CHAPTER 1

The Seat of Awakening

Jack Kornfield · 52 min

> In this opening talk from a spring insight meditation retreat, Jack Kornfield invites practitioners to understand the profound significance of taking their seat of awakening—just as the Buddha sat beneath the Bodhi tree. Drawing from the mythological encounter between the Buddha and Māra, Kornfield illuminates how temptation, aggression, and doubt inevitably arise when we commit to stillness, and how these challenges can be met with compassion rather than resistance.
> Kornfield weaves together wisdom from diverse sources—John Muir's exhilarating account of climbing a Douglas spruce during a fierce storm, Viktor Frankl's observations from concentration camps, and the teachings of Ajahn Chah—to illustrate the fearlessness required for genuine transformation. He emphasizes that fearlessness doesn't mean absence of fear, but rather the willingness to face whatever arises: bodily tension, restless thoughts, difficult emotions, grief, and the 'Freudian layer' of family conditioning.
> The talk explores the foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), beginning with breath and body awareness, moving through feelings and mental states. Kornfield teaches that when we stop running and truly take our seat, a natural healing unfolds—the body releases its held tensions, emotions that want to be honored arise, and renewal becomes possible. Through the metaphor of fireflies rising from an alfalfa field, he points to how life naturally wants to renew itself when met with loving awareness. The invitation is to remember our true nature: not the body of fear, but the timeless awareness that witnesses all arising and passing phenomena.

Good evening to you.

Here we've completed the first day of the retreat, and I'd like to talk about what we're doing here, why we're here—which may have occurred to you as a question during a particularly difficult sitting or windy walking. You think, "Gosh, I could have been in San Diego where it's sunny and on the beach, or maybe for the same amount of money gone to Hawaii."

I want to talk in particular about what it means to take the seat of awakening that we have together—to take a seat in the midst of this mystery of our human life, our human incarnation.

There is an artist in Colorado who created a beautiful temple, partly made out of beautiful cedar and wood, and in the center of it is a very large transparent crystal made of glass, six feet high or more. Inside are 7.2 billion grains of salt. It's about half full or a little bit more, and it rotates every twenty-four hours on two metal rods. She's the priestess of what she calls the salt monument. Every evening she goes with a jar of beautiful glass and pours out of the bottom 200,000 grains of salt, then does a ritual to bury them. That's the 200,000 people that died today on the planet. And every morning after the sun rises, she takes another beautiful vessel and pours in the top 250,000 grains of salt. That's the 250,000 people that were born today. And she does a prayer of blessing for each of those beings who come in.

So this is us. We take our seat like a Buddha under our own tree of enlightenment, like the bodhisattva of compassion, and sit in this mystery of human incarnation, quieting the mind, opening the heart. As we do, as we take this seat of awakening, then Mara appears.

For those of you not familiar with Mara by name, Mara was here visiting you today. Mara is the mythological name in India for the god or being who represents all the troubles and struggles and pains and difficulties of the world. As the story is told—the myth of the Buddha on the night of his enlightenment—seated under the tree of awakening, Mara attacked with temptations of all different kinds. When that didn't work, then came the armies of Mara, all kinds of aggression. When the spears of Mara's army and the flaming arrows came at the Buddha seated there under the tree, he raised his hand. There are these beautiful paintings of this. He touched each one with the heart of compassion. A little drawing in the painting has a line going from his heart to his fingertips. And the arrows and spears turned into flower petals and fell at his feet.

Then Mara said, "Alright, temptation isn't going to do it for you and aggression won't get you. How about doubt? By what right do you have to sit here and think that you should awaken, that you can awaken?"

At that moment, the gesture that the Buddha made was to touch the earth with one hand. You see lots of these mudras or expressions in the Buddhist iconography. He said, "The earth is my witness that I have a right to sit here, that I have earned through countless eons of patience and compassion and care and devotion and understanding, that I and all beings have a right to sit here and remember who we really are. We have a right to awaken."

In that moment of touching the earth, saying "the earth is my witness," this gesture is really the gesture for you as well, as Mara comes. Anybody notice Mara today? Don't raise your hand, no need. He gets around, you know. Yes, he was in ancient India, but somehow he found you in Yucca Valley. How could this be?

What this story tells us, what it reminds us of, is our capacity to awaken, to touch the earth. The earth is my witness. I, you, we have the capacity to awaken the mind and heart wherever we are. And to awaken no matter what. With the worst aggression and the worst fear and the worst doubt, we still have the capacity to take our seat in the midst of it all.

As Viktor Frankl said, "We who lived through the concentration camps can remember those who walked through the huts comforting others and giving away their last piece of bread. They may have been few in number, but their very existence proves the last and final freedom of human beings—the freedom to choose your spirit no matter what the circumstance."

So here we are, and we stop. We take the seat of awakening. Rollo May said, "It is an ironic habit that human beings run faster when we have lost our way." On retreat, we stop and we take this seat. As we do, of course, all the worries and tasks and thoughts of work and money and family and the unfinished business of the heart and the creativity attacks and the addictions that we have and the ways that we're lost in thought—all those things come.

And it turns out you don't have to go to the Bodhi tree in Bodh Gaya in Bihar, India. You don't have to go to the Himalayas. You're in the perfect spot to awaken just where you are. When you stop and take the seat of awakening, then you will naturally encounter the forces that keep the mind small or limited or caught in all kinds of ways, as the Buddha did.

You'll encounter temptation and desire and greed and compulsion. You'll encounter frustration and anger and aggression and doubt—all of these things.

And yet when you look deeply with compassion, you see that there's really nothing more profound for you to do than to find that inner freedom, to not be caught by these powers and confusions and addictions that also catch the whole world and that you carry within you. Because it's very clear that no amount of computers and nanotechnology and biotechnology and space technology—all the outer technologies of the world—are going to stop the continuing warfare and continuing racism and continuing environmental destruction and confusion and tribalism. The outer developments have to be matched by the inner developments of humanity.

And so we have this extraordinary situation. In my pocket I have my smartphone, which contains the great library of Alexandria times a thousand. But we also know that there are some deep questions that can't be answered by Google—which is why you're here. The outer technology answers some things. But somehow human beings have to find in their hearts an equivalent development of interconnection and compassion, a new way of being.

It takes a kind of courage to do this. It's courageous of you to sign up and do a retreat, whether you've done them before or not. Each time is a kind of leaping in. And today it was cold and windy. You came from these nice warm places, maybe. Maybe you didn't.

I love the story of John Muir, who writes about "one of the most beautiful and exhilarating storms I ever enjoyed, in the Sierras in December 1874. When the storm began to sound, this huge storm, I lost no time in pushing deep into the woods to enjoy it. For nature always has something rare to show us, and the danger to life and limb is hardly greater than one would experience crouching deprecatingly beneath a roof."

So the big storm is there and Muir says, okay, bring it on. He trekked to the top of the highest ridge in the neighborhood, "gained the summit to get my ear closer to the Aeolian music of its topmost needles. I made a choice of the tallest of a group of Douglas spruces that were over 150 feet high. Though comparatively young, their lithe, brushy tops were rocking and swirling with wild ecstasy in the wind." And he lashed himself to the top, in this great storm. You've got to picture this.

"Never before did I enjoy so noble an exhilaration of motion. In its widest sweeps, my treetop described an arc from 20 to 30 degrees, but I felt sure of its elastic temper amidst all the other trees that were swaying, waving like fields of grain, rippling undulations of the trees like grasses from ridge to ridge, shiny foliage stirred by the great waves of the wind. And the sounds of the storms corresponded gloriously with this wild exuberance of light and motion—the profound bass of the naked branches and boles booming like waterfalls, the quick tense vibrations of the pine needles rising to shrill whistling hiss and falling to silky murmur, the rustling of laurel groves in the dells and the keen click of leaf upon leaf. All this was heard as attention calmly bent to the Aeolian music. I kept my lofty perch for hours, closing my eyes to enjoy the music itself and feast on the delicious fragrance streaming past of the warm rain and the balsamic buds steeped like tea."

So you're kind of doing the same thing, right? More or less. Muir was the man who took Teddy Roosevelt around California, brought him through Yosemite, and inspired him to begin the national park system. John Muir was really a sage, but he also had this capacity to stop and listen—to listen to something so vast and extraordinary.

Here you've taken your seat of awakening and Mara has come in all his glory. That's fine. Mara always gets here. And then what happens is sometimes our hearts get frightened. We're afraid to climb the ridge or lash ourselves to the tree or even stay in our seat and let go and allow ourselves to experience the sweep of the mystery and the appearance and disappearance of all things. Because whatever happened today is already gone. Mara made this huge show and you could barely stay in your seat. And where is he now? Back in Bihar taking a rest. He'll return, but he's in India for the moment, or wherever he goes back to.

When our hearts are frightened to touch all the things of the world, we contract and things become solid. And when they start to open, we see that it's waves of experience arising out of emptiness, appearing for a time and displaying themselves like that Aeolian music, and then vanishing.

To take the seat in the midst of all things requires a kind of fearlessness. And dharma practice, to really transform the heart, asks a fearlessness of you. But fearlessness doesn't mean no fear. It has a different meaning. In Tibet, it's traditional for Vajrayana practitioners to pray for difficulties. It's like, come on Mara, bring it on. May I have suffering in my life. Grant me suffering enough to so that the great heart of compassion will open in me. That's not an American style prayer as far as I know. It's got a very different tenor to it. Because the goal of that isn't the goal of habit or comfort or the small self. It's really much more the goal of the liberation of the heart.

One of my favorite passages comes from Karl Friedrich Graf von Dürckheim, who was a Zen teacher in the Black Forest. He said: when faced with difficulty and challenges in your life, do not go and seek out those friends who comfort you, those friends who want to cushion you and keep the old small self in its place. But rather seek out those who encourage you to risk yourself and to take a step into the unknown, to be willing to face something greater than you have faced before—so that you are even willing to die, because it is only dying day by day into something new, only facing that which is unknown, that that which is indestructible can be born within you. Seek out those who recommend you to turn, when it's windy, to lean into the wind. To climb to the top of the tree, to be willing to face that which is difficult, so that only when you face that and gone through it, maybe again and again, can that which is indestructible be born in your heart, be discovered in you.

Now, for those of you who are experienced students, I think I should say this, because you come and you think, okay, I've done retreats. Some of you are friends that I've known for ten, twenty, thirty, forty years, been coming back a long time. So it should be easy by now, right? You and Mara have a good relationship, right?

But I remember visiting Ajahn Chah, my teacher, when he was quite sick. He had diabetes and water in his brain. They put a shunt in. He had been in the hospital on and off for a long time. He was back in the monastery and I was staying with him. He was kind of weak. I bowed. I hadn't seen him for a while. We talked about how he was, and then I said to him, "Well, this is what you're always teaching us, that life includes illness and old age and sickness and death." And he peered back at me and he said, "Don't say that so glibly." I was like twenty-eight years old at that time going back to see him. He said, "Yeah, don't say that so glibly. Old age, sickness, and death, right?"

I was talking to Ram Dass in Hawaii about my own brushes with death and illness. And sometimes thinking, okay, I've done all these practices and I'll be really calm—I've done these trainings, sitting in the charnel grounds and imagining my own death and so forth. It'll be all easy. But at certain points it wasn't. And Ram Dass laughed. He said, "Oh, yeah, I flunked the course a bunch of times."

So it's important to understand that yes, you've trained, and yes, you have an acquaintance with Mara, even those more experienced. But it doesn't also necessarily mean that Mara won't return in all kinds of new forms and new phases of life.

So then what to do? Each time, you want to stop and turn toward it in some deep way and let yourself calm and make space for what's actually present, whatever it happens to be. And there's something beautiful that I watch and feel in the room as we sit together. Even though the first few days are restless and sleepy in their struggle, there's also something that starts to sweep across the room and through our hearts and psyches—a tenderness to it, and a courage, and a stillness. Even in the beginning, you start to feel, you might not even feel it in yourself, but you look around and all these other people are sitting so still, they look like Buddhists. You don't know how crazy it is in their minds, but they look really good. You're looking good, right? And there's something that starts to happen in the field. And you start to remember, oh yeah, it's possible to stop and really be present.

Nelly Sachs, a wonderful poet who won the Nobel Prize, wrote these poems after the Holocaust and the Second World War: "Someone will take the ball from the hands that play the game of terror. Stars have their own law of fire and their fertility is the light. And reapers and harvesters are not native here. Far off stand their granaries."

Straw, too, has a momentary power of illumination, painting loneliness. Someone will come and sew the green of the spring bud on their prayer shawl and set the child's silken curl as a sign on the brow of the century. And here amen must be said, this crowning of words which moves into hiding. And peace, you great eyelid, closing on all unrest, your heavenly wreath of lashes brings you the most gentle of all births.

And somehow she found this place of stillness even after a life of tremendous tragedy and struggle.

So we start to sense what it means just to stop and breathe, to open to the vastness of the desert and the vastness of the mind. We begin to unlayer the foundations of mindfulness as we're talking each day—starting with breath and body, then moving through the foundations of feelings and thoughts. And you start to feel the breath breathe herself, himself. This mystery of inter-breathing with the winds that sweep the desert and the breath of the person next to you and the breath of the coyote behind the rocks and the breath of the lizard and the winds that brushed Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa and flowed over the Pacific and came to the desert to you. You are part of all of that vastness.

Then you start to pay attention to your body. It breathes. It's bigger than what you thought. It's part of this whole interbeing of breath. But of course, at first the body can be full of tension that we carry. Why is your body hurting while meditating? Are you sitting the wrong way? Not likely. It's because you sit quietly and then your body says, "Hey, remember me? You've been running me around. Every time you got uptight, you clenched your jaw. Your shoulders took a little hit, and your back." Pretty soon you sit quietly and your body hurts, and it's just saying, "Here, let me allow you to feel what you've been carrying."

If you stay present—if, as Mary Oliver writes, you let the soft animal of your body love what it loves—you begin to feel that it wants to open. Even if you feel the pain of it for a time, it then starts to release: the trembling, the tightness. As you allow the mindfulness, it begins to unfold.

Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche, the Tibetan Lama and son of Chögyam Trungpa, is a very experienced horseman, as was his whole family. He writes about taking his favorite horse, Rocky, up a high mountain trail at eleven thousand feet or more in the Rocky Mountains. Rocky was great on the plains—a galloping horse, a horse in the ring—but he had never done high trail riding. It was a narrow trail. You know, trail horses know how to back up or turn around, but Rocky had never done this.

So they came to a place where there was a very narrow trail, a steep cliff on the left, and a thousand-foot drop on the right, a little bit of scree, not so easy. Rocky slowed down and paused. Sakyong Mipham looked at it and thought, "He could slip and we could both die." Before they started, he shifted himself a little to the left in the saddle—in case Rocky slipped, he could bail off and hold on to the rock. He shifted his weight, and then Rocky turned his head around and looked at him with his big eye, as if to say, "You what? I thought we were in this together." And then Sakyong Mipham realized what he was doing and shifted himself back to the center of the saddle. Rocky nodded, went very carefully, and they made it.

This is really what it means to take a seat in your body. There will be parts you want to move away from, squirm away from—it's too hard. When you bring mindfulness to your body, when you take the seat of awakening, you begin to allow the tension and pain. Your body starts to sing its music to you—some of it throbbing and tingling and opening, some of it twisting and tight and fiery. You allow the music of the body, and you make a wise relationship with it.

And then, of course, you get your mind. Alas, Hafez writes, the mind is ever a tourist wanting to touch and buy new things and toss them into an already full closet. It has no pride, and it secretes thoughts just like your salivary gland secretes saliva. You sit here, and sometimes it's like you're in Motel 6 late at night, and you're on some bad TV channel, and the channel won't turn off. Ninety percent of your thoughts are repeats—have you noticed that? And if you could hear the thoughts of the person next to you through a little speaker, you would think, "Huh?" And then, "Oh, really?" And then you'd start to shift your seat away, like, "Wow, really?" It's pretty wild in there.

And it's not like you're supposed to stop it. I love that New Yorker cartoon showing a car crossing the vast Utah desert, and there's a roadside billboard that says, "Your own tedious thoughts next 200 miles." That's a little like meditation.

So you get to see the mind, and it does everything. With mindfulness, you begin to be present for the mind doing its thing. You begin to be present for the body, as we've talked about. You also begin to be present for all the moods and emotions, which are like the weather of the desert. The sun shines, and then the clouds come, and the sprinkles of rain. A huge wind comes up, then it settles down, and it's absolutely still. And then it gets wild again.

One of my favorite things to watch and show people on YouTube—it's not a cat video, I promise you. There's a famous experiment done by Walter Mischel who was testing four-year-old children about deferred gratification. It's a very famous psychological experiment, because it turns out that if young children have learned at four or five years old to defer gratification, that's a kind of inner strength, like John Muir, where they can move through the world. It's a great predictor of success, and it's something you want to foster in them—a little bit of grit, or whatever the education word of the day might be.

So there you are, you watch the YouTube video, and they bring this hapless little boy or girl, four years old, and set them in a chair. There's one marshmallow on a plate, and they say, "Just sit quietly, we'll be back in a couple of minutes, and if you can sit with the marshmallow and not eat it, then we'll bring you two marshmallows." And they close the door. And you watch these kids' faces, staring at it. Sometimes they'll reach out, and they even touch it, and they squish it a little, and then they pull back. One kid picked it up and looked around, took a tiny little lick of it and put it back. They are struggling so hard not to eat that marshmallow.

So your emotions will come. Desire will come. It's supposed to come. We're desire beings. You can't get rid of desire. It's like being on a diet, as the poet says, and hiding the chocolate chip cookies. And you're the only person in the entire galaxy who knows where the chocolate chip cookies are hidden. Desire is part of being human. So you have to sit with Mara appearing in desire form.

Or your loneliness comes. And if you can't bear your loneliness or your restlessness or your boredom, what do you do? When you're home, the minute you get lonely or bored, what do you do? You open the refrigerator. Or you go online. Because you can't be with yourself. So here, when it comes, you say, okay. Again, as the poet Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness too quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few human ingredients can."

So you sit with it. Restless, bored, lonely. Your love, your joy, your tenderness, your fear, your confusion. Because it's all in there. War is in you. Hate is in you. Racism is in you. Courage, compassion, doubt. The tainted glory of humanity is there for you to experience when you take the seat of awakening. And your gift is to be able to open yourself to it and give a bow to each one. It's like the Buddha touching those spears with the heart of compassion and saying, yes, this too, this too is part of being human.

And the main thing is not to judge it. If you're sleepy, you know why you're sleepy? You've been running around. Your body says, "Hey, God, you're quiet now. Thank you. Oh, sleep time." You need it. And if you think that it's a bad thing, just go to an ashram or a Zen monastery in Japan or India in the afternoon for the noonday demons to arise.

All these great meditators are nodding off. It's just part of your humanity, and you'll get all of your humanity as you sit here. So the point isn't to judge it. As Auden the poet says, the point is to love your crooked neighbor with your own crooked heart.

Just to see that we're all in it together. And it's not about perfecting yourself according to some ideal of how you're supposed to be. It's about perfecting your love, your capacity to really love this life that we've been given.

And so practice, to begin with, in this seat of awakening is simply to bow to what happens and say, "Ah yes, this too." And to feel your life breath breathing itself in the midst of it all. Later we'll talk about how, once you've taken this seat of awakening and you're able to stay centered and wise, there's all manner of things that need to be responded to. So it's not just passive. But this is the first critical, important step.

In taking this seat of awakening, my teacher Ajahn Chah called it taking the one seat in the middle of the whole world and opening the doors and windows. And your only instruction, he said, is to keep your senses open—your eyes, your ears, your heart open—and not get off your seat. The rest will all teach you. All that will come is your teacher. You don't need anything more than that.

So you meet with respect, with the doors open, with a spacious and kind heart, whatever wants to arise. And as you do, a profound healing starts to take place. You experience the physical pains in the body, or the conflict in your life, or the memories of guilt and grief and what I call the Freudian layer—your relation to your family. There's a reason they call it nuclear family, by the way, but we won't go there.

The dukkha, the suffering—along with the unbearable beauty of life, there's also an ocean of tears. And we all are part of that. We have the tears of the world, of environmental destruction and climate change and continuing warfare, all those things we carry in us. But we also carry the lineage of the sufferings of our families and communities, what has happened to us and to them.

But underneath the suffering that we carry and the Freudian layer, if you can sit with it and listen deeply, there comes a kind of healing. What feeling wants to be honored in you that you've run away from? The grief, the longing, the love, the loneliness, the creativity? What in your body wants to heal, to be touched with healing attention? What story wants to be let go of or forgiven? What comes that's true? What truth wants to be acknowledged? This is really the way it is. It's like this. What wants to be accepted in you?

When you can sit with this kind of open and caring attention—loving awareness, mindfulness—there will come in its season a sense of renewal and goodness and flowering. "Although the world is full of suffering," says Helen Keller, "it is also full of the overcoming of it." The suffering is not the end of the story. And there comes in you a sense of capacity and presence and renewal.

I remember this from being in the Cambodian refugee camps—these long rows of little bamboo huts that were about seven feet long and four feet wide for a family, with a little open door with a cloth hanging over it. In front of each hut there was a square, maybe one yard of earth where the path went into the door. That was their little plot, and then there was the next hut.

After a month or two in this dry, barren place, the UNHCR had made seeds available. And almost everybody took these little seeds for squash and beans and things. There was a big pit well at the end of this huge camp of 100,000 people. You'd go with your bucket and stand in the hot sun in a long line, walk all the way down, and get a bucket of water. There's this line of people, and they'd be watering the little plants in their garden. These were people who'd lost their villages, whose temples were burned, whose lives were saved out of a wreckage of genocide really, just horrors. And there they were, planting their seeds and pouring the water. There were the tendrils of the beans and the peas and the things that they planted growing over the doorway.

Because life, when we allow it, when we attend to it, when we water it with our loving awareness—it wants to renew itself in us.

In the 1990s, I started a rigorous six-year academic program in Boston that required me to work during the day, take classes at night, and do homework on weekends. I was exhausted. On my first summer off, I wanted to get far away from studies and work with my hands and get close to the earth. So I went to live with an Amish family in Pennsylvania. The experience renewed me, and I decided to do it again the next summer.

But that year my father died, and shortly after, I drove from Boston to Pennsylvania on a holiday weekend. What was normally a six-hour trip took more than ten hours. By the time I arrived just before dusk, I was anxious and exhausted. My Amish hosts had delayed their dinner for me, and during the meal I tried to act natural, but I felt my grief and I was full of nerves.

My Amish host could clearly tell something was amiss, because at the end of dinner he said, "Come with me." I followed him to their backyard, which bordered an alfalfa field. Although his faith discouraged smoking, the farmer lit a cigarette. Three of his children gamboled about while two others clung to him. The farmer stood without saying a word, looking out over the alfalfa.

I did the same. The dark green field was becoming harder to see in the fading light. The sky was peach at the bottom and deep blue higher up. Stars had begun to appear. And then out of the alfalfa rose fireflies—a few at first, but soon there were hundreds. Their pinpricks of light mingled with the stars, heaven and earth meeting in this humble man's backyard. I felt my anxiety leave me. And the farmer turned and said, "That's for you."

There's something that wants to renew itself in us, in you and in me. When we willingly take our seat—the seat of awakening—we bring to it also a kind of growing faith in our capacity to open. And it knows how to open. The body knows how to open. You don't have to pull the petals of the flower to get it open. Your grief knows how to open. It will come with its ocean of tears and stories and sorrows in the body and pain in the heart. Your longing, your love, your creative connection to life—all these know how to open. You can absolutely trust this.

And then you discover that what you most long for is already here. As Thoreau famously said, many men go fishing all their lives without realizing it's not fish they're after. But there's something about standing out in that stream with your fishing rod, or sitting on your cushion taking this one seat, where you stop and you listen to something so mysterious and magnificent.

This is from James Baldwin: "Love takes off the masks that we fear we cannot live without and know we cannot live within. I use the word love here not merely in a personal sense, but as a state of being or a state of grace. Not the mistaken and even infantile sense of being made happy, but the tough and universal sense of quest and daring and growth and unconquerable love."

And so something really deep grows in you—what you long for—which is to be home in your own body and in the universe, to take this seat, to sense its vastness, to know that you are not just the small sense of self. You are not what's called the body of fear. You've encountered it, it's in you. But that's not who you are. There's some shift that opens from the small sense of self, the body of fear, and you recognize that you are connected with everything. Or as Nisargadatta, my teacher, said: wisdom says I am nothing and love says I am everything. Between these two my life flows.

If you want to do a little practice sometime while you're here, or even just to reflect on it, I'd like to offer this: look in the mirror and notice that you've aged. It droops, it sags, it loses its fur—or it sprouts other fur. It does. It's really quite remarkable. The hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard. It gets wrinkly and saggy. It's the animal of your body going through its changes.

But the strange thing—which we all know from experience—is that we don't necessarily feel older. You know that experience? You can say, "Gosh, how did that happen?" It's a remarkable thing because in that moment, you recognize that it's the body that's aged. It was this infant, this little child, teenager, young person—and it goes through its arc of what human bodies do.

But in that moment of looking and saying, "Hmm, I don't feel older," it's because the loving awareness, the consciousness—you could call it the spirit of who you are—exists outside of time. You're not this body made out of Caesar salad and yams and oatmeal. You're just not oatmeal. That's simply not the truth of who you are. And you're not your thoughts, thank God. And you're not your feelings. You have to honor them as you honor this body. It's a magnificent, beautiful thing to have this human incarnation. But who you are was born into this body—its vastness and emptiness and timeless consciousness.

And this isn't something I want to convince you about. It's much more something to invite you to remember, to know.

"Try to be mindful," said Ajahn Chah, "and let things take their natural course. Then your mind will become still in any surroundings, like a clear forest pool. All kinds of wonderful and rare animals will come to drink at the pool, and you will clearly see the nature of all things. You will see many strange and wonderful things come and go, but you will be still. This is the happiness of a Buddha."

"How nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Remember this capacity for awakening. You are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones. This capacity for freedom—it will bless you and your life and all you touch.

And it's so deeply needed in this world to have some who, instead of running away from the world, have really stopped and seen it—the beauty and the suffering, the glory and the difficulty—and found this seat in the midst of it all: a wise and peaceful heart.

So if you're having a hard time, perfect. Anybody have a completely easy day? Don't raise your hand. Everyone will be jealous, and we will be dubious. Because it's not how it starts, and it's not really what it means to be human. You get the whole thing.

It's truly an honor to be able to sit together as we do, to share this practice of awakening, freedom, and love. Because until you can let yourself really be present, you can't know the magnitude or the blessing fully—the blessing of love. And in a way, we also all want that.

From the poet Rilke: "In order for a thing to speak to you, you must regard it for a certain time as the only one that exists." Through your laborious and exclusive love—like each breath, the only one, the only phenomenon—now placed at the center of the universe. And in that incomparable place, in that moment on that day, it is attended by angels.

So we're learning something really magnificent and difficult and beautiful—tedious and boring, too. But Gandhi called it blessed monotony.

Thank you for your practice, for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 2

The Bodhisattva Leaves a Retreat

> In this closing talk from a Spring Insight Meditation Retreat, Jack Kornfield addresses the profound challenge of transitioning from the silence and sensitivity cultivated in retreat back into the complexity of daily life. He introduces the bodhisattva ideal—the commitment to embody freedom while bringing awakening to all one touches—tracing it from the Buddha's own journey after his enlightenment under the Bodhi tree.
> Kornfield guides practitioners through an experiential paired meditation exploring the four brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity), inviting participants to gaze into another's eyes and perceive both their unique personhood and their timeless Buddha nature. This practice illuminates how loving awareness naturally arises when we attend deeply to another being, seeing both their secret beauty and their measure of sorrows.
> The talk weaves together the Four Noble Truths with practical wisdom for engaging with a world marked by suffering, racism, and political turmoil. Kornfield emphasizes that awakening is not a journey from here to there, but from there to here—becoming intimate with all things. He encourages practitioners to discover and deliver their unique "cargo" or gift to the world, drawing on stories of Thich Nhất Hạnh, the Dalai Lama, and everyday moments of grace. The teaching concludes with the Buddha's instruction: "Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate."

So here you are, you've been talking. Between the world of silence and the world of talking, do you have a preference? I see some nodding heads. What's your preference? Silence? Isn't that nice? I mean, they're nice people and everything. And how does it feel in your body after the days of silence to be talking? Hard? It's resonating a lot, isn't it?

Now we live in the sea of this out there, but here you got a bit quieter and still, and you've become more sensitive. We'll talk about it in the morning as you leave—that you have to respect this sensitivity over these next days. But I think more deeply, you have to respect that you're sensitive beings. We armor ourselves and we learn to navigate all of this. But in fact, we're also organisms that are tremendously sensitive and tender. And we've created a world where that's not so well supported, is it? You know, in our society.

So tonight I want to talk about the ideal of the bodhisattva. Bodhisattva is a compound word most of you have heard. Bodhi means awakening or free. And sattva means a being committed to liberation or awakening. The notion of the bodhisattva—the ideal of both embodying freedom and then bringing it to all you touch—is there from the very beginning in Buddhism, in every one of the schools, and from the earliest time. The Buddha himself was called the Bodhisattva for lifetime after lifetime of training and practice and developing these capacities of awakening.

After his awakening under the Bodhi tree, his bodhisattva activity is very simple. People say, well, is this passive? He sat, he had his deep revelation of wisdom and freedom. And then he stood up and he walked for forty-five years the dusty roads of India. Before he walked, before he stood up, it occurred to him: What should I do right now that this awakening is so clear? And with his mind so clear, he surveyed the world with what's called the eye of wisdom and compassion. He saw beings everywhere creating suffering out of ignorance and misunderstanding. And he knew that there was a way to teach them that they could live with greater happiness and freedom.

But as he saw the suffering that humans create, tears rolled down his cheeks, and when they touched the earth, they turned into the goddess Tara or Quan Yin, one of the bodhisattvas of compassion, as the myth goes. He saw the possibility in the midst of the suffering of the world for awakening. And then he got up and he said, let me walk through the roads of this world for as long as I live and invite others to this freedom and to this understanding.

So that's where you will be returning to—the dusty world of Fresno or Los Angeles or Albuquerque or wherever it happens to be. And it's not actually going to be that easy. First of all, we live in an addicted society where the best adjusted person is somebody who's not quite alive but just consuming and working all the time and not questioning too much. We're taught not to question.

And we live in a world, the human world, where there is dukkha, or suffering—the first noble truth. One of the Buddha's first teachings is that human incarnation involves suffering. Anybody not have that? Raise your hand, you can have your money back. And it's serious. It's loss and illness and aging. So there's that kind of suffering. And then there's the human-caused suffering of climate change that we have to deal with, and continuing racism and warfare.

Somebody was asking why we have groups for POC or white allies or white awareness groups and so forth. One of the dedications in our community now is especially around this, because there's so much visible pain around racism in our culture right now. And it's there in the political campaign.

The Buddhist teachings are a medicine for this. From the very beginning, the Buddha said that the Dharma gates welcome every single human being for their fundamental dignity, their beauty, their spirit—whatever your race or caste or creed or orientation or gender, the Dharma gates welcome you. He was really radical in that way, especially in that time.

But now we're in this culture that has racism as one of its wounds—maybe the core wound of our culture. A lot of the economic problems and disparity, and many other kinds of suffering, come from seeing people as other. And so it becomes really important to use our Dharma to awaken and see the dignity of every single being.

You'll be out there, and first of all, you'll see and hear in the conversation that racism—this is James Baldwin—he writes, "One of the reasons that people cling to their hate and prejudice so stubbornly, I believe, is that they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pains." And so if we can project it on the enemy du jour—whether it was the communists or the gays or the Muslims or the blacks or the immigrants or the Mexicans or whatever—it's like the insecurity. We are insecure. We're vulnerable. It's true as human beings. This is our lot. Things change. When we can't bear this, then we project it on others.

And then the politicians of the world—this is from H. L. Mencken, a great political commentator of a hundred years ago—he says, "The whole aim of politics is to frighten and menace the populace with an endless series of fearful hobgoblins, almost all of them unreal," simply as a way to gain power, to try to make you afraid in some way or other.

So I'm just giving you some little hints about what's out there. And for those who are interested in the presidential campaign, my advice is part of the time just turn off the news and turn on Mozart, please—or somebody else, Lady Gaga, anybody. You'll have enough information. It's just for information's sake to know that the race is now between Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump and that's been settled. Nobody else is in it. So we live in interesting times.

These energies that I'm talking about in different ways are out there. And so how do we deal with that? And more than that, how do we, as the Buddha did, walk through this dusty world with its enormous sufferings and its unbearable beauty? Which is what human incarnation gives us.

Now, what did we learn here that is important to carry and to take with us? One of the first things is that our states of mind, our spirit, the way we approach the world means almost everything.

Who is your enemy? Ask the Buddha. Mind is your enemy. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can hurt you more than your own mind untrained. You know this. Talk about being in trouble—the biggest trouble you can make is your own damn mind, right? And who is your friend? A trained and awakened mind and heart can carry you anywhere. Through the dusty world, the world of the ten thousand joys and sorrows.

What you've started to learn here is that there's a way to sit and walk and be in this human incarnation of its ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows with wisdom, with a loving awareness or mindfulness that sees the play of experience.

And you've learned to actually see deeply. I like to talk about the Vipassana facelift at the end of the retreat. I look at some of you and honestly, you look a lot younger. It's beautiful. Look in the mirror. Your eyes are brighter, your skin smoother. It might have been a tough retreat, but something happened to you. You can tell—you walk in the desert and in certain moments you just feel so much more open and connected. We all know this. It's like we're cleansed a bit and we can see deeply.

And you see deeply anyway at certain moments—when you listen to sacred music or enter a great cathedral, or there at the birth of a child, or that mystery when you're with someone as they die and that spirit leaves as silently as a falling star and something mysterious happens. Who are we? We have this life and then it disappears. Or making love, or sacred medicine—all kinds of ways that you touch something that's so much greater than the limited sense of self. Walking in the cathedral of the redwoods, and then that small sense of self opens up and you realize, as Wes talked about, it's not me, the separate self, but this is—I am life.

Alice Walker writes, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was. And it came to me, that feeling of being a part of everything."

And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and ran all around the house. When it happens, you just can't miss it.

And so you get to see more deeply here the human lot that you were born into, with greater wisdom. And that deep seeing allows you to attend to the world and see what's called its secret beauty—the dignity of each person that's there.

Dante, back in the late 1300s, was standing on the edge of the Ponte Vecchio in Florence, this marvelous medieval bridge. And he saw a young woman standing on the bridge—Beatrice—and he was so smitten by her beauty and her spirit, he was just swept away. Not just how she looked, but somehow how she touched him. And he got to know her a little bit. And then she died; she died in the plague. But she didn't die to him.

She became his muse in some way. And he then went and wrote one of the most magnificent poems and works of art, certainly in Western literature—the Divine Comedy, the Inferno and Paradiso, all of that extraordinary work. And it was the vision of Beatrice that carried him through all that.

So in the Second World War, toward the end of the war, when the Allies were going up the Italian peninsula with their tanks and bombs, and the Germans and Italian army were retreating, the Germans were blowing up all the bridges over the rivers so that the Allied forces couldn't use them and couldn't advance. But the German general was a literate man. And he was just north of Florence. And he contacted the main general of the Allied forces and said, "I don't want to blow up the Ponte Vecchio. But I need you to promise that if I don't blow it up, you won't use it for any military purposes." And the American general contacted him back, made radio contact, and made a promise that they wouldn't use the bridge—which held. The bridge wasn't blown up. Not one single American soldier or piece of equipment went across it. And it's still there.

The bridge was spared in this terrible, ruthless modern war because Beatrice stood on it. And Dante had a vision of beauty that changed everything for him. And that kind of vision—seeing the secret beauty of the world—is really what's offered to us in this practice.

So I want us to do a little practice now, instead of just talking to you. This is the practice side. See, you have your habits, and some people are already kind of putting one foot in the stirrup and getting in their meditation saddle. It's so interesting to watch, right?

This is going to be a paired meditation for about ten minutes or so. And what I want you to do is stay silent. I'd like to invite you to turn to someone near you and sit opposite them so that you can just face them kindly, with no words. And then we'll do a little guided meditation practice.

So settle yourself for a moment, and let yourself be ready now, in a silent way, to attend with this open-mindedness—to see deeply this other being. Take a deep breath or two. Relax. Release any tension that's present. And then, when you're ready, gaze into each other's eyes. And if you're introverted or shy, which is also fine, and you feel a little discomfort or the urge to laugh or look away, just note that embarrassment with patience and gentleness. And come back when you can to your partner's eyes.

For you may never have the opportunity to see this person, the uniqueness of them, in this way again.

And as you look into this person's eyes, let yourself see the beauty behind these eyes, the beautiful spirit that was born there, the original goodness, the capacity for love. Open your awareness to the gifts and strengths behind these eyes. Behind these eyes are unmeasured reserves of courage, intelligence, patience, wit, and wisdom—so many gifts born into this human being, some of which this person themselves may be unaware.

As you see their beautiful spirit that was born into them and carried to this day, and all the kindnesses they may have offered the world, and all the possibilities of this amazing being, sense the natural goodwill you have for them—how you would like them too to be free from fear and confusion, to be well. And know that what you are now experiencing is the great, natural loving-kindness.

As you look into these eyes, stay connected. Continue to look and take a deeper breath. Looking deeply, let go of the loving-kindness. Let yourself also become aware of the measure of pain that is there behind these eyes—the measure of sorrows accumulated in this life, as in all human lives, that you can only guess at. There are disappointments and losses, failures and loneliness, hurts beyond the telling.

Let yourself sense that pain, the hurts this person may have never told another human being. You cannot fix their pain, but you can be with it with a spirit of courage. As you let yourself simply be in the presence of their measure of sorrows, as you see them, you might see a frightened child. Imagine what your response would be—a hurt child, how you would reach out to comfort. Know that what you see now is giving birth to the great heart of compassion. It is essential for the healing of the world.

Take a deep breath as you continue to gaze. We are going through the four divine brahmaviharas, the awakened heart. Can you continue to look and let go of the compassion and the seeing of sorrows, and look even deeper?

As you look into these eyes again, you can also see the secret beauty and joy that is there—the child of the spirit that was born into this body. Imagine their happiest moments as a child, their best adventure, their laughing and running, their zest and joy. Let yourself sense the delight they take in collaborating with others, in playing and creating in the world—how they learned first to run and catch and play, and then read and grow, and bring this world alive with their joy. As you see in these eyes the child of the spirit born there, know that what you are now experiencing is mudita, the joy in another's joy, the delight in the joy of another. The true nature.

And finally, take one more deep breath, staying connected with these eyes. Let your awareness drop deep, like a stone sinking below the level of words, to see that consciousness which underlies all life, the web of life you have both taken birth in. See the consciousness behind these eyes and the face before you as one who, at another time and place, has been young and old, awake and asleep, lost. Who has been your son or daughter, your mother or father, your friend, your enemy, your student, your teacher.

Who are you really? Look deeply now—not the body, not the thoughts or feelings, not conditioning. Let yourself see the timeless spirit. And who is it that is seeing? Is this who I am? The timeless awareness, mystery, pure knowing. Rest in it. Trust it. It is your home.

Let your eyes close for a moment. Just rest. And again, let them open. Acknowledge your partner and take literally just one minute to thank them in any way you wish.

Okay. It's been great this year. We'll talk. I'll see you soon. I hope to see you. Thank you.

Finish up. And if we had a lot more time, I'd just let you talk to one another in this way. I know this can be difficult at times when you feel shy or embarrassed. But also it can open something—to see the beauty of another being this way. I've had people raise their hand and say, "I was married to this woman or this man for twenty-nine years and we never looked at each other." Wow.

And you can begin to feel how natural loving-kindness and compassion and understanding are when you attend in this extremely simple way, when you bring your gaze to the mysterious being in front of you.

How was that? Kind of wild, isn't it?

So what do you learn when you do something like this? It really amplifies what we've learned in the practice—that there are two different dimensions you get to see. One is the timeless nature of consciousness itself, that spirit behind these eyes that's independent of their body or their history or their family or any of that. There's something so universal. The Buddha nature, the true nature in that being, so beautiful. And you also see their uniqueness—their particular face and eyes and hair color and history. All of that sometimes flashes, and you see things about them by looking so deeply.

And so there's this paradox in which you have to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number, basically. You don't separate these, but you hold this mystery of human life with its uniqueness and its universal and timeless truth. And it's not one or the other. If you only see the universal, then you're not a very good driver—they'll lock you up basically. You're not attending to what's here. On the other hand, if you're just a materialist and only focused on what's here and you don't see the spirit behind it, you're also lost.

So what you saw was a kind of wedding.

Trudy and I had this experience. I had the opportunity to visit Thich Nhat Hanh, who's had this major stroke. He was in San Francisco. We went together on the last day, especially the last day before he went back to France. He's eighty-nine. And he can't talk. He can raise one hand. With speech therapy, a few words he can now say.

We went early in the morning to sit with him before he was to fly back to France. After the sitting—six-thirty, we went and we all sat together. They rang the bell and helped him walk in. He was in a wheelchair and they sort of sat him up. And he looked around, and Trudy actually had the most beautiful description of what it was. Because there's one way he saw each of us. I've known him for many years. He saw the small group of people that were there and kind of bowed to us. That was the particular.

But as Trudy noted, the other eye was looking into infinity. It was like there were these two different eyes—one that was the most beautiful personal recognition, and the other, him on the verge of death, really, at the end of life, seeing, which he's always seen, something that's timeless.

And that's what you just got to see in some way—the beauty of this person and the timelessness of it. And you also get to see that the heart is big enough to hold the ten thousand joys and sorrows.

You can see the measure of tears and the suffering, which is not a mistake. It's part of human existence. You get to see that, and that seeing brings awake in you the great heart of compassion. And that's what you've been learning here as you sit.

Enlightenment—it's not a word I use so much. I like the word awakening better. I think it's a better translation. Enlightenment was a Victorian translation that has a lot of overlays of misunderstanding. Awakening, enlightenment, is not far away. You don't get from here to there, practice long enough and then travel to Burma and India and the Himalayas. It's not a journey from here to there. It's a journey from there to here.

As the poet Kabir says, "Are you looking for me? I'm in the next seat. My shoulder is against yours." If you're looking for something holy, all you have to do is turn around and gaze at the person beside you. And something starts to become clear.

I've looked at many of the different spiritual scenes in America because I'm in the industry, basically. The lamas and swamis and mamas and papas and whatever. Some are better and some aren't. Some have sila and virtue, and some forget about that part, which is pretty problematic. A lot of them say, "We have the best, fastest way. Tantra is the best way. Zen is the emptiest. Advaita is more non-dual than your practice." All that stuff. You see all that, right?

I haven't seen any place where it's faster than any place else. Because it's not going somewhere. And it's not about some state. You've had beautiful states here sometimes. Instead, it's about the growing capacity of the heart to be present and free in the midst of all the things that rise and pass. To become the one who knows. And that's not fixing yourself in some way. It's simply being present.

Did I have a good retreat, you might ask. What's a good retreat? Maybe you had a lot of suffering, maybe there was joy, maybe there was both, maybe you had it and you lost it, and then you lost it and had it again.

Go ahead, light your incense, ring your bells, call out to the gods. But watch out, for the gods will come and they will fire up the forge and put you on the anvil and beat you and beat you until they turn brass into pure gold. This is an Indian saying.

So you've had a tough retreat? Terrific. As I said, in Tibet they pray for suffering. May I have enough suffering to really open the heart of compassion. What is a bad retreat or a good retreat?

To awaken is to become—Zen Master Dogen used this beautiful phrase, as Trudy was talking about in his teachings—to awaken is to become intimate with all things. To become intimate with life. And so you become intimate with your measure of sorrows. You become intimate with your body, its pains, and then when it opens and there's bliss and joy, and then the trauma that you carry.

But you are not your trauma. You need to tend it, and sometimes there must be healing and forgiveness. But you don't want to be too loyal to your suffering. How did Nelson Mandela walk out of that prison after twenty-seven years on Robben Island with so much magnanimity and graciousness and forgiveness and compassion? He had to work it in the prison—when you read his autobiography, you see this. But they can put your body in prison. No one can imprison your spirit.

Not your parents, not the police. Nobody can do that to you.

And so the practice is to see the dignity in each being you meet and to find it in yourself.

A woman who works as a Buddhist chaplain in a hospital likes to go around twice a year, and as she moves through the hospital, she blesses people's hands. She blesses the hands of the surgeons and the nurses. Then she goes down to the basement and finds the people who are cleaning the toilets, serving the food, washing the pots, and she makes sure their hands get blessed too. Last year one of them said to her, "This is the most meaningful thing that happens all year." Some of these people are not valued as they should be. She goes around and finds them and blesses their hands, and they're often startled and deeply touched—as is she.

It's so simple, that kind of intimacy of bringing your attention and your care. And yet when you do, your life changes, and the life of those around you begins to change, because you've learned this presence and a certain kind of fearlessness—the ability to gaze at the measure of sorrow and not turn away from it. As James Baldwin says, not to project it on somebody else, but to feel your own vulnerability and your own tears, and to see that in another and say, "Yes, I've sat under my tree of enlightenment. And I know that this is what makes up life."

There comes a fearlessness and an understanding—I guess you could call it wisdom.

I have this story from a woman who was working, as I have at times in the past, in Palestine and Israel with different peace groups. I found it very moving because one of the things that happens is you only get the bad news from there. Anybody throws a bomb, a suicide bomb, teenagers being shot, all the terrible things that happen—that makes the news. But not the hundreds of groups doing real work: the former combatants for peace, the bereaved mothers—Palestinian, Israeli, Lebanese—the teenagers making connections across the lines. Really amazing, beautiful things.

Anyway, this group was working in Palestine—Israelis, Americans, and Palestinians together. They got permits to come into Israel for a special gathering. They brought one Palestinian man with them who was going to be a speaker, a beautiful guy who'd gone through a lot of difficulty. When they got to the checkpoint, the soldier—a woman in uniform—checked everyone, then saw the man and said, "Give me your ID. Get off this bus. You can't cross here. This isn't a crossing for Palestinians. You have to go back that way." The other crossing point was an hour and a half away. If he could even get a taxi, very expensive, maybe he'd get there, maybe not, and an hour and a half back. He would miss the meeting. He was, of course, very disappointed.

The woman accompanying him wrote about what happened next. She said, "I looked at the soldier and I saw, under the uniform, a beautiful woman. Under her military hat I saw her long black hair tied in a ponytail behind her. Repeatedly, with sharpness, she said no. But I watched her hair, and it was swishing back and forth. She moved one way and her hair moved differently. I got confused by her presence because she was saying no, but something else was going on.

"I tried not to judge her. I just looked at her and saw this woman, and I said, 'This is really important. It's peace work. Is there any way you can find to help us? We really need him there. I can see that you want to help.'

"She looked at me and moved her gun aside a little, and her keys, and she said, 'Well, see that gate over there? If he crosses it quickly and goes calmly to that other gate, in five minutes I can meet him as a guard and let him through.'

"I saw this opening and I wanted to honor it. And there it was, and she went through with it.

"I became curious about this woman—this dark, slender, young woman in front of me, young enough to be my daughter. I wanted to ask her about her hair. What's the story? I was convinced her hair had its own language.

"And I did ask, and she said, 'It is a reminder that I'm first and foremost a woman. I'm born into life to love. I tend to forget this under the uniform. I've forgotten how to smile. I've seen so much suffering. And then my hair slaps my face. It blows and reminds me I'm a woman. No one can bury this fact under any kind of uniform. And when I'm out of here, I will work for peace like you.'

"And now we were speaking the same language, her and her hair."

There's something about our willingness to see the beauty in another.

As Nelson Mandela said, it never hurts to see the good in someone—they often act the better because of it.

So you've learned that your heart is big enough to hold all the joys and sorrows, to see both the universal and the personal, to bring a kind of intimacy of attention that awakens beauty and presence and understanding. That intimacy is not just with another person; it's also with yourself.

Of course, you've been intimate with yourself here. You know the socks of the people near you and such things. But you've also watched your own mind, your own heart, as it opens and as it closes. You think, "Oh, I should always have a big open heart. I should just love all the time." That's the ideal, right? "Oh God, I'm just going to love everything."

But you have to breathe. And it turns out the heart also opens and closes. The lungs breathe, and the cerebrospinal fluid breathes, and the tides move to the moon, and the stock market changes. Menstrual cycles. It turns out the heart opens and closes. You can't force it open and simply be loving on demand. You've sat here and watched the heart open and close. You've watched the mind open and close. Everything that's conditioned is impermanent.

And then underneath all that, as you get quiet and allow your own uniqueness to be met with loving awareness, you begin to sense—like the Buddha getting up from his seat—that it's time to take your understanding into the world. In Zen they say there are only two things: you sit, and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is—the garden of the world.

So you quiet the mind and open the heart. You remember who you are. And then you go and give your gift to the world. It might be as an artist, or a conscious businessperson, or a parent, or a person working for social justice, or someone working in the crazy, insane criminal justice system, or a person planting trees. You each have a cargo to deliver.

That's what my African friend, a shaman, says. It's a beautiful West African metaphor: we're all born with a cargo, and the only thing that matters in your life as you awaken is that you deliver your cargo.

You say, "Well, what the hell is my cargo?"

Puanani Burgess, who is a Hawaiian teacher, says: "I try to work in the schools in a process called Building the Beloved Community. The exercise I work with these kids involves first telling three stories. Story number one: tell us all your names. The second is the story of your community. And the third story I ask is: tell us your gift."

"So one time I did this process in our local high school. We went around the circle and got to this young man, Kele. He told the story of his names well and the story of his community well. But when it came time to tell the story of his gift, he asked, 'What, miss? What kind of gift you think I get, eh? I stay in this special ed class and I get a hard time reading, and I can't do math. Why you make me shame for? Asked me that kind of question, what kind of gift I have. If I had gift, you think I'd be here?'"

"Kele just shut down and shut up, and I felt really shamed. In all my years of teaching, I've never done that. I've never shamed a student."

"Two weeks later, I'm in our grocery store and I see him down one of those aisles. I see his back, and I'm going down there with my cart, and I think, 'Nope, I'm not going there.' It was too painful. So I start to back up, trying to get away from him. And then he turns around and sees me and throws his arms open and runs toward me. 'Auntie, auntie! I've been thinking about you! Two weeks I've been thinking—what my gift, what my gift?'"

"I say, 'Okay, brother, what's your gift?'"

"He says, 'You know, I've been thinking. I cannot do that math stuff and I cannot read so good. But auntie, when I stay in the ocean, I can call the fish. And the fish, he come every time. Every time I put food on my family table. Every time. And sometimes when I stay in the ocean and the shark, he come, and he look at me, and I look at him, and I tell him: Uncle, I'm not going to take plenty fish. I just going to take one, two fish, just for my family. All the rest I leave for you. And so the shark, he say, Oh, you cool, brother.'"

And I tell the shark, uncle, you cool. And the shark, he go his way and I go my way.

And I look at this boy, Kali, and I know what a genius he is. And I mean it. But in our society, the way the schools are run, he's rubbish. He's destroyed, not appreciated.

So when I talk to his teacher and the principal, I ask them, what would his life be if this curriculum were gift-based? What if we were able to see the gift in each of our children and taught around that gift? What would happen to us as a society if we saw the gift in every human being?

And so you become intimate with yourself and you listen for what your gift is and what your cargo is to deliver. And it's never too late, you know. I mean, here Trudy and I, we fell in love, we're seventy, right? And we're having a great time. It's never too late. As someone said the other night—whether it was George or Noah or Trudy herself—even people at the end of their life, sometimes there's a moment when they see in a new way. But you don't have to wait to be wise.

It also means that you don't want to be too idealistic about it, thinking you're supposed to be some special way. When I read Shambhala Sun or Tricycle, I wonder who these people are. They admit to an occasional random thought, but it's clear they're all becoming enlightened, or at least able to dwell in clear and empty space. Or those Yoga Journal people, where everyone is thin, composed, and bends in all directions. Or Fortune, where everyone's a millionaire, a captain of success.

So where, I ask, is the magazine for failure? For thirty years of falling and recalling, oh yes, be here now again. For the continual recovering from the storms. For the endless repairing of the ship and the broken sails. For this thick and heavy middle-aged body, barely bending. For the immense gratitude in meeting once again next week's payroll, next month's rent.

It's not about—I said it in the first talk—it's not really about perfecting yourself, but perfecting your love. That's what matters in this life. And love, or loving awareness, which we've been teaching, becomes the gateway to freedom. If the freedom doesn't have love, or the love doesn't deepen into a sense of openness, something's missing.

And it's very simple. What we have learned here is not only to sit and walk in the midst of the joys and sorrows—we've seen the First Noble Truth. Anybody not seen dukkha? Mara not come to any of you? So we've seen that that's part of our life.

But that's the first noble truth. We've also seen the second noble truth: the cause of our suffering and the suffering of the world is greed and hatred and fear and reactivity and judgment. You see all those suffering forms of mind.

And then you see the third noble truth, which is there's an end to that suffering. There's a balance of peacefulness, a joyful heart, a loving awareness. Becoming the one who knows, there's a witnessing of it that says, yes, this too, and this too, and this too—with graciousness and compassion. And you start to realize that your suffering is not the end of the story. It's just the beginning of the story.

Now people have asked, in these previous question periods, what about the need for ambition or anger? Where do you get your power from if you're just this nice loving person? Because the world is tough out there and it's full of both conflict and greed and hatred and ignorance. What do you do? How do you move through the world as a bodhisattva?

Wes interviewed Gary Snyder, one of our great Pulitzer Prize-winning poets, a few years ago. Gary's in his eighties. He was one of the original visionaries for an ecological consciousness in this country.

50 years ago, he won the Pulitzer Prize for Earth Household—an amazing environmentalist. And Wes said, "Gary, you see global warming, loss of species, rising oceans, environmental disasters. What advice do you have for us?"

And he looked back and said, "Don't feel guilty."

Amazing thing—don't feel guilty. Because if you try to save it out of guilt, or anger, or fear, those are the very forces that have made the problem: the anger and the fear and the guilt. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it.

And the only force that can actually meet aggression and ambition, that can possibly match it, is the force of love. It's Martin Luther King saying after the church was bombed, "We will meet your physical force with soul force," using Gandhi's words. It's the power that makes mothers lift cars off their children.

And it's the quality that allows the Dalai Lama, whose country has been taken over by the communist army, whose temples burned, so much lost, to still have a joyful spirit. He said, "They've taken so much from me. They've taken the temple and the land. Why should I let them take my happiness as well?"

I think people go to see him by the tens of thousands not so much for those Tibetan teachings—half of which are incomprehensible anyway. They're cool, but you don't quite know what he means. They go to hear him laugh, to witness that somebody could carry this much suffering and be so joyful.

Or you look at somebody like Wangari Maathai, who won the Nobel Prize in Kenya. She planted trees. She was thrown in prison for her activist work. But she got out of prison and gathered her people, and she ended up planting trees until they planted 51 million trees. One tree at a time. Tremendous courage. And she just didn't give up. She was quite positive: "If they throw me in prison and I come out, I'll plant some more trees on government land. I don't care where the land is. We're just going to plant trees." And she began to change the country.

So love gives a different kind of courage and a different kind of power—and it's yours.

And then this third noble truth: yes, there's suffering in the world. And remember where we started—who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. No one can harm you as much as your own mind untrained. And who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can bless you and support you more than your own mind, not your most beloved friends or parents—your own mind.

And so you begin to realize that amidst all of this life that we experience—like the Dalai Lama or Wangari or whoever—there also is joy. The instructions from the Buddha are this:

Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate.

This is instructions in the hatred, political season, injustice. Live in joy and in love even among those who hate. Live in joy and health even among the afflicted. Live in joy and peace even among the troubled. You become the one who carries the peace. Look within, be still, free from fear and attachment. Know the sweet joy of living in the way.

These are instructions.

And so we could be loyal to our suffering, but that's not the end of what we're doing. Len Bergantino, a well-known psychologist, writes about a series of frustrating therapy sessions with a patient who was disconnected, detached, or else trying to please him all the time. "The feeling I had on this particular day was I just didn't want to say one more word to him about anything. So to his surprise, I took out my mandolin and in the most loving, beautiful way I could, I played 'Come Back to Sorrento.' He broke down in tears and cried for the last 40 minutes of the session, saying only, 'Bergantino, you sure earned your money today.'"

And I thought, to think, I wasted all these years talking to people! In good therapy, yes, there are skillful means, but a lot of it is just that you love people, that you really see who they are and you love them. You see their beauty, their dignity, you see their measure of difficulty, and you love them through all this.

So when we talk about letting go, there's a confusion—non-attachment, I'm going to be detached from the world. It's not that.

Detachment means I don't care. That's called indifference. Instead of grasping, what arises is love, commitment, dedication—whether in your relationships or in your practice. If you don't have dedication, you can't meditate. You'll simply run out of the hall the first time it gets unpleasant. If you don't have commitment, you can't do it. If you don't have that in a love relationship, how can it continue?

So it's not about attachment and needing things to be a certain way, but rather to love this other person with dedication and commitment and care. And that's part of what Gary Snyder was talking about. If you want to save the world, save it because you love it—out of your dedication and care and commitment.

"Give me everything mangled and bruised," writes Dina Metzger, "and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

Or Pablo Neruda, who writes, "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring."

There's something in life that wants to renew itself. And you've come here to renew yourself and to learn an equanimity in the midst of all things. To remember that joy is possible. And that it's possible for you.

Even if you're feeling depressed today. Even if the retreat is ending and you're thinking, "I have to go back. I have troubles." Yes, that's okay. Depression is like this. Worry is like this. But who you are—you could see it in the eyes—is so much bigger.

And then you go back and you carry this. There's a piece from Laurie Chapman: "I like nothing more in this world than just listening, sitting on my ass, being happy, doing nothing. And it's not my fault that I have this attitude, because I happen to have an amazingly comfortable ass. It may not look like much, but if you could sit on this baby for two minutes, you'd realize that getting up off this ass would be a crime against nature."

So when you go home and practice, the point isn't to suffer. The point is actually to find some way to sit that reminds you that you can be present under your tree of enlightenment with the joys and sorrows of the world. And then you get up from your seat, as the Buddha did, and walk the dusty roads for those years. You get up from that seat and you bring your blessings to what you touch. And the world needs it.

Isn't the silence sweet?

It will help regulate you. And you've learned so many important things this week. Now it's a beautiful time to stay with it and not abandon the practice that you have.

We have teachings in the morning for you about going back—daily sitting, community, sangha—things like that, that will be very helpful as well.

But right now, enough words. Let's return to silence.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 3

Tending Yourself, Tending the World

Jack Kornfield · 1h04

> In this heartfelt teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together stories of ordinary kindness and extraordinary courage to illuminate how we might tend to both our inner lives and the suffering of the world. Beginning with a moving account of a train conductor's compassion, he connects personal acts of care to the larger work of social transformation, drawing on examples from the abolition of slavery to Archbishop Tutu and the Dalai Lama's remarkable capacity for joy amid hardship.
> Kornfield addresses the challenge of engaging with politics and social suffering without being consumed by fear or reactivity. He shares the Buddha's teachings to kings on creating a flourishing society—honoring elders, caring for the vulnerable, tending the natural world, and cultivating personal mindfulness. The talk emphasizes that these are not mere ideals but trainable capacities, supported by modern neuroscience research on compassion and mindfulness practices.
> The teaching explores how equanimity allows us to hold life's inevitable changes—joy and sorrow, gain and loss—with a steady heart. Through John Muir's exhilarating account of riding a treetop in a storm and the Amish community's radical forgiveness after tragedy, Kornfield illustrates that we can remain centered amid life's turbulence. He concludes with the Buddha's instruction to incline the mind toward compassion, truth, and wisdom, reminding us that each person's unique contribution to healing the world has never been offered before.

So welcome back from the break.

When you come and listen to teachings, there's no quiz at the end and no grades. And you don't even have to remember anything. Rather, the invitation is to make the listening its own kind of meditation—not in some weird formal way, you're weird enough without adding to it—but rather to listen and notice if anything resonates in you as true. And if it does, if it reminds your heart or your spirit that this is something that matters, then there's some kind of moment of shared understanding that you can take with you.

Because you already have the wisdom of the ages within you. And of course people hear that and think it's a kind of nice platitude. Unfortunately, it's true. But the other unfortunate thing is that we often don't take the time to really listen to our hearts and listen to what is most important to us, because we all get caught up in the thousand things of the world. So to meditate in some way is an invitation to come back and listen more deeply.

I was thinking what I might say tonight, especially given that it's the first presidential debate—or whatever you call it, bread and circus in Rome—and I want to talk about tending ourselves and tending the world. We'll see if it's helpful or useful or makes sense to you.

I'll start with a story from the British writer Bernard Hare. This happened a couple of decades ago. He was then a young student living on very little money in London.

"The police called at my student hovel in the early evening, but I didn't answer as I thought they'd come to evict me. I hadn't paid my rent in a couple of months. But then I got to thinking my mom hadn't been too good, and what if it was something about her? We had no phone in the hovel and mobiles hadn't been invented yet, so I had to nip down to the phone box. Rang home to Leeds to find my mother was in the hospital and not expected to survive the night. 'Get home, son,' my father said.

"I got to the railway station to find I'd missed the last train. That train was going as far as Peterborough, but I would miss the connecting Leeds train by twenty minutes. I bought a ticket and got on. I was a struggling student, didn't have the money for a taxi the whole way, but I had a screwdriver in my pocket and a bunch of skeleton keys. I was so desperate to get back to my mom, I planned to nick a car in Peterborough or hitchhike or steal some money or something. I knew from my dad's voice that she might die.

"'Tickets, please,' I heard. I fumbled for my ticket, gave it to the guard. He stamped it and stood there looking at me. I'd been crying, had red eyes.

"'You okay?' he said.

"'Of course I'm okay. Why wouldn't I be? What's it got to do with you in any case?'

"'You look awful,' he said. 'Anything I can do?'

"'Get lost. Mind your own business,' I said. 'That'd be a big help.' I wasn't in the mood for talking. He was only a little bloke. He must have read the danger signal in my body language and tone of voice, but he sat down anyway.

"'If there's a problem, I'm here to help. That's what I'm paid for.'

"I was a big bloke in my prime, so I thought for a second about physically sending him on his way, but it somehow didn't seem right. He wasn't really doing much wrong, and I was going through all the stages of grief at once—denial, anger, guilt, withdrawal, fear, everything but acceptance. I was a cauldron of emotion, and he was in my line of fire. The only thing I could think of to get rid of him was to tell my story.

"'Look, my mom's in the hospital dying. She won't survive the night. I'm going to miss the connection to Leeds at Peterborough. I'm not sure how I'm even going to get home. It's tonight or never. I won't get another chance, so I'm a bit upset. Don't feel like talking, okay? Be grateful if you leave me alone.'

"'Okay,' he said. 'Sorry to hear, son.'"

I'll leave you alone then. Hope you make it home in time." And he wandered down the carriage, taking tickets.

I looked out the window. Ten minutes later, he was back by the side of my table. Oh no, I thought, here we go again. He touched my arm.

"Listen, when we get to Peterborough, shoot straight over to Platform 1 as quick as you like. The Leeds train will be there."

I looked at him, confused. "Come again?" I said. "What do you mean, is it late or something?"

He said, "No, it isn't late. I just radioed Peterborough. They're going to hold the train for you. As soon as you get on, it goes. Everyone will be complaining about how late it is, but let's not worry about that. You get home—that's the main thing. Good luck and God bless."

And then he was off down the train taking tickets. "Tickets, please. More tickets."

And I suddenly realized what a top class, full-fledged ass I was. Some of us have had that experience in our own lives. I chased him down the train. I wanted to give him all the money from my wallet, my driver's license, my keys, name my firstborn child—but I knew he'd be offended. I caught up and grabbed his arm.

"It's okay," he said. He had a warm smile and real compassion in his eyes. He was a good man for its own sake.

"I wish I had some way to thank you."

"Not a problem," he said. "If you need to thank me, the next time you see someone in trouble, you help them out. That will pay me back amply. Tell them to pay you back the same way, and soon the world will be a better place."

I was at my mother's side when she died in the early hours of the morning. Even now I can't think of her without remembering the conductor on that late-night train, and to this day I won't hear a bad word said about British Rail.

My meeting with the conductor changed me from a selfish, potentially violent hedonist into a decent human being—but it did take a little time. I've paid him back a thousand times since then. I tell the younger people that I now work with in juvenile hall and so forth. And I'll keep on doing it till the day I die. 'You don't owe me nothing,' I say to these young people. 'And if you think you do, I'll give you the same advice the conductor gave me. Just pass it down the line.'"

So—an opening story about a personal moment of kindness and connection. And of course it is personal, but it's more than personal.

Yesterday I met a couple of people who had just flown back from the celebration and the opening of the new African American Museum in Washington, D.C., which from all accounts that I've read is absolutely magnificent. They were standing there telling me about it—they'd been involved in the building and support for it—and they were weeping as they talked. They said it is filled with such amazing art and literature and the sense of beloved community, but also the artifacts of tragedy and pain: Emmett Till's coffin, Ku Klux Klan outfits that have blood on them, pictures of lynchings—all those kinds of things—but also uplift and magnificence of the art and the literature and the things that were created in pride.

And I thought about the story of one of my favorite reads of these last decades, a book called Bury the Chains by Adam Hochschild. He describes a group of a dozen folks who met in a tea shop or a printer shop in England in the 1780s and '90s, when slavery was still the major economic engine of the British Empire—that and sugar in the Caribbean and Latin America. Sugar was the oil of the time, and that was where all the money was coming from.

They met—some of them were Quakers, some weren't—and the head of this was a man named Thomas Clarkson, who ended up riding on horseback thirty thousand miles around England, bringing some ex-slaves who were well-spoken and articulate about the terrors of the Middle Passage, about what slavery actually was like, into the living rooms of English people around the country. After thirty years, this small group of people, which grew into a movement, were able to effect in the British Parliament the law that outlawed slavery in the British Empire. Starting with twelve people.

And the Quakers who worked a lot with Thomas Clarkson—they wouldn't take their hats off for the king. "We only take our hats off for God."

But when Thomas Clarkson died, all the Quakers in England took their hats off.

So there is the momentary tending of another person on a train, of someone in trouble. And there's the tending of the injustice and the justice that's needed in the world.

And you might have hoped you were coming here tonight to escape from politics. Veronica Shoffstall, the poet, has written a charm for you called "A Charm Against the Language of Politics":

After you've compared the candidates' slippery platforms, say over and over the names of things, the clean nouns. Weeping birch, tanager, damask rose. Read field guides, atlases, gravestones. At the store, bless each apple by kind: Macintosh, winesap, delicious, Jonathan. Enunciate the vegetables and herbs: okra, cilantro, calendula. After a speech on compromising the environment, recite the tough, silky structure of webs: tropical stick, ladder web, mesh web, filmy dome, funnel web. Chant the spiders: comb-footed, round-headed, garden cross, feather-legged, black-faced. Remember that most short verbs are ethical: hatch, grow, spin, trap, eat. Dig deep, pronounce clearly, pull the words in over your head, and hole up until it's time to hatch.

But you really can't escape politics any more than you can escape death or taxes. You'll see—it's coming. Because underneath, in human incarnation, there is suffering. And there's also our care for one another. Both are true.

When we look at the political world, there are so many lenses we can use. One of them is that it's a way to tend to people's fears and desires and suffering. How do we tend to our suffering?

I just got a book called I Wish My Teacher Knew, filled with handwritten letters, mostly by second and third graders:

I wish my teacher knew that I don't have pencils at home to do my homework.

I wish my teacher knew that my mom doesn't sign my reading log because she can't read.

I wish my teacher knew that after my mom got diagnosed with cancer, I've been without a home three different times this year.

I wish my teacher knew that my dad works two jobs and I don't see him much.

I wish my teacher knew that I get worried when my little brother gets scared and wakes me up every night.

I wish my teacher knew that I love animals and I would do anything for my animals. I would love to work at the SPCA so I could help animals get adopted.

I wish my teacher knew that I'm smarter than she thinks.

You hear the spirit of these little kids. And you also know—I remember teaching at an education conference—yes, it's great to teach STEM: science and technology and engineering and math. But you can't learn math when your parents are in the middle of a terrible divorce, when there isn't money to pay the rent, when you're worried about the health of somebody in your family and there are no resources.

Part of what politics speaks to is really what we have to tend to as human beings: the suffering that each person carries. No one in this room is exempt from it. And the care that's there in our hearts. Because you hear those stories and you think about that child, you think about the teachers in that child's classroom, and what it means not just to see the papers that are submitted, but also somehow to see both the tears and the tender heart and the possibility in that human being.

Now, mostly politics is driven by fear. H.L. Mencken, who was a great political commentator, said a hundred years ago that the whole aim of politics is to create a continual state of alarm—to frighten and menace the populace with an endless series of hobgoblins, almost all unreal, as a way to gain power. That's one assessment of politics.

Another way to understand it is that politics is ritualized warfare. In the old days, the Republicans and the Democrats—and maybe the Libertarians or Greens would chime in, the smaller armies—would get in their tanks or on their horses and pull their knights out and see who gets the power and who gets to run the country. That's how it worked for a very long time among human beings.

Even though it is painful to watch at times, our political system, and in certain ways still quite problematic, at least it's done as a ritual kind of warfare. It is warfare, and you can see people approaching it as a battle. But it's not literally enacted.

So then when you see what happens and how messy it is, it's not so surprising. Because politics has become our way of solving the question of who gets the power, who makes the decisions for us in government. And there's a lot of conflict in it.

Now the sad thing is that, because of what Megan said, politics is often driven by fear. And we end up forging bonds of hatred rather than bonds of love. James Baldwin writes, "I believe one of the reasons that people cling to their hate and prejudice so stubbornly is they sense that once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

And so we project our pain or our fear or insecurity—because we are insecure. Anybody in this room not insecure? Come on. As Rilke the poet said, ultimately it's upon our vulnerability that we depend. Because we're vulnerable to the people who are driving the other way on Sir Francis Drake Boulevard, and somebody could just turn their wheel and crash into us in a moment. We're vulnerable to the air that we breathe and the Fukushima nuclear reactor and how many particles of cesium or whatever are in our air or water. We're vulnerable to one another. Human life is tender and vulnerable as well as being robust. This is a reality for us.

And so instead of understanding that the human lot is also insecure—that security is a superstition—we project it on the communists. They're our enemy, the enemy du jour. Or the Mexicans, or the immigrants, or the gays, or the Muslims—whatever the enemy du jour. They're the ones we have to be afraid of. And if they weren't there, then everything would be hunky-dory. That kind of whipping up of fear as a way to solve our problems doesn't lead to much happiness for us.

But it turns out that there are other ways to meet insecurity, which is partly why we meditate. From Martin Luther King: "Now there's a final reason that I say love your enemies. It's this: that love has within it a redemptive power. And there's a power there that eventually transforms individuals. Just keep loving them and they can't stand it too long. Oh, they'll react in many ways in the beginning. They'll react with guilt feelings and sometimes they'll just hate you more at that time. But you just keep loving them and by the power of your love they will break down under the load. That's love, you see. It's redemptive. There's something about love that builds up and is creative, and there's something about hate that tears down and is destructive."

When I was at the first Buddhist White House leadership gathering last year and gave a teaching to sum up what we were doing, there were all these beautiful, wise teachings that the Buddha had given to kings and ministers of his age, where he said: If you want to have a wise society, a healthy society, then answer these questions. Do the members of that community meet regularly in harmony, discuss things in harmony, and depart in harmony? If so, they will prosper and not decline. Do they follow and honor the wisdom of past elders? They will prosper and not decline if they do. Do they tend and care for the natural world around them, the environment? Do they care for women and children and the most vulnerable among them? When they meet, do they treat all community members with respect and dignity? If so, they will prosper and not decline. And do they cultivate their own personal mindfulness and loving-kindness? So then they can be expected to prosper and not decline.

These are ancient teachings. And you hear them and they resonate. They're beautiful. But here's the interesting part: they're not really a big surprise. We kind of know this, right? But what I was able to say after talking about this and many other things at the White House is that these are not just ideals. The best news is that there are ways to develop them for human beings. All the ten thousand studies and papers in modern neuroscience in the last couple of decades on compassion practice and mindfulness training show that through the power of our attention, through the cultivation of compassion in a systematic way, of forgiveness, of loving-kindness, mindfulness of body and emotions—whether it's in little kids or grown-ups, whether it's in medical settings or business or education—these trainings rewire us. They actually give us the tools to learn how to be in the presence of conflict and difficulty and fear in a centered and kind way.

So the beautiful news is not just that these are great ideals, which they are, kind of universal across wise cultures, but that you as a human being have the capacity to grow and develop in these just as surely as you could plant a seed in a garden and water it and tend it and let the sunlight and all the nourishment of that, whatever you put to amend the soil, and beautiful things will grow. It turns out to be true for the human heart.

Now, what does the Dharma—the teachings traditionally of Buddhist psychology and the kind of practices that we do—actually have to contribute to all of this? Well, first of all, underlying it is the deep wisdom that what we need in the world, especially at this time, is not more technological advance, although that's marvelous.

Nanotechnology, biotechnology, greater computers, the worldwide web, space technology—all of this is very cool, astonishing actually. But as one of the chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff said, we are a nation of nuclear giants and ethical infants. The outer development of humanity now has to be matched by inner development—by the cultivation of understanding interdependence, by developing the capacity to attend and listen, by the growth of compassion and all these qualities.

The meaning of the word Dharma, which means truth, which means the teachings, has many dimensions. My teacher Ajahn Chah said Dharma means the heart. That was his translation. And it means that when we approach the world through the Dharma heart, we live not with fear but with trust. It doesn't mean that fear doesn't arise—it does—but there's a deeper sense of trust underneath it. As Nelson Mandela said, coming out of twenty-seven years in Robben Island Prison, "It never hurts to see the good in someone. They often act the better because of it." And Mother Teresa's words were, "If we have no peace, it is because we've forgotten that we belong to each other, that we're family."

So the first thing that the Dharma teaches us is how to quiet the mind and open the heart and begin to listen more deeply—to connect with ourselves, to connect with our deepest values, and to connect with one another. Without something like this, we can flail around like a boat without a rudder. Everything that comes, whether good or bad, knocks us around each day. But as you learn to practice, as you undertake this training of presence and centeredness, of loving awareness, as the Tao Te Ching asks: "Do you have the patience to wait till your mud settles and the water is clear? Can you remain unmoving until the right action arises by itself? Patient with both friends and enemies, you accord with the way things are. Compassionate in action and thought, you reconcile with all being."

There is something offered to us in these practices, in the contemplative dimension of humanity found across the world, in so many traditions that remind us there is a different way to live. When Mahatma Gandhi took one day a week in silence, he was doing so in the middle of deconstructing the entire British Empire. There were huge demonstrations and marches with hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of people in India—battles and all of this. And Gandhiji would say, "Well, Thursday's my day off. I have to be quiet that day." They would say, "But we need you." And he would reply, "You may need me, but I need to listen to something deeper and bigger." He would get quiet for that day every week and listen—like a Sabbath that we all need—to what he could do that was the purest, the most genuinely helpful, the most honorable with his life. What a beautiful set of questions to ask ourselves.

In the Dhammapada, the ancient verses from the Buddha's time: "Meditate. Live purely. Be quiet. Do your work with mastery. Like the moon, come out from behind the clouds. The one who awakens shines with the radiance of spirit." Come out and shine like the moon. But first, quiet yourself. Quiet the mind. Tend the heart. Come back to yourself. Let what is beautiful in you—what is beautiful in each one of you—have space to be heard and listened to, to blossom and grow.

Because who you are, in the end, is spirit, consciousness. There are all kinds of words for it—loving awareness. How did you get into that human body? You don't even remember very well, do you? Your parents did something, but whatever. They did a lot of things, but that one made you. Who you are is the spirit that was born into this body. And that's what will leave the body when you die. You think you're the kale and pasta that you eat? That's just not who you are. Vegetables and yogurt—that's not it. All right, well then maybe I'm my feelings and thoughts. I hope not, really. They change. You feel one thing and fifteen seconds later you feel something else. Feelings and thoughts are beautiful things, but they're not who you are. You are the witness to this. You are the consciousness that was born into this body. Who you are is loving awareness itself.

When my teacher went to talk to his great master more than fifty years ago, he said, "I've had all these great meditation experiences."

He found this great master. The master said, "Oh, you missed the point. Those are just like movies on the screen. The only question is, who's having those experiences? Who are you really?" Turn your attention back and become the one who knows—that was his expression—the witness to it all. Rest in loving awareness.

And then you'll see joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, praise and blame. Anybody not have those? They keep changing. But there is a space of knowing that is always present and available, that can allow for and contain and hold all things with a tender heart—with compassion and love and awareness together.

A new book just came out a couple of days ago that friends of mine helped create, called The Book of Joy. It's a week-long dialogue between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu. They're old buddies. And the principal question in the book is: How can you two, who have suffered so much—Tutu under the apartheid regime and the kinds of suffering in South Africa that were enormous, all those deaths; and the Dalai Lama with the destruction of Tibetan culture, being in exile for more than fifty years—how can you two laugh? How can you two be joyful? What do you have to teach us about this?

As you read it, you just feel their spirit. I say very often, I think people go to hear the Dalai Lama not for all those great teachings that he does—those fantastic Tibetan teachings that no one quite understands but they seem really cool—or even the fact that he's this Nobel Peace laureate, this wise political figure. People go to hear him laugh. That he can sit up there after all that he's been through and giggle and laugh this deep belly laugh and love life.

So they're talking about their age—they're both in their eighties. "Yeah, I went to see a German specialist for my knee," the Dalai Lama said. "He found my physical condition pretty good, but then he told me my knees were the problem. He said, 'You're not eighteen years old anymore, you're eighty years old, so nothing much can be done.' I felt that was really a great teaching. It's very important to think about impermanence. He reminded me I'm eighty years old. That's wonderful. But my friend, you're even older than me."

"Are you showing off?" the Archbishop says.

"Oh, yeah," he says. He goes on: "Something else happened. The media at the airport said this was a special occasion. They said, 'You must be very happy to have Archbishop Tutu visiting.' I told them, 'Yes, indeed, I'm happy. I'm very happy. I'm receiving one of my very good friends. Firstly, on the human level, he's a very good human being. Secondly, he's a religious leader, a serious practitioner who respects different religious traditions. And then thirdly, and most important, he's my very, very close friend.'"

"You are flattering me," said Tutu.

"So then I told them that you often used to describe me as a mischievous person. So I said, I also consider you a mischievous person. And the meeting of two mischievous persons is wonderful. So happy reunion for us, and happy birthday." And they laughed.

"Thank you very much," the Archbishop said. "Thank you for welcoming us. Thank you for this great lunch. And thank you for putting out all those people along the road to welcome us."

You just get the spirit of these two world figures having a good time with one another, and how happy it makes you.

So what the Dharma has to offer first is a reminder of who we are. And this leads into a kind of equanimity.

It offers equanimity. You know the Ojibwa saying that's so often spoken: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky." There is a reality that is vast, that we are a part of, and we can tune in to this mystery, to this vastness.

And we know it again when we sit quietly, or we take a walk in the hills, or we walk by the ocean, or watch that harvest moon that rose last week in such an amazing way, or we sit with someone giving birth. Give birth ourselves. Or sit with someone who's dying. Or make love, which is a wonderful, mysterious, wild thing to do, actually. Kind of strange, isn't it? But cool. Yes, we like it. It's just—you know, these bodies are really weird. But wonderful at the same time. Or we listen to an amazing piece of music and all of a sudden we remember that we're connected with something so vast.

And we also sense the ephemeralness of it all, the emptiness of it, which is mysterious. I drove by the house that I had lived in, in Woodacre, for almost thirty years, that we sold a couple of years ago. And I looked at it—there's a new younger family in it. My daughter's thirty-two now and married and off working as a lawyer doing asylum and human rights law. But I looked at it and they'd repainted things, and I thought about all the things that had happened. We got this little bungalow and we put on all kinds of other parts, a new floor and all these gardens, and the people who'd come over and the adventures we'd had. No one remembers it. It's all gone. Except for me, and I'm just barely remembering it, right? It was there. And my daughter a little bit. But that's it. And my ex. It's gone. It's empty. This whole life and all that seems so real—and then what happens to it? It disappears and vanishes into emptiness. Because everything does. It's back there with the dinosaurs and the pharaohs and, you know, Y2K—remember that? Things appear and then they vanish.

And having a vast vision is such a beautiful thing. Because in the vast vision, you can see the turning of the seasons and the turning of the spheres, the magic of the earth making its way around the sun. Now we just came through the turning of the seasons and the last day of summer and the equinox. And it makes things become—they're ephemeral, but they actually become more precious.

What is life, says the Crowfoot elder? It is the flash of a firefly in the night. It's the breath of a buffalo in wintertime. It's the little shadow that runs across the grass and loses itself in the sunset.

And things appear, and they're very tender, and we love them, and then they change. And to have equanimity means that we can see the seasons of change. Civilizations come and go. Political parties come and go. Sometimes there's a lot of suffering in it, which is very sad, and we have to tend to it and try to prevent it. But we can't really prevent change, and we can't really prevent the changing of cycles of how human beings act. But we can take our seat somehow in the midst of it all, in all of the turning of the world, and remember our place in it so that we can plant beautiful seeds wherever we are.

Now John Muir, one of the greatest naturalists ever in the Western world—perhaps not counting the native naturalists, who were many—John Muir, who convinced Teddy Roosevelt to start the National Park System and make Yosemite the first park and all those good things, one of the things he used to do, and there's a fantastic description of it, was to go out in the middle of a storm. You know, when a big storm is coming, we tend to batten down the hatches. But he said:

"On a particular day, one of the most beautiful and exhilarating storms I ever enjoyed in the Sierras occurred in December 1874, when I was exploring one of the tributaries to the Yuba River. The day was pure and balmy, but a bracing wind began, and I lost no time pushing out into the woods to enjoy it, for the danger to life and limb is hardly greater than one experiences crouching deprecatingly beneath a roof. I took a long, tingling scramble through the copses and ceanothus and gained the summit of the highest ridge in the neighborhood. And then it occurred to me it would be a fine thing to climb one of the trees to obtain a wider outlook and get my ear close to the Aeolian music at its topmost needles.

"I made a choice of the tallest of a group of Douglas spruces that were growing close together like a tuft of grass. Though comparatively young, they were a hundred feet high, and their lithe, brushy tops were rocking and swirling in ecstasy. Being accustomed to climb trees and making botanical studies, I had no difficulty reaching the top, but never before did I enjoy such a noble exhilaration of motion. The tops flapped fairly in the wind as I lashed myself, and the widest sweeps in my treetop described an arc from twenty to thirty degrees. I felt sure of its elastic temper."

This was like a great wave of grain, these huge trees in the wind. "And my eye rolled over the valleys, ridge to ridge, shining foliage, and the sounds of the storm's exuberance, the base of the naked branches and the boles booming like waterfalls, and the tingly vibrations of the pine needles. And I kept my lofty perch for hours, closing my eyes to enjoy the music of life itself."

So whenever you're having a hard sitting in meditation, or you're in the midst of one of those no good, terribly bad, difficult days, think of John Muir and say, "All right, I'm going to lash myself to the top in the middle of this huge storm and feel the movement of the seasons"—the tears that come through you, the grief that comes, the loss, the anger, the fear, the longing, the love, the joy, all the things that make you human. And remember that underneath all of that, there is a possibility of equanimity, of balance in the midst of it all.

That's really part of what the training of the Dharma gives you. Because otherwise, with climate change right there in our midst, or our concerns about elections or the Supreme Court or whatever it may be, we can get lost in a kind of reactivity. This doesn't mean you don't work for what you care about. But when Wes Nisker, a good friend and colleague here, went to talk to Gary Snyder a couple of years ago—Gary was eighty-four at the time, this renowned environmentalist for the last half century, author of Earth House Hold, Pulitzer Prize winner—Wes said, "Gary, climate change, the oceans are rising, species are being lost, all kinds of disruption happening. What do you say to us as an environmentalist for all these decades?"

And Gary looked back and said, "Don't feel guilty. If you're going to save it, don't save it out of guilt or anger, because those are the very things that cause the problems. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it. Save it because it's you. It's part of you. It is your heritage. It's your body of the earth."

And so with equanimity, it's not that you can't act, but you have a sense of the storms coming and going—political, climate, whatever—and you find that vastness around it that says, "I can rest in a peaceful heart and I can tend this from a place of understanding rather than a place of fear." Because politics is trying to make you afraid, and you don't have to go down that road.

What's also true is that equanimity has to include suffering. Dina Metzger, friend and poet and activist, writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again." Because even though there is suffering, it turns out that suffering isn't the end of the story—it's only one part of the story, just as the seasons turn.

And so here are the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu together. At some point in their conversation, Tutu says, "How come you're not morose? How come you're not a sourpuss with all that's happened to you?" The Dalai Lama had never heard the word "sourpuss" before. They'd had a couple of conflicts as they were talking about different ideas about God, with their very highly developed intellects, and they were arguing about it in a very friendly way. And then at some point, the Dalai Lama pretended to reach over and choke Archbishop Tutu with his hands. And the Archbishop turned back to him and said, "Hey, the cameras are on us. We have to act like holy men. Come on."

There's something in this, in which he goes on to say, "Don't be a sourpuss." And they've kind of figured it out. There's something in equanimity that says you don't contribute to the world through your fear, through your depression, through your anxiety. You actually contribute to the world by bringing your steadiness and your love and your good heart.

The other thing that makes equanimity possible, and that the Dharma contributes, is laughter. It's called the laughter of the wise. I remember one night I was teaching here with a Tibetan Lama, and I was going along like I am with you. And he said, "Oh, I see what you do." I said, "Oh?" He said, "Yeah, you get them to laugh. And then when their mouths are open, you can pop the pill of wisdom in."

And so here's Tutu again, talking about laughter. He says, "It's so important to be able to have a sense of humor no matter how difficult things get. I remember one time we came to a township just outside of Johannesburg where the apartheid forces had provided weapons to one group and they had killed quite a number of people. We were having a meeting of bishops close by, and I was part of those leading the funeral of the victims of that massacre.

"So imagine: here you are, there's been terrible killing in the community. The people were obviously extremely angry, and I didn't know what to do. Yes, I cared about their grief, but then I remembered a story that had been told about how, at the beginning of creation, God had molded us out of clay and then put us into a kiln, like you do with bricks. God put one lot in and then got busy with other things and forgot about those he'd put in. And after a while, he remembered and rushed to the kiln, where the whole lot was burned to cinders. They say this is how we Black people came about."

Everyone laughed a little.

"And then I said, 'Next, God put in a second lot. And this time he was overanxious and opened the oven way too quickly. They weren't well baked, and this second lot came out completely underdone.'"

And that's how white people came about, and you can see it to this day.

But what's true in this is that you can always start again. Here they are in the middle of the suffering of the world, and yet the Dharma reminds us that it's possible—that suffering isn't the end of the story, that it's possible to take the suffering that we're granted or given and use it to develop the great heart of compassion. And that becomes the next gift of the Dharma: that compassion and wisdom can be the response to suffering and conflict.

As Abraham Lincoln said, "I've always found that mercy bears richer fruits than seeking strict justice." What a thing to say in the middle of a civil war that cost millions of lives and tore the country apart, where there would be so much cause for bitterness. "I have always found that mercy bears richer fruits than seeking strict justice."

You remember a few years ago the terrible thing that happened to the Amish community when a shooter went into a schoolroom in Nickel Mines, Pennsylvania and kept ten girls in there and began to shoot them, killing five little girls and wounding others. The extraordinary thing was that within hours the Amish community forgave the killer and his family. News of the instant forgiveness stunned the world almost as much as the incident itself. Many lauded the Amish, but others worried that hasty forgiveness was emotionally unhealthy.

In dozens of interviews with Amish people, this writer discovered something else. Members of the community began offering words and hugs of forgiveness when the blood was barely dry on the schoolhouse floor. Her grandmother laughed when asked if the forgiveness was orchestrated. "You mean that some people actually thought we called a meeting to plan forgiveness?" As the father of a slain daughter explained, "Our forgiveness was not our words, it was what we did."

Members of the community visited the gunman's widow at her home with food and flowers and hugged members of his family. There were few words, but it was primarily their hugs, gifts, and mere presence that were acts of grace communicating Amish forgiveness. Of the seventy-five people at the killer's burial, almost half were Amish, including many parents who had buried their own children just the day before. The Amish people contributed to a fund for the shooter's family.

So what is our response to suffering in our own life and in the world around us? "Hatred never ceases by hatred," says the Buddha, "but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law."

And so we have forgiveness practice. Many of you have done it, and there are beautiful books on it in the bookstore. We have compassion training, and we have the training to see the noble truths—that there is suffering, there are causes to suffering, which are hatred, fear, greed, and ignorance, and there's an end to it, which is the opposite: the cultivation of love and courage, of generosity and clarity, and of gratitude.

The roots of suffering are a false sense of separate identity. We're different than them. We have to protect ourselves. The roots of love and wisdom are interdependence. "We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, woven together in a mutual garment of destiny," says Martin Luther King. To see with the heart, which is the Dharma, we see that it's us together. And there comes then tenderness and compassion. Whatever we value, whatever we celebrate, whatever we enforce in our lives, in our words, in our deeds, and in our politics is what will grow.

Here's the Dalai Lama again. What do you do about things that really need attention in this world? He says, "If something can be done about the situation, what need is there to be dejected? Let's just do it. And if nothing can be done about it, what use is there to be dejected? Because we can't change it."

The Archbishop said, "People know it in their head, but it doesn't help them. They still worry."

And the Dalai Lama went on, "Many of us have become refugees. There are a lot of difficulties in my own country." He cupped his hands into a small circle. "When I look at that, then I worry. I worry about the Tibetan people and all that I care about." But then he widened his hands. "But when I look at the world, there are a lot of problems everywhere. Other parts of the People's Republic of China, for example—the Uighur Muslim community has problems and suffering. And then outside of China, there are many more problems and more suffering, and refugees streaming across borders everywhere. Refugees like me."

When we see these things, we realize that not only do we suffer, but so do many of our human brothers and sisters. And when we look from a wider perspective, we reduce worrying and instead are motivated to tend to the world because it is our brothers and sisters. It shifts from being your personal suffering to becoming the pain of the world. This is part of what you're given, but it's not the end of the story.

The Zen teacher Karlfried Graf Dürckheim writes: "The person who, really being on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not, as a consequence, turn to those friends who offer them refuge and comfort and encourage the old self to survive. Rather, they will seek out someone who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves, so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them."

And in this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening.

So trust, equanimity, a steadiness of heart. A wisdom that sees that suffering is caused by greed and fear and hatred and confusion, ignorance—and that suffering is ended by love and clarity and understanding and generosity. We know how to do this.

The development of compassion, especially in conflict. When you're in conflict, the question to ask of the other person in your heart—you don't have to say it out loud—is: What are your fears? What are your needs? What are your longings? What's behind this? Listen from heart to heart.

In kindergarten, when kids start hitting each other with the blocks, you say, "Put the block down and use your words," right? Could we not do that in other parts of the world for larger kids? Could we not do it in Syria? I could name fifty countries. Come on, use your words. Could we not begin to listen to what each other is afraid of? Because that's what's underneath a lot of it. And tend one another. Listen deeply.

I have a friend I'm in touch with, just tried to reach him yesterday, who's down in Colombia as part of the peace agreement. He's been working there for twenty-five years as a peacemaker, for the signing of the deal between the FARC and the Colombian government—to stop the last major war in all of South and North America. And it's really, hallelujah, it's an amazing thing because it's been fifty years. Reconciliation is possible. It is possible, but it requires us to pay attention in a different way—not from our small sense of self and our righteousness and all those things, but to quiet ourselves and say, what really matters?

I received this letter from a friend who sits here:

"My father was not able to communicate his love for his children, even though I found out later that he did love us. He just expressed it in ways that children couldn't necessarily understand. After my mom died, I told my dad I wanted a relationship with him, and we had many good years, but none of my siblings did this. My brother died at forty-eight of brain cancer. In his last few months, his wife called me and said Jay's one missing thing was that his father had never told him he loved him. I got on the phone and told my dad to say something on his next visit, but according to Daddy, the subject never came up.

"On Jay's last day, his wife Kathy called to say Jay would probably die within an hour. At that point, he was blind and paralyzed and hadn't spoken for more than a week. I had Kathy hold the phone to Jay's ear and told him that I loved him. Then I called my father. I said, 'Daddy, you have one more chance. Jay will probably die today. Pick up the phone and tell him that you love him.'

"And my father did just that. He called Jay. He told him that he loved him. And Jay, who hadn't spoken for more than a week, started talking and talked to Dad for more than an hour. Jay didn't even die that day. He rallied and lived for another month and spent a lot of time during that month talking often, enjoying his new relationship with his father."

It's possible. It's possible for us as human beings. And it's never too late. It's never too late to love.

So we set the compass of our heart in the best directions that we can. We incline ourselves to what's beautiful. And in this text the Buddha says, "Others may be cruel. We shall not be cruel. Thus we should incline our mind. Others will take what is not given. We will abstain from this."

Thus we shall incline our mind. Others will kill living beings. We will protect living beings. Thus we will incline our mind. Others will speak falsehood. We shall speak truth. Thus should we incline our mind. Others will be uncaring. We shall be compassionate. Thus we shall incline our mind. Others will be greedy and envious. We shall not be greedy and envious. Thus shall we incline our mind. We shall be generous. Others will be arrogant. We shall not be arrogant but humble. Thus we should incline our mind. Others will lack wisdom and compassion. We will cultivate wisdom and live with compassion. Thus we should incline our mind.

And it really speaks to the possibilities of us as human beings. What intention do we set our heart upon? What integrity do we most value? Others will slander. Others will cause harm. We will not do so. We will live in a different way. We will live with nobility and dignity. Thus we shall incline the mind. Others will be uncaring. We will be compassionate.

Now it doesn't mean when you're compassionate that you therefore have to go out and do everything for everyone. That would be a violence against yourself. For some of you it will be to raise a mindful and beautiful child. For some it will be to create art that redeems the world, that lets people see the wonder of it anew. For some it will be to run a conscious business. For many it will also be to become activists and work to heal injustice and to care for those who need their basic life to be valued. Put down the guns, bandage the wounds, carry the water, share the bread. These are all the works that you might do from a place of stillness, from quieting the mind and opening the heart.

And it's never been done before by somebody like you in the vast universe of a trillion stars, billions of galaxies. There's never been one being exactly like you. It's kind of wild, isn't it? That's the kind of abundance of life itself. "I'm going to make a new person that we've never seen, even though we've had billions of them before. Look at this one, try this one out." And you're one of them. It's never been done before.

There's a story of two acquaintances who drove up to the botanical garden in Montreal, a very special temple garden that had been moved from China to the West, home to the largest bonsai collection outside of Asia. They approached the massive gate and discovered that day it was locked. One of them panicked, ready to demand entry after driving four hundred miles from another country to see this. His husband Robert, like an Asian sage, simply treated the situation as a koan, a riddle to be solved. He stood quietly for a time, and then he began to walk the outer wall of the garden, which was high, insurmountable. His partner was frustrated, but Robert kept slowly walking along the high wall. The garden stretched for two hundred acres or more, and his companion wondered, "Are we going to walk its entire perimeter?" The thought made him cranky, yet Robert kept walking mindfully and slowly. And suddenly, when they'd walked farther than was originally in their view, the walls disappeared. In fact, the garden itself had no walls, save for the façade at its entrance. They simply walked through the open grass to a path that welcomed them. What had seemed like an impenetrable barrier, a locked threshold, was actually a symbolic gate waiting for their patience and understanding.

I hope somehow in these words and in our sitting together, you sense the invitation extended to each of us—not to storm the gates of awakening, but to walk patiently along what appears to be an insurmountable wall until we discover, with wonder, that it was never really there at all.

The threshold awaits. Not locked, never locked—simply waiting for our patience, our understanding, and our willingness to take the next step.

> In this timely talk delivered shortly after the 2016 U.S. election, Jack Kornfield addresses the fear, despair, and uncertainty many were experiencing, offering Buddhist perspectives on how to respond skillfully to challenging political and social circumstances. He explores how to work with the body's survival responses, the racing mind, and the heart's deeper wisdom, emphasizing the importance of not letting fear colonize our hearts.
> Kornfield draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah about uncertainty, Gandhi's long view of history, and the joy exemplified by the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu in their book "The Book of Joy." He shares the inspiring story of Vinoba Bhave, who walked across India simply listening to people's needs, catalyzing the largest voluntary land transfer in history. Through guided reflection, he leads practitioners in recognizing our shared humanity with others.
> The talk weaves together practical meditation instruction with stories of courage and compassion, including the work of Grandmothers for Peace and support for Standing Rock water protectors. Kornfield reminds us that we've been training for difficult times through our practice, and encourages us to be strategic, to connect with others, and to carry what is beautiful from the temple back into the world. As he quotes Leonard Cohen: "Even though it all went wrong, I'll stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah."

I'd like to invite you, as I talk tonight, to take this as a kind of meditation, which is to say you don't have to remember anything—there's no quiz at the end. You can listen and sense if there's something that resonates as helpful or true. If not, just let it go by. It's a very interesting and challenging time, so I simply want to reflect out loud and hope something is of use.

Before I start, though, I have a question to pose to you, just to hear and connect a little bit. What topics might you hope that I would touch on tonight?

Climate change. Anger management. Understanding. Equanimity. Despair. Fear. Totalitarianism. Survival. Healing. How to keep hearts open. Children. Activism. Trump—President-elect Trump, yes. Leadership. Race.

This is helpful.

It is a difficult time, post-election, and one of the things that I hope tonight and Spirit Rock can be for you—and as a reminder of what you can create within your own life—is a sanctuary. A sanctuary of calm, a sanctuary of loving awareness to hold everything.

Because difficulties are inevitable. If you haven't noticed in human incarnation, there's praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, success and setbacks and failures. Anybody not have that? You can have your eight dollars back, whatever you paid. It's going to happen. Trouble, said Zorba the Greek—that's called life.

And there's a purpose in it for us, or it can have a purpose, just as we go right now into the darkest time of the year, into the solstice. You can feel it with the time change and the seasons shifting. That darkness has a purpose, as the poet says: gradually it will school your eyes and your heart to find the luminous spirit, the true gifts that are required to navigate, hidden in this night's corner.

Thich Nhat Hanh often described how when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone on the boat to survive.

So here we are, and there are these national and international questions and uncertainties and fears, as people named: climate change, jobs, immigration, racism, Black Lives Matter, security, the role and the rights of women, LGBTQ rights, human rights in general, our prison system. All these things are in the process of being shaken, possibly changed in uncertain ways. We're right now in an uncertain time. We've actually been in uncertain times all along, just so you know. But it's particularly visible at certain times.

How do we respond in a time of uncertainty? I noticed myself after the election, and also talking to other people, that there were different levels of my experience.

My body, because I had a particular predilection in this election—which I won't say, but you could guess—felt, after a very long night, like PTSD. When I tuned into my body, there was that kind of fight, flight, or freeze that got activated. Fear, sadness, confusion. But more than that, it was somehow locked in my body.

And then I began to realize that the election, at least as I could see it, was also about survival—on both sides, on all sides. People who were worried about surviving in some way or other. And it moved survival fears from one group to another perhaps, but everybody who was part of it could feel: Will I survive? Will the things that matter to me survive?

If you look at it from a neuroscience perspective, as well as from the Dharma, you start to see that the way the campaign went, it somehow hijacked the limbic system, hijacked the reptilian brain. That was really what was operating for a lot of people—not the neocortex looking at things thoughtfully, but primitive fears. And so that was all in my body and in other people's bodies.

That's the first thing: being mindful, paying attention, acknowledging those survival fears, and also learning how to be present for them so they can unwind and untangle, so they're not carried in the way we react.

Then I looked at my mind. It was a mess. Racing and trying to figure things out, rehashing, "if only," planning. Somebody called this the United States of Anxiety right now. Catastrophizing in different ways. As Mark Twain said so notably, "My life has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened." I could see all the catastrophizing, and my mind was just having a field day, going crazy. Okay, there's the mind.

Then I tuned into my heart, and that was different. It got quieter. That's the place where, for me, compassion, wisdom, love, and graciousness live. And somehow there was a sense of being here in the midst of it all—a stillness, a being present, which is what we did tonight when we sat, inviting ourselves to come into the present in a deeper way. To breathe, to relax, even amidst the uncertainty. To tie your shoes and keep walking in the right direction.

From that attention, I realized what was important: to not let fear take over my heart. Yes, there were the thoughts, and yes, there was stuff in the body, but the essential thing was to not let my heart be colonized by fear—by that kind of primitive activation that's been so powerful on all sides in the country.

And then I opened my attention in meditation further, to a kind of vastness—to what my teacher Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows," to being the space of loving awareness as a witness with vast perspective. From this vastness, we sense the winter solstice coming and the turning of the seasons, the rise and fall of political dynasties, the rise and fall of whole civilizations and eras, the turning of the spheres. Somehow we're part of this whole great turning that we can see. We can become the witness, the one who knows, the loving awareness that says, "Wow, this is a historic time we're living through, where history becomes really visible"—with interest and care, but also not so tangled in the middle of it. There's a kind of equanimity, a balance, simply by making a vast space of it and looking over time, over a long period of time.

As Gandhi said, "When I despair"—so there he was, despairing like someone else who mentioned it here—"I remember that all through history, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time, they can seem invincible. But in the end, they always fall. Always."

Gandhi was taking that vast perspective. They can seem invincible, and when we look at the state of the world, there are tyrants in all kinds of forms. But in the end, they always fall. Always. And it was in some way that Gandhi could hold the dance of humanity—the tainted glory, the troubled life of human beings. Some of it stupendously, unbearably beautiful, and some of it, as my Zen master Seung Sahn, a Korean Zen master, would say, "Human beings—number one bad animal." You kind of get both sides to it.

I spoke last month when I was here about this beautiful new book that has come out called The Book of Joy, which is a dialogue between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu. Some friends were able to fly Archbishop Tutu to Dharamsala and invite the two of them to have a week together, recording how it could be that they laugh and are joyful when Tutu lived through the horrors of apartheid—people being killed and shot and necklaced with tires and gasoline, just really atrocious times for a long period. And the Dalai Lama, even now, will meet people who walk barefoot over the Himalayas out of Tibet, people who've been in prison or tortured, and he hears those stories every week when he's there.

And yet somehow they laugh. The book is full of them playing with one another too. They're sitting about to have lunch, and Tutu starts to tell a story, and then the food starts to come in, and the Dalai Lama turns away. Tutu says, "You're not listening to me, Your Holiness! How am I going to get your attention?" And the Dalai Lama says, "I think maybe you need a stick to hit me with."

And so Tutu pretends to start hitting him, and the Dalai Lama says, "No, no, the cameras are on. We're supposed to be holy men. Cut that out." And you just feel their love for one another, which they actually express. There's something so beautiful. And you see there are a bunch of photos of them kind of laughing with one another.

They're talking about what it means to carry a sense of happiness and joy, even in the midst of the sorrows of the world. And they would say, what good does our spiritual life have for us if it leaves us depressed, if we can't truly be happy where we are?

And so then they start talking about where they might get reborn. Tutu says, "Do you really think that when—I didn't say if—when the Dalai Lama arrives in heaven, that God will say, 'Oh, Dalai Lama, you've been rather wonderful. What a pity you're not a Christian. You'll have to go to that warmer place.'" And then Tutu pauses and in a very intimate moment says, "I think one of the best things that ever happened to me in my whole life was meeting you."

And then the Dalai Lama smiled and started to tell another story. And Tutu says, "I thought we were trying to eat. Come on, let's stop this story." They're just bantering back and forth.

They go on to talk about dying because they're old guys, they're in their eighties. The Dalai Lama says, "Well, I suppose you're going to go to heaven, right?" And Tutu says, "How about you?" The Dalai Lama says, "Maybe hell." Tutu says, "But I thought you Buddhists believe in rebirth." Then he pauses, and the Dalai Lama says, "Well, it's all uncertain. We have to wait and see. Even that is uncertain, right?" And Tutu goes on, "Well, you better be nice to the Chinese because they're planning to pick your next incarnation."

What they talk about amidst their teasing with one another is a deep joy and a celebration of the life they've been given no matter what. There's something magnificent and beautiful about life as it is—that the leaves on the trees take light and turn it into sugar. I mean, what a planet. It's fantastic. The turning of the seasons, the birth of new babies and children. All you have to do is see some little kid wandering around looking at the world. "Wow, where did I get born?" Looking at the trees.

I remember taking my daughter when she was little to these great monuments. You take a little kid to the Grand Canyon and they reach down and pick up a stone and say, "Isn't that pretty?" They don't need to look at the Grand Canyon because everything is the Grand Canyon to them. And you get that sense from the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu—this delight in being alive no matter what, and gratitude for it.

So how do we respond and not let fear take over the heart? This is really our question today. And how might we practice in such a way that fosters this?

Mindfulness, loving awareness, invites a deep listening, a kind of profound listening. Because if you look at the election, whatever side you are on or however you voted or believe, I believe the result of the election and of Trump's electoral victory—I see it as a symptom, not as something in itself concrete. I believe it's a symptom for many people of fear, that survival place, that expresses loss, pain, lack of hope or loss of meaning.

The question is: Can we not turn on one another? Can we turn toward one another? Can we listen to the fears that are underneath, the loss of meaning, all of those kinds of things? As Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic, says, "Of what use is it to travel to the moon if we cannot cross the abyss that separates us from ourselves and from one another?"

And so to practice as we have is really an invitation to be present for the way things are and to listen more deeply than just the superficial level. And listening, it turns out for human beings, is a beautiful thing.

My beloved wife, Trudy Goodman, colleague, teacher, and inspiration to me—she's currently working in the Darfur refugee camps on the border inside Chad. The project she's working for involves people from her dharma community in LA. They went in and did something unusual in the camps.

They asked the women what they wanted. Usually aid comes in and somebody somewhere has an idea and they send it over. But they went in and they listened. They said to the women, "What do you want?"

And the women wanted two things. They wanted soccer so their children would have something uplifting to do and learn to cooperate with one another. And they wanted preschool and kindergarten so that the little ones would begin to perhaps unravel their trauma somewhat, but also begin to realize that they could learn about the world. What a beautiful thing—to ask people and then listen. "What is it that you want?"

So Trudy is there training teachers, because she had run a school for little children for a long time, including disabled children, so she knows a great deal about it. She's training teachers in trauma work for young children and in the arts of emotional intelligence and that aspect of education. And it all started simply by listening.

I was working recently with a very famous playwright in America who was worried because her son, now in his forties, was an artist and painter who didn't sell very many paintings. She'd been supporting him. Couldn't he get a job? Wasn't she just enabling him and ruining his life? She, as a playwright, was very successful and quite wealthy, and she'd been supporting him. The son was married, they had a couple of kids. And she said, "Somehow I feel like I'm ruining his life by not letting him become the man he should be."

And I said, "Well, maybe so. Why don't you ask him?" That little surprise. "Oh!"

So we sat down together and she asked him, and he said, "No, this is exactly what I want to do. Thank you. Thank you, Mom. I want to paint. I feel like not only that, I use my art in this way and that way. You're helping me live exactly the life I want. I don't want to be a schoolteacher. I don't want to be the things you envision I should be. Thank you."

There's just something about listening to somebody and asking them, "What is going on for you? What matters?"

One of my favorite dharma stories is of a man named Vinoba Bhave. Vinoba Bhave was probably, after Gandhi, the most important leader in the Gandhian movement after Mahatma Gandhi died. When Gandhi died—after the partition of India and Pakistan and all of the destruction that happened as people fled and there was violence—in those new nations, after Gandhi was assassinated, the people who followed him were depressed, if not despairing, as someone raised those words in this room.

Vinoba, who had been very close to Gandhi, just kind of went on retreat. It was like after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, how people were dispirited. They lost their spirit in some ways. It was so terrible.

A couple of years passed, and some of the people said, "We want to have a conference to continue his work. We want to have a gathering, to bring the community together of those around Gandhi. Would you, Vinoba, fly across the country and meet us in Madras or wherever it was going to be and be our leader? Help us."

And he refused.

They pressed him. "Will you come? Will you come? We need your voice."

Finally he said, "All right, I will come under one condition. I need to walk there."

The walk was six months across a great part of India. And so he started to walk. He would go into the rural villages in the different, poorer parts of India and sit under the big tree that you find in the center of many Indian villages. He would sit with people in the evenings and simply have a listening circle, asking, "What is your life like? What's happening for you as human beings?"

After visiting a series of villages, he began to hear more and more how the very poorest of the Indians there at that time were like indentured servants to a system where they couldn't raise their children well, couldn't make very much money, because they were farmers working someone else's land and getting just a pittance, a meager amount.

He became more and more troubled. So he went to sleep, woke up the next morning, called them all together and said, "When I go back to Delhi, I'm going to meet with Prime Minister Nehru"—whom he knew—"and I'm going to get the government to start a program to give parcels of land to the landless among you so you can grow your own food."

And everyone became very happy.

He was delighted, and he stayed another night—but he didn't sleep very well. He called them together the next morning and said, "You know, I didn't sleep well because I realized the way government works." At least at that time in India, and other places in the world, including here. He said, "By the time the money gets allocated and goes through the states or the provinces and the districts, when the government allocates it, even if I can get them to do it, by the time it gets to you, there ain't going to be much." He was not all that trusting of government, which is also in the air right now in certain ways.

And so he became a little bit despondent. What can we do? And then a man stood up—one of the wealthiest men in that particular village, a landowner. He said, "You have come with the spirit of Mahatma Gandhi, who is so revered in India. And I hear this problem. How much land do we need for these families?" It turned out there were sixteen families, and they needed five acres apiece or something like that to actually have a sustainable farm. And the man said, "In the honor of Gandhi, I have land, and I will grant them—the sixteen families—I will grant eighty acres of land." It was a beautiful gesture and a gift.

So Vinoba then walked the next day, two days to the next village, listened to their problems and concerns, especially for those who were the outcasts in that system—because that's a kind of racist apartheid system as well—and their struggles. And then he told the story of what had happened in the previous village. And one of the rich elders in that village stood up and said, "Well, in the spirit of Gandhiji, how much land do we need in this village?" And there were twelve families or something. "I will give sixty acres."

And it began then, what turned into the Bhoodan Indian Land Reform Movement. Vinoba Bhave, from that point on, walked for more than a decade through every state and province in India, and with his people collected fourteen million acres of land that people voluntarily turned over to those who were poorer, who had nothing. It was the biggest land transfer in the history of the world, all done because he simply went and sat under the trees and listened to what people really needed.

This is what listening is about in some way.

I have this page that I love, that my daughter wrote when she was in second grade. She said, "Dad, I think you could use this." You all know this passage, but it's written in that elementary school handwriting: "What is man without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, men would surely die from great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man." That's that famous passage from Chief Seattle.

And so when we listen—and someone mentioned climate change, which is of course an enormous global problem—listening also means listening to the earth and really listening to what's happening, so that we can respond in a way that is direct and courageous and intelligent, no matter what.

I just came back from spending some weeks with my twin brother, who's in the middle of a very difficult cancer treatment. He has a kind of blood cancer, and he's been treated at Dana-Farber in Boston and at Brigham Hospital. Sitting in the hospital or in the cancer center, as I have on and off now for some weeks or months—it's kind of an amazing thing. First of all, the doctors and the staff there have been fantastic. They're just so devoted and loving. It's really amazing. And sometimes they succeed and sometimes they don't. But their care is beautiful.

And then you see all these families. It's not just the people with the bald heads and the cancer patients—and they can be little kids or they can be old people, every age. But you see all the concerned families, all the brothers and sisters and moms and children. And there's something so tender about it. And then I start to feel all the people in the world who are tending one another when they get sick. It's not just there, but it's us taking care of each other. And there's something in just letting myself listen to that and see it—even though it's tragic in certain ways, there's also something magnificent in the kind of care and love that people offer to one another.

So I want to ask you to do something. I'd like you to look around a little bit and catch one or two people's eye or glimpse. It doesn't have to be that soulful Sufi stare or something like that. But just to look around at some people near you while I read a little passage to you. Just look at some folks and let them look at you. Pick one.

This person has a body and a mind, just like me. This person has feelings, emotions, thoughts, joy and sorrow, just like me. This person has in his or her life experienced physical and emotional pain and suffering, just like me. This person has at some point been sad or disappointed, just like me.

Let yourself see.

This person has at some point been hurt or angry, just like me. This person worries and is frightened sometimes, just like me. This person has longed for friendship, just like me. This person is learning about life, just like me. This person wishes to be free from pain and suffering, just like me.

Keep looking at someone. Keep it going.

This person wants to be caring and kind to others, just like me. This person wishes to be safe and healthy, just like me. This person wishes to be happy, to be loved, just like me.

And you start to feel, as you do this, the natural metta, the natural care. All it takes is a little bit of attention and listening. And you see: Oh, I wish that this person would be well, that they would have friendship and love and compassion for the difficulties, and be freed from struggle and be happy, peaceful. It's innate in us. And all it asks is a little bit of our attention.

What happens is you drop into the heart. As you quiet the mind and listen to the heart, you also tune into the universal laws of things. The noble truths: that suffering has its causes. Greed, hatred, ignorance—these become the cause of suffering. Prejudice, delusion, racism, the kind of fears that we carry—all those things create suffering.

And their opposite, which is your birthright, which is also possible for you. This is one of the beautiful things with the Dalai Lama and Tutu, because they keep talking about human possibility. This is the world that we are directing ourselves toward. The opposite: love, clarity, wisdom, truthfulness, generosity, gratitude. These bring happiness.

And so when the Buddha was asked about society, he said: Yes, when members of the society meet in harmony and depart in harmony, when they treat one another with respect, the society will prosper and not decline. When they honor the timeless wisdom, the ancient wisdom, they will prosper and not decline. When they care for the most vulnerable among them—the women and the children, the aged—they will prosper and not decline. When they tend and care for the natural world around them, even then, they will prosper and not decline. When they treat one another with respect, they will prosper and not decline. When they cultivate their personal mindfulness and loving kindness, such a society will grow and prosper and not decline.

You just look from the heart and you see what works for the happiness of human beings. Just like me, that person and that one and that one want to be happy. And you see the truth again from the Buddhist teachings: that hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. It doesn't matter what has happened—this is the way that it works. Hatred never ends by hatred.

Or, as Mark Twain said, kindness is the language which the deaf can hear and the blind can see. There's something really beautiful in that—that kindness is the language that the blind can see and the deaf can hear.

"O nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you are. Remember the fundamental dignity that was born into you and in all beings. And as you listen, let your listening to one another be a listening that respects the dignity of the other, that each being deserves respect.

Let me share a story. The man was aged but looked many years older. He was an army veteran. He was also homeless, cold, and hungry. I could see he had tried to wash up before coming to the social services department to ask for help. His face and hands were clean, but his clothes were filthy. And though he claimed not to have had any alcohol that day, the smell of it seeped from his pores.

I wanted to get him into rehab and I asked if he was ready to come in off the streets. "No ma'am," he said, "all I'd like is a few dollars and some bus tickets. If I can get sober enough, they'll let me into the shelter across town."

That shelter had fifty beds—cots, really. The homeless were admitted at night and forced out at dawn to eat breakfast at a nearby charity. Fifty beds and nearly a thousand homeless in this part of the city. Winters here in Northern California means cold rain and mud. Even though this man and many like him slept under bridges to keep dry, the dampness penetrated everything.

His clothes and the bedroll he'd placed on the floor smelled moldy. The pages of a book he carried were swollen with moisture. I asked him how many times he'd tried rehab.

"Two or three," he said. "Long time ago."

"Maybe it's time to try again." I explained that I'd had a client who'd gone through the program seven times before it took. "Besides," I said, "we're months away from warmer weather. What else have you got going on?"

I watched his face as he considered my offer. I thought I saw a flicker of hope in his eyes, followed by a shadow of doubt. He'd tried before. It had been hard—impossibly hard. And so he was living on the streets. Finally, he lifted his head and looked at me. I reached for the phone. "Shall I?" I asked. He barely nodded yes.

An hour later, I handed him over to a recovering alcoholic, also a veteran, who would drive him to one of the best rehab facilities in the county. "Come visit me when you graduate," I said as they left.

I barely recognized the man when he came into my office six months later—so tall and handsome, smelling like the outdoors, holding a huge bouquet of flowers.

This is possible. It's there in us.

Now, what's also true—and this is the trauma and the fear we carry—is that more veterans from Vietnam have died of suicide than the names written on that wall. How do we care for them? How do we care for one another?

So in times of change, oh nobly born, here is what's asked: a kind of courage. But the first aspect of courage is humility. To be still. Not to react so quickly. There's a place for reaction, certainly. But can you find in your being the ability to stay present and still even amidst uncertainty?

My teacher Ajahn Chah used to say, "It's uncertain, isn't it?" When people would ask him about anything, he would just laugh and say, "It's uncertain, isn't it?" This was one of his favorite phrases, and he would drum it into you. "How do I do this?" It's uncertain, isn't it? "What about that?" It's uncertain, isn't it? "Tell me about enlightenment." It's uncertain, isn't it? "You're supposed to be enlightened!" It's uncertain, isn't it?

There's a kind of humility being asked of us—to acknowledge that we actually don't know yet. We don't know what will happen politically, whatever side you're on. We don't know what will happen in other ways in society or in the world. It's not given to us yet to know that. And so we have to let ourselves wait and look and listen deeply.

It says in the Tao Te Ching: "Can you be still and not act until the right action comes of itself? Can you let the mind and heart settle like stirred up water until things are clear and you know how to act in concert with the Tao?"

This also asks of us a kind of trust. Trust in mystery. Trust in something vast, in the huge cycles of history. We're in a historic period, and a visible one to us. But there are other realities that are also true.

Gandhi again: "I believe in the unity of all things. And therefore I believe that if one person gains, the whole world gains. And if one person falls, the whole world falls to that extent."

So humility...

It's interesting reading Desmond Tutu and the Dalai Lama, because they're asked: What do you do in times of despair? How do you respond? And they offer this beautiful phrase. They say, "You show your humanity." What do you do in times of despair? You show your humanity. And they do—they make themselves vulnerable.

Here's a favorite story. Most of you know who Black Elk was, the great Sioux Lakota medicine man, one of the greatest of his era. There's a famous biography by John Neihardt called Black Elk Speaks. In the last chapter, Neihardt tells about Black Elk's final hike up Harney Peak, this mountain in the middle of the Dakotas where he'd had his sacred vision as a young shaman.

This holy man explained to Neihardt that when death approaches, a Lakota could climb this mountain to see if the Great Spirit had approved of their life. Rain would fall on those who had received the blessing or approval of the Great Spirit.

As a young man, Black Elk had experienced a vision that told him how to save his people and homeland from the soldiers and settlers. Remember, this was probably back in the 1890s that he was born. Through all his years, he had worked to fulfill this vision and restore what he called the sacred hoop, the circle of life. However, he felt that he had failed and that the sacred hoop was broken.

The day of his climb, Black Elk was an old man. He dressed in red long johns, moccasins, war paint, and a feathered war headdress. Slowly and laboriously, he climbed to the summit, oblivious to the tourists who stared at him. Neihardt teased him, saying that he should have picked a day with at least one cloud in the sky, but Black Elk rebuked him, saying that the rain would have nothing to do with the weather.

At the top of the peak, not far from the tourists, the old man lay down under a blue sky. To his astonishment, Neihardt watched as a few small clouds immediately formed over Black Elk, and a soft rain began to fall. Black Elk wept with relief. He felt that even though he had not succeeded in fulfilling the vision of the sacred hoop, the Great Spirit was signaling to him that he had done his best.

We are really in the midst of something so much vaster than our ideas—whether political or international, social or spiritual, all the kinds of ideas we carry. We're in the middle of some vast mystery of human incarnation on this earth and its evolution, we hope, on a good day, with its fits and starts. That's how it works. And we don't know.

But what we can do is begin to find a trust that we can do our part in this, no matter what. Like Black Elk, we don't know about restoring the sacred hoop. But as it says in the end, he wept with relief even though he had not succeeded in fulfilling his vision. The Great Spirit was signaling that he had done his best. He had done his part.

This is the secret. You're part of something vast and enormous, and the secret is to act beautifully even though it's not given to you to determine the outcome. To act beautifully without attachment to the fruits of your actions—because that's not given to you. But what is given to you is your heart and your voice and your spirit.

And sometimes it doesn't take that much. It only takes a little loving awareness at the right time with that person or those people.

I received this note from someone. I get all kinds of messages—descriptions of people's practice, questions, expressions of gratitude. This was a thank-you note:

"I don't really know how to talk to Jack directly, but I want to express how grateful I am right now just to be aware of your teaching. I found you listening to the podcast of Duncan Trussell. And little by little, your idea of loving yourself and having compassion kept inching their way toward what I guess is my heart. You soothed me in some of the darker days of my life and gave me a glimpse into a more loving reality.

Tonight, after resisting for months and months, I finally gave in and tried meditating. I decided, after hearing you speak through my phone for all these months, that I would just sit with myself for a while and see what happened. I'm not sure I've ever cried tears of joy like that in the twenty-one years I've lived so far.

For the first time, I stopped and really held my anger that I'd latched onto, my hatred, my anxiety, my self-judgment, everything else I criticized myself about—with softness and compassion, without judgment. And all of a sudden, I felt like I really could be loving to myself in the same way that I want to love others. I just finally got some relief from what I felt inside. And I want you to know that I love you for it. Thank you. Thank you so much."

It doesn't take that much. Finally sitting down and saying, we can do this. I can do this. You've been training for this kind of period that we're going through for a long time. You have.

And the words from the Buddha again, from the Majjhima Nikaya—something in your heart knows the truth of this:

Others will be cruel. We shall not be cruel. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will kill or harm living beings. We will not harm living beings. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will be greedy. We will be generous. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will speak falsely, maliciously. We will speak truthfully and kindly. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will be envious. We will not be. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will be arrogant. We will not be arrogant. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will be unmindful. We shall establish mindful presence. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others will lack wisdom. We shall cultivate wisdom. Thus we will incline our hearts.

This is an instruction of intention. But it's really a description of what you've been doing and learning—not just here at Spirit Rock. Some of you have come for a long time, some are quite new. But you're here, and in some way your presence is an expression of the wisdom that you already carry. It's not that you're getting something new here. You're just getting a little team spirit or something like that. You've been training for this for a long time—in steadiness, in compassion, in deep values.

And in times of uncertainty, you become the real bodhisattva. Bodhisattva means a being who's dedicated to compassion for all life, no matter what. In Zen they say there are only two things: you sit and you sweep the garden, and it doesn't matter how big the garden is. You quiet the mind, open the heart, and then you get up from sitting and you tend—whether it's the climate or whether it's immigrants or whatever is in front of you that needs your care and attention. People are hungry, you feed them. Someone's hurt, you bring what healing you can. Not because you're supposed to, or it's going to make you some special person. But as the Dalai Lama says, it's the only thing that brings true joy in this life—to be able also to serve life itself, to bring some of your gift to this world, to make a difference to a single child, to make a conscious business, to fight for justice.

And so you quiet the mind. And like the Tao, you let yourself get still until the right action arises. You want to be strategic at this time. And strategic means that you do have to be quiet. Make yourself a zone of peace and let yourself become a sanctuary, so that the work and the things you care about come from a deep place of understanding and the courage to be true to your heart.

And then you connect with the others after you sit quietly. Trudy said in the Darfur refugee camps, the greeting—they don't ask how you are. The greeting there is, "How is your family?" That's how they greet one another. What a beautiful greeting. How is your family? And then, of course, Mother Teresa said the problem with you is that you may draw your family circle too small.

How is your family? And it's a big family. It's humanity. It's the animals. It's the beings of the earth. It's libertarians and Democrats and Republicans and Greens and all those in-betweens.

A person with courage never needs weapons, but they may need bail. And as Thomas Jefferson says, one person with courage is a majority. One person with courage is a majority.

I read this last time about Barbara Widener, who founded Grandmothers for Peace. She says, "I began to question what kind of a world am I leaving for my grandchildren? So I got a sign, 'A Grandmother for Peace,' and stood on a street corner. Then I joined others kneeling as a human barrier at a munitions factory. I was taken to prison, strip searched, thrown into a cell. Something happened to me. I realized they couldn't do anything more. I was free." And now Barbara and her organization, Grandmothers for Peace, works in dozens of countries around the world. One person with courage is a majority.

The courage to connect. How is your family? To say that to anybody. How is your family?

And as the Dalai Lama and Tutu speak about, to rejoice. To see the enchantment of the world, no matter what, because it is extraordinary. To bring a beautiful smile and a joyful heart, even into the circumstances of difficulty. To live with gratitude—whether it's the holy or the broken hallelujah, to honor our beloved friend Leonard Cohen, who just died. "Even though it all went wrong, I stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah." It's been played too many times, but it doesn't matter. It's still really good.

So I have a treat for you, but first there's a couple of treats. There's a little addition to tonight's talk and then our small treat to end. I want to invite my dear friend and colleague, Thanissara, who's going to speak for just a few minutes.

Thanissara was a Buddhist nun for fourteen years. And then she and her beloved husband, who was a monk for even longer, jumped over the wall and got married instead of staying in the monastery. Then they went to South Africa and opened a Dharma center in KwaZulu-Natal—not just a Dharma center, but also a center for healing during the AIDS epidemic. It was a center for community development, community organizing in a very poor part of the country. They did that for quite a long time, for a decade or two. And now they're back here part of the time and teaching on occasion at Spirit Rock. They do extraordinary work, and she has a request to make of you tonight.

Thanissara began: "Thank you so much, Jack. Thank you for such beautiful and uplifting and hopeful and insightful and profound and healing words, which we all need at this moment. I'm really glad that you mentioned Black Elk and the Sioux peoples, because that's what I want to talk about tonight and ask for your support.

"In response to an invitation by Chief Arvol Looking Horse, who is out there on the North Dakota plains, on behalf of his peoples, the Sioux peoples, and the two hundred and eight tribes that have gathered there now—to help, with allies from across the country and around the world, to try to protect the sacredness of their lands and of the waters against the Dakota pipeline that's being laid with a great deal of aggression and intimidation. It's a very difficult dynamic.

"The invitation of Chief Arvol was for people of prayer, for people of peace, and particularly those who are religious people, people of faith, to come to the site and join in and offer prayers and stand with the peoples there—and for some people to stand on the front lines."

So this is a request that I felt very moved by, and felt compelled to respond to, to try and find a way to contribute so that a Buddhist presence can be there with other peoples of faith. About five hundred faith leaders have just been there to spend time with the community.

One thing I thought I could do—I'm going there actually on Saturday myself with a small group, helping to prepare some lodging and space for the Buddhist Peace Fellowship delegation that's going the week after. With a few friends, we're doing a fundraiser to help get some tipis there, to help winterize them, and to have provisions for Dharma practitioners to go and join this community and lend their support.

Since the climate march a few years ago, there has been a strong Buddhist presence and faith presence in supporting this need for us now to shift our ways of drawing energy from fossil fuels to renewables. And this Buddhist presence and voice, for all the reasons that Jack talked about tonight, is very important—this flavor of peace, of depth, of consciousness, of love over hate. Guided by masters like Thich Nhat Hanh, this is the kind of energy of spirit and sacredness that we can bring to these frontline struggles.

Today, just to finish, I spoke with a sangha member, Milo Byrne, from the San Francisco Zen Center, who's actually there on site at the moment. I asked him, "Have you got a few words? Because I'll be giving this talk tonight and asking for support, for contributions for this fundraising campaign to get those tipis there."

He was full of a great sense of spirit, actually. He said, "This is a generous community. People care a lot. We are holding a beautiful, prayerful space. Communities of resistance are really important, particularly aligned with Thich Nhat Hanh's encouragements. This interfaith gathering of spontaneous community is resistance through love." He said it's also cold.

So friends, I ask you to add to the dāna tonight. The dāna, I believe, is going to this effort. I ask you to give generously and to help me get shelter and supplies to those on the front lines by supporting this initiative. As you support this initiative, you're supporting the rights and dignity of the First Nations peoples of this land, who call us all relatives and who consider their actions also of benefit to our children and grandchildren up to the seventh generation and beyond.

Thank you. All my relations.

Thank you, Tanisara. There will be baskets as you leave for you to support and contribute. For those of you who can't go, you can help in that way.

What the times ask of us, and what the earth asks of us, is a change of consciousness—to shift from the fearful, separate consciousness, the consciousness of me versus someone else, to the consciousness of connection and interdependence and compassion. We're doing that work. Each of us, in our way, is invited or asked to find a kind of freedom of spirit no matter what happens, and to carry what's beautiful into the world.

And even though it all goes wrong, I stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah.

We've got to sing in here more. I like it. It's great.

Thank you.

Keep your heart strong. You've been training for this for a long time. And carry what's beautiful from the temple back out into the world.

Thank you. Thank you so much.

And thank you to Nisra too.

Good night.

CHAPTER 5

Jack Kornfield · 2h15

> In this Monday night teaching at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield and Trudy Goodman offer reflections on navigating uncertain times through Buddhist practice. Jack draws on the story of Emperor Ashoka's transformation and the Buddha's final teachings on what makes a society prosper—harmony, care for the vulnerable, and fostering mindfulness. He emphasizes that the Buddha's touching-the-earth gesture represents our capacity to trust in awakening despite Māra's challenges of temptation, aggression, and doubt.
> Trudy shares her profound experience teaching mindfulness to traumatized preschool teachers and soccer coaches in a Darfuri refugee camp in Chad. She reflects on the stark juxtaposition between affluent Western life and bare subsistence existence, yet notes the resilience and grace of people who show up to serve children despite chronic hunger and illness. The teaching highlights how simple loving presence and the ability to return attention to the present moment can be transformative for those experiencing trauma.
> The evening concludes with a blessing cord ceremony for the solstice, where participants tie three knots representing non-harming, refuge in the sacred, and heart intention for the year ahead. The teachers invite practitioners to become 'the weight that tips the balance' toward goodness, planting seeds of compassion even in times of darkness.

Good evening, everyone. Welcome to Spirit Rock on this wonderful Monday night.

So, we are live streaming tonight. If Jack and Trudy do some Q&A, remember that if you ask a question, you will be on camera and it will be broadcast. So if you prefer not to be broadcast, please don't ask a question tonight.

We have listening-assisted devices available on the back ledge of the sound booth. So if you're having a tough time hearing tonight, they're working very well, and you might want to try one of those.

During our break tonight, you can go up to the West Hall if you'd like. We have two virtual reality systems set up, and you can check out Living Insight, a virtual reality meditation that was produced at Spirit Rock with Jack. That's in the East Hall upstairs, and it'll be there during break.

Jack is our founding teacher at Spirit Rock, and Trudy is the founder of Insight LA. Very happy to have them with us tonight.

It is so much fun being newlyweds at this stage of life. Trudy and I got married this summer, and so far, it's actually going very well. We've had a good time. Really fun.

So it's a great pleasure to welcome you here tonight for this Monday Night Sitting group, which has now been ongoing for thirty-two years. In this last year or two, as I've come into my seventies, I've been teaching it less—more like once a month now. I did it once a week for those thirty years or whatever it was. And we have a whole panoply of other wonderful teachers who come and meet with folks on Monday night. But I'm very happy to be back and to welcome you here.

How many are here for the first time to Spirit Rock? Particularly a pleasure to welcome you all.

Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful valley through a whole community's care and commitment to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness—or inner freedom of heart—that are part of the Buddhist teachings, but that are really part of all wise spiritual life. And so through the care and the efforts of many, many people, we've created a sanctuary here, and we want to welcome you.

How many of you are new to meditation practice? Virgins in Marin, still! Wow. Particularly welcome. We'll have a little bit of instruction.

What we do Monday night is quite simple. We sit for thirty or thirty-five minutes in silence with a little bit of instruction. Then we take a break—ten or fifteen minutes to stretch and relax. That's usually followed by some teachings, as it will be tonight with Trudy and myself, and sometimes some dialogue or questions and answers. To end this evening, we're also going to do a little bit of ritual for those who wish to participate.

I have another question I want to ask of you. How many of you are involved in some form of work as service—whether you are teachers or healthcare workers, teaching English to someone who doesn't know it, or any other form of service? Ah, and the others are your clients that you brought along, right?

That's a beautiful thing to see as well. And it's not to divide the group in some way, because we all go at different cycles in our life, in and out of the times when it's time to serve in one way or another. The main thing is you don't want to use your spiritual practice to judge yourself. You're already too good at that, and we don't need to add another layer.

Mostly it's just a pleasure to be together. It's almost full moon and almost the solstice—all the turnings of the seasons.

So let us begin with some meditation practice. Sit together. Find a way to sit that is comfortable and stable, feet flat on the floor, perhaps sitting upright in your chair or on your cushion or bench—whatever way allows your body to rest stably on the earth. When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently.

You take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this human form, under your own tree of enlightenment. As you begin to pay attention, notice the state of your body this evening—this precious human body. If there's any obvious tightness or tension that you can easily release, do so. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Relax the shoulders and let the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body, gravity, the heaviness of your body in contact with the cushion, the chair, the earth. Feel how the earth can completely support you. You can let go and be fully held on the earth, just here. Let your belly be soft and the breath natural. Let your heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to pay attention to the experience just now—the living experience of this moment, this life. Feelings, thoughts, sounds. Establish a presence of mindfulness, a loving awareness.

After just a minute or so, you notice that as you establish the sense of loving awareness and presence, the attention very often wanders away—thinking, planning, remembering, imagining. So underneath the waves of thoughts and plans and memories and sounds, to deepen the sense of presence, feel the wave of the breath, this life breath that breathes itself constantly. Drop into the rhythm of the breath with your awareness. Feel it as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to feel, you can simply put your hand on your belly and feel the belly rise and fall in the palm of your hand for the meditation.

As you sense each breath, let each breath invite a calm, steady quieting of body and mind. Breathing in, breathing out. Receive with loving awareness, quieting the mind, steadying the body. Just here, this breath.

Again, after just a minute or two with the breath, you notice how after three breaths or six breaths, the attention again gets pulled by other experiences. If the experiences are in the background—thoughts and feelings and sounds—let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. But if something becomes stronger, then let go of attention to the breath. As if to bow to it, receive it with the same loving awareness you've given to the breath. Name it gently: "Oh, sadness," or "excitement," or "planning." As you name it—"sad, sad," or "excited," or "planning"—feel that wave of energy move through your body and mind. When that wave has passed, rest in the stillness and again feel the breath for a time, until another strong wave arises to be received with the same loving awareness.

Rest just here in the reality of the present. Steady. Kind.

Noticing the ever-changing breath, or receiving the visiting waves of experience with loving awareness, naming them gently, letting them rise and pass. This breath, or this moment's experience—receive with loving awareness. Just this. Steady with the breath, calming, centering. And a mindful bow to whatever arises: joy or fear, anger, longing, worry, delight, connection. Naming it gently. This too, receive with loving awareness. Receive with a peaceful heart.

It's really quite a wonderful thing to sit among so many other human beings who are quiet. It's quite fantastic. Thank you.

So please let yourself sit back down and get settled again. Let yourself sit in a way that is comfortable and at ease.

The teachings that are offered are not something particularly to believe or follow, but rather something to contemplate or reflect on. At best, they're reminders of something that you already know—something that's true in your own heart and your own experience.

I'll start and Trudy will follow, and then we'll do some kind of ritual as well. It was interesting driving up here, seeing the almost-full moon—tomorrow night it will be full. It's the December moon. And getting ready for the solstice that comes in not many days, this next week.

We had a meeting this morning of much of the Spirit Rock Teachers Council and other teachers who teach here. The conversation was about how Spirit Rock can be and is a sanctuary for people—how it can be a sanctuary in these times for those who come here and also for others who are in danger.

For all who are here tonight, it's such a pleasure to sit together. This becomes a place to quiet the mind and open the heart and listen deeply to what really matters. As a sanctuary, we welcome everyone—whatever race or orientation or ability or background or caste or creed—whoever you are, the Dharma gates welcome you. From the very beginning, the teachings of the Buddha were inclusive. They would say of this sage Gautama that he allowed everyone to join, not just the high caste or whatever it was. Everyone is welcome in the Dharma gates.

I've been traveling, some of it with my beloved, Trudy. I was on the East Coast for a while with my twin brother, as he's going through some of the difficult stages of cancer treatment at Dana-Farber. It's beautiful to see how much care and how steady and devoted the caregivers are at the hospitals and cancer centers, and all the families supporting people.

We were also just leading a retreat together with Ram Dass in Hawaii—a tough assignment. Ram Dass is eighty-five now, and he mostly talks about love. He has this huge altar at his house with images of the Buddha and Ganesha and Krishna and Shiva and the Dalai Lama and Gandhi and Mother Teresa and various Indian saints and sages. And then in the middle—it had been Dick Cheney and John Boehner for a while—now there's a big picture of Donald Trump. He says, "I love everybody. They're all on my altar and I pray for them all." It's a beautiful thing.

It is a beautiful and precious thing to be able to come and practice, to have a refuge or a sanctuary where we can steady our hearts, where we can quiet our minds, and make ourselves peaceful, especially in these times.

One of the great true stories in Indian history concerns the man who became Emperor Ashoka of the largest empire in India and surrounding lands over the last couple of thousand years. He was a conquering king who had just finished a huge battle conquering the southern part of the subcontinent. He was sitting in his tent, looking out over the battlefield afterward, which his troops had won. He saw so many people who had been killed, including some of his beloved friends and soldiers.

And then he saw a monk walking along the edge of the field, very peacefully, going out with his bowl for morning alms food. And he said, "I, who am the emperor of lands that stretch for a thousand leagues in every direction and can command anything, have everything at my fingertips—but I don't have the one thing I see that monk has, which is peace of mind."

So he called the monk over. It turned out to be a very wise and compassionate monk who began to offer teachings: "If you're seeking happiness, happiness won't come from greed. It won't come from hatred and violence. It won't come from ignorance. Here are the roots of happiness: generosity, love, care for one another." He began to give instructions, outwardly and inwardly, to quiet the emperor's mind and open his heart.

Eventually Ashoka became the most benevolent emperor in that whole thousand-year history of India. Today there are stone pillars still standing all around India inscribed with his edicts, which say that everyone should be treated with respect no matter what their birth, that everyone of every religion should be respected, that the natural world should be cared for. These were planted throughout his entire empire. And it all came because he looked and saw: I have everything but one thing. I don't have peace of mind. I don't have a peaceful heart.

As it says in the Tao: "Have you the patience to wait till the mud settles and the water is clear? Can you remain still and unmoving until the right action arises of itself from the heart?"

To come here and sit together is an invitation to come back and listen more deeply to what matters. This becomes particularly important in times of change and uncertainty. It seems, said the Buddha, that although we thought ourselves permanent, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not.

I remember very much how my teacher Ajahn Chah would answer many of the questions we asked him with a bit of a twinkle. He'd say, "Hmm, it's uncertain, isn't it?" We could ask him about all kinds of things. "Tell me about enlightenment." Instead of giving some philosophical answer, he'd look and say, "Hmm, it's uncertain, isn't it?" What's going to happen? What should I do? "Oh, it's uncertain, isn't it?"

He wanted us to become comfortable with uncertainty and to see, in the traditional language, anicca, dukkha, and anatta—that wherever we look, things are impermanent and in change, if you haven't noticed.

And that wherever you look, there is both sukha, or pleasure, and there is dukkha—loss, and trouble, and suffering, as well as joy and beauty. The world is composed of both, and you cannot run away from it, cannot have one without the other. And it's not in your control.

So then the question becomes: How do you navigate this particular human incarnation that you've been given?

When Ajahn Chah was invited to start a monastery in England some thirty-five years ago, he brought his first group of Western-trained monks to a little place that had been offered in London, stayed with them for a bit, and then left them there. They were meditating, going out for their alms food, living their life in this community of half a dozen people.

He came back a year later to visit and asked, "How is it going?"

They said, "Oh, swimmingly"—I suppose that's what you say in England. "It's going well."

"How are you getting along?"

"Oh, we're getting along beautifully. It's all going well."

And he looked at them and said, "Well, then there's not going to be much wisdom here, is there?"

Of course, he didn't really believe them either. That's the other part of it. Because the point wasn't to make things easy. The point is to take the human incarnation that you are given—with its joys and its sorrows, with its gain and loss, with pleasure and pain, with disruptive things and difficult things—and ask, "How do I respond to these? How do I live with them? How do I work with them?"

A story. Let me see.

He came in the evening after my children were asleep, slipping over my fence into the backyard, tapping quietly on the sliding glass door. The first time he arrived this way, I reached for my baseball bat. Then I saw who it was.

"It's so I won't ruin your reputation," he explained. He knew the neighbors would gossip about a married woman who entertained a man in her home while her husband was overseas in the military. There was no way to explain our unusual friendship to my proper, church-going neighbors, who watched approvingly during the day as I mowed the grass, washed the car, put up the screens. "You manage so well," they said.

This rental house in suburban California was just a temporary home. I intended to go back to college as soon as I could. Whether my husband would be included in these plans was still up in the air—he'd been repeatedly unfaithful, and we'd been unhappy for years.

My friend, too, was on the brink of making a life-changing decision. While he and I folded my little girl's laundry, emptied the dishwasher, cooked dinner, we talked for hours about the lives we'd chosen, our secret dreams. He spent Halloween with my girls and me, carrying the flashlight while the kids went trick-or-treating. Thanksgiving, he carved the turkey. My girls missed their father, and this kind, respectful man listened to them, laughed with them, read them stories.

One night, my next-door neighbor saw my friend arriving through the backyard, and he forbade his wife to speak to me after that. Then my across-the-street neighbor snubbed me at the supermarket—she'd obviously been talked to.

I wish there were a way to explain that I had decided to get a divorce and would soon be going back to college on a scholarship. Or that my friend was a Catholic priest who had spent the last twenty years in a monastery and now intended to leave the priesthood and live openly as a gay man.

How do we understand one another? We are so quick to judge other people. And of course we judge ourselves too—we can be so harsh on ourselves.

Perhaps when we quiet the mind and open the heart, when we begin to practice in the way that we do, the most important thing is that we can begin to listen. Listen to ourselves, but also listen to others—however they voted, wherever they live, whatever they look like—to their fears and hopes and concerns and vulnerability and tenderness and humanity.

Because it's our common humanity. That famous poem from Thich Nhat Hanh, "Call Me by My True Names," that everyone knows: "I am the frog swimming happily in the clear water of a pond, and I am the grass snake that silently feeds itself on the frog. I am the child in Uganda, all skin and bones, my legs as thin as bamboo sticks, and I am the arms merchant selling deadly weapons to Uganda. I am all of these." When I see this, he says, please call me by my true names, so that I can hear my cries and laughter at once, so that my joys and pain become one, so that I can wake up and open the door of my heart, the door of compassion.

So it's not like it's somebody else. It's humanity. It's us. And we're born into this. This is our family. We begin to listen. We begin to pay attention with respect. And then somehow, as we quiet ourselves and steady the heart, we have to live or stand up for what is true, what we know to be true in the deepest way in ourselves.

The word Dharma means truth, means the universal law. It's not like you have to become a Buddhist—spare your friends and family. It's the Dharma as that which is the way things are in this world. And that Dharma says hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. That Dharma says, in the face of fear and questions about immigration, or healthcare, or Black Lives Matter, or the poorest people, or Muslims, that every human being is born with an innate dignity and Buddha nature. And each one is a worthy being, every single one. That Dharma says that hatred and greed and ignorance lead to suffering. Not even a lot of judgment about it, just a cool analysis. This is how it works. And the opposites—generosity, love, care, wisdom, clarity—lead to well-being. What will you practice?

We are each endowed with the capacity to awaken. Said the Buddha, "If it were not possible for you to awaken, I would not teach you to do so. But just because it is possible for you to live a life with dignity and care and compassion, the great heart of compassion that's born in you, because it is possible for you, I teach you how to do so." And this is really what he called the great miracle of all—that this is born into us as human beings, individually and collectively.

In the last year of his life, there's a whole compendium of his final teachings. He was asked about a wise society. I've read this at other times in the last year or two, because it was something I got to read at the first Buddhist White House Leadership Gathering a year and a half ago or so. I'm not sure how many more there will be right now. Leave that aside.

But the Buddha was asked about a wise society in particular. And he responded—this was to a chief minister; he talked to kings and ministers and princes and cabinet members. And he said, here's the question: Do the members of that community meet regularly in harmony, discuss and depart in harmony, and treat one another respectfully? If so, then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. Do they follow and honor the wisdom and traditions of their elders in the past? Do they tend and care for the natural world around them? Do they care for the women, the children, and the most vulnerable among them? Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline. Do they foster mindfulness and loving kindness in their society? Then they can be expected to prosper and not decline.

Injustice, racism, war—they're not something new. And they're the source of enormous suffering. But they're not the end of the story. They are not. As Mark Twain said, kindness is the language the deaf can hear and the blind can see. And the end of the story is that it's possible for us as human beings to transform our own heart and mind. And we come together in that spirit.

You look up here at these images, these statues. There were no Buddha images for five hundred years. The Buddha didn't want any statues. And the only images there were was a wheel or a deer or some kind of nature images, a tree. The very first images of the Buddha looked like Apollo. They were copies of Greek gods, but with a little bit of a Buddhist twang to them or something like that. But this one, which comes from Thailand, the one that's behind me—there's Quan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion, behind Trudy, has her back there. And the Buddha that's behind me has one hand, his right hand down, touching the earth, which is a symbol of the night of enlightenment seated under the Bodhi tree when the Buddha, in the myth or the story...

vowed to sit there and not move until he had awakened to the freedom beyond all space and time. One of those little vows.

And then he was attacked by the armies of Mara. Mara being, in the Indian mythology, the god who represents all the struggles and difficulties that there are in the world. Mara came in the form of temptations—every possible temptation—and Mara came in the form of aggression. Spears and arrows and flaming arrows. And each time, the Buddha would simply raise his hand and touch the weapons that came at him with the heart of compassion, and they would turn to flower petals and drop at his feet.

And finally Mara said, "By what right do you have to sit here and awaken?" So the last of the difficulties was doubt. The doubt of yourself. What right do you have, in this earthly human realm, to awaken?

And then the Buddha reached down, in the story, the myth as it's told, and said, "The earth is my witness." The earth is my witness that I have dedicated this life—and if one likes the bigger story, many, many lives—to compassion, to patience, to care for another, to truthfulness, to integrity, to steadiness of heart. The earth is my witness that it is the possibility and the birthright of human beings to awaken.

And with that, the goddess of the earth, as the myth is told, rose up, and out of her hair came this great shower of water, this great waterfall that washed Mara and the armies of Mara away. And then the Buddha sat very peacefully until the morning star appeared, just there on the horizon, and then he was awakened. Something like that.

So when I say, as we sit, that you sit under your own Bodhi tree—you have Mara. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, "No Mara, no Buddha," right? You need Mara. Mara is part of the plot. Mara is in there. But Mara invites you to touch the earth, to say, "Yes, I see you, Mara. I see who you are. I see this." And to trust that there is another reality in your own heart that is vast, that is beyond the forces of Mara.

And what we learn and practice in the most beautiful way is to trust. It doesn't mean every sitting or every week of practice is glorious. Sometimes it's not. It hurts and you're doubting and you're judging and you do all the kind of weird things you do in there. I know you do. You look good, but it's not, you know...

I tell the story of meeting this man in the Miami airport who came up to me. I was traveling to some retreat, and he said, "Jack, is that you?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "Do you remember? I sat the three-month retreat with you in 1982." I kind of vaguely remembered him. He said, "Well, I feel like I was a kind of failed student because I practiced for a while and then I built a business and I had a couple of kids and I got involved in all kinds of other things, and I didn't meditate. I really felt after some years that I'd fallen away, that I was a failure."

He said, "But last year I had a heart attack. And as I was being wheeled into surgery on the gurney and getting prepped—it all came back to me. I knew how to steady myself. I knew how to come to my breath. I knew how to make space for the fear and all the things. It was amazing. It was all there." He said, "So I thought I was a failure, but thank you."

I'm sorry to say, it's too late for you. The fact that you've come into this room today means that some part of you—that knows it's possible to live in an awake and compassionate and free way—has already started to awaken. And, you know, too bad. It's in you. It's happening. So there's something that you can trust.

But it's not just a personal trust in some way. There's also something much deeper. Deena Metzger, poet friend, writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

And there are these vast cycles of time as well as the limited ones. So Gandhi says, "When I despair, I remember that all through history the ways of truth and love have always won. Yes, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time they can seem invincible, but in the end they always fall. Think of it—always, always."

And so sometimes what's needed is both a trust in your own heart and also a trust in the broader cycles of humanity. We have less slavery than we did one hundred and two hundred and three hundred years ago.

It's getting less and less and less. And even though women are not treated as they should be in many places and parts of the world, still it has improved over the centuries. And even though there are children who are badly treated, still the lot of children has gotten better and better. And it goes up and down, and there are all these cycles. But it's something that we are learning that's possible for us.

There's this beautiful story that Barbara Kingsolver tells of the Lorai people in the mountains of Central Asia. They're nomadic people, and they were about to come down with their herds from the high mountains. Fall was coming. One of the young children, a ten-year-old, was in charge of taking care of the little ones. She turned away—somehow she had her little flock of children—and all of a sudden one of the boys, a toddler of sixteen or eighteen months who had just learned to walk, disappeared. She ran all over and couldn't find him, then ran back to the village calling out, "I can't find him! Is he back here? Did he come back?" No one had seen him. They all got upset and started looking. They looked under everything, in every house. The parents were, as you can imagine, completely alarmed. It got dark. They couldn't find the child. They got their lights and looked as best as they could.

The next morning they went and looked further, and then someone said they'd heard there was a bear in the vicinity the day before. Everyone got frightened. The men of the village got themselves ready, took some torches, and went up into the woods. How could he walk so far? Maybe something happened to him. In the trees above there was a series of caves. It was the third or fourth or tenth cave—they were searching, nobody knows—and they heard a voice. A cry. A child. They looked into the darkness and ominously smelled bear. But the boy was in there crying, alive.

They moved in the half-light of the cave and saw this animal against the wall. A huge, thick-furred she-bear. And then they saw the child. With sounds and gestures and fiery torches, they somehow scared the bear out of the cave. They rushed in praising Allah and grabbed the child.

Kingsolver says, "I've searched for more of the story, what happened to the bear, but I can go no further because I don't read Arabic or Farsi or their language. But this is not a mistake. It's not a hoax. It happened. The baby was found with the bear in the den. He was alive, unscarred, and perfectly well after two and a half days—and well-fed, smelling of milk." The bear was nursing the child.

So what does this mean? How is it possible that a huge, hungry bear would take a pitifully small, delicate human child to her breast rather than tear him into food? But she was a mammal, a mother. She was lactating, so she might have lost her own young somewhere. And so she was driven by the pure quality of maternity to take this small, warm neonate to her belly and hold him there gently.

You could read this story and declare it impossible, even though many witnesses swore it was true. Or you could read this story and think of how warm lives are drawn to one another in cold places—and think of the unconquerable force of a mother's love. The fact of the DNA code that we share in great majority with other mammals. You could think of all that and say, "Of course the bear nursed the baby. He was crying from hunger, she had milk—small wonder."

There is something in us that is designed to care for one another. We can lose sight of it in big systems, in political ways and economic ways, and it can be quite destructive, as it has been over history.

But there's something even deeper than that, which is the love that connects us—this earth and human beings together. And this is really what's trustworthy.

So we're in the time of the solstice and the turning of the seasons. Christmas, Hanukkah, Kwanzaa. And the mythology is that the humans help the sun come back by lighting your candles, by celebrating in the way that you do. You somehow invite out of the darkness the light to begin to return.

And archetypally, humans are called the make-weight. Remember those scales, the way people used to measure things? There would be a balance scale with weights you'd put on one side, and then you'd weigh whatever the commodity was on the other. If you see the fancy sets of weights, they're little turtles or rabbits or animals all made out of some heavy metal. Well, it turns out the scales of the universe are closely balanced between good and evil, between creation and destruction. And in this mythological way of understanding, human beings are one of those little weights—but we're the little weight that when it's placed on one side of the scale or the other is the one that tips the balance.

And so that is what's given to you from Mary Oliver, our great poet laureate. She writes about the Buddha's last instructions:

I think of the Buddha every morning as the east begins to tear off its clouds of darkness and send up a signal white fan streaked with pink and violet. An old man, he laid down between the two sal trees. He might have said anything knowing it was his final hour. Around him the villagers gathered and stretched forward to listen. No doubt he thought of everything that had happened in his difficult life. Slowly, beneath the branches, he raised his head and looked into the face of that frightened crowd. "Make of yourself a light," he said. As his last words: make of yourself a light.

And so in this time of solstice, in this turning of the seasons, you are invited to become that light that shines in the world. Whatever your background or views or wherever you come from, you can carry something beautiful into this world. And it's said that not in the sky, nor in the midst of the ocean, nor the highest mountain cave can one escape the consequences of one's deeds. And not in the sky or the mid-ocean or the highest mountains will the seeds that are planted fail to bear fruit. If you plant beautiful seeds—if you plant something even in the season of no light, in the darkness—if you plant the bulbs and the seeds and tend them as we do, something beautiful will come.

To quiet ourselves and to sit together and to reflect in this way, it's not a grim duty. It's really a joy—what seeds you will plant.

I want to welcome you all and welcome myself to being here. This is my first time teaching in this beautiful new hall, and I actually haven't taught this Monday night for many years. So it's a pleasure to be here and to be here with Jack and all of you.

When I was listening to Jack talk about those little weights that are us, the humans, that can tip the balance one way or another, I was thinking about what I wanted to share with you tonight. Somebody came up and asked me if I'd had a lot of travels. I said yes. And he said, did you take Jack with you? And I said yes—we went together to Maui to teach with Ram Dass in beautiful Hawaii.

But before that, I was in Africa, in the heart of Africa, and I didn't take Jack with me on this trip. It was not a very safe trip at all. I was in eastern Chad. Chad, if you don't know exactly where it is, is really right in the middle of the continent—Nigeria, Niger, Libya, Sudan, Cameroon, Central African Republic. Anyway, it's right in the middle.

And I was in a Darfuri refugee camp called Gozamir, which is less than an hour from Darfur, from Sudan. There's just a highway—actually just a big, wide dirt road, not even passable in the rainy season—which is the highway to Sudan.

The juxtaposition of going from working and being in a place like this to being at the retreat in Maui with so much—this buffet full of so much food, like here at Spirit Rock. Electricity, running water, Wi-Fi, air conditioning if you need it, fans—just comfort piled upon comfort piled upon comfort. We take all this for granted. And to be in a place where we just didn't have comforts like that, where we never knew what to expect.

We were staying in a little UN compound with lots of barbed wire and guards. It's not a safe place at all where we were. We couldn't stay in the camp. But there was no reliable anything. So we were so grateful for the trickle of water, or the times when the air conditioning worked before it went off again. The heat was so intense.

And yet, we were there to teach mindfulness to the preschool teachers and the soccer coaches.

They're all young people. They're all totally traumatized. Because anybody over the age of fifteen—well, thirteen really—has seen, has witnessed unspeakable atrocities, or had them done to them.

Mindfulness, I kept thinking when I would have moments of doubt—as Jack was talking about, doubt is the slipperiest of those hindrances to our being fully present—I would wonder, mindfulness is not at the top of the hierarchy of needs here. How can we help? But it turns out that we really were able to help.

And the first way is through what we're all practicing here: the ability to be very simply present, to be attentive, to listen. We've listened to ourselves enough that we know how to listen to others with a little less judgment, a little more compassion. And it turns out—and we all know this—that being the recipient of that kind of attention, attention that is interested and fully present... infants have sonar for this. They fuss when you're not there. Children would rather have terrible attention than none at all.

So it turns out that our just bearing witness and listening to people's stories, and obviously being moved by their stories—and they knew we cared enough. It takes a long time to get there. You have to travel in these little humanitarian planes, and you land on dirt airstrips, and you have to listen to the plane voice, which is female even though the pilots are male, saying as you get close to the ground, "Terrain, terrain, pull up, pull up." And you're thinking, I know African pilots are so skilled, but is there an airstrip? Which you don't know until the last minute if it's your first flight.

So it turns out that our ability to be interested, our simple loving presence, counts for a lot. And teaching people how to bring their minds back from, say, a flashback—because traumatized people are constantly having flashbacks. Some of you unfortunately know this from your own experience. To be able to bring the mind back to the simple reality of what's here—we don't go inside, but we look at just what's here: the touch points of the body with the chair, what we see, what we hear in the present moment, the fact that we're being quiet and all of us are together. We come to this moment and we're safe for now.

Nobody there can tell their children, "Now you're safe." Because they're not, for sure. They're safe for now. And in some way, that's how we all are, right? We're safe for now.

And as we mature, all of us, in our practice of mindfulness and compassion, we just can't see the world the way we used to, maybe, when we were able to ignore more of reality. We really see that when one person is hungry, we're not separate from that hungry person. When one person is homeless, we feel that. When one person is a refugee, we're not separate from the refugees.

And I feel that—and I think you do too, or you wouldn't be here—a part of us is then hungry, a part of us is homeless, a part of us is also a refugee. And we realize more and more our intimate connection, our belonging to life. Just like the breeze belongs to the wind or a wave belongs to the ocean, we belong to life. And when we belong and feel our belonging to the world in this way, how can we not want to be of benefit in some way? To be that little weight that tips the balance.

And obviously not everybody is called to travel that far and go someplace like that. I felt very fortunate to have met these people and fallen in love with this small team and decided to join them. But I kept feeling while I was in the camp: if everybody did one small thing, we wouldn't have hunger in the world. We wouldn't have all these refugees. If we all, whatever according to our talents or skills or interests or affections or karmic affinities, could find one small thing to do.

Whatever you do, we all belong to life, and we can all express our love and the goodness of our practice in some small way.

One of the great joys of being there was teaching the teachers some games. I want to give a shout out to my friend Susan Kaiser Greenland. She wrote a book called The Mindful Child, and her second book, called Mindful Games, had just come out at Thanksgiving. She very generously let us use some of the games she teaches for kids before the book had even been published, so we could share them with the teachers and coaches to use with the children in their classes.

You have to understand that for these young teachers and young coaches, just to be able to play is so much fun. There aren't that many opportunities for them to play. The young women, most of them have babies. They go home and have to somehow make whatever food there is last, grind whatever flour there is, carry water. So much time spent hauling water—huge containers on their heads, swinging their arms and walking so gracefully and elegantly with these enormous bidons of water balanced above them. I said I wanted to learn how to do it, and our translator said, "You can't. You are not strong enough. You can't."

One of the games we taught was a kind of icebreaker at the beginning of a class. You could picture us playing it—we'd be sitting in one big circle with a ball. The kids don't have balls, but we had brought balls for the classrooms and for the soccer coaches. We chose games that didn't require any props, not even a raisin, because you don't have anything there. We would roll the ball across the circle, and then you mindfully report what's happening in your mind, what's happening in your body.

So I would roll the ball to someone—say Zaynab—and she would say, "My mind is happy, but my body has a fever." Then she would roll the ball across to somebody else, maybe Fatima, who would say, "My mind is happy, but my body is tired and achy." It went on like this. Almost everybody reported that they were happy to be there—happy. But they also reported that they had fevers, that they had malaria. And there they were, showing up to teach the kids every day. So much resilience and so much grace.

I found it inspiring. It really helped me think of days when I wake up and don't feel like doing something, even though I'm fine. You know those days. We have those days. And it turns out nobody there has seven days in a row of feeling well, because nobody has enough to eat. I asked the interpreter, "How can they go and teach? How can they show up in the morning with all these kids?" And he said, "Well, we have to, because nobody has seven days in a row of feeling well. That doesn't happen because there isn't enough food." And because if you get malaria, you have to have money to be able to get medicine.

One of our teachers said in the circle, "This summer I was so happy. I was given the gift of twin girls born to me. I fell in love with them. I was so happy. And then in the fall, they got malaria and they died." She said, "And my happiness went away."

This is preventable. This is curable. This doesn't need to be happening anywhere in the world.

I felt so much sadness at times, and yet so much gratitude that we could be there. The children who are in the programs get some food. They look so different from the other children in the camp. And they have such a fair, equitable system of choosing who gets to be in these classes. The classes, with the support of people like you and me, are going to grow. The program is called Little Ripples, and it's going to ripple out and spread to other camps. Other refugee camps are interested. They want to know: What about mindfulness with refugee populations? What about preschools that are refugee-led, that aren't brought in from outside? What about this?

For me, I felt no separation. I would look at a little girl in her frayed, raggedy pink dress and become that child. That's what our practice allows us to do. Sometimes it's called exchanging self for other. But we can really listen deeply and have some sense of what it is like to be each other.

Again, it's that simple presence. And in that presence, in that melting away of separation, there's just the little girl, the intense psychedelic heat around us, the flies that come to drink at the corners of your eyes where it's moist, or try to get up in the nostrils where there might be a little moisture too. And all of it so vivid and bright and so sacred, really—to witness this different kind of human life in this different kind of place and wonder, how can we even be in the same world? How is it possible that we are sharing a world where we could be one moment amid such beautiful, beautiful affluence in nature in Hawaii, and knowing all the while that the refugees are still there? They're still there, living this very difficult, challenging life, responding to every bit of loving awareness and loving attention and interest that tells them they haven't been completely forgotten—even though Darfur is no longer in the news and the international community hasn't made it safe for anyone to go home.

It's not possible to fully comprehend. But I've been reminding myself, and reminding Jack, and everywhere that I go.

Let me just tell a quick story. We taught the teachers the games, and at the end we had a contest. They had to divide into teams, and their job was to play the games in such a way that showed they understood the mindfulness principles behind each exercise. They chose the names for their teams: the Lions and the Intelligent People.

Each team took turns demonstrating the exercises we had taught, and it was beautiful. In the end, the Lions won. They had a more competitive spirit—they were hiding their discussions and deliberations from the Intelligent People. The Intelligent People sighed. They were a little dismayed, but they accepted it with grace. They truly did.

This happened right around the time of the election. I was there when it occurred, and the Africans were worried about what the consequences would be for them. Will they still get funding? Will they still receive food? What will this mean for them? They laughed at our shock and dismay because they said, "You know, we've had leaders like this—leaders like what this might be. We don't know." They kind of laughed at our dismay, but ruefully. And then they reminded us, "Your country is not Sudan. Your leader is not al-Bashir." This is a good thing to be reminded of.

The Intelligent People—some of us consider ourselves, with our vote, the intelligent people—we were very dismayed when we lost the contest. Whatever side of this election you were on, whatever way you felt called to cast your vote, and however you feel about the results, from the perspective of our mindfulness and our loving awareness, whatever unmasks what we need to learn, whatever unmasks our own biases and prejudices, whatever shows us where we were deluded and unclear—this is actually something to be welcomed and learned from.

I was struck—of course it was just a fun contest—but I was struck with the graciousness and grace of the refugees at every step of the way. I felt we have so much to learn.

May we include in our loving awareness everyone who needs care and protection. And all the parts of ourselves. For decades I practiced Zen, and we have these vows to be helpers in the world, to be that weight that tips the world toward goodness, even though we never know exactly the results of our actions. We hold that intention to tip the weight that way.

The first line of these vows is: "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all"—that's the usual translation. But another translation is: "I vow to free them all." And that means freeing the many beings who reside in our own hearts.

How do we free them? We free them by allowing them to be as they are, who they are. Think of what a freedom that would be for each other. Genocides would never happen. The people in Darfur wouldn't have been killed and persecuted for the color of their skin, which is darker than the northern Muslims who essentially conquered them or drove them out of their land. To be able to free each other to be just as we are, to be able to accept all of who we are in loving awareness—this is our work in the practice.

I'm always so inspired by people—all of you, people who come to our center, InsightLA in Los Angeles, who come to practice and to grow the capacity to love, to grow in wisdom and compassion. I'm always inspired, and I thank you. I thank you for your practice, for whatever you're doing to cherish and protect the earth and your life and the people around you. Really, thank you for that. Because we all belong in this clear wakefulness, this vivid experience of presence in the reality that we share.

So thank you for listening. Thank you for allowing me to be here with your beloved Jack. I'd love to share my beloved with you. And I'm really happy to get to teach with you tonight.

What I'd like us to do as a follow-up, and a way to conclude the evening, is to offer—voluntarily, for those who wish—that we create blessing cords for the solstice and the year ahead. You can take a red or a gold, or if you're desperate you can take both.

While they get passed around, let me talk about what it means to create what's called a blessing or protection cord. I have one that I've worn for a long time, one I received from the Dalai Lama. And it's a beautiful thing to—

If you have lots of clumps, maybe spread them out so other people can pass them on too, because there's lots of you.

And don't put them on yet—we have to create them. There's a little ritual that we'll do for those who want to.

Across Asia, certainly across Buddhist Asia—what had been the Buddhist temples in Afghanistan all the way through India and China and Japan and so forth—the thread is used as a symbol of the sacred. It's used in wedding ceremonies, it's used in rituals that bring people together, and it's used in healing ceremonies. It's considered to be the thread that weaves through all of life. So it's a symbol of the sacred that we live with.

And the reason that it has this color, the gold or the red color, is that it's considered to be one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun. So that when you go into the marketplace, you're wearing your robes—basically you're a monk or a nun in drag, you know, going into the marketplace. And you remember that your real home is in the temple.

As I tell most of the time in doing this little ritual, having done a blessing cord ceremony with Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, Tibetan Lama, many years ago, somebody raised their hand and they said, "These are also called protection cords. What exactly do they protect you from?" And he said, "Why, yourself, of course"—which is the main protection that human beings need.

So we'll tie three knots into them, and then there's a ritual way to tie them on around your wrist or wherever you like. And we'll talk about the three knots.

If you hold your cord, the first knot is the knot of integrity and non-harming. From the Buddhist texts it says: Others will be cruel, we shall not be cruel—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will kill living beings, we shall not kill—thus we incline the heart. Others will be greedy, we will not be greedy but generous—thus we will incline the heart. Others will speak maliciously, we will speak truthfully and kindly—thus we will incline the heart. Others will be envious, we will not be envious—thus we incline the heart. Others will be harsh without compassion, and we shall establish compassion—thus we will incline the heart. Others will lack wisdom and mindfulness, we shall cultivate wisdom and presence—thus we will incline the heart.

And so you hold your cord and the first knot to be tied is the knot of your commitment to not harm other living beings and to not harm yourself. It's really a commitment to care for yourself and to all of life as best as you can.

So take a moment to reflect on that in your own way—what it means to live a life of reverence for life and non-harming of yourself or another. And when you're ready, tie a knot in the center of the cord. That's your commitment: not harm yourself and not harm others, as best as you can.

Then the second knot is a knot of refuge. In the Buddhist tradition, it's refuge in awakening—the awakened mind or heart the Buddha represents. It's refuge in the Dharma of speaking truth, of seeing what's true. Refuge in Sangha and community. But it can be refuge in whatever you consider sacred or holy. This is the place, when you have to make a decision, when things really come down to how to live, that you go for the deepest refuge.

So hold your cord and reflect on what is the refuge of that which is sacred and holy for you. When you're ready, tie a knot in the center of the cord.

And the third and last knot is the knot of your intention, which is particularly helpful and important in the time of the solstice and the new year, the turning of the year and the return of the light. As Trudy said, there is the bodhisattva vows: Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to free them all.

The Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning and takes the Shantideva version: May I be a lamp or a light to illuminate those who are lost in the darkness. May I be food for the hungry. May I be medicine for those who are sick.

May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge for those who would cross the flood. May I be a resting place for the weary. And may I do so as long as earth and sky exist, as long as the galaxy exists, until all are liberated together. Some nice little vow like that.

A friend, Diane Ackerman, puts it in a very poetic, simple way. She says: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning, and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

So before you tie the third knot, take a moment to reflect on your heart's intention, setting the compass of the heart. It could be as simple as: I vow to be kind to myself and others. What would your vow be? What would your sacred intention be as we go into this time of darkness and plant the seeds for something new to be born and the light to return?

When you have a sense of what very simple intention would turn the compass of your heart in the direction of the deepest and most beautiful vow you can make, tie the third knot into the cord, which holds that intention.

Now your blessing cord, your protection cord, is fully activated. If you want to wear it around your neck, as some do, put it around the back of your neck and let the two ends hang down—don't tie it on yet. If you want to wear it around your wrist, wrap it two or three times around your wrist and let the ends hang down. If you don't want to wear it, you can simply put it in your pocket.

But if you want to wear it for a little while as a reminder of your robes and the perfume of the temple that you carry, I ask that you turn to a person seated next to you or near you and silently tie on their blessing cord—not too tight, not too loose. As you do, give them a silent blessing. And they will tie yours on. If you don't have a second person, you can do it in threes. Just find someone seated near you. It's a beautiful thing—you're tying on blessings and receiving them.

Lastly, before we go tonight: in India, when you meet someone, the most common greeting is to put your hands together in a gesture of respect and say namaste, which means "I honor the divine within you." I see the secret beauty, the spirit that was born into you. The root of the word namaste is, in Sanskrit and Pali, the word namo, which begins most Buddhist texts. It means to bow to, or pay respects, or honor.

I want us to chant namo nine times. As you do, feel what it is that you've dedicated yourself to in your blessing protection cord. Sense the spirit of those around you. Bow to the earth as a protector of all life in whatever way seems right to you. And imagine, as you offer these nine namos, that you're also offering a bow to whatever matters to you, or whoever needs support, or whoever needs love in this world.

Namo. Namo. Namo.

Namo. Namo. Namo.

Namo. Namo.

One more.

Namo.

May the harmony of our words and song together in namo, this gesture of respect, spread from ourselves to one another and across the earth, so that our words and deeds join as seeds, as beautiful waves, as something that spreads from us to bring blessings and care, respect and dignity to all life.

May it be so. And may you all have a wonderful solstice, Christmas, Kwanzaa, New Year, Hanukkah—happy everything.

Thank you, and good night.

CHAPTER 6

The Generous Heart (Drop-in at Spirit Rock)

Jack Kornfield · 1h02

> In this opening talk of a year-long series on the inner perfections (pāramī), Jack Kornfield illuminates generosity (dāna) as a fundamental path to liberation and happiness. Drawing from the traditional Buddhist framework of dāna-sīla-bhāvanā—generosity, virtue, and mental cultivation—he presents giving not as moral obligation but as a practice that naturally arises from recognizing our interconnectedness and abundance.
> Kornfield shares the mythological story of the Bodhisattva's vow upon meeting Dīpaṅkara Buddha, illustrating how the perfections are cultivated over countless lifetimes. He describes the three levels of giving in Buddhist teaching: tentative giving, brotherly or sisterly giving, and royal giving—where one offers from such inner fullness that nothing feels like sacrifice. Through moving personal stories, including his experiences as a monk receiving alms in Southeast Asian villages and accompanying his daughter to welcome refugees at the airport, he demonstrates how generosity connects us to something greater than our fearful, separate selves.
> The talk offers practical wisdom for engaging with difficult times while maintaining an open heart. Kornfield emphasizes that true generosity includes oneself—compassion must be circular to be complete. Whether caring for a sick brother, donating a kidney to a student, or simply being present with one's humanity, the teaching invites listeners to remember their noble nature: 'O nobly born, remember who you really are.' This is not about perfecting personality but about stepping out of the body of fear into the vast, universal heart that is our birthright.

So, let yourself quiet down. Sit at ease and let yourself listen.

There's a lot of excitement in the room tonight. It's wonderful.

And as you listen, again, as I said before, it's not particularly that you have to remember anything. There's no quiz, no grades. You really want to listen to see if something rings true in your own heart, in your own experience, that's of value. It's really a reminder of something. And it gives you, as you listen, just as we sat together in silence for a bit, a chance to do your own inner reflection.

Tonight I'd like to start a series of teachings over this year by talking about the generous heart.

In these demanding times there is, in a simple way, a call for medicine—medicine of healing. Healing of the spirit and the heart, healing of the community, and healing of the earth. Just as Spirit Rock offers itself as one form of sanctuary, the deeper sanctuary, of course, is the inner sanctuary that we find, the inner garden.

It's an interesting thing, actually. I was teaching, working with some peace groups in Palestine and Israel some years ago. I did a whole big benefit and raised a bunch of money for teachers to be offering these teachings in Arabic, in the Arabic community. One of the teachers, a new teacher that I was counseling and working with—I talked about how there's this wonderful tradition of going up in the mountains or going out to some holy place, and it must be beautiful. There must be some tradition where you can speak about going out in the desert and listening in some deep way.

And he said, no, no, no, I tried that. That's actually a kind of banishment. He said when he tried to talk to people about going out in the desert and listening, apparently that's considered more of a punishment. So he was not sure what the right image was to use for meditation.

As we talked further, what came from him was the walled garden—you know, in the Sultan's court or at the oasis. There's this beautiful walled garden that everyone has within them, a beautiful garden that they can tend and listen to. That was the language. You have to find your language for what is your own sanctuary.

The medicine of the Dharma—Dharma is a Sanskrit word that means truth, the path of awakening, teachings; it has multiple meanings. One of the most fundamental descriptions of Buddhist teachings is dana sila bhavana, which is the Buddhist recipe for human happiness. Dana means generosity, which we'll talk about tonight. Sila means virtue or honesty or living a life of integrity. And bhavana means the cultivation of the mind and heart in a wise way. So it's outer and inner.

Yesterday I went with my daughter to the airport to join in with a couple of thousand people at the international part of SFO. She's a young immigration lawyer, an asylum lawyer, so she was part of a group of young lawyers making themselves available to families of people who'd been detained or other people who were worried. There was a group of them, some who spoke Arabic and Farsi and all kinds of translators, and that part was great. Then there were these different demonstrations with, as you can imagine, very creative signs of all different kinds, and lots of chanting—literally a couple of thousand people.

My favorite, actually—there would be groups of three hundred or five hundred people here or there in the terminal—was one where people were chanting. There was a whole series of different chants. One of the chants was: "No ban, no fear, refugees are welcome here."

My favorite one had a really good jazz band in the middle, a brass jazz band, New Orleans style, with trombone and trumpet and saxophone. They'd start to chant, "No ban, no fear, refugees are welcome here," and the drummer would kick off, and then the sax would come in. Even the cops were smiling. They were trying to contain it, but the police were actually very good. There were some rowdy people too, as there always is. But there was some feeling that it wasn't just a demonstration against something, but that there was some love in it, some artistry, that there was something bigger, some joy that was being carried—that this is who we are.

The signs and the things that were most moving were not against something, but they were proclaiming that which we know to be noble and beautiful.

Now, I don't want to continue tonight to talk about politics. One could, but one wants to turn off the news as well. Nor do I assume that everyone in this room has a particular political view. People voted all kinds of ways and in all kinds of directions. So I want to talk about something deeper that I believe comes from the teachings of the Dharma, or the best of the Buddhist teachings, something that nourishes the heart and the community, whatever your particular political view or your particular orientation—something that's more universal.

But I do have to remind you: last year in the spring, when there was all this talk about the fear of refugees from Syria, I asked in a Monday class, a couple of times actually, how many people would seriously consider taking a Syrian woman, or a woman and children, into their home for a year to help them get settled here. A hundred hands went up, and I took a picture of it.

And I sent it to President Obama and Secretary of State, and to a whole bunch of them, to Dianne Feinstein and so forth, saying, you know, I want you to understand that there are people who aren't afraid.

I also need to let you know that the NSA now knows who you are. But they've known who you are for a long time, so you don't have to worry about it.

But whatever your political point of view or your orientation, what I want to speak about tonight as the beginning of this series is the teachings on Buddha nature. They're sometimes described as the inner perfections. And what they talk about is what is innate in us—that we can awaken to, that we can carry and honor the life that we've been given.

And so I'll tell some stories, which are stories of human possibility and the great possibility of happiness and freedom and generosity and liberation and joy for each person, no matter what your circumstances. And maybe in a way, the stories and the teachings also can help break the spell of fear, the small sense of self, the sense of separateness—that when we feel really separate gets guided by fear or rage or revenge or those kinds of things.

And this is in that way a really radical teaching. It shifts us away from me first, or us first, or greed or hatred—not because those things are bad, it's not a judgmental teaching—but simply because those don't lead to happiness. And the teachings of the Dharma, Buddhist teachings, fundamentally are teachings of the possibility of human happiness for us individually and for us collectively. On this earth.

So here's an old story. Long ago, when you were much, much younger than you are now, there was a Buddha previous to Siddhartha Gautama named Dipankara Buddha. He was supposed to have been a being of great radiance and beauty and tremendous generosity and love, and he affected everyone that he encountered. And so the Buddha that we teach about or talk about, the historical Buddha of 2,500 to 2,600 years ago, in this story met this previous Buddha and was so taken by the beauty of this heart and this being that he said, "I will do whatever it takes to become like him, to become like this." And he made a vow that however long it takes, he too would come to this great possibility of liberation and love that he now saw human beings could embody.

And then it took him, as is true for Buddhas in these stories of mythology, a while. The description of "a while" is called 100,000 Mahakalpas and Four Immensities. And a Mahakalpa, one Mahakalpa, is this: there's a mountain as high as Mount Vepula, a little higher than Mount Everest. And every hundred years, a bird drags a silk scarf across the top of the mountain, wearing it away a tiny bit. And when that Mount Everest-sized mountain is worn down by this silk scarf, that's one Mahakalpa. So we're talking time here.

And over those 100,000 Mahakalpas and the four immensities, the Buddha-to-be—all of us as Buddhas-to-be—practiced generosity, compassion, patience, steadfastness, wisdom, loving-kindness, truthfulness, all the great virtues of the heart, again and again and again, until they had become fully realized.

There are two wonderful huge volumes of stories of the past lives of the Buddha. Whether one believes them or not, they're kind of the mythological tales, like the fairy tales of India—when the Buddha was born as the king of the deer, or as an elephant king, or a tiger. Many of them are animal fables, and they're extraordinary ones.

The ones about generosity, which I'll talk about tonight—there was the Buddha who was born as a rabbit. There was a great yogi in the mountains who was practicing, about to achieve some deep enlightenment but who hadn't eaten for a long time. The rabbit felt so moved by the dedication of this yogi that he threw himself into the fire to offer food for the yogi. That's the kind of excessive generosity of these stories.

I remember being at Mother Teresa's in Calcutta several times to volunteer. There was a sign in one place that the younger nuns had put up. The sign said, "Mother says, let them eat you up." And it's kind of stunning, because when you're in circumstances of great difficulty or great suffering, often the inner protective part wants us to pull back—which has its place. I'm not saying you should all get eaten up, not yet anyway. But this was like the tales of the Buddha: Mother says, let them eat you up. No matter what is needed, you offer yourself. So that's the kind of tales these come from.

And whoever dedicates themselves in the way that this great being, the Buddha to be, did, is called a Bodhisattva. Someone dedicated to bringing awakening to fulfillment in this world. Whatever happens, no matter the political changes, the civilizations that rise and fall, the empires and so forth, this is the dedication to generosity and truthfulness and compassion and wisdom and loving kindness that is timeless.

Now, you might hear about this and even though it's a recipe for happiness, it seems a little daunting. How am I going to make myself perfectly generous? It's called perfections—perfectly truthful or perfectly compassionate and so forth. And perfection is really not a good word for it. How am I going to perfect my personality? You've tried that. It didn't work very well. Perfect my body. You've tried that too. It doesn't really work. How about a perfect cleaning job, a perfectly clean car or apartment? Then what happens? A little while later it gets dirty again. Perfection can't be found in that way, in that very limited idea.

And so when you hear these stories, because they're archetypal or mythological—they're not a therapeutic story or a psychological story or a literal story—they don't exist in time. This is really a story about that which is timeless and universal, in all times and in all places. It is available when you step out of the small sense of fear and you step into another reality. Extraordinary powers and extraordinary capacities. The mothers who lift cars off their children. The Chinese man with the shopping bags standing in front of that whole long row of tanks. That is there in us. And as Martin Luther King said, everybody can be great because everybody can serve. Everybody has it in them to offer something that's beautiful.

Robert Johnson, who was a Jungian analyst and writer, now deceased—he wrote books, little books like He, She, We, Jungian mythological books—he writes about being in India. He says, "I was in India and I got very sick with a fever and great pain over my body, and I could hardly walk. I kept falling down. They took me to a hospital. They must have seen my apprehension as they tried to assure me that they were a very modern facility. 'We have a thermometer,' the nurse reassured me. I found out their one thermometer was passed from one patient to another. In between, they held it under the water faucet just to be safe. My temperature reached 105. And somehow after ten days, I survived."

"While I was hospitalized, I had made a new friend. He came every day to visit me and slept each night on the floor under my bed. Of all my experiences in India for twenty years, this was the most touching. When I was sick, my friend came and slept near me. He said, 'So you wouldn't be frightened or lonely.' Now in America, if I get sick, I can't get anyone to stay with me very long—not to speak of being under my bed—but he slept on the mat there and tended me."

"One day when I was so sick, my new friend Shankar stood at the foot of the bed and said to me, 'Robert, I want to tell you a story about Baba and his friend. Baba's friend got very sick, and Baba came and stood beside him and said to him, only you say the word and I will go to die so that you can live. Robert, for you I am Baba.'"

You have only to say the word and I will die, so you will live.

"Now, that floored me," said Robert. It was like something out of the tale of a thousand and one nights, some fairy tale. How can you hold this? I was shocked by this story. But at least I had the presence of mind to say, "Thank you, Shankar, for this great gift. But please don't do anything rash now. I think I have enough life force that we'll both make it through." And we did. But this was the most astonishing thing that happened to me in all my twenty years of coming and going in India.

There's something in this story, and something in us, that resonates and goes, "Wow." We can really be there for one another. We can be there for this world in a generous way—not because you're supposed to, not because it makes you a better person than somebody else, but because it makes the heart sing, because it makes life come alive, because it brings a deep kind of happiness.

Sometimes these teachings are described as a cultivation or a development or a nurturing, but more deeply they're an invitation to step out of the body of fear, the small sense of self, and reclaim your place, your nobility, of shared compassion in this vast universal heart of ours. "O nobly born," begins the Buddhist text. Remember who you really are.

I have another story, a true story about a man named Sasha Dichter who worked for a large international fund. He was driving home with his family one day—they used to give money to homeless shelters and things like that—when he was struck by a kind of lightning bolt. He realized he'd been making the wrong choice. People would ask him for things, beggars asking for money, people needing help this way or that, and he would give sometimes, and sometimes he wouldn't. In that moment, his heart opened. He said, "I wanted to stop saying no. I needed to break the habit. I decided I was hiding behind some discrimination."

So he made this decision on the spot: for the next month, he would only say yes to whatever anybody requested. Beggars, nonprofits, street musicians, mail solicitations—they would all get a yes. Now it happened to be December, so he got an endless stream of year-end appeals. Friends warned him he'd better be cautious, giving money to strangers who might use it on drugs or alcohol. But for the month, he resisted employing this careful scrutiny. Instead, he said, "We can't know the results of what we do." And he learned that the smartest philanthropists lead with generosity.

He soon discovered that his experiment was never really about donating money. It was a chance to test what it felt like to live with a totally different orientation. It was a commitment to take a door that had been closed by his own taste and open it to whatever came. And it changed his life after that. He's written about it in different ways.

So this is really the invitation, O nobly born, to discover the first of these ten qualities of your own Buddha nature: the generous heart. And it's universal. There's pleasure in it. There's gratitude that you have things to offer. And we have so much, really.

I remember a friend years ago who'd come out of the Soviet Union when there still was a Soviet Union—those of you who are old enough to remember that—with long bread lines and not much in the stores under that stark communist economic system of the time. They'd come to Marin, come to San Francisco, and a friend took him into a supermarket. He looked around and his jaw dropped. Oh my God, he couldn't believe it, the abundance. And he said, "What is this place? Is this special?" The friend said, "Come with me." They got in the car and drove three blocks away and went into another supermarket. And he stood there and wept.

And he said, "I had no idea that there could be this kind of abundance."

And of course, we take it for granted. You live in enormous abundance, whoever you are in this room. An enormous kind of privilege. But it's not only that kind of abundance—it's also the sunlight and the warmth and, in this case, the safety that you have. You also live with the protection of so many others and goodwill, because they all stop at the red lights when your light is green. They really protect your life. They do. And you protect their lives. They don't go into the market and just grab the goods or grab your money—not very often anyway. You live in a sea of protection and graciousness and tremendous abundance.

So to be generous really means that you begin to feel that already the universe is generous with you. The poet Rumi says, "Walking out of the treasury building, I feel generous. How can anyone be sober in this weather when we've been given so much?"

And you can begin to understand the power of generosity as a practice of liberation. Not because you're supposed to be a good person or something, but because of what it does to the heart and mind. It's really a practice of letting go, of expanding who you are, of trusting in some deep way.

Reflect for a moment, if you will, on someone who has been generous to you. With money or time or love—some benefactor. Someone who's really been generous. Picture them. Think of the ways they've cared. Feel whatever arises.

How does it feel? I experience delight when I think of this person, and gratitude. What does it feel like for you? Love. Warmth. Joy.

Those who are generous are loved. You could feel the love, the joy, the delight—those qualities that come when you think about someone who's been generous to you.

Now, the next reflection is to think of the times that you've been generous to others and how it feels to you. Whether it's supporting another or offering your love and care, in whatever way it was—your assistance, your money, somebody that you really served generously. And generosity means there's a little stretch to it too. Not that you don't want to do it, but that you expand.

And then remember one more thing. Remember or sense the opposite. Sometime when you felt fearful, worried about money, stingy, hoarding, grasping—fess up. You've all done it. We have. I have too. Frightened about it. And what's that feel like in your life?

It's said that there are three levels of giving in the Buddhist teachings. The first is called tentative giving. "Oh, I've got this coat in my closet, I hardly ever wear it anyway. Maybe I should give it away, it takes up space. But yeah, I kind of like it, but I never wear it." Fine, you kind of give it away to somebody. It's still a beautiful thing. It's actually a lovely thing that you did. Even if there's reluctance, that's fine, it doesn't matter.

But then the next level is called brotherly or sisterly giving, in which you say, "They're like me. I have this coat. I have something really nice. You need one? Sure, let's share." And there's a bigger open heart with brotherly or sisterly giving. Let me just offer to you as if you were part of my family—which you are. Since, again, Mother Teresa says the problem is we draw our family circle too small. So you take them into your family.

And then there's what's called royal giving. The giving of the empress or the emperor, the king or the queen, in which you take the best of what you have and you say, "Here, I give this to you because I know what delight it will bring to you." You're so full of well-being and benevolence, you've got the treasure inside that you can give away anything because you're full of abundance. And it's a really beautiful thing to do kingly or queenly giving.

I remember watching the level of generosity when I was a monk living with an alms bowl in some very remote villages in Laos and Thailand and Southeast Asia, parts of Burma. In the dry season, the villages would be very poor out where I was. There wasn't that much to eat. There was rice, and then there was fish that was stored away with chili peppers and things, what they could grow a little bit, but not very much. We used to get curries that were made even from bats or field mice and things like that because that was the meat that had nourishment in it.

But anyway, we'd go through the village. You had to be silent. And people would come out and they would put some of the food that they'd cooked that morning into your bowl. And you couldn't say thank you or anything. You couldn't say, "Oh my God, you gave me a mango! That's like the best thing of the week." Or thank you for whatever you get. You just receive it in silence.

And of course, I was thinking I could always wire home to my mom if I got really hungry, and she'd send me a couple hundred dollars, which was the annual income of a family in this village. These were villages that still weren't wired for electricity, so people wove their own cloth and very much sustained their own lives. Very poor, but they would give with so much love.

And I thought, how can I receive this? How dare I take this from somebody who's hungry when I come from a culture where there's so much abundance? But then I realized how much delight they had in giving it. And also that they weren't just giving it to me, but they were giving it to what I represented—the other monks and nuns who came through. We represented something that they so valued in their culture, which was awakening and compassion and loving-kindness and the liberation taught by the Buddha for thousands of years. They said, "Of the little we have, we want to make sure to support this because it brings joy and light into our whole culture and our whole life." And so here we give this to you.

It wasn't really personal. And yet at the same time, I had to receive it and say, okay, I actually better do this stuff. I can't be a slacker, exactly, because their generosity somehow made me rise to the occasion of being maybe a slightly better monk than I might have been otherwise—best as I could on a good day.

So you can begin to hear not the necessity or the judgment or the duty of generosity, but rather the beauty of it and the joy of it, and why it fits into the mandala of an awakened life, why it is actually central to the teachings of living with a liberated heart and liberated mind. What makes us happy, says the Buddha. Generosity is the first of these aspects of Buddha nature.

And it's a practice, as well as an awakening in you, like the story I read. I took a kind of inner intention, a vow, twenty years ago or so, that if I had a thought to give something, I would do it. Because you think about it, and then there's, "Oh, wait a second, that's too much," or "Maybe I shouldn't," or "I should give to other people," or all the kinds of things our minds do. And I said, if I have a thought to give something, I just do it. There may be an occasion I can think of in these years where I haven't, for whatever reason. But most of the time I've done it, and it's been fantastic. I don't even have to think about it. If the thought comes, I just do it.

I also love to give things to homeless people and people on the streets. If somebody is a vet, somebody who's mentally ill, somebody who's lost their home, somebody who can't make it, whose body is hurting—maybe they're an addict or whatever, and they use my money for a bottle, a drink. If I were in their situation, I'd probably want a drink too. It's not about judging what they do with it. It's just saying, I see you, I look at you, and I offer you what I can.

So here we are in this human life, with a measure of joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain, gain and loss, unbearable beauty and an ocean of tears. And this month, this week, there are personal struggles with family or work or divorce or illness or suicide—all the things that make up the troubles of our lives. But also there are the collective troubles we face. How do we live as a country and a wise culture in a time when what's being put out, often in different ways through the media, is that which tries to frighten us? Do we let that colonize our hearts? Do we let that take us over? Or is there another way?

Is there the way of Nelson Mandela and Aung San Suu Kyi, when she walked out after seventeen years of being imprisoned by the military, or Nelson after twenty-seven years on Robben Island—with such magnanimity and graciousness and compassion and forgiveness? No one can put you in prison and take over your heart. They can do what they like, but no one can take your spirit from you. And so this becomes the invitation.

Now what's also important in it is that you don't have to sacrifice yourself to do it. Compassion, generosity—all these qualities are circular. And the circle isn't complete if one person is left out. And you know who that person is. As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi?" Yes, that person.

So you can ask, is this compassionate or generous to her, to him, to them, to whoever? And is it also compassionate to this one? Because somebody has to tend to this one, and guess who that person is. So there's a balance that's necessary.

Since I'm talking about Mother Teresa, I remember going with a colleague here, Wes Nisker, who for many years was on the radio doing extraordinary newscasting. He was kind of like The Daily Show, only twenty and thirty years before. He would tell the truth on the radio. It was extraordinary. He would say, "Here's what happened," and people would say, "Wow, he actually said it." It wasn't all obfuscated.

Anyway, he was working on a show for National Public Radio on spirituality and social responsibility. So we went to interview different people—we interviewed the Dalai Lama, we interviewed the president of India, somehow we got to see him. We interviewed yogis and various teachers. And then we went to visit Mother Teresa. I thought, how are we going to get to see Mother Teresa? I had told people I was going, and so people collected money. I had an envelope with ten thousand dollars to give her, from churches and others around here.

I thought, all right, we'll go, because I sort of knew her schedule, and I'd been there before. In the morning, she goes to chapel at five o'clock and prays with all the young novices and nuns, so we would catch her after that.

She came out, and Wes and I greeted her. "Mother, we're here for just a little while. We're doing this show. Would you mind if we asked you a few questions?" He pulled out his big reporter's microphone, and she said okay and sat down. I said, "Also, here's a gift from these churches," and she took that. Then I said, "By the way, Mother, would you mind if we filmed this?" I pulled out my camera and turned on a light.

She got pissed off. "It's five in the morning. I just did my prayers. Come on, you guys. What are you trying? I want to go and serve people, and you're trying to make your film or something."

I thought, I've come all the way to India and pissed off Mother Teresa. This is just not... But there was something in it as well. The point isn't, again, some kind of ideal of how you're supposed to be. The point—and she was the exemplar of service in many ways—is to serve in the way that truly rings true and feels true to your own heart.

Of course, we live in times of homelessness, racism, environmental destruction. It's easy to feel overwhelmed or lonely or isolated, to feel that you don't know what you can do. I don't know if you've seen it, but one of the short documentaries nominated for the Academy Award is called 4.1 Miles. That distance—4.1 miles—is the span between one of the Greek islands along the Turkish coast and the Turkish shore itself. It's a short film, elegantly done, very few words, mostly images. It follows a Coast Guard captain in his Coast Guard fishing-type boat, going out to rescue refugees day and night on those floating boats—those who live, those who die. This little island and the islands nearby have had 600,000 refugees arrive on boats from Turkey, crossing into Europe. They're overwhelmed, but they keep doing it.

It's really extraordinary. The captain said, "I have a boat and there are children out there." And so you see them going day after day. It makes you weep to watch it, but it also wakes you up to a reality we can become inured to when watching images on television or reading about it. You can't deny it when you see it.

We live in this kind of time, and you might feel, well, I can't do enough. What can I do? But the point is really just to start to listen, to know your limitations and your capacities, but also to know that you are greater than you think. And that is the beautiful thing of these teachings: to say, "O nobly born, whoever you are, you have a capacity to serve. You have a capacity to give." As Gandhi said, "What I do, I don't do for India. I do for my own joy."

Just as you did that reflection on what it means to receive generosity from another or to offer it, you have this possibility in you. O nobly born, remember it.

Of course, there are seasons to it. There are times when you want to give to someone, but at the same time, if you look at a mother lioness or a bird or a wolf, they nourish, they provide, they sacrifice for their offspring. And then one day, it's the day to fly, baby, and they kick them out of the nest. Or it's the day you've got to go hunt, and they disappear, and you're hungry, and you're on your own, and you have to learn how to get your own food.

So it's not that it's simply, "Okay, let's take care of everybody like the mommy of the world." There's both a dignity in it and a kind of attention that's beautiful—one that says, "What can I serve? What do I understand? And how can I bring this to others?" Sometimes what you have to offer is your tears.

You know, how do I serve in the greatest difficulty? The Dalai Lama and Tutu had this conversation about joy and how they keep their spirits up in terrible times in the world. What do you do when things are really bad? They had an interesting answer. Part of it was service and generosity. But then the question was asked again: What do you do when things are really bad? And they said, "You show your humanity."

that being the greatest gift in many ways that you can give.

There's a beautiful story in Ram Dass's book called How Can I Help? If you don't know it, it's one of my favorite books ever. It tells of a woman who was a Maryknoll sister working in Peru as a schoolteacher at a very high altitude—13,000 feet. She became quite sick and had to return home for surgery. She could no longer work at high altitude and actually became crippled. She wondered, will I go back to Peru? Can I do anything? But she decided to go back and see, settling this time in the lower altitudes.

She said, "Everything changed, especially my attitude toward people. I could feel their poverty and pain in a new way, as if I was seeing it for the first time." And the affirmation she received was: "You're the same person you were before. Even if you can't teach or do anything, we want you to stay."

Her ministry changed. It became the ministry of walking together. She found others with physical disabilities—because she couldn't walk so well, having been crippled by her illness—and they were just trying to be together, being with them in love.

Of course, she said, many of the Peruvians they encountered with handicaps were deeply ashamed. Some hid, or they would hide their children. She thinks of Juan, a polio victim at three who had been hidden by his family behind their little house until they discovered him at age eight—five years hidden away. His brother Julio took them home one day, and there was Juan, twisted legs under him, scooting around the dirt patio on a circular piece of rubber. His mother was suspicious—a handicapped child meant she was being punished for something, in her belief system. Think of the child. Think of the mother.

They returned on several occasions to visit him. One time they found him alone. His family, with the rest of the town, had gone on a religious procession. Of course, he had never seen one. So they borrowed a bicycle, put Juan on it, and joined in the procession. It was his first time outside the house, the first time he had looked at people from a level higher than the ground, his first procession. His parents were initially annoyed, but their attitude changed.

When the time seemed right, they asked at the next town meeting if they could raise money to send Juan to Lima for physical rehabilitation. The townspeople liked the idea, and he went off. After a long, hard struggle—a year of pain—one day he returned to the village. He was using braces and a cane. It was really hard for him, but as he began to walk down the street toward his home, people came out from their houses. They appeared from all over, cheering and clapping, following him all the way home. It was so wonderful. It was Juan's second procession.

Sometimes what you have to offer—and anybody in twelve-step work knows this—is your truth, your own suffering that you've been through, your own humanity. That too can be a tremendous act of generosity.

If you think you are too small to make a difference, if the problems in the world seem overwhelming and you don't know what you can add—well, if you think you're too small to make a difference, you've never been in bed with a mosquito.

It's the small acts. One of the things that touched me at the airport was a three-year-old girl with a sign on her, this beautiful little girl. It said, "My mom was a refugee." And then you could see her mom with her own sign. But it was just this little girl who wouldn't have been here, who wouldn't have been safe, but there she was. "My mom was a refugee." Refugees are okay. This country is made of refugees—except for the native peoples who are, unfortunately, refugees from what the invaders have done to them here, the genocide.

But in some way, we're all refugees. And then the question becomes: Can we become not only refugees, but can we find refuge?

And the refuge is really the refuge in care for one another. The refuge is in our generosity. The refuge is in the nobility of your heart and your care for one another. And it's an individual act, but it's also a call to the society at large. Who will we be? Who are we really? We have always taken in refugees. This is who we are.

I've been going back and forth to the East Coast because my twin brother has been quite sick with blood cancer—myelofibrosis and leukemia. The last year and a half has been a long series of treatments and chemo and different things, and it's been getting more and more difficult. I'm not sure how much longer he'll be alive.

As I said last time I was here, part of what's so moving to me is the time spent in the hospital or at the Dana Farber Cancer Center. I'm there with the kids with bald heads, the families holding somebody who's coming in with a walker, the people with masks because their immune systems are gone. And I see all the people who are tending them, the family members who bring them. There's so much tenderness—the nurses and doctors and staff. It's an amazing thing to watch how much we actually take care of one another. It's a beautiful thing.

My youngest brother Kenneth, who's eight years younger—he's now sixty-three—has been donating platelets. He was the one who donated a stem cell transplant, which worked for a little while and then stopped working. Other blood donations haven't worked for my twin brother, except from this one matching brother. I tried, but it wasn't a match. So for the last number of months, every five days Kenneth gives blood to my brother. He lives here, flies east, hangs out for a couple of days, then comes back. He just does it. He doesn't think about it particularly. He said, "It's my brother. Of course I'll do it."

It's like the story of Joan Schmidt, I believe her name was, who was a first grade teacher in Wisconsin. She had a little girl in her class who was on dialysis because her kidneys had failed, and it looked like she wasn't going to make it. And her teacher said, "Oh, I'll give her a kidney." This is different than giving her homework, right? And she did. She donated her kidney to this little girl who's now—it's five years later since that story—in middle school and thriving.

I just see how much care there is in the world. For every act of brutality, for all the fear that there is, for all the terrible things that happen, there's a nobility to humanity that is your birthright.

And to meditate is not so much to have some meditation experience, although they come and they're quite wonderful, along with insights. It's really to quiet ourselves, to listen to the heart, to still ourselves a little bit in the midst of all the noise of life and politics and demands and possibilities. And to reflect: what really matters? At the end of the day, or the end of the year, or the end of the month—what do I wish that I'd done, intended? How can I live? How can I offer myself to this world?

It's not just the rabbit throwing himself into the fire in that remarkable Buddhist tale. We humans really care for one another. That's why we're here. Your ancestors were all survivors, and they did all kinds of things to care for their children and their grandchildren and made it possible for you to be here.

So it's not helping others in the sense of "I'll help you." It's us. It's our family. It's our brothers, our sisters. And in this way, you step beyond the small sense of yourself to feel something beautiful, which is your brotherhood and your sisterhood.

My teacher Nisargadatta in India said there is really no separateness to self. There is no separate self. And in this open space, in this vast space, there's only one movement—the movement of love. What else really matters to us?

Well, I think if you play music and you can bring your band down to the airport, that would be a fine thing too. Somehow I think that whatever redemption we bring alive to the problems of the culture is best done with a beautiful and joyful heart. Your anger, your fear, your depression—all the things that we also have as humanity—you need to hold with compassion. That's not the game. The game is actually to be like the Dalai Lama or Aung San Suu Kyi or Nelson Mandela, or whoever you want to name—to carry your beautiful spirit into whatever needs tending and plant your seeds and play your music and offer yourself.

So let's sit for a moment. When you come to the temple, the sanctuary, to sit together, may you carry the spirit of nobility, generosity, the treasure, the treasury within you. May you carry your own beautiful heart back out into the world.

Thank you again for coming, for your good behavior as you listened.

Drive politely out there. There are lots of cars and it's dark. We're still in the winter season. We might have more rain coming. Isn't that a beautiful thing?

And just as the rain comes down, may you offer your rain of love and care to the world.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 7

The Joy of Virtue (Drop-in at Spirit Rock)

Jack Kornfield · 1h09

> In this rich dharma talk, Jack Kornfield offers a profound exploration of virtue (sīla) as one of the pāramīs—the perfections of awakening. Moving beyond conventional notions of morality as external rules, he presents integrity as the natural expression of our Buddha nature, existing outside of time as something to be discovered rather than developed over countless mahākalpas.
> Kornfield outlines three levels of ethical practice: first, limiting harm through the five precepts (not killing, not stealing, not lying, not misusing sexuality, not abusing intoxicants); second, actively cultivating compassion and reverence for all life; and third, discovering virtue as our birthright and true nature. Drawing from the Jātaka tales, he shares the story of the king, the dove, and the hawk to illustrate the profound depths of selfless integrity, connecting these ancient teachings to Gandhi's philosophy of nonviolent resistance.
> The talk weaves together Buddhist teachings with poetry from Ellen Bass, wisdom from Zhuangzi, and stories from the Desert Fathers, creating a tapestry that reveals how virtue brings genuine happiness, inner peace, and freedom. Kornfield emphasizes that these are not grim duties but the foundation for a beautiful life—one where we become like the lotus unstained by mud, finding our own way like the rhinoceros. Particularly relevant for times of political upheaval and social division, this teaching invites practitioners to quiet the mind, listen to the heart's integrity, and discover what each person is called to contribute to the world.

I want to continue with a series of teachings that I started last month in a Monday class. I did a couple of talks since the election time on spirituality and politics. As Gandhi said, those who think that spirituality and politics don't go together do not understand what spirituality really means. So that seemed very important to talk about. However you voted or whatever your political point of view, it's a very fraught time in many ways—a time of much dissension and upheaval and change. Something really worthy of paying attention to.

Tonight, in continuing this series, I want to talk about Buddha nature, or your own true nature, and in particular, the joy or the happiness of integrity, which is really basic Buddhist teaching. These are called the qualities of awakening. One image that's used—because they're sometimes translated as the perfections—is that there's a mountain, Mount Vepula, as high as Mount Everest or a little higher. Every hundred years, a bird comes along with a silk scarf in its beak and drags it across the top of this mountain, wearing it away slightly. When that mountain is worn down by the silk scarf, that is one Mahakalpa. And to become fully awakened in this particular mythology—a glorious, awakened Buddha—takes 100,000 mahakalpas, and then four immensities thrown in just to make it a little bit more interesting.

You hear that and you think, all right, I've got to practice patience for 100,000 mahakalpas, and I have to practice kindness for 100,000 mahakalpas, and I have to practice wisdom. It seems a little bit daunting. It's hard enough to do it for a New Year's resolution for a few weeks. I'm going to meditate, right? And then the silk scarf goes by. Okay, wait another hundred thousand mahakalpas.

When you hear this kind of story, a misunderstanding is to place it in time—that if you train and practice and change yourself and do all these things, eventually through zillions of hours and lifetimes, you'll become somebody different. I know you've tried that already in your own way, and it didn't work very well. You're still yourself, sad to say, but also happy to say.

Because the qualities this represents don't exist in time. They're actually timeless, universal, eternal. And so this becomes the metaphor for discovering something that's outside of time. The question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity.

A couple of years ago, I went to the top of Mount Tamalpais because it was the day of a transit of Venus across the face of the sun. Somebody up there had a great big telescope with all the filters, so I could look in. First there was the big disk of the orange sun, and it was alive—when you see those videos, all those changing textures. In real time, it was very vital and alive and moving and swirling with fire and light and all its nuclear energy. And then there was this little marble, maybe one-fortieth of the sun's diameter, that slowly over the course of an hour or an hour and a half moved its way across the face of the sun. That marble being about the size of our planet as well.

Somehow in looking at it, I could feel that we're on the same ride going around the sun, and then Venus is, and Mars. We're part of some huge, vast turning of the worlds and the seasons and the galaxies. And that is true. And then we have all our problems. But as the Ojibwe say, sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky.

The teachings for tonight, which are really rock bottom, basic, central to Dharma or to those who would live a spiritual life—I have talked about politics and spirituality, but this is really, really basic—are a way of anchoring ourselves in what we know to be most important amidst the politics and the fear mongering or racism or war or all those things that we see in the culture around us. These are the universal laws of human happiness in the midst of all these different cycles.

Now in modern times, there's a kind of sensibility about cultural relativity and what's right and what's wrong. You need to take in the perspectives of different peoples and different cultures, and those things need to be respected. But this is something deeper than that.

In Psych 101, there's an experiment done in the perception section where you get the unwitting student to come up to the front of the class. You have three buckets: a bucket in the middle with neutral temperature water, a bucket on one side with very hot water, and a bucket on the other side with water and ice in it. You have the student plunge their hands into the very hot water and the very cold water and hold them there for pretty much as long as they can, like thirty seconds. It gets really intense. Then they pull their hands out and put them in the middle bucket. When their hands are in the middle bucket and you watch the student, their face and eyes kind of go a little wobbly. Because their hands are touching and this hand says, this is really cold—it was in the hot water—and this hand says, it's really hot. Our perceptions and the stories we tell about them are relative in a certain way.

But underneath this truth of perceptions, there are some fundamental principles of human life and of conscious life. And virtue is one of them.

We tend to take it relatively: "Oh, it's okay to cheat a bit on our taxes," or to drive a bit over the speed limit. I was a cab driver in Boston. I have a whole lot of unfortunate driving habits that I learned there. We only took red lights as a suggestion. So we all have our things—or insider trading: "Everybody's doing it." You get a little hint and then you buy the stock.

There was a hospital in Illinois, a state hospital that was alongside a toll road. Because it had just one hospital and a few other streets on it, they didn't have a toll booth. Instead, there was a place to throw your money in at the exit. One of the psychologists there decided to do a little research. With the camera that was there, he observed which people who worked at the hospital paid their toll and which ones drove through without paying. Then he did an interesting thing: he tried to correlate it with the success of their therapies and the success of their patients in getting well. It was a psychiatric hospital. I don't know quite how he measured that success—maybe it was how soon people were released—but he had some good measurement. And he discovered that the people who paid their tolls, their patients got better quicker.

So there's something almost basic beneath all the different stories that we hear about virtue or integrity or ethics or morality. It is the adornment of humanity. And Aristotle says the only stable nation is one built on virtue. The only stable society is one built on virtue.

It's so innate in us. Again, modern psychology—not only do we know this, but there are studies like those at Yale University where they track the gaze of infants or young children who are pre-verbal, not many months old. If they show them or put them in a situation where something is unfair—one baby gets a lot and the other baby doesn't—they don't like it. That's not right. They can't say anything yet, but you can see that it upsets them. Even the great apes or chimps don't like it either. In Chicago, I think it was, even the rats don't like it. "This isn't fair. You haven't treated my sister properly." There's something in us that knows what it means to have a kind of fundamental care and integrity with what we do.

And of course it's not easy. The tales that make up these stories from thousands of years ago in India, from the teachings of the Buddha—they also use these animal fables. There's one story of a king who vowed that he would rule justly and not bring harm to any being and not cause any being to be killed. A noble king, great. He's sitting on his throne, and then one day, in through the window of the throne room flies a dove and lands on the arm of his throne and speaks to the king—because this is a fable—and says, "Help me, I'm being chased by a hawk."

Then the hawk flies in and lands on the other arm. The king says, "I am protecting this dove. I do not want beings in my kingdom to be killed."

And the hawk, who can also speak—these are cool animals—says, "Your Majesty, I survive by eating meat. This is what my diet is. I don't live on berries. That's some other kind of bird, not me. I'm a carnivore. I eat other birds. That's how I was built. That's what my incarnation is. And you are depriving me of the food that I need to survive. Help me."

So here we are. This is a morality tale. But what do we do in this situation?

Now, of course, because these are great old morality stories, what does the king do? He says, "I cannot let you kill the dove." And he orders his attendant to bring out a golden scale. He places the dove in one part of the scale and says, "Now bring me a sword." And he cuts out flesh from his own thigh and puts it there and says, "I will offer to the hawk my own body so that no one else is harmed."

It's a kind of wild and magnificent gesture.

And he does so, and he bleeds, and then he says, "It's not enough." And he cuts more, and finally he grows faint. When he loses consciousness, as happens in these tales, the hawk suddenly transforms into one of the great heavenly gods—those beings whose thrones are said to grow warm when something interesting is happening here on earth. The god descends to say, "I heard there was a just king here, but I wanted to see for myself whether it was true." And so the hawk becomes this radiant being who heals the king, saying essentially, "You're okay now, it's fine," and blesses the dove, and everything is happy thereafter.

Now you hear a story like this and you think, "How am I going to measure up to that?" And of course you can't. But at the same time, here is Mahatma Gandhi saying, in the face of unjust laws and those things that cause suffering: "If you make laws to keep us suppressed in a wrongful manner, without harming you in any way, we will never obey. Award us what punishment you like, we will put up with it. Send us to prison and we will live there as in a paradise. Ask us to mount the scaffold and we will do so laughing. Shower your sufferings upon us and we will calmly endure all and not hurt a hair of your body or anyone else. We would gladly die before so much as to touch the slightest of you. But so long as there is life in these bones, we will never comply with the laws that cause harm."

This is a human being taking on the kind of power that the story of the king and the dove illustrates. It's partly why Gandhi is so celebrated—Einstein, who was his friend, said that at some point in the future, people will not even believe that such a person even walked this earth.

It used to be that when a man or woman took an oath, it wasn't taken lightly. We stood by our character. And my teacher Ajahn Chah loved—as did the other masters I studied with—to talk about virtue, to talk about spiritual life. If you want to be happy, the joy comes from your integrity. Peace comes from your integrity. It's actually very hard to meditate after a day of killing and stealing. It doesn't work terribly well. You can try it.

Sanity for yourself and the world comes from integrity. And any practice in these dimensions we speak of—last week it was generosity, or love, compassion, wisdom, patience, truthfulness—they each, like a hologram, contain all the others. Through the practice of virtue, there is compassion, there is mindfulness, there is patience. All the great virtues come together, and spiritual life rests upon them. We know this somehow in our inner sense of conscience. As someone wrote, "The more moral a society, the less paperwork." There's a way in which we also know that when we live in a community of trust, it changes everything.

Without integrity, it's like getting in a rowboat and saying, "I'm going to go somewhere," while the line is still tied to the dock. There's no spiritual life worth anything—no insights, no great bliss, no special states. They're worthless if they don't grow out of a basis, a field of integrity. Otherwise they're just fancy stuff that comes and goes.

So there are three levels to this virtue, this integrity. The first is called limiting harm. Basically it means entering the human realm, because before that you may be embodied as a human being, but you're not really living as one. The texts say you're living more as a beast or a hungry ghost. This first level is to undertake to refrain from activities that harm one another.

I remember the local Marin County Sheriff used to park in our parking lot here. I think he would read a book and take a little break from patrolling the roads. It's a peaceful place. And one of my colleagues and good friends, Ruth Dennison—one of our senior teachers who has since died—one day we were here and I said, "Oh, the sheriff's out in the parking lot." She said, "Oh, great, darling"—she was originally born in Germany—"I have to go see him." So she went to the parking lot and said, "You know, we are making your job easier here from what we are teaching." He said, "You've come to the right place," and they had a wonderful conversation.

This is the first level of human awakening. And the first of these three levels says, in a fundamental way, I will limit harm. Traditionally there are certain trainings one undertakes, precepts of different kinds. The first is not to kill and not to harm living beings. And it's a beautiful thing to watch—the Dalai Lama has a special thing for insects and bugs.

He doesn't—except for mosquitoes. He said mosquitoes are the enemy. But other than them, he's interested and curious, and he doesn't want to harm a single living being.

I have this beautiful poem, written in magnificent calligraphy by Lloyd Reynolds, who was the nation's premier calligrapher. He was actually the master artist who taught Steve Jobs when he was up in Oregon, before he started Apple, what it meant to make a beautiful line. And his poem reads: "A bug crawls over the paper. Leave him be—we need all the readers we can get."

There's something quite powerful about simply saying, "I'm not going to harm beings." Now, I have my own difficulties with it. I give them notice, right? "Okay, you have some days, you ants or whatever, you roaches," and I put out something that doesn't harm them for a while. But if they're really persistent, then we have to go another step. Yet it gives you the moment to reflect on really caring for life—the small life, the big life—just not to harm, not to kill.

And then the next one is not to steal. It was so ingrained in us in our monastic training, and so important, that if you stole something as a monk that was worth more than a nickel, basically, if you took it, from that moment on you were no longer a monk, even if you were wearing the robes. It was so deeply forbidden. And it was forbidden, of course, because they wanted people to respect the monastics. But it was also forbidden because it shined a light on what really matters. If you have a culture where people steal from one another, and then there's barbed wire, and there's gated communities, and there's people who are defending and so forth—we don't live in a culture where we trust one another. So to not steal is a really powerful practice.

The next one is to not speak falsely—not to use your words in a way that harms or undermines others. To speak with integrity.

John invited his mother over for dinner. During the meal, his mother couldn't help noticing how beautiful John's roommate was. She'd long been suspicious about a relationship between John and the roommate, and this only made her more curious. Watching the two interact over the meal, she started to wonder how much more there was than met the eye. John could see it and volunteered, "I know what you might be thinking, but I assure you, Carrie and I are just roommates."

A week later, Carrie came to John and said, "Ever since your mother came to dinner, I've been unable to find that beautiful silver soup ladle. You don't suppose she did something with it, do you?"

"I doubt it, but I'll email her for sure."

"Mother, I'm not saying you did anything with the silver soup ladle or not, but for some reason it's disappeared ever since you were here for dinner. Do you know anything about it?"

Later in the day, he received an email which read: "Dear son, I'm not saying you do sleep with Carrie, and I'm not saying you don't. But the fact remains that if she was sleeping in her own bed, she would have found the ladle by now. Love, Mom."

It's called "Don't Lie to Your Mother." It just doesn't work. And in this time of truthiness and all of those things, to speak what's true and to hear what's true, to know what's true, is really a blessing. It becomes more valuable than ever.

And then to not harm through the misuse of sexuality—you know, whatever it is, adultery or causing pain. How many people in this room have made idiots of yourselves in relation to sexuality? Don't bother raising your hands. We already know about you.

This is a very powerful force, and it can be used in beautiful ways, or it can be used—out of our greed or fear or confusion or other motivations—to cause a lot of suffering. So this simply says: don't misuse sexuality in a way that causes harm to others. It's not like you're supposed to, or this is some morality from on high. These are the principles of happiness. You want to be happy? Follow them. They are the foundation for a truly happy human life.

And then the last is not to abuse intoxicants—alcohol and drugs. Ten million drug addicts, twenty million alcoholics, fifty million people in their extended families in America. The majority of auto fatalities, the majority of home fires, the majority of child abuse. It's really powerful stuff.

So again, it says: pay attention to these energies of life and navigate them from the place of conscience, from the place of understanding, from the place of mindfulness and care—because that's the treasure that you have.

That's who you really are. And that's the only thing you can take with you in the end—your integrity and your virtue. Or as Spencer Tracy, the movie actor, said: just know your lines and don't bump into the furniture. It's that basic, that simple.

And yet, if you were to imagine even half of one of these trainings spreading across the earth—not even a whole one—just that we stop killing people, or stop telling lies even though we might still gossip, even a little bit of it would make an entirely different planet. Imagine if we didn't kill each other. Kind of crazy that we do, don't you think? Really crazy.

It's about time. We've more or less come to the conclusion that slavery is bad, even though there still is slavery in some places in the world. I think it's about time that we came to the conclusion that war is bad, and that there's an alternative. I mean, when you have kids in kindergarten and they're whacking each other with the blocks, you say, "Use your words," right? Gosh, you guys—how about the grown-ups? Some of these world leaders, could you use your words?

Yes. The earth is too small a star, and we too brief visitors upon it, for anything to matter more than the truth, more than what we care about—our own virtue.

So the next level of sīla—and you can hear how it becomes more beautiful as it goes along—is not only refraining from harm, but either expressing or cultivating compassion. Not just to refrain, but to see somehow that we're all in the same boat. Edmund Burke says, "All that is necessary for evil to triumph is that good people do nothing."

This is a really important reflection. It's not just that you refrain from harm, but that it's in your good hands, in your heart, to care for this world. And again, not because it's some great dictum of morality about who's good and who's bad. This is what makes a human life beautiful and noble. It is living your own Buddha nature. It's an empowerment.

And because we're all connected, we're all cells in the same living body. As Lewis Thomas says, the driving force in nature on this biosphere, this planet Earth, is cooperation. He's one of our great biologists. It's cooperation. The most inventive and novel of all schemes in nature, the most significant in determining the great landscape of evolution, is symbiosis—which is simply cooperative behavior carried to an extreme. We're woven into life. This is who we are.

So then, how we drive, how we use water, how we respond to homelessness or injustice or racism, what we eat, how we care for our brothers and sisters of every color and every orientation and every ability—this actually becomes the gift you are given to produce a beautiful life.

And not killing then becomes a reverence for life, a care for the earth. So that when Chief Seattle says, "What is mankind without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, humankind would surely die from a great loneliness of spirit. For what happens to the beasts happens to man."

And we know it, but we sort of put it aside and go about our day. And yet—the Mele Binturong and the Malabar civet and the Hawaiian monk seal and all species of rhino and twelve species of antelope and fifteen species of turtle and twenty-two species of shrews and all the great apes—the orangutans and the gorillas and the chimps—and six species of whales and all species of manatee and the golden lemur and the Indus and the Yangtze dolphin and the woolly spider monkey. These are your brothers and sisters. And they're saying, "Pay attention to me. Don't just refrain from harm, but remember that we too are part of your web of life, woven into the same single garment of destiny."

So it's a reverence for life that grows.

And then not stealing turns into concern and care, stewardship for what you have. I mean, we live in a prosperous society. And what do we do with it? It's not just not stealing—it's actually not being piggy. Sorry, Miss Piggy, I didn't mean to say anything really anti-pig to you, but you know exactly what I mean.

There are—I don't know—how many tens of millions of hungry children on this earth? Many tens of millions. My beloved Trudy just came back a couple months ago from working in the Darfur refugee camps on the border of Chad. And she said many of the kids, most of the adults there, have the orange hair of kwashiorkor because they don't get enough nourishment. Our grain elevators are full of food. We're telling farmers to plow things under. The world doesn't need more food.

The world doesn't need more oil. It needs less greed. Less prejudice. It needs more love.

So the precept is not just about refraining from stealing—it's about reverence for what we've been given. I read a story about an older Japanese immigrant woman whose job was to clean and tend the bathrooms in a public facility in New York. Some local kids came in one day and sprayed graffiti all over those bathrooms, messed things up the way kids sometimes do. And she was upset, and she left a note on the door that said simply, "Please do not desecrate my place of work."

It was so simple. It was an unthinking act on the part of those kids. But for her, it was her place of work. And every place on this earth is the place of somebody's work, or some creature's work. So we start to take care with things in this world.

This is from William Faulkner. He writes: "Some things you must always be unable to bear. Some things you must never stop refusing to bear. Injustice and outrage and dishonor and shame. No matter how old you are or how young you are. Not for fame, not for cash. Your picture in the paper nor money in the bank. Just refuse to bear them."

And you hear it, and you know that there's something true in this. There are things that our mindfulness and compassion—when we sit here and quiet the mind and tend the heart—there are things we touch inside that know: this is really what matters to me.

And then, of course, there's the precept of not lying, of caring for the truth. The Buddha says speak in due season, speak to the benefit of others, speak that which is honest.

The people you have to lie to own you. The things you have to lie about own you. When your children see you owned, then they are not your children anymore. They are the children of what owns you. If money owns you, they are the children of money. If your need for pretense and illusion owns you, they are the children of pretense and illusion. If your fear of loneliness owns you, they are the children of loneliness. If your fear of truth owns you, they are the children of the fear of truth.

So it's really, especially now with public discourse about what's true and what's not becoming so alive for all of us—it's not so much a time to put your commentary out there, although you might, and you need to act and respond from whatever is your place of integrity. But in terms of truth, it means getting quiet and listening to that truth that's inside yourself. That which you know to be so, no matter if everybody else told you it's not true. You know what matters. There's something so fundamental in it.

Sexuality. Eros. The first teaching is not to harm. But Eros has tremendous power. If we look at the advertising of our country and the images—not to speak of our own teenage years—there's this enormous power. Part of the power of Eros is love, and part of it is connecting sexually. Somehow we see that we have these mysterious ways of being attracted to one another. Sometimes it's to make children, or accidentally make children. Sometimes it's just to love another being in the most extraordinary and intimate way.

We don't talk about it so much in meditation, but it's absolutely critical. And again, if I were to ask not only how many of you have made idiots of yourselves, but how many have suffered in the area of sexuality? We used to have these men's retreats that I led here for many years, and one of the evenings we'd do a council where men would tell their sexual histories in the center of the room. While there was some beauty and joy in it, there was inevitably confusion, pain, suffering, not knowing how to deal with it.

But at the same time, it's magic. When we love somebody and when we can touch someone in an intimate way, there's something so—it's as if we touch things we touch when we walk in the mountains, or listen to a magnificent piece of music, or are there at the birth of a child, or witness the mysterious passing of a human being. And making love is one of those things.

Okay, a poem for you from one of my favorite poets, Ellen Bass in Santa Cruz, one of our great poets.

And she likes to write a lot about sexuality. It's called "Jack Gottlieb's In Love."

I'm talking to Jack Gottlieb's son, my childhood friend from Pleasantville. He was a skinny, dark-haired guy with a neck thin as the stalk of a dahlia. We lived in railroad apartments over our parents' stores. Now he's balding and quadriplegic from the brush of an eight-axle truck.

"My father's got a girlfriend," he tells me. "He's having more sex than you and me in both of our neighborhoods combined."

I picture Jack Gottlieb, 86, stroking the loosened skin of his beloved, puckered as fruit left too long on the limb. Skin softened the way I once read a pregnant woman stranded alone in a hut in Alaska softened a hide for her baby's birth, chewing it hours and hours each day.

Life has been gnawing Jack Gottlieb like that. First his son, stricken, stripped down to sheer being in the chair. Then his grown daughter, died from cancer, and his old wife following like earth into that grave.

Comes love. All the cells in Jack's old organs stir. The heart, which had been ready to kick back and call it a day, signs on for another stint. The blood careens through the crusted arteries like a teenage skateboarder. He kisses each separate knob of her spine, the shallow basin of her belly, crowning it like a queen. The sad knave that's hung between his legs, extraneous and out of date, ill-fitting as his old vest, is now steam-pressed and ready for the ball.

Comes love. Jack Gottlieb is a child sledding down a hill and climbing up again, face flushed, breath hot, visible in the twilight. He can't believe her goodness. Life, that desperate addict, has mugged and robbed him on the street. And then she appears, taking his head in her palms. He handles her reverently as though she were the Rosetta Stone, revealing what lies beyond hope. He scoops her into his hands and she pours through his fingers again and again.

Ellen writes about all kinds of sexuality—not just heterosexuality, but every kind. There's something about the honesty of it. I especially like this poem because I just got married at almost 72. So thank you, Jack, for showing the way.

But there's a way in which that energy of Eros, whether it's literally enacted as sexual energy or simply the spark between us, can bring a kind of beauty into the world. And we can cultivate it and care for it.

I had these friends years ago, back in the seventies, who decided to travel around the world and visit all the most peaceful cultures they could. They visited the !Kung Bushmen in Africa, the Inuit, cultures where there wasn't a lot of conflict or violence or war.

They said that one of the things common to all these cultures was that there wasn't much teaching about the afterlife. It was all here. They had a reverence for the body. And they knew how to dance—which is part of that Eros. If you want your revolution, you want a little dance in it.

And then the fifth precept—not to abuse intoxicants—becomes not just about abstaining, but rather about doing that which wakes us up. Taking time in silence as we did tonight, listening to our own breath and heart and body. Walking in the mountains. Listening to music. Coming together in community.

Here again is Zhuangzi, the great Chinese sage. Speaking of intoxicants, he says: "A drunken man who falls out of a cart, though he may suffer, does not die. His bones are the same as other people's, but he meets his accident in a different way. His spirit is in a condition of security. He's not conscious of riding in the cart, neither is he conscious of falling out of it. Ideas of life, death, fear, and the like cannot penetrate his breast, and so he does not suffer from contact with objective existence. If such security is to be got from wine, how much more is to be found resting in the Tao?"

There's some kind of trust that grows—the trust that we can live a life that's intoxicated in the right way. Intoxicated by that crescent little moon you saw as you drove up here. By the cold snap of spring following the rain and rain and rain. Everything insanely green, like we're living in Ireland. Thank you and hallelujah.

There's something about letting yourself be intoxicated by the life around you and by each person you meet and by the things that present themselves. At this level, the level of reverence knows that life is complicated, but that underneath there's an intention of the heart to care for it all. Like a parent. And it doesn't mean you want to judge other people so much. That's not a very helpful thing in virtue.

This from Elizabeth Taylor: "The problem with people who have no vices is that generally you can be sure they're going to have some pretty annoying virtues."

So the point isn't somehow holier than thou. It's not that at all. It's actually love. You almost can't separate virtue from love, or virtue from compassion, or virtue from care.

O Nobly Born, begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Discover that you have within you—whether you call it conscience, virtue, or integrity—as your very essence. And when you know this, then the fears of insecurity, the pulls of self-interest, the fear of dying—all those things that are natural to us as human beings, that we all carry—they are somehow placed before you, and the integrity you have is even bigger.

There's a description of a man named Mr. Liu, who was locked up in a communist Chinese prison because he was speaking against the government, against land being stolen and various injustices in his community. So he spoke out against the government. He was imprisoned for eleven years and forced to sit on a little wooden stool most of the time. To get out of prison, all he had to do was sign a paper saying that what he had said was wrong and untrue. For eleven years he wouldn't sign the paper.

When he finally got out and somebody asked why he couldn't sign it, he said, "I could see the faces of all the people that I live with, the people whose lands were stolen, the people that I cared about. And then I remembered what I cared about." And he said, "So I sat." That sounds like Horton the Elephant—I sat and I sat and I sat and I sat, and I simply couldn't do it.

There's something so magnificent about integrity when we awaken to it in ourselves. We become the king or queen of the world, the benevolent one, whose every act is to bestow virtue and justice. That's the kind of leadership one would like to discover and have and embody.

Thomas Merton writes, "Saints are holy not because of their own sanctity, but because they have the gift of sainthood that allows them to admire everyone else." That's really what a saint is. Not that they're so holy, but that they can see the secret beauty of every single being they meet.

And so this is called Adi Sila. It is the discovery of virtue as your birthright, your true integrity. I have a story to read to you.

Abbot Anastasius had a book written on very fine parchment which was worth eighteen gold pence, and had in it both the Old and New Testament. Once a certain young brother came to visit him, and seeing how valuable the book was, made off with it. That day when Abbot Anastasius went to read, he found that the book was gone. He realized the young brother had taken it, but he didn't send after him to inquire about it, for fear that the brother might then add perjury to the theft.

The young brother went down to the nearby city of Alexandria to sell the book, and the price he asked was sixteen gold pence. The buyer said, "Give me the book that I might find out if it's worth this much." With that, the buyer took the book back to the holy Abbot Anastasius and said, "Father, take a look at this book, please, and tell me whether you think I ought to buy it, and whether sixteen gold pence is a good price. Is it worth that much?"

The abbot held it up and said, "Yes, it is a fine book, worth at least that much."

So the buyer went back to the brother and said, "Here's your money. I showed the book to Abbot Anastasius and he said it's a fine book, worth at least sixteen gold pence."

The brother asked, "Was that all he said? Didn't he make any other remarks?"

"No," said the buyer, "he didn't say another word."

"Well," said the brother, "I've changed my mind. I don't want to sell the book after all."

And he hastened back to the abbot and begged him with tears to take back his book. But the abbot would not accept it, saying, "Go in peace, brother. I make you a gift of it."

But the brother said, "If you do not take it back, I shall never have any peace."

After that, the brother dwelled with Abbot Anastasius for the rest of his life, among the desert fathers and their disciples. You hear it and it's almost impossible to imagine —but not completely impossible.

And part of the delight of hearing that story is because it resonates with what we already know, with the kind of conscience and purity and integrity that was born into us. It's inexhaustible. It's timeless. It brings us blessings no matter how difficult things are.

When Martin Luther King's church was bombed and children were killed, he said, "We will match your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul force." There's something so ennobling about this. And so for Martin Luther King, again he goes on, "I still believe that standing up for the truth is the greatest thing in the world. This is the end of life. The end of life is not to seek pleasure or to be happy and avoid pain. The end of life is to follow the sacred truth, come what may."

And so you hear these stories not just as beautiful parables, but because they are in you. They are who you are. When you sit and quiet your mind and tend yourself, you will know what to do. You will know how to respond. You will know what's called for you.

I got a phone call from one of my friends in Thailand who is a troublemaker—an official troublemaker. He was part of the extended royal family, and then he became kind of the Gandhi figure of Thailand, Ajahn Sulak. But he also became a thorn in the side of the government. It's always a good place for a thorn to be. At one point he was going to be jailed for speaking something against the king, which is a great stricture in Thailand —if someone does, you get locked up.

But he's the person who worked with the abbots of monasteries to take their robes and go ordain the largest trees in the remaining forest, making them the abbots of the forest so no one would cut down that part of the forest. He was a person who helped bring peace, the monastics bringing their whole monastic community at times to stand between warring factions of the government or the demonstrating students or the Buddhists and the Muslims—just to stand there and be a symbol of peace. He did all these wonderful things.

And he said, "You know, they might throw me in jail for a long time. I need some friends." And I said, "I'll be there if I can, if there's anything I can do." Because there's something so beautiful about standing up for what matters to you.

The words of the Buddha: Be like the lion, not frightened by noise. Be like the wind, not caught in the web. Be like the lotus, not stained by the mud. Find your own way like the rhinoceros. You will know which way to go. The rhinoceros is this great creature, but also it doesn't follow the crowd. It follows what it knows more deeply inside.

And so you begin to listen. Not in some ideal way, and not to judge yourself—we've done that too long. But to listen and to nourish and embody the things that you care about. And then it becomes your treasure. "The scent of sandalwood, jasmine, and rose bay travels only as far as the wind," says the Buddha. "But the fragrance of virtue rises even to the gods."

So you begin to discover what's possible in this way.

A little reflection for you. Since what's truly yours is your virtue, let your eyes close for a moment. First, just sense whatever you've heard tonight that struck you as valuable or important. The rest of it you can let go. But that which really reminded you of something that you already know—if you were to carry this out into the world more fully, if you were to embody a reverence for life, for justice, care, integrity of word and deed, what might you do beyond what you are already engaged in? What are you called to do? What does your own heart's integrity ask of you at this time? You can know.

When we end, you might even want to write down what your reflection was so you can really remember it. And again, it's not about being idealistic. Sometimes all we can do is refrain from harming. And hallelujah, may that be so for us individually.

For us as a nation, we are the largest arms exporter on the face of the earth. We sell tens of billions of dollars of killing machines all around the world. And yet we worry that we're not so safe. Oh, let's build more of those. Let's pay attention to this.

Sometimes all we can do is not harm, or refrain from harm. But other times, something is touched in you, in us, that brings out the nobility and the beauty of the king or queen in you—your virtue, your integrity. And it moves through you as if you are touched by the gods.

Mark Twain says it's curious that physical courage should be so common in the world and moral courage so rare. I don't think he's quite right. I actually think that there's a lot of courage in humanity and millions of acts of it every day. But what's asked of us is to listen—what can we contribute? What is our place and what is our part?

Thomas Jefferson, in the same sort of way, says one person with courage is a majority. One person who really stands up for something—there's a tremendous power in your integrity. Yes, as Gandhi said, they can throw me in prison. Yes, you can face consequences for it. But one person with courage is a majority, and can make extraordinary things happen.

The last thing to say is this: this is all actually about human happiness. These are ways for us in our own lives to follow the Dharma, the universal laws of things. How to quiet ourselves and find an inner freedom and balance that can embody what matters from our heart. How to live a life that really ennobles us and expresses our Buddha nature.

But the point is also not to make it a grim duty. If it feels that way, it's not virtue, really. I mean, it's okay—you're practicing, like training wheels, it's okay. But actually there's something beautiful about it. Beautiful about telling the truth. Beautiful about care for life. Beautiful about attending to those around us with this kind of loving awareness.

Molly Ivins, who was a great journalist for the New York Times and in Texas and various places, wrote sometime before she died: "So keep fighting for freedom and justice, beloveds. But don't forget to have fun doing it. Be outrageous. Rejoice in all the oddities freedom can produce. And when you get through celebrating the sheer joy of a good fight, be sure to tell those who follow how much fun it was."

There's something in that spirit—this is not about grim duty. It's really about carrying something beautiful, which is who you really are.

Whatever your life circumstances, whatever your politics, your perspectives—there's something deep in you that's called forth, maybe especially at this time. Remember to quiet your mind, tend the heart. Remember that you're part of something so much bigger than the political waves that come from left and right and swing us. They come and they go and we have to respond. We need to. But have a big perspective. It's not the end of the story; we're in the middle of it. And you get to plant seeds in it.

Someone said they thought they would bury us, not knowing that we were seeds. You carry something beautiful in yourself, and what's asked is to quiet yourself and remember and discover it, and then bring it forth into the world.

Spirit Rock is now one of your homes, so you can come walk the land, come to a class.

And Gary, I particularly thank you for that beautiful, beautiful meditative music.

Good night.

CHAPTER 8

Surprising Delights of Renunciation (Drop-in at Spirit Rock)

Jack Kornfield · 1h06

> In this teaching on the third of the ten pāramīs (perfections), Jack Kornfield reframes nekkhama (renunciation) not as deprivation but as a profound source of joy and freedom. Drawing from his years as a forest monk in Thailand and his work with dying patients, he illuminates how our attachments—to possessions, to controlling others, to fixed views, and to fear—create the very suffering we seek to escape.
> Kornfield weaves together Buddhist teachings with contemporary research, including studies on telomeres showing how inequality affects cellular health across all social strata, and the famous marshmallow experiment illustrating our struggle with delayed gratification. He shares moving stories: meditators giving away money at a bank during Occupy, two women in Berlin—one whose father survived the concentration camps and one whose father was a Nazi guard—embracing in mutual forgiveness, and Gandhi's fearless stance against the British Empire.
> The Buddha taught that knowing satisfaction makes one rich regardless of circumstances, while those who don't know satisfaction remain poor even in abundance. This talk offers practical wisdom for householders navigating these divided times: how to hold possessions without being possessed by them, to love without grasping, to maintain values without clinging to views, and to act with fearless compassion. As Ajahn Chah taught, 'If you let go a little, you'll be a little happy. If you let go a lot, you'll be a lot happier. If you really let go, everything will be easy for you.'

Let yourself find a way to sit comfortably and listen to these teachings. Not so much because you're supposed to remember them or there's a quiz or something, but to listen to see what they remind you of that you know to be true. And if it seems wrong or doesn't seem true, then just let it go. But if it touches something of your own wisdom and reminds or supports or illuminates that, then that's a benefit or a blessing.

This evening, I want to continue a set of teachings that I'll be doing pretty much throughout the year on Buddha nature, and in particular what are called the ten perfections of the human heart. Basically, they're one of the many Buddhist recipes for human happiness. What's true about them is that they speak in a kind of timeless way to our experience.

I have a poem here from Gabriela Mistral, the great Chilean poet. She writes:

A woman is singing in the valley. The shadows falling blot her out, but her song spreads over the fields. Her heart is broken, like the jar she dropped this afternoon among the pebbles in the brook. Does she sing for a husband who looks at her silently in the dusk? Or for a child whom her song caresses? Or does she sing for her own heart more helpless than a babe at nightfall? Night grows maternal before this song that goes to meet it. The stars with a sweetness that is human are beginning to come out. And the sky full of stars understands the sorrows of this world. Her song is pure as water filled with light, cleanses the plain and rinses the mean air of the day in which men hate. And from the throat of this woman who keeps on singing, day rises nobly, evaporating toward the stars.

I read this to bring in a sense of a rhythm that's so much bigger than our ordinary rhythm of life—the rhythm of the movement of the spheres and the turning of the seasons and the rise and fall of dynasties and the changes that we participate in that are much beyond our human doing.

I wanted to offer these teachings on the paramitas this year particularly because we're living in divided times and confusing times, politically and socially and in other ways. It seemed important to come back to some ground of basic dharma or teachings of truth that are timeless, that we can rest in and use to understand how to act and live in the world in times of volatility and so much change.

So far we've talked about generosity, the first of them, which is really generosity of spirit. And then we talked about virtue, integrity—that if we don't have some fundamental integrity, we move through the world like a boat without a rudder, thrown around by all the temptations and difficulties. All these are not "you're supposed to be virtuous" or "you should be generous." They're actually invitations to happiness. This is a way for you to have a profound well-being of heart and spirit and mind.

The third of these qualities—and you might think, what is he going to talk about?—is nekkhamma, which means renunciation. Happiness and renunciation: how do those fit together? It's particularly hard to understand in a society that teaches that accumulation is happiness, which is one of the big messages we're surrounded by.

And yet we know that when you go camping and you're there out in the Sierras in your little tent, and you have almost nothing but the cook stove and the freeze-dried food or whatever you brought up with you, some of the happiest times of your life are not encumbered by all the things of the world. You're present, in a kind of immediacy with the rest of this mystery.

A couple of years ago during the Occupy movement, which was really partly fueled by a vision or an understanding that we need to adjust the way our society is working because the inequality between very wealthy and very poor has increased and brought suffering to a lot of people—folks from the East Bay Meditation Center in Oakland decided they were going to do a demonstration. They picked one of the major banks that had been a focus of Occupy on Wall Street, trying to make a statement that it's not so much about money and how much money a corporation can make, but how we use our money.

The meditation center's action was to go in front of one of the major banks in Oakland, stand there very peacefully, do some meditation, and give out a dollar to everyone who walked by. Instead of taking your money, we're going to give you money. It shocked people. Some people took it, some people didn't, some were quizzical. The bank locked the doors—there's protesters out there. It sort of frightened them. But they watched, and these people were very peaceful, giving away money. Finally, they ran out of dollars and needed change. They knocked on the bank and held up a twenty-dollar bill, and the staff opened the door: sure, we'll give you ones. They became like friends with the people inside the bank.

There's accumulation, and it has its place, but in our society we've lost the sense of what really brings happiness.

How many of you would like to simplify your life? Look around—yes. There are a few who don't raise their hands, but that's because they're shy, actually.

When I lived as a monk, and with these monks and nuns for the years that I did, it was very much a life of renunciation. You shave your head, you leave your home, you live with an alms bowl and very, very few things. The idea is to shed those encumbrances in the monastic order and pay attention to your own heart and how you live. And that's really what matters the most.

There was a lot of teaching about renunciation for the monastics that we did. You get the food that's put in your alms bowl that day. And some days you don't get food. Okay, well, I trust that I'll get food tomorrow. And you do usually, so it's okay. But you learn to live by a very different measure than what you have.

And then you listen—okay, this is in the Buddhist teachings—is this necessary for us, for liberation? Here we are, householders. But we also don't just want to go to the temple and make some offering, as is common in the temples in Asia. People in the West are also very much interested in their inner liberation in the midst of their business and their household life. We too need renunciation.

There is a text from the Buddha's teaching: "Herein, what are the kinds of joy based on renunciation? When, by knowing impermanence, change, that all things change, fading away, the cessation of all that arises, one sees the world as it actually is—impermanent, fleeting, like a star at dawn, like a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a dream. And proper wisdom forms, that all things are impermanent, ungraspable, not to find satisfaction that is lasting in them. And thus understanding, great joy arises. Such joy is the joy based on deep understanding and renunciation."

Okay, that sounds good in a certain way, but how does it apply to us? Here we live in a desire-based culture mostly. Mae West said, "I can resist anything but temptation." Right?

There was a famous scientific experiment done by Walter Mischel a couple of decades ago or so. The gist of it is that you take a young child and a marshmallow. You've heard of this, I'm sure. You put the marshmallow on the plate, you take the young child there, and you say, "You can have it now, or if you just wait a bit, I'll be back and I'll give you two marshmallows." It's basically determining whether that child can delay gratification. And from the social science point of view, what it showed was that the children who had developed somewhat of that capacity in fact succeeded much better in school, in relationships, or work, because they somehow were able to regulate themselves better.

I really see this as the picture of what it's like when you're beginning to meditate and how hard it can be with all the storms and the different things that come to people.

And she was crying when she left, not because it was hard, but because she had never been so happy. There was something about the simplicity that allowed her to see what really mattered.

The renunciation of physical things, the simplification of our lives, offers a kind of freedom. But there's also the renunciation of mental states, which is perhaps more subtle and more important. We can renounce our judgments, our opinions, our need to be right. We can renounce our complaints and grievances. We can renounce the endless commentary that the mind provides about everything.

A Tibetan teacher once said, "The problem with us is that we have too many opinions." And it's true. We carry around these heavy burdens of views and positions and stances on everything. What would it be like to set some of that down? To not need to have an opinion about everything? To not need to be right?

There's also the renunciation of identity, of who we think we are. We construct these elaborate stories about ourselves, about our history, about our wounds, about our accomplishments. And we carry them around like precious possessions. But they too can become a prison.

The Buddha spoke of the conceit of "I am" as one of the last fetters to be released. Not that we don't function as individuals, but that we hold our sense of self more lightly. We recognize it as a construction, a useful convention, but not the whole truth of who we are.

And finally, there's the renunciation of time itself, in a sense. The letting go of the past with its regrets and resentments, the letting go of the future with its hopes and fears, and the resting simply in this present moment. This is the deepest renunciation, and also the most liberating.

And she said that it was the happiest time in her life. The teachings were beautiful, the spirit of the people there was beautiful, but there was also something about just living—like camping, I said—living with that level and that kind of simplicity.

So in the end, our happiness is not what we have or don't have. It's not saying you should get rid of things, but it's our ability to be present for life as it is, rather than wanting and grasping and so forth.

The great Zen poet Ryokan writes:

My life may appear melancholy, but traveling through this world, I've entrusted myself to heaven. In my sack, three quarts of rice. By the hearth, a bundle of firewood. If someone asks what is the mark of enlightenment or illusion, I cannot say. Wealth and honor, praise and blame arise and pass like the weather. As the evening descends, I return to my hermitage and stretch out both feet in answer.

My answer is: here we are. This beautiful way.

Now, some years ago, my friend Duane Elgin, who's also a dharma practitioner, wrote a book called Voluntary Simplicity—I think in the seventies or eighties, it's hard to remember quite when it came out. And most people want to simplify. But it's also not that easy. I know from living in villages and places where it was very simple, there was something really refreshing about that simplicity. Thoreau says the soul grows by subtraction, not by addition. When you simplify in certain ways—outwardly and inwardly—you can listen in a new way.

Of course, even when you simplify, the habit of clinging is there. I noticed in my monastic life that a monk friend of mine had a very cool set of robes that came from the garments they were using in funerals. They were sort of special robes because you were like a really cool monk if you had these old funeral robes. And I'd look and say, "Gee, I wonder when I'm going to get robes like that." And he had a really nice alms bowl and mine was not all that nice. You start to see how it is. It doesn't matter where you are—that desire thing starts to work.

But you want to reflect: What is it time to let go of, or to hold lightly? And it's not about poverty. Because the Buddha, again, says in one of these wonderful texts—well, I'll read it to you:

A wealthy businessman said to the Buddha, "I see you are the awakened one, and I would like to open my mind and heart and ask your advice. My life is full of work. I employ many people who depend on me to be successful. I enjoy my work and like working hard. But having heard your followers talk of the bliss of renunciation, and seeing you as a homeless one, should I do the same? I long to do what is right."

And the Buddha replied, "The bliss of a truth-seeking life is attainable for anyone who follows the path of unselfishness. If you cling to your wealth, it's better to throw it away than let it poison your heart. But if you don't cling to it and use it wisely, then you will be a blessing to people. It's not wealth and power that enslave us, but the clinging to them."

And the truth is that you don't get to keep it anyway. You have it for a certain time. It's sort of like you're the accountant in the firm—you take care of it and you pay your taxes on it, you tend it, whatever it is. And then at some point you have to give it up. The real question is: does it possess you?

And not only does it possess us in some way, but if we look in our society—does it possess us collectively? Everyone knows the passage from Eisenhower at the end of his presidency, where he says:

Every gun that's made, every warship launched, every rocket fired signifies, in the final sense, a theft from those who are cold and not clothed. The world in armaments is not spending money alone. It is spending the sweat of its laborers, the genius of its scientists, the hopes of its children. This is not a way of life at all, in its true sense. It is humanity hanging from a cross of iron.

And so here we are, in the richest nation on earth.

Emerson says the wisdom of nations is shown by what they do with their surplus capital. How do we use the wealth that was given to us? If we look in a certain way, we're also sadly a warlike nation, and I can count dozens of wars that we've been in, big and small, in my own lifetime. Pretty much not many years between them—the little ones like Grenada or Panama, or Libya, or many, many others. And then, of course, there are all the other wars elsewhere. But we also supply the majority of armaments to the world, more than any other country. And then we worry that we're not safe. There might be some connection between those two.

So we start to reflect on this, again not to make a political statement or to favor one political point of view or another, but to look at what benefits humanity from the deepest place. And I remember being in New Delhi, along the river where there's a great big park, an open expanse with some stone walls on the side inscribed with the sayings of Gandhi. It's a memorial to Gandhi, where his body was cremated. And on one of them, there's a famous phrase where it says, "Before you act, think of the poorest person you've met and consider if your next act will be of any benefit to them." It's a really powerful question to consider—what is our relationship to others?

I just came from a conference at UCLA this past weekend on consciousness and mind and human well-being. It had neuroscientists and physicists and psychologists and various teachers of different kinds. It was really quite a wonderful conference. My favorite presentation there was from a woman named Elissa Epel. She works at UC Medical Center and is a professor there, working together with Elizabeth Blackburn, who won the Nobel Prize for discovering telomeres—those caps on the ends of your chromosomes that protect you from aging. When they start to fray and diminish, the cells start to die and eventually your body dies.

But it turns out, one of the things that Elissa's research showed—and she couldn't believe it, she did it several times and then she published it and no one else believed it until they replicated it—was that if you meditate for some weeks, they can measure that the telomeres in your cells actually repair themselves more. Your life is extended, you get healthier cells, and it's measurable. So that was already a wild finding that she could hardly believe, but it's been replicated many times.

But the thing she said that was much newer and interesting was this: Your cells are listening to the world. She said we can see it as geneticists in the epigenetics of your cell—certain things get activated or turned on or turned off depending on the hormones in your body and the level of stress or well-being. We're tuned to those around us and to the environment.

The particular thing she measured was that in places or societies where there's a very big differential between the wealthiest and the poorest of that population, obviously those who are poor have more stress and their telomeres get frayed—because there's not enough food, or there's violence around them, or whatever suffering that racism and poverty bring to their lives. But it turns out that in those same areas or countries, the people who are wealthy, their telomeres also shorten. As if somehow their body and their cells, even if it's not conscious—they may feel guilty about having a lot of money or they may not—but somehow our bodies are tuned to the matrix of the humanity around us. And so their lifespan is also shorter because the lifespan of the people around them is shorter. It's a wild piece of research that points to interdependence.

So when Gandhi says, "Think of the poorest person you've met and consider if your next act will be of benefit to them," it turns out that them is us. We're in the family together.

One dimension of renunciation, then, is renunciation of attachment to things, renunciation from greed, so that what you have is both appropriate and used in a beautiful way. That's what makes the heart happy. Otherwise, you're not so happy.

Now, renunciation of the second kind is the renunciation of the possession of others—that is to say, people being possessed. To the extent that you try to possess or control your lovers, your spouse, your children, your parents, whoever it is—first of all, they don't like it. You may have noticed that. And it's generally not a very successful strategy.

I remember when my daughter was first learning to drive. There she was, fifteen or sixteen, and that terrifies every parent—and it should. Then this guy came who was from the driving school and said, "Get in, let's head out toward the freeway." I'd given her lessons in a parking lot. I said, "You're going to take her on the freeway?" He said, "Oh, the girls are easy, it's the boys I worry about." But we'll leave that aside for the moment. All I could do was pray. That's it. She's going to do her best, and here's a car. That's all you can do.

And in the end, that's pretty much all that you can do anyway with our kids or with the people that we care about. Mostly, in the end, what we can do is love them. Ursula Le Guin wrote, "Love doesn't just sit there like a stone. It has to be made like bread, remade all the time, made new." And that love is not a possessive love, because that's not really love, but the renunciation of the grasping of how they should be.

Now I'm about to go off to the East Coast in a day or so to be with my twin brother who's in the last weeks of his cancer—myelofibrosis and leukemia—and he's called hospice. I've been going back and forth. I'm very close to him, and my other brothers will all be there. And I had some ideas about what might be the right, good thing for him in terms of hospice and how he might die peacefully and so forth. But it turned out, of course, he had some ideas. And his family had ideas. And the family's ideas were not even necessarily his ideas.

And I could see, you know, from all my experience and thought, this might be really good—but it's not my place to determine that. People die in character. They die as they lived. They die in the circumstance of the people that they're with. And I might have some idea. But it turns out that basically the game is to go and love people as they are. And there's a deep kind of renunciation in this.

Here, let me read you a story. I told you Frank Ostaseski is going to come and teach with me next month. This is a story from his wonderful new book called The Five Invitations.

So this is talking about someone who has Alzheimer's or dementia. She was finally unable to live on her own, this woman, and so one of her daughters brought her into her home and tried to create a place where she could live. Not long after bringing her mother with dementia to live with her, Jillian—that was the woman—walked into the living room to find her beloved books scattered across the floor. Jillian was a writer who had these bookcases full of all the classics and things she loved, including her sacred Buddhist texts and her favorite antique books. Her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty old books. I'm going to give them to my dentist."

Now, Jillian was momentarily trapped by rage. She scolded her mother's assistant or attendant who was there all day taking care of her. "How could you let her do this? How could you let this happen?" And the attendant, who was not caught in the whole drama, replied, "Ma'am, today I pack the books up and tomorrow I will unpack them. If this gives a sense of control to a woman who has lost so much, well then, it's okay with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

How's that? We have so many ideas about how it's supposed to be. And here—okay, I'll pack the books up and I'll unpack them, because it's really the presence of love that matters and not where the books are. And so you can feel the kind of deep renunciation that comes in this dimension.

And also what's true is that you can do it. You might think you can't. I remember I was at Esalen years ago. I brought for a program a number of Buddhist teachers there—Chogyam Trungpa Rinpoche and Tartang Tulku and Lama Govinda and all these kind of Buddhist luminaries—and we were all teaching together with Stan Grof and so forth. One of the people I brought was a Korean Zen master named Seung Sahn, or Soen Sa Nim as we used to call him. Some of the folks at Esalen got really enamored of his teaching. He was a wonderful Korean Zen teacher. And this couple who was there became students of his, and he came back another time, and they were very devoted. And then they broke up. You know how it is.

And they were young, but you don't have to be young to break up. But there it is. And it was not easy at all. The woman left him for somebody else, and the man was just inconsolable.

I watched the Zen master, and he was very tender with this man. He touched him on the heart and said, "Difficult. Hold it all with compassion." Nice, lovely kind of response.

Then the Zen master traveled for about eight months to Korea and various temples, and he came back. I happened to be there when he returned. These people were there—what had been his disciples, this couple that had now separated. She was with some other guy.

The Zen master met this man and looked at him and said, "How are you?"

He said, "Oh, still terrible. Such loss. I still feel so bad."

The Zen master said, "Oh, I have a gift for you." He opened his monk's bag and pulled out this beautiful set of beads. "Here, give me your hands." He put the beads in his hands and held them with one hand, looked him in the eye, and smacked him across the face. He shouted, "Let her go!"

We were all like—I didn't learn this in therapy training! Might have been a good move, but they don't teach that. The man was shocked, but I'll tell you, a week later he was done. He just finished it. "All right, I get it."

So you hear these teachings and you think, "Oh yeah, nice for the Buddha or those monks or something." But it actually is possible for you. Not that you deny it, not that you don't feel the grief—which originally the Zen master acknowledged, saying, "Yes, feel compassion, that's painful." But now it's time to start anew.

Renunciation is not possessing people, and even in yourself, not possessing the way it's supposed to be. Then you're free to move with wise relationship.

The third kind of renunciation, particularly helpful in these times, is the renunciation of views—just in case you have them—and opinions.

The Buddha says, well, in the Tao it says the philosopher is wedded to his opponent. They like it, and that's okay, that's a kind of nice thing. But the Buddha says, "Those who cling to their views go about the world annoying others." I find he laughed when he said that.

Half our opinions are really based on fear and misunderstanding anyway. And they change periodically. But we get so filled with what's right and the way things are supposed to be—whether it's political or spiritual or any other way. Then we start to carry our anger and our grudges and our perspective in it. In some way, it undermines the heart. We become full of judgment.

I hate to say it, I wish it weren't true, but your judging part—at least those of you who have a strong judging part—it's been in there since you were a kid. It follows you around and it kind of knows you and says, "Oh yeah, she's not doing that right. You could do that better." It's just in there. No matter how good things go, it's like Dustin Hoffman says: "A good review from the critics is just another stay of execution." You can't really let yourself be happy because the judge is in there in some way.

The thing about views is that you believe them. But they're really only partial. Truth is not given to us in words. Being right—everybody's heard this—would you rather be right or happy?

It doesn't mean that you can't have perspectives and values and carry them, but it's the grasping of them, believing that you have the right way and that you really see it. Who knows, politically, what's going to happen? Who knows, spiritually, what's going to happen?

Who knows what's going to happen in your life? "Don't know mind," which is what Zen Master Seung Sahn called it—Suzuki Roshi called it beginner's mind—is to be willing and able to see things in a fresh fashion. And we need that, perhaps now more than ever.

Peter Matthiessen writes: "Eventually the child's clear eye and heart is clouded over by ideas and opinions, preconceptions and abstractions. Simple, free, joyful being becomes encrusted with the burdensome armor of who we should be and how we think we should be. Not until years later does an instinct come that some vital sense of mystery has been withdrawn. The sun glints through the pines and the heart is pierced in a moment of beauty and strange pain, like a memory of paradise. And after that day, we become seekers."

There's something about the child of the spirit in you, no matter what views and what you've lived through—something inviolable that can be touched when we let go of views and step more into the mystery of life. You can reflect on that as well.

Spiritual views. People come and say, "My partner doesn't meditate." So what? Maybe you're the one that needs it. Thomas Merton wrote that the beauty of saints is not their sanctity or holiness. This is not what makes a saint holy. What makes a saint holy is the gift that they're given, the gift of sainthood, which is to see the beauty in everyone else. That's what it means.

So this is a different kind of renunciation—the renunciation of your views—to really honor life. And again, even in the practice of metta, which I send everywhere, to political leaders everywhere, some you like, some you don't, whatever your views are: may they be free from hatred, may they live with a heart of compassion. I wish that for them, for every single one, the ones that I might agree with or don't in my own opinions. That's something I could really wish for everyone.

I have a friend who went on a vision quest—you can see how far I have to go here, I'll tell this story. He was a sort of angry guy who got into conflict with people because he had a lot of views and opinions. One of those types, not unlike some people we know—myself and others.

Anyway, he went on this vision quest, ten days at Four Corners, way out in the desert in the Southwest. Very special. He was alone with his little canteen and whatever supplies he had. And he's going on and on, day after day, looking for some vision, and no vision came. It's coming to the last day, and he goes around a corner and sees a rock to sit on. He just sits down on this rock, somewhat disillusioned, disappointed—I came out here to have a vision, no vision came, maybe I'm not so spiritual, whatever the judgment inside says.

And then he noticed that a little ways in front of him were some animal bones, deer bones. And then he looked more closely, and it was sort of odd the way they were configured. And then he looked even more closely, and what he saw was two sets of antlers entangled. During the rutting time, these two deer with antlers had butted heads and somehow locked their antlers together, been unable to get them apart, and eventually had died.

And he said, "Okay, vision's come. And now I see." It was the perfect vision that he needed—to understand the conflict he was having, that he created in his life, and how being locked in his views and conflicts actually kept him entangled with these people.

So you can understand the Buddha's teaching about happiness. Not that we don't see clearly and have discriminating wisdom and understand what our values are. But the attachment—we know, and this is true—it's only temporary, that view. And there are other views. No matter what your view is, there's another view, another angle to see it from. Renunciation of being right. Letting things go.

This is again from the Buddha: "Look how he abused me and beat me, threw me down and robbed me. Perpetuate such thoughts and you live in hatred. Look how he abused me and beat me, threw me down and robbed me. Abandon these thoughts and live in love. In this world, hate never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law."

Here's something pretty serious. It's not like, "Oh, they dissed me," or "They were emotionally distant," or whatever you want to complain about. He abused me, beat me, threw me down, and robbed me.

Are you going to continue? Doesn't mean you don't protect yourself or care for yourself. But when that's over, do you dwell in that kind of loyalty or suffering? Or as the Buddha says, abandon these and move on. Renounce that which causes you suffering and start anew.

"O nobly born," the Buddhist texts begin, "remember who you really are." Remember that you have within you a heart of generosity, of integrity, and of the kind of renunciation—I mean, those kids were struggling to learn it—that gives you a centeredness and a place of stillness or peacefulness or wisdom that you can reside in with the waves of praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain that make up human incarnation. And that's the way you become free.

So renunciation of things, not of our attachment to them. Renunciation of possession of people. Renunciation of your fixed views. And renunciation of fear.

Gandhi said, "Fearlessness is the prerequisite for a genuine spiritual life." And of course, politics works by trying to scare people. You can say it's contemporary, but it's actually been going on for centuries. And so we have fears of the other and terrorism and racism, and all these things sort of intertwine. These people or this circumstance or whatever—you need to be afraid and we'll keep you safe. Fearlessness is that which gives you a whole different level of freedom of heart and spirit.

So here's Gandhi standing up to the entire British Empire and they're throwing him in prison and so forth. And he says, "If you make unjust laws to keep us suppressed in a wrongful manner without taking us into confidence, these laws will merely adorn the statute books. We will never obey them. Award us what punishment you like, we will put up with it. Send us to prison and we will live there as if in a paradise. Ask us to mount the scaffolding and we will do so laughing. Shower what sufferings you like upon us. We will calmly endure all and not hurt a hair of your body. We would gladly die and will not so much as touch you or harm you. But so long as there is life yet in these bones, we will never comply with your arbitrary laws—and we will love you anyway."

So that's a statement of somebody who's fearless. And as I said, quoting Thomas Jefferson last time, one person with courage is a majority. When we remember fearlessness, it empowers us to live in the way that really brings happiness to ourselves and to others.

Fear is an interesting thing because often it's about what hasn't come yet. It's really about the future, all those stories and thoughts. And yet, in fact, we don't know what's going to happen tomorrow. Tell me somebody knows what's really going to happen tomorrow. I mean, you have good guesses, but some days you're wrong, you know.

What will happen? So much mystery. What is love? What is gravity? What will happen politically? What will happen in your family? When will you die? So mysterious. What is consciousness? How did you get to be a human being? People would answer to Zen Master Seung Sahn, "You don't know." He said, "Ah, good. Don't know." You just keep don't know, don't know. So you look fresh and not with your views.

This is also letting go of your fear, and it includes the fear that somehow you're going to fail. Because guess what? You will. Anybody who's worth anything and pays attention—you have success and failure. "I've missed more than nine thousand shots in my career," says Michael Jordan. "I lost over three hundred games."

26 times I've been trusted to take the game's winning shot and missed. I've failed over and over again in my life, but I still keep going out on the court. That is why I succeed.

So you fail. But fearlessness is not about success or failure. The freedom of the heart is the ability to enter this world with your care and your love. And that's what brings you happiness. If you're possessed by fear and controlled by it, in some way you lose touch with that freedom that was born into you, that freedom of who you really are.

Looking at stories again. This is from Frank Ostaseski. He said, "I flew to Berlin to teach a workshop on grief and forgiveness. I didn't mention my experience of having gone to the concentration camps, to Birkenau, prior to leading this workshop. It can still be difficult to speak of such things in Germany. As the workshop was ending a day or two later, however, a woman from the very back of the room stood up and said, 'I've been listening to you talking about forgiveness, but my father was a prisoner in those concentration camps and I could never forgive his killers. My heart is like ice.'"

The whole room went silent. And again, the only appropriate response was to bear witness, just to hold that with a witnessing heart.

Then a woman on the other side of the room raised her hand to speak, and I thought to myself, now the stories of the camps and the grief of these losses will come. She stood and said, "My heart is like ice too. It feels like a stone. My father was a Nazi officer who was a guard in those camps. I know that he killed many people. I can't forgive him."

Silence.

And then these two women did the bravest thing I've ever seen. They made their way across the large conference hall of two hundred people and embraced. They didn't say a word. They didn't have to. They just held each other. Their actions were a clear recognition that they were no longer alone in that pain. And for that moment, their suffering was all of our suffering, and their compassion and forgiveness was all of ours.

To let go of fear is somehow to have a bigger vision of the world. Kabir, a wonderful poet, writes—I'll try and remember it. He says, we sense that there's some spirit that is born into the animals and plants and trees around us. It's the same spirit that gave life to you in your mother's womb. Why do you walk around feeling that you are an orphan? Don't you remember that you belong to it all?

A holy relationship. And a holy relationship means a moment when you hand something to someone or receive it from them or look in their eyes or say a word. A holy relationship is a means of saving time. One instant spent together restores the universe. You can hear it in that story in Germany—one moment of that kind of attention can turn everything around.

And so this kind of renunciation is the renunciation of all the things that hold us back and the willingness to say, as Gandhi did, "I know what matters to me." What mattered in his case was both justice and love. And I will put neither of them down. I will carry them both in the ways that I best can.

Each of you have gifts that you carry to the world. When we sit and meditate, yes, you quiet the mind. Yes, you open and tend the heart and release things. Yes, you can go into vastness and a sense of connection, all of those things. But then the gift from it is to come back to this world with hands that can plant seeds and nourish and water and tend—not because you're supposed to, but because it's your family, it's who you are. Your gift is really your love.

Maybe the great renunciation in our human life is the renunciation of the way we thought life was supposed to be. And the willingness to love life as it presents itself and then to respond—to add our peace and our gift and our seeds, to open ourselves to the sky and the wind and also to the storms and the rain and the mystery of all of it.

I could read you, and I will, a little poem to end. But I'm contemplating whether to tell this story or not, and I guess I will. Some years ago, I had a friend named Milton Friedman. And Milton Friedman, who has the same name as the great economist who was at the University of Chicago, the very famous conservative economist—

My friend Milton Friedman was a speechwriter in the Senate, and then he worked in the White House long ago during Jimmy Carter's presidency. During that particular time, there was a very high level of inflation. Oil prices spiked, interest rates climbed into the teens and twenties.

One day Milton Friedman was there working on a speech when a phone call came for him. "Is this Milton Friedman?" the caller asked. "Yes, it is," he replied.

It turned out to be a clergy person in one of the largest church communities in America—a whole very large church organization. He was their financial officer as well as a clergy person, and he wanted advice about what to do with the billion or however many dollars that the church had to invest, especially in this fraught economic time.

"We have this many billions," he said, "and I'm calling to see if you have some advice about investment."

My friend Milton Friedman replied, "Have you considered giving it to the poor?"

The man on the other end of the line was a little shocked. "Is this the real Milton Friedman?" he asked.

To which my friend Milton Friedman paused for a moment and said, "Is this the real church?"

He was a witty fellow.

At whatever level we are, actually, these teachings point to what brings happiness to us—the level of integrity that we live with, the level of generosity. Not because you're supposed to be generous, but because it's actually what brings joy and happiness to the heart. And the level of renunciation so that you can, like those little kids in the video, amid all the storms and pulls of your opinions and others' needs and praise and blame, actually tend your own heart no matter what.

You have a rudder on your boat in the stream. There's some way in which you know how to live that, through these trainings and practices, gives you peacefulness and steadiness and allows you to bring that gift of peacefulness and steadiness to the world that so needs it.

This is from Gensei:

Trailing my stick, I go down to the garden gate.
Fall, winter floods have washed away the planks of the bridge.
Shouldering our sandals, we wade across the narrow stream.
I dabble in the flow, delighted by the shallowness of the stream, gaze at the flagging, admiring how firm the stones are under the water.
The point in life is to know what's enough.
Why envy those other world mortals?
With the happiness held in one inch square heart, you can fill the whole space between heaven and earth.

So let's just sit for a few moments. And as you sit, let yourself reflect. What things is it time to let go of? To give away, to sell, to offer to the poor, to give to someone else. To release. And what people is it time to release? And what opinions and ideas and views would it help to release, to rest in mystery and a trusting heart?

I thank you for your kind attention. It's lovely to be able to remind myself, because every time I teach I'm also talking to myself. Jack, yes, listen, remember this, it's good. I hope something of this touches you in a way that's of benefit, and perhaps we'll see you again.

Good night. Drive carefully out there on the wet roads. Be polite with one another. It's crowded. Good night.

CHAPTER 9

The Tender Heart of Life and Death

Jack Kornfield · 2h07

> In this deeply moving talk, Jack Kornfield welcomes longtime friend and Zen Hospice Project co-founder Frank Ostaseski to explore the intimate relationship between life and death. Kornfield shares his recent experience accompanying his twin brother through his final days with leukemia, describing how he meditated aloud to communicate the dimensions of presence—from the body's coldness and resistance to death, to the tenderness of the heart, to the vastness of awareness itself.
> Ostaseski offers his "Five Invitations" distilled from sitting with over two thousand dying people: don't wait, welcome everything and push away nothing, bring your whole self to the experience, find a place of rest in the middle of things, and cultivate don't-know mind. Both teachers acknowledge how they've "flunked the course"—Kornfield facing a misdiagnosis, Ostaseski recovering from a heart attack—discovering that the body doesn't want to die even as awareness remains spacious.
>
> The dialogue weaves together Buddhist teachings on dukkha, the Four Noble Truths, and the brahmavihāras with universal wisdom about impermanence. Through stories of hospice patients—from a heroin user wanting to "come back as Jackie" to a marginalized woman writing her death poem—they illuminate how ordinary people discover extraordinary compassion when facing mortality. The teaching emphasizes that freedom, love, and presence are available now, not after years of practice, and that recognizing our interconnection transforms how we live each precious moment.

Good evening.

It's a pleasure to welcome you here to this Monday night sitting group at Spirit Rock. If we haven't met before, my name is Jack Kornfield, and I'm here with my longtime good friend, Frank Ostaseski. I'm very pleased to share the night with you.

How many of you are here for the first time, just to know? Welcome. It's a particular pleasure to welcome you here. And if you saw a hand go up near you of someone who's new, when we get to the break, turn and introduce yourself to that person or welcome them.

Monday Night Sitting group has been ongoing now for thirty-two years. I keep track because it's the same age as my daughter. And Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful valley here through a whole community that's committed to the twin principles of wakefulness, or inner freedom of heart, and of compassion. We received this beautiful land from the Nature Conservancy, asking us to steward and take care of it, and gradually the whole community itself has created and built this as a lovely retreat for people to come and quiet their minds and tend their hearts. We have all kinds of trainings and retreats—day long, week long, month long—for families, for educators, for special kinds of programs, for people in healthcare and all kinds of other areas. Frank also has been part of some of our wonderful programs.

Mostly what we do on Monday night is really quite simple. We sit for about half an hour, which I think we'll do tonight, with a little bit of instruction just for those who are new or as a reminder. Then we take a break, stretch or relax for a little bit, and come back together for some teachings, which will be both stories and teachings and some dialogue that we share.

It's so spring out there. It's pretty amazing to walk this land or other parts and feel, with the wild amount of water that we've had, how everything is just dancing and bursting open. The grass is saying, "Yes, me too," and everything is insanely green. Maybe it's a time for us also to kind of breathe and quiet down and let that spring come in inside ourselves.

Again, I'm very happy that you're here. Do you want to say hello, anything?

Frank: Just how delighted I am to be here with you, and how beautiful it is to have the green. We were commenting on the way up that here we are, almost in May, and we're still green. Fantastic. So good that we can have all that liveliness as a counterposition to our discussion tonight about death. They go together, don't they? Package deal.

Jack: That's it. So let's begin with some meditation practice.

Find a way to sit in which your body is comfortable and yet also alert. If you're in a chair, let your feet be flat on the floor. Have some sense of dignity, sitting upright, but also gracious—like the king or queen on the throne. Present, easy on the cushions, however you sit. Let your body be at ease. You don't have to get in any kind of weird posture. You're weird enough as you are without adding to it from your spiritual practice.

When you've taken your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this mysterious human form, this human incarnation, you're ready to let your eyes close gently and just come into the present. Simple mindfulness or loving awareness of what is present here and now.

As you tune into your body, if there are any areas of obvious tightness or tension that you can easily release, do so. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. You can roll your head in a circle if you like to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Relax the shoulders and let the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body and how gravity pulls you into contact with the chair, the floor, the cushion, and how the earth can completely support you. You can relax and let go in this seat on the earth. Let your belly be soft and breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to pay attention to the play of experience—what's present in body and heart and mind as you sit quietly, bringing attention to the aliveness of the moment, all that comes and goes.

After just a minute or two, you begin to notice how easily the attention drifts off to commentary and planning and remembering in other places.

So to deepen the sense of presence underneath the waves of thoughts and plans and remembering and sounds and ideas, become aware of the wave of the breath—how under all these things the body is breathing itself. Feel it wherever you can most easily: the coolness in the nostrils, swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's helpful, if it's hard to feel the breath, simply put your hand on your belly and feel the rise and fall in the palm of your hand for this sitting time.

As you rest with each breath coming in and out, let the sensations of breathing invite a quieting and calming of attention. Just this breath, breath by breath.

And again, after just a minute or two, you notice how the waves of thoughts and sounds and sensations pull the attention away from the breath. Quite natural. When you can be with the breath, let these waves rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. When one of the waves becomes quite strong and pulls you, then let go of attention to breath and, as if to greet it with the same loving awareness, as if with a bow, acknowledge it—the feelings of sadness or excitement, longing, joy, or the thoughts: planning, remembering, or the sounds. As you name it gently, feel the energy of this wave move through the body and mind. Then when it subsides, when you're at ease with it, return back to feel a few more breaths.

Rest just here with each breath, or with the strong waves met with a kind attention. Rest in the reality of the present. Remember to keep the heart tender, to touch all that arises with the spirit of compassion. This breath, breathing itself. Or this moment's experience arising like a wave—sensations, feelings, thoughts—then passing away. You rest in stillness in the midst of it all.

Whatever is present, relax around it. The breath breathes itself. The sensations, the feelings, thoughts that arise come into the space of loving awareness, of mindfulness. Let them come as they come, go as they go. You are the witnessing, the kind attention that sees just what's here. This breath, this moment's experience, receive with loving awareness. Relax, present, easy and calm with each breath.

Now one little thing to say about meditation, especially mindfulness meditation. You sit and I talk about relaxing and calming, but it's not always that way. It's actually kind of wild in there.

There was this one Zen master with whom I trained years ago. There were all these ardent students in the 1970s asking, "When are we going to get enlightened? We've heard about the Zen awakening and all these things." And he would say, "You practice, you train, and soon you will get everything." We thought, well, we'll get all those good things, right? But after a year or two or three or however long of practice, it started to dawn on us that when he said, "You practice sincerely, you're present, you will get everything," that's really what you get when you sit. You get everything.

You get the unfinished business of the heart and the tears that want to come. You get the achiness of the body. You also get to hold it with compassion and tenderness. You get joy, the spring, but also the death of people that you love. All of that comes, and as you sit halfway between heaven and earth, you become the Buddha that you are, allowing all this to be received with a great heart of compassion and understanding.

So just to be clear about this, in case you had some ideas about what was going to happen.

And the last announcement is that on Saturday, the 29th, at Lake Merritt in Oakland, the coalition of Bay Area Buddhist groups are having a sit-in and a stand-in for climate and justice. A lot of the Spirit Rock teachers—Wes and James Barras, Donald Mark—will all be there. They won't be speaking because everybody's going to be silent. But there will be a great gathering of people sitting and afterward networking for climate justice.

Those are announcements. Take a little bit of a break. It's great that there's a little baby here. How old? Three weeks. This is a dharma baby getting the first taste in the temple. Well, welcome. How nice.

So please take a break for a bit. And my new book, and maybe Frank's, are out there for anyone who's interested.

Let's just sit quiet for one minute to let the cocktail party settle down just a little bit here. You don't even have to close your eyes.

So we talked about each of us speaking for ten, fifteen minutes or something and then see where it goes. Some kind of dialogue, storytelling, disagreements if we're lucky, whatever.

And it's also true that just about now we each have new books that have come out. Frank's Five Invitations and Jack's No Time Like the Present. This one's really good. Have you read it? I read excerpts. Yeah, right. That's what they say. You leaf through it. There's good stuff you missed in there. Anyway. I'm going to get myself a copy of that.

And it turns out, when I look at them—it's not that we're going to do book reading, we're going to do some teaching—but one of the things that strikes me in looking at both these books, and I love your book, by the way, I think it's really quite a magnificent book. Thank you. Congratulations. It's very cool.

What strikes me is that there's a very similar message in both books. And Frank can talk about his own with the subtitle, "Discovering What Death Can Teach Us About Living Fully," and what does it mean to live a full life. And No Time Like the Present, the subtitle is "Finding Freedom, Joy, Love Right Where You Are."

I started by talking about how we can have a vision—an understandable one—of spiritual life as a development. You learn different practices and trainings, and you become more present and kinder and more insightful and wiser and so forth.

But often in that model, there's something out in the future that if you do it right, you'll get to, and then you'll be wise or good or whatever enlightened vision you have of a person. And so it's always something ahead.

What I say in this book, especially after all these years of teaching, is that there's another perspective which is called starting with the fruit, or starting with the result—living the fruit—in which you don't have to wait to be free. What's also true for us, yes these trainings are enormously helpful, but in any moment we can be truly present, we can be loving, we can be free. And no one can take that from us. That's our birthright. That is our true nature. They can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit.

And so there's some kind of commonality in the themes of these books. Yes, there's understanding and insight—we call this insight meditation. As you quiet the mind and open the heart, you get to experience the unbearable beauty of life. And you also get the ocean of tears. The war, the racism, the problems with the climate, all kinds of things like that. And they can't be separated. The problem is when you open, you get it all, as said before the break. And that's part of what it means to be a genuine human being, or a wise or a loving human being—to grow your capacity to be present for this human incarnation in its mystery in an open-hearted way.

I felt this very strongly in these last weeks because I was back east. I was back east a lot this year because my twin brother had been quite sick over the last couple of years with myelofibrosis and leukemia—stem cell transplant and a million transfusions and chemotherapy and so forth. And he died a couple of weeks ago.

I was back there with him for quite a bit of the time until the day before he died, where I had to go somewhere else, and it also felt right to leave. We were pretty complete. He ended up being home for the last couple of weeks, but then he was struggling some, so they moved him to the hospital where they could give him IV morphine and help him. For the last night he had his two daughters, and they sat up on either side and held his hand. It was exactly the right thing. He was ready after all he'd gone through. And they were there to hold him. Very, very touching.

He was a kind of adventurer. He was literally a member of the Explorers Club—the people who go to the South Pole and the North Pole and the moon and all those things. Those guys. I asked him if they would allow inner explorers. He said no.

He was a scientist, a biologist who studied the genomes of the great lakes of the world like Baikal and Lake Titicaca in the Andes and Lake Malawi. But as he got closer to death and as we got time to really sit together, it was clear he wasn't that interested in meditation, and I wasn't going to foist that on him—spare your friends and family. But I somehow wanted to communicate with him something of what I knew. And it was especially powerful to me because he is a twin. He's an identical twin. There's a kind of closeness.

So I was sitting there with him in the last days, and I said, "You know, I think I'm going to meditate out loud a little bit so you just kind of know what I'm doing inside." And I didn't quite know what I would experience. But as I sat there, I said, "I'm tuning in as I sit with you"—and he was pretty thin and weak and all the things that happen at the end of a long bout with cancer—"and the first thing I notice as I tune into my body is that it's cold. I feel that coldness all the way in the perineum, in my pelvis and genitals, and then it radiates out." I said, "I feel death in my body."

And we talked about him dying. I said, "You're coming close to death, but as your twin, I also feel it. And I can feel with it, the coldness, I can feel contraction, fear, resistance, all those kinds of things that can accompany the body which doesn't really want to die."

And so I just kind of began to track that and describe it to him. I sat for a bit. And I said, "But then my attention gets drawn further up in my body, not where it's so cold and dead."

And I find myself then drawn to the heart. And I looked at him and I said, I feel so much love for you. We don't talk in this way in our family. I said, but you know, here we are, it's about time. And there was a kind of tenderness in it.

If you've sat with people who are dying, especially those that are close to you, at some point you get to look in their eyes. And there are things that you can't even say in words that are so tender, and you feel lost, like I'm never going to see this person again in this way. So it's both heartbreak and also this beautiful, deep kind of love or communion.

And we just sat and looked at each other, and I said, this is the next part of my meditation of attention—just to see, to see you, see this person I lived my whole life with. And that I'm not going to see in this form again. Tears and presence. And we sat that way for a bit.

And I said, and now my attention is opening up as it does in meditation. And I feel a sense of space and vastness of just awareness itself, like the sky, which isn't limited to my body or your body, but it's really what we are. We are awareness. What do you think was born into that body of yours, by the way, in the womb? You think you're only made of hamburgers or oatmeal or whatever it is that you grew up on. I mean, you're something more than that. The spirit came into this life and it will leave.

And I said, and now I'm experiencing as if I can look at you and see our whole life past. There we were in the womb together, these little embryos and then these little babies that got born, and there we were together in the crib. I actually had a dream a few days after he died that he was next to me in bed, and it was like being back in the womb or in the crib or something. It was very comforting. He said he's okay, which I was glad about—whether it's true or not, I don't know, but it was a lovely dream.

And I said, there's this vastness, and I see you, and then I see our dance. I see the dance of this particular human incarnation that we're given so much time. And he said to me, you know, one of us has to go first, so I guess it's me.

And I looked at him, and I remembered when he was eight years old. When he was eight years old, I was eight years old. When we were eight years old, we were living in Buffalo. And it was a huge, bitter snowstorm, windy, cold. And we went out to play all wrapped up the way you do in the cold as kids. And I was skinny as a rail and shaking and freezing, and he was much bigger and more robust—he played football. And he was this adventurer.

He looked at me and he said, it's not cold. And he took off his hat. He said, it's not cold. He took off his scarf. Then he took off his jacket. Then he took off his shirt until he was stripped naked to the waist. And he started dancing around. He said, you think it's cold. It's not cold. And it was beautiful. It was some kind of transmission or teaching about his spirit.

So I was sitting there remembering that and seeing all the things that we lived through—our children and marriages and adventures together. And I said, well, this incarnation may be ending, but I'll share a womb with you again anytime. And I said, let's rest in this, let's rest in the vastness and the mystery of it.

Later we talked about what happens when you die, which Frank and I have some disagreements about, but we'll get to that in a little bit.

What was there in this conversation was both the mystery—the mystery of being alive as a human being, the mystery of the vastness and of awareness or consciousness itself. Because when you're near death, the gates between the worlds open. You see in some vaster way. There was a lot of tenderness and also a kind of wedding.

I hope you can hear this because it's so important to understand in our lives that you need to remember your true nature—the undying spirit, Buddha nature, whatever you want to call it—and your zip code, basically, that you have a physical body and you have this particular life and incarnation and you have to tend it. And the dance is somehow to hold all those pieces: the coldness and the death and the enormous love and the vast vision that says, here we are going through human incarnation. How is it going for you? Oh, you're going to be dying soon. Well, I'll be following you.

And it was both mysterious and beautiful and tender and tragic—all those things that we know when things are really close to the heart. And of course, the people all around him did what they did. Some were easy and attentive, and some were completely freaked out and frightened and so forth. And that's also the way that it is. People do what they do around death.

I have to say, one of my favorite stories in your book—and I'm actually going to read one story from your book.

It's all right. I'll use it in talks later. Thief, you know. So I'm assessed.

One of my favorite stories is about Jillian, who brought her mother who had dementia home to live with her. Jillian walked into the living room—she had gotten a caregiver for her mother while she was working and publishing, whatever she was doing. She came home and in the living room found her library, all her beloved books including sacred Buddhist texts, scattered across the floor. And her mother announced, "I'm tired of all these dusty old books, I'm going to give them to my dentist."

So you get a little sense of the dementia there. And Jillian was momentarily trapped by her anger. She scolded the attendant: "How could you let this happen?" All that. And the attendant, who wasn't caught up in that drama, said, "Ma'am, today I packed the books up and tomorrow I will unpack them. And if this gives a sense of control to a woman who's lost so much, well then it's okay with me. It doesn't matter so much. I just like being with her."

There's so much tenderness in that reply. It's such a beautiful story. And people will do what they do. Our game is not to try to perfect the world or other people or save them. You'll notice they don't want you to save them, particularly those in your family. "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all," it says in Zen. But your family members are not interested in that. The game is not really to perfect them or even yourself. It's to perfect your love. It's to be able to show up in some way that's genuine and loving for this mystery.

And it's so mysterious. It takes six million grains of pollen to seed one peony. How does that happen? And there you were, some tiny little one cell—or maybe two little cells came together—and then poof, a new incarnation. How does that happen? So it's so mysterious and beautiful. And there aren't ideals about the way that it's supposed to be as much as there is the practice that we do. And I could feel it sitting with my brother, sitting with a lot of people who've died. You've done that much more than I. What it meant to be able to bring that presence to all those dimensions at the same time.

I liked how you started out talking about all these words that we use—awakening and realization and enlightenment—they all feel very far off. And I liked that you were talking about the emphasis of your book starting from the fruit of practice.

I don't even use this word mindfulness so much anymore. When people ask me what my practice is...

Because you don't want to pay the royalties?

Yeah. Well, mindfulness is the new black, you know. It's suitable for all occasions, it seems. But anyway, what I say my practice is, is intimacy. Really learning to be intimate with myself and with the world. And what you described with your brother is that. It was a beautiful attunement to yourself, but also to him.

And this intimacy was really expressed so beautifully by you. I thought that was lovely.

Life and death are intimate. They're a package deal—you can't pull them apart. In Japanese Zen, there's a beautiful expression: shoji. It's usually translated as one word: birth-death. Nothing separating the two except a small hyphen, a thin line. A life that doesn't really include death is only half a life. There's this intimacy that's always present, yet we're constantly trying to pull them apart, to compartmentalize them. But I wonder what it would be like if instead we invited it in—invited death in to see what it had to offer us.

I say that death is not at the end of a long road, at the end of an illness, but in the marrow of every passing moment. She's the secret teacher hiding in plain sight, showing us what matters most.

We have this idea that at the time of our death, we'll do the work then. But to imagine that we will have the strength of body, the emotional stability, the mental clarity at that time of our life to do the work of a lifetime—it's a ridiculous gamble. One of the reasons I wrote the book was that I saw so many people coming to this moment with so much fear and distress and regret. I wanted to encourage us to step into a relationship with death much earlier in our lives.

To give you some background, I was the co-founder of something called the Zen Hospice Project that we started thirty years ago. We didn't really know what we were doing. It just seemed to us that there was this match between people who were cultivating what we could call the listening heart in meditation practice and people who needed to be heard at least once in their lives—people who were dying. We didn't have much more of a plan than that. Really, that was it.

We worked mostly on the streets, with folks who lived in Tenderloin hotels, a section of San Francisco. I changed a lot of diapers on park benches behind City Hall. Over the course of the years, I've probably sat with a couple of thousand people who died. All kinds of people. People from cultures I didn't understand, speaking languages I didn't know. People with great faith, others who'd sworn off religion years ago.

There was Nguyen, a Vietnamese man who was scared of ghosts. And his roommate Isaiah, an African-American man who was deeply comforted by visits from his dead mother. There they were, sharing a room together. There were people who had intact families and good health insurance. And there were people who lived on the margins of society. People who were clear as bells. Others who couldn't remember their own name.

There was a man I knew who had contracted the HIV virus from a blood transfusion. But the year before, he had disowned his gay son who was diagnosed with HIV. Now they were in twin beds in the same room, being cared for by Agnes—the husband's wife and the son's mother. There was Alex, who got so confused one night he climbed out onto his fire escape and froze to death.

Some of them really opened and blossomed and discovered a kindness they'd always wanted their whole lives. Other people turned toward the wall in withdrawal and depression and never came back again. All of them are my teachers. Anything I have of value to offer came from them.

A few years ago, I was teaching a retreat for doctors and nurses on compassion, and in the middle of it I had a heart attack. I went through surgery and all that. But what was interesting was that for the months after, almost every night I had dreams of the people I'd taken care of. They would come to me in the dreams—sometimes they would just sit with me, other times they'd give me advice, sometimes they'd say thank you. It was a clear lesson about how the relationship continues even after someone has died. Maybe especially so when it's our twin.

A few years ago, Bill Moyers invited me to come back to New York with a bunch of other people to talk about this film he was making about dying in America. I wrote this very salient talk—I felt quite proud of it. I got there and I was on this panel with all these silver-tongued devils, and they took up all the time.

And I never got to deliver my talk. Bill, who I knew from something else, grabbed me and said, "Could you just talk for a few minutes?" On the airplane there, somewhere over Kansas, I had tried to write down a few key things that I thought were really important, and they became the five invitations. What are the five things I've learned from people who are dying that have value?

The first was: don't wait. Don't wait to tell someone you love that you love them.

The second was: welcome everything, push away nothing. Jack and I were just talking a moment ago about this beautiful James Baldwin documentary that's out, I Am Not Your Negro. It's a beautiful film. In it he says something really extraordinary: "Not everything that can be faced can be changed. But nothing can be changed unless it's faced." To welcome everything doesn't mean we have to like it all. We just have to be willing to meet it.

The third was: bring your whole self to the experience. We think it's our strength or our expertise that will help others, but often it's—well, I felt for myself—it was the things I was sometimes most ashamed of, the parts of myself I most wanted to hold in some hidden corner of my life, that in fact became the very thing that allowed me to build an empathetic bridge to the other person's experience. So I had to bring it all: my strength and my clarity, but also my fear and my helplessness.

The fourth: find a place of rest in the middle of things. We think we'll find rest when we go on retreats or vacation or when our list gets checked off. My list never gets checked off. So I have to find a way of resting right in the middle of what I'm doing. That's what this practice is all about—helping us to find a place of rest right here, right now.

And the last one was to cultivate don't-know mind. I felt it was important to put something Zen-like in this list. I remember my son saying to me, "What the hell does that mean, Dad?" But to cultivate don't-know mind is to cultivate a mind of wonder, of curiosity, of openness, of receptivity, of readiness. It's not to encourage ignorance. Ignorance isn't just not knowing. Ignorance is misperception—I know something, but it's the wrong thing, and I believe it really strongly.

So those are the five invitations. I found that these were my guides for many years in working with folks who were dying. But then I thought, well, they have a relevance for all of us—for living a life of integrity and meaning and love. I feel very grateful that people let me come up close and personal with death. They really showed me how to live by doing that. I feel very, very grateful to all my teachers, two thousand of them that I had.

So, that's a little something we can start out with. But let's visit a little bit and see what else we want to chat about.

Jack Kornfield: There are a couple of things—a kind of overarching statement and then a question. What you're describing, there are parallels in what I've written about, that the place where you end up, as T.S. Eliot says, after all our journeying and voyaging, will be to arrive where we started and know the place for the first time, in the Quartets. The goal is actually to be where we are in this mystery, but with open heart and clear-eyed in some way.

What I'm hearing, in a much more universal language, is also what's traditionally structured in Buddhist teachings—the Four Noble Truths: there's suffering and its causes, which is our clinging and our resistance and our fear; and the possibility of freedom wherever we are; and the path to that being the willingness to be intimate, present, compassionate. Or I'm hearing the four dimensions of the awakened heart: of love; and compassion when there's pain, but not ending the story with that; of having joy as well; and finally equanimity, or peace.

These fundamental teachings are expressed so immediately and in such a universal way, not as Buddhist teachings—because they're not, really. They're just the way it is in human life. And I think it's part of what's happening here in the West, that these beautiful teachings and trainings and practices of mindfulness and compassion, empathy and forgiveness, now researched by five thousand papers and studies and neuroscientists, in schools and clinics and businesses—they're getting out there, but not as Buddhist practices. Rather, as trainings that are really our birthright, that are part of our human nature. And your being close to death, in a way, shines that light of presence and attention that reveals them so naturally. So that's one comment to make.

And then I want to ask a question about not being idealistic, about flunking the course, basically. Because I have.

"Yeah, me too."

And how has that been for you?

Well, as I mentioned earlier, I had a heart attack. It wasn't somebody else that was near death. You know, the view from the other side of the sheets is a really different view. And here I was, Mr. Hospice. There was a lot of pressure to do this right. I had people all over the country, all over the world wondering how he's going to do it. I used to think I knew something about dying until I had my own heart attack. Then I realized how little I knew, actually. And I became much more humble. That was a good thing.

"Good for your family, anyway."

I'll tell you a story. I just ran into Eugene on the pathway—Eugene Cash. Some of you know Eugene. He's a dear friend of both of ours. Right after my surgery, I was in the cardiac care unit, intubated. I had this long, several-hour surgery, triple bypass. And I was thinking about how our practice is—when you were guiding us in our practice, you were helping us attend to the body and breath. But sometimes I think we get too fixed on the body and breath. It won't always be there for us. And so we have to open beyond the body and breath.

So I'm in this cardiac care unit and I'm intubated, I can't speak. That means I've got hoses coming out of every orifice. Eugene's there with me and my son. Into the room comes a respiratory therapist and he says, "Let's pull out that tube and see if you can breathe." That's how he introduced himself. I waved like this—I could feel, they had actually damaged my left lung in the surgery, and I could feel my left lung wasn't working. So I wrote on a piece of paper, "I'm scared."

Eugene, very no-nonsense guy, said, "Frank, sense your body."

I tried to sense my body, but I could only feel up to my knees. Then he said, "Find your breath, find your breath." But I couldn't. I couldn't tell the difference between the machine and my own breathing.

In that moment, I remembered one of my other great teachers, Suzuki Roshi. The night before Suzuki Roshi was dying—a great Zen master who turned the wheel of Dharma in America and changed the whole way the Dharma is experienced here—the night before he was dying, he wanted to take a bath. Okasan, his wife, said, "No, no, no." But he insisted, and so Otohiro, his son, picked up his father and carried him to the tub. As he started to lower him into the warm bath water, Suzuki Roshi became terrified. He was afraid he would drown. Otohiro said to him, "Father, calm yourself. Find your breath, find your body." And gradually, Suzuki Roshi was able to do that.

But in that moment in the cardiac care unit, I thought: if Suzuki Roshi can be scared, I can be scared.

Then I grabbed Eugene by the shirt. We were like this—I pulled him close to me and put my ear right next to his cheek. Somehow he understood that what I needed was to follow the rhythm of his breath. Which I did. He lent me his breath until I could find my own again.

And my son slipped his hand in against my chest. And it was like a conduit from God. There was so much love. And then I could say to the respiratory therapist, okay, okay, now you can take out the tube.

I think we can have idealized notions about practice and our dying and who we think we're supposed to be. What I've learned from other folks who are dying and from my own experiences is that this is all we have. This is who we are—not just this, as Jack said, not just this sinew and bones, but this is who we are. This is what we have to rely on. And we can keep discovering greater and greater dimensions of ourselves that become increasingly more reliable.

About six or seven years ago, I was teaching in front of a big group of people, and then I fell over and passed out. I was unconscious for a pretty long time—a minute, minute and a half. It was pretty long. When I came to, there were like eight doctors all peering down at me who had rushed up. Then I went to get scans and all the kinds of things they do, because the next day something similar happened. Then I started to get pretty serious tremors. I still have a bit of a tremor, but they were much worse then—and numbness and tingling and cold in my body along with all these tremors.

After some tests, I went to see this doctor. I was misdiagnosed. He said, "Well, you have this thing sort of like ALS." It was happening pretty quickly because it had now been a couple or a few weeks. I went with my daughter to this appointment. And he said, "Given how rapid this is happening, what I suspect will happen is that your body will fall apart over these next few months in the way that it is. And with it will come dementia."

Now, I was thinking of a different kind of death. And dementia wasn't on my menu, you know. It scared me also. I went out and told my daughter, who was waiting for me, and she just started to weep. She said, "Daddy, I want you to be here for my children," and all the things—you know, the people that love you the most.

Fortunately, it was a misdiagnosis and it wasn't true. But I too thought, oh, I'd sat in the charnel grounds in the monastery, chanted over bodies, done all the death meditation, sat with people. You know, I'm chill with death, right? Okay. The body doesn't want to die. There's something in it organically that's true. It clings to life.

I had this really interesting experience when I came back from being in the monastery for those years. I disrobed and started to live a modern life. I was driving down the freeway in Massachusetts and a tractor trailer lost a big piece of its tire on the freeway in front of me. One car crashed into it, another—it was really something—and I had to swerve to get around it. Fortunately I wasn't part of that accident, though some people were hurt in terrible ways.

There were two things going on. One part of me, partly because I'd just been in some years of retreat, was extremely spacious and calm. Like, "Oh, interesting. Maybe I'm about to die. Wonder what will happen." Just peaceful witness. And my body grabbed the steering wheel and yanked it this way and said, "Not today, baby." Both of those were happening at the same time.

I talked to Ram Dass about it. He said, "Oh, I flunked the course a lot of times."

But this is part of the reality of being human—that our body has a certain life and it needs to be respected. Our heart and our love have a certain life that needs to be respected. And then, as you sit in quiet silence, the mind open, the heart open, there's also a sense of something bigger and more mysterious that is who you really are—that you're part of this vastness.

As Alice Walker writes—I love this passage—she said, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was, and it come to me. Being a part of everything. And I knew that if I cut a tree my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and I ran all around the house because when it happens you just can't miss it."

There's something in us that knows this is true—whether it's walking in the high mountains or making love or listening to an extraordinary piece of music or sitting at the bedside of someone dying or someone being born, which is equally wild. Out of your body or someone else's body—oh, here's a new person. Okay. We touch something, those gates open, and we realize that it's not just our to-do list or the roles that we carry. Somehow we all know this very, very deeply.

And part of the grace of the work that you and I both get to do—in hospice work and in this work of people's practice of opening with intimacy—is to invite that presence in whatever way we can. And to know that it's not an ideal. It's the full picture.

I mean, when I'm dying, I want somebody next to me who knows what the hell they're doing. I want good pain management. I want symptom control. I don't want somebody coming and just chanting over me.

But that won't be enough.

Right, you also want someone to breathe in your ear.

Exactly—I was going to say that. So that won't be enough. The other thing I want is somebody who's comfortable in a territory of meaning, who can help me figure out what the purpose and value of this life has been. I want to explore that with somebody. I need someone who's comfortable in that territory.

But there's a juncture in the dying process where that's not important anymore. Meaning falls away. And we're still talking to Grandma about her favorite piece of music and how she used to like to ride the roller coaster at Coney Island. But Grandma's someplace else now. Grandma's entering into this territory of mystery that you're speaking of. This is the land of unanswerable questions. And in this land, I think, we're all adventurers—like your brother. We bear witness more than anything else, more than provide any kind of answers.

You don't do that? You don't tell them what will happen?

I'm more interested in what they think is going to happen.

Well, he said he was going to become dirt. He's a scientist.

How do you respond to that?

Well, I had the guy who was the head of the California Atheist Association come to die with us at Zen Hospice. I was very proud that he felt we weren't going to push any dogma on him. And I asked him—I ask everybody—what do you think is going to happen after you die? Everybody's got a story. We all have a story. And that story is shaping the way in which we die, and I think also the way in which we live our lives.

So I said to this guy, what's going to happen after you die? He said, "Nothing." And I said, well, what kind of nothing? Like, will you have ears? Will you smell things? "No, you don't have no ears." I said, is it like a dial tone? He said, "No, no, no, no. You're molecules and you mix with all the other molecules in the universe." I said, oh, that kind of nothing. That's beautiful.

But then there was another guy. We had this guy, Jackie. He was a thirty-year heroin user. African-American guy. I loved him dearly. And I said, Jackie—you know, he was at Zen Hospice, right?

This guy had come in off the streets. And I said, "So Jackie, here you are at this Buddhist hospice. Do you think you're going to get born again?" And he said, "Yep." I said, "Well, what are you going to come back as?" He said, "Jackie." I said, "Well, why do you want to be Jackie? You could be something else. You could be a king or a queen. In some cultures you can come back as a cow—that's very sacred, you know."

And he said, "I'm not coming back as no goddamn cow. I'm coming back as Jackie."

I said, "How come?"

He said, "Because next time I'm going to get it right."

And now we're having a different conversation. If I had told him what was going to happen, we wouldn't have had that exchange.

I don't know—I mean, I have my own views and beliefs. But I don't hold on too tightly.

There was a woman, a wonderful Christian Scientist, ninety years old, ready for dying. She said to me, "I just want to put my head down in the lap of Jesus." Then her granddaughter came to visit and said, "Grandma, I read a book at this spiritual center in Woodacre. You don't have to worry, because when you die, everybody who's died before you will be there to meet you."

And Grandma became terrified. Her husband Edgar had been beating her most of her life. He had died five years before. The idea of spending eternity with Edgar was not appealing at all. You can't divorce your ex in the afterlife—it's too hard.

So I'm just saying that I don't impose my ideas. I explore with people. I inquire with them and see what their story is. And then we see whether or not that's a helpful story.

On occasion, I do tell people what's going to happen. I did with my brother. I said, "You're a scientist, right? Scientists do experiments. They have a hypothesis. They're open-minded and they learn from it. So you think you're just going to turn into dirt." I said, "It might be so. But it's also possible, based on some potential data for you to consider."

I told him: first of all, the majority of people around the world, across cultures, understand that you're not limited to your body. That's a belief found everywhere. Then there's my own experience—I've had out-of-body experiences in meditation and learned to do that. I've sat with people who are dying, and when they're close to death they go out of their body and see light, or become light, and come back and describe it. There's all the near-death literature. I've led past life regressions in Asia and Europe. People who believe and people who don't—it doesn't matter. If you have a group of thirty or forty people and you do this regression, half of them or more remember some

And it's not like Cleopatra. It's more like being a foot soldier in Crimea or being a farmer somewhere in South America, sometime long ago in Peru. And the people who have those experiences are not necessarily the ones who believed in them beforehand. Then if I progress them forward to what it was like to die in that life, they feel the pain of dying and the loss, and then they feel themselves liberated and free, and there's these states in between.

So I don't know. You have to be open-minded. But I said to my brother, it's possible that as you die, you'll find yourself leaving your body, that you might experience light. And he was also an amateur Egyptologist, so I decided to read him from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, because that was his language. He didn't want the Tibetans. But okay, there's Maat, there's the feather from Maat, and there's the scale, and your soul will be judged in this way. And I read it, and I said, whether you take it literally or metaphorically, there's some way in which there's a kind of reckoning—okay, I've died, wow, what was that one about? Some sense of life review that happens, as people describe.

So I just sort of went over that territory with him, not expecting him to believe it particularly. But I did say, "If it happens, remember, I told you so." You know, we're twins. What can you do? Brothers, right? Who's going to be there at the time of your dying to say, "I told you so"?

My father used to say, "It can't be too bad—no one's come back to complain." He didn't know about the Buddhists at that point. I don't know. Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche, when somebody asked him what was going to be reborn, said, "Mostly your bad habits." It's not a pretty picture from him.

That said, we were talking about Bly's translation of Kabir's poems: what's found now is found then. And that's what interests me—how do we take this whole exploration and bring it into this very life, this moment of our life? How can we use that to inform how we lead our lives now?

The two questions people inevitably form in one way or another when they're dying are: Am I loved? Did I love well? Those are the two big questions, in one fashion or another, that are asked. And why should we wait until the time of our death to answer that question? Do we need to wait until we die to rest in peace? Or can we find it now? This is what interests me. If what Trungpa was saying is that habit is what's reborn, then let's cultivate habits that bring us to our wholeness and happiness and the four flavors of love.

I think of the phrase "the habits of the heart." Somebody asked my teacher Ajahn Chah, "What is the Dharma?" Because dharma is this multi-meaning word in Sanskrit that means teachings and truth and so forth. And he said, "The Dharma is the heart." This is the way that you live in the world.

And we don't live in isolation in this. For most people, whether they had any religious practice or not in their life, if you ask somebody what's most important to them, inevitably they would say their relationships, in one fashion or another. It could be their relationship with nature, their relationship with their family. We don't do this life alone. We can't do it alone.

We have a mutual friend, Bernie Glassman, a great Zen teacher. He was talking in Germany about Avalokiteshvara, this Tibetan form of Buddha, this deity depicted sometimes as having a thousand arms. And in each hand, in some depictions, there's an ear to hear the cries of the world, and a thousand arms to respond. Bernie was talking about this in Germany, and a man raised his hand. He said, "It's a very nice metaphor. It's beautiful, but I have only two arms." And Bernie said, "I'm sorry, you're mistaken."

And the man said, no, I'm quite sure I have just two arms. And Bernie said, I don't think so. I don't think so.

And then he had everybody in the room raise both their arms. Go ahead, do it. Just go ahead. Look around. This is Avalokiteshvara. This is our life.

We can't do this alone. It's a ludicrous idea to think that we die alone, that we practice alone, that this sitting practice we do is just for our own benefit. We're always wrapped up, tangled up in everything else. And that often is what shows itself in the time of dying.

Ordinary people, people like you and I, many people who have no spiritual practice, regularly find themselves—as you're describing to your brother—feeling a kind of expansiveness, becoming something more than the small separate self they had taken themselves to be. And to really trust that in the dying process, particularly the process that comes with long-term illness, is conducive to this. It's helpful to this.

And it's a process of stripping away. The ways in which we've defined ourselves are either stripped away by illness or gracefully given up, but they all go. They all go. And then we find, often, something much more fundamental, much more reliable than all of our constructions.

When I write in this new book about the different dimensions of freedom—the freedom to love, the freedom to forgive, the freedom to start over, the freedom to be yourself, and also the freedom beyond yourself—it's also true, as you're saying and as Martin Luther King would say, that my freedom is bound up in your freedom, that we can't separate them.

I think about a men's retreat I led here with Robert Hall, one of my beloved friends and dharma teachers. In the circle one night we were sharing stories, and there was a fellow on the retreat who had a radio show in Los Angeles on Sunday nights. It was a blues radio show—I don't know, maybe KPFK or one of those stations. He said he had a big following of people who were in prison. Lots of incarcerated people liked to listen to that show.

One day he got a letter from somebody who was serving a life sentence or a long term in prison, asking would he play some early blues masters like Blind Lemon Jefferson and Muddy Waters and Mississippi John Hurt—some of the classics. And the letter was signed John Huntsman, or whatever his name was.

A couple of Sundays later, the DJ said on air, "I received a letter from this gentleman, John Huntsman, who's obviously an aficionado of the blues and knows who the great masters are, and I'm pleased to be able to play these next songs for you."

Then a couple weeks later he got another letter from John Huntsman. It said he was so grateful for the show, and then this line: "That's the first time in my life I can remember hearing my name said with respect."

There's something in this—I've seen it in working with gang kids, and I know you know it at the bedside. It doesn't take forever. It takes a moment to see somebody with the eyes of love and with that vastness, to see the dignity and inviolable spirit that was born in them, to see something with that kind of respect, to really see the Buddha nature in each person. And that kind of intimacy can change everything, even in a moment.

There was a man who came to the hospice on compassionate release from prison. He had stabbed his sister seventeen times. He was in prison for manslaughter. I didn't tell our volunteers this. He came to stay with us. And he wouldn't let anybody help him. Just wouldn't.

But we just treated him with kindness.

One day we were in the backyard smoking cigarettes, and he said, "I let the girls help me today." The girls were the nurses. I said, "Well, what did you let them do?" "I let them get me in the shower." Not just put him in the shower—he actually got undressed in the shower with their help.

Gradually over time, just by treating him with kindness, just by holding up a mirror to his basic human goodness, he started to soften. Really soften.

And then he did a funny thing. I worked at Zen Hospice for twenty years. The only one who ever threw me a birthday party was this guy. He threw me a surprise party, and he saved his social security check. He actually wanted to get a stripper to jump out of a cake.

And?

The nurses persuaded him that just a regular cake would be okay.

But he did this all himself. He did it all himself. I walked into the room, and there he was with the volunteers, and he was so happy that he could give something.

Now this man, he'd been in institutions all his life.

He'd been in juvie, he'd been through prisons—he started out in orphanages. But he discovered in himself this basic human kindness that he couldn't show before in his life. Had he shown it, he might have been hurt or even killed. There was no room for this gentleness to be shown.

So this happens in the dying process. Whatever has been hidden in us oftentimes comes to the surface. Sometimes it's our ugliness that comes, but sometimes it's our beauty. In his case it was this beauty. But the thing is to keep seeing the whole human being that's there—even if, as Mother Teresa would say, he's in a distressing disguise. See the whole human being, no matter what they are.

These days we're talking about people with confusion, and a lot of our parents... The Alzheimer's epidemic is massive. We are totally unprepared. One in ten of us at sixty-five or over are going to have Alzheimer's. Thirty-two percent of us over eighty are going to have Alzheimer's. The numbers are growing fast. It's dwarfed the AIDS epidemic. But there's a whole human being there.

My Aunt Mimi had Alzheimer's, and I would go to see her, and she couldn't remember who I was. I'd known her all my life. She'd never been married, and I said, "Mimi, you never had a beau? You never had a sweetheart?" This is a woman who was calling me by different names, throwing her dress over her head. And when I asked if maybe she never had a sweetheart, she sat up in her chair like this, folded her arms, and said, "Some questions are too personal to ask."

I really got it. I really respected her, because there's a whole human being there. Even if they can't speak back to us in language we understand and we get confused—that's what happens for us. When we're around other people, we get confused. Other people are confused. But there's always a whole human being there, and we can always hold a mirror to that, to the wholeness in them.

If we're companioning someone who's sick or someone in our family who might be dying, that's the most important thing—just to hold a mirror up to them, to show them. And let their eyes, which are the clearest mirrors I've ever looked into, show you yourself. I've never looked into a mirror that's clearer than the eyes of someone who's dying. They've shown me all my holding and my resistance, all of it. And they also showed me something else—this kind of what I call undying love. That's there too.

But I don't have a fixed... I mean, I'm not romantic about dying. I'm not. It's the hardest work we will ever do. And it's beautiful, and it's horrible, and as Jack said, it's tragic, and it's transformative. But most of all, it's ordinary. It's normal. All of us will go through this. Nobody gets out alive.

We're in the soup together. We're in the boat together. When we really get it, we don't make dying something that happens later. Later gives us this comfortable distance from it. If we really see this is actually in the very nature of my being right now, then I think we're kinder to each other. We don't hold on so tightly to our ideas or notions of ourselves, or our beliefs. We let go. It engenders this kind of kindness and letting go, and an appreciation of one another.

When we know how precarious this life actually is, then we also understand how precious it is. And then we don't want to waste a moment. Then we want to jump in with both feet. Tell the people we love that we love them.

When you talk about Alzheimer's, I remember that story in our dear friend Rachel Remen's first book about a physician whose father had Alzheimer's severely enough that for at least five or six years the man was unable to speak at all. He gradually lost comprehension, and then he lost his language. There were caregivers, and the dad was there. And one morning he was sitting in his chair and he fell off—he was having a heart attack. His heart was in tremendous pain. Being a physician, the son could see that, and he was about to call 911. But the father lifted his head. He hadn't spoken for six years. And he said, "Don't call 911. It's a heart attack. I'm dying. Tell your mother I love her. And I love you." And that's it. And where those words came from—from someone who couldn't speak, whose brain was full of all the tangles of Alzheimer's—because we're not just this body. We are not.

It's interesting with Alzheimer's, because when people have a difficult time articulating their experience, we often think that there's nobody home. We're really identified with our brains. We're not so identified with our spleens. If our spleens don't work, it's okay. But if our brain doesn't work, then we think we're not there. It's just such a small story to live in. Such a small story. We are so much more than that.

And it becomes so clear and evident in the dying process. Ordinary people, regular people who had no spiritual practice in their life, regularly discover in themselves the resources, the compassion, the capacity to meet the impossible in extraordinary ways.

And this is really—I thank you for what you're saying—sort of winding up. It's both the gift of what you've written and of all your life work at Zen Hospice and so forth. And it's also the gift of the practice that we do together, that we share. Whether you use the word mindfulness or not, or use intimacy, as Zen Master Dogen said: to become enlightened is to become intimate with life.

So I want to read you a story in your honor as a way to close, unless there's something else you want to add before I do.

No, go ahead.

No, I mean, I was thinking of other things, but we could do this for days. At some point we have to go home.

A Sufi master known for his open-mindedness died in the fullness of time and found himself outside the gates of heaven. The attending angel said, "Go no further, O mortal, until you have proven your worthiness to enter this paradise." The master responded, "Just a minute. First, can you prove that this is really heaven and not just the wishful fantasy of my disordered mind undergoing death?" Before the angel could reply, a voice from inside the gate shouted, "Let him in—he's one of us."

Yeah, you do have something, okay.

Amongst some Zen monks, there's a tradition that on the day of your death you write a poem—a death poem—that tells maybe the essential truth of your life. And if you don't die that day, it doesn't count. You have to write a new one. But anyway, I was in the hospice one day reading this book of death poems, and there was with me a woman who had lived on the margins of society. She asked me about what I was reading, and I told her. She said, "I want to write one of those." I said, "Okay, good, you should do that." She said, "Well, what's the form?" I said, "Don't worry, just write it." This is a woman we would have passed by on the street.

Some hours later, she called me up to her room. She came upstairs. She said, "Frank, I've written my death poem. And when I die, I want you to pin it to my clothing, and I want to be cremated with it." I said, "Okay, we can do that." And she said, "But I want you to learn it by heart."

She didn't say memorize it. She said, I want you to learn it by heart. And she said, I want to know that it lives in your soul.

I feel so lucky I had these people in my life.

You want to hear her poem?

Don't just stand there with your hair turning gray.
Soon enough the seas will sink your little island.
So while there is still the illusion of time,
set out for some other shore.
No sense packing a bag.
You won't be able to lift it into your boat.
Give away all of your collections.
Take only new seeds and an old stick.
Send out some prayers on the wind before you sail.
Don't be afraid.
Someone knows you're coming.
An extra fish has been salted.

"Don't just stand there with your hair turning gray. Soon enough the seas will sink your little island. So while there is still the illusion of time"—that's a great line—"set out for some other shore." In other words, practice now.

"No sense packing a bag. You won't be able to lift it into your boat." Nobody I was with who was dying ever said, "I wish I'd gotten that second Mercedes."

She said, "Take only new seeds and an old stick." You know that image of farmers or gardeners putting a stick in the ground and then a seed, a stick in the ground and a seed? It means it's not a full stop.

Then she says, "Send out some prayers on the wind before you sail." Don't think you can do this by yourself. Get some help. But don't be afraid. In her view, someone knows you're coming. An extra fish has been salted.

That was her death poem. Her name was Sono, and thank you, Sono. I appreciate you honoring me with that poem. Thank you, my friend.

Well, let's just sit for a minute and let this rest in the heart.

Thank you again for coming. Please feel free to come back, walk the land, do a retreat—anything that nourishes your spirit, quiets your mind, tends your heart. You are now part of this community just by virtue of being here.

And tend each day with love.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 10

Energy to Awaken

Jack Kornfield · 1h01

> In this talk delivered near the summer solstice and on Juneteenth, Jack Kornfield continues his series on Buddha nature and the pāramitās by exploring the quality of wise effort or wise endeavor (sammā vāyāma). He begins by inviting listeners into contemplative presence, noting how we orbit through the vastness of space while often lost in our to-do lists, and honoring the ongoing work of liberation commemorated by Juneteenth.
> Kornfield presents wise effort through several dimensions: the effort to be mindful and present with loving awareness; the effort to prevent unwholesome states from arising and to release them when they do; the cultivation and sustaining of wholesome states like love, generosity, and wisdom; and the balance required in spiritual practice—neither too tight nor too loose, like tuning a lute. He draws on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Suzuki Roshi, and Alan Watts, illustrating how attention can be directed and trained, and how we can choose which mental states to "pick up" and which to leave aside.
> The talk weaves personal stories—from watching Venus transit the sun to encountering a fawn on the Spirit Rock land—with practical guidance on navigating compulsion, addiction, and suffering through self-compassion. Kornfield emphasizes that inner development must match outer development, that our freedom is interconnected with the freedom of all beings, and that we are called to tend both the garden of our hearts and the garden of the world, planting seeds of love wherever we are.

God bless you.

Please let yourself get settled as we begin. Listening to teachings is its own kind of meditation or contemplation. You sit, you listen, and part of the response is not so much to take notes—there's no quiz or grade at the end—but more to listen and see if something resonates as true in your own understanding and experience. It's really a reminder of something that you already know. And if something doesn't seem useful, then simply let it go.

People come to a temple or a meditation center or a sacred place—although in a truer sense every place is sacred—but to the places we create for this purpose: to quiet the mind and listen to or tend the heart, to find some kind of balance or inner peace, or release conflict and stress that we might be carrying, or find some sense of renewal or compassion.

Today seems like a very good day for teachings. First of all, it's just a day or so before the summer solstice, and there's this beautiful glow of light still after eight o'clock, the hillsides illuminated.

A couple of years ago I went to the top of Mount Tamalpais during an afternoon to watch the transit of the planet Venus across the face of the Sun. There were a number of people up there who had big telescopes. One man had a large telescope you could peer into, with all the appropriate filters to make it safe. You look in and there's this enormous glowing orange-yellow disc of the Sun, and it's very lively when you look at it through a big telescope—this glowing fiery thing, quite fantastic. And then for an hour or so, progressing across the face of the Sun was this little black marble, basically, which was the planet Venus. We were seeing the backside, the shadow side of it, as it slowly moved across.

In looking, I could feel not just the planet Venus but somehow ourselves in space, because we're on another one of those little marbles going around in our solar system, this huge, vast, erupting luminous ball of sunlight. And here we are, doing our dance around the sun. For me, it's just about seventy-two years now—seventy-two turns around. It gave a sense of vastness and perspective and mystery. How did this all happen? Usually we're kind of checking off our to-do list, what we have to do tomorrow. But meanwhile, we're on this great ride around the sun, and also in the spiral arm of the Milky Way galaxy—that's a little bit longer, 250 million years or so.

There's something so beautiful about just taking a pause and noticing the turning of the seasons and the changing of the light and having some sense of that which is outside of time.

Aldous Huxley wrote that an idolatrous religion is one in which time is substituted for eternity. Future time, in the idea of endless progress, is the devil's work, demanding human sacrifice on an enormous scale. He's really talking about what it means if we're always living in the doing mode rather than having a sense that we're living in eternity as well—that we live in the reality of the present with a greater sense of mystery and appreciation.

So it's a beautiful time to come to the temple and find some balance. The outer world is now coming to balance of light, and in its way, all the light, then turning toward the equinox, the true balance, and then back to the winter solstice. And we get to be part of this cycling dance.

Today is also Juneteenth. For those who don't know or remember, it is a celebration on June 19th of the last emancipation of slaves in the United States. That happened in Texas about two and a half years after the Emancipation Proclamation. Some of the states that weren't in the Confederacy still had slaves after Lincoln, in theory, freed slaves in other parts of the continental United States. The last proclamation for the freeing of slaves in this country came in Galveston, Texas, when General Gordon Granger announced on June 19th—there were 250,000 slaves in Texas, a quarter of a million people enslaved, just so we don't forget the reality of this—and on that day, in Galveston, he said all who are here are now emancipated and equal as human beings under the law and in our community.

This is celebrated in different parts of the country, and it too is worthy of acknowledging as we come together. Because we also come together seeking in ourselves a kind of freedom. But in fact, as Martin Luther King and others have said, we can't be truly free unless everyone is free. Somehow our freedom is tied up with everyone else's.

What's also true is that the vestiges of slavery persist. In my experience having done some work in our enormous prison system—where we have two and a half to three million people incarcerated and eight million people in the prison industrial system—this is in part a vestige of slavery. Our prisons are in some ways giant poverty and racist poverty prisons. So it's not over, really. May all those who are enslaved be freed, in all kinds of ways.

We come here in the midst of the turning of the seasons, for whatever our personal motivation is—to quiet the mind and the heart, to find some inner freedom. And as Martin Luther King said, the arc of the moral universe may be long, but it bends toward justice.

May it be so.

We go through some very hard times in different ways—politically, economically. But somehow also the goodwill of humanity may bend us in the long run toward greater justice, outwardly and inwardly.

This year, in these monthly Monday night teachings, I'm doing a series of talks on what's called the Buddha nature, or sometimes the paramitas—the innate perfections in human beings and our capacity to manifest and live from our Buddha nature. In the course of previous months, we've talked about generosity, integrity, wisdom, renunciation, these qualities. Each invites a shift of identity from a small sense of self, a sense of separateness—sometimes it's called the body of fear—to open and live from a greater possibility: greater generosity, greater wisdom, greater integrity, greater connection with all things.

And it's both individual, but we can't separate the individual from our interdependence with everyone else and everything else. Here you are paying attention to your breath, the breath that was breathed by other people in the room and by the deer and the raccoon—and I once saw a badger here near the stream. Badger breath. Sounds like a bad ad on television, actually. But it's the same breath that dusted the tops of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it came over the Pacific, and it also dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor. We're all in it together.

And so we also recognize, as I say so often, that the outer developments we have so remarkably surrounded ourselves with—electronics, our smartphones, the internet, computer technology, biotechnology, space technology, nanotechnology—no amount of that will save us from continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing environmental destruction, continuing tribalism, and continuing addiction in our society. It has become, if I read the statistic right, the number one cause of death for adults between ages twenty and fifty: drug overdose. So something is happening that needs tending.

What this tells us is that the inner world of humanity now needs to be developed to match the outer world. We can't rely on outer development to save us in some fundamental way, or to live with love and wisdom in a beneficial way, without also cultivating the inner. And that becomes both a personal endeavor, but it also in some way becomes our collective task.

So tonight, the next step in these teachings on Buddha nature is traditionally called right effort, maybe right endeavor. I try to figure out how to translate this in a way that's meaningful to us in our own lives. We have an innate amount of energy. We have an innate life force. And the question is: How will we use it? How do we direct it?

There are stories—all these ancient stories with these paramitas or teachings. The main story connected with this particular quality of energy and effort is the story of a great ox who could do anything. In agricultural times in India, oxen were considered the most powerful animal that you could tame to do things with. What do you do with the ox of your own life, and its energy?

So, just a little task as we sit here. You don't have to move or anything, but I'd like you to put your attention—as you're listening to me now—shift your attention to the doors on the left that lead outside. You don't even have to turn your head, just sort of your eyes and your attention. Put your attention over that side of the room. Now put your attention back up here. And now, even without looking, put your attention up above, like the space above your body. Now put your attention in your feet. Now put your attention in your hands. Now bring your attention to your heart, to your chest. Notice both the physical sensations and perhaps any feelings that are present.

So what's true is that you can direct your attention. You can put it all over—in your body, outside your body, to physical sensations, to the emotions that are present. We were doing it in our meditation practice as we sat here. And so the question of right effort really is: Where and how will you direct your attention and your energy? What is right effort?

There are several dimensions of it. And as you listen, perhaps something will serve as a reminder for you in your life.

The first dimension of right effort—and I think I'd like to translate it as wise effort—particularly in spiritual life, but it turns out actually in all of life, is simply the effort to be mindful, to be present with loving awareness. From Alan Watts: "The art of living is neither careless drifting on the one hand, nor fearful clinging to the past or anticipation of the future, and consists of being sensitive to each moment, regarding it as utterly new and unique, and having the mind and the heart open and wholly receptive."

So the first and most central training and capacity that we have is actually to be present. I remember teaching with Houston Smith, this wonderful old professor of religion who had been at MIT and wrote that book on world religions that sold millions of copies. He was really elegant—one of the great gentlemen that I ever met.

We were doing a panel at UCLA or some similar grand event, in a great big auditorium. Houston was already in his nineties. He had these enormous hearing aids. And he stood up, a little bit shaky at ninety-two or ninety-three, and said, "Well, I can't see you that well, and I certainly can't hear. My body's a little shaky. But I'm here." And everybody applauded—okay, way to go, Houston!

There was something so touching in that moment. All right, his body may not have been able in the way it once was, or in the way one might wish for, but the disability was not the question. "I'm here," he said, "and I'm really here with you." There was this beautiful sense of what it meant to show up for life however it was.

Suzuki Roshi invited a few great up-and-coming Zen masters from Japan to help him—Katagiri Roshi and Kobun Chino Roshi. They were senseis in those days. Katagiri came but didn't speak English very well. Suzuki Roshi kept saying, "You need to take the dharma seat and give some teachings. You can't just come here." Katagiri protested, "But I can't speak English very well." Suzuki Roshi replied, "It doesn't take a lot of English to teach the dharma. Here, I'll show you."

So they rang the bell and Suzuki Roshi went in, bowed, and took his seat. Everyone gathered for the dharma teachings. He looked out and said, "Today is today. Today is not yesterday. Today is not tomorrow. Today is today." Then he bowed, got down, and said to Katagiri, "Okay, six words, right? There's a dharma teaching for you."

This was really his amplification of that famous teaching: the goal of meditation practice is to keep your beginner's mind. To actually come alive and see with the eyes of children playing on the floor in your room, to watch the fading of the light as you walk in the fields or along the road, to see the people you work with, to tend your garden, to taste the food you eat—to actually be alive where you are and see what's happening around you.

So this is the game, really. The first and most central capacity of your Buddha nature is that it's possible to live in an awake way and not be lost, as much as we usually are, in plans and memories. Plans are useful. Remembering has its place. But we've got it reversed—we live mostly there and not here. The invitation is to live in the reality of the present.

And the gift is that attention can be directed, as you just experienced. It can be steadied. It can be trained. In doing so, there comes an intimacy with life, with the people you're with, with the work you're doing, with the things you care about, with the wondrous nowness of experience.

There also comes a kind of authenticity. When we live in our past and future so much, we're not really connected with ourselves, or with others. But when we become more present, we know more clearly what we feel, what we sense. We find ourselves in a deeper relationship with life instead of living so many moments ahead. We see the colors, taste the textures and flavors of life in all their richness.

You walk out here on the land and smell the bay leaves from all these bay trees. I've walked this land enough to have seen a number of bobcats. One of my favorite memories involves the little path that goes up to a cottage in back. I was walking up to this cottage one day in spring—April or May—after the little fawns were born. I've seen lots of fawns around here. I walked up just a little ways, paying attention. Then all of a sudden, in relatively low grass, right at the edge of the path, there was the body of a little spotted fawn, all curled in on itself.

I thought, well, maybe it died. So I stood very, very still. I couldn't see it breathe. I wondered if it was still alive. Okay, I'll just meditate.

I'll just stay here. And then, all of a sudden, one dark eye opened like that and shut very quickly—like it had seen some monster. Okay, it's in there. So very slowly I crept away and went some considerable distance. I spent about five or ten minutes there, and then I went back to see. Of course, its mom had come and it was gone and it was fine. But it was a beautiful moment. It was like we were there in this stillness between life and birth and death. Okay, I'm here. Oh, whoops, all right, I'll leave you alone.

There's something about being willing to quiet ourselves with one another, with the things that we have to do, with the tending of the world as a whole, that is part of the invitation of mindfulness or loving awareness. It's a different way of being than just being on a kind of inner treadmill. Does it make sense to you? This is why people say, "Okay, I sat." And even though sometimes meditation is pleasant and sometimes it's distracted or not so pleasant, there's something about just quieting ourselves or coming back into center, into presence, that's empowering, that gives us a connection with life.

So that's the first meaning of wise effort—to train your capacity to be present, to develop it, to sense it, and to embody it.

Now the second dimension. In Pali or Sanskrit, the word for mindfulness is sati, but it's sometimes a compound word: sati sampajañña. The second part of the word is sometimes translated as "clear comprehension." I think a more useful translation is "the mindful response." Mindfulness has two different dimensions to it. One is to see what's so—to be connected with the present with clarity and kindness, loving awareness. And the second is the mindful response. What do we do?

In that case with the fawn, I stayed still, then I saw its eye, then I backed away. How do we respond mindfully to the circumstances of our life?

In the traditional descriptions of wise effort, there are four dimensions. One is to prevent unhealthy states—greed, hatred, ignorance, the causes of suffering in our life and others—to do what you can to prevent them from arising in yourself. Pay attention to your life so you see with clarity what it is that brings those states to be, and try to prevent them in whatever way, to live in a way that diminishes greed, hatred, fear, ignorance, confusion. Prevent them.

The second is this: if they do arise—which they will, because we're human beings—when you notice them arising, release them. Let them go. Do not follow them. Just as you can direct your attention to your feet or your hands or the door or your heart, you can direct your energy to either follow certain things or not follow them. We all know this. This becomes part of the inner art that gives you a sense of how to navigate. Instead of the boat without a rudder, it gives you a rudder to steer with in the waters of the stream you're navigating. To release that which is unhealthy.

The next two of these four wise efforts concern doing that which fosters love, that fosters awareness or attention, that fosters wisdom, that fosters generosity—inwardly and in the circumstances of your life. Do those things that foster your well-being and the well-being of others. This points to the inner states, but also to how we act.

And then the fourth: when wholesome states do arise, when you have a sense of love and connection and generosity and well-being, do that which sustains them. Dwell in them. Inhabit them. Invite them in some way to become more the way that you move through the world.

This is possible for us. My teacher Ajahn Chah used to say it's a little bit like being at a mango tree when the season is ripe. You go to the mango tree, maybe even shake the tree, and some mangoes come down. Then you sort through: Is this an old rotten mango, or is this a fresh good mango? It's not that complicated. You take a look at which mango is good. Those go in your basket. These ones, leave aside. To have that capacity of attention to see: this is healthy, this is skillful, this brings benefit. And this one—this is not one I want to pick up.

One of our great philosophers, along with all kinds of other dimensions, was Albert Einstein. He said, "I think the most important question facing humanity is: Is the universe a friendly place? For if we decide that the universe is an unfriendly place, then we will use our technology, our scientific discoveries, and our natural resources to achieve safety and power by creating bigger walls to keep out the unfriendliness and bigger weapons to destroy all that which is unfriendly. But if we decide that the universe is a friendly place, then we will use our technology, our scientific discoveries, and our natural resources to create tools and models of understanding. And because power and safety come together with understanding, we will understand the workings and motives of the universe, and it will be a benefit to all."

Here's Einstein offering us, in a way, a wise way to approach the world—whether it's out of fear, building weapons and building walls, or seeing the possibility of benevolence, seeing the possibility that we can do something beautiful with our human incarnation and our human life.

Whether it's your meditative or spiritual practice, your personal relationships and family, your community, or the globe—how do you direct your life energy? Direct it toward that which is wholesome or healthy. This isn't about judgment, saying you're good or bad. It's just knowing that we contain all these energies. And the first thing, of course, is to recognize it. Okay, here's one I get caught in.

Anger or fear or addiction or anxiety or compulsion—whatever arises in ways that don't feel healthy. Maybe with attention, I don't have to follow that.

I was out walking with Ajahn Chah on alms round, my teacher in the forest monasteries of Thailand. We passed a field, and there was a great big rock, a boulder in the middle of it. He said to us who were with him, "Do you see that boulder over there?" We said yes. He said, "Is it heavy?" We said yes. And he smiled. "Not if you don't pick it up."

That's the game, you know. You're going to see this stuff in your experience, but you don't actually have to pick it up. And if it arises, you can release it.

Here's a story from my book No Time Like the Present. Sandra, a woman I worked with during one of the retreats here, needed a great deal of compassion to face her lifelong demon of binge eating. She described years of struggling with the compulsion and of wandering—she called it wandering like a hungry ghost—with so much self-hatred.

"I believed that food had an unparalleled capacity to bring satisfaction and free me from suffering. Time and again I reached for the food, looking for it to do its magic, only to have it turn on me, to fail me, to bring me untold physical and emotional suffering and shame. I became hypercritical of myself and my situation and then despaired.

"Freedom has come as I've become more mindful of my body and the intense discomfort I was trying to escape from. I started to find that I could recover more quickly and less painfully from bouts of compulsive binging if I could stay even a little bit kind to my body and present with my pain."

This is what loving awareness trains us for—to open our capacity to be present for the measure of pain and sorrow and beauty that we all have.

"If I could stay even a little bit kind to my body and present with my pain, instead of eating even more just to try and avoid the effects of having eaten too much and the remorse of having done it again, I could actually watch myself start down that sad old path. And as the loving awareness grew, I realized, oh, I don't have to do this. And self-compassion would grow. I'm deeply grateful for the compassion that has rescued me from the realm of the hungry ghosts."

There's something very tender in listening to that, because you can feel her suffering and also the wisdom in it—that this is what's possible for us in each of our own lives and in our own dimensions.

We can let things go.

I think about a story Sylvia Boorstein told. She and Seymour had a little house in southern France where she would go for quite a long time. They decided they needed to change the bed they had, needed a new bed. So they went to the local town and saw this beautiful antique bed, but it had to be fixed in some special way and the mattress refitted. They arranged to buy it. First of all, it didn't come on time. Then when it finally came, the mattress didn't fit right, and the woman charged them considerably more to fix it and make it right.

Sylvia said, "I started to get really upset and angry with her because she wasn't doing what she said and was charging more. But I didn't know what to do with it, so I decided I would go and tell her how I felt." She went in to see Madame Verdon and thanked her for the beautiful bed, but said she was upset because of the way it had gone—charging extra money, not doing it right, not doing what she'd promised. "It caused the arising of mauvaise émotion," she explained, "of bad feelings."

Madame Verdon's response was to look at her and say, "Oh, these mauvaise émotions—they are not good for you. You should let them go."

Nothing about the money, mind you. "They're bad for you. You should let them go."

Here's a poem from an eight-year-old: "I want to tell the fish, eat only the bait, not the hook. When you eat the bait, start from the edge and slowly gnaw bit by bit. Never, ever gobble it in one go."

There's your meditation instructions.

You can pay attention and reflect in yourself: What fosters well-being for you?

What fosters love for you? What fosters a sense of well-being? What fosters generosity? What fosters some centeredness and calm? Is it sitting in meditation? Or walking in nature? Maybe it's some kinds of reading that you do, or community. Maybe it's hanging out with children. Maybe it's avoiding children—I don't know. Maybe it's quieting yourself. Or maybe it's taking action about things that you care about, so that you actually don't foster well-being until you stand up for something that matters. That may be what brings this kind of energy of life and presence alive for you and brings a greater clarity. But these kinds of reflections in yourself—what turns you toward well-being and health—are part of these teachings.

So wise effort, wise endeavor: the effort to be mindful, to bring loving awareness to this world. The effort, as you do, to not only notice what's here—mindfulness—but also to respond to it in a way that fosters that which is healthy, and to let go of that which isn't, personally and in your relation to others.

Two more dimensions. Wise effort asks for a kind of steadiness or willingness. And if you want to integrate your meditation or your spiritual ideas and perspective into your life, it's not that easy—because we have gain and loss and praise and blame, and painful days and pleasant experiences. It goes back and forth, joy and sorrow. Everybody has this, right? So you say, all right, I want my life to be this beautiful, happy thing. It doesn't work that way. That's not human incarnation. Human incarnation has ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows.

So what's asked of you in this dimension of wise endeavor or wise effort is to say, yes, this is the place I will practice. To be willing to turn toward your experience, whatever it is, and say, this is the place of practice.

Frank O'Connor, the Irish author, tells in one of his books how, as a boy, he and his friends would make their way adventuring across the Irish countryside. When they came to an orchard wall that seemed too high and too doubtful to climb over, too difficult to permit their voyage to continue, they would take off their hats and toss them over the wall. And then they had no choice but to follow them.

There's something in that spirit of adventure—to say, all right, things are this way, sometimes very painful, sometimes beautiful. Let's see what comes next. Let's open ourselves. Let's see how we can work with this, how we can respond to what's here. Because you don't actually know where you are. Even looking at that little marbled black, beautiful round black, perfect circle move across the face of the sun—we don't really know where we are. We're somehow in the midst of the universe unfolding.

Zen Master Dogen said to meditate is like being on a boat on the ocean, where you can't actually see the shore. What you have is where you are. This is where we are.

And so you come into the present and you notice what's skillful and healthy and foster that, and what's unhealthy you let go. But you stay steady with it and you say, all right, let's see then what happens. You experiment, you explore—let's see what happens next.

With this, you start to understand that mindfulness or loving awareness—and it's in the very first teachings in the Buddhist texts on mindfulness—is developed inwardly and it's developed outwardly. And then finally it's developed inwardly and outwardly together, so that the two really can't be separated. You attend to your own inner freedom and you attend to the freedom of others. You attend to your own well-being and you tend to the well-being of others.

I was recently at a conference with Elissa Epel. She works as a scientist in a lab with Liz Blackburn at UC here in the city. Elizabeth Blackburn won the Nobel Prize for her discovery of telomeres, the little caps on the end of chromosomes that protect chromosomes—and when they get frayed or reduced, they reduce your life expectancy and so forth.

And Elissa has done some fascinating research. One of the most striking findings was a study showing that for people who had meditated for some weeks—not a huge long time—the frayed telomeres actually got better, extending themselves. So you're going to live longer, right? There is that benefit if you practice, though I know that doesn't matter to you.

But here's what was more remarkable, and I really want to read the full analysis of the study. They began to discover that the telomeres were affected not just by what you did for yourself, but by the community and place around you.

And here's the truly wild part. If you were in a community where there is a great deal of disparity between rich and poor, the people who are poor—who generally have a lot of stress, wondering how they'll pay the bills, how they'll feed their kids—their telomeres were shorter and frayed. Stress, pretty straightforward. But the people who lived in that same community, even in a gated community separated from those in poverty, their telomeres were also frayed and shorter.

It's as if your cells are listening and connected to one another. Isn't that interesting? We know interdependence, but now, with sophisticated science, we're seeing new levels of it.

So steadiness, or willingness, means saying: all right, I'm going to tend inward and outward and make this life that I have—whatever comes with it—a place where I bring attention and loving awareness, a place where I cultivate that which is beneficial. Rather than just measuring success and failure, whatever comes becomes a place for practice.

And it can be tough.

Since today is Juneteenth, I thought I would read something fitting in honor of it. I found this children's book while looking through a bookstore. It's called Extraordinary People. I thought it was funny because the central person in the middle of the picture is Evel Knievel, the daredevil. Next to him is Marie Curie, and on the other side is Bruce Lee. I said, okay, this is a pretty interesting book. When I started to flip through, I found a whole bunch of people I'd never heard of, or maybe just vaguely heard of.

The one I want to read represents this quality of steadiness, of willingness to tend both inner and outer. Her nickname was Stagecoach Mary.

Born in Hickman County, Tennessee. Died in Montana in 1914. Stagecoach Mary—six foot tall, 200 pounds. Mary smoked cigars, packed a pistol, kept a jug of whiskey at her side, and made certain the mail got delivered. She was the first African American woman to be employed as a mail carrier in the United States, and only the second woman to work for the US Postal Service—a job she took on at age sixty.

She was born a slave, grew up as an orphan, and after emancipation, she was taken under the wing of an Ohio nun named Mother Amadeus. When Mother Amadeus suddenly got sick, Mary nursed her back to health. She also took it upon herself to protect all the nuns in the convent with a gun strapped under her apron. Of course, this sort of toughness, while it may have been appreciated, doesn't necessarily fit in a nunnery in the long term, and ultimately she was dismissed from her duties.

But the nuns felt bad, so they provided her with enough money to start her own business. Mary opened a café, but because she was kind and generous, she gave food to everyone who stepped in, and her business didn't do very well—ran into the ground several times. Eventually she closed down the café and began working a mail delivery job. She and her mule, Moses, never missed a day of work for a decade. Even if it was snowing and the wagon was frozen in its tracks, Mary would make the deliveries on foot, carrying the sacks of mail on her shoulders.

Cascade, Montana loves Stagecoach Mary, and every year on her birthday, the town closes its schools to celebrate.

So there's a little bit of right effort, of willingness. But we have it in us. You each do, in your own way. And what's possible is to remember that you carry this capacity to direct your attention and to direct your energy. And it's not like some little battery that's going to run out. Love doesn't run out. When you open the channel, you get more love. Attention doesn't run out. When you bring more attention, attention grows. You become a channel for something that's already a part of you.

Steadiness and willingness to be here for the ten thousand joys and sorrows.

And then the last dimension is balance.

The traditional metaphor, which most everyone has heard in the Buddhist texts, comes from the Buddha himself: in your spiritual practice, in your meditation, in your meditative life, wise energy and wise effort is like tuning the strings of a lute or guitar. You don't want it too tight and you don't want it too loose. You want to tune it in a way that brings harmony.

This is something we need to learn, and we experiment with it—like riding a bicycle in some way. And again, my teacher Ajahn Chah would sometimes teach in what seemed like contradictory ways, telling one person to do this, then telling somebody else to do something entirely different.

When I asked him about it, I said, "Wait, you contradict yourself." He just laughed. He said, "This is how I teach." He said, "There's a beautiful road to go down, and I know it well. But I look down and I see that somebody's walking and they're about to fall in the ditch on the right-hand side, or get lost in some little sidetrack. So I say, 'Hey, go to the left a little bit.' And then you see that same person, or another, about to fall in a ditch on the left-hand side, or get off on a little sidetrack. And I say, 'Hey, now go to the right a little bit.'" And he said, "That's really all I do—I try to bring them back to where they are and not get lost."

This takes a kind of attentiveness to our lives, to see with loving awareness what is the right way to marshal our energy and to use it wisely. What is a mindful response? And of course, as Martha Graham says, you are unique in the whole vast universe. There has never been—in galaxies and hundreds of millions of galaxies—there's never been anybody as weird as you. This is it. So either you're going to do it or not, but this is what you've got. You might as well flaunt it, because this is your life.

Sometimes what's needed in balance is to be tough. In education, you know, there are these different fads. Grit is fashionable now, right? Teaching children grit, among other things. There's a lot children can learn from being tough.

It used to be that in the Zen tradition, if you wanted to practice in a Zen temple in Japan, you had to go and sit tangaryo first. They didn't let you just knock on the door and say, "I want to come and do a retreat," like Spirit Rock where you just sign up online and pay your money. No. You had to go and sit outside the gate and show that you were sincere. And to show that you were sincere meant often you would go in the winter and sit in the snow, sit outside the gate all day and not move. Somebody would kind of open the gate a little and say, "We got one sitting out there, let's see how long they last." And after two or three or four days of sitting in the snow and not moving, you come back the next morning—"Okay, I'm ready"—and go through it again. They'd say, "I think we got a live one. All right, open the gate, we'll let him in and see if they're any good."

There's something in the training, and you all know it, that asks a kind of strength and courage in you. There are times in life when this will be demanded of you. Sometimes it's some great endeavor that you really have to throw yourself into—you started an enterprise, or a school, or a business, or a family. "Okay, we have twins." Ha! Now you don't have to go sit in front of the gate of the Zen temple. You have two live-in Zen masters. You just gave birth. All right, that's your training.

But also I think of the times when people have come up to me and said, "My child has a very serious cancer," or "My child has died." And then, all right, what do you do with that as a spiritual practice? Because it's one of the great sufferings, one of the greatest sufferings to be visited upon us, to lose a beloved child. And yet you have to go on living. You carry it. You can't say, "I'll get over it." You don't get over it. You take it and it cracks your heart and it changes you as a person. And then you have to live with that fire. It becomes part of who you are. And maybe the spirit of that child says, "All right, dad or mom, now you really have to live, because I'm not here to live it. You've got to live my part too."

So there's a toughness that's asked of us. You will have it come upon you, and at times that is what's needed.

But sometimes what we need in order to really be present for this mysterious life is much more delicate. We need to stop and pause and listen more deeply, slow down.

This is a poem about approaching things in a more tender way:

Think of those Chinese monks' tales, years of struggling in the zendo and then the clink while sweeping up of one stone on another and enlightenment like that.

Emily Dickinson's wisdom: truth in circuit lies, in circles. Or see Grant's book, Common Birds and How to Know Them, New York, Scribner's, 1901. And here's the instruction: "The approach must be by detour. Advantage taken of rock, tree, mound, and brush. But if without success this way, use artifice. Throw off all stealth appearance, watchfulness. Look guileless, a loiterer, purposeless. Stroll on, not looking directly toward the bird, avoiding any gaze too steadfast. Or failing still in this, give voice to sundry whistles and chirps—your quarry may stay to answer."

More briefly: try, but stymied, give it up. Do something else. Leave the untrappable thought. Go walking. Ideas buzz the air like flies. Return to work. And when you get quiet, outside the window the cream-dipped tail and red fire legs, doused with watery brown, emerges from the wood's dark margin, stopping all your thoughts—and briefly squats. Not fox, but vixen. And then moves along, out of sight.

Enlightenment, wrote one master, is an accident, though certain efforts make you accident-prone. Take your time.

And so there's something also about delicacy—in your own life and in your attending of one another. No one can tell you, any more than with riding a bicycle, how to come back to balance. This is another part of loving awareness: to listen in this way.

Laurie Anderson—poet, performance artist, musician—writes:

"In the Tibetan map of the world, the world is a circle. And at the center there's an enormous mountain guarded by four gates. And when they draw a map of the world, they draw the map in sand. And it takes months. And then when the map is finished, they say some prayers and erase it and throw the sand into the nearest river.

Last fall, the Dalai Lama came to New York City to do a two-week ceremony called the Kalachakra, which is a prayer to heal the earth. And woven into these prayers were a series of vows that he asked us to take. And before I knew it, I'd taken a vow to be kind for the rest of my life. And I walked out of there and I thought, for the rest of my life? What have I done? This is a disaster.

And I was really worried. Had I promised too much? Not enough? I was really in a panic. They had come from Tibet for the ceremony and they were walking around Midtown in their new brown shoes, and I went up to one of the monks and said, can you come with me to have a cappuccino right now and talk?

And so we went to this little Italian place. He'd never had coffee before, so he kept talking faster and faster. And I kept saying, look, I don't know whether I promised too much or too little—can you help me please?

And he was really being practical. He said, look, don't limit yourself. Don't be so strict. Open it up. He said, the mind is a wild white horse. And when you make a corral for it, make sure it's not too small. And another thing: when your house burns down, just walk away. And another thing: keep your eyes open. And one more thing: keep going."

Because it's time to go home.

So here we are. We don't quite know where we are on the boat in the ocean, and we're on this little marble going around our beautiful star. But we do know some things. In Zen they say there are only two things: you sit, and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is. You quiet the mind and tend the heart, and then you get up.

And the garden is the garden of your life, the garden of the world. You plant seeds wherever you are, in whatever your situation. You plant seeds of love, of compassion, of care for yourself and others. You stretch your arm out and mend the part of the world that you can touch. Because you can't mend the whole world, but you can mend some part of it.

There's a beautiful account of Alan Chadwick at the University of Santa Cruz, who was one of the pioneers of biodynamic gardening and all kinds of amazing things. Chadwick took his class in the 1970s looking for a place to do a garden, and went and found a junkyard lot filled with rusted-out cars, broken glass, chunks of cement, sand, abandoned trash. He asked the owner if his class could use the lot for an experiment to grow flowers and vegetables. And the owner said, sure, but you're crazy—that soil is dead.

And so the students put months into revitalizing the soil. This garden has now become famous for its extraordinary delicious vegetables and gorgeous flowers. And in the same way, you can both tend the garden of your heart and of your life, and you can plant beautiful seeds. That's what's given to you.

This is really the gift of wise endeavor, wise effort. To step out of the body of fear, the small sense of self—those fearful thoughts will come—and rest in something bigger, in the sense of your connection with the vastness and with the people you meet and the work you do. Whether it's a business you're starting, whether it's the raising of a child, whether it's a spiritual endeavor, whether it's an artistic endeavor—what moves through the stars moves through you. This is what's given to you. And the qualities of the Buddha can awaken in you.

As it says: one hand on the beauty of the world and one hand on the suffering of all beings, two feet grounded in the present moment. And then as you walk through the world, plant those seeds that bring beauty where you are, inwardly and outwardly.

You've been given the energy of the stars, this life energy, and you have the capacity to do all kinds of things with it. May you use this energy to plant beautiful seeds, to work for justice, to plant seeds of love, to care for yourself and those around you and this earth, each in your own way. And may you use your meditation, your spiritual practices, as a way to cultivate and remind you and open your heart and your being to this possibility.

Now in Texas on Juneteenth they have a lot of parties. So feel free—even in California we can celebrate emancipation. Thank you so much for coming. Enjoy this beautiful almost-summer-solstice evening. And see you again, perhaps. Good night.

CHAPTER 11

Monday Night Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 35 min

> In this welcoming Monday night sitting at Spirit Rock Center, Jack Kornfield offers an accessible introduction to meditation practice rooted in mindfulness and loving awareness. He guides practitioners through a 30-35 minute sitting, beginning with establishing a dignified yet relaxed posture and bringing attention to the present moment experience of body, mind, and heart.
> The meditation instruction focuses on using the breath as an anchor—feeling it at the nostrils, throat, chest, or belly—while allowing thoughts, emotions, and sensations to rise and fall like waves around this central point of awareness. Kornfield teaches the traditional practice of mental noting: when a strong experience captures attention away from the breath, one turns to welcome it with a gentle label such as "planning," "remembering," "sadness," or "excitement," feeling how it moves through body and mind before returning to the breath.
> Throughout the guidance, Kornfield emphasizes receiving all experience with compassion and kindness, describing this quality as "loving awareness." He offers the image of training attention like training a puppy—with patience and gentleness rather than harshness. This talk exemplifies Spirit Rock's commitment to making the Dharma accessible to all, regardless of background or experience level, while honoring the twin principles of compassion and inner freedom that form the essence of Buddhist spiritual teachings.

Good evening.

It's a pleasure to welcome you here to this Monday night sitting group at Spirit Rock Center. If we've not met before, my name is Jack Kornfield.

How many of you are here at Spirit Rock for the first time? Oh, wonderful. Welcome. And if you happen to see a hand go up next to you or near you and you've been here for a while, at the break, just introduce yourself. Say hello to that person or welcome them here. Thank you.

Monday Night Sitting Group has been ongoing now for thirty-two, thirty-three years. Spirit Rock has grown over the course of this time in this beautiful valley that we received from the Nature Conservancy, through the care of a whole community committed to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness—or inner freedom of heart—which are the essence of Buddhist spiritual teachings, but really are part of all wise spiritual life.

We have all kinds of classes and retreats and programs: for educators, for healthcare professionals, family program teachings for parenting as a spiritual practice, informed citizenship as a spiritual practice, and retreats of three days, a week, a month. Whatever brings you here, it's really a pleasure to welcome you. We open our gates to everyone—whatever your orientation, your sexual orientation, whatever your class or color or race or background. The Dharma gates open and say: you are welcome here.

Monday night has served as a gateway, an introduction for many people to Spirit Rock Center and to the teachings we have here. What we do on Mondays is really pretty simple. We sit for thirty to thirty-five minutes in meditation with a little bit of guidance and a lot of silence. Then after the sitting, we take a break of ten to fifteen minutes to stretch or relax, usually followed by a talk, as it will be this evening—some teaching, sometimes dialogue or questions and answers.

I've been teaching one Monday a month at this point. Not quite retired, but taking time to do some other things and not doing it weekly as I had for such a long time. So when I get to come back on Mondays and be with everybody, it's actually kind of fun and wonderful. I'm glad to see you.

Whatever brought you here, again, welcome. The invitation is to find your own way to quiet the mind, tend the heart, and listen in some deep way.

Let us begin with a period of meditation.

Let yourself find a way to sit that's both comfortable and alert. If you're in a chair, you might let your feet be flat on the floor, sitting upright so there's some sense of dignity and presence, but also a graciousness and ease. If you're on a cushion on the floor or a bench, find a way to sit where your body is stable and comfortable.

When you feel present in this way—comfortable and stable—allow your eyes to close gently for this time. First, bring your attention to the quality of presence with your own body, mind, and heart. Notice: here you are, alive, sitting halfway between heaven and earth in this human form, taking your seat. There will be the state of your body, the moods and feelings that are present, the thoughts that come through. Notice that you can begin to be aware of just what is here and now.

Let this sense of awareness—of mindful awareness or loving awareness, we'll call it—attend to your experience as you begin to sit.

What you often notice as you start to pay attention is that the mind is easily distracted. After a few seconds or a little bit of time being present, the attention goes off into thinking or planning or remembering, or goes to other sounds and sensations. So to help deepen the quality of presence underneath the waves of thoughts and plans and memories, become aware of the wave of the breath, how the body is breathing itself.

Feel the breath as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, coolness at the upper lip—or the rise and fall of chest or belly, or the whole body breathing. If it's at all difficult to sense the breath, take one hand and put it on your belly and feel the rise and fall of belly in the palm of your hand. You can just leave it there for quite a while.

As you rest in the present, feel each breath as it comes and goes. Let the attention to breathing, with some ease and calming, invite the body and mind to come together just here. Let the thoughts and feelings and sounds rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath.

After just a minute or two, you'll notice that while you attend to the breath for a short time, one of the waves becomes so strong it pulls your attention from the breath, and you find yourself planning or remembering. Or there arises sadness or excitement or some other emotion or strong sensation that carries you away from the breath.

When the waves stay in the background, just feel this breath, each breath as it comes and goes. But when a wave becomes strong and captures the attention, let go of the breathing and turn as if to welcome it with a bow. You can name it gently: "Oh, planning," or "remembering," or "sadness," or "excitement," or "longing." As you name it —"sad, sad" or "excited, excited" or "planning"—feel that wave move through your body and mind.

When it has passed, or you're at ease with it, return back to feel the breath again for a time. Rest just here in the present moment, with this breath.

...or this strong wave of experience, naming it gently.

And remember to keep the heart tender, to receive all that arises with a spirit of compassion and kindness. This breath, or this moment's experience—receive it with loving awareness.

Come back to the breath when you can, quite gently, like training the puppy: sit, stay. Feel how the body breathes itself in its own rhythms. And with each breath, a sense of inviting ease and calm to grow.

Whatever is present, feel how the breath breathes itself in the midst of it all, and relax into the breathing. Rest in it with a sense of growing ease, calm.

CHAPTER 12

The Garden of the Heart

Jack Kornfield · 59 min

> In this heartfelt talk, Jack Kornfield draws upon the imagery of spring to present meditation and spiritual practice as the cultivation of an inner garden. He shares a teaching story from the early Buddhist texts where the Buddha describes his practice to a skeptical Brahmin farmer: "Trust or faith is the seed. Compassion, the rain. Wakefulness is my plow and yoke... wise effort is my oxen drawing the plow steadily toward freedom of heart."
> Kornfield weaves together the teachings of Thích Nhất Hạnh on storehouse consciousness and the seeds we water, with contemporary examples of transformation—including Father Greg Boyle's work with gang members at Homeboy Industries and Kathy Sneed's prison garden project. He addresses both sudden and gradual awakening, noting how we've all touched moments of transcendence, whether in nature, in sacred spaces, or at life's thresholds of birth and death.
> The practical teaching is clear: we cannot create a perfect garden, nor should we try. Rather, we take our "perfectly human circumstance"—with all its tension, emotion, and difficulty—and use it as the very ground for wakefulness. The obstacles that arise in meditation and life are not failures but the essential work of tending. As Kornfield reminds us through Suzuki Roshi's words: "You're perfect just as you are. And there is still room for improvement." This talk invites us to choose the seeds we plant consciously and to water the beauty not only in ourselves but in all those around us.

Please let yourself get settled in a way that's comfortable and listen. Listening to teachings is a kind of reflection or a meditation practice. There's no quiz at the end, no exam—you've already passed. Rather, you let yourself listen and sense what's true in your own heart, what resonates for you, what reminds you of something of value. And the other things that don't resonate, just let them go by, or put them on the shelf, or whatever you do with them. You take it in as a kind of practice. And the practice is really the practice of a deeper listening—not just to these words or teachings, but looking into your own heart and your own mind. So sit comfortably.

This evening, especially since the signs of spring are here—in California, the plum blossoms are out in many places. And although we need rain, please, whoever's up there, the rain gods—the sense of spring, which comes early in California, is a really beautiful one. You can see the light turning. And so I want to talk about our practice of mindfulness, compassion, meditation, these things, as a gardening practice, as a gardening of the heart.

This has been a difficult week in the news. There have been a lot of them, but this is one of them, with the school shooting, with the failure to solve any of the problems of immigration for the Dreamers or other people. And as most of you are aware, this is President's Day. I think about going to the Lincoln Memorial, which is one of my favorite places in Washington, and it calls itself a temple. It says, "In this great temple are the words and the memory of this man." It's like a Greek temple. And there, carved in the stone, are the words after the Civil War, which was such a horrendous trauma for the entire country: "With malice toward none and charity toward all." That is presidential leadership. That is an expression of what it means to bring people together. Like Emma Lazarus on the Statue of Liberty: "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

There is in our history—and I feel it in our bones, in our consciousness—the understanding of what wise leadership looks like. And sometimes we get it, and sometimes we don't, and often it's kind of mixed. I'm not going to presume the politics of everyone in this room. People have all different kinds of political views. But what I do know is that amidst gun violence, amidst continuing warfare and racism and the kind of sufferings that we see in the world, there are also, even during the course of this evening talk, a billion acts of kindness that don't get featured in the news.

I remember when I was doing some peace work in Palestine and Israel some years ago, what struck me was how many groups there were. I met with a number of them: the Gandhian peace group, a nonviolent peace group that was growing in Palestine, the Former Combatants for Peace, the Bereaved Mothers, the Sulha that was bringing together teenagers from Palestine and Israel. There were hundreds of amazing groups doing things that you never hear about. All you hear about is if somebody throws a hand grenade or some terrorist attack or someone getting shot. The news is kind of a race to the bottom of the brain stem, basically. Let's try and scare people, and then they'll be frightened and they'll vote for us. It's more or less how politics seems to work.

But it's not what President's Day celebrates. I think we have it combining Lincoln and Washington—from my childhood, we used to have separate President's Days, remember. It is really a celebration of human possibility. And for us, no matter what happens outside, that is what we have to carry as a vision and a possibility in our hearts.

Now here's the paradox. As human beings, we are made of stars and we're made of mud. And we carry all of these possibilities within us. Zen Master Suzuki Roshi said, "You're perfect just as you are. And there is still room for improvement." Right? Part of what we need to understand is how to cherish ourselves and how to be real with ourselves and life as it is. And at the same time, also understand in this paradoxical way that there are still greater possibilities for each of us and for the collective—of compassion, connection, understanding, and so forth. And we all know this.

In Buddhist language, there's talk of sudden and gradual enlightenment. Perhaps we'll get to enlightenment tonight. Perhaps we won't. But let's just call it sudden and gradual awakening. And we've all had it, actually—walking in the mountains, or entering a great cathedral, or hearing an extraordinary piece of music, or making love, or being with someone as they're giving birth, or giving birth yourself, that mystery. Or sitting at the bedside of someone as they die, and the spirit leaves the body, and the gates between the worlds open up and you wonder: What is this human incarnation that lasts for a time and then is gone, just like that? Or you're standing by the Grand Canyon, or you've taken some sacred medicine. There are a hundred ways that we've touched this—where we step out of the small sense of self, what's called the body of fear, the separateness, and feel ourselves truthfully to be part of something so much greater, which is the energy that gave life to us and is the turning of the galaxies and the stars, because that's what we are. We come from this.

And yes, we have to tend this separateness. As Ram Dass likes to say, you have to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number. There's some kind of paradox that you have to work with. But there's also a timeless reality, the ever-present eternal in which we live. And the question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity. What does it mean to live in mystery rather than just have your list and check off the to-do things—things you have to shop and buy or complete or turn in or send or get? Those are all fine things. But if that's all that makes up our life, something profound is missing, something that nourishes us.

So we all know this somehow. And in some way, entering a spiritual practice of meditation and mindfulness, loving-kindness, compassion practice—these are really gateways to open us to that which is bigger than ourselves. Our connection with all life, our sense of that mystery that we can rest in, of that which is timeless.

It's a beautiful thing to watch when I go up to visit the two-month retreat, or even a week-long or ten-day retreat—people get younger. We talk about it as the Vipassana facelift. By the end of ten days or so, people come in and they're tired and haggard. They did a lot in order to make their week or ten days free. And then you start to see their brows clear and their eyes grow brighter. They're walking around and they take time to look at the flowers and smell the spring air. It's as if their vitality and their beauty and their youth starts to shine again, because they've stopped and slowed down and tended themselves with loving awareness, their own body and breath. And in doing so, they've opened themselves to these other dimensions, which is what we are. Anything important or good that we do has to be connected with what we are. You could call it love or mystery or consciousness, interbeing. It's a beautiful thing.

And so when we come and sit in meditation, it isn't so much to have a good meditation, because you get everything in there. That's what happens. You sit down and you get your own mind. As I like to joke, borrowing from my friend Anne Lamott, she says, "My mind is like a bad neighborhood. I try not to go there alone." So you come with other people, right? You get it all. But the point isn't the particular experience. The point is to get bigger than being caught in those things that come—your fears and longings and hopes and all of those things—so that you become the witnessing of it, the place of loving awareness, of compassion that says, "Yes, this, and even more." You open yourself so that you can live with love for yourself and others. Because in the end, what matters?

So there's the sudden awakening. But the other image that's used is gradual awakening. And here you sit, and there's the monkey mind. Some of you may have noticed that, or the tension in your body, or all the stories that get told, or all those other kinds of things that arise. And the question is, here we are in this human incarnation—I don't know how you got in there, but you're here—and you're sitting here with it. How do you respond to all this stuff?

A story from the early days of the Buddha's teaching: He went out with his alms bowl and approached an area owned by a wealthy Brahmin that was being plowed in the spring plowing. The wealthy Brahmin was distributing food to all the workers. When he saw the Buddha come with his alms bowl, he said, "Ah, monk, I plow and sow and work, and having plowed and sown, then I eat. Why don't you likewise plow and sow, and having plowed and sowed, eat?" He was challenging him—like, come on, you're a mendicant, get with the program and do something worthwhile.

And the Buddha says, I also, Brahman, plow and sow, and having done so, I eat. And the Brahman says, you claim yourself a plowman, but I see no plow. Tell me, what kind of plowing is it you do?

And the Buddha replies: Trust or faith is the seed. Compassion, the rain. Wakefulness is my plow and yoke. Conscience, my guide. And my mind is the harness. Clarity is the plow blade, and well-guarded in action and speech, I use truth to weed and cultivate release. Wise effort is my oxen, drawing the plow steadily toward freedom of heart—that which can never be regretted.

He offers this little poem in response. And this bears the fruit of liberation. Then the Brahman says, "Ah, then let the venerable monk eat. You are indeed a plowman." Somehow he convinces him.

Now there's an interesting end to this story, because the Brahmin takes a pitcher of milk rice to pour into the alms bowl of the Buddha. And as it pours into the bowl, it hisses with steam and won't stay in the bowl. Of course these stories are both literal stories and metaphors—they're mythological stories. And so you can listen to them in a different way. Why would it hiss and steam? If any of you have ever had the joy of being in a field that's been plowed and touching the plow blade after it's cut a long furrow through the earth, you know it gets very hot. The iron gets really hot. So here's the Buddha's alms bowl. You want to give me something? Let me show you something. Pour in the milk rice. The plow is still hot from the inner work that I've done.

That's the story. And it's a beautiful one because, following Suzuki Roshi—yes, you're perfect the way you are and there's still room for improvement—it really speaks about the seeds that we plant. Having tended them with wise effort as the oxen and the rain of compassion, beautiful fruit will come: the fruit of freedom of heart, the fruit of well-being.

This is Thich Nhat Hanh's way of describing it. Your mind is like a piece of earth planted with many different kinds of seeds. Sometimes he talks about it as storehouse consciousness, with all the different possibilities, the archetypal seeds within it. In this piece of earth with different seeds, there are seeds of joy, of peace, of mindfulness, understanding, and love. There are seeds of craving, of anger, of fear, hate, and forgetfulness. The healthy seeds and the unhealthy seeds are always there, sleeping in the soil of your mind and heart. The quality of your life depends on the seeds that you water. If you plant tomato seeds in your garden, tomatoes will grow. Just so, if you water a seed of peace in your heart and mind, peace will grow. When the seeds of happiness in you are watered, you become happy. When the seed of anger is watered, you become angry. The seeds that are watered frequently are those that will grow strong.

This is really an instruction that's gone down now for 2,600 years, from the Buddha's image to the teaching of Thich Nhat Hanh—what it means to begin to tend the garden of our own heart and our own life. Because nobody else can tend it for you, as you've probably noticed. They try online, but it just doesn't work.

Now what happens when you tend the garden of the heart—when you look into what seeds you are watering, what you are planting—is that as you begin to practice what's called appamada, or presence, not being lost, when you become more present, first of all, things start to change in a beautiful way. Modern neuroscience talks about how even in six or eight weeks of training the mind in meditation and the heart, there are measurable changes in the telomeres at the caps on the ends of chromosomes, epigenetic changes, changes in brain structure, and so forth.

But basically what happens is that you become present for your experience and you relate to it in a different way. You don't just get lost in it. When anger comes, you don't just water the anger and get lost in it. When longing comes, you don't just follow that story. Instead, there grows a capacity for spaciousness and perspective and some peacefulness.

You begin to water the seeds of peace and presence and mindfulness as you do, step by step.

And step by step, in this part of the teaching—the gradual teaching—is the game.

My beloved friend and teacher, Maha Ghosananda, who was the Gandhi of Cambodia, was nominated for the Nobel Prize a whole number of different times. Even though he was a scholar who spoke fifteen languages, after the Cambodian Khmer Rouge genocide, he led peace marches—peace walks really—from all the refugee camps on the Thai border, which held hundreds of thousands, maybe a million people. He said, "You can't go back to your villages where the temples were burned and all the intellectuals were killed and almost a quarter of the population died. You can't go back unless you reclaim the land with your own love and your heart."

And so he would lead streams of a thousand people in a bus or the back of a truck, with someone beating a drum and someone ringing a bell, singing the chant of loving-kindness: "Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law." And they would recite it over and over and walk back to their villages, reclaiming the land through killing fields, until they felt that they could again plant the seeds of love in ground that had grown so barren.

This is the game—to make our life beautiful. You set a direction. You set the intention of your heart, which is the seeds of compassion, of wakefulness, of being present, of mindfulness. You plant those seeds, and then those seeds have a certain power to grow if you dedicate yourself to them.

But the other thing that happens—and anyone who's ever gardened knows this—is that obstacles will arise. You know how it works, right? There are insects, there is drought, there are weeds that try to take it over. There's compacted soil with no aeration. I don't need to take you by the hand to the local nursery, but they would read you the litany of things you have to tend to make the garden really blossom and bloom.

And this is true in any enterprise we undertake. You know it in parenting, in love relations, in business. You plant this seed—you say, "I'm going to start a business." Let's say your business is your garden. And then you hit the obstacles. Not enough capital. A key employee quits. The market changes. Interest rates rise. Competition becomes stiffer. The supplier gets bought up. All this stuff happens. Anybody who's a business person knows this. You set your direction, you plant your seeds, and then you tend the obstacles, and you keep going.

In parenting, first they just want to put everything in their mouth, right? And hit each other with blocks. And then they fall off their bicycles and have injuries. And then you have to socialize them to play with each other. And then they have to go through middle school. Oh my God. There's puberty and teenage angst and then sexuality and cars and alcohol and drugs and independence. It's rough, right? For everybody. It's also totally wonderful—I just couldn't be happier being a parent. And yet, there's obstacles.

Social change—the same kind of thing. You look around and you say, this is crazy. We're solving our world problems with war. In kindergarten, when kids hit each other with blocks, you say, "Use your words," right? Why couldn't that go up a little bit to the adult level? And there's racism, which is insane. Let's see, what color are you? You're brown, you're pink—I mean, give me a break.

It makes no sense. There are children starving today while grain elevators overflow with more food than we know what to do with. And it's not complicated—just ten percent of what we spend globally on military weapons (and we are the great military weapons supplier of the planet) would feed every hungry woman and child and man on this earth. What are we doing?

So you say, all right, we have to do something about it. But when you try to engage in social change, what do you encounter? Political obstacles, doubts, financial problems, squabbles between people. All the best activists fight with each other at certain times—not all of them, but you know how it goes, right? Because they're activists in there, passionate and driven.

So you have to meet the obstacles in love. It's the same as in relationships. You seem compatible at first. You fall in love and it's just great. And then that little disappointment starts to creep in, the shadow side, because you imagined them to be a certain way, and then it turns out they're messier or more irritable or anxious or judging or controlling or addicted or whatever it is. And oh my God, I thought you were this person, but I didn't realize I was getting the whole catastrophe.

And back to social change—let's talk about gun control for a moment. Being a country with more guns per capita than any other country in the world, there has to be something sensible. And I think about the children, because I actually believe that what's happening now with the young people from Florida may—may—be a game changer. The margins are the place where real life lives, not in the center of the consciousness of the country, but among the disenfranchised and the children and the elders and the people who've been kept out. They're the ones who actually still carry the possibility and the vision.

A poem from my friend Jane Hirshfield, a great poet in Mill Valley. She writes: "The dead do not want us dead. Such petty errors are left for the living. Nor do they want our mourning. No gift to them, not rage, not weeping. Return one of them, any one of them, to the earth and look—such foolish skipping, such telling of bad jokes, such feasting. Even a cucumber, even a single sesame seed, a feast."

We have to treasure life and the life of our children more than our guns. We have to treasure this earth in ways that we haven't before. And yes, there are obstacles. That doesn't mean we stop doing whatever we think is really right.

So there we are—obstacles that come. And guess what? Your spiritual practice is basically a practice of, as you garden, working with the obstacles.

The first question is: What are you going to devote yourself to? What are the seeds that you want to plant? If somebody asked you this year, or this decade—would it be seeds of kindness? Would it be a peaceful heart? Would it be seeds of mindfulness? Seeds of compassion and care for yourself? Seeds of compassion and care for others around the world? What are the seeds you would plant? Seeds of love? What will you devote yourself to?

And then, as you begin to meditate—which is like training wheels for living with some consciousness—your body tension and the untamed mind and the unfinished business of the heart and the grief that you carry, the ocean of tears that make up human life, because you're a human being and you carry a certain measure of the sorrows of the world, and the radiance of your heart—all these things will arise. And what do you do with them?

"Just as the water jar is filled drop by drop, so let those who are wise fill themselves moment by moment with goodness." This is from the Buddha. And the goodness is: no matter what arises, can you meet it with compassion? No matter what arises, can you become spacious and peaceful, not so lost and caught up and reactive? Not because you're supposed to, not because it's a grim duty, but because it's actually an invitation to return to your own Buddha nature, to who you really are.

What's important somehow in this is to stay connected with the seeds that you plant. "As a farmer channels water to their land, so the wise ones direct their own heart and mind."

Again, from the text of the Buddha.

This last week I went to a lecture at LMU, Loyola Marymount in Los Angeles, given by a friend and a really wonderful man named Father Greg Boyle. He's written a couple of bestsellers, and I can't commend his books to you enough. Tattoos on the Heart is the first of them, if you haven't read it. He's the founder of Homeboy Industries in Los Angeles, and for thirty-some years now he's been working with kids coming out of gangs. They have Homeboy Bakery and Homeboy Cafe; they have all kinds of services for the city removing tagging and graffiti; they've got all kinds of businesses. But mostly what his work is, is to tend the soul and the spirit of these young men and young women who in many cases don't really have a family, or don't have a safe place to live. And so they join a gang because that's what's there. But they also know that it's tremendously destructive. He talks about it beautifully in his book, and I really, really recommend it to you.

Part of what he does is keep notes of the kind of strange malaprops and language that some of his homies like to use. For example, one of the young guys who'd been working with him for a while—he sends them out to talk about Homeboy Industries—came in one day and said, "I'm really learning how to do public speaking. You know, you have to be self-defecating." And Father Greg said, "Oh, that's something I've been meaning to practice."

He describes one day after working for a long time with a whole group of young men who'd come in tattooed, trying to figure out whether they would get out of the gangs or not. Some of them come and go, and it takes four or five, six, eight different times before they really can land at Homeboys. He said, "After a long day, another father and I finally went upstairs. We were reading the paper and just having a quiet time and a cup of tea. And there's loud, insistent knocking on the door. We kind of know who it is—it's this very insistent person who's homeless and difficult and comes around often needing stuff." And it's like, okay, after a day. Finally the other father gets up and says, "All right, I'll answer it." He's there for like twenty minutes and then he comes back. Father Greg looks up and says, "So who was that?" He said, "It was Jesus in his least recognizable form."

You've got to have humor about this for it to work.

I'll read you one part from this book, because at all of the talks that he gives—and now he goes around the country talking about really the redemption that's possible for these young people—if you go there, it's quite extraordinary. He says, "I always bring a couple of homies with me to talk. They get up and they tell their story."

He said, "So we were flying, a long flight, and I took a couple of homies who were from different gangs. I like to mix them up. One of them worked at the bakery, and the other one worked in their store, their shop that sells Homeboy stuff. They got to the airport. They'd never flown. They were terrified. And so we're looking out the window and two of the flight attendants are going up the steps with cups of Starbucks coffee. And I said, 'Well, must be pretty soon it'll be time to take off because they're trying to sober up the pilot.'" He said, "I know that wasn't fair to say to these guys, but anyway—" You've got to mess with him sometimes.

And he says, "All right, it's a thousand people, psychologists and social workers in this major city, and I want you to tell your stories first, and then I'll talk about how I work."

So they get there, Mario and Bobby, and they were both nervous. Their accounts moved people very deeply because their stories were filled with violence, abandonment, abuse, torture, homelessness of every kind. Honest to God, if their stories had been flames, you'd have to keep your distance. Otherwise, you'd get scorched. This is really the work he's thrown himself into.

So they spoke before me. And then before I presented, because I wanted to include them, I asked if anyone there had any questions for these guys. They were both nervous. Once things quieted down, a woman raised her hand. She had a question for Mario, and he started to quake, like, "How do I do this?"

"Yes," he said.

She said, "You're a father. You've been at Homeboys for eight years or nine years. Your son and daughter are starting to reach their teenage years. What wisdom do you impart to them?"

And his sobbing was now more pronounced. The woman was silent. No one said anything, just as you're being silent now. She stood up again. Now it was her turn to cry. And she pointed at him, and her voice, quite certain through her tears, said, "Mario, why wouldn't you want your kids to turn out to be like you? You are gentle. You are kind." He was known as being a gentleman at Homeboys. "You are loving. You are wise." She planted herself firmly. "I hope your kids turn out like you."

And there wasn't much of a pause before all one thousand attendees stood up and began to clap. The ovation seemed to have no end. All Mario could do was hold his face in his hands, overwhelmed with emotion.

What Father Greg has done is to tend the seeds of goodness in these young people that come to see him. And he does it over and over. And if they fail, he says, "Then come back when you're ready to try again."

And this is what our human life is about—to direct ourselves towards something that has some nobility to it, that's honorable and moving to our own heart and beautiful. To plant those seeds and stay connected with them. Now the great thing is that you have good seeds to plant. That is born in you. And as Henry David Thoreau says, "Though I do not believe a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I'm prepared to expect wonders."

And you have in you the seeds of great compassion. You have in you the seeds of wisdom, the seeds of kinship with life, of care for others. And meditation then isn't to make some special experience because you sit and everything happens. It's to learn how to tend this garden of your own humanity—to water the seeds of kindness, to water the seeds of presence, to water the seeds of attention and care, to water those seeds that are the most beautiful in your own heart.

As the Buddha taught, "As the bee gathers nectar and perfume from the flower without marring its beauty, so let the wise one move through this world, harming none and bringing blessings to all." When you tend the seeds in your garden and the flowers and the fruits and the vegetables bloom, you become like that image of the bee tending what's beautiful, bringing forth good in yourself and those around you, what you value, without harm.

Now here's another really important thing to keep in mind for spiritual practice. The idea is not to make a perfect garden—you know, one of those photos in House and Garden, the coolest garden in Marin County or something like that. It's sort of like all the photos on the covers of magazines of models, the most handsome or beautiful human being you've ever seen, taken in the best light and then touched up. Nobody looks like that. You know that's true. And no garden looks like that except on that day when everything's taken out and they get the photographers in the right light on a spring day at the best angle. They don't show you the compost pile and the weeds.

We have these ideas of how it should be. I remember this cartoon of two little fish swimming in the water. One says to the other, "I want the whole thing—the glass bowl, the little white castle, the blue pebbles." We have these ideas. They're crazy, these notions about how it should be. Instead of trying to make an ideal of your life—which you've already failed at. You know that.

We all have. Let's be serious about it. As Zen Master Ryokan said, "Last year a foolish monk, this year no change." So here you are.

The idea isn't to make a perfect garden, but to take your perfectly human circumstance—your emotions, your thoughts, your body, for better and for worse, and bodies are always for better and for worse. To take your relationships, oh my God. And your family. Remember, Buddha and Jesus had trouble when they went back to their families too, so just keep that in mind. To take your perfectly human circumstance and use that for wakefulness and compassion and steadiness and letting go and learning to trust. There's no other place to do it. No other way to do it.

Alan Chadwick was a famous gardener at UC Santa Cruz, one of the founders of the modern environmental movement. He gardened by growing soil to grow plants, and what he meant by soil was different from the earth's surface that you or I usually mean. I think he meant the power in the universe that could be concentrated in a garden to capture cosmic magic. Chadwick grew soil and planted seeds based on relationships that existed between the earth, its moon, the sun, the other planets, the weather, the way doves in the area coo, the mist in the trees, and everything you could imagine.

When winter was bleak, he'd sing about the energies underneath the surface of the earth: "Underneath, the seeds are full of life. This very moment, the seeds are waking up. They're pushing up to the sun. The doves are singing, coo, coo, life."

Once, Professor Chadwick took his class to a junkyard lot full of rusted-out cars, broken glass, chunks of cement, sand, and lots of abandoned trash. He asked the owner if his class could use the lot for an experiment to grow flowers and vegetables. The owner said, "Sure, but you're crazy—that soil is dead." The garden later became famous for its extraordinarily delicious vegetables and gorgeous flowers.

This is the tending that you can do in your own life, moment by moment, person by person. And it's not about being idealistic. As my teacher in the monastery would say on a super hot, sweltering day, or a freezing cold day, or a day when we got very little food in our alms bowl, "Ah, conditions are perfect for awakening." They are.

Now, you don't want to try so hard. It's not about striving. It's really about tending. You don't pull the leaves of the flower open for it to blossom. You water it. You tend it. You let the sun shine on it.

Lauren Slater writes: "Especially in this time of managed care, more emphasis seems to be placed upon medication and the quick amelioration of symptoms, short-term work, and profit—privatized profit-making clinics—than upon the lovely and mysterious alchemy that comprises the healing cords between and within people, the cords that soothe our terrors and help us to be whole." This is true in medicine. There's something that needs to be tended in addition to the body that we know about. And it's true in our relationships. It's true in the society in which we live.

So it's not about making this some kind of grim duty. Actually, it's an act of love. And that's kind of the game. In the end, if your spiritual practice isn't an act of love, it's somehow gone down the wrong track. It's planted the wrong garden.

So you get comfortable with your life. This is what you got.

You can change where you live and so forth. But the big change that needs to be tended is really the change in the heart. Because wherever you go, there will be people who are difficult. You know they're waiting for you, right? And yet, the teachings are an invitation to freedom of heart. The Dharma is an invitation to freedom. It's immediate, here and now, open-handed, offered to all—a freedom that can be found only and just where you are.

Now it's also true, as you sit, as you practice, that you can't measure it very well. How am I doing? Some days you think you're doing splendidly, and then something happens and you feel like you're the great spiritual failure. And then you tell stories about it. But it's more like being on a boat on the ocean. If you're on a river, you watch the shore go by, but if you're out on the ocean, you actually can't tell exactly where you are. And there is no spiritual GPS—I'm sorry to tell you about this. Instead, what you get to do wherever you are is tend your garden, plant the beautiful seeds.

This from Wendell Berry, a great poet and environmentalist. He writes: "So my friends, every day do something that won't compute. Love the world. Work out of love for nothing. Love someone who doesn't deserve it. Invest in the millennium. Plant sequoias. Put your faith in the two inches of humus that will build under the trees every thousand years. And go with your love to the fields and lie down in the shade and rest your head." Plant sequoias—you know, that take a thousand years to grow majestic.

So there you are. You can't tell how you're doing. I mean, if you really want to know, you could, of course, ask the people in your family—but that's another story. You can't tell how you're doing. What you'll see is tension and difficulty in your body, because you have a physical body, and also potential to live with this body in a healthy and beautiful way. But it will have pain. Anybody not have pain, you can have your money back. Right? You just get suffering along with joy in this life. This is human incarnation.

And then you notice the judging mind and the doubting mind and the frightened mind and the angry mind. There's praise and blame and gain and loss. This is the working stuff of a human incarnation. Don't tell too many stories about it. Name it. Water the beautiful seeds. Let the other ones go by. It's not that complicated. Water the seeds of love, of compassion, of presence.

Because your stories are likely—and "likely" I would underline—to be inaccurate. I remember at the end of a retreat we had down in Joshua Tree, in Yucca Valley. We used this wonderful retreat center, Institute of Mental Physics, for thirty-eight years. And there was a woman who left the retreat—she told me this story later.

She went to Palm Springs Airport and got a bag of her favorite chocolate chip cookies that they sold at one of the market stores there. She went to the waiting area of her gate and sat down. There were a bunch of seats and little tables every three or four seats. She put her cookies and her stuff down and sat there for a while just looking at her phone or whatever you do in an airport these days.

Then she noticed that the guy next to her was opening her bag of cookies. That was really weird. He took one out and ate it, and he looked at her as he did it and tipped the bag to her like, "You want one too?" She was thinking, "Okay, I don't know about this." So without saying any words but feeling really strange, he ate a cookie and she ate a cookie. What is happening here, right? She was somewhat upset by it, but okay, coming from a retreat, she thought, "I'll be compassionate," and so forth.

So then it was time to get on the plane. The cookies were gone. She got her stuff, settled into her seat, and as she was putting her stuff away, she opened her purse—and there was her bag of cookies.

Don't put too much stock in the stories you tell about yourself in the world. There's always another point of view. And then you see, you are the Buddha, but you're embarrassed Buddha, chagrin Buddha, foolish Buddha, as Ryokan said. "You know, this year no change." There's happy Buddha and sad Buddha, sun Buddha, moon Buddha. You contain all of these. And you rest in the mystery of being alive—this amazing thing that you have this life and you get to shape it. You get to make something beautiful out of it.

I think that's why, in a certain way, people have helped to build this place at Spirit Rock—not as a monument to something, but really as a place that's a reminder of how magnificent you are and what you can be, what beautiful seeds you can plant and how you can tend them. And that you can trust this.

Pablo Neruda says, "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." There's some life force that wants to renew us. Even in the body politic, which seems so divisive now, and in many ways destructive—and worse than that—at times it feels like we are, instead of, as Lincoln said, "with malice toward none and charity toward all," almost reversing it. We're dividing those who are valued and those who are vulnerable and are not valued, and throwing them out of our hearts and out of our willingness to be in communion.

And yet, we are in communion. Every breath you take is breathed by all those other people. Every breath you take, as I say, came over the Pacific and dusted Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa, and before that it dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor. We are in this one together. This is our family.

Pablo Neruda, so beautiful. But if you plant seeds, then something good will come. As Thoreau said, "I don't know how long it will take, but I'm prepared to expect miracles and wonders." Pablo Neruda also wrote another line for spring, one of his love poems. He said, "I want to do with you what spring does to the cherry trees." How's that for a little romantic line?

So Kathy Sneed, some years ago in the 1980s, started a prison garden project. She was concerned for the soul death of so many people who've been incarcerated. Sadly, we have these enormous racist poverty prisons—if you're born in the wrong place or the wrong race or wrong skin color, the likelihood is you're going to end up in prison, and not for doing much. So she began a project in the San Francisco City and County Jail, which is a pretty big establishment. Men were invited to grow vegetables in a garden plot behind one of the prison buildings, which had been there from decades before when there had been a prison garden. Through fundraising, she was able to offer them seedlings and mulch, fertilizer and simple garden tools.

To be able to grow a garden with their own hands, to be responsible for its blossoming, to overcome insects and drought—this brought out the best in these thrown away people. It awakened a connection to and caring for something outside of themselves. Kathy tells about one macho giant saying, "Don't step on my babies," as he walked through the garden.

The prison wardens were amazed by the change. The gardens became so important to those who cared for these patches that their lives began to revolve around them. In fact, when time came for these men to be released from prison, some purposefully recommitted petty crimes or violated parole so they could get back to their gardens. That's when Kathy realized that she needed to start a garden project for ex-prisoners, which she did.

"Do not judge me by my successes," says Nelson Mandela. "Judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up again."

Tend your garden in a way that's beautiful. Choose the seeds. Even as you listen tonight, you know what the seeds are that you really would most want to plant in this incarnation, in this life. And then water them with your attention, with your dedication, with your devotion.

I'll close with a blessing from John O'Donohue, that wonderful poet. He writes:

On the day when the weight deadens on your shoulders and you stumble, may the clay dance to balance you. And when your eyes freeze behind the gray window and the ghost of loss gets into you, may a flock of colors—indigo, red, green, and azure blue—come to awaken in you a meadow of delight. When the canvas frays and the cork of thought and the stain of ocean blackens beneath you, may there come across the waters a path of yellow moonlight to bring you safely home. May the nourishment of the earth be yours. May the clarity of light be yours. May the fluency of the ocean be yours. And may the protection of the ancestors be yours. And so may a slow wind work these words of love around you, an invisible cloak to tend your life.

One more reflection came as we were sitting quietly. You don't just water your own seeds. There are gardens next to yours that could also be quite beautiful, and you have water to spare. The world needs you to also water the seeds of goodness, of compassion, of presence, of dedication around you. The society needs it—whether it's raising conscious children or creating a conscious business or standing up for justice or standing for the vulnerable or tending them. But to do so in a way that waters the beauty in them and the best in them.

As Nelson Mandela said, "It never hurts to think the best of someone. They often act the better because of it."

Seek out your ways to water the seeds of goodness and make a difference both in your own heart and in all that you touch in the world.

Enjoy the spring.

CHAPTER 13

A Peaceful Heart – How to Live with Balance, Equanimity and a Peaceful Heart

Jack Kornfield · 1h00

> In this profound teaching on upekkhā (equanimity), Jack Kornfield shares insights from his recent meeting with the Dalai Lama, who emphasized the importance of teaching cessation—the possibility of freedom and peace for all beings. Drawing from the Four Noble Truths and Suzuki Roshi's wisdom that finding composure amidst change is the gateway to nibbāna, Kornfield explores how equanimity differs from indifference. While indifference is withdrawal born of fear, true equanimity is the willingness to be fully present in life while holding a vast, spacious perspective.
> Kornfield weaves together teachings from diverse sources—Chuang Tzu's empty boat parable, Zen Master Ryokan's poetry, and Thich Nhat Hanh's reflections on birth and death—to illuminate how we can meet life's inevitable gains and losses, pleasures and pains, with grace. He shares moving personal experiences from Cambodian refugee camps, where survivors planted gardens despite losing everything, demonstrating life's innate drive toward renewal. The talk addresses the balance between inner peace and engaged action, using examples from Rosa Parks to the March for Our Lives, showing how a peaceful heart can fuel courageous action.
> The practice of equanimity meditation is offered as a complement to loving-kindness and compassion, helping free us from codependence while maintaining deep care. Kornfield guides listeners toward recognizing their true nature as loving awareness itself—the vast stillness that witnesses all experience. This teaching invites us not to let fear colonize our hearts, but to become lamps of peace in an ever-changing world, honoring the Buddha's final words: 'Make of yourself a light.'

Let yourself come back in and find a way to sit. Let things quiet down a little bit.

Let's do a little one-syllable chant just to recollect the energy after the social time. The one-syllable chant is a seed syllable in Sanskrit that's considered the syllable representing great wisdom—the seed syllable "ah." It's the sound of opening, of letting go, of receiving. So let's just sing "ah" for a little bit and then sit for half a minute or so in the stillness afterward.

Chanting

Well, that kind of did it, didn't it? That was nice. And I'm not sure which I like better—the harmony, which gets very sweet, or the silence afterward.

So here you've come Monday night into this beautiful temple. I'd like to speak about the quality of equanimity.

I've just come back from travels in Asia—Japan, and Dharamsala, India—being part of the Mind Life Science meetings with the Dalai Lama and various scientists and social scientists from around the world. This one focused on education and social and emotional learning. Through the days we were together for a good part of a week, the Dalai Lama kept his focus on this: "All right, we have good science about these things now. How do we change the world? How do we make the world better for our children, for adults, for people who are vulnerable?" Over and over again: What's best for the world? How do we use this?

And then when we had a chance to talk together a little bit privately, a little bit of Dharma conversation, he said, "Now when you teach, you must emphasize cessation." Then he went on to explain what he meant by that. In the Buddhist teachings of the four basic truths or noble truths, there's suffering and its causes, and then there's an end to it. He went on to say, "You must teach people that there's freedom and goodness that's possible for each of them and for this world—that that's what's possible."

When greed, hatred, and delusion are released and given up, it says in the Buddhist texts, we no longer cause sorrow for ourselves and others. This is nirvana. Or as Zen master Suzuki Roshi said, "When you realize the fact that everything changes and find your composure in the midst of it, this is the gateway to nirvana"—or to well-being, or to peace.

So this is what the Dalai Lama was urging: remind people what's possible, how it is possible to live.

This is also the last of the series of ten talks on the qualities of the awakened heart—equanimity, or peace. They're called the qualities of the awakened heart because they're not found someplace else. You don't have to go to the Himalayas or to Kyoto in Japan. They're the nature of the heart and mind itself. "Luminous is this mind," it says in the Buddhist teachings, but it gets confused by the various thoughts and feelings that color it. When we see them arise, it's sort of like the leaves fluttering on a tree. When the wind comes up, we think that everything's moving, but actually the tree is still there, and the leaves flutter and then quiet down again.

Our fundamental state is peaceful. It just gets bothered by stuff, you know—life and the twenty-four-hour news cycle and the people in your family and money problems and work and all of those things. And yet underneath it all, there's a substrate of stillness, an understanding, a sense that you have when I ask that question: How would it be to live with a peaceful heart? Most people in the room—I couldn't see you all, but I could see some of your thoughts were like, "Yeah, pretty good idea. Actually, it would help."

And so what you also could see in that brief meditation on equanimity is that we can be reminded, we can invite, we can turn toward certain qualities—whether it's compassion or loving-kindness, or respect for one another, or understanding. And when we turn toward them, the mind is malleable. It's pliant. When we turn our consciousness or our attention in a particular direction, that's what flowers.

As Thich Nhat Hanh says, when you water certain seeds, they blossom. If you water the seeds of peace, guess what? They grow. You feel them come alive. And if you water the seeds of resentment or disappointment, those too will grow. Unfortunately, you've noticed that.

Dharma, which is a very complex or multi-meaning word in Sanskrit, means the teachings. It means the truth or the law. It means one's particular destiny. It has all these meanings. But here in the temple, the dharma teachings are the teachings of the way things are—the kind of fundamental universal truths to help us live wisely.

And equanimity grows when we have a vast perspective. It's in certain ways the culmination of the practices of a spiritual life. Zen Master Ryokan, the most beloved poet of Japan, writes: "If someone asks me what is the mark of enlightenment or illusion, I cannot say. Wealth and honor are nothing but dust. As evening falls, I sit in my hermitage and stretch out both feet in answer."

There's a kind of ease and relaxation. Wealth and honor—these things come and go. But if you want to know about a peaceful heart, stretch out your feet. Notice the changing of the light. We've gone from that beautiful green landscape through the twilight and now into spring evening darkness. Find in yourself a way to rest in the midst of all things.

Now, it's also true—well, here's another early Buddhist text: Some children were playing beside a river. They made castles of sand. Each child defended their castle and said, "This one is mine." They kept them separate and wouldn't let any mistakes about whose was whose. When they were finished, sometimes they visited, but sometimes they fought. The owner of one castle got angry and pulled another child's hair—"You spoiled my castle!"—and they all kind of ganged up on one child, and then he found other friends. We know how human beings are, it says in here.

But then evening came. It was getting dark, and they all thought it was time to go home. Their mothers were calling them. And no one cared what became of their castle. One child stamped on his. The waves washed over another. They turned away and all went back home.

This is an ancient Buddhist text, and it's somehow written to remind us of something, if you hadn't noticed. The things that make up our life, that matter, that we can care about—they don't last.

You have many incarnations. I think about my early childhood and my middle school years and the time I lived as a monk and when I first got married—all those things are gone. The houses I lived in are gone. Some were torn down. If I could go back, they don't even exist anymore. That whole thing just disappeared. And then at some point, I'll be gone. People who knew me will remember me. "Oh, yes"—a little sadness—"I'll miss them." And then they'll be gone. And then, okay, boop. It's gone. It's what happens. It's the sandcastle thing. It's really, really true.

So then, how do we live? What's wise?

There are the worldly winds. There's praise and blame, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, pleasure and pain. In Ecclesiastes it says there's a time for planting and a time for sowing and reaping, birth and death. There's a time for every season, and it keeps changing, doesn't it? Let's get real about it. Praise and blame. So what do we do?

And then there comes a sense of grace. Not because everything will go the way you want it to. There's still warfare and racism and environmental destruction and things that we have to tend to. But there's also a bigger story. As Dr. Martin Luther King said, the arc of the moral universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. And we can also sense the truth of that.

I remember when I was working in the Cambodian refugee camps many years ago. It was a dry, barren, hot place—the hot season—flat, with a big pit well at one end that people would walk down into with their buckets. And everybody had a little tiny hut made of bamboo. Fifty or a hundred thousand people in each camp, and these huts were made of woven bamboo, maybe six feet wide and eight feet long with a little door and some cloth hung over it.

Next to each hut's door, along the path, there was a little plot of land—maybe one square yard, one square meter—between the door and the next hut, with little paths running between them. And after a month or two, almost everybody had planted a garden. They'd lost everything. People in their families had been killed, their villages burned. There they were with nothing. And yet there was a little squash plant, a bean plant, a pepper plant. They would go every day and stand in the hot sun in these long lines, get the water, and tend their plants.

It was an extraordinary thing to watch—this sense that there's something in life itself that will renew itself. It wants to. It's its nature. And it's possible to begin to trust in that way.

So equanimity doesn't mean indifference. That's called the near enemy to equanimity—it masquerades as the real thing. But indifference is fear or withdrawal, insulation. "I don't want life to touch me." Equanimity is the willingness to be in life but to be spacious and open, to have a vast perspective and say, "Yes, here I am, showing up, caring, loving—but I'm not in control of this game." And I hope you've noticed that.

So there's less of what Chuang Tzu describes—less person in the boat, less "me" and "mine" and "the way it should be." It's not that there won't be self-consciousness and the small sense of self and the body of fear and all those things that arise as part of our nature. But it's almost like, "Oh yeah, there's that. That's the personality. That's okay. But it's not the real story."

And you discover through your meditation practice—those of you who have a meditation practice or your inner spiritual life—the capacity of your heart to move with all things, to embrace the mystery, the changing mystery of life. And it is a mystery. Nobody knows. Who are you, really?

How did you get here? How did all the stars and planets come to be? Nobody has the answer to that. It says in one of the Buddhist texts, "Thus shall you think of this fleeting world: a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, a dream." It appears, and it's mysterious that it appears, and then it's gone.

You remember Y2K, right? What happened to it? It's back with the pharaohs and back with I Love Lucy and the Middle Ages. It goes back into wherever it came from, to emptiness. And another day says, "All right, here we're going to have another day." But things appear and then they disappear.

And we know intuitively that there is a way to find balance. My teacher Ajahn Chah said in almost all his teachings that he didn't really teach anybody anything. He just said if they were falling off the road on one side, he'd say, "Go that way, go back to the middle." If they were falling off the left-hand side, he'd say, "Go back that way." He said, "That's all I do. People get attached here. They get afraid there. I say, come back. Be here in the present." And as you are, be here with a loving awareness of this life because it's all you have. This is it.

And this, just as you know how to ride a bike—you learn it, and when you learn it, you know that balance—there's a kind of inner learning of balance. And then gradually you learn to trust. You don't need your bike just to be on a really flat, simple place. You can take it places. And then when difficulty comes, you have this capacity.

This is from Zen master Suzuki Roshi. He says, "Suppose your children are suffering from a hopeless disease. You don't know what to do. You can't lie in bed normally. The most comfortable place for you would be a warm, comfortable bed, but now because of your mental agony, you cannot rest. You may walk up and down, pace in and out, but this doesn't help. Actually, the best way to relieve your mental suffering is to sit in meditation, even in such a confused state of mind and with a bad posture. If you have no experience of sitting in this kind of difficult situation, you're not yet a real meditation student. For no other activity can appease your suffering. In continuous practice, under a succession of agreeable and disagreeable situations, you will realize the marrow of meditation and acquire its true strength."

So it's not saying that you won't have gain and loss and pleasure and pain and birth and death. You will have it. Anybody not have it, you can have your fifteen dollars back. It's just how it is. But we can sit with a kind of loving awareness, a sacred attention that says, "This is life." This is life with its unbearable beauty and its ocean of tears that make up our human incarnation.

I think about Rosa Parks because I love reading about her. She'd actually planned that for a while, and I remember seeing a big picture of her, this kind of luminous being. Now she knew how to sit. She said, "I just knew I had to sit there and not get up." She could come here. We want her on our faculty. "I knew I just had to stay on the bus." And there's something in that of the courage of heart that comes from a peaceful heart—to say, "Yes, I'm peaceful, and yes, I'm here. I really know what it means to be alive and present."

Part of it is the great gift of having a bigger perspective. That the arc of the moral universe is long.

It bends toward justice. Life will renew itself. Even when terrible things happen—the little plants in the gardens in the refugee camp—something will renew itself. It's not the end of the story.

And the other dimension is a kind of common humanity. The fact is that we all suffer, as well as having beautiful, delicious, wonderful things in our lives. But everybody also experiences suffering and loss and aging and sickness and things like that, don't they? Don't you? Don't we? Moi aussi. And we also survive. We have a kind of courage and ability that we share as human beings to go through what's beautiful and what's difficult. That's our journey. And it's not a mistake. You're not bad because you suffer. You didn't do something wrong. You just took the ticket for the human incarnation ride at Disneyland, and it says: beautiful joy and great suffering. You want one? Well, okay, you got a body. Here you are. That's how it works.

So you start to see the commonality of this. And the transformation of our life then comes from our ability to be present for it as it is, which is what meditation teaches us —that phrase of Suzuki Roshi's, the marrow of meditation. Because it's not about some particular state; it's the capacity to be present for life with loving awareness for what it is.

This is from William Butler Yeats, who says: "We can make our minds so like still water that beings gather around us so that they may see their own images, and so live for a moment with a clearer, perhaps even a fiercer life because of our quiet."

It's an amazing passage. Yeats was an extraordinary poet. He's saying that if we can be present—and you know it when people are really in the midst of suffering, or when you have the privilege of being with somebody who's dying—you can't fix that one. If they're dying, you can't change it. But if you can be present for it, the stillness and presence you have allows what needs to happen: the last words that haven't been spoken, the feelings that need to be felt in that circumstance or in other ones. Because you're actually there for it. You're not trying to fix it or change it. You're actually present.

And that's part of the gift of equanimity. It untangles, it cleanses, it purifies, it brings a certain balance. And even in a moment, it can change everything.

There you are, should it happen, in an argument with your lover or your spouse or your partner—if you have one, and if you don't, you'll find someone else to argue with, it's okay. And then there's a little voice in the back that says, "We're really in it, aren't we?" You know that voice? "God, we really got into it this time." And that little voice says, "Hmm, pretty interesting. We're in the drama now. We're really in it." And even that little voice, that moment—it's like a pause that says, well, this is part of our human life, but it's not all of who we are. It's just part of what we do. We also get in conflict sometimes. And then there's a breath that comes. You take a bigger breath and you say, "Yeah, are you okay in this? Here we are having a conflict. Is it all right?"

Conflict isn't a bad thing, you know. We have different desires and needs. It depends how we handle it, unfortunately.

Many of you saw her in her sparkly pink dress with the flowers on it. She'd come for a baby blessing five years ago, and now I get to see her dancing around. I asked her if she was in school, and she said, "Yes, I am in kindergarten." She really wanted me to know the particulars.

In kindergarten and preschool, if kids start hitting each other with blocks—which they do—the teacher will say something very simple like, "Use your words." Couldn't we do that on a national level? An international level? As a species, it's not that complicated.

So there's something in us that knows it's possible to step back and say, "Well, we're really caught in it," and that we don't have to be so caught in it. In some moment we can say, "Ah, yes." And we can begin to trust that. Trust not so much your plans and ideals and goals and things to figure out, because—and I love the work of Byron Katie, some of you may know her—she invites people to question their thoughts. Whatever view or story you have, first of all, there's another story about it. It's one perspective. But she'll say, "What if that thought weren't true? How would it be for you? How's it working for you to keep attached to that thought?" Or even more, "What if its opposite were true?" You think, how could that ever be? But we have ideas about things and yet they may turn out somewhat differently than we imagine. So holding them lightly is actually a really good thing. In Zen they say today's satori is tomorrow's mistake. You have a great revelation, but then how about the next day?

Equanimity is an invitation, somehow, again, to a place of trust in something much larger. There's a passage that I love, one I think is important in our national and cultural conversation. It comes from Mothering Magazine, from Peggy O'Mara, the editor. She writes:

"We have a cultural bias against dependency, against any emotion or behavior that indicates weakness. This is tragically evident in the way we push our children. We establish standards more important than their inner experiences. When we wean our children, rather than trusting they'll wean themselves. When we insist that they sit at the table and finish their meals, rather than trusting they will eat well if healthful food is provided. When we toilet train them at an early age, rather than trusting they will learn to use the toilet and not be wearing diapers in high school. It is the nature of the child to be dependent, and it is the nature of dependence to be outgrown. Dependence, insecurity, and weakness are natural states for a child, for all of us. But just as we grow from crawling to walking, babbling to talking, puberty to sexuality, from weakness to strength, uncertainty to mastery, begrudging dependency because it's not independence is like begrudging winter because it's not yet spring. Dependency blossoms into independence in its own sweet time."

That's a wisdom for child rearing, but it's a deeper wisdom as well. If we live in a cowboy culture—"I'm completely independent, I can take care of myself"—you're not. You're vulnerable every time you drive down the street, trusting that other people stay on the right side. Every time you go through a traffic light, trusting that people stop at the red and let you go through the green. You're vulnerable every time you use money, trusting that people will believe that little piece of paper is actually worth something. That's an agreement.

And as we sit here and breathe and relax and open, this amazing thing happens: our body breathes. The breath we take was breathed by the other people in the room, for sure. And by the deer on the hillside. I saw a badger here once—it was really great. And coyotes and mountain lions. But that breath also comes across the Pacific. It dusted Mauna Loa and Mauna Kea. It dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor.

It did. You know, we are in it together. And so the whole idea that you're independent is a fiction. You are life expressing itself in a particular form. And life apparently approves of you, because you're still here, right? And all your ancestors, who are survivors, are kind of at your back rooting you on. They say, "Yep, you can do it. We did it. We went through all this, and you can do this as well."

And when we stop, even for a moment—when we meditate, when we take a walk in the hills, when we quiet ourselves—we can sense that there's a vast stillness that we long for amidst the clamor of the culture. A huge silence which contains everything: the turning of the stars and the seasons, birth and death, the joy and sorrow of people around us, the mystery of life. It's not far away. It's here in any minute, in any moment.

And equanimity is an invitation in the yogic tradition. It's the opening of the crown chakra, where you sit and the crown chakra opens and you feel the turning of the seasons and the stars with each breath.

This is another Buddhist text where the Buddha is speaking:

I consider the position of kings and rulers as that of dust motes in a sunbeam. I see the greatest treasures of gold and gems as but broken tiles. I look upon the finest silken robes as tattered rags. I see the myriad worlds of the universe as small seeds, and the great Indian ocean as drops of mud that soil one's feet. I perceive the teachings of the world to be the illusions of magicians, and look upon the judgment of right and wrong as the serpentine dance of dragons, and the rise and fall of beliefs as traces left by the four seasons.

It's poetic. It's beautiful poetry—traces left by the four seasons, the serpentine dance. There's a stillness in you that is beckoning you, that is saying, "Yes, you can live from this place." And meditation and spiritual life really is a reminder of this: that all these things are turning. Civilizations—the Sumerian and the Hittites, the Ottoman Empire. Remember the British Empire? When I was young, that was a big empire, but you know, easy come, easy go, or whatever. The Portuguese Empire. The Chinese empires. Empires—the Mayan and the Aztec and the Incan. But who are we? If we grasp and hold on, then it's like rope burn. It's changing and you're trying to hold on to it.

But with loving awareness, which is what you are, you're really the witness of it all. When you get quiet, then you come back to rest in the silent mind, which we could call loving awareness—the awareness of this dance. Just as you can step out of a conflict and say, "I'm caught in that," there's a place of stillness in us that's outside of time.

Thich Nhat Hanh writes:

This body is not me. I'm not limited to this body. I'm life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Since before time I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds on our journey. Birth and death are a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand. Let us say goodbye to meet again soon. We will meet today and again tomorrow, in every moment. For we are life meeting itself.

He's a pretty deep cat. And he's pointing to a truth and a reality that who you are is spirit. You're not this body—I mean, I hope not anyway. Kale and Big Macs, or whatever it is, that's just not who you are. And you're not your feelings, because they're always changing. And God knows you're not your thoughts, because they contradict one another. As Whitman says, "Yeah, I am large, I contain multitudes."

So what are you? Spirit was born into this body consciousness, and it will leave in that mysterious moment of death. You are awareness itself. You are loving awareness that's having this human experience.

And to meditate isn't to have some particular experience—"Okay, now I've got it and I'm quiet and I've had some great insight." Those come. But it's really to remember who you are, this vastness and spaciousness and stillness. And when you do, there comes a possibility of a kind of vast perspective and freedom.

Here's Mahatma Gandhi, who says, "I believe in the unity of all things. And therefore I believe that if one person falls, the whole world falls to that extent. And if one person gains, the whole world is uplifted by that." We each have our place to contribute. And then he goes on: "When I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been murderers and tyrants, and for a time they can seem invincible, but in the end they always fall. Think of it. Always. In the end they always fall. Think of it always."

Like those plants—the squash and the beans in the little gardens in the refugee camp—life wants to renew itself. And we're asked to participate in this mystery, not from a place of contraction and fear. All that comes, okay, you can notice that with loving awareness. But from a place of a deeper care and a deeper trust.

When I came back from being with my beloved Trudy—we were traveling together in Kyoto and then Dharamsala—I came back to do some teaching in Washington, D.C. for a big conference of four thousand therapists, which they need in D.C. very badly right now. And the day after I did my keynote address was the day of the March for Our Lives. So I went out on Pennsylvania Avenue, because it matters to me. I've been out demonstrating in all kinds of ways, because they matter.

One of the things that was really striking—there seemed like three quarters of a million people out there, an extraordinary number, and then big marches elsewhere. And what was very moving was how civilized it felt, how composed and gracious people seemed. There were lots of little kids and certainly many, many young people and many generations, and it was very diverse. People were all gracious with one another. It was like the world we want to live in. And the cops were all smiling. First of all, they don't really want us all to have guns—they have a certain perspective on that. But also, they were appreciating the civility of it.

At the same time, with that civility, there was a passion. It was very interesting, because the young people who spoke, those who were on the big screens right in front of the Capitol building—there was this wonderful Black gospel singer who did "The Times They Are a-Changin'" from Bob Dylan in a whole new way that I'd never heard. It was fabulous.

But then here's a poem by Alison Luterman, an Oakland poet, one of my favorites. She writes:

"I see her on TV screaming into a microphone. Her head is shaved and she is beautiful and seventeen and her high school was just shot up and she had to walk by friends lying in their own blood, her teacher bleeding out. And she's my daughter, the one I never had. And she's your daughter and everyone's daughter. And she's her own woman in the fullness of her young fire, calling bullshit on politicians who take money from the gun makers. Tears rain down her face, but she doesn't stop speaking. She doesn't apologize. She keeps calling them out. All of them, all of us who didn't do enough to stop this thing. And you can see the gray faces of those who've always held power contort, utterly baffled to face this new breed of young woman—not silky, not compliant, not caring if they call her a ten or a troll. And she cries, but she doesn't stop speaking truth into the microphone, though her voice is raw and shaking and the sun is molten brass. And I'm three thousand miles away thinking how Neruda said, the blood of the children ran through the streets without fuss. Only now she is, they are raising a fuss, shouting down the walls of Jericho, and it's not that we road-weary elders have been given the all-clear exactly, but our shoulders do let down a little. We breathe from a deeper place. We say to each other, well, it looks like the baton may be passing to these next runners."

And they are fleet as thought and fiery as stars. And we take another breath and say to each other, the baton has been passed. And we set off then running hard behind them.

It's hard to read without weeping. And I love the end of it, because it's not that they're doing it alone—we're behind them also. We have to be. We have to hold the space so that those who are young and full of that passion and fire can feel supported by us. It's not separate.

Equanimity doesn't mean that one with a peaceful heart can't act in the world. You can act, but in a very different way. That civility of those three quarters of a million people still had courage and strength in it.

Now, the equanimity practice we did, which invited you to invoke or open to that quality of a peaceful heart, to rest at ease amidst the turning of all things, to be open and balanced and peaceful—this practice had a little phrase at the end. When you pictured another person, you said: "Your happiness and suffering depend on your own heart, on your own thoughts and actions, and not my wishes for you."

This is a tough part of equanimity. But it's taught as a practice, as a balance for loving-kindness and compassion practice. Because if you only do compassion and loving-kindness, it can accidentally fall into a kind of attachment—"I need a certain result" or "I want you to change or be a certain way." When you love someone or something and you want it to be a certain way, you can get really attached. You could call this the ancient wise response to codependence in relationship.

Because basically you can love people and care for them and support them, but you can't love for them. You can't change for them. You can't let go for them. And so there's something in that moment where you see this loved one and wish them a peaceful heart, and then you say: "May you have a peaceful heart. May you be filled with love. I care for you. And your happiness and suffering depend on your heart, your thoughts and actions, and not my wishes for you."

I remember teaching this practice. I had the honor of leading a group at Alice Walker's home for about ten years. It was a group for women of color, and they sort of adopted me somehow. I felt very fortunate. I was nervous when I taught it the first time because I thought they might consider it to be a kind of cold Buddhist detachment thing—which it isn't. It's really an invitation to liberation. But I taught it anyway and asked, "So how was this?" They were smiling. It was a group of quite accomplished women—a professor at Berkeley, someone who ran an HIV/AIDS project, Alice who is a Pulitzer Prize winning author, and so forth.

They said, "In our community, especially in the communities of people of color, when we're accomplished in some way, people want a lot from us. Come and help my nonprofit. Write something for my book. I need money for my nephew or niece who's in trouble. We get this all the time, and we do what we can. But at some point we also need to be able to say: your happiness and suffering are in your hands and in your heart. We can love you, we can do what we can, but they depend on your own state of heart and mind, your own thoughts and actions, and not our wishes for you."

It was actually quite liberating. Does that make sense to you? It's not meant as uncaring. It's meant as a disentanglement from the ideas we have for other people—just in case you have those kinds of ideas about other people.

We all live through the same enormous changes of circumstance, of gain and loss, pleasure and pain. And then you get that phone call. Surprise. I think of this friend who is a hospice nurse. She took care of so many people. And then she got the call from the doctor saying, "Your biopsy doesn't look good." She said, "It was so different taking care of all those other people. But when I got the call—wait a second, it's moi," as Miss Piggy would say. "It's me." Such a surprise. And she became, of course, scared in some ways, but also tremendously tender. "Oh yes, this is what it's like to go through this."

Of course we could complain. The world is unjust, and we need to work for justice. And still humanity is... well, what did Gandhi say when asked about Western civilization? "It would be a good idea." Something like that.

But I remember the poetry in the Book of Job, where Job was complaining. And he had fair reason to complain, all those things that happened to him.

But then there's this voice out of the whirlwind, which is really out of the whirlwind of creativity of life itself. "Where were you when I clothed the sky, when I placed the suns in their orbits? Were you there when I laid the foundation of the earth, when I set the morning stars to sing together in the sky, when I set the sea with doors to hold it as it gushed forth out of the womb, when I swaddled the earth in clouds? Do you know the seasons of the wild ass as she brings forth her young, and the days the falcon learns to fly?"

It's really a poem about mystery—that we don't know so much, really. There's something about creation itself that we are a part of, but it's not meant to be just figured out in our heads, how it's supposed to be. Instead, it becomes possible to meet it and to care for it with a peaceful heart, to live in that way. And that's the real miracle.

Yes, stand up for justice. Yes, plant seeds, plant sequoias that take two thousand years to grow. Yes, make a conscious business and raise conscious children, beautiful children. Do all these things. But how do we do it? We have a choice.

I remember the story of a couple who were unable to conceive and decided to adopt a child. They decided they would go where there were children who were either orphaned or really needed parents. So they went to India, found this very little child, adopted him, and brought him back. After a year or two, they discovered that he had cerebral palsy and also that he was profoundly deaf. So they started to take care of him physically, and they started to teach him sign language. Then they got really worried about their little boy, about how lonely he would be with cerebral palsy and being deaf.

So they went back to India. Most of us would say, "Oh my God, I adopted this child and now look—this little boy is sick with cerebral palsy and he can't hear. What a tragedy." But they went back to India and they said, "Do you have any other kids with cerebral palsy who are deaf? Our boy needs friends." And they adopted a second child with the same challenges. "We got one, we need two of them to keep each other company."

You will have difficulties. Anybody in this room have difficulties? You will. You also have a good heart. You have all kinds of possibilities when you get quiet. When you look, you can do magnificent things in the smallest way, and it plants incredible seeds in this world.

Think about where in your life needs grace, needs letting go, needs a more spacious heart. And what is it that supports this in your life? It could be reading a poem, or sitting in meditation, or taking a walk in the hills—something that brings you back to a place of peace. Or your best friends who remind you, who give you a bigger perspective. Or just taking a long hot bath, listening to music. You know what brings your heart back to peace and gives you a big perspective.

Human life is not without its sorrow. And yet in the midst of all, there is a reality of presence, of consciousness itself that's open and vast and inviting. It allows you to walk through this world with a peaceful heart, with understanding. All the wise people of the ages, the people we care about and celebrate in some way—yes, they may have done amazing things, but the wise ones also did it from a place of understanding, a place of graciousness, a peaceful heart.

There's an interesting experience that happens to people sometimes in very wonderful or deep meditation sessions. It's one of the dozen or twenty flavors of awakening or enlightenment that can happen—maybe I'll talk about those flavors some night soon. It's the experience of perfection. I'm wary of saying it, very careful, because I don't mean the war in Syria is perfection, and I don't mean hungry children and starving people are perfection in the ordinary sense.

And I think we have to do whatever we can to care for one another and to reach out and tend this world and to knit together the parts that have torn.

But there's another reality that's also true—and that is to see the mysterious perfection of it all. To recognize that somehow there couldn't be birth without death, there couldn't be gain without loss, there couldn't be night without day, there couldn't be joy without sorrow and sweet without sour. It's actually how it's woven together. This is duality. It's human incarnation.

In this perspective, as the mystic Julian of Norwich wrote, "All shall be well, and all manner of things shall be well." She had a revelation that was filled with love, really—filled with love for the whole world, for all its beauty and all its sorrows together, if that makes sense to you. And again, I want to be very careful in talking about this, because it doesn't mean that one doesn't tend and care. But it's the invitation to rest in that which is sacred. And then every place you are is the holy land. Every body is the body of the Buddha in different forms.

When the Buddha was lying between the two sal trees, as the story is told, on his last day—surrounded by the villagers and monks and princes and nuns and all the people who were there—the very last thing attributed to him was this: "This world is impermanent. Make of yourself a light." Be a lamp, be a light in this ever-changing world. And that's the invitation of this practice of peace and well-being and love—that we carry that. That's who we are, actually. And it's possible for us.

Perhaps the point is not to let the fears and the terror and the confusion that's there out in the news and in the world colonize your heart, not let it take you over. The world actually needs people whose hearts are at peace, who can see with clarity and tend to it with a kind of beauty that is given to you and given to each of us. And if anything tonight resonated with you or reminded you, then that becomes something that you already had, something you can carry as you go.

Mindful Loving Awareness - Part 1 - The Three Gates to Freedom

Jack Kornfield · 1h05

> In this profound teaching, Jack Kornfield illuminates how mindfulness and loving awareness serve as both the gateway and destination of spiritual practice. Drawing from the Therīgāthā (freedom songs of the earliest Buddhist nuns), T.S. Eliot, and his own training with Ajahn Chah in the Thai forest tradition, Kornfield presents three interconnected dimensions of freedom available through practice.
> The first dimension involves expanding our capacity to be present with the full range of human experience—joy, sorrow, fear, longing, boredom, and grief—without resistance or escape. Rather than perfecting ourselves, we perfect our love and compassion for humanity itself. The second dimension reveals the process of experience: seeing anicca (impermanence), dukkha (the unreliable nature of conditioned existence), and the emptiness of all phenomena. This understanding brings the "tears of the way"—a recognition of our common humanity that fosters deep forgiveness and tenderness.
> The third dimension points to consciousness itself, what Ajahn Chah called becoming "the one who knows" (Pāli: sati-bhūto). Kornfield guides practitioners to recognize that awareness exists outside of time, unlimited by the aging body or changing circumstances. When identity shifts from the content of experience to awareness itself, fear naturally diminishes and we fall in love with the world. This love then moves us to tend the earth with what Zen calls "bliss-bestowing hands"—engaged action arising from wisdom and joy rather than reactivity.

So this evening, I'd like to talk about mindfulness or loving awareness as both a gateway and the destination. And to talk about the dimensions of it in a way that I hope is helpful for you who practice and in your practice.

Speaking of gateway, it's important to say that these teachings and Spirit Rock and the community welcomes you all. Whatever particular body you were born into, whatever your class or sexual orientation or whatever your gender identity or whatever your race, whatever your political point of view, whatever background you have, the gates of the Dharma are open and inviting to say: here are practices and understandings, may they serve you.

So as you listen to this teaching, you can do it as a kind of meditation in itself, as a reflection. It's meant to empower, to encourage, to remind you of what's possible in your own heart and mind and what really matters in some way.

In saying that mindfulness is both the gateway and the destination, there's so much teaching of mindfulness out there in the broader world now—in education and business and healthcare, for purposes of reducing stress or becoming more productive or all kinds of other things which have great value. But there's also something that it leads to that is deeper than those. T.S. Eliot's famous lines in the Four Quartets: "We shall not cease from exploration, and the end of all your exploring will be to arrive where you started and know the place for the first time."

And so the invitation of mindfulness and loving awareness is really to be alive and present here on this earth, in this life, in a wakeful and honorable and beautiful way that is given to us as human beings. This is your gateway to freedom. It's a birthright of all human beings, this capacity to be aware.

Now, mindfulness has two aspects to it, like breathing in and breathing out. There's a quality of mindful presence, of becoming really present to life itself. And then there is mindful response. You breathe in, mindful presence, sit quietly. And then you respond to the world, mindful response. Tonight I'm going to focus more on mindful presence; later on mindful response and relationship to the community around us and to the collective that we're woven into.

There are three dimensions of the freedom that this gateway of mindfulness offers, or loving awareness. Not to gain, but to find just where you are, wherever your life is, whatever your family, community, work situation, living situation.

I have these verses from the Therīgāthā, which are the freedom songs of the earliest Buddhist nuns. It's a new, beautiful translation. Here's one from a woman named Amadina. She says: "For so long, I thought only of the river's end. Then one morning I set my paddle down to watch the sunrise over the eastern hills, only to find myself floating somehow gently upstream. I promise, it's not what I expected."

We're so busy paddling, and finally she set her paddle down. What she was looking for wasn't at the end of something, it turns out, but where she was, where you are, here and now.

So the first dimension of freedom isn't about gaining something. In fact, the goal of meditation isn't to gain something, but rather to come into a different relationship with this life that we've been given.

The first dimension of mindfulness or loving awareness that offers you a deeper freedom is the capacity to be mindful of experience, of the content of your experience. It's very practical because as you meditate and undertake the training of mindfulness, you gradually learn to trust in your capacity to be present and to tolerate your human incarnation. And that's not an easy thing. Take a look at it—there's a lot of things that are hard to tolerate.

Here's a poem from my dear friend Jane Hirshfield called "Fado": "With a sleight of hand, a man reaches close and lifts a quarter from inside a girl's ear, and from her hands he takes a dove she didn't know was there. Which amazes more, you wonder—the quarter's serrated murmur against the thumb, the dove's seduced silence, that they magically appeared, or that in Portugal, this same half-stop moment, it's almost dawn, and a woman in a wheelchair is singing a fado that puts every life in the room on one pan of a scale and itself on the other, and the copper bowls balance."

If you've heard Fado, the kind of depth of it that comes in that song and that sound—it's as if it's all of humanity being given through one voice.

So here we are, we have this human incarnation that we have to figure out what to do with. Mindfulness allows you to do what neuroscientists call expanding your window of tolerance. You sit in meditation thinking, "I'm going to get calm and reduce my stress and be happy." And what happens? You get a little bit quiet. And some of you just not often go to sleep—I notice that. You need some rest; I'm aware of that.

But then when you're not sleeping, what comes up? Anxiety. Your personal anxiety, the collective anxiety, the political anxiety, the environmental anxiety. You know all of those anxieties, right? The unfinished business of your heart. The grief that you haven't let yourself weep. The rage that may be there for the injustices of the world or what's touched you with injustice. The unexpressed love and creativity. Or maybe it's just your boredom or disappointment or restlessness or loneliness.

As the great poet Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness so quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few divine ingredients can."

So the point when you sit, if you get bored or restless, if the tears come and you grieve, if anger comes or longing—the point isn't to get rid of it. It's actually to begin to tolerate it with loving awareness and say, "This is part of being a human being." Because otherwise, guess what? The minute you get bored or lonely, what do you do? Open the refrigerator or go online or whatever your favorite way to put yourself to sleep is, because you can't tolerate being with yourself.

And so the first great gift of freedom is to allow yourself to learn how to sit with loving awareness for your full humanity. That means you'll sit and at times your body will hurt, and you have to hold that pain with kindness the way you would hold a crying child. Not the pain that you could simply move away from. People say, "Well, why should I sit with pain?" Because someday you're going to have pain that you can't move away from. Or you'll be sitting with someone who's in the hospital, holding their hand, and they're going to be in pain. If you don't know how to be with it, you're going to freak out. But if you learn how to be with joy and sorrow, praise and blame, pleasure and pain, this brings an immense freedom to you.

And then you have to be with all your desires. "I want this and I don't want that." You know your desires, the desiring mind. Julia Child writes, "In department stores, so much unnecessary kitchen equipment is bought indiscriminately by people who just came in for men's underwear." The desiring mind can pick you up and take you to the mall or Las Vegas. It can get you married. It can also get you divorced. It can do anything. But to be able to sit and say, "Ah, this is desire. This is longing. This is boredom, loneliness. This is fear. This is love"—you begin to discover that the heart is big enough to hold it all. And that you can trust this. This is an enormous freedom to have.

Now, these simple, skillful means that we teach on retreats and in classes are to be able to bow to what arises inwardly, to name it gently. "This is sadness. This is longing. This is joy. This is love. This is fear. This is hate." To acknowledge it and to get curious. What does this energy actually feel like if I let myself experience it?

And then, here's another little move: to invite it to open and say, "All right, show me—whether it's longing or love or boredom or fear—show me the whole nine yards, the whole megillah, whatever language you want to use. Display yourself. Let me see it." Because most of the trouble with what you experience in meditation when you get in trouble is your resistance to the experience. It gets worse and worse and worse. And then it stays more. But when you say, "All right, let me just experience this"—

"Oh, I'm so restless. I feel like I could die." All right? I'll be the first person at Spirit Rock to die of restlessness this spring. Take me. Kill me. Restless, restless. Name it restless. Dying, dying, dying, dying. And then you'll notice a little thought comes: "I wonder if I should go out for a little snack after the class." Because the mind has no pride, right?

And you begin to realize that you can be aware—as we did in that first meditation—of being the sky of mind. You discover that you can allow experience, that the heart is big enough and the mind spacious enough to do this. So you name it, you acknowledge it, you let it open, you feel it as an energy.

And then something very interesting happens. Even though you become spacious, it also brings a kind of intimacy with life. Thomas Merton, the Christian mystic, says, "Of what avail is it if we can go to the moon if we can't cross the abyss that separates us from ourselves?" There's something tremendously intimate about loving awareness. It's a willingness to be present for all of the feelings and thoughts and experiences that make up our humanity, and to be able to be with them.

Now I'm talking about this in this sort of nice, glib way—you can do this. It's not that easy. In my own practice, when I sit, generally I can become very spacious, a kind of vastness. But I also live a very complicated and speedy life, and I tend to be a speedy person by nature, somewhat impatient. So yes, there's vastness, and sometimes I'll bring in loving-kindness, metta. But sometimes I'm just impatient or frustrated. Sometimes it gets harder than that.

I think, for example, about when I went through a very painful divorce seven years ago or so—which I didn't want to go through, as one doesn't. I'm generally a quite loyal person, and I thought I would be married for the rest of my life. But it didn't happen that way, and there was a lot of grief and agony and anguish. It was really painful. I would hold it with compassion.

I remembered when I was training in the forest monasteries and I got sick with malaria. I was lying there, kind of out of my mind, sweating with fever, and my teacher came to visit. He later brought some medicines. He said, "Sick, huh?" I said, "Yeah." He said, "Makes you want to go home to your mother, doesn't it?" "Yeah." He said, "Okay, we've all been there. You can do this. I'll give you some medicine, which will help, but you can do it." And because he had done it, he kind of exemplified the capacity that we have.

So there I am when it's really hard. And sometimes I couldn't do it. Sometimes it was too painful. I was too sad. I'd get up. But then I made this practice, which I have now: I won't get up for three times if something's really difficult. Okay, I have to get up. It's too hard, too caught in it. Okay, that's one time. Now let me sit a little bit longer. Compassion, vastness. Yeah, but this is too painful. Okay, that's twice.

An interesting thing happens. On the third time, I let myself get up. It's not like you're supposed to torture yourself. But an interesting thing happens: as you push the envelope of your capacity to be present, to tolerate all of your humanity, your presence deepens and the loving awareness gets stronger. Even in two minutes of saying, "I can't do this, but I'll do it a couple more minutes until the next wave comes when I've got to get up"—in those two minutes, you feel stronger and deeper. "Oh, I did that." Yeah, but now you're going to get up. Well, let's try that again.

What you discover is that it's a process—a really trustworthy process—of letting yourself find a way to open to your full humanity. And each dimension of it gives you a kind of freedom.

Here, from a woman I worked with on retreat who was facing the demon of her own inner struggle with binge eating. She said, "I believed that food had an unparalleled capacity to bring satisfaction and free me from suffering."

Time and again, I've reached for the food, looking for it to do its magic, only to have it turn on me, fail me, bring me untold physical and emotional suffering and shame. I became hypercritical of myself, my situation. I despaired.

Freedom has come as I've become more mindful of my own body and the intense discomfort I was trying to escape from. I started to find that I could recover more quickly and less painfully from bouts of compulsive binging if I could stay even a little bit kind to my body and present with my pain. Instead of eating more just to try and avoid the effects of having eaten too much and the remorse of having done it again, I could actually watch myself start down that sad old path, and as the loving awareness grew, I realized, "Oh, I don't have to do this," and self-compassion would come in. I'm deeply grateful for the compassion that has rescued me from the realm of the hungry ghosts.

It's poignant and painful, and it also has tremendous courage in it—a testament to what's possible.

There comes a kind of fearlessness as you practice. And this is a really important thing to say: fearlessness doesn't mean that you won't be afraid.

I remember going with my teacher, Ajahn Chah. We were invited to a monastery on the Cambodian border, a new little forest temple. We got a ride in this guy's pickup truck. He was a young guy who was driving really fast on a one-and-a-half-lane dirt road through the mountains. Mostly it was fine, but once in a while there'd be a big bus or a logging truck or a water buffalo in the middle of the road, and you couldn't see it around the curve. He was speeding, and we asked him to slow down, but he was young and he didn't and wouldn't.

I started to hold on really tight, thinking, "Okay, I'm going to die as a monk. What will my mother think?" And then I looked over and saw that Ajahn Chah's knuckles were white too. That somehow reassured me a little bit.

Finally we made it. We got there. We didn't die. We pulled into the compound of this place, and Ajahn Chah smiled. He wasn't afraid of dying—he knew that, he showed that in many ways. He looked at me and said, "Scary ride, wasn't it?" And it's just what it was. It's not like you pretend there isn't fear. But even fear becomes simply, "Oh, this is what fear is like. Fear is like this."

As this capacity for loving awareness grows—our trust and ability to be present for life—it not only affects us but affects those around us. You know how it is when you're with somebody who's able to be present in a difficult situation or in a conflict, how helpful that is.

And if you want to change the world that really needs it, the human world, you know that has to start with a change of heart, a change of mind. W. H. Auden, the poet, wrote about loving your crooked neighbor with your own crooked heart. It's got to start somewhere, and it starts in here.

James Baldwin wrote, "I imagine one of the reasons people cling to their hate and fear so stubbornly is they sense that once hate is gone, they'll be forced to deal with their own pain." A really powerful thing. Once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain.

When we can't bear insecurity—anybody in this room have perfect security? Please raise your hand. Financial security, total? Physical security? It's just not what incarnation offers. When you can't deal with it, you project it out because it's scary and you can't hold it. And so you blame your insecurity on others—the Muslims or the gays or the immigrants or black people or brown people. Or communists. They were the old one. Remember them?

They're coming back around, actually. It's like the enemy du jour. But it's actually because, as a society, we can't tolerate our vulnerability.

And yet, as the poet Rilke says, ultimately it's upon your vulnerability that you depend. Because we're vulnerable to each other. Every time you drive down the street, you're vulnerable to the people stopping at red lights so you can go through the green. Or to the farmers and the woman with the bandana who picks the strawberries, and the people who spray the pesticide on your food that gets washed off. We're in it together. And every breath you take dusts the top of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa as it comes over the Pacific, but it also dusts the Fukushima nuclear reactor. It's us.

And so when we can hold this with compassion, we become a different force in the world—one that doesn't project our fear onto others, but understands that this is our human lot, and that we can do this in a beautiful and wise way.

There's been a lot of publicity recently about the National Memorial for Peace and Justice that just opened in Montgomery, Alabama, started in part by Bryan Stevenson and the Equal Justice Initiative. Hopefully many of you have at least seen the photos, because it's extremely moving. There are those long wooden columns under the roof, one for each county in America where terrorism was committed against Black people, with the names of those who were lynched—women, children, men, teenagers. It's a little bit like the truth and reconciliation process in South Africa. It says we need to be able to see this and tolerate the shame and the pain and the suffering of it if we're to live in a different way.

And your practice of mindfulness is that which allows you to live with your true humanity—to be in the presence of the unbearable beauty of life and the ocean of tears. It's the gateway to your freedom, and not just your own, but to our collective freedom.

Now, the second dimension of mindfulness or loving awareness—besides being able to be aware of, to hold with compassion, to tolerate the range of human experience. Because as Auden points out, it's not just the crooked neighbor. There isn't anybody who doesn't have, because we live in cultures of it, their own prejudice. I do. Our own racism, our own fears, our own hatred that we tolerate. And when we can tolerate it, we can actually examine it instead of being lost in it.

So you start to realize the point isn't so much to perfect yourself—"Okay, I'm going to be this perfect person." It's to perfect your love, to perfect your compassion for humanity itself, yourself included.

The second dimension of freedom that comes through mindfulness and loving awareness is not mindfulness of the content of experience, but noticing the process of experience. And again, this is tremendously practical, because in the midst of drama—now I know you don't have drama, but some people do, right?—in the midst of loss, of being triggered, in the midst of fear or difficulty, or even of new possibilities, there's another way of relating than being closed down or reactive.

I remember the Ojibwe people saying, "Sometimes I go about pitying myself when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky." There is another perspective.

Loving awareness not only sees the content of experience and holds it with compassion, but it also illuminates the nature of life. As you pay attention, you notice that wherever you pay attention, everything is in change. Everything is changing. It's impermanent. The Pali word is dukkha. It has some problems built into it, which I'll explain—it encompasses suffering and loss and so forth, whatever you look at. And everything is also empty. These things need a little unpacking, so I'll try to do that.

In the Buddhist stories, the Buddha was wandering with various followers and came to the bank of the Ganges River. He said, "See the bubbles that float along the bank of the Ganges River?" They said, "Yes, we do." He said, "Examine them. If you examine them closely, you'll see that they appear, but that they're fundamentally empty—there's no substance to them, and after time they disappear." They said, "We see that." He said, "In the same way, examine your thoughts and your opinions. Examine your emotions. Examine the sensations in your body, the views and perspectives you have about life." And they too, as we practiced in the first meditation, arise for a time and then vanish.

The more quiet you get, the more you start to see that kind of emptiness—that things don't last and they're insubstantial.

Let me put it in some other languages.

It was a good time here in San Francisco. I was here for that. Summer of love. And it's gone. So are the nineties. In fact, remember Y2K? That one's gone too. Remember 2017? Where are they? They're back with the pharaohs, and they're back with Genghis Khan, and they're back with Lao Tzu, and they're back with the dinosaurs. They disappeared back to where everything goes to.

Where is that? Things appear in the reality of the present, and then they vanish like bubbles. Where is the year 2000? Where is last week? Where is your childhood? Gone, right? And we feel things to be solid, but when you get quiet, they really are not. They don't last. And therefore, you can't hold on to them. I mean, you can try holding on, but then what you get is rope burn.

So things are impermanent. This is part of what you start to see. And your wisdom grows. Oh yeah, it's all in change. That's the reality of it. And then you can't hold on to it, really.

And then you see dukkha. Dukkha is a complex word that means unreliable, pain, loss, aging, sickness, death. Again, that life has both the unbearable beauty of the world and the ocean of tears. This is what human incarnation is made of. Even the most beautiful experiences we have as human beings don't last. And not only that—you're in the middle of that beautiful experience, the best wine and the most beautiful music, the greatest lovemaking, and then that little thought comes in: "Gosh, I hope we can do this again." Because you know it's going to end.

Built into incarnation is the fact that everything dissolves. And what does it mean to be alive and wise and loving in a world where this is true? This is the way that it is.

Loving awareness or mindfulness allows us to see this and to see that we're all in it together. Because what comes with this is a sense of our common humanity. There you are aging—you may have noticed that. Or you're going through financial loss or divorce, or someone you love has died, or even worse. People come and talk to me and one of their children has died, which is kind of the most unbearable of pains.

There's a poem in these beautiful songs I started to read from, written by a nun whose daughter Jiva died. When she was meditating, all of a sudden she was weeping, and she began to realize how many other mothers had daughters named Jiva, and that a certain number of them too had died. Then all of a sudden she realized it wasn't just those mothers in India—she was in the middle kingdom of India at that time—but she realized, "Oh, I am part of all mothers. Sometimes we give birth and they live, and sometimes we give birth and they die." She realized it wasn't personal to her, even though it was tragic and personal. There was something greater that she was a part of.

That's true in financial loss or divorce or whatever we want to talk about. There comes a different kind of tears—not just the tears of grief that we have to grieve for some change or loss that's very important, but what are called the tears of the way. They're the dharma tears that say, "Oh yeah, this is what it's like to be a human being on this earth—to have birth and beauty and creation and celebration, and also to have loss and death and illness." This is what's given to us.

As we open to this reality—that it's not us, that we didn't make a mistake, that we're not suffering because we did something wrong—that's not what dukkha means.

Suffering isn't because you were bad or did something wrong. It's because you're a human being. And human life has joy and sorrow, praise and blame, gain and loss, birth and death, sweet and sour. It's woven together with these opposites. And it can't not be. How could you have day without night? How could you have birth without death?

What happens as the sense of common humanity grows, when we see that it's all impermanent and ungraspable in some way, is that the heart becomes tender and wise—the tears of the way—and one becomes very forgiving.

This is William Butler Yeats: "I'm content to follow to source every event and action and thought his whole life, measure the lot, forgive myself the lot. When such as I cast out remorse, so great a sweetness flows in my breast, for we must laugh and we must sing, for we are blessed by everything and everything we look upon is blessed."

And there comes a tenderness that says, this is our life. Instead of the kind of struggle against the way things are, there grows a trust that, like our ancestors and the generations before, like the Miwoks who walked this beautiful land and left it for us, the generations turn and we're part of something so much bigger.

At the end of things, it's not always the end of the story. Today, 200,000 people died, give or take a few. And today, 250,000 people were born. Tomorrow, 200,000 more will die and 250,000 more will be born—every day. This is wild. This is us coming into being, having an earthly dance, and then leaving these bodies.

What's beautiful in understanding this—it's not tragic, it's actually equally magnificent—is that when something ends, something else is always born. And you can begin to trust this in the most beautiful way. You think you've come to the end of your road and that all the gates are closed, and you have to be quiet for a while and maybe feel your fear and your grief and wait to see what will come. And then, I promise you, something new will come. It always does.

I like to think about Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and Leymah Gbowee, both of whom received the Nobel Prize several years ago. They were leaders of Liberia in West Africa. Ellen said—because they'd been through so much pain and struggle and warfare in their country and around that part of West Africa—in celebrating her Nobel Prize, she said, "Liberia used to be known for its child soldiers, and now they remember our country for its women." Out of that suffering came something that had never happened before there.

So there's also a way that with our great hearts, with the loving awareness that grows, that we can trust and rest in, we know that whatever happens is not the end of the story—that something new is waiting to be born. That's how it is.

One hundred billion red cells are born in you each day. New red cells. One hundred billion. You're amazing. And 600,000 particles of skin leave your body every hour. That's why you need a vacuum, by the way. You get a new stomach lining every five days. New eyebrows every four months—those of you who don't pluck them anyway. And pretty much your liver replaces itself every six weeks. You too are being reborn and remade. This is not the same body you had back then. Oh, you know that—you just look in the mirror, you know that. You are part of something that is renewing itself. And this is part of our common humanity as well.

So you begin to find the freedom of tolerating experience, of being with the full range and content of your humanity. You start to see the principles, the laws of impermanence and emptiness and ungraspability. You start to realize what it means to see the whole process of life renewing itself. And there's a great freedom that comes. Whatever drama you're in—oh yes, this is part of the renewal.

And you begin to trust that.

And then finally, how do we hold this immensity? This third dimension of mindfulness is an awareness of consciousness itself. It's what we were doing in that meditation when we started this evening, and in a way why I began with that practice. And again, it's really practical. This is not talking about some kind of philosophy that you have to believe. You try it for yourself and see whether you can learn to be present. And when you are, what are things doing? What is the nature of your life?

So here's the next step. When my teacher Ajahn Chah was living as a forest monk, he practiced very ardently in caves and out in the forest with the tigers and elephants. He had lots of stories about that in the old days. And because he was an ardent meditator and quite devoted, at times he had great experiences. His body would fill with light and he would have visions and great insights and all those things.

For people who come here on retreat, we have an annual two-month retreat. And one of the honors I've had for twenty years of that was to sit with people each day and talk about what's happening in their practice. Amazing things happen sometimes. Your body does dissolve into light and rapture and all kinds of beautiful things. So Ajahn Chah had these great insights and experiences, and he thought, what do I do? I'm going to go see the most renowned master of his time, who was another Ajahn named Ajahn Mun, a forest master.

He went to see him and said, "I need to tell you about the last years of my practice and get some guidance." So he laid out all these things after he bowed and sat there quietly for a bit. And then Ajahn Mun looked back at him and said, "Chah, you missed the point. Those are just experiences." He said, "They're like movies. You can go to movies and there's a romantic comedy and there's a documentary and there's a war movie and there's a drama—or a cartoon, animated, whatever it happens to be." He said, "Those are just movies that appear and disappear. And the point is, they're always changing. You can't get one of those movies to stay. The question is, to whom do they happen? What you have to do now is turn your attention from the movies, which you're able to be present for, back to ask: who is seeing this? Turn it back to consciousness itself, to awareness. And become"—the word in Pali is sati buto—"the one who knows, the witness to all things."

Turn your attention back. Ajahn Chah used this phrase: to become the knowing, or the one who knows. And in this very practical way, you step out of the drama of life and you start to witness it, as we did in that first meditation, from the place of loving awareness or consciousness itself that says, "Hmm, look what's happening now. This is this kind of drama. This is a war movie, or a conflict, or this is a love story," whatever it happens to be.

Another simple way to explain this—and we did that meditation, you can try it at home—look in the mirror. When you look in the mirror, you'll notice you've aged, right? It droops, it's wrinkly, it loses its fur in some places and grows new fur in other places. As my colleague Wes Nisker says, the hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard. It ages.

But the interesting thing is that when you look, you don't necessarily feel older, right? Everybody know that experience? That's because it's only your body that's getting old. When you look in the mirror and notice it drooping or aging, the consciousness that's seeing it is outside of time. The body exists in time—it's little and gets bigger and adult, and then it gets older, and then it dies. But the awareness itself is timeless. It says, "Hmm, let's see, how are we doing in this incarnation?" Seems to be like we're in the middle at best right now, sort of in the closing stages, or whatever. But consciousness is not limited by your body.

I know this because I've sat with people in coma where they're flatlined, where they say nothing's there. I was sitting with Marlene Jones, who was one of our wonderful teachers here, and she'd had heart failure. They didn't get to her in time—a long time passed before she got to the hospital. For a week there was no sign of anything. Brain dead, body hardly responding, no response to any kind of stimulus. So her daughter and family and I decided, alright, take her off the life support.

I was holding her hand and I said, "Marlene, you're leaving us too soon. I really loved you. We needed your support and help. You were so great." And then I added, "But the least you could do is give us a sign or something," thinking maybe afterward, whatever.

I said that, and two tears rolled down her cheeks. Nothing for a week, no response—and then that.

Who we are is not this physical body.

This is the reality of it. We identify with our body, we identify with our views and feelings and thoughts, but that's not the game. And as we begin to rest in loving awareness, there's a kind of shift of identity that's tremendously liberating.

Here from Thich Nhat Hanh, where he says: "This body is not me. I'm not limited by this body. I am life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Since before time I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds on our journey. Birth and death are a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand. Let us say goodbye to meet again soon. We will meet today and again tomorrow. We will meet at the source of every moment, in all forms of life."

This is what—first of all, it's true. You can check it out yourself, but it happens to have the charm of being true. It's what got Thich Nhat Hanh through the horrors of the American Vietnam War, through all kinds of terrible things. How could he do this? Because he knew that he wasn't limited by this body and mind. And so he was able to impart that to others around him.

I was just in Dharamsala with the Dalai Lama for these Mind and Life science teachings, and he was talking about his own practice. He said, "You know, if I go somewhere and I think I'm the Dalai Lama, it doesn't go so well." We're not the roles. We get to inhabit them, but that's not who you are. There's a coming home.

Here's one more way to talk about this mystery. We're really talking about the mystery of incarnation. Derek Amato, in his late twenties, dove off a diving board into a pool and hit his head on the bottom. It was the shallow end, and he had a horrible concussion. He lost part of his hearing and was rushed to the hospital. He wasn't paralyzed, fortunately, but when he came back, he had this odd impulse. He went to a friend's house who had a piano, sat down—he'd never been musical, never studied—and played this incredible piece of music.

It's now called acquired musical savant syndrome, because they don't know what the hell else to call it. From that moment, even though he'd never studied, he didn't just play—he could play Beethoven and Bach—but he was also composing. He was composing rock music, but he didn't compose it by writing it down. He just played it. There's a beautiful NPR show, and there are YouTubes of him. He's just astonished. He said, "I started to weep. What is this coming through me?"

But it's like Rumi the poet, or Mozart. Do you think Mozart composed that stuff? He heard it, and he wrote it down as fast as he could before it disappeared. Or Rumi—the Masnavi is an ocean of poems. Somebody was going around behind him, writing it down. He was listening to the music of the spheres, to the poem of the ages. A hundred thousand verses just poured through him.

Who do you think you are? Consciousness is not just that little thing. You are connected with it all. Personality is, I think Aldous Huxley called it a reducing valve, basically—so you can handle the dimensions of mystery and still remember your social security number.

So you are consciousness itself. You are all that is. This is your true nature. And when you can witness the world from that place, as we practiced in the beginning, the practicality of it is that it reduces fear. Fear arises, but oh, that's just fear. It reduces the grasping. You realize this is not the story of the world—your body or what you have. It's just not the deepest reality. And you live in a different and much freer dimension.

And then finally, as your identity shifts, it all comes back in a circle, because it's not like levels. These are actually all like a mandala, or dimensions.

We are complex beings, and these are dimensions of consciousness. In the Zen ox-herding pictures, you see at the end—after going and finding the ox and taming it, this whole beautiful Zen story—the tenth picture is this figure returning to town with what's called bliss-bestowing hands. "I carry my wine bottle in one hand, not afraid of anything, and I've got my staff in the other, and I go back and I offer blessings to everything that I touch."

There's something that happens when you become able to tolerate experience of all kinds, so that your heart grows wise and big and compassionate. When you see the nature of life—impermanent, empty, ungraspable, containing both the tears of the way and the beauty of the world—you realize that it's not that you're in the world. The world is in you. You are this consciousness in the world. This is what you are. It's having its way with you.

And you fall in love with the world. You fall in love with the sky and the grasses. You fall in love with all the weird people sitting around you. In spite of yourself and in spite of world history, you fall in love with it because it's magnificent. You fall in love with wood and carpets and bells, with light and dark, and you say, "Wow, what an amazing..." There comes awe. Mystery. You know Allen Ginsberg's coda to his great poem Howl, where he starts: "Holy, holy, holy, everything is holy."

And in the vastness—as said Nisargadatta, one of my Indian teachers—in the vastness of consciousness then, there's only one movement: the movement of love. Because it's all you. It's your life, but it's not your small life. You are life expressing itself. And you can enter and abide in this.

Then, with bliss-bestowing hands, you're able to tend the world, to reach out and mend it, to do what's necessary, but from a really different place. You bring a sense of joy or ease even to the great sufferings and difficulties.

I've told the story on other nights of being at the airport with my daughter for the demonstrations after that first January, a year ago, that presidential edict that forbade people coming to the U.S. from those seven predominantly Muslim countries. There were big demonstrations, and we went down together. She's an asylum lawyer, and she came down with a whole group of young lawyers who were trying to get asylum or save people whose lives were in danger from all around the world. There were more young lawyers there than there were people who needed lawyers, in fact. They put out a sign: "Anyone need immigration or legal help?"

Everybody had their signs, and they were shouting and chanting—the usual kind of archetypal demonstration. The best piece of it: we were at one gate with about four hundred people. The whole thing had a couple thousand people in it for a couple days. And in the middle of this one, as everyone's chanting, "No ban, no fear, refugees are welcome here," there was a New Orleans jazz band.

So people are chanting, and then the drummer kicks in with a nice riff. You get a little pulse behind it. Then the trumpet plays a beautiful riff on top, and the trombone comes in, and pretty soon everybody is chanting and singing at the same time. The whole "No Ban No Fear" turns into this New Orleans jazz piece. The security guards, the cops—everybody's smiling. Because it was an important demonstration and a statement, but you could feel the love in it. You could feel the joy in it. It wasn't against something. It was for life itself.

Molly Ivins, who was a really wonderful writer, a columnist, an activist—all kinds of other things—from Texas and the New York Times and all those kinds of dangerous places, she wrote: "So keep fighting for freedom and justice, beloveds, but don't forget to have fun doing it. Be outrageous. Rejoice in all the oddities freedom can produce. And when you get through celebrating the sheer joy of a good fight, be sure to tell those who follow how much fun it was."

When this capacity for mindfulness grows, for loving awareness, and we can rest in it, there come both the tears of the way and the joy of participation in life—because it's ours and it's us.

I read a poem a month or two ago, but I want to read it as I close. When I came back from India about a month ago, I was in Washington, D.C., teaching. I got there just in time to go down to Pennsylvania Avenue to the big March for Our Lives. It was remarkable to be there. Many of you were at other marches of this kind, those of you who are of that particular persuasion. I don't assume what your politics are, but for me this felt important personally. I want to protect people. I want to protect people who are black. I want to protect people who are brown.

I want to protect gays and lesbians and immigrants. I want to protect the dignity of everyone, including even the people who don't want to protect people. And I want to protect people who keep our laws. I want to protect the police and the government and the firefighters—all of it. But all of it out of respect.

And the beautiful thing about that march was that there was so much civility there. It was not just peaceful—yes, there were lots of kids and families and young people—but it had a spirit of love. It had a spirit of great care. And a kind of fierceness. This really matters. But it was also really civil and beautiful.

So here's a poem from my friend Alison Luterman, a wonderful poet in Oakland. She writes:

I see her on TV, screaming into a microphone. Her head is shaved, and she's beautiful, and seventeen, and her high school was just shot up, and she had to walk by friends lying in their own blood, her teacher bleeding out. And she's my daughter, the one I never had, and she's your daughter, and everyone's daughter, and she's her own woman in the fullness of her young fire, calling bullshit on politicians who take money from the gun makers. Tears rain down her face, but she doesn't stop speaking. She doesn't apologize. She keeps calling them out—all of them, all of us—who didn't do enough to stop this thing. And you can see the gray faces of those who've always held power contort, utterly baffled to face this new breed of young woman. Not silky. Not compliant. Not caring if they call her a ten or a troll. And she cries, but she doesn't stop speaking truth into the microphone, though her voice is raw and shaking and the sun is molten brass. I'm three thousand miles away thinking how Neruda said the blood of the children ran through the streets without fuss. Only now she is, they are, raising a fuss, shouting down the walls of Jericho. And it's not that we road-weary elders have been given the all-clear exactly. But our shoulders do let down a little. We breathe from a deeper place. We say to each other, well, it looks like the baton may be passing to these next runners. And they are fleet as thought and fiery as stars. And we take another breath and we say to each other, the baton has been passed. And we set off then, running hard behind them.

It's hard not to weep when I read it. I love the ending too, because it's not just them. We set off running, but hard behind them—because it's for all of us, for what we care about.

And each of you will have the things that you care about as you open, as your heart opens. As you become wiser in these ways that we've described, there's nothing else to do but to tend the earth—because it's you, it's your earth, it's your people.

And this isn't linear. There isn't one layer after another. But these are your gifts, your birthright, your capacity to rest in loving awareness and to open in these ways. It's why we come together—to remind ourselves. And it's also why our community here has offered this place for us for all these years: to come and be reminded.

I'm grateful for you coming. There are all kinds of wonderful programs here, as I mentioned, and now that you've been here, we invite you to come back to try a day-long retreat or a week-long retreat or a month-long retreat or do the kind of training that's offered.

And more than anything, to carry whatever was touched in you back out with your art, with your poetry, with your business acumen, as a parent, as a gardener, as someone who tends and cares for the earth.

This month at Spirit Rock is called Metta May, and so there are all kinds of classes and teachings on loving kindness. You can get one of these little Metta May things out there, or look online, and we invite you to that.

Thank you for coming. It's really a pleasure. Take care, and drive politely out there—it's very crowded. See you again, I hope. Good night.

Mindful Loving Awareness - Monday Night Dharma Talk - Part 2 - Big Sky Mind Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 44 min

> In this Monday night dharma talk from Spirit Rock's 33rd year of weekly gatherings, Jack Kornfield offers a guided meditation exploring the spacious nature of awareness itself. Rather than beginning with the traditional anchor of breath, this practice opens through the doorway of sound, inviting practitioners to sense that mind is not limited to the size of the head but is vast and open like the sky.
> The meditation guides listeners to observe how sounds arise and pass away within spacious awareness, followed by thoughts appearing like clouds, emotions moving through like weather, and even the body floating as a field of changing sensations. This approach connects to the satipaṭṭhāna teachings on mindfulness of mind and mental phenomena, while emphasizing the quality of loving awareness—consciousness that is open, tender, and compassionate toward all beings lost in separateness and confusion.
> Kornfield emphasizes that meditation practices are explorations rather than tests, and that among the 84,000 doorways to awakening, different approaches serve different practitioners at different times. The talk offers practical wisdom for bringing this spacious awareness into daily life—even in noisy urban settings—and raises the profound question of identity: if we are not our changing bodies, thoughts, or emotions, perhaps we are the awareness itself that witnesses all things yet remains unlimited by them.

Good evening. It's a pleasure to welcome you here to Spirit Rock Center for this Monday night class. If we've not met before, my name is Jack Kornfield, and the Monday night class is in its 33rd year here—easy to keep count because it was the year my daughter was born. Spirit Rock has grown in this beautiful center and this gorgeous valley that we got from the Nature Conservancy through a whole community's effort and care and devotion to the twin principles of compassion and wakefulness, or inner freedom of heart, that are central to the teachings of the Buddha, but that are really part of all wise spiritual life.

So it's a pleasure to welcome you. How many of you are here for the first time? Particularly happy to have you. What we do on Monday night is really quite simple. We begin with a meditation—sometimes more of a silent meditation. Tonight will be a guided practice that I'll explain in a little bit. After that, we take a break to sit or walk, and following that, there's usually a teaching, on occasion dialogue or questions and answers.

In coming into the temple, the basic purpose is not so much to get anything. If anything, maybe this is the dump—it's the place to leave stuff. But more than anything, it's a place to be reminded of something that you already know, to return to a quality of presence of heart and mind and to reawaken in yourself, or reconnect, or support that which is already wise and is already loving. That's your own true nature.

This evening I'm also happy we're joined by the next group of teachers at Spirit Rock, the current four-year teacher training. Both the Spirit Rock teacher training and the IMS teacher training on the East Coast, our sister center which started at the same time, are predominantly people of color, so we're going to have close to 40 new teachers in the next few years, almost all of whom are also people of color. I would like to ask them—because I love them and they're a really great group, I told them they're the best we've had yet—if they wouldn't mind just standing up for a moment so people who are in the community can see who's coming to teach you. They are as varied and interesting and wonderful as they look—maybe even more so. We'll find out.

And I want to thank Antonio Aversano for playing that beautiful native flute. There are CDs and information about his sacred sound sessions out there for all who are interested. Thank you, Antonio. It was really beautiful.

Spirit Rock, as it has grown over these years, now offers all kinds of retreats and classes and trainings in compassion and forgiveness and loving-kindness and mindfulness of the body, and trainings for educators and for healthcare professionals, and family retreats and programs for parents and lawyers and all kinds of people—and the people that they need, yes, that's right.

I know when my daughter said she was going to become a lawyer, my heart sank a little bit. I said, "I don't know that many happy lawyers, kiddo." She said, "Chill out, Dad. I'm going to do human rights law. It's fine. It's okay." And she's great. But anyway, the Lawyers' Retreat is actually a really wonderful and important one because it's kindred spirits, where people come who have this sensibility of that which is sacred and want to imbue the work that they do. This is really important for all of us, because we live in a society that can be characterized by the absence of the sacred in many ways. To come to a place or to come together in community and be reminded of the sacredness of life, in whatever language or form works for you, becomes not just a gift but almost an imperative to stay sane in the busy times that we live, in times that are so outer-directed.

So tonight I'd like us to start in a way a little bit differently than certain other Monday nights where we sit more silently. This is a guided meditation, and for some people it will work well; for others it's not the right flavor. There are 84,000 doorways into the sacred, and this is one of them.

But it's a beautiful one.

Ordinarily, for those who do mindfulness meditation practice—or loving awareness, as I like to call it—it's common to begin with mindfulness of the breath. Many of you already do that. Or mindfulness of the body. Or you begin to become aware of feelings and thoughts and so forth. These are part of what's called the foundations of mindfulness.

Tonight's meditation will start by opening our attention, our loving awareness, not to the breath and body, but rather to sound itself—to the doorway of the ear. And with it, as the meditation is guided, you'll be invited to sense the open spaciousness of mind itself, within which we can then become aware of body and breath and heart and mind and all that arises.

All meditations are really an exploration. They're an invitation to discover something. So let yourself discover. It may work or it may not. If it's frustrating, that's okay—you can be mindful of that. If you hate it, you can simply notice: "Oh, I hate this. How's that? Interesting." It doesn't matter. It'll just be what it is. And if you want to, you can always return to your other practice of mindfulness of breath or something else.

But let's practice together, especially on this beautiful spring evening where the grasses are still green, waving up the hill, about to turn golden as you know. They're changing their hair color, as one does in California. It's a beautiful evening.

So feel yourself present as you can in this beautiful place and valley. First, let your eyes close gently and come back to a quality of presence. Here you are, seated halfway between heaven and earth in this human form. Let your body be at ease as you sit. Let your attention rest with a loving awareness, just here and now.

As you rest here in the reality of the present, the ever-present moment, bring your attention to sound—to the doorway of the ear—and notice the play of sound as it arises and passes away. There are the soft sounds in the room. Sometimes distant sounds of traffic or air traffic. There is the sound of these words as they arise and pass away, appearing and then vanishing. And there is the sound of the bells.

Relax. Rest just here and now, and let the sounds come and go—appearing and disappearing. Words, soft sounds in the room, and even the sound of silence.

As you listen, let yourself imagine or sense or feel in any way you can that your mind is not limited to the size of your head, that it's bigger—as big as this whole room and even more vast. Open like the sky, without inside or outside. Let yourself feel your mind open like the sky, allowing sounds to appear like clouds or bubbles. Sounds nearby and distant sounds. Bells and silence. Arising and passing in the vast open space of mind.

Relax. Rest in the spaciousness and let the sounds arise and appear like clouds, then disappear, leaving no trace.

In its true nature, mind is not limited by the body. Mind is vast and open, transparent and timeless, allowing for all things yet not limited by them. To know if this is so or not, look directly at the nature of your own mind.

And notice too: just as sounds arise in the vast space of mind and disappear, so too do thoughts and images arise. Word thoughts, picture thoughts appear like clouds and tell a little story or show an image, then dissolve back into the silence.

Sounds arise and pass. Thoughts appear, display themselves, and vanish on their own.

Rest in the space of awareness itself. Relax into it. Trust it. Let the appearances of sounds and images and words come and go, come and go, like clouds.

Sounds come and go.

Thoughts, images, and words appear like clouds and float in the vast space of mind, vanishing like clouds or bubbles. Rest in the spaciousness, the clear sky of awareness. It is your own true nature. It is home.

Notice too how feelings and emotions can arise like weather in the sky. Sadness or boredom, frustration, longing, love, joy—like weather, they appear for a time and color the sky. And then they too dissolve and vanish. Just as sounds and thoughts arise like clouds, so too the weather brings moods and feelings. Easy come, easy go. Let them arise and pass as they will. You are the vast sky.

Sounds come and go. Thoughts and images arise like clouds in the vast space and sky of awareness. Moods and emotions appear like weather for a time and then pass away.

Notice too how the body floats in the vast space of awareness. If you sense directly, there is no solid body. There are areas of pressure and warmth, of tingling and coolness, hardness and softness—a field of energy that is ever changing, floating in the vast space of awareness. Relax and let the energy field of the body float and change slowly. It breathes, and the breath moves like a breeze in the space. And you are the vast space of awareness itself.

Sounds come and go. The breath moves like a breeze. Moods and emotions float and color the sky like weather for a time and then disappear. Thoughts and images, sensations arise and exist for a time and pass away. You are the awareness itself that contains all things and is yet not limited by them. You are consciousness, loving awareness.

And as you feel the vastness and connection with all things, let there arise a deep sense of compassion for all those beings who forget who they really are, who are lost in separateness and fear and confusion. The vast sky is loving awareness itself—open, tender, allowing for all things, yet not limited by them. Rest in consciousness itself, in loving awareness. This is your true nature. Trust it. Relax into it. It is your home.

And when you hear the sound of the bell and you're ready, let your eyes open again and remain with the sense of vastness as the colors and images appear, all within the same vast space of loving awareness, of consciousness itself.

Did some of you have a sense that your mind wasn't the size of your head, that there was some sense of spaciousness and openness? I see some people nodding. I'm not going to ask you to raise your hand because the people who don't will feel left out. But it's not because you're the superior meditators—sorry about that. It's just that this particular practice on this day worked for you.

Because there are many different practices, you have to sense, as you let yourself open to a spiritual life, which are the gates that touch your own heart and allow you to open. For some, it might be the practice of loving-kindness or compassion or forgiveness. For others, it's the simplicity of the breath. But for some, or at some times, this sense of opening to vastness can be really helpful.

And it's not just when you're in the temple. You can be sitting out at a café in Berkeley or San Anselmo or the Mission, and it's noisy, and there are people going by, cars in the streets, and you think, how could I ever meditate? And then you close your eyes and say, oh, like John Cage, the music of life—I'm just going to listen to the play of all these sounds and become the spacious vastness. And then all of a sudden, all of it becomes workable. You come back to this place that you have touched before, of spaciousness and timelessness and openness.

So if it was helpful, feel free to play with it. If it wasn't, the basic rule of meditation is: don't use it to judge yourself.

You're already very good at that. You don't need any improvement in that area, right? Instead, say thank you. Perhaps this is not the right practice for this evening, and return to what you know serves you. But it is a beautiful practice for the times when it can work. And it points to something quite extraordinary, which we'll explore more later this evening.

We tend to be identified with our bodies, our thoughts and opinions. Have you noticed that? And with our feelings. But the thing is, they keep changing. So who are we? If we're not our bodies, if we're not our thoughts and opinions, maybe you're the spirit that was born into this body and that will leave it someday—believe me, that's going to happen. Maybe what you are is actually spirit or consciousness.

So we'll leave that as a question for us.

It's now time to take a break for ten or fifteen minutes to stretch or relax. You can keep that sense of openness as you walk around, if it's helpful to you. If it's not—if you're in a place where you need more of a sense of protection—you have to respect that too. Then don't do that. Come back to your feet on the earth, to a sense of compassionate holding of your own body and being.

For those who wish, there are cookies outside. There's the bookstore for mindful shopping, for those who need to do such things. If someone near you raised their hand as a person here for the first time, you might turn and introduce yourself, welcome them.

We'll take a little break and ring the bell again in ten or fifteen minutes to come back. Thank you.

CHAPTER 16

Remembering Ajahn Chah

Jack Kornfield · 1h04

> On the occasion of Ajahn Chah's 100th birthday, Jack Kornfield offers a deeply personal tribute to his beloved teacher, weaving together stories from his years as a monk in the Thai forest tradition with the timeless wisdom he received. Through vivid recollections—from Ajahn Chah's delight at discovering American forests to his compassionate yet direct teaching style—Kornfield illuminates what it means to create "zones of peace" and to stop the inner war against the way things are.
> The talk explores Ajahn Chah's essential teaching of "taking the one seat"—sitting in the center of one's experience with loving awareness, allowing all phenomena to arise and pass without becoming entangled. Kornfield shares how Ajahn Chah taught that the Dhamma is fundamentally about the heart, and that suffering arises not from life's inevitable pains but from our reactions and attachments to them. The instruction to "become the one who knows" points to the shift from identification with changing experiences to resting as awareness itself.
> This teaching carries profound relevance for navigating contemporary challenges with wisdom rather than reactivity. Kornfield emphasizes that awakening doesn't require remote monasteries or special circumstances—the perfect conditions exist within each person's own life. Drawing on the Therīgāthā (songs of the early Buddhist nuns) and his recent dialogue with Ram Dass, he reminds listeners of their fundamental dignity and capacity for compassion, invoking the traditional address: "O nobly born, remember who you really are."

Please let yourself sit in a way that's comfortable and at ease. For tonight, let yourself listen as you would in a meditation practice. It's not a lecture where you have to take notes, and there's no quiz at the end. It's more about listening to see if something resonates as true for you, something that reminds your heart and spirit of what you already know to be important, deep, and valuable. The rest of it you can simply let go.

I'm very happy to be able to sit together. It's a bit of a disaster out there in certain ways with our news—problematic, to say the least. But to be able to come and sit together in the midst of the changes in the world, many of which are rather dramatic, to quiet the mind and tend the heart so that we can hold it all in a wise way and hopefully respond in a wise way, to be together in that spirit of wisdom and compassion—this is really important.

If we look, there are things that remind us or awaken us out of our separateness, out of our habit of checking off our to-do lists and feeling isolated from the rest of the world. These experiences awaken us and remind us to love. Remember what it was like when you were in love? I know almost all of you can remember that. It's pretty sweet, isn't it? And it's actually possible to be in love with the world, with people, with this place. This mysterious, marvelous human realm with its unbearable beauty and its ocean of tears—you can love this. You can step out of that sense of isolation and separateness, what's sometimes called the small sense of self, or the body of fear.

We get reminded of it in so many different ways. Sometimes walking in the high mountains, or listening to an amazing piece of music, or making love, or sitting at the bedside of someone who's dying. The gates between the worlds open, and you realize, "Oh yes, this is also going to happen to me." Isn't this mysterious, that we have a certain life for a certain time? Or being there for the birth of a child—that's so wild. Here's another human being. Where do they come from? It's wild.

Another way that we wake up—and it's beautiful just to recognize that we can wake up from the trance we move in—is sometimes through spiritual teachings or teachers of different kinds who remind us of our own beauty, our own buddha nature, our own fundamental goodness. Somehow we are supported. Even as we come here to Spirit Rock, we're supported by a stream of thousands of years of people who also treasured awakening and compassion and connection with all life and respect.

I know that for a time I did a Tibetan practice where you do full prostrations and visualize a tree of benefactors—your teachers and the people who've blessed you. You populate the tree with everybody who's ever been a teacher or guide or mentor or benefactor. I started filling my tree up, and it became like a Christmas tree: that one, and that one, and that one. Then I would bow and say thank you. Because we're not here alone. You're here with your ancestors. We're here with the ancestors of this land, the Miwok who lived and tended this land. We're here with thousands of generations.

Tonight, because this week marks one hundred years since my teacher Ajahn Chah was born—his hundredth birthday—I want to share something of that lineage. I can still hear his voice, which is a fantastic thing. Don't you know that experience when someone you cared about deeply has died, and there are moments when you can still hear just what they sounded like and what they'd say? I feel very blessed by that. I want to talk about the stream of teachings that have come to Spirit Rock, teachings that I received, that so many other people received, from this wonderful teacher.

A few weeks ago, Ajahn Pasanno, who runs Abhayagiri Monastery in Mendocino, came and offered a whole day on the hundredth birthday teachings of Ajahn Chah. My other dear friends—Ajahn Sumedho, Ajahn Amaro, Ayya Anandabodhi—all these beautiful monastics who still carry his spirit are also part of our community.

I first met Ajahn Chah when he was forty-nine years old, in 1967. He was a very plain-spoken person. His main language was Lao, which I had fortunately learned during my years in the Peace Corps, when I was on medical village teams doing tropical medicine work on the border of Laos and Thailand.

Looking at this picture of him smiling, I used to think of him as kind of like a frog because he had this giant mouth that could turn down. Then he would get animated and it would turn up, and this huge laughter would come out of him.

When I first arrived, there were forty-five monks and a couple dozen nuns at his monastery. When he died, thirty years later, a million people went to his funeral, including the King and Queen of Thailand. He became a truly revered fountain of wisdom in that culture.

He lived as part of the tradition of forest monks, those who live in the jungles and forests. He had his little bag of roots and herbs and herbal medicine. He'd lived in caves, out with the tigers. It was remarkable, during the years I was there, to be able to live in these somewhat remote forest monasteries.

But I realized that before I talk a bit more about him, I want to let him introduce himself to you. There is just a six-minute clip from a BBC documentary called The Mindful Way that was shot in the 1970s that will give you a little taste of it.

These monks in northeast Thailand are on Bindabhat, the daily dawn walk to receive their food offered by the villagers. Not all monks in Thailand keep strictly to the discipline prescribed by the Buddha, but these monks strive to maintain the original forest tradition of a pure and simple life. They're not allowed to possess money nor grow their own food. This ensures their total dependence on the lay community, so they can't cut themselves off in a spiritual cocoon.

The abbot, the venerable Ajahn Chah, has been in robes for 50 years.

"Here in the forest, you can learn to be in harmony with the way things are in nature. You can live happily and peacefully. Buddhist monks don't practice meditation for selfish reasons. We practice in order to know ourselves so that then we'll be able to understand and teach others how to live peacefully and wisely."

This monk has been ordained for 15 years. He's respected not only for his skill in meditation, but also for his practical skills, his consistent mindfulness.

Meditation doesn't just involve being at peace with the world. Confronting the self can be like walking into a raging storm. It's quite usual at first to despair, even to want to kill oneself.

"Some people think that a monk's life is a lazy and an easy one. If that's what they think, they should just try and see how long they can stand it. A monk's work is hard. He works to free his heart so that he begins to feel loving kindness which embraces everything. He sees that all life has the characteristic of the breath. It rises and it falls. Everything that is born expires. So his suffering diminishes as he knows that nothing belongs to him."

"To help people contemplate the true nature of the body, we have human skeletons in the assembly hall. Because when one doesn't understand death, life is very confusing."

"Buddha made a distinction between ultimate truth and conventional truth. The idea of a self is merely a convention. Foreigner, Thai, you, the interviewer—these are all conventions. In ultimate reality, there isn't anybody. There is only earth, fire, water, air—elements which have combined temporarily. We call the body a person, mind. But ultimately, there is no me. There is only anatta, not self. When we see beyond self, we no longer cling to happiness. And when we stop clinging, we can begin to be happy."

"Shouldn't be concerned with nirvana or attaining nirvana. If you are, then that in itself will prevent you from gaining nirvana."

"So what should a monk's main concern be?"

"The aim is to let go."

"So you have to let go but without striving to let go?"

"That's right. You should let go without desire. If there's still desire in the pursuit to do that, then that's not nirvana."

"Be mindful and let things take their natural course. Then your mind will become still like a clear forest pool. All kinds of rare animals will come to drink at the pool. You will see many wonderful and strange things come and go, but you will be still. Problems will arise, but you will see through them immediately. This is the happiness of the Buddha."

I think Ajahn Chah would have been laughing at that voice recognition that was trying to make language translations from Thai and Lao into some really wild stuff. Siri does that all the time, but she was really in good form tonight.

But you get a sense in seeing him of both the delight that he had and the wisdom and the honesty.

When he first came to the U.S., we picked him up at the Boston airport.

And drove him along Memorial Drive in Boston. "Okay, this is MIT, and this is Harvard." We went through Harvard Square and so forth. He was okay with all of that.

And then we got on the Massachusetts Turnpike to go out to our center in central Massachusetts in Barre, in the hills. We got a little ways outside of Boston, outside the big ring road, and then of course it turned into more agricultural land, lots of trees and so forth, which you see across New England.

So we're driving along, and he said, "What's this?" I said, "What do you mean?" He said, "All these trees." I said, "They're trees." He said, "Pull over."

So we pulled over. He got out of the car and walked up to the fence, and there was one of those New England forests. He was smelling the air, and he said, "Forest! What kind of animals live here? Are there bears? Are there lions?" He just loved the forest.

I said, "Okay, there used to be bears. There are occasionally, but mostly it's deer and this and that." "Well, how far do these forests go?" he asked. I said, "Well, probably from here north through Canada, maybe a thousand miles." He said, "Oh, forest monks! Great! The right place for us."

You see, his vision of the U.S.—when he was a boy, he'd seen some cowboy movies, so he'd seen the western desert with people on horses, and then he'd seen movies about New York City. He had no idea that we actually had forests here. He was completely delighted.

And he and his colleague, another great master, Ajahn Buddhadasa, when we talked about the hard time that people have in the West meditating and caring for themselves, loving themselves, how much self-hatred and self-judgment there is—they said, "Bring them out to the forests. Let them spend time with the trees and the rhythm of the moon and the sun and the stars, and teach them practices of loving-kindness and compassion. That will soothe their hearts and get them sane again." Something like that was his answer.

So I had gone to find a master when I was quite young. After graduating from college, I asked the Peace Corps to send me to a Buddhist country because I knew I needed something to help me with the kind of inner struggles that young people have. But I had a lot of them, and my family was difficult. My father was a violent, abusive person.

Last week I was in Los Angeles with my beloved, with Trudy, and we went as volunteers to a shelter for battered women. We went with Amy Wakeland, who's the wife of Eric Garcetti, the mayor of Los Angeles, who supports a number of really great projects. We were interested in her center and in sending mindfulness teachers and compassion teachers to places like this.

And I found it so poignant to be there. First of all, it was a secret place. They wouldn't tell us where it was. They had to van us there because they didn't want anybody to know the address, to protect the women who were there.

All of a sudden I started to get all these memories from my past—of my mother hiding bottles behind the curtains so she would have a weapon to defend herself in certain rooms, of not going out in public except in long sleeves because of all the black and blue on her body, and the kind of terror that I experienced from my father. It was the 1950s, and there weren't places like this. She had four kids, and she kept saying, "I should leave him." But she didn't.

So it was a very painful and poignant place to be, and to meet women who were being cared for and held and taken in—in some way that I wished my mother could have experienced, and that we could have too. I have to say, I heard on the radio today that our Attorney General has now declared that even if you are the victim of horrific violence of this kind, you're not eligible for asylum in the U.S., which kind of breaks my heart and makes me want to actually do something politically. That's another story that's important.

Anyway, when you go into Ajahn Chah's monastery, it was entering a place of peace. It felt so peaceful in this forest. It's the way Spirit Rock has become for many people, especially those who've taken a series of classes or done a residential retreat. People will come in with the stress in their life—their financial problems, the things they have to take care of, stuff going on with their body, their confusion, their dreams, their creativity, questions of how to live, in the middle of a divorce—all the things that make up our modern human life.

And I love watching people's faces, especially people who go on retreat. They come in haggard, and they leave with what we call the Vipassana facelift. Their eyes are brighter, their faces look five or ten years younger. We could sell this in Hollywood, I know we could. And they're paying attention to the movement of the clouds and to the flowers blooming around the dining hall. It's almost like they get their spirit and their life back in some way. It's a beautiful thing.

So the same kind of experience was what it was like to walk into his forest monastery. Fortunately, we have it here in this beautiful valley. There was the jungle, and then you'd enter, and there would be these long paths that were swept clean every day. It was part of our job as monks and nuns with these long bamboo brooms. And it didn't matter if you swept the path absolutely clean—by the time you got to the other end, the leaves were already falling where you'd started. The point was somehow to do it with graciousness and beauty, to make the sweeping itself a part of the rhythm of life there.

So you'd come in and you'd see people who were dignified. There was a kind of impeccability, a terrific care for discipline. And somehow they made the inner beauty mirrored by the outer beauty. There was some way in which they made that inner peace visible through how they cared for the forests and the paths and the robes.

And then there were little signs as you came in, like: "You there, be quiet. We're trying to meditate. This is not the city." Or: "Hey there, life is short. What matters to you? Come on, get on with it." Little nudgy Dharma signs. The idea was somehow to create, as we have in this valley, a place that reminds us of another way to be.

Of course, we were near the border of Cambodia and Laos. So when I was there—both on those tropical medicine teams and then in the monastery—it was the time of the American war in Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos, the Southeast Asian War. There was a big air base not far away, so we would see fighter jets and bombers relatively frequently.

I remember these friends who came, who were in the IVS, the International Volunteer Service, which was the equivalent of the Peace Corps—but I believe it was actually run by the CIA in Vietnam and Laos, because they weren't safe enough for Peace Corps. Anyway, that's another whole story. But they came in and they were upset with me. We were old friends. "What are you doing sitting on your butt when there's a war going on?

When there are people who are in danger? When unthinkable cruel things are happening and suffering is enormous? Why don't you come back out and join the fight in some way?"

What happened after they stayed in the monastery for about a week is they began to realize that it was a zone of peace. They talked to Ajahn Chah about it, and he said, "You know, for those of us who live as monks in this thousand-year-old tradition, wars come and go and leaders come and go. Our task is to create a place of sanity that reminds people, even when there's great difficulty, that there is another way."

Because if you were around the war zone, you had to be careful—your life would be in danger, your things would be stolen, people are desperate. In the monastery, you could lose your gold earring or your wallet and somebody would pick it up and place it on the altar until you came back. It was a place of such integrity, such care. It was like an island of sanity.

And then Ajahn Chah said, "We human beings are constantly in combat, at war, trying to escape the fact of being so limited—limited by so many circumstances we cannot control. But instead of escaping, we continue to create suffering: waging war with evil, waging war with good, waging war with what is too small, waging war with what is too big, waging war with what is too short or too long, right or wrong, courageously carrying on the battle. Why not stop the war? Why not step out of the battle and come to a place of peace?"

It was really a visionary place in that way. Perhaps another night I'll tell a story about being in a remarkable monastery of a similar kind in the Mekong Delta, in the middle of the war in Vietnam, that was also a zone of peace—where those who were trying to run from the bombings and firefights could come and find refuge.

What Ajahn Chah talked about, and my other teachers as well, is that it's not just that we have to do away with landmines and bombing. We have to do away with the landmines in the human heart. We have to do away with the violence in the human heart. Here we live in a society where there's racism and environmental destruction and continuing warfare. Where does it come from? It comes from us human beings. It comes from our own minds and hearts. And some of us have to stop, have to find a different way, and become that, and model that. This is a reminder, an invitation.

You could hear in the last part of that video, even with all the funny language underneath, Ajahn Chah talking about the still forest pool—to let things take their natural course, to let your heart and mind become still in any surroundings, like a clear forest pool, and to see all the wonders of the world, the amazing things. Mary Oliver's line: "I was a bride married to amazement."

For Ajahn Chah, there's this new biography that was just published by a friend who was a monk—a thousand pages or something, full of great stories. Because I was there, I'm loving reading it. It tells in part about his own practice, which wasn't easy in his early years. He lived out in jungles.

There were tigers, and he lived in the caves, and tremendous physical pain, and all the kinds of struggles that one might have as a renunciate in a very poor environment. Part of the time anyway, in the dry season, there was not a great deal to eat in those villages, and he was struggling somehow to find a place of unshakable peace in himself.

When we came to the monastery, his instructions were actually quite simple and not very different than what we did tonight. He called it taking the one seat. He said, just go into the room and put one chair in the center. Take the one seat in the center of the room, open the doors and windows, and see who comes to visit. You'll witness all kinds of scenes and actors, all kinds of temptations and stories, everything imaginable. Your only job is to stay in your seat. You'll see it all arise and pass. And out of this, wisdom, deep compassion, and understanding will arise.

I like to use the word loving awareness as a synonym for mindfulness. And for Ajahn Chah, meditation wasn't about gaining some special state. It was taking the one seat in the middle of it all, stopping the war against the way things are. Instead, quieting the mind, bringing the spirit of loving awareness here, letting things settle, and then noticing when you get entangled, when you get caught, when you get afraid and reactive, and discovering that it's possible to see that with loving awareness and not get so caught, to find a kind of inner freedom.

Someone asked him at one point, what is the Dharma? This is a word that means truth, it means the teachings—it's kind of a complicated set of different meanings. And he said, the Dharma is the heart. If you want to practice the Dharma or learn the Dharma, learn the truth, learn the way, just look into the heart. What spirit, what heart are you using to guide your life, to move through this world? Why not quiet yourself and listen in a way so that you're in touch with your heart rather than all the things that people around you want you to do? He would ask, what's the state of your heart today?

He was very interested in human suffering. Anybody here have that? But his interest was not just in suffering. He would say that's not the end of the story. There's suffering, there's its causes, and there's its end. Life has pain—everybody knows that. There's pleasure and pain and gain and loss and fame and disrepute and joy and sorrow and praise and blame and hot and cold. This is what makes up life in some way. But suffering is different. Suffering is all our reactions and responses and entanglements in it. And he wanted us to shift from the creation of suffering to the freedom of heart.

My teacher Nisargadatta used to say, the mind creates suffering, the mind creates the abyss, and the heart crosses it. And he wanted us to really listen from the heart.

I remember being there, and there was a big festival at the closest village to the forest monastery. Usually it was very quiet, but they had giant loudspeakers and all kinds of music and a village fair. One of the monks came and complained that it wasn't quiet. Ajahn Chah laughed. He said, there's the noise, but I have a question. Who's bothering who? The noise isn't doing anything. What is your relationship to it? Who's bothering who?

He would tootle around the monastery at different points, and if you looked like you were having a hard time, he'd gaze at you and say, hmm, you suffering today? If you said no, he'd say, wonderful, enjoy the day. If you said yes, he'd say, hmm, must be quite attached. And then he'd sort of tootle off. That was it. That was how simple it was. It wasn't very complicated. He wanted us to see how we got entangled and where the roots were, which were in our own lives.

I remember one Western monk, an English monk named Aranya Po. He's kind of famous for this story because he was never satisfied. He went to a remote forest monastery, but it was too quiet. There wasn't any good teaching.

So Ajahn Chah sent him to a monastery near Bangkok where there was this famous teacher, but it was too noisy. Then he went to a monastery on the Cambodian border, but it was too poor. He just always couldn't find the satisfactory thing. Finally, he came back. Everyone was sitting around with Ajahn Chah, and he was asking about where to go next to find the right thing. And Ajahn Chah said, "You know, this poor monk—he must have put his monk's bag down in dog shit. And everywhere he goes, it smells bad." As I said, he was very plain spoken, but you get the message, right?

When I was sitting in meditation classes, trying to be very peaceful—yeah, Mr. Peace, right?—all this anger came up. It really shocked me because I was not going to be like my father, a violent, angry person. So where did that anger go? All suppressed in there. And then I'm sitting, and all this stuff starts to come up.

I went to see him because some monk in the nearby hut had done something—just a small thing—and I just got enraged. I knew it had nothing to do with that monk; I was at least that savvy. I said, "All this anger is coming up. What should I do?"

He smiled and said, "Oh, good. You get to learn about anger. It's the hot season. Go in your hut, little tin roof hut. Close the one window and the door. Wrap yourself in all your robes and cook." He said, "If you're going to be angry, do it right. Sit in the middle of it and name it—anger, or fire—so you're not so damn afraid of it."

His direction came from this faith that if we could turn toward our deepest experiences—the deep experiences of love and care and connection, and also the things we fear like anxiety and anger—if we could actually sit in their presence, there would grow a shift of identity. This is the great gift of meditation: a shift from the contents—here's anger, here's fear—to loving awareness itself that would say, "Oh, this is the angry mind. This is how the angry mind works. This is the heart that's been hurt." Mostly anger comes because we've been hurt or we've been frightened, or there's something we've been in some way abused or mistreated.

He said, "These things are natural. You have to learn to be in the presence of all the energies of nature—the wild energies and the peaceful and beautiful ones."

"Desire comes," he said. "Make your loving awareness like a parent taking a kid to the store." You know by the checkout there's all the candy, right? And the idea from the parent isn't to hit the child or something like that. You just see that they're a kid and they want everything, and that's part of being a child. Desire is natural. There's healthy desire and unhealthy desire. It's not until you become the loving awareness that you have a choice to decide which are the ones you want to give to this child, which are the things that are healthy for you and which are not.

There was some way in which he just made it our common humanity. We'd be sitting around with him, and he'd introduce his monks to people. "Some of my monks are really big eaters, like me." Ajahn Chah was a little bit overweight, he would say of himself. "They're all like me. We do that. Some of my monks are just big sleepers. They eat and then they sleep."

And then I've got some monks who all they want to do is meditate. I think they're afraid of relating, basically.

I remember bringing a group of friends to visit Ajahn Chah in his monastery in the seventies—Joseph Goldstein, Mark Epstein, a whole bunch of people who are now dharma teachers, and Ram Dass. We were all sitting around, and Ram Dass was about fifteen years older than the rest of us. We were still maybe around thirty years old, and Ram Dass was like forty-five or something, with a beard, coming from India. The first thing Ajahn Chah did was peer around the group. "Okay, who'd you bring?" And then he said, "Hey, who's the old man you brought with you?" He was right on Ram Dass's case immediately.

But he could also be so tender. We went to visit the largest Trappist monastery in New England, called Spencer Abbey—one of the main Trappist monasteries, like Thomas Merton's Gethsemane Abbey. When Ajahn Chah was there, we went to visit because those monks, who lived a few towns over, had become friends, and some of them would come and sit at our retreat center in Barre. The abbot, Father Thomas Keating, was a gracious and very wise, beautiful man who has become a kind of famous Christian contemplative. So we took Ajahn Chah over there.

About a hundred of their monks in their black and white outfits—which remind me of penguins, elegant penguins, I have to say—were there in the courtyard. And then there were these monks in their dusty orange robes, a different costume altogether. All the monks were gathered. Thomas Keating is this very tall man, and Ajahn Chah is quite short, a little bit round. They were standing next to each other. I introduced them, and Ajahn Chah sized him up very quickly, as he used to do. He just peered at people.

And then he said, "I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry."

Thomas Keating asked, "Why is he saying 'I'm so sorry'?" It was a strange greeting, right? "I'm so sorry."

And then Ajahn Chah turned around and looked at all the hundred monks who were there, and he said, "You know, being an abbot is a really, really hard job. And you should love and support this man. He's really doing you a favor to take this role."

Keating's eyes lit up, and this huge smile came across his face. Yes—somebody understands.

So Ajahn Chah was very tender at times. And his interest was to shift from confusion and difficulty and fear—all those things that we have and know—to finding peace in your own heart, to finding well-being.

When he was teaching at IMS, at our retreat center in Massachusetts, I remember we were out wandering, taking a walk on the great big grassy lawn in front, and people were doing their walking meditation. He turned to me and said, "You know, this place looks like a big hospital." It wasn't the forest—it was big brick buildings, New England style. And then he started to walk up to people as they were doing their walking meditation. He'd smile and say, "I hope you get well soon."

But he didn't set things up as some kind of ideal. He told us that when he was a young abbot, trying to get it all right, wanting everybody to behave in the right way, they would never do exactly what he wanted. You know how people are, right? So he said, "All right, I've figured it out now." He had all the monks come in and lie down, lining up with their feet on a certain line in the meditation hall, so they were all very even. And he said, "That's really great, except for one thing—your heads aren't even." So then he had them slide down until their heads were all in a line. And he said, "That's really great, except for one thing—your feet aren't even."

Finally he said, "Okay, stand up. This is who we are. We're short and tall, and this is the way that it is. We have to live with each other the way that we are, not the way that we imagine we're supposed to be."

It wasn't idealistic.

The driver taking us was a young guy who drove really fast, as certain young men like to do—some of whom I've known quite intimately, but I'll leave that aside. It was a one-lane dirt road through the mountains, maybe one and a half lanes, so two cars could pass if they went slowly. Mostly it was pretty empty in those days. But once in a while, a logging truck or a bus would come around a curve. And this guy was just careening around the corners. You couldn't really see what was ahead.

I'm holding on, thinking, okay, I'm going to die a monk. I guess this is it. I started to breathe and center myself, getting ready for my death. And then I look over at Ajahn Chah, and his knuckles are white too. Somehow that gave me some relief. Okay. So we're in it together.

Finally, we asked him to slow down. He wouldn't listen—didn't slow down, or not very much. But we made it. We pulled into the courtyard of the Cambodian monastery, and Ajahn Chah looked over at me, smiled, and said, "Scary ride, wasn't it?"

It was beautiful. It wasn't like he was going to pretend there wasn't fear. It was like going to Disneyland and riding the big roller coaster. It was just fear. Fear is what the body does at certain moments. Scary ride.

And I knew he wasn't afraid of dying. In many ways, he had shown that. He was simply saying: these emotions, they come. It's totally fine to see the way things are and to know that you have the capacity—your loving awareness—to be present for this life, and to know that you are bigger than all of it.

I remember when I was very sick with malaria. I was wretched, lying on the floor of my little hut on my robes. Ajahn Chah came to visit. He looked at me, and again, the language was very simple.

He said, "Sick, huh?"

I said, "Yes."

He said, "Fever and pain, huh?"

I said, "Lots of it."

He said, "Yeah. Makes you want to go home to your mother, doesn't it?"

I said, "Yes. Yes."

He said, "Well, this is suffering. This is suffering. Most of us as monks have had this a number of times. Now there's good medicine. I'll send the medicine monk over to help you. But you know, you can do this. This is just malaria. We know how to do this."

And he just stood there. I could feel that he'd been through it all. He was saying, yeah, yeah, we know how to do this. It's tough, but it's okay.

It wasn't some ideal. It was that we know how to be wise. We know how to be compassionate and loving in the midst of it all. These were the kinds of trainings he would give to people who came.

After I left—I was the second Westerner to be with him—there was a monk named Ajahn Sumedho, the one who had told me about Ajahn Chah. He had been there for a few years before me and became an abbot himself and a very wonderful teacher.

As the word got out that this was a great master, Western European and North American students, Japanese people from around the world started to come. One visitor began to see these different foreign monks arriving and asked Ajahn Chah whether he spoke English or French or German or Japanese. In every case, he replied no, he couldn't. The questioner looked confused. How did the foreign monks learn anything then?

He answered with a question. "Do you keep animals at home? Have you got any cats or dogs? Any oxen or buffalo?"

"Yes."

"Well, can you speak cat language? Do you speak dog? Can you speak buffalo?"

"No."

"Then how do they know what you want them to do?"

This was his first reply. Then he summarized: "It's not that difficult. Training the Westerners is like training water buffalo. You just keep tugging on the rope and soon they catch on."

But he could be so tender. A farmer would come whose child had died, and Ajahn Chah would hold him and put his head in his lap, just so compassionate. Then the next day some puffed up, corrupt official from Bangkok would arrive with all his medals. Ajahn Chah would take out his false teeth so he looked kind of gummy, and give some lecture about karma and corruption and dishonesty and where it was going to lead.

Underneath it all, beneath the form of the monastery, there was tremendous care. The rules were kept, the virtue and the vinaya. It was like the form of a beautiful poem. If you write a sonnet, you have a certain meter and a certain number of lines. But within that, you can make great beauty. So there were these outer forms that we followed, but inside there was a tremendous sense of freedom. He could laugh at almost anything and see where you were holding on.

There was a Western woman who became a nun at the monastery that was built about eight miles away in a village. There were so many Westerners that Ajahn Chah had said, "Why don't we make a monastery where the teachings are in English?" He asked Ajahn Sumedho, this American monk, to be the abbot, and the villagers built this beautiful monastery. There were twenty or thirty Westerners. This nun, who was quite eloquent and learned the language, became one of the villagers' favorites.

After about five years, she left. People were disappointed. A year later, she came back—but she had gotten another kind of religion. She'd become a born-again Christian, and an evangelist at that. So she came back to the monastery, and now she was trying to tell everybody about Jesus.

She was not terribly popular in the monastery for doing that, and not terribly popular with the villagers who had supported her, but she was still there doing it. They were really upset. Finally, in their upset, a whole group of villagers and some of the monks walked over to Ajahn Chah's monastery. They told the story of her coming back and trying to convert everybody, saying Jesus was the way. They were all upset.

He listened to it. He knew this was happening—the grapevine in the monastery is like any other grapevine. He listened to it all. How could she do this? We fed her and trusted her and now she's come back. He listened for a while, sat quietly, and said, "Well, you know, maybe she's right."

And it just diffused it. Everybody was on their horse about how it was supposed to be. We need that wisdom now with all the political conflict as well.

Maybe there's something that actually needs to be listened to from somebody who's different. And it doesn't mean you can't respond. It doesn't mean that there aren't things we need to stand up for now. But how do we do it, and from which place? Do we do it out of aggression or out of fear? That just perpetuates it. Or can we stop the war and respond by saying, this is something worth standing up for, that really matters—but to do it with the kind of courage like Gandhi would, to say, do what you will, I have to stand up for this because my love for you and everyone else, even those of you who are creating suffering, I love you too. And I love you so much that I don't want to let you continue to make this kind of suffering for others. It's a very different way of responding.

Ajahn Chah taught a kind of fearlessness—to be present for this human life, to tolerate it, and to allow all the energies of life. As you meditate, you learn how to really be present. He also taught how to step back and see that like the breath, it's all impermanent, that you can't grasp it. He said, if you let go a little, you'll have a little peace. If you let go a lot, you'll have a lot of peace. If you really learn to let go, you can move anywhere freely.

And that was part of his teaching. He went to visit Ajahn Mun—ajahn means a kind of acharya in Sanskrit, a master or teacher—one of the other great forest masters. Ajahn Chah was still practicing as a monk in the forest after about ten years of living in caves and doing his meditation. Along with great struggles, when he was finally able to practice deeply, he experienced deep insights and visions and light, all the kinds of meditation experiences one might have.

So he went to see this great master, Ajahn Mun, bowed and paid his respects, and said, "I want to tell you about all my meditation practices and what I've seen and learned," and kind of laid out all those experiences. Ajahn Mun sat quietly, listened, and then looked up and said, "Chah, you've missed the point. Those are just experiences. They're like movies." He said, "You go to the movies and there's a romantic comedy and there's a documentary and there's a war movie and there's a historical drama. They appear on the screen and disappear." He said, "These are the same. Luminous states and rapture and physical pain and suffering and insights and confusion—those are all states. The only question that matters if you want to be free is: to whom do they happen? Turn your attention from the changing experiences back to consciousness itself, to awareness, what we're calling loving awareness or consciousness itself. Become the witnessing—what in that language is called become the one who knows, become the knowing."

So you become loving awareness that is the witness to all of this—joys and sorrows, praise and blame, gain and loss. And when you do, then the real freedom and real well-being, the happiness that's not dependent on anything, the happiness for no cause, the freedom that's not dependent on circumstances—will start to mature and grow in your own heart. To stop the war with the world, to take one seat in the middle of all things, and then become the one who knows. Become the Buddha, the awakened one, loving awareness itself.

I have this beautiful set of poems that were sent to me recently, translations from the earliest Buddhist nuns:

One morning after alms round, begging for my breakfast, looking down at one more meal I hadn't worked for, hadn't paid for, and hadn't earned, a life of debts I could never repay, pushing in on all sides like the weight of the sea, I blinked. A tear fell into my bowl. Would it always feel like this? Just as the moon rises up from the bottom of the sea, a handful of rice lifted itself from the bottom of my bowl and my heart rose with it and opened. I wish I could tell you how it tasted, that first bite of food as a free woman.

These are called the songs of enlightenment. There was a moment when, in that taste, all of a sudden all the things she thought she should be and who she was dropped away, and the vastness and mystery opened.

It happens that that vastness and mystery is who you are. You are consciousness itself that was born into that body of yours. Where do you think you came from? You're certainly not the physical body. As I say, you are not kale and Big Macs. It's just not who you are. And you're not your emotions, I hope—they're nice at times and terrible at others. And you're certainly not your thoughts. First of all, they come and disappear just like that. Which one is you? Spirit, consciousness, born into this body will leave this body. You'll see. It's going to happen sometime.

What a trip that was, that life, wasn't it? You'll see. I told you so, right?

And here you are in the middle of this mystery. You're in this mystery. What you are is consciousness, is spirit, having this human experience. And without understanding, you're like a boat without a rudder.

When you come to the temple, as you have, or you go to that forest monastery, it's really a place of reminder that what you're seeking is who you are, and where you're going is here—because there's only now. You can imagine other things, but actually all you have is what's now. It's always now. This is where we're going.

And so to remind you, amidst the ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows, you have the perfect place to awaken. You don't have to go to some forest monastery in the jungles of Thailand or Burma. You don't have to go to the Himalayas. You don't have to live in some cave. You have all the perfect conditions for awakening in your very own life, in your own body and mind. And when you do, then you can really care for the world in a whole different way.

This last weekend, I was teaching for Buddha Fest in Los Angeles, which was a big festival of Buddhist teachers and films and arts. But I was up here, unable to be there in person, and so I Skyped in to a dialogue with my beloved Trudy, my wife, who's a teacher inside LA, and with Ram Dass. There were hundreds of people there and thousands of people online, and we had about an hour-long conversation about awakening and loving awareness and what's possible for us. Because it's not in India. It's not in the jungles. It happens to be in your own heart.

As we came toward the end of that, Ram Dass told one of his favorite stories about how, when he was in India after some years with his guru, his guru was urging him to go back to the U.S. to teach and to offer these teachings. And Ram Dass demurred and said, "You know, I'm not ready. I'm too neurotic. I'm too impure. I'm too imperfect. How could I offer the teachings of love that you have embodied so much? How could I do that? I just feel too imperfect."

And his teacher got up off the little wooden bench where he sat and very slowly, taking a couple of minutes, walked around Ram Dass and peered at him from his feet to his head, looked in his clothes and looked in the back, peered at him all around. Then he sat back down and gazed at him and said, "I see no imperfections."

In India, it's called the glance of mercy. It's that love that happens when someone looks at you and sees the secret beauty that was born into you as a child—that's inviolable, that no one can take away—and recognizes your beauty.

So there we are, Ram Dass is talking about all these kinds of things, and then a woman raises her hand in the question period at the end. She says, "You know, Ram Dass, you had a guru. You went to India. Here I am in Los Angeles. What can I do?"

And I said to her, "You know, you're a little bit like the person sitting by the river asking for water." I said, "Ram Dass, can you see her in the camera?" I forget what her name was—it might have been Vivian or something. "Can you see Vivian?" "Yeah." I said, "Do you have anything to say to her?"

And he just looked at her and said, "I love you. I love you completely, just the way you are, exactly as you are." And then he looked at all of them and he said, "I love you all, every one of you." He was on a roll. He was loving everything by the time it was done. And you could see it and feel it in the group—it changed everybody.

Just to have somebody gaze at them with that much love and say, "Yes, I love you. And you are exactly as you should be—the universe has brought you here. You are completely lovable and worthy of love."

The Buddhist teachings begin with the phrase: "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas, of the awakened ones, do not forget who you really are." Remember your fundamental dignity. Remember that you have the capacity for freedom, that within you is born the great heart of compassion. Trust it. Open to it. And then you can live with wisdom and bring your blessings to the world.

So, in honor of Ajahn Chah, I pass along these teachings.

Let's just sit for a moment. Be quiet.

You have the perfect conditions in your life for awakening the great heart of compassion. It is your birthright.

O nobly born, remember who you really are.

CHAPTER 17

The Art and Heart of Forgiveness

Jack Kornfield · 1h16

> In this deeply moving talk, Jack Kornfield and Trudy Goodman explore forgiveness as one of the essential dimensions of the awakened heart, alongside compassion, loving-kindness, and joy. Drawing from the Dhammapada's teaching that "hatred never ends with hatred, but by love alone is healed," they examine what forgiveness truly means and how to practice it wisely.
> Jack shares powerful stories including the GRIP program graduation at San Quentin, where formerly violent men and community members exchanged apologies, and the remarkable work of Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela with South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. He clarifies essential points: forgiveness does not condone harmful actions, it is primarily for oneself rather than the offender, it cannot be rushed but unfolds through grief and processing, and it requires not closing one's heart to another being.
> Trudy Goodman offers her understanding of forgiveness as "learning to make peace with life when you didn't get something that you wanted" and shares Eve Ensler's creative approach of imagining her deceased father's acknowledgment. She emphasizes that until we can feel our grief, rage, and sorrow with self-compassion and equanimity—as Bhikkhu Anālayo did during his winter retreat on climate change—we cannot act effectively in the world. The evening concludes with a guided forgiveness meditation offering phrases for forgiving oneself, forgiving others, and asking for forgiveness, cultivating what the tradition calls the brahmavihāras—the divine abodes of love, compassion, joy, and equanimity.

So please let yourself be settled. Find a way to sit and listen.

And if one were to ask, after the meditation that we just did, how do we live with loving awareness? The theme for this evening that Trudy and I want to talk about is forgiveness, which is one of the dimensions of the awakened heart, along with compassion and loving kindness and shared joy. It's really an expression of what it means to live with loving awareness.

So as you sit and listen, let it be a little bit of a meditation. That is to say, it can be a reflection or a contemplation in yourself of what seems helpful or true or useful to you, or a reminder of something you already know. And if it doesn't seem right, forget it. You're the one that has to live this, and nobody else has lived quite as weird a life as you have. So you might as well get used to it.

A question as we begin: How many of you have things that you would like to forgive yourself for? Notice almost every hand went up, except that one person who's fibbing—and they'll have to forgive themselves later. How many of you have things where it's like, okay, I probably should forgive somebody else? So now we're in it together. Here we are, human beings. This is part of being human.

We have all been betrayed. I won't ask you to raise your hands on that one. We've all been hurt. We've all been abandoned—sometimes individually and sometimes collectively, sometimes in small ways, but it still stings or hurts. And sometimes in this world, in really terrible ways, with lots of pain for us. Sometimes it's individual, and sometimes it's part of the collective pain that we suffer or undergo.

I was invited to give an address at the graduation of the GRIP program at San Quentin a few years ago—Guiding Rage into Power. It's run by my dear friend Jacques Verduin, who runs Insight Out there, and I'd been chair of that board at one point. There were one hundred plus men dressed in mortarboards and graduation gowns, and about three hundred guests—politicians, people from the state corrections department, mayors, and so forth—all there. The men stood up. It was so moving. They had a valedictorian who spoke on behalf of them all, about how they'd all been violent men and now took a pledge to never solve a difficulty or conflict with violence again, that they'd learned all these things from their anger management and mindfulness and yoga. They spoke in really eloquent ways.

I gave a little talk on the dignity of each person and the possibility of change and renewal. And then my good friend Luis Rodriguez, who was the poet laureate of Los Angeles, and who also ran for governor rather unsuccessfully—but anyway, he's a great poet whose book La Vida Loca: My Gang Days in L.A. he says proudly is the most stolen book in high school libraries across the country.

Luis was going to read a poem, and his poems are like bloodletting Mayan sacrifice—they're extraordinary. But he said, "I can't read my poem." Because these men had stood up and forsworn violence, and then the whole group had apologized, saying, "We have been violent men and we now want to apologize to you for all the suffering that we've caused to so many of you and your families."

He said, "I can't accept your apology without making one of my own." And then he paused and said, "Because most of you grew up in circumstances of poverty, of racism, of drugs, where you weren't protected, where you were hurt in so many ways, and we didn't take care of you. And so we here owe you a deep apology, as you have offered to us."

It was a really powerful moment. What is forgiveness, in small ways and in big ways? We need it because we're related to each other, like it or not.

There's a book by a Zen teacher, Koshin Paley Ellison. He writes: "At eighteen, I was on a bus in Colorado. I'd been studying Zen, and a warm-faced woman struck up a conversation with me. I started to talk about Buddhism and she was interested. She asked me which community I was affiliated with, and I said, 'I have a lot of teachers that I read, but I don't practice with any one community in particular.' 'Oh,' she said, 'you're a lone wolf.' 'Yes,' I nodded and smiled. She went on, 'You know what's interesting about lone wolves? They're sick. Wolves are pack animals and they often mate for life. So if you see a wolf by itself, there's actually something wrong with it.' I will always remember that conversation on the bus."

You understand what happened to him, what she's saying. This is the deal: we are related to one another, for better and for worse.

of the family members of people who'd been in the jungle for ten or twenty years. Here's your old mother, here's your cousin, your sister, your brother. Remember, you're still part of another big family. And it helped to lead to the peace process.

So, forgiveness. These are the words from the Dhammapada, from the Buddhist teaching:

Look how he abused me and beat me. Look how he threw me down and robbed me. Continue to live with such thoughts and you live in hate. Look how he abused me and beat me. Look how he threw me down and robbed me. Abandon such thoughts and live in love. In this world, hatred never ends with hatred. But by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law.

This isn't some petty thing that somebody did. He beat me, threw me down, robbed me. And yet it becomes critical for us as human beings. Without it, you have the Northern Irish Protestants and Catholics saying, "Your people marched through our neighborhood three hundred years ago and I'm never going to forget it." Or the Hutus and the Tutsis, or the Palestinians and the Israelis, or the Serbs and the Croats and the Bosnians. Somebody has to say, "It stops with me." Yes, this has happened. But instead of carrying the story, to actually realize that we have the capacity, the magnanimity of heart, to say yes, we can live with forgiveness. Like my teacher from Cambodia whose family was killed in the genocide, who became famous for walking the countryside, chanting loving-kindness and forgiveness for everyone that he met.

A woman I worked with was in the middle of a terrible divorce. We worked with the grief and the loss and the anger and all those things. The man she'd married, the one she was getting divorced from—it was one of those bad divorces. He'd hired a really aggressive lawyer and he was trying to keep all the money and keep all the kids, even though he was the one who had the affairs. It was tough. So of course I recommended that she get a kick-ass lawyer, which she did, thank you. But then one day, after we worked with the grief, she came in and said, "You know, I realized something. My husband is trying to turn the children against me. All these terrible things are happening. And I realized that I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children. I will not say a single thing that's bad about their father. I will just be silent about it. It will stop with me." You can feel the courage of this.

Now, the holidays are coming up. Ram Dass says, "If you think you're enlightened, go spend a week with your family." Kind of straightens you out very quickly. But it's one of the places where we might have some difficulty. It's a good place to work on forgiveness—another reason to be talking about it at this point.

It says in the Bhagavad Gita, "If you want to see the brave, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the heroic, look to those who can return love for hatred."

So what is forgiveness? How do we understand it? There are things we need to know in order to practice it wisely.

The first is that forgiveness does not condone what happened. It doesn't justify it in some way. In fact, the first thing you can do is say, "I will do everything I can to prevent this suffering from continuing—continuing to hurt me or someone else, to prevent this harm." So it's not like rolling over or saying it was okay. It was not okay. And you stand up for what really matters. And it doesn't mean you have to talk to somebody. You may or may not end up talking to them. Forgiveness is reclaiming your own heart.

I remember a person I worked with named Alvaro. When his father died, it was a big construction company that the family owned, and his brothers tried to get his share of the company. You know how it happens when somebody dies in families.

And it was nasty and it was really painful because they'd also been a close family. And finally he came in one day and he said, "I will stand up for myself. I will do what's needed to protect myself." And he did. He got a really good business partner who helped him do that. He said, "And I've learned that I can trust—and I can trust my brothers to be themselves. I now know who they are, but they're my family and I love them anyway."

And it was that difficulty that we have of holding the pain of something, but also recognizing often that we still love that person. Not that easy, but welcome to the human realm.

So the first thing about forgiveness is it doesn't condone. It says, in fact, that's wrong. I will do what I can to prevent the harm from continuing.

The second—and also noticing this—the second is who forgiveness is for. Guess who? As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi."

You may have noticed that when you sit in meditation, it's a little hard to control your own thoughts and mind. Have you noticed that? How about controlling others? How's that going for you?

So who forgiveness is for primarily is for oneself. The release of the burden. Not to be a hostage to the past, to what's happened. Not to be the victim of it. "Oh, he did this, she did that"—just what the Buddha was writing about. And then you live in that story as if that story were true. And the thing about the stories that we make up and then live in is they're kind of true. You know what I'm saying? And they're kind of not true. There are other sides to it.

It's like the two ex-prisoners of war who met years afterward, and one says, "Have you forgiven your captors?" And the other says, "No, never. They tortured us. All that happened." And the first one said, "Well, then they still have you in prison, don't they?"

Who is it for? It's for yourself.

And truthfully, the story that you have—if you were to let it go, who would you be without "they did me wrong"? It's not so much that we're afraid of change or so in love with the old ways, but it's the place in between where we let go that we fear. It's like being between trapezes. It's Linus when his blanket is in the dryer. There's nothing to hold on to.

So here's a poem about story. It's just such a good poem. I needed to read it tonight. It's called "Little Movies," from my favorite poetry journal, which is called Rattle.

I'm telling my friend Charlotte that Barbara and I are going to go to New York, where I hope to not spend a whole lot of money in fancy restaurants. And Charlotte tells me she was just in New York herself but didn't spend much money on food because she was with a group of pregnant women. I can see them now as they decide between goat cheese salad and the hummus, the hearts of palm and the orange glazed shrimp with spicy walnut crumble, as the waiter says, "Can I interest you ladies in a mimosa, a glass of Prosecco?" And they say, "No, not this time, maybe in a few months."

Barbara asked her hairdresser if she plans to have children. And the hairdresser says she's leaning the other way because she works on a lot of young mommies, and they're just not selling it. Then again, parenthood isn't about joy. Studies show that parents report significantly lower levels of happiness, life satisfaction, marital satisfaction, and mental well-being compared with non-parents.

Why do it then? Why have children at all? Probably because children add narrative to a life that doesn't have one, or add more narrative to a life that's actually pretty rich in narrative already, or seems as though it may never have a narrative at all.

Do you know that even aliens love stories?

The woman who claims to have interviewed the alien whose ship crashed in Roswell, New Mexico in 1947 said the creature's favorite books were Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, Don Quixote, and A Thousand and One Nights—all stories of great spirit and great power. Great images.

Tom Petty says a good song should give you a lot of images. You should be able to make up your own little movie in your head for a good song. And the same is true of stories.

A man had a peacock, says playwright Tom Stoppard, and the man was shaving one morning. In the mirror, he sees the peacock atop the garden wall, about to jump to the other side. So the man drops his razor and races out just as the bird reaches the motorway and starts to leg it to God knows where. He catches it after a hundred yards or so, puts the peacock under his arm, and starts home. So the story ends happily.

But in the meantime, a good half dozen cars have sped by, and their occupants have seen a man clad only in pajama pants, his face covered by shaving foam, carrying a peacock. What did they think? That the man had lost a bet on a rugby match, perhaps, and now has to walk from Whitby to Berwick-on-Tweed with the foam on his face and the bird under his arm? Or that he belongs to a cult religion that worships shaving, partial nudity, and peacocks, and he's on his annual pilgrimage? Or that he's been slipped a powerful drug by his wife's lover, who is sending the man out into the world this way so that he will appear deranged and spend the rest of his days in a care home while the two lovers squander the man's considerable fortune?

All lives end the same way. Between the start and the finish, it's the stories that count. We can be grateful for all these stories.

Charlotte laughs as she tells me about her pregnant friends, and I love thinking about all that life around the table. And then I ask Charlotte if she plans to have children, and she wags her finger at me as if to say, "Wouldn't you like to know?"

I read this partly for the pleasure of it, because it's a good poem, but also to remind us that we make up so many stories about this world. My friend Roger Walsh—MD, PhD, on the faculty at Stanford Medical School—read the Encyclopedia of World Religions from Ahura Mazda all the way to Zoroaster. I said, "So what did you learn from this, Roger?" And he said, "All these religions have stories that they place upon the mystery." Birth stories, beginning stories, ending stories. Stories placed upon the mystery.

So when we forgive, we actually become more vulnerable in a way. Like Linus with the blanket in the dryer. We let ourselves open to something new that's not the old way, not the old holding on and the old belief of how it was, but open to another possibility.

Also, forgiveness can't be papered over. It's a process, often slow, with grief and rage and fear and blame and tears. The story I always tell is of the man who wrote to the IRS saying he was unable to sleep because he cheated on his taxes last year. So he enclosed an anonymous cashier's check for three thousand dollars. He said, "And if I still can't sleep, I'll send the rest."

It's pretty much how it works for us. You do a little forgiveness and you say, "Yeah, but I'm not really... I mean, they did it and I shouldn't..." And you can feel all that stuff inside. You know how it works. But little by little, there comes somehow a realization that it's good for you to forgive. Forget about them. They may or may not change at all. You can't make them different. But you tend your own heart.

There's a remarkable book I have here. Trudy and I were talking about it because she's going to be in Dharamsala in dialogue with the Dalai Lama in a couple of weeks. We were kind of wishing we could go. A woman named Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela, a South African psychologist, was one of the central people who helped run and organize the Truth and Reconciliation process there. This book is a record of her going into the toughest prison in South Africa and spending a year in conversation with the man who was most vilified as a killer on the side of keeping apartheid going, on the side of the Dutch white folks—a man named de Kock.

She spent a year trying to understand him. And in the course of it, she changed and he changed. It's a remarkable story. Here he is, he says: "I think that I lost... It's a feeling of loss. The first thing that goes is innocence."

I mean, there's no more fairy tales, no more Bambi. That's gone. We killed a lot of people—and he did it in terrible ways. And they killed some of ours.

And then he pauses.

"We fought for nothing. We fought each other, basically, eventually for nothing. We could have all been alive having a beer. And the politicians... If we could put all the politicians in the front lines with their families and grandparents and grandchildren—if they're in the front line, I don't think we'll ever have a war again. I think it's educated people, very educated people, who sit in Parliament and decide about war. So I'm confused. I'm very confused. I'm just tired."

De Kock shook his head, shifted his legs to adjust the position of the chains that bound him to his seat, his eyes downcast, looking like somebody reflecting on the greatest loss in his life.

And it's a remarkable thing to see somebody like Pumla go and say, "I'm going to go to the person that's most considered the evildoer in our culture and try to understand them, and in some way to be understood by them." You can feel the dignity and the nobility of it. But it's a process that was a whole year of her life.

And then finally, there's a kind of perspective that we have to carry. You know the Ojibwe saying: "Sometimes I go about pitying myself, and all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky." We are vulnerable human beings. It's true. The poet Rilke says, "Ultimately it's upon your vulnerability that you depend." And we depend on one another—to stop at red lights so we can go on the green, to drive on their side of the street, to be gracious in line at the store, to care for one another, to care for children who are lost. We depend on each other so much. And this is our human realm.

So the last piece is to not put another being out of your heart. Not to close your heart. And not for their sake. There they are—they might be having a vacation in Hawaii right now. They're on a beach in Kauai having a lovely time. "I hate them. I hate them." Who's suffering? But it's something very deep that's needed.

Another story. This is a story of a man who's in hospice, close to dying. And the hospice volunteer—a Zen hospice volunteer—asked him if he had any last wishes. He said, "I really want to see my daughter. I've been estranged from her for years, and that's the thing that I most want."

So the hospice volunteer took great effort, tracked the daughter down, emailed her, and then began to call her. The daughter didn't want to come back. And finally, after a long time—she kept saying, "I don't want to see him. I hate him. I'm glad he's dying"—she relented. "Okay, I'm not going to stay long, but I'll come."

The hospice volunteer was happy that she could aid a reconciliation. The day the daughter arrived, the volunteer was standing outside the door, looking to see what would happen. The daughter flew into the room. As soon as she got in, she looked at her father and said, "You're one of the most awful people I've ever known. You caused more harm to me than anyone I've ever met. I hate your guts." And then she turned around on her heel and left.

The hospice volunteer went into the room and said, "I'm so sorry. I didn't know that was going to happen."

And the father responded, "That's exactly what I wanted to have happen."

The truth is, I was a terrible father. She's never had the opportunity to tell me to my face, and I knew it was eating her alive. I needed to let her say it.

So it doesn't go the way you think it should go, but it's really an act of mercy of your heart to say, "All right, I can do this. I can forgive in some way." And a lot of it is forgiving of yourself. We're so hard on ourselves, and we define our lives by our worst moment as if that's really the truth.

Or the society, which is one of a lot of blame—especially in our crazy criminal justice system, poverty, racist poverty prisons. Most incarcerated women, two-thirds, are in prison for nonviolent, low-level drug crimes or property crime. One of the first incarcerated women I ever met was a young mother who was serving a long prison sentence for writing checks to buy her three young children Christmas gifts without sufficient funds in her account. Like a character in a Victor Hugo novel, she tearfully explained her heartbreaking tale to me. I couldn't accept the truth of what she was saying until I checked her file and discovered that she had in fact been convicted and sentenced to over ten years in prison for writing five checks, including three to Toys "R" Us. None of the checks was for more than $150.

It could make you weep. And it also makes you weep because there's a way in which we want justice. There's something in us that knows what justice looks like, and we want something honorable. And we have to be honorable to ourselves as well—to forgive ourselves as well as forgive others.

In Hawaii, there is a temple on the coast of the Big Island called Pu'uhonua o Hōnaunau, sometimes translated as the Temple of Refuge or the City of Refuge. These are big black lava stone walls on the beach with some little temple buildings inside and a whole courtyard. It's said that in the ancient Hawaiian culture, if you had broken a taboo, or you had done something that was illegal or terrible, if you could get yourself inside the walls of this city of forgiveness, this temple of forgiveness, you would be forgiven no matter what it was.

I remember the first time I went there, I found it very moving. I wondered, "Does this place still work? Could I be forgiven? Could you be forgiven? Could we be?" And what would it be like for us as a culture to build temples of forgiveness instead of the kind of crazy prison system or all the other things we do?

So it's both the collective peace that we want to awaken to—seeing that there's another way to live as humans—and then, of course, it starts most personally at home, in our own heart.

"Thank you, Jack. I really like listening to you teach."

"And I'm happy to be here as a guest at your sitting group. Jack comes and teaches at my sitting group in L.A. It's not quite this large—we have an intimate group of about a hundred that come on Sundays. It's a great pleasure to be here with you at Jack's group. I think of this as Jack's group, although I know every week there's somebody else teaching for the rest of the month.

"So yes, forgiveness. This is a topic very dear to my heart for my own life, for personal reasons, which I'll share with you in a bit. And I've really thought too about what it is. What does it mean to forgive? We all want to forgive because it's spiritual and nice. But forgiveness takes time, and it can sometimes take a long time. It just takes as long as it takes.

"The dictionary says forgiveness is giving up any thought of revenge or harm even when it's justified. That's the hard part, right? Because I have a right to be full of rage and entertain revenge fantasies and plot...

"My own definition of forgiveness is that it's learning to make peace with life when you didn't get something that you wanted. Another understanding is that there are ways to handle that experience of not getting what we want in our life besides becoming bitter about it.

"This might be a tasteless joke, but I'm going to go ahead anyway since I've started. Somebody said to me once, 'Do you know why cannibals never eat divorced people?'"

Because they're bitter.

I'm divorced, and I'm not bitter. But of course, I'm happily married now, and I'm going to tell you a story about that—the not being bitter story.

I think forgiveness is loving when we've been harmed or caused harm. It's that decision to love. It's how we love when we've been harmed or done harm—we love by forgiving. This is an activity of love.

I love this process, no matter how long it takes. Because when it happens—when we finally can let go of whatever grudges, whatever anger, whatever sorrow, whatever terror, whatever gets in the way of our being able to honestly and truly forgive ourselves or somebody else—when that happens, what floods in, when our hearts are freed from being caught in states of various kinds of ill will, what floods in are what we call the Brahma Viharas, the divine places that the heart can dwell. Brahma means heavenly or divine, and Vihara is dwelling place. And these are love and compassion and joy and equanimity. That's what floods in. So there's a real incentive to forgive in a genuine way.

I was going to tell a story about Pumla, and I'll just say that having read Desmond Tutu's book on forgiveness and having read about that whole time, it's such a story of hopefulness. When the ANC won and Nelson Mandela was elected president, South Africa had a real chance of becoming the next Rwanda, of really having a bloodbath that would have been a genocide. And because of the work—the incredibly hard work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission that Pumla was part of—it didn't happen. It's really important for us to look at examples of when something awful could have happened and didn't, particularly during a time when we feel so many awful things are happening.

What was necessary for the survivors of the violence, the people who had lost loved ones in the war in South Africa, was an acknowledgment—an acknowledgment of what had been done. And not even so much an apology, because how can you apologize for murdering somebody's family member? But an acknowledgment.

Sometimes we have to use our imagination. How can we forgive people who have no remorse for having hurt us? How can we forgive people who have passed away, who are gone? How can we forgive ourselves for not meeting our own expectations? How can we forgive things like racial bias or climate change? How can we forgive ourselves for not having prevented that when we look into our grandchildren's eyes? How can we forgive ourselves for letting go of people in our lives that we really needed to hold close?

One story of using imagination in forgiveness that I read recently—I don't really recommend this book, it's a very hard read—is called The Apology by Eve Ensler. Some of you might have read it. Eve Ensler wrote The Vagina Monologues, which was a wonderful play of different women telling stories about their relationship with their—can we even say it? They say things like "down there" or all these euphemisms—with their vaginas. And it's funny, it's sad, it's poignant, it's beautiful actually. It can be life-changing too, just to hear women speak this way.

This was part of her own journey of healing as a survivor of childhood sexual abuse. But it wasn't enough. She needed more. What she needed was an apology from her father who had sexually abused her for many years. But her father had passed away.

So what she did was just hard to imagine—such an act of creativity. She imagined what it was like to be her father, doing these things that he did to her. She really let herself inhabit his psyche completely, empathically, just describing what happened. And at the end of the book, she has her father—he doesn't really apologize in a beautiful way, he was not a beautiful guy—but what he did was acknowledge how much he had hurt her.

And she has him tell her how much he knows that he changed the course of her life and made it so much harder by the harm that he caused.

Now, this never happened, because he had already passed away. But she imagined it. And the power of the imagination was—and can be—so healing for us.

For many years, I worked as a psychotherapist in Cambridge, Massachusetts, about twenty-five years. We did a lot of psychotherapy through something called psychodrama, where we would take different parts and enact each other's stories and dramas. But what we could do in psychodrama that we can't always do in life is imagine a different ending for some of those stories. We could play out the way it had happened—that was the cause for needing therapy, so it was something painful. And then we could play out: what if that person had done something different? What if something different had happened?

I was a little skeptical at first. It's pretend. It's playing, it's pretend. But it's powerful.

About twenty-five or thirty years ago, when I was doing that kind of work, I was also meditating a lot. And I didn't really have the permission to use my imagination so much in meditation. I was following the instructions and kind of strictly sticking to them—not so free in that way.

But I want to encourage you in your meditation to feel free to use your imagination, to use your creativity. When you sit down to be with yourself and meditate, maybe you aren't going to just follow your breath that day. Maybe you're going to radiate some compassion to yourself or to somebody else. Maybe that's what's called for. And maybe one day you sit down and compassion is the farthest thing from your mind or what's even possible, and you're just going to sit with the breath and the sensations in the body and calm down a little bit. But having that freedom to ask: How is it? How is it for me today? What do I need? I want to encourage you. It's important.

And it also helps us in our daily life. Here's just a daily life story. Last night I couldn't find the little plastic thing my dentist made for me to put in my teeth at night. I couldn't find it anywhere, and I was so frustrated because I get up in the night sometimes and get a glass of water or have a snack, and I'm so careful about where I put it. But I'm at Jack's house—I live part-time in LA, of course, and we go back and forth—and I was looking everywhere, and so was Jack, and it was nowhere to be found.

But what was going on is that I was berating myself the whole time. "This is so expensive. You already lost one. How could you not be more careful?" And suddenly, mindfulness—yes, some loving awareness—actually happened and kicked in. Because when we have a practice, it does that. And when it kicked in, I thought, "Actually, I'm really careful with my binky"—I call it my binky—"I'm really careful with my binky. Where would I have put it carefully?" And instantly I knew. It was in the pocket of my fuzzy bathrobe.

The happiness that I felt! But really, it's a story about forgiveness, because the minute that activity of calling ourselves names and berating ourselves for being whatever it might be that we're not happy with—as soon as that stopped, it was just clear.

Recently—Jack knows, I've talked to him about this—I've been traveling and doing a retreat and going to a board meeting, just doing some travels and work. And in the course of these travels, just coincidentally, twice I found myself with people sequentially who could not get along with each other. In other words, a gathering with one person who was upset with another person who I saw later, or having lunch with one person, then coming to the place where the other person was.

This is two sets of people who have had forty or fifty year friendships. In one case, these are two people in their seventies who were friends since kindergarten. That's a long friendship. That's a lot of trust and affection over the years. And they are mad at each other. They've been mad at each other for three years.

I know what they're mad at each other about, and it's easy for me to say, how can you let a lifetime of trust and affection go down the drain simply because they said this that you didn't like, or they did that that you didn't like? It was not horrible. It was just inconsiderate. Or thoughtless. We're all like that sometimes.

But we do this, don't we? And we sometimes do it to children. "You lied to me. You're nine years old and you lied to me. You know better." Nine years of trust. Banished. Gone. "How can I ever trust you again?" We say these things sometimes when we're upset.

But that lifetime of trust and affection is so important. And I just want to encourage all of us to hold it carefully and tenderly, to remember where we've put it. When we wake up at night and the mind starts churning—she did, she said, he did, he said—it's possible to change the channel. It's possible for us to actually shift our attention. And I'm not talking about the big horrible abuse, or the person who harmed you the most in this lifetime, or betrayed you in the worst possible way. We have to do some grief work around losses and wounds like that. We have to. And around the losses and what's happening that we can't control.

Recently I sat a retreat with Bhikkhu Anālayo at the Barre Center for Buddhist Studies. He's a monk who practices very intensively. He spends five days a week in retreat, in silence, sitting all day. And actually, he sits down to meditate and he gets up seven and a half hours later to have lunch, take a shower, maybe rest a little bit. Then he sits down and gets up another seven and a half hours later. So if you think maybe it's long to sit for half an hour, you can think—I do—you can think of Bhikkhu Anālayo and his practice. And then he writes two days a week.

He said that his whole winter retreat—he does a hundred-day retreat in the wintertime—his whole winter retreat was focused on the grief and outrage that he feels about climate change. And he said it took him his entire retreat to be able to face the various possibilities, all of which are really difficult to face, especially if you're a parent or grandparent. All the possibilities, including the end of humanity. He went that far.

And he said until he could feel all the feelings of grief, of rage, the immense sorrow, the fear—all of those feelings—until he could feel them and be with them with some measure of self-compassion and equanimity, he knew there was really nothing effective that he would be able to do.

So this is another way that our practice is so important for us. The things that we want to change and that we want to help in the world—they can't be helped when we're coming at them with this huge charge of anger and outrage, or grief, or whatever it may be. For us to be able to muster the loving awareness and the internal balance to meet what's happening with some measure of compassion and equanimity is a way for us to be effective with each other, with those who don't share our views, listening to each other, learning what it's like to be each other.

So we can't forgive too early, as Jack was saying, until we've grieved the loss. I think that's the obstacle that most people encounter when trying to forgive. We also can't cry in rage forever. And we do calm down. And then we can remember that first of all, the only life that we can be happy in is the one we actually have. Not the one that's going to happen in the future maybe, or the one that we used to have, but this one, right here, right now. This one that we actually have.

And the most famous Stanford expert on forgiveness, Fred Luskin, says, "Remember that a life well lived is your best revenge. Instead of focusing on your wounded feelings and thereby giving the person who caused you pain power over you, look at all the love, beauty, and kindness around you."

Because forgiveness is about personal power.

And forgiveness is also heroic. It's noble. It takes an immense effort when something bad has happened. We can rewrite our memoir, rewrite our autobiography when we make that noble choice. And every time we do, we're actually moving our whole society more toward love. Because what we do for ourselves and our community, we're doing for both at the same time.

The last story I want to tell you is about forgiving my husband—the man I was married to before Jack. There were ten years in between, and it wasn't my first marriage, that one either. I seem to require ten years in between to recover, but then I start over again. I do assure Jack, and it's true, that he is my favorite of all my husbands.

There's been a lot of news recently about misconduct on the part of Buddhist teachers this past year, and it's painful news. It seems to come in waves every ten years when you've been doing this as long as we have. You can see that rhythm, and it's just so upsetting that it keeps happening, but it does. Some people are forced to step down. Some move on and start another community somewhere else. Some do the incredibly hard work with integrity—a much harder path of sincere, committed work on themselves with an expert, specialized therapist. Taking responsibility and facing their history, they can emerge stronger and wiser.

In my case, my husband was a wonderful, gifted teacher, and actually still is, but he hit a really rough patch and, like some of the recent teachers, went off the path. It didn't happen while we were together. Even in a court of law, you're not required to blow the whistle on your own spouse. I didn't tell because I wanted him to be in recovery, and he was for a while.

Whatever we've done, we all want to be forgiven for our past mistakes, don't we? We've all made unwise choices. We've all needed forgiveness. And we all want to be seen and understood and known for the more overarching good of who we are, whether we're nine years old or ninety years old. That's what we want. We don't want to be judged forever for the past unwise choices or mistakes we made.

So this story: quite a number of years after our divorce—maybe eight or ten—my daughter invited my husband to come visit, and we met for the first time in all that time. We hadn't even spoken for ten years. It took me a long while to really feel forgiving of him. It didn't take as long for what I felt had happened to me, but more for our family—the extended family, the kids.

But this time, we just spent easygoing time together, taking care of the grandkids. We were actually babysitting, making dinner, and it just felt so familial, so familiar—being family together, gradually unburdening ourselves a little bit. There was a Sunday sitting group at InsightLA where we actually taught together that weekend. We decided we could do it after that Saturday night of just taking care of kids.

That morning of teaching together, we talked about loss and repair, because everybody's lost somebody and often without the chance to repair. We really opened it up and brought everybody into that experience. It was kind of beautiful, actually.

And what I saw was this: after ten years, after all the heartbreak, all the anguish—agony, actually, at times—what was left? What was there on the other side of that suffering? I think those of you who've gone through heartbreak of great magnitude and a lot of suffering know, if you've had time to heal...

and even time to forgive, you know what lies on the other side of that suffering.

And it's really just love. Love and humility. The humility of our shared humanness. And the love of these teachings that help us live better lives.

I don't know what I would have or could have done if I hadn't been practicing all these years. Because I have been, I don't know what the other life would look like. But I'm grateful, and I know you are too. And if you're new to this practice—keep going. Don't stop. Pick it up and keep going, even when you disappoint yourself and stop. You can still keep the intention to practice in the center of your life and come back to it, just like the Julia Child story. It's here, always waiting for us.

So we've all made plenty of mistakes in this life, and we will probably continue to do that. But through the grace of cultivating loving awareness, we can grow and strengthen our capacity for growth through practicing, and also this human capacity that we have for forgiveness and redemption.

What I would like to do now is lead a forgiveness meditation—a practice that can take us in the direction of forgiveness and redemption.

Please find a posture that you're comfortable in, because it's very hard to generate the intention to be compassionate and forgive if you're really uncomfortable. And we can forgive ourselves for getting distracted in meditation too. That moment of distraction and our noticing it is right there—the birth of our freedom.

Sitting comfortably, closing your eyes if that's comfortable for you in a large group, or just lowering your gaze if not. I like to begin this practice with forgiving ourselves, because without that it's really hard to genuinely forgive anybody else. How we do this together is I will say certain phrases that carry the intention to forgive and invite you to repeat them silently to yourself. All you have to do is listen to what you're saying to yourself and see if you can mean it too.

I forgive myself for being imperfect. I forgive myself for making mistakes. I forgive myself for being a learner in this life. And that means for being a work in progress. We forgive ourselves for being in the process of learning how to do better.

I forgive myself for being a learner in this life.

And once again: I forgive myself for being imperfect. I forgive myself for making mistakes. I forgive myself for being a learner in this life.

In whatever ways I may have harmed myself, intentionally or unintentionally, I forgive myself. For any way that I have abandoned myself, betrayed myself, my values, been less than who I know I can be—I forgive myself.

Taking a moment now, using whatever phrase speaks to you, resonates for you, that you need to hear. Just offering forgiveness to yourself. You can place a hand on your heart. Just offering some self-compassion, kindness, understanding, and love.

Then, when you feel ready, call to mind somebody you need to forgive—but please don't choose the person who has harmed you the most in this lifetime. Maybe start with somebody who has just annoyed you. The reason for that is simply time. It takes time to forgive, or it can.

Call to mind this being, and then we're going to offer the phrases to this one.

I forgive you for being imperfect. I forgive you for making mistakes. I forgive you for being a learner in this life.

And once again: I forgive you for being imperfect. I forgive you for making mistakes. I forgive you for being a learner in this life.

For whatever way you've hurt me, intentionally or unintentionally, I'm willing to forgive you. For whatever way you caused me harm, knowingly or unknowingly, I forgive you.

Again, using whatever phrase is right for you, spend another moment with this person to whom you are extending forgiveness.

And now I invite you to call to mind somebody that you have hurt.

Somebody whose feelings you hurt, somebody you overlooked. Again, not the most horrible thing you've ever done, but something that was hurtful to somebody. Call this person to mind, because we're going to ask for forgiveness.

Please forgive me for being imperfect. Please forgive me for making mistakes. Please forgive me for being a learner in this life.

For whatever way I may have intentionally or unintentionally hurt you, I ask your forgiveness. For whatever way I knowingly or unknowingly harmed you, please forgive me.

Just take a moment to say anything else you may need to say to this one.

And coming back to yourself for a moment. Once again: I forgive myself. I forgive myself for being imperfect. I forgive myself for making mistakes. I forgive myself for being a learner in this life.

And just as I forgive myself and others, may all beings find it in their hearts to free their hearts from ill will, resentment, grudges, revenge fantasies. May we and all beings free our hearts to forgive and find our way back to loving awareness.

Thank you, everybody, for your practice, for your presence, for your listening. Thank you for being here.

CHAPTER 18

Loving Witness Meditation | Monday Night

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a systematic opening to what he calls 'loving awareness' or the 'loving witness.' The practice begins with establishing a dignified yet relaxed posture, settling the body, and connecting with the natural rhythm of breath. Kornfield emphasizes that the breath breathes itself, inviting practitioners to sense their participation in the larger exchange of life with all beings through the shared ocean of air.
> The meditation unfolds through progressive layers of awareness. Starting with breath as an anchor, practitioners learn to receive whatever arises—bodily sensations, emotions, thoughts—with the same quality of kind attention. A distinctive element of this practice is the invitation to greet each experience with gratitude, acknowledging pain or tension with 'thank you for protecting me' and pleasant sensations with equal appreciation. This approach transforms the relationship with difficult experiences, honoring the body's wisdom rather than fighting against it.
> Kornfield guides practitioners to recognize their true nature as awareness itself—spacious, open, and fundamentally loving. Rather than identifying with the changing phenomena of breath, sensation, emotion, or thought, one rests as the witness to this 'arising and passing dance.' The meditation concludes by extending this loving awareness beyond the personal sphere to encompass all beings, taking one's seat of stillness amidst what Kornfield describes as 'the 10,000 joys and the 10,000 sorrows'—a reference to the full spectrum of human experience that loving awareness can hold.

So please let yourself be settled in a way that you can sit for the next twenty-five minutes or so. Let your body be stable, sitting upright enough so there's a sense of alertness or presence, and also a graciousness—as if you're the king or the queen on your throne, at ease.

When you're ready, let your eyes close gently and begin to tune in. Take two or three long, deep breaths in and out as a way to center and release what's present, any tension you're holding. And bring a kind attention to your body. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let your shoulders relax and your arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body and the connection with the seat—your bottom or your feet—and the heaviness of your body being met fully by the chair, the earth, the floor. For this time, you can rest on the earth and she will support you just where you are. Let your belly be soft and your breath natural. Let your heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness, compassion.

And now, with this embodied awareness, in whatever way feels right to you, let yourself sense how your body is breathing. It breathes itself. You might feel the whole body breathing the ocean of air that we share with all the other living creatures of this planet, breathing in and out, exchanging the oxygen and carbon dioxide with the leaves of the trees and the grasses and all the beings around you. Or maybe you'll feel the breath as coolness in the back of the throat, swirling and tingling, or coolness in the nostrils, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to sense the breath, you can place one hand on your belly and feel the rise and fall gently in the palm of your hand.

This is a first invitation for mindful loving awareness: to let the body settle, let the breath breathe itself. And even if there's a background of pain or trauma that's carried in your body, be spacious and loving, feeling that in this moment there is a sense of presence and care that you can bring to yourself. Rest your attention as best as you can, gently and easily, feeling how the body breathes itself, one breath at a time—in breath and out, rising and falling, expanding and contracting. You are a living, breathing being.

With each breath, let the breathing and the awareness of this breath be an invitation for settling, for calm and ease to grow. Sometimes people even use a soft word with each breath: in, and out—ease, calm.

And of course there will be waves of thoughts and memories and plans, of emotions and other sensations. Let them rise and fall around this breathing, around each breath that you take. Let the sense of breath help settle and steady the mind and body together. Let all the other experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around this breath, and this one, around each breath.

And notice, as you feel the breath, as you're aware of the waves that arise around the breath, that who you are is not this breath or this body. You are the loving awareness, the loving witness. You are consciousness itself—open, spacious—letting the breath breathe itself and the experiences rise and fall within a field of loving awareness. Become the loving awareness itself. You are the kind witness.

As you quiet with the breath, let yourself settle with increasing calm and tenderness of heart. You'll notice that there are some strong sensations from the body that call your attention, that pull your awareness away from the breath: tingling or pleasure, pain, throbbing, vibration, warmth, cool, areas of trauma held in the body, areas of pleasure and delight in the body.

When a bodily experience from this precious human body becomes strong, receive it with the same loving awareness you've given to the breath. Let go of the breath as the focus. And as if to bow to it, you can name it gently and say, "Thank you." If it's pleasure: thank you. If it's tingling: thank you. If it's cold or hot: thank you for telling me. If it's trauma and tightness: thank you for protecting me.

You become the loving witness to the body. And the body shows you all that it holds, how much it's cared for you through everything. Whatever it shows you, you receive with loving awareness. You witness and say, "Thank you. Thank you for keeping on." And then feel the breath behind it all.

Just as waves of bodily experience will arise as you sit quietly sensing your breath, so too emotions and feelings will arise like waves of the ocean: sadness, longing, excitement, joy, fear, anxiety, love. When a strong wave of feeling arises, as if to bow to it, receive it with the same loving awareness. You are the loving witness.

You can name it gently—sad, sad, or longing, or joy, joy, happy. And whatever the feeling is that you name, let it rise and say, thank you. Thank you for letting me feel so much, so deeply.

When the feelings pass, you can return again to the breath for a time. You are the loving witness to this breath, to these sensations, to these moods and emotions. Life living through you.

Just as the breath arises and passes. Just as sensations float and change—painful and pleasurable—one after another, arising and passing in their time. Just as emotions and feelings rise and fall like waves of the ocean, and you are the loving witness.

Let yourself also be aware of the waves of thoughts. Picture thoughts and word thoughts arise and fall around the breath—planning, remembering, trying to take care of things, trying to keep you safe and protect you, trying to understand, guide, navigate. And when the waves of thoughts are strong, you can name them gently, as if to bow to them all. Planning. Thinking. Remembering. Envisioning. Figuring. As if to bow to them, naming them and say, thank you. Thank you for trying to take care of me and protect me. I'm okay just now. You can relax.

And when it's quiet, return back to the breathing. You are mindful loving awareness itself. The loving witness that notices the arising and passing dance. And you are open and silent.

And finally, let the sense of loving awareness extend beyond this body and feelings and thoughts to become the loving witness of all that's around you. The joys and sorrows. You are the loving witness. You are the awareness itself—loving and compassionate, spacious. Amidst the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows, you take your seat of stillness as loving awareness itself.

CHAPTER 19

Jack Kornfield · 45 min

> In this heartfelt talk, Jack Kornfield offers guidance on cultivating loving awareness as a way of navigating our challenging times—from climate change and pandemics to personal struggles and global conflicts. Drawing on the story of the Buddha's encounter with Māra on the night of his enlightenment, Kornfield illustrates how difficulties arise not just once but repeatedly throughout our lives, and how we can meet them with the same spacious, caring presence the Buddha demonstrated.
> Kornfield weaves together profound teachings with moving stories: the tale of Lee Horton, who after 25 years of wrongful imprisonment emerged to find extraordinary beauty in standing in line at the DMV; Ram Dass's encounter with a state trooper while on LSD, seeing Krishna in the blue light; and the parable of the rabbi who told dying monks that the Messiah was among them, transforming their community through mutual respect. These stories illuminate how shifting our identity from being caught in struggle to resting as loving awareness itself changes everything.
> The practical invitation is simple yet transformative: even three minutes of sacred pause can shift our perspective from fear and grasping to spacious witnessing. Kornfield emphasizes that this isn't about escaping the world's difficulties but about engaging with them from a place of centered wisdom. When we become the loving witness, we can hold both the unbearable beauty and the ocean of tears that comprise human existence. From this ground of awareness, we naturally respond with compassion—tending to what matters, serving where we can, and moving through this dusty world with an open heart.

So tonight I'd like to extend the teachings of our meditation on becoming the loving witness, the loving awareness, and talk about how we can manage ourselves, especially in these very challenging times.

At the end of our annual three-month retreat that we started some forty years ago on the East Coast at our center at Insight Meditation Society, we used to take a week at the end that we called integration week—to get people who had been silent for a long time prepared to go back into the complexity of their ordinary lives. We would show movies sometimes, and I remember renting this black and white documentary of a whole succession of speeches by Dr. Martin Luther King. Very, very moving. He would get up and begin to speak, and this incredible oratory would come out of him with so much vision and heart. He was really like a prophetic voice. And when he finished, sometimes he would fall back into the arms of the people around him, as if he had become a channel for something great—which was true.

I remember, as we all do, that famous statement where he said the arc of the moral universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. I think of it in these times because they are difficult times. It's hard to witness and feel what's happening in Afghanistan—because it's part of us. It's hard with the newly released UN climate change report. We've known it, and yet it comes into our bodies and our spirits. It's hard with the pandemic and the delta variant. There are emotional responses of being worried or exhausted or languishing, or for some of us, grief and loss.

And how are we going to fix all of this? We better hurry up. Things are difficult.

I think of the story of a young, ardent man who came to a great Zen monastery and found the master and said, "I want to come in and practice. In this world, there's nothing I want more than enlightenment." The master nodded. The young man said, "If I really applied myself, if I practice, how long will it take me to get enlightened?" The master smiled back and said, "Give me ten years." The young man said, "But wait—I'm really on fire. If I'm really ardent and do it, then how long?" The master looked back and said, "In your case, probably twenty years." The man got agitated and upset. He said, "Why did you raise it from ten to twenty? I told you I would really do it." And the master said, "Yeah, in your case, maybe even thirty years."

What can you take from this story? Where are we going? What will we find when we get there? Some kind of promised land in the future?

With everything that's happening in the world and in our lives, should we be optimistic or pessimistic? The pessimists among us look out and see the suffering in Afghanistan and the struggle as the Taliban has taken over—people trying to get out, the loss of freedoms, particularly the vulnerability of the women, and so many more things. The pessimists look at Syria and South Sudan and Myanmar and the rainforests in Brazil and in parts of the US that are losing so much. So much vulnerability, so many different forms of suffering. It's heartbreaking the way people mistreat each other. And if you look into the Buddhist texts in the cosmological sections, there are descriptions of the ends of empire on the earth with increasing disasters and shorter lives, natural disasters and human-made disasters. It's enough to make a pessimist out of almost anyone.

But then there's the optimistic side. This is not just a time of change in our lives, dear friends. It is really a time of transformation. If nothing else, the pandemic and climate change and the calls for racial and economic justice are showing us how completely interconnected we are. The young people in the world see it and know it. The great majority of the population of Africa and parts of India and China are young people, and they're filled with passion and hope for the future. There are all these possible breakthroughs in fusion power, medicine, agriculture—all kinds of human possibilities. And we are survivors. We've not only survived as human beings; we've taken difficulty and then made new leaps out of it.

So which is it? The poet Rilke calls it this life that faces both ways. Both ways. Because if you look really honestly, whether it's optimism or pessimism, you realize that they're only thoughts. They're only ideas. They're not the reality. We don't know, actually.

These are just views. And people who cling to their views, said the Buddha on many different occasions—those who are free let go of their views, and those who cling to their views move through the world annoying other people. It's one of my favorite little passages from the Buddha. And you know it, people who are really attached to the way they believe things should be.

But here we are, in this time, and it's not an easy time. We look back at the story that's told of the Buddha's enlightenment—seeking liberation, freedom, awakening. He took his seat under the Bodhi tree, the tree of enlightenment, and through that last night before enlightenment tried to steady his heart and quiet his mind and see deeply.

And as he did, as the story is told, Mara appeared. Mara is the name in Indian mythology of the god or being, the archetype, who represents all the difficulties of the world. And Mara came in many different forms.

As the Buddha sat there—and you've all heard this story—Mara arose first as temptations. Desires and needs, showing the Buddha all the things that he could have: Mara's most beautiful daughters, the most amazing food, all the possibilities. Don't you want something? All the things that we could want. And the Buddha sat and said, "I see you, Mara." With loving awareness, he became the witness to Mara appearing.

And Mara got frustrated and sent what are called the armies of Mara. There are these paintings and depictions of flaming arrows and swords and all of the armies of aggression and anger, seeking to knock the Buddha off his seat. And as it's painted, the Buddha holds up his hand—you see a line from his fingertips going to his heart—and he touches each of the arrows and swords and spears as they come to him with the touch of compassion, and they turn into flower petals and fall at his feet.

And finally the Buddha sits quietly, and then Mara comes in the last form—the form of doubt. Self-doubt, doubt in the whole process. "Who do you think you are? What do you think you're doing? What do you think is possible? This world is the way that it is. There's no way for you to find freedom."

And again, finally, the Buddha touches the earth and says, "The earth is my witness. I've sat under this tree. I have practiced and practiced and practiced for this moment, to be present for it all. And I have no doubt." And the earth washed away the armies of Mara, and the doubt disappeared, and the Buddha's heart and mind became absolutely silent.

As the morning star was ready to set, the Buddha saw that all things are impermanent, that all things arise like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, and a dream. He saw the evanescence of all things and found that the freedom was not to cling to any—to escape the snares of the king of death. As he said in a conversation later with Mogharāja on how not to be seen by the king of death: not to hold on to a single thing, to claim none of it as me or mine or identify with it. And instead, he became silent awareness itself, the witness to all things—both the vast stillness and the freedom beyond the whole sense of identity. He became freedom itself.

Now, the interesting thing in my experience as a teacher all these decades is that when I've led retreats—whether in Baltimore or Indonesia, Tucson or Switzerland, all these places around the world—one of the big surprises for people is that Mara appears everywhere. You sit down, minding your own business. "Okay, I'm going to sit and meditate, make myself calm and steady, see with clarity, bring compassion." And who appears? Guess who? Well, it's Mara again. Mara finds you wherever you go.

In fact, even after the Buddha's night of enlightenment, when you read the texts in the history, Mara kept coming back—fifty times Mara reappeared, testing the Buddha. And each time he would say, "Oh, Mara, is that you?"

Thich Nhat Hanh writes this beautiful account of the Buddha seated in a cave, quietly meditating, with his attendant Ānanda outside. And Mara—sometimes translated as "the evil one"—appears and begins to ask Ānanda, "I want to see the Buddha." And Ānanda says, "He's not here." And the Buddha hears the conversation and says, "Ānanda, is that my old friend Mara come round again?" And Ānanda didn't want Mara to come in, but he had to answer, "Yes, it is." And the Buddha said, "Set out a table. Let us have tea together."

And he invited Mara to tea. He said, "How is it going, Mara? How is it being the evil one?" Mara shook his head and said, "It's really tough. People hate me. I have a really hard job, inspiring everybody toward aggression and temptations and so forth." The Buddha was quite sympathetic and compassionate. He said, "You know, it's not even that easy being a Buddha, Mara. People distort my teachings. They want things from me that I can't do. They have all these imaginations and fantasies that they put on me."

We both have tough jobs, don't we, Mara? Take some tea, Mara. I'll see you when you come back again.

So here we are, dear friends. We got ourselves in trouble, which is called the human incarnation. What Zorba the Greek called "the whole catastrophe." We got ourselves a life that has birth and death, praise and blame, gain and loss, fame and disrepute, pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow—the life of opposites. We got ourselves born into a world of unbearable beauty and the ocean of tears.

Take a breath.

Here we sit together to meditate, to become the loving witness, the loving awareness. It's so mysterious. We don't know quite how we got here, and we're only here for a short while, a brief while. The ten thousand joys and ten thousand sorrows, praise and blame, gain and loss—they rise and fall in this human incarnation, ceaselessly.

So how do we live? How do we live wisely?

In any moment, you can become the loving witness. You can become loving awareness. It's why we sit in meditation. It's why we train—not to have a particular special amazing experience and hold your breath and hope it will last, but to sit with heartbreak and love and longing and fear and loneliness and sweetness and tenderness and anger. To step back. To put on that little half smile that Thich Nhat Hanh recommends as we meditate, the one you see on all those images and statues of the Buddha. To say, as Ajahn Chah, my teacher, used to say, "Oh, it's like this." Whatever arises—fear is like this. Loneliness is like this. Longing is like this. Hope is like this. We become the loving witness of it all. Spacious, caring, wise.

Now, you will be tried. Here we are with the spread of the Delta variant. People desperately, our children desperately needing to be back in school, even with masks. People wanting to go back to work. The flood of refugees as the oceans rise, as the temperature changes with climate change. The people around who don't vaccinate, the propaganda and untruth that spread around the world. You become the loving witness to all of that, yes.

And yet, it's also midsummer here in the northern hemisphere anyway. And the fruit is ripening. And the blueberries are sweet. And the blackberries hang heavy on the vine. I just recently went to a friend's house who had this amazing mulberry tree with these huge, long, sweet mulberries. And then the organic strawberries at our farmer's market, and five varieties of peaches, pluots and plums. What an amazing earth that brings us this bounty! How do we respond? What channel do you turn to amidst it all—amidst the joys and beauty and the sorrows?

This from Lee Horton. Among the two million people in our criminal justice system, he and his brother Dennis spent twenty-five years behind bars, accused of robbery and murder, sentenced to life without parole. They always maintained their innocence. And this year, after being locked up for a quarter of a century, their case was reviewed finally, and they were granted clemency.

He talked about how amazing it was to come out and not have handcuffs put on him when he was in a car. And he said, "When they take everything away from you, I came out into this world and everything becomes beautiful." He continued, "When we got out, just to tell you a story—me, my brother, and another man who was commuted went to the DMV a couple of days later to get our driver's licenses back. We stood in line for two and a half hours, and we'd heard all the stories that everybody tells about the bad things about the DMV. We had the most beautiful time. And all the people were looking at us because we were smiling and we were laughing and they couldn't understand why we were so happy. It was just that—just being in line, standing at the DMV was a beautiful thing."

It was wonderful. I was in awe of everything around me. The things everyone takes for granted become the best things in the world for you. Having an onion just to cook your food becomes priceless.

He goes on and on about this. What channel will we choose? Because the world offers herself to us with an ocean of tears and its unbearable beauty every day.

Now, when I speak about Lee Horton, I think about my close and beloved relationship with Ram Dass—colleague, friend, teacher, inspiration. He tells a story from years ago when he was living at Millbrook in upstate New York. At that time, he was still in the Richard Alpert mode. He and Tim Leary had been kicked out of Harvard for giving LSD to undergraduate students, and he was going around talking about the psychedelic revolution and enacting it as they did at Millbrook.

He tells the story of dropping some acid, and then he needed to go somewhere—to the market or something. So he got in his big old car and got on the road, whatever it was, Route 9 that went near Millbrook. He started to drive along, and all of a sudden behind him he saw this flashing blue light from a police car. He knew enough, even though he was tripping, to pull over.

And this officer got out of the car with the blue light and walked over to him wearing a blue uniform. The state trooper. Ram Dass said, "I saw the blue light, and it was the same blue light that surrounds Krishna." When you look at all the beautiful images from India, especially baby Krishna, Krishna is surrounded by blue light. "And I saw this blue light come, and I knew it was the God Krishna who had stopped and come to visit me."

The officer came and Ram Dass lowered his window. He said, "I would have given him anything. This is a visit from God. What do you want?" And the officer said, "I want to see your license and registration."

So Ram Dass gave him his license and registration. "He thought," said Ram Dass, "that he was a state trooper, but I knew who he really was. I knew he was God." The officer gave him his license and registration back and told him that he'd been driving far too slowly. Apparently he was going twenty miles an hour on this highway, or fifteen. And then the officer looked at him so kindly and said, "Go on your way now, but make sure to pay better attention."

Ram Dass said, "And I got these teachings from God."

What channel do we tune in? There's something mysterious about this world, something amazing. It presents itself, and with mindfulness, mindful loving awareness, like Lee Horton, we can see it all anew—like the child of the spirit that was born in you. It's still there, underneath it all, to see with the eyes of amazement.

Mary Oliver's famous lines: "And therefore I look upon everything as a brotherhood and sisterhood, and I think of each life as a flower, as common as a field daisy, and as singular. And each body a lion of courage and something precious to the earth. When it's over, I want to say all my life I was a bride married to amazement."

What a line. Married to amazement. And it is amazing. Take a breath. Remember.

And when we see with amazement, with loving awareness, we also see with the heart. Do you remember the story that I've told from past years about the rabbi in the woods?

It turns out that sometime long ago, there had been a great order of monastics, and all of these monastics who had spread out across the Christian lands had created temples of meditation and contemplation and prayer. But over the years, as modernization happened, the temples started to close and die out. People were less interested in going into monasteries. And so finally there was only one main mother house, one place where a handful of monks remained. There were only six of them left, and they were all in their seventies. They were a dying order.

It turned out that near the monastery there was also a special retreat center for the master rabbi, the mystic of that area from the Jewish tradition. And because the monks were quiet and listened, they could sometimes tell when the rabbi came into the woods.

They became despondent as everything was dying out, and they said, "Maybe we should send someone—our abbot—to go speak with the rabbi. He can give us some advice. Maybe he can help us, or at least understand us."

So the abbot went to the hut of this mystic and told him about the loss of so many other monasteries, and how now there was just this small group of them left. The rabbi kindly commiserated and said, "Yes, in these times, it's very difficult." And they sat down and prayed together. They read from the Torah. They read from their scriptures. They felt it was wonderful to see one another in this time and place, no matter what happens.

Have you no advice for us? the abbot asked the rabbi. He said, No, I really have no advice. But I have a vision that came to me, which I don't understand—that somehow the Messiah is with you. Maybe even one of you.

So the abbot of the old monastery went back. He pondered on what the rabbi had said. And he told the other monks when they asked, What did he say? He said, The Messiah is one of us.

And in the months that followed, they all pondered these words. What could that mean? Could he have meant one of the monks here? The Abbot? If he meant anyone, probably Father Abbot. He's been our leader for a generation.

On the other hand, he might have meant Brother Thomas. Certainly Brother Thomas is a holy man. Certainly he couldn't have meant Brother Elrod. Elrod gets crotchety at times. But come to think of it, even though he's a thorn in people's sides, when you look back at it, Elrod is virtually always right. Often very right. Maybe the rabbi meant Brother Elrod.

But surely not Brother Philip. Philip's so passive, a real nobody. But then, almost mysteriously, he has a gift for somehow always being there when you need him. He just magically appears by your side. Maybe Philip is the Messiah.

Of course, the rabbi didn't mean me. He couldn't possibly have meant me. I'm just an ordinary person. Yet supposing he did. Suppose I am the Messiah. Oh God, not me. I couldn't be that much for you, could I?

And as they contemplated in this manner over the weeks and months, the old monks began to treat each other with extraordinary respect on the off chance that one among them might be the Messiah. And on the off chance that each monk himself might be the Messiah, they began to treat themselves with extraordinary respect.

Because the forest where it was situated was beautiful, it happened that people still occasionally came to visit the monastery—to picnic on its lawn and wander some of the paths and go into the dilapidated chapel to meditate. And as they did so, without even being conscious of it, they sensed this aura of extraordinary respect that now began to surround the five old monks and seemed to radiate out from them and permeate the atmosphere of this place. There was something strangely attractive, even compelling about it. And hardly knowing why, they began to come back to the monastery more frequently—to picnic, to play, to pray. They began to bring their friends to show them this special place, and their friends brought their friends.

And then it happened that some of the younger men who came to visit the monastery started to talk more and more with the old monks. Sensing their beautiful respect and care for everything, after a while one asked if he could join. And then another, and another. And so within a few years, the monastery had once again become a thriving order, thanks to the rabbi's gift. A vibrant center of life and beauty had arisen from the gift of reminding the monks who they really are.

What does it mean in this mystery to treat ourselves with that kind of respect, to treat one another with that kind of respect?

Now, one of the concerns I hear from my colleagues, out there in the spiritual industry—so to speak, of which I am a part, embedded into the spiritual industry thing, which I can kind of look at now with some amusement and loving awareness—is the ruin of the loss of depth of what the tradition has. We had two-month retreats at Spirit Rock and three-month retreats at IMS and year-long trainings, monastic trainings that used to be so common in Thailand and Burma, Sri Lanka and elsewhere, where we received these beautiful teachings.

But more often than not, people are doing very short retreats. They've shrunk from three months and two months to ten days or a week or a weekend. And there's a certain loss of depth that happens. There's something amazing when you can come for ten days or longer and be silent, sit with your own body and heart and mind. Things open up. You can't even imagine if you've never done it. It's powerful and difficult at first, and amazingly beautiful.

And we see people at the end of retreats, and we like to talk about the meditative facelift. The Vipassana facelift.

Because people's eyes are shining at the end. There's a kind of smile and openness that's so beautiful to see.

But instead, now meditation has gotten shortened from one hour to thirty minutes or twenty minutes. And now I'm seeing the call for three-minute meditations. At the same time, some of the modern neuroscience coming out says that three minutes does a lot. If in your day you can take a few times for this sacred pause—this moment where you stop for three minutes and quiet and become the loving witness. "Oh, here I am caught up in this process at work. Here I am having to deal with this in my family. Here I am cooking, exercising. Here I am in the middle of paying my bills or caring for my garden or answering emails or watching the news." Let me take a moment—three minutes, one minute—to pause and step back and become the loving witness of life. Rest as loving awareness and say, "Well, this day, this moment with its joys and its sorrows, this is what I have to hold. This is the life I can give."

And in just a few breaths, our identity shifts from being caught in the difficulties and the struggles, the ambitions and problem-solving, the plans and memories and emotions—all those things we get identified with—to loving awareness. "Wow, look at this day! Look at this!" Like Lee Horton: "Look at this amazing day! Look at this line in the DMV! Wow, look at the berries and the summer fruit in a supermarket that has more food than any empire, any emperor or empress in previous thousands of years, would have had." What you have in your local supermarket would astonish them. Take some breaths and look at it all with the eyes of wisdom and a loving heart. Become that loving awareness itself. This is what you can do.

This is really the invitation to freedom. Yes, Mara will come, and you can say, "Oh Mara, is that you? I see you." But it's never too late to see with the eyes of mercy, to start anew exactly where you are—because where you are is always the place of freedom, again and again the invitation.

From the Tao: "I have just three things to teach: simplicity, patience, compassion. These three are your greatest treasures. Simple in actions and thoughts, you return to the source of being. Patient with both friends and enemies, you accord with the way things are. Compassionate toward yourself, you reconcile with all beings in the world."

When you learn to sit in the midst of it, when you learn to say, "Oh Mara, is that you? I see you," when you learn to step back and become the loving awareness itself, the loving witness—then you become a model of how to live in this magnificent and troubled human incarnation. You bring your heart to what matters. And it's so clear: when people are hungry—I think it was the Pope who said—when there are people who are hungry, you pray for the hungry, and then you feed them. That's real prayer.

And where you go, you sow seeds of respect. You tend the neighborhood. You walk through this dusty world, as it's called, as the Buddha did for forty-five years, and you tend the garden of this world with your loving heart, with your stillness. You become the loving awareness itself that's not caught up and frightened and grasping.

For me, I'm on a lot of boards now—I think seven or eight boards of incredible organizations working with refugees, climate boards, the Regeneration Board of Paul Hawken that's extraordinary, education boards, the board of Partners Asia working with all the heartbreaking situations happening in Burma and Myanmar and countries around there—so many different organizations. And the people involved are so goodhearted. Part of what I bring—yes, I give money, I help connect people, I offer my own visions—but a lot of it as an elder is to sit in the seat of loving awareness and say, "Yes, we've been through this before. Yes, we human beings have suffered wars and environmental disasters, earthquakes and typhoons and tornadoes and pandemics in the past. And we know how to do this. We know how to hold hands. We know how to keep our hearts steady and calm. We know how to see that we're woven together in this mystery." And then we can respond. We can respond not with our fear or our ambition, not with optimism or pessimism—both of which are just ideas. We can respond with the heart.

I want to read you one more story, just to give you a sense of how playful you can be even in the midst of difficulty. And I've seen it. When those who are wise, those who meditate as we do and learn to center yourself—as the Tao said, to sit in that center of patience and simplicity and, more than anything, of love, of being the loving witness—then you get up and you work. You give your money, you join the organization, you tend the garden, you pick something that you care about. It's not your job to pick them all, but to pick one of them at least and offer your gifts and your service and your help.

"I'm ninety-two years old. I get up every morning at seven a.m. Each day I remind myself: wake up, get up. I talk to my legs. 'Legs, get moving. Legs, you're an antelope.'"

It's a matter of mind over matter when you're in your nineties. You have to get the spirit right. And I'm out on the street at 7:30 a.m. sharp, wearing my Honorable Sanitation Commissioner badge they gave me from City Hall. I'm alert. I'm ready. I've got my whistle.

My job is to help get parked cars off the street so they can bring in the sanitation trucks and the Wayne Broom—the big one, thirty grand for a broom. So when they show up, I go around blowing my whistle to get people to move their cars. I have a great time.

People are asleep. They're busy with business. They're busy taking time off from their business. They're busy having a good time. They're busy not having a good time. Whatever. I don't care. I blow my whistle. I'm all over the place.

I don't discriminate either. I go after the sanitation men too. The union got them a coffee break. Some coffee break. They're having eggs. They're having bacon. They're having toast. They're having French toast. I kid them about it. I go right into the restaurant and I blow my whistle. They love it. They understand. Everybody loves it. Everybody understands. It's the whistle that gets them. Sometimes I'm having such a laugh I can't even blow it. And then I get back to work. "Schleppers, get moving! Let's go move those cars."

This used to be such a beautiful city. People cared. If you didn't pay your rent, the sheriff would come and put your furniture out on the street. But the poorest of the poor would come out automatically and drop their pennies and nickels at your house and put you back into your apartment. That's neighborhood.

Now, sadly, it's different. Things have gone out of kilter. Hard to say why. People seem to be lost in their own lives. I see them on the streets, lost in their own thoughts. Not that I'm all that different myself. I'm a schlep myself. I've had many bad habits, as many as anyone. You should see my apartment—it's a mess. Me, Mr. Clean. But I'm trying.

Let's try. It's all possible. What can I tell you? I'm not a saint or a wise man. I'm not the two-thousand-year-old man. I'm only the ninety-two-year-old man, just a senior citizen.

But what do I know that everybody else doesn't know? We know. I just go out there in the morning and blow my whistle. That's what I do. And you do what you do. And me, I'm having a great time, a wonderful time. And when people see how much fun I'm having, they have to laugh. What else can they do? And then I hit them with it: Move your car.

I never met him, but I love his story. And it tells me something—and maybe you as well—that it's one thing to get caught up in our lives, as he describes in his own way. And then it's another thing entirely to realize that we do have a choice. A choice of which spirit, which channel we tune into. We can be the loving witness, the loving awareness. And then we can engage from that place in the world, with joy and openness, in spite of it all.

What better to do? What better? What better could we do with this life, with this mysterious incarnation?

Thank you, my friends. Thank you for listening. I'm so grateful. You know, when I give these talks, I give them as a kind of reminder for you. But you know who else I'm reminding, don't you? As Miss Piggy would say: moi. This one here. These are ways that I remind myself to go out in the street with my whistle—or whatever I do as a meditation teacher. Instead of a whistle, I have my bell.

So thank you for listening. Thank you for your good hearts. Thank you that we get to remember together the spirit that's possible.

Forgiving Heart Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 25 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a gentle journey from breath awareness to loving-kindness (mettā). Beginning with the invitation to sit "halfway between heaven and earth," he establishes a foundation of embodied presence—softening the face, releasing the shoulders, and feeling the earth's complete support beneath us. The breath becomes a doorway to stillness, with the reminder that each inhale connects us to the living field of all beings.
> Kornfield introduces a compassionate approach to working with the wandering mind, using the now-classic analogy of training a puppy—returning attention again and again without judgment or harshness. He offers the practice of acknowledging whatever arises with a simple "thank you"—whether planning, remembering, worrying, or joy—before gently returning to the breath. This approach transforms potential frustration into an opportunity for kindness.
> The meditation gradually deepens into what Kornfield calls "loving awareness"—becoming the witness that holds all experience with tenderness. Drawing on teachings from Thích Nhất Hạnh, he suggests using the words "ease" and "calm" as gentle supports. The practice culminates in radiating mettā outward in all directions, like a lighthouse beacon, wishing peace and well-being for all beings everywhere. This meditation offers a beautiful integration of samatha (calm abiding), sati (mindfulness), and mettā practice accessible to both beginners and experienced practitioners.

Find a way to sit that's comfortable and stable, where there's a sense of both upright alertness and graciousness or ease. Take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this mysterious human incarnation, sitting under your own tree of enlightenment for this time. Begin to pay attention in a deep and quiet way.

Let your eyes close gently. First, take two or three long, slow breaths to release whatever is obvious that you're holding. Bring your caring attention to your own body as you sit here halfway between heaven and earth.

Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Relax your shoulders. Let your arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on your seat, your chair, your cushion, your feet. Notice how the earth beneath you completely supports you. You can relax just here and feel this support just where you are. Let your belly be soft and your breath natural. Let your heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and tenderness.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice how the body breathes itself—this mysterious inter-breathing with the ocean of air around us. Each breath you take in was breathed recently by those nearby, by the birds flying overhead and the worms in the soil. We're exchanging our breath of life with the rest of the living field of this earth.

Simply sense wherever you can—coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat. Sense this breath, the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's at all difficult to feel, put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand as you meditate. If it's helpful, with each breath you can whisper in the back of your mind: ease, calm. These words, suggested by Thich Nhat Hanh, invite the breathing to open you to quiet and center. Each simple breath.

Naturally, the attention will wander. When you notice the attention has wandered off—as soon as you're aware of it, ten seconds or two minutes later, it doesn't matter—as soon as you wake up, you recognize: oh yes, here, seated, breathing mindfully. As if to bow, acknowledge that you've been away and gently come back to the very next breath. It's this returning and redirecting over and over that begins to stabilize the sense of calm and steadiness.

No judgment. It's like training the puppy, we say. When the puppy gets up after you say "sit" and "stay" for a few seconds and runs around or pees in the corner, you clean it up. You pick the puppy up kindly and put it back down. Sit. Stay. You don't want to beat the puppy or frighten it. You want the puppy to learn that it can rest, just as you can.

Gently, with ease, this breath. One after another.

This breath. Notice its beginning, middle, and end, the space between breaths. How it rises and falls like waves of the ocean. You become the still and quiet witness of this breath. Calm and ease.

This breath. Use a kind and tender attention.

Let the stillness and steadiness deepen.

You are becoming the loving witness, the mindful loving awareness. Rest in the present, noticing the breath, this life breath breathing itself.

And with the same mindful loving awareness, you can acknowledge where the attention gets pulled when it leaves the breath. Not to stay there, but as if to acknowledge with a bow—planning, or remembering, or sadness, or longing, or love and joy. And maybe you can even add a little thank you. Oh, planning. Thank you. And then return to the breath. Oh, remembering. Thank you. And then return to the breath. Oh, worrying. Thank you. Return to the breath. Oh, love or joy. Thank you. And return to the breath.

You are the loving awareness, the witness of the breath and the waves of experience that rise around the breath. Stay simple. Just this breath now. Or just whatever wave appears to pull you away. Thank you.

You are the loving witness, the loving awareness itself, noticing this breath. Calm. Peace. And kindness toward whatever experience gets strong around the breath. Thank you to each one. And then return to the breath.

As the stillness deepens and the sense of being the loving witness, the loving awareness itself, grows—let this loving kindness fill your being. Add in the metta, the loving kindness: as all things arise and pass, may I be filled with loving kindness. Receive them all with kindness. Safe and protected. Kind and well.

Kindness and loving awareness holding this whole body, heart and mind, this whole human life that you've been given. Tenderly. Steady, loving and deep. With every breath and every wave of experience met with loving kindness, loving awareness.

And finally, let this loving kindness and loving awareness that fills awareness itself, that fills the sky of consciousness—let it spread from you out in every direction, like a lighthouse, like a beacon, wishing calm and peace for beings everywhere. Spreading loving kindness in every direction to beings far and near.

Rest in stillness and love. Let it naturally shine forth and be present for all you touch, and out to beings everywhere.

CHAPTER 21

Forgiving Heart | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 53 min

> In this profound talk, Jack Kornfield draws upon the wisdom of his teacher Ajahn Chah—"If you let go a little, you'll have a little peace. If you let go fully, you'll have complete and joyful peace"—to explore the transformative power of forgiveness. Reflecting on the Jewish Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur, and his own peace work with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, Kornfield examines how even the most entrenched conflicts can begin to heal when we remember our shared humanity.
> Kornfield outlines essential principles for wise forgiveness: it is not weak or naive, does not condone harmful actions, requires first stopping ongoing harm, and is ultimately not about the other person but about freeing our own hearts from being chained to the past. He shares moving stories from his work with Mahā Ghosānanda, the Gandhi of Cambodia, and from hospice settings, illustrating how forgiveness operates as a gradual process—like water on stone—rather than a quick fix.
> The talk culminates in a guided meditation through the three directions of forgiveness practice: asking forgiveness from those we have harmed, forgiving ourselves for the ways we have caused our own suffering, and offering forgiveness to those who have hurt us. Drawing on the Bhagavad Gītā's teaching that the truly courageous are those who can forgive, Kornfield invites practitioners to remember their Buddha nature and begin the tender, brave work of releasing bitterness to repair both heart and world.

The Forgiving Heart

My teacher Ajahn Chah said, if you let go a little, you'll have a little peace. If you let go a lot, you'll have a lot of peace. And if you let go fully, you'll have complete and joyful peace.

So here we are at the turning of the next seasons. The Jewish New Year and holiday of Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, has just passed. The New Year, which is in that culture or system, follows the time of the harvest—to start the New Year after the harvest. And of course, we're always starting again. How do we renew ourselves? How do we atone, which is the Yom Kippur day of forgiveness? How do we somehow cleanse the past and start in a gracious, wise, loving way again?

Earlier this year, I joined online with a group of peacemakers called Combatants for Peace. The event was held in Beit Jallah, a town in Palestine. The two warriors on the panel with me were an Israeli commander named Tulsi and a Palestinian combat leader named Osama. They had both led their military units in conflict where their comrades, their followers, people with them on both sides, were killed. And somehow, as they said in our conversation and in the work that we did for all those who watched, they simply couldn't do it any longer. They realized we have to find a way to share this land in peace. We need to find a better way. And so they've been on this journey, trying to convince and support and awaken this possibility, which is there on all sides.

Of course, it's not easy. People get really stuck.

A few years ago, I was doing some peace work in Myanmar, or Burma. It was during the time of the targeting—which has continued—of the relatively large and long-standing Muslim population there, trying to drive them out, great anti-Muslim racism. I met with one of the main Buddhist monks who was a kind of provocateur of this, even though he was a famous monk, an anti-Muslim leader. I read to him some of the Buddhist texts and said, as an upstart I might say, "You know, this is really not following the Dharma." And he agreed and said he would change his ways. Of course it was a lie. He continued to foment violence against the Muslims.

Around the same time, when I was in Palestine, I met in Hebron one of the most vociferous anti-Arab activists, the head of one of the political parties in Israel that wanted to throw all the Palestinians and Arabs out of Israel and out of the Palestinian land. Even with a kind approach and trying to inquire—nothing. Not easy.

And we know it in the polarization in this country as well. This isn't a quick fix.

But yet we need to understand. Dear ones, we have to know: What is it that allows Northern Ireland to stop killing one another? What is it that allows Rwanda to begin to mend a country, a nation torn apart between the Hutus and the Tutsis, and find a road to peace? What is it that's allowed France and Germany, which were these incredibly violent enemies in World War I and World War II—not that long ago, in my lifetime actually—to become friends?

"O nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Remember your true nature, your Buddha nature, for there's a reality deeper than the conflicts. There's a truth and a reality deeper than all these conflicts.

When I was doing peace work there in Palestine and Israel, I remember joining teenagers who'd been brought together at the Sulqita. I was working with a group of Jerusalem peacemakers that included Muslim sheikhs and rabbis and Druze and leaders from all different spiritual traditions. These teenagers—mostly boys, although there were girls there as well—had been meeting together for three years, and they finally managed to bring their parents together.

There was great difficulty trying to get the Palestinian parents over into Israel, into this community that was hosting them. And there were a hundred or a hundred fifty of us all together. I remember standing in a circle with these folks—Palestinian parents and Israeli mothers and fathers, all holding hands, the Arab women holding hands with their family members, of course—and gazing at these kids in the middle, maybe a dozen or fifteen of their teenage children, who'd become heart friends. They'd become so close together.

And then one of the Arab mothers turned to me, and through a translator said, "You know, for twenty years, I've only seen Israeli soldiers. I forgot they had mothers."

It was such a touching moment—for her to see, and for us to remind one another that who we really are is not all these stories that are told, but that there's a profound humanity and connection underneath it all.

So here we are, human beings in this incarnation, in a world of unbearable beauty and an ocean of tears. How do we touch our measure of suffering? With a forgiving heart—that's how.

I remember at the founding of Naropa Buddhist University, the first summer teaching together with Chögyam Trungpa and Ram Dass and Sharon Salzberg and Joseph Goldstein and Krishna Das, and many other teachers, two thousand students or more. On the full moon that summer—it might have been Guru Purnima or some great holiday—we had a bonfire out in the flatland under the moon, where you could see the whole wall of the Rocky Mountains as you do coming from the Great Plains up to Boulder, the mountains arising above you. A huge bonfire.

It was meant in part to be a celebration, but also a Kali fire, a fire of purification—to release and atone and move on. All the students were invited to write down things they needed to let go of, things they needed forgiveness for, things they needed to release in order to start anew.

Ram Dass, in his role at that time as a kind of priest—still wearing white and beads in the beard, Baba Ram Dass was his persona then—had set up a small tent. Before you could go and throw your words and troubles into the Kali fire to be released and purified, you were invited to step in and confess, or to speak from the heart, to tell Ram Dass what troubled you, what weighed on you.

Ram Dass stood there as a thousand people went through his little tent, listening to each one. Afterward, I watched them throw things into the fire, and then they began to dance. You could feel a new freedom.

I asked Ram Dass what he had heard. He said, "Oh, so many stories. A lot of self-hatred, a lot of self-doubt, judgment, a lot of confusion around sexuality, a lot of problems in families." He said over and over again, the same kinds of stories. And he said, "All I did was gaze at them with eyes like my guru's—to see who they really are, that secret beauty underneath it all—and bless them. And then they threw it in the fire."

We all need that.

With mindful, loving awareness—the very practice we've been doing—we can step out of the tyranny of self-judgment, judging ourselves for all the things we haven't done right or haven't done or have done wrong. We can forgive ourselves for being learners in this life. Did you get a manual when you were born? Are you supposed to be an expert? This is, as some say in a somewhat joking way, a training planet. This is a place for us, when we're born, to remember—even though we've lost it in ways—to remember our nobility, to remember the possibility of heart, the great heart of compassion, forgiveness, kindness, awakening.

Yeats, the great Irish poet, probably one of the greatest, Nobel laureate—toward the end of his life he writes:

I'm content to follow to its source every event in action and thought.
Measure the lot, forgive myself the lot.
When such as I cast out remorse
so great a sweetness flows into the breast for we must laugh and we must sing for we are blessed by everything and everything we look upon is blessed.

This is the gift of forgiveness. We can be forgiven, and we can forgive.

I remember the story of a hospice worker, a woman who worked at Laguna Honda Hospital here in San Francisco in the hospice ward. A man had been brought in who was quite sick, on his trajectory toward dying and death. He was in the orange garb of a convict, a man who'd been taken out of prison, and in fact he was shackled with a handcuff to his bed.

The hospice worker, this volunteer, spent time with him. She listened to his story, she tended him, she cared for him. She asked about his family, and he said he hadn't seen his mother for thirty years. He hadn't wanted her to see him in prison. He was so deeply ashamed of what he had done. He felt he couldn't face his mother.

But the hospice worker, with her good heart, slowly, slowly convinced him that it would be worthwhile, important, essential for him to make amends, to see his mother. And so the man, shackled to his bed, finally gave her permission to call. She arranged for his mother to come.

She said an old woman with a cane came down the hall, dressed mostly in black. She met the hospice worker at the door with a greeting, then looked in at her son and just stood there.

The hospice worker, this woman who told me the story, began to weep as she spoke. She said this mother stood there and looked at her son, and she began to weep. Her countenance was like the face of Mother Mary holding her beloved child, even after all that had happened to him, after the crucifixion. It was like seeing the face of the mothers of the world, holding their children no matter what.

This is who we are.

Suffering is not the end of the story. This is the good news in this mysterious human realm. Yes, there is suffering, but there is something so much greater. There is also freedom of heart—the great heart of compassion, redemption, peace.

O nobly born, we are invited to step out of the battle. As Ajahn Chah says, if you let go a little, you'll be a little happy. If you let go a lot, you'll have a lot of happiness. And if you let go fully, you'll be truly happy.

Yes, you might say—and ask quite rightly—but what if you're being harmed?

I think of the story of Amy, a meditation student who came to talk to me some years ago after her father died. Her father had started a big construction company, and her three brothers and she were supposed to receive the inheritance. But the brothers began to fight, and especially they tried, in some very unpleasant and mean ways, to cut Amy out of her inheritance—to steal it from her. She was both in grief and confused: what do I do?

So we did a lot of inner work over some time, first to settle and steady her. I said, you know, you can go through this. Then we talked about finding the best lawyer she could, which she really needed to do to protect herself. As we talked and met over a period of time, she got the lawyer and at least saved part of her inheritance.

One day she came in and said, "You know, they're still my brothers. No matter how much I was hurt, they're still my brothers, and I don't want to abandon my family. I need to find a way to love them again." And she began doing the forgiveness practice that we'll be doing later this evening together.

In a similar way, another woman was in the middle of a terrible divorce. In this case, her husband was trying to keep all the money, turn the children against their mother, and cut her out completely so she wouldn't even be able to visit them—even though he'd been the one who had the affair. And he was doing it in a mean-spirited way, using a lot of the money they had both shared to hire lawyers to help him.

Again, as we began to work together, I said, get yourself a kick-ass lawyer, because you need it to protect yourself. And she did that. She worked in her own way to hang in there so that she wouldn't lose custody of her children.

One day she came in to see me and said, "With all that's going on, my ex is trying to turn the children against me"—as happens in these terrible divorces. And she got quiet and looked at me and said, "I've been meditating, and I realized that I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children. I will not talk badly about their father, no matter what he does."

There was such dignity and courage and bigheartedness in what she said. Yes, she was protecting herself, but even more importantly, she was protecting her children.

The principles for wise forgiveness are these. Those of you who've been with me over the years have heard them, but they're still important to remember.

First, forgiveness is not weak or naive. It doesn't mean to forgive and forget. It takes real courage, deep courage. As it says in the Bhagavad Gita, if you want to see the brave, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the heroic, look to those who can offer love in exchange for hatred.

Forgiveness also does not condone what happened. It doesn't in any way say that it's fine or okay or good. In fact, it's critical with forgiveness, as a first step, to make sure that you don't allow the harm to continue—to step away, to intervene, to stop in any way you can, whatever you need to do. And it doesn't even mean that you have to speak to people if they're going to continue to harm you, or have contact with them. It neither condones, nor does it allow harm to continue. You can say, "I will put my body in the way of making sure this harm does not continue to myself or others," or "I will step away to make sure." It takes this courage.

Also, forgiveness is not quick. You can't paper it over. Like grief, it is a long, tender, hard process of the heart digesting the pain that's happened and, little by little, coming to terms and extending forgiveness.

The story I always tell is of the man who wrote to the IRS during tax season: "I haven't been able to sleep since I cheated on my taxes last year. So I've enclosed a three thousand dollar anonymous cashier's check made out to the IRS. If I still can't sleep, I'll send the rest."

This is how it works. Like metta, you don't start with the most difficult place. You start with what opens your heart. You do it a little at a time, at the sweet place first, a step at a time.

He led these peace walks, at the front with a bell, chanting: "Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed" — followed by a thousand people walking behind him, back to their villages.

Ghosnanda was invited to the US Congress to speak because he was part of the group working to ban landmines worldwide — that group received a Nobel Prize. For Ghosnanda, it was very personal because he'd seen too many children who'd lost their limbs, who'd been blown up by mines.

When he stood up before Congress to speak, he said, "Yes, I beg you, you must sign the worldwide treaty to ban landmines." And then he paused and said, "But even more importantly, we have to work together to remove the landmines in the heart — the fear and the hatred and all of those things that create the landmines."

Yes, we need to work outwardly and do what we can for this extraordinary and amazing earth. And at the same time, we need to remove the landmines in our own hearts.

I believe it was Longfellow who said, "If you could read the secret history of your enemies, you would see suffering and tragedy enough to disarm all hostility." If you could see the secret history of even those who are doing terrible things — the fears and the trauma and all that drives them — it would disarm your heart.

Think of this story of Maria Elena. Maria Elena grew up with a lot of shame about being poor. Outwardly, she tried to overcome this with hard work. She was the first in her extended family to ever go to college, but struggling with feelings of insecurity, she felt like an outcast.

After she graduated, she worked in the city for the Department of Public Safety. Sixteen years later, she transferred to a farming community just in from the coast near Oxnard. She told me, "After I'd lived in the city, now I go in the coffee shop and see the old clothes and the uneducated farmers. It's so easy to judge them and feel myself as different. We may be different in education and politics, but these are false ways we separate ourselves. Now, when I really look, I just want to drop my judgments and be with them — be with us.

"My father was like them. He drank too much. He berated us, his daughters. He was terrible to his sons. I was desperate to get free of him, of our family, but my shame and anger and resentment stayed with me.

"When I began to practice mindfulness, compassion, loving kindness, it was hard to sit still. After a while, I realized how sad I was and how much hurt was in my body. I was just trying to cope. I was grateful to be taught the loving kindness and forgiveness practices. I did them twice a day for two years. I needed to forgive myself for being so angry and ashamed as much as I needed to forgive my father. Practicing forgiveness was like learning to stand and walk and feel good about myself."

And then I was able to go home to see my family, even my father, without hurting so much. Seven years later, when my father got sick, it wasn't hard to go back. I saw his slow decline until finally he was a weak old man on his bed. I knew that I loved him. I had forgiven us all.

With forgiveness, we repair the world. Sometimes it's your broken heart that opens your loving heart.

You all remember the famous old Zen story about the two monks and the young woman in a beautiful kimono at the edge of the river, unable to cross because the river had risen in the storms. One of the monks walked over and, with her permission, picked her up in his arms and carried her across the river and put her down on the other side. The two monks continued to walk on their journey to a distant temple.

Sometime later, some hours later, the other monk had been chewing on it and finally blurted out, "How could you do that? We monks are not supposed to look at, much less pick up women—young women in beautiful kimonos like that. How dare you do that?" And the second monk looked at him and said, "I put her down back there. Are you still carrying her?"

We've all heard this story, and it's been repeated for centuries. Why? Because it's true. We can let go. We can put down the burdens of resentment. We can see anew with a heart of tenderness and compassion. We can engage this world and care for it in a very different way.

For who you are is consciousness itself—not your conditioning and not your history. They have to be honored, but they are not who you are. Not your body or your emotions that are constantly changing, or that river of thoughts, most of which you wouldn't want anybody else to hear anyway. That's not who you are. You are loving awareness, consciousness born into this body. And this is the place of freedom.

The invitation of the Buddhist teachings is to step out of the body of fear. Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. The invitation is to step out of the body of fear and find that beauty and wellbeing and peace that comes with forgiveness and graciousness of heart, looking at the world with tender eyes.

I like to read this story of Roberto DiVincenzo. He was the most famous golfer in Argentina some years ago—maybe the equivalent of Tiger Woods, or if you're older, maybe of Arnold Palmer. Once he won a tournament, and after receiving the check and smiling for the cameras, he went to the clubhouse and prepared to leave. Sometime later, walking alone to his car in the parking lot, he was approached by a young woman. She congratulated him on his victory and then told him that her child was seriously ill and near death. DiVincenzo was touched by her story and took out a pen and endorsed his winning check for payment to the woman. "Make some good days for the baby," he said as he pressed the check into her hand.

The next week he was having lunch in a country club when a PGA official came to his table. "Hey, some of the guys in the parking lot last week told me you met a young woman there after you won the tournament." DiVincenzo nodded. "Well," said the official, "I have news for you. She's a phony. She has no sick baby. She fleeced you, my friend."

DiVincenzo looked up. "You mean there's no baby who's dying?"

"That's right," said the official.

"Well, that's the best news I've heard all week," he replied.

We can do this, you know. We can live with a gracious and tender, forgiving and compassionate heart. We can learn to practice forgiveness, and it is a practice. When I was first taught, I was told to do it twice a day for six months or so. And then I began to think, wait a second—that's three hundred times.

And I did it, a little at a time—for my father, who had been so violent and abusive, for other people in my life, for people around me. I think Mark Twain said something about how much we only wish the foibles of other people's personalities would change. But anyway, I just did it. I did it and did it. Little by little, water on a stone. You know how that goes. Slow, soft, small, tender. And it became more and more the way that I wanted to live.

But it's not just me. It's us. The ones we admire, those who are at the top of the pantheon—Archbishop Tutu and the Dalai Lama and so many other great spiritual figures—they're not really different than us. They have simply opened themselves to that great loving heart that is who you really are, who we really are.

So let's practice the three directions of forgiveness together now for a bit. If you would, shift your body and find a way to sit comfortably and at ease. This will be a guided meditation for ten or fifteen minutes. Take it as a practice. The word practice means practice. It doesn't mean perfect. It's an invitation to your heart to remember what's possible, to begin the road of tenderness and forgiveness, to begin to open the gates to the inner garden of freedom—to not carry the burdens of the past.

When you're ready, close your eyes gently and take thirty seconds just to come back to breathe gently and rest with whatever has been touched in this talk. Wherever you are, hold it all in tenderness.

Now, breathing gently, let us begin the first of the three directions of forgiveness practice. There are many ways—take this as a reflection as you listen. There are many ways in which I have hurt and harmed others, betrayed them, abandoned them, caused them pain, hurt them in all kinds of ways, knowingly and unknowingly. I begin to remember these now. Let yourself remember some of the ways in which you've hurt and harmed others or caused them pain, abandoned or betrayed them. You can remember. You can know. And as you do, feel the tenderness, the regret, the care that comes in the heart.

Now reflect either generally on all that you remembered, or you can choose a particular person or circumstance. In the ways that I've hurt and harmed you, knowingly or unknowingly, caused you pain, caused you to suffer, abandoned you, betrayed you, caused harm to you in any way—small and large—out of my own confusion and fear, out of my own hurt and pain and misunderstanding and ignorance... In this moment, seeing with the heart, I ask your forgiveness. In any way, out of my own pain or fear, confusion, hurt, or anger, that I've caused harm to you—please forgive me. Please forgive me.

And sense, as you do, that you can be forgiven. That forgiveness is possible. That forgiveness is our birthright—to start over again. Oh nobly born, to ask forgiveness, to receive forgiveness, to begin again.

And now, with the same tenderness of heart, let us do the second direction of forgiveness. Just as we ask forgiveness of others whom we've harmed and caused to suffer, so too we have to forgive ourselves for all that we've done that's caused harm to others—but even more, the ways that we've caused harm to ourselves. In this moment, I remember the ways I've abandoned myself, betrayed myself, caused myself pain or suffering, just as I've done to others—the ways that I've brought hurt to myself, judged myself so harshly, harmed myself.

In the many ways that I remember now—that I've hurt or harmed myself, betrayed myself as I've harmed others at times, judged and undermined myself—in all these ways, out of my fear, out of my own confusion and hurt, out of anger and ignorance and misunderstanding, out of my pain and hurt, I now offer myself forgiveness. I forgive myself.

And if you wish, you can put your hand on your heart. Hold yourself with tenderness. In this moment, I release myself. I forgive myself. As Yeats says, "I measure the lot, forgive myself the lot."

And let the sweet nectar of forgiveness fill your consciousness and your body.

You can do this. You can be forgiven. This is tending the heart. O nobly born, this is remembering who you really are—remembering your Buddha nature, your true nature, the great heart of forgiveness.

And finally, the third direction of forgiveness. There are many ways that others have hurt and harmed me. Just as I've harmed others or harmed myself, there are so many ways and times that others have betrayed me, hurt me, abandoned me, caused me pain and suffering—knowingly and unknowingly. This has happened, and we all carry these hurts.

Let yourself remember and see all the ways that you've been abandoned and hurt, harmed, betrayed. And perhaps choose one that feels important, one where it's time to begin to forgive and let go. Remember what happened and the pain you still carry. And visualizing, say: In the way that you harmed me or hurt me, in the way that you betrayed or abandoned me, caused me pain—sometimes so much pain—out of your own fear and hurt, out of your own pain and anger and confusion, I see this now with a forgiving heart. And to the extent that I'm ready—because you can't rush this—to the extent that I'm ready, I offer you forgiveness. It might be a little or a lot. It might be just the beginning. To the extent that I'm ready, I forgive you. I release you. I will not carry bitterness in my heart.

And feel, as you do, that you're opening the door of forgiveness—maybe beginning the process of letting go, a tender release, a courageous forgiveness.

With these three directions, together we've been practicing forgiveness: asking forgiveness of others, forgiving ourselves, and offering it to those who've harmed us. Return now to a place of quiet and dignity. O nobly born, remember that this freedom and greatness of heart is who you really are. Trust it. Practice it. Let your heart be free.

As the Bhagavad Gita says, this practice takes courage. If you want to see the courageous, the heroic, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the loving, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see those who can laugh with joy and move on into a new season in their life, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see those who in themselves can repair the world, and who can bring this spirit to the conflicts and difficulties around us so that we might share in the repair of the world—look to those who can forgive.

Mindful Loving Witness Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 24 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a practice of establishing mindful, loving awareness—what he calls becoming the "loving witness" to all experience. The session begins with careful attention to embodied presence, settling into a posture that is both alert and gracious, "halfway between heaven and earth under your own tree of enlightenment."
> The meditation unfolds in stages, first using the breath as an anchor to bring body and mind together. Kornfield invites practitioners to notice how the body breathes itself, connecting this personal breath to the larger rhythms of life—the winds across mountains and oceans, and all breathing creatures sharing this ocean of air. Drawing on Thích Nhất Hạnh's teachings, he suggests the gentle mental noting of "ease, calm, relax" with each breath.
> As the practice deepens, practitioners learn to work skillfully with the "waves" of experience—thoughts, emotions, and sensations that arise and pull attention away from the breath. Rather than struggling against these experiences, Kornfield teaches a gentle naming practice: acknowledging each wave with a soft bow before returning to the breath. This approach embodies the Buddha's teaching on impermanence—all things rise and pass away, and coming into harmony with this truth brings happiness. The meditation concludes with the recognition that we are not merely observing experience but are the loving awareness itself, capable of holding even difficulty with tender compassion.

So let's begin with a period of meditation.

Let yourself find a way to sit, if you can, that's comfortable and at ease, stable and yet gracious. You sit, you take your seat halfway between heaven and earth under your own tree of enlightenment. And when you settle yourself, if you can, let your eyes close gently for this time.

And tune in. Sense how your body can both be alert and present and also gracious, like the queen or the king seated on your throne halfway between heaven and earth. Take a couple of long, slow, deep breaths and begin to release whatever you carry with each breath to be here more fully.

Tune into this amazing, mysterious body that you have been given. It has been given because you didn't actually order it online—even Amazon won't deliver it. Somehow you came into this body. As you feel and tune in, let the eyes and face be soft and loosen the jaw. Let the body begin to relax. If you like, you can roll your head in a circle to release your neck. Let it find a simple upright posture. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight of your body wherever you're seated and sense how the earth can completely support you. You can rest just where you are. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, loving kindness and care.

Now, with this embodied presence, bring a quality of loving awareness, of mindful loving awareness, first to this moment, the reality of the present, just where you are. To bring the body and mind together for the first part of the meditation, notice if you can how the body is breathing itself. You can feel your breath as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to feel the breath, you can place one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand. Or feel the whole body just breathing and exchanging air with the great winds that come across the mountains and the oceans, and with all the other breathing creatures that share this ocean of air.

Let the breath be easy. As you sense the breath, you can whisper in the background, if you wish, the words Thich Nhat Hanh suggests: ease with each breath, calm, and relax with each breath into the rhythm of life breathing itself.

Of course, as you sense each breath, there will be thoughts that appear—plans, memories, evaluations, judgments, hopes, fears, images. There will be emotions: sadness, excitement, peacefulness, anxiety. There will be sounds. For this first part of the meditation, stay with the breath. Each time the attention wanders, come back to it and let all those other experiences rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel this breath just now, in the middle of it all. Ease. Calm. Inviting a sense of steadiness. This breath. No judgment. No evaluation. Simply notice. Notice what you notice. How the breath breathes itself. How the attention gets carried off. And whenever you notice—after thirty seconds or five minutes—you simply come back to this next breath, gently and graciously, like training the puppy. Sit. Stay. Just here.

As you establish a mindful, loving presence with each breath, quieting, steady, notice when one of the waves that rises and falls around the breath becomes so strong it pulls your attention away. As you notice getting carried off by thinking or planning, by sadness or worry or excitement or love, as soon as you notice this strong wave, as if to bow to it, name it gently, softly: worry, planning, sadness, love, joy, tingling, hearing of sounds. Acknowledge the wave, and as you do, naming it gently, let it rise and fall, then return back to the breath.

Rest just here in the reality of the present, with each breath appearing and disappearing, gently acknowledging the strong waves that pull your attention from the breath. You become the mindful loving awareness, the loving witness of each breath as it rises and passes, or of the waves of experience that you name gently as if to bow to them. Yes. Thank you.

You are the witness, the loving awareness, the space of awareness that notices what arises and passes away. This breath. This moment's experience. You are the loving witness, the mindful loving awareness itself.

Rest in it.

All things are impermanent. They rise and they pass away. To come into harmony with this truth brings true happiness.

Staying with mindful, loving awareness, let your eyes open. The breath still breathes itself, and you are the loving awareness—present, open.

And even if the meditation was difficult, with struggle, worries, physical pain, you become the loving witness to it all. Not to judge or try to fix, but to hold it with tender compassion and kindness.

CHAPTER 23

Jack Kornfield · 58 min

> In this deeply moving Dharma talk, Jack Kornfield addresses what Zen tradition calls 'the great matter'—death itself. Drawing from the teachings of Master Rinzai, Thich Nhat Hanh, and Ramana Maharshi, Kornfield explores how we can meet impermanence with an open heart rather than fear. He shares the Buddha's teaching that when we do not cling to anything as 'I, me, or mine,' we are not seen by the king of death—pointing to the practice of resting as the loving witness rather than identifying with our roles, bodies, or transient experiences.
> Kornfield weaves together personal stories—sitting with his dying father, receiving a terrifying misdiagnosis, experiencing shared death phenomena—with traditional Buddhist contemplations on impermanence. He discusses the wisdom found in charnel ground meditations, out-of-body experiences during deep practice, and the mysterious ways consciousness transcends physical boundaries. The talk touches on Frank Ostaseski's hospice work and William Peters' research on shared death experiences, illustrating how the gates between worlds open when we approach death mindfully.
> The teaching culminates in a vision of the bodhisattva who can enter all realms of experience—joy and sorrow, birth and death—with 'gift-bestowing hands' and an open heart. Quoting Thich Nhat Hanh's words on his 95th birthday, Kornfield reminds us: 'This body is not me. I am life without boundaries.' He closes with Mary Oliver's poem 'When Death Comes,' inviting practitioners to live as 'a bride married to amazement' rather than merely visiting this world.

I'm glad we can be together this evening. The talk, which may be challenging in its own way, is going to be on death. That's its title: On Death.

Last time I talked about forgiveness, and we did a forgiveness practice. Next month, Thanksgiving month, I'd like to do some teachings on gratefulness and gratitude. Both of these—forgiveness and gratitude—are sweetness of the heart.

This is the month that has Halloween. You can see all the decorations in every store already, getting ready for Christmas probably right away after. The Day of the Dead. And also today is the holiday—remember, holiday means holy day—that was Columbus Day, now Indigenous Peoples Day. Both of these, the Day of the Dead and Halloween for sure, but also Columbus Day and Indigenous Peoples Day, are woven together with birth and death.

Columbus Day was declared by Benjamin Harrison in 1892 as a result of the public lynching of eleven Italian men in New Orleans who were considered darker-skinned criminals because there had been a murder, and they were thrown into prison as possible suspects. Hundreds of people gathered and broke into the prison and hung them all. And of course, if we look at that as the origin of Columbus Day, we also have to look back at the Native American genocide. If it's Native American Day, yes, there is the celebration of all the things that are here in the native culture, but also the decimation and the suffering and the death that goes with it whenever we honor our natives, those who lived on this land for thousands of years before us. So these holy days are woven in with death itself.

And if we want to change the world, if we want to serve the world in some beneficial way, we have to face death.

Zen Master Rinzai, one of the greatest of the Buddhist Zen teachers of Japan, said: "Followers of the way"—that's you—"this one speaking right before you is a person who enters fire without being burned, goes into water without being drowned, and plays about in the three deepest hells as if in a fairground. Such a person enters the world of hungry ghosts and dumb animals without being molested or harmed by them. How is this so? Because there is nothing such a one fears or dislikes. Do not tire yourself by making up discriminations of what is right and wrong, struggling in the ocean of birth and death. Let yourself open to it all, and quite naturally of itself, you will find the way."

That's an amazing teaching. Goes into the worst and most painful experience as if in a fairground. Plays with the joys and sorrows, the praise and blame of the world of birth and death, with a clear mind, a spacious mind, and an open heart.

Now, of course, this is not an easy thing to talk about. It's a heavy lift, because the truth is that we are profoundly challenged at this time. Collectively, we face climate change and the loss of species, the great movement to bring some healing for the suffering of racism and economic injustice, looking for social and economic and racial justice. We're in the throes of reimagining our culture in a healthier way. But right now we also face the suffering of it.

And then personally, we all know those who've had COVID. Almost three quarters of a million Americans—all those little white flags out on the lawn in Washington, D.C. in the mall. People who've died. Death.

It's a mystery. Did you think it wouldn't happen to you?

There's a story somewhere in the great Hindu teachings. Someone asked the God Krishna, "What are the most miraculous things on earth?" And Krishna answers with a few things and then says, "But the most miraculous of all is that people can see others getting sick and old, can see those dying around them, and think that it won't happen to them."

Did you think it wouldn't happen? asks the Buddha.

So how do we find a freedom of heart in this world, in this world of birth and death? How do we act and see it, see it deeply with the eyes of wisdom?

In Zen, this question of death is called the great matter. And they say: Practice ardently, for life is short. Find the answer to the great matter.

But we live in a culture that's really one of denial, that has lost its way. It's a culture focused on youth and whatever is smiling and sexy. Someone who wrote me a message before this talk said, "I hope you can speak to this poem by the great Chinese poet Han Shan, Cold Mountain." He writes: "Even if you store up rhinoceros horn, wear a tiger's eyeball, drive away evil with a peach branch, or make a garlic necklace, even if you warm your belly with dogwood wine or drink wolfberry soup to empty your mind, in the end, you cannot avoid death."

And here we are in our modern form—the keto diet and eating just kale, or the people into the cryo-freezing of their body and brain, hoping that they will somehow be able to revive it in future centuries. Or the ones who are looking to artificial intelligence to download their brain into, or those who are buying an underground bunker in some house in New Zealand. All the ways that we might hope to avoid death.

Not likely.

There's a truth that's bigger than all of this, and our heart knows it. All is subject to change. All is subject to birth and death. This is tonight's talk on wisdom. The other night's forgiveness, gratefulness, or the heart talks of love. This is wisdom. All is subject to arising and passing, subject to birth and death.

My dear colleague Michelle McDonald, who has taught retreats for many, many years at the Insight Meditation Society and still does, would work with kids as well as a teacher. She described how she was working with kindergarteners or preschoolers, age four or five, and talking about death because they were interested. Kids are interested. How does this world work? They'd heard about grandparents dying or pets dying. So she said, let's together understand this. And she sent them out into the woods around the school where they were to look for anything they could find that had died. They came back in with handfuls of dead leaves and twigs and branches. Somebody even found a little piece of a skeleton, maybe of a squirrel that had died. All these different things—dead seeds and plants. And they made a pile of them and began to talk about it.

Then at one point she asked them, "Well, what would happen if there wasn't death?" And one of the wise little ones there, some wise little girl, said, "Well, then nothing would go away. There'd be more and more trees and more and more things. And there'd be no room for us." Because the ending of things is also the beginning of something new. Each end allows for the arising of something else.

The Buddha was approached by a man who said, as they usually ask, "Are you a Buddha? Are you a blessed one, a wise one, an enlightened one?" The Buddha nodded. The man said, "I have a question for you. How is it that we may practice or live so that we are not seen by the king of death?" Now there's a great question. How is it to live and practice so we are not seen by the king of death?

And the Buddha answered, "When you do not cling to anything as I, as me, as mine, then you will not be seen by the king of death."

What does this mean? This means to shift our attention, our locus of presence, of identity, from being identified with our role or our body or our place or whatever it happens to be, to be the loving witness. The witness of gain and loss, praise and blame, grief and joy, pleasure and pain. To be the mindful, loving witness of this dance of life—for this is who you are.

Now, of course I say this, and then you say, "Well, how do I live this in practice?" And it's not really so simple, is it? Because here we are in these bodies with our lives.

I remember when I'd first come back from practicing in the monasteries and I'd had long retreats and deep meditations—more than a year in silence in one little hut, living in the ascetic practice monastery in the forest. I was driving on the Massachusetts Turnpike, the freeway there, a couple months after I'd been back. As I was driving down the Massachusetts Turnpike, a truck a couple hundred yards ahead of me—a big truck—lost part of a tire. It flung into the air and smashed into a car that was following it. That car swerved off the road and other cars braked suddenly to avoid crashing into it. And I wasn't very far behind them. It was really clear that I could crash into them and could die.

My mind, from all those months and years of meditation, had a great equanimity and peace to it. I could feel, "Ah, look at this—this might be the day I might die." But I was so peaceful in the midst of it, just noticing, just the awareness.

But that's only part of the story, because then in my body rose this huge wave of adrenaline, and my hands gripped the wheel, and my body said, "Oh no, you're not gonna die," and wrenched the car over into the side of the road and into the grass to stop and avoid crashing.

It's as if there were these two dimensions, because we live in multiple dimensions. One part of me so at ease with it all from all those months and years of practice, and another part holding on—not now, not yet.

We live in these multiple dimensions. We cherish life.

And yet also we have to let go. As Mary Oliver writes, to live in this world, you must be able to do three things. To love what is mortal, to hold it against your bones as if your life depends upon it. To love what is mortal, hold it against your bones. And when the time comes to let it go, to let it go. These three things.

Larry Rosenberg, a wonderful teacher, wrote a book called Living in the Light of Death. What does death have to teach us? When it is, as Carlos Castaneda and his teacher Don Juan expressed, when it's taken as an advisor—to take death as an advisor, death constantly there over your left shoulder, reminding you of the brevity of life.

In the monastery, I sat in the charnel grounds when bodies were being burned through the night, watched the body go into ashes. We did meditations on death. We watched the decay of the body. And as I sat and went deep in meditation, I also had these amazing experiences—out of the body experiences where my consciousness floated out of my body. My body was still sitting there and I could look out the window of the little hut I was in and see things that were happening. And I realized, wow, I'm not this body. My body would dissolve into vastness, dissolve into light. Things would arise and disappear. The whole world would disappear and reappear. And I began to see from the quietest, deepest place that who we are is a play in consciousness, is a play of consciousness. On one level, we're born into this body. A spirit comes, consciousness comes into this body. You're not your body. You're not your feelings or thoughts. You are the consciousness inhabiting this body.

I've talked about sitting with my father when he was dying in the hospital. He was really terrified. He was a scientist who believed in physical matter, and I asked what he thought about death and he said, "You turn into dirt, there's nothing else." And he was so frightened, he kept looking at the monitors behind him in the ICU to see if he had died yet. He didn't want that to happen with no one to notice. So when I asked him what happens, he said, "Nothing, you turn into dirt." I said, "Well, that could be, but you're a scientist. Maybe you should take it as an experiment."

And I told him about dissolving my body into light, about having out of the body experiences, about memories of past lives. I've done past life regressions for people around the world. Some believe, some don't, but it's amazing—half of them, even the non-believers, have these extraordinary experiences of past lives. I talked about sitting with people in hospice and having them begin to come close to death and leave their body and then come back—near death experiences, describing going out into light. I said, "So maybe you'll turn into dirt, but it's very possible that you'll find yourself floating out of your body, looking down, maybe reflecting, 'Wow, that was an incarnation, wasn't it? That was an amazing life.'" And I said, "Remember, if it happens, I told you so. Pay attention."

On another level, Ramana Maharshi, the great Indian sage, when he was dying of cancer and a student said, "Don't leave me, don't leave me," looked back with such tenderness and said, "But where could I go?" For on a deeper level, the whole sense of death is an illusion.

Here is Thich Nhat Hanh—today is his 95th birthday—our sage and elder and amazing being. He says: "This body is not me. I'm not limited by this body. I'm life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Since before time I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds on our journey. Birth and death are a game of consciousness, a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand. Let us say goodbye to meet again soon. We meet today and tomorrow. We meet at the source of every timeless moment."

We meet each other in all forms of life.

I remember sitting with Thich Nhat Hanh a few years ago after his stroke. He could not speak. He was getting ready to leave. He'd been in San Francisco for a while, taken care of by Mark Benioff, with a whole cadre of monks and nuns. And he looked around on the last morning before he left at those of us sitting with him, with two eyes—one in which he could see each person, and he nodded to them. He looked at me, he looked at Trudy, he looked at us, acknowledging that we'd known each other in this amazing dance. And the other eye was focused on eternity. You could feel the timelessness as he gazed at us.

This is the reality. As Kalu Rinpoche says, when you understand, you'll see that you are nothing—and being nothing, you are everything. You are the play of consciousness, and this is what gives you freedom.

Beyond all the roles you have as a woman or a man or whatever your identity might happen to be, your roles at work, your roles as a child or a parent or whatever role you might take—you know this. You know you're not your roles. You switch. You come home from work and if you have a family, they don't see you as the worker; they see you as the sister or brother, son or daughter, partner or lover. They're all tentative. Who are you underneath it all? This is the question.

Well, all right. We sit back, we become the loving witness. We realize that everything changes and rises and falls. We find a place of equanimity, of the peaceful heart, the timelessness in the midst of it all.

Ha—not so easy, really.

About a dozen years ago, I started to have much wilder tremors than I have now. They've really quieted down a lot since then. But I passed out a couple of times in front of big groups of people, and something was clearly going wrong in my body, along with all kinds of other symptoms. I got tested in every way you can—scanned and examined and so forth. And then I got misdiagnosed.

I went to see this physician, and he said, "This is happening quickly." He watched me and heard the symptoms and described some disease kind of like ALS but not the same, and that it was going to happen fast. My body was deteriorating, and I nodded—I could feel it. And then he said, "Oh yes, and with this, you will lose your memory and you'll find yourself in dementia."

That was not in my program. I was maybe ready to die, but I wasn't ready to lose my awareness and end up demented, unable to even remember anything. And this huge wave of fear came up. I thought I was good with death, sitting in the charnel grounds, envisioning my own death, being at peace with it all. But when it came to "Okay, you're dying soon with dementia and everything else"—I got terrified. I was surprised at how fast and big it was. It took some days to start to come to terms with it. And then I found out it was a misdiagnosis, and I'm actually fine for now. It's all for now, you know, isn't it? Karma, they say, changes like the swish of a horse's tail.

And at seventy-six, Trudy and I look at each other very lovingly and say, "Wow, seventy-six is a pretty big number." Here we are—healthy and loving and together and happy—but that tail will swish. It will happen.

I remember going to talk with Ram Dass sometime after that. I told him, "I thought I was chill with death, and then I got this misdiagnosis—dementia and all this—and I got really frightened." And he smiled, he laughed. He said, "Oh yeah, I flunked the course a number of times."

But he was so gracious at that point, so spacious. He had become really ready to die, to drop his body, as they say. He and Mirabai Bush, dear friend and teacher, worked on this wonderful book called Walking Each Other Home. And he became so spacious about it. He said, "Dropping your body, leaving this body, is like taking off a tight shoe." For him, he had twenty-some years in a very painful and increasingly disabled body. So you could hear it—he was ready.

But this is the reality.

As it says in the texts, a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, echo, a rainbow, a phantom, and a dream. All things appear for a time. It seems like we'll be here forever. And then this great mystery, which is here—as Don Juan says, death is stalking us, which is what makes life so precious and alive—that it will happen.

And whenever someone close to us dies, or whenever we approach death, something remarkable starts to happen. You know this. The gates between the worlds open. And you start to feel the sense of mystery. Like it all seems so solid—I know who I am, I have my world—and yet, and yet, it will all be gone.

There's a recent book by a friend and dharma practitioner entitled At Heaven's Door by William Peters. He had started at Zen Hospice some twenty years ago, and he was sitting in the hospital with a man, a hospice patient, holding his hand as his last breath began to happen and his spirit began to leave his body. William said the amazing thing was that he could feel himself going with him. Not only did this man leave his body, but he left his body too. He didn't even know it was the man's last breath, but they were there floating above their bodies in a realm of space and light. And then he came back, he said. It really touched him that he'd gone a little way with this man he was sitting with and holding his hand.

The book is about what he calls SDEs. You've heard of NDEs, near-death experiences. These are shared death experiences. And many of us have had them.

I was sitting with Marlene Jones, who was one of my dear friends and a teacher at Spirit Rock. She'd been in a coma for a week. She'd had heart failure. Her brain was flat-lined. She'd had a long time without oxygen. Nothing was functioning, no response. Everything was tried to bring her back—not possible. And finally her family decided they had to take her off life support.

I was holding her hand and I said, "Dear Marlene, if you can hear me"—people in a coma can, you know—I said, "It's too soon. I'll so miss you. You've been such a light for all of us. But the least you could do is give us a sign." And as I said it, two tears rolled down her cheeks. Nothing—the doctors had probed and shouted and touched and tried to get a response from her for a week, brain dead, zero. But those few words, so mysterious.

I tell the story of being with my beloved sister-in-law, Esther, as she was dying of cancer, coming back and forth to her house. It was very close. I was with her and my brother. I got up one morning right toward the end of her life, hurried to get down to be near her. But I had to stop and pick up some medicine at the drugstore. I was rushing through CVS, and all of a sudden, as I approached the checkout counter, my whole body changed. I relaxed and I thought, I felt, I sensed—oh, Esther died. I got to my car and called my brother. He said, "Oh, I'm glad you called. Esther died five minutes ago." And I knew it. Just as I, and people I was with, knew the surprising death by accident of people halfway around the world when I was living in Asia. How could we know?

When I teach in person, I ask the group how many have had this kind of experience where you've known something at a distance—that someone died, that you've lost someone. And a third of the hands go up. How could this be?

It's because, dear ones, we are not this body. We're not limited to the sense of the small self, as it's called, the separate self.

We are a life connected with it all, living through this unique body. But halfway around the world, because we are consciousness itself, we can know.

I was holding hands with my father as he was dying. And after he died, we were in Philadelphia—my mother and my three brothers and I—emptying his little apartment. His life had shrunk down. What are we going to do with all his things? There wasn't that much left. But he'd been a tyrant. Yes, he'd been a kind of compelling and brilliant scientist who developed some of the first heart-lung machines and worked in space medicine. But he was also a wife batterer, given to almost mentally ill, violent, paranoid fits throughout his life.

We asked the superintendent if there was a Salvation Army nearby where we could give the furniture. And the superintendent said, "Well, next block over, there's a battered women's shelter." We all just started to smile—the perfect justice of it.

We were staying at the Benjamin Franklin Hotel, this big suite, the four brothers and my mom. And I had a dream the next night. My father came to me. I don't dream about him particularly, but there I was. He came in my dream and looked kind of confused. I said, "Dad, Dad, I'm so glad to see you. It's so touching to see you after what happened." He looked at me confused. "What happened?" I said, "Yes, I'm here with Mom, your ex, and my brothers. What happened is you died." He stared at me as if very confused. I said, "You died, Dad." He nodded as if digesting this. Then without a word, he turned his head and walked away and faded out.

People die in character. Some resist, some in fear, some in love, some let go more easily than others.

There's a story in Frank Ostaseski's wonderful book called The Five Invitations. He writes about all his years helping to found Zen Hospice and his hospice work. He tells about a man, a gay man named Matthew, who'd been raised in a fundamentalist Christian family. Commandments had been beaten into him by his fire-and-brimstone preacher of a father. He felt certain that God would condemn him for eternity to hell due to his sexual orientation. So Matthew had become a Buddhist to step out of the church and all the condemnation. They created an altar by his bedside with a beautiful healing thangka and a Buddhist statue.

But he was having a really hard time. Frank said, "I began to chant with him. I held his hand, massaged his feet, played his favorite music. Nothing worked." Because Matthew had spun into a world of confusion and shame and dread that somehow he was going to meet this condemning God and be condemned for eternity for being gay.

By two in the morning, Frank said, he was exhausted. He drove home to get some sleep. And as he was driving, he remembered his first holy communion, the Catholic ritual that ushers young innocents into the loving lap of God. When he got home, he searched through his mementos of childhood and located this plastic figurine of Jesus surrounded by lambs and little children. And instead of going to bed, he drove back to the hospital.

As Matthew continued to shout and toss and turn in agony, Frank took down the thangka and Buddha statue and replaced it with the statue of Jesus. Just as he was smoothing the altar cloth, the night cleaning woman named Dina came into the room and spotted the figurine. Setting her mop to one side, she said with great enthusiasm, "Merciful Jesus! When his kindness is with us, everything is right."

At once Matthew's eyes locked onto Dina. An angelic smile spread across his face as he pivoted toward the altar to gaze at the plastic Jesus statue and the lambs and children around him, then back in Dina's direction. His whole body relaxed. In that moment, the punishing God of Matthew's childhood—the one whose wrath he'd been told to fear, whose judgment made him feel like a terrible person—was transformed into the merciful God he also knew and loved. The one who adored all his children, no matter their so-called faults and flaws. A kind, forgiving, all-accepting and benevolent, loving God. Dina's faith in God's love was so secure that it gave Matthew exactly the strength he needed to release his inner pain and self-condemnation.

I left them there together to get some rest. They no longer needed me.

As bodhisattvas—those of you who practice the life of compassion to reduce suffering for yourself and for all those around you, that's you, you bodhisattvas—we are always at the bedside of birth and death, of beginnings and endings, of impermanence. This is our role: to be with all things that change with an open heart.

I think of my friend Houston Smith, who was a great philosopher, teacher, and religious figure. He was a professor of religion at MIT and wrote this book on the religions of the world, one of the great bestsellers. Houston told this tragic story: his granddaughter, only twenty years old, was killed in some adventure she'd taken with someone else, killed in some terrible way. People tried to comfort him, sending messages and talking to him. He was heartbroken. The grief was just so big, so stupendous for him to carry, even as a wise old sage. This was his beloved granddaughter.

Later he said, "The person who helped me most in that time of despair and grief was a young man who lived two doors down the street from us. He was a Native American man. When I would sit out, he would come over onto the porch and sit next to me and hold my hand and say nothing." And that, he said, was the deepest and greatest comfort.

Mindful, loving presence in the birth and death, the arising and passing, the beginning and ending of things. They will begin and end. They are all impermanent. We will have our emotional reactions, but the mindful loving presence opens us to that which is timeless.

I think of working with Michael Meade and Luis Rodriguez in these retreats for young men from the gangs, getting out of the gangs in Oakland and Chicago and Los Angeles. These were kids who'd been brought up in terrible circumstances of poverty and racism and lack of opportunity. They joined a gang to find a family. But of course, there was the undeclared war on the streets. So many people died. And these were the kids trying to leave the life, leave the gang life, brought with mentors who took them to our retreats to find another way.

At the end of the time together, we made a ritual, a ceremony. I brought with me fifty skull malas, those 108 beads with tiny skulls. They look like Halloween adornments, but they're Tibetan, of course—you've seen them, remembering death. We created this ritual for them after working so deeply together—storytelling and grieving and understanding and compassion, helping them see that they were not limited, not defined by their trauma. They were not defined by what had happened to them, that who they are was bigger than that. They had a free spirit.

Each one was given a blessing, the mala was put around them, and a chant was done by the whole group of young men and older men: "This is a man who has faced death, a young man who has faced death, and now chooses life."

You will meet death in personal ways—illness, loss, death of those around you, grief, the end of work, the divorce that's unexpected, people around you that leave, all the endings of things.

I remember leading retreats with Steven Levine, colleague and dear friend, retreats on death and dying. Steven would peer out after some days of our heart work together, and he would say, "Suppose this was the last week. Suppose this was the last day of your life." This was really touching and moving because it was during the time of the AIDS epidemic. We had lots of young men who had come on these retreats. There was no cure yet at that time.

"Suppose this was your last week, your last day. Who would you call? What would you say? And why are you waiting?"

Everyone got quiet to reflect on this.

To face death, to see that everything arises and passes, to take your seat in the middle of this world, like the bodhisattva or Buddha that you are, and to meet what comes and goes with a wise and tender heart—this is the great medicine that's needed.

I remember the story of Gary Snyder being interviewed by our colleague and dear friend Wes Nisker some years ago. Gary, I think, must be in his nineties now. He had written Earth House Hold and a number of amazing books about care for the earth, as a Zen teacher and as an environmentalist. He received the Pulitzer Prize for his work, trying to wake us up fifty years ago to being embedded in the environment in which we live and how we care for it.

And so Wes asked Gary, you look out now, you see the loss of species, the rising oceans, the desertification, bigger hurricanes, the ravages of climate change and the things that are happening in this world—what message do you have for us?

And Gary sat quietly and looked back from the place of wisdom and age and said, "Don't feel guilty. If you're going to save it, don't save it out of guilt. Or anger. Or fear. Those are what cause these problems. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it. Save it out of love."

Love—the power that has mothers lift cars off their children. Love—the power that can change anything. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it.

And this is what living in the light of death offers us—of birth and death, of change, of gain and loss and praise and blame and success and failure, of tragedy and rebirth. We get to bring the great medicine of love.

And in that love, there's also a trust that suffering is not the end of the story. It's only the First Noble Truth. There are causes of greed and hatred, fear and anger—we can see this. But there is also a liberation, a freedom of heart in the midst of it all, and a path to liberation: loving awareness itself, mindfulness, compassion.

I remember being in a refugee camp. Refugees fleeing, as they often do, some of the worst tragedies you can imagine, everything being lost. And yet the kids in the camp, the five and six and seven year olds, eight year olds—they'd taken the milk cans that the UN brought and offered. After the milk was poured out, they punctured the side of them and put little sticks in the cans, then made handles for them and created these little carts. They were doing races and running around with their milk can cars and carts, unable to be stopped—their creativity and their laughter and their joy and their love.

Suffering is not the end of the story.

And we as the wise ones, as the Bodhisattvas, can rest in a timeless place of trust, unafraid to love well, no matter what's happening. Yes, death is an advisor, and it gives a clarity to us of what really matters.

But then, as the great Bodhisattva, as Master Rinzai whom I read about in the beginning: "You who are followers of the way, you can enter the world"—all of the world, its tragedies and its unbearable beauty—"with gift-bestowing hands," with an open heart, with a fearlessness that says, "Yes, this is life. This is samsara. This is existence as a human being. All things change."

And who we are is the loving witness, the consciousness itself, the witness to it all, the timeless awareness. We are the ancestors, soon enough, of the future generations—not just seven generations, but thousands of generations that are in the earth under our feet, and what we will join and be under the feet of the next generations.

Thich Nhat Hanh, in his book No Death, No Fear, describes missing his mother after she died. He was living in his monastery in North Vietnam and went out one night after having had a dream of her, like I dreamed of my father. He was missing her so much, and he began to walk between the tea plants under the moonlight. And all of a sudden he had this profound realization that his mother was with him, that she had never left, that her dying was just her body, but not who she really was.

He said, "And she became the moonlight caressing my skin. And I realized she was still with me, and I realized my body, which had been inside her, was her body too. And together, as I took my steps, I could feel that it was her feet as well as my feet, leaving footprints in the damp soil in the moonlight."

There's a freedom. You know this. There are moments when you look back and say, "Wow, that was an intense thing I lived through. That was difficult. This is hard. That was wild. That was amazing." But the experiences are not who you are. Who you are is the one who knows, says Ajahn Chah. The consciousness, the witness to it all.

And as the Bodhisattva, you rest in vastness and a loving heart. And you can say, "Wow, what an amazing incarnation this has been." And you don't have to wait until the death of your body to see it that way. Because here we are in this mystery. And your identity will disappear in some way. But it doesn't matter, as Thich Nhat Hanh says: "This body is not me. I am life without boundaries."

I am life itself. I have never been born and I have never died.

To end, I want to read you what I consider a holy text. You all know this sutra, or most of you do. It's one of Mary Oliver's poems—she who has been one of our greatest poets, the Whitman of our time, perhaps. The poem is called "When Death Comes." You know it. Let it speak to your heart again.

When death comes like the hungry bear in autumn, when death comes and takes all the bright coins from his purse to buy me and snaps the purse shut. When death comes like an iceberg between the shoulder blades, I want to step through the door full of curiosity, wondering what is it going to be like, that cottage of darkness? And therefore I look upon everything as a brotherhood and a sisterhood, and I look upon time as no more than an idea and consider eternity another possibility. And I think of each life as a flower, as common as a field daisy and as singular, and each body a lion of courage and something precious to this earth. When it's over, I want to say all my life I was a bride married to amazement. I was the bridegroom taking the world into my arms. When it's over, I don't want to wonder if I'd made of my life something particular and real. I don't want to find myself sighing and frightened or full of argument. I don't want to end up simply having visited this world.

A bride married to amazement.

Take a breath. Rest in the mystery. Yes, you love and tend this body and this life you've been given. And yet—and yet you also know: like a star at dawn and a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a phantom, a rainbow, a dream.

Let your heart be open and free and wise, to say yes. I can love it all.

I did a Sufi dance at Lama Foundation, one of Murshid Samuel Lewis's dances—Sufi Sam. I used to think they were kind of hokey, but they're really beautiful. There was an outer circle and an inner circle, and as we rotated to a certain rhythm, guitar playing and chanting, we would meet each person and chant and bow to them: I love it when it comes. And I love it when it goes. Then there would be a silence and some music, and the next person would appear. I love it when it comes. And I love it when it goes.

You are love. Fearless, timeless, open, loving awareness itself. Rest in it. Trust this. You'll see—as I said to my father, you wait and see.

Thank you for your kind attention.

CHAPTER 24

Gratitude and Generosity Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 27 min

> In this gentle guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a progressive journey of gratitude and self-compassion. Beginning with breath awareness and bodily relaxation, the practice establishes a foundation of ease and presence before moving into deeper territory.
> The meditation unfolds through three stages of grateful acknowledgment. First, practitioners are invited to thank their body for all it carries and holds through daily life. Then attention moves to the heart—the seat of emotions—acknowledging the feelings, longings, fears, and loves it continuously bears. Finally, gratitude extends to the busy mind, honoring its ceaseless efforts to plan, protect, and figure things out. At each stage, the instruction is the same: thank you for trying to help me; I'm okay just now; you can relax.
> The practice culminates in a profound recognition: we are not the body, feelings, or thoughts we have been observing with such tenderness. We are the loving awareness itself—consciousness witnessing the flow of experience. This insight, central to many contemplative traditions, is offered not as abstract philosophy but as a felt, experiential truth. Kornfield invites practitioners to rest in this vast stillness, trusting it as their true home. The meditation beautifully weaves together the brahmavihāra of loving-kindness with the liberating insight of anattā (not-self), offering both comfort and freedom.

So let's begin with a meditation.

Find a way to sit that's stable and comfortable and at ease, where there's a sense of dignity to your body, some uprightness if you can, if your body allows, so that you are like the queen or the king seated on your throne in the middle of your own life. And also gracious, not rigid or tight, but rather just present with a kind and loving awareness.

When you're ready, if you're able to, let your eyes close gently and take two or three long, deep breaths to release whatever obvious tension wants to be let go of. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position.

Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight of your body as it touches the chair, the cushion, the floor, and how the earth completely supports you. Just where you are, you can let go and be supported just now. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now bring your attention to the fact of your body's breathing and feel it wherever it's most natural to sense—coolness in the nostrils, swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's difficult to sense, put your hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

As you feel your breath, quite simply, we're not trying to become good breathers or manipulate the breath, but let it breathe itself. With each breath, let there be a sense of growing ease or calm steadiness. Breathing in ease and calm. Breathing out, inviting ease and calm.

Return to the breath for now at the beginning. Whenever the attention wanders off, just come back gently and kindly to the next breath that you notice. A steadying of attention, a relaxing into the rhythm of breath. The ever-present wave of breathing invites you to relax. This breath—beginning and middle and end. The in-breath arising. The space between breaths as it turns. The next breath. Like the waves of the ocean, the breath rises and falls. Steady attention. A loving awareness to this breath.

As you feel the breath or return to it when attention wanders, the quality of presence deepens, and with it you notice what's happening—the thoughts that come and go, the feelings and emotions, the sensations and experiences of body. All of these too can be included in the meditation's mindful loving awareness.

So now shift your attention from the breath to all the sensations, the field of sensations that make up your body—the pressure and warmth or cool, the tingling, the hardness or softness, the areas of pleasure or pain, tightness, holding, throbbing. With mindful loving awareness, notice the whole field of sensations that make up your experience of this human body.

If there are areas of pain or tension that are obvious, bring the mindful loving awareness to them, as if to bow to them. Hold them with kindness. Not trying to fix them, but hold them the way you would hold a child who is going through a hard time. Notice how this kind, loving awareness allows for the tensions and knots to begin to soften and open in their own way.

And now, as an expression of gratitude, as if you could make a bow to your own body, say thank you. Thank you for carrying so much, for holding so much as I move through the days and nights. Your body carries so much. Thank you. You can relax. I'm okay just now. You can relax.

Let your body know you're okay just here and now. You can relax. Allow an opening of presence to deepen. Feel the breath breathe itself again for some breaths.

Now bring your attention to the area of your heart—the heart that carries so much. Yes, the physical heart, but much more the heart of feeling, of emotion. Notice all that your heart has been carrying: longings and fear, great love, worry, frustration, excitement, sweetness, sadness, appreciation, doubt, deep love—all carried by this heart, this very human heart.

With mindful loving awareness, just notice how much your heart feels and carries. Notice what's especially strong for it now. Hold it all with tenderness, with loving awareness. As if you could bow to your heart inwardly, say thank you. Gratitude. Thank you for caring so much, for caring so much, for trying to help and protect me. Thank you, dear heart, for all you carry. I'm okay just now. Thank you for trying to help me in all these ways. I'm okay just here and now. You can relax. You can rest. Let your heart be at ease.

Notice the breath again, naturally breathing, each breath caring for your life.

Now, with the same mindful loving awareness, notice your mind—the mind that produces a stream of words and thoughts and pictures and images, plans and memories. The busy mind that keeps active, thinking and imagining, analyzing, remembering, on and on and on like a stream. The mind moving, moving, with all these thoughts and images and pictures and words and plans and memories and ideas. Feel the energy of the mind: creative, sometimes obsessed, analyzing, exploring, opening.

Again, as if you could inwardly bow to your mind, say thank you. Thank you for working so hard to take care of me, to protect me. Worrying and planning and figuring it out. Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm so grateful. Thank you, mind. Hold it with tender compassion—this mind works so hard. Say, thank you, I'm okay just now. You can relax. I'm okay just here. Rest in the quiet heart and the breath.

Finally, notice that just as you can bow to your body and say thank you for caring so much, for trying to keep me safe and well—just as you can bow to your heart, thank you for carrying all these feelings and cares, trying to protect me, care for me—just as you can bow to your busy mind, thank you for trying to figure it out, to keep me safe, to help me—notice that you are not your body. You're not your feelings. You're not your thoughts and images.

You are the loving witness. You are consciousness itself. You are the loving awareness that acknowledges the body, the heart, the mind. Relax into loving awareness. You are the silent, vast witness to it all. Breaths and sensations rise and pass like waves of the ocean. Feelings and thoughts come and go. And you are the loving stillness, the mindful loving awareness—your own true nature. You are consciousness itself, witnessing, allowing, receiving it all in the vast stillness.

You are loving awareness. Rest in it.

Trust it.

It is your home.

When you're ready, let your eyes open and remain connected to the stillness. Remain connected to the deep understanding that you are consciousness itself—witnessing and experiencing this remarkable human life.

CHAPTER 25

Gratitude and Generosity Dharma Talk

Jack Kornfield · 46 min

> In this heartfelt Dharma talk, Jack Kornfield invites us to discover the transformative power of gratitude and generosity, especially during challenging times. Drawing from his experiences as a monk in Thailand practicing the traditional alms round, he illuminates how the entire Buddhist monastic system is built on trust and mutual care between beings. The practice of dāna (generosity) is presented not as progress toward some distant goal across countless mahākalpas, but as an awakening to the fundamental abundance that is our birthright.
> Kornfield weaves together teachings from diverse wisdom traditions—an Iroquois medicine man's hour-long gratitude prayer, the Iroquois practice of teaching children generosity, and the Zen tradition of offering gratitude for all beings whose labor supports our lives. He explores the three levels of giving recognized in Buddhist teaching: tentative giving, brotherly or sisterly giving, and royal giving—the joyful sharing of our best without reservation.
> Through moving stories of a nun serving in Peru, a Harvard physician washing the feet of homeless patients, and the work of small but mighty organizations serving refugees, Kornfield demonstrates how our wounds and vulnerabilities can become doorways to deeper compassion. He reminds us that we exist within what Martin Luther King called 'the network of mutuality'—that we belong to each other and somehow know it. The talk becomes a meditation itself, inviting listeners to recognize gratitude not as something we cultivate for joy, but as the very source of joy. As Brother David Steindl-Rast teaches: 'It's not joy that makes us grateful. It's gratefulness that makes us joyful.'

How do we practice gratitude and generosity in these times, in the midst of all of this? The pandemic—well, we can also be grateful for the vaccines that have been developed. The climate crisis—and maybe we can also be grateful that nations are beginning to come together for what we need. The cries for social and racial and economic justice, all of these things.

Our dear elder and sage, Joanna Macy says the world is not a problem to be solved. It is a living being to which we belong. We are part of this living being—its beauty, its suffering. And our current problems seem almost orchestrated to bring forth from us the biggest moral strength, courage, and creativity in our hearts. I feel that when things are this uncertain and difficult, a person's determination, how we choose to care, to invest our energy with our heart and mind, can have a much greater effect on the larger picture than usual. So I also find it an exciting time to be alive. Here we are in the midst of it.

Somebody asked Ramakrishna, the great Indian saint, why there is evil in the world. And he replied, "To thicken the plot." You wouldn't go to the movies if it was all just everybody smiling. It had to be there to thicken the plot.

The Buddha, however, never answered those kinds of questions—why, where did it come from? Those were philosophical questions. He just said, "What I teach is simple. There's suffering in human life and its causes: greed, hatred, fear, attachment. And there's a path to the end of it, to a freedom. This is what I offer you—how to pass through the difficulties of human life and find that which is free and compassionate and beautiful in your own heart." This is the offering of the Dharma.

He trusted somehow that people would find their way, individually and collectively. He created a big community and worked with the leaders of the communities of his time, trusting that we as human beings can find a way to live more wisely, more compassionately, more generously and graciously.

The whole monastic order is founded on trust. The way the rules work, especially in the Theravada tradition where our teachings come from—Southeast Asia and Sri Lanka and India and Burma, Thailand—the rule for monks and nuns is that you may not eat anything that was not offered and placed into your hands that very morning. You cannot store food. You cannot grow food. You cannot cook your own food. You have to go out with your alms bowl, or you wait until someone comes to your temple, and you eat what's offered to you.

It was an amazing experience as a monk in the remote parts of Thailand, on the border of Laos, to go out in these very simple and poor villages at dawn and have people waiting to take of the little food they have and place it in your bowl. They would stand silently, reverently, as if to say, "We so value what you carry in our society—the teachings of compassion and freedom. We so value this that we want to share of the little food that we have, even in the poorest seasons and households."

It was an amazing experience to feel that level of generosity, that level of gratitude, and that level of trust. Because you had to trust that you would get enough to eat. And almost always we did. Once in a while we didn't, and so be it. Then the next day we might. But the whole integrated field of Dharma is built on a love and a care and a trust between human beings.

Years ago, I was invited to a big conference at the Menninger Foundation in the Midwest. It was a conference on the nature of consciousness. All the neuroscientists and researchers were there, the usual suspects. And there was an Iroquois medicine man who came and attended. His name was Mad Bear.

When it was his turn to address the assembled conference, he said, "Come out with me to the prairies, to the plains." We went out with him and stood, and he stood up and for forty-five minutes or an hour, he made a prayer. Now that is one darn long prayer, I've got to tell you. I started to get a little bored, a little impatient. Okay, it's nice to have a prayer—when is he going to finish?

The prayer was a prayer of gratitude. He thanked the grasses. He thanked the heads of the cereal grains that grow. He thanked the earthworms and the beetles on the earth and the ants—all that kept the soil moving and moist and open so things could grow. He thanked the birds that flew by and the birds that we didn't see. He thanked the wind and the colors in the sky. He went on and on.

Pretty soon, even to my slightly impatient and irritated consciousness, I realized that this was a gorgeous mindfulness meditation. It was a meditation on gratitude. It was a practice of connecting and engaging with loving awareness all the things around us. And it changed us when we went back into the room.

The Iroquois nation, who offered so many brilliant visions to the founders of the American Republic—there's a lot of history about that—they also had a beautiful way of teaching their children generosity. As I understand it, part of their tradition was to take children when they were three, four, five years old and place them in the center of a circle. First, they would give them beautiful things to drink. Then someone on the outside of the circle would cry out, "I'm thirsty! I'm thirsty! I have nothing to drink!" And the child who had been given so much would say, "Oh, come in! You come in. Let me share my drink with you."

Then they would give the child all kinds of beautiful things to eat. And from outside the circle, a voice: "I'm hungry, I haven't had anything to eat, help me." The child would be encouraged and guided to say, "Oh, there's so much food here, please come partake, please come share, come have some of my food." Then they would wrap the child in warm skins and woven things, and someone would shout, "I'm cold, I'm freezing!" And the child would offer these warm things to them. What a way to raise children—to have that sense of abundance that can be offered.

Now, my three-year-old grandson went out on Halloween this time. It was his first time really understanding it. His mother was pretty savvy because she didn't want him to have this enormous pile of candy that wasn't all that good for him to eat day after day. So, kind of like the Iroquois, he went around—I mean, there's this mysterious thing where you go from one place to another. Talk about a Buddhist alms bowl! He has his little alms, his Thanksgiving pumpkin, this plastic pumpkin that he puts stuff in. And everywhere he goes, people are giving him the best thing he could imagine: candy.

But then his mother explained something. She said, "The way this holiday works"—this was rather clever, I thought—"is you get all this candy and then you wait by the door, and other children come by, and you get to give it to them." So he had this whole big pile of candy, and then he waited, and as the older kids came later, he got to give the candy out to them. He took as much delight in giving it away as he did in receiving it.

In the Buddhist tradition, it says you become a fully awakened Buddha after practicing these great ten perfections for one hundred thousand mahakalpas—a few immensities, these enormous, vast lengths of time. And one of the first of these perfections is the perfection of generosity.

Well, I don't think this is a really useful framing. One hundred thousand mahakalpas, each of which lasts longer than an eon on earth, where you're trying to become more and more patient, more and more generous. How am I doing? "Okay, I've gotten through thirty-four thousand nine hundred kalpas..." The whole notion of progress in that way in spiritual life—some goal out there—can be really problematic for us. As Aldous Huxley said, an idolatrous religion is one that substitutes time for eternity. Some goal, some place you're supposed to be, rather than the eternal present.

But there's another way to understand generosity, and that is as fundamental abundance—that this is who you are. As Rumi says, you, the richest person in the world, could give it all away. Why don't you do this? To awaken to a sense of wellbeing that is your birthright.

Here's a poem from David Whyte called "Everything is Waiting for You":

Your great mistake is to act the drama as if you were alone, as if life were a progressive and cunning crime with no witnesses to the hidden transgressions. To feel abandoned is to deny the intimacy of your surroundings. Surely even you at times have felt the grand chorus crowding out your solo voice. You must know the way the soap dish enables you, or the window latch grants you freedom. The stairs are your mentor of things to come. The doors have always been there to frighten you and invite you. And the tiny speaker in the phone is your dream ladder to new identities and divinity. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and see the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you.

I could kind of stop right here. Just this as an invitation and a reflection.

We have this remarkable, marvelous human incarnation with all its sorrows and losses, and with its unbearable beauty and magnificence. Open. Become that loving awareness, the loving witness. You are the consciousness that gets to delight in and suffer through all these things—this human incarnation—and see it all.

And you know that you're not just this body, or these fleeting thoughts or feelings. Who you are is so much bigger—not the small self that we take ourselves to be. You are so much bigger than this.

And it comes out the moment a child falls and is in danger in the street. Everybody leaps to try to get that child out of the way. Why is that? Because deep down, we belong to each other, and we know it.

If you look at the military, the stories are not about the great bravery of soldiers for some ideal, whatever flag they're carrying. They really do the brave things they do because they love their comrades and want to take care of their brothers and sisters. We belong to each other.

Here, a story:

When I graduated from nursing school at age forty, the only job I could get was at a veterans affairs hospital. The work was a challenge in every possible way. It didn't help that the veterans teased me relentlessly, asking over and over if I was married. I think they could sense I'm a lesbian. My growing discomfort with their questions seemed only to egg them on.

Meanwhile, caring for them required a great deal of physical intimacy. While changing a dressing or washing a severely ill patient, I often could tell it had been a long time since he had been touched with kindness. Gradually, I came to love the crusty old vets and the stubborn guys in detox, many of whom were homeless. Their spirit and resilience in the face of tremendous adversity were a kind of miracle.

Later, I worked on the psychiatric ward, where some patients could become argumentative, even angry and aggressive. I sometimes didn't feel quite safe there, especially after it occurred to me that all these troubled veterans were combat trained. Once, a large psychotic man approached me in a threatening manner. Just as I was starting to worry, an equally large Vietnam vet with dementia quietly came in between us. Several other vets seemed to appear out of nowhere. They stood nearby in silence, and I felt safe.

I've retired now, but I still volunteer on that ward twice a week. I feel like I'm visiting my family.

We belong to each other. And something in us knows this and wants to help each other.

Every morning after alms round in the monastery, we would do our morning chants—sometimes before we went out, some of them when we came back. They were chants of gratitude and prayers: May I use the food that's offered, the robes that I've been given, the care that I received from others. May I use this in a way that benefits myself and the community around me and all beings in this world. May I receive this with deep gratitude.

Gratitude. The acknowledgment of the countless blessings, great and small, that we receive every single day—with every breath, every meal. Gratitude has a trust, a confidence in life itself. It feels the same force that pushes grass through cracks in the sidewalk, that invigorates and keeps you alive every day.

Gratitude gladdens the heart. It's not sentimental, not jealous, not judgmental. It doesn't envy or compare. Gratitude receives in wonder the myriad offerings of the rain and the earth and the care that supports every single life.

Here is a meditation on gratitude:

With gratitude, I remember the people, animals, plants, insects, creatures of the sky and sea, air and water, fire and earth—all whose joyful exertions bless my life every day.

With gratitude, I remember the care and labor of a thousand generations of elders and ancestors who came before me.

This is a Zen prayer, by the way.

I offer gratitude for the safety and well-being I've been given.

I offer gratitude for the blessings of this earth I'm given every day.

I offer gratitude for the measure of health I've been given.

I offer gratitude for friends and family and community I've been given.

I offer gratitude for teachings and lessons, and for the life that has been bequeathed to me.

As Brother David Steindl-Rast says, it's not joy that makes us grateful.

It's gratefulness that makes us joyful. Maya Angelou captured this beautifully: "This is a wonderful day. I've never seen this one before." That innocence, that beginner's mind.

Several of my friends and colleagues—teachers that you know, I won't use their names—have become gratitude buddies for each other. At the end of a day, they will text their gratitude buddy: "Here are three things that I'm grateful for today." It starts to tune the heart, to begin to look and notice—oh yes, this and this and this.

There's a whole form of therapy in Japan called Naikan therapy that was designed for people who are depressed or anxious or neurotic. Basically, you go on a retreat and begin to reflect on everything that you've been given in your life—from your very first breath and your first diaper and the first milk that you were given, whatever baby food—how much abundance has come into you, and that you are part of this abundance.

Now, let's be real about it. It's not that easy. We all have periods that are extremely hard. We face our own fears and illnesses and confusion and aging and conflicts in our family. And then all this stuff that I talked about that's so present in the culture and in the world—the conflicts.

In Tibet, those who practice meditation offer a prayer to receive suffering: "Grant that I may be given enough suffering that my heart will open and find within me the great heart of compassion." Imagine asking that. You know, we usually pray for other things. Grant me suffering enough that the great heart of compassion will open in me.

Because part of what we have to offer the world, along with our gratitude and our trust, is not how accomplished and wise and thoughtful we are. We offer the world our humility and our presence and our heart—and our brokenness as well.

There's a story of a Maryknoll nun, and this comes out of one of my favorite books ever—Ram Dass and Paul Gorman's book called How Can I Help? A brilliant, wonderful book. This woman, a Maryknoll nun, went to be a school teacher in Peru at a school at 13,500 feet. But after a few years living there, she came down with rheumatoid arthritis that gradually contracted her hands so that they were locked in fists that couldn't even be opened. Eventually she came down the mountain, came back to the U.S., and went to the Mayo Clinic to have surgery—not just on her hands, but on all the other places that the rheumatoid arthritis had damaged her body.

When she went back, she could only go to a lower altitude, but she saw some of her Peruvian friends there. They said, "You're the same kind person you have always been. So let's see what else we can do together."

She said, "My ministry changed. Instead of being the teacher, the one who knew, it became a ministry of walking together. Others with physical disabilities joined together to share our experiences. And it turns out our difficulties and pains and weaknesses proved to be teachers of the great mystery, an introduction into which the spirit can be born.

"I found I'd become much more sensitive to others—more touched, more able to listen, moved more by feelings than by concepts and intellectual ideas. I discovered that the more I opened to the pain of others, the more I found in myself a spirit of service. This was true for the others who were disabled as well. Having been brought low, it was a matter of standing humbly as best we could.

"Many of the Peruvians I ran into with handicaps were deeply ashamed and hid. I would come to see them and they would hide in their own homes. But as I moved about, they would gradually come forth. I think of Juan, a polio victim at three who'd been hidden by his family in their small mud brick house until we discovered him at age eight. His brother Julio took us to his home one day, and there was Juan, his twisted legs underneath him, scooting around the small back dirt patio on a circular piece of rubber.

"His mother was suspicious and didn't want us to stay, for a handicapped child meant she was being punished for something. She was ashamed. We returned, I and these others I worked with, on several occasions to visit Juan. One time we found him all alone. His family, with the rest of the town, had gone to a religious procession. Of course, he'd never seen one. So we borrowed a bicycle and put Juan on it and joined in the procession itself. It was his first time outside the house, the first time he'd looked at people from a level higher than the ground, his first procession. His parents were immediately annoyed, but their attitude changed gradually."

And when we thought it was right to raise the idea, we asked at the next town meeting if we could raise money to send Juan to Lima for physical rehabilitation. Everybody liked the idea, and Juan went off to the big city. He had a long, hard struggle with much pain and effort, but one day he returned to the village. He was using braces and a cane. It was very hard for him. But as he began to walk down the street to his home, people came out of their own homes. They appeared from all over. They were cheering and clapping, and they followed him all the way home. It was so wonderful. It was Juan's second procession.

Everybody brings their hurts and their trauma and their magnificence and their mystery and their unbearable beauty, all of it wrapped up. And we can bring eyes of compassion and mercy, tenderness, appreciation to the Thanksgiving table—to the wacky relative and the QAnon supporter and the crabby aunt and the misbehaving children that we all were in our time. And as we did in our meditation, we can bow and say, thank you. Thank you to it all. Thank you that we can all be together.

Because when the heart opens, it is said that even the leaves on the trees become like pages in the holy books. Everything we see is colored by the attention of the heart, by mercy, by care.

I saw this cartoon with several panels. Someone was in trouble and when he gets out of it, he says, "Thank you, Jesus." And then in the next panel, there's a picture of Jesus Garcia. He's got a little name tag on—he's obviously working somewhere, got some job—and he says, "De nada." Thank you, Jesus. Jesus says, de nada.

There's a doctor that I admire a great deal. His name is James J. O'Connell. Dr. O'Connell was a physician trained at Harvard Medical School, and being near the top of his class, he went over to Mass General Hospital, one of the great teaching hospitals in Boston, and became one of the chief residents there. He was highly accomplished. But he'd heard from some friends that there was an interesting problem to solve, an interesting place to go and work—to learn how to work with the homeless population in Boston.

So he decided to go for a month to a clinic that he was directed to, to learn about how to be a physician for those who had no homes, who were houseless or homeless. He went in and met this nurse. Her name was Barbara McInnes, who he later said was the greatest saint he'd ever encountered. But there she was, just an older nurse. She welcomed him. "Hello, doctor. I'm so glad you're going to be with us. We're grateful to have you. I have a little bit of instruction and guidance for you."

"Yes," he said. "You've been doing this a long time. Tell me."

She said, "Well, first, lose the white coat. Take off the stethoscope." Which he did. She said, "And for these first weeks here, what I'd like you to do is to wash the feet of the homeless people as they come in."

Now there's something biblical, if you will, about this story. What does it mean to wash the feet of someone? There's a kind of humility and tenderness in it, but it's a lot more than that. He writes about it, saying that as a physician, all of a sudden he could see so much that was going on for them. He could see the swollen feet and the diabetes and the blood pressure, all these things, because he had time to touch and be with their bodies. But more than that, he said, he could listen. And as he washed their feet and massaged and tended their feet, they would begin to tell him their stories in ways that he would never have heard anywhere else.

And then of course, Barbara said, "Well, we have to go out on rounds." He was used to hospital rounds from one ward to another. But they got in the van and did rounds under the bridges. She would go out and he would go with her, and she would introduce him to her patients, and they would look at their feet and look at their bodies.

He was so moved by it that he made it his own ministry, his own work, which he's been doing now for twenty-five or thirty years. And he created a program where physicians in training at Harvard Medical School and at places like Mass General and other hospitals around Boston—many, many of them are invited to come and do a rotation and learn what it means to attend to people who are on the streets. Beautiful, beautiful work. And a lot of it is just listening.

We want to talk about gratitude or trust or generosity. To listen is an enormous act of generosity.

And I think about—I've told this story of my beloved Trudy, my wife and partner and colleague, dharma teacher—going to work with this very tiny, but as they call it, "small but mighty" anti-genocide group in Africa. While the big NGOs go in and bring their crates of things, have their Land Rovers, have a whole program of how they're going to help people, what the IACT folks did was go and sit down on the dirt in the desert with all the refugees from Darfur in these huge, desolate desert camps. They sat down with the women and asked, "What do you need? What do you want?"

And the women said, "We want preschool for our kids. We want them to begin to realize that they can learn. And we want soccer. We want our children also to realize they can be part of the world."

And so now in many of these camps, there are these beautiful preschools where the kids are learning practices of mindfulness and compassion, things that IACT has been teaching along with education of language and words. And the soccer teams have grown up. A lot of them still playing barefoot, but they've got shoes and balls and all these things donated from around the world. And now there is a Darfur United team that went to—I forget, it might have been Doha or the United Emirates or somewhere in Dubai—for the World Street Cup Championship. They got new shoes and uniforms, and their whole wish was that they would score at least one goal in this world competition, which they did. And the camps all cheered because it made them related and connected to the world.

This is something that we all can do. Even if we're alone, we can share a smile. We can be grateful when we go shopping and encounter somebody. We are in the network of mutuality, the shared garment of destiny, as Martin Luther King said.

Some years ago on a sunny Seattle afternoon in a park, a young Catholic priest stopped to talk to a parishioner and her five-year-old daughter, Carmen. The little girl had a new jump rope, and the young priest began to demonstrate the intricacies of jumping rope to her. After a while, Carmen began to jump—first once, then twice. Mother and priest clapped loudly for her skill, and eventually the little girl was able to jump quite well on her own and wandered off with her newfound skill. Priest and mother chatted for a few moments until Carmen, with the saddest, wisest eyes, returned, dragging her rope. "Mommy," she lamented, "I can do it, but I need lots of clapping."

We need each other. And maybe we're put in this world to admire it, to love it, to be grateful for it.

In the Buddhist teachings, it's said that there are three levels of generosity or giving of dāna. The first is tentative giving, where you have stuff or things and you say, "Well, maybe I'll need it, maybe I won't. It's cluttering up my house. All right, I'll give it away." There's that sort of doubt. We've all been there. You know what that's like—should I keep it? No, I don't have any use for it. I'll give it to someone else. Tentative giving.

Then there's brotherly or sisterly giving, where you see others as your family. You see them through the eyes of family and you say, "I have this. Won't you share? Won't you also be part of what I have? Let us share this together. We're in this together."

And then the third is called royal giving, like the king or queen who has the treasure house. Rumi says, "Walking out of the treasury, I feel generous. Anyone still sober in this weather has missed the point"—the spring weather. In royal giving, there is the delight of taking the best that you have and saying, "Here, you have this, you share this," because the joy is so great in sharing and in giving.

You can think about it. Those who've been really generous around you—how do you feel toward them? And how does it feel when you've been generous in that way? You can also reflect: what does the opposite feel like? The times when our minds are fearful, worried, miserly, stingy, clinging in some way, hoarding—all those kinds of things. Without being judgmental about it, how does it feel?

Gratitude, generosity, trust. When they are present—which they are in you—when you honor them and allow them to flower, they connect. They bring joy again. As Brother David said, it's not joy that makes you grateful. It's gratefulness that makes you joyful.

Your body isn't yours. And it's not just that I'm saying your consciousness and your spirit will leave the body when you die. That will happen.

You'll see. And you'll look back and just say, wow, that was an incarnation. You kind of look at that whole thing as you float out of your body into the light. You'll see.

But I'm not talking about that. I'm talking about the fact that you are an organism that is an entire ecosystem with what is now estimated to be a trillion other living beings. The viruses and the bacteria that live not just in your gut, but in every part of your body. Every square inch of your skin has hundreds of thousands and billions of little creatures. The weight of your body—I think it's something like three quarters of your body is not your own cells. It's all these other organisms.

Now you might say, ew, creepy. But guess what? We are life. Breathing, living life. We can't separate ourselves out in that way. That's a fiction. That small separate self, sometimes called the body of fear. Yes, we have to stop at a red light. Yes, we have to remember our social security number. There are things we have to tend to as an individual. But we are in this mutual garment of destiny. This shared mutuality.

And what do we want to do in this life if we're connected with it all? What better thing to do than to love? What better thing to do than to be grateful for it? And you know, when you're with people who have gratitude and generosity, how much delight it brings.

Someone was asked in a classroom, what is it that helps us to see goodness? "I see the goodness on my husband's face when he sees the kids after an out-of-town trip. They all run toward him, Daddy!" "I see the goodness when my youngest son hears the fatigue in my voice and brings me a cup of water. Here, Mommy." "I see it in my wife when she greets the parking attendant or the cashier with such kindness and attention and respect." "I see it when my best friend comes home and hugs his dog with deep affection." "I see it when my husband pulls over to help someone whose car has died and never takes anything for it." "When my partner is tender, willing to stay in relation when things are difficult." "I see it in my five-year-old daughter who says to the sun at sunset, goodbye, I love you."

We have this in us—gratitude, royal generosity. And this season, if anything, is a time to let that shine. I mean, every season is.

I like this poem from Brian Andreas called "Waiting for Signs": "I used to wait for a sign, she said, before I did anything. Then one night I had a dream and an angel in black tights came to me and said, you can start any time now. And then I asked, is this a sign? And the angel started laughing and I woke up smiling. And now I think the whole world is filled with signs. But if there's no laughter, I know they're not for me."

The signs are here, all of it. This is our time on this earth, as Joanna Macy says, for our courage and our love, our wisdom to shine forth. It's our time to serve beyond our fears and small sense of self. It's a time to express this.

There's a song from Idina Menzel. She sings: "At this table, everyone is welcome. At this table, everyone is seen. At this table, everyone matters. No one falls between. At this table, mercy has a seat. At this table, there'll be no judgment. At this table, we're all sons and daughters. There's no better place to be."

Your Thanksgiving table—that's the place.

Your table every night—what do you really want to give thanks for? In the end, what are you grateful for? And if you could do something a little extra generous in this season and this time, what would that be? How might it feel?

May the earth be yours. May the clarity of light be yours. May the fluency of the waters and the ocean be yours. May the protection of the ancestors be yours. And so may a slow wind work these words of love around you, an invisible cloak to hold your life.

These blessings from John O'Donohue.

Our meditation, our practice, the Buddhist teachings—they are simply a reminder of who you really are. O nobly born, remember what's possible for your heart and your life. Freedom. Compassion. Tenderness. Humility, because we all have our wounds to share with one another, and our care.

There is a kind of magnificent love that's possible in each person. There really is.

This is who you are.

CHAPTER 26

Setting an Intention of the Heart Dharma Talk

Jack Kornfield · 50 min

> In this Winter Solstice dharma talk from 2021, Jack Kornfield weaves together poetry, story, and contemplative practice to explore how we might live as bodhisattvas during challenging times. Drawing on Pablo Neruda's "Keeping Quiet" and Wendell Berry's wisdom about the fertile darkness, Kornfield invites us to pause from the ordinary rhythms of life and listen more deeply to what matters.
> Kornfield reflects on the Bodhisattva vows and how they shift our perspective from the small self's concerns to a larger commitment of service. He shares personal reflections from sitting in Ram Dass's room in Maui, where he experienced the vastness of awareness alongside the tenderness of the human heart. Through touching stories—including a teacher who protected a student's dignity, and the remarkable tale of how Dante's love for Beatrice saved the Ponte Vecchio during World War II—he illustrates how compassion and trust can transform even the most difficult circumstances.
> The talk addresses the reality of suffering—pandemic waves, political gridlock, climate crisis, personal loss—while pointing to the Buddha's teaching that suffering is not the end of the story. Kornfield explores the West African concept of each person carrying "cargo" or gifts to deliver to this world, encouraging listeners to discover and offer their unique contributions. The session concludes with a ritual for setting intentions for the coming year, lighting candles, and speaking vows aloud as witnessed acts of commitment to the Bodhisattva path.

So welcome back. And please let yourself sit and listen in a way that's kind of meditative, we might say. That is, there's no exam at the end, nothing you have to take notes for. Remember, if anything, this is just a reminder to something that you already know in yourself. And if there's something that's touched in you, a reminder that matters, then you can keep it. And if things don't seem like they fit, just let them go. Take it as a practice, even as you listen.

So here we are, 2021, in the Northern hemisphere, the winter solstice. And as most everyone knows, that word solstice means the sun is stopping. We get to feel the turning of the seasons when we pay attention—that music of the spheres. Most cultures, as we know, have some kind of ritual for the solstice: songs, prayers for the light to come back, offerings, communal gatherings. And of course, all the holy days that we know—Christmas and Hanukkah and Kwanzaa and the Islamic holidays and the indigenous celebrations—so many ways that people celebrate.

Because it reminds us that we live by rhythms that are not the rhythms of the internet or the cars or business. There's another kind of rhythm. The great rhythm, the breathing of the world that breathes with our breath and the heartbeat. And so we step out of the rhythm of our ordinary life and pause. The question is not the future of humanity, it said, but the presence of eternity—to listen in a deeper way.

And as we do, we get to look around a little, both inwardly and outwardly. I've been watching the migration of the geese. Trudy and I—my beloved—we live on a lagoon near the San Francisco Bay. And there's not just the migration, but there's a huge owl. I believe it's a great horned owl that's in the oak tree between our house and the lagoon, just a few yards outside our window. And it roosts in the top. It's giant—like the size of E.T. in the movie. It will turn its head almost completely around. It's just astonishing to see it there. And I'm hoping sometime maybe I'll get to see it or feel it when it leaves and then comes back again. My neighbor saw it bringing back some little creature that it had caught in its talons, silently.

There's a rhythm to the world that's happening around us—of the creatures and what Chief Seattle called the beasts of the world—and a rhythm of our own heartbeat, the movement of our life. When we get quiet and come into the present, we can feel the aliveness of this rhythm.

The poem from Pablo Neruda that most of you have heard, but I haven't read for years—I thought of it and I love it. Sometimes it's nice to revisit these things. It's called "Keeping Quiet."

Now we will count to 12 and we will all keep still. And for once on the face of the earth, let's not speak in any language. Let's stop for a second and not move our arms so much. It would be an exotic moment without rush, without engines. We would all be together in a sudden strangeness.

Fishermen in the cold sea would not harm whales. And the man gathering salt would look at his hurt hands. And those who prepare green wars, victories with no survivors, would put on clean clothes and walk about with their brothers and sisters in the shade, doing nothing.

What I want should not be confused with total inactivity. Life is what it is about. If we were not so single-minded about keeping our lives moving, and for once could do nothing, perhaps a huge silence might interrupt the sadness of never understanding ourselves, or threatening ourselves with death.

Now I'll count up to 12 and you keep quiet, and I will go.

An invitation to quiet the mind. An invitation to love and tenderness, to presence.

Now, of course, that all sounds good. It's poetic and gorgeous. He won his Nobel Prize for poetry for good reason. He's the voice of the heart in some way. But it ain't so easy. You know, the advertisements for it make it sound good. But actually, it's really hard when we stop.

We stop and try to sit quietly. And it's like there's a layer of ice that needs to thaw before the water can even move inside. Or maybe it's like there's so much speed in our mind—business and planning and doing—and we try to get still, our body gets quiet. And then it's like in the cartoons when Coyote runs off the cliff and he hasn't looked down yet and his little legs are still going, and then he looks down and goes "oops!" We're somehow suspended even as we start to meditate.

Because when we do sit quietly, as we do sit quietly, as we face the stillness, there also arises—we start to feel the grief that we carry for the sorrows of the world and the immense beauty of life. All of it is there for us when we quiet.

And right now there's the next wave of the pandemic, the spread of Omicron really, really rapidly across the globe. I read that today seventy-five percent of all COVID cases in the US are already Omicron. I think in a couple of days it will be ninety percent. We can't see friends and family in some cases, or have to cancel our travel plans, and schools are closing, stores can't stay open, businesses shuttering. It's really affecting all of us in some deep way. And when we get quiet, we carry all that, because it's there in the field of our lives.

We also are aware of the political gridlock, our longing for something better in the body politic that's not happening. We can feel the weight of the calls for social and economic and racial justice—the continuing racism, the continuing conflict and targeting of people, the continuing economic disparity. We all feel this. And climate change.

So when we sit quietly, there's the stillness and the immense beauty, and then there's also the problems, the difficulties that we share. If we try to hold these in our mind and heart with our small self, our limited self, they're overwhelming. They're just too much to bear. But if we hold them as the bodhisattva that we are—the great heart of compassion born in you, the being committed to being in this world and to alleviating or diminishing suffering—then all of a sudden it becomes possible.

It's like the poet Ryokan, who wrote, "Oh, that my priest's robes were wide enough to gather up all the suffering people in this floating world." You can imagine Ryokan in his priest's robes gathering everyone up into his heart, saying, "Oh, that I could hold them all in my heart." I put my hand on my heart—you could do the same. You can almost feel this, that this is a different way of holding all that we're going through, the immense beauty and the struggles.

And don't think that it's not the journey. "Go ahead," writes one sage, "light your candles, burn your incense, make your prayers, ring your bells, call out to the gods—but watch out, because the gods will come. And they will put you on the anvil and fire up the forge and beat you and beat you until they turn brass into pure gold."

So we're being asked to be greater than ourselves in this time.

I notice it in myself. This year, at certain points I started to think, "Well, should I be pulling back?" Here I'm seventy-six and a half. I've got hardly—I don't have any unpublished thoughts. I've written a lot, I've done these things, and maybe it's time to just go on a long retreat, to step back. And the world is not as exciting as it used to be. Or maybe I should travel to some more exotic place, or take something new on, or find what will make it fresh.

And then I had this revelation as I was getting quiet and reflecting. Those reflections are about me, the small self, Jack. Am I bored? Have I done enough? Should I do more? Have I fulfilled my job? Whatever. But when I get quiet, I remembered my bodhisattva vows. And I thought, "Oh, it's not about me. It's not about whether I retire or not, or what I do for myself." The bodhisattva vows that I've taken, and that many of us have, are so simple: May I be of service. Whatever gifts I have, may I help to alleviate the suffering of beings everywhere.

And then all of a sudden I felt this lifting of the weight of who I'm supposed to be or what I'm supposed to do—just, "Let me be of service. Let me do something that makes a difference."

But how to do this, how to do this bodhisattva thing? It all sounds very noble.

Trudy and I came back not long ago from leading the legacy retreat that we taught for many years together with Ram Dass. This was the first time without him—it was a year off last year from the pandemic. And I sat in Ram Dass's room. They've made the house where he lived, now called Hanuman Maui, into a temple where you can go on retreat, a few people at a time, and people gather and they chant and they meditate.

And it's quite a beautiful place. I sat in Ram Dass's room, and I'm not that much of a woo-woo person, but it was a surprise how powerful it was. I was sitting and all of a sudden my mind and heart opened to this immensity, this vastness, emptiness—the fertile emptiness from which everything comes, the vast silence behind everything, the universe, consciousness before form.

I don't mean to make it into something out of reach, because you can experience this too. But there was this sense of vast stillness, becoming that awareness itself, that loving awareness Ram Dass talked about. And then as I fell into that vastness, there appeared in the middle of it a heart. You know, when you watch television or YouTube showing open heart surgery and they crack the chest open and there's that amazing pulsing, beating organ of the heart? That's what appeared. There was the vastness and there was this incredibly tender heart.

And I thought about Ram Dass in his life. The great Tibetan sages say, "My view is as vast as the sky. My actions are as tender as barley flour, as minute and careful." Ram Dass—I loved him and he was a sage and he had his own personality and neurosis, which he famously talked about a lot. But he also worked in the AIDS epidemic and sat with hundreds of people who were dying before we had medicine for HIV. He was there for people whose children died. He was there in Nepal and India working with thousands of people, and it turned out to be five million people that the Seva Foundation he helped found restored sight to. That tenderness at the same time.

Though there's suffering in the world, it's not the end of the story. And the inspiration from Ram Dass—there he was in this somewhat broken body after a huge stroke, twenty years in a wheelchair, still unable to move half his body, repeated infections and hospitalizations. People get loyal to their suffering, they focus on it. But he would go once a week on Mondays to swim in the ocean on the other side of the island, and we would join him. They'd roll him down in this wheelchair with giant wheels across the sand, put on a life vest and give him a little glove for the one hand he could use, and float him out into the ocean. And he would be just smiling and paddling away.

Off this beach, there was a buoy in the water. He would paddle out there and there would usually be twenty or thirty hippies with flowers throwing petals in the water, like it was the river Ganges or something. He would get out to the buoy and float there, open his arms and say, "Oh boy, oh boy, oh boy." And then he would say, "Oh joy, oh joy, oh joy," until everybody was singing along with him.

When we quiet ourselves, we can see in a new way, as he did, as we can with the heart. And now is the time of darkness in the northern hemisphere. Our farmer poet Wendell Berry says, "To go in the dark with a light is to know the light. To know the dark, go dark. Go without sight and find that the dark too blooms and sings, and is traveled by dark feet and dark wings."

So in the pause in this time of the holy days, there's an invitation to the fertile darkness, the holy darkness, the beautiful, wise, tender darkness. And maybe the virus, which is sending us back to our rooms saying, "Okay, you didn't quite learn your lesson yet, maybe you need a little bit longer"—is inviting us to take an even deeper pause and look at our life.

An old man meets a young man who asks, "Do you remember me?" The old man says no. The young man tells him he was his student, and the teacher asks, "What do you do in your life?" The young man answers, "I became a teacher." The older one says, "How good, like me?" And he says, "Yes, in fact I became a teacher because you inspired me to be like you."

The old man, curious, asked what time he decided to become a teacher. And the young man tells him the story. He says, "One day a friend of mine, another student, came in with a beautiful new watch and I decided I really wanted it. I stole it, took it out of his pocket. Shortly after, my friend noticed his watch was missing and immediately complained to our teacher, who was you. Then you addressed the class saying, 'This student's watch was stolen during classes today. Whoever stole it, please return it.' I didn't give it back because I was ashamed and also because I wanted to keep it. You closed the door and told us all to stand up and form a circle. You were going to search our pockets one by one until the watch was found. However, you told us to close our eyes because you would only look for his watch if we all had our eyes shut. We did as instructed."

You went from pocket to pocket. And when you went through my pocket, you found the watch and took it. But you kept moving, searching through everyone's pockets. And when you were done, you said, "Open your eyes. We have the watch." You didn't tell on me. You never mentioned the episode. You never said who stole the watch. That day you saved my dignity forever. It was the most shameful day of my life. But this was also the day I decided not to become a thief, a bad person. You never said anything, nor did you scold me or take me aside to give me a moral lesson. I received your message clearly. Thanks to you, I understood what a real educator needs to do. Do you remember this episode, teacher?

The old professor answered, "Yes, I remember the situation with the stolen watch, which I was looking for in everyone's pocket. But I don't remember you, because I did my best to keep my own eyes closed while I felt for the watch in pockets as I was looking."

And I learned—oh, this is the heart of teaching: to correct, not to humiliate. If you don't know how to do this, if to correct you must humiliate, you don't know how to teach. And if you do know, then teaching becomes an act and an art of love. Not judging the other, but in the darkness, in the unknowing, seeing with eyes of understanding, trying to understand.

The restorative justice movement in prisons and schools is one of the great exemplars of this, where people get to listen to the person they believed wronged them the most, or the one they've harmed, until very often they come to a heart connection.

Life will test you. Events, loss, death, pandemics, shocks. This past few weeks, our dear friends Gabriel and Katie Stauring, who started the extraordinary nonprofit iACT that does anti-genocide work in Darfur and Sudan—people from there, in Chad and Central African Republic, working with people from Syria and so forth—in the most dangerous places, we worried about them. They came home and they were killed in Los Angeles near their house in a car accident when someone ran a red light. That driver too was killed. They were in their forties. They had three kids. Terribly painful, tragic. And yet they burned bright. When Gabriel first heard about the continuing genocide in Darfur, he said, "I have to do something." Decades ago, he made forty different trips to Africa, gathering people to help refugees. Yes, life will test you as it tested them. And their response was to burn bright.

In this past week, my dear friend Malidoma Somé, West African shaman and medicine man and professor, also died of cancer. And I remember this story he told, that in Africa, when a woman wants to have a child, before she lets herself get pregnant, she'll go sit out under a tree—a beautiful big tree out in the field—and wait quietly until she hears the song of the child that wants to be born. And when she hears the song of the child that wants to come into her body, she goes and teaches it to her lover, and they sing it together when they make love and create this new life. Then after she gets pregnant, she teaches it to the villagers around. So when the baby is born, the midwife and the women gathered around sing the song of this baby to it, saying, "We know your song. We welcome you." And then that song is sung through the rites of passage—the bar mitzvah or whatever that child goes through in that culture—all the way to the wedding, when both people's songs are sung, to the end of life when it's the very last thing that happens, and those gathered around that person on their last day sing their song to them.

I heard this story and I thought, that's a culture I'd love to live in, where we know each other by our song, where we listen in that deep way.

And then Malidoma went on at another time—and I've told this before here—he said, "In the Dagara people, in my people, we believe that each child is born carrying gifts for this earth. And that their main task is to deliver their cargo." I love that metaphor, because cargo is the word used in West Africa for all those ships that ply the rivers of West Africa and have for centuries. Your task in life is to deliver your cargo.

So when I ask, how do we do this bodhisattva thing? We have to listen: What are your gifts? What is your sense of offering to this world? Like Katie and Gabriel, what do you want to respond to?

How do you find yourself moved and motivated?

To do this bodhisattva thing, you also need to invite a sense of trust. The awakened heart is the same as the trusting heart. Enlightenment is the same as the trusting mind, it says in ancient teachings. Trust. If you don't have it, go look at the buds on the trees around you. If you don't have it, go look at the little green things that are pushing themselves up through the cracks in the cement and the concrete. There is a mysterious unfolding happening right now, always. That's what this life is. It renews itself just as surely as the light will come back from this darkest day of the year in the north.

You can trust inwardly—and I know this from fifty years of working with people in inward processes of meditation, retreats, and therapy—that the inner monsters, the fears and rage and grief and guilt and the things that are stuck there, yes, if there's a lot of trauma they may need to be resourced and supported with safety. But in the end it's not repressing or judging or fighting. It's inviting the monsters into the heart. It's letting yourself open and say, "This too." To allow the rage or the fear or even the sense of dying, to say, "All right, let me open to this change and trust," as I've seen again and again, that when we let ourselves open to that which is difficult, something new will be born. You know this.

The poet Italo Calvino writes, "What is to give light must endure burning." And sometimes we have to go through the darkness. Sometimes we have to go through the fire and endure things. But the heart wants to heal. The body wants to heal. And it turns out even the inner monsters—in the end, even the fears—they want to be loved. It's kind of remarkable to see it in this inner work. Finally, you get this dialogue with the inner fears and monsters and ask, "Well, what do you need?" And they turn into, "Oh, I just want you to put your arm around me. I want that tenderness. I want to be included too."

But it's not just inwardly, it's outwardly. Inwardly and outwardly.

And you probably know the story of Dante's Divine Comedy, the masterwork of the thirteenth century. An amazing poet. He wrote the Divine Comedy inspired by the woman he fell in love with—Beatrice. It was just before 1300, and Dante spotted this young woman standing on the Ponte Vecchio, this bridge that goes across the river in Florence. It's an amazing, beautiful bridge with all these artworks and shops and various things. And the sight of her lit up his heart and ignited and awakened a sense of love and beauty and something eternal. He only got to speak with her a few times before the plague, the pandemic of the time, took her away. But she somehow became his muse, his inspiration.

Six hundred fifty years later, during World War II, the American army was chasing the German army up the Italian peninsula toward the end of the war. And the Germans in retreat were blowing up everything in their wake, including bridges, to try to stop the American progress. But no one wanted to blow up the Ponte Vecchio because Beatrice had stood on it and Dante had written about it. So the leaders of the German army, some of whom had read Dante and knew this great artist, made radio contact with the Americans and said in plain language that they would leave the Ponte Vecchio intact, but only if the Americans would promise not to use it. And the promise held. The bridge was not blown up, and not one American soldier nor one piece of equipment went across it. The bridge was spared in a modern ruthless war because Beatrice had stood upon it and love had touched Dante. And down through the centuries, it still mattered.

So yes, inwardly, the bodhisattva says, "Yes, I can hold all of this. I invite it all into my heart to be met, to be held, to be loved." But outwardly, yes, there's growing hatred and divisiveness. The bodhisattva sees this and says, "There's a goodness underneath all of this. Under all of this, human beings fundamentally have a good heart."

The bodhisattva honors the truth that everything changes. Remember Mary Oliver saying that to live in this world, you must be able to do three things: to love what is mortal, to hold it against your breast as if your life depends upon it, and when the time comes to let it go, to let it go.

And so the very last words of the Buddha were: All things are impermanent. All things are impermanent. This is the truth.

And the Bodhisattva says, "I love it when it comes, and I love it when it goes."

The Bodhisattva also understands the other truths of existence—that there's suffering in life. It's not a mistake. There's birth and death, joy and sorrow, praise and blame, light and dark, gain and loss, fame and disrepute. Who among us hasn't experienced all of these?

But suffering is only the First Noble Truth. Yes, there's suffering, says the Bodhisattva, but that's not the end of the story. There are causes for our human suffering: greed, hate, ignorance, fear. And there's a path to the end of suffering for everyone's heart—compassion, mindfulness, wise understanding.

And this is who we are. We're being called to this, O Bodhisattvas of the time of change. This is not just a time of change; it's a time of transformation. And it asks us to step out of the small sense of self—what's called the body of fear, the sense of separateness. That's just not true. Instead, we're invited to feel our connection with life itself, and the gifts that we've been given, and the reality that we're not alone, that we're in this together.

"O nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Remember the spirit that was born into your body, the timeless awareness that is who you are. Take time to listen, to value it. Take time to walk among the trees in nature. Walk by the water and the mountains just to be still. See the rhythms of the oak and the maple, the willows. Take time to meditate.

Bodhisattvas, dear ones, don't fear change and don't fear suffering. They're part of the dance of incarnation. This is us. This is who we are. This is what this life, this human embodiment offers—joy and sorrow, praise and blame, gain and loss. Breathe with it. Like the rivers, feelings and thoughts come and go, relationships come and go. You become the loving heart that says, "Yes, I can hold all of this, this greater dance." Dance with it.

And if you need to, heal your body. Forgive your lover or your ex. Tell your story. Write poems. Make art. Find a gratitude partner where you send something every day—a text saying, "This is something I'm grateful for on this very day." Make a meal for someone. Stand up for justice. Feel your gifts. Use what's been given to you so that when you leave, the world is a little bit better because you, the Bodhisattva, were here.

I said that the last words of the Buddha were, "All things are impermanent." But at the very end, he said something else. As he looked into the eyes of all those gathered around him, after forty-five years of walking the dusty roads of India, speaking to everyone about the freedom and great heart of compassion, the nobility of every being that they could remember and find in themselves—he looked at them and said, "Make of yourself a light."

Become that illumination, O Bodhisattvas, and carry it.

Nelson Mandela: "Keep one's head pointed toward the sun and one's feet moving forward."

So simple. Turn your heart, great Bodhisattva, toward the world. Bring your love and your gifts into it.

But before we do it, I want to remind you that in the chat is the link to IACT, which is the name of the little nonprofit that Gabriel and Katie J. Starring began. I've talked about it before. It's really remarkable—as someone called it, a small but mighty anti-genocide group that has now become a model for people around the world who are working with these streams of refugees. They've learned how to listen to them, how to ask what they need, how to bring the very things that illuminate their lives and their hearts. It's really beautiful work. So please, if you can, support them.

Now I'd like to ask you to get quiet for a moment. We will do a ritual—a ritual of setting the intention for the next movement of the spheres, of the earth around our sun. In this solstice time, we begin another journey around our star. It's a good time. You could call it New Year's, the Holy Days, whatever you wish. It's a good time to set the intention of the heart for what matters to you and how you want to live.

So let your eyes close gently.

The Dalai Lama wakes up early in the morning in the dark and chants his bodhisattva vows: May I be a boat or raft, a bridge to help those cross the flood. May I be food for the hungry and medicine for the sick. May I be a resting place for the weary and a lamp in the darkness for all to follow, as long as earth and stars exist.

That's a very poetic way to say it. But let yourself set an intention or a vow. It's never too late to start over. Today is the perfect day to set the most beautiful intention of your heart. And it could be just as simple as: I vow to be kind. Listen. You will know.

Now, whenever you're ready, let your eyes open again. And I'd like to invite you, if you have one, if you brought one, to light a candle—or turn your little battery-operated candle on. Once you've lit it, place it down where you are.

Now take out the piece of paper that you brought with you, if you did, and the pen. If we were all together in the room, we would do blessing chords. We would do a ritual where we turn to one another and read our intentions, because to speak them out loud, to have them witnessed, gives a beautiful power. It's also a tender thing to hear from another.

But for us in this way, we do need a witness. So on your paper, where you will write your vow or your intention, at the top of it I'd like you to write the name of someone who will be your witness. You can say, "In the name of my inspiration"—and it could be your grandmother or grandfather. It could be Nelson Mandela or Greta Thunberg or Quan Yin or Mother Mary. "In the name of Greta Thunberg..." "In the name of Quan Yin, I set this intention..."

Let yourself finish up what you're writing. If there's more, you can add to it later.

And now, when you're ready—Jesse, would you unmute everyone, please? You can all unmute yourself. You now have permission.

Hold your candle up. Let us all read them aloud. I don't know how this is going to work, but I'm very interested—because there's something compelling and beautiful about giving voice to these words from the heart. So go ahead and hold the candle. We are all witnesses, walking together.

[A moment of voices reading aloud]

Well, it was a little cacophonous—like life—but it was still a beautiful thing to do. Beautiful.

So take this paper, put it someplace special. You have the witness, whoever you wrote down. It would be fun to see who you named.

And I'd like to end with a little blessing chant, but first I want to read a poem that I read periodically.

Thirty years ago, a woman named Lynn Parks came to a Monday night class—a poet who lived in Marin who has since died. To explain one line in her poem: she had brittle bone disease, which means that as a child, many times when she fell, she broke her bones. She said she broke her bones fourteen times as a girl.

But here's her poem:

Take the time to meditate, to pray.
It is the sweet oil that eases the hinge into the garden
so the doorway can swing open easily.
You can always go there.
Consider yourself blessed.
The stones that break your bones will build the altar of your love.
Your home is the garden.
Carry its odor hidden in you into the city.
Suddenly your enemies will buy seed packets and fall to their knees to plant flowers in the dirt by the road.
They'll call you friend and honor your passing among them.
Give everything away except your garden.
Your worry, your fear, your small-mindedness—your garden can never be taken from you.

And just as the rain falls on all things, nourishing them with its sweet water, beings everywhere welcoming the rain. Just as the full moon we had last night shines its luminous silver light on all beings—so too may the good intentions of your heart and all the actions of the bodhisattva that you are, the small and tiny acts of kindness, may they gather together like raindrops into rivulets, into streams, like the moonlight that illuminates even the darkest of nights. May they gather together into rivers and return to the ocean of well-being, to nourish and support and bring blessings to you, to all you care about. May they bring well-being and happiness. May your life become a blessing to yourself and to this world.

May it be so.

I am so grateful to be together with you in this way. This soul's retreat has been really special. I thank you for your stillness and your prayers, your meditation and your vows, your kind attention, and the fact that we get to have this shared communion together of teachings and compassion.

Be well. Take care of yourself and those around you.

And I'll see you in the new year.

CHAPTER 27

Nourish and Connect Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 27 min

> In this guided meditation offered at the time of the winter solstice, Jack Kornfield invites practitioners to settle into what he calls "loving awareness"—a quality of consciousness that witnesses all experience with kindness and spaciousness. Taking one's seat "halfway between heaven and earth," the practitioner learns to observe the breath breathing itself, recognizing our fundamental connection with all living beings who share this breath.
> Kornfield offers a gentle approach to working with the thinking mind, noting that "the mind produces images and words, it secretes thoughts the way the salivary glands secrete saliva." Rather than struggling against thoughts, he suggests meeting them with the phrase "I love it when it comes, I love it when it goes"—allowing thoughts, feelings, and moods to rise and pass like waves of the ocean. This reflects the classical understanding of vedanā (feeling tones) and the changing nature of all mental phenomena.
> The meditation culminates in an expansion of peaceful presence outward to all beings, using the beautiful image of a violin's strings resonating sympathetically with another instrument. Drawing on the spirit of the brahmavihāras (divine abodes), Kornfield suggests that by finding stillness within ourselves, we naturally offer blessings of peace that "resonate across the universe." This practice integrates mindfulness of breathing with mettā (loving-kindness) in an accessible, heart-centered approach suitable for practitioners at any level.

Let yourself get ready to sit now in meditation in whatever way is comfortable for you. Taking your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this remarkable human form, this human incarnation. Sit with a sense of graciousness and ease, upright so there's a sense of presence, but also relaxed.

Perhaps if you're ready, let your eyes close gently or lower your gaze and take two or three long breaths in and out. Take your time to release whatever wants to be let go of in this moment.

Here you take your seat amidst the great turning of the spheres, the time of the solstice. Let yourself become loving awareness itself, a mindful loving awareness. In a simple way, if it's helpful, you can begin to feel how the body is breathing itself with all other beings—the in-breath and rising of the belly and chest, the out-breath all happening on their own. You can relax and calm with each breath, a loving awareness.

First, as you sit, just let things settle, simply, graciously. As you feel the body breathe into breathing with all life, breath shared with all the other creatures of the earth, relax and trust. It knows how to breathe. It knows how to nourish and connect, and you can come to rest.

As you relax and feel the breath come and go, there will often be a stream of thoughts. The mind produces images and words. It secretes thoughts the way the salivary glands secrete saliva. It just does it, kind of wondrous. When you notice the thoughts becoming predominant, as if to bow to them with your loving awareness, you can say to yourself: I love it when it comes, and I love it when it goes. Just let them come and go like waves of the ocean. Rest quietly just where you are.

Just as the breath breathes itself, you can rest here and now in the reality of the present with life breathing you. And just as the waves of thought will arise—pictures and words—you can notice them with loving awareness. Oh yes, the thinking mind, planning mind. As if with a bow: I love it when it comes, I love it when it goes.

You are the loving awareness, the space of awareness itself, consciousness, the witness of all that arises and passes. Rest in mindful, loving awareness.

Just as the breath breathes itself, this breath rising and passing, just as thoughts—picture thoughts and word thoughts—appear and disappear, and you are the witness, the loving awareness, notice too the feelings and moods that can arise like waves of the ocean. Sadness, excitement, longing, love, fear, anger, contentment, joy. Let each rise and pass as it will, like the breath itself.

You are the loving witness. Loving awareness, just here at ease. Gracious. Silent.

If you like, you can put a half smile on your lips, as Zen Master Thich Nhat Hanh recommends. You sit as the Buddha that you are, the wise being, the compassionate one, resting in loving awareness. Rest in it. Letting all things appear and disappear. I love it when it comes. I love it when it goes.

Quieting, centering. With each breath, an invitation to ease, calm. You are the loving awareness itself—consciousness witnessing the breath and the rise and fall of experience. Silent and open.

As the ease and peace deepen, let yourself sense or feel or imagine that it can spread from you in every direction, like the violin that's placed on the table whose strings resonate with another violin being played in the room.

May the resonance of peacefulness and stillness, steadiness amidst all the waves. May the stillness of your heart, its steadiness just now, spread out in every direction and resonate the strings of the hearts of all beings, near and far, that they might find a deeper quiet, a loving presence, and inner well-being and peace amidst all things.

Being peaceful even for a moment, you naturally offer your blessings for peace and well-being that resonate across the universe.

And now let yourself imagine the sound of a big and beautiful bell being rung to signal the end of the meditation and to send out with its sound the same waves of peace and resonance and beauty across the world.

Let your eyes open when you're ready.

I'm so grateful we get to sit quietly at this time of the great turning. Sit and listen—calm, steady, loving awareness.

CHAPTER 28

Compassion in a Time of War Meditation | Monday Night

> Jack Kornfield offers a tender guided meditation on karuṇā (compassion), one of the four brahmavihāras or divine abodes. The practice begins by cultivating compassion for someone dear, acknowledging their struggles and sufferings, then receiving compassion back from them before turning that same care toward oneself. This reciprocal flow of compassion opens the heart with both tenderness and courage.
>
> The meditation then expands outward to embrace all those caught in the world's conflicts—in Myanmar, Eritrea, Sudan, Ukraine, Libya, and beyond. Kornfield includes a moving poem by John O'Donohue as a prayer for those suffering violence, those working for peace, and even those who profit from war. Practitioners are invited to become beacons of compassion, radiating care across time and space to mothers clutching children in fear, the elderly and sick, youth conscripted into battle, farmers, healers, teachers, and poets.
> This practice speaks to the profound Buddhist understanding that we are interconnected—that even a small offering of compassion, like a pebble in the ocean, touches the whole. The session concludes with a sense of collective practice, as if all participants are holding hands together, opening hearts as prayer and blessing. It offers both a refuge for one's own sorrows and a way to respond to the suffering of the world with presence, strength, and an open heart.

You can relax and let go and feel fully supported just where you are. Steady. Strong. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

With this embodied presence, let's begin with a practice of compassion.

Let yourself think of someone you care about where it's relatively easy, not terribly conflicted—someone where there's a natural sense of love and care. Tenderness. Picture them, remember them, sense them, feel them in any way you can. Let their spirit, the sense of this one that you care about, be seen and felt. Just now, feel your connection and how much you do care for their wellbeing.

While you can wish them well and send them loving kindness, let yourself also be aware of the struggles in their life, as in all human lives. Let yourself sense the sufferings or the struggles, the fears or pain, the difficulties of their life. And because you care about them, notice how immediately there arises a sense of compassion—the heart being touched, moved by their struggles and your care.

Then extend this compassion to them with simple phrases of well-wishing: May you be held in compassion. May your struggles or sorrows be eased. May you be safe and protected. And may your heart be at peace. May your struggles and sorrows be eased. May you be held in great compassion. May you be safe and protected. May your heart be at peace. May your life be at peace.

With these practices of compassion and loving kindness, you can alter the words so that they express your care in any way that works.

Now imagine this dear one, this person who you care about, could gaze back at you. They gaze with the same loving care, and you feel the connection. And they say, just as you have offered compassion and well-wishing, "I want to offer it back to you." They gaze at you and say, "I see your struggles and sorrows. May your struggles and sorrows be eased. May you hold yourself in great compassion. May you be safe and protected. And may your heart be at peace and your life be at peace. May your struggles be eased." They say, "May you be held in compassion."

You take in their care for you and maybe even put your hand on your own heart. Because they so want this for you, they care about you. You receive this and say yes. May I hold myself in compassion. May my struggles be eased. May I be safe and protected. May my heart be at peace. May my life be at peace. May I hold myself in compassion for all the struggles of life.

Feel this. The heart opens with tenderness and care and courage. Strength and compassion.

Now think of another person who you care about. Picture them, this other loved one or person that you care about. Feel the care, the love that's there. Again, let yourself be aware of the measure of struggle or sorrows in their life—what they struggle with as a human being. Feel the tender compassion that arises. And again, extend the compassion in whispered words from the heart: May you be held in compassion. May your struggles be eased.

May you be safe and protected. May your heart be at peace. May your life be at peace.

And sense how you can open your heart, one after another, to extend the field of compassion. You can be like a lamp that shines this compassion now, out from your own consciousness and heart, across time and space. Feel the struggle of others.

And for this evening, let's extend our compassion and spread it to all those who are caught up in the wars of the world—frightened, lost, suffering. To mothers holding their children, clutching them in fear. To those who are old and aged or sick. To the youth. To those in the wars of Myanmar and Eritrea, of Sudan and Ukraine and Libya. To the young men and women being conscripted and drawn in. To the farmers and healers, to the teachers, merchants, and poets all caught up in war.

And this poem from John O'Donohue, extended with your compassion:

As the fever of day calms toward twilight, may all that is strained in us come to ease. We pray for all who suffered violence today—may an unexpected serenity surprise them. And for those who risk their lives each day for peace, may their hearts glimpse providence at the heart of history. That those who make riches from violence and war might hear in their dreams the cries of the lost. That we might see through our fear of each other a new vision to heal our fatal attraction to aggression. That those who enjoy the privilege of peace might not forget their tormented brothers and sisters. We pray that the wolf might lie down with the lamb, that our swords be beaten into plowshares, and no hurt or harm be done anywhere along this great holy mountain.

And let yourself envision those who are struggling in all those places named and beyond, young and old. And from your heart, extend the wishes and prayers of compassion in every direction to them. Held in compassion—all, all, all.

May your sorrows be eased. May you be safe and protected. May your heart find peace. And may your life find peace.

And staying present as a beacon of compassion, breathe gently, and with each breath extend the care, the courage, the tender compassion and strength. For some, it will be like radiating from your heart a sweet and luminous energy of compassion to surround beings everywhere. For some, it will ask and invite you to picture the farmer, the mother with her child, the old ones, the teachers and poets and healers, the youth caught up in war. Sense that they might feel this and know this from you, as if we were connected across time and space. For we are. And even a pebble tossed in the ocean changes the whole ocean.

So let your prayers and compassion touch the heart of all. And feel how it's as if we're all holding hands together tonight—holding hands and extending compassion, opening our hearts as a prayer and a blessing, and a deep connection.

Thank you, dear ones, for practicing together with me and everyone else. I needed that. Maybe we all need that in some way. It feels so important and simple—to stop, to quiet the mind, tend and open the heart, and offer the connection and compassion and love that is so natural to us.

CHAPTER 29

A Peaceful Heart in a Time of War and the Legacy of Thích Nhất Hạnh

In this heartfelt tribute delivered shortly after Thích Nhất Hạnh's passing at age 95, Jack Kornfield weaves together the Zen master's profound teachings on peace with reflections on war and human suffering. Drawing from personal encounters with Thích Nhất Hạnh at Spirit Rock and other gatherings, Kornfield shares intimate stories that illuminate the teacher's remarkable presence—his walking meditation that made 2,000 people gasp in recognition of what true presence looks like, and his gentle response when asked about collective karma: "It didn't happen to the Vietnamese people. It happened to all of us."

Kornfield explores Thích Nhất Hạnh's genius for making profound teachings accessible, from the Ānāpānasati Sutta's breath practices to the complex doctrine of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent origination), which he rendered as "interbeing." The talk addresses how to work with Māra—the forces of doubt, fear, and aggression—through acknowledgment rather than resistance, offering tea to our difficulties while not letting them stay too long. Central to the teaching is the understanding that whatever seeds in consciousness we water will grow.

The practical message is clear: meditation is not about complacency but transformation. We must change our lives to live from gratitude, love, and fearlessness rather than grasping and fear. As Kornfield reminds us, quoting the Dhammapada, "Better to conquer yourself than a thousand men in battle." The talk concludes with an invitation to become the Department of Peace ourselves—to embody the brahmavihāras of loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity in a world burning with suffering.

Tonight, I had planned to talk about Thich Nhat Hanh, the great and wise Zen master and teacher who died just about a month ago at age 95 in his home temple in Vietnam. But it also seems critical to acknowledge the grief of the war in Ukraine. And so in Thich Nhat Hanh's honor, I start with a story.

Back in the 1970s when I was coming and going from Thailand and living there at times for some years as a monk, there was a lot of conflict in the streets of Bangkok between the military dictatorship that had taken over the government and the protesting students. There were barricades in the center of the city, not far from the grand palace and the government buildings. The fighting had escalated so that students had been shot and killed, Molotov cocktails were being thrown, and it was really getting terrible. There seemed to be no way to deescalate it.

And then one morning, probably starting very early in the dark, a meditation master from one of the forest monasteries called together his monks and nuns. They traveled to Bangkok and walked on foot along the way. After dawn broke, they simply stood in their robes silently with their bowls between the two lines—between the soldiers and the government side and the students on the other side. They stood and stood and stood for a good part of the day, just peacefully. Then finally they left.

Somehow their presence of peace was powerful enough, the respect for the robes and for what they carried of the treasures of the Buddha, that everyone took a breath. The negotiations between the students and the government and military leaders began to take a new turn, and after that, an avenue to peace was found.

So here we are again with a war in Europe, in Ukraine. But of course, our media tends to be Euro-North American centric, much of Western media, and very white-centric. In fact, there are wars going on in Burma, all in the ethnic states, and war in Eritrea and Ethiopia, continuing in Libya and South Sudan and Mali and so many places. It gets off our radar, but it's happening—as we acknowledged in our compassion meditation. It's happening to grandmothers holding their grandchildren. It's happening to young people being conscripted or losing their chance to make a life, to farmers and poets and merchants.

So let's take a breath and pause, as we did in our compassion practice, and hold all those places and struggles in our heart.

In some way it seems so foolish, almost astonishing, that people would do this. And yet, and yet we do as human beings. So now our heart cries, we have grief and tears and shared sorrows and care.

I was with Thich Nhat Hanh at a gathering at one of the Zen centers on a particular day of his teachings. One of the students wanted to ask him about karma. They raised their hand and said, "Thay"—which was what he was addressed as, his teacher—"is there such a thing as collective karma? Why did the Vietnam-American war happen to Vietnam?" Where we dropped more bombs on these little countries—Cambodia and Vietnam and Laos, each country like the size of Michigan or Wisconsin—more bombs than the entire of World War II, millions of tons. Why did this happen to the Vietnamese people?

He paused and his eyes got very soft. He looked back and said, "It didn't happen to the Vietnamese people. It happened to all of us."

That is the deeper truth. As it says in the Buddhist teachings and elsewhere in the wisdom teachings of the world, in war there are no victors. Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. In one of the first verses of the Buddha, he says, "Better to conquer yourself than a thousand men in battle." I'm leaving it in the masculine, even though I often will change it to make it more inclusive, but I'm sorry to say it's more accurate.

It's easy to get caught up in the war, if you watch the media, as if it's a video game, in the kind of heroism of it. Here are these Ukrainians armed now with Javelin and Stinger missiles to bring down helicopters and blow up tanks. I could even feel myself get a little excited—yeah, fighting for the underdog there. And then I realized in a moment that there are young men in each of those tanks, or young women but probably young men. There are young people in those helicopters. Nobody is excluded from that suffering.

"Promise me," says Thich Nhat Hanh, "this day, while the sun shines upon some part of the earth, promise me—even as they strike you down with a mountain of hatred and violence and crush you, even as they dismember you—remember, brother or sister, humans, men, women, are not our enemy. The only thing worthy of you is compassion, invincible, limitless, unconditioned. Even as you face this, a smile will bloom like a flower. For when you face the beast of war with your courage intact and your eyes kind and your smile blooming as a flower, those who love you and behold you across ten thousand worlds of birth and dying will bow as well."

He saw this. He lived in it.

Wisdom says don't look at the results, but look at the causes and conditions, because it's not this war, that war, those people doing it. It's us. The three trillion dollars spent every year on military in this world—the US is by far the largest of these, spending more than the next nine countries all put together. We are also the largest exporter of weaponry in the world, way more than anybody else, sending killing machines of all kinds to countries all over the world, and then worrying, why aren't we safe? We have defunded the State Department. We have refused the repeated efforts, starting at the time of the Constitution from one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, Benjamin Rush, who wanted to start a Department of Peace parallel to the Department of War.

And year after year, people have proposed a Department of Peace in Congress, only to have it ignored or voted down. There has to be a better game than war for human beings. Competition, yes, but some other way. We sell all these weapons for our trade balance, to import cheaper goods or luxury goods. Who are we? What is our moral center?

So when we look at war, we have to look at the war in ourselves as well. What to do? What can we do? In a world, as Thich Nhat Hanh says, burning with suffering and hatred, what must we do? And his instruction is very simple: to stop. Probably his best-selling book of all is Being Peace. Out of his hundred books, this carries the voice of being peace—to stop making enemies wherever they are.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian dissident and poet who was in the gulags in Siberia, who suffered tremendously, wrote: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

To stop making enemies. I think of the Ukrainians—I had great-grandparents who came from Kiev and parts of Ukraine. And how many Jews in Ukraine were killed during the Holocaust? Huge numbers. And yet they have a Jewish president now.

As that prayer from John O'Donohue that I read to you: "As the fever of day calms toward twilight, may all that is strained in us come to ease. May those who enjoy the privilege of peace not forget their tormented brothers and sisters." That the wolf might lie down with the lamb, that our swords be beaten into plowshares, and no hurt or harm be done anywhere along this holy mountain.

Stop making enemies. Make prayers, make blessings. This is our moral task. It's really the task of our human hearts. You know it, I know it, we know it together.

I was recently on the campus at Spirit Rock. It's the middle of the two-month silent retreat, and it was just beautiful to see—people walking quietly, people sitting in meditation. The campus is mostly closed to outsiders to keep it safe and protected. And when I was there reflecting about teaching tonight, I remembered the times that we hosted Thich Nhat Hanh.

One of the times he came, there was a gathering—perhaps two thousand people flooded into Spirit Rock. We had built a platform for him to teach, with big loudspeakers and so forth, down near the stream where the current dining hall is. And people sat up on the hillside all the way up to where we now have the upper retreat hall—two thousand of them. Thich Nhat Hanh's monks and nuns sat on the platform, passed out apples, and had people pause and slowly eat and taste and savor the cloud and the sun and everything in that apple. It was beautiful—to sit quietly and get prepared for Thich Nhat Hanh and his teaching.

And then all of a sudden, I felt something happening and I turned around. I'd been looking from that stage up to all two thousand people. And there, a hundred yards back, perhaps a hundred fifty yards back, Thich Nhat Hanh had appeared on the road, walking toward us. He walked so slowly and with such dignity and presence. He talks about walking meditation, letting each foot kiss the earth. And as he did, I could feel all two thousand people go: "Ah... oh... oh my heavens... that's what it's like to really be present, to carry a sense of peace and attention and love."

It says in the Dhammapada that the perfumes of rose bay and sandalwood and jasmine travel only as far as the wind. But the perfume of goodness, of the heart of a being, of their goodness, spreads far and wide, arising even to the heavens. And there was a kind of sweetness and perfume, peacefulness and strength, just in Thich Nhat Hanh's presence and his steps.

Being with him at one teaching he was giving, a number of us who were in the role of Buddhist teachers gathered with him at Green Gulch Zen Center. As he was teaching mindfulness and attention to breath and so forth, he talked, as he often did, about putting a half smile on your face, of breathing in with ease and breathing out with joy. He talked quite a bit about joy. But the strange thing was that as I sat there near him and listened to him, I started to feel sad and grief in my heart, even as he spoke of joy. I was confused.

So later we had lunch together, and I sat near him, and I said, "Thay, I'm confused."

You talked about joy and bringing a smile and happiness into meditation. But as you did, I felt this wave of sorrow and grief. And what I don't know—because we pick up things from each other, you know how that is—what I don't know is, was it mine or was it yours?

His eyes again got very soft. And he said, "I've seen so much suffering. That's why I must teach joy. Why I must do it."

You know, he started that school during the Vietnam-American war, not taking sides—North or South—bringing the youth together for social services to serve everyone. And a number of the young people he gathered were killed. If you can imagine bringing people who love you, people you care about, to do something meaningful—and then they are killed.

Thich Nhat Hanh says, "Life is filled with suffering, but it is also filled with many wonders—like the blue sky, the sunshine, the eyes of a baby. To suffer is not enough. You must also be in touch with the wonders of life. They are within us and all around us, everywhere, anytime."

So suffering, the First Noble Truth of the Buddha, is not the end of the story. There are also the Noble Truths of the causes and the path to the end of suffering. And that path is not a grim duty that one has to do. As Thich Nhat Hanh invited through his poetry and presence, he said it's like the soft spring rain, the breezes that blow, the causes and conditions that make these happen. It is a happiness that is unborn. There is a vastness and a silence. And this is your birthright. This is your true home.

He said, "This is where you will find me. I am vastness and silence and love."

Thich Nhat Hanh had a major stroke about five or six years ago. He was in France at the time and taken to the hospital, where for some months he was given intensive medical care. He could hardly speak anything, could perhaps only move one arm a little bit.

Then he came to San Francisco. He was brought here by some folks who really loved him and were inspired by him. He had a group of monks and nuns with him, and they were staying in the city. Trudy, my beloved wife, and I would go and sit in the mornings there sometimes. In the living room of one of these big houses where Thich Nhat Hanh had been staying, they had set up a kind of meditation hall or zendo. People would sit—those around him, some of the monks and nuns, a few visitors—and then he would be wheeled in.

This was the last day before he was to return to France and eventually return to Vietnam. He was wheeled in and we all sat. When the bell rang at the end of the sitting, out of that very deep silence that was present, Thich Nhat Hanh raised his head and looked around. He couldn't really speak much at that point at all.

He looked at us. Trudy described it this way. She said he was looking with two different eyes. One eye was an eye on eternity—outside of time. After his stroke, here he was, ninety years old, just seeing the vastness and the play of birth and death, joy and sorrow, human incarnation coming and going. An eye on eternity.

And the other eye peered at each one of us, so present, and nodded as he could—because he knew everyone in the room. Oh, you. And you. I'm about to leave for France. Oh, I see you. I am present. I am with you. You are with me.

This is where he lived: in the vastness and in the reality of the present moment, with mindful, loving attention to each moment and each thing, with care.

One aspect of Thich Nhat Hanh, part of his brilliance, was that he was able to take ancient teachings—sometimes very deep teachings—and make them really simple. Some of it seemed to come through his love of children, as you could see in that photo we had at the beginning of the meditation. There he was, holding hands with the children, doing a walking meditation.

He explained that sitting in meditation is like having a glass of that kind of unfiltered apple juice that's sort of cloudy. If you place the glass of unfiltered apple juice on the table and just wait quietly, gradually the particles will settle. Pretty soon it will become transparent and clear, and you can see through it. So he said to the children, "Let yourself settle like the glass of apple juice."

Or another time he said, "Let yourself become a pebble that's thrown into the river, slowly sinking to the bottom, resting there, even as it's caressed by the water that goes by."

He invited the children, and the child of spirit in each one of us, into the reality of the present, into the moment of eternity, which is now.

When you sit and meditate, when I sit, practicing compassion, mindful loving awareness—one thing we can do is to step back in a moment to acknowledge what's happening. Here are the thoughts, here are the emotions. We can even name them. Sadness. Excitement. Planning. All the things the mind is doing, all the emotions of the heart. And when we name them gently, we can become that vast perspective that's not caught and not identified, that just says, "Oh yes, this is worry, this is love, this is longing, this is analyzing and planning, or anxiety, or creativity, this is grief."

We acknowledge it and we become the space—the heart space of loving awareness, of mindful loving awareness itself. For this is who we really are. And in a moment, we can remember this and be free.

Sounds easy, doesn't it? It is actually, in a moment, and it's fantastic. But then—ah yes, there's the rub—we start to see how the mind is untrained. And even though we can step out and step back and disidentify and not be so caught, the freight train of thoughts and plans and memories and emotions starts up again, or continues, gets full, fills our consciousness.

So the second thing is that we can train the mind. And here Thich Nhat Hanh invites us to use the breath, that most central teaching of Buddhist mindfulness. He adds his own flavor, which comes from the Anapanasati Sutta, the text on training the mind and heart with the breath, where he uses the phrase: "Breathing in, I calm the mind. Breathing out, I sit with ease." Or different versions of that—calm and ease—inviting beneath all the busyness of the mind the attention to settle, the body and mind to come together, the steadiness of concentration to grow so that the disturbances on the surface of the ocean are distant from the deep stillness that can come underneath them all.

This training of the mind to settle and focus and quiet and concentrate is another dimension of our meditation and a tremendous gift, because it allows us to be really present for each thing. Making art or writing a poem or writing code or driving or playing golf or making love or doing business or looking in the eyes of those around us or taking a walk with each step, quite present. Vast perspective. Training of the mind. Settling. Focusing.

And the other dimension is to understand that mindful loving awareness is not about complacency. Once you quiet the mind and open the heart, there's one other pesky little thing that you have to attend to, dear ones, and that's called your life. You have to change your life. You have to change the rhythm of your life and the inner dimensions of it so that you notice when there's lack of forgiveness or grasping or fear, anxiety, confusion. Instead of living from fear or grasping or frustration or anger, you more and more turn to live from gratitude, from love, from fearlessness.

You become the bodhisattva embodied. You take those bodhisattva vows—may I be of service to all, may I help alleviate the suffering of beings—and you embody them in your life.

"Despair is an insult to the imagination," says Wade Davis, the wonderful anthropologist and writer. Despair is an insult to the imagination. Because what's possible for you and me and human beings is freedom, gratitude, love, fearlessness. We can learn it, we can embody it, and we can teach it to others.

And Thich Nhat Hanh, unlike the traditional role of many monks and nuns, chose to speak out against war, to travel, to become a peace activist in ways that the Buddha did at times in his own life. He pleaded with all he could see, starting in Vietnam, and of course in his famous relationship with Dr. Martin Luther King, for us to stop the war—to stop the war inwardly and outwardly.

One of the precepts that those who followed Thich Nhat Hanh and his order would take: "Aware of the great suffering caused by war and conflict, we are determined to cultivate nonviolence, understanding, and compassion in our lives, to promote peace education, mindful meditation, mediation and reconciliation within families, communities, nations, and the world."

How could it be that we defund the State Department? How could it be that we don't create a Department of Peace?

But what Thich Nhat Hanh also said was this—as the Buddha put it in his phrase, "To conquer oneself is greater than conquering a thousand in battle." You must always start with yourself.

I remember teaching with Thich Nhat Hanh at a big conference at UCLA. There were probably two thousand people and we were alternating teaching in the morning and the afternoon. It was on Buddhist and Western psychology in part. It was a weekend, a decade or fifteen years ago, when the US was about to bomb somewhere in the Middle East. I don't remember exactly, because we are a warlike nation, I'm sorry to say, and we've done a lot of harm in the world.

And so many of us had been part of demonstrations, going out as I will myself again, standing up with the people of Ukraine, wearing black armbands. There was a whole group of us in that hall who had been out in demonstrations, and we were about to do a walking meditation—two thousand people slowly and mindfully walking in a circuit around the UCLA campus.

So I said to Thich Nhat Hanh, "Thay, why don't we give out black armbands to everyone so that we can also stand against the bombing?" I knew he cared about this so much. And he paused and he said, "No." He said, "When we walk, we just walk. When we walk, we're not demonstrating for or against anything. We become the peace that the world needs."

This was part of his message—to not make enemies anywhere. In meditation, he described sitting and taking tea with Mara. You all remember who Mara was: the Indian god, or whatever form of being, that came when the Buddha was seated under the tree of enlightenment. First came all the temptations, and the Buddha was unmoved. Then came the armies of Mara with all their aggression—all these things that you meet, by the way, if you happen to come on retreat at Spirit Rock. Mara is waiting for you as you sit. And then Mara came in the form of doubt, until the Buddha finally touched the earth with his hand and called on Mother Earth herself to bear witness to his pure heart, to his ability to awaken. He raised his hand and touched every spear and flaming arrow with the heart of compassion, and they turned to flower petals at his feet.

But it turns out in the Buddhist texts that Mara comes back forty more times during the Buddha's life. And each time, the Buddha recognizes him: "Oh, is that you, Mara?" And Mara then goes away, generally speaking. Once in a while there's a little negotiation. Near the end, in the last year of his life, Mara says, "You've lived a long time. You've succeeded in everything you wanted. You have a sangha and community—laypeople, monks, nuns. Isn't it time to hang it up?" And the Buddha said, "Yes, within this year it will be the end of my life." So they had a little dialogue, but mostly: "I see you, Mara." And Mara goes away.

Thich Nhat Hanh took this and told a beautiful little story, as he did. The Buddha is sitting quietly with his attendant Ananda nearby, and then someone lurking nearby approaches—it's Mara. Ananda tries to get rid of him. But the Buddha says, "Wait, is that my old friend Mara who's come? Would you set up some tea for him, Ananda?" And they sit together and talk about their lives. The Buddha says, "It must be very hard for you to be Mara all the time." Mara says, "Yes, it's a really terrible job." And the Buddha says, "Well, it's not that easy being Buddha either. Let me tell you what they do with my teachings." And so they talk in that way, and then Mara goes on his way.

But Thich Nhat Hanh said, when Mara comes, you might serve tea a little bit, but don't let him stay very long. Mara of aggression or greed, Mara of uncertainty or self-doubt—all these forms of Mara. You can take tea; you can even say to your anxiety and your fear and your self-doubt, you can even bow as you sit quietly in their presence and say, "Thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me," to your anxiety. "Thank you for trying to take care of me. I'm okay just now, just where I am."

And as Thich Nhat Hanh said, the present moment becomes a wonderful moment. When you let yourself see Mara come, acknowledge, and go—who you are is the Buddha, unshaken and unmoving, compassionate and wise for all.

One of the greatest gifts of Thich Nhat Hanh was this profound simplicity of taking the most complex teachings—for example, the teachings of dependent origination with the twelve links, paticcasamuppada—and translating it as interbeing. His famous poem says: in this sheet of paper is the tree from which it came and the logger who cut the tree down, the rain that gave nurturance to that tree, the earthworms in the soil that let its roots drink deep, the wife of the logger who made the sandwich for lunch that day when he cut the tree down, and the people in the mill. In this paper are rain clouds and storms and sunshine and human beings, mechanical equipment—everything is in this paper.

He showed in the simplest way the very deep truth that we need to know. The deep truth that we are interconnected—with the pandemic, with the calls for racial justice and economic justice, with climate change—we are interconnected.

There's a beautiful essay in the new version of Being Peace that was just published, a kind of preface by one of our most beloved and celebrated elders, Jane Goodall. She talks about how she never had the chance to be with Thich Nhat Hanh, but reading and seeing his words touched her so deeply, she said, because while he was there teaching interdependence and not making enemies anywhere in Vietnam and around the world, teaching peace, she said, "There I was in Gombe and I was seeing the interdependence of all life in the same way. Between the trees and the chimpanzees and the other animals that lived on this land, the movement of the sun and the rain—I immersed myself until I became part of that landscape and part of that life in my consciousness in ways that I'd never known before."

And she writes about how important and how critical it is to have this sense of preciousness and wonder and connection at this time, especially with the global climate crisis—that we are not separate.

Remember that poem from David Whyte, where he says, "The great mistake is to act the drama as if you were alone. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and see the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you."

And I love this poem from an Aboriginal elder in Australia. Of course I can't read it with his words and accent, but I'll try to read it to you because it has that same consciousness that Thich Nhat Hanh teaches and that Jane Goodall embodies, and that you can remember because it's true. It's from Bill Neidjie, an Aboriginal stockman, road worker, song man, whose long stream of poetry-essay is titled "Story About Feeling." He chants and sings about belonging:

"Well, I'll tell you about this story, about story where you feel. Listen carefully this, you can hear me. I'm telling you because earth, just like mother and father or brother of you. That tree, same thing. Your body, my body, I suppose. I'm same as you, anyone. Tree working when you sleeping and dream. That star, you working there, see? You working, I can see. Always at night, if you lie down, look careful. He working, see? When you sleep, blood he pumping. So you look, he go pink, he come white. See him work, he work. In the night you dream, you lay down. That star he working for you. Tree, grass, working for you."

And it's so extraordinary because he uses that word "e"—sort of genderless, you know, it's not you or he or something or she, it's "e," it's us.

Thich Nhat Hanh was a great world teacher, and he combined the Mahayana tradition of Vietnam and Zen and some of the most profound Mahayana teachings of the Mind Only School with the Theravada teachings they also had in his center. Some of his teachings weren't that simple. If you look at a book called Transformation at the Base: Fifty Verses on the Nature of Consciousness, it's one of the most profound essays on the nature of mind that a teacher has offered in modern times.

And underneath it, the principle that he proclaims again and again is: whatever seeds in consciousness you water will grow. So this asks for your reflection. Are you watering seeds of forgiveness? Are you watering seeds of generosity? You can, you know. Are you watering seeds of patience? Of compassion? Of wonder? For what you water will grow. Kind of amazing. Our human incarnation, our consciousness is like this. This is part of the depth of what the Buddha saw and offered as a way for us to awaken, to awaken the wise heart, to live with freedom.

Of course, this is not just hagiography about a saint. He was also human. And one of my favorite stories about Thich Nhat Hanh: he was going to give teachings on the Brahmaviharas, the expressions of the awakened heart—loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and peace or equanimity. He started to give a series of talks and people were sitting there in his center, listening to him, because these are famous teachings that all the traditions hold. It's like, "Okay, he's giving these teachings. We've heard him talk about love and so forth."

And then halfway through the first lecture, or maybe at the beginning of the second lecture—because they're set as chapters in the book—he changed from talking about love in the abstract. He said, "She was eighteen years old when I first saw her walk down the steps in the temple in Chu Lai, North Vietnam." And he talks about falling in love with this young nun.

And all of a sudden people were sitting up, paying attention. Oh, he's telling a story, and it's the real deal—because he was human, just as all of us are.

He was so upset by the bombing that the United States had started, so angry, that he wouldn't even travel to the US for a while. The trauma he carried from being under those bombs in Vietnam was simply too much. And he could be tough. There were conflicts in his community—conflicts between some of his senior students and him, conflicts between the monastics and the laity, between the Western students and the Vietnamese students. But it didn't matter. He carried the great medicine, the medicine of a free heart. That's who he was.

When he first came to San Francisco Zen Center, there was a kind of—how to say it—if not disdain, then a looking down on Theravada mindfulness practices, viewing them as second class compared to the poetry and rigor of Zen practice, which was considered non-dual. They thought mindfulness was somehow dualistic: "I'm going to become mindful." And Thich Nhat Hanh went in and said, "You don't understand. Zen is mindfulness. That is what Zen is—the capacity to enter so fully into the present moment that you become that which you see, that you recognize we are all of it."

The abbot of Zen Center at that time said Thich Nhat Hanh was like a cloud, a snail, and a piece of heavy machinery. I love this description—a cloud, a snail, and a piece of heavy machinery.

He was a gateway, a door to the infinite, an invitation for us to remember who we really are, to vastness and awakening. He was a Buddha field and a magnet. You could feel it. You can even feel it as you listen to me now and remember, as you hear these words, because he is here.

When he died, there were all the memorials and beautiful things written, and he was shaking his head even after death because he had written beforehand: "People will tell you I died. It is not true. I have never died." He said, "Look at the clouds in the sky. They become rain. They become snow. They enter the land and the rivers and return to the oceans. And then the sunlight on the ocean brings them back up to be clouds in the sky. A cloud can never die. And neither can I. I am you. I am in you." All of his teachings. I am you, and you are me.

Just as Thich Nhat Hanh made himself a beacon of peace, just as he would not take sides yet at the same time, with tremendous courage, stood up for peace everywhere, wherever he could—he spoke, he stood, he walked, he did all the things that would contribute to peace—you can do the same. I will. I'll see you there.

To stand up—and it's not just one place. Yes, I may stand up for those in Ukraine and those in Eritrea and those in Myanmar, as I have in other places, to offer our hearts. But we can also support the creation of a different world: a department of peace, the training of those who mediate, who understand the power of deep listening and nonviolence that Thich Nhat Hanh taught. We can work toward the elimination of oppression and injustice. We can become the Department of Peace. And that is the invitation.

Natthi santi parang sukhang—there is no higher happiness than peace, says the Buddha.

So let's sit quietly for a minute. Just take this in and become it. Breathing calm and ease. The mind quiets. The heart softens. And we become a being of compassion and peace.

Thank you for your good hearts, for your kind attention, for your connection to one another, to Spirit Rock, and to all the other good things you are connected with.

Thank you, and good night.

The heart softens. And we become a being of compassion and peace.

Thank you for your good hearts, for your kind attention, for your connection to one another and to Spirit Rock and all the other good things that you're connected with.

Let's just stay where we are.

Thank you, and good night.

CHAPTER 30

Open, Spacious Awareness Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 27 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield invites practitioners to discover the peaceful heart that remains steady amidst the eight worldly winds (lokavipatti)—praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, fame and disrepute. Drawing from both Buddhist wisdom and Taoist philosophy, he points toward a way of being that is centered and unshakeable, able to perceive universal harmony even when difficulty arises.
> The practice begins with settling into the body and breath, then gradually expands awareness to recognize our interconnection with all breathing beings. Kornfield guides practitioners to identify not with the body, thoughts, or emotions, but with consciousness itself—what he calls "mindful loving awareness." This vast, sky-like awareness becomes the container for all experience, allowing thoughts, feelings, fears, and longings to arise and pass like clouds without disturbing the essential peace beneath.
> The meditation culminates in the cultivation of compassion (karuṇā), connecting to the Buddha's own gaze upon beings caught in confusion and suffering. This practice offers a direct taste of equanimity (upekkhā) combined with tender-hearted care—two of the brahmavihāras that form the foundation of an awakened response to life. Whether new to meditation or deeply experienced, this guidance offers a pathway to rest in one's true nature as loving awareness itself.

Let yourself find a way to sit that's stable and comfortable, where you can sit upright with a sense of alertness, but at the same time, a graciousness and ease, like the king or queen on the throne. You take your seat here halfway between heaven and earth in this human form and invite a sense of stillness and openness.

Tonight our meditation practice will have the qualities of equanimity and compassion. To begin, I invite you to reflect on the value of a peaceful heart. What is it like to have a peaceful heart among the worldly winds of praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, fame and disrepute, birth and death? These are the worldly winds that constantly change. To have a peaceful heart in the midst of them all —steady, spacious, open. This is the invitation.

As it says in the Tao, there's a time for being ahead and a time for being behind. A time for being in motion and a time for being at rest. A time for being vigorous. A time for being exhausted. A time for being in danger. A time for being safe. For she who is centered in the Tao, she can go wherever she wishes without danger. She perceives the universal harmony even among the arising of pain and loss. For she has found the vast space and peace and rests in the Tao.

Let things quiet. Let the body begin to settle. The shoulders relax. The arms and hands rest easily. Let the eyes and face soften, loosen the jaw. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well to receive all that arises with a spirit of compassion.

As you sit quietly, you can notice how the body breathes itself. This organism, this human body, this human incarnation, expanding, contracting, breathing in and out. Notice as you tune into the breath that the air is not just inside you, but all around you coming in and out. There's an ocean, a vast sky. And the breath is breathing in and out in the ocean and the vast sky—the shared breath that is breathed by all living beings.

When you breathe out, it becomes part of the in-breath of the little girl getting put to sleep in your neighborhood, and the raccoons who play with your trash cans, and the deer in the hillsides. Breathing together.

With each breath, allow the sense of vastness and openness to grow. Make your mind like the sky, without boundaries, vast, open. You become the space of loving awareness, of mindful loving awareness that feels how the body breathes itself, inter-breathes with all life.

You are the space of awareness through which float thoughts and images and words like clouds. Just as the breath comes and goes, rises and passes, so too the clouds of thoughts appear—words and images—and then vanish. You are the vast stillness. Mindful loving awareness like the sky.

Love and longing may appear and disappear. Fears and worries can arise for a time, feelings and thoughts, and then they vanish. You are the vastness, the vast space of mindful loving awareness. This is the peaceful heart—the vast open heart, open mind.

You are not this body. You are not the thoughts or feelings and emotions that arise. You are consciousness itself. You are the loving awareness. The consciousness that was born into this body—timeless consciousness, vast and open, taking many forms, yet not limited by them in any way.

Rest in loving awareness. Rest open.

Allowing for all things, yet not limited by them.

You are the Buddha resting in vastness, seeing the arising and passing of all things with a great heart of compassion—peaceful in the midst of it all.

Let your mind be open like the sky: peaceful, compassionate, and tender, allowing for all things to rise and pass. You are the wise and compassionate witness to it all.

From a place of vast peace, the Buddha surveyed the threefold world with the eyes of compassion and saw beings who are lost and confused in fear and greed and hate and anger, causing suffering for themselves and others. And he let the vast space of awareness be filled with compassion to hold them, to teach as many as he could, to remind them of who they really are—their innate nobility and freedom—and to send compassion and love and blessings in every direction, as you can do now.

May we rest in vast compassion and wisdom amidst it all.

CHAPTER 31

Peace is Possible | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 45 min

> In this deeply moving talk, Jack Kornfield addresses the challenge of maintaining a peaceful heart while witnessing the suffering of war, pandemic, climate change, and injustice across the globe. Rather than turning away from these realities, he invites practitioners to hold them with vast compassion while remembering their true nature as loving awareness itself.
> Drawing from his experiences as a monk in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam War era, Kornfield shares powerful stories: Ajahn Chah's monastery as an "island of peace" amidst conflict, a temple in Vietnam featuring Buddha and Jesus with arms around each other's shoulders, and Lao soldiers on opposite sides of a civil war taking turns bathing in the same stream. He references Solzhenitsyn's profound insight that the line between good and evil runs through every human heart, and the Buddha's teaching that in war there are no victors.
> Kornfield explores the three vipalāsa (illusions) that entangle us—the illusions of permanence, ownership, and sustainable pleasure—and how meditation practice helps us see through these distortions. Citing Thich Nhất Hạnh's teaching that one calm person can show the way for everyone to survive, he emphasizes that inner and outer work must go together. The talk concludes with a call to plant seeds of peace through truth and reconciliation, conflict resolution, and social-emotional learning, reminding us that we carry the medicine the world needs and that we are "the ones we've been waiting for."

I was reflecting on what to speak about tonight, and I wanted to talk about vastness and space. But even as I started to make notes for myself, the war kept creeping in. It just didn't want to be ignored.

And here we are. We could start with Charles Dickens' extraordinary sentence: "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times." In many of our cases, we have considerable well-being in our lives, and at the same time there are these wars going on for thousands and millions of people. We can watch the Oscars—I'm glad that CODA won; it's an amazing movie—but then we change the screen and we see the children of Mariupol or Kharkiv, and the incredible suffering. Heartbreaking.

So I want to reflect together tonight, because it's not just the heartbreak of the war in Ukraine. "Long have you suffered," said the Buddha, "from conflict and war." It's the pandemic. It's climate change. It's the wars in so many places—as we know, in Ethiopia and Tigray, in Libya, still in Syria, in Myanmar. We could go on down the list. And then there are the cries for justice: economic justice, racial justice, continuing racism in the world, continuing economic insecurity for so many.

And now we have Russia again as our big enemy. There we go. For a while it was the immigrants, or the Mexicans, or the Central Americans, or the gays, or it's the anti-vaxxers, or it's the vaxxers, or it's the radical liberals, or it's the white supremacist conservatives. Now Russia's our enemy. Enemy du jour, I think we should say. And the military industrial complex is very happy about this. It's been tough not having a really good enemy to fight.

We're a country that—when I looked it up before this talk—if you talk about regime change, depending on the list, we have meddled in twenty, thirty, forty, eighty different countries. From Iran and Chile, from assassinating Patrice Lumumba, from the Philippines, from countries across Central America, from Iraq—we have toppled the leadership in country after country. We, the peaceful American people. This is part of what Eisenhower called the military industrial complex, where we voted to defund the State Department, not to create a Department of Peace, and upped our military budget to trillions of dollars over the years—and then worry why we don't feel safe.

So how do we practice in these times? Because this is where we are as human beings. How do we navigate? The media, of course, tries to hype things up and exacerbate fear and anxiety and polarization. And the results are anger and depression.

If you read the Buddhist texts, one of the interesting things is that Mara—who, as most of you know, is the god who personifies greed, hatred, and delusion, who came to attack the Buddha as he sat peacefully under the Bodhi tree the night of his enlightenment—returns after the Buddha's enlightenment forty different times in the texts to try to hook the Buddha or bother him or challenge him. Almost always the Buddha says, "Oh, is that you, Mara? Are you back again?"

Here's what we don't want to hear. I could weep when I say it. There is no easy fix to this.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn—who was two generations before Navalny, who is now in a Siberian camp—was one of the greatest Russian writers, himself thrown into a camp in Siberia. He said, "If only it were all so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who among us is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

It's not just the enemy out there, the enemy du jour, whoever it happens to be. It's also that within our own hearts.

My friend Roger Walsh, who is a spiritual seeker, MD, PhD, psychiatrist, and various other things—in his multiple studies, he read the entire Encyclopedia of World Religions, trying to understand them, from Ahura Mazda at the beginning to Zoroaster at the end. I asked him, "Roger, what did you learn from that?"

He said, "I saw that in these hundreds of religions, with hundreds of billions of followers over the years, they all had creation stories. They all had stories of good and evil and how we should behave. They all had stories of the place of human beings and the environment and the cosmos—all kinds of beautiful, wonderful stories. And by the end, it was very clear that there were all these stories placed upon the mystery. There wasn't the right story. We're actually living in this extraordinary, vast mystery of consciousness and human life. And we explain it to ourselves because we're storytelling creatures."

But as the great mythologist Joseph Campbell said—and I had the fortune of teaching with him at Esalen back in the day—if you want a myth, you should make it really big, or maybe none at all, because that's how big the mystery is.

But here we are. This is also called samsara, the cycle of suffering that follows grasping and greed, fear and anger, hatred and ignorance and confusion. These become the seeds that keep it going, and we can see it in the world. As the Buddha says, in war there are no victors. Because it happens to everyone.

What then? How do we practice?

I remember when I was living in the forest monastery at Ajahn Chah's, in a province that borders Cambodia and Laos, toward the Vietnamese end of southern Thailand and Southeast Asia. There was a big U.S. air base right nearby, so we would often see bombers and fighter jets fly over on the way to Vietnam or Cambodia.

One day we had a visit from some folks I knew about. They were a group—I think they were Quakers or international peacekeepers—who had gone to volunteer and live in Vietnam during the war, trying to make peace between people. They were really brave and beautiful. They said, "We can't stand by. We have to do something. We are going to go there."

They came into the monastery burned out. They'd been in the middle of so much conflict, and it was really hard. They were looking for a little respite, but they also complained to Ajahn Chah. They said, "There's a war going on and you all are just sitting on your behinds meditating. What about taking care of the world? What about compassion and action?"

But they stayed for a while—ten or twelve days. Ajahn Chah didn't even answer them at first. He said, "You stay here for a bit. We'll talk about it." That was his beautiful answer, really.

What they could see was this: if you live in a war zone, everything is in danger. The temples were being destroyed. Things were being stolen. People turn against one another. There's so much fear and violence. And this monastery was an island of peace and sanity. There might be some fighter jets flying overhead on occasion, but you could lose your gold ring and someone would find it, save it, put it on the altar so that you might get it back. You could find yourself lost at night and people would go and help you. It was a place of peace and love.

As Ajahn Chah said to them later, it was a living library of what was possible. "Wars come and go," he said. "And around here, we've seen a lot of wars. We need to show that there is another way."

He continued: "We human beings are constantly in combat, at war to escape the fact of being so limited—limited by so many circumstances we cannot control, things that we wish were different. But instead of escaping, we continue to create suffering, waging war with evil, waging war with what is too small or too big or too soon or too late, waging war with what's too short or too long or right or wrong, courageously carrying on the battle."

"It's time," he said, "to stop the war."

And we know where the war starts. It starts in the human heart. To make your own heart a zone of peace.

I remember when I went to a temple in Vietnam during the middle of fighting in the Mekong Delta—I don't remember which year it was, maybe 1969 or 1970—visiting the temple of the peacemaking monk known as the Coconut Monk. On this little island, it was peaceful, and you could see the helicopters and firefights on the horizon. All the signage and all the teachings proclaimed this a place of peace. At the far end of the island, on a hill, there were two very tall statues, maybe forty feet tall.

I was used to seeing long reclining Buddhas and great standing Buddhas in these countries. But these were two statues—one of Buddha and one of Jesus—and they had their arms around each other's shoulders, as if to say: yes, there's a war happening, but there's another way.

You know how often I quote Thich Nhat Hanh: when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person remained centered and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive.

So make your heart a zone of peace. Set your compass to your highest or deepest intentions, because this is what's given to you as a human being.

"Others will be cruel," said the Buddha. "We shall be kind. Others will kill living beings. We shall protect living beings—thus we will incline the heart. Others will steal. We shall be generous—thus we will incline the heart. Others will engage in harmful sexuality. We will respect sexuality—thus we will incline the heart. Others will speak falsehoods and malicious gossip. We will speak truth that is of benefit—thus we will incline the heart. Others will be greedy. We will be generous—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will be unmindful. We shall establish ourselves in mindfulness and compassion—thus we shall incline the heart."

This is what's possible. And the thing is, we know this. Part of what's so heartbreaking in seeing the wars in so many places and the violence—I went up to the battlefront in Laos. I was still in the Peace Corps, working on medical teams in the villages, tropical medicine, mostly malaria but also some typhoid and leprosy programs. I had a friend on the other side of the Mekong River who was in the international volunteer force, which was probably run by the CIA since the Peace Corps wouldn't go into Vietnam or Laos during the conflict. He asked if I wanted to go up to the front, and being young and foolish—young men always ask, "Is there anything dangerous to do around here?"—I said sure.

So we commandeered a jeep and drove through the mountains. It was the narrow part of Laos, which means it's only about a hundred miles or so from the Mekong River to the border of Vietnam. We drove on this dirt road through the mountains and little villages and came to a hilltop above a stream where the Royal Lao Army was encamped.

I met the officer, a major running that encampment. We talked some about the war. He had a good little library—books about revolution in different places, how they'd won, who lost. He was pretty sophisticated. We sat down and he poured us tea. I asked how things were going. He said it was pretty quiet, but now that we'd come it was almost afternoon, almost bathing time.

He went out on the bluff and shouted across the stream to the encampment of the Pathet Lao, the Lao Communist Army. "We're going to take our bath first today, all right?" And the guy on the other side called back, "All right, sure." So the men went down, put on their bathing cloths, washed in the stream, and came back. Then they called out, "Okay, it's your turn," and we watched the soldiers from the other side come down to bathe.

The Lao culture is a very peaceful culture—which shows what we can make in this world. That's the beautiful thing, and part of the point of the story. Behind the Pathet Lao communist army on the other side were Vietnamese soldiers who were quite fierce, pushing them forward. And behind us, on my side of the Royal Lao army, across the Mekong River, were the encampments of the US Special Forces pushing the Lao to fight in that direction. These guys knew it was a proxy war. It actually had almost nothing to do with their country, and they didn't want to do it. They knew in themselves that it was not the right thing.

War can sound noble. There are all these heroic myths—the Trojan War and the rest.

Or you read of Genghis Khan or the Mongols, or read Sun Tzu about war, The Art of War, or you read and learn the mythologies of the Incas and the Aztecs on war, or the Ashanti—Tano, who's the god of war in Ashanti culture in West Africa—or you read the Bhagavad Gita, a spiritual text about war. It makes it sound heroic.

But there are other stories.

I was living in a monastery for a while on the Malay Peninsula. During this time when I was a monk—this would have been 1971, '72, something like that—there was still a lot of armed conflict, not only in Laos and Cambodia, but in Thailand and the mountains. There were what they called terrorists. That's the generic term for the ones you don't like, but sometimes they do wreak terror. Sometimes, sometimes not. But anyway, there they were, the communists—they had different names for them.

Ajahn Chah was kind of a peacemaker abbot. He would go and do blessings on all the soldiers on the different sides and give them protective amulets to wear. But still the firefights continued.

One night it came really close to the temple. The temple was in a rubber forest in the Malay Peninsula mountains, and you could see the flashes from the guns at night. It was pretty close. The next morning we got up, did our chanting and meditation and so forth. Then I was out in a little meadow, a clearing really, doing some walking meditation. There was an old monk there, a local monk, who was sitting. I saw helicopters come onto the ridge about a mile or mile and a half away, and you could see them dropping canister bombs—these explosions would happen.

I said to the monk, "Oh, it looks like they're bombing those communists, or whatever they call them, who came down, who they were fighting with last night."

He shook his head. He said, "Oh, there's no communists there. They live in the caves about thirteen kilometers north, that way around in that valley. That's where they are."

I said, "Well, why are they bombing up there then?"

He said, "Well, if they kill them all, who would give them the helicopters and all the equipment and all the money?"

How about that? How about that? It really makes you want to weep.

Like the friend I know who was working as the executive assistant for the head of one of the biggest oil companies during one of these wars. She said the thing that surprised her most was that the company was selling oil—it was the Vietnam War, still back then—selling the oil to the South and to the North. Big surprise.

Oh nobly born, say the Buddhist texts, remember what's possible for you as a human being.

Here's the problem. The brilliant biologist E.O. Wilson at Harvard put it this way: human beings have paleolithic emotions, medieval institutions, and godlike powers. That's where we're stuck. Paleolithic emotions, medieval institutions, and godlike powers.

And yet, oh nobly born, something in us knows there's another way. We know it's possible, as William Butler Yeats, the poet, said: we can make our hearts and minds so like still water that beings gather around us that they may see their own images, and so live for a moment with a clearer, perhaps even a fiercer life, because of our quiet. We can become that place of peace.

So what to do, dear bodhisattvas who you are, dear beings committed to the ending of suffering?

There are the outer responses. I have friends who've already gone to Poland to work on the border and support refugees. Friends who went to work with World Central Kitchen, one of the most beautiful organizations feeding hungry refugees around the world. Friends who are there as translators, friends who are there offering teachings, friends who are there working with Doctors Without Borders.

But of course, it's not just there. It's Myanmar and it's Darfur, which is still happening, and the conflicts in Latin America and Tigray—I don't need to go down the list—and Libya.

So the first response is to tend the wounds and feed the hungry and stand up for peace in whatever way you can, welcome the refugees, engage yourself in the politics of the time in a way that makes a difference.

But there's also an inner response needed.

There are three vipallāsa—the word in Sanskrit or Pali—illusions that we have.

One is the illusion of permanence—that you think things will last. And yet the very last words of the Buddha, some of his very last: all things are impermanent. You may want them to stay the same. You may want the country, the people, the culture, the world to stop and remain as it is, to keep what you have.

A poem from the New Yorker:

What now? There's a magnificent sand castle that's taken years to build, a row of pink seashells for gables, rooms of pebble and driftwood. This is your life. Then comes the affair, the nagging blood work, a freeway pileup. The tide moves in, the water eats your work like a drove of wild birds. There's debris, a tatter of seagrass. I'm here to tell you the tide will never stop coming in. I'm here to tell you whatever you build will be ruined, so make it beautiful.

And that's where we could weep, because the world itself is sacred and beautiful. And yet we cannot hold on to it. This is where we started in our sitting: praise and blame, gain and loss, war and peace, pleasure and pain, birth and death. The illusion of permanence. It is not permanent. All is impermanent like the tide.

Then there's the illusion of ownership—that there's someone, you, who thinks you own your body. Good luck. You can take care of it, please. Take care of your car too, and your garden and your neighborhood. But you don't own it. If you owned it, it would do what you want, right? "Don't get old." It doesn't work that way. The whole sense of self and ownership is a fiction, constructed. We are part of a whole. We are consciousness itself playing in these different forms. And none of it can be owned. It comes and goes.

And then there's the illusion that we can sustain pleasure. This is a great one in this country, especially with Amazon. I love it actually, I have to say. I know it's not really great and I'm politically incorrect, but you go on, you see something, one little click—buy with one click—and the next day it appears. It's like Santa Claus and a magic genie. Of course, there's a lot of destruction involved in all of that too. But this is our culture: keep the pleasure going. Try to avoid loss, pain, sadness, the end of things. Blame death.

So these are the illusions. From the text of the Dhammapada: "Your body is like a fragile jar. Make your home in the untroubled heart or mind. Your body is like foam, a wave, a shadow of a shadow. A bubble, a mirage—this world, a dream. Escape the king of death. Let go of this body and this attachment and these dreams. The wind cannot overturn a mountain, and neither praise nor blame can overturn the heart of one who has let go. Few cross the river. Most are stranded, running up and down on the riverbank. But the wise, who harm no one—they release anger and fear. They live in love and do their work, inner and outer, and make an end to sorrow."

O nobly born, remember that you have the capacity for a peaceful heart.

Amidst it all. The world longs for this. You are loving awareness. You are consciousness itself. You are the witness to all of this. And even now, as you practice, as you meditate, you can invite this sense of vastness, of equanimity, of a peaceful heart.

You step out of the small sense of self, out of the body of fear, out of all the dramas. That doesn't mean they're not there. You worry about people you love, you worry about places you love, you worry about people you don't even know. All that is human and natural. And you can hold all of it in compassion, vast compassion. But don't forget who you really are. You are loving awareness itself. Don't get caught in the dramas of the wars and keep them going.

James McNeill Whistler, the acclaimed painter and artist, attended West Point as a cadet in his early years. As part of the training there, cadets were supposed to sketch military campaigns and strategize their execution. Being a good artist, Whistler was asked to do a drawing of a bridge across a river—the implication being that this would show how the army could cross to the other side and continue its conquest. He drew a scene somewhat bucolic. He made a nice stone arch bridge over the river. And then he drew a little boy with a fishing rod, fishing off the bridge. The commandant of that class saw it and said, "Get that boy off the bridge."

So he redid the drawing. He put the little boy with his fishing pole sitting on the bank of the river and let the bridge be what it was. The commander said, "Get that boy out of the picture." So Whistler redrew the bridge and the river, and where the boy had sat on the riverbank, he put a little headstone, a little tombstone. He then quit.

That's really the moral of the story. Something in him knew it was not the right place for him. And I don't mean that as a put-down of West Point particularly, more than anything else. But there's something in us that knows there's another way. The children who are in danger in Kiev, in Darfur, the Rohingya children—they're all our children.

Steven Pinker, who wrote The Better Angels of Our Nature and Enlightenment Now, the anthropologist, philosopher, and historian at Harvard, claims through his statistics and charts—and they're actually quite impressive—that we're doing better as human beings now than we ever have. There are fewer wars. There's less slavery. There's less terrible treatment of children and women. Oh, there's still slavery. We know this. We know women are mistreated. We know there's still war. But when he charts it, it's declining. There's less of these things. He said we are perhaps evolving, in fits and starts, slowly. We're in a time of great transition—as a globe and as a species. The climate, the pandemic, the injustice and racism—they're all pressing on us to live in a different way.

And if you live with a peaceful heart, the point is not to let your heart get hardened, not to turn your gaze away, but to see another possibility. To see it with a great heart of compassion, and see it fresh, and say: we don't have to do this.

One of the very first neuroscience studies ever done about Buddhist meditation was conducted in the 1960s by two researchers in Japan named Kasamatsu and Hirai. They did an interesting study about habituation. Normally, when something repeats itself in our consciousness, after a while we become habituated to it—we start to ignore it and move on to other things. You all know how that happens. Sometimes it's even the voice of somebody you live with—but I shouldn't say that. It can be all kinds of things that we grow habituated to.

What they wanted to study was whether the training of attention affected that habituation mechanism—because it's a strategic mechanism in our nervous system, designed so that we don't have to keep paying attention to the same thing over and over again. It allows us to be more attuned to things that might be dangerous or might be an opportunity. You can think way back: if you heard a clattering in the tree, looked out, and discovered it was just a limb banging against another branch, you'd realize it wasn't dangerous. Then you'd hear the clattering, but you'd ignore it.

The research that was so interesting was that they brought in some senior meditators and hooked them up to electronic monitoring. And the meditators didn't get habituated. Each time a certain stimulus came, other people—those they had simply sit and be quiet—after a while, they'd hear a piece of music or a sound or a voice. When they heard the same thing over and over again, they started to ignore it. You could see in the brain signal there was just a flattening. But the people who were meditating and had practiced—there was a beginner's mind of freshness each time.

Now is the time for us to look afresh. "It is better to light a candle than curse the gathering darkness," say the prophets—to foster a wiser society. Even though Mara will visit, and Thich Nhat Hanh suggests that we have tea with Mara on occasion, we need to vote for a department of peacemaking. We need to bring social and emotional learning more fully into education everywhere. We need to learn truth and reconciliation as a way of living in our communities, and conflict resolution.

The foolish look at events, says the Buddha, and the wise look at causes. We need to plant the seeds of wellbeing and respect to make a wise society where those who are vulnerable are cared for, where there is genuine justice. It may sound impossible, but I think we're improving. I think Steven Pinker is right.

Henry Moore, one of the greatest sculptors of the twentieth century, said, "The secret of life is to have a task, a vision, something you devote your entire life to. And the most important thing is it must be something you cannot possibly do." He's talking like the Bodhisattva who takes the vow: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to bring liberation to them all"—to end suffering.

We have the possibility, we have the capacity, dear ones, to embody what we care about, to live it and make it come alive in our own hearts, to be that zone of peace. How we respond when conflict arises around us, in our culture, in the world—to plant seeds of goodness. As we do so, we become—I think Alice Walker coined the phrase—"We are the ones we've been waiting for." You are the ones you've been waiting for.

In the marketplace, in the family, in community and business, let there be respect and healing, wisdom. Join with others. We can't do it alone.

Together with my teaching colleague and friend Tara Brach, I have started an online offering called Cloud Sangha, because one of the most frequent questions I've been asked over the years of traveling around the world is, "How do I find a teacher?"—especially if I live in Des Moines or Tampa or Belfast, Ireland. How do I have a teacher? And it turns out one of the blessings that's come from the pandemic, where we've learned to connect online, is that we can make connections with teachers for people around the world. Through Cloud Sangha, you can sign up for small groups lasting several months or a year and become part of a weekly gathering of eight or nine people with a teacher—to talk about your life, your practice, all the things that matter to you in your spiritual life, and to listen to others and learn from one another. The people who are in it love it. I'm telling you about it because it might serve some of you, but I'm also telling you because we need each other.

What I've been giving voice to—"O nobly born"—is true: that peace is possible in the human heart, that there are Nelson Mandelas who can walk out of twenty-seven years in Robben Island prison with such magnanimity and compassion that they change an entire nation and the imagination of the world. This is possible for us as human beings. And not just Nelson, but the people singing from balconies during the pandemic, delivering food—the smallest gestures.

You carry the medicine the world needs. But you need to get quiet. You need to find a way to make your heart a zone of peace. It's why we practice. And from that quiet place, as Yeats said, our stillness allows others to see clearly too. We join hands, we join hearts, we come together.

And I close these teachings by reading yet again what I read a month ago—John O'Donohue's poem, "For Peace":

As the fever of day calms toward twilight,
May all that is strained in us come to ease.
We pray for all who suffered violence today.
May an unexpected serenity surprise them.
For those who risk their lives each day for peace,
May their hearts glimpse providence at the heart of history itself.
That those who make riches from violence and war
Might hear in their dreams the cries of the lost.

That we might see through our fear of each other a new vision to heal our fatal attraction to aggression. That those who enjoy the privilege of peace might not forget their tormented brothers and sisters. That the wolf might lie down with the lamb, that our swords be beaten into plowshares, and no hurt or harm be done anywhere along this holy mountain.

So let your eyes close for a moment. Just sit quietly. And remember what touched you or reminded you tonight of your own goodness, your own great heart of compassion, your own capacities to bring your gifts to this world.

CHAPTER 32

Opening the Heart Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 27 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a practice of opening the heart through mindful loving awareness. The session begins with establishing a stable, comfortable posture and releasing tension throughout the body, emphasizing how the earth fully supports us and inviting the heart to soften with kindness and compassion.
> The meditation unfolds in two phases. First, practitioners develop calm and steadiness by resting attention on the natural breath—noticing sensations in the nostrils, throat, chest, or belly—while allowing other experiences to rise and fall like ocean waves. Kornfield offers the gentle image of training a puppy: returning attention to the breath with patience rather than harshness, simply saying "sit, stay" to the wandering mind.
> As the practice deepens, the meditation opens to include stronger experiences that arise. When a powerful wave of sensation, emotion, or thought captures attention, practitioners are invited to turn toward it with a bow of acknowledgment, naming it gently—"sad, sad, sad" or "excited, excited"—and feeling how it moves through body and mind before naturally passing away. Through this approach, one recognizes oneself as the field of loving awareness itself: vast, still, patient, and compassionate. The practice cultivates both samatha (calm) and the beginnings of vipassanā (insight into impermanence), offering a foundation for resting in open-hearted presence.

Find yourself a way to sit that is stable and comfortable and at ease, and at the same time has some sense of alertness and presence. In this posture and in this place, settle yourself. If you're able and comfortable, let your eyes close gently, or at least lower your gaze. Let's begin with some meditation together.

With your eyes closed gently, take two or three long breaths to begin to release whatever's being carried that can be let go of easily. Let yourself settle here on the earth. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little bit of a circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright. Let the shoulders relax. The arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on the cushion or floor beneath you and how the earth can completely support you. You can let go and feel fully supported just where you are. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice with loving awareness how the body breathes itself. Just now, this breath. You might feel it in the nostrils—the swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, coolness in the nostrils. You might feel the breath as a rise and fall of chest or belly. Feel how the body breathes itself in this ocean of air that we all share together. Relax with each breath. Invite a sense of calm and ease, breathing in and breathing out.

As you feel the breath, let the other experiences of sounds and thoughts and emotions and sensations rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Let your attention, your loving awareness, return again and again just to this moment, breathing in and out with ease, inviting calm, steady.

When you notice the attention moves from the breath, very gently, when you're aware you've gone off, bring it back to the next breath kindly—like training the puppy, our image. Sit, stay. Over and over until the puppy settles down, and the attention too will settle down. Sit, stay. You don't need to hit the puppy or get angry. Very kindly say, sit, this breath, and invite presence.

You're not trying to become a good breather. Let the breath be short or long, whatever it wants to do. The attention to the breath, this mindful loving awareness of this breath and this one and this one, helps you to be here now, to find ease and presence just where you are.

This breath. Ease. Calm. Resting in the present as the body breathes itself.

As you continue to sense the breath with a mindful loving awareness, let the waves of experience—sounds and sensations, thoughts, feelings—rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Periodically, one of the waves will get quite strong and pull your attention away from the breath.

Now, opening up the meditation: when a strong wave arises, let go of the breath as the focus of attention and turn toward it, as if to bow. You can name it. Itching. Tingling. Sadness. Joy. Happiness. Fear. Longing. You can name it thinking or planning, remembering. As you name the wave, let yourself sense it move through the body and mind, naming it gently—sad, sad, sad, or excited, excited. After a while, the wave will diminish, arising and passing, appearing out of emptiness and vanishing. Then return back for a time to the breath, steady and calm, this breath, until another strong wave arises.

In this way, you become the field of loving awareness. You are the awareness—noticing the breath, steadying the attention with it, and acknowledging the waves of experience.

when they're strong, just as you notice the breath coming for a time and going.

Keep it simple. This breath. Calm and steady. Or this experience, acknowledged with a name. Let it rise. Let it be felt. And in its time, pass away.

You are the loving awareness. The mindful loving awareness itself. Rest in it. Relax into it. Patient. Steady. With a kind and compassionate heart.

You are the mindful loving awareness, receiving it all with quiet, steady attention.

You are the mindful loving awareness, the space of kind and loving awareness that notices the movement of breath and the waves of experience. And around them all, you become still, quiet, vast. So let them come and go as they will.

And when you're ready, let your eyes open gently. Take another long, deep breath or two. And stay with the same field of loving awareness—with eyes open and heart open—this moment.

CHAPTER 33

Tending the Garden of the World, Tending the Garden of the Heart

Jack Kornfield · 55 min

> In this richly layered talk, Jack Kornfield draws from early Buddhist texts and contemplative traditions to explore the practice of tending both our inner landscape and the world around us. Beginning with the Buddha's encounter with a Brahmin farmer, where the Buddha describes his own plowing—with mindfulness as his plow blade, compassion as his guide pole, and wise effort as his oxen—Kornfield illuminates how spiritual practice mirrors the patient work of cultivation.
> Kornfield addresses the challenges of our current times—climate change, warfare, social injustice—while offering an antidote to despair through the teaching of yoniso manasikāra (wise attention). He emphasizes Thich Nhat Hanh's instruction that consciousness contains seeds of both suffering and liberation, and that our task is to water the wholesome seeds. Through stories ranging from a dying monastery transformed by sacred respect, to Wangari Maathai's 51 million trees planted in Kenya, to a math teacher's simple act of kindness, he demonstrates how small actions create profound change.
> The talk weaves together themes of Buddha nature, the Bhagavad Gītā's teaching on non-attachment to results, and the recognition that we are both the gardener and the garden. Kornfield invites listeners to reflect on what seeds they are planting through their words and deeds, and to discover the three things the earth is calling them to do. The teaching culminates in a reading of Roger Keyes' poem channeling Hokusai, celebrating how life lives through us when we pay attention and let ourselves care.

And tonight I'd like to talk about tending the garden of the world and the garden of the heart.

Ram Dass once told me that I tell too many stories, and tonight I'm afraid I'm going to prove him right.

The Buddhist texts begin: "Oh nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember your birthright as a Buddha, as one who can be awakened. Remember your own Buddha nature."

Let me begin with a story.

Some years ago, not so far in the past, there was a beautiful old monastery that served as the mother or father house for a large monastic order in the Catholic Church. But it had gradually changed, losing its monks and members as interest in monasteries in the West declined. After a time, even though it had stood there for a century or two, only five old monks remained. They were sad because they could see that their order was dying out, and they didn't quite know what to do.

Now, it happened that there was a forest nearby connected to this monastery. On the other side of the forest stood a small hut where the local rabbi, an old rabbi who was also a mystic, would go for his own meditation. In some way he enjoyed, as they did, the sense that there was communion across the woods and the forest.

Feeling discouraged, one of the monks went to visit the rabbi on behalf of those five old men who remained. They sat together and talked about the decline of the monastery. The rabbi said very sympathetically, "Yes, the same thing for me. Not so many people come to the temple anymore. They seem to want something different. It's hard to know how to serve and connect them with the divine."

The monk said, "Well, Rabbi, do you have any advice for us? Can you help us?"

The rabbi closed his eyes, meditated for a time, then opened them kindly and said, "I really haven't any advice for you. But I have a vision that comes to me now—a strange vision that somehow among you is the Messiah."

The visiting monk paid his respects, departed with deep affection, and returned to the monastery. The other old monks gathered around and asked, "Did you talk to the mystic? Did you talk to the rabbi?"

"I did."

"Well, what did he say?"

"He said he had no advice for us really, except he had this strange vision that somehow the Messiah was among us."

They all pondered what this could mean. In the weeks that followed, they began to think: Could this be true? Suppose he meant the abbot. Everyone knew the father abbot was a leader for a generation, a holy man. On the other hand, maybe he meant Brother Thomas. Certainly Thomas is a holy man, a man of light. Maybe he is the Messiah.

Certainly he couldn't have meant Brother Elrod. Elrod gets crotchety at times. But come to think of it, even though he's a thorn in people's side, when you look back on it, Elrod is almost always right—often very right. Maybe the rabbi meant Brother Elrod.

Philip? Surely not. He's too passive, a nobody. But then, almost mysteriously in his quiet way, some gift of him being there just when you need him magically appears.

Of course, the rabbi couldn't have meant me, thought each monk. He couldn't possibly have meant—you don't suppose he did suppose I... Oh no, not me. I couldn't be that much for God, could I?

As they all contemplated in this manner, the old monks began to treat each other with extraordinary respect, on the off chance that one of them might be the Messiah. And on the off, off chance that each monk himself might be the Messiah, they began to treat themselves with extraordinary respect.

Because the monastery was situated in a beautiful forest grove, people used to come and picnic and wander there before they saw it as a decaying place. But now, as they came, without even consciously being aware of it, they began to sense the aura of extreme respect that pervaded the atmosphere as each of the monks treated one another in this sacred fashion. There was something strangely attractive, compelling about it, and hardly knowing why, they came back to play, to listen, to be there in that beautiful forest, and to bring their friends.

And so it happened that some of the younger men especially became inspired, and one asked if he could join them, and then another and another. Pretty soon it became a thriving order again—from the gift of the rabbi.

What a way to treat each other: as if that next person beside you might be the Messiah. Or maybe even, as Miss Piggy would say, moi.

Now, it's not easy, the time we're in.

The climate change that brings so much worry and concern for the planet in all sorts of ways. The warfare, not just in Ukraine, but in Myanmar and Libya and so many places. The scourge of racism that continues around the world, calling for social and economic justice. What to do? Perhaps the story of the monks and the rabbi can help us.

You know The Little Prince by Antoine de Saint-Exupéry. His instructions were: First thing in the morning, you look after yourself. You brush your teeth and wash your face, don't you? Well, the second thing you must do is look after your planet.

So here are the Buddhist instructions of how to practice, from one of the very earliest texts. Early one morning on his alms rounds, the Buddha approached the area where a wealthy Brahmin landowner was distributing food to his workers. The Brahmin saw the Buddha coming with his alms bowl and said, "Oh renunciate, oh monk, I plow and sow, I work, and having plowed and sown, then I eat. You too should do likewise. You should plow and sow, and having done so, then you might eat." A little bit of a challenge here.

And the Buddha replied, "Oh Brahman, I do plow and sow, and having plowed and sown, I eat."

The Brahman said, "You claim to be a plowman, but I see no plow. Tell me what kind of plowing it is you do."

And the Buddha stood quietly and said, from a place of deep steadiness and connection to the earth: "Trust is the seed and composure the rain. Clarity is my plow and yoke, compassion is my guide pole, and my mind is the harness. Mindfulness is my plow blade and goad, well-directed in action and speech. I use truth to weed and cultivate release. Wise effort is my oxen drawing the plow steadily toward freedom without regret. This is how I plow, and it bears the fruit of deathlessness. Whoever plows in this way will become free in the midst of all things."

And then the plowman said, "Let me offer you something," and poured into the Buddha's bowl some liquid food for the Blessed One to eat. But when the food entered the bowl—this liquid milk rice or whatever it was—it hissed and a great steam came up, as the story is told, for the bowl couldn't hold it. And the Brahmin looked and said, "I see you are a plowman indeed."

Of course, for any of you who happen to know about plowing, one of the things that happens to a plow blade when you go down the furrow in a field is that it becomes hot—in fact, almost red hot from cutting open the earth. And so this was the beautiful symbol of the Buddha's bowl being like the plow blade, hot in his hands, receiving that gift from the Brahman.

So here we are at this time on earth. What kind of seeds are we planting and tending? There are unhealthy seeds of greed, ignorance, fear, hatred, and delusion. When we plant these seeds or allow them to grow, they bring enormous suffering. We're putting trillions of dollars of our economy into killing machines. As Dwight Eisenhower said, the military industrial complex is stealing the education of our children and the wealth of our nation—the vision of what's possible for this earth. These are one kind of seed, creating new enemies and fear.

But there are other seeds. Seeds of generosity, of clarity, of gratitude, of compassion and mutual respect. As Thich Nhat Hanh says, consciousness has all these seeds embedded in it. Which ones will you water? For those are the ones that will grow.

Take a moment to reflect. The seeds of social and emotional learning for children in kindergarten or preschool, when they start to hit each other with blocks—you pause and say, "Use your words." I only wish our political leaders could do that, whether it's Putin, Zelensky, whoever it happens to be, the generals in Myanmar. Use your words. Can we educate our children to plant beautiful seeds of respect and care for one another?

Reflect in yourself. What are the seeds you plant with your words, with your deeds? What are the seeds that you water day by day, moment by moment? This is called yoniso manasikāra—wise attention to notice which seeds we plant and which ones we water.

Now, for many people, it's a time that feels overwhelming, and we can fall into despair, into grief. The opioid crisis, the divisive politics—we can drop into anxiety or worry or apathy, where we feel like the problems are too big and we're too small. I love the statement by the great anthropologist and explorer Wade Davis, who says, "Despair is an insult to the imagination."

Think of this: despair is an insult to the imagination. To despair, to be apathetic, to give up because it's too big, you're too small, too much, too hard—it says the imagination is not as grand and magnificent and big as it truly is. And yet we are survivors for generations, for so long. We have an enormous imagination to make things different.

Here's a story for you. "Tell me the weight of a snowflake," a snow finch asked a wild dove. "Nothing more than nothing," was the answer. "In that case, I must tell you a marvelous story," the snow finch said. "I sat on a branch of a fir tree close to its trunk. When it began to snow—not heavily, not in a giant blizzard, no, just like in a dream, without any violence—since I didn't have anything better to do, I counted the snowflakes as they settled on the twigs and the needles of my branch. Their number was exactly 3,741,952. When the next snowflake, 953, dropped onto the branch—nothing more than nothing, as you say—the branch broke off." Having said that, the snow finch flew away. And the dove, since the time of Noah an authority on the great changes in this world, thought about the story for a while and finally said to herself, "Perhaps there is only one person's voice lacking for peace to come about in this world."

Take a moment to quiet yourself. Let your heart soften. Despair is an insult to the imagination. Every snowflake, every seed watered becomes something to change the world.

If you want to practice, take a walk and look at the buds on the trees in the springtime. Or look closely at the grass and the weeds that push themselves up through the cracks in the sidewalk. Each bud is an answer to despair or apathy. Each springing up of life is an answer. Quiet yourself. Each great windstorm, so beyond anything we can control, is an answer—this earth moving its wind, the tides coming in and going out. These answer the small sense of self. You start to sense that you're a part of something so much bigger. And when you get quiet, as the sages say, even the leaves on the trees become like pages in the holy books.

Take time in your life to go out and seek out and study one bud. One bud. One plant pushing itself up out of the earth, one flower, one blade of grass, one seedling. They speak to you, you know. They tell you about something magnificent and huge that you are a part of, as the wind does, as the tides do.

Now, I don't want to be a Pollyanna about this. We all suffer, some more than others, and the suffering is going to continue—refugees, drought from the climate, certainly pandemics, all of these kinds of things. But your ancestors and mine have lived through pandemics and epidemics. They've lived through storms and earthquakes and tidal waves. They've lived through all the vast changes of the landscape, and they survived. In your blood is this capacity of creativity. In your blood and in your cells and in your beings are your ancestors saying, "Yes, we can do this."

For climate change, I have before talked to you about the remarkable book Drawdown by Paul Hawken, which describes the hundred things we can do to reverse climate change, and then the new volume, Regeneration: Ending the Climate Crisis in One Generation. Don't think this is not possible. This is not an insult to the imagination or a failure of imagination, but rather an invitation to see that here and now there are choices to make. There's the re-kelping of the ocean—projects that do amazing things across square miles to start kelp forests, to draw carbon out of the atmosphere, to regrow the health of the ocean. There's compelling and wonderful new research on fusion reactors, the laser kind that are smaller than the big tokamak in France, that look like in the next year or two we'll be producing positive amounts of energy that can be replicated by the thousands.

The story is not yet read, and we get to be a part of it with the seeds we plant, with the courage that we bring.

Rachel Carson puts it this way: "If I had influence with the good fairy who's supposed to preside over the birth of all children, I should ask that her gift to each child would be a sense of wonder so indestructible that it would last throughout the lifetime." The sense of wonder.

There's a beautiful story that Lynn Twist tells. She went to Africa as part of a community that was working to end hunger. She traveled to Senegal in West Africa, along the edge of the Sahel, which is contiguous to the great Sahara Desert. She went because there was a calling out from a whole group of villages—dozens of them along the edge of the Sahel—which were losing their water and therefore losing their ability to grow their gardens, to tend their animals, to live at the edge of the desert. They were asking for whatever help could be brought.

So she and her team went. She tells this beautiful story of traveling over with their Jeeps and going out. It wasn't like the great white saviors arriving. They went just to listen. They said, "We are your allies, your friends. Let us listen with you." And they sat in a circle and heard about all the struggles—how it was going to be hard for everyone to survive, how the children, the young men and women, were already moving into the city, and how their culture and villages would be lost. But the way it was set up, the men spoke while the women sat outside the circle silently. That was the culture.

Then Lynn and her friend said, "We would like to meet with the women as well. We've listened to you and we feel tremendous sympathy and hear that you've tried to do everything you can, but you don't know what to do." The men were a little bit disturbed by this—you know how men are in this world—but because these people had come so far and offered their friendship, they said, "All right."

And so there was a council of the women. After Lynn and the group listened to the women, they heard a different story. They heard about dreams that told them there was an aquifer, a lake of water under the desert nearby. If only they would dig for it, they would find the water they needed to save all of their villages. The men hadn't believed them and hadn't listened, but the women begged Lynn and those who had come for an opportunity to see.

Together they went back and talked to the chief and the men in the village, because women were not supposed to do manual labor like digging. But they insisted: "May we try it?" And so the women went out to the place where they thought the water would be found according to their visions and dreams. The men brought drums and made music for the women as the women dug—deeper and deeper, day after day, for a number of days.

And then, as you know how these stories end, the sand became damp at the bottom. They dug deeper and deeper, like you do at the seashore when you're a child digging to find water at the bottom of your hole. Pretty soon the moisture came, and the water came, and the drums played on, and the women continued to sing.

Now there is a piping system that brings that water to sixteen or eighteen villages. The gardens are flourishing, the animals are growing. All because the women had a vision and imagination that said, "Yes, there's something greater than what we know. Let us look for it, let us seek for it."

We need this. We need this among ourselves. We need this in our culture. We need to tend the seeds inwardly—seeds of trust and courage and vision. And we need to tend the seeds together with one another in community outwardly.

As Thoreau said, "I do not believe that a plant will grow where there are no seeds planted, but I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I'm prepared to expect wonders."

So we need a confidence in our hearts and in our lives, inwardly and outwardly, that we can plant and water and tend beautiful seeds. Like a carpenter turns wood, said the Buddha, like a fletcher straightens his arrows, like a farmer channels water to their land—so we should tend our own hearts and minds, that beautiful things will grow from them.

Take a breath.

These are daunting times, and difficult tasks lie before us. For many of us, there is a deep grief. There might be anger or rage or fear. Underneath it, a kind of grief. And the grief is there because we care so much. Let yourself feel the grief or the despair—as Joanna Macy speaks of despair and empowerment—until underneath it you can feel the care. You can feel what matters, what makes that grief arise in you. Underneath it, something really matters, and you know what it is.

Now, if you're going to garden in this world, inwardly and outwardly—when you plant the seeds, when you set a direction—it takes a certain courage and perseverance and dedication, and maybe a moral clarity, to say, "Yes, this is what matters." In spiritual life, it is absolutely that way.

And as in the plowing text where the Buddha talks about the seeds of faith and the dedication and the plow of mindfulness and the wise effort that is the oxen—if you garden, the same thing will happen. You will plant your seeds and there will arise weeds, there will arrive insects, there will be drought.

On the inner side, in meditation, you set yourself: I'm going to do loving-kindness, or loving awareness, or mindfulness practice. And what happens? Restlessness, sleepiness, doubt, confusion, fear—all those things arise, the hindrances we call them. Any meditator who's practiced even for a little while knows the hindrances. They're like Mara coming. They're your friends. When you learn how to recognize them and acknowledge and work with them, it's an enormous relief to feel it's not personal—it's just part of the way things are.

When you're a gardener, you don't say, "Oh, insects shouldn't come," or "The garden shouldn't need watering during drought," or "The weeds shouldn't appear." You recognize this. These are the obstacles to work with.

It's the same in business. You set a direction. You make a business. And then the obstacles come. Not enough capital. A key employee quits. The market changes. Prices go up. Supply chain issues happen—you may have noticed that lately. The competition grows strong.

Or maybe in parenting. You have this sweet, beautiful little child who can also throw a magnificent tantrum just to make sure you're paying attention. You have to protect them—they're little and they put stuff in their mouth. They hit each other with blocks. You have to make sure they don't run into the street. You have to socialize them. And that's just the beginning. Then they start to ride a bicycle. But where will they ride, and will they get in trouble? Then they start to do sports, and there's the possibility of injury. Then they go through puberty and become a teen, and they have to deal with sexuality and independence and cars and alcohol and drugs. All these things—the obstacles that you need to tend.

I remember when my daughter Caroline was about six or seven months old. She wasn't yet crawling, and we were driving down the coast to do a retreat or some teaching at Esalen. She was in her car seat, and somehow she found a penny that was there on the seat or nearby. She played with it for a little bit, and then she stuck it in her mouth. Somehow my wife saw it, or maybe I saw it in the mirror, and we were terrified. We stopped the car, looked in her mouth, tried to get the penny out. It wasn't there. Well, maybe she dropped it—who knows what happened? But we were frightened.

So we called our pediatrician. "Hey, our daughter might have eaten a penny. Something terrible might happen." The pediatrician asked a few questions and said, "If she seems all right, don't worry about it."

Here we are, trying to protect this child. A couple of days passed. We'd been worried, but things seemed okay. And then, two and a half days later, in her diaper—she was still wearing diapers—one morning we opened the diaper, and in the middle was the shiniest penny you'd ever seen. It had obviously gone through the car wash inside. She has the penny still; it's taped inside her baby book.

But there we are—the obstacles. Puberty, sexuality, independence, putting things in their mouth, protecting them. That's what it means to care for something.

And in a love relationship, it's the same thing.

You fall in love, you have this beautiful connection, but then other things appear—the little shadows and the difficulties and the conflict. When I have had the privilege of performing wedding ceremonies, which I don't do anymore, one of the things I would say to couples is this: when you go into the used car lot, there's a sign in the windows of the cars that says, "As Is."

And I would have the couple look at each other and ask, "Do you accept each other as is? Can you love each other, not with the idea of how you're going to change them, but can you love each other as is—and then water the seeds of love, water with love and goodness that they might blossom in their own way?" Stay connected to the best of these seeds.

Take a moment to reflect. What is your highest intention in your love relationship? In raising children, if you have them? In doing your work? Your intention is part of the seed. Come back to it again and again and water it. What is your intention for this world? You feel it, and you carry on. As Nelson Mandela said, "Do not judge me by my successes. Judge me by how many times I fell down and got back up."

There's a famous biologist, the father of biodynamic gardening at the University of California, Santa Cruz, named Alan Chadwick. He gardened in an unusual way. He wasn't growing plants—he said he was growing soil. He was growing the connection between the soil and the seeds and the phases of the moon and the direction of the wind and the cosmic magic and the way the doves cooed in the trees and the mist from the ocean near Santa Cruz and everything you could imagine. When things were bleak, he would say, "The seeds underneath are waiting to erupt in beauty. They're pushing up saying, 'Come on, life, life!'"

To show that this was possible, he took his students to a plot of land that had been a junkyard. It was full of rusted cars and trash of all different kinds. He asked the owner if they could use it as a sample garden plot, and the man said, "You can, but the soil is dead." Of course, Alan Chadwick and his students came and amended the soil and watered it and brought things in and tended it and turned it over. After a time, it became a remarkable garden, filled with the most beautiful flowers and plants. It's still there. It was a demonstration that if you plant good seeds and tend them, even in places that seem impossible, something gorgeous and beautiful can grow.

Like the poet Deena Metzger says, "Give me everything mangled and bruised, and I will make a light of it to make you weep, and we will have rain, and we will begin again."

I think of Wangari Maathai, who started the Green Belt Movement in East Africa. She won the Nobel Prize, yes, but on the way there, she was thrown in prison several times. She was targeted in ways that might have killed her. She became a world-renowned activist, but she overcame incredible obstacles. By the time she received her Nobel Prize, she and the followers who had worked with her over decades had planted fifty-one million trees in Kenya to build the beginning of the Green Belt in East Africa.

This is the gift of gardening. You just keep doing it. Even if they throw you in prison, as they did, or disparage you, or throw up their hands, or say it's too small, you can't make a difference—remember what Thoreau said: "If you have a good seed there, I'm prepared to expect miracles."

For here's the secret, and the secret is in the Bhagavad Gita. I know you've listened this evening, so it's time to tell the secret. The secret is to act beautifully without attachment to the fruits of your actions. As Thomas Merton said to an activist who was discouraged, "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all, if not perhaps bring about its opposite. As you understand this, concentrate not on the results but instead on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself—and let the seeds grow as they will."

"I don't know whether nice people tend to grow roses, or growing roses makes people nice." —Roland Brown

So a story I haven't told for a long time concerns a math teacher in Ohio. I don't even remember her name now, but I'll call her Mrs. Matthews. She was a high school math teacher, and in her classes there were certain times when things would get rowdy or the students would fall asleep or get bored. She tried to make her math relevant and useful to them.

And there were some students who had resistance or whatever, but she loved them anyway.

One of her favorite students was a young man—we'll call him Billy. She tended him, and they made a really great connection, even though he had difficulty in math. And one day before the holiday, maybe before spring break or something like that, the class was getting antsy and tired, and nobody was really focused. She stopped the class and said, "We can't do any more today. And I know you're going to go away for a break for a little bit. So here's what I'd like to do."

She wrote on the blackboard a list of the twenty-nine names of students in the class. She asked everyone to copy the list down, name by name, on a piece of paper. And then she said, "Your assignment for the rest of the hour will be to write next to each of these names one thing that you see that you admire or like about that person."

At the end of the class, she collected those papers.

Sometime later in the spring, when the class again got antsy—maybe it was before exam time, getting frustrated—she paused the class again. And she handed each student a piece of paper with their name at the top, and pasted on it were the twenty-nine things that their fellow students had said they admired or liked or saw as good in them.

A few years later, she got a phone call from Billy's mother, who had known that Mrs. Matthews had a deep connection with Billy. His mother called and said, "I have tragic news to tell you. Billy was killed. He went into the army, and he was killed in combat in the Middle East. We're going to have a memorial service. Would you like to come?"

She said, "Of course I will come." She loved her students.

So there they were, gathered around the gravesite—a number of her other former students and friends of Billy. People spoke about him. And then his mother spoke. She said, "You know, my son carried only a few things in his pocket when they got his body after he was killed. And one of them was this."

She pulled out a piece of paper that had been folded and unfolded clearly a number of times. At the top was written his name, Billy, and pasted on it were the twenty-nine things that students around him had seen as good and beautiful in him.

She said, "You let him see who he really was."

And of course, everybody in the circle—the other students—said, "Oh yeah, I carry mine in my wallet still," or "I posted it on the wall in my house. We all have it. It meant so much to us."

We can plant beautiful seeds wherever we are. We can tend them and water them and make the earth different. Because who we are is earth tending herself. We are life. We're not separate from it.

Oh nobly born, you are consciousness. This is what you are. You are the gardener. You are also the garden. You are all of it. You can't separate yourself from the Amazon and the atmosphere and all those ancestors who've been here before you and buried underneath your feet—cheering you on, by the way. You are all of this.

And in fact, you are the vastness. When you get quiet and deep, you realize, as Nisargadatta said, "Wisdom says I am nothing, and love says I am everything. And between these two, my life flows."

Or as Thich Nhat Hanh said, "I was never born. I never died. I'm like the raindrop. I'm the cloud that then turns into snow and rain and enters the river and the ocean and then becomes a cloud again. I was never born. I never died. I am this life living through this body at this time."

This is who you really are. And when you get quiet and listen deeply, you know this. This is your true nature.

But of course, there's that little dilemma.

Okay, Buddha nature, true nature, the divine, the oneness. You need to remember your Buddha nature and your zip code. You have to remember both the vastness and the uniqueness of your own life and seed, and both of them come together.

This is your time. This is the time that Earth is calling you to plant beautiful seeds, to tend them, to make beautiful things grow. Whether you see them in this lifetime or not, it does not matter, because all of us doing it together is what makes it work.

So again, get quiet. Let yourself reflect. You are the garden and the gardener. You are all of it. Come into your form now, this amazing mystery. Maybe even close your eyes. What three things is the earth calling you to do to make a real difference? You can know. And with all the divisiveness and conflict in our society, in the world, in the human world, what three things are you called to do to make a real difference? This is what the Sufis call sobet, a conversation with the heart.

I end with a poem, along with your beautiful reflection, your shining faces, your good hearts, the fact that you are in fact magnificent gardeners. This is by Roger Keyes, who is a steward of and an expert in the woodcut art of Hokusai, the great Japanese printmaker—the one whose Japanese prints you see of Mount Fuji and the boats and the waves, all those gorgeous prints. Hokusai, the great artist. Roger Keyes speaks with Hokusai's voice, the artist who looked at the world so deeply and brought it to us so we could see it:

Hokusai says, look carefully. Pay attention. Notice. Stay curious. There is no end to seeing.

Hokusai says, look forward to getting old. Keep changing. You just get more of what you really are. Repeat yourself as long as it is interesting. Keep doing what you love. Keep meditating and praying.

Every one of us is a child. Every one of us is an angel. Every one of us has a body. Every one of us is frightened. Every one of us has to find a way to live with fear.

Everything is alive. Shells, buildings, people, fishes, mountains, trees. Water is alive. Everything has its own life. Everything lives inside us. Everything lives with the world inside you.

It matters that you care. It matters that you feel. It matters that you notice. It matters that your life lives through you. Contentment is life living through you. Joy is life living through you. Satisfaction is life living through you. Peace is living through you.

Don't be afraid. Don't be afraid. Look, feel. Let life take you by the hand. Let life live through you beautifully.

So let's sit for a minute or two. Getting quiet, listening with the heart allows you to be the gardener and the garden, to plant and water beautiful seeds. And what else matters as you pass through this incarnation, this life?

To make blessings.

I don't know whether nice people tend to grow roses, or whether growing roses makes people nice. However you want to look at it, you can do beautiful things.

So thank you for your kind attention.

And when you reflected on what you were being called to do—you know, you actually do know.

Thank you, dear ones. See you again.

CHAPTER 34

The Most Basic Truths: Gateways to Freedom

Jack Kornfield · 53 min

> In this deeply grounding talk, Jack Kornfield returns to the foundational teachings of Buddhism after months of addressing collective challenges like war and pandemic. He explores the three characteristics of existence (tilakkhaṇa)—impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā)—not as abstract philosophy but as practical gateways to freedom and peace.
> Kornfield illuminates how truly understanding anicca opens us to trust rather than fear, recognizing that change makes room for renewal. He describes the three types of dukkha: the suffering of change, physical and mental pain, and the inherent unsatisfactoriness of conditioned existence (saṅkhāra dukkha). Rather than avoiding this truth, he shows how opening to suffering awakens the great heart of compassion—connecting us to one another in what he calls "the communion of the open heart of life."
> The teaching culminates with anattā, the recognition that we are not separate selves but part of the vast web of existence. Drawing on teachers from Nisargadatta Mahārāja to Ram Dass, Kornfield invites us to discover the loving awareness that witnesses all experience without clinging. Through poetry, stories, and guided reflection, he demonstrates how these ancient insights transform our relationship with anxiety, grief, and the challenges of our time—offering not escape but the freedom available when we see clearly and rest in our true nature.

So what I'd like to talk about tonight—and we'll see how it goes—is the most basic truths in Buddhist teaching. I've come to it in part because in these last months I've been talking about the war in Ukraine and the pandemic and the collective anxiety and all these other things. And it feels like it's time to come back to the basics.

I'll start with a poem that answers a kind of question for us as human beings, as human incarnations. What kind of world did we incarnate into? So this is a poem from Brigid Lowry that I often read. It is, by the way, a meditation poem:

In the strange early morning half-light we sit. In the cloudiness of our questioning we sit. In our madness and our clarity we sit. In the midst of too much to do we sit. In the warm arms of our shared sorrow we sit. In community and in loneliness we sit. In sweet exhaustion we sit. In the blazing energy of being alive we sit. Here with the singing of the coyotes and the crickets. Here with each electric bird song. Here with the rippling of breezes and the great trees and the dry grasses. Here with the cobwebs and the clouds and the teeming masses. And the dusty road upon us, us in the sound and the sound in us. Us in the world and the world in us.

So here we are with this human incarnation, given a human life. And of course, at this time—maybe in all times, but right now—there are things that are quite difficult. Especially if you're here where I am in North America, there's the growing fire season. And then we look at the images in the news and there's floods and refugees and climate change. And of course the wars: Ukraine and Myanmar and Libya and so many other places. So there's all those kind of difficult images and troubles of this human realm that we're born into.

And then last night there was the eclipse, the blood red moon. Really kind of magic to watch the eclipse, because you could see the shadow of our sphere moving across the face of the moon. And at least in North America, there's spring and blossoms. It's the plowing season in some places. Maybe that would be at the beginning of the rainy season for others. There is in California this year a renewed migration of monarch butterflies—not so many had been seen for a long time. So there's the troubles and there's the springtime and the music of the spheres.

When I was first taught in the monasteries in Thailand and Burma, the key to the basic nature of life was repeated over and over again. Everything is anicca, or impermanent. Look at it. Everything is dukkha, which means unsatisfactory. And everything is anatta. Anicca, dukkha, and anatta. And anatta means emptiness, selflessness. We'll talk about all of them. The reason that these were repeated over and over is they were saying: if you see these, you see with the eyes of wisdom.

Zen Master Seung Sahn Soen Sa Nim, the Korean Zen master with whom I studied, said: "Once a great man sat under the Bodhi tree, saw the morning star and gained enlightenment. He saw the sky was blue, the earth was brown, and all things were rising and passing. Things were just as they are." And then he really knew the nature of things and his enlightenment was complete. He saw things the way they are: arising and passing, blue sky, brown earth.

Or Krishnamurti, the great sage, said: "It is the truth that liberates and not your efforts to be free." It's seeing the way things are. And of course, to survive—because we have this very complex human brain—the brain, besides seeing the way things are here in the present, also tries to anticipate, keep you safe, fix and stabilize and imagine.

So the first of these basic truths is anicca, impermanence. And you say, well, what's the big deal? Of course things change. Why is this news? The stock market's gone down and it will go up sometime. It's just what things do.

The phases of the moon change. But there's something deeper to feel and know. The point of it is seeing with the eyes of wisdom—it brings a kind of liberation.

Here's a phrase from the texts: karma changes, or karma can change, like the swish of a horse's tail. That is, at one time everything seems hunky dory and fine and going along. And then in a moment—an accident, or a diagnosis, or an opportunity, or an asteroid, or who knows what, a pandemic—and everything gets turned topsy-turvy. Karma can change like the swish of a horse's tail, and then all of a sudden you go, "Oh yeah, whoops, anicca." Things are not as stable as we thought. Not so solid.

And we're watching the contests of empires—the Russian empire trying to get back, the Chinese empire trying to get big the way it was a thousand years ago, and the US empire. What did Chief Seattle say? Tribe follows tribe and nation follows nation. Even empires come and go. And wars arise for a time and then they end. There's always an end to a war, however horrific and terrible and sad it is—then it ends. Then of course there might be a new war and a new conflict. This is anicca. It's where we live, where you live, where I live.

Now in psychology 101, there's an experiment that's often done in which three buckets of water are placed at the front of the room. One bucket has hot water, quite hot. One bucket has room temperature. And one bucket has ice water with ice cubes in it. The unsuspecting student who volunteers to come up for the psychological experiment is invited to take two hands and place one in the bucket of ice water and one in the bucket of quite hot water and see how long they can stand it—usually thirty seconds or a minute or whatever. It's not that easy.

Then the next instruction, when they take their hands out, is to put them in the bucket of room temperature water and let them touch each other. And in that moment, there's this funny expression that comes over the face of the psychology student, because to one hand the water feels really cold—the hand that was in the hot water—and to the other hand, touching it, the water feels really hot—the hand that had been in the ice water. Their perceptions are warped somehow. Which perception can I trust?

You know, my dear friends—and I have to include myself in this—we get pretty attached to our perceptions of things, and yet they're not really quite certain, are they? The Buddha said at one point, "People who cling to views"—the wise ones, he said, don't cling to views—"but people who cling to views go about the world annoying others." That's one of the passages that I think is a little bit of humor from the Buddha—or maybe he was just experiencing that.

So what changes our perceptions? You're a libertarian or a Republican or a Democrat or a whatever for a certain portion of your life, and then it might change. Your views change. What else changes?

It's said in the Buddhist texts that who we are are the five skandhas, sometimes translated as the five aggregates, or the five rivers—which is how I like to translate it. A river of physical experience and sensations of the body, a river of feelings, a river of perceptions and views, a river of thoughts and images, and the river of consciousness. And they're always changing. You could see it when you sat in meditation. Nothing stayed the same for a moment as you paid attention.

Now here's why anicca is important to understand. Because everything is changing, the more you cling and hold on, the more you suffer. Holding on is called rope burn. You try to hold on to things and they're changing—whether it's the views or the world or the empires or your emotions.

I remember the story of a couple, two men who got married, and part of their celebration in their life was to take a road trip to Montreal, to the biggest bonsai tree garden in North America. Amazing bonsais imported from Japan and China and grown there. So they got in a car and they drove a long way up into Canada from where they lived in New England. And they got there—one of the guys had arranged the trip and was really happy because he loved bonsai, they both did—and they arrived at the gates of this huge garden and it was padlocked shut. And this was before the pandemic. "Sorry, we're closed on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. We're open these days of the week."

And his partner looked at him and said, "Didn't you check on this?" And got all upset and frustrated. "We drove all the way here!" And the guy who'd done the driving and brought them there, just got quiet and said, "Let's see, let's take a little walk here. Maybe we can figure something out."

And what's he going to figure out? He's going to call somebody? Is there a way to get in? Can they open it? He just started walking along the huge—this is a giant botanical garden—along the gate and along the front wall, a high wall. You could see the beautiful fruit trees and amazing trees inside. He walked and walked, just trying to get quiet, figure out, well, what should we do next? He went around the corner at the end of that long front part of the garden and started to walk further.

And then all of a sudden, to his and their surprise, the wall stopped. It was a facade on the roadside of the garden. But as they walked along the side, there was no wall. And they could walk right in, which they did, whatever day it was, closed or not. One of them smiled and the other sort of apologized—you know how it is being a couple.

But the idea was that instead of saying things are or aren't possible, instead of getting so frustrated, to be open and say, "Oh, I wonder what's going to happen next"—to have that spirit.

Because the truth is that the body produces one hundred billion new red blood cells every day. That's fifty thousand in the time that I read these few sentences—your body's making that. There are a trillion living creatures in your gut and in parts of your body, little ones that live in your eyelashes and your eyebrows and so forth, all having their little bacteria, virus, buggy little life, being born and dying. You are this walking—my friend Wes calls it a walking feedlot for this entire cornucopia of life. You lose six hundred thousand particles of skin an hour and it's replaced in that hour. You get a new stomach lining regrown every five days, and all the major parts of your liver are recreated every six weeks. Your eyebrows take four months. But who you are is this river of change that's constantly changing and opening and evolving. And as we become wise, we step back and see the mystery of it instead of how it's supposed to be.

I had a friend who was the hospice director of a very big hospice for some years. One day he went in—he'd been working with a lot of the patients who were dying. There was an old Italian man there whose family kept coming in to attend to him, his children and so forth. They came in one morning and said, "We need to talk to the hospice director." They said, "We have a problem, a question. Our father is here"—it was three of the children—"and he's very close to dying. But his younger brother was killed yesterday in a car accident. We don't know whether we should tell him because he's so close to dying himself. Maybe it will agitate him and make him feel terrible. Maybe we should just leave him and let him be in that state of loving his brother and not knowing about the loss. What should we do?"

My friend, the hospice director, said, "Well, let's go in and see your father and see how he's doing. Maybe we'll understand better when we do that." Here's this kind of open-minded response—not exactly this is right or that's wrong.

They went in and sat with the father, who was pretty weak but still conscious and could speak. They said, "We're so glad to see you, Dad. How are you?" He said, "Well, I'm getting weaker and my time is coming." Then he looked at them and said, "Don't you have something to tell me?" They said, "What do you mean?" He said, "About my brother. Don't you know he died?" They said, "Well, how do you know that?" And he said, "Oh, I've been talking to him all morning."

There's a little bit of a mystery for you. I could tell you fifty more stories like this. Who are we, born into this body, this human incarnation? Who do you think you are?

Things change. I remember a retreat that was taught by Michelle McDonald. She was teaching on the East Coast at our center in Barre, and she also worked in the family program.

So she liked to work with little kids. And she brought this group of little kids—I think they were like kindergartners or something—and said, "Let's talk about things being born and things dying." And kids are interested in that. So they talked about it some, and then she said, "I'll tell you what, let's learn more about it. You go out in the woods"—which was around where we are—"and bring back whatever you find that's died, and we'll look at it together."

And the kids ran out excitedly and they brought some dead leaves or some sticks. And one kid found a little bit of a skeleton of some mouse that had died. And somebody else found a bone, or they found something else that had died. And they brought them all back together, made a pile, and said, "Wow, all these things in the forest have died."

And then she said, "Well, what do you think about this?" Trying to understand how it looked to these five-year-olds. And one of the kids said, "Well, it looks like everything in the forest is there for a while and it dies." And another little kid piped up and said, "Yeah, it's a good thing. Because if the trees and the branches and things didn't die, then there'd be more and more and more of them. They'd get so close together and then there'd be no room for us."

They knew somehow that change actually is the opportunity for something new to come. And that death isn't something wrong. It's natural. As Emily Dickinson said, "Because I did not stop for death, he kindly stopped for me." It's just part of an incarnation. So you might as well relax and become the loving awareness, become the sky of awareness and see how things are changing.

But then there arises all our anxiety—the emotions of being anxious and worry, the stories we tell ourselves, the body. What about COVID? What about the stock market? What about whatever it is that worries you? What about family? All these things. And the mind kicks in, trying to protect you from change.

The practice is not to resist the anxiety and the thoughts, not to judge them, but to bow and say, "Thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm okay just now." And not let the voices of anxiety take over the heart. You can name them. "Oh, here's worry. Here's anxiety. Thank you." And then ground yourself and become part of the earth, or feel the openness of the sky through which the birds and the clouds and everything come and go, or the trees of the forest renewing itself.

And people will call me—friends, people I've taught over the years and worked with—"I'm going into surgery." "My teenage son is dealing with addiction, he's in trouble." And we talk about the specifics: what you can do, how do you resource yourself, how do you support yourself? And then often I'll say, "Make an altar. Put a little altar with a picture of your teenage son on it and surround that picture with Quan Yin or Buddha or whoever you value. Let yourself reflect on who carries the spirit that most matters to you in this world, whether they're alive now or whether they're an archetypal being—the Buddha or Mother Mary. And make a bow, maybe light a candle, and say to Mother Mary and Kuan Yin and the Buddha and so forth, 'Will you please hold my boy? Will you hold him so that I don't have to worry quite so much?'"

I am traveling at great speed toward a star in the Milky Way. My heart's a little fast. Otherwise, everything's okay. The voice of a poet.

With anicca, we step back and say, the galaxy is turning, things change. And we learn the trusting heart. The practice of sitting in meditation is to learn the trusting heart. "Oh, nobly born," it says, "remember your true nature." Become the loving awareness—the shift of identity from that small worried person to the Buddha that you are.

And I see it in my cohort. I'm about to turn seventy-seven. I know a lot of dead people, lots of friends who are sick, many people in my address book—I used to have an address book.

Now it's electronic. Half of them aren't here in this incarnation anymore. It's happening. They're moving off stage. We're in the queue, so to speak.

And then there are all these new grandchildren, you know, and what follows. Just reflect for a moment, because life is renewing itself through you, around you—you're a part of it. You are life renewing itself. Even as you age and die, you're in the recycle process.

Here's a reflection. Quiet yourself. Maybe even let your eyes close. What is changing in your life? What are the big things that are changing? And what would the wisest part of you say in response to this change? What would the wisest part say? Here's how to hold this. You can know. You already do. It makes us come more alive, more trusting—this impermanence.

I think of my old friend and colleague, Stephen Levine. We taught retreats together, taught and practiced together. I remember he would ask people—he was teaching death and dying retreats—he would say, "If you only had a short time to live, who would you call? What would you say? And why are you waiting?"

This is the wisdom of impermanence, of trust and living fully just where we are.

Then anicca goes to dukkha. And dukkha is this complicated term. It has a lot of meanings, but mostly it means things are insecure and uncertain. It's also translated as suffering. And if we look with the eyes of wisdom—well, all we have to do is turn on the news. The conflict, domestic terrorism in Buffalo, and the continuing scourge of racism, as if some people are better than other people. It's kind of crazy that here's a little child born, and what particular color they are—whether they're green or brown or black or white or yellow—what color you are determines your value. It's kind of insane. But the suffering from it is enormous. This is dukkha. Just like the wars are dukkha. These are the big ones in the news—the pandemic, the climate change. This is your human incarnation, folks. Mine too.

So the Buddha, under the Bodhi tree, when he attained enlightenment at the time of the morning star, like that poem said, he sat quietly for a time, as the story is told. And then he turned his eye, his wisdom eye, toward the world of living beings across the whole world. And he saw beings everywhere wanting to be happy, yet often doing the very thing that made them unhappy. And the tears of the great heart of compassion rolled down his cheeks. It's said in one of the myths or stories that those tears turned into Tara, the goddess of infinite compassion. She was born out of those tears. He saw the sufferings of the world, and immediately that great heart of compassion that was also the Buddha nature began to shine in every direction.

To understand dukkha, there are three kinds of dukkha. There's anicca dukkha—the dukkha of change. Joy and sorrow, praise and blame, gain and loss, pleasure and pain, fame and disrepute. However wonderful, you know, that incredible meal, that great vacation, that sexual ecstatic experience—I hope you had one at some time—and that delicious spiritual awakening and so forth. There's that little voice inside that says, "God, I wish this would last." But it doesn't. The dukkha of change.

Now, the good thing is that when things are terrible, they don't last either. But this is one kind of dukkha—that nothing lasts. And seeing it with eyes of wisdom, the heart goes, "Okay, I have to really get this. You can't hold on."

The second kind of dukkha is the dukkha of pain—physical and mental pain. Part of what we learn in meditation is to sit when your knee hurts and your back hurts, when you're having physical pain. We live in a culture that basically wants to sell you a prescription, a painkiller, the moment you're a little uncomfortable. We live in a culture that fears discomfort. You have to do anything to stay comfortable. Good luck. It doesn't work that way.

But when you take your seat with some dignity and allow the itches and the pleasures and the pains, the tightness and the release and the opening, when you allow all the energies that are stuck in the body, there becomes this opening of trust, of loving awareness, and a deepening capacity—expanding the window of tolerance to hold it all in compassion.

And it's physical pain, yours. Sometimes it's harder when it's the physical pain of someone near you. If you haven't learned to sit with it, you can't hold somebody else's hand when they're in the hospital or at an accident or dying, because you don't know how to be with it. You don't know how to rest in loving awareness and say, "Yes, this too."

My friend Vivek Murthy, the Surgeon General of the United States, said that more than half of what comes into the hospitals and clinics across America is really based on emotional pain and suffering. It's not even the physical suffering. So this is the second kind of dukkha, physical and mental pain. You all know it because it's part of incarnation. We have it.

And then the third kind, which is called sankhara dukkha. Sankhara means all the different things that arise and make up the whole world, the form of the world of duality. Sankhara dukkha is just the nature of things. To have a globe and a world and a moon and a solar system and galaxies, there's light and dark. There's birth and death. There is unbearable beauty, amazing beauty, and an ocean of tears.

The Buddha said at one point that you've been born and died so many times that the bones of even one person's incarnations piled up would be as high as the great Mount Vipula, taller than Everest. That's how many times you've taken incarnation. Now, it may or may not be true, but what it was pointing to is that built into this human life is this birth and death—born and dying and born and dying. Each day, each moment, it's what we are.

And then the text goes on: Did you never see a man or a woman aged, bent down with blotched limbs, walking with a cane? Or sick and lying in bed? Did you never see a corpse after their life energy has passed from the body? And did the thought never happen to come to you: "Oh, this will happen to me too"?

But we live in a culture that says get more money, more power, more things. Consume. Travel. Get these things—all of which are fine; I like some of them too. But the message is: if you do it right, there won't be dukkha.

I'm sorry. I am really sorry. It's not how it works. And I know people who have very little who are insanely joyful and happy, and people who literally have billions of dollars and anything you could buy who really struggle with sorrow and unhappiness.

I could just ask: How many of you have dukkha? Raise your hand. But you don't have to bother, because we know.

Just as impermanence gives birth to trust when you really see it deeply—you realize that just as things are dying, as the kids saw in that forest, it makes room for something new to be born, and you begin to trust the process of turning—even as you sit and the emotions come and you make space. There's sadness and fear and you allow it, and it rises in a big way. And then if you stay with it, it passes. And there you are, still the loving witness of it all.

So just as anicca, impermanence, is the doorway to trust, dukkha gives birth to compassion. They come together. They make a courageous heart.

Thich Nhat Hanh was asked not so long ago about climate change, before he died. A student asked him, "Should I sit and meditate and go on retreat and somehow purify my heart? Will that help? Will that make the difference? Is that what I should do? I'm worried about climate change. Or should I go out on the barricades? Should I protest? Should I get politically involved? What should I do?"

And Thich Nhat Hanh got quiet, looked back, and said, "Just listen until you can hear the sounds of the earth crying."

He didn't tell the student what to do. He just said: Let yourself open and hear and feel and listen and sense the truth.

Your grief becomes a doorway. As Rilke says, if the drink is bitter, then turn yourself into wine. So you sit and you quiet the mind and open the heart, and you listen until you can hear the sounds of the earth crying.

There's a story of an old Hasidic rabbi who used to talk about the practice of prayer and meditation. He always used a strange phrase. He would say, "When you meditate, when you pray, when you offer these prayers, recite them, feel them, and place them on your heart." One day a student said, "Rabbi, Rabbi, why do you always use that strange phrase, 'place them on your heart'? Shouldn't we put them in our heart?" The rabbi got quiet and said, "It's not us who can put them in the heart." Perhaps he said it's God that puts them in the heart, or the divine, or something deeper than our own will. He said, "Our practice is to recite them and place them on the heart, so that someday when the heart breaks, they will fall in."

And this is how grief and dukkha becomes the doorway to compassion.

A poem for you called "Everyday Grace" by Stella Nasanovich:

It can happen like that—meeting at the auto repair, buying tires amidst the smell of rubber,
the grating sound of jackhammers and drills.
Anywhere we share stories, grace flows between us.
The tire center waiting room becomes a healing place as one speaks of her husband's heart valve replacement, bed sores from complications.
A man speaks of multiple surgeries,
notes his false appearance as strong and healthy.
I share my sister's death from breast cancer,
her youngest only seven.
A woman rises, gives her name, Mrs. Henry,
then takes my hand.
Suddenly, an ordinary day becomes holy ground.

This is how we connect. We hold hands. There's something so innate in us when there's suffering. You can look at Ukraine and see all the terrible things, but you also see nations and Doctors Without Borders and World Central Kitchen and people from every direction pouring in their love and help and support. That is also us. Suffering brings us the deepest compassion.

Impermanence, yes. Dukkha, part of this incarnation. It's here, baby. It is us. And yet it connects us in compassion and love. It does.

So quiet and close your eyes again for a moment. What is calling to you? What suffering, what loss, what difficulty in your life, in the world? What is calling to you and saying, "Yes, don't avert your gaze. Let your heart open, see, feel"? And then—what courage is asked of you? You can know. When compassion arises, compassion is a verb. It also says, "I must. I will. I find a way to make a difference."

Now, Thich Nhat Hanh from the Mahayana tradition of Vietnam teaches these three characteristics. He calls them the three seals. And instead of teaching dukkha, he teaches nirvana—because knowing dukkha is the gateway to nirvana, to freedom or peace.

As Zen Master Suzuki Roshi, who founded San Francisco Zen Center, said: "When you realize the fact that everything changes and find your composure in it, there you find yourself in nirvana." Nirvana isn't someplace else. It is the freedom and the peace that's available to you with a quiet mind and an open heart, when you become the loving witness of it all. Pain is inevitable, but suffering is not. And you can rest in loving awareness and joy.

We can get so loyal to our suffering and forget that joy—that joy I like to talk about from the books of the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu, laughing and joking together in The Book of Joy.

So dukkha gives birth to the great heart of compassion.

And then the last of these three is anatta, which is translated sometimes as emptiness, no self, no separate self. This is the hardest one to understand, but you could sort of feel it when we were meditating together and I said, "Now, who are you?" toward the end. Look—and you look and you don't find yourself. There are sensations and thoughts and experiences, and there is awareness, but it's not your awareness.

In fact, you're not even there exactly. There's just awareness itself. Nothing separate.

Wes Nisker, my colleague and friend at Spirit Rock, puts it this way. He's a humorist as well. He said, here's the three characteristics: Life's hard. It'll put you through changes. Don't take it personally.

And this is the third—anatta—that it's not yours. The profound reality, the invitation to step out of the fiction of separateness, what's called the small sense of self or the body of fear, where we get frightened or selfish or self-centered or cut off.

Alice Walker wrote, "One day when I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was, it come to me, that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed, and I laugh and I cry and I run all around the house. When it happens, you just can't miss it."

And we know this—walking in the high mountains, or making love, or being there at the mystery of the birth of a child, or the death of a human being silent like a falling star. All of a sudden we step out of the time-bound consciousness, the separateness, and feel ourselves part of the turning of the seasons of life. You feel it on retreat. You're doing walking meditation and all of a sudden you realize you're not doing it. It's all just doing itself. It's amazing.

No self, as one of my teachers said—no self, no problem. More self, more clinging, more self-centeredness, more problem.

But it's like this. When I look at my daughter, she was born of an egg carried by her mother. But the egg that was carried by her mother was actually there in her grandmother's body. When her mother was an infant in her mother's womb, the grandmother's womb carried the egg that became my daughter. And then my daughter grows up as a woman and she has a child. Maybe she has a daughter—she has a son now. Maybe she'll have a daughter, we don't know—who becomes a mother and grandmother. And the eggs are there a couple of generations before and after. We are not ourselves. We are the whole chain of beings.

And in one apple is the mystery of life. That tree doesn't grow without the rhizomes underneath it in the forest floor, the sunlight on the leaves, the wind, the turning of seasons, the planting and the harvesting in an apple orchard, or before that in the wild apples. And the chlorophyll that turns sunlight into sugar—now, how's that for a miracle? We live on a planet where light turns into sugar so you can be happy. The biosphere, the genetics of an apple, and all of it's just happening, baby. This is selfless. This is the form of life coming out of consciousness itself and expanding and opening in all these remarkable multitudinous ways.

A man came up to the Buddha—his name was Mogarajan—and he asked him a question three times. When you ask three times, then the Buddha has to answer, as it's said. He said, "Tell me, oh Blessed One, you are supposed to be wise. How can I live so that I will not be seen by the king of death?"

And the Buddha responded, "O Mogarajan, do not cling to anything as being yours alone, as being self, or I, or mine. And if you do not cling to anything as self, you will not be seen by the king of death."

So this is the invitation Thich Nhat Hanh talked about—the seal of nirvana, of freedom. The timeless freedom that is who you really are. When you don't cling to your body, your feelings, your relationships, the things around you. And understand, when I say don't cling, I don't mean don't care. You know the difference. You'll feel it in your body between attachment and love. They're really different. And you can live in the timeless present, the consciousness of loving awareness itself.

I remember my time with Nisargadatta, this great guru in Bombay, where he said at one point, "My consciousness can enter into anything, and I can feel the experience of it, because it's all consciousness."

He said, "Wisdom sees that I am nothing. Love sees that I am everything. And between these two, my life flows."

I loved watching Ram Dass in the last years of his life because he was there in that wheelchair, in a broken body where he couldn't move one arm and one leg, where he had aphasia and couldn't speak fluently, grappling to find words. He had multiple infections and physical traumas and bedsores at times and all these things. And he was about the happiest person I'd ever been with. Really joyful amidst all the paralysis and aphasia.

"How can you be so joyful, Ram Dass?"

And he said, "I am loving awareness. I love it all. I love it all. The joy, the sorrow, the birth, the death, the spring and the winter."

So when you understand, there comes this beautiful sense of freedom. This is our incarnation.

And then from Antoine de Saint-Exupéry in The Little Prince, he says, "First thing in the morning, you look after yourself. You brush your teeth and wash your face, don't you? Well, the second thing you must do is look after your planet." It's not that complicated.

And the heart changes when we come to terms with change and impermanence and realize we can trust that life wants to renew itself. And we come to terms with dukkha and say, "Yes, that's part of incarnation. You don't get out of it." Loss and change and pain and suffering and gain and pleasure—all are woven together.

I don't know whether nice people tend to grow roses or whether growing roses makes people nice. And I don't know the answer either. But I do know there's a kind of joy that comes when we see with the eyes of wisdom and the great heart of compassion and trust.

Oh, nobly born, remember this teaching for now and forever.

And as you know, when you touch this, it spills out of you—your joy, your peace, your acceptance, your flexibility, your non-rigidity, your openness, even with your own foibles, all held in the great heart of compassion. And you become like those people in the tire store waiting room. You become part of the communion of us, of the open heart of life.

And this is possible for you.

Alice Walker says, "War will stop when we no longer praise it or give it any attention at all. Peace will come wherever it is sincerely invited. Love will overflow every sanctuary given it. Truth will grow where the fertilizer that nourishes it is also truth. And trust will be its own reward."

Teach yourself peace. Pass it on.

CHAPTER 35

Here and Now Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 28 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners into a direct experience of present-moment awareness through the cultivation of what he calls "loving awareness." The practice begins with settling into the body, releasing tension through conscious breathing, and establishing a foundation of ease and trust in simply being here and now.
> The meditation unfolds in stages: first anchoring attention in the natural rhythm of the breath—felt as coolness in the nostrils, movement in the chest or belly, or the whole body breathing. Kornfield emphasizes that wandering attention is natural, and that the gentle returning to breath is itself what steadies the mind. He suggests using soft whispered words like "calm" or "ease" to deepen the settling quality.
> From this stable base, the practice expands to include all arising experience. When strong waves of sensation, emotion, or thought pull attention away from the breath, practitioners learn to acknowledge them with gentle naming—"sadness," "planning," "hearing"—receiving each experience in loving awareness before returning to the breath. This approach reflects the essence of satipaṭṭhāna practice: clear knowing of present experience without grasping or aversion. The meditation culminates in recognizing oneself as awareness itself—the silent, unshaken witness at the center of all changing phenomena. As Kornfield reminds us, this vast loving awareness is our true home, always available, always present.

Find a way to sit where you're comfortable and stable and at ease in your body. Let yourself be settled. If you're able, allow your eyes to close gently, or at least lower your gaze, and turn your attention just here and now to the present experience.

Start, if you will, with two or three long breaths, and allow each of the long breaths out to release whatever they will—to let yourself open, become more present. Tune into your body seated here with a loving awareness. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders drop, relaxed, and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on the seat or the cushion or the floor, wherever you are. Sense how it's met equally by the earth below you, that you can let go and rest on the earth just where you are—with ease and trust in this moment, relaxed and present. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the experiences here and now. There will be sensations of the body, sounds, emotions and feelings arising. A parade of images and thoughts and words will come and go. And you take your seat just where you are, in the midst of all of these rising and passing experiences.

To help settle the attention, to help quiet the mind and open the heart and the body, begin to notice how your body is breathing itself as you sit quietly. Amidst all the other waves of experience, turn your attention to feel the rhythm of the natural breath. You can feel it as coolness in the nostrils, swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly, or the whole body breathing. If it's at all hard to feel, put one hand on your belly and feel the rise and fall of the belly in the palm of your hand. Leave it there.

Taking our seat halfway between heaven and earth as the Buddha that we are, begin to quiet the mind and steady the attention first by feeling this ever-changing rhythm of breath rising and passing. Let your attention be a loving awareness that kindly notices this breath as it opens and as it dissolves.

After a few breaths, very often you'll notice the attention wanders off to thinking or planning or sounds or sensations somewhere else. This is natural. As soon as you notice, notice what's there and then gently return to feel the next breath. It's the very returning and coming back that starts to steady the mind and the attention—just here, this breath. Coming back again and again, gently.

As you feel each breath, as it comes and goes naturally, the point is not to become a good breather, but to feel the breath, to use the attention to the breath to invite a calm and steady ease to arise. Breathing in and out—calm. Rising and falling—ease. Some people find it helps to even whisper these words: calm, or ease, or steady, as they sense the breath come in and out. This breath. This moment.

As you feel the breath, calm and steady, there will be all the other waves of experience—thoughts and images, sounds, sensations, and so forth. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath, and feel the breath in the middle of them all.

From the steady attention to the breath, now you can open the awareness. When one of the waves becomes strong—so strong it pulls you away from the breath, not the background waves, but a strong emotion of sadness or excitement or fear or love or longing, or a big thought train or image of the future or past, or some strong sensation like cold or itching or pain—when a strong wave pulls the attention from the breath, let go of that focus and, as if to bow to it, turn your attention and acknowledge it with a soft whisper: sadness, excitement, tingling, itching, planning, remembering.

When you name the wave of experience, let yourself be the loving awareness that notices this wave as it rises in body and mind and then passes away. Sad, sad, sad, sad—and eventually it passes. Then you can go back to the breath. A loud sound comes: hearing, hearing—and that wave of experience passes.

And you can return to feel some more breath. You become the loving witness, the loving awareness. The quiet and steady attention on the breath. And then a gracious acknowledging, naming the strong experiences that rise like waves. Name them gently, and when they pass, return to the breath.

Rest in loving awareness. You are the space of loving awareness. The openness of loving awareness. Rest in it. Just here. And notice the breath as it comes and goes. Name the strong waves of experience as they arise, received in loving awareness, and after time, pass away.

You are just here, unshaken, unmoved, the one seed in the middle of it all. This breath. This moment's experience. You are the Buddha. Seated. Silent. Loving awareness. Receiving the breath. The waves of experience. And you are the silent vastness of awareness itself. Loving awareness.

Bell

Who are you? When you look deeply, you won't find anything. There are thoughts and feelings that come and go. What there is, is this remarkable awareness, loving awareness, that knows them all. Rest in it. Relax into it. It is your home.

And when you're ready, let your eyes open gently.

You know what the bell sounds like. In fact, you know everything. This is all just a reminder. Oh yes, I do know.

CHAPTER 36

Centering Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 26 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers a practice designed to bring together the essential elements of Buddhist meditation: grounding in the body, settling the mind, and cultivating an open heart. He emphasizes that meditation is not a grim duty but rather an invitation to presence—a presence infused with what he calls "mindful, loving awareness."
> The practice begins with establishing a stable, gracious posture and systematically relaxing the body from face to belly. Kornfield then guides attention to the natural rhythm of the breath, using it as an anchor to unify body and mind. He introduces the gentle noting technique for working with whatever arises—sensations like tingling or throbbing, emotions such as fear or longing, and the endless stream of planning, remembering, and imagining that characterizes the thinking mind. Rather than fighting these experiences, practitioners learn to bow to them, name them softly, and watch them dissolve like clouds in sunlight.
> Central to this meditation is the recognition that we are not merely the contents of our experience but the awareness itself—the loving witness to all that arises and passes away. Kornfield invites practitioners to "sit like a Buddha," steady and kind, with an open heart in the midst of all the waves of experience. This teaching reflects core insights from the satipaṭṭhāna tradition while making them accessible through Kornfield's characteristic warmth and poetic instruction, offering a complete practice for both newcomers and experienced meditators seeking to deepen their capacity for presence and equanimity.

Let's begin a meditation that both centers and grounds and opens you, quiets the mind and opens the heart.

Please find a way to sit that's grounded, stable, relatively upright, but also gracious and at ease. Meditation is not meant to be a grim duty, but rather an invitation to presence—to presence with whatever is here, held in a mindful, loving awareness.

Let your eyes close gently. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Perhaps roll your neck in a circle to let it find a simple upright position. Let your shoulders relax and your arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight of your body on the seat, the chair, the floor, and how you can relax and let go. Let the earth fully support you just where you are. Trust it. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, take two or three long breaths. With each exhale, let go of what wants to be released.

In this complex and busy world, this busy time in which we live, one of the simplest and most helpful beginnings to a meditation is to come back to the rhythm of your own breath. Not to try to change it or become a good breather in some way or other, but to bring the body and mind together by feeling each breath as it comes and goes, inviting a sense of ease and calm with each breath. You might feel it in the nostrils—coolness or swirling, tingling in the back of the throat—or the rise and fall of chest or belly, or the whole body breathing. Let your attention rest in the breath, feeling its own natural rhythm, and maybe whispering softly with each breath: ease, calm.

Of course, after a few breaths—two or three or ten—the attention will wander and go off to planning, thinking, remembering, feeling other things, sounds. When you notice, bring the attention gently back to the breath. It's the very act of returning again and again that begins to steady the mind. No judgment. It's like training the puppy: sit, stay. At first the puppy doesn't listen, runs around, pees in the corner. You clean it up, just like your mind can do. And then you come back: sit, stay. Little by little, with a sense of ease and calm, in the midst of all the waves of experience, you feel the breath—this breath—and let things settle.

This breath, just as it is, receive with loving awareness. You are the mindful, loving witness as the breath arises and passes away, relaxed and calm with each breath.

As you feel each breath, let the waves of thoughts and sounds and feelings rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel the breath in the middle of them all. Steady, kind attention. Nowhere to go, just here—the reality of the present with this mysterious quality of mindful, loving awareness, present and open, steady, at ease.

Now, as you feel the breath, receiving it with mindful loving awareness, you can open up the awareness in a gracious way to the strong energies that arise and pull you from the breath. As you feel the breath move in and out, rise and fall, if there comes a strong emotion—sadness, excitement, longing, love—or if there comes a strong sensation—tingling, hot, pain, cold—as if to bow to it, you can let go of the breathing for a time and name it gently. Oh, tingling. Throbbing. Name it gently: tingling, tingling, itching, throbbing. See what happens as it rises like a wave and passes away. Then return to the breath.

Or an emotion. Fear—fear arises. Longing. Excitement. As you name the wave of emotion, let it open and move through you for a time. Excitement, excitement. When it's passed, let there be a little space, and then feel a few more breaths until some other strong emotion or sensation or sound arises.

Rest just here in the reality of the present, receiving the breath, the sensations, the sounds, the feelings with mindful loving awareness. You are the loving awareness, the loving witness to the breath that breathes itself, or to the waves of experience that arise on their own and pass away. Rest in mindful, loving awareness of this breath or this wave of sensation or feeling.

You can also notice the waves of thought. Picture thoughts and word thoughts will arise and pull the attention from the breath. It might be a story or a memory or a plan or a worry or an imagining.

And just as you note the breath coming and going, when thought comes to the center of attention, you can bow to it and name it gently. "Oh, planning, planning," or "remembering, remembering," or "worrying, worrying," or perhaps a creative thought arising.

As you name these thoughts—imagining, planning, remembering—they appear like clouds. And as you name them gently, they dissolve like clouds, because you're not in the middle of them. You are the loving awareness that acknowledges them like sunlight.

Let them dissolve. Feel three or four or five more breaths until another wave comes. You can bow to it, name it gently for a time, and then return back to the breath.

Just here. This moment. This breath. Or this wave of experience, received and acknowledged with loving awareness.

When you sit like a Buddha—steady and kind, with heart open, gracious and wise—in the midst of it all, you take your seat and let it come and go. You are the loving awareness, the loving witness, the steady one. Balanced, at ease. The witness to the joys and sorrows that arise and pass. The timeless witness.

You are the mindful loving awareness itself. Wise and steady, gracious and compassionate.

Let your eyes open gently now, keeping the sense of ease and graciousness. Whatever is quieted or settled, stay with this.

CHAPTER 37

Mindful Respect | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 54 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Jack Kornfield examines respect as a cornerstone of mindful living and spiritual practice. Drawing from his years in the Thai forest monastery with Ajahn Chah, he illustrates how mindful respect infuses every action—from folding robes to sweeping paths—with sacred attention. The talk opens with the traditional invocation "O nobly born," reminding listeners of their inherent Buddha nature and dignity.
> Kornfield retells the Celtic legend of Sir Gawain and the Loathly Lady, revealing its profound teaching: what all beings truly want is sovereignty—the freedom to be masters of their own lives. He connects this wisdom to the Buddha's characteristic response after teaching: "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit," demonstrating deep respect for each person's autonomy and wisdom.
> The teaching extends to practical applications of loving awareness—respecting the body as "a fiesta" rather than sin or machine, honoring our feelings, training the mind, and listening deeply to others. Kornfield references Jon Kabat-Zinn's mindfulness-based stress reduction work, showing how respectful attention to pain and difficulty transforms suffering. He addresses contemporary challenges including divisiveness and injustice, invoking James Baldwin's insight that hatred often masks unacknowledged pain. The talk concludes with Mahāghosānanda's teaching about removing "the landmines from our hearts" and Martin Luther King's vision of soul force, offering a path of engaged compassion that honors the sovereignty and nobility of all beings.

Tonight, the theme of the talk will be respect.

The teachings of many of the texts begin with the phrase, "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, remember who you really are." Treat yourself with respect, honor. As Martin Luther King said, if a man or a woman sweeps streets for a living, they should sweep like Michelangelo painted, like Shakespeare wrote his plays, like Beethoven composed his music.

One of the beautiful things in the forest monastery where I lived with Ajahn Chah is that everything was done with that spirit of mindful respect—folding the robes, how you cared for your monk's bowl, the bowing before you eat, when you meet your elders, before you chant, the sweeping of the path through the forest as the trees would lose their leaves. Sweeping like Michelangelo painted. O nobly born, you who are listening, my friends, meditators, remember this sense of respect.

Now what's true, and I can't bypass it, is the recent Supreme Court decisions, especially the decision about abortion and making it illegal or allowable to be illegal in so many states that will impact especially women who are poorer, people of color. I think about how long it's been—the march for women's empowerment, when they had to fight to get the vote. They've had to fight to not be a slave, to not be raped by the person who enslaved them, to not be somebody who was just producing more babies for the man, to not be the person who is under the thumb of their husband. They had to fight to get contraception. Women have had to fight just to get equal pay, and it still hasn't happened—equal opportunity.

I think of Dolores Huerta, when she says, "Why is it the farm workers and the farm worker mothers feed the nation, but they can't get food stamps and food for their children?"

I am someone who really respects life, all phases of life from the very beginning. More than that, I respect that each woman and each person should be able to decide and live their life for themselves.

So I want to tell a story to continue with this talk tonight on respect. It's an old story that goes back to the time of King Arthur, the story of one of his great knights, Sir Gawain.

Sir Gawain and some of his fellow knights were out on an expedition across the countryside. Sir Gawain took a path that led him into a deep and dark forest. He continued to ride, to see what was there. Gradually it got darker and darker and night fell. As night was falling, Sir Gawain found himself in a clearing where there was a beautiful, almost magical well. Being thirsty, he dismounted from his horse and drank the waters of this well and began to rest.

All of a sudden, at a distance, he heard the sound of horse hooves. A horse came toward the well. It was nighttime and the moon was shining. A gorgeous white horse appeared with a woman veiled in a scarf. She took the scarf off and looked at him, and she was a fright. She was the woman who in India we call Kali, and in Russia she's called Baba Yaga. The Mayans have a word for her. She is the fierce ancient feminine—one eye on him and the other kind of drooping out and looking another direction, wild looking.

She said, "Who gave you permission to drink from my sacred well?"

He didn't know what to say.

She said, "You got no permission. You came here and took what was mine. What will you give me, knight?"

Being a knight and trying to be an honorable man, he said, "I will give you what you wish, madam. I'm sorry I have caused affront."

She paused for a while and said, "Well, knight, I've been alone a long time, and I need a husband. What I would like is to marry you."

This took poor Sir Gawain aback. He was ready to do whatever she wanted, but this seemed a little bit much. He took a deep breath and reflected and said, "Is there not anything I can do to offer you instead of this wish that I marry you?"

She said, "Yes. There's one other thing. If you can answer a question for me, then I will release you from this request."

He said, "Why certainly, what is your question?"

She looked down at him from the horse and said, "The question you must answer is: What is it that women want?"

He began to think, he began to imagine. He said, "May I have a little time to reflect on this?"—being a meditator as he was.

She said, "Yes, I will give you a year. I will lead you out of the forest, and I expect you to return in one year with an answer to this question—or else we shall have a great wedding feast."

Sir Gawain mounted his horse and agreed to her terms. She led him under the moonlight out of the forest, and he hightailed it back to the castle where he found King Arthur and some of the other knights. "Let me tell you what happened to me," he said.

They all heard his story and said, "Go to sleep, sleep on it first. We'll find out what women want."

And the next morning, the king and the knights went out across the countryside. They deputized others and they had these great leather-bound books, and they began to write down from one woman after another what it is that women want. They want children, they want love, they want land, they want money, they want music and joy. One possibility after another, and the books became filled with what women want.

Sir Gawain relaxed a little. He said, "We must have the answer somewhere in here." He lived his life, but then a year started to come up and he realized, "I have to go back. I swore as a knight that I would return, and on my honor, I will do so." So he took a stack of the bound books with all the answers and he went back on his horse into the woods.

And there in the dark forest by the well, he waited. And sure enough, after it got dark and the moon rose, he heard the hooves of the horse. And sure enough, the great white horse appeared, and the woman with the shawl unveiled herself—to be one of the ugliest women he'd ever seen, one of the least desirable of women he'd encountered. Because when you are Baba Yaga and when you are Kali and so forth, you can take any form.

And she said, "Do you have an answer, fine knight that you are?"

He handed her the books and she began to leaf through them. "No, no, no, no, no." And finally she put them down and said, "This is not the answer."

"So what now?" he asked.

"We will have a wedding. You will take me back to the palace and we'll have a wedding."

"All right, how soon?"

"Tomorrow."

"Couldn't we have it at night, please?"

"No, no, no. We have to do it honorably. I want a banquet. I want all the knights to attend. I want people to know. Let us do it in the daytime. The next day, bring them all together."

So he went back with her. They gathered a banquet and everyone came to see Sir Gawain marrying this old hag, as she was called—the Hag of Bera in Irish mythology, Kali, Baba Yaga. And once the wedding took place, everybody was talking about it, but they all respectfully watched. Then Sir Gawain and the lady he'd married retired to the bridal chamber.

She looked at him and said, "Well, it's time for us to do our wedding night lovemaking."

He was somewhat taken aback.

"You're a great knight," she said. "Are you frightened to kiss me?"

So he took all of his knightly powers and stood up and walked over to her and planted a kiss on her lips. And the moment he did, she turned into this beautiful princess, more beautiful than he could have imagined, and explained that she'd been under a spell and he had now broken the spell—in part. By his willingness to kiss her, he had broken part of the spell. He, of course, was thrilled. "Okay, I've married someone and look who it turns out to be."

"But to finish the spell," she said, "here's the dilemma. If you would like me to be beautiful like this for you at nighttime, then I will be the hag in the daytime, for you have broken only half the spell. On the other hand, if you would like to have me go around with all of your friends and all in the court in this beautiful way, I will do so, but then I must turn back into the hag at night. Which will you choose, Sir Gawain?"

He sat quietly. He did a little mindfulness meditation, reflected some metta, compassion practice. And finally he looked at her and said, "I cannot choose, really, my dear. It is up to you."

And the minute he said this—

A great smile broke across her face, and she said, "You have broken the spell. When you offered me the answer, 'It is up to you,' you granted me something that answers the question of what women want." She gazed at him and said, "What women want is their own sovereignty."

Sovereignty means to be the lady, the lord, the person who is in charge of their own life, not under someone else's rules. To be the queen of their own life, the one who decides. This is what women want—this freedom. Sovereignty is a loving respect, an awakening of respect for the Buddha nature, the secret beauty of every being.

It's interesting when I look at the Buddhist texts that mirror this story. Often people would come to the Buddha with questions and issues and problems. He would listen to them and then give teachings or advice, question them, get into dialogue, help them see in a new way. Very often at the end of those texts, when all was done, half of the time someone had some great, amazing revelation or breakthrough or enlightenment—but not always. When the dialogue was finished, the phrase that the Buddha used was: "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit." He didn't say, "Follow these teachings, do what I told you"—none of that. They had their dialogue, something was illuminated, and then: "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit." You can feel the level of respect, of sovereignty if you will, in this.

Every being loves respect. I think of the story of a little seven-year-old boy who went out to a restaurant with his mother. It was dinner time. They got the menus. The waiter came and said, "What would you like?" She ordered, and then she said, "Let me order for him. He would like mashed potatoes, peas, and maybe a little bit of chicken." The boy looked at the waiter and said, "What I really want is a hot dog and fries." The waiter looked back at the mother, then looked at the little boy and said, "Would you like ketchup with your fries?" Then he turned around and walked off. And the little boy turned to his mother and said, "He thinks I'm real."

We all long for respect. Our employers and employees, adults, children, elders, our garden, the fields around us, the quail and owls and rabbits—and bugs. I love this poem from Lloyd Reynolds, who was the greatest American calligrapher. He was the person who taught Steve Jobs, before Steve started Apple, the elegance of language: "A bug crawls over the paper. Leave him be. We need all the readers we can get."

I remember when the Dalai Lama had come to Spirit Rock along with Maha Ghosananda, the Gandhi of Cambodia. They were old friends, and when they saw each other, great smiles crossed their faces. They approached each other and each one began to bow, and the other bowed, and then the Dalai Lama bowed lower, and Ghosananda bowed lower, until finally they were almost horizontal and the tops of their heads touched. There was so much loving respect between them.

This is what mindfulness offers. When you sit and you name what comes—the sadness, the excitement, the fear, the longing, the sensations, the stories—and you meet them with loving awareness and a bow, you become the loving awareness that can honor things as they come and as they go.

I remember going with my teacher Ajahn Chah to visit a temple on the border of Cambodia. The forest monastery where I practiced was near the border of Laos and Cambodia, and it was a fairly long ride across the province and then through a dirt mountain road to get near the Cambodian border. As we went, the driver who had picked us up in a little Toyota started to drive really fast. He was a young guy and he liked to show his stuff. But it was a one-and-a-half-lane dirt road winding through the mountains; you couldn't see around the curves. He was speeding through it, and periodically—not very often—a big bus or a logging truck would come by. He would go fast, and we said, "Please slow down, please slow down." But he didn't listen.

It was quite a trip, speeding around those blind curves, hoping there wasn't a bus or a logging truck. I got rather frightened. Then I looked over at Ajahn Chah and saw that his knuckles were white. Somehow it reassured me—I wasn't alone in it.

We finally made it to the courtyard of this Cambodian temple, and he turned to me and said, "Scary ride, wasn't it?" It wasn't as if he was supposed to never be afraid, some kind of idealization.

It was as if he was bowing to it. You know, people go to the amusement park and get a ticket for a scary ride. It's just the way it was.

So mindful loving awareness offers a bow of respect to what arises. Respect for the body. As the poet Eduardo Galeano wrote, "The church says the body is a sin. Science says the body is a machine. The marketplace says the body is good for business. The body says, I am a fiesta."

With loving awareness—not obsessed and clinging to your body and not avoiding it and ignoring it, but with the curiosity and interest of loving awareness—you can begin to pay respectful attention to your body. Close your eyes just for a moment and ask: What in your body is wanting respect? You can know. Let your eyes open gently.

It's this loving awareness, this mindful loving awareness that can offer respect, that can listen and tune you to your own body, to the fiesta of your body.

But what if your body's in a lot of pain? I think of my dear close friend Jon Kabat-Zinn, who started mindfulness-based stress reduction decades ago in the basement of the medical school in Massachusetts. He went into the hospital—he'd done his doctorate at MIT and was a scientist, but he'd also been practicing mindfulness intensively and he knew its power. He opened a clinic in the basement and then he went upstairs for rounds or grand rounds with all the physicians and some of the nurses and said, "I'm opening a clinic in the basement for all those patients that you can't help, that you've had a struggle with because they have too much pain, too much anxiety, too much fear, and you've been unable to help them. Send them down to me." Later he said to me, "Because I knew I had the great medicine."

And people began to come down. They'd been struggling with their illness and struggling with their pain and struggling with how it was going to work out—a lot of stress and struggle. The main thing, the first thing that Jon did and the training that they had, was to take their seat and stop the war. Stop the struggle against the way things are, trying to fix it and change it and make it and all that. They'd already done all the medical things possible.

When they stopped, he said, "Let's pay a respectful attention to the pain, to the stress carried in your body, to the difficulty you're going through. Instead of trying to fight against it, what happens if you wrap it with compassion and kindness and loving attention?" And of course, much of the problem came from all the resistance and fear in the experience. When they were allowed, all those difficulties were held in a new way with care and respect.

But it's the same kind of respect for the earth itself, the body of the earth. Rachel Carson writes, "If I had influence with the good fairy who's supposed to preside over the birth of all children, I would ask her gift to each child in the world be a sense of wonder so indestructible it would last throughout life."

Just as we can become the steward of our body, just as we can respect what's here in our body, we can also listen to what the earth is calling you and me and others to do. I think of the monks who were terribly aggrieved when the great forests around the forest monastery were being cut down and the teak trees sold—the environmental destruction. So they went out into the middle of the biggest remaining parts of the forest and took the robes and wrapped them around trees. You've heard this story. They did a whole long ceremony to make the biggest trees the abbots of the forest and created a shrine there, and the loggers wouldn't go anywhere near it because it became sacred again. This is the body of the earth that asks for your bow of attention, your care. What is it asking of you even now?

And then there's the feelings that we have. William O. Douglas, Supreme Court Justice from a previous generation, said, "At the Supreme Court level where I work, ninety percent of our decisions are made on an emotional basis. And the other ten percent is our minds used to rationalize those decisions." We can see that even now. It's really led by feelings—what people want, what they believe, what they don't want, all different kinds. And yet mostly we're unaware; we're lost in our feelings. Each one comes, each perspective. We don't know how to step back and be quiet and listen more deeply in a connected way to what will serve everyone.

But it's not just the Supreme Court. You too carry the ocean of tears, sadness, and fear. And you carry the unbearable beauty and joy and love of this world, all in you. How do you treat this? Do you treat your heart, your feelings, with respect? Do you listen deeply?

During my second month of nursing school, our professor gave us a pop quiz.

I was a conscientious student and had breezed through the questions until I read the last one: "What is the first name of the woman who cleans this classroom, this corridor, and the rest of the school?" Surely this was some kind of joke. I'd seen the cleaning woman several times. She was tall, dark-haired, in her fifties. But how would I know her name? I handed in my paper, leaving the last question blank.

Before class ended, one student asked if the last question would count toward our quiz grade. "Absolutely," said the professor. "In your careers, you will meet many people. All are significant. They deserve your attention and care, even if all you do is smile and say hello." I've never forgotten that lesson. I also learned that her name was Dorothy.

What does it mean to pay attention with loving awareness and respect to one another? Take a pause. Listen inside. What in your heart wants respect? And what in the feelings of others around you wants respect?

In this difficult time, we have to learn to listen to each other. In this divisive and fraught moment in our history in the United States and elsewhere in the world, we can't afford to not offer respect to one another and to try to listen in a different way—because it's not "them." As Alexander Solzhenitsyn said: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being. And who is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

There he was, writing from Siberia and the Gulags, with this great heart of wisdom—a Nobel laureate. This is us, this is human beings. We need to find a way to listen to all the parts of one another.

Then there's respect for the mind. The Buddha asks: Who is your enemy? Mind is your enemy. Who is your friend? Mind is your friend. No one can help you more than a mind trained, not even your most beloved friends, and no one can harm you more than a mind untrained.

So you begin to pay attention. And with loving awareness, you see that the mind creates everything. As the great lama Khenpo Rinpoche says, the mind creates both samsara and nirvana. Yet there's not much to it—it's just thoughts. Once you see deeply, you'll see that thoughts appear and disappear. They're empty like clouds. And the mind will have no power over you.

So you have to see the mind—the thinking mind, the planning mind, the remembering mind, the judging mind, the doubting mind—and say, "Oh yes, thank you for those thoughts. Thank you for trying to keep me safe. I'm okay." You offer respect and see anew and see clearly. Who are you? This invites a shift of identity from being lost in the thoughts.

When I was at UC Berkeley at the law school as part of a conference, there was a man who had been a judge. He was a meditation practitioner invited to sit on the bench. And he thought, "Sit on the bench? I know how to sit." He'd been meditating for many years. "I can do this." And here are the instructions he gave to his jury: "I want you to listen to what will be presented in this courtroom with total attention."

You may find it helpful to sit in a posture that embodies dignity and presence, staying in touch with the feeling of your breath moving in and out as you listen to the evidence. Be aware of the tendency of your mind to jump to conclusions before all the evidence has been presented and the final arguments made. As best as you can, try to suspend judgment and simply witness with your full being everything being presented in the courtroom, moment by moment. If you find your attention wandering, you can always bring it back to your breathing and to what you're hearing, again and again. When the presentation of evidence is complete, then it will be your turn to deliberate together as a jury and come to a decision—but not before."

You could hear his wisdom in this instruction, the respect he wanted the jurors to offer to all that was going to unfold before them.

So we listen not with ideas of how it's supposed to be, but with a gracious, loving awareness. And as we do, instead of filtering everything through our thoughts, there's a kind of beginner's mind that opens, and we can see anew.

I remember a cartoon that showed two generals striding down the hall of the Pentagon with all their medals and decorations. One of them said to the other, "It really shook me. I dreamed the meek inherited the earth."

We all have our perspectives of how things should be. But what does it mean to live with beginner's mind, with an open heart, to value the sovereignty, the nobility of all?

Who you are is loving awareness. You have an original innocence that was born into you. And even with the conditioning and such common self-doubt and self-judgment and unworthiness, when you practice mindful loving awareness, you listen in a different way. You listen with the heart, and it expands the sense of not only who you are, but who we are.

We weep for all the parents who've lost a child or whose child is ill, for all those who are losing their rights. We rejoice for all the parents whose children succeed, for the sovereignty and rights that are growing for human beings. We hold them all in our hearts.

A poem for you, called "The Sleepless Ones":

What if all the people who could not sleep at two, three, or four in the morning left their houses and went to the parks? What if hundreds, thousands, millions went in their solitude like a stream, and each told their story?

What if there were old women fearful that if they slept they would die, and young women unable to conceive, or those seeking an abortion, or a child that was wrong to carry?

What if there were husbands having affairs, and children fearful of failing, and fathers worried about paying the bills, and women having business troubles, and men unlucky in love, and those in physical pain, and those who were guilty?

What if they all left their houses like a stream, and the moon illuminated their way, and they came, each one, to tell their stories?

Would these be the more troubled of humanity? Or would these be the more passionate of this world? Or those who need to create in order to live? Or would these be the lonely ones?

And I ask you, if they all came to the parks at night and told their stories, would the sun on rising be more radiant?

And again, I ask you—would they embrace?

You can feel this, what it would mean to listen to one another deeply.

I love the Quaker Listening Project. They've been going around the world now for decades—to Sudan and Libya and North Korea, places that people don't go—simply saying, "Tell me your story. Let me understand you." You can do it in your family, in conflict, in your community, with neighbors, in so many ways. But it means you have to be somehow flexible. You have to honor the sovereignty of each being.

I remember shortly after I got married to my beloved Trudy—and today is our wedding anniversary; I took her onto the Ferris wheel here in Santa Monica, in Venice, because that's where I proposed to her—at one point early in the marriage, she said she wanted to go somewhere and take a trip. I spent time planning it, trying to figure out how we'd fly there and where we'd stay. And then after a week or so, she said, "You know, I don't think I want to go there."

I got upset. I said, "Yes, but you said you wanted—" and on I went. I felt that upset rising in me. She smiled, looked at me, and said, "Jack, women change their minds."

Of course, men change their minds equally so. But there was something in the way she said it that just touched my heart. It's like—why would I judge? We all change our minds. Why would I get rigid?

And there was a sign posted on it that said, "Not accepting change, thanks." And then underneath it, somebody put another posted note that says, "Change is inevitable, deal with it."

This is the way this world is—it's not fixed. And the views aren't fixed, and even the court decisions, sometimes bad as they are, are not the end of the story. But the story will change also when we begin to listen to each other. Try it in your family; you'll find out they like it.

Even dogs like it. There's the story of this guy who had a Doberman, and he'd heard that cod liver oil was good for the coat of dogs. He would call his dog and grab its mouth and pull it open and pour in the cod liver oil, and the dog resisted and hated it. Then one day when he was trying to do it, he dropped the bottle and a whole puddle of cod liver oil spilled onto the kitchen floor. He went to get a mop, and when he came back, the dog was licking up the cod liver oil. The problem was not the cod liver oil, it turned out. It was the way he was trying to administer it or force it down the poor dog's throat.

When people ask for a little attention, it's not a little thing—it's a great thing. Because the whole path of awakening, of quieting the mind, seeing clearly, opening the heart, is based on respect. A generous heart. It's us. Not harming ourself, not harming others. Can we listen deeply?

A poem for you:

When someone deeply listens to you, it's like holding out a dented cup you've had since childhood and watching it fill up with cold, fresh water. When it balances on top of the brim, you are understood. When it overflows and touches your skin, you are loved.

When someone deeply listens to you, the room where you stay starts a new life. And the place where you wrote your first poem begins to glow in your mind's eye. It's as if gold has been discovered.

When someone deeply listens to you, your bare feet are on the earth, and a beloved land that seemed distant is now at home within you.

Wisdom and compassion for all that we have to hold as human beings. Can we actually listen in this way to one another, to ourself and others as we sit and walk and engage in our community, in our society, the joys and pains of it? Because the game is respect.

And I remember from a men's retreat years ago at Spirit Rock, there was a man—we were telling our stories about men—who had a blues radio show in Los Angeles on Sunday evenings. He said he'd studied and loved the blues for most of his life. He had a lot of listeners, many of whom were incarcerated men in prisons. He got a letter one day from a man in prison, Joe Johnson, who said, "I love listening to your show and I'd like to see if you can play these pieces from some of my favorite early bluesmen—from Muddy Waters and Blind Lemon Jefferson and a few others of the masters."

So the next week on his show, he said, "I got a letter from Joe Johnson, a man who obviously knows the history of the blues, a blues aficionado, and it's my pleasure to play first for Mr. Johnson these pieces from Blind Lemon Jefferson and Muddy Waters." And he did. A few weeks later another letter came from Joe Johnson. He said, "Thank you for listening to me, for playing those pieces. I love listening to that show. And more than anything, it's the first time I can remember my name being said with respect."

Imagine that. Imagine that.

Could the Palestinians and Israelis listen to one another and treat each other with respect? And the Hutus and the Tutsis? And the Northern Irish, and the Irish and the English, and the red states and the blue states?

But what about the big difficulties? Racism, economic injustice, endless wars, so many kinds of global dilemmas created by human beings. James Baldwin writes, "I imagine one of the reasons people cling to their hate and ignorance so stubbornly is because they sense once hate is gone, they will be forced to deal with their own pain."

And so there's pain and insecurity, and now you have to have respect for Mara. Mara who appeared to the Buddha in the form of greed and temptation and addiction—and that didn't move the Buddha. And then Mara appeared in the form of aggression, flaming arrows and swords—and that didn't move the Buddha. And then Mara appeared in doubt: "You'll never get enlightened. This won't work. You can't help other people." And that didn't move the Buddha.

Because each time, the Buddha responded by saying, "Oh, I see you, Mara. I know who you are. I see you." Not with fear, not with confusion—with a bow. "Is that you, Mara? Oh, yes. The Mara of doubt, the Mara of insecurity, the Mara of fear, the Mara of greed and aggression."

These are not small things. The power of greed, of hatred, of ignorance—huge. Civilizations, warfare, on and on. But when we see deeply, when we listen with the heart underneath all of that to the longings and the fears and the confusion and the pain that James Baldwin points to—the hurt that's underneath everything else.

I remember when Maha Ghosananda, the Cambodian teacher and colleague and friend, went to the U.S. Congress to testify on a ban for world landmines. When he came to Spirit Rock, he was raising money for artificial limbs for children who'd stepped on landmines in Cambodia, and crutches for people who'd been maimed. When he spoke to Congress, yes, he spoke about voting for the ban. But then he got quiet, and he said, "Before we can do that, the most important thing is to remove the landmines from our hearts." To remove the landmines from our hearts—the landmines of our aggression and fear, all those energies of Mara and confusion, the anger and blame and revenge.

Martin Luther King, after his church was bombed: "We will match your capacity to inflict suffering with our capacity to endure suffering. We will meet your physical force with soul force. We will not hate you, but we cannot in all good conscience obey your unjust laws. And we will soon wear you down by our capacity to suffer, and in winning our freedom, we will so appeal to your heart and conscience that we will win you as well."

Without mindfulness and loving awareness, we get lost in polarization, isolation, separation, aggression, fear, racism, violence. The wonderful thing is that there is mindfulness. There is loving awareness. It is your birthright. O nobly born, remember who you really are. It is your sovereignty, and no one can take it from you. There can be laws one way or another, but the reality is that it's your heart and your spirit—they can put you in prison, but no one can take your spirit from you, or your choices.

When you realize this, it becomes an enormous blessing. William Butler Yeats, looking back on his life, said: "I am content to follow to its source every event in action and thought, measure the lot, forgive myself the lot. When such as I cast out remorse, so great a sweetness flows into the breast, for we must laugh and we must sing, for we are blessed by everything. And everything we look upon is blessed."

We have to live true to our values, true to the deepest place in our hearts of what we know is right and wise—the actions and thoughts of the wise ones. This is what the Buddha called them: the loving heart, the wise heart, the strong and courageous and steady heart. And we must do so, and then listen to each other. To see the sovereignty in one another, and respect it, and support it in whatever way we can. For all beings. For the benefit of all.

For we are the world. We are consciousness. We are the field of awareness having this human incarnation, this human life. And what we do makes a difference. When we embody respect, graciousness, loving awareness for all, when we listen deeply, we are changing the world person by person, piece by piece. And this is the only way that it happens. We add our voice. We add our love. We add our courage.

And we do so with the power of loving awareness and the freedom that it offers.

So I thank you. And I see so many more people on the screen than there had been in previous nights. Sadly, I'm not going to take time for questions and dialogue as I usually do after these talks, because it's my anniversary—happy wedding anniversary with my beloved Trudy.

I just wish blessings and well-being to you all. May we stand up for what matters, and may we do so with a wise and loving heart for all.

Thank you. Blessings. Good night.

CHAPTER 38

Wise Society | Monday Night Talk

Jack Kornfield · 56 min

> In this deeply personal and contemplative talk, Jack Kornfield addresses the Buddhist foundations for engaging with society's most challenging issues. Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya and the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, he explores the Buddha's teachings on social harmony: meeting together with mutual respect, caring for the vulnerable, and honoring the natural environment. Kornfield emphasizes that dharma practice is not merely individual—our growing sense of interdependence reveals we are completely embedded in community, echoing Gandhi's observation that spirituality and politics cannot be separated.
> Through the parable of the declining monastery transformed by treating each person as if they might be the Messiah, Kornfield illustrates the power of deep respect and sacred listening. He then courageously applies these principles to contemporary issues: abortion (honoring women's sovereignty while acknowledging the tenderness of the experience), the prison industrial complex (sharing moving stories from San Quentin's transformation programs), and war (examining causes and conditions rather than propaganda). Throughout, he returns to the Four Noble Truths—that suffering has causes in greed, hatred, and ignorance, and diminishes through generosity, love, and wisdom.
> The talk offers not answers but contemplations, inviting practitioners to quiet the mind, open the heart, and listen with the thousand eyes of Avalokiteśvara. Kornfield concludes with a powerful question for daily practice: "What would love have me do today?" As the Buddha instructed his students, now it is time for each of us to do as we see fit—approaching even those we disagree with through the lens of mutual respect and compassion.

The teachings are not something, as I often say, that you need to take notes or remember. There's no exam, there's no quiz. They're really more of a reflection of meditation. And tonight in particular, because of some topics that we find difficult, I don't want to teach as if I know the answers. My wife would be happily smiling when I say this. But I offer it really as a contemplation and as a reflection.

What I'd like to talk about tonight is wise society. Part of the reason for doing this is that last month, after I finished giving that talk which included the long and quite wonderful story of Sir Gawain and what it is that women want—those of you who attended know it's a story I love to tell—part of my reason for telling it was actually in response to the Supreme Court decisions recently, especially that about access to abortion, but other things as well. The story really links to that in a certain way, but I didn't do it explicitly. And I felt wrong afterward, like I didn't really say what I wanted to say. So let's try it in a different way tonight.

The first thing is to say that it's a mistake to believe that dharma practice, the inner practice of liberation, is an individual matter. One of the deepest realizations that comes as we meditate, as we pay attention, as we live a life of care and loving awareness and mindfulness, is the growing sense of interdependence—that there's absolutely no separation between our body and the body of the earth, between our life and the DNA and body of the biosphere, the food we eat, and the beings that we live with. We are completely interdependent. And so when I think about teaching meditation and dharma, one of the things that's really obvious is that it has to include our embeddedness in the community in which we live.

Mahatma Gandhi put it explicitly. He said, "Those who say that spirituality has nothing to do with politics do not understand what spirituality really means." They come together.

There are many teachings about wise society. There's a beautiful book called The Buddhist Teachings on Social and Communal Harmony by Bhikkhu Bodhi, with a couple of hundred pages of passages from the Buddhist texts and teachings on this very topic. In one passage in the Anguttara Nikaya, the Buddha says there are four types of beings: those who practice for the welfare of themselves, those who practice for the welfare of others, those whose life and practice is neither for the benefit and welfare of themselves nor of others, and finally, those who practice for the welfare and benefit of themselves and others. This last is his invitation for a wise way of practice.

In another text, the Mahaparinibbana Sutta, a beautiful text where he talks about wise society, he says: How can people live in harmony? If they meet together and listen to one another respectfully and depart in harmony, they will prosper and not decline. If they honor the healthy laws and traditions of the past that other human beings have passed down, they will prosper and not decline—if they don't forget those lessons. If they care for the vulnerable in the society, the children, those who are ill, anyone who's vulnerable, they will prosper and not decline. If they care for their natural environment around them, they will prosper and not decline. Wise society.

This is a divided time. We all know this. It's reflected in our divisive politics, which are more about fear and loss of power than love. We all know this. So then how do we go about attending to wise society? It asks for a kind of courage that is in part the courage of tenderness and vulnerability, of mutual respect.

There's a story I've read before, maybe even sometime in this last year, but I'm going to read again because it's illustrative, as was the Sir Gawain story. It concerns a monastery that has fallen on hard times. Once it was a great order with many houses and monks and nuns, but with the rise of secularism and the decline of those who wanted to join the monasteries—we can see it in our modern culture—it gradually declined until there was only the mother house, an abbot, and four others, all seventy years of age.

In the woods surrounding this great monastery, there was a little hut that the wise rabbi who lived in the town used as a place to meditate. The monks, who were tuned into their environment, could sense when the rabbi had come—the rabbi's in the woods. At one point, they looked at themselves and said, "We are a community in decline. We are about to lose our order. I wonder if the rabbi has anything he could say to help us. Some advice."

So the abbot went to greet the rabbi, his old friend. They embraced one another and gazed at one another.

You know, it's tough being an abbot. Ajahn Chah went over—we took him to the Spencer Abbey to see Father Thomas Keating, one of the greatest Catholic Cistercian monasteries. We stood there, and Thomas Keating was this great big tall monk wearing black and white, sort of penguin-style robes. Ajahn Chah was wearing his dusky forest off-orange robes, and he was sort of short and squat. They looked at each other. The first thing Ajahn Chah said to Thomas Keating—we were in the courtyard with a hundred monks who lived there, and the abbot—he looked at him and said, "I'm so sorry."

It's kind of a weird greeting. I was translating, and Thomas Keating said, "You're so sorry? What kind of greeting is that?"

And Ajahn Chah said—

You're the abbot." And then he turned to all the monks gathered there and said, "You have no idea how hard it is to be an abbot. You should really treasure this man." And Keating had this big smile on his face after that.

So the abbots embraced, and they talked about how hard things were in this world for those who are devoted to a spiritual life. And the rabbi said, "I don't really have any advice for you. The only thing I can tell you is some sense I have that the Messiah that you wait for is somehow among you." What a strange thing to say. But that's what he said in the end.

The old abbot of the monastery went back after seeing the rabbi, and the monks asked what he had said. "Well, it's the strangest thing," the abbot replied. "He said the Messiah is among you." They thought, what could that mean? Could it mean that one of the monks is the Messiah? Perhaps the abbot himself—after all, he's been our leader for more than a generation. On the other hand, he might have meant Brother Thomas. Certainly Brother Thomas is a holy man, a man of light. Surely he couldn't have meant Brother Elrod. Elrod gets crotchety at times. But come to think of it, even though he's a thorn in people's side, when you look back at it, Elrod is virtually always right—often very right. Maybe the rabbi did mean Brother Elrod. But surely not Brother Philip. Philip's so passive, a real nobody. But then, almost mysteriously, he does have a gift for somehow always being there when you need him. He just magically appears by your side. Maybe Philip is the Messiah.

"Of course, the rabbi didn't mean me. He couldn't possibly have meant me. I'm just an ordinary person. Yet supposing he did. Suppose I'm the Messiah. Oh my. I couldn't be that much."

And as they contemplated in this manner, the old monks began to treat each other with extraordinary respect—on the off chance that one of them might be the Messiah. And on the off-off chance that each monk himself might be the Messiah, they began to treat themselves with extraordinary respect.

Because the forest in which the monastery was situated was beautiful, people still came to visit, to picnic on the lawn, to wander some of the paths, to go to the old chapel as they always had. Without even any words, they began to sense an aura of extraordinary respect that now surrounded the five old monks. It began to radiate out from them and permeate the atmosphere of the place—just like the metta you were just doing. There was something strangely attractive, even compelling about it.

Hardly knowing why, people began to come back to the monastery more frequently—to picnic, to play, to pray. They began to bring their friends to show them, and their friends brought friends. Then it happened that some of the younger ones who came started to talk more and more with the old monks. After a while, one asked if he might join them. And another. And another. Within a few years, the monastery had once again become a thriving order. Thanks to the rabbi's wisdom, it became a vibrant center of spirituality and light for the community and all those around them. And I suppose, as the fairy tales go, it should be "they lived happily ever after"—or something like that.

So what does this say to us? First, it talks about quieting the mind and opening the heart. Listening deeply. Listening with respect to one another, to ourselves, to our own body and heart, to those around us—including those whom we might judge or disagree with initially.

Reflecting on this: How much respect do you give to those you disagree with? And what would they feel from you? Not that you have to share the same ideas, but is there that spirit of respect? Can you see them all? As Merton says, can you see the secret beauty behind their eyes? Can you see them all somehow with the heart open—even if you disagree?

Can you see like Quan Yin, with the eyes of compassion and the thousand arms and thousand eyes? You've seen those images of Avalokiteshvara, Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion. She's called "She Who Hears the Cries of the World." She listens to everyone's heart.

The Dharma, the teachings, is the medicine for the world. And part of this medicine is the invitation to this capacity that we have—to listen deeply and to listen with respect. The teachings of the Dharma, beginning with the Buddha's Four Noble Truths, say that suffering for us as human beings in this human incarnation exists.

There is suffering individually and globally, and it has its causes—the Second Noble Truth. The causes of suffering are greed, hatred, and ignorance. The more that we live with and promote and embody greed, or hatred with all of its judgment and anger, or ignorance, the more there will be suffering.

And yet the opposite is also true. Instead of greed, the more there's generosity. Instead of hate, the more there's love and care. Instead of ignorance, the more there's wisdom and truth-seeing, truth-telling. Then the greater happiness and wellbeing. It's not very complicated.

It's a little bit horrifying to look around the world, because there are so many avenues promoting greed in our culture, promoting hatred, promoting lack of truth and ignorance. The point isn't simply to fix it. But the point is to see it clearly, because without seeing it, we can't go another way. Things can seem like they've always been that way—but they haven't, and they don't have to be.

I was so moved today when I listened to a bit of the broadcast of the Pope apologizing to all those native people of Canada—and it could be the US as well—who were stolen from their parents and put into residential schools, places often of torment and abuse, for a hundred years. He apologized. He said there's no excuse. But the amazing thing is that this was taken for granted for a long time. And yet when we hear now and see, we know how wrong it was. This is especially apparent to those who are not part of the dominant dimension of the culture—the women and the BIPOC people.

Let me tell a little moment. I had led a series of meetings for Buddhist teachers from around the world for thirty, forty years, bringing teachers together. One year back in the early nineties, we brought lamas and swamis and mambas and many Western teachers together with the Dalai Lama in Dharamsala. There we were, seated in his palace, and part of our reason to come together was to reaffirm our ethics and talk about some of the difficulties that had been happening with various Buddhist masters—not to speak of clergy in other religions, political figures, coaches, and all those things. The abuse of power. But we wanted to address it directly. We had this meeting to see how we could operate in a way that safeguards students and teachers. It was very moving, actually, and not easy, because there were some people in the room that everybody knew had been perpetrators of suffering.

At one point, one of the Tibetan nuns who'd come, Tenzin Palmo—she lived in a cave for twelve years, an amazing, wonderful woman—talked about how incredibly hard it was for the nuns and for the women in Tibetan Buddhism. How the men had the good food and the warm places in the monastery, while the women were working in the kitchen or outside. How difficult it was.

The Dalai Lama began to weep. He said, "I knew it was hard. I didn't know it was this hard."

Then Sylvia Wetzel, a teacher from Germany, said, "Your Holiness, can I teach you a meditation?" It was great. The Tibetans would never dare to do that, but you know how we are as Westerners—we're weird and willing to stick our necks out. Everyone gasped. And he said, "Of course."

So she said, "I want you to look around." The room was filled with beautiful thangkas and imagery and statues. "Now close your eyes." She guided him, and everyone. "I'd like you to quiet now, and imagine that there's a little reversal. You see the sixteen thangkas around the room of the great masters and teachers, but now you look at them and they're all in female form. Every one of them—Je Tsongkhapa and all these great masters. And you look and you see that there's a woman in every one of these thangkas. Then you turn around and look at the altar, and all the statues are of female Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. Then you look to either side, and there are all those companions in the holy life with you, all these senior women, wise women. And then you look at your own body and you go, 'Oh my, I am the Fourteenth Dakini Dalai Lama.' And you've always been born in a woman's body, because they say that even though men can get enlightened, it's much better to be born in a woman's body."

I tell you, the room was in shock, and I just loved it. It was one of the great moments, because there we were, surrounded by the patriarchy which has been a big part of Buddhist culture—culture around the world. And here was Sylvia flipping the table in such a creative and wonderful way.

Afterward, the Dalai Lama cried a little bit, and he said, "I will do my best to help women become empowered, even in Buddhist tradition, even though it's not what our culture has done before." And slowly it's happened. Slowly.

Patriarchy—you may have noticed it.

It's not just there in the religious or spiritual world. We're all worried about climate change, and yet when you look at Project Drawdown and the greatest science about what will help reverse climate change, as you heard me say, the number one thing at the top of the list is not wind or solar power or change in agriculture. The most effective change of all would be the empowerment of girls and women. That would change the world more radically.

So this means we have to listen, like the monks in that story, to one another with a kind of respect for each being—not in the old way, but in a sacred way, in some new fashion. Even those we might disagree with, like Brother Philip and Brother Elrad at the store and so forth.

My beloved Trudy Goodman, my partner and wife and also dharma teacher, founder of InsightLA, recently went through treatment for uterine cancer. She'd been bleeding a bit and got tested, and it turned out it was cancer. She had major surgery, a radical hysterectomy. We were quite worried, but it turned out fortunately to be very early stage. They said this was all the treatment that she needed, so she's gradually getting better, although it takes a while after surgery.

But some of the remarkable things about it—first of all, she wanted a woman surgeon. We found the top surgeon at UCLA, did it in Los Angeles together. And she said it was amazing. "I went into the operating room and it was all women—the doctors, the nurses, everyone there." She said it made her feel like she was in the right place.

She had the surgery, and when she came out, the nurse who came to take care of her in the recovery room—I came up to see her then—and Trudy said, "What's your name?" She said, "Petra." Trudy said, "What kind of name is that?" I was sitting there looking at my phone or something. Petra said, "It's a Thai name." And Trudy said, "Oh, my husband speaks Thai."

I looked up and I said hello in Thai. She said, "How do you speak Thai?" I said, "Oh, I had been a monk in Thailand." And then she looked and she said, "Are you Jack Kornfield?" I said, "Yes." She said, "Oh, my teacher is Ajahn Chah! I grew up in the province where Ajahn Chah was. He's my teacher. I know you're a student. We have the same teacher." And she came and she bowed and she was so excited. And she said, "Oh, Trudy, you are the dharma teacher here."

It was like we were surrounded by these women who were so loving and supportive. And when Trudy had to get up and do her first walk down the long corridor of the recovery room and back, she started to walk very slowly, and Petra said to her, "Trudy, where is your mind now?" And Trudy said, "It's in my feet." Petra said, "Yes, you must keep it in your body."

Then she started giving us all these dharma teachings—death can come at any time, you must live in the present and pay attention, and so forth. It was kind of wild.

But what's happened since then is Trudy has been sharing this whole journey. At first she was keeping it private, but then on Instagram and in all kinds of ways, she began telling her story, showing images. And she's gotten back hundreds and hundreds of responses from women who say people don't talk so much—certainly in her generation, our generation—about their uterus and their ovaries and surgery and the female organs. And Trudy just, as she does, put it all out there.

She said, "In this time, when in the culture the feminine is not being uplifted but in ways is actually being denigrated, it really feels important that we come together and see the beauty of the feminine and that we uplift it together in some way."

And then Petra said, "Listen, you are the one to heal yourself. You must listen to yourself."

I felt during this whole process these different levels of experience. One that was predominant at times was concern and worry. Will she be okay? I love her.

You know, all the thoughts that we have, especially during almost the week that we had to wait for the pathology report to find out how far the cancer had spread and what kind it actually was. And finally, we got this very good report.

Another dimension at the same time was almost as if I could become vast and silent and say, well, this is human incarnation. Old age, sickness, and death are part of the noble truths of what the Buddha spoke about. It's what comes into human incarnation. We may have many of them in fact, and that's what's happening now. And there's this vast perspective, and the Dharma is to hold it all in compassion and to see it clearly, but not to be so caught by it.

So now I want to move on and talk about something related and even more difficult, which is abortion. And I want to talk about it through the lens of sovereignty from the talk last week, for those of you who attended, on what it is that women want. And from the lens of respect, because this topic is so polarized. Whatever your views about it, this is a reflection. It's a time to meditate and consider.

Because it gets so polarized. On one side, in the polarized view, it's always bad. It's a terrible thing. We must do everything to stop it. You know that view, the anti-abortion view. And then on the other side, it can be called a simple procedure. A medical procedure. People should have the right to their own medical procedure on their own bodies.

But of course, it's not just a medical procedure. And it's not just one thing or the other. And to listen with respect requires a kind of vulnerability and tenderness as we struggle with it.

Long ago when I was much younger, I was with a woman who got pregnant, and it was a little bit of a dangerous pregnancy because she got pregnant on a coil in a way that wasn't necessarily healthy. And we also were really not ready to have a child. So we decided together to have an abortion. And it was hard. It wasn't just an easy thing. It took a lot of consideration and care and thoughtfulness and pain in some cases and struggle. So the idea that an abortion is nothing, just a quick procedure, isn't the truth.

My dear friend Yvonne Rand, who died a few years ago, was one of the main Dharma successors of Suzuki Roshi in San Francisco Zen Center. And she used to host these ceremonies that came from Japan for water babies. It was a ritual primarily for women, although men could attend, who had lost babies through miscarriage, or abortion if they chose that, or other reasons—stillbirth. And women flocked to them because they held in their bodies the kind of loss, and some men too, that it represented. And there was no judgment in it. It didn't say this was wrong or this was right. It was just a tenderness holding our human incarnation, saying this is one of the things we have to struggle with. It's not nothing.

And I know I talk really personally. Back in some of the deepest places in my meditation and my inner exploration, I had the sense, the vision, the experience of past lives and being born—in deepest meditations and breathwork. A few of those births and deaths were as a tiny little embryo which either miscarried or got aborted. And I can remember feeling I didn't have a personality, I didn't have a life, I didn't know anything, but I could feel I was alive. And I wanted to cling to that life as all life does. And then it was gone. Wow. And then I could feel the cycling to come back again to take another birth. You can believe what you do. I'm just reporting my experience.

Does this mean that therefore we should ban abortion? Not in the slightest. Women need the sovereignty over their own bodies and hearts, and it cannot be dictated to another human being. And if my daughter Caroline was to come to me and say that she wanted or felt that it was right or she needed to have an abortion, I would want my daughter to have that choice, as much as every other woman.

Now, the truth is that more women die in pregnancy in the US than any other developed country because we don't care for them so well. The majority of abortions happen to women in their twenties who are already moms and overwhelmed and can't take care of more children, or have some other part of their life where there are reasons that they cannot. And the truth is that society doesn't support mothers and children, and you know that. We are something like thirtieth or fiftieth on the list of developed and developing nations in terms of how much our society supports women and childcare.

It's crazy—10 times or 50 times as much in other countries as here.

So what does this mean? It means it's not a simple thing. It's tender and vulnerable. It touches on the mystery of incarnation. It happens—just as I described feeling that experience of being born again and again several times in that way. It's certainly not the purview of others to tell a woman what she should do. Even though I can respect those who are the most caring on the pro-life side, I can listen and really respect that. My deepest respect is for the sovereignty of women themselves.

This is really a reflection of our practice of mutual respect—of not lording it over another being, but meeting them as they did in that monastery, seeing each other with the eyes of deep respect. The Buddha's teaching on wise society is not about rigidity or taking a side, but about whether you can come together and hear one another in harmony. Meet with respect, depart with respect. Listen with the body and the heart, hold it all in compassion.

One of the things that strikes me in the Buddhist texts is that at the end of his dialogues with many people who came to see the Buddha—people who said, "Give me teachings of liberation or compassion," or "How do I manage my life?" or "What do I do in this difficult human life?"—and all the different problems people brought, the Buddha would respond as he did. And there are many, many stories and accounts of these dialogues. They end with him saying something very powerful. He looks kindly at that person, as he was the compassionate one. And then he says, "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit." It's a really powerful phrase. He gave the best teachings he could. He pointed them in a direction and they had an amazing experience. And he said, "Now it is time for you to do as you see fit." He placed it in the good hearts and hands of that individual who was there in front of him.

We live in a current climate of fear. And when we consider wise society on different sides, there's the fear of the loss of the spiritual. We live in a society that's partly characterized by the absence of the sacred, the loss of values, the loss of church. But unfortunately, the response is more about power. Who's losing power? Who has power? Not a response of love or a sense of the sacred. The Buddhist teachings for wise society say one must look not at the results but at the causes and conditions that allow for respect—of the land, of climate, of one another.

Let's talk about another difficult topic since we're in these deep waters here. I hope it's okay for you. Take a breath.

I want to talk about our prison system because it fits with tonight's teaching. The US has the largest prison system on the entire planet. We have less than 20% of the world's population and this enormous multi-million person, multi-hundreds-of-billions-of-dollars system of locking people up. There is a prison industrial pipeline that goes from the poorest communities right into our prisons. You all know this.

I remember when I brought a group of people together with the Dalai Lama—people who'd been in prison and practicing dharma and somehow got out—to try to educate him about the US, because he seemed to think things were really good here in all kinds of ways. And he wanted to know: What is your American suffering? How can the dharma help? So we brought these people together and he was astonished to hear about the prison system. And I remember one of the young men said, "You have to understand, Your Holiness." He stood up—his name was Amos—and he said, "Man, you gotta get it. They want us in prison. In my hood, in my neighborhood, that was where you were headed."

So Jacques Verduin, one of our community at Spirit Rock, starting almost 30 years ago, began what was called the Insight Prison Project.

And he looked around the room and he said, "I can't read my poem yet."

There were about 300 people in the audience—corrections officials and politicians, the local mayor, the families of these men. And he said, "You men, when you stood up and said you would not be violent men, you also gave us an apology." They said it collectively and deliberately: "For all the ways that we have caused suffering to those we hurt, to our families, to our communities, in all these ways, we feel that suffering now and we apologize. We deeply apologize." And you could feel it.

Luis said, "I can't read you my poem, because it's not just you who needs to apologize." And he turned around and looked at the room—the corrections people, the people from the police, the politicians and various other folks. And he said, "You know, it's we who failed you as well. Almost every one of you was born into a community where you as a child was not protected. You weren't protected from racism. You weren't protected from the poverty where you lived. You weren't given an education that really enhanced your life and protected you. There are so many ways we did not care for you or protect you. And standing here, I offer you an apology on our behalf for what happened to you."

It was an amazing moment. Everybody in the room got quiet. It turned the tables. And then he read his poem.

We're in this together, you know—when we listen with respect. Like that story. We can see the causes and conditions. We can see how we treat the vulnerable among us, as the Buddha said—the homeless, the undocumented, those children who were brought here as young children and still can't live full lives, even though they never lived anywhere else. And our political system doesn't care for them. We're in this together.

I led a men's group with Robert Hall at Spirit Rock some years ago. In the evening, we had a circle where men would get in the middle and tell stories of their lives. One man who was in the middle said he had a radio show in Los Angeles—a blues show. He said, "I'm on every Sunday night, and I get lots of fan letters from people who love the blues. But I especially get letters from men who are inside prisons, because this is one of the things they have—the ability to listen. I got a letter one time from a man named Joe Johnson. And he said, 'I so love your show. I listen every week. I'm a great fan of the blues. And I'd like to ask, would you play some of the early classics? Blind Lemon Jefferson, Muddy Waters, some of the other great blues masters?'"

So the week after he got the letter, he said on air, "This is going out to a man, Joe Johnson, who clearly knows the history of the blues. It's an honor to play these songs for you, Joe." And he played some of the great old classics.

Two or three weeks later, he received a note from Joe Johnson thanking him. It said, "Thank you. Thank you for playing those for me." And then he said, "It's the first time in my life I can remember hearing my name said with respect."

How about that?

Talking about causes and conditions and respect for one another—we're in this together.

One more story, since we're talking about difficult things. We're reflecting, we're meditating. Let's talk about war.

It's so easy to get fixated, because there's a lot of propaganda. That word is flying around. Now, it's true that what Putin is doing in Ukraine is terrible, but there are also terrible wars all around the world that we're not paying attention to—in Sudan and in Myanmar and so many other places. But if we look at causes and conditions, we have to understand something different. If we look through the eyes of the Dharma and respect for one another.

I was at Ajahn Chah's monastery as a monk, in the Malay Peninsula. His monastery, which was a metta monastery—that was the main practice of loving-kindness—was in a rubber forest going up the mountainside. There was a lot of fighting at that time. There were communist insurgents in the mountains and the Thai military there. It was during the 1960s and early 70s. Sometimes at night there would be firefights around. When it got close, you could actually see the flash of the guns and hear all that.

Ajahn Chah was known as a peacemaker. He would go to each side and give them amulets to try to protect everyone from being hurt.

But one morning, after a big firefight that was close to the monastery, I was sitting in a clearing doing my meditation and there was an older monk there. A helicopter came over the ridge about a mile or mile and a half away, and it started dropping canister bombs. You could see the explosions up at the top of the ridge.

I said to the old monk, "Well, they must have come to bomb those communist insurgents, or whatever you call them, who were fighting down here last night."

The old monk looked at me and said, "Nah."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, those insurgents—they live in caves about ten kilometers north, two valleys over. We know where they live."

"Well, why are they bombing here?"

He looked at me and said, "There aren't that many of them. If they kill them all off, who would give them the helicopters and all this money?"

The Pentagon is so happy that we have Russia as a new enemy again, returned as an enemy. We who are the largest weapons suppliers on the face of the earth, and then worry that we're not safe.

So we look at causes and conditions. If we look with respect, what does it mean to see honestly and listen deeply to the cries of the world, as Kuan Yin does? What is the answer?

It starts in our hearts. Quiet the mind. Open the heart. Listen with respect. See each other with respect. See ourselves with respect.

And to have both a vast perspective—that this is human incarnation. It's not pretty. It's magnificent and beautiful and creative in all these ways. And it's also difficult. There is suffering, but there are causes and conditions, and it can increase or decrease. If we honor one another, the sovereignty of one another, with respect. If we listen in ourselves in a deep way.

The text says: Others will be cruel; we shall be kind—thus we will incline the heart. Others will kill living beings; we shall protect them—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will steal or be greedy; we shall be generous—thus shall we incline the heart. Others will speak falsely; we shall tell the truth, speak truth—thus we will incline the heart. Others will be arrogant; we will have humility—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will be unmindful; we will listen with mindfulness—thus we will incline the heart. Others will lack wisdom and compassion; we will develop wisdom and compassion—thus we will incline the heart.

You become a Buddha. You steady your heart. You listen. You trust your body. You see how difficult it is to be human, and how magnificent and beautiful. You see that suffering isn't the end of the story.

Otherwise we wouldn't have Desmond Tutu and the Dalai Lama. We wouldn't have Wangari Maathai and Ellen Johnson Sirleaf and all these Nobel laureates who rose above the suffering of the world and show us there's another way.

You are one of them.

And when you meditate, meditation is just a kind of preparation for living wisely. Then in the end, you can listen to this one question: What would love have me do today? With all these things we're concerned about, can we listen? Can we approach them, approach one another, with respect? Quiet the mind. Feel the vastness of life. What would love have me do today?

So these are reflections for you on difficult topics. They're not answers. They're not saying how you should be. As the Buddha says, now it's time for you to go and do as you see fit. But they're reminders of something that you really know and that you can trust.

CHAPTER 39

Tree of Enlightenment Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 25 min

> In this gentle guided meditation, Jack Kornfield invites practitioners to take their seat "halfway between heaven and earth, under your own tree of enlightenment" — evoking the Buddha's awakening under the Bodhi tree as a template for our own practice. The meditation establishes a foundation of stability and ease in the body before turning attention to the breath as an anchor for presence.
> Kornfield emphasizes that the purpose of ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing) is not to become a "good breather" but to use the breath as a vehicle for steadying attention and cultivating presence. He offers the simple instruction of noting "calm" or "steady" with each breath, and uses the memorable image of training a puppy — "sit, stay" — to describe the patient, gentle quality of returning attention again and again.
> The meditation then expands to include working with "waves" of experience — emotions, thoughts, and sounds that arise more prominently. Kornfield teaches the practice of gentle mental noting (vedanā and saññā recognition): acknowledging what arises with labels like "sad, sad" or "planning, planning," feeling the energy move through, and returning to breath when it passes. Throughout, he emphasizes that we are not merely observing experience but recognizing ourselves as "mindful, loving awareness" itself — the peaceful witness in the midst of all arising and passing phenomena.

Let yourself sit in a way that's stable and comfortable—perhaps feet flat on the floor if you're on a chair, or on a cushion, whatever way lets your body feel grounded and steady.

Settling yourself, you take your seat halfway between heaven and earth, under your own tree of enlightenment.

Let your eyes close gently, or if there's any problem with that, at least lower your gaze. Begin with two or three long breaths, and with each exhale, let go of whatever wants to be released.

As you sit, let your body be both present and also relaxed. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find the simple upright. Let your shoulders relax and your arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body resting on your seat, and how, as you let go, the earth completely supports you. You take your seat in the middle of all experience as the Buddha that you are.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Now, to bring the body and mind and heart together just here in the present, begin to notice how your body is breathing itself—this miraculous expanding and contracting, the in and out of the breath. Exchanging air with the leaves of the trees around you and with the breath of every other living being on earth, we share this atmosphere. Feel it wherever you can sense it: coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly.

Sense this living breath, relaxing as you feel each breath come and go.

The point of awareness of breathing is not to become a good breather—your body already does that beautifully—but to use it to steady and calm the attention and become more present. If it's hard to feel the breath, put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand. With each breath, if it's helpful, you can whisper softly: calm or steady or ease in the background as you relax into feeling the breath.

As you feel the breath, there will be, of course, sounds and thoughts and emotions that arise at the same time. Let them be in the background for now. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Your attention, calm and steady, is just to feel this breath in the middle of it all.

When the attention wanders off, as it will often, when you notice, gently come back to the next breath. Again and again, returning to this breath. Like training the puppy: sit, stay. Rest your attention, ease and calm, this breath. Bring it back over and over. Sit, stay.

Let it gradually settle. Invite it to feel this breath and relax into it. This breath, rising and falling or coming in and out. Relaxing. Ease. Steady.

You're establishing a presence of mindful, loving awareness of the breath. This breath: beginning, middle, and an end, and a space arising. Then the next breath. This breath. Rest in it.

Now, as you continue to steady the attention with the breath, with mindfulness of breathing, you can open the field of attention. When one of the background waves becomes strong—not just in the background, but a strong wave of emotion, of sadness or excitement or longing, or a loud sound, or a big thought: planning, remembering, figuring out, worrying—when a big wave arises, you can let go of the attention to the breath. With the same mindful, loving awareness, you can acknowledge the wave, naming it gently: sad, sad, or excited, excited, or planning, planning.

Feel the whole energy of that wave of emotion or thought or sound. Hearing, hearing. Let it rise and move through the body and mind as you name it gently. Then, when it passes away—which it will—let there be a quiet moment, and then return to the breath.

You rest just here in the reality of this moment, the present, feeling the breath as it breathes itself, or naming gently and acknowledging the big waves of experience as they rise for a time and then pass away.

You sit like the Buddha—kind, loving awareness—allowing things to rise and pass. And you are the awareness itself. You are the loving awareness that witnesses them all.

Keep it simple. This breath, calm, steady. Or this wave of experience. Name gently: planning, planning; sad, sad; excited, excited. And you remain the loving witness. You are mindful, loving awareness, noticing just now the arising and passing. And you are still and peaceful in the midst of it all.

You are the mindful loving awareness. The Buddha seated just where you are. Noticing the breath and the waves of experience. And you are the loving awareness itself.

Rest in it.

Trust it.

So let your eyes open again gently, staying with the quality of presence, mindful presence, or loving awareness.

CHAPTER 40

The Reality of the Present Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 27 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers essential instruction in vipassanā (insight meditation), making it accessible for both newcomers and experienced practitioners. He begins by establishing a grounded, embodied presence—inviting practitioners to feel their connection to the earth, soften the body, and settle into what he calls "the reality of the present."
>
> The practice unfolds in two stages that reflect classical mindfulness training. First, Kornfield guides attention to the breath as an anchor, using it not to become "a good breather" but to cultivate ease, calm, and presence. He offers the gentle image of training a puppy—"sit, stay"—as a kind approach to the wandering mind, free from judgment. He also incorporates Thích Nhất Hạnh's teaching of the half-smile to soften the practice.
> The meditation then expands into choiceless awareness, where strong experiences—thoughts, emotions, sounds—are received rather than pushed away. Kornfield teaches the practice of gentle mental noting (planning, remembering, sadness, fear) while feeling these experiences as waves passing through body and mind. Throughout, he emphasizes resting as "the loving witness of life itself," embodying what he calls "mindful loving awareness"—a quality of presence that is steady, gracious, and kind amidst all that arises and passes away.

If you would, let yourself find a way to sit that is stable and comfortable, at ease, and allow your eyes to close gently when you're ready to do a bit of meditation together.

With your eyes closed, sense yourself just seated here in the reality of the present. Just now. Be here now, this moment.

Begin by taking two long, deep breaths. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax, and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel a connection to the earth beneath you—the hardness of your seat, your buttocks and feet on the floor or chair, held to mother earth by gravity. Feel the steadiness of taking this seat halfway between heaven and earth, under your own tree of enlightenment. Steady and grounded.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this quality of embodied presence, begin to notice with mindful, loving awareness the play of experience. You are the loving witness of life itself.

For many, to start, it's helpful to feel the body breathing as a way to quiet the mind and soften the heart. You can feel it as coolness in the nostrils, swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's hard to feel the breath, you can put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

The point of mindfulness of breathing is not to become a good breather, but with each breath to invite a sense of greater ease and presence and calm. Breathing in and out gently, you can even whisper "ease" or "calm" with each breath. No judgment—just a simple returning to the breath. Like training the puppy: sit, stay. You return gently when you notice the attention has wandered. Sit, stay for a few breaths. And when it wanders off, bring it back gently. Each time you feel the breath, you're deepening the sense of presence.

Relax with each breath. If you like, you can put a half smile on your face, as Thich Nhat Hanh recommends—the half smile of the Buddha. As you feel the breath, let the other thoughts and sounds and sensations rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel this breath gently moving moment by moment, arising and passing away. Keep a beginner's mind: this breath, just as it is, arising and passing with ease, with calm.

Now, having invited the mind and heart to quiet a bit, to settle and calm with the breath, let's expand the field of our attention. When a background wave becomes quite strong—the planning mind, or an emotion of sadness or excitement, or a loud sound—when some wave becomes strong and pulls your attention from the breath, instead of pushing it away, let go of awareness of breathing and receive that sound or that emotion or that thought with the same mindful loving awareness. As if with a bow, you can name it gently: planning, or remembering, or sadness, or fear, or longing, or love, or hearing.

As you name it—sad, sad, or remembering, remembering—feel it as a wave passing through the body and mind. Name it gently. And when the wave subsides, return back to the breath for a time. Rest in the reality of the present.

You become the field of mindful, loving awareness that notices this breath, or gently acknowledges the waves, the strong waves of experience, naming them, letting them rise and pass. You are the loving awareness itself—quiet and present, steady, receiving it all with kindness.

With mindful loving awareness, you sit like the Buddha, gracious and wise amidst it all. As it all arises and passes away, you rest in a deep stillness, vast stillness amidst it all.

Present. Gracious. Loving awareness.

Allow your eyes to open, keeping the same sense of presence as you do.

This meditation is the fundamentals of Vipassana, or insight meditation—starting with the breath or some other focus that helps calm and steady the mind and soften the heart, and then beginning to open to feel the waves of experience received in a field of mindful loving awareness.

CHAPTER 41

Beacon of Love Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 24 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers a beautiful and accessible practice of mettā bhāvanā (loving-kindness meditation), drawing on the traditional method outlined in the Karaṇīya Mettā Sutta. He guides practitioners through the progressive stages of cultivating loving-kindness, beginning with an easily loved being, then receiving mettā back from those we've blessed, extending compassion to ourselves, and finally radiating love outward to ever-widening circles of beings.
>
> The meditation uses simple, heartfelt phrases—may you be filled with loving-kindness, may you be safe and protected, may you be well and strong, may your struggles be held in compassion—as vehicles for opening the heart. Kornfield emphasizes that the practice isn't about forcing feelings but about planting seeds of intention that will naturally grow over time. He acknowledges that sometimes the practice feels mechanical or even brings up resistance, and offers gentle encouragement to simply continue with patience.
> The practice culminates in a powerful visualization of becoming a lighthouse or beacon of love, extending mettā to all beings without exception—including those who are struggling, those who are afraid, and even those causing harm. Kornfield grounds the meditation in present-day reality by referencing contemporary movements for justice and freedom, demonstrating how this ancient practice remains vitally relevant. The session closes with an invitation to see the world with fresh eyes of mystery and love, carrying the spirit of mettā into daily life.

So let yourself settle where you sit, and try to sit in a way that's comfortable—where you'll be awake, but at ease. It's very hard to do loving kindness meditation if your back is killing you or your knees. So you want to be, as you can, respectfully comfortable and present.

Once you have settled yourself, halfway between heaven and earth in this human form, you take your seat. Let your eyes close gently. Take two long breaths in and out, and let the body, the heart, and mind all begin to settle. The body breathes itself, and you can relax and let there be a gracious, loving awareness of whatever is present.

Into this space of presence and loving awareness, let us now practice the traditional loving kindness meditation in at least one form, and invite the quality of loving kindness to flower and open in your own heart and your own consciousness.

First, let yourself think of someone, some being that you know, who is easy to love—unconflicted, easy, gracious, someone you care about. It doesn't have to be this fantastic relationship, just someone where there's a natural feeling of care and love. And if there isn't any being that comes to mind, you can even use your dog, who generally speaking loves you quite unconditionally—or a little bit conditionally, depending on the dog food.

Picture and remember and envision this person, someone you naturally feel kindness and love toward. As you see them in the mind's eye, let yourself get quiet. Sense that you can wish them well, that your care can be expressed as loving kindness. Whisper in the mind or the heart some simple phrases of well-wishing, some simple intention: May you be filled with loving kindness. May you be held in great loving kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well and strong.

Become aware also of the measure of struggles in this person's life, as in all life—their difficulties. May you hold your struggles in great compassion. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

Repeat again, letting the feeling of loving kindness and care grow as you do. May you be filled with loving kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well, strong, healed. May your struggles be held in great compassion and kindness. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

As you do this, know that sometimes the feelings will arise more strongly. Sometimes it can feel a bit mechanical, or even bring up its opposite. You just keep planting the seeds of loving kindness, little by little by little, and they will grow.

Now think of another person you care about. Bring them into the mind's eye and heart—someone again where it's easy, natural to feel care. As you picture them, offer the same well-wishing and intention: May you be filled with loving kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well, strong, and healed. May your struggles be held in compassion and kindness. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

Now let yourself imagine or picture or sense that these two beings you have held with loving kindness, to whom you have offered your thoughts and intentions of love—that they gaze back at you. You can see them looking at you with kindly eyes. They want to send back to you the same loving kindness that you offered to them. They care about you.

They gaze at you and they say: May you too be filled with loving kindness. May you too be safe and protected. May you too be well, strong, and healed. Take in their well wishes. May you hold all your struggles in compassion and kindness. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

Taking it in, if it feels right, you can even put a hand on your heart. They've wished this for you, and you can wish the same for yourself, just as they wish for you—these people who care about you. May I be filled with loving kindness amidst it all. May I be safe and protected. May I be well, strong, and healed.

May I hold my struggles with great compassion. Feel the tenderness of that. And filled with loving kindness, may I be happy—truly happy.

Let the happiness and kindness fill your body, fill the cells, fill the whole of your being.

Now that the heart has invited the quality of loving kindness to grow, to open, let's extend it further. Let yourself think of someone you care about who's maybe struggling, who could use an infusion of loving kindness. As the heart opens and you picture them: May you be filled with loving kindness. May you be safe and protected. May you be well, healed and strong. May you hold all your struggles in compassion, kindness, tenderness. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

Now let this loving kindness spread. Pick another person and silently—whoever you choose—extend the loving kindness further, using the same well-wishing, or whatever phrases express your heart's care.

Now sense yourself as a lighthouse, a beacon of love. Let the feelings of loving kindness and whatever well-wishing phrases arise in you extend to the circle of all your friends and family—all of them. The easy ones and the not-so-easy ones. You know who I mean.

May you all be filled with loving kindness, all of you. Safe and protected, all of you. Well and strong and healed, all friends and family. May you hold your struggles in compassion and tenderness—all your struggles. And filled with loving kindness, may you be happy.

Now let the loving kindness spread across the community around you, however big it is—the neighbors and community, the place you live. You are the lighthouse, sending love to beings large and small in every direction.

Now let your loving kindness spread across the whole world, omitting none, as it says in the Loving Kindness Sutra. Spread to beings who are struggling. You can think of all those women marching in Iran after the death of Mahsa Amini, just wanting some freedom. May they be safe and protected, filled with love—just as so many of us marched for Breonna Taylor and others in this country. But omitting none, sending the loving kindness to all beings, far and near. May your hearts open in loving kindness. Even those who are afraid, even those who are acting in ways that bring harm—may you remember love. May you foster loving kindness and well-being.

Now you extend loving kindness so naturally that it becomes who you are. You are love, connected to all, part of it all, filled with loving kindness. Quiet now, and deep. You are like the earth herself, blessing all beings.

Rest in love.

And staying with the spirit of loving kindness, let your eyes open gently. Look around at this amazing world you find yourself in, as if you were transported from some other planet. Here you are, on earth, and your assignment is to see it with the eyes of mystery and love, with surprise.

CHAPTER 42

Waves of Experience Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 19 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield offers foundational instructions for mindfulness practice, framing it as cultivating "mindful, loving awareness." The practice begins with establishing physical stability and ease in the body, systematically relaxing the face, jaw, neck, shoulders, and belly while connecting with the support of the earth beneath.
>
> The central metaphor of the meditation is the ocean and its waves. Kornfield instructs practitioners to use the breath as an anchor while allowing all other experiences—sounds, sensations, emotions, and thoughts—to rise and fall like waves around this center point. When attention is pulled by a "big wave" of strong sensation, emotion, or thought, practitioners learn to receive it with loving awareness, gently name it ("sadness," "planning," "tingling"), allow it to be fully felt, and watch it pass away in its own time before returning to the breath.
> This practice reflects core teachings from the Satipaṭṭhāna tradition, integrating awareness of body (kāyānupassanā), feeling-tones (vedanānupassanā), mind states (cittānupassanā), and mental phenomena (dhammānupassanā). Kornfield emphasizes that awareness itself—steady, calm, and compassionate—is our true nature. The meditation concludes with an invitation to recognize oneself as "the awakened one, as awareness itself," carrying this open-hearted presence into daily life with love, compassion, and freedom.

Find a way to sit that is stable and comfortable. Settling the physical body and finding a stable seat is very helpful in stabilizing and quieting the mind. Once you find a way for your body to be stable and comfortable, if it's okay, allow your eyes to close gently for this time.

We'll go through some basic instructions for those who are new, or as a reminder of mindfulness practice—mindful, loving awareness—and we'll have periods of silence.

With your eyes closed, first take a couple of long breaths and let go of whatever wants to be released. Bring your attention to this precious human body you've been given. First, to your face. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little bit of a circle to release your neck. Let yourself find a simple upright posture. Let the shoulders relax. Let the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body—buttocks and legs and feet—carrying this weight. And feel how the seat you're on and the earth beneath can completely support you. You can relax and be held by Mother Earth just here, steady and present. Let the belly be soft, and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, with a mindful loving awareness, begin to notice what's here, this moment in the present. There will be physical sensations—all the energies and sensations of the body, pleasant and painful. Tingling, warm, cold. Places of tension and ease. There will be emotions, states of mind and feelings. There will be thoughts, pictures and words. And you become the loving witness to it all, steady and calm.

To help with this steadiness, one common practice is to start by feeling the body breathing itself—the breath—amidst all the sounds and sensations and thoughts. Feel your breath: coolness in the nostrils, or swirling tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it's difficult to sense the breath, put one hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall on the palm of your hand.

With each breath, invite a sense of ease or calm. You can even whisper these words in the back of the mind, allowing the breath to invite the mind and heart and body to settle. As you sense the breath, there will be thoughts and sounds, feelings and emotions, sensations. Let all the other experiences that come and go rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath.

Feel how this breath keeps breathing itself so naturally in the midst of it all. This breath, just as it is—long or short, deep or shallow—no judgment, just a loving awareness.

From this place of stillness, you'll notice that among all the background waves, the attention will get pulled sometimes to a strong wave, a big wave. It could be a loud sound or a strong sensation in the body. Or it might be an emotion—sadness, frustration, longing, joy—or thoughts.

When you notice that a wave has pulled your attention from the breath, receive it. Let go of the attention to the breath and receive it with the same loving awareness, as if to bow to it gently. Name it: "Oh, sadness... sad, sad," or "excitement, excitement," or if it's a thought, "planning, planning" or "remembering, remembering," or "tingling" or "hot" in the body, or "cool." Feel this wave and name it gently.

Let it rise like a wave of the ocean. Be felt and known. And let it pass away in its own time. Then you can return to feel a few more breaths until another wave comes along.

You rest just here in the reality of the present—steady and calm, at ease. This breath, this wave of experience, received with loving awareness.

You are the loving awareness. You are the loving witness to it all. Steady and calm, allowing it to rise, be known, and in due season to pass away.

You rest in the timeless present, just here. Rest in loving awareness. It is who you are. You are awareness itself—the loving witness of all the waves of experience, all the dramas of human life and human incarnation.

Take your seat as the awakened one, as awareness itself, with love and compassion and an immense freedom.

Staying with this quiet, open-hearted presence, allow your eyes to open when you're ready. Sense that you can carry this ease, this loving awareness, as you open to the world around you.

CHAPTER 43

Embodied Presence Meditation | Monday Night

Jack Kornfield · 22 min

> In this guided meditation, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners into a direct experience of embodied presence and loving awareness. The practice begins with settling into the body, taking one's seat "halfway between heaven and earth," and systematically releasing tension from the face, neck, shoulders, and belly. Kornfield emphasizes the felt sense of being held by gravity and the earth, establishing a foundation of stability and groundedness.
>
> The meditation unfolds through layers of awareness: first attending to the body breathing itself, then recognizing how we "inter-breathe" with all living beings and the earth. From this embodied foundation, practitioners are invited to notice emotions arising like weather patterns and thoughts appearing like clouds—all held within a spacious, loving awareness that remains steady while phenomena rise and fall. This approach reflects the classic satipaṭṭhāna framework of mindfulness of body, feelings, and mind, while emphasizing the quality of loving awareness (mettā) as the container for all experience.
> Kornfield addresses the particular challenge of our busy modern culture, where silence and presence are rare. The invitation is to rest in a stillness that is bigger than passing thoughts and feelings—to become, in this very moment, "the Buddha" seated with a peaceful heart. This meditation offers both technique and immediate experience, making it accessible for newcomers while pointing experienced practitioners toward the natural awakening available in each present moment.

If you would, let yourself find a way to settle, stable and comfortable. If it's easy, sit upright enough so there's a sense of both wakefulness but also graciousness. Like the king or queen on the throne, you take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this human form. Allow your eyes to close gently.

The invitation of meditation is to come into the present, to quiet the mind, to open the heart, to find an embodied presence and loving awareness.

To begin, take two or three long breaths with a little bit of directed attention and relaxation. As we start, let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body, how your body pulled by gravity meets the earth, and the pressure of gravity and the earth together make a seat that is steady and dependable. Held by the earth, let your belly be soft and the breath natural. Let your heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now with this embodied presence, begin to simply notice with a mindful loving awareness the experiences here and now. Notice this body breathing itself. Feel how it inter-breathes with the rest of the earth, the air and the creatures, and all that breathes together. Relax as you feel the body breathe. Rest in the breathing. Let it calm and steady the body, heart, and mind.

As you sit with mindful loving awareness of this body breathing itself with the whole earth, you'll notice as well the arising of emotions and feelings like weather coming and going. You'll notice the thoughts and images of the mind, like clouds appearing—stories, pictures, memories, plans. Relax with it all and rest in mindful, loving awareness. Let things quiet and settle even as the feelings and thoughts rise and fall. You are the steady loving awareness, open and gracious.

We live in a busy culture, in a busy time, and there's not much room for silence, presence, listening. Rest just here in a stillness that's bigger than the thoughts and feelings that move through. A spacious loving awareness, quiet and present and kind.

Rest in a steady ease and presence. The body breathes with the earth and the waves of feelings and thoughts rise and fall. Underneath and around it all is a deep silence and stillness—a presence of loving awareness that notices it all as it rises and passes, and remains still and loving and present, just here and now.

If you like, you can put a half smile on your lips, the little half smile of a Buddha. Seated with a peaceful heart, steady, loving, present amidst it all, you become the Buddha. Take your seat of awakening just here and just now.

Just here. Quiet. Present. Amidst all things.

Now, when you're ready, allow your eyes to open gently and keep the sense of mindful presence as you do. For many of us, there are so few times when we just stop and let silence have its place. Listen. Presence.

CHAPTER 44

Monday Night Meditation & Dharma Talk with Jack Kornfield | Feb. 19, 2024

Jack Kornfield · 1h41

> In this Monday night gathering, Jack Kornfield leads a 25-minute meditation focused on resting in mindful, loving awareness while observing the arising and passing of all experience. The guided practice emphasizes noticing the beginnings and endings of breath, thoughts, and sensations, recognizing that awareness itself is our true home.
> The teaching explores the mystery of consciousness and incarnation, drawing on poetry from Pablo Neruda, Mary Oliver, and Thich Nhat Hanh to illuminate how spirit takes form in the body. Jack shares Thomas Merton's profound encounter with Buddhist statues in Sri Lanka, where he recognized that "everything is emptiness and everything is compassion." The talk emphasizes that wisdom is not something to be gained through spiritual development, but rather remembered—as Korean Zen master Seung Sahn would tell students, "You already understand."
> Jack weaves together teachings on the Four Noble Truths, impermanence (anicca), and the nature of suffering (dukkha) with personal stories, including his mother's death and his time as a "Druid Reformed" in the Army. He addresses our current global challenges through Joanna Macy's vision of "the great turning" toward a life-sustaining civilization, encouraging practitioners to trust their innate wisdom and live from loving awareness. The evening concludes with community dialogue where participants share their own experiences of awakening, trust, and the dropping away of fear.

We have sat virtually, we sat on the land, we've come together. We've had all kinds of adventures actually, which I could tell you about at times. We've had the Tibetan Gyuto tantric choir come and sing to us. We've had amazing teachers come through. And here we are as a community practicing together.

What we do on Monday night is really very simple. We sit in meditation for twenty-five minutes or so with a little bit of guidance, a reminder. Then we take a break, five minutes or so to stretch and relax. And then there's teachings, and on occasion, as there will be tonight, dialogue and question and response afterward.

So I invite you to find a way to sit, to begin our meditation practice together. Find a steady, simple, grounded posture in whatever way you can. If you're sitting in a chair, let your feet be flat on the floor. A cushion, whatever allows you to feel really connected—your body to the seat beneath you and all the way down into the earth. A steadiness.

When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently, or keep them mostly downcast if that's better for you. Take a couple of long breaths. Let your body begin to settle. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, roll your head in a little circle to let it find a simple upright. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily.

Again, feel the weight of your body, gravity, and how the earth completely supports you when you let go into your seat. You're met by the strength and steadiness of the earth itself. You can rest on her. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the play of human experience moment by moment. As you relax and rest in a mindful, loving awareness, notice how the breath breathes itself. You might feel it as coolness in the nostrils, swirling, tingling in the back of the throat, the rise and fall of chest or belly. If it helps, you could put your hand on your belly and feel the rise and fall in the palm of your hand. With each breath, invite a sense of ease and calm. Ease. Calm. Whispered. You relax in mindful loving awareness. Let the mind quiet and let the attention be present and kind.

Begin to notice the beginnings and endings of experience. Everything rises and falls away. As you feel each breath, notice without struggle, in whatever relaxed way you can, either the beginning or the ending of a breath. The space between breaths. The next beginning. Notice how the breath arises, is felt, and then dissolves. The rising and passing away of experience. Let it have its own rhythms—rising, appearing, experienced, and then passing away.

You are the mindful, loving awareness that notices gently the beginning, the middle, the end of the breath, and the next breath.

As you notice the beginning and the ending of the breath, resting in mindful, loving awareness, you can also notice the moments when attention is pulled from the breath to a sound or a thought, to an emotion or an image. Notice how these too have a beginning and an end. There's a thought, a picture, words. You notice it. You relax, let it dissolve. It ends. Then you go back to the breath, the next beginning. Or maybe there's an emotion and you notice that. Feel it. And then after a time you turn away and that ends.

Images, emotions, sensations—they all are in change. They arise like clouds in the sky or waves.

You don't have to do anything about them. You don't have to follow all the waves like at the edge of the ocean, watching each wave carefully. Relax. Rest in loving awareness and simply notice how everything appears for a little while and then vanishes. It's all made up of ever-changing experience and vibrations appearing for a moment or a time and then gone. And you are the mindful, loving awareness—gracious and easy. You are the mindful loving awareness, consciousness itself.

The breath begins and ends, rises and falls. And the waves of experience appear around the breath, and each of them is made of lots of little waves. The sensations in the body have lots of vibrations inside them. The thoughts and images have lots of pixelated parts—colors, words, and ideas. The sounds have a field of changing vibration on the ear. And you rest in the stillness of the present and let the field of change, like the waves of the ocean, rise and pass.

Relax into awareness. Trust it. It is your home. You are the gracious awareness that notices the arising and passing, the waves of the ocean of experience. And you are the silent, vast consciousness that notices. You are the loving awareness. Rest in it. Trust it. Relax into it. Letting the mind quiet, the breath settle with ease and calm. Let the heart soften and rest in kind attention.

One more minute. Relax into loving awareness—spacious, kind.

And when you're ready, let your eyes open gently and keep the same spirit of kind attention, presence.

Welcome back. I'd like to teach tonight, but first I'd like to invite you to relax, to listen in a way that is meditative and contemplative. It's not something you need to take notes about, and there's no quiz at the end. It's really a reminder of things that you already know. So let that which reminds you or touches your heart in some way come in, and if it's not useful, just let it go.

I've recently returned from travel teaching in Costa Rica. I was there with my beloved Trudy, who got quite sick. She'd actually had an infection in California, and it got much worse there. She ended up being hospitalized, and now she's a lot better. It feels really good to be back home in our own place, in our own bed.

And it's mysterious, you know, getting on an airplane—those metal tubes with a kind of thin aluminum wall. And there we are at 38,000 feet. All of a sudden you're in a different continent. It's extraordinary. And then I come back and look at this culture after having been away for a month or a month and a half, trying to make sense of the way people move here, which is different than what was true in Costa Rica.

Who are we? Who are you that gets to travel in this really miraculous way?

There's an even bigger mystery beside airplanes and global travel. Who are we? We get lost in our phones—you know how that happens—and our to-do lists. But what about if you look up at the night sky? What about if you look at the mystery of a single tree or flower?

The mystery is amazing because it's us that's amazing. We are beings of spirit, we are beings of consciousness. Spirit came into your body to be born in this incarnation, and it will leave it when you die.

Mary Oliver writes, "The spirit likes to dress up like this—ten fingers, ten toes, shoulders and all the rest. It could float, of course, but would rather plumb rough matter. An airy and shapeless thing, it needs the metaphor of the body."

So consciousness comes into this human body. And as Thich Nhat Hanh says, "This body is not me. I am life without boundaries. I've never been born and I've never died. Since before death and before time I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds." Birth and death are a game of hide and seek—pretending we're separate, that we're not connected, that we're not the field of life itself expressing itself in some new, unique way in your incarnations.

I love this extraordinary poem by Pablo Neruda, certainly one of the greatest poets of the last century. He writes about his awakening to poetry: "And it was at that age, poetry arrived in search of me. I don't know, I don't know where it came from—from winter or a river. I don't know how or when. No, they were not voices, they were not words, not silence, but from a street I was summoned. From the branches of night, abruptly from the others, among violent fires or returning alone, there I was without a face and it touched me. I did not know what to say. My mouth had no way with names. My eyes were blind and something started in my soul—fever or forgotten wings. And I made my own way deciphering that fire. And I wrote the first faint line, faint without substance, pure nonsense, pure wisdom of someone who knows nothing." It's a mystery. "I felt myself a pure part of the abyss. I wheeled with the stars. My heart broke free on the open sky."

I start with a poem when we're talking about mystery because, as another great poet said, you can't get the news from poetry, but men and women die every day from lack of what is found there—from that heart-soul connection to mystery.

"Oh, nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are—the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, of the great lineage of those who've awakened. And look around at this mystery.

Rachel Carson, the great environmentalist, said, "If I had influence with the good fairy who's supposed to preside over the birth of all children, I should ask her gift to each child in the world be a sense of wonder so indestructible it would last throughout their life."

This is really the purpose of meditation more than anything. Yes, we can quiet the mind, we can calm ourselves, we can de-stress, we can see in new ways. But it invites more than that. It invites a sense of wonder and mystery, and with it, a sense of love.

When Thomas Merton was traveling in Asia, he writes in Asian Journal about visiting the great monastery in Sri Lanka where an entire cliff was carved with huge statues of the Buddha and Ananda. He said he stood there on the grass barefoot, observing the extraordinary faces, the great smiles—huge and subtle, filled with every possibility, questioning nothing, knowing everything, rejecting nothing. The peace not of emotional resignation, but the stillness that is seen through every question without trying to discredit anyone, without refutation, without any argument. The thing is, when you see in this way, there's no puzzle, no problem. All the problems are resolved and clear because you see that what matters is: everything is emptiness and everything is compassion.

He said that was the most moving work of art he had ever seen—to see the eyes, even out of stone, of the Buddha saying it's all empty and it all matters: the great heart of compassion and loving awareness.

Meditation in the end is not about gaining something or attaining something. Instead, we can see the world with the heart of wisdom. Seung Sahn, the Korean Zen master with whom I practiced, used to respond at certain moments when people would ask—and this was the 1970s, when everybody wanted to get enlightened—"How about this? And how about that?"

And sometimes he would pause and look back at people and say, "You already understand." It was a beautiful moment. "You already understand. This is the mystery. You already know." And it was tremendously empowering to hear it. It was a reminder to us.

Now, of course, the whole spiritual industry—of which I'm a card-carrying member and part of—has an entire wing devoted to the development of patience and loving-kindness and calm and steadiness and equanimity, and all of the qualities and ethics and so forth. The idea that if you develop and develop, then you get to be this magnificent being, maybe in this lifetime or sometime. But the spiritual industry based on development, which is not a bad thing—I mean, I've done it and it's helped me in some ways—it's not quite the real deal. It's sort of flirting with the reality, but it's not the real deal.

I was in Western Massachusetts some years ago, and one of the most beloved healers, a physician in that community, died. Because they were part of a whole spiritual complex in Western Massachusetts of many practitioners and practices, they did the kind of things that you might do. They got the Tibetan lama to come and chant, and they did forty-nine days of practice, and they did visualizations, and they bathed his body and did all this.

And then his widow, his wife, wanted to know what happened to him. So she went first to a wonderful Sufi master that they'd practiced with and said, "Do you have any sense of what's happened to him?" The master closed his eyes and said, "Yes, I've been tracking him. He's now in this Sufi heaven." And he described this place with the saints. "He was such a saintly soul." And she was really kind of consoled by it and helped.

Then she ran into the Tibetan lama who'd helped, and said, "I've been wondering how he's doing." The Tibetan lama said, "Oh yes, I've been tracking him through the bardo, and he's now in this particular bardo, and this is where his consciousness is, and he's moving from one to another." She nodded and thought, "Hmm, that's a little different, but maybe so."

Then a little while later, in the next days, she went and spent some time with this amazing Hindu guru that they'd also practiced with. And he said, "Oh, I've been meditating and connecting with your husband. He's already in the womb of a woman in Washington, D.C. He's ready to take his next birth."

She listened and thought to herself, "Whoa, here are the experts telling me all these different things." So she made a mistake and came to visit me. And I thought, "Well, she's going to ask me where is he, what do I think?" And even though I'm foolish, I'm maybe not that foolish—or maybe I am—but anyway, I said, "I need to ask you a question. Here's the great Sufi master and the Hindu guru and the Tibetan lama, and they're all telling you something different. And you're in this state of confusion. You don't know who to believe. What is it," I asked her, "that you know? That nobody could tell you anything different because you know it so deeply. What are the things you actually know? You may not know where he is, but what is the deepest knowing you have?"

She began to get quiet and answer. She said, "Well, the things I know that no one could tell me different: everything changes. Everything. Everything that appears or arises eventually disappears. Everything that's born dies. It's all impermanence, it's all in change."

I nodded. "Yes. What else do you know?"

She said, "Well, I've learned that if I hold on to what changes, I'll struggle. And if I let it come and go as it does, life is easier. I've also learned that I can't stop pleasure and pain, praise and blame, gain and loss—they all keep coming no matter what I try to do."

I nodded yes.

And she noticed a couple of other truths. She said, "When I get all lost in it, I suffer a lot. When I relax and come back to my practice of mindfulness and loving-kindness, it all goes easier."

Take a breath. Let yourself get quiet. What do you know? No matter what the lamas and mamas and swamis and gurus might say or not—what are the things in the deepest way that you know about this human incarnation? You already understand.

When I do dialogue with people, and sometimes I do at the end of these Monday classes, people ask me a question. It used to be when I was a younger teacher, I had all kinds of answers. I still do. I don't think that pleases my wife terribly much, but there they are. But I don't tend to answer right away, not so much anymore. Instead I'll say, "Let's breathe together. Now that question or problem you have—what makes you ask?"

And then all of a sudden the whole thing will unfold, because they asked me about karma. I could go on and on about karma. But instead, they'll say, "Well, my sister just died." Or, "My cousin won the lottery." Or, "I have this good friend in Europe who's decided to go and volunteer in Ukraine." And all of a sudden, instead of an abstract question, it comes from the heart.

And then I might ask, "Where do you feel the dilemma or the question in your body? And how do you touch it—with kindness or fear, with curiosity or trust?" Not that you should, but what's actually happening? And then when they notice, they relax often. Maybe I can touch it with kindness, this question, this dilemma. Surprising what cool answers come back.

And then I might turn to the group and say, "What have others learned about this kind of dilemma or question?" And all kinds of other wisdom appears. Or I might ask, "What would your wisest self do in this circumstance? Or what would your most compassionate self do or say?" And they get quiet and begin to trust.

It takes some practice. If you're young, you might not trust your instinct and wisdom and intuition. "Should I get divorced or not?" Sometimes the knowing will come and sometimes it won't, because it's not yet time for you to know. But in time, you will know.

Take a moment to reflect. What is a big question for you in your life? And what would the wisest and most compassionate part of yourself say in response? You can know.

Now the beautiful thing is that wisdom is gracious. As it says in the Tao, "If you don't remember the source, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. But when you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kind-hearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king. Immersed in the wonder of the Tao, you can deal with whatever life brings you, and even when death comes, you are at ease."

That's an amazing thing, to have that ease and graciousness. That's the place of wisdom. Wisdom is actually playful.

Here's a story. In 1969, right out of graduate school, I was drafted into the U.S. Army. I got new clothing, a haircut, vaccinations. I filled out a stack of forms. One asked for my religion. Feeling rebellious, I decided to choose a new religion for myself.

I wrote "Druid, parentheses, reformed." Two weeks later, I received my dog tag stamped with my name, social security number, blood type, and "Druid Reformed." I wonder how the army would administer last rites for that.

Stationed stateside for several months before shipping out, I was looking forward to a big special weekend—a night and a date—when the commanding officer suddenly canceled all weekend leaves. A large anti-war protest was scheduled, and he feared many soldiers would join in. I was determined to go out that weekend with my girl. Discovering there was to be a full moon, I requested a two-day pass to celebrate a religious holiday.

The commanding officer was skeptical. "What the hell religion are you?" I told him I was a Druid, and the last full moon before the winter solstice was our high holy day. He demanded to see my dog tags, so I showed them to him. He looked at them in stunned silence for a moment, then granted me a pass. As I was on my way out, he said, "Wait a second—don't you guys kill goats?" "No, sir," I said. "That's the Orthodox. I'm Reformed."

Wisdom is playful. It is. And here's the Taoist saying: even in death.

When my mother was dying—and my mother was a really loving heart, a loving being. My father was a violent, difficult figure in my life, but my mother was very loving. She was approaching ninety and had lost a lot of her memory. She was in care and then hospice, but she knew who her family members were. She was somewhat oriented to where she was.

In the last days, the four of us—my three brothers and I—were gathered around her, a couple of days before she died. She was there in her bed. She had said that one of the things she was sorry about, knowing she was facing death, was that human beings were going to travel to other planets. They were going to go to Mars and other places. She wished she could be around for it.

So there she was, lying back, kind of out of it. My twin brother—he died a few years ago, my beloved twin—he had no shame about anything. He was a kind person, but he actually didn't care what anybody thought. He just did what he liked, which I admired greatly because I couldn't quite do it.

She's lying there, and we're gathered around for this solemn thing, and he grabs her bed and says, "Mom! You know, you're getting near now. It's almost time to go to Mars!" And he starts shaking her bed. Her head is lolling back and forth. "The rocket's taking off, Mom! The rocket's taking off! You're going to Mars! You're going to Mars!" "Oh, I am! I am!"

He shook her for a while. We're all cracking up. The hospice staff thinks we've just lost it—which we have, actually. We couldn't stop laughing. Finally she settles back, and he says, "Mom, you had a trip to Mars." And she smiles a little bit.

The Tao says even when death comes, you can be gracious. It's not such a big deal, it turns out. You can be amused at all of it. This is part of wisdom—not taking it all that seriously.

Now you say, "Wait. We're in tough times. The world is really suffering. Climate change, racism, warfare, divisiveness, dangerous technologies, increasing conflict."

Oh nobly born, my friends—you humans on this planet—remember the Four Noble Truths. Suffering, the First Noble Truth, is not the end of the story. There is suffering, and it's caused by greed and hate and ignorance and fear. But there is also a path for human beings to the end of suffering.

And you know it and we know it.

Joanna Macy, the great and wise systems theorist and wonderful Buddhist teacher, talks about this time as what she calls "the great turning"—a name for the most essential adventure of human beings for a very long time: the shift from industrial growth society to a life-sustaining civilization. The ecological and social crises we face are caused by an economic system depending on accelerating growth, its performance measured by how fast materials can be extracted from the earth and turned into consumer products, weapons, and waste. Increasingly, a revolution is underway. People are realizing that our needs can be met without destroying the world. We have the technical knowledge, the communication tools, and the material resources to grow enough food, ensure clean air and water, and meet rational energy needs. Future generations will look back at the epochal transition we are making to a life-sustaining society, and they may well call this the time of the great turning. You are invited to be a part of it, even now.

That's one of the most hopeful things you can imagine—that we're being pushed. You know how we human beings are. We're being pushed and pressured and pressed into realizing our interdependence, into realizing that we can't continue to live the way we have, and that there has to be a different consciousness. And part of your task as the wise one is not to get lost in despair or fear, although those arise.

But as Howard Zinn writes, to be hopeful in bad times is not just foolishly romantic. It's based on the fact that human history is a history not only of cruelty, but also of compassion, sacrifice, courage, kindness. What we choose to emphasize in this complex history will determine our lives. If we see only the worst, it destroys our capacity to do something. If we remember those times and places—so many of them—where people have behaved magnificently, this gives us the energy to act and the possibility, the moral possibility of sending this world in a new and extraordinary direction.

Your wisdom heart knows that we belong to each other. That sense of separation is a fiction. As Archbishop Tutu said, in Africa when you ask someone, "How are you?" the reply is almost always in the plural. Even if you're speaking to one person, a man would say, "We are well," or "We are not well." He himself might be quite well, but his grandmother is not well, and so he is not well either. The solitary, isolated human being is really a fiction. We know this so deeply in ourselves.

With every breath, when Ajahn Chah said, "You already understand"—you do.

My daughter, when she was in third or fourth grade, lettered for me this page. It's a paragraph from Chief Seattle in her elementary school handwriting, which I cherish: "What is man without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, men would die from great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man." We could say women, humans. She gave it to me and said, "Here, Daddy, I think you can use this in your talk." And I cherish it.

But we know this. We know with every breath. We know that in many cultures, people greet each other as relatives. Yes, there is Grandpa Joe, our president. And Grandmother Kamala. And that weird Uncle Donald. You know, they're all members of our family. All of them. Sisters and brothers, aunties. We know this.

But we also forget. And this is part of the mystery. Just as there's remembering, there's forgetting—the illusion of forgetting. And our culture does it really well. Modern consumer culture is an inoculation against the misery.

Get things, buy things, have a new future—all of this. John Gatto, the New York City Teacher of the Year, wrote: "Think of the things that are killing us as a nation: drugs, brainless competition, recreational sex, the pornography of violence, gambling, alcohol, and the worst pornography of all—lives devoted to buying things, accumulation as philosophy."

And you hear this, and we tune out. We forget who we are. We forget the mystery. We forget the capacity of the heart. We get lost.

John invited his mother over for dinner. During the meal, his mother couldn't help but notice how beautiful John's roommate was. She'd long been suspicious of a relationship between John and his roommate, and her curiosity only grew. At some point, her son volunteered, "I know what you might be thinking, mom, but I assure you that Carrie and I are just roommates."

A week later, Carrie came to John and said, "Ever since your mother came to dinner, I've been unable to find that beautiful silver gravy ladle we used when we made that nice meal for her. You don't suppose she did something with it, do you?"

He said, "Well, I'll write her an email." Dear mother, I'm not saying you did take the gravy ladle or move it somehow, or didn't, but mysteriously it's been missing ever since you were here for dinner.

She sent a message back which read: Dear son, I'm not saying you do sleep with Carrie, and I'm not saying you don't. But the fact remains that if she was sleeping in her own bed, she would have found the gravy ladle by now. Love, your mother.

The story is entitled "Don't Lie to Your Mother." Don't lie to yourself. You know?

Ruth Dennison was asked if she could explain karma. She said, "Karma means you don't get away with nothing. Because there's always somebody watching, and you know who that is." As Miss Piggy would say, "Moi."

We're the ones that see and know. But with loving awareness, with the very practice at the heart of what we do—mindfulness and loving awareness—we also discover that awareness is big enough to hold it all. The ten thousand tears and joys and sorrows. The heart is big enough to hold it all. And the purpose of meditation isn't some grim duty to make yourself somehow a better person. I know you've got your therapy, you go to the gym, you work out—but it's not really about that.

It's about the presence of the loving heart and the wisdom that opens to this mystery, and how we navigate it. And you already understand.

When my teacher Ajahn Chah went to visit the most famous master of his time, Ajahn Mun, he described all the experiences of his meditations, wanting to get guidance—dissolving himself into light, having bliss, seeing the suffering of the world, all the things one can see. And Ajahn Mun said, "Well, that's good enough, Chah, but you've missed the point."

Ajahn Chah said, "What do you mean?"

He said, "Those are just experiences. They're like movies on a screen. There's a romantic comedy and a war movie and a documentary and so forth. All those experiences come and go. The only question is: to whom do they happen? Turn your attention back to awareness itself and become the one who knows. Become the knowing."

Ram Dass describes this as "I am loving awareness." That's his phrase. When you shift from the experience to become the mindful loving awareness itself—and because the two are wedded together—here's a poem from Zen master Issa, the great haiku poet, one of Japan's most beloved poets of all time. He writes: "Dew evaporates and all our world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting."

I'll recite it again now with context. He wrote this poem when his young daughter died. And he loved her. And he said: dew evaporates and all our life is dew. So dear, so refreshing, and so fleeting.

Suzuki Roshi said, "When you realize the fact that everything changes—everything—and find your composure in the midst of it, there you find yourself in Nirvana."

So the wise heart is filled with tenderness and compassion, like Isa. And it views the world—birth and death, joy and sorrow, so much of it—with kindly eyes.

Take a pause for a moment and ask yourself: what's asking to be viewed with kindly eyes in your life and in this world? And when you quiet and listen, you know. You already understand.

Central casting has put you in this particular weird body that you have, in the weird family and weird culture in which you were born. What an amazing thing for this ride, this hide and seek that Thich Nhat Hanh described. Central casting put you there and put all the characters around you so you would have a really rich human experience, with the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows. And with a trillion creatures living in your body, you're a galaxy for all these little viruses and bacteria and amazing things that live inside you—and gain and loss and pleasure and pain. Here you are, you get the whole drama. Central casting says, here, try this life. See what it's like.

And then you think, well, I want it just to be pure and beautiful. Alexander Solzhenitsyn—and I think of him because he was in the same prison system where Navalny was just killed—he was one of the great Russian poets and authors who also got thrown into the Siberian prisons. And yet from there he wrote: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being, and who among us is willing to destroy a piece of our own heart?"

So here you are, asking that deep question. What needs to be seen with kindly eyes? Even the horrible and the terrible. Or maybe it's your own aging. You look at your body and go, whoa. Because I've been talking to my colleagues and friends—we're all headed toward eighty. In a couple of months, my beloved dharma teacher partner Joseph Goldstein turns eighty. Jon Kabat-Zinn turns eighty. Trudy and I turned seventy-nine. Something's happening here.

And I think of the retreats I used to teach with Stephen Levine, dear friend and a wise person who wrote so much about these subjects—Healing into Life and Death, Who Dies, and so forth. We'd be teaching together and people would talk about what they've been through and what they're going through. And he would pause, and he would look with such kindness, and he'd say, "Big surprise. Big surprise." Oh, there's death happening—big surprise. There's birth happening—big surprise. There's gain and loss and pleasure and pain, all of it.

And as you get quiet, and as you listen to what you really know, there comes a kind of trust. A trust in your intuition. Ruth Dennison, colleague and dharma teacher who died a few years ago—she had a ticket to get on one of those airplanes on 9/11, the one that crashed into the field, the one that was going to crash into the Pentagon but crashed in Pennsylvania. She was going toward the gate and she said, "Uh-uh, I don't think I should get on this plane." Something in you knows, often, if you quiet and listen. If you learn to trust, you can see deeply. You can live from a place of understanding.

And trust, it turns out, in the great Zen texts—trust is really another word for liberation. Liberation, it says, is one with a trusting heart. To trust that the heart is big enough to hold it all, that you can navigate it all, birth and death when it comes.

Mary Oliver explains it this way: "To live in this life, you must be able to do three things: to love what is mortal, to hold it against your bones as if your life depends upon it, and when the time comes to let it go—to let it go."

Three lines of wisdom: to love, and to let go.

In this whole world, it's like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo or a rainbow, a dance, a dream. What happened to your childhood? Terrible, beautiful, whatever it was. Hey baby, it's back with the pyramids and the dinosaurs. It's back into the void, and a new day appears. As Maya Angelou says, "It's a wonderful day. I've never seen this one before." It keeps coming back.

And it's not that happiness makes us grateful, but that the wisdom heart and its gratitude makes us happy. This is what we really know. The path to happiness is not one of possession. Socrates used to love going to the markets, he said, to see all the things that he was happy not having. He just enjoyed the dance of it all. This is wise understanding.

The path to happiness is recognizing that you can't possess anything, even your own body. What you are is free to love it—you can love. And living, you can live as a wise being just where you are. It's never too late. Oh, nobly born.

Then you become grateful for it all. What an amazing thing to have this life. And what an invitation of awakening. Oh, nobly born. Remember that there's a freedom in you, a humor and a perspective and a vast love that no one can take from you. It's who you really are.

I remember teaching with Stephen Levine. I really loved him, and we had many good years of friendship. Sometimes toward the end of his retreats, especially when he was working with people who had experienced loss and were struggling in different ways, he would say, "If you only had one more day to live, who would you call? And what would you say? And why are you waiting?"

So we come together to quiet the mind, to open the heart. To remember that you are the Buddha. You are the wise one. You already understand. Trust this. Live in the vast love and spacious awareness. That's who you really are.

It's never too late to be the wise one, the loving one. It's who you really are.

It's been very deep for me. I cry every day, and I just really want this to stop. I just wanted to hear from you and see.

I want it to stop too. And I'm absolutely sure that a ceasefire is absolutely necessary, and it's awful. So that's the first thing. Yeah, absolutely. And I have been, and will probably go back out on the street wearing my own keffiyeh, as you are. And I've done it in Hebron, and in Ramallah, in peace walks with my friends and peacemakers from all sides—the Druze and the Arabs and the Christians and the Muslims. So I feel, also like you, not just brokenhearted, but appalled by what's happening. And I thank you for lifting it up for us.

Thank you. Yeah.

Ernest?

Yes, hello, Jack.

Hi, Ernie.

I don't have much of a question, but I wanted to share some of my story. Please keep it very short, because it goes along with what you were talking about at the beginning—about the mystery. The way my life has unfolded is that all the big changes in my life just came to me.

I became a psychotherapist. I was in the process of ending a relationship. I'd been in a workshop with the therapist I was seeing. And as I was walking home—I was in Davis, California, you walk home there—all of a sudden, walking down the street, I can still see the image of where I was, and I knew: I wanted to do what Paul does, as a therapist. So I wound up dropping out of school, and I had nothing to do with it. The universe just came along and said, "Do this." And I wound up doing it.

So many other things came along just that way—it all unfolded. I got into dharma practice because I was seeing Robert Hall, the therapist, back in the seventies, and he told me to go see Dhiravamsa. I didn't know what it was all about. I spent a weekend with Dhiravamsa, and an hour into his talk on Friday night, I knew. There was just this opening, and it all happened.

I've been involved with Hameed in the Diamond Approach since the early nineties, and how I got into that was exactly the same way. I was also going through a relationship ending, and I got a flyer in the mail. I'd seen Hameed a couple of years before and had a kind of nice feeling about him. The flyer arrived saying, "Here's the Diamond Heart," and it was just a knowing. It just emerged—yes, this is what I need to do.

I could go on with other kinds of things as well, but I just wanted to reassure everybody that it's possible to live a life that just comes out. And I can say this now, after many years—I'm older than you are at this point—looking back, I can see that that's what was happening at the time. It was just, "Oh, this is what's going on." I wasn't aware of these miracles that were just emerging. So I don't have a question. I just wanted to share that.

Beautiful. You're passing along that if you pay attention and trust, things will come. It wants to unfold. It wants to. Yeah, that's beautiful. Thank you, Bernie.

When you said, "Okay, what do you know that's actually true?"—I know the Buddhist Four Noble Truths, but what came to me is that what I really know is true is that the universe is unfolding exactly the way it's supposed to unfold. Which is the same thing, a little different way. So yeah, thank you.

Thank you. And just a little story for those who are listening: Sharon Salzberg, when she was I don't know, seventeen or eighteen, just a relatively young student at the University of Buffalo, got a scholarship to go study in India. A great Tibetan Lama was visiting. She went to his lecture and raised her hand and said, "I'm about to go to India. Are there some teachers or places that you recommend I should go?" And the Lama looked back at her kindly and said, "Best to follow the pretense of accident." A kind of brilliant answer.

And in fact, she went to India, not knowing what awaited her, ran into people who said, "Here, try this." Very quickly, she met both great meditation teachers like Goenka and Anagarika Munindra, and colleagues like Joseph Goldstein and others. It all unfolded, as Ernie is saying, in its own way—the pretense of accidents.

Susie, it's good to see you.

"I had what I can only call a spiritual awakening. I moved to San Diego, and to put things in context—I have a very healthy heart, but the timing belt was wrong. They put all these pieces in me, so I'm kind of bionic today. And I have never felt more grateful, more awake, more alive.

The awakening was when I noticed that fear had dropped away. The fear I had been dragging, dragging all my life. I remember someone asking, 'How long is it going to take to get over this?' And you said, 'Oh, ten years.' And here I am at seventy-eight going, 'Aha!' It's so amazing to just know when it drops away and you're free. I'm free. It just feels like I'm part of everything."

Was there some moment that this happened, or did it just sort of unfold?

"It just kind of—I started noticing that I wasn't afraid to speak to people anymore. I felt comfortable outside of the house. Now that my heart was all better, I could do anything. I had enough energy. I noticed that I was doing everything instead of doing nothing. My partner said, 'Look at you.' People kept saying, 'Look at you, look what's happened.' And I went, 'I look at me and I know'—I didn't say this out loud—'I know I'm not afraid of anybody.'"

Gorgeous. What a great rebirth. Hallelujah.

Let me ask you something. If you would close your eyes for a moment and tune into the joy in your rebirth, the sense of fearlessness—if your heart had a message for everybody else who's here, who's listening, what would it say?

"Be grateful. Be grateful no matter what it is. Be grateful. And live and experience the moment."

It just is what it is. We are what we are. And everything passes. Everything changes. Be grateful.

Gratitude is so powerful—it really is. Gratefulness brings happiness.

That was beautiful wisdom and a beautiful experience to share.

Maybe there's one more raised hand? We have one more.

Hi, Jack.

Oh, heavens, how great! Really good to see you.

Good to see you too. As I've been sitting here enjoying this, I remembered a story, so I'll tell you a short story if that's okay.

Yes.

I'm a retired Teamster. I attended no fancy university—well, actually, I attempted twice, but it turned out they wanted you to go to class. So I was driving for a number of years across the country for UPS, pulling a double trailer through the Rocky Mountains. Early in that job, I found myself in blizzard conditions coming across the pass in Wyoming. You could see about maybe fifteen or twenty feet in front of the truck. You couldn't really tell where the edges of the road were. And it was night. I became rather tense.

But I had a kind of secret weapon. There's this thing called Dharma Seed—I heard of this—and there's this guy on there with a gentle, calm voice. So I put the plugs in my ears. They had wires in those days. And I listened to you talk. And I drove.

Somewhere in the talk, you said something about weather. You said, "Whatever the weather is, wonderful or awful, the weather will change." As I crested the top of the Rocky Mountains and started to go down the other side, the sun and the time moved on. I'm going fifteen or twenty miles an hour. The snow began to lighten. And the sun came out and everything was wonderful.

Then about ten miles further, the clouds closed in and it started snowing like heck again. But now I knew—the weather will change.

Just don't hold the wheel too tight, and don't make sudden changes in direction.

So that's my little story for tonight.

Part of what I'm loving this evening—you know, sometimes we have dialogue and people talk about their struggles, their family, their work. But tonight there's been this garden of wisdom emerging. Your experience in the truck—we were all there with you, going ten miles an hour in the snowstorm. Or the beautiful experience from Susie of not being afraid anymore. Or the wisdom from Ernie about the world just unfolding as it does and trusting it.

This is really sweet. We're hearing the voices of wisdom from the community, from the people around us. It makes me really believe what Sant Anim said: you already understand. You do. And it's beautiful.

So let's take a couple of minutes just to be quiet and feel our connection with one another in the silence. Feel how much the world is blessed when we bring a peaceful and trusting heart to this complicated life. Feel how we can trust ourselves, our deep knowing—the one who knows.

Thank you all. A pleasure, as usual, to see you. Bon voyage. Good evening, good morning, wherever you are. Send your love—a little bit of mettā for everybody you see on the screen.

What a treat to share and to hear the sweet wisdom of those who spoke tonight.

Be well. Stay safe. Stay dry. Stay well.

It's just weather. Sometimes it's just between your ears—and that is the worst storm of all.

Yes. And it passes.

CHAPTER 45

The Garden of the Heart

Jack Kornfield · 1h46

> In this springtime teaching, Jack Kornfield weaves together the imagery of gardening with the Buddha's own agricultural metaphors to illuminate the path of awakening. Drawing from an early sutta where the Buddha describes himself as a plowman—with faith as the seed, mindfulness as the plow blade, and wise effort as the oxen—Kornfield explores how we cultivate the garden of the heart through patient, loving attention.
> The talk addresses the ancient debate between sudden and gradual awakening, suggesting that we are always already here in the present moment, yet there remains work to be done. Kornfield discusses how obstacles inevitably arise in any endeavor—whether meditation, parenting, relationships, or social change—and how these difficulties become opportunities for deeper learning. He emphasizes the importance of watering wholesome seeds of kindness, forgiveness, and compassion rather than seeds of anger and fear, referencing Thích Nhất Hạnh's teaching on consciousness as a field of seeds.
> Through stories ranging from prison garden projects to shopping carts in the rain, Kornfield illustrates how we can shift from the 'body of fear' to living as loving awareness itself. The teaching culminates in a profound invitation: pretend you're enlightened. By imagining ourselves as spacious, gracious Buddhas seeing the world with eyes of compassion, we remember our true nature as consciousness itself—playing hide and seek in human form. The talk includes a guided meditation on trust, the body's natural healing, and becoming the loving witness of life's constant renewal.

Good evening, everyone. Thank you, Ileana. I'm very happy to see you all and to be back here in the springtime, at least northern hemisphere spring, and pleased to be able to join you.

This Monday Night Sitting group, for those who are new tonight or attending, has been ongoing now for 39 years. Most of it took place on the beautiful land in Woodacre Valley, San Geronimo Valley at Spirit Rock. I taught Monday night for close to 30 years, once a week. Now I teach it once a month and other people come in. But I really love being able to see your faces on the little squares here because many of you I know well over time. I certainly miss seeing people in person, but this is what we have, so we work with what we got.

What we do on Monday night is really pretty simple. We'll start with some meditation, guided a bit and some silence. Following that, there'll be five minutes or so to stretch and relax, and that's followed by some teachings, as it will be tonight, and then some dialogue with folks.

Busy life, busy world. Let's invite the sense of presence and come into our meditation time.

Find a way to sit that is comfortable and gracious for your body. There's enough suffering in life without actually adding to it from your meditation. Find it comfortable and stable. Let yourself settle. Settle in your place this moment where you are on this earth. And if you're comfortable doing so, let your eyes close gently.

Just begin to tune in. Take two long breaths and let them be an invitation for body and heart and mind to come into the present, to open and soften and make space.

As you tune in with mindful, loving attention to this moment, start with awareness of your body. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Roll your head in a little circle if you wish to release your neck and let it find a simple upright. Relax the shoulders and let the arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight of your body, how gravity pulls you down to the seat, the chair, your feet, your buttocks into the earth, and feel that solidity, how your body is completely supported just where you are.

Relax. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Here you take your seat in this human form, halfway between heaven and earth, with a loving awareness just now. You could say meditation is an act of love, of bringing loving attention to life right here and now.

As you do, let yourself open to the spirit of trust. The way you can sense this most easily is to bring your awareness to the rhythm of your breath. Notice how it breathes itself. You don't have to do anything. It comes in, the chest and belly rise and fall, goes out like the waves of the ocean. You can trust the breath breathing itself. Feel the breath just as it is—deep or shallow, doesn't matter. Let it breathe how it wants, and receive it as an act of trust.

If it's helpful, you can sense yourself breathing in the ocean of air that you exchange, that every breath brings in fresh new oxygen and air to your body and you breathe out carbon dioxide. You inter-breathe with the trees around you, who drink up the CO2 and breathe out oxygen in return.

And the breath breathes itself with the krill in the ocean and the lemurs in the forests of Madagascar, and the teenagers out on their first date—they're all breathing with you. And you can trust this because you're resting in the breath of the earth that breathes you in all things. Relax into it. Trust in the rhythm of the breath. Gracious and easy. You are breathed by the earth. Trust it.

If you like, you can put a half smile on your lips. You become the Buddha seated under your own tree of enlightenment, sensing the rhythm of life. You take your seat in the midst of it all.

And as the breath breathes itself, invite the mind to quiet and the heart to soften. A sense of benevolent presence, a mindful loving presence, to receive whatever is here with kindness.

And as you breathe, as the breath breathes itself, you can also sense with this trust how the body heals itself. You don't have to breathe the breath. And similarly, every twenty-four hours, one hundred billion new red blood cells are born in your body, renewing your blood, just now. And if you scratch yourself or you fall and break a bone, if you sit quietly, the bones begin to heal. The scratch covers over and the body heals itself. Just as the breath breathes itself, this body too tends and heals itself. Rest in this trust. Feel the endless creativity of renewal, breath by breath, in the whole of your body. Loving awareness and trust, allowing the rhythms of life to renew again with each breath and each moment.

And just as the breath breathes itself so naturally, and the body renews itself and heals itself, so too the heart heals itself. There are times of loss and grief, of pain—but they're not the end of the story. There are all the emotions of longing and love and fear and joy that the heart opens to, and even in the great pains of life, in its own season, the heart finds its way to mend and hold them. Not pushing them away or denying, but as a field of loving awareness, allowing the cycles of loss and gain and pleasure and pain, all the movements of the heart, like the breath, to come, to be known, and in their time to come to a resolution in love. To be healed.

Stay simple and present with the breathing of life. Rest in mindful, loving awareness just now.

And as you feel the breath inter-breathing with all things, the recreation of the breath, one breath at a time, renewing—and the body which renews itself, which heals, which renews—and the heart which heals itself—you can feel the trust. Your attention is an act of love, noticing this creative recreation.

And let your awareness open further to the earth around you. If you're in the Northern hemisphere and it's springtime, there's this amazing recreation of green and flower and bloom every year, wherever you are on the earth. I remember going where there'd been a forest fire, and it rained, and two years later that earth was so thick with green and bushes and young trees insisting on rebirth.

And you breathe gently and feel how the earth renews herself just as you breathe. Trust it. And you sit in this vast stream of recreation—body and heart, mind and earth around you. You sit as a Buddha, witnessing the earth recreating itself in all things. You rest in mindful loving awareness and a timeless trust. You are the loving witness of all things renewing themselves again and again. Change and renewal. You are the loving witness. You are the awakened mindfulness and love itself, witnessing life. Steady and gracious amidst it all.

When you're ready, allow your eyes to open gently. Come back to the visual realm. And let yourself stay with a sense of loving awareness and presence.

And we'll take a five-minute break. If you can remain silent, that would be good. And then we'll come back for teachings.

Hi again, dear friends.

So now we have this part of the Monday night sitting group, which is the teachings. My invitation to you is to take this as a time to relax and listen in a meditative way. You don't have to take notes, you don't have to remember anything—no quiz. Just listen and notice if there are things that touch your heart, that ring true. Let them be a reminder. And things that don't seem helpful, you can simply let them go. This is a kind of inner meditation: to notice, from the outer words and stories and forms, what happens in here. A kind of invitation.

Tonight I'd like to give a talk that's a teaching I've given in previous years—with some stories you may have heard before, as they're among my favorites, and some new ones. It seems particularly fitting since this is the first week of spring in the Northern hemisphere, and we had the eclipse of the moon last night with the solar eclipse coming.

I remember some years ago going up on top of Mount Tamalpais when there was a transit of Venus to be viewed through a telescope across the face of the sun. There were a number of telescopes set up, and I remember looking into the eyepiece. There was that amazing, roiling fire disc of our star, the sun. In a big telescope it's extraordinary to watch because it's alive—like an ocean of color and fire. And then there was this little black dot, like a tiny marble, Venus making its way over the course of two hours across the face of the sun.

It was like seeing the music of the spheres, because I could feel: oh, that's the size of our planet too. Our little planet—ours is the little blue one, the next one out from Venus—making its circuit around our star. This is us.

We have the music of the spheres and the season of renewal of spring, which is also celebrated in Easter and other renewal holidays after long winters or rains. You walk out sometimes and spring pops. The plum blossoms are there, the forsythia are blooming, the quince. I actually planted quince and forsythia at Spirit Rock knowing that we had the two-month winter retreat in February and March. I wanted people to see the flowers start to come out as their heart and mind opened in that long retreat.

Now there's an old debate in Buddhist teachings about awakening being gradual or sudden. Is it sudden, like spring comes—there you are, you can sort of see the buds on the trees, and then a warm day and it all pops out and the flowers bloom? Or is it a gradual process?

From the sudden awakening perspective, the question is: where are we going? We're not going from here to there. We're going from there to here. From all the ways we may somehow be thinking we're somewhere else, to remember that we're always here in the present.

Meditation, says Alan Watts, is kind of like making music or dancing. The point of making music is not to get to the end of the piece. If that were true, the fastest musicians would be the best: "I got through that piece, give me another one!" Or the point of dancing isn't to have your partner and then dance them down to the grocery store or to some errand. The point of making music and the point of dancing is to be in rhythm just where you are.

And Alan Watts goes on: so the point of meditation isn't some goal that we're going to get to, but the coming into harmony here and now, always. This is T.S. Eliot's phrase—the still point, a condition of complete simplicity, here and now. Asking a surrender of everything. You could call it the reality of the present. A condition of complete simplicity.

And so here we are. Be here now.

Ajahn Chah tried to describe it in the metaphor of still flowing water. Still flowing water.

When we get quiet and take a walk outside with the mind a little quiet and the heart and body open, we become something like the phrase from Mary Oliver. She says, "I was a bride married to amazement," because we sense the mystery of life. We don't know, we can't explain—but we can engage it with our awareness, with our heart. A timeless awareness. We become that space of witnessing, of loving awareness itself, timeless awareness that notices, as we did in the meditation, how everything renews itself.

And the planet circles the sun, and we become the space that holds it all. This is the spacious awareness of awakening, of the Buddha.

And then the mystery is what it is, but somehow in the space of our awareness, joy and sorrow and birth and death and praise and blame and gain and loss—all the opposites that make up human life—are felt as a kind of rhythm or harmony, like the Tao.

And we all know this. We've had our moments. Maybe walking high in the mountains, or sitting with someone as they're giving birth, or giving birth yourself as a woman, or sitting with someone as they die in that mysterious moment when consciousness leaves the body, silent like a falling star. We know the sense of mystery and rhythm—lying on the grass in the summer and looking at the night sky, or listening to a transporting piece of music, or taking psychedelics, or going on retreat. We've all touched it. We've all had the sense of the mystery and the cosmic dance.

And as one Zen master, Rinzai, speaks of it in perfection, he says, "When I understood, I could go into the three deepest hells as if playing in the fairground and cavort with the most ferocious wild animals, because I saw it all as part of this great dance—all of it."

And even sometimes, in a blessed way, when I've gone in to do prison work or to refugee camps where people are suffering, sometimes immensely, there will be certain people who say, "I may be behind bars, but I'm free." Or they're in a refugee camp and they beam at you with such love and presence. And you can feel from them that the circumstances don't touch the true heart that they are, that true free loving awareness. They become this.

So take a moment to reflect yourself. What were the times when you've experienced this timeless dance of mystery? The perfection of it all, with its ocean of tears and its unbearable beauty. You remember, because you know this. And you don't want to wait till you float out of your body when you die and look back and say, "Wow, that was an amazing incarnation, wasn't it?" You actually want to have it now. To be married to amazement.

And so this is the beautiful revelation of sudden awakening—to see the world, the timeless vision of this world recreating itself, and to be at the still point of the turning world.

And yet there's another side, because we are creatures of paradox. Zen master Suzuki Roshi put it so simply. He said, "You're perfect just the way you are, and there's still room for improvement."

One of the great Korean Zen masters, Sunil, spoke of it in a different way. He said the Zen path for him was one of sudden realization and then gradual practice. Instead of practice to get to realization, it was the mystery, the realization, and then the fulfillment of it. You're perfect just the way you are. Take that in, because it's true. And then, with a smile and playfully, he said, "And there's still room for improvement."

And we can see this. We can see the ways that we get lost in what's called the body of fear—the small, separate sense of self, our confusion and ignorance and grasping, the kind of pains that we go through that stick, the trauma that we have. The way we get lost. And we live in a culture of the absence of the sacred, that takes us away from the sense of mystery.

So how do we shift this? How do we work with this—to shift from the body of fear, this illusion of separateness, to live with that deep realization?

Early one morning, while out on his alms round, the Blessed One, the Buddha, approached an area being plowed in springtime, where a wealthy Brahmin was distributing food to his workers. When the Brahmin saw the Buddha with an alms bowl, he said, "Oh monk, I plow and sow, and having plowed and sown, I eat. Do you likewise plow and sow, and having done so, you eat?"

He was confronting the Buddha, saying, "Listen, I'm a landowner, I have people work for me and I work, and then I get food. How about you with your alms bowl?"

And the Buddha looked back and said, "I also plow and sow, and having done so, I eat."

And the Brahmin said, "You claim this, but I see no plow. What is it you do?"

The Buddha replied, "Faith is the seed and composure the rain. Clarity is my plow and yoke. Compassion is my guide pole and mind is the harness. Mindfulness is the plow blade and my goad—caring in action and speech. I use truth to weed and cultivate release. Wise effort is my oxen, drawing the plow steadily toward freedom without regret."

This is how I plow, and it bears the fruit of freedom—the deathless itself.

At this point, the Brahmin, the wealthy landowner, says, "I see that you are a plowman. Let me place some food into your bowl." And he tried to put food into the Buddha's bowl. When he poured the rice gruel into the bowl, it hissed and a huge cloud of steam rose up—or so the story tells.

I love these old mythological weavings in the story, because the metaphor here is that if you've ever touched a plow blade after it digs a furrow across a field, it gets really, really hot. It can almost get red hot from plowing. And so the Buddha's alms bowl becomes the plow blade, and putting anything wet in it causes it to hiss because he's been plowing.

I love this text, this encounter that's described. As the Buddha talks about planting seeds with faith and trust and mindfulness, and as we practice—as we establish over the months and years of our own meditation our mindful loving awareness, as we establish loving kindness and forgiveness and compassion as our practices—they too become part of what bears the fruit of inner freedom, inner wellbeing. And you can feel it in yourself. It grows, it opens, it flourishes.

So good. Now we're plowing, we've put in beautiful seeds—faith and trust, energy, the oxen of wise effort, mindfulness and so forth. But then what? Obstacles arise.

If you have a garden, there are weeds, insects, drought, storms, gophers—all kinds of things you have to work with once you've planted your seeds. All of you who are gardeners know this very well. And similarly, whatever else you choose to do as an activity, whatever you devote yourself to—be that field, if you will, of attention—when you do it, obstacles will arise.

If you start a business, at some point there will be obstacles: a key employee quits, the market changes, you don't have enough capital, there are supply chain problems, there's competition. If you're parenting—oh my gosh, it's an obstacle course. First, they want to put everything in their mouth. I remember when my daughter—we were driving down the coast, I don't know how many months old she was, like five months or something—she grabbed a penny and put it in her mouth. I looked and it was gone; she'd swallowed it. We called her pediatrician: "What do we do? Is this an emergency?" And the pediatrician said, "It's okay. It'll be all right." I was still quite worried. Two days later, I was changing her diaper, and in the diaper was the shiniest penny I'd ever seen.

But there you are. You've got a kid and they want to put things in their mouth, or they're in preschool and they hit each other with blocks and you say, "No, no, use your words," or "Don't run into the street." They learn to ride a bicycle and they fall. They go through puberty—remember that one? And then they learn to drive. And then there's sexuality and their independence. Lots of obstacles. And you have to keep steadily continuing your care.

The same holds true for social change. The money dries up, the activists burn out, the politics change. Or in love relationships—at first, it seems so compatible. You fall in love. But we all know that story. As you get close, the shadows arise, the difficulties come as well. And that's what love is about: how to tend the obstacles.

And you sure enough know it in meditation. That's why there are all these texts about the hindrances—the arising of fear and anxiety and doubt and confusion and anger and all of those kinds of things.

The poet Hafez says: "Don't surrender your loneliness so quickly. Let it season you. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few divine ingredients can."

And so instead of getting rid of these things as you meditate—because they will all come up—you watch your mind. Remember that roadside billboard someone saw driving across Arizona: "Your own tedious thoughts, next 200 miles." I think it was actually in a cartoon. But you sit with all these things, and as you practice, whether you're a parent or a business person or a meditator, the obstacles come and the hindrances arise, and you become the loving witness that tends them with care.

A poem for you:

My son comes into the kitchen and asks if he can have an avocado. Avocado, he says, loving the weight of each green syllable on his five-year-old tongue. Avocados represent an immense step for him, an evolutionary leap far beyond the narrow confines of cornflakes wherein he has dwelt for so long. The breast, the cornflakes, the avocado—such has been his journey thus far. You'll have to wait until they're ripe, I tell him. Do you want some cereal instead? No thanks, he says, and wanders back into the world of being five, while I, doing dishes at this point, start thinking about ripening and how glad I am that it takes time. And his own ripening will be years in the making. Years, I say aloud, enjoying that long luxurious syllable, like a cat stretching out my tongue. As Michael comes in again—it's been five minutes—and asks, are they ripe yet?

This is from George Mugier, "Are They Ripe Yet?" And that's what we see too when we sit: the impatience, and where are we going, and are we there yet?

I love the story of these two men who went up to the great botanical garden in Montreal. They drove up because it has the largest collection of bonsai in North America. They drove a long way to get there, this man and his husband. And they got to the gates and they were locked—it was closed that week. One of them chided the other and said, "Didn't you look into it?" You know how it is as a couple. "Weren't you supposed to figure that out? We came all this way and it's closed."

But the other, who was in a more contemplative mood in his life, said, "The gates are closed. Let's just take a breath." And he started to walk, like doing walking meditation, in front of these huge gates and the great facade and the sign of the Montreal Botanical Garden. Then he began to walk further, slowly, just contemplating: What's the next move? What will we do? His partner followed him and they walked further around the side of the great garden. After about five minutes of walking, the fence disappeared and you could just go in. It turned out there was a big gate and a big front, but it wasn't walled in all the way around.

It was that patience of allowing space to open—saying, instead of trying to break down the gates or blame, "Hey, let's take a breath. Let's walk a little. Let's see what there is. Let's see what wants to unfold."

And so we practice. We make space. The text says: As the farmer channels water to his crops and as the carpenter turns his wood, so the wise one pays attention graciously to what's in front of them, directing their heart and mind.

Let yourself reflect for a moment on the quality of loving presence and what it's like when you're not in a hurry, when you're trusting. Presence becomes an act of love and graciousness, space opening. Remember when this happens for you. You can know. Delicious, isn't it, when you remember it?

That's what meditation does. It makes space. We step out of the thrall of our plans and our thoughts and our reactions and how it should be and what's happened and what should happen. Out of the fears and confusions and sadness and excitement and all of those things. And we become the space of awareness, of loving awareness that says, "Yes, it's an act of love."

And then what? Well, the texts say you want to plant good seeds.

He says, consciousness is like a field filled with all kinds of seeds. And for human beings, these are seeds of fear and anger and greed and hatred and confusion—and seeds of love and caring, seeds of wisdom and understanding, seeds of mindfulness and forgiveness. Which seeds will grow?

He goes on: When you tend your garden and you water the seeds of respect and presence, of love and kindness, of mindfulness itself, those are the seeds that will grow. If you water the seeds of anger, anger grows. If you water the seeds of kindness, you practice it, you tend it, you remember it—it grows. It means that you stay connected to your deep intention.

Thoreau put it this way. He said, "Though I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there and I'm prepared to expect miracles."

"Oh nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you are. Sons and daughters of the Buddha, nobly born, you have within you good seeds. And the Buddha goes on: it's not by caste or race or creed or background, by religion or wherever or however you're born, whatever body or incarnation or ability. He says one is noble by heart. If there's nobility in the heart, that is what brings awakening. "Oh nobly born," these texts begin, reminding you of your own good seeds.

I love this story. I have told it over the years. There was a teacher in Ohio, a high school math teacher, who had a student she liked quite a lot and became close to. It turned out that in her class, in the autumn semester near Thanksgiving, the class was getting really restless. She was watching the teenagers and how critical they can be of themselves and one another. So before the holiday, in the last class, she wrote the name of every one of the thirty-one students in the class on the blackboard. She asked them to copy it down and then to write on that piece of paper one thing that they observed that they liked or appreciated or admired about that student in their class. Before the holiday, she collected them.

Then in the springtime, again before spring break—the class was rowdy and nobody was learning math anyway—she called the class to attention and handed back a gift. She had taken those thirty-one pages and cut them apart, put the name of a student at the top of each page, and pasted in the thirty-one good things that their fellow students had said of them. People got them and read them and loved them.

Well, it turns out that Billy, we'll call him, was in the class—a bit of a cutup, but also really sweet, and she had a great connection with him. He went into the military, and his mother called the teacher two or three years later and said, "I have to tell you, I'm so sorry. I know he was one of your favorite students. He was killed in action in the Middle East. We're having a memorial service this weekend and I thought you might want to come."

So the teacher went, and there at the graveside, people stood and spoke about Billy and their affection for him. Then his mother turned to the teacher and said, "You know, they sent back to me everything Billy was carrying on the field of battle. And one of the things in his pocket was this." She opened that page—that had obviously been opened and closed many times—with the thirty-one things that people had written that they liked about Billy or appreciated. Then the girl next to her said, "Oh, I always carry mine," and took it out of her purse. And a boy across the way said, "Yeah, I carried it with me when I got married, in my wedding."

It's such an extraordinary thing, not only to sense the good seeds that we carry, but to acknowledge them and to water them. Because it's who you really are. You sense them and you tend them.

And then the Buddhist texts go on: "As a bee gathers nectar and perfume from the flowers without marring their beauty, let the wise one wander, bringing blessings to many and harm to none."

So we feed these seeds of goodness with our attention and our care and our forgiveness and our kindness—all those different dharma qualities. We nourish them, remember them, sense them, inhabit them.

But what's important also is not to be idealistic about it. You're not trying to make some beautiful house, you know, those magazines—House and Garden—"I'm going to make this photogenic life and post it on Instagram and become a Buddhist influencer." It's not about perfection.

Remember the story of the young physician who was driving her four or five-year-old daughter to preschool, kid in the child seat in the back. Her little daughter opened her doctor's bag and pulled out the stethoscope, playing with it, and put it in her ears like she'd seen her mother do. The mother in the front seat glanced back and thought, "Oh, maybe my daughter will go to medical school, she'll be a doctor like me"—all the thoughts that parents might have. Then the little girl took the other end of the stethoscope, put it up to her mouth, and said, "Welcome to McDonald's."

May I take your order, please?

We have so many ideas about how it's supposed to be. But as the bee gathers the nectar and perfume from flowers without marring their beauty, so let the wise ones attend to whatever arises and bring kindness and blessing—not their ideas about it, but the actual experience of the way things are.

And then you just stay steady. Again, the poetry of the Buddha: just as the rainwater jar is filled drop by drop, so may those who practice loving-kindness and presence find their hearts filled with drops of awareness and love.

And of course, the conditions all keep changing. Sometimes it's hot or cold, the sun's out, there are big storms. You know about the changing conditions. You know about the difficulties. And when we live in the heart, when we live in the space of loving awareness, of the inner freedom that is your birthright—when things are difficult, you ask, what's the lesson here? What is this inviting me to understand or grow in? Growing in courage, growing in forgiveness, fearlessness, growing in perseverance or compassion, growing in understanding.

My teacher Ajahn Chah loved difficult conditions. He loved it when we had a hard time. We were in an ascetic forest monastery where things were really tough, and he relished that it was tough. At times he would ask us, "When did you learn the most? When things were easy? Or when did you really learn in your own heart the deep dharma?"

This from Karlfried Dürckheim, a Zen teacher: "The person who, being really on the way, falls upon hard times in the world will not as a consequence turn only to those friends who offer refuge and comfort so their old self can survive. Rather, they will seek out those who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the spirit of true awakening."

So you're doing your garden, you're planting, you're practicing, you're watering the seeds—and baby, it'll get tough. People die. People get sick. Your body will get sick. You'll lose things. Finances go up and down. All the things of life will happen. This is your practice. And not in a glib way. This is the place to find that which is timeless and indestructible.

Reflect for a minute. Take a pause. And remember when you've gone through serious difficulties—we all have—and what you were called to learn in your heart.

What you begin to notice when you reflect in this way is the magic of a shift of identity. When you get through those difficulties, you become what Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows." You become the field of mindful, loving awareness itself. You become like the Bodhisattva—the being who goes through difficulties not only to go through them and to awaken with all those seeds, but in some deep way, from that, to be able to offer that spirit of freedom to whatever else you encounter and touch.

This happens—you know this. You know when you've gone through something difficult that when you finished, you became something bigger and wiser and freer. And for the Bodhisattva, it's like they say, "Yes, is there something difficult to do around here? Someone in difficulty?" And you turn toward it and say, "Aha, perfect place to practice."

I love the story of Kathy Sneed. She worked in the sheriff's office in the city and county of San Francisco. Then she got sick and was looking to somehow change her work due to serious illness, but still needed to work. She got permission—there had been an old garden as part of a very large jail complex—to help the inmates there plant a garden. And that was the beginning of Kathy Sneed's prison garden project. People were really dubious about it, saying, "Hey, these inmates, these prisoners can be mean and lazy. Why would they ever want a garden?"

But of course, Kathy, who had witnessed the racist poverty pipeline into prisons over the years—where people came in from communities with so few resources—understood that this is often where you end up if you were born into that kind of poverty. She said, "Give me a chance."

And she got some men to go out and dig some beds. She got volunteer gardening centers to deliver good soil and amendments. She got people to offer up seeds for her. And she took some of the most hardcore residents and gave them hoes and shovels, gardening implements—and they loved it.

It gave them a sense of purpose, and the garden started to grow. Over the years, the garden produced literally thousands of pounds of organic food, which they gave to soup kitchens and those who were homeless around the community.

And she said it was amazing. You'd see this guy, all tough, and you'd go into the garden and someone would be walking by, and he'd say, "Don't step on those flowers, man. I just planted those. Be careful of those tomatoes." As if they were tending their own children. They got so connected to this, and to the fact that they could renew themselves through the garden. Because it wasn't just about the garden. It was really about giving a chance for that renewal that we all long for.

Yes, it reduced recidivism when they got out—but not as much as expected. And then they discovered something wild: some of these men were actually breaking parole or doing things that would get them back in prison because they missed their garden. So she started the Inside and Outside garden project, so you didn't have to come back in to tend your garden.

But this is what we're doing. We're taking this fertile earth—yes, with its gophers and its insects and all those things—and we're making something beautiful, outside and inside. And it's completely trustworthy. As Tennessee Williams said, "The violets in the mountains have broken the rocks." There's a power in planting seeds and tending them. This is the garden of the heart.

Oh nobly born, remember who you really are. You are creativity itself, born into this incarnation. You are creative consciousness. Thich Nhat Hanh calls it hide and seek. You pretend that you're a human being, but who you are is life itself.

And of course, you have dozens of identities. You're a son or a daughter, a parent or a sibling at times. You can have multiple identities. In one room, you'll be the child of someone and the parent of another person. You're a student at times, you're a teacher. You have your ethnic identity, your racial identity, your gender identity, your political identity—"I'm a liberal" or "a conservative" or whatever.

But that's not who you are. That's the hide and seek part. That's part of the incarnation you got to work with and play with, but it's not who you are. Who you are is consciousness itself. You are loving awareness, vast and timeless. You are the creativity of life displaying itself, playing in this human form. Hide and seek, says Thich Nhat Hanh. Remember who you really are. There's a freedom no one can take from you.

Take a breath. Reflect. Amidst it all, there is a freedom no one can take from you. Feel the space of loving awareness, vast enough to hold it all, timeless. You get to be the loving witness—like the Buddha touching the earth, seeing all of the renewal season by season, all the joys and sorrows seen with the eyes of compassion and wisdom.

And what do you do then? You see it, you sense it, and you become like a bodhisattva. Not because you're supposed to, but because it's all you. You're not separate from it. Every breath, every cell in your body knows you're connected. And so you reach out—touch and mend what you can, because it's part of you. It's all you. This is us.

I spoke to the mother of a very beloved and kind-hearted man, Gabriel Klein, who died in an accident recently. At his memorial, his brother-in-law described going to Costco with this warm-hearted and very special young man on a stormy day. They did all their shopping, getting ready for something, and then went back out into the pouring rain in the parking lot, got to their car, and loaded all the things. The brother-in-law who had the cart sort of pushed it aside so they could get the car out. But instead, Gabriel got out in the pouring rain and walked the cart all the way back to the store.

After they drove away, his brother-in-law asked, "Why did you do that?"

And Gabriel said, "There's a person there whose job it is to take the cart from point A to point B, from the lot back. There's no reason to make their job harder." He said, "It seems like there are two kinds of opportunities for people in the world. There are the kind of people who leave the cart, and those who bring it back."

So tiny and so simple. And yet that bodhisattva vow—in Diane Ackerman's words, a kind of modern bodhisattva vow: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

Whether it's the shopping carts in the lot in the rain, whether it's someone you encounter on the street, whether you get in a fender bender accident, or whether you're going to your business or school or wherever—you get to be the loving one. You get to be the one with the free heart. You get to be the bodhisattva or the Buddha amidst it all.

And it's not like it's going to turn out and everything will be hunky-dory and great. It says in the Bhagavad Gita that the secret is to act well without attachment to the fruits of the action—to plant beautiful seeds, to water them, to care for them, and trust that in their own time, they will bear fruit.

It's never too late to tend and water the good seeds in the heart and mind. And water and tend the good seeds in your actions and deeds in the world around. It's never too late.

The practice I want to suggest to you as we wind down is again a reflection. For those who want more of it, you can look in my book The Lamp in the Darkness. There's a whole extensive guided meditation in which you allow an awakened being or an awakened figure to take over your own life and see what they do. Because the wisest part of you already knows. You already know.

So here's your practice for tomorrow, this evening, this week, this year: Pretend you're enlightened. Pretend you're spacious and gracious like a Buddha—wise, allowing for all things, at peace in the midst of them. Seeing the world with the great heart of compassion. Reaching out and mending or touching the things that you can, the things that come to you, with compassion and kindness.

Imagine it, feel it. Suppose you were to decide, "All right, I will act and live and pretend as if I am a Buddha, as if I am awakened." What would that be like at work? At home? Toward yourself? You can sense or picture it because you do know.

O nobly born, remember who you are.

So thank you for listening. Happy spring to you in the Northern Hemisphere, and a beautiful autumn for those in the Southern Hemisphere, and a beautiful ongoing flowering of life for those in the middle by the equator. All good, as they say. All good.

And I wanted to hear the good stuff, obviously. But I wanted to tell you that you have been helping me a great deal with my father right now. He is 97 years old with dementia and doesn't remember that he served as a leukemia doctor for over 60 years. And this man who has been the hardest karmic relationship this go-round is now like a little child. And all of my hospice practice is coming to bear, just being loving with him. I have been able to forgive him and just feel so grateful for this dharma path.

Thank you. I can see it. I mean, it's hard. Sometimes it doesn't happen till near the end. The very end.

So thank you.

There's also something strange. It's not that likely, but sometimes—I'm going to use an image just because it's fun, about dementia, to kind of expand the conversation. Back in the 1970s, there was a series of books by this sort of channeled entity named Seth—

Seth Speaks. I remember.

You're old enough, you might remember those. And there was an image in that book. Seth, or whoever he was talking to, had gone to an old age home, a place where people were placed when they needed care. And he said, "I want you to look at this. What do you see?" And the fellow said, "I see a porch with eight rocking chairs and eight people who are nodding or drooling on themselves, really out of it." And Seth said, "Do you want to know what I see?" "Of course." "Well, I see that line of people, but I actually see they're all up there above that place having a party. Their bodies are down here and they're actually talking and having a great time."

I'm not saying it's completely true. Who knows? Because it's so mysterious. But there's some way—not only have you worked through with your forgiveness, and that's so important, and I so respect it—but also there's a kind of mystery in dementia. Like, who are we? Sometimes there's something there that we can't even tell, but what's left is love. And that's what you're doing.

And he's talking with my deceased mom, you know.

Who knows where she is. Maybe. We don't know. Maybe they're talking. You think he's there. He's out with your deceased mom. It's really mysterious, but your heart is what you get to tend, and it's beautiful.

Thank you, Ginger. So glad to see you.

Thank you for this evening. This is actually my first time in this space, and I feel very welcomed and very happy to be here. I was really moved by what you said about the culture—that we live in a culture of the absence of the sacred. I have worked for every tech company, most of them, and I swim in those waters. This notion of the rational, of meritocracy, of this resistance to seeing the inequity in the world and the absence of the sacred.

I just wanted to share that "just pretend you're enlightened" is such a beautiful, funny invitation—just to not fight, to know your true nature, to know my true nature. I'm an MMTCP graduate and I teach every Wednesday, which I love. Thank you for that, because I think those of us who are in workplaces feel a sense of duality. I'm very grateful, very blessed to be here.

Thank you, Jess. I want to ask you, because whether it's the tech world or other places—I'll get a call from somebody who's in the military, and it's not that all the military is that way, but parts of it are very difficult. Even if you close your eyes and remember, what does it feel like when you're living in your own loving awareness in the midst of that tech world? On a good day, when you feel you're staying true to yourself and your values and the sense of the sacred amidst it all—what is that like? What have you learned?

I think that I don't have to fight everyone's fight. I feel a sense of release. There's a physicality almost, a leaning back—it's not a forward motion of having to prove or change or educate someone, but more of meeting this person where they are.

Yes.

And hopefully they can meet me where I am. There's that sense of connection. That's when it's felt good. And I also realize that people bring with them to the workplace—it's not just a workplace, it's our lives. People say work-life balance, but it's just your life and it just shows up. So I try to remember that people are on their path, on their journey, and are coming to this Zoom screen or wherever we are with their own pain and suffering and misconceptions.

That's true. They come and who knows what happened to them that morning. They could have a sick kid, they could have all those things. But I'm tuning into your description of feeling the relief and the sense of not fighting or trying to prove things. Instead, there's what you described as a kind of inner graciousness. Feel that and sense that that's who you are. You know this.

And of course you'll get riled up. We all do at certain points. I'm Italian from New Jersey—it's part of our DNA. No big surprise about that. You can get riled up. But let this be your resting place. Let this be the kind of source code, if you will, underneath all that. For yourself, this graciousness and not trying to prove, but just being there as a loving presence and doing what you do.

Yes, and some of them will be kind and some of them will be difficult. But even that graciousness you have with people who are difficult, with those who are fighting—it helps in some way. You carry something beautiful in you, and you can bring it there.

Thank you. Thank you for your time.

Thank you. A pleasure.

fairly common that people who are attending somebody who's dying, especially if they're not conscious, they're there and then they have to go out and go to the bathroom or they have to go get something. And that's when the person dies.

"That was with my dad," she said. "The first night I left, after nine nights."

And that's partly, I think, because it's too hard to leave when somebody's there that you love. And it's like, "Okay, I need a little privacy. Thank you. I'm about to leave my body. I want you to feel this." So we have our needs—"Oh, this special moment"—but believe me, you'll have plenty of time with the body. It's okay. If you're there for that moment on the last breath, fine. If you're not, it's not like, "Oh God, you missed the train."

So that's the first thing to say. Because what really matters, and this is what you're talking about, is your presence. To the extent that you can be peaceful, hold their hand, be loving, breathe with them when they're still breathing—pairing your breath with someone is an amazing practice to do. Especially right after death, you get all these strange breath rhythms and things like that. But if you pair your breath with them, very gently breathing when they do, you start to feel an even deeper connection. And it's not the connection of your ideas, but just that energetic sense. Then you do it with a sense of metta and loving-kindness.

As they leave, I like to do a kind of blessing of loving-kindness in which I envision and sense them released from their body. And then the body becomes nothing—it just becomes, you know, dead. You can feel the spirit leave the body like a silent, amazing thing. And then to try to feel that, to somehow hold that spirit where they're going with trust and love, and say, "It's okay, let go. Let go into the light. Let go into the ocean of peace." I say it out loud sometimes.

And saying that—it's not complicated. There are all kinds of elaborate Tibetan things, but if you read the Egyptian Book of the Dead and the Ars Moriendi from the Middle Ages, there are all these different traditions. What matters in the end is love and presence. Because that's what we look for when someone comes in and when they go out.

Now with your mom with Alzheimer's, I also have this feeling that the Tibetans talk about going through all these bardo experiences, right? They're not just when you leave your body. They're already there in dementia. In some way, she's not all here anymore. She's already entered the in-between and those states.

So when you're with her, in some way you can acknowledge: your body's here, and who you are is more than this. You're already out there somehow. And you don't have to try to pull her back. You can say, "I love you wherever you are" or something like that. You can actually sense this is organic, and she knows how to die. The body just knows how to breathe. It also knows how to let go and die. Sometimes it gets difficult, painful—

You get all those kind of last-minute spasms and things like that, death throes. Mostly people who've had near-death experiences and gone through and come back say, "Yeah, that was just my body. I was already mostly out of it, not in the body."

So you become the space of love. And the ocean of peace that you want her to let go into.

Close your eyes just for a second since we're talking. What's your mom's name?

"Carol."

And let yourself picture Carol and being with her as she gets weaker. And it may take a while, as you say. It could be a year or five years. You don't know. And there, finally, it's time. And you're there with her. And imagine that you're Kuan Yin, the bodhisattva of compassion, just looking at her with kindly eyes, that all her incarnation is ending. And you're the field of loving awareness itself, peaceful and gracious. It's like, "Carol, you know how to do this. We're together. Dear mom, you know how. You know how to let go. You know how to be at peace. We can do this together."

How does it feel?

"It feels good. And what's beautiful about what you've said, and what's really helped me, is that I'm realizing she's been in this process for a long time. Because with my dad, I witnessed for him the last nine days, just looking up and speaking into the air to whoever was showing up for him, and his process of letting go. But what you've said has made me realize that she's been doing that for several years in her dementia, looking and talking in ways we don't understand. But I think that may have been parts of her letting go, just in a longer version. So when I picture us being there, I picture my sister and myself, but I also feel my dad in that room, which makes me think that it's not necessarily important that I'm physically in the room—because I will be in the room. We all will be in the room with her when it happens."

Beautiful what you say. It's really deep. And we're in this conversation about something so mysterious, mysterious to all of us. It's like you're turning and facing into the great mystery. We're not that personality. We're something so much more.

"Yes. And that connection is so real after someone passes. It's so near after someone passes, for quite some time. And that mystery is something really special to lean into."

Yeah. Thank you.

I've talked about this before, about how I was in Asia and knew that someone I cared about—I felt that they died. And then I got a message sometime afterward: they died in an accident. And I thought, how did I know that? And I've had other experiences. So I ask in a group, I'll say, "How many of you have the experience of knowing someone died at a distance, unexpected?" Lots of hands go up. It's incredible. Exactly what you're saying—that we actually are with each other. We're connected in that way. And you described it so beautifully. Thank you.

"Thank you."

So this is where we'll end tonight. It's a gift you give us to describe that.

"Thanks, Jeff."

I thank you, Chris. And maybe I'll be with you for a little bit too in that room, now that I know—with you and Carol and your sister.

"I hope you are. You blessed our first daughter, Ruby. So you have an important place in our life."

All right. Thank you.

So if you're interested, look on my website for that.

I'm just glad that we get to spend this time together. These teachings are ones that you already know—that you get to do something, make something beautiful of your life. And that's what they remind us of.

So let's just sit quietly for a moment. And if you like, you good-hearted people, you can unmute yourself and offer a little blessing or message to some of your fellow practitioners on the screen. Feel free.

CHAPTER 46

The Listening Heart: Mindfulness in Troubled Times

Jack Kornfield · 1h29

> In this heartfelt dharma talk, Jack Kornfield invites us to discover the transformative power of deep listening during challenging times. Beginning with a guided meditation, he leads practitioners through connecting with the breath, receiving messages from the body and heart, and opening to intuitive wisdom through visualization. The practice cultivates what the Pāli tradition calls sati-sampajañña—mindful presence combined with mindful response.
> Kornfield reflects on how difficulties serve as doorways to awakening, drawing on teachings from his teacher Ajahn Chah and the wisdom of the Tao Te Ching. He shares the remarkable story of Yeshe Dunden, physician to the Dalai Lama, whose profound pulse diagnosis exemplifies sacred listening that modern medicine has forgotten. Through the inspiring account of Vinoba Bhave's land reform movement—born from simply listening to villagers across India—Kornfield illustrates how quiet attention can catalyze massive positive change.
> Weaving together teachings from Gandhi, Jane Goodall, Black Elk, and the Dalai Lama, this talk offers practical wisdom for responding to climate change, political division, and personal struggles. Rather than reacting from fear or anxiety, we are invited to quiet the mind, tend the heart, and trust our innate capacity for wisdom and compassion. Kornfield reminds us that we have been training for these times, and through loving awareness, we can know when to speak, when to act, and when to simply be present.

With great respect and with great kindness, it's a pleasure to welcome you all to Spirit Rock. Spirit Rock is located both online globally and on land in the San Geronimo Valley, which is part of unceded Coast Miwok ancestral territory in Northern California.

When we say welcome, we welcome you all—all parts of you: your color, your culture, beliefs, gender, orientations, abilities, ages, education, and economies, full-hearted or broken-hearted. Bravely take your place in this international circle.

I want to acknowledge your generous dana, your donations and registration fees to Spirit Rock, which are deeply appreciated and needed at this time. Your fees keep us able to offer online and on-land teachings. They support the scholarship program, and they also go to support our teachers. So thank you for joining us in the Dharma.

Jack Kornfield, founding teacher of Spirit Rock Meditation Center, will be our speaker tonight. This offering has been prerecorded earlier today, and therefore there will be no Q&A session afterwards. Jack Kornfield trained as a Buddhist monk in the monasteries of Thailand, India, and Burma. He has taught meditation internationally since 1974 and is one of the key teachers in the Western insight tradition. He holds a PhD in clinical psychology. He's a grandfather, father, husband, and activist.

Thank you, Christina. Very glad to see you and very glad to see everyone who's joining.

I am in Spain right now, in the south near Malaga, visiting my daughter Caroline and her husband James, and our five-year-old grandson, Desmond. It's really fun hanging out with five-year-olds. They are remarkably smart, and it turns out they have a lot of views and thoughts about the world. We get to engage in a totally wonderful way.

I'm sorry I can't be there live this evening. This is being recorded in the morning because it's going to be nighttime here, and the time difference would mean I would be recording at 4 a.m., which is simply not my best hour.

I'd like to welcome you, as Christina did. This Monday Night Sitting group has now been going on for 39 years, starting in San Anselmo at Fairfax Community Church and then moving onto the land of Spirit Rock. For most of those years—30 years or more—I offered teachings once a week, and now I have changed to once a month. Something about being about to enter my 80th year, turning 79 in the next couple of months, has invited me to slow down.

I welcome you, and in some way perhaps want to invite you also to slow down for this moment. Not to slow down your caring, not to stop acting in all kinds of creative and amazing ways, but to be invited to take a pause that lets you listen and reflect and be present and alive in a deeper way, connected with life.

So what we'll do is sit, as we usually do on Monday night, for about 35 minutes or so with a bit of instruction. Then we'll take a break of five or ten minutes to stretch or relax, followed by a teaching as usual—without, however, the questions and dialogue.

Please let yourself find a way to settle in your body. Find a stable seat. Center yourself. Get ready for this period of meditation.

As you do, bring your attention here quite fully into the present moment. Come into your body, as they say, connecting body, heart, and mind together. Begin perhaps by taking two long breaths. If you wish, you can close your eyes or lower your gaze for this time.

Notice how it is to close your eyes and take a couple of long breaths. Already your body starts to say, "Oh, thank you. Thank you."

Now, as you bring your mindful, loving attention in this moment to your body, let the eyes and face soften. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle and let your neck release and find a simple uprightness. Allow the shoulders to drop, the arms and hands to rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body—gravity pulling you to the seat, your bottom, your feet. As you feel the heaviness of your body met by the earth and what you're sitting on, relax and sense that you can be fully supported just where you are. The earth holds you. You are part of her, and she holds you steady. Feel this deep steadiness, rooted with the earth.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, invite the mind to quiet and the heart to soften further. One of the simplest ways to do so, as you invite the quiet and calm, is to feel your body breathing and relax with each breath. Notice the breath as it touches the nostrils—coolness, or swirling, tingling in the back of the throat.

Or notice the rise and fall of chest or belly. Feel how the breath breathes itself. You are being breathed in the ocean of air that's shared by all the beings that breathe together. The earth is breathing you. Relax into it. With each breath, invite a sense of ease and calm.

If it's at all difficult to sense the breathing, put your hand on your belly and feel it rise and fall in the palm of your hand. Leave it there as we practice. It's a fine way to feel the breath.

As you sense the breath, there will arise other thoughts, emotions, sounds, sensations. Let them come and go as they will. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel how the breath breathes itself gently in the midst of it all.

As you relax with each breath, the attention might wander or be pulled away. You might notice when you return to the breath each time that the sense of calm and steadiness can grow. Invite this. Feel even one breath becoming easy and calm. It's a doorway to a steady heart and mind and body together.

As you sense the breath, different moods may arise. The calm might grow deeper, or boredom might arise, or worry, or delight. Let the moods come and go like weather around the breath. You can notice them with a loving awareness and return to sense or feel the breath breathing itself with the whole world, again and again, gently inviting a presence and a calm. This breath, steady. This breath, easy. This breath. Rest in the reality of the present, breathing itself.

As you let the body and mind settle down, quiet and calm, you can begin to listen more deeply. Turn your attention to your body in this calmer, quieter state—not so much looking to pay attention to all its sensations, but with a curiosity or an openness: What does your body want to tell you? If it could remind you of things or speak to you, what does it have to say?

It might have several things to say. It might say, "Thank you. Thank you for taking me out for a walk, or feeding me well." It also might have other things to say. "Remember this. Pay attention to me in this way. Don't forget."

So listen. What messages does your body have to tell you just now, this day? You can hear, or sense, or intuit. You can know. Take your time. Different parts of your body may have different things to say to you. Listen to them. Be open.

With a spirit of gratitude, like a bow to your body, you can say, "Thank you. Thank you for caring so much. I'm listening."

Feel a few breaths now again, breathing and calming, relaxing.

Now bring the same loving attention to your heart—the heart that carries so much longing and love, fear and delight, anger, grief, sweetness and joy. Listen to your heart with compassion and kindness.

Ask your heart, what do I need to remember? What do you want to tell me today on this earth? What matters?

Take your time and listen, or intuit, or sense. You can know what messages your heart has for you just now. Your heart says, "Remember this. Pay attention to this." Let yourself listen to what it tells you.

And again, as you have listened for a time, take a deep breath and return to feeling the rhythm of the earth breathing your breath. How each breath arises and passes in the vastness of space. Rest in it. Relax into it.

In this quiet, you can receive a gift of just what you need to know to live in a beautiful way at this time in your life. With the gift of mind and imagination, which reveals all kinds of things, let yourself picture, as you're quiet, that a wrapped gift is placed in your lap or in your hands. And if you can't picture it, then you'll be able to hear the message that comes with it.

If it's easy to picture, unwrap this gift that's been given to you by the gods. Inside you'll find a clear symbol of just what you need as you move through the weeks and year ahead—just that most beneficial blessing. What is it that you most need? This will symbolize exactly that. Open it, hold it up to the light.

And if there's no visual gift that you see, let yourself imagine that the wisest of spirits and the kindest bend down and whisper in your ear a few words, a sentence or two of wisdom and love, of advice for you just now as you go forth in your life. What do they say? You can hear and sense and imagine and know. Listen.

Taking these gifts—the symbol of just what you need, the words of wisdom and love, and the messages from your body and from your heart—taking them in, carrying them gently now as we get ready to end the meditation.

Send out your loving-kindness and blessings to beings everywhere. Extend your caring heart in every direction, that beings everywhere might also receive blessings and wisdom, compassion and love. Rest in it and offer the blessings like a lamp shining in all directions, like the energy of the heart spreading across the world. Kindness and blessings.

Carrying the treasures, the wisdom, the understanding, the messages from body and heart and beyond, gently allow your eyes to open. Maybe with a half smile. Stay with the sense of quiet, of calm, of steadying.

Tonight I'd like to speak about the listening heart.

Here we are in obviously troubled times. We are, as they say, not out of the woods. There's climate change. There's continuing warfare and continuing racism, conflict and political divisiveness. There are hungry children around the world and grain elevators full of food elsewhere, and yet the food doesn't reach them. There's so much we care about that really matters, and yet sometimes the things around us seem like they can't be solved, at least not very easily.

Difficult times call on our best spirit. Not every moment, but deeper than that, in a way that we listen and understand how to navigate.

From the perspective of wisdom, there are two dimensions to mindfulness. Mindfulness in Pali, like Sanskrit, is a combination: sati, which means mindful presence, and sampajañña, which can be translated as mindful response.

Like breathing in and breathing out, we listen deeply, and then we can respond.

Difficulties have a purpose, and my beloved colleague and inspiration Joanna Macy, one of our great elders, calls this the time of the great turning, where humankind has to learn to turn from individualism and "me and mine" and separation and grasping to the wisdom of interdependence and mutual care on this planet.

So there are lessons that we're invited to learn. Ajahn Chah, my teacher, used to love talking about the difficulties we would have in the forest monastery, which at times was very difficult and demanding, or the conflicts that we would get in between ourselves as peaceful monks who were living together. And then we could—I believe the colloquial word is—piss each other off. We could bother one another. We'd have trouble, and then others would come in and talk to us and bring their problems.

And Ajahn Chah would say, "When have you learned more? When everything was going along easily, or when you had to go through your difficulties?" Because the very difficulties you have are the place that truly awakens the heart.

Karlfried Dürckheim, a Zen teacher, writes: "The person really on the way who falls upon hard times will not as a consequence turn only to those friends who offer refuge and comfort and encourage their old ways to survive. Rather, they will seek out those who will faithfully and inexorably help them to risk themselves so that they may endure the difficulty and pass courageously through it. Only to the extent that a person exposes themselves over and over again to annihilation can that which is indestructible be found within them. In this daring lies dignity and the true spirit of awakening."

And this is what we're called upon—personally, in times of difficulty, in our society, globally. How do we respond? Do we take it all as obstacles and frustration? Or might we also take a breath and sense, here's the opportunity—not an obstacle alone, but a doorway, an opening to something greater.

Take a pause for a moment and reflect on how it is that you respond to difficulties. Is it a challenge? An opportunity? A worry? A fright?

It's pretty easy when things are difficult to go into anxiety, PTSD, grief. It's the body as much as the mind worrying. We get the fight, flight, or freeze response triggered—a limbic hijack. But it doesn't really serve us over the long run. The mind will race and try to figure it out. We can blame, we can go back and forth. You know how we do that. We can worry and repeat ourselves and imagine and think.

But remember Mark Twain's very simple analysis: "My mind has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened."

When you're in difficulties, when I'm in difficulties, when we are in difficulties, the first step—maybe the last step too—is the invitation to come into the present, to take some deep breaths, to quiet the mind as we did in our sitting, to listen to the heart. Somehow in this, to find a connection with wisdom, compassion, love. Whether you're an activist or a business person, whether you're a healer or in your own family—listening, quieting the mind, opening the heart, responding with wisdom and compassion.

As Nelson Mandela said, keep it simple. Tie your shoes and keep walking in the right direction.

The art of listening starts right where we are. And it's never done in a fixed or formal way, a kind of prescribed roadway. As many of you have heard me say, there's this passage from Somerset Maugham: "There are three rules for writing the great English novel. Unfortunately, no one knows what they are."

And this is a gift—that this day has never happened before. It's new, this week, this month, this year. And we get to be the witness, we get to be the loving presence in the midst of it all.

So with difficulties, take a breath, pause, begin to listen. And let yourself turn to the rise and fall of so many things in the world. We tend to fix things and get worried in this limited way. But the passage from the Tao Te Ching says: "There's a time for being ahead and a time for being behind. A time for being in motion and a time for being at rest. A time for being vigorous and a time for being exhausted."

A time for being in danger and a time for being safe. The wise one sees things as they are without trying to control them. She lets them rise and fall and go their own way, and resides at the center of the circle.

When we pause and hold this bigger picture, we can see different possibilities. I love the book that I speak of many times—on the art of happiness and joy, the dialogue between Archbishop Tutu and the Dalai Lama—where they're playful and they tease each other and make fun, saying, "Hey, you're supposed to be a holy man!" And then Tutu will grab the Dalai Lama's hat. He said, "The way you're acting, you're going to have a bad rebirth." And the Dalai Lama replied, "Well, I hope you'll meet me there," or something like that. They just play with it. In the middle of everything else, there is joy. This is an amazing world. The line from Mary Oliver: "I was a bride married to amazement." Take a pause.

Being with my five-year-old grandson, he has such beginner's mind spirit, as all children do—looking at amazing bugs and birds and the turning of the day, learning about how day and night work as the earth turns itself. He's really interested in the beginnings of science. It's so fantastic to watch his mind open.

And then, like the Dalai Lama and this book of joy, the follow-up is Jane Goodall's book of hope, where she says without hope, she would give up. She goes on: "I go on because I care passionately about children, about nature, about this earth." Or as Wade Davis, the great anthropologist, says: despair is a failure of the imagination.

One of the beautiful things when you read Jane Goodall's story is how, after Richard Leakey—the great scientist in Africa, a paleontologist—suggested she might want to pay attention to the primates, the chimps and the gorillas, she went off to do so. She sat there, and they wouldn't let her get near them. She would follow the band and watch them, and they'd run away. After six months of quiet watching, all of a sudden David Greybeard—the name she gave him—one of the chimp elders, came close to her. She extended some food, or her hand, and suddenly he understood that she was a friend and introduced her to all the others. After that, she could sit among them and watch them raise their children, watch the teenagers make trouble as all teenagers do, and see who was caring for whom.

This is mindfulness. This is the mindfulness of the heart. You could call it heartfulness. It invites a deep listening—another dimension, not trying to get something done, but stepping out of time. Seeing, settling, listening to what wants to be learned and known in a deeper octave.

Tonight I'm also going to tell or read some of my favorite stories from the past. If you've heard them before, there will be new details. Plus, it's like a bedtime story—"Oh, read that one again."

So this, from Richard Selzer, a surgeon at Yale University, who found out I was reading his stories—now over decades—and sent me a message of appreciation. He was so glad they weren't just sitting on his bookshelves but were coming alive.

Here is a story about Yeshe Dhonden, the physician to the Dalai Lama.

On the bulletin board at Yale Medical School, in the front hall where I work, there appeared an announcement: "Yeshe Dhonden will make rounds at 6 a.m. on the morning of June 10th." The particulars were given, followed by the notation: "Yeshe Dhonden is personal physician to the Dalai Lama." Though I am a skeptic, I could not ignore this emissary from the gods. So on the morning of June 10th, I joined the clutch of white coats waiting in the small conference room adjacent to the ward selected for the rounds. The air in the room is heavy with ill-concealed dubiety and suspicion of bamboozlement.

At precisely six o'clock, he materializes—a short, golden, barrelly man dressed in a sleeveless robe of saffron and maroon. His scalp is shaven, and the only visible hair is a scanty black line above each hooded eye. He bows in greeting while his young interpreter makes the introduction. Yeshe Dhonden, we are told, will examine a patient selected by a member of the staff. The diagnosis is unknown to Yeshe Dhonden, as it is to the rest of us. The examination of the patient will take place in our presence, after which we will reconvene in the conference room, where Yeshe Dhonden will discuss the case. We are further informed that Yeshe Dhonden has purified himself by bathing, fasting, and prayer.

I, having breakfasted well and performed only the most desultory ablutions and given no thought at all to my soul, glanced furtively at my fellows. Suddenly, we doctors seemed a soiled, uncouth lot.

The patient had been awakened early, told she was to be examined by a foreign doctor, and had been asked to produce a fresh specimen of urine. When we entered her room, the woman showed no surprise. She had long ago taken on that mixture of compliance and resignation that is the face of chronic illness. This was but another in an endless series of tests and examinations.

For a long time, Yeshe Dunden stepped from the doorway to her bedside and stood apart, watching. He gazed at the woman, favoring no part of her body with his eyes, but seeming to fix his glance at a place just above her supine form. I too studied her. No physical sign or obvious symptom gave a clue as to the nature of her disease.

At last, he took her hand, raising it in both of his. Now he bent over the bed in a kind of crouching stance, his head drawn down into the collar of his robe. His eyes were closed as he felt for her pulse. In a moment, he had found the spot, and for the next half hour he remained thus suspended above the patient like some exotic golden bird with folded wings, holding the pulse of the woman beneath his fingers, cradling her hand in his. All the power of the man seemed to have been drawn down into this one purpose. It was palpation of the pulse raised to the state of high ritual.

From the foot of the bed where I stood, it was as though he and the patient had entered a special place of isolation, of apartness, about which a vacancy hovered and across which no violation was possible. After a moment, the woman rested back upon her pillow. From time to time, she raised her head to look at the strange figure above her, then sank back once more. I could not see their hands joined in a correspondence that was exclusive, intimate, his fingertips receiving the voice of her sick body through the rhythm and throb she offered at her wrist.

But all at once, I was envious—not of him, not of Yeshe Dunden for his gift of beauty and holiness, but of her. I wanted to be held like that, touched so, received. And I knew that I, who have palpated a thousand pulses, have not felt a single one.

At last, Yeshe Dunden straightened, gently placed the woman's hand upon the bed, and stepped back. The interpreter produced a small wooden bowl and two sticks. Yeshe Dunden poured a small portion of the urine specimen into the bowl and proceeded to whip the liquid with the two sticks. This he did for several minutes until a foam was raised. Then, bowing above the bowl, he inhaled the odor three times. He set down the bowl and turned to leave. All this while, he had not uttered a single word.

As he neared the door, the woman raised her head and called out to him in a voice at once urgent and serene. "Thank you, doctor," she said, and touched with her other hand the place he had held on her wrist, as though to recapture something that had visited there. Yeshe Dunden turned back for a moment to gaze at her, smiled, and then stepped into the corridor. Rounds were at an end.

We were seated once more in the conference room. Yeshe Dunden spoke now for the first time, in soft Tibetan sounds I had never heard before. He was barely begun when the young interpreter began to translate, the two voices continuing in tandem—a bilingual fugue, the one chasing the other. It was like the chanting of monks.

He spoke of winds coursing through the body of the woman, currents that break against barriers, eddying. These vortices are in her blood, he said—the last spendings of an imperfect heart. Between the chambers of her heart, long before she was born, a wind had come and blown open a deep gate that must never be opened. Through it charged the full waters of her river, as the mountain stream cascades in springtime, battering, knocking loose the land and flooding her breath. Thus he spoke, and was silent.

"May we now have the diagnosis?" a professor asked—the host of these rounds, the man who knows answers. "Congenital heart disease," he said. "Interventricular septal defect with resultant heart failure."

A gateway in the heart, I thought, that must not be opened. Through it charged the full waters of her breath, flooding. So here then is the doctor listening to the sounds of the body to which the rest of us are deaf. I know—I know the doctors to the gods can listen to what we cannot hear.

And I remember now, as I make my rounds, the sound of his voice, like an ancient Buddhist prayer, its meaning long since forgotten, only the music remaining. And then a jubilation possesses me, and I too feel myself touched by something divine.

It is an extraordinary story—tender, wise—about what it means to really listen deeply. Whether it is the climate or a pandemic or the politics we share or our deepest concerns, they are all symptoms, and they are all rooted in the human heart. Many of those problems are rooted in human fear, greed, and hatred. What are these symptoms?

Instead of turning on one another and reacting, can we begin to listen to each other? The pains and loss and meaning and fears. As Thomas Merton said, of what use is it if we can travel to the moon when we cannot cross the abyss that separates us from one another? It's possible to listen in a different way to one another.

One of the organizations that I'm so pleased to be connected to and a supporter of is IACT—this small but, as they describe themselves, "small but mighty" anti-genocide group working in the worst camps in Chad, in places in Azerbaijan and Syria, and many, many places with refugees. My beloved Trudy went with them because they asked for an expert in mindfulness and early childhood education, which she is.

IACT operates in the most wonderful way. They go in and, unlike the big NGOs—the UN and other organizations that help in many ways but kind of top-down, just come in, set something up, decide what people need, and deliver it—the IACT people sat down with the women of the camp and said, "What do you need?" They listened for a long time. And the women said, "We need childcare. We need preschool and kindergarten so our children can learn—can learn to learn itself. We need soccer because we want our children not to give up hope for the world and to find joy."

And across now many refugee camps, IACT has helped to provide the soccer training and the preschools, train the teachers and pay the teachers, bring the soccer balls, and help to fund what became Darfur United—the first Darfur soccer team that went to the World International Refugee Soccer Championship, I think it was in Doha. And everyone at the camps turned their radios on and listened to the refugee team that could. This is listening—going in with an open heart and an open mind.

From the Tao it says, "Do you have the patience to let your mud settle and the water become clear? Can you remain unmoving until the right action arises by itself?" When you take the time to quiet your mind, to listen with the heart, to bring a loving awareness to the situations you find yourself in, then you can respond in an entirely different way.

We began with this beautiful meditation of quieting ourselves and then asking, "What is it that this body, this precious human body, needs? Where is its tension? What is the care that's asked for or longed for?" We listen to the heart. What does compassion tell us now—for ourselves, those around us, for the earth? We can listen to the earth itself. Just like Jane Goodall, we can get quiet and sit and listen to the trees and the change of seasons, watch the phases of the moon. And of course, hear the cries of the earth, the rhythms. But not just listen—listen so that, like Geshe Dandan, we feel deeply.

A poem from Valencia Robin:

When the hard edges of the book that I was reading and sang me to sleep woke me,
I assumed thoughts of all I hadn't accomplished weren't far behind.
The people I disappointed, the money I hadn't made,
the power structure I'd rarely opposed.
But instead, I found myself greeted by an almost criminal hope, somehow free of the social order that had shaped my mind so that by the time the sun peeked in and the huge sugar maple that filled my window spoke, the only thing I questioned was the 40-hour work week and why the French and Italians got eight weeks of vacation.
Because it's been, what, a million years?
And yet somehow that maple tree knew me.
We talked and talked until I became birched and oaked, crab-appled and cherried, drunk with all the tree-ness I'd forgotten.
My God, to think I could bud, even blossom.

Nature will speak to you. It does all the time—speaks to us, and we can listen.

One of my favorite stories of this kind of listening is the account of Vinoba Bhave. Vinoba was a close associate and disciple of Mahatma Gandhi. After Gandhi was assassinated, the whole Gandhian movement in India fell into disarray. Yes, there had been the partition of India and Pakistan, and now there was this new state and a lot of hope, but also a lot of confusion.

After a year or two, the followers of Gandhi realized that his work was not done—his work to bring people together, to care for one another, to feel their interdependence. So they decided they needed to come together and have a big gathering of the close followers of Gandhi and the ones who supported them. They invited Vinoba as the most celebrated of the Gandhian leaders. And he declined.

He said, "Gandhi has died. We have to do something different."

They asked and asked. And finally he said, "All right, I will come, but I need to walk." The conference was more than halfway across India. "If you postpone it, I will walk there and come."

Vinoba set out. And as he walked across the countryside, he came to one village and went to the central square, which was under a tree that had been planted there for people to sit and gather. He called a village meeting in the spirit of Gandhi, and he said, "I want to listen."

The farmers and the merchants and those in the village began to talk to him. And one of the things he heard most clearly was from the Dalit, the lowest caste, the untouchables, saying, "We work so hard for others. We so much wish that we had our own land."

Vinoba asked, "How much land do you need?"

They said, "We would need five acres each to farm, to grow food for our families, to take care of our children and the next generation."

"How many families are there?"

There were eighteen families.

He paused, and in the spirit of Gandhi he spoke. "From Mahatma G's lips to my heart and to you, I would ask: is there any way that we can find land for these desperate families?"

And one of the rich landowners of the village stood up and said, "I will donate ninety acres—five acres apiece for these eighteen families—in the name of Gandhi and in the spirit of our new independence."

Everyone was touched and appreciative. And Vinoba slept.

The next day, he went on to another village and listened to them talk about their difficulties and their hopes. At the end, he told the story of what had happened in the previous village. And after he did so, he asked, "How many untouchable families are there here?" There was a certain number. And then again, a wealthy landowner stood up and said, "In the spirit of Gandhi, I will offer twenty-two acres," or whatever it was, "for these families."

Village by village, as Vinoba heard these stories, he helped collect land for the landless. By the time he reached the conference halfway across India, he had collected more than two thousand acres of land for the poorest of the poor.

When he told the story to the whole Congress, everyone got excited. It became the beginning of a movement called the Indian Bhoodan Land Reform Movement. All the followers of Gandhi at that conference, and many others, gathered together and spread out across the many provinces of India. They walked year after year. And in five years, they collected fourteen million acres of land for the poorest of the poor in villages across the whole subcontinent.

It was one of the largest peaceful transfers of land ever to happen on this earth. And all because Vinoba went into the village and sat and listened.

You can listen too. You can know, you can sense the universal truths. Greed, hatred, ignorance—they cause suffering. The more of them, the more suffering. Love, wisdom, generosity, and gratitude—their opposites—bring wellbeing, bring happiness.

How can we foster this? How can we inspire one another with this listening to act from wisdom and love and generosity and gratitude? How can people remember the truth? Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law.

This is power.

Mark Twain says, "Kindness is the language with which the deaf can hear and the blind can see."

I love the stories of Mr. Rogers. When he speaks about the difficulties in the world—the hurricanes and the floods and the earthquakes and the man-made disasters—he said his mother taught him something: not to look at the tragedy and the suffering, but to look at the helpers. When there was flooding after the hurricane in Houston, from all the states around, people brought their airboats and their pontoons and whatever they could. It was the Cajun Navy that came in and began to disperse among all the flooded houses where people were huddled on rooftops with their children and their dogs. People from states far and near drove to come and rescue and help.

We want to do that. We want to be able to offer ourselves. And what's asked is that we listen and we learn.

I remember when my twin brother was in Dana-Farber in Boston, the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute. He was diagnosed with and died from blood cancer.

And I spent a lot of time sitting in the waiting rooms and being with him and others and their family members. And what struck me was seeing people come from all over the world to support their families, their loved ones, their friends. And you could see how each person deserved respect, deserved care, deserved to be listened to.

"O nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. See the nobility of others. Remember your capacity for love and compassion no matter what. And include yourself. That too—you, the beings around you. As Chief Seattle said, what is man without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, men would die from great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man.

When we listen, we feel ourselves together. We know we're in it together. And we join with billions of acts of goodness that happened today on this earth. Mothers feeding rice gruel to their young children, or tortillas. Feeding someone who is sick, warming someone who is cold. People stopping at the red light so you can safely pass through the green. A thousand million billion acts of kindness, again and again and again. As Jane Goodall says, do not lose hope.

When I despair, Gandhi described, I remember that all through history, truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time they can seem invincible. But remember, in the end, they always fall. Think of it. Always.

This is the Dharma. It's the teachings that the heart can be free no matter what. It's the teachings that you can trust that there's something bigger in this earth that you are a part of. There's a humility, not knowing the answers as Vinoba didn't, but being still and listening.

One of my favorite accounts is in the famous book Black Elk Speaks. Wilhelm Neihardt describes how Black Elk, now an old man at the end of his life, decided he had to go back up to the top of Harney Peak, where he'd had his original vision of the sacred hoop of the world that inspired his whole life. Neihardt describes how Black Elk put on his finest feathered headdress and painted himself. And step by step, in an old man's body, he climbed to the top of this peak. He went back to visit the place where he'd been blessed by a vision of that sacred hoop.

He held a sacred pipe and asked for a blessing, honoring the goodness and the beauty of the sacred tree he had seen. Neihardt had been told by Black Elk that if his prayer was heard, rain would fall, the sky would open—this was a signal that the Great Spirit had begun to listen and care.

The sky was perfectly clear that day. It was a hot and dry day amidst a season of drought, almost the worst in memory of the old ones in the community. Black Elk lay down holding the pipe and spoke as he could to the Great Spirit and asked, "If I have lived righteously, may I have the blessings of your rain."

And to Neihardt and those few around him, to their surprise, clouds began to gather, thunder rolled, and a light rain fell in the midst of the dry, hot, clear blue sky. Tears fell down Black Elk's cheek, and he knew that his life was not in vain.

If that doesn't bring humility, what can? Here, Black Elk, in the drought and the driest time, and the clouds come and say, "Yes, we bless you." Sometimes it takes only a little loving awareness to begin to listen.

There's a poem: "When someone listens deeply to you, it's like holding out a dented cup, one you've had since childhood, and watching it fill up with cold, fresh water. When it balances on top of the brim, you feel understood. When it overflows and touches your skin, you are loved."

Listen, dear ones. You've been training for this for a very long time. You've been training to be kind. You've been training to be present. You've been training to listen so you know how you can respond. *Sati sapaññ*a—listening presence, and then listening response.

When you listen, it's not really that complicated. As the Buddhist texts say: Others will be cruel—we shall be kind, thus we will incline the heart. Others kill—we will care for living beings, thus we will incline the heart. Others will speak falsehoods—we will speak the truth, thus we will incline the heart. Others will be envious—we shall be grateful, thus we will incline the heart.

Remember, you know how to live in a wise way. You know how to navigate the praise and blame, the gain and loss, the pleasure and pain, the beginnings and endings, the ever-changing impermanence of this human incarnation. All you have to do is listen deeply in your heart, to rest in loving awareness. To start with the loving awareness. To quiet the mind and tend the heart. To start with small things—that's where blessings begin.

And then you'll know when it's time to speak up, when it's time to stretch out a hand, when it's time to mend what you can touch, when it's time to be quiet and peaceful, when it's time to say no. All of these things.

I love the verse from Leonard Cohen's great anthem "Hallelujah"—what he calls the holy or the broken hallelujah—where he says: "Even though it all went wrong, I stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah." There's a song to listen to like your own heart.

I'm so grateful we get to share these teachings. I'm so grateful that we get to practice together. I'm so grateful that we have the dharma to help us navigate through the rapids of life—we would be otherwise, as Ajahn Chah said, like a boat without a rudder.

Quiet the mind. Take time. Tend the heart. Listen here in yourself. Listen to one another. Listen to the earth. You will know what to do.

Thank you, dear ones, for listening. Carry the spirit of whatever was valuable, or whatever reminded your heart, out into the world as you go now. If there were things that didn't resonate, just let them go. Trust yourself. Listen. Care. Rest in loving awareness and freedom that is yours.

CHAPTER 47

Monday Night Meditation: The One Who Knows

Jack Kornfield · 1h40

> In this Monday night talk from Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield guides practitioners through a meditation on mindful loving awareness before exploring the concept of 'the one who knows'—a phrase from his teacher Ajahn Chah pointing to our innate capacity for awakened consciousness. Drawing from the Theravāda tradition's understanding of awareness as distinct from its contents, Jack invites us to recognize that while our bodies age and change, the consciousness witnessing these changes remains timeless.
> The teaching weaves together insights from multiple wisdom traditions, including Nisargadatta Mahārāj's profound statement: 'Wisdom tells me I am nothing. Love tells me I am everything. And between these two, my life flows.' Jack explores how expanding our 'window of tolerance' allows us to hold both the unbearable beauty and ocean of tears that constitute human experience. He shares stories from the Oslo Freedom Forum, where human rights activists learn to release the weight of collective suffering without abandoning their compassionate engagement.
> Through interactive dialogue with practitioners struggling with fear, letting go, and parental attachment, Jack demonstrates how to work skillfully with difficult emotions—thanking fear for its protective intentions while recognizing we are larger than any passing state. The talk culminates in the essential question: 'Did I love well?' reminding us that our birthright is to see the world with the eyes and heart of a Buddha, planting seeds of compassion in a world that desperately needs awakened hearts.

Thank you, Christina. How great to see you all. Some of you are old friends in the little squares where you live, apparently. That's where I get to see you and know you these days. And I'm really pleased to be able to be together again on this Monday night.

Spirit Rock started thirty-some years ago to create a sanctuary and a place for people to develop and understand the practices of mindful loving awareness, loving kindness, and compassion—and how to actually live and embody them in their lives. Over these years, we've had all kinds of trainings and classes, as Christina was pointing out, in many different forms. And I think one of the most important things is simply that we come together, that we sit together in meditation, that we remind each other of these values of compassion, these values of a courageous heart, the values and the capacity for inner freedom. We practice them, and somehow they spread from our own lives out in all the ways that we touch the world.

So with this, I'm really grateful to be back. And I would like us to start as we usually do with a period of meditation.

Let yourself find a way to settle. Let your body find a posture that's upright and at the same time comfortable, if that works for you—or whatever posture will keep you present and is inviting of your steady attention. Take your seat here, halfway between heaven and earth, as if under your own tree of enlightenment, your own Bodhi tree.

Let your body begin to settle. Take two long breaths, and with each one, let ease and relaxation grow. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle and release your neck for a simple uprightness. Let your shoulders relax, and your arms and hands rest easily.

Allow the body to settle in this seat, on this earth, in this amazing day. Feel the weight of your body, the contact with the seat beneath you—the buttocks or feet, legs—and sense how you can let go and be completely supported by Mother Earth beneath you. Steady. Stable.

Let your belly be soft and the breath natural. And let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion. Allow the mind to quiet and match the softening of the heart. Come more fully into the present moment, resting under your tree of enlightenment as the Buddha that you are—the awakening one.

Now notice how the earth is breathing you. You don't actually have to do anything. Simply notice with gentle attention how the body breathes itself in this ocean of air. You might sense the breath as coolness in the nostrils, or swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or as the rise and fall of chest or belly. Feel how it breathes itself. Whatever rhythm it wants to take, let it do so. And with each breath, invite a sense of ease and calm.

As you quiet, sense the miracle of breathing. Your body is inter-breathing with the trees and the grasses around you. You breathe out carbon dioxide, which they breathe in. They breathe out oxygen, and you take it in. You're breathing with all life on earth. It is breathing you. You're breathing with the whales and with the breath of your ancestors. You're breathing with earthworms and pelicans.

Let yourself relax into the breath of life. Calm. Steady.

Notice that there are two different levels happening, two levels of experience. There's the feeling of the breath—this breath, the sensations in the body and movement, sound—each breath coming like a wave as the earth breathes you. And there is the knowing of the breath, the consciousness that notices and experiences the rhythm of the breath, slower or faster, the sensations.

There's the experience, breathing itself. And there is the mystery of awareness, of mindful loving awareness, that notices.

Rest in the stillness, settling and quieting. And of course, as you quiet and settle and feel the rhythm of breath, there will naturally arise other waves of experience.

Thoughts will come and go. Picture thoughts and word thoughts will come across the screen of awareness. Emotions will arise—restless, bored, anxious, happy, peaceful, steady—and all the sensations of the body and senses, waves of sound, tinglings in the body, warm and cool. In the middle is your awareness of this life breath, rising and falling, breathing in and out gently. Being breathed.

Let the mindful loving awareness now include the waves of experience that rise and fall around the breath—the longing or excitement or pleasure at settling, the tinglings or pain or throbbing in the body, the images of past and future, ideas, thoughts. You rest in the center with this breath and notice the waves as they come and go.

If it's helpful to stay present, you can gently name or acknowledge the stronger waves. As you feel the body being breathed, you can acknowledge sadness or excitement. You can acknowledge tingling, or hearing when sounds arise. You can acknowledge planning or remembering when thoughts come. As if to bow to them, you name them gently and feel them as a wave passing through the loving awareness, the mindful loving awareness that acknowledges as they arise, that notices and feels them—how long they last, how big they get—and notices as they pass away, how the body continues to be breathed, one breath after another.

And add in, if you wish, the quality of loving-kindness, so that whatever waves arise, whether painful or pleasant, thoughts or sensations or emotions, they're received with kindness. Pain is received kindly. Anger is received with kindness—thank you for trying to help me. Fear is received with kindness—thank you for trying to protect me. Longing and love, memory—when they arise, receive them with kindness. Oh yes, this too. This too.

And you are the mindful, loving awareness itself, the field of consciousness that receives and acknowledges, that bows to, that knows what arises as it arises and passes away.

And finally, if you are comfortable doing so, place one hand on your heart. Let yourself feel the gratitude that you've had this opportunity, that life has given you in this turning world the chance to pause and stop and listen deeply with the mind and heart and body, to be present and feel what benefit may have come and does come from doing this.

Welcome back. Please let yourself sit in a way that is comfortable and let yourself listen again—not so much to take notes or remember anything, but to quiet and listen and sense if there is something you are reminded of that matters to you, that you already know. And let that inspire you or touch you in any way it might.

Tonight, I'd like to talk about a phrase that my teacher Ajahn Chah used at times. He called it "the one who knows"—the wise or conscious, liberated nature of our own heart and mind.

It seems fitting. It's just about summer solstice. And of course, we could talk about carrying the inner light—though it's only solstice in the north; it's winter solstice for those in the south who are listening. But there's something timeless about carrying light: the light of understanding, the light of liberation.

And having it also be the week of Juneteenth, when the last major populations of enslaved people in America—two hundred fifty thousand human beings in the state of Texas alone, enslaved, a third of the population—were finally liberated.

So we'll talk about our own knowing and the understanding of liberation, inner as well as outer. The outer forms of oppression and racism and the ways that people have mistreated one another—they stem from the human heart. And the transformation that's needed for humanity at this time more than any is a transformation of the heart.

I run into people periodically as I travel and go about my work, who often will come up to me, those who know me, with warm greetings, thank-yous, different things like that. Commonly they will say, "If I didn't have the Dharma, if I didn't have these teachings, if I hadn't practiced loving-kindness, if I hadn't practiced mindfulness—going through what happened with my parents or my family or my divorce or the accident—I just needed these so much. They made a huge difference."

It's beautiful to hear. And of course, it's the purpose of the teachings: to actually offer these things that transform our lives and become part of who we are.

Zen Master Seung Sahn Soen-sa-nim, a Korean Zen Master whom I first met in 1972 when I'd come back from the monastery and was in Cambridge—he'd come from Korea a couple or a few years earlier and landed in Providence, Rhode Island, but also taught in Cambridge at one of the Zen centers there.

It was there that I met Jon Kabat-Zinn in 1972, that I met my beloved Trudy Goodman and Larry Rosenberg—and Seung Sahn Sunim, which means "respected teacher." He would do dharma combat, this way he had of teaching where he'd say, "All right, who wants to talk about what they know?" Trudy said I was quite brash after coming back from the monastery and would challenge things he said. He would always demolish me, but it took a few minutes, so it was kind of exciting.

One of the phrases he loved to use was, "You already understand." He was speaking to that deep part of you that knows—that knows wisdom, that knows how to live, that knows the mystery. Not by figuring it out, but by standing in its grace.

Over these fifty years of teaching, my approach has evolved. In the beginning, I taught more as a kind of authority: here's a dharma talk on the seven factors of enlightenment, or the practice of anapanasati and mindful breathing. But if you read the Buddhist texts, while the Buddha gave teachings in that form—as did some of my great teachers in Asia—he also engaged in a great deal of dialogue, a kind of Socratic dialogue.

Someone came to him and asked, "What happens when you die?" Instead of blurting out some answer, the Buddha said, "Well, why did you ask?" The person replied, "I want to know if I should live a moral life. Does it matter in the end?" A fair question. And the Buddha said, "Well, if there's a life after this one, how do you think it will be determined?" The person reflected and said, "Probably by how I lived. So if I live a moral life, it might lead to a better rebirth." Then the Buddha asked, "How about if this is the only life? How would you want to live?" The person reflected again and said, "Well, if this is my only chance, I guess I want to live my best life." Through this kind of dialogue, the Buddha didn't give an answer, but rather inquired together with that person.

This is a quality and way of interacting I've learned now—to be less of the authority, although, talk to my daughter, my wife, my friends, and I can pull off the authority thing too. But when people have questions, I'll ask them: What have you learned? What would the wisest part of you say in answering this? Or I'll ask: Where do you hold this in your body, and how do you hold it? That question, that concern, those emotions. Then I might turn to the people around and ask what others have learned about this question. Something beautiful starts to happen in a group. The room becomes wise. It's not just one person—what have you learned? But what have others learned? And suddenly there's this shared understanding.

Some Buddhist texts begin with the phrase, "O nobly born, O you who are the sons and daughters of the awakened ones, you who are of the good families of the awakened ones"—which is your true history. What it means is that each one of you has the capacity to awaken, to remember dignity and freedom and love, and the nature of consciousness itself.

Robert Johnson, the celebrated Jungian author, writes about the shadow in the Jungian tradition—our worst fears and thoughts, the things we push away and don't make conscious, and what it means to see and learn about them. But he says, curiously, people resist the noble and positive aspects of their shadow more strenuously than they hide their dark sides. It's more disrupting to find out you have a profound nobility of character than to find out you're a bum. No slur on bums, by the way, but you know what he means with that metaphor.

So how do you live this? Rumi puts it simply: pay regular visits to yourself. It's what we started to do in our meditation tonight. And Lama Yeshe, that wonderful, great old Tibetan teacher from some decades ago, he looked at his students—he was very colloquial in his teaching—and said, "Hey, how many times do you check out what's in your refrigerator every day?" Then he asked, "How about checking out what's in your heart and mind as often as you look in the refrigerator?"

There's something about pausing and listening, as we did in our opening meditation. Taking the time to step back from our busyness and sense the mystery of being alive, and how we navigate it. Quieting down and asking: What wants attention? Because different things do. What wants understanding? And maybe, what wants love? You can reflect in yourself what wants attention and what wants love.

Of course, meditation is not just about getting calm and quiet. Those of you who've practiced for a while, especially Vipassana and mindfulness and mindful attention, know this. I remember Ajahn Chah in a BBC interview at his monastery saying, "Sitting is not just a sweet, calm thing to do."

Sometimes you're sitting in the midst of a raging storm—your grief, your fear, your anger, your concern for your life and the world and the grandchildren and the trees and everything else.

And so to sit, when we speak of the one who knows, is to expand what is called the window of tolerance. The one who knows says, "This is the human experience." It's the first noble truth of all the forms of suffering. Anybody not experienced that? Raise your hand. You can have your money back. And it's the third noble truth of the freedom in the midst of that suffering, of the end of suffering and the freedom beyond it.

And so you take your one seat in the middle of it all. You get the mundane problems of sleepiness—what one monastery I practiced in called "the poor man's nirvana." You don't judge it; you need it. You get restlessness and anxiety and fear, and you say, "Hey, fear, thank you. Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm actually okay right now. You can kind of calm down." As Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness so quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it seize in you as few ingredients can."

So you sit with it all. And at the same time, you sit with your joy and your dance, with the beauty of the world. You sit with your thoughts—as my friend Anne Lamott wrote, "My mind is like a bad neighborhood. I try not to go there alone." So she sits in groups.

But you also sit with the cultural suffering, the cultural anxiety about climate change and political divisiveness and continuing racism and so many other dimensions that we carry. What happens as you sit is that you're able to shift from the cultural trance.

Here's a passage from John Gatto, who was the New York City Teacher of the Year: "Think of the things that are killing us and our children. Drugs, brainless competition, recreational sex, the pornography of violence, gambling, alcohol, and the worst pornography of all—lives devoted to buying things, accumulation as if it gives a sense of meaning." He said this is what our kids are being taught in our schools.

But what happens as you sit is that you wake up. The opposite of the word "truth" in Greek is alethe—alethe means to sleep. And the word truth really means to wake up, to see the world as it is with its ten thousand joys, its magnificent beauty, and its ten thousand sorrows. To see our human lot in the midst of it. This is where the one who knows takes a seat. You look with the eyes of the Buddha and say, "Yes, this is our human lot." And you expand the heart to hold it all with kindness and compassion.

Then something very interesting happens. As you become the one who knows taking that seat, you shift from the content to see the process of life itself. "All things are impermanent"—the last words of the Buddha. And you start to see this. Even the big things—the cultural anxiety of divisiveness and climate, AI—they're all in change, and we don't know. We are in the middle of the story. You can't grasp and say, "This is the way it is and will be." The more you grasp things that change, you get rope burn.

Instead, you get the opportunity to see it with the eyes of an awakened one. Then you get to plant beautiful seeds in the midst of it. Yes, it's all impermanent. What can I do? If I hold on and get frightened, it creates more suffering—greed, hatred, fear, confusion. If I hold it with compassion and understanding, something entirely different is possible.

Now it's hard these days because there's so much insecurity. We don't know what's going to happen with climate or AI or with the person who's sick in our family or the healthcare system. It's not so much that humans are afraid of change or so in love with the old ways, writes one sage, but it's the place in between that we fear. It's like being between trapezes. We know where we were. We might look at where we're going. It's Linus when his blanket is in the dryer.

There's nothing to hold on to.

But what happens after we get to sit with the ten thousand joys and sorrows is that there also grows this capacity to see the whole dance of it in an amazing way.

Ariyaratne, who died a month or so ago—the great sage from Sri Lanka, a wonderful, amazing person, nominated for the Nobel Prize—in the middle of the Sri Lankan Civil War, he called all half a million of his followers together and laid out a peace plan that he called the Five-Hundred-Year Peace Plan. He said, "Not my lifetime, not yours. But we can plant seeds where we help one another in the villages, where we build roads, where we build schools, where we build love for each other. We learn each other's languages. And after ten and twenty and thirty years, we start to see how we're doing. Then we economically help the poorest rise up and join those who have more wealth." He laid out a whole process. He said, "Every hundred years we'll pause with a council and see how we're doing."

From this perspective of the process, as Martin Luther King said, the moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. And the vision of Ariyaratne—that five-hundred-year peace plan—was magnificent. We're part of something so much bigger. And the one who knows in us recognizes this.

I just got back from being invited to teach at the Oslo Freedom Forum, which takes place where the Nobel Peace Prize is given in Oslo. But instead of one person being celebrated, they bring together forty activists—human rights activists, all of them eligible for a Nobel Prize. They come and share stories and support one another. There's the older generation: the former head of the Cambodian government who was ousted by a dictator, or the wife of Navalny, or a minister who did receive a Nobel Prize. But then there's this new generation of forty-year-olds and thirty-year-olds—these amazing human rights activists working to save the rainforests, working for justice around the world.

One woman came up to me who's been a huge figure in Latin America for saving the rainforest. She said, "Every time there's a huge new fire, the next day my menstrual period starts." There were people who came up to me who were Uyghurs working with a million Uyghurs who've been imprisoned in China, or people from Sudan and Syria. They said, "I have nightmares. It's so difficult. There's survivor's guilt." But the thing that most worried them was: "What about my compadres who are still in prison, even though I got out?"

Part of the work there that I was privileged to do was to say: there are inner practices. You don't need to carry the fires in your body. They belong to Mother Earth. She knows how to recycle them. You don't need to carry the prison in your heart. You can, as Nelson Mandela did when he walked out of Robben Island prison after twenty-seven years, say: they can imprison your body, but no one can imprison your spirit.

And so we did rituals and practices and trauma work and therapy—the things that would really help people. But it's not just them. All of us need to find our way to be the one who knows, to be the Buddha amidst this complicated and magnificent life.

Part of what happens is that the window of tolerance opens. We see the process of life—birth and death coming again and again and again. Then we set our directions. We plant seeds like Ariyaratne. There's suffering, and there's the overcoming of it. That was the passage of Helen Keller.

And then there's the invitation to step back, as we did in our meditation, and become consciousness itself. You know this. If you go look in the mirror, you'll notice you've aged. You lose fur in some places. Little wrinkles grow bigger. Your skin changes. Your body gets bigger or gets skinnier. It does all that stuff. It's aging.

But the weird thing is that you don't necessarily feel older. There's that feeling of: "Wow, look what's happened to my body. Whoa." And that's because it's only your body that ages. Who you are is the one looking in the mirror going, "Well, it's losing its hair, its fur, it's changing"—or the hair moves to some other place, all the weird stuff that happens. But behind that is this consciousness that's saying, "Wow, look at what's happening in this life. I guess we're more than halfway through. I guess we're headed on the downhill side of the roller coaster."

There is a perspective of consciousness itself, and you see it. You become the loving witness of it. Instead of getting caught in all these things, you become the one who knows.

As Walt Whitman wrote, "I am large, I contain multitudes."

But who is this one who knows?

If you turn back and look, it's like being in the movie theater and you realize that there's light and awareness itself. It's born into your body. It leaves your body when you die. This is who you are. You are awareness and consciousness. Loving awareness.

Years ago, I was studying with Nisargadatta Maharaj, the sage in Bombay. He used to teach that what we took to be ourself and our identity was not who we were at all. We're not our body. We're not our culture. You can honor your body and feed it and care for it—it's precious. You can value your ancestors and your cultures. But he'd look at you and say, "Do you think that's who you are?" You asked me, am I afraid of death? He said, "You think this body made of chapatis and lentils and curries—you think that I'm made of curries and lentils? It's just not me." And he said it with such conviction. He said, "Who I am is beyond space and time." This is consciousness itself, outside of time.

So I went and did a long retreat for a couple of months, and I did this kind of radical practice of starting with the heart and doing radial sweeping, coming back to the center of things, and then dissolving into emptiness. You know, when you have time and you're young, you do weird things. And I came back high as a kite. I flew back to Bombay and sat down with him. He peered at me as he peered at people who came, and he said, "Ah, you're back. What's up?"

And I said, "I'm not back. It's all a dream. It just appeared and disappeared."

Whoa—that was like baiting the bear or something. "What do you mean? What do you think you know?" And he tested me in different ways. I said, "No, no, it's all just a play of consciousness." I was way out there after two months of this practice of going from one to zero and back. "It's all just the play of light, of space and time, and that's just consciousness."

Finally he kind of got it. He looked at me and said, "Pretty good." And then he said, "So now no more fear, ever, right?"

That got me. I sort of frowned. I thought, "Oh, maybe I could be afraid again."

He said, "Go sit in the back. You haven't finished yet."

If I were wiser at that time—but of course we all could say that about whole vast chapters of our life—I would have understood what I now know and said, "Fear arises. So what? It has nothing to do with me." And then of course he would have tested me some other way.

But there's something so beautiful about seeing the way things are. And the one who knows realizes, as we breathe, as we practice—St. Francis de Sales put it this way. He said, "What's needed is a cup of knowledge, a barrel of love, and an ocean of patience." And the patience is really timelessness. There's no quick fix for this life or for this globe. The one who knows acknowledges the way things are—the unbearable beauty and the ocean of tears.

Mary Oliver writes: "What can I say that I have not said before? I'll say it again. The leaf has a song in it. Stone is the face of patience. Inside the river there is an unfinished story, and you are somewhere in it, and it will never end until it all ends. Take your busy heart to the art museum and the chamber of commerce, but also take it to the forest. The song you heard singing in the leaf when you were a child is singing still."

I am of years lived so far—seventy-four—and the leaf is singing still. And this is really the invitation from the one who knows: unbearable beauty, the ocean of tears.

The Dakini speaks. The Dakini is the feminine wisdom figure.

"My friends, let's grow up. Let's stop pretending we don't know the deal here—or if we truly haven't noticed, let's wake up and notice. Look, everything that can be lost will be lost. It's simple. How could we have missed it for so long? Let's grieve our losses fully, like ripe human beings, but please let's not be so shocked by them. Let's not act so betrayed, as though life had broken her secret promise to us. Impermanence is life's only promise to us. Let us watch as things die and as they are renewed."

So the one who knows this says, "Hey, human incarnation—pretty cool. Pretty horrible. Pretty wondrous." And it also sees that life doesn't unfold by accident. There are causes and conditions. What we practice makes the future.

Sharon Salzberg tells the story of how she was practicing some months of loving-kindness meditation in Burma, repeating over and over, "May I be well and safe," extending these wishes to other people and things. Partway through her practice, she'd gone to receive her food that was placed in her hand. She went back to her little cottage and dropped it all on the floor—the plate smashed, everything scattered. She said to herself, "Sharon, you're such a klutz," which is sort of how she had viewed herself. But then the next thought came: "Sharon, you're such a klutz, and I love you." She said, "Oh, this stuff works."

What seeds we plant, what we practice—it makes the difference. This is your birthright: to know that it's possible to practice love and generosity in this amazing human life, and to let it be playful.

People think of spiritual life as some grim duty. I exercise, I have a new diet, I work out, I'm studying a new language to keep my memory sharp—all this stuff you do, right? But Ajahn Chah had such a sense of humor. The Dalai Lama—you come to see him and half the time he'll put his hand on your cheek, or if you've got a big mustache, he'll kind of tug on it or play with you and just start to laugh. Ruth Denison loved to get people up to dance.

Here's a story for you. In 1969—a long time ago, right when I went into the monastery—right out of graduate school, I was drafted into the US Army. After I got new clothing, a haircut, and vaccinations, I filled out a stack of forms. One asked for my religion. Naturally, I was worried about going to Vietnam. I decided to choose a new religion for myself. Feeling rebellious, I wrote: "Druid (reformed)."

Two weeks later, I received my dog tags stamped with my name, social security number, blood type, and "Druid Reformed." I wondered how the army would administer last rites for that.

Stationed stateside several months before shipping out, I was looking forward to a big date on Saturday night when the commanding officer canceled all weekend passes. A large anti-war protest was scheduled, and he was afraid a lot of his soldiers would attend. But I was determined to go on that date with my girl.

Discovering there was to be a full moon that weekend, I requested a two-day pass to celebrate a religious holiday. The commanding officer was skeptical. "What the hell religion are you?" he asked. I told him I was a Druid and that the last full moon before winter solstice was our high holy day. He demanded to see my dog tags, so I showed them to him. He looked at them in stunned silence for a moment, then granted me the pass.

As I was on my way out, he said, "Wait a second—don't you guys kill goats?"

"No, sir," I said. "That's the Orthodox. I'm Reformed."

You've got to laugh. You've got to play in this.

The Taoist Zhuangzi writes: "If you're crossing the river in a boat and an empty boat collides with your own skiff, you will not be angry, you will not be shouting and hurt. You'll just push it away. But if there's someone in that boat, you'll shout at them to steer clear, and you'll get angrier and angrier as it comes closer—all because there's somebody in the boat. But if the boat were empty, you would not be shouting, you would not be angry and upset."

If you can empty your own boat as you cross the river of the world, he says, no one will bother you and no one can truly harm you.

So there comes, for the one who knows, a sense of graciousness and generosity and ease, because what matters can't be taken from you. They can put your body in prison and you'll suffer. Believe me, these were people in Oslo. I was so touched because they'd willingly or unwillingly suffered for something that mattered so much to them. But in the end, what mattered was so much bigger than their suffering.

And this is your birthright—to see the world with the eyes of a Buddha, to see the whole of the world with the heart of the Buddha.

What matters in the end to the one who knows? There are really only a few questions at the end of life. Did I love well? Perhaps, did I learn to let go? Did I live fully? But did I love well is the question.

O nobly born, remember who you really are.

Nisargadatta again talked about this when he spoke about his own experience of freedom. "Wisdom tells me I am nothing—just the play of elements, the play of consciousness. And love tells me I am everything. And between these two, my life flows."

Here's Chief Seattle, and of course he meant to include women: "What is man without the beasts? If all the beasts were gone, men would die from great loneliness of spirit. For whatever happens to the beasts also happens to man." And I got this when my daughter was in second or third grade. She said, "Daddy, I think you can use this in your talks." It's in her third-grade handwriting, so I treasure it.

But I'm also aware of Israel, Gaza, Palestine. When I was there doing peace work in Palestine and Israel, I met with the former combatants for peace—they're still going even today. I met with the bereaved mothers on both sides, the Jewish and the Arab, the Palestinian and the Israeli bereaved mothers. And they're all, in the end, just mothers. And it's still happening. This is not the end of the story. The violence is not the end.

The one who knows shifts from what's called the small self, or the body of fear, when we feel ourselves individual and separate from the world. We're afraid the heart can't bear it. We have to defend ourselves. But to open, as Hafez the poet says: "Fear is the cheapest room in the house. I'd like to see you in better living conditions."

So you open. The one who knows says all of this can be held in the heart. For who we are is timeless awareness, loving awareness itself. Wisdom says, I am nothing, I am space. And love says, I am everything.

And this is not a philosophy. It's an experience, and something in you knows this and will know it when you die and you leave your body and go, "Wow, that was an incarnation. How about that one? Wonder what I learned from that one." Don't be afraid. Or you can be afraid, as Nisargadatta teased me, but don't be afraid of the fear. It's just another state.

Rilke the poet reminds us: ultimately, it is upon our vulnerability that we depend. The fears and confusions and the suffering of the world—they are to be experienced in this vast heart.

O nobly born, who you are is this knowing, is this deep wisdom.

Sometimes I suggest to people a practice: pretend you're enlightened. For the next week, just pretend. And see what happens. Maybe you won't even go back from that. "You already understand," said the Zen master.

Take a moment to reflect. Think of a situation that's difficult in your life—and your life is not just your body's life, but your life in the world, wherever it is. Imagine yourself as the wisest figure you could be. Imagine that you turned into Mother Mary or Buddha or Nelson Mandela—whoever it is. How would you respond if you were Mother Mary? How would you respond as an awakened one?

While it is not your task to fix the whole world—that would be hubris—you are charged in this human form to reach out and mend or touch the places that you can, from this wise and loving heart.

Continue to reflect. Not only is that wisdom within you, the wisdom of the awakened ones, but where are you called to reach out, to touch, to mend? You can know. As the poet says, "The earth is too small a star and we too brief visitors upon it to do anything but love."

You do know. You already know. You already understand.

In the question period that followed, a student named Toby shared this reflection:

"I have studied your work for many, many years. And now, as I'm really getting older—not just imagining it—I'm finding that it's become much more internalized, probably because of the practices. What I've noticed is that because I have very deep feelings about what's going on in the world, I've said to myself: then do something for the people you're able to reach. People are so needy to be seen and to be deeply heard.

"My practice is about having the courage to tell them what I see. I find that even those who are deeply grieving or frightened, when you hear them, when you say 'I heard you, I saw you, I know what this means'—you don't have to have a solution. What you have to do is have the connection.

"I grew up as an only child, and what I've come to realize is there's no such thing as an only child. We're all so deeply connected that we may be in a family configuration that pretends otherwise, but even our next door neighbor has changed that illusion.

"I can use what you've been teaching about the one who knows to remind myself that I'm never going to be perfect—that's not on the agenda. But I should take the risk. I should listen.

"It doesn't have to be anything dramatic. I was at the zoo the other day, and I had a long walk to get somewhere and didn't know how. A staff member in a car rode by, and I stopped him. Obviously he was very annoyed at being stopped. But I asked him for directions and he was very precise. And I just looked at him and said, 'Thank you. You were so wonderful.' This huge, radiant smile came over his face. And I thought: don't not do this."

It's really important. So whether it's in my volunteer work or just in my everyday life, I see it everywhere. Sometimes my husband laughs if we're at a restaurant and a waiter is wonderful. I'll say, "Would you like me to tell your manager?" And he says, "Don't move, don't move—he's right over there. I'll get him for you."

I think that's the one thing we can all do: for each person we interact with, if we see it, say it. The only thing I would add, and this is very serious to me, is that if you see that kind of beauty and wonderfulness in people, you also very often see the other side—and you have a great responsibility not to misuse it. That's a separate issue. You can just stick to what's really special.

So thank you, because without your teachings, I'd still be home thinking about whether I should do it.

Joseph: I am really touched by what you say, by your spirit. I wrote down "there's no such thing as an only child," because it's a profound revelation and you express it exquisitely. Not only is what you talked about and the way you're doing it inspiring, but the other thing you've communicated is that it's fun.

Student: It is. It really is. And you surprise a lot of people while you're at it.

Joseph: You get to be some combination of Wavy Gravy and the Dalai Lama—you're actually bringing some beauty and joy into all those interactions. And it's fun.

Student: And it also makes me happy.

Joseph: Ah, that too. Yeah, that too. So thank you so much.

Student: Oh, thank you, thank you.

Joseph: Pamela, would you like to unmute and come on?

Pamela: Hi. It's such an honor to be able to ask you a question.

Joseph: Sure.

Pamela: I'm grappling with a couple of things. I loved what you said about how you don't need to carry the prison inside your heart. I nearly lost one of my sons a year ago. I have twin boys and I'm a single mom. He's alive still, thank God, and healing. But he and his twin brother—I've always been the mom that did all the work, and I still do all the work. I manage a lot of medical stuff because he has a complex medical condition. And they're in this phase now, they're seventeen, where they want to spend more time with their dad than with me.

I'm really struggling. People keep telling me I need to let go, that they'll eventually come back to me. Our relationship is healing, but it's really hard. It's really painful. And I feel that I hold a lot of resentment and anger because I do so much every day—I'm constantly managing the doctor's appointments and this and that.

I don't want to hold that resentment because I want to do it. My ex said to me today, "Well, I'll make the appointment." And I said, "No, I don't want you to make the appointment. I got it. I'm handling it." But it's like... yeah. So I don't know if you have any words of wisdom.

Joseph: Thank you. Yeah. I'm a twin. Are your twins fraternal or identical?

Pamela: Fraternal.

Joseph: Are they quite different?

Pamela: Very. Very.

Joseph: Yeah, I was quite different from my twin brother. He was a football player, star of the high school play. I played oboe in the orchestra.

So it was just very different. But I can feel the tenderness.

"Yeah. You've said so many things. First of all, as we talk, let me ask, where do you carry the pain around this in your body?"

"I mean, in my heart, I guess."

"What's it feel like? Close your eyes and not trying to change it, just being gently attentive. What does this pain feel like? How big is it? What's its..."

"It's big. It's huge."

"Is it hot or cold? Is it trembling? Is it fiery? What is it?"

"It feels like a prison. There are things that have improved and I'm so grateful for that. But I'm so wrapped in fear of losing them, or them not coming back to me."

"Yes. So feel that. Feel the prison and the fear that after all you've done, your children won't love you and won't come back. Feel it. And let me ask, how do you hold it? How do you touch that? Do you wish it wasn't there? Do you try to push it away?"

"It's a mother's fear."

"Close your eyes. This is deep mother's pain, saying, 'I love them. And I just have to hold on to them because that's my job.' So you feel all of that. And now what happens if you hold that with compassion? Not trying to fix it, you're just loving and saying, 'I know how frightened you are, and I'll hold you kindly, and it's okay—you can feel all these things.' See what happens if you're kind to it. Does it like that?"

"Yeah."

"All right, so notice that. Now notice the next thing, as you listen and feel. There's something about trust. You think you're in charge because you've had to be for a long time, right?"

"Yeah."

"You're not really in charge much anymore."

"I know."

"Okay, let's take that in and see how that feels."

"It feels really crappy."

"It does, doesn't it? Because that means—who would you be if you're not in charge? Who's left? Tell me."

"I don't know."

"Yeah, so be with that don't know. There would be a tender place, and 'I've had this identity and I've had to fight for this identity in the lives of my twins.' Now, 'I don't know who I am.' They kind of don't want you to be that old person anymore. They're growing up, and even your ex is trying to do something, and you still want to be that woman. Now, if you were really kind to her, if the wisest part of you could speak to that woman... If Mother Mary and Quan Yin would say something to that woman who's worked so hard, what would they say?"

"I guess you have to move on to something else."

"So take a breath and then say that again—like the bodhisattva, the goddess of infinite compassion who knows the hearts of mothers—say it again."

"I guess you can take a break, but there are things I can't take a break on, you know..."

I think Mother Mary doesn't quite buy that. Yes, of course there are some things, but feel that. That's actually the part of you that's terrified to let go. Hold that with great kindness, because you've needed to have that. And say, "Thank you. Thank you. It'll be okay."

And it will, actually. It's not in your hands anymore.

"But one of them has a complex medical thing..."

Yes. And you do what you can, and you let your husband—your ex-husband—do some things. Maybe he won't do it as well as you, but he's their father. And you alienate them all, you know this, by clinging so much. How would they all respond if you let go of some?

"They'd be happy."

This is the one who knows. They'd be happy. Could you be happy?

"I guess."

That's a very soft, tender, sweet "maybe."

"All right..."

Well, you see, you already know. You already understand. And it's hard. But you actually have to become somebody different than who you identified with in your role—which you needed to be. And you need to say thank you to your heart, your strength, and your body for doing it. But basically, the game's over now for that part. You've got to be a different kind of parent. And they'll be happy, and you'll be happier eventually.

"Thank you so much."

Thank you. I'm so touched. I feel how deep your love is. Now it's time to match that deep love with the wisdom that you carry.

"Thank you."

Do we have time for another question? One more.

I want to add something. As we were ending that exchange, I found myself wishing I'd had her imagine that Quan Yin or Mother Mary—whoever resonates—could wrap their arms around her and say, "We understand. We understand that you could feel that." Because it's not just you, it's all mothers, right? And these great beings have all been mothers. They would say, "It's okay. We've all done this. And we've also all learned to let go."

Thank you. Okay. Let's see who comes next.

Todd, would you come on and ask your question or make a comment?

"Yeah, Jack. So I'm not so much a father right now as a grandfather. I also have two wonderful sons who I'm still in their lives. One has two sons, and I have a third grandson. He's almost three, and my wife and I spend a lot of time taking care of him. He is just the most amazing, joyful little guy. And my oldest grandson is about to graduate high school tomorrow night."

Wow.

And he was a great athlete. Like you said, your brother was the football player—he was a great basketball player and baseball player. And I watched his every game since he was five and worried and worried every single game. I couldn't even enjoy it because I'm a worrier. And I worry about my grandson—he's such a bundle of joy. He has his meltdowns and I worry about him.

So you started this whole thing by saying that people come up to you and say, "I really need the Dharma." And I really need it, really need it too. I've been following you for many, many years. I've taken—you don't know me, but I shared a little bit once with you here. I've been doing the stewardship thing on Monday nights for a few months now. And I really need this. I'm not new to it. I've been doing various spiritual practices for fifty years. But for me, it's so much more just the hope that I could go past all this.

A lot of fear as I get older. Fear of old age, sickness, and death—all that stuff. A lot of fears. It's hard for me to enjoy my life because I'm so fearful. And unlike the woman who just shared, things are actually going really well. I haven't had bad things happen. Everything's going well. I have this wonderful marriage—I've been married for fifty-two years—and I have a wonderful family. They're all doing well. But I worry so much about all of it. And for me, the Dharma that I need so much is more just the hope. Just to be in these conversations, a hope that somewhere there is less suffering.

Okay. So, question. What is the benefit of all that fear, having it go for so long? What do you get from it?

Nothing. It's bad.

Yeah. Okay. So that's a reflection for you, for yourself. Because I think when we cling to things—I mean, some of it is that your body's on alarm and you've got fight, flight, or freeze going all the time. So there's a physiological part. But also, it's familiar. You're comfortable with it. This is how you navigate the world. And hopefully the world has been okay because you've been worrying about it. And if you didn't worry about it, maybe it would fall apart. Maybe it needs you to sit on the sideline and worry the whole game, and that makes it go better or something like that. I'm not quite sure what it is.

So yeah, close your eyes for a moment. And tell me, as you tune in, where do you carry the worry and fear in your body?

It's all in my stomach.

It's in your stomach. What's it feel like?

Just tight.

Tight.

"So bring a kind attention to it, almost like you were holding a child who was frightened and curled up in a ball and scared. You're just going to hold them kindly, as if to reassure them in some way. That holding gives us a sense that they're recognized, they're held, that something bigger can hold them. Notice what happens as you hold it kindly. See if anything happens. Just be curious. Does it like it?"

"Well... in this moment, it feels a little better doing that. But it's kind of like I know that it's not going to be like this tomorrow."

"Slow it down. In this moment, stay with it. Keep your eyes closed."

"It feels good. But then the worry comes in and says, 'Yeah, but that's BS. I'm coming. My channel is full tilt open. And as soon as this is done, I'm coming back on.'"

"But first, stay right where you are. To actually pay attention and bring kindness to it soothes, it softens, it opens. Now, imagine that you could take that worry—for the moment, we're just playing with it—and put it in the lap of some great spiritual figure, like the Buddha or the Bodhisattva of Compassion. Whoever you choose—that's just mine, but it could be anybody. And say, 'All right, I've got so much worry and I know it doesn't really help so much. Will you carry it for me?' Imagine that you were to put it in the hands of the wisest and most loving being that you could imagine and say, 'Would you hold this for me for a little bit?' And see what it would be like in your imagination to take it outside of your body and place it in the lap of this wise being who said, 'Yeah, I hold a lot of stuff. It'll be okay.' Notice what happens."

"I'm not sure that if I say I'm noticing something, I would be honest. I feel like I should say something."

"No, you don't have to. What you're noticing is that that doesn't work for you."

"Yeah. It's just still there."

"Right. Okay, so put two hands on your belly. We'll go a different route. Okay, and say, 'I understand you're trying to keep me safe. Thank you. I understand you're trying to keep me safe and the people I love safe. Thank you.' Because that's what it's trying to do. 'Thank you. You've been working really hard to keep me safe. Thank you.' And now say the next thing: 'In this moment, with my eyes closed, listening, talking with Jack—in this moment, I'm okay. In this moment, you can relax a little bit. It's okay.' As you thank it and say, 'Thank you for doing so much. You can relax. It's okay.' And notice what happens."

"It feels better. It softens."

"Okay. One more question. What does the wisest part of yourself—the advice from the wisest part of your being—want to say?"

"That there is hope in these practices to get beyond this fear."

"Yeah. And it's not that you're going to get rid of the fear."

But you can notice even now, when you said, "Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm okay right now. Thank you for keeping me safe"—the fear is there, but who you are is bigger than that fear. You're this part that's wise and witnessing and compassionate. You can say, "Yes, I know you've been helping me. Thank you." And I'm okay. A bigger part of you can say, "I'm okay." So you don't have to get rid of it, but you become someone larger and wiser—which is who you are.

"I'm going to add this one about 'thank you.' I have many practices that I try to put into my mind all the time, many things that come from you and many other Buddhist teachers. And I'm going to add this one—thank you. Thank you for the fear."

Remember to put your hands on your belly when you do it, on your gut, and say, "Thank you. I'm okay just now. You can relax somewhat. And thank you for taking care of me." Really make it a physical practice because you can't just do it in your head. You have to feel it and do it in your body.

You're a good dad. You're a good grandfather. You're a good human being. So things are okay. And you will die—it's true. You'll get old and sick and you'll die. And everybody does. Not a problem. This Ajahn would say, what do you think? You think that's not natural? You'll be fine. Your job really is to love. And you have so much of it. So much care comes out of you. And now you can even love the fear and say, "Thank you. We'll be okay."

That was the last question for this evening. Thank you all for attending. Thank you for your good hearts. The world needs us to wake up, needs human beings to care in a whole bigger, more wonderful way. And we can only do that together. There's no such thing as an only child—I love that expression. So brothers, sisters, siblings, take care of yourselves this week. The summer solstice, Juneteenth, celebration of freedom—let it be inner and outer.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 48

The Laughter of the Wise: Emptiness and Form

Jack Kornfield · 1h37

> In this profound Monday night teaching from Spirit Rock Meditation Center, Jack Kornfield addresses how we can navigate these turbulent times—political division, climate change, wars, and personal struggles—without becoming overwhelmed or disconnected. Drawing from the Heart Sūtra (Prajñāpāramitā Hṛdaya), he illuminates the paradoxical teaching that form is emptiness and emptiness is form, not as abstract philosophy but as lived experience that can liberate us from grasping and anxiety.
> Kornfield weaves together wisdom from multiple traditions: the Diamond Sūtra's (Vajracchedikā Prajñāpāramitā Sūtra) teaching on impermanence, Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha listening to the river's thousand voices, Zen master Seung Sahn's "don't know mind," and the Bhagavad Gītā's secret of acting without attachment to results. He shares the teaching of his master Ajahn Chah, who learned from Ajahn Mun that all experiences—even profound insights—are merely waves passing through awareness. The essential question becomes: to whom do these experiences happen?
> The talk offers practical wisdom for engaged spirituality: becoming "make-weights" who tip the scales toward justice, planting seeds without knowing when they'll sprout, and embodying the paradox T.S. Eliot expressed as learning "to care and not to care." Through stories of Aikido master Morihei Ueshiba, Sri Lankan sage Ari Ratana, and Father Greg Boyle's work with gang members, Kornfield demonstrates how resting in loving awareness allows us to act with both fearlessness and tenderness—laughing with the wise while weeping with the grieving.

And Spirit Rock, of course, not only welcomes you, but we have beautiful retreats on the land. And now that we're open again, more or less post-COVID, I can't recommend enough what happens when you come on a silent retreat in this beautiful valley.

So what we do on Monday night is really quite simple. We meditate or sit with a little bit of guidance for about half an hour or so, then take a break, stretch or relax for five minutes. And then there's some teachings and time for questions and dialogue.

Whatever brings you, it's a pleasure to welcome you wherever you are in your life—both geographically, emotionally, communally. All parts of you are welcome, all of your rather extraordinary web of life now invited to come into the present here, this moment with one another and yourself.

So let's sit together, if you would. Please let yourself find a way to settle. Let your body be stable, supported, and also at ease. You don't have to get into any weird posture to do this. You're weird enough as you are without adding to it from your meditation.

And once you find yourself settled, if you're comfortable, let your eyes close gently, or at least leave them downcast. Take two or three long breaths and bring the mind and body and heart together just here in the reality of the present—which is all we really have. The rest is just thoughts of past and future, but here, just where you are.

Let yourself begin to open to the reality of the present, to your experience. It's helpful to relax the body somewhat. Let your eyes and face be soft.

Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle and release your neck. Let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body on the seat, wherever you are, and how gravity pulls you to mother earth—and how, at the same time, the earth completely supports you. You can relax just where you are, just where you're seated. Let the belly be soft, the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

And now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the experience of being alive, just here and now. Notice how the earth, how life itself, is breathing you. You don't even have to do it. You're being breathed. And each breath, in and out, breathes together with the trees and the grasses, with the cats and dogs and wolves and octopus and all that lives. We're all breathing together. Feel it, and relax into it. You can rest and trust in the breathing.

As you bring your mindful, loving attention to the body breathing itself, very kindly invite the quality of calm and steadiness, of ease. You can even whisper it as the body breathes itself: Calm. Ease. Let the breath settle, and the whole energy of being come to rest here on the earth, in this moment. Calm and ease, inviting a sense of relaxation, graciousness with each breath.

You don't have to make the breath do anything. Let it have its own life, its own rhythm. Sometimes short. Sometimes longer. Sometimes loose and easy. Sometimes constricted. Sometimes slow. Or faster. Let it breathe itself, and you are the loving awareness, resting in ease and calm as the breath breathes. Steady, kind attention, just noticing. Resting in a calm, mindful, loving awareness.

You can also begin to notice all the waves of experience that rise and fall around the breath. Sometimes you'll feel the breath very directly. And sometimes a wave of thoughts—plans, concerns, issues, memories—will rise up. And as you notice that wave, you can even name it gently: thinking or planning, imagining, remembering. And let it rise and fall. You don't have to surf it or go anywhere with it. You just notice it. And then again, feel the breath, how it breathes itself in the midst of it all.

And just as your mindful and loving attention can feel the breath breathing itself, and can notice the waves of thoughts that come and go around the breath, notice too the emotions and feelings: sadness, excitement, longing, frustration, sweetness, peacefulness, joy. And when the feelings become like strong waves, let go of the breath as your focus and name them gently: sadness, sadness or excitement, excitement. Feel it as a wave of energy. Just as the breath breathes itself, so the feelings arise and fall like waves of the ocean. And the breath breathes itself in the middle of it all. Relaxed, gracious and easy.

You are the mindful, loving awareness that notices the breath coming and going, that notices waves of thoughts and feelings as they rise for a time and pass away, that notices too the ever-changing field of sensations, which is how you experience the body and senses. And like the breath that breathes itself, the tingles and vibrations, the warm and cool, the contractions and opening—the whole field of sensations floats in the mindful, loving awareness, the space of awareness itself.

Relax. The breath breathes itself. You simply notice, calm and steady. The waves of thoughts and emotions, the sensations of the body—they rise and fall around the breath like waves of the ocean. And you are the space of loving awareness: open, gracious, steady amidst it all.

From this quiet place, you can ask what wants your loving attention. You can know what in the body, in the heart, in the mind calls to you. And as you allow yourself to listen and know, let the loving awareness become compassion and kindness. For you know what to do and how to respond. You are the wise one. Steady. You are awareness itself.

So tonight, as usual for these teachings, I'd like you to sense them more as a reminder or a reflection or a meditation—just to let yourself listen and sense what feels true to you, what's helpful and what's not. Toss out what doesn't serve you, let it go. The whole point is to actually communicate and touch each other's hearts and minds in ways that benefit, and let the rest disappear.

Tonight I'd like to talk about the laughter of the wise, about the nature of emptiness and form. So it's a little bit of a deeper talk, if you will, than some others recently. Often I've been teaching about the Bodhisattva and the commitment to serve this world from the awakened heart. Tonight is a different perspective on the understanding of wisdom.

It's pretty wild times out there. And of course, the question for us is how do we navigate? How do we hold this? There's the changing political landscape that's really dramatic. Divisiveness in politics and elsewhere. There's climate change. There's continuing racism and injustice. There's wars—Ukraine, Sudan, Gaza, and other places. Plato said, "Only the dead know the end of war." Hard to say, but it pretty much describes my experience in seventy-nine years of this world. There's refugees. There's all the kinds of struggles in our communities.

How do we navigate? We want to help. We want to make a difference. We offer money. We offer our time. But also, it's overwhelming.

There's an African story about a village alongside a river. When the river rose and flooded much of the village, one man was sitting on a rock by the edge of the torrent of water. The hands sticking out of the river were his sister, his mother, his daughter, his brother, his wife—and he could only reach for one or two hands. That's tough, isn't it? But it also maps a little bit where we are. You want to help somewhere and you can, and it's a beautiful thing. But what about all those other hands reaching out?

Take a pause here. This is our human predicament in samsara, in this world.

And so we sit in meditation. Yes, in part for stress reduction—mindfulness-based stress reduction, as Jon Kabat-Zinn called it. And we need that.

And the sitting we just did was beautiful. But the word Vipassana also means to see clearly—to see our own mind and heart, to see the ways that we get entangled, to see the ways we get free, and to see the same in the society around us: the entanglements and the possibility of liberation.

When we see clearly, we see suffering and we also see joy. And as we see clearly, we can foster the causes that increase wellbeing and happiness, and release those that cause suffering. But we have to stop and look, and look around, both deeply in ourselves.

Yesterday I was out on my deck watching the shimmering nearly full moon that did look like a round cheese near the horizon. It had that nice cheese-like yellow color. Remember as a kid, you were told that's what it was made of? And over the lagoon, I felt somehow how that same orb, that little planet that circles ours, was also being seen at different hours this same day in Jakarta and Johannesburg and Jamaica and Jerusalem. We're all on this little blue globe floating in a vast sea of space, circling around our star with another little globe circling around us. And it's pretty mysterious when you pause and you look.

Even if your circumstances are easy—the economics of your life, the class, the caste, the geography, wherever you are—even if you're somewhat easy and blessed, you can't really be at ease. Because as Archbishop Tutu says, when someone asks, "How are you?" in South Africa, he said, "We always answer in the plural. We are well, or we are not well." He said, because we're so connected. If I say we are not well, it's because my grandmother is sick or my brother had an accident. And you asked me, how are you? And I say, we are not so well. You understand what I'm saying? Because you know this, that there's suffering. Parents who can't feed hungry children, thousands of refugees in Sudan, thousands and thousands, refugees all over—there is suffering. And no matter how much we might remove ourselves, it touches us because we're not separate. We have to say we are well or not well together.

How do we hold this? Suffering isn't the end of the story.

In the course of this hour or two that we gather together, there are Bodhisattvas doing extraordinary work to care for others. And there are ordinary Bodhisattvas. In one or two hours, there will be 2.6 billion acts of kindness. Parents putting tortillas and cassavas and oatmeal and rice and Cheerios on the breakfast table for children. People who open the door for another, who pass each other with a sense of kindness. That's also who we are. Yes, there is suffering, but it's not the whole story and not even the end of the story.

So let's take this reflection a little bit deeper. The most recited verse in the Mahayana Buddhist temples, especially the Zen but elsewhere too, is the Heart Sutra. And it begins with Avalokiteshvara there on Vulture's Peak, offering teachings, having been asked by the Buddha to awaken all to what is called the perfect heart, the heart of perfect wisdom.

And Avalokiteshvara begins: Form is not different from emptiness. And emptiness is not different from form. That which is form is emptiness. And that which is emptiness is form. Feelings, perceptions, thoughts, memories, experiences—all things.

What is emptiness? It's a little bit like a fish saying, "What is water?" And here's the remarkable thing. Do you know what fish are made of? They're made of water. Everything that makes all these sharks and squids and urchins and all the amazing things that we see in the ocean actually is a consolidation, thanks to DNA and all kinds of miraculous things—it is water taking new forms. So the fish say, "What's water?" And it turns out they are water.

So what is emptiness? If the fish says, "What's water?" and we say, "What is emptiness?" Emptiness is taught as a liberating teaching. Because as we look at our life, we're busy worrying, planning, concerned, remembering, trying to organize.

And these days I meet people with a tremendous amount of anxiety and worry. When you quiet the mind and look more deeply, then you start to see that you can't figure it out with your mind in the way that you try to. Because you want to figure it all out and make it safe for yourself. That's what the mind does—it's sort of a safety machine. Let me anticipate and get through this as best as I can and minimize trouble.

But you all know that story of the Chinese horse, right? There is this prosperous farmer. He gets married, he has his son, and everyone says, "Fantastic, he's so fortunate!" Not only does he have a farm, he's got some horses, and he has a boy, which in China was a special thing. But then a wild horse got interested in the horses that the farmer had and came sniffing around, and they caught it. The son caught it and brought it in. And now the farmer had three horses, and everyone said, "He's so lucky! He's got a boy, he's got three horses."

And the young man then decided to break in the horse. He was riding it and he fell and broke his leg. And now everyone said, "Oh, he's so unfortunate. He had this beautiful horse that came, he had this son, and now he fell and broke his leg. Who knows how he'll be limping. How unfortunate." Three weeks later, the local warlords came through town, taking all the young men off to battle—but the farmer's son couldn't go because his leg was broken. And they said, "Oh, he's so fortunate now." And I could go on with the story. You don't know. I mean, it's extraordinary.

And what this speaks to is called the wisdom of uncertainty—or by Zen master Seung Sahn, he called it "don't know mind." The mind that's open, that's not so rigid, that doesn't worry. "I know what's gonna happen in this election." Well, guess what? In one week—a terrible assassination attempt. And assassinations are horrible and they change the course of history like that. The stepping down of the current president. It was just one tiny little week in the wildness, and you thought you knew.

So emptiness—it's not a philosophy, but it's more tuning you to the experience of the way that life is.

"For years and years, I struggled just to love my life," wrote Mary Oliver, the poet. "And then the butterfly spoke, don't love your life too much, as she rose weightless in the wind." Don't hold on too tight. So much in that poem—the struggle to love oneself, but to do so not by grasping.

Because think back. Remember when you were a teenager? And all the opinions and views and hurts and longings and love and struggles. And then your twenties and your thirties, and it all seemed so real at the time. And then your life passes—oh wow, middle school, I remember that. That was like a different incarnation. Relax, baby. This is a journey. It's not something to hold on to.

So back to that river—the African River. Now we're at a different river, the river Ganges. And the Buddha walks along with a group of monks and nuns. And he says, "See the bubbles that float on the edge of the Ganges River?" And they said, "Yes." And he said, "Those bubbles are your thoughts, your feelings, your experiences, your days. They appear, they're there for a while, and they're gone. This is the nature of things."

Or as the Diamond Sutra says: like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow—things appear and they disappear. And you know this. It all dissolves.

What happened to Y2K?

It's back with the dinosaurs, with the triceratops and the trilobites. What happened to the Mayan Empire and the Aztec and the Roman and Kublai Khan? They were magnificent. Gone. Ozymandias—all gone, you know?

Notice, it can all change in a moment. An earthquake, a comet, an assassination—we hope not—a volcano. All these things. This is the nature of samsara. We tend to feel it's so solid, but it doesn't last. This is part of the mystery of emptiness—that things are here and then they're not here.

And you know who that includes? As Miss Piggy would say, moi.

In the Mahabharata, it speaks about the great mysteries of life. And at one point it says, among the mysteries, here is one of the greatest of all: that human beings can see people die all around them and think that it won't happen to them. We kind of know it, but when you get the diagnosis and it's near the end, you go, "Whoa, I sort of expected it, but not so soon. Not like this, not like everything."

It's like the very rich man who died, and people in the neighborhood were saying, "Well, how much did he leave?" And somebody who was kind of wise said, "Why, everything, of course. That's what you leave. You leave it all."

So as you sit in meditation, yes, you can quiet, there's stress reduction, but it's not an errand to get somewhere. And it's not a grim duty. It's a pause in the mystery of life, because it all seems so solid. And yet when you quiet and notice, there's waves of pleasure and anticipation and planning and anxiety and remembering. There's waves of tension in the body and softening. There's all kinds of insights. But when you step back, the insights themselves and all the thoughts and feelings that come—they start to become like waves of the ocean. And that's what life is. You're on the shore, and the waves come in and out.

Here is a reading from your high school days. Hermann Hesse, Siddhartha, now at the end of his journey. He was listening deeply, and he sat by the river where he was learning from the ferryman:

He was now listening intently, completely absorbed, quite empty, taking in everything. He felt he had now completely learned the art of listening. He'd often heard all this before, all the numerous voices in the river, but today they sounded different. He could no longer separate the different voices—the merry voice from the weeping voice, the childish voice from the manly voice. They all belonged to each other: the lament of those who yearn, the laughter of the wise, the cry of indignation, the groan of the dying. They were all interwoven, entwined in a thousand ways, and all the voices and goals and yearnings and sorrows and pleasures, good and evil—they were the music of the world, the stream of events. And when Siddhartha listened to this river, to the song of a thousand voices, when he did not grasp just one—the sorrow or the laughter—but heard them all, the whole, then the great song of a thousand voices consisted of one word: harmony, perfection, the laughter of the wise.

And you sit, and your life becomes pixelated. You see the screen and then moments of thoughts and moments of sensation and vibration of the body and sounds. The more closely you attend, the more it becomes vibrations. It dissolves. Again, the Diamond Sutra: like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in the summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, and a dream.

And it is dreamlike. You'll see when you die and float out of your body, and there's this like, "Wow, that was a trip, that incarnation. Amazing. Look at that." You'll see. You don't have to believe me. Just wait.

So the point, if it's a dream, is what? The question is not the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity. The question isn't the next election cycle. The question isn't the resolution of this war or that. It's a recognition of something so profound—the dance of eternity, the play of consciousness. And instead of being confused and depressed and anxious and all those things, you can step back and say, "Wow, look at samsara."

What a dance, baby. What a dance.

And as Siddhartha said, with all the joys and sorrows and groaning and sweetness, all of it—this is the river of life. It's how it is. And it is like a dream because you can't find 2023. It is gone. In fact, you can't find June. You can't find July 19th. It's gone.

And so what do you do? Where do you rest? Yes, there's a wisdom of insecurity.

My teacher Ajahn Chah went to see the greatest master of the day of the forest monasteries, Ajahn Mun, and he told him about all the experiences he'd had—the insights and light and dissolving his body and understanding impermanence and seeing the forms of suffering, and what it meant to live in this way and that, and the images that could come. Ajahn Mun listened and said, "Chah, you missed the point. These are just experiences. You're sitting there, it's like you're in the movie and there's a Western and a documentary, a nature movie and there's a romantic comedy and there's a war movie. You're seeing all these movies, but there's only one question: To whom do they happen? Who's watching the movies? Turn your attention back and become the awareness itself, which is what you really are. You are consciousness."

Now, if you want a little hint, go look in the mirror—I like to say this—and notice that you've aged. Get real about it. The hair turns different colors or just vanishes like it can. The wrinkles appear, your body changes. And you have this experience—it doesn't matter, you can be in your 20s or 30s and have it—that you look a bit older or a lot older, but you don't feel older. You know that experience? Why is that? Because it's only your body that's aged. But the consciousness, which is what you are, is timeless.

And so you look and you say, "Whoa, look, it's lost its fur. It's sagging here. It's doing what it does." But that's not who you are. And you know that in a moment. You might rue it and say, "Gosh, I wish I had all that luxurious hair I had when I was a teen." But that's not the deal. You realize that you just rent the body from Hertz. Then you have to turn it in again, or whoever rents it to you. Your karma rents it to you, maybe.

But what happens is you become the witness to it all. You become the consciousness. And you get kicked into it sometimes—when there's an accident, when there's a diagnosis, when you take psychedelics, when something shocking happens. You go, "Whoa, I forgot. This is like a dream, it's changing. Anything could happen." The solidity starts to break apart.

And what happens instead is you become a loving witness of it. As Sri Nisargadatta, my teacher in Bombay, said, "When you understand, you will realize as I do: wisdom says, I am nothing." You're not separate from it all. You're just a play of consciousness, not who you think you are. Wisdom says, I am nothing. And love says, I'm everything. That is all.

And this isn't a philosophy—it's actually an experience.

Many of you know this from the times when you've gotten quiet and something remarkable or difficult happened. And you go, "Oh, wow, it's not quite how it seemed—this solid." Who are you? There's the question.

We have so many things that we identify with, that we identify ourselves with. I'm a man or a woman. I'm a son or a daughter. And when you're in the room with your parent, you're a son or a daughter—that's who you feel yourself to be. I'm a sister or a brother. I'm a teacher sometimes. A student when you listen. I'm young-ish. I'm old. I'm gay or straight or trans or non-binary. I'm a Republican or a Libertarian or a Democrat or something else. I'm black, I'm brown, I'm yellow, I'm red, I'm white.

Forget it. All those identities need to be honored and respected, but that's not who you are. That's just your body. Those are the roles that you play at different times. I'm the boss. I'm the worker. I'm the social change agent—wonderful. I'm also at the effect of the society at large. Who you are is so much bigger than you think you are. Those are all just costumes you put on for a certain moment.

My dear friend Ari Ratana, who is the great sage of Sri Lanka and the best community organizer in all of Asia, during the long civil war in Sri Lanka between the Hindus and the Muslims and the Buddhists—he was a Buddhist elder, but really a celebrated elder, and he used his home to shelter some of the Muslim leaders from the Tamil Tigers.

One day, the military came to his door and knocked on it, people in uniform. His daughter opened the door, his teenage daughter, I think fifteen. They said, "Where's your father?" She said, "He's not here." They said, "We know you're harboring people. We want to come in and see who you have in the house." She said, "My father wouldn't allow you to do so, but he's not here." They looked at her and said, "Where's your mother? We need to talk to her and come in." She said, "My mother isn't here either, and she wouldn't allow you to come in."

Then they said, "We need to come in." And she looked at them and said, "This is what my father would say. And I say it to you: you will have to kill me first before I will let you come in or harm any of these people."

Imagine—a teenager. But his spirit was so strong and so beautiful that it lived in her. You are bigger than you think you are. You're not these small roles. You undertake them, but you also have a huge heart. The real you is loving awareness and joy, and you can use it and embody it.

Thich Nhat Hanh says we're just playing hide and seek, all these roles. Sometimes I'm the girl on the refugee boat who throws herself into the sea after being raped by the sea pirate. And sometimes, he goes on, I'm the sea pirate with no compassion in my heart. I am all of these. And I weep as I tell you this.

"If only it were all so simple," said Alexander Solzhenitsyn. "If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary just to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being—and who is willing to destroy a piece of their own heart?"

"Oh nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. You are ariya ratana—you are the noble one.

Yes, it's all tentative. It's all constructed in some kind of remarkable way. It appears, it's like a dream. Why care, then?

Because as you become the loving witness of it all, as you rest in consciousness, that wisdom brings tenderness. The Heart Sutra goes on, after saying "Form is emptiness and emptiness is not different than form—it all evaporates, it's not solid"—then it goes on to say: "And form is form, and emptiness is emptiness." This is the paradox. The form is also form. And we live in this extraordinary paradox.

Marpa, one of the greatest of ancient Indian-Tibetan sages, talked about the emptiness of all things. And then his grandson was killed and died, and he wept uncontrollably for a time. His students said, "Master, you told us it was all empty." And Marpa looked back and said, "Yes, and the death of a child is one of the most intense emptinesses you will experience." And he continued to weep.

This world—it's filled with unbearable beauty and blazing love and an ocean of tears. But it's the only place that I know of in all the circling galaxies where you can fall in love, where you can eat baked Alaska, where you can see an anaconda and an octopus. Not only can you fall in love, but you can break your heart too. Where else can you do this but in this earthly realm?

And I have to say, one of the most improbable things for me, and one of my favorites, is fireflies. I mean, think of it—let's have some bugs and put little blinking lights on them. Come on! How did this happen? It's so remarkable.

And yes, there's the ocean of tears, and there's the innocence of children that can't be taken away. If you watch young children run around, or you watch puppies and kittens and otters and wolf cubs—amazing. They play, there's a kind of innocent joy, a wonder, a beginner's mind, because this earth, the form of it, keeps recreating itself. And you get to be the witness of it in this time, in this incarnation—and probably quite a few more times. So you hang out, you'll see.

So why care? Because where else can you eat baked Alaska? And where else can you feel that profound tenderness when you look in the eyes of another being—whether it's the tenderness of love or the tenderness of compassion—because you're all connected.

So you realize emptiness and the inevitability of suffering. Anybody not seen that? Please raise your hand. You know, it's vast. But so is the innocence of children and the wonders of every forest and ocean.

And so how do you function? You function in a different way. I was showing some martial arts movies to a friend of mine who's a martial artist—films of O Sensei, Ueshiba Morihei O Sensei, the founder of Aikido. He was this tiny little guy, four foot nine inches, with a white patriarchal beard. He would invite the great martial artists of that time in Japan to come and see his art demonstrated.

In one scene I watched, he was surrounded by twelve or thirteen big guys—masters of judo and karate and other martial arts. And he said, "Okay." He said, "When I signal, bring it on."

He stood there, he signaled with a nod, and they moved in to attack him. And the strange thing is, it's like watching Obi-Wan Kenobi—he turned in a circle and they all fell down. Their eyes were wide with bewilderment: what happened? I watched it many times. How could this be? But his chi, his energy—and he said it's the energy of love, really, that doesn't allow harm to happen. Come on, bring it on. And they all fell down, these big, hulking, great martial artists.

How do you function the more that you're empty, the more that you're not so attached? Oh, I'm so attached to the politics and to the struggle, to the peace work which I love and I've been doing for decades. But the more you attach to it, the more you suffer. T.S. Eliot says it this way: teach us to care and not to care. Relax. Make space. Become gracious like the Dalai Lama and Desmond Tutu in that beautiful Book of Joy, with all the sufferings of Tibet and South Africa and so forth. How can they still laugh? Because they live in the reality of the present. They live in the heart of love. They live in the spaciousness of loving awareness. They become gracious.

And when you do, you become fearless. It doesn't mean fear doesn't arise, but something bigger happens. You sit in meditation and you face your tears and your worries and your anxiety and your trauma and your grief and all of that. And you face your longing and your love and all the beautiful things. And you take your one seat in the middle of it all and become the loving witness.

I work with a group of CEOs of some of the top twenty companies in the country, or the world. I don't know quite how it happened, but I've ended up with this as one of my assignments. And I like it because they're smart, mostly, and the ones who choose to come to me are ones with good values.

One CEO came to see me, and she was being attacked—it's hard for women as leaders, even more than men in our patriarchal culture—she was being attacked for her liberal policies and support and vision. We talked about how you could find this spacious equanimity in the midst of it all. Sweep through your body and return the sufferings to the earth so you don't carry them. I said, "You need backup, but you shouldn't carry it in your body."

She said, "What kind of backup do you mean?"

I said, "Here, I'm going to come back in a few days." And I brought her this beautiful statue of Durga, one of the Indian goddesses with eight arms filled with all these weapons. I said, "It's said that when you have trouble, you call on Durga. She'll come and take care of the demons, and then you're fine."

But along with Durga, I gave her a series of pictures: Sojourner Truth, Harriet Tubman, Dr. Martin Luther King. And because she was also working in the tech world, Nikola Tesla and Einstein and Louis Pasteur. We made a kind of altar. And I said, "Now, when you sit, you turn to them and say, 'Okay, I know you've done it. You've all been attacked. There's Galileo—they wanted to throw him on the pyre. We can do this.' They're cheering for you."

And it changed everything.

The moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. So what you bring to the game then is emptiness and love. You bring your presence.

When I was a monk, and before that living in Thailand, there had been some very violent student demonstrations in Bangkok. The military dictatorship was resisting, and the students were doing what students do and are supposed to do—they were protesting. It got quite violent for a long time. There was a standoff at the barricades, you know the whole archetype. And the country was in great dismay because things weren't moving, and the violence was escalating.

One morning, the abbot of a forest monastery gathered together a whole group of his monks and nuns. They got onto a big bus and drove into Bangkok. Out came sixty monks and nuns with their ochre forest robes, and they made a line. They stood between the military and the students in the street all day. They didn't move. And when someone asked why they were there, they said, "We're here to practice loving-kindness and peace."

And they stood there peacefully and lovingly for an entire day. And when they left, the space that was created was enough for the student leaders and the military leaders to begin a conversation to unwind that conflict.

You become gracious and fearless in a different way, and more flexible. It doesn't mean that you don't care, but you're not attached in the same way.

A poem from Hala Alyan, who is a great Palestinian poet: "I'm here to tell you that the tide will never stop coming in. I'm here to tell you whatever you build will be ruined, so make it beautiful." That's a line—whatever you build will be ruined, so make it beautiful.

And you become gracious and flexible. My friend who started Homeboy Industries in Los Angeles, Father Greg Boyle—his work is mostly to love these people that have not been loved, the gang members who've lost so many friends to gun violence and prisons. He doesn't judge them. They say, "Father G, I need some money, I need bail, I need help." And he just gives it to them and loves them and supports them in ways they would never have felt before. He doesn't judge them. That's the moral arc.

So what can you do? You plant seeds. As Henry David Thoreau reminds us, "I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, but I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I'm prepared to expect wonders."

And those wonders come in part from your trust in the long-term moral arc. They come from the seeds of your best intention. You don't know when those seeds will sprout, but if you act from the place of beauty and trust and love—I think it was Immanuel Kant who talked about how there were moral acts of ethics and then there were moral acts of beauty. And those are the ones with the greatest power.

The Bhagavad Gita explains it as the secret. Here it is: the secret is to act beautifully without attachment to the fruits of the actions, because that's not given to you. You get to see the dance of life from the place of loving awareness and plant amazing seeds and let it unfold. Don't be so damn attached to it all, because that's not your job. Your job is to care and not to care. Plant seeds, vote your heart and your conscience, act without attachment to the fruits of the actions—because you don't know, it's the Chinese horse, who's supposed to be the leaders, what's supposed to happen.

From the Tao, it says, "When you don't realize the truth, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. When you realize where you come from, who you are, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kindhearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king, immersed in the wonder of the Tao. You can deal with whatever life brings you. You can serve whatever life asks of you. And even when death comes, you can smile."

If you want to read anything remarkable, read Father Greg Boyle's first book, Tattoos on the Heart.

So let's take a minute to be quiet, and then we'll do a little dialogue together.

A student speaks: "The questions you're raising—I don't think we can sustain ourselves through all the insanity unless we follow some of the paths that you outlined. I have so many friends, and we're all getting older. People are starting to have worse physical pain or sickness, but they don't slow down. They just keep going as hard as they can. And I don't know what to say. I think the root of that is inside what you're saying—we do what we can. That's all there is."

"And this is what you're saying — we'll plant seeds. Maybe the grass, maybe it's about results, but I don't know if you have any advice about how to talk about that. I mean, I've had to deal with that for a long time, and I'm really working on it, but I don't know what to say to my friends. I mean, they're great people, they do great work, but they can't sustain it at that rate."

"Well, what I feel, China, because you spent your decades as an activist yourself — you've just really given yourself — I feel how much you care. And also, I feel that in these years, you've learned something like Gandhi taking a day a week in silence.

You've learned somehow that you have to sustain yourself, and some of your friends haven't yet. So if the wisest woman you can imagine were to give you some advice, what would she say to you, China?"

"The thing I can think of is... I have a friend who used to say, when people couldn't spend time with their family because they were at work, she would say, 'You're not going to regret that you didn't work more when you die.' And it's like, I feel like we have to — I mean, I guess what she would say is, a lot of it is about who you are and not what you accomplish. And you just have to accept that."

"What I hear, and I really appreciate what you said, is that somehow you've now been cast in the role of the wise woman for your friends. And some of them are lost in a way. But the fact that you're talking with them and that you carry this voice is already a gift. Just like all your work to build a more moral and gracious community and society, you now have a new role. You have become that, you know, and it's a beautiful thing to see. So I thank you."

"Thanks so much, Jack. I appreciate that."

"Thank you. That's helpful."

*

"Jeff, would you come on and speak to Jack?"

"Jeff, how great."

"Hey, really good to see you."

"Glad to see you. Wonderful talk. So thanks for mentioning water. Got me going a little bit about fish appearing from water. I happen to live next to a creek — Alhambra Creek in Martinez. And it's a year-round source of water. I use it to water my yard. And the redwood trees love it, and everything loves a little water. The yard's doing fine — you can just see it over my shoulder a little bit.

That creek also, in these rainy years, has flooded and done severe damage to myself and my neighbors. And so should I curse the creek? You know? No. It doesn't work that way for me.

I first met you in a flood of emotions. The perfect woman had left me. She was looking for the perfect man, probably. Apparently she left her glasses at home because I was right there. That began the time that I've been listening and participating with you. I no longer — to the Chinese horse story — I am no longer made difficult. There's no difficulty that arises when the flood comes, because every year it rains, every year the flood comes. Maybe it's bad this time, maybe it's not so bad this time, but there's always water in the creek. So I just keep a calm attitude, and your advice to care and not care — I'm not sure exactly what that means, but it resonates with me, as practically everything I've ever heard you say has. So thank you very much for being my teacher."

"Jeff, you're a poet as well as many other things — a teamster poet and many other things. One of the things that you speak of, and I hear from you, is your relationship to the — you have a relationship. You and the creek are in relationship, and she floods and you befriended her in some way. And that's what I've learned about you — that you have a lot of water of tears, that your poetry and your" work now is also to see with kindly eyes this world and to care with an open heart. So you and the creek are somehow relatives, and you're living together. You befriended each other. You know that she rises sometimes, so you can prepare a little bit. Anybody in a relationship knows this happens. So I want to celebrate the water of your tears and the water of your creek, and kind of reflect back the relationship that you have. Thank you for your words.

There's a comment in the chat from Carl. He writes, "I must have spoken to you before your talk and told you exactly what I needed to hear. Thank you for somehow knowing."

Oh, thank you, Carl. I appreciate that comment. Somehow we do get tuned with each other, and it's beautiful.

You know, folks, part of what happens when we come together in a field of care and openness—you know, emptiness and form, both the spaciousness of the heart that's big enough to hold it all and the care that comes out of it—then when we act, we become, even in difficult times or maybe especially, we can become what is sometimes called a "make-weight."

If you don't know that term, because it's not very common: when you have balance scales, and you go to some markets and places where there'll be that balance scale, on one side they put the papayas or the tomatoes or whatever, and on the other side they put these weights. The last in that line of weights are these very little weights, and they're the ones at the end that you put—one little make-weight at the end—and finally the scale tips.

In some way, I believe that we become the make-weights in this world, even when things are difficult, by our presence, our care, our connection to what matters, and also that spaciousness. We can place that weight, and the scales tip toward justice, toward beauty, toward love.

Maybe this is enough words for tonight. You all are quiet, and I'm deeply appreciative of that. We're quiet together. And we're holding this world and this mystery of life in loving awareness and a big heart shared.

So thank you. As always, it's a pleasure.

CHAPTER 49

A Labor of Love

Jack Kornfield · 1h36

> In this heartfelt Monday night talk, Jack Kornfield offers a fresh perspective on Labor Day by shifting from traditional teachings on right livelihood to exploring what it means to make our lives a "labor of love." Drawing from his decades of teaching and personal experiences in India and Bali, he contrasts Western identity through work with Eastern traditions that define people by their spiritual devotion.
>
> The talk begins with a guided meditation that approaches the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) through a lens of gratitude—thanking the body, heart, and mind for all they carry, rather than trying to fix or perfect our experience. Kornfield emphasizes that "the goal of anything is to perfect your love" rather than perfecting ourselves or our mindfulness practice.
> Kornfield shares practical wisdom for keeping the heart open during difficult times: cultivating trust in the vastness of time, maintaining a daily meditation practice, engaging in mettā (loving-kindness) throughout daily activities, seeing others as young children, and celebrating life's gifts. He addresses a mother's profound grief and fear for her teenage son, guiding her through a practice of bringing loving awareness to difficult emotions and ultimately toward the wisdom of setting loved ones free. The talk reminds us that we are held by something greater than our struggles, and that blessing ourselves and others is the essential work of being human.

I'm glad to see you all here tonight. It's an odd relationship, you in your little squares and me in mine on the other side. But it's what we have, and it's a pleasure. I do miss meeting in person, I have to say. There's something so special about it. But I'm also glad we can gather virtually because it means people who don't live locally can be part of Monday night, and I appreciate that as well.

For those of you listening who are new—some of you have signed up as Spirit Rock Stewardship Circle members, while others are joining through YouTube or Facebook or whatever other channels exist. I don't even keep track of them all, but I know you're out there, and I welcome you.

Monday night has been for me a teaching time and a kind of personal ritual. I started teaching Monday nights forty years ago when I moved full time to Marin County from the East Coast, where we—Joseph and Sharon and other friends—started our center in Barre, Massachusetts. I did it pretty much every week for thirty or thirty-five years. Now I teach once a month, but I still feel deeply connected to the community.

Part of what Monday night is, is a reminder to all of us when we come together of what matters—in whatever way you can hear that in your own heart and in your own being. We take time to pause, to reflect, to listen to some Dharma teachings, to connect with one another. I really enjoy it, and tonight I look forward to the dialogues and questions and responses that we'll share.

For those listening in the broader audience, if you've never been on a retreat, coming to Spirit Rock is really magic. It's an amazing, beautiful valley that we acquired forty years ago from the Nature Conservancy to protect. We've preserved almost all of the 412 acres except for the bottom part of the valley where our retreat buildings stand. The rest is wonderful land to walk on, with beautiful tree groves and expansive views.

More than that, we so need time to go on retreat. There's something about a retreat that's different from just relaxing or taking quiet time at home. The discipline and the invitation and the community support really become magic. We used to joke about it after so many years of retreats—we called one feature of it "the Vipassana facelift." People would come on retreat after being really busy beforehand, struggling to get everything together, wondering if they even really wanted to go. They'd finally arrive, and you could see all the struggle in their bodies, the tension they'd carried for weeks and months, everything that had been going on. It's just obvious because we live in a culture and time that's so demanding.

And at the end of a week or ten days or longer, they'd be ready to leave—forget the Botox. Their faces were all smooth and clear. Their eyes were shining. We could sell this in Hollywood, I know we could. There's something that's good for your spirit and your smile and your heart and your body and your mind. So here I am touting retreat, because it changes your life.

What we do on Monday night is really quite simple. We start with a meditation, which we'll do for about twenty-five to thirty minutes. Some of it is guided. Then we take a break for five minutes to stretch or relax. That's usually followed, as tonight, by some teachings, and then a period of dialogue, questions and responses. Whatever brings you here, you are welcome. As Emiko said, all the parts of you are welcome. This is a heart space that says, "Yes, you belong here." I feel your attention and your presence, and we share it.

So let's begin with some meditation practice. Let yourself find a way to sit that is stable and comfortable and also alert, in whatever way works for you, so there's a sense of presence and ease. Take your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this human incarnation. When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently, or if that doesn't work, lower your gaze and bring your attention kindly just here where you are. We tend to focus so much on what we're doing and where we're going, on external things. Let that settle and come into the present moment, the reality of the present.

And to bring body, heart, mind all together. Bring your attention here to this embodied experience. Feel the presence of your life here, seated on earth. And take two or three long breaths to help everything settle.

Invite the presence of mindfulness, mindful loving awareness, to notice just this moment, just as it is. As you feel your body seated here, let the sense of ease and relaxation deepen. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, roll your head in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax and the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your whole body on the chair, the cushion, wherever you're seated. The weight of gravity pulling your body back to Mother Earth. And relax with it. Trust that the Earth supports you as you meet her. You take a relaxed and steady seat just here. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Now with this embodied presence, pay attention to the life of this body you've been given. With loving awareness, feel how it breathes itself, wherever you sense it. The earth is breathing you. The atmosphere of air shared with the trees and all the living creatures. Feel how the earth breathes you, breath by breath. There's no right breath. Sometimes it's short or long or shallow or deep. Let it breathe itself. And you rest in a mindful, loving awareness that feels how the body breathes, inviting an ease with each breath.

Allow the mindful loving awareness of the body breathing to notice as well all that's carried in your body, very kindly. The areas of tension or contraction or stress. Notice the places of openness and ease. Notice the whole field of the body. It's alive with vibrations and tingling, warmth and cool, places of pleasure and of pain. The whole field of the body—you hold this mysterious, blessed field of energy with loving awareness. This body, with its delights and its illnesses, its struggles, its play. You feel how it's always changing, tingling, vibrating, breathing, the life of the body.

And now, as if you could offer a bow, say to your body, thank you. Thank you for carrying so much, for carrying the beauty and the tears, the joys and the pain. So much you carry. Thank you. Holding it with loving awareness. Thank you. I'm okay just now. You can relax. Here in this present moment, I'm okay with it all. You can relax and rest with a spacious ease and gratitude, holding this whole bodily experience with kindness.

And with the same spirit of loving awareness, mindfulness, bring your attention to your heart, to the heart that holds so much. Yes, the physical heart, but the bigger heart that carries your longings and love, your tenderness and your pain, that holds hopes and worry. The heart has so many things it holds. Frustration and joy. Kindness. Impatience. All of it. Deep fears and even deeper love.

With mindful loving awareness, sense all that your heart has been carrying, surrounding it with kindness and compassion. All the tears and beauty and pain and love, all carried by this wondrous heart, this human heart.

And as you hold the fullness of this human heart with loving awareness, as if to offer a bow, you can say thank you. Thank you for carrying so much. Thank you for carrying the joys and the sorrows. Thank you. You can relax just now. I'm okay here in the present moment.

Let yourself rest in the reality of the present. Thank you, you can relax and be at ease. I'm okay, it's okay. We can hold it all.

Let the breath deepen. And experience the great heart of a Buddha in yourself—the great heart that holds it all with kindness and wisdom. We can do this.

And with the same mindful, loving attention, become aware of the mind, the thinking mind, the busy, ever-present stream of thoughts and images. The mind secretes thoughts like the salivary gland secretes saliva. They pour out. It thinks and spins and remembers and envisions. It rehearses and plans. It analyzes.

Feel the whole busyness of the mind, figuring things out, trying to take care of you, trying to keep you safe. Sometimes it feels energetically a little like the hamster in the wheel, going round and round, all to try to make it okay, to help you figure things out.

Hold it all. Surround it with kindness, compassion—it works so hard. Feel its energy. And notice when you bring kindness to all the energy of the mind, whether it likes it.

With loving awareness, as if to make a bow to the mind and all it does, you can say thank you. Thank you for working so hard to keep me safe, to take care of me in this life. I'm okay just now. You can relax. I'm okay just here and now. You can rest.

Let the mind settle down, held in the space of mindful loving kindness. You can relax and be at ease just here and now, in this moment.

And notice the space of stillness in the awareness beyond the thinking mind, beyond the words and images—the vast, silent, loving awareness that is who you are.

Shift your attention. You have noticed the experiences of the body. But who was noticing them? You have noticed the pain and the pleasure, the measure of joy and suffering carried in the heart. But who was noticing it? You notice the busyness of the mind, thoughts and images.

And relax back. Become the field of loving awareness itself, like space or sky. You are the awareness. You are consciousness itself, experiencing the body, the emotions, and thoughts. You are the loving witness, the timeless consciousness. Rest in it. Trust it. It is your home.

I invite you to take your seat and be comfortable and listen again, as usual, not to take notes. There's no quiz at the end. And in fact, not even to believe anything I say—even I don't believe everything I say, so why would you? Rather, listen and sense if there's something that resonates, something that's true for you, a reminder. If so, wonderful, and if not, just let it go. Listening in that way is its own kind of meditation, its own form of mindful presence, allowing. And then it has a bit of care or discernment in it.

For tonight, given that it's Labor Day, I had a long, well-crafted talk prepared, which I sometimes like to do. Those talks go on for an hour with all kinds of quotes and texts and so forth on right livelihood. I was on my way to the drug store to pick up a statin that my cardiologist said I should start to take because it will be good for me as I enter my eighties. Okay, you should probably take it. All right.

I was thinking about it, and I realized I didn't really like the talk. It felt too teacherly and too formal in some way. So I decided to simplify it a lot and try it a different way, which I will. Rather than talk about right livelihood and what the Buddha taught, I'd like to talk about the labor of love.

We spend so much of our time—in many cases more than half our life—working. This is Labor Day. And in the West, we define ourselves often by our work. You meet somebody and one of the first questions is, "What do you do?" "Well, I'm a financial analyst," or "I'm a nurse," or "I'm a gardener," or whatever it happens to be—a teacher.

In India, that's not what people ask. Instead of asking what you do, which helps them understand who you are, they ask, "Who do you worship? Who is your God?" Are you a follower of Ganesh, the remover of obstacles? Are you a Shaivite, where Shiva is the deity? Are you a follower of Ram, Ram and Sita, the path of love? And they know you by being a Vaishnavite who follows Vishnu, or someone who follows whatever the particular goddess or deity lights you up and inspires your life.

What a different way to see people. Who's your spiritual star? Who inspires you, instead of what kind of work do you do?

The beautiful thing is when you go into taxis. I think of those years I spent time in India, in Bombay with Nisargadatta, this wonderful guru I was with. Sometimes I rode the double-decker buses, which was great, but I'd take a taxi, and the taxis have a little shrine on the dashboard. Yes, there's the speedometer, which no one pays attention to. And there's the signals, which maybe or maybe not. But on top of that, there's Ganesh, or there's Sita and Ram, or there's Hanuman. And that's what matters more than anything.

I've told this story before, and I will tell some others—old stories that I love. When I lived in Bali over a number of different years for periods of time, my daughter, during one of those long stays of many months, was six years old. We were living with a Balinese family, and we found a school for dance. All the kids in Bali do dance, and her Balinese friends were training.

So she went to this school on Jalan Sugriva. Bali is so interesting because it's kind of a South Sea Island culture mixed with Hinduism, so you have all the gods and goddesses. And she started to learn Balinese dance. Of course, as a six-year-old, that was a class—it was fun.

By the time we were getting ready to leave months later, they were going to hold a kind of performance, her last performance, showing what she'd learned. So we went, and it was in the afternoon, and they started to get her ready for her dance performance. They wrapped her in silk and put all kinds of makeup on her, which she loved, then did her hair up and put these gold flowers in it. The teacher's wife took off some of her gold bracelets and put them on—for little girls who liked that kind of thing, it was like her best dream.

Meanwhile, it was starting to get dark. It was late afternoon and I had my video camera and I'm dad—I'm gonna film my daughter's Balinese dance. And I started to get impatient. After more than an hour of them dressing her to the nines, the teacher could see I was getting impatient. He looked at me kindly and said, "Relax. You'll get whatever film you get. But in Bali, we believe that everyone is an artist, whether they're five or six or eighty-five or eighty-six, and they don't perform for the audience. They perform for the gods. They make their dance an offering. And so your daughter is an artist, and we want her to look her very best in her offering to the gods."

If you travel in Bali—and it's a culture that I love—it's the most robust culture in spite of all the tourists. Everybody is an artist. The guy in the bank is also a gamelan music player, and the nurse or the doctor in the clinic is also a painter or part of a Balinese dance troupe, and the auto mechanic sings. Everybody is an artist. In fact, they don't think of art as something separate from life. You do it for the gods—or you meet someone and ask, "Who are you really?" "Well, I'm a follower of Hanuman, the servant of Ram who offers gratitude and support to everything good in this world." What a way to define yourself or to steer yourself in this life.

You know that story of the cathedral in France? A man was traveling through a town and went by an unfinished building in the stone yard. There were some people chipping away at stones and he began to talk to them. He said, "So what are you doing here?" One man said, "I'm a stonemason. I carve stones." The man smiled and nodded and wandered around a little more. He saw another man and asked again, "So what are you doing here?" This one said, "Well, I carve stone, but I do it because it's a beautiful livelihood. I like doing it. And I get money to support my family and to live a good life in this town. It's a good livelihood." The man thought, "That's beautiful."

He wandered around more. Finally, he saw a third person chipping away at the stone. He said, "I see you're one of the stonemasons here." The guy's face lit up with a smile. "Yes," he said. "I am building a great cathedral. It may not be done in my grandchildren's lifetime. But what I'm doing with each strike of the hammer is to build a magnificent cathedral."

So how do we do the things that we do in this world? Yes, we need to feed our family or make money or get through the day. But what does it mean to live this life with a joyful spirit and warm heart? Think of the people you run into, whatever they're doing—whether they're the cashier in a market or the person you deal with for finances or the auto mechanic or the nurse. The ones who do it with a joyful spirit—what that's like.

Again, my daughter. She used to love going over the Golden Gate Bridge, first of all because once in a while we would get one of the toll takers who would smile and say, "Welcome to the city of St. Francis." That made us all light up. What a cool thing. But her favorite thing was to pay for the car behind us, back when you still paid before it all got automated. She'd say, "Daddy, let's pay for the car behind us." So, okay, we'd pay for the car behind us.

And then she said, OK, go slow and turn around and look. And the people would get up there and learn that their toll was paid by the car ahead. And then she would look back and smile and they would all laugh.

What a way to go through the world. Why not? What would it mean to keep your heart open as you go through the day? And what helps you? Because you're supported by the universe. The universe obviously approves of you because you're here, right? You are approved of. What helps you to keep that joyful spirit, playful, warmhearted? What reminds you, inspires you? Who reminds you?

When we did the guided meditation at the beginning of this Monday night class, perhaps you noticed that the instructions have changed somewhat. We went through the foundations of mindfulness—of body and feelings and mind and dharma—but in a different way from how I used to teach it. I would teach, okay, be mindful of the breath. Here's the practice of mindfulness of breathing with ease, breathing in and out and concentrating and focusing, all of which has great value, especially if you do it over some period of time and the mind becomes focused and steady.

But instead, I found how helpful it is for people to begin to be aware of their embodied experience, their emotional experience, the activities of their mind and say, thank you. It changes the valence. Instead of being kind of the mindful observer, there's this generosity that says, thank you for carrying this, for breathing, for holding the emotions, for carrying the struggles in the body and the beautiful things. Thank you for trying to protect me, mind. And you can feel how it surrounds all of that with gratitude and loving kindness.

So you're able to be aware, but you're not trying to fix it or get different because the goal isn't to perfect yourself or perfect your mindfulness or perfect the world. The goal of anything is to perfect your love, our love. And so it's a little different valence, a different way of paying attention.

So what about when things are hard? How does the heart hold them? And I could go down the list—the political divisiveness and the politics and the elections. And politics, by the way, in case you've forgotten, is ritualized warfare. The Republicans and Democrats don't send their knights on horses with lances and they don't send their armies to D.C., except for maybe armies of lobbyists and online whatever. But it's really a kind of ritualized power struggle to see who's going to carry the responsibility and the role forward. But there's so much divisiveness in it.

And then we have the continuing wars—Sudan and Gaza and Venezuela and Ukraine, trench warfare in Europe. We thought that was over. Oh, my God. And climate change and racism and all of the struggles of humanity. And the economic divide—very rich on one side and large numbers of people who struggle financially on the other. It's why Labor Day became so important. It celebrated the life of working people and celebrated the right to unionize or to have an eight-hour work day or to not have child labor, those kinds of things. But it's hard in a modern capitalist industrial society. There's this huge economic divide.

So here we are—climate change and wars and economic struggle and so forth. How do you tend your heart in all this? How do you hold your heart? How do you keep a spiritual perspective, which is not a grim duty? Okay, I'm supposed to meditate, like I go to the gym and I work out and I have a good diet and I, you know, whatever, now I meditate. It's meant to be something more uplifting, like that thank you—that gratitude, that spirit of loving awareness that says, wow, here we are. How do I navigate this? How do I tend my heart?

What helps me is a sense of trust in the vastness of time. I don't see spiritual practice as a grim duty. I see it as an invitation to open and hold it all with the great heart of a Buddha. And I hear Dr. King saying the moral arc of the universe may be long, but it bends toward justice. And I believe it. I believe there's a fundamental goodness, Buddha nature, whatever you want to call it, in the human heart.

And I sense it and know it and trust it.

It's easy to get scared because the way politics works is that it tries to scare you. That's the currency of politics. Let's scare people, make you anxious, and then you'll vote for us. Those people are going to do something terrible. You better vote for us. It's all going to hell and we will rescue you. That's the game.

Having a vast sense of trust, it plays out. Praise and blame, gain and loss, birth and death, joy and sorrow, Republicans and Democrats and everybody in between. This is the game of being human. You can hold it all with a sense of perspective. I can. And practice helps.

Having a meditation where you daily quiet yourself—where I quiet myself, quiet the mind and tend the heart—and have the perspective, as it says in the Bhagavad Gita, the secret. You remember the secret, right? The secret is to act beautifully, to act well, without attachment to the fruits of the actions. It's not given to you to determine, certainly in the short term, how it turns out. But it's given to me and you to plant beautiful seeds and water them. And that you can do in this life. If you have a seed, eventually it will bear fruit.

Practicing mindfulness, quieting the mind, tending the heart. What helps me is doing mettā. This year, I'm just doing mettā practice. I'm doing loving-kindness practice. And I love doing it. I love doing it when I drive because I can feel a little irritation come up when somebody cuts me off or somebody's impolite. I've been an aggressive driver—I was trained as a taxi driver in Boston. I know how to get my way through traffic. I've become kinder somewhat, but mostly I bless people when they piss me off. I go, "Oh, having a hard day. May you be safe and protected."

When I go through the grocery store, I look at the tired people working there or the people shopping late or early. Bless you. May you be safe and well, surrounded by love. I bless the trees and they bless me back. And it changes me to do mettā—to sit and do loving-kindness meditation, to share it.

I remember the teachers that inspired me. Ram Dass, who became more or less just love at the end of his life. He loved everything. One of my friends was there with him in his wheelchair after twenty years of living with his stroke and disability. He'd had a lot of illnesses and almost died. He was in a lot of pain often. This person walking with him said, "Ram Dass, are you in pain?" And he looked up and said, "I love my pain. I love everything. I love my pain." It was an amazing moment.

To bring it back: to love this life that we have, with all of it. That helps me to stay true in some way. Because everybody wants you to be something or do something—or if not, you internalize it from the society.

Remember the story of the little boy who went to the restaurant with his mom? The waitress came up to the table and said, "What would you like?" And he said, "I'd like a hot dog and a Coke." His mom looked at the waitress and said, "He'll have meatloaf and mashed potatoes, please." The waitress took all the other orders, wrote them down. And as she was about to leave the table, she looked at the little boy and said, "Do you want ketchup and mustard with your hot dog?" A big smile broke out on his face. And as she left, he turned to his mom and said, "She thinks I'm real."

How do we stay real to ourselves? And to each other. That's something too. Am I being true to myself, what everybody else expects aside? I ask myself this because there are all these requests and opportunities and problems and things to do. And I take some time to listen. What's my task? What's my love, really? What's your love?

I also get help from gratitude, keeping the heart open with all this. Sylvia Boorstein, another of our colleagues, another teacher—she and a friend became gratitude buddies. At the end of every day, they text each other two things they're grateful for, which means you have to scan your day and say, what am I going to text tonight that I'm grateful for? It's so helpful to have that spirit of gratitude, for myself and for others. If you want to learn more about it, go to Brother David Steindl-Rast's site—I think it's gratitude.org or something like that. He's really a wonderful teacher. Gratitude.

And then celebrate. Trudy and I went out on a date a couple of nights ago. We just took our time. We took a stroll along the water as the sun was setting, and then we went to our favorite French restaurant. I thought, God, it's so great—time in nature, walking along the bay, the waves, watching the moon, having a date. Please celebrate.

You remember that story of the priest? He was not quite accosted, but one of the young monks in the monastery was given the task of copying the prayer texts and the rules for the order because the old copies were wearing out. He was copying them dutifully, and then he got kind of upset one night. He had a dream. He said, what if someone made a mistake? We've been copying the copies and copying those copies for centuries. Is this really the great texts that our ancestors gave to us? So he went to the master there and said, I'm worried about these—we keep copying them, but they may not be really accurate. Could you go look? Because down in the bottom of the great monastery were the special rooms where the original texts were kept, wrapped up, sacred texts. Let's just check.

So the abbot went down, and he didn't come back up for a while. The young acolyte thought, what's the matter? He waited longer, and finally he went down the stairs toward the crypts where the great texts were kept, usually locked up, and he heard the abbot crying. He said, Master, why are you crying? And the abbot said, I read it. It said celebrate, not celibate.

Celebrate is what makes me happy too. And you—why not celebrate? I watch the Dalai Lama and Tutu and all these icons of joy, and I think of sharing mudita, which is one of the great Brahma Viharas, shared joy, paired joy. It's not an individual practice like metta is for oneself and others. Mudita is the joy in the happiness of others. It's one of my favorites.

You know that story of the farmer who had some of the most prized and best corn in all of Iowa? He'd go to the county fair and there would be all these exhibits, and they would be judging who had the best corn—the big kernels—and he had the most magnificent corn. But he also had the practice every year of giving away his best seed corn to all the farmers who lived around him. Somebody said to him, why would you do that?

You know, with the old American competitive spirit—you've got the best corn. And he looked at them so kindly and said, because the wind blows. If my neighbors grow inferior corn in their fields, it will blow over and pollinate my fields too. The fact that I can share the best means we all get to share in the blessings of this really fine corn.

And I know it—when I'm able to share something that I love, music, care for something. It won't be the corn because I'm not a farmer or a gardener. Maybe I farm other kinds of things. I farm loving-kindness in the heart—and on a good day, mind you.

Not always. But this is what it's like—it's our nature to want to share. Every little kid says, "Take a bite of this. Try this." You know how they want to stick stuff in your mouth when they're little? Because they're loving it.

There is a practice with mudita of picturing others and seeing them as a young child. I do this when I do my metta practice. If I go along and somebody seems grumpy or difficult, I gaze at them and look—what were they like when they were five years old? Still with a lot of innocence, getting ready to go to school, young and earnest. And I can see what that child was like. All of a sudden my heart just melts and I think, "Yeah, you too. Here we are. I know who's in there, even though you're being brusque or mean or whatever." Under there is that kid. Because it's still in all of us, that child of the spirit.

And then you envision what their happiest moments were. Even people with terrible childhoods had a happy moment where they rolled down a grassy hill or played in the sand or something like that.

My five-year-old grandson started kindergarten this past week. It's a big deal to go to school. You're a big kid now. Here's your little backpack, and you are becoming a school kid. I think he was some combination of anxious and scared—it's new. Would he have any friends there? It was a new school. Kind of, okay, stiff upper lip, I can do it. But you could see the tears.

I remember a couple of years before, when he was in preschool. He'd started a new preschool and had a hard time for a bit. Then I was visiting him, and he said to me, "Baba"—which is what he calls me. He said with this big smile, "I have two friends." And he gave me their names. "I have two friends." It was just so tender. I have two friends. We want that. We want that.

And this is what loving kindness and joy and mudita is. We talk about what keeps the heart open in these difficult and divisive times. It's our friendships, our love for one another, the vastness of space and time, the moral arc long but bending toward justice, gratitude, care for one another. What better can you do?

Happy Labor Day. This is the real labor. It is. It's the labor of love.

Arisaka, I'm so happy to see you here.

"So much wisdom tonight, Jack. So much wisdom of the elder. Thank you."

We're elders together, kiddo. It's come to this.

"I was especially touched by the notion of seeing the child in the other. For me, one of the things I did—I woke up one night very afraid, and I did Tsultrim Allione's Feeding Your Demons practice. One of the gifts you can receive from this persona, this archetype that you fear, came to me. The gift was about seeing the small, scared child even in the face of the person you fear. There's a political person I'm thinking about—I'm not going to say their name—but that understanding that even in that person there's a small scared child who wanted to get their father's love and approval. It shifted something in me, because it made me realize every one of us came out—I was a midwife for twenty years—every one of us came out of the womb as a child just needing love. And all the horrendous things that some people evolve to do stem from how they were treated. To really see people not as enemies but to truly see that child and try to connect is so profound. I'm really glad you spoke to it. Because one of the decisions I've made as an elder is that as I prepare to leave, I don't want to leave angry at anybody. I want to leave with compassion for everybody. And seeing that child, knowing that child exists—it's so important. So thank you for that."

Oh, Arisaka, I just want to pause and drink in and honor and celebrate. You really, in these few words, offered us your heart—what really matters to your heart. When I hear it, there's such a sweetness. So thank you for dessert. It's the end of the evening, and if you're going to leave, leave with a really good dessert. Thank you, dear.

And Priscilla, I see a hand.

"Can you hear me?"

Yes, I can hear you just fine.

"Jack, you don't know me, but I feel like I know you. I've listened to you for years, and I feel very grateful for that. I also feel grateful because it was a beautiful evening—I could go to a gong bath and listen to the beauty of gongs and bathe in that, and then come and listen to your talk and bathe in this. Something I want to say is that the sound of your voice, and all our voices, sometimes gets lost because we're so much trying to figure out and listen to the content. When I listened to the gongs and listened to you, it was all so beautiful when it comes from the heart. All the voices that come from the heart are so soothing and comforting. Yes, what you say is so important, but just the sound of our voices when they come from the heart makes me teary. I just wanted to thank you over the years for your voice. It's a song to me at this point. And when I listen closely to so many people who show up authentically from the heart, it's all a song."

Priscilla, thank you. This is sweet. We get to share this, and it makes me happy too. I have a question for you. What helps you hear that song that you said is comforting and soothing, that sense of harmony, even when you're out in traffic and the horns are honking and the red light is flashing? As we go through our life, what helps you stay tuned to the harmony?

"Well, I'll tell you—I think because I've had a regular meditation practice for years—"

If I can drop into my heart, that's all I have to do. If I can get present, I just inhale and exhale, and it works. I just came off a week-long workshop on awe and happiness, and it touched on all the points you've been talking about. Because I'm also a writer, and when I listen to the bells, how I describe it when you really hear and get present—it's like chocolate cake in the womb. When you were talking about dessert with that lovely woman, that's exactly what it is. When we come from the heart, we find that baby Buddha within all of us. You just have to remember. And sometimes in traffic, you forget.

Chocolate cake in the womb. I will remember that too. Thank you, dear. This is wonderful.

Another voice spoke: So nice to see you, Jack. Actually, the woman before me said a lot of what I was thinking about. Over the years, your voice has been so musical to me, so soothing. I wrote down a couple things so I wouldn't forget—I forget everything after two minutes.

When you were talking about how people introduce themselves and ask what you do—I've been a writer and an artist all my life. Sometimes I would say, "I'm a writer," and sometimes, "I'm an artist," and people would respond, "Wow, that's so cool." It made me realize how lucky I was to be an artist and a writer. It taught me so much gratitude through their responses. I learned from all these people.

Gratitude is something I've studied a lot, in a twelve-step program and other places. Gratitude is just so important. And so I want to thank you, to give you so much gratitude, because you have helped me over the years. And you continue to.

I'm listening and taking it in with much appreciation for your gratitude. But I also love that people say, "You're so lucky you're an artist." Somehow I dream that our culture would say, "Your life is your art. You are an artist." It's like Bali—you are an artist, you just don't know it. We are all a fountain of creativity, and it wants to come through us. When people light up seeing it in you, you're reminding them of something. It's a gift to them, but it also reminds them: I have that too.

Exactly. Sometimes I would say to them, "You're an artist too, you just don't do it." They think that's kind of crazy, but I believe that. I believe that very deeply.

So it's easy for me to say, "Yes, you're an artist too. Go and draw something."

There was a little girl who was being driven to preschool by her mom. Her mom was an art professor at a university. As they're driving there, before she drops her off, the little girl asks, "So, Mommy, what do you do as an art professor?" Her mother said, "I teach people how to draw." And the little girl looked at her and said, "You mean they forget?"

Yes. Yes, exactly.

I had a similar experience when my son was pretty little. He was maybe five or six. I used to teach writing, so very often he would ask, "Where are you going?" And I'd say, "I'm going to teach writing." One day he just looked up at me and said, "Are these grownups?" I said, "Yes." And he said, "Don't they know how to write?" He thought I was teaching them cursive or something like that. How perfect is that? "Don't they know how to write?"

The next person to speak was Pamela. "Hi, Jack. I have a question. I had talked to you once before. I'm so honored and appreciative of your time. I'm a mom of twin boys and I've been divorced for many years. I guess my question is, how do you love this life when you are dealing with incredible grief?"

She continued, "I've been locked into this terrible struggle with the father of my sons for almost seventeen years. And now one of my twins has told me he doesn't want to live with me anymore—he only wants to live with his dad. I have been so full of grief and worry. How do I try to trust? How do I not hate and feel anger towards his father? I've spent so many years being a mother. I feel like I'm losing that ability and I feel terrified that I won't get my son back. I've spent the last two years fighting for his health. I don't know exactly what the question is. Is it how does one try to feel gratitude and joy? Or how do I trust that he'll come back to me?"

I listened to her, and first I wanted to bow to the honesty of what she was saying and the depth of the pain she was expressing as a mother—because that's some of the deepest pain we have as parents, taking care of our children, trusting them, hoping, not wanting anything to happen. It's built into a mother's DNA. And of course that brings fear and worry, and also a lot of attachment. You may have noticed.

I asked, "He's seventeen, you said? How old is he?"

"Seventeen."

And he has a lot of medical issues that I've been managing. He doesn't want to deal with them or have me manage them anymore.

You know what? You have done beautifully. I hear it. You've tended him. You've cared for him. You've handled the medical needs. You've protected him from things, maybe from his father. Magnificent. It's exactly what a mother is supposed to do.

And now it's like the fledglings in the nest—he has to try to fly. When I hear you, I sense that he may even unconsciously realize that the only way he can learn to fly is to separate from you, because you've done everything for him. Something in him... it's like young men at some point who say, "Is there anything dangerous to do around here?" They want to. He wants to do something to make his life that's not entwined with his mother.

You needed to protect him and be that close to him to protect him. And now he's saying, "Okay, you've done it, Mom. Now I've got to try it." And then there's that part of you that says, "Oh, who will I be if I'm not taking care of him?"

Let's pause for a moment because I'm saying some things and I'm wondering how they're landing.

It's complex because he tried to take his life two years ago. He's finally doing better now. And the way his dad takes care of him is different than the way I do.

Of course. So you're afraid he won't be taken care of, and he might take his life. And he's saying to you... I feel this because it's primal. It's in your core chakra, in your womb: "I have to keep him alive." And he's saying, "Mom, I've got to do it myself now."

All these parts of you that don't trust, that say he might die—all those are true. But you can't grow up if you don't face some danger. You don't become an independent person with your mom still there.

I think—thank you—I think where the double grief happens is that I've started to feel like it's because I'm a bad person. I'm not enough.

You're a bad mom. Didn't do enough. Okay. Close your eyes, and first check in: where do you feel the grief in your body?

Like here, in my chest.

And what's it feel like?

Like I'm locked up.

Feel the place that's locked up, the grief. Is it hot? Is it raging? Is it ice cold? What does it feel like, locked up? What's in there?

Like a volcano.

Okay, there's a volcano. So first, just feel the locked up place and the volcano with interest and care. You kind of need to do this because your son probably has some of it in himself too. So you have to learn how to do this. Feel it and wrap it with awareness, to say, "Okay, I feel this volcano happening"—of rage and pain and who knows what else is in there.

And now you're not running away from it. You're doing something very brave. You're actually bringing a respectful attention to it. And it has to be respectful, because this part of you is trying to protect you and your son.

First, you can simply say: Thank you. Thank you for holding all this, for trying to protect me. And see what happens when you do this. How does it respond?

It softens.

So feel that softening. If you were to let it come out, how big would it be? Would it be like a huge volcano, or would it be bigger? Get an image for it. Is it like a tornado? A hurricane? A nuclear explosion? What is it? How big?

Big. Enormous. Nuclear.

Yes. So feel that. And you can make space in your image, in your heart. See what it's like, right now, to just let all that energy have some space to explode—in grief and tears and rage and pain. You're actually making space with loving awareness, saying: This is what a mother's heart has been carrying.

What happens as you just allow it to be, let it open? What do you notice?

I feel gratitude to you. I feel a lot of gratitude.

And in yourself? Is it still there? It should be, probably.

Yeah, but it's less.

Now feel something else, and see if this is right. Underneath all the pain and volcanic rage and anger and fear and confusion and worry—you know why it's all there? Because you care. Because you care so much. You care for your son. You care for life. Feel that place of care that gives birth to all this: I won't let it happen. I have to protect him.

Feel the care underneath it all. How deeply you care. Do you? Is it true?

Yeah.

And that's what I would call a good mother. You could say you've been bad, but I see the care, and it's enormous.

Thank you.

So my recommendation to you is to make a ritual for yourself, and have it witnessed by someone you love. Do you have a good therapist?

Yeah.

Good—witnessed by your therapist, by close friends. Write a letter to your son saying: I set you free to find what you need. Your mother has done everything to care for you. I trust you. I love you. And I set you free. Because he needs that. He needs to find himself. He has to face his own dangers, or he'll never grow up.

Put it on the water, or light a candle and burn it. Have people witness it. Make a ritual that becomes an offering of love. Because this is one of the great things parents learn over the years: you love immensely. And then you have to set them free. Because they're not yours.

He's not yours. He's himself.

So make a ritual for yourself. And invite close people, make it beautiful, because this is a huge thing and you're ready for it. And he's saying, "Mom, I'm ready. I need this." And I think you're wise enough and brave enough to do it. How are you feeling?

"I really appreciate how you reframed what he needed, because I think I was interpreting it as his rejection of me, because I was bad, instead of seeing that it was him needing to break free. Really helpful."

Yes, I'm so grateful. Well, all right. Stay with this. Write down what we talked about. Make the ritual.

It's so interesting—I'm a twin. My twin brother broke away before I did. He just needed to get out. As soon as he could, he left. I still stay more connected. But he had to get away. And I missed him terribly. But he knew he had to do it. He just had to do it.

So, all right. Thank you, dear.

"Thank you so much, Jack."

Thank you.

So I want to pause here and offer gratitude to each person who spoke—to Priscilla and Susan and Pamela. We're all in this together. To Arisika, thank you, dear heart friend.

We have our sufferings, but we're also held in something greater. I read this beautiful song prayer from an Aboriginal elder in Australia. He said, "When you sleep, the star is working for you. When you sleep, the rocks are working for you. The whole world is working for you, even when you sleep." You're being held by something. We all are, by this earth. Our tears are held and our joy, the beauty and the aliveness of being human. Part of the aliveness is that we suffer too. And it's not a mistake. There have to be the opposites of day and night, joy and sorrow, beginnings and endings, birth and death.

We live in a world of ever-changing polarities, and everybody has gain and loss. Everybody gets praise and blame. Everybody has pleasure and pain. And who we are is that loving heart that can hold it all and navigate it and bless ourselves and the people we touch.

It's a pretty good gig, I think. Not easy. But anyway, I'm so glad to share with you.

CHAPTER 50

Reconciliation

Jack Kornfield · 1h45

> In this heartfelt teaching delivered on October 7th, Jack Kornfield addresses the urgent need for reconciliation in a world marked by conflict—from personal relationships to global warfare. Drawing from his years at Ajahn Chah's forest monastery during the Vietnam War era, he shares how that community became a "zone of peace" and a living example of what's possible for humanity.
> Kornfield presents the Buddha's seven-step process for reconciliation as found in the Vinaya: face-to-face encounter, deep listening, non-stubbornness, voluntary confession, decision by consensus, accepting the verdict of compassion, and covering mud with straw. He illustrates these principles through moving stories of restorative justice at San Quentin, South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation process, the Bereaved Mothers and Combatants for Peace in Israel-Palestine, and healing ceremonies among Indigenous communities.
>
> The talk weaves together practical wisdom from the Dhammapada with contemporary examples, emphasizing that repair is possible even after profound harm. Kornfield invites listeners to examine their own conflicts and consider where they stand in the reconciliation process. The teaching concludes with Philip Moffitt's meditation on reconciliation—a prayer extending from families to nations to all beings—reminding us that the capacity for profound compassion lies within each of us, waiting to be awakened and shared.

Good Monday evening to you.

I'm really happy to be able to teach again. As most of you know, I did Monday night teachings for more than thirty years, every week. And now, as I am in my eightieth year, I've cut back and I'm teaching once a month so that I could do other interesting things. But I still miss it, and it's such a pleasure to see you all.

What we do Monday nights is usually quite simple. We start with a meditation, which we'll do tonight, and then have a break—five minutes or so to stretch or relax—and then that's usually followed, as it will be, by some teachings, and maybe a brief meditation at the end of the teachings before we do some question and response.

Whatever brings you, just take a pause for a moment. I'm really glad we get to connect, because the invitation of this space, more than anything, is to remember—to remember what really matters, to remember what your heart knows, to remember the wisdom that was born in you that you carry.

So with that, let us begin with twenty minutes or so, maybe a little more, of meditation with a bit of guidance tonight. And I'll start us off with a bit of a story or an image.

During the years that I lived at my teacher Ajahn Chah's forest monastery, which is in the province of Ubon in Thailand that borders both Laos and Cambodia, it was during the period of the Vietnam-Cambodian-Laos War—the American War, anyway, with them. And there were warplanes that flew overhead, bombers and fighter jets. There was an air base in the province, not that far. And if I went to one of the monasteries right along the border, you could even see flashes at night of the fighting.

We had visitors. I remember a friend who came from Vietnam. He was part of a Quaker group doing peace work in the middle of the war. And he said, "How dare you stay here when there are all these people suffering?" He asked Ajahn Chah about that. Doesn't Ajahn Chah want to do something about it?

And Ajahn Chah's response was this. He said, "Wars come and go. They're a terrible thing. They cause tremendous suffering. And the Buddhist teachings are to see suffering and to find the path to free ourselves from suffering. And that means to make our own hearts a zone of peace. So this monastery is a zone of peace. In the war zones, people steal, they rob, they kill. Here, if you lose something, it's returned to you. If you're in trouble, someone reaches out. It is a completely safe and generous and kind and compassionate community. And we're at peace with the animals and the beasts of the forest. Come and taste it. Because we want to be a living library of what's possible for humanity, so we don't forget."

William Butler Yeats puts it this way: "We can make our minds so like still water that beings gather around us, that they may see their own images, and so live for a moment with a clearer, perhaps even a fiercer life because of our quiet."

So with these words, let your eyes close gently and invite yourself to become a zone of peace.

If it's helpful, settle on your seat. Let yourself sink into the earth and feel the support right under you, fully supported. Take two long breaths. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, roll your head in a little circle to release your neck, and let it find a simple upright. Let the shoulders relax. The arms and hands rest easily. Let the belly be soft, the breath natural, and let the heart be soft as well—to receive whatever arises with kindness, with compassion.

And as you begin to quiet, invite a sense of peacefulness to arise. Yes, there will be thoughts that come and go, sensations of pleasure and pain in the body, emotions, memories. And there is a deep peace to be found in the midst of all of these, just here. Not an absence of thought.

but a spacious, peaceful heart, peaceful presence. Deep down you know this.

Let yourself remember or picture a time in your life when you were quite at peace. A moment, a day. You remember. You can feel it.

May I rest in peacefulness. With each breath, may peace arise. The out-breath returning to peacefulness, each breath. Steady.

May I become a zone of peace. May I have peace in my heart amidst all the things this heart carries. May I have peace amidst it all. May I have peace in my body. Let the body come to rest and ease, softening into stillness. May my mind be at peace. May I have peace in my mind.

Let the sense of peace expand like space, vast and open. Like the sky or the galaxy—boundless space and peace. And yes, there will be thoughts and troubles, pains and joys, emotions, all the parts of life rising and falling like waves in the ocean. And you are the vast space of peace. Relax into it. Trust it. Vast space and peace, timeless and open.

And sense now how you can move through your life with a peaceful and loving heart in the midst of it all. Feel it. Picture it. This is who you are.

And when you're ready, gently allow your eyes to open, carrying that spirit of stillness. May you have a peaceful heart.

Tonight I'd like to speak on a topic that I feel to be compelling at this time, because there's so much cry or call for compassion and dharma understanding in what's happening in our world. And this is the theme of reconciliation.

Now I know reconciliation also sounds like a Senate procedure, but it's a more humane procedure than that. And so, as I teach, it's not so much for you to believe or even learn, but perhaps to reflect and be reminded.

What do we do when there's conflict? Conflict is natural, you know, at times. It's just built into this kind of incarnation as animals on this earth. I mean, all you have to do is go and volunteer in a preschool, as I used to, and the kids would get in conflict. "It's my toy." "That's not fair." "He got more cookies." "She did." One is hitting the other with a block. And then you get down on your knees and you say, "Use your words instead of the blocks." I wish we could say that to our global politicians. Use your words. And you ask, "What upset you? What hurts? What scared you?"

It happens—conflict—to all humans, including, shockingly, in spiritual communities.

I have seen that in the last fifty years. But when we pause and when we reflect, especially in these divided times—the political divisiveness and the longing for racial justice and the climate disruptions and all the other things that we might care about, now heightened in conflict—it invites us to pause and reflect on our values. On what matters.

In the Dhammapada, those verses of the Buddha: "One who seeks happiness by hurting others will never find happiness." How about that as a message to the world?

And today, of course, is also October 7th. It's the memorial day of that horrific violence that happened from the attack of Hamas on the Israeli settlers a year ago this day. And more than that, the beginning of the horrific war that has caused immense suffering on all sides and continues—and really tears at the heart if you look at it, as does the war in Ukraine and Sudan and Myanmar and so forth. But this one is right here somehow, in our screens and our laps and people we know. What are our values in the midst of this?

Here's Robert Kennedy—the other one, the one who ran for president in 1968 before he was assassinated, just to keep it straight. He was talking about our gross national product. He said it's measured to count prisons and nuclear warheads and advertising and cigarettes and the logging of our forests. "Yet the gross national product does not allow for the health of our children, the quality of their education, or the joy of their play. It does not include the beauty of our poetry or the strength of our marriages, the intelligence of our public debate, or the integrity of our public officials"—that's a kind of quaint phrase, isn't it? "It measures neither our wit nor our courage, neither our wisdom nor our learning, neither our compassion nor our devotion to one another in the country. It measures everything, in short, except that which makes life worthwhile."

So we really have to reflect amidst all the conflict: What really matters?

Thich Nhat Hanh—one of his first books was Lotus in a Sea of Fire. He talked about building the school for youth and social services and clinics during the war, not taking a stand between North and South Vietnam. Lots of the young people who were working with him were killed. And still he was a beacon of peace. That's what Dr. Martin Luther King uplifted him for, nominated him for the Nobel Prize.

I remember talking with Thay Thich Nhat Hanh. At one point I asked him why he has people smile and talk about joy so much. I see him holding hands and working with children, the new generation. And he said, "Because I'm so sad. Because I've suffered so much, I have to choose joy. I have to water the seeds of peace. This is what I've chosen to do with my life—to water the seeds of peace and joy."

There are several accounts of the Buddha trying to stop conflict in his time in northern India. There were battles and warfare between the Sakyas and the Kosalas and so forth. At least a couple of times he went out and stood in the middle of the marching armies on the battlefield. At one point he stood in front of one of the armies that was going to go and sack the other kingdom. The conflict was over water—which we will have, alas, more of those in our climate change time. And he said, "I need to ask you a question. Which is more precious, water or blood?" And somehow he asked it with so much concern and compassion that at least one time the army turned back. Not every time. But it did.

So where are you with conflict? What are the conflicts in your life? What are the conflicts around you that touch you? And how do you navigate the conflicts in your life? Human beings have struggled with this question of conflict for thousands of years.

And our brains are wired, tuned toward the things that are conflictual—the negativity bias, what's scary, what might cause trouble, what we might lose, all of those kinds of things.

There was an organization started in the sixties or seventies in Palo Alto called A Better Game Than War. The notion of it was—I think Joan Baez was a part of it—that conflict is natural, competition is natural. Think of the Olympics. How can we get human beings to use the impulse of competition and conflict in a healthier way? Of course, the Olympics are an example. Maybe at best the space race was meant to be this. But it posed a question for us as human beings: How do we do this? We need a new model or a new set of values.

And of course, it's interesting to see in this highly politicized moment, certainly in the United States, that politics are in some way ritualized warfare. The Democrats and the Republicans don't have tanks and fighter planes to go to Washington and take over the Capitol. It's being done in other forms, but it is a ritualized way of trying to deal with conflict and come to a resolution—or come out on top. Let's pay attention to it and what we might do to steer our humanity in a healthy way.

When I was some years ago in Palestine and Israel doing peace work, I met with the bereaved mothers. I met with the former combatants for peace, and they were on both sides—Palestinian commandos, Israeli officers. I had the most moving time being with the Sulha. It was part of a group that brought teenagers from Palestine and Israel together, starting when they were young, when they were nine or ten, and continuing as they became teens, to learn about each other. After five years, they became so bonded. They would say, "Why would we fight each other?" And their parents came at the end, kind of shocked to see what their children had found. It's hard to hate up close. And that's what happened.

Van Jones, the commentator on CNN and a social activist and a brilliant, wonderful friend—he did an interesting thing. He was very much involved with the problem of the fentanyl and opioid deaths, this huge epidemic that's still ongoing. He got a grant and brought a group of people from Southern California—liberal parents, immigrant parents. This was a group who had all lost children to the epidemic, whose children had died. And he flew them to West Virginia and invited them to sit in a room in a big circle with a number of folks from West Virginia who were culturally much more conservative—religiously, politically, in all kinds of ways.

They sat together, kind of looking at each other with whatever they were thinking. And then he asked everyone to take out the one thing he made sure they brought with them: the picture of their child who had died. Place it in front of them or hold it up and say their name before anything else happened. And of course, everything changed. There weren't conservatives and liberals and immigrants and old families. There were just parents looking at each other's eyes saying, "Oh, my daughter, my son—me too, us." And the profound care we have for one another.

I tell these stories because stories make our future. As the poet Muriel Rukeyser wrote, "The universe is made of stories, not atoms." And what are the stories that we carry of what's possible?

Even in spiritual communities, it happens, as I said, that there are wee bits of conflict—or more. Once, a long time ago, the Buddha spent a rains retreat with the monks in the forest at the Kosambi Monastery, and a conflict arose. The story is told that it was between the Vinaya master, the master of decorum, and the master of recitation, two of the leaders in the community, about how people were supposed to behave. They became really heated. Many took sides, though some refused. But it got more and more heated, and the lay supporters were upset and beseeched the Buddha to call them in. He heard them describe all the ill-used words and the wounds and so forth—a serious blow to the harmony of his community.

And you know what happened? The Buddha sat with them and tried to work with them. They didn't listen. If you're a parent, you know this, right? They didn't listen even to the Buddha. He tried, and the conflict continued, and they were fighting. And finally he said, "I'm leaving."

He told no one. So I just contradicted myself—he absented himself. He turned away and walked into the forest with a couple of monks who were close to him and spent three months away. He said they were really happy months. He was out with the animals, the elephants, with the phases of the moon and the movement of the leaves and the wind and the quiet of the forest, meditating.

Three months later he returned and asked, "How is it?" And they said the conflict was worse, if anything. They continued to argue. And the lay disciples got really angry. They were so upset. They said, "You drove the Buddha away. We're not even going to offer you food anymore. You've got to get it together."

So how to do so? As the story is told, the Buddha called them all together, but he said, keep them separate, one side from the other. And here are the teachings of how to resolve, how to bring some resolution—the seven steps that are needed for reconciliation. As I talk about them, you can more than anything feel what they speak to in your life, or the life of the people around you, or the world around you.

The first step in this seven-step process of reconciliation is called face to face—bringing people all together so that it undercuts the private conversations where everybody builds up their legal case and makes it worse, and instead brings people together. They actually have to be in the same place because something happens when you're actually there face to face.

I was reading recently in a book on forgiveness, a story of parents who were going into the court for the sentencing of a man, a drunk driver who had a history of drinking and driving, who crashed and killed their two daughters. He was a young man. The mother walked into the court and she saw the family of the young man who had driven the car that killed her daughters. She saw the sorrowful eyes of his mother and she couldn't help herself. She just walked right over to her and wrapped her arms around her and they both wept. Because they all suffered. Face to face—hard to hate up close.

When I was doing couples therapy, there was a couple in considerable conflict, you might say, who came to see me. We were sitting there and I welcomed them and they told me a tiny bit about what was happening, just a tiny bit. And I said, "Well, we need to make a space where there can be some real listening to each other. Why don't you get in a position where you feel safe to talk about what's going on?" Immediately the woman stood up, walked out to the other end of the room, and slammed the door shut. I had to smile. Okay, that's safe. And then she opened the door and you could see her eye peeking in through the little crack. But that's where we began. I said, "Stay there. All right, you can talk from out there if that's what makes you safe."

The first step is to bring ourselves together in some way where we feel safe. And then the next step is called deep listening. This is also called remembering with clarity and curiosity. Instead of being in your position in conflict, you lean in with mindfulness and interest and care and say, "I want to know exactly what it was like. Tell me—what did you feel? What did you think? What did you do? What did you see?" There's something about the listening, and each person speaking their truth, whatever it is, that has an enormous power to release the ways that we're caught.

In India, there is a saying or a practice called the act of truth. When you're in real trouble, you can make a ritual act of truth. And when you make that ritual act of truth, it will change things. The story is told of a family where their young child was very, very sick. The doctors had come and they could do nothing. This child, this daughter or son, was in a coma, and the parents were, as parents could be, terrified and lost. And there was a traveling yogi, a sadhu, who came through, and they said, "Well, maybe he has some mantras, some magic that can help our child."

And he came and he tried his mantras, and nothing happened. And finally he said, "Well, I'm afraid the only thing that will work is an act of truth. Do you agree?" And they agreed.

And as he got quiet, he said, "My truth is that I'm not a very good yogi, that I cheat on my vows, that I've not kept them. And by telling this truth, may your daughter be healed." And her eyes opened. She started to awaken.

Then he looked to the father. And the father said, "You know I have a business. But my truth is to tell my wife that it's not a very good business. I'm not doing well. I haven't been so honest. And by this act of truth, may my daughter be healed." And she sat up.

And then his wife turned to him and said, "My act of truth is that I've not been happy in this marriage. We need to change things radically. I pretended to be happy, but not in my heart."

And then the daughter stood up and looked at them like, whoa, what's been happening here?

It's called an act of truth. Face to face, telling the truth, deep listening.

The next principle is called non-stubbornness. I would know nothing about this except for that little part of me that loves to be right. You know how it is, all of us—my opinions, how I believe things, how I've seen them. And the Buddha talks a lot about this. He talks about clinging to views. Those who cling to views, he said, go around the world annoying other people. It's one of the vaguely humorous phrases you find in the texts. "Moi?" says Miss Piggy. Yes, you too. Those who cling to views annoy one another. It's not about being right. It's about whether you want to listen and connect and love.

Bryan Stevenson, the great activist in the South who worked in prisons, who helped build the memorial to all the lynchings that happened—an extraordinary being—he talks about something called undeserved mercy, that even those he worked with who've done the worst things, they too deserve mercy.

This is Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary only to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being, and who among us is willing to destroy a piece of their heart?"

And the wild thing is, when you do the work of Byron Katie, that kind of inner questioning, one of her most important four questions is: What if the opposite were true? She'll ask what you believe, what your story is, and then she says, try it on. What if the opposite were true?

Non-stubbornness. The valuing of others' perspectives. The valuing of their experience. And the valuing of their pain. Even the undeserved mercy.

Then comes voluntary confession. And it has to be voluntary. But it's really, really important. It's that sense of acknowledgment of someone's part in it. And it's really the basis for restorative justice that we'll talk about.

There's a book called A Human Being Died That Night by the South African leader Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela. She was very much involved in the South African truth and reconciliation process, quite an extraordinary woman.

And she wanted to understand how it could have been so terrible, how people could have treated each other, killed each other, tortured each other, burned their villages, their homes, their children. How could they do this?

One of the things she describes was going into the maximum security prison where Eugene de Kock was held—the mastermind of the apartheid killings, the worst of them. She wanted to meet with him, and she did over some months, sitting there with him, simply asking him to talk, and listening.

The denouement of the book comes on the day she went in and found him with his head down. He had obviously been reflecting, carrying his own karmic burden. He looked at her and said, "We killed so many. What for? They killed a lot. What for? We fought for nothing. We could have all gone out and had a meal. If we put the politicians and their children on the front line, they wouldn't do it. Why did we do this?" He lowered his head in grief.

And I think for her, as she wrote about it, that was one of the great moments she needed for healing. A voluntary confession.

Restorative justice is this remarkable movement in which people who have been victims of violent crimes—mostly—choose, with proper support and training and understanding, to sit down with those who perpetrated those violent crimes. And often it's actually young people who are caught up in it. So there's a whole movement of restorative justice. San Quentin is one of the models of it, but there are many other places. My friend Sujata Malika is one of the mainstays of it.

In San Quentin, I believe it was, there was a woman named Radha. She couldn't speak to the young man who killed her son because he was killed, but she was trying, like Pumla, to understand how human beings could shoot or kill or destroy another life. And so in the restorative justice process, she asked to meet with some of the men on death row, lifers in San Quentin who had killed young people, who had committed murder.

She was taken in by a guide, someone who understood restorative justice. And she talked about her son, Chris, and how he had been shot at age twenty-one for nothing. She talked and they talked. And they made a connection. She started to visit them and listen to them and understand the tragedy of their stories, which in many cases were immense—just like most of the women in maximum security prisons who committed murder are there, almost all of them, because they were terribly abused. And she heard all these stories.

The next year was to be the anniversary—the fifth anniversary or whatever it was—of the killing of her son. And the men she had been meeting with in San Quentin asked her to come in on that day. They had all cut pieces out of their blue prison uniforms and stitched them together, making a quilt of atonement and love. They stitched with their hands his name and the date, and then peace doves and flowers and prayers.

When she came in, they said, "We have something to give you." They unwrapped it and wrapped it around her and said, "Not only do we who have been killers ask your forgiveness, but we ask your understanding."

And this is the Holy Grail, really. This is what allows people who have been in conflict to see each other with the sacred eyes of humanity.

A voluntary confession, then decision by consensus. In the monastic context, that meant all the other monks or nuns around in this process, but here it means the support of your family, your teacher, your therapist, your community, the exemplars who nod and say yes. Turning toward peace is exactly what is needed. We support you. We uphold you. We have your back. We are with you with all the courage that you take to do this.

And then there is accepting the verdict. The elders are asked for their view on how it should be resolved. And it is always the verdict of compassion. Can you feel the compassion? And are you willing to change?

You can reflect on this in your own life. Can you feel the great heart of compassion for all?

Are you willing to let go and change and reconcile in your heart—to not put anyone out of your heart?

And finally, there is the stage of covering mud with straw. All the mud and the blood and the pain is now covered by straw. In that formal process, the elders, the most respected monks and nuns, speak. And in your own life, you can imagine: What would the Dalai Lama feel? What would Archbishop Tutu or Aung San Suu Kyi on her best day say to you in your conflict? What would they whisper in your ear, remind you of, tell you?

Again, it's like a woman who came to see me who was in the midst of a terrible divorce. The husband who was divorcing her, who'd had a number of affairs, was not only trying to keep the money but lying about her as a mother and trying to keep the children. It was one of those really painful and messy situations. We talked about her getting the best lawyer she could, which she did, and protecting herself, which she also did.

And then she came in one day and said, "My ex is telling my children all kinds of bad things about me." And she said, "I will not retaliate." She sat up and declared, "I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children." It was like an act of truth. It had such courage and power in it. She simply would not play that game, would not go into that conflict to cause harm. "I will not bequeath a legacy of bitterness to my children."

So some questions for you who are listening. Where are you in this story? In your own life, where are you? Are you in that position like the Buddha where no one will listen to you? It could happen. Are you one of the stubborn monks? Are you one of the bystanders, the disgusted lay people who don't even want to feed the monks anymore because they're so lost in their conflict? Are you one of the few who didn't take sides? Think of conflict in your life. Are you listening deeply with your heart, not putting anyone out of your heart? Are you willing to cover mud with straw?

I was the peacemaker in our family. Four brothers—we each had different roles. My parents fought a lot. My father was abusive and violent, a wife batterer. I tried to make peace. I still do it for a living.

And I remember being with my father when he was in the hospital toward the end of his life. Talking to him, he mentioned something about my mom. They'd been divorced for probably fifteen years, but they were married for thirty. And I shook my head and said, "You know, it's still hard for Mom because of the way you treated her." And he said, "Treated her?" And I said, "Yeah. The times you hit her and got really violent with her." And he looked at me—it was a kind of amazing moment. He couldn't even remember. He couldn't even let himself see.

But whatever he remembered or didn't, I'm not going to carry the legacy of bitterness. I had my reconciliation with him. Grief and pain. And then what? It's not the end of the story.

Reconciliation is hard. It brings us close to where we're truly vulnerable. But we need it—in our families, in our communities. More broadly, you know, the USA is still fighting the Civil War.

It really is. Fear, laws, white power, supremacy—all of it. Fear of immigrants. We're still fighting the Civil War, with all the racism and tropes that came from that, still acting upon us.

We need reconciliation. South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation process was so remarkable. Twenty-two thousand victims came forward and spoke. Seven thousand hearings for amnesty were held for people who agreed to say what they had done, who were willing to face up to it. It didn't fix everything, but it was a start. It was the beginning of asking: What does it mean to see each other with the eyes of compassion for the life that we carry?

And the amazing thing is that repair is possible. "He beat me. He robbed me. He threw me down," says the verse in the Dhammapada. Perpetuate those thoughts and you live in hate. "He beat me. He robbed me. He threw me down"—let go of those thoughts and live in love. We have all suffered. Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law.

Repair is possible. I think of an old acquaintance from years ago, Jane Middleton-Moz, a psychologist and community ritual organizer. She's part Native American, Anishinaabe. She told the story of working, I think in Southern Canada, with a Native community that had been decimated—the children stolen and taken to boarding schools, forbidden to speak their language, beaten, abused. The parents who lost their children.

She said, "We need a council." And she brought them all together. The council had three rings. In the middle were the younger generation, children now living in that community. Around them sat their parents—the ones who had been taken to those terrible schools. And around the outside ring were the grandparents.

She asked them each, in turn, to tell their stories. The grandparents told what it was like to have their children taken from them—the sorrows they carried, how it completely upended their lives and community. The parents told what it was like to be torn from their families and carried off, beaten, mistreated. And then the children in the middle said, "Oh, now we understand better what happened to you."

As is true in that Native community, when there is this kind of reconciliation, this coming together, there is gift-giving. This was the telling of truth, the acts of truth. And from the outside of the circle, one of the grandmothers spoke: "Since my daughter was taken, I have never woven our sacred blankets. But after these stories today, I speak to you children—I will teach you how to weave."

One of the parents said, "You know I don't come out of my house because I only drink. I drink since I came back from when they carried me away and took my language and my life. You know I'm a drunkard. But I look at you, next generation, and now that you know what happened to me, I pledge to you—I will never take another drink. This is my gift to you."

Elders and parents in the circles gazed at their children, telling the acts of truth and then offering: "I will teach you to make baskets again, the baskets that hold our people together." And the children drank it in. They could hear it. They could feel it, because it was the medicine that was truly needed.

Repair is possible.

Reconciliation is possible.

Leymah Gbowee, who along with Ellen Johnson Sirleaf won the Nobel Peace Prize—these women from Liberia—they said that Liberia used to be known for its child soldiers. Now it's known for its women leaders.

Human beings can learn. We can grow. We have the capacity to see one another with compassion. This is what all of our practice is about—in your family, in your community, in the political world, in the world of war. Remember. See it. Feel it.

The Hutus and the Tutsis have somehow come to live together. The Northern Irish Catholics and Protestants, after years of conflict, have come to live together.

True love, says the Mahabharata, is not for the faint-hearted. The Bhagavad Gita explains: if you want to see the brave, look to those who can forgive. If you want to see the heroic, look to those who return love for hate.

No one knows how old humanity is, but we can all agree we're old enough to know better.

It's time. It's time to become wise. It's time to carry something deeper—something we can offer one another to plant the seeds of reconciliation in our lives, in politics, in community, in family, in the arts that we're a part of.

Oh nobly born, says the Buddha, remember who you really are. Remember the Buddha nature within you, the capacity for profound compassion.

Others will be cruel. We shall be kind. Thus we will incline the heart.

Others will kill or harm living beings. We shall not do so. We shall care for them and cherish them. Thus we will incline the heart.

Others will take what does not belong and steal. We will not do so. We will be generous. Thus we shall incline the heart.

Others will speak maliciously or speak false words. We shall tell the truth. Thus we shall incline the heart.

Others will be arrogant. We shall find humility. Thus we will incline the heart.

Others will be careless. We will be mindful and attentive. Thus we will incline the heart.

Others will lack wisdom. We will cultivate and awaken our wisdom. Thus we will incline the heart.

It's there in the world. Through the struggle that they have endured, Northern Ireland has found some part of this. We can too. Liberia has found it.

You, each of you—you and I—we carry the seeds of a new world, of a possible world. This talk doesn't give an answer to what and how and exactly what you should do, because the answer lies in your heart. Reconciliation—in your family, in your community, in all that you touch.

You carry beautiful seeds. Water them.

May all mothers and daughters be reconciled. May all mothers and sons be reconciled. May all fathers and sons be reconciled. May all fathers and daughters be reconciled. May all sisters and brothers be reconciled. May all partners and lovers be reconciled. May all husbands and wives be reconciled. May all family members be reconciled. May all employers and employees be reconciled. May all community members be reconciled. May all men and women be reconciled. May all religions be reconciled. May all races be reconciled. May all nations be reconciled. May all creatures be reconciled. May all beings in every form find reconciliation and peace.

Thank you. Thank you for your reflections and your sincerity. This was not one of those talks filled with jokes and humor, but it feels like a teaching that the heart needs to remember and inhabit and carry in these times. There is a possibility of love and redemption, and it is one of the most beautiful things that can happen.

We have a bit of time for reflections, observations, questions.

Was this helpful? I see Linda's hand. Linda, if you would like to unmute and speak.

"Hi, Jack. As I was listening tonight, I was thinking about a number of conflicts in a number of different categories and capacities—family members, politics, countries. And I was wondering, is it possible for us to keep our heart open and to look for reconciliation if it's not mutually accepted? I mean, I can't resolve the conflicts in Ukraine or in Israel-Palestine or other places, but I can hold my heart open. What would you say?"

First, I'm listening to you and appreciating that you can hold your heart open, because there's so much suffering in Ukraine and Russia, there's so much suffering in Israel and Palestine. How could we not see it? And then it's not up to us to be able to have the wand to make it go away. Some people won't even agree with that—they say you have to hate that side or that side. But I hear you saying that's not what you're doing. Is that correct?

"Yes, yes."

So then you're asking, is it possible to hold that openness and not have people agree that they should follow your wishes and do it? They don't necessarily follow what you're saying, but you feel it. So close your eyes for a moment and just tune in. Let yourself answer your question, because you know. What does your heart wisdom say?

"My heart wisdom says that I feel like I'm holding the sadness for so many in so many different areas. And I want to keep my heart open and not be taken in by one perspective or another. But the sadness is that the suffering continues. And it's not just frustrating—it's something that's so heavy on my heart. I don't always know where to put all of the emotion of that."

Yes. So first, the wisdom that you're holding it all and not getting caught up in one side or the other. And now what's asked of you is to embody the great heart of compassion.

You have to become Dr. King. You have to become Gandhi. You have to say, "I let this be. I look this in the eye. I see it. I feel it. And who I am is bigger than this."

Because even as you feel the great heart of compassion which holds all the tears and suffering, it's not the whole story. Today there are a billion people making love and planting gardens, and billions of people feeding their children, and billions of people doing beautiful things. You can forget it, and then the heart can get kind of colonized by just the tragedy. But actually, the great heart of compassion knows both.

"Oh, I loved your answer. Thank you."

Another practitioner shared: "Thank you for tonight's talk. It's like my thoughts exploded all over the screen. Having been on this planet, meandering into putting one toe into the next decade—the eighth one, I'm not there yet, but I'm in there—I know that the same thing happens over and over and over. People are always making gardens and feeding children and making love and building, and people are always fighting and tearing down. And it is what it is.

"The only thing I can do is live in a state of hope, keeping my heart open, my eyes open, my ears open, and living with the knowledge that there's nothing I can do by myself. But if I join a sangha, a program, a group—there's always love. There's always love. There's always the people that are going to burn crosses on my front lawn perfectly happily, but I don't have to speak to them. I can just smile and acknowledge their presence and say, thank you for sharing.

"I just know that if you always do what you've always done, you'll always get what you've always gotten. And I believe that we're okay. We're okay. And I know that there is so much sorrow and so much joy. To live in the balance of it all is the best I can do."

It's good to see you. I feel myself in this very tender space tonight, hearing you speak, the conversations we've been having, and the tenderness of your heart that's open to all this, and the wisdom you spoke. I couldn't imagine it being said better. That's as good as it gets. You've just given a beautiful gift to us.

Another practitioner raised his hand: "My story is this. I live in Berkeley, California, which is a liberal enclave. All my friends are other progressives and liberals. And I've had it in mind for a while to try and have an interaction with a Trump supporter. About twenty miles up from my town—a place called Lafayette, if you're in the Bay Area you know where I'm going—there's a bridge across the freeway. Typically a lot of Trump supporters will be there waving flags and Trump signs. I plan on going out there, and after I get through what I'm doing, I was thinking about just walking up to one of the people and saying, 'Gee, I'd like to talk with you.'"

I don't want to argue. I don't want any conflicts or anything. I just want to ask: How come you believe this? How come you believe that?

So that's all well and good. But what I got from your talk tonight is that I have an underground intention of fixing them, of changing them, and somehow making them awake to what's going on. The Berkeley consciousness, of course.

Well, it's not just Berkeley—there are a lot of us. Progressives, yes.

So I think it might be a little difficult for me to walk up to some of these people and just come from a pure place of really wanting to know. To ask questions like, "Suppose you deport eleven million people—who's going to pick the crops?" But not from a place of wanting to change them. From a much more open place. I'm going to have to work on that. I'm going to have to play around with that during the week. I'm going on Friday, actually. So I want to thank you for that.

What you're saying underneath it is about something much deeper—trying to understand. "Help me understand how you see it." I don't even think the specific questions—"you're going to throw out the immigrants"—that almost sounds like an accusation. "Help me understand how you look at immigration. What do you think should happen? Help me understand."

With that kind of open-hearted curiosity, people will feel it. On the other hand, you're quite accurate. If you go in with a little edge, really wanting to convince them—that's not going to get you very far.

And who knows? They might have some things you can learn from, because you don't hear that side. "Tell me, how does this affect your family, your children? What's your vision? Tell me. Let me listen."

Yes, learning to phrase it in a much more open and connective way rather than my underground wanting to fix them.

And then what's your intention in doing it? That was a very good question, because what came up all of a sudden was wanting to help myself let go of some of the anger and ill will and resentment.

Well, if you're honest with that and say, "I want to talk because I've been afraid or resentful, and I realize I don't understand. I need to understand better"—that's a beautiful intention. It makes you vulnerable, but it's honest.

Good luck. No—it's not good luck. It's good skill.

Yes, it's good skill and good heart.

When we approach each other with our minds already made up—which of course I would have no experience of, but people like you do that anyway—it's a little like when you sign up for something online and you can't go any further until you read all the fine print. There's like four pages of fine print with a little accept button at the end. And you just scroll down and press accept. But you've never actually read it or listened.

We can listen to each other that way. Like we're just going to press the accept button. Okay, and now I have my case.

But there's something that happens if we get quiet, like Ernie did for a moment, and ask: What's our best intention? What's the intention underneath it? For him it was to undo his resentment and his anger and the distance he created—which is another way of saying learning how to love. But that's the question for us: What's our real deepest intention?

A participant named Toby raised a question: "I feel so deeply about the sadness that's taking place in this world at this time. And I think like everybody else, I feel hopeless or at least helpless at times. Is it a conceit to feel that if we treat each other—because I feel we're so deeply connected—if we treat each other individually with kindness and openness, that it has an effect that will ultimately make some changes, if not as global as we might wish?

"Because in my experience—and I'm older than you, so I've had a lot of experience—I've met very many different kinds of people, and yet I have found they have all wanted the same thing. They have wanted to thrive. They have wanted to be seen. And when that happens, nobody says, are you Jewish or Palestinian? Are you conservative or liberal? Because in that moment, that connection is more profound than the differences. So my feeling is: if I can do this as much as possible on an individual basis with a true heart—not to be altruistic, but because I see it and feel it—is that enough?"

You posed the question two ways. Is it enough? Enough for what? I don't know. "Will it make a difference?" was a different way you framed it.

What you're talking about, I really respect. Close your eyes for a second. Just do a little reflection. Imagine that you're in a school system where all the children are being instructed to fight and battle and be angry with one another. That's how they're being taught—we should always fight and be first and be the best and put other people down. And this starts to grow in the community.

Would that affect the world if people have those kinds of instructions and thoughts?

Yes.

You're sure, aren't you?

Yes.

So your question kind of reversed it.

Now you're picturing, all right, suppose in a society there are a number of people who foster respect and connection, people who make others feel like they're being understood and cared for—will that spread? Will it grow? Will it change things? We don't know how much or how long, but does it make any difference? I think so.

If you put a violin on a table and have a violin in your hand and you play it, what happens to the violin on the table? The strings resonate, you know, the very same notes. You can't not make a difference because they're part of you. Now we have all these different parts, as Solzhenitsyn said—our heart contains all these. But if that's the seeds you water, if that's what you bring into this world...

I love what you said. You've seen people over all these decades and they all want to be seen and respected, to feel a connection. The beautiful thing tonight is people are just speaking wisdom and we get to drink it in.

One of the most amazing things I've seen is that it's true whether a child is five or somebody is eighty-five—there's that moment when that look comes and that brightness in the eyes that says, "Ah, you saw me." And you approved, or at least did not disapprove. It's a hope that it spreads sufficiently, and I don't know. We can't know. But at least you feel it has enough value that in its own self, it's something to pursue.

When you look back at your life, that's what you'll be glad you did. That's really what mattered.

This is a beautiful way to end tonight. Quite lovely and uplifting. May we all carry this spirit and illuminate. It is a little bit of a tough time, and we are tender and we need a big heart of compassion. What Toby said was wonderful—such beautiful medicine.

Let's just sit quietly again for half a minute. And remember how powerful it is to be seen and loved. That's really the great power in the world. More than any. The power of love. And you have it and carry it. And can live it.

CHAPTER 51

Essential Teachings for Changing Times

Jack Kornfield · 1h37

> In this heartfelt talk delivered shortly after a contentious election, Jack Kornfield guides practitioners back to the fundamental teachings that sustain us through difficulty. Beginning with a guided meditation on mindful loving awareness, he invites listeners to step out of 'the tyranny of time' and reconnect with the vast, timeless dimension of consciousness itself.
> Kornfield explores the three marks of existence—anicca (impermanence), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self)—as essential wisdom for navigating change. Drawing on the story of Nelson Mandela's extraordinary compassion toward his former prison guard, poetry from William Carlos Williams and others, and the Aboriginal elder's teaching that 'the earth's sole vocation is to astonish,' he illuminates how these ancient truths offer genuine freedom. He references Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching that 'this body is not me, I am life without boundaries' and the Bhagavad Gītā's wisdom about acting without attachment to outcomes.
> The talk culminates in a profound exploration of the three refuges—Buddha (our awakened nature), Dhamma (the truth of how things are), and Saṅgha (community). Kornfield emphasizes that we are never alone, supported by countless beings and the wisdom lineage of teachers like Harriet Tubman, Gandhi, and Martin Luther King. Through tender exchanges with practitioners holding grief about the election and fear for vulnerable loved ones, he demonstrates how compassionate presence itself becomes the teaching—showing that our freedom lies in choosing how we respond, planting seeds of goodness, and holding the world together with love.

Thank you, Emiko. And thank you, everybody who's joining. It's good to see your faces as I scroll through the squares. Many dear friends, perhaps a few new folks, all good.

Here we are. Big changes afoot. And what would be useful to do and to talk about? I was trying to think about that for tonight, because I'm aware that there have already been dozens of brilliant analyses of what happened in the election from different points of view, from the triumphant to the tear-jerking and catastrophic. I'm sure some of you have read all of that. And then there's been all the advice-giving: if you're grieving or if you're dancing in triumph, here's how you take care of yourself in times of change. You meditate, you go out in nature, you take tea with other people, you make community, you make music and art, you read poetry.

A lot of what politics has done—and it's not new, actually, it's part of the political playbook—is to encourage our fear. That's how it works. Trying to make you afraid so you'll vote for somebody or other. And behind it are trauma cycles. People feeling nervous and upset in times of change. Some disenfranchised, some concerned and compassionate, some really afraid in other ways, because it does fuel fear. And you'll have your grief and your triumph and you'll be fed all of this. Then we have all our emotions that come with it—our anxiety and the stories and the thoughts.

But it's hard to see clearly when we're frightened or angry. In some way, what this time also calls for is to be able to take a step back, center, see anew with the heart, the eyes of understanding, and a kind of wisdom. That's the direction I'd like us to go tonight.

What's also true is that mindful loving awareness—and we'll do a sitting in just a couple of minutes—mindful loving awareness is big enough to hold all of this. Praise and blame, gain and loss, triumph and defeat. It's big enough to hold the fact that it's Veterans Day, when we celebrate in some strange way, and now it could get almost tearful, the succession of battles and wars, one after another. We've had a lot of them because the United States is also warlike in its history. Many, many wars. This is what human beings are doing regularly on the planet.

And today, there were 200,000 people who died. Let that in. People holding them and grieving in tears, young and old. And there were 250,000 new people who came in today and were born. It's wild.

Here we are, with all these different swings—whether it's politics or emotions, the possibilities of how we live together, the difficulties that we make for one another. In the Dharma, the teachings of wisdom invite us to take a breath, to release the body of fear, and to recognize that the world is not a problem to solve but a living organism, a living being to which we belong. We are part of the rhythms of all of life. We are the consciousness that has come at this time.

As in the Tao, where everything has its season, mindful loving awareness says: take your seat with an open heart and a bigger perspective. Step out of the tyranny of time—what just happened, what happened before that, what will happen, which we don't know but we have some imagination about—and step into the timeless reality of love and presence and a vast vision.

I should mention that Trudy told me I wasn't being compassionate enough when I told her what I was going to talk about. That could be true, and if so, I apologize. I'll do my best. One has to listen to one's spouse, at least somewhat.

So let yourself settle and take this seat halfway between heaven and earth, in this human incarnation you were given, with its praises and blames and joys and sorrows, with gain and loss and success and failure, with sweet and sour and beginning and end and hot and cold. This is the world of the play of opposites.

Allow, if you will, your eyes to close gently. Feel your body centered on the seat. You can sink down into the seat, into the earth, in a steady way. You belong here. The world is a living being to which you belong. Once you settle down, feel a stable and centered presence. Take a couple of long breaths.

Here we take our seat in the midst of all things.

The one seed at the center of the universe that is our seed.

Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Perhaps again, circle your head a little bit to release your neck. Let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax and the hands and arms rest easily. Relax your weight into the seat and feel how you're completely met and supported, steady on this earth.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness, with compassion. And let yourself rest in a quiet and open loving awareness.

This mindful loving awareness can feel your body breathe. The earth is breathing you. You are part of this breathing earth. Relax into it. Trust it.

Let the same loving attention expand to the whole of your body. All the pleasures and pains, all the experiences of inhabiting a human form, held in loving kindness and loving awareness. This mysterious human body and human incarnation held in loving kindness and loving awareness doesn't need to be fixed or changed. All of it held in kindness, just as it is.

Allow the loving kindness and awareness to also notice all the feelings and emotions of the heart. The longing and love and grief and fear. The excitement and tenderness. So many feelings—the worry, the anger, the compassion. Holding it all with loving kindness. Nothing to fix. Nothing to change. Simply the beautiful loving presence.

There are tears. There's laughter and joy. There's excitement and worry. And a hundred other feelings rise and fall like waves in the ocean. And you are the loving kindness, the loving awareness that holds it all.

With the same loving kindness, you can notice the energy of the mind—the stream of thoughts and plans, ideas and worries and imaginings, analysis, understandings, stories, images. A river of thoughts and feelings, a river of images and words. You can hold it all with loving kindness and say thank you. Thank you for trying to figure it out and take care of me, plan the future, make it all good. Thank you for all that work. I'm okay just now. You can relax. And let the mind begin to quiet, held in loving kindness.

You are not the sensations of the body. You are not the waves of feelings and emotions that rise for a time and transform and fall away to another. You are not the thoughts or images of the mind. You are consciousness itself. Mindful loving awareness. A consciousness that knows all of these experiences. Vast. Timeless. Spacious. Mindful, loving awareness. A space of knowing, witnessing.

Loving awareness can hold it all with tenderness and wonder—the whole town, the seasons as they turn, elections that come and go, whole nations and civilizations that arise for a time and pass. You are the witness, consciousness itself, loving awareness. You see the mystery of rising and passing and hold it all with love, for that's what it is.

And when you open your eyes, you get to play your role, your dance in the drama. But you know that who you are is so much bigger, beyond all this. You are consciousness itself. Rest in it. Remember—consciousness and love.

So this evening, I want to speak to the basics of the teachings offered in the Buddhist tradition, but that are really part of all wise spiritual life. It seems in times of change and disruption, we can get engaged in all the complexity of it, and we can have all our emotions and thoughts and worries activated. But there's something more fundamental that I believe and know deeply can guide us through complicated times.

And these basics, first, want us to tend to our own heart and mind—to find a way to quiet your mind, to tend your heart, keep it steady and loving. And the amazing thing is that this is possible.

After becoming president of South Africa, Nelson Mandela asked some of his bodyguards to go with him for a walk in town. Then they went for lunch at a local restaurant and sat at a central table. The waiter brought their menus. At that moment, Mandela realized that at a table right in front of theirs, there was a single man waiting to be served.

When the man was served, Mandela told one of his bodyguards, "Go ask that man to join us." So the bodyguard went and transmitted the invitation. The man stood up, took his plate, and sat down next to Mandela. While eating, his hands were constantly shaking, and he didn't lift his head from the food. When they finished, he waved without even looking directly into Mandela's eyes. Mandela shook his hand, and the man walked away.

One of his guards said, "Madiba, that man must be very sick. His hands wouldn't stop shaking while he was eating."

"Not at all," Mandela replied. "The reason for his tremor is another." They looked at him quizzically, and he said, "That man was the guardian of the jail where I was locked up. Often after the torture I was subjected to, I screamed or cried for water. And he came to humiliate me. He laughed at me, and instead of giving me water, he urinated on my head. He wasn't sick. He was scared and shaking, perhaps fearing that I, now the president of the country, would send him to jail and do the same things he did to me—torturing and humiliating him. But that's not me. That behavior is not part of my character, nor of my ethics. Minds that seek revenge destroy states and humans, while those that seek reconciliation build nations and well-being."

So when we're invited to tend to our own hearts and mind, Nelson Mandela really reminds us that this is our birthright, that this is possible for us.

In addition to tending our own hearts, then, like a bodhisattva, we have to open and listen to the cries, the fears, and the dreams of the others around us. And there's a lot of fear now. These are from people who feel not respected or not included, people worried that they will not be, worried about what will happen to them.

I remember seeing a beautiful Tibetan thangka of the sage Milarepa.

And he was sitting there clad in his white cotton, with one hand cupping his ear in a gesture of the Bodhisattva who listens to the cries of the world—so that after we quiet the mind and tend our heart, we listen in a deep and compassionate way, because there are cries on all sides.

It helped me not just to speak of politics, but to remember art, poetry, other ways of seeing. William Carlos Williams said, "You can't get the news from poetry, but men and women die every day from lack of what is found there." Something deeper.

Here's a poem for you when we speak of respect:

Remember how astonished your daughter is at ladybugs and motorcycles, a pebble she finds, a moth, a firefly, the stars that follow the moon, mayflies, light seen from the window before bed. Remember beneath each scarf, bandana, and surgical mask, there is a throat that might break into sudden surprising aria. Remember the image of your lover's brown hair on the pillow in the blue hour of the morning, any morning, is worth more than all your poems and thoughts. Remember even an angry word from them is worth more than the best line of poetry you've ever read. Remember your poems cannot shelter you or make a roof for the ones you love. Remember the earth's sole vocation is to astonish.

Remember. The earth's sole vocation is to astonish.

We've been through so many things. Ups and downs, amazing and beautiful and magnificent and terrible and painful, connected and divisive. This is part of our birth here on earth—to quiet the mind and tend your own heart, to hear the cries and the fears, and to see with the eyes of wisdom the reality, the laws of incarnation, to live wisely. These are what I offer as core teachings.

I know if I were to go to Ajahn Chah right now, if he were still alive, and say, "There are many people who are really distraught about what has happened in this election"—not everyone, some of you may be celebrating, and I honor that too—he would look back and say, "Anicca. Things change." And smile as if to say, can you honor that? Change happens. It's the law. Anicca. And then he might tilt his head and say, "Oh, and dukkha too," the second of the characteristics—suffering, uncertainty. He'd nod. This is dukkha too. Can you see it? It's how it is. Is your heart big enough to hold it?

Now, if I were to ask the Dalai Lama, he would probably look with watery eyes of compassion and say, "This is hard to hold. I know it is." Hand on his heart. "Me too," he would say. And then he would laugh and say, "We learned to do this, you know."

Anicca, the wisdom of uncertainty. Things change. Nations change, societies change, politics change. We change, we age, we get sick, we die. The Buddha said, did you think this would not happen to you, to the people you care about? All these things come and go, and right now we are at a big turning point on the earth—what Joanna Macy calls the great turning. Can we shift from an exploitative consumer consciousness on this planet to one of interdependence and mutual care? Because for wellbeing, we may need to do this. We do need to do this.

And then you might say, well, that's a big order. I don't know if human beings can do it. I don't know it either. But it's not about an election one way or the other. They come and go. There are such huge other forces happening right now.

Climate change. Artificial intelligence. Enormous changes coming. Nuclear fusion energy that could proliferate and offer complete free energy everywhere if it's done right. Huge possibilities and huge problems.

And as T.S. Eliot says, "In my end is my beginning." Everything that turns then offers a new openness and beginning for something else. There is a freedom when we accept that things change. They do change. We can take our seat and step outside of that small sense of time, the tyranny of our ideas, and feel the great movement of life.

I like this poem:

When you return, fallen leaves will climb back into trees. Shards of the shattered vase will rise and reassemble on the table. Plastic raincoats will refold into their flat envelopes. The egg, ball, and its transparent halo slide back into the thin calcium shell. Curses will pour back into mouths. Letters unwrite themselves, words siphoned up into the pen. My gray hair will darken and become the feathers of a black swan. Bullets will snap back into their chambers, the powder tamped tight in brass casings. Borders will disappear from maps. Rust revert to oxygen and time. The fire returned to the log, the log to the tree, the white food curled up in the unsplit seed. Bird song will fly into the larks' young lungs. Answers become questions again. When you return, sweaters will unravel and wool grow on the sheep. Rock will go home to mountain, gold to vein, wine crust into grapes, oil pressed into the olives, silk reeled into the spider's body, ink drained from the indigo tattoo, diamonds will be returned to coal, coal to ferns, rain to clouds, light to stars sucked back and back into one timeless point, the way it was before the world was born, that fresh, that whole, nothing broken, nothing torn apart.

So we take a seat in the freedom outside of time, open to the change, the dance of it all.

And of course there is also dukkha—the three marks. We know the obvious dukkha: continuing warfare and injustice and racism and suffering, aging, pain, death, loss. They are our companions. We live in a culture that rather prefers to hide from this. There was a page—so young, and so many pills—on the cover of the second section of the Wall Street Journal describing the tens of millions of antidepressants, anti-anxiety medications, and ADHD medications that our children take. This is how our society deals with stress. Or we hide, blame somebody else.

Dukkha is part of life. Did you not notice? And when we open to it, something happens. We realize it's not personal. As Longfellow wrote, "If we could read the secret history of our enemies, we would find sorrow and suffering enough to disarm all hostility." It's us.

Impermanence, suffering, and dukkha. And what comes out of it, if we turn toward it, if we acknowledge that this is the way it is, is such tenderness and compassion.

Zen Master Issa's three poetic lines: Dew evaporates and all this world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, so fleeting.

Now listen one more time. Because these three lines were written on the death of his young daughter. And you'll hear what he really meant:

Dew evaporates and all this world is dew. So dear, so refreshing, and so fleeting.

This is what opens the heart—that we share this. We share dukkha and anicca.

Yes, I could speak of loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity. But these are the basic laws as well: impermanence, instability of things, endless change.

And our freedom comes when we understand that dukkha is not a mistake. You didn't make a mistake. Somebody didn't make a mistake, and therefore we have suffering in human life. I mean, we have much more than suffering—there is beauty and magnificent love and so forth. And there's dukkha. It's simply the reality of our life as well.

Now, sometimes these three marks, as they're called—anicca, impermanence; dukkha, unstable, unsatisfactory, can't be held, suffering; and the third one, anatta, or selflessness, the emptiness of it all—sometimes they're named differently. Thich Nhat Hanh replaces dukkha with nirvana. He wanted people to understand that not only is there the field of suffering when we are attached and identified, but there's an unshakable freedom, an unshattered freedom.

Here he writes:

This body is not me. I am life without boundaries. I have never been born. I have never died. Look at the ocean and the sky filled with stars, manifestations of the wondrous true mind consciousness itself. Since before time I've been free. Birth and death are only doors through which we pass, sacred thresholds. Birth and death are a game of hide and seek. So laugh with me, hold my hand. Let us love now, and then let us say goodbye, only to meet again soon. We meet each other in all the forms of life. This body is not me. I am life without boundaries.

These are profound, wild, and liberating teachings.

You live in illusion in the appearance of things, in the color of the chain. There is a reality, but you do not know this. And when you understand, you will see that you are nothing. From being nothing, you are everything. That is all.

This is the invitation to step beyond the small sense of self, the individual that we have to take care of and carry and pay our taxes and stop on the red lights, and so forth. But the sense of separation is also a fiction. We are interwoven in the breath of the earth and that truth—billions of organisms that live within our own body. Most of you is not you, you know. It's all the other microorganisms in your gut, in your eyes, in your fingernails, every other part of your body.

And we know that we're not separate. You know it especially when you're on the mountaintop looking down from some amazing hike, or listening to a piece of music that transports you beyond that small sense of self. You know it when you make love or take psychedelics or have some profound meditation or dance until you disappear. We all know it.

A beautiful passage from an Australian Aboriginal elder puts it this way:

I'll tell you about the story, the real story, where you feel. Listen carefully to this. You can hear me. I'm telling you because Earth, just like mother and father or brother. You, that tree, same thing. Your body, my body, I suppose I'm same as you, anyone. Tree, working when you're sleeping and dreaming. That star, he's working there. See? He's working.

I can see. Always at night, if you lie down and look carefully, you can see that star working. When you sleep, blood pumping through your body—watch closely. It goes pink, then white. You see it work? It works. In the night when you dream, lying there, that star is working for you. Trees and grass are working for you.

Wow. What an understanding. It's all working for you. It's all a part of you. There are a billion causes and conditions that allow you to exist today.

We don't need to talk about politics or nations. It is so extraordinary that existence is here at all. And you and I get to play our part in this great dance. We get to plant seeds. In the Bhagavad Gita, there is Arjuna who doesn't want to go out on the field of battle, and who finally realizes the great lesson: to do your best to plant seeds, to act well without attachment to the fruits of your actions. Because you don't get to decide the outcome. You get to reach out and touch and mend what you can with your hand.

I looked at our past election as a ritual. Politics is a little bit like ritual warfare. Only instead of the Democrats and Republicans and the Libertarians and the Greens all mounting their tanks or their cannons or their steeds with swords and going to Washington to see who gets to win and take over for a while, it's ritualized. But it's sort of the same thing. And I think it's astonishing that hundreds of millions of people could participate in it. Even though it is troubling and troublesome and has its really messy parts and is smelly in some ways, it kind of worked. It was this huge ritual that we did, and we didn't destroy each other yet in any way. Kind of extraordinary.

So you now get to take the role that was assigned to you by your karma, or central casting, or however you want to say it. You got put in a pretty weird role—you know that, right? And then you get to do something with it. This is the freedom. The freedom is that, like Arjuna, here you are and it's messy. You don't want to go on the field of battle. But it is your task, wherever you are. And then you bring your heart. You say, all right, then let me choose to do something beautiful.

Howard Zinn wrote: "To be hopeful in bad times is not just foolishly romantic. It is based on the fact that human history is a history not only of cruelty, but also of compassion, sacrifice, courage, and kindness. What we choose to emphasize in this complex history will determine our lives. If we see only the worst, it destroys our capacity to do something. But if we remember those times and places—and there are so many—where people have behaved magnificently, this gives us the energy to act."

Oh wise ones that you are, remember there's a freedom just where you are to choose—in the midst of change inevitable and all the causes and conditions, you get to choose. You get to choose your spirit no matter what. What greater gift could there be?

Now remember that it's also helpful to acknowledge in changing times that there is refuge to be found—traditionally, refuge in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Just take a pause for a minute. The Buddhist texts begin: Oh nobly born, remember who we really are. Remember the dignity and freedom that was born in you. Yes, we humans can and do get lost in separateness and tribalism and conflict, in the body of fear. But we can also see beings with unconditional love, and from a place of freedom—as Nelson Mandela did in that restaurant.

We can do this too.

The human race tends to remember the abuses to which it has been subjected rather than the endearments. What's left of kisses? Wounds, however, leave scars. That's Bertolt Brecht. We forget the kisses sometimes and remember the trauma and the wound, but there is so much more.

Refuge in the Buddha means to see beings with unconditional love, to understand somehow that we can turn toward this life as a bodhisattva—as a being who deliberately turns toward suffering and difficulty and says, "Oh, I've been called. Let me help alleviate suffering. Let me help beings be free." Even if the sun should arise in the west, the bodhisattva has only one way. When there is something difficult, their heart opens, their eyes open, and they say, "Ah, this is the place for me to add something beautiful."

I can hear Krishna Das, my friend, chanting this song that was given to him or that he wrote from a Zen prayer from Roshi Bernie last month. I wish I could sing it to you in his style—I'd need a harmonium and a better voice. "Calling out to hungry hearts everywhere through endless time. You who wander, you who thirst, I offer you this bodhi mind. Calling out to hungry spirits everywhere through endless time. Calling out to hungry hearts, all the lost and the left behind. Gather round and share this meal. Your joy and your sorrow, I make it mine. Your joy and your sorrow, I make it mine."

And here is the freedom that you find. The freedom to step out of fear. Yes, dukkha—that's part of the game, as Nietzsche understood. But there is also freedom from fear. You turn toward the difficult and say, "Oh yes, the perfect place to care, to build compassion, to transform." You rely on your own true nature, the Buddha nature, the nobility of beings. You rely on the Dharma, the truth, the laws, the way things are.

Human suffering grows when there is more greed, more hatred, and more ignorance. We can see plenty of it in human society—individually, in our families, our communities, our societies. But there is an opposite. Instead of greed, we can cultivate generosity. Instead of hatred, we can cultivate love. Instead of ignorance, we can cultivate wisdom. There is suffering and its causes. The more greed and hate, the more we suffer. The more love and wisdom and clarity, the more freedom and well-being we find.

Helen Keller put it this way: although the world is full of suffering, it is also full of the overcoming of it. And this gives birth to compassion.

When we see with the eyes of the Dharma, we see the possibility of living in a different way. One of the Buddhist texts recites: "Others will be cruel; we shall not be cruel. Thus we will incline the heart. Others will steal and take what is not given; we shall be generous. Thus we shall incline the heart. Others will speak falsely and maliciously; we will tell the truth with kindness. Thus we will incline the heart. Others will be envious; we will be appreciative. Thus we will incline the heart. Others will be arrogant; we will have humility. Thus we will incline the heart. Others will be unmindful and uncaring; we will be mindful and caring. Thus we will incline the heart. Others around will lack wisdom; we shall cultivate and live with wisdom and blessings. And thus we will incline the heart."

This is a recitation of the noble truths, the path of the Dharma. Although the world is full of suffering, it is also full of the overcoming of it. And it is lawful. We can plant seeds of goodness, and eventually they will bear fruit.

Maybe not in our lifetime, but they will. And this is our freedom—to know what's true. Hatred never ceases by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law. And this is the Dharma. You know this.

So we're being called to remember the deep and basic truths in the midst of all that's going on. And that is our freedom. Others may do certain things. We know who we are in heart and mind.

O nobly born, remember refuge in Buddha nature and fundamental dignity, liberation of heart. O nobly born, remember the Dharma, the possibility of awakening just where we are. Remember Sangha, community.

The monastic Buddhist communities are among the oldest living continuous communities of humans organized in that way. And it's an expression of our collective wisdom. You know it and I know it—when I've worked in nonprofits and corporations, an individual's understanding is always limited. And it's so helpful and wonderful to come together with other people and say, "How do you see it? Let me understand how it looks from your perspective. What do you have to offer?" And almost always, almost always, the result is better. We need one another in so many ways. And we care for one another. If there's an accident near you, someone falls in the street, the initial impulse is: How do I help? How can I make a difference? This is who we are. Community is born into us—or we're born into community is probably a better way to say it. You come out of your mother's womb and you're already in community. And you look around. Don't forget it in these times. Sangha, community, mutual care—so uplifting and so liberating.

When I graduated from nursing school at age forty, the only job I could get was at a Veterans Affairs hospital. The work was challenging in every possible way. It didn't help that the veterans teased me relentlessly, asking over and over if I was married. I'm a lesbian. My growing discomfort with the question seemed only to egg them on. Meanwhile, caring for them required a great deal of physical intimacy. While changing a dressing or washing a severely ill patient, I often could tell it had been a long time since they had been touched with kindness. Gradually, I came to love the crusty old vets and the stubborn guys in detox, many of whom were homeless. Their spirit and resilience in the face of tremendous adversity were a kind of miracle.

Later, I worked on the psychiatric ward where patients could become argumentative, angry, aggressive. I sometimes didn't feel safe there, especially after it occurred to me that all these troubled veterans were combat trained. Once, a large psychotic man approached me in a truly threatening manner. Just as I was starting to get worried, an equally large Vietnam vet with dementia quietly came between us. Several other vets seemed to appear out of nowhere, and they stood nearby in silence. I felt safe. I'm retired now, but I still volunteer on that ward twice a week. I feel like I'm visiting my family.

This is us. This is us, you know?

Chan Master Cheng Yen says, "Those who do not have faith in others will not be able to stand on their own. Those who are suspicious will always be lonely." What does it mean to have faith in others, to trust, to feel the Sangha? This is the freedom of the heart of community. The heart knows that you're supported by millions and billions and gazillions of beings—from the earthworms and the hummingbirds, the field mice and the trillion microorganisms growing in your intestines and around your body. And the countless numbers of good deeds being done every day by billions of human beings for one another, to help each other. So many ways—caring for family, for community. That's the web that we don't see in the newspapers, in the media.

But there's something even greater, if you will, or as great, when you look for your freedom, freedom of heart. And that is to understand that you have backup. Your backup is Harriet Tubman and Sojourner Truth and Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King and Archbishop Tutu and Wangari Maathai and Thomas Jefferson on his good days and Marie Curie and all the sages and saints of thousands of years. They're your backup. They're part of you. And the trees, as that beautiful aboriginal vision says—they're working for you. And the creatures, working for you.

This is the great freedom: that you're not alone. You're supported and loved and part of this, no matter what. And yes, there's impermanence and there's dukkha. Just how it is—incarnation, birth and death, gain and loss, praise and blame, joy and sorrow. We all have this. And there's something bigger. Who we really are. The mystery of consciousness itself, born into this body and incarnation. And the invitation is to the great heart of compassion and understanding. You are free. And you're free to do beautiful things with your life.

After a period of silence, a woman named Susie spoke from the gathering, her voice carrying both tenderness and weight.

"I bring my family," she said. "Here is my daughter, my daughter who has cried since the election. My daughter who I always say is the Buddha—she's the wise daughter, filled with wisdom, and she cannot..." Susie paused. "And I say to her, it's just life. It's just what is. And I hold her in my heart and make jokes with her. But I say, go ahead and cry all you need to. And this is somebody who is a wise mind. She lives from a wise mind."

Susie continued, "I just volunteered for the ACLU as soon as I heard the results. I always donate, but I figured I'll give my time. Make phone calls. But I don't know what to say."

"Can you say what your daughter's first name is?" I asked.

"Sarah."

"So first of all, thank you for bringing her and you in together. Because there are people that are weeping."

She's younger, you know, and sensitive. She's not like my mom who said, "Oh, Jackie" – she called me that when I was little – she said, "My father came back from World War I, and then we lived through the Great Depression and World War II and the Cold War, and you hiding under your desk from the nuclear bombs, and the assassinations." She said, "We've been through this." But she hasn't. And even if she had, she may still be carrying the tears of many, many people.

And so your willingness to hold her is exactly right – to honor her sensitivity along with her wisdom. It's kind of a beautiful pair: wisdom and a sensitive heart. I want to thank her for her tears. We need more tears, actually. We need people who are our leaders to also be able to cry sometimes, because that's what's true. And she's not holding that back. Good for her.

You're lucky to have each other. Thank you, Susie. Take care, dear.

Ben, great to be here with you.

"I feel excited to be able to speak with you. I've been sitting with your teachings for a while now. This year I had a good dose of dukkha, some pains that cut pretty deep, and I turned pretty hard back into meditation. I've been studying a lot and sitting a lot, read a bunch of your books – or at least listened to them on audio. So I've spent many hours with your voice in my ear. I did a short retreat in September, and I'm doing one at the end of this week at Spirit Rock for seven days, which I'm very excited about. Your talks and teachings are always extremely helpful.

One of the places in my own practice where I'm struggling is that I get locked into some justified anger. Your talk today was so much about these broad perspectives and being with others in a profoundly compassionate way. But I find I can get stuck on these small loops where I'm frustrated with pain that others have caused me or caused people close to me. I think in A Path with Heart you talk about your 'top ten playlist' – this is my top ten playlist. I'm becoming quite familiar with it. I'm curious if you have suggestions on practices I might bring into my daily practice, as well as the retreat that's coming up."

First, I really appreciate that you have been practicing. You said you got a big dose of dukkha. Can you say in a word or a few what that was?

"It's all a tad tender, but yes – some big personal losses, and an awakening to some sufferings that were going on around me amongst people I'm close to. Big transitions. I also run several companies, and it's a lot of work and very exhausting. Until this year, I hadn't been doing the work I needed with the meditation on a daily basis to really bring the equanimity I needed. So several things piled together."

Thank you for sharing that.

Because people are listening and I haven't realized—okay, you're in the middle of it. And there's all these things that go on. And if you're in a bit of a leadership position too, or whatever you have, then you have even more of it. People looking in, you have to carry some wisdom and compassion in the middle of it. And then people are behaving badly around people. They do that. They cause pain.

So where do you carry that justified anger and the pain from it? Where do you carry it in your body? If you close your eyes and sense that anger, where is it?

"I feel a fair amount in my throat and in my chest."

Yeah, so feel it. What's it feel like? Is it hot? Vibrating?

"Yeah, it is. It's also mixed with nervousness in the moment here."

Sure. So let yourself feel that—the nervousness and heat in the throat. The throat often carries things that would come out: the shouts, the pain, whatever, all that. And then notice, as you feel it, because you make space with mindful awareness, what happens if you don't try to get rid of it or do something about it, but you just feel it and hold it with a kind attention? Say, "Ah yes, this is pain. This is painful." And this is anger that comes up, and the mind justifies the stories. You watch the mind do its stories, and you feel the pain or the anger or the heat of it. And you just bring a compassion to say, "Yeah, this is part of what we have to live with." What happens when you do it? Does it get more intense?

"Yeah, so I practice a lot and this comes up a fair amount. I think we're at... I go to planning and I go to arguing with people in my head. And I replay scenarios. I replay injuries and I replay what I would say or what I should have said, or how I can protect myself in the future, protect people around me in the future."

Okay, close your eyes again. Here's what happened. You felt the pain—it's hot. You felt the anger. And then quite accurately, you'll notice that your mind does all this stuff to not just feel that, feel the pain of it. You want to fix it, argue, make it better, something.

How about if you just let yourself hold the pain? Because it hurts and it's unfair, and so you feel that tearing because of the injustice of it. You feel the heat of anger and the unfairness, the pain underneath, and how much you care. Tune in, because all this suffering is also because you care so much. Right? And you're not trying to fix it. And you can see your mind arguing—thank you, okay, I've done that, thank you. And you're just being kind and saying, "This is part of what my life is—to also be able to hold this with compassion."

And notice what happens with your eyes closed. What happens to it? Does it get bigger? What does it do when you hold it this way?

"Yeah, it calms down a lot. It relaxes."

Yeah.

"I think there's a lot of feelings behind it, which is something you mentioned in a heart with neuropathy."

Yeah, yeah. And they could be there too. So it relaxes and calms.

You can feel that other emotions want to come. Now you become—and it's beautiful to watch you—more in your body and more present. You're not trying to fix it or bargain it away or argue it or something. You're just being with it in a compassionate and steady way. And through this, it will begin to teach you how to be present for the other emotions. You more and more trust that you can do this. And then you will be less reactive. It's not going to scare you or overtake you or feel like so much. Then you can take whatever actions you need to take, but they won't come from anger or fear—they'll come because you care.

"In these last eight months, I've been really practicing, and my capacity to be with feelings has increased tremendously. But this is one of those places where I'm really knotted up. I think what I'm really taking away is to be very attentive and aware of when I go from the feeling to the planning or the rational or the judging."

Right. And don't judge it—that's what the mind does. But that's not the place to live. The place to live is in a compassionate heart that holds the feelings.

This is beautiful, because as you were doing this work yourself, you were teaching everybody else. We are all grateful to you.

"I heard and appreciated very much your comments this evening for myself and for my heart in general, but I come to you tonight as a mother, as a parent—the mother of a permanently head-injured child. He lives because his accident happened when he was beyond our ability to keep him on our insurance. He is, in essence, a ward of the state of New York, living on Social Security, disability, and Medicaid. The incoming regime has promised to slash and destroy and take away benefits. I fear for my son's life. I don't know how to hold that sadness. I don't want to fix it. But I don't know how to hold the pain of seeing someone take and destroy so many people's lives. I realize that's in the future and we need to be present, yet I see this person promising to do these things. I'm trying to hold that in my heart and keep my heart open. What would you suggest?"

First of all, what you're saying is also a concern of many folks. There may be people who hold another view, who feel good things will come out of this next administration. People have all these different perspectives. But when I think about your son, it's so tender and so real as a mother. And then I think about the people I know who are immigrants here but undocumented, and I realize someone could knock on their door, haul them out, push them across the border to a place where they never even lived. There are a lot of very frightened people because of the kinds of things that have been said.

So you're not just giving your mother's voice for your son. You're also giving the voice of the mothers—because there are so many people who could be at risk. We don't know.

I don't have a simple response. I kind of just want to sit with what you've said for a moment.

As a father and a parent, holding the suffering of our children is one of the most difficult things we're ever given to do. It just is. It's almost like you want to say, "I'll take on the suffering myself and you'll be free," but you can't. And so you're bearing it, and you have to. So first, just to acknowledge—this is so hard.

Now, second, let yourself, let your heart and your consciousness expand to sense all the other mothers whose children are at risk—not just from the current politics, but maybe it's the children of mothers who are in Gaza. And Sudan. And all of a sudden, let yourself feel as if you could hold hands with these mothers, because you are the mothers that are holding the world together. And you're holding it with torn hearts. You're really holding this. And you need to support each other, which you do.

Feel this. This is one of the most difficult things you'll be asked to do in your life. And one of the most important. Can I carry this in love and care and not be taken over by despair and hopelessness, but still somehow do what I can? And it's you, and it's all the mothers that carry this together. The mothers have been doing this for a long time. Mothers are extraordinary. And it's really hard, which is why we need each other. You need each other in community.

Hold hands. Feel the sense of support. And love. And a kind of courage. I see you have a lot of strength. I see you have a lot of courage. And I see you have a really profound love. Don't let the outer things take over your heart, because it's such a good heart. You are strong. I see it. Strong and loving.

I'm glad to connect. We've been friends for a very long time. So I hold you in the same way, with that kindness and a lot of respect. A lot of respect.

And when I look now and I see the screen, the eyes and the faces are so beautiful. And same respect. We carry a lot. You know, you're asked to carry a lot—personally, sometimes really difficult. And then with your eyes and your heart open, we carry a lot collectively.

Take a look across the screen at the faces, if you will. You can sort of scroll a little, because these people are with you. Look in their eyes as if to ask, can we do this together? Can we hold this world together in a beautiful way, in the face of difficulty, personal and collective?

And feel the courage behind these eyes. We can do this. Feel the compassion behind these eyes, because it's here.

It really is.

I'm grateful. Thank you. Linda, thank you. And thank you to everybody who's tuned in.

We are holding hands. We're touching hearts. And there's this great love that grows in the midst of it all, that blooms even in the suffering.

This is also true.

CHAPTER 52

A Rudder in Turbulent Times

Jack Kornfield · 1h40

> In this heartfelt Monday night teaching, Jack Kornfield addresses how to navigate periods of cultural anxiety and rapid change through the lens of Buddhist wisdom. Opening with a guided mettā (loving-kindness) meditation and a reading from the Metta Sutta, he establishes the foundation of practice that has protected practitioners for millennia.
> Drawing from the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta's teachings on wise society—where communities prosper through harmony, care for the vulnerable, respect for nature, and honoring ancestral wisdom—Kornfield offers practical guidance for turbulent times. He references the Sālekhā Sutta's instructions on maintaining integrity: "Others will be cruel, we shall be kind. Others will speak falsely, we shall speak truth." The teaching weaves together stories of moral courage, from Nelson Mandela's reconciliation with his former prison guard to a military officer who defused a volatile crowd through a gesture of respect.
> Kornfield encourages listeners to ground themselves like great trees with deep roots, to steady the heart through practice, and to remember that we are all survivors whose ancestors brought us through countless upheavals. He invokes the Bodhisattva path—entering difficult realms deliberately to bring benefit—reminding us that now is the time to draw on our moral strength, creativity, and courage. The talk concludes with community sharing that demonstrates the teaching in action: neighbors supporting immigrants, people standing in solidarity, and practitioners honestly acknowledging their struggles while returning to their good hearts.

This Monday Night Sitting group was started forty years ago in a friend's living room in San Anselmo, and then moved to the Fairfax Community Church for about thirty years, every week, more than thirty years. Recently I've been doing it once a month, with others filling in. And I'm still really grateful to have you attend, to be connected. I see you in your little squares, at least some of you, many of you who I know. And it feels like a really important time to have community and to be together.

What we do on Monday night is really very simple. We have a meditation period, twenty or thirty minutes or more, then take a break for five or ten minutes to stretch or relax. And then usually, as there will be tonight, some teachings and some time for questions and dialogue afterward.

It is both a pleasure to see you, and at the same time, I'm also missing the live Monday nights and how sweet and connecting it is to sit in the community hall at Spirit Rock and be present with one another. And maybe that will happen, but not for right now.

In these rather turbulent times, the theme for this evening is a rudder—a rudder for crossing the wild stream, for navigating the times. I was reflecting on what would be a good practice for us this evening, and so I'd like to guide, for those who wish, a loving kindness or metta practice.

How many of you already do sometimes a metta practice? Basically all the hands go up, because it's part of the tradition and one of the practices that has spread most widely, along with mindfulness, here in the West.

What's true about metta practice is there are a variety of different ways to do it. One of the ways you may have practiced is closing your eyes and systematically reciting certain phrases, picturing yourself or people you care about: May you be safe, may you be well, may you be happy, may you be peaceful—things like that.

Another way of practicing metta that's also ancient and traditional is to invoke or invite the feeling of love to be in yourself without the specific words or images—more that you become a carrier of, or a beacon of, kindness. Whatever arises—thoughts, people, images, concerns—the response might be held in kindness. This too, held in kindness, about yourself, others, the world around you.

And of course, the ideal as you practice is to find your own way, to find what most naturally resonates with yourself as a gateway to open the heart. To feel not just the loving connection with the world, but more deeply, to feel the state. And that, in the deepest way, is who and why.

So with this very small introduction, let yourself find a way to sit comfortably and at ease. In doing metta and loving kindness practice, it's really helpful to sit in a way without a lot of pain. It's very hard to do loving kindness when your knees are killing you. Let your body actually have a sense of care and wellbeing, and rest in that sense of wellbeing.

When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently, and first bring kind attention to your own body. Take a couple of long breaths. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. If you like, you can roll your head in a little circle to release your neck. Let it have a simple, upright ease. Let the shoulders relax, the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body and let yourself sink down or settle into your seat, so you feel completely supported by the seat and the earth below. You can rest just where you are. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness, compassion.

Only in the space of presence and stillness.

Let me read to you the one-page version of the Metta Sutta, loving kindness, that has been recited for thousands of years. As you listen, let the words invite an opening of the heart and mind and body to the field of love and the field of kindness.

This is the work of those who are skilled and peaceful, who seek the good.

May they be able and upright, straightforward, and easily supported, unburdened with their senses calmed. May they be wise, not arrogant, without desire for the possessions of others. May they do nothing mean or that which the wise would reprove.

And resting in this simple goodness, let them reflect and share in this way: May all beings be happy. May all beings live in safety and joy. All living beings—and this is your well-wishing going out to beings in trouble, beings in every form. May all living beings, whether weak or strong, tall or stout, average or short, seen or unseen, beings near and those distant—may beings everywhere be happy. May they have wellbeing in every form.

Let no one deceive another or despise any being in any state. Let none by anger or hatred wish harm to another. But as a mother watches over her child, willing to risk her own life to protect her only child, so with a boundless heart one should cherish all living beings as your children, suffusing the whole world with unobstructed loving kindness. Above and below, around every quarter, pervaded with loving thought and care. Sublime—standing or walking, sitting or lying down—during all the waking hours, may one remain mindful of this heart of kindness. This way of living is the best in this world. And may your loving kindness, with love-filled thought abounding beyond measure, reach beings in every dimension and every direction.

Every time you recite these words or hear them, know that in other parts of the world just now, there are people reciting these same words and evoking the same spirit of metta. Always—twenty-four hours a day, every hour and minute—someone is reciting and practicing loving kindness. And you can feel it. You join in the stream of kindness. You can rest in the field of loving kindness.

Or if you like, you can add the words of loving kindness in the systematic way that many have done, and picture loved ones and friends and neutral ones and beings in every quarter, each time wishing: may they be safe and protected, happy and well, filled with kindness. Or you can rest in the reality of the present, and whatever arises, whisper from the heart: held in kindness, held in kindness. The thoughts, the feelings, the people, the memories, the sensations—held in kindness. Whatever floats your love boat, follow that. And if the attention wanders, as it will, when you remember, just the simple phrase: held in kindness. Wherever it went—held in kindness. Staying in the loving heart. Held in kindness.

If you wish, you can direct the field of loving kindness to parts of the world, spreading loving kindness especially to those who are suffering, struggling. And to those who are causing suffering—may their hearts too become peaceful and loving. Omitting none, it says. Omitting none. And to beings in every shape and form, beings of the waters, beings of the earth—well-wishing to be held in kindness.

And finally, bring the loving kindness back strongly to yourself. If you'd like, you can even put a hand or two on your heart, on your belly, and hold this mysterious life you've been given with loving kindness. With care. And feel yourself as a field of metta, loving kindness. When you're ready, gently open your eyes. You carry the light of this loving kindness in your being for all you see and touch.

Welcome back from the break. Let yourself get settled again in some way where you can listen as a kind of meditation and reflection. Not so much that you have to believe what I say or talk about—it's a contemplation. A reminder, perhaps. If there's something that touches you as true, let that inspire you. And if there's something that feels wrong or awful, let it go.

So to begin with, on this Monday in February 2025, I recently returned from a pilgrimage in Southeast Asia—Laos, Cambodia, and Thailand. It was quite wonderful. I got back the day after the Los Angeles fires started, returning to LA with Trudy. And it was, of course, very difficult. We now have many friends who have lost their houses, homes, and livelihood. The fires were very close to our houses. Trudy's daughter lived just a block and a half away from the edge of the Palisades fire, where everything else had burned—other dear friends too. So that was really difficult to come back to.

It seems like our life goes along, we know what's going to happen, we have our plans. And then—in the Buddhist texts, there's a phrase that karma can change as quickly as the swish of a horse's tail. Part of the nature of samsara, this world of birth and death, is the nature of uncertainty. Everybody had their certainties about their life. And then for thousands, it was an enormous upheaval.

Then we went from Los Angeles to lead a retreat in Costa Rica. I love being in Costa Rica and teaching there because the greeting and the culture uses the word pura vida. It's a kind of hello greeting, like aloha—pura vida, pure life. There's such a warm and friendly culture. It's probably the only country of its size that has no army. It's also a warm and caring culture because it was never heavily colonized. They were fortunate—they didn't have gold or oil. So in other ways, they were left more alone.

It was a reminder of the Buddhist teachings of wise society. That if we live with care for one another, without an army but with mutual care, things can be quite beautiful.

But now I'm back, as we are in the US, in a kind of maelstrom of change and cultural anxiety—at least for many.

I want to read a poem that was sent to me by my friend and fine poet Alison Luterman this last week. Because when I read it, I wept at the end. It describes some of the kinds of changes that are happening or being proposed. And if we think about how we navigate these wild waters, how we have a rudder—the first part is just to wake up to what's happening.

It's called "Praise the Broken Promise of America":

Praise deep mineral veins under the rich dirt and fossilized remains of dinosaurs turning themselves into gas for our benefit. Praise the exhausted earth, miles and miles of subsidized corn, and cattle lowing from their hell holes in automated milking barns.

This is not an easy poem.

Praise farm workers rising before dawn, their sore backs and aching knees. Praise the myth that drew them here, stories eagerly consumed when there is nothing to eat but faith. Praise the courage of the reverend to look the dragon in the eye and preach mercy. Praise whatever hidden waterways are still pristine.

Praise music that refused to play at the funeral of democracy and the killing cold that swept through Washington when a fake pope took power. Praise drag queens and lipstick lesbians, boys who were girls and girls who were lions, butch women wearing tool belts, and all the music theater nerds who are even now building new passageways, mapping the next underground railroad, and suiting up to be conductors.

Oh, everybody, get on board. This train will chug quietly across the Great Plains and over rocky Sierras into the desert where people still leave bottles of water and packets of food for the desperate who have always been the lifeblood of this nation. It will stop in obscure hamlets to pick up fugitives with tears tattooed on their cheeks and fraying backpacks overspilling with contraband books.

Praise the weirdos because if anyone can save us, it will be us.

And praise all the glittering illusions we gawked at, ignoring our own neighbors in favor of a 24-hour peep show on the internet. Praise the conflict firefighters on the front lines in LA battling the insurmountable for ten dollars a day. We gambled our future for a hot air balloon with a hole in it. Praise our reckless hubris and the infinite distractions of the hall of mirrors we find ourselves in now.

And bless our overwhelmed brains scurrying like mice for shelter. Bless our collective rage and protect the officers who stood up on January 6th and now see their attackers roaming the streets like rabid dogs.

Oh, bless the animals we have always been in our coats and shoes and clumsy language. Bless our willful ignorance, so enormous, so world-altering, that like the Great Wall of China, it can be seen from outer space, where the gods are shaking their heads even now, in pity and in awe.

Now, mind you, I'm aware that poem comes from a person with a liberal persuasion. But it's also heartbreaking.

And it doesn't mean that there isn't value, which I see in conservative points of view—in simplifying government overreach or other things that we can do to simplify and straighten our society. Because the benefits of the Dharma are useful and universal, and it doesn't choose which party to support.

But I also see that the rapid pace of change brings an enormous potential of suffering falling upon the vulnerable, which is what the poem points to. I have a call from a friend who works at WHO, and another who's been one of the main leaders in USAID, saying, "You don't understand. For less than half a percent of your American budget, you saved millions of lives—starving children, HIV transmission stopped, polio you're ending. So many things you've done as the richest nation in the world. We still look to you."

So how to navigate? And this is, if you will, a hard talk and a serious one. How do we respond? What is the rudder, if you will—what teachings, whatever your political persuasion, might be kept in mind?

First, remember your best values as things change. I was in a meeting with several of the heads of the biggest AI companies in the world and a world-famous historian who looked at them and said, "You know, you're like the Bolsheviks." And they sat back. He said, "Yeah, you look at what happened in Russia. They tried to change the whole society very quickly. How did that work out? Look at how the Maoists did it. 'Oh, we're going to have AI and we're going to get new jobs.' Look at how it worked out in China. How about Cambodia? You all have to stop for a moment and reflect."

It was kind of an amazing moment because they were taken aback being called Bolsheviks when they thought they were capitalists. But it's where we are.

So for you and me and those around, the Mahaparinibbana Sutta begins: If a society meets in harmony and treats one another with respect, it will prosper and not decline, says the Buddha. If a society takes care of the vulnerable among them—the children, the women, those who are vulnerable—it can be expected to prosper and not decline. If the society reveres the wise teachings of past generations, it can be expected to prosper, not decline. If society cares for the natural world around it, it can be expected to prosper and not decline.

So these are the values of wise society taught by the Buddha: respect, care for the vulnerable, care for nature. Remember your best values.

Then in this time, ground yourself and steady your heart. Do you remember Thich Nhat Hanh's line about when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates? If everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person on the boat remained steady and calm, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive.

I'm going to do a whole teaching another night on anxiety, but we're swimming in it—a cultural anxiety. And so to steady yourself, do your meditation. And breathe. Imagine as you sit that you're a great tree with roots that go down into the earth. Breathing in air. Buffeted by storms and winds and change of seasons. But underneath, let your core be steady.

When anxiety arises, acknowledge it. Name it. "Anxiety is like this. It feels like this in the body." Acknowledge the stories that it tells. Say thank you. "Thank you for trying to protect me. I'm okay in this moment. You can stand down. You can rest."

Maybe change the story. You'll hear the story anxiety tells. Change that story to one of challenge. Wade Davis, the great explorer, said, "Despair is a failure of imagination." Change the story to one of imagination and possibility, to one of challenge. Shift your chakras—go from the fear place to the heart, to the place of love that we just did. Walk out in nature.

All these things to ground yourself. Steady yourself. Because we human beings have been through huge upheavals many, many times, and we know how to do this. Remember your best values. Ground and steady yourself. Don't be afraid.

This is what H. L. Mencken, the great political commentator of a hundred years ago, said: "The whole aim of politics is to keep the populace alarmed and hence clamorous to be led to safety." And so the zeitgeist and the media are almost designed to activate fight, flight, or freeze, to colonize the nervous system and make you afraid and worried. Don't buy it. It's not who you are. It's not what we are as human beings.

When the terrified monks and perhaps nuns who were practicing out in the forest around the Buddha came running after a night of wild animals and howls, they asked, "What should we do? Please give us a protection—we're so alarmed." And he said, "I will give you the protection." That was the first time the Buddha formally taught metta and loving-kindness as a practice. He said, "Develop this and embody this metta, and you will be protected wherever you go." In the name of ancestors who have practiced through hard times, up and down and around, with a loving and compassionate heart.

Here's a puzzle for you. Belief means just this: who is right and who is wrong. The sutras say the wise do not cling to views—not "who," but rather take your stand on principles, on what is to be valued. Support what's good on every side.

I loved reading Rahm Emanuel, who had been Obama's chief of staff and mayor of Chicago and many other things as a kind of stalwart, famous liberal, writing in the New York Times or the Washington Post about how he was cheering for Donald Trump to get the Nobel Prize. He said this man has the opportunity to revision what's happening with Iran or in the Middle East or Ukraine or North Korea. He said he deserves a Nobel Prize. Rahm Emanuel said, "I'm cheering him on. May he solve one or more of those and bring peace in the Middle East and Ukraine and with North Korea." Support what's good wherever you see it. Take the long view—I'll talk about that in a moment. Live with integrity and the virtue of non-harming.

So this is the Sallekha Sutta. When asked how we live in a society where there are difficulties, this is the practice: "Others will be cruel; we shall be kind—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will speak falsely; we shall speak truth—thus we shall incline the heart. Others will exploit and steal; we shall be honest and generous—thus we shall incline the heart." What it is really asking and saying and inviting us to do is to live with integrity and virtue, more than ever in this time.

After becoming president of South Africa, Nelson Mandela recounted: "I asked some of my bodyguard members to go for a walk in town. After the walk, we went to lunch at a restaurant. The waiters asked what we wanted, and I noticed at a table nearby a man sitting alone, waiting to be served. When he was served, I told one of my guards to ask that man to join us. The man stood up, took his plate, and sat next to me. While eating, his hands were constantly shaking, and he didn't lift his head from the food. When we finished, he waved without even looking at me and walked away. One of my guards said, 'Madiba, that man must be very sick. His hands wouldn't stop trembling.' 'Not at all,' I said. 'The reason for his tremor is another.' They looked at me and I went on: 'That man was the guard of the jail where I was locked up.'"

Often after the torture I was subjected to, I screamed and cried for water. He came to humiliate me. He laughed at me. And instead of giving me water, he urinated on my head. He wasn't sick. He was scared and trembling, perhaps fearing that I, now the president of South Africa, would send him to jail and do the same thing he did to me—torturing and humiliating him. But that's not me. That behavior is not part of my character, nor my ethics. Minds that seek revenge destroy nations, while those that seek reconciliation build wise societies.

Live with integrity and the virtue of non-harming. Others will be cruel; we shall be kind. Others will speak falsely; we shall speak truth.

And from the teachings: Do not be afraid to stand up and speak for these values. From the text again: "Truthfully will I speak, with good intention will I speak, for the benefit of all will I speak." Don't remain silent.

A couple named Carrie and Laurie Riding came home to find their rainbow flag on their front porch had been stolen and their house egged. Anti-homosexual vandalism wasn't what they expected in their close-knit Massachusetts neighborhood. As it turned out, it also wasn't what their neighbors expected. They got together and said, "Why don't we all have flags? They can't take them from all of us." As one of the neighbors explained to the Boston Globe, within days, the rainbow flag—the symbol of gay pride—was flying in solidarity with the Ridings on over forty other homes in this family-friendly area. One person's act of fear and maliciousness created a powerful statement of love, said Laurie. Love wins.

Do not be afraid to stand up and speak for your values.

"Oh nobly born," begin the Buddhist texts. Remember the fundamental dignity and nobility of every single being, and treat them that way—with respect.

Another story for you. In the early years of the Iraq War, this is a story from the New Yorker, a small unit of American soldiers were assigned to go to the holy city of Najaf. It was a delicate mission, as the presence of Americans in uniform was seen as a potential desecration of their faith and sacred sites. When the soldiers approached one of the revered mosques, hundreds of Iraqis poured out of the buildings on each side, fists waving, throats taut. They pressed in on the fifteen Americans, who glanced at each other in terror. The reporter witnessing it said he felt afraid that a shot would come from somewhere, or someone would open fire, and it would turn into a massacre.

And then, quite suddenly, in the middle of it all, the American officer in charge stopped and held his rifle high over his head with the barrel pointed to the ground. He stood there against the backdrop of the seething crowd, now almost a thousand deep. It was a striking gesture, almost biblical. And then he took a knee. The officer held his position and told his men to follow. The soldiers looked at him as if he were crazy. And then, one by one, swaying in their bulky body armor and gear, they knelt before the crowd and pointed their guns at the ground in the same position as their officer. The Iraqis fell silent. Their anger subsided, and the officer ordered his men to withdraw.

The writer of the story said it took him months to track down Lieutenant Colonel Hughes. How did you learn to tame a crowd in a war zone in a distant country? Hughes offered a shrug. It's not part of army training. The problem, you know—people start shooting for real, said Colonel Hughes. The Iraqis felt that the armed Americans had disrespected their mosque and their culture in this holy city. The obvious solution was a gesture. And this is what makes wise society: to offer the gesture of respect to everyone—those you agree with and those you disagree with.

And take the long view. As I said before, here's Gandhi saying: "When I despair, I remember that all throughout history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time, they can seem invincible. But in the end, they always fall. Think of it. Always."

How long?

As long as it takes.

In the great cycles of existence, there's a wisdom that we know and carry. Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law.

And we human beings—we've been through wars and depression, and we will again go through global crisis. We may be in the middle of one now. To be hopeful in bad times, writes Howard Zinn, is not just foolishly romantic. It's based on the fact that human history is a history not only of cruelty, but also of compassion, sacrifice, courage, kindness. What we choose to emphasize in this complex history will determine our lives. If we see only the worst, it destroys our capacity to do something good. But if we remember the times and places—and there are so many—where people have behaved magnificently, this gives us the energy to act and the possibility of sending the spinning top of a world in a fine direction.

Take the long view, because it's your intention and your heart and mind, in all the cycles of birth and death—it is that deep intention of wisdom that creates what's possible.

The word Vipassana means to see clearly. Look with clear eyes. Believe in your own observations, your honest wisdom. Believe in science when it's good science. Believe in art. As it says in the Kalama Sutta, do not follow what others say. See for yourself: this is harmful, and this is of benefit. Have the clarity and courage to not avert your gaze. Yes, times can be difficult. Did it never occur to you, it says in the text, that suffering will come to you as well? We're in this together, this human realm, subject to joy and sorrow, gain and loss, praise and blame.

With all of these things, you become what's called a make-weight. In the old days, when you went to the market, they'd hold up one of those scales and put the papaya or the rice or whatever it was in one pan. In the other, they'd put metal weights until they balanced. The make-weights are the name for the tiny little weights added after they put in the one pound or two kilo weight. Often they're quite beautiful, created in the form of a series of little animals—little ducks or little whatever they are. And they get added until that last make-weight tips the scale, makes it go down.

It doesn't take a lot at some times for us to add our goodness—to serve, to care, to support, to awaken. You can be that make-weight that tips the scale.

Join with others. Taking refuge in the Buddha, taking refuge in the Dharma, we take refuge in the Sangha, the third of the refuges. Especially in difficult times, I can't tell you how important community is, because we can easily get isolated. And there are a thousand ways to find others—to create affinity groups, to join service organizations in your neighborhood and around you, to stand up, whether you're political or social, whether you join with artists. Reach out and say, let's do this together. Let's support one another. There are a thousand small ways to do it.

And now is the time.

Twelve-year-old Matthew Flores of Sandy, Utah approached the mailman, his postal worker Ron Lynch, and asked if he had any extra advertisements or random newsletters. Matthew explained that he loved to read, but he couldn't afford books. Even the bus fare to the library was too much most of the time. So he'd take anything the mailman had that was extra. Ron Lynch was floored. He didn't want electronics. He didn't want to sit in front of the TV playing games all day. The kid just wanted to read. Lynch told the local newspaper and asked his Facebook friends for reading material.

Soon, Flores was getting books sent from all over the world—the US, England, India, South America. For his part, Flores said he plans to read all the books and then share them with other book-starved kids.

It's simple. And that's maybe the last teaching for how to live like a Bodhisattva.

Now is your time. We're all survivors, you know, and your ancestors brought you here—they survived. We know how to do this. You've been training for this for a long time in your life: how to stay steady, how to keep your values with integrity, how to care for one another.

The Bodhisattva enters the realms of the hungry ghosts, the jealous gods. They happen to live in Washington DC these days. The Bodhisattva lovingly enters all realms, deliberately, to bring support and loving-kindness, compassion, to help alleviate suffering. Dear Bodhisattva, I vow to bring benefit—or however you want to say it. What better thing could you do in life?

Now is the time to draw on your moral strength, your courage, your creativity. It's almost like the world has orchestrated this because the globe needs a reset. We know this with climate change and warfare and racism and AI and all these things happening. We need a new set of values to really come forth. You know this as well as I. And it happens when we get quiet and remember what our deepest values are. Then amazing things can happen.

I was just reading about José Andrés, the world-celebrated chef of El Bulli who started World Central Kitchen after the hurricane in Puerto Rico. He got volunteers, and thousands of people came and served tens of thousands of meals. Now World Central Kitchen has served a hundred million meals in Ukraine and Sudan and places where people are hungry. That's a kind of grand thing—kind of fun to talk about and inspiring. He's got people who know how to cook from all over the world with him.

But it doesn't have to be that big. It's the kid who said, "Do you have any books or anything I can read?"

The Bodhisattva's reflection: How can I live and contribute to a wise and healthy and compassionate society? How can I be part of us meeting in harmony and respect? How can I support protecting the vulnerable and the natural world around us and respecting the wisdom of generations before?

And for me, it's the same. I'm listening. I don't even know what to do. I was touched by the image of the Underground Railroad. I live in a neighborhood full of immigrants, some documented and some not. And I will talk to them. How can I help? What do their families need? I talk to CEOs also. But you can lobby, educate, create art, sing songs, serve in the community.

Underneath, you get quiet. And you remember that you're here for a beautiful purpose, O Bodhisattvas. What better thing to do with your life?

So let's pause for a moment. Just be quiet. It's a confusing time in some ways, and also a time that calls for us to speak out or to make a difference.

I want to ask if anyone—there are a lot of you on the screen—just for the fun of it, who might be willing to be a conductor on the Underground Railroad, if it's called for. Just to see if any hands go up.

Yeah. There are.

It's not right for everyone. But it might be right for some of you.

Let's open the community space for comments, questions, and dialogue for a little bit before we end the evening.

Nancy shared something beautiful. "You know, it's so interesting because today I live in Los Angeles, and today I went to Homeboy Industries. I'm sure you know Father Boyle."

Yes, I do.

"Well, he has just written a book called Cherished Belonging and the Healing Power of Love in Divided Times. I just got it today—I'm only on page twenty-seven. But he is so heartfelt about seeing the goodness in everybody. One of the things I love so much that he says is, instead of focusing on punishment—you know, he works mainly with gang guys who've been in prison—what he encourages us to do is see the pain instead of the behavior. I feel like that could be very helpful. I don't know how to work with it when you see the pain in the people who are calling the shots right now. But those guys are in pain, you know. And I think that's kind of where you were saying the Buddha comes from—that we have to understand that people really, if we treat each other with kindness and loving, won't be cruel. If we can understand each other a little bit more, understand the pain that causes this behavior."

Thank you, Nancy, because I can feel the inspiration. Homeboy Industries and Father Greg Boyle is a real inspiration for me, from his first book, Tattoos on the Heart. I can't recommend it highly enough. He takes people who would be thrown away—not just some of them undocumented, but people who've been in prison for murder, for shooting one another—and he loves them. And they change. He sees their pain, and he also sees their goodness. And he has a word I wouldn't usually use—Father Greg has a wicked sense of humor.

"Oh, he does."

And that's another power we have: to make art, to make this into humor, to turn where we are into something different, which is really what you're saying. So I feel your inspiration, and I thank you for sharing it.

It's funny because I get so inspired reading Father Greg's books. We've done a few events together, and Trudy and I have both gone down to Homeboys. I said to him, "So where do you get your inspiration?" He said, "Oh, I listen to podcasts from this guy, Jack Kornfield." And it was like, oh my God, I admire him so much—but I guess you take it wherever you can find it.

Then our Teamster poet spoke up. Those are two words that are not often put together, I understand.

"First, thank you for this—as usual, the treasured moments that we spend together, even online. You're a great inspiration for me and many others. Although, if you want to start up the live gigs again, I'd totally drive up to Spirit Rock. And thank you for shouting out World Central Kitchen. As a practicing Buddhist, I cannot support any militaristic action. But you still want to do something for people who are suffering. And World Central Kitchen does that."

Yes. I have friends from Ukraine, and they have said to me that outlying villages away from the cities would have starved to death were it not for that work. Excuse me—it chokes me up a little bit.

And then I wanted to say something about taking action. Because of the pandemic, a friend of mine, Miguel, who had been doing some work for me—he's legal—said to me, "Man, it's really tough. All these people, you're getting checks from the government to stay at home. But these immigrants who don't have the papers have no support. There's nothing coming in."

So I started making phone calls and we got together a few projects in the neighborhood and in other cities. I live in Martinez. These people mostly came from a place called Bay Point. And we got some work together for these folks and put some money in some pockets.

Well, you know, maybe recently you noticed that there was a march on immigrant day, when every Hispanic business, practically speaking, in the Bay Area shut down for a day. The Mexican restaurants were down. The corner stores were down. People just stopped. And better than that, some of the South Asian owners, recognizing that although they had some advantages that the Hispanics did not, they shut their liquor stores too. They shut their corner businesses too. And they had a march out in Bay Point.

My friend Miguel said, "You want to come?" And this is what I'm suggesting to everybody that's gathered on the screen now. Find out where that march is. Having old white people with gray hair standing with them says something to them and to the broader world around us. That needs to be said. Let them lead. But do your walking meditation in a march supporting what you believe. And believe me, you'll never run out of tamales—they came over the bag like this, you know.

Give it a thought. A lot of us are living on Social Security or in retirement. It's not a long drive. These neighbors are not too far away from you, and they're waiting for you to help them.

Jeff, what you say—what was said before by Nancy—you're both just putting your heart out there and saying, this is what matters. This is where I went to Homeboys. I went to this march. You're expressing that care from your heart and your life. Thank you for doing it. Thank you for reminding us. We all need to hold hands together in difficult times. And I feel you reaching out with your hands and your heart. And yes, World Central Kitchen is extraordinary—to feed one hundred million meals. It'll get you out of the house, get you some exercise. Away from the TV for a while with all the nonsense. Be well and happy.

Padma. Lotus.

"First of all, thank you so much for being the elder, reminding us to let go of fear and stand in solidarity, and also to stabilize the mind and not let it go a thousand places. When Nancy was speaking, what came to me was that in spite of doing all the things I do at work—seeing people from where they are, being able to do that—as soon as she said we should be nice to each other, the first thing that comes to my heart is, 'Well, let them be nice. Then we will be nice.' I hear that tone inside me. And at this point, I have to acknowledge that this is where I am. This is how I feel. It's not like I can deliberately go and be rude to anyone. But even when I'm driving, I'm suddenly thinking, 'I wonder if the car in front of me is a Republican car or a Democratic car.' And I'm very sad that this is what it has come to. But I also appreciate that I am on this path. I'm not letting go. And I'm very grateful that I have met you."

I'm touched, and I thank you. Also, you've said some things that are really important. First of all, you've said you have some not completely loving and charitable thoughts. No one else listening would have that problem—you're the only one among us. But the fact that you fess up to it is itself actually rather comforting to other people, because I myself have had at times what one might call un-Buddhist thoughts toward people.

But then, because we've learned to practice, I see them. Even in traffic—it's a small thing, and it's not who's a Republican, but who's driving in a way that's cutting people off. And I can feel the reactivity, and it's become really a practice for me. If I feel myself being reactive, whether it's that or something on television, I picture them as a five-year-old kindergartner going into school. And here they are—wide-eyed and innocent as kindergarteners. Yes, they can get in fights and a whole lot of things, but basically there's still an innocence of heart in almost every child who goes in. And I see them that way. They're in the big adult body driving or running something or speaking, but underneath is that child of the spirit. And when I do, there's a kind of metta that comes, a softening of, "Oh yeah, this one too is in there. Let's figure out how we do this together."

So I'm glad you brought it up so honestly, because that's also important for us. And if I remember, your work is as a physician, is that correct?

"Yes."

So you never really do anything of use. But the thing is, I'll tell you, that if any of these people—even the ones that you might, how we say, judge—were to come to see you as a doctor, you would love and care for them. And I want you to feel that even right now, that that's really who you are. All that other stuff comes, that conditioning—we have it. But who you are, feel that. It is that person who would care for anybody who came to see you as a doctor. And that's your pledge, but it's really your true nature.

So thank you, Padma.

That could be a good place to stop. What I hear from Nancy and Jeff and Padma is our good hearts. We admire whether it's going to Homeboys and seeing the transformation of people that you would think would be thrown out—and Father Greg doesn't throw anyone out of his heart—or Jeff and his work, or Padma. This is actually who we are. And we need each other to remind each other to stand up, to be honest—

And with that honesty, also to be really loving. It's so funny talking with Padma—it's as if her mind has no pride. It'll do anything. It does all these things. But you can feel her good heart in evoking her work, her care as a physician. That's really true, as it is for Jeff, Nancy, and you.

So may these teachings that have been carried for thousands of years to this time give you sustenance and reminder and courage, strength, and love.

Thank you.

Good to have a moment of quiet. I'll see you out there. Wherever we are, we'll do it together.

Good night.

CHAPTER 53

Presence and Heart Now More Than Ever

Jack Kornfield · 1h28

> In this heartfelt talk from Spirit Rock's Monday night gathering, Jack Kornfield addresses the collective anxiety and grief many feel during times of political and social upheaval. Beginning with a guided meditation on mindful loving awareness, he invites practitioners to discover the spacious consciousness that witnesses all experience—thoughts, emotions, and sensations—without being overwhelmed by them.
> Drawing on teachings from Thich Nhat Hanh, Gary Snyder, and the wisdom of Black Elk, Kornfield emphasizes that the way we respond to difficulty matters as much as what we do. He shares Thich Nhat Hanh's instruction to 'let your walking be the peace you want for this earth' and Gary Snyder's advice to save the world not out of guilt or fear, but out of love. Using the metaphor of imaginal cells in a chrysalis—cells that carry the vision of flight even as the caterpillar dissolves—he suggests we are living through a great turning, a difficult but necessary transformation.
> The teaching weaves together stories of Thomas Clarkson's 30-year campaign against slavery, a veteran's unexpected protection of a nurse, and the cellist of Sarajevo playing amid bombed ruins. Throughout, Kornfield reminds us that underneath our fear and anger lies profound caring, and that one centered person can show the way for many. The evening concludes with community dialogue and a collective blessing, affirming that we face these times together.

I'm zooming in from the Sierras near Lake Tahoe in Truckee, where I'm visiting my six-year-old grandson Desmond and his parents. Trudy and I are up here in the snow, and it's been wonderful and tiring. Six-year-olds have a lot of energy. "Come on, Baba, let's do this and that and this and that." Anyway, it's been great. And now I'm happy to see you all.

If this is your first time coming, our Monday night class has been ongoing for 39 years—30 of them or more on the land at Spirit Rock, and before that, nearby. The format is really simple. It invites you, whoever you are, to come together for us to sit in meditation with a little bit of guidance to start, for 20 or 30 minutes. Then we take a break for five or ten minutes to stretch or relax, and that's usually followed by a talk or teachings, sometimes with dialogue. Tonight will be a little bit different. There'll be a semi-talk and maybe a lot more dialogue. We'll try that.

Let me pause before we meditate. Sometimes people think meditation is an invitation or an approach to have a particular experience or state—even that very basic one of quieting the busy mind, or calming in the midst of anxiety or planning or worry, and then getting some deeper understanding. All those things can happen. But the real point is to come into the reality of the present. This is all we have, actually—this moment. The past is a fiction. The future is a fantasy. Memory and fantasy. What's alive is just now.

To come into this present moment with mindful, loving awareness is to notice the play of our human experience and to discover that we can take our seat with a compassionate and gracious heart, with a freedom that is your birthright and mine, in the midst of all the coming and going of feelings and thoughts and memories and plans and emotions. We take our seat, sometimes beginning quietly with the breath, inviting a sense of calm and ease, noticing the play of experience. We become the mindful, loving witness—mindful, loving awareness itself—spacious and gracious.

With that, I invite you to find a way to sit that's comfortable, at ease. Let your body rest. When you're ready, if you're comfortable doing so, allow your eyes to close gently.

Begin by taking two long breaths. Settle yourself here in the present moment. Let your body relax. Let your eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Maybe roll your head in a little circle to release your neck, then let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax, and let the arms and hands be easy. Feel the whole weight of your body and how it is met by the seat and the earth below. Relax and settle into your seat. Let yourself be fully supported and at ease just where you are. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with compassion and kindness.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the experience of this present moment with loving awareness. For those of you who are somewhat experienced in meditation, you might want to begin by simply sensing how the body breathes itself. Feel it as coolness in the nose, swirling and tingling in the back of the throat, or the rise and fall of chest or belly—the whole body. It breathes all by itself. As you feel it, invite a sense of calm and ease with each breath. Calm and ease, relaxing with each breath.

This breathing with mindful, loving awareness is not avoiding the world. There's turmoil, difficulty, problems and suffering, concerns we all share. This is a centering of yourself, a quieting of the mind, a softening of the heart, so you can be fully present before you respond to this world—before you respond wisely, with courage and compassion. First, be here. This breath. Steady. Easy.

As you feel the breath, when the attention drifts off, just bring it back gently.

Relax into this breath just now. Feel it, rest in it, swim in it. Let all the other thoughts and worries and plans and sensations rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel the ocean wave of the breath—calm and steady. This breath breathing its own rhythm. Rest in the reality of the present as the breath arises.

As you settle and come to an ease, centered, invite the sense of mindful loving awareness to open so that you can notice the waves that rise and fall around the breath. You feel the breath, and then all of a sudden the attention is pulled by a thought—remembering something, imagining, planning, thinking, picturing. When it happens, as soon as you're aware of it (not right away often, but when you are), you can acknowledge it as if with a little bow: remembering, thinking. You are the loving awareness that notices that wave of thoughts arising. Then return back to feel the breath in the middle.

Just as mindful loving awareness can notice the thoughts and words and images, it can also notice the emotions—sadness, excitement, fear, love, longing, desire, frustration. When they arise, as if with a bow, you can acknowledge: oh, sadness; oh, excitement; oh, longing; oh, joy. Let that wave of emotion be felt, let it rise for a time like a wave, and pass away. Then back to a few breaths again. Just here. The reality of the present. This breath and the waves around us.

Notice now too that just as you can be aware of the breath with loving awareness, just as you can notice the rising of thoughts and images, of emotions or sensations in the body—these waves that come and go around the breath—you are not the breath. You are not the thoughts and feelings and sensations. They all come and go. You are the consciousness, the space of awareness, of loving awareness, that notices the breath and the experiences.

Rest in the space of loving awareness, of consciousness itself. Relax. Open. Timeless. Present. Spacious. The breath comes and goes. Waves of experiences arise for a time and pass. And you are the loving witness, the awareness itself.

Loving awareness is vast and open. It allows for all things. The joys and the sorrows arise and pass. The longing of love. All of it. And here you are, seated like the Buddha herself, himself—the compassionate and loving witness. Spacious. At peace. Rest in the present. Relax. You are the consciousness. You are the awareness itself.

Finally, let this loving awareness be filled with tenderness and compassion. It is love itself—for all that arises, all the beauty and the pain. You rest in the great heart of compassion and the vast consciousness of the awakened heart and mind.

When you're ready, allowing the sense of spacious loving awareness to continue, let your eyes open gently. Feel yourself centered in eternity, which you are—the reality of the present, where all things arise and pass. Look around. Let the sights in with a gracious heart.

Now, before we take our break, which we will in just a minute or two to stretch or relax, a reminder: the word mindfulness means sati sampajañña in Pali or Sanskrit. It has two parts—it means mindful presence and mindful response.

You see, we're mostly practicing in the sitting: mindful presence. As you heard, they say in Zen, there are only two things—you sit and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is, the garden of the world. Breathing in, breathing out, we sit first.

I remember teaching at UCLA with Thich Nhat Hanh at a very big conference on Eastern and Western psychology, a couple or a few thousand people. It was time for walking meditation. That particular weekend, or those few days of retreat, the US had commenced bombing somewhere—I forget where, but we're always bombing somebody somewhere. Sad to say, that's part of what we do in this world.

I was wearing a black armband, as were a number of people who came, as a kind of protest to remind people that we didn't stand for bombing, that that wasn't what we wanted. And I said to Thay, to Thich Nhat Hanh, "Well, we could give black armbands to the other thousand people who don't have them when we go out and do our walking meditation across the UCLA campus."

He paused and looked at me and said, "No." He said, "When you walk, just walk. Let your body, your steps, your walking be the peace you want for this earth."

It was a beautiful moment. When you walk, just walk. Be that.

And again, you sit or quiet yourself or even walk slowly. And then you sweep the gardens. I have to say, to use Ram Dass's phrase—boy, oh boy—it sure feels good to sit together with you in these times. So thank you.

Welcome back. Before I start to talk this evening—because often I'll create a kind of crafted talk of teachings and examples and stories in a systematic way, and then we have a conversation afterward—for tonight I want to do something different. I'd like to be able to speak but also to respond to where you are, to what your concerns are, to what themes you wish we could touch on. Perhaps we'll have some dialogue with this. So I invite you to put into the chat the themes or topics or words—what you're looking for, what you're hoping for, what's going on for you—that we might talk about together.

Let's see what comes up.

How to cope with the stress and anxiety of the current administration. The destruction in the country. Balancing self-care with compassionate action. Stability of heart. Uncertainty. Grief. Fear of sickness. Maintaining sanity while watching destruction. Balancing doom scrolling with head in the sand. Being overwhelmed. Self-care versus activism. How to send love and blessings to all people. Compassion with boundaries. How do I focus on the positive and stay present? Giving my gifts. Watching late-stage capitalism disregard humans. The despair of the news. How to help those with memory issues to remember how to meditate. How to understand that there are other views of what's going on. Remember that spring always follows winter. I do not feel guilty for feeling safe.

Oh, well. This was going to be a couple of hours, but I'm afraid we'll be here all night. Might as well relax.

What I love about hearing from you, even though it's difficult, is somehow the sense that we're in this together.

How do I stay centered? How do I take care of my family? How do I quiet myself and also act in the world? And how to do so with a joyful heart? How do I deal with the struggles? How to avoid or work with feeling overwhelmed?

And if you look at the screen and see the little faces in the squares, or you're on the Facebook live stream or whatever, we're in this together. And it doesn't mean there aren't some conservatives on the screen. There are some really important conservative values, the best of them, that we need. So this isn't a political statement, but it's a Dharma statement.

As Thich Nhat Hanh repeated often: when the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person remained centered and calm, it showed the way for everyone to survive. And you know who that one person is. That's how the world is made. It's made from us, from our hearts and our being.

So maybe the first thing is simply that we allow ourselves time to be present, to walk in nature, to turn off the damn news. You know, you kind of know the plot. It's like reading a Shakespearean tragedy in many cases. You know it. Quiet your mind, tend your heart. And also, as you do, perhaps not get into the game of blame, of who's right and wrong.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian activist and author, said: "If only it were so simple. If only there were evil people somewhere insidiously committing evil deeds, and it were necessary simply to separate them from the rest of us and destroy them. But the line dividing good and evil cuts through the heart of every human being, and who among us is willing to destroy a piece of our heart?"

In a way, what we're seeing is really a symptom of our humanity. Here we are, twenty-first century, late stage capitalism, which has gotten to the place where there are extreme divides between rich and poor, exploitation. And we're at the time Joanna Macy calls the Great Turning, the great opportunity really for us to reset our lives as human beings.

What's also true about the Great Turning is that it's a birth process. I don't know how many of you have given birth, but I imagine looking at the screen that some of you would raise your hands. And it's messy. It's painful. It's dangerous. It's difficult. We are in some kind of birth process. All the things we see are not just terrible things, but they're also symptoms of our fear as human beings. We're kind of wired to fear the other. And our politics is all about fear. The great commentators about politics said, you know, the whole aim of politics is to frighten the populace into voting for you. That was a hundred years ago, that commentary.

But that's not who we are at heart. That's the small separate self, the body of fear. The Buddhist texts also begin: "Oh nobly born, remember who you are." Remember your fearlessness in the midst of it all. Center yourself.

Thomas Jefferson said something like, "One person with courage is a majority." I used to have on my refrigerator a picture of that Chinese man with the shopping bag standing in front of that line of tanks. Remember that image? After Tiananmen Square, the tanks stopped, and he had his shopping bags.

But how do we do this? We have to stay in the present. Because if you let yourself get drowned by the news and the fears and the thoughts, you'll go swimming and rising and falling in the ocean of grief and fear. And that's not who you are. Meditation invites you to have a very different perspective.

When a butterfly makes a chrysalis, we used to think as kids, and we were told, that it would grow its wings. There's the caterpillar and it had some wings and it comes out and it flies. But now we know all the science shows us something very different. It dissolves. It becomes a gelatinous mass of cells, some of which are related to the old caterpillar, and some other cells which have a beautiful name.

They're called imaginal cells. And these are the cells that picture that they can fly. I mean, what a wild thing for those cells to believe. But honestly, they do. They carry that image, that imagination, that possibility. And apparently there's some struggle there in the chrysalis about who's going to win out. Can we go back to the old caterpillar? I don't think so. And gradually the imaginal cells begin to build the wings of the butterfly.

But it's not easy. Things fall apart. And I say that lightly, but actually there can be tremendous suffering, and we can see it. Part of our practice and our training is the capacity to bear witness to the ocean of tears, as well as the wondrous glory of the world and the universe. The beauty that surrounds us. And nature keeps showing us amazing things. It keeps getting reborn no matter what you do. It will be reborn. It will push through the cracks in the sidewalk. You try to pave it over—baby, it's coming back. It's just what it does. It renews itself.

So there's a kind of trust that's asked. And there's a story—remember Black Elk? Black Elk was the great medicine man of his people, and he was celebrated. He had this beautiful vision on Harney Peak about the circle of life, and part of the vision was the way his people would again come together and live in the harmony they had before.

In the beautiful biography Black Elk Speaks, John Neihardt, who interviewed him and lived with him at the end of his life and became partly his voice—he was with Black Elk. And Black Elk was an old man now at the end of his life, as Neihardt writes. He wanted to go back and visit the top of Harney Peak, where he had been blessed by a vision of the sacred hoop of the world that inspired his whole life and so many people.

So he put on his finest headdress and painted himself as one does to meet the gods, and took a sacred pipe and asked for a blessing, honoring the goodness and beauty of the sacred tree. He walked up to the top of Harney Peak, and Neihardt said it was a clear blue sky. Yet Black Elk had told him that if his life was of any value, the rains would come. This is a very dry part of the Dakotas, but the clouds would part and bring some rain as a blessing from the Great Spirit.

He climbed up. The sky was perfectly clear. There were tourists looking at this old man in his headdress and paint, wondering. And it was in the midst of a season of drought, one of the worst in years. He lay himself on the ground at the top of Harney Peak and made a prayer that if he had lived righteously, the gods would somehow bless him with rain.

And Neihardt said, to his astonishment, some clouds appeared just over that part of the mountain, and a light rain began to fall. Black Elk lay there and smiled and somehow knew—even though he didn't succeed in reweaving the sacred hoop in the way that he intended—that his life was not in vain.

There are some bigger forces than what you know. Bigger than politics, bigger than even climate change, bigger than AI. And these are all huge forces—don't get me wrong. But in another way, they're trivial. They're trivial compared to the forces of the turning of the seasons and the return of life. As Pablo Neruda says, you can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring.

There's another force. And that's what we're asked to remember. Something mysterious and great. To quiet ourselves and align ourselves. And then, of course, to begin to act—but to act not in the way of fear.

I tell that story—I might have told it a month ago—of my beloved friend and colleague Wes Nisker, who died a couple of years ago, visiting Gary Snyder. Gary Snyder, the great environmentalist, now in his nineties, who got the Pulitzer Prize for his environmental writing fifty, sixty years ago with Earth Household. Wes said, "Gary, the oceans are rising, the deserts are growing, refugees everywhere, animals going extinct, the ice flows melting. What advice do you have? You've been an environmentalist for more than half a century."

And Gary looked back and said, "Don't feel guilty. Don't feel guilty. If you want to save it, don't save it out of guilt. Don't save it out of fear."

Don't save it out of anger. Because the guilt and the fear and the anger are what has created our human problems. This is the source of it. If you want to save it, save it because you love it. That's the force that makes a difference. That's the power that does so.

So what you do when you meditate is you let yourself sit with heartbreak. How many have heartbreak? Don't bother raising your hands. We know you. How many have felt guilt or fear? And then here's Gary saying, don't save it out of fear, out of confusion and guilt, doom scrolling, all these things which will come in these times.

But the end of Mary Oliver's poem about the last day of the Buddha, where he lies under the two sal trees and his last words as the trees break into blossom—he looks up and he says, "Make of yourself a light." It's usually rendered as "be a lamp unto yourself," but Mary Oliver's better than that. She says, "Make of yourself a light."

So I'm going to pause for a moment. We could get practical in a few minutes. But I'm really talking about the value of learning how to embody that nobility and dignity that is who you are. We human beings go through horrible times—world wars and tremendous human-caused suffering. How will you carry yourself? And what light will you carry? Because you can, you know.

How are you doing? I go to nature to relieve the grief. Do it out of love—such a powerful message, because it's a shared message. We see each other. We're actually holding hands in spirit, even here.

And do you know why you get afraid? Do you know why you get angry and upset? Because you care. Underneath all that—the fear and the anger and all of it—it comes because you care. And in meditation, the invitation is to drop beneath. You can see the anger and the fear and all that. That's being human. Like Solzhenitsyn said, who doesn't have that in their heart? But underneath that for you is to sense that care.

Poetry helps. Arts help. Music helps. A bigger picture. "I feel like I should be doing something and make a difference, but what?" "Do it out of love breaks my heart open."

A couple of days ago, being up in Truckee, there was a big demonstration of people out on the street who were concerned about the firing of USAID and the money that would go to feed children who are hungry or starving, would go to give medicine to those who are sick. And the thing that struck me—Truckee's a small town, I think three or four thousand people—hundreds of people came out, and there were so many creative signs. It was amazing, the creativity. So many people came out for a long time. It took about a day to organize. And it was done by a high school student. He said, we've got to get out there.

And he started calling the other students, and they all started calling their friends and their parents and their cousins. In a day or so, hundreds and hundreds of people in this small town appeared with their signs of love and their signs of concern. Of course there were signs of frustration and anger too—there were all of them. Part of what struck me was how creative it actually was, when you're standing up. It's here. It's in us.

And you say, well, what should I do? Go out in nature, supported by children and grandchildren. They're rooting for you. Sometimes it's just small things. I think about Italy during the pandemic, how people began to sing to one another from the balconies when they couldn't visit each other. And then they began to bang their pots, remember that? It's really simple. We should have a pot banging day for people who are concerned.

It also helps to have a big picture. If we think about the Great Turning, I remember being on the top of Mount Tamalpais—I've talked about this before. Some years ago, Mount Tam is the 2,500-foot mountain in the middle of Marin County, our local mountain, and it was the day of the passage of the planet Venus across the face of the sun. I drove up because I had read about it, and at the top there were a bunch of amateur astronomers who had brought their telescopes, some with pretty big ones. I got to look through a big telescope, and there was the sun.

If you get to look close at it, first of all, it's kind of wiggly. It's not like a bright orange disc. It's like looking into a fiery, moving, amazing thing, constantly alive. It's astonishing to see how alive it is. The sun is considered a being or a god in so many indigenous cultures—they could be right, you know. This thing was really alive in these ways.

And then at one corner, there was this little dark marble, very tiny compared to the big disc of the sun. As I watched for five minutes, I could see that it moved a tiny bit. I went away and came back, and it had moved a little further. And then I realized—oh, that's Venus. It's about the same size as planet Earth, like us. The same size. And it wends its way around our great star like we do.

There's this vast space and these little tiny marbles going around our star in this wonderful way. And then we get upset. "Sometimes I go about pitying myself," said the Ojibwe, "when all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky."

There's something about trusting—Black Elk's vision—that there's something bigger. And then you're called in the darkest times and the most difficult times to remember who you are and to treat one another from that place of dignity and respect, as those who are nobly born. In a way, that's what we've been practicing for, some of us for a very long time.

And it doesn't take a lot, you know. Gestures of kindness. Asking others how you can help, and then tuning and listening: Who is doing things that make a difference? Is there a new underground railroad growing to shelter people who otherwise might be in danger? Would you want to be a stop on that underground railroad, if that was the right thing for you?

We will get through this, and we'll get through it because we do it together.

There's an amazing book called Bury the Chains by Adam Hochschild. It's the story primarily of a man named Thomas Clarkson. Thomas Clarkson aligned himself—he might have been a Quaker, or he aligned himself with the Quakers—and he was one of the activists in England fighting against the slave trade. In the 1700s and 1800s, a lot of the wealth of the British Empire came from slaving and then from slave plantations, slave colonies, penal colonies, especially in the Caribbean islands and Central America and all those places where you can grow sugarcane. Sugarcane was the oil of the time, and it brought great wealth.

And they knew, the Quakers especially knew, that this was immoral and it was wrong. And six of them got together in an English tea house and said, "We're going to change this." They all vowed in their own way to make a difference. Clarkson in some way became the head of them, and he rode for thirty years. He rode tens of thousands of miles back and forth across England, meeting especially with the English gentry and the people who had wealth or power or in some way were part of those who ran the society.

He brought with him often an ex-slave, somebody who had been somehow released or able to get to England and who was well spoken, who described what it was like—the middle passage, to be chained in the hold of a ship with hundreds of others and no food, what it was like to be whipped and beaten. And here in the nice parlors of the English gentry, Thomas Clarkson went from place to place to place. Thirty years it took him. And at the end of it, it wasn't just him, of course—it was a movement from the Quakers and others. The English Parliament came together and with the force of their movement, they outlawed slavery. They probably did it in stages, as I remember, to be accurate. First, no more taking of slaves, then no more keeping of slaves.

I'm telling you this because it takes a while, especially in times of huge social change. But you—you are the imaginal cells. You are the ones who are called to hold the vision of a wise society where people respect each other, where we care for the vulnerable, where we understand the universal teachings: hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is you.

One person shared that on Saturday in the city of Berkeley where they live, there was a large demonstration at the Tesla store in southwest Berkeley. There were going to be six or eight hundred people there. And there was anger—people would drive by in Teslas and they would say, "Sell that car, sell that car." But what they wanted to share was that the mood was joy. People were just so happy to be together, all these folks coming out, and it was a joyful occasion. They stopped traffic, blocked the whole street. After a while somebody built a cardboard Tesla, about eight feet wide, eight feet long, carried on sticks covered with aluminum paint, traded back and forth among the people. It was a joyful occasion, and they wanted to reassure everyone about that.

I really appreciate the spirit of it, that it was done, that it's not done out of great fear or great anger. Now, I need to be honest. I bought one of the first Teslas, and I still drive it. People want to give me the bumper sticker: "I bought this before Elon turned into whatever." I really appreciate the concern about Tesla, but more deeply, it's the concern about what's happening in our government and the kind of things that the Department of Government Efficiency, DOGE, is doing. I was talking to one of my dearest friends who worked for the World Health Organization. And he said, "Do you know what it's like to hold children who haven't had enough to eat?" Because he worked in the refugee camps. He said, "That's what I'm worried about."

So thank you both for the joy. And also somehow it's funny to hear that the old lefties were having a good time—they've got a cause now. May it work, you know. But it's not just them. It's our children. The gathering that happened in Truckee had families and kids and it was also joyful. If we're going to change the world, let's do it out of love, out of joy.

Another person shared that they are an AIDS researcher and have worked for four decades with very vulnerable populations—women at risk for HIV in Africa and sexual and gender minority people. Their group is heartbroken to see these vulnerable populations come under attack.

And we're trying to find a way to make some noise and make the cuts that have been made in PEPFAR and other USAID programs palpable for people in America. And it's been very hard. A lot of our international collaborators who could give us the data to show the impact are afraid. They feel so vulnerable. They're afraid to participate, which is even more heartbreaking.

Of course, we're old friends. I'm glad to see you. I know as a physician that you've given your life to this work of bringing medicine that saves people, that keeps families and mothers and children from dying across many parts of the world, and that your whole team and all the things you do now feels like it's being taken apart, undermined. So that's the tragic part.

And I think your willingness to name it as part of our community, to ask us all to carry it with you so that you're not alone—I invite you to look at all the little squares if you shift your computer so that people can gaze at you and look back and say in their own way with their eyes: we're with you. We hear you. We want to help. So look at that so you feel that's there.

And then also know, as you say, you're doing everything you can to make changes. It isn't the end of the story. We go through a lot of cycles, and this is a destructive one. It may have some tremendous suffering in parts. It may also have lessons we don't even know. It's so mysterious, you know. It really is. And what light can you carry? What spirit can you carry? What helps you? What's the most helpful thing now that you're carrying your lamp in the darkness?

"Well, I think I take a lot of solace in the feelings of solidarity that people are coming from all different backgrounds. There's a Stand Up for Science movement. There's other people who can feel the pain of these destructive acts. So community is really central."

The solidarity, all those people who gaze back at you with their eyes of compassion and also care and respect for all this beautiful work that you've done. And you are one of the imaginal cells, kind of remembering: okay, we can do this. We can have things fall apart and we will respond and we'll envision and somehow we'll rebuild something. But for right now, it's also very difficult. There's no question about it for the kind of things you're talking about.

I think about Vedran, and I carry his picture sometimes. Vedran Smailović, who is the cellist of Sarajevo. Here he's playing in the bombed-out National Library of Sarajevo. For the three years that Sarajevo was under siege—mortar fire, people couldn't get in and out except for UN helicopters—it was a really terrible time. And Vedran, who'd been in the symphony, would put on his tux and take his little folding chair, and wherever there'd been a mortar fire or a bombed-out building, he would go in the day that followed it and seat himself in the middle of the crater and play beautiful music so the people of Sarajevo wouldn't give up hope.

That's what's asked of us too—to bring our music even in difficult times, to bring art and beauty and care and love more than anything else, even more than the fear and concern.

Anyway, thank you for all your years of service. And I have just one terrible thing to say to you, kiddo: you ain't done yet. And I trust you. You know how to do this. You've done it in really hard places. I know you have. You've gone to the ends of the earth. It's been hot. It's been terrible. People have been sick. You've been the doctor.

You know how to do this. And you're not done yet. You have things to do.

I hope we can be effective. I hope so too.

Let's pause for a moment. The help that can come also arrives in unexpected ways. If we're open, if we show our own humanity, sometimes it's surprising what appears and who joins us. You have to trust this as well. You know that it could happen.

When I graduated from nursing school at age forty, the only job I could get was at a Veterans Affairs hospital. The work was a challenge in every possible way. It didn't help that the veterans teased me relentlessly, asking over and over if I was married. I'm actually a lesbian. My growing discomfort with the question seemed only to egg them on.

Meanwhile, caring for them required a great deal of physical intimacy. While changing a dressing or washing a severely ill patient, I often could tell it had been a long time since that body had been touched with kindness. Gradually, I came to love the crusty old vets and the stubborn guys in detox, many of whom were homeless. Their spirit and resilience in the face of tremendous adversity were a kind of miracle.

Later, I worked on the psychiatric ward where patients could become aggressive and angry, argumentative. Sometimes I didn't feel safe there, especially after it occurred to me that all these troubled veterans were combat trained. Once, a large psychotic man approached me in a threatening manner. Just as I was starting to worry, an equally large veteran with dementia quietly stepped between us. Several other vets seemed to appear out of nowhere and stood nearby in silence, and I felt safe.

I've retired now, but I still volunteer on that ward twice a week. I feel like I'm visiting my family.

And it is our family. Now, of course, families are weird. In most every other culture, when people are referred to, the honorifics are familial—uncle and auntie. We have wacky uncles too, demented uncles even. We won't use their names, but they're our relatives because we're all family. In the end, we're woven into an inescapable garment of destiny, as Dr. King says.

We can't fix it or change it. We can't change the suffering, but we can bear witness to it with our tears and our hearts. And remember that we're even bigger than the suffering. Then we can reach out our hand, each of us in our own way, to mend the places that we can touch, to care for those in front of us or around us, or to join together in community with others who care.

And that care changes people. Just that alone begins to make a difference. It becomes a kind of movement—the movement of caring. This is compassion. It's really simple. It's not easy.

You look at the dialogues between the Dalai Lama and Desmond Tutu, and they both suffered as much as anybody. Their countries and all that's around them, all the responsibility—the loss of Tibet, the killings in South Africa—they're right in the middle of it. And yet they bring this huge compassion of heart and joy. Why should I let my heart be taken over? Let me bring beauty into the world, and compassion, and love.

And you can do that too.

"Therefore, I look upon everything as a brotherhood and a sisterhood," says Mary Oliver, our modern great poet. "And I think of each life as a flower, as common as a field daisy, and as singular, and each body a lion of courage and something precious to the earth."

I think of Ajahn Chah's forest monastery when the fighter jets and bombers flew over during those years of the wars in Cambodia and Vietnam. Our province was on the border of Cambodia and Laos. The monastery was a deliberate island of peace.

He said, "I want people to remember what's possible—not to close their eyes or turn away, but to become a light." Make of yourself a light.

So I thank you for tonight. Thank you for what you have shared. Thank you for your good hearts. Thank you for your profound caring and for the sense of community that we have.

I invite you to look at one another. Let's be quiet for a moment and practice a little metta, wishing well for all these faces before us. You know, these are your sisters and brothers, your uncles and aunties. They are.

Offer each one a blessing from your heart—courage, support. We're in this together.

With gratitude, blessings, and love to all.

CHAPTER 54

Be Joyful Though You've Considered the Facts

Jack Kornfield · 1h50

> In this deeply moving talk, Jack Kornfield draws from Wendell Berry's wisdom to explore how joy is not merely pleasure or happiness, but a radical understanding of our human spirit—and one of the essential factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga). He weaves together teachings from the Dhammapada with stories of the Dalai Lama, Desmond Tutu, Thích Nhất Hạnh, and Mahā Ghosānanda to demonstrate how the most awakened beings maintain joyful hearts even through immense suffering.
> Kornfield identifies what genuinely brings joy: integrity (sīla), generosity (dāna), gratitude, trust in the long arc of justice, and mindful presence. He shares the powerful metaphor of imaginal cells—how transformation emerges from apparent dissolution—and the concept of being a 'make-weight' whose small presence can tip the scales toward peace. The talk includes a guided meditation on breath awareness, wonder, and reconnecting with the joyful child of spirit within.
>
> The evening unfolds into a rich dialogue where practitioners share their experiences of finding joy through compassionate understanding, overcoming fear to join protests, and discovering that deeper connection reveals unshakeable goodness in all beings. Kornfield reminds us that we catch joy from one another, that our hearts are not meant to be colonized by fear, and that the world—as Allen Ginsberg proclaimed—is holy.

Hello, dear ones. Welcome to Spirit Rock Online, Monday nights with Jack Kornfield and friends.

Spirit Rock is located in the San Geronimo Valley of West Marin County, California, on unceded Coast Miwok territory. We name the history of this beloved place as a gesture of respect and reparation toward the indigenous residents of the colonized land we now call home.

We welcome you all, all parts of you—your color, culture, beliefs, gender, orientations, abilities, ages, education, and economic status. Please fully take your place in this circle.

We've been meeting, some of us on Monday nights, for forty years. Most of those years were on the land at Spirit Rock—thirty years there—some before, and now a bit more infrequently online. It was every week for about thirty years. All during this time, it's really been a way for people to come together to quiet the mind, tend to the heart, reflect on teachings and values of compassion and loving awareness and mindfulness, and to share in this.

The format tonight, as usual, is very simple. There will be a guided meditation to start, followed by some quiet meditation time—probably about thirty minutes. Then we'll take a break to stretch or relax for five minutes. After that, as usual, there will be some teachings, followed by a period of questions and responses or dialogue.

Whatever brings you here, welcome. As Ileana suggested, all parts of you are welcome. The Dharma doors, the Dharma gates, invite you to take your seat—this place halfway between heaven and earth, in this extraordinary human form—and to remember the capacity we have to awaken, to be present, mindful, alive, and also loving and compassionate in the midst of it all.

So let's begin with some meditation. Part of it will follow the theme of this evening's talk. The great farmer-poet Wendell Berry wrote, "Be joyful, though you have considered the facts."

Let yourself settle for this time. When you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently. Take two or three long breaths. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Roll your head in a circle if you like, just a little bit, to release the neck, and let it find a simple upright posture. Let the shoulders relax. Let the arms and hands rest easily.

Feel the weight of your body and sink down into the seat. Sense how you can be completely supported by the seat, the chair, by the earth beneath you. You can relax and settle into just here, taking your seat halfway between heaven and earth in this meditation of awakening.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with the spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, establish the quality of mindfulness—mindful, loving awareness. Begin simply by noticing the body breathing itself, without trying to fix or change. Notice if the breath is soft or shallow or deep or irregular. Let it breathe as it wishes.

As you sense the breath—the coolness in the nostrils, the swirling tingling in the back of the throat, the rise and fall of chest or belly, or the whole body moving—relax and sense that it is the earth that's breathing you, the ocean of the air. You're being breathed by life.

As you relax, you can invite a sense of ease and calm to come with this kind attention to the breath. Breathing in and out, inviting a sense of ease. Noticing the breathing rhythm, inviting a sense of calm and quiet. Breathing gently, let the mind quiet and the heart soften into presence.

Naturally, as you sense the breath, there will be all kinds of other experiences that arise. Thoughts and plans and memories, images. Other sensations in the body, warm or cool, pleasant or unpleasant. Sounds that come and go. Emotions—sad, happy, worried, excited. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. No need to stop them or fix them. Feel how the breath moves quietly in the midst of them all.

Sensing the breath invites you to become the loving witness, the mindful, loving awareness that notices the moods that come—sadness or fear, longing, love, joy, connection—that lets you notice the streams of images or thoughts that pass by. And like the breath itself, you quiet, feel its rhythm, and you witness the rising and passing like waves of the ocean.

You rest in the middle, breathing quietly, still. You are the awareness itself, noticing the arising of experience. You are the quiet, steady witnessing. Timeless, present. Allowing for all things, all the waves to rise and pass. Quiet in the middle, undisturbed, spacious presence.

As you sit quietly, notice how the thoughts and images, as Rumi puts it, come trooping out of emptiness from nowhere. Let the sense of wonder arise—amazing, the breath breathes itself. Images and appearances arise and pass. Let yourself sense the wonder that was born in you.

Remember your best adventures as a young child. Call upon the child of the spirit that can wonder at a flower or pebble or the mystery of a tree. Mary Oliver's line: "I was a bride married to amazement."

With a sense of wonder, allow there to be joy. The child of the spirit rolls down the grassy hill, plays with whatever is here. A joyful heart, inviolable, still within you.

You carry within you the gift of awareness and a profound joy just to be alive, to see and touch and taste. May your wonder increase. May your joyful spirit shine even amidst it all.

Keeping the sense of mindful, loving presence and the spirit of wonder or joy, when you're ready, let your eyes open gently. Notice how you feel. Stillness, presence, kindness.

Happy to be with you.

I'm seated here at my desk in San Rafael, California, looking out across a bit of green grass to a crab apple tree in full bloom. It's still before sunset, so it's beautifully lit. One of the things about crab apple trees is that they have these amazing, gorgeous pink and white blossoms and their green leaves at the same time. You get this contrast of green and white and pink all together in a kind of magic form. And then in the black acacia tree on the other side of our house, near the water, lives a very big owl that hoots—might even hoot during our talk—that I get to hear outside my bedroom window, especially when it flies about at night.

It's spring, you know, here at least in the Northern Hemisphere. And I was reflecting on what to talk about tonight because the last couple of months of teachings really had to do with politics and wise society and how we respond to all the craziness happening around us. It felt important to complement that with a teaching on joy—and what the Dalai Lama calls having a positive attitude.

Joy is different than hope. It's a deeper knowing and a bigger thing than pleasure or happiness. In fact, it's one of the essential factors or qualities of enlightenment—necessary for enlightenment and an expression of enlightenment. Joy as a factor, a necessity for enlightenment. How's that?

And it's so fitting in the spring. I think of the great poet Pablo Neruda's line: "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." There's something that wants to renew itself and bring beauty into the world no matter what crazy human beings—us—do.

Now a question, of course, is how can we have joy in these times? When we've defunded USAID and there will be hundreds or thousands or millions of people, many children, who won't have medicine for malaria or HIV. When we've defunded education and scientific research. When I read that the National Park Service took down the webpage about the Underground Railroad and Harriet Tubman, took her picture off, and simply said something like "the Underground Railroad is one of the most significant expressions of the American civil rights movement"—taking about a whole page describing leading people out of slavery and that entire transformation, all gone, as if it didn't happen. But of course it did.

So how do we have joy when there's chaos, disruption, suffering in so many ways?

What I've seen in going into refugee camps is that they don't really want you to be depressed. They have enough of that on their own. They're not looking for people to come in frightened and worried and depressed, but actually to come in with an uplift, with possibility and joy.

I think about my dear friend Wavy Gravy, the cosmic clown, who half a century ago at Woodstock, after a rainy night following a lot of the great rock bands, got up on stage early in the morning and said—in the mud of it all—"What I'm envisioning is breakfast in bed for 450,000 people." And their tents began to pass out food to as many people as they possibly could.

Wavy Gravy, as a clown wearing his red nose and his big clown suit and shoes, spent a lot of time going into children's hospitals. He specialized in going into burn units—if you can picture children who've been badly burned. And he would go in and, as he said, "I would lead with bubbles. Before I even went into the room, I would blow the bubbles and start to laugh. And I'd get the attention of the children who'd been suffering so much. And then I'd hit them with jokes and playful things."

We need each other. We really need to remind each other, as we did in that meditation at the end with joy, that there's something immense that we're a part of. And that suffering is not the end of the story—it's the beginning of the Four Noble Truths. We don't have to be so loyal to our suffering.

I went out for demonstrations on Saturday in Marin. There were 6,000 people. In San Francisco there were tens of thousands. And the feeling was so warm-hearted and joyful and peaceful at the same time. There were, of course, amazing creative signs, things like: "It's so bad, even introverts are here." Or "I'm not a sign carrier, but holy fuck." Or "History teacher against bad history." Or "I didn't grow up saying liberty and justice for all every damn day to accept anything less." "Jesus would be deported" was one of the signs.

And I've been giving out red cards—in Spanish and English, or in Tagalog and English, different languages—for those who are undocumented, as a kind of protection. You can order them online. I've gotten some thousands of them. They explain your civil rights: "I do not wish to speak with you or answer any questions or hand you any documents based on my Fifth Amendment rights in the Constitution. I do not give you permission to enter my house based on my Fourth Amendment rights under the Constitution unless you have a signed warrant with my name on it. I do not give you permission to search any of my belongings."

I choose to enjoy and exercise my constitutional rights. These cards serve as a kind of protection.

So here we're talking about some of the difficulties that are happening. And then you have Howard Zinn, the great historian, who says to be hopeful in bad times is not just foolishly romantic. It's based on the fact that human history is a history not only of cruelty, but also of compassion, sacrifice, courage, kindness. What we choose to emphasize in this complex history will determine our lives. If we see only the worst, it destroys our capacity to do something of benefit. But if we remember the times and the places—and there are so many—where people have behaved magnificently, this gives us the energy to act and the possibility of sending the spinning top of a world in a positive direction.

So is joy okay? As I again quoted from Wendell Berry, our great farmer poet: be joyful though you have considered all the facts. And I love looking at the Book of Joy with the Dalai Lama and Desmond Tutu. There they are in their conversation, these old friends meeting together. They said, "We laugh more easily and we cry more easily and we connect more deeply." When they got together with all the cameras there, Tutu said, "It is so joyful to see you," but then added to the Dalai Lama, "Hey, remember the cameras are on—we have to act like holy men." And they both broke into gales of laughter. Then Tutu started teasing the Dalai Lama: "All these people come to see you. You get more people than me. They come to see you and you can't even speak English properly. What's the story?" And they tease each other.

But in the end, their message is to say: do not let the heart be colonized by fear, by hate, by confusion. All that's happened to the people of Tibet, in apartheid in South Africa—they had enormous suffering. "Why should I let them take my happiness?" says the Dalai Lama. "Why should I let them take over my heart?"

I love that image I carry of Vendran Smailovich, who played his cello in the bombed-out National Library of Sarajevo. During the war, when Sarajevo was besieged, wherever there had been mortar and bombing, the next morning he would put on his tux from his time in the National Symphony, bring his cello, and play music so that people would not give up hope.

Part of this is that we catch joy from one another. We can bless each other. We can heal each other from our hearts. Joy—Rumi tells us—do not sit long with sadness, my friends. When you go into the garden, do you look at thorns or flowers? Spend more time with roses and jasmine. And on Rumi's tomb it's written: "Ours is not a caravan of despair. Welcome, lover of life, wanderer, worshiper. Even if we have broken our vows, ours is not a caravan of despair." Something bigger.

And this is really what joy is. It is the joy of life renewing itself, even though it takes a long time and wanders through some pretty dark places. You remember this passage from the Dhammapada: "Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate." Here's the Buddha giving you mainline Dharma. "Live in joy, in health, even among the afflicted. Live in joy, in peace, even among the troubled. Look within, be still, free from fears and attachments. Know the sweet joy of living in the way."

Joy is a radical understanding of our human spirit and possibility amidst it all. I think of my teachers—Ajahn Chah, whose forest monastery was in the province next to Cambodia and Laos where the wars were happening and the bombers and fighter jets flew overhead. I think of Maha Ghosananda going back to Cambodia after the enormous genocide and loss. I think of the Dalai Lama after fifty, sixty years, unable to return to Tibet, watching the destruction of the culture. And they're some of the most joyful people I ever met. Loving, present, joyful. It's a radical thing.

Yes. There's guilt, there's doubt, there's unworthiness.

There's fear that maybe if you're joyful or loving, somehow there's not enough goodness to go around. Or in some ways we've learned to be loyal to our suffering. We all have a certain measure of suffering that's given to us—cosmically, if you will—by human incarnation. And we're called upon to meet it with compassion and a loving heart and joy.

You know the great poem that I read so often from, called "A Brief for the Defense" by Jack Gilbert. I won't read the whole long poem, but these lines: "If we deny our happiness, resist our satisfaction, we lessen the importance of those living in deprivation. We must risk delight—not pleasure seeking, but deep delight. We must have the stubbornness to accept our gladness in the ruthless furnace of this world. To make injustice the only measure of our attention is to praise the devil." In defense of joy.

So there are joy meditations. And spontaneously in deep meditation practice, when the mind gets very still and concentrated, light begins to arise. In the texts, there are twenty-five kinds of joy: bliss and thrilling joy, and cool joy where the body feels like a vastness of silent coolness, and joy of illuminated colors, rainbow joy—so many kinds of joy.

I remember when I was a new monk at Ajahn Chah's monastery, learning to meditate. I was practicing walking meditation. I'd been there for maybe a month or two, trying to find my breath and concentrate with my crazy mind, learning how to go out on alms round with my bowl and not drop my robes in the middle of the street—which happened to me once. Just trying to be a good person, a good young monk.

I set a candle by two trees in the forest next to my hut, a candle by each tree. There was a little walking path that I'd swept on the forest floor. I was walking slowly and mindfully, really concentrating. And then all of a sudden, I felt my body grow taller and taller, like I had taken a bite out of Alice's mushroom in Wonderland. My head was up in the limbs of the trees and I was filled with this lightness and joy. I paused and said, "Wow, this stuff really works." It was the first experience of that kind of meditative bliss. Of course it didn't last, but it gave me something to realize—okay, you're on the right path.

Now, having a joyful heart is not about not caring, but something bigger. When you read the history of the years of the Buddhist teachings, there was injustice. There was a tremendously oppressive caste system, which the Buddha stood up against. There were people being enslaved. There were lots of wars, and he did what he could to help stop some of those wars. But that wasn't his main thing. His main thing was, as Ajahn Chah would say, to teach people to step out of the battle, to find in their hearts and their consciousness an embracing of life that's steady and loving and peaceful and joyful.

I once asked Thich Nhat Hanh why he taught so much about sitting and smiling, because sometimes he seemed kind of sad to me, and I said that to him. He said, "That's why I teach smiling." He said, "I've seen so much suffering. People killed." In his school in Vietnam, all these young people came to the school he created for peacemaking, and it was attacked by both the North and the South Vietnamese. Young people he brought together who were killed, bombed, shot. So he said, "I've carried so much grief and suffering. I have to smile. I've had to find joy." And you become, even in spite of the suffering of the world, you become a lamp—as he was.

Gandhi put it this way. He said, "I believe in the unity of all things. And therefore I believe that if one person gains, the whole world gains. And if one person falls, the whole world falls to that extent." Thich Nhat Hanh was one of those who gained and passed it along. But it's each of us—we become a make-weight.

I think of that photo I had on my refrigerator for many years, of the line of tanks in Beijing around the Tiananmen Square time. That Chinese man—you all know that photo—standing in front of the line of tanks with two shopping bags of groceries, just gazing at them. And them unable to move further because of his presence, his courage, his dignity to stand there and say no.

So when I speak of make-weight, it means in the old days—still now when you go to many markets and you buy rice or mangoes or asparagus, whatever the vegetable—there are the two pans. They put the goods you want in one and then the weights, half a kilo or a quarter of a kilo, and they come close to balancing. And then there's this little line of tiny weights.

Sometimes they're in the form of little animals, little turtles or little birds or something. And they put a couple of make-weights in, and finally the scales balance. It doesn't take much, these make-weights. And yet the whole scale can tip—just like that man in Beijing with his shopping bags, stopping the entire roadway filled with oncoming tanks.

Doesn't always happen quite that way. In war and in difficult times, sometimes that doesn't work, and it's too dangerous. But if there's a shred of morality, a shred of decency, it's an extraordinary thing. Non-violent standing up has an incredible power.

So there's a kind of inner courage that you have as a human being that no one can take from you. That child of the spirit, the original wonder and innocence, amazement, and that care and courage—because you know what's right. You absolutely know it.

Pause for a moment. I'd like you to reflect: What is it that brings joy, even in difficult times? And what is it that brings you joy? You can think about it—walking in the woods, time with people you love.

Here are some of the Dharma teachings that point to a deep level of joy. One of the things that brings joy is our integrity. From one of the Buddhist texts:

Others will be cruel. We shall be kind. Thus shall we incline the heart. Others will be greedy. We shall be generous. Thus shall we incline the heart. Others will speak falsehood. We shall speak truthfully. Thus shall we incline the heart.

Not very complicated. Reflect on it. We know this. Integrity.

I love this story from the Christian Desert Fathers, translated by Thomas Merton. The holy Abbot Anastasios had a very fine Bible on refined parchment with a jeweled cover. Once a certain brother came to visit, and seeing the book, made off with it. That day, when the abbot realized the brother had taken it, though he was sad, he didn't send after him for fear that the brother might add perjury to the theft.

Well, this brother went down into the town in order to sell the book. He asked sixteen gold pieces from the buyer of antiques, who said, "Give me the book that I may find out whether it's worth that much." With that, the buyer took the book up into the desert to Anastasios and said, "Father, take a look at this book and tell me, is it worth sixteen gold pieces? Should I buy it?" And the abbot said, "Yes, it's a fine book, worth at least that much."

So the buyer went back to the brother and said, "Here's your money. I showed the book to Abbot Anastasios, and he said it's a fine book, worth at least sixteen gold coins." And the brother replied, "Was that all he said? Did he make any other remarks?" "No," said the buyer. "Well," said the brother, "I've changed my mind and don't want to sell the book after all."

He hastened back to the monastery and begged the abbot with tears to take back the book. But the abbot wouldn't accept it, saying, "Go in peace, brother. I make a present of it for you." But the brother said, "If you do not take it back, I shall never have any peace. For I found here what I was looking for." And he joined that community around Abbot Anastasios and lived there for the rest of his life.

It's your integrity, unshakable integrity, that brings joy of heart. Think of the situations in your life where it really matters.

And how you get boosted up and strengthened.

It's also generosity—taking time and love and care, serving, being there for others. We get happy when we can give. If we can't give, it's a really impoverished life, because we are knitted together. And the heart knows this. Our joy comes when we find our ways to give.

Father Daniel Berrigan, an activist and of course a spiritual leader, said: "Sometime in life, hope that you might see the look on the face of a starving man when the bread finally arrives. Hope that you might have baked it or bought it or even needed it yourself. For that look on his face, where you're meeting his eyes across that piece of bread—you might be willing to lose a lot, or suffer a lot, or die a little." But that is what brings joy. Generosity, offering, serving makes the heart grow open. We know it and we can do it, especially in these times.

Integrity, generosity—what else brings joy in our life? Gratitude. There's a beautiful website for Brother David Steindl-Rast, all these teachings on gratitude. Gratitude of seeing the beauty of life itself so much.

You know, after the Buddha's enlightenment, as the stories are told, and they are told often, one of the first things he did was to move a distance away from the Bodhi tree and sit for seven days and gaze at it in gratitude for sheltering him. Garden and nature feel the gratitude of the trees that are breathing oxygen, taking your carbon dioxide and feeding you, working for you, loving you, all around you. They're loving life by transforming carbon dioxide into oxygen. Look at the things in your life that you have. Look at the relationships. Look at the mystery around you. How can you not feel gratitude?

One of my favorite books, and I've been rereading it lately, is Father Greg Boyle's Tattoos on the Heart. If you haven't read it, it's an astonishing book of stories of Homeboy Industries and who he's worked with over the years and all the suffering in the community—how many young people were thrown in prison, how many were shot, the gang wars. And Homeboys in the middle of them showed another possibility: come join us, step out of the gang, come back when you're out of prison, we'll get you a place in the community.

One of the stories he writes about is an eighteen or nineteen-year-old young man named Spider, who he said was raised in the village there with his sister, abandoned by his parents. And somehow they managed to get enough food and eat somehow. And then he came to Homeboy Industries. He'd been part of a gang and they were shooting at one another. And he said, "I can't do this anymore. I want a family." He had this girlfriend, they got married. He came to Homeboys, and Father Greg helped secure him a job as a hospital orderly moving patients and equipment. And he felt so proud of himself. They moved into a little apartment and they had two small boys.

So Father Greg was driving and he saw Spider out on the street, not so far away. And he said, "Here, I'll give you a ride home." And they talked for a while about his life, and he was thanking Father Greg for helping him get the job. "How's it going?" And he says, "I'm okay." He said, "You know what I'm going to do when I get home right now? I'm going to sit down to eat with my lady and my two boys. And well, I don't eat. I just watch them eat. My lady, she gets crazy with me, but I don't care. I just watch them eat. They eat and eat. And I just look at them and thank God they're in my life. And when they're done eating and I know they're full, then I eat." And the truth, sometimes there's food left and sometimes there isn't. And he smiled and he says, "You understand. It's a father thing."

Gratitude—you can feel the tenderness in this, just to be able to watch his boys eat and feel that he could care for them.

What else brings joy?

Trust.

The moral arc of the universe may be long, said Dr. King, but it bends toward justice. Trust means a long view. "Enlightenment," says one of the great patriarchs, one of the founders and ancestors, "enlightenment is one with a trusting heart." To be without anxiety about non-perfection.

And even as things get taken apart around us, even with concerns about widespread suffering, there is another image that's important to keep in mind, and that is the imaginal cells.

When a caterpillar spins a cocoon and goes inside, we usually think—I certainly did as a kid—that it's in there and then it grows its wings and comes out and sprouts as a butterfly, which looks like it has a little caterpillar in the middle and these huge wings. But that's not how it happens at all.

Inside the chrysalis, there's this extraordinary dissolving in which that caterpillar becomes a mass of fluids and cells, completely unorganized. And then among those cells, as it divides and dissolves, there's a handful of cells that scientists call the imaginal cells. They're the cells that know that they can fly, that know within them and within the brother and sister cells there is the possibility of creating this amazing being of a butterfly. And they start to organize all the other cells, sometimes apparently with some resistance from the other cells, as the scientists watch. And the imaginal cells build the butterfly.

Trust. Trust that it's possible, and not only that it's possible, but that in your heart, you can make a difference.

"Tell me the weight of a snowflake," a tiny mouse once asked a wild dove.

"Nothing more than nothing," came the answer.

"In that case, I must tell you a marvelous story," the mouse said. "I sat on the branch of a fir tree close to its trunk when it began to snow. Not a blizzard, no, just like in a dream, without a wound, without any violence. And without anything better to do, I counted the snowflakes settling on the twigs. When the number was exactly 3,741,952—when at that moment the 3,741,953rd snowflake dropped onto the branch, nothing, as you say, nothing like nothing—the branch broke off."

And having said that, the mouse went away. And the dove, an authority on this since the time of Noah, thought about this to herself and said, "Perhaps there's only one person's voice lacking for peace to come into this world."

Trust that you make a difference and that each one of us makes a difference.

And then mindful presence brings joy. The awakened heart, knowing that we can hold all the things of this world in awareness, in mindfulness, and in love. To become fearless, to turn toward that which is difficult with a vast and open loving awareness.

And we help each other. That's why sangha, community, is one of the great refuges, one of the three refuges—our connection with each other. We need to remind each other that we're in this together, that we can awaken together, that we can support the beautiful heart and mind and the beautiful world that we can be. It is here and it's in us as part of our own imaginal selves.

Some years ago, on a sunny Sunday afternoon in Seattle, a young mother stopped to talk with a local priest. Her five-year-old daughter, Carmen, had a new jump rope and began to demonstrate the intricacies of the jumping rope. While at first she began to jump and the priest and the mother clapped for her skill, the priest said, "Let me show you." He gave her a little more instruction and she became able to jump quite well on her own. With all the new skills, she went off with her rope quite happily.

The mother and this young priest chatted for a few minutes until Carmen, with the saddest eyes, returned dragging her rope. "Mommy," she lamented, "I can do it, but I need lots of clapping."

Here we are in our meditation where we started—remembering your best adventure as a child, the child of the spirit, feeling the loving connection that we all long for and how much we uplift each other.

And then there's the mystery along with this amazing connection. The mystery that life exists. Where did it come from? How did we appear? You think you have to fix it and make it your way. But there's something so much bigger that breathes us, that brings life into being. Consciousness arising.

A poem from Malachi Moran:

I tried to explain to the flowers on the banks of the river that they honestly had chosen an awful time to sprout. I detailed all the nuance of international tariffs and suggested they wait a bit to see how things shake out. They swayed with polite attention as I outlined my position.

on the effects of the weakened dollar and the day's stock market rout—but I do not think they listened, as they lifted their heads defiantly, and their azure petals did not display any doubts as they stood up.

You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring. They come again.

It's a kind of fearless joy. It's the joy I saw in Maha Ghosananda in the refugee camps. It's Molly Ivins, the great activist, saying: "So keep fighting for freedom and justice, beloved, but don't forget to have fun doing it. Be outrageous, rejoice in all the oddities of humanity and freedom, and celebrate the sheer joy of a good fight. And when you get done, be sure to tell those who come after how much fun it was to fight for what really matters—to stand up for it."

The world is a holy place, and you get to live in it and love it and celebrate it.

And one of the really remarkable poems of our modern history, Allen Ginsberg's Howl, ends with a footnote or coda that begins: "Holy, holy, holy, holy—the world is holy, the soul is holy, the skin, the nose..."

And he goes on: "Holy the solitude of the skyscrapers and the pavements. Holy the cafeterias filled with the millions. Holy the mysterious river of tears under the streets. Holy the vast lamb of the middle class. Holy the crazy shepherds of rebellion. Holy New York and San Francisco. Holy Peoria and Seattle. Holy Paris and Tangiers. Holy Moscow and Istanbul. Holy time in eternity. Holy the clocks in space. Holy the fourth dimension. Holy the sea. Holy the desert. Holy the railroad, the locomotive. Holy the visions. Holy the hallucinations. Holy the miracles. Holy the eyeballs. Holy the abyss. Holy forgiveness. Mercy. Charity. Faith. Holy our bodies. Our suffering. Holy magnanimity. Holy the supernatural, extra brilliant, intelligent kindness of the soul."

We sit. We quiet the mind. We tend the heart. We see as a Buddha on this amazing, astonishing planet. We see with the eyes of tenderness and wisdom and compassion. And we bring our joy, our love to this world, which so needs it.

Reflect for a moment on what it's like when you meet someone wise, strong, who brings joy into this world. And reflect now on what it's like when you are that being—on those days and times when you carry a joyful spirit amidst it all.

What a gift.

Nancy, hello.

Hello.

I had this book in my purse today.

Oh, you do? Have you read it?

I read it a couple of years ago, and I had it in my purse to reread it.

It's worth rereading.

It is. And one of the things—I had mentioned a couple of times ago with you that I had just been to Homeboy, and I had Cherished Belongings, his latest book. And I know that one of the things he says is that the two principles of Homeboy are: we are all unshakably good, no exceptions, and we are all connected to each other, no exceptions.

And I guess my question is, when you read from the Dhammapada about "others may be greedy, but we can be generous," something along those lines—I feel like if we keep saying that others can be greedy and others can be this or that, maybe we're not quite understanding the pain that the others have to be that way. Which is something that Father Boyle just points out so well.

Yes, he's remarkable and honestly kind of saintly consciousness. And he does point out that underneath all the rest of it is really pain and suffering. And so there's a huge compassion in it, which is what I see with people like the Dalai Lama or Maha Ghosananda too. And they might name it. The Dalai Lama said the Chinese are his favorite enemy. He doesn't say they're his favorite buddies and friends. He even uses that word enemy, but he talks about it because they are in a way in that role.

So you make a beautiful point about how we see one another. And even in that text, maybe it should say: when we see others being greedy or fearful or dishonest, we can remember—because this is a translation—that we can be honest, we can be generous...

And compassionate for them.

And compassionate for them. Yeah. Does that work for you?

Yeah, it does. And I was just listening to one of your videos, and you said the exact same thing, I believe. I even wrote it down. I believe there are no evil people—that evil people are carrying... I don't remember your exact words, but are carrying a burden of hurt.

Yes.

And abuse, the family abuse, goes from generation to generation.

So let's just pause a second because I'm so appreciating what you're pointing to, Nancy. And it's really deep. And I love you correcting the Buddhist text too. Thank you. That's chutzpah. I really appreciate it.

I want to pause and I want you to just quiet—and people who are listening—and feel what it's like in yourself to see, in the eyes of Father Greg, who sees a tremendous amount of suffering and violence, people shooting at one another around him and killing and dying, and what it means to see with the eyes of compassion, to see that we're all in it together, as you point to, that we're all connected, and in the end, we're all good.

You're pointing us to this: that we might live this. What an extraordinary consciousness you invite. How does it feel?

Yeah. It's very moving, isn't it?

It's very moving.

Well, thank you. Thank you for the teachings.

And I'll correct the text as necessary.

You know, one of the things that I keep thinking is: if punishment really worked, we wouldn't be punishing people anymore.

Well put. Yes, it's love alone that heals in the end. And understanding—understanding the pain that people go through.

A new participant joins the conversation.

So the first thing I wanted to point out is that there is a force greater than love or hate or jealousy or anger. And that is the deep, deep desire we all have to edit the texts. I'd rather edit than eat.

Laughter. Well, there have been thousands of years of people editing the texts, so you have a long tradition behind you.

The other thing was in relation to the woman who was speaking just before me, and to a broader view. A few years ago, the Dalai Lama spoke at the Hollywood Bowl in Los Angeles and took questions. I only heard this on tape—I was not present. One of the questioners was an LAPD police officer and a practicing Buddhist who said he had constant difficulty because he had to deal with people doing horrible things. Sometimes he had to act forcefully to make them stop. And the Dalai Lama's answer was, "Think of the good that you are doing—stopping them from further ruining their karma. You give them the chance to be reborn."

I don't know if that exactly says anything to anybody, but when I'm faced with my own anger and hatred and resentment towards situations and the people that cause them, I remember that. Okay, we don't try to make them disappear—we try to contain them so they have the opportunity to reflect and perhaps change.

This is a compassionate reflection that is adjacent to, related to, what Nancy just talked about—seeing the suffering and then responding with compassion rather than with our own hatred. How do we contain the harm and then hopefully make the possibility of something good come out of it eventually?

These are the hardest situations. Somebody asked the Dalai Lama at one point—one of those typical moral quandaries—"You're there and there is a person with a gun who's going to shoot a lot of people. You could stop them by shooting them. Would you do it? Should you do it?"

The Dalai Lama said, "Maybe it's the right thing. I couldn't do it." It's very interesting. He just said, "I couldn't take a life. And maybe it's the right thing." That's part of our human dilemma. Solzhenitsyn said the line dividing good and evil exists in every human heart. How do we find our way through this with compassion?

Who knows? There's no set answer. I remember Joan Baez responding to someone who said, "Well, what would you do if this happened, then that happened?" And she said, "I only respond to realities."

and not to made up examples of what might happen. It's impossible to know what you'd do given extreme circumstances. For me, hopefully I wouldn't take the life either.

Here we are with some of the big human questions. How do we hold suffering? How do we hold those who are causing suffering? How do we find compassion for the pain underneath it all? What Allen Ginsberg called "the mysterious river of tears underneath the streets."

Someone is asking if I could share the website about gratitude. The website is from Brother David Steindl-Rast. It's a whole beautiful training on gratitude that he has offered. I think he's like ninety-eight or ninety-nine years old and still out there offering these gorgeous teachings of a grateful life. For him, for Brother David, who's an old friend, the practice of gratitude is the central spiritual practice—to say thank you, thank you for it all, even the difficulties. Those are the ones that make the heart grow deeper and more compassionate.

One participant shared: "I just wanted to say what brings me joy is babies. Even just looking at a picture of a baby, it can soften the heart so easily. Saturday, after a lot of contemplation—my husband is not in town, and it was a big undertaking for me—I finally decided for the first time in my life I would stand up and go stand in the protest.

"Going to the protest wasn't such an easy decision, I realized. And I looked at the fear and how much fear there is that I never, ever had to experience before. It just really made me feel very humble and recognize how much suffering there is on both sides. It is all coming from fear. I just got up in the morning and I said, okay, what is the worst that is going to happen? Am I going to get arrested? Okay, let's go see what this feels like. Made a copy of my passport, put it in my pocket, picked up a friend who was also brown, and we went to whatever was happening in our town.

"Looking at all the people that were there—really, really elderly people showed up in their wheelchairs. It was just impossible not to have compassion. I don't even recognize what moment I forgot about fear. There was just so much joy to see all the people around. I didn't see myself as anybody different. I didn't see the fear of the non-white person that everybody describes in these days. I was just able to stand there, smile at everyone, look at everybody's banners, just connect—really, truly, without even trying, connect. And that was very joyful. It doesn't need to be that we are standing and screaming. It can be just standing there and smiling. So it was just really good."

You are spreading the joy. Even as you speak, I start to smile, and I imagine others who are here online, listening and witnessing. And it's so interesting for you to say that you had a lot of fear, which is understandable. You could get arrested, you could get thrown in jail or prison.

So let me know. But something happened where that fear became much smaller than the joy and that connection.

Close your eyes for a second and just let yourself feel the joy and the strength that came from seeing all these people together, and how you and they were carrying this beautiful quality. It wasn't fearful at all. In fact, it was a kind of triumph. You could really feel yourself part of it, all that you're describing so beautifully. And now you know it's there in you, so you can use it anytime. What does it want you to remember?

Remember that we are all one. Forget the separation.

Yes. The little kids and the ones in the wheelchairs and the ones in the middle, all together.

I also recently got to hold a baby that was born prematurely and finally came home. This little bud was like a loaf of bread—four and a half pounds, this little boy, very handsome. And it was so cool. It was just like, oh wow. Such an amazing thing. All of us, we were all those babies. You and me, we used to be one of those little ones.

Beautiful. Thank you, Padma. This is beautiful, what you shared.

Hi, Jack. You spoke about what brings joy, and one of the things I realized is that part of it is your expectation. When I was growing up, I was always told that when you get married, you have a honeymoon phase and then you're living real life. I always felt that was backwards. I thought, wait a minute—if I have a long marriage, I could get to know that person. I could find things that they don't even know exist and I don't know yet. Perfection wasn't in the imagination. But I realized that the more you have that closeness, that connection to somebody else—that trust, that integrity you talked about—that is such a joyful thing, something to be so grateful for.

As I've gotten much older, not only do I find this to be true, but I find it in so many relationships. The more I get to know people, the more I understand where their fears are coming from, where their anger is coming from. Perfection is not on the agenda. The idea is to find out who that person could be and would be if only they—who they want to be.

And as we're going through all of these things now, because of the people I've begun to see that way, I have great faith that we will not allow what is happening to continue, that we will not settle for less than the goodness I see in so many people. It doesn't mean I'm not angry. It doesn't mean I don't get scared or disappointed. But there's something there that is so much greater than what's happening right now.

When people think it's romantic to imagine perfection, I don't think that's it at all. I think what's real is that when a person is unhappy, you can be the thing they trust. When they're happy, you can be the thing that makes them even happier, and vice versa. There are so many things in this world to be joyful about. Like Padma said—a child, or being in a group where you suddenly realize you're part of something.

I don't think that's going to be destroyed. I don't think it can be destroyed, because I think that's the stronger thing. It's almost pure energy. What we're looking at now, the destructive part—it's not pure, it's all mixed up and not in the right place. I really believe that as a group, we will not only triumph but bring people along with us who've fallen into this, and they'll be part of it too. Because it's what you said: when you bring something to somebody and open it up to them, often you see in their response the joy they get just knowing it exists and that they could be part of it.

This is just a long way to say I think the more we know and the deeper we go, the stronger we are. There may be things to be afraid of, but I don't think it's our own goodness that we should ignore.

I'm just sitting with you.

The depth of our goodness.

And the point is not to perfect anything except maybe to perfect our love. To be present. And the closeness you described in relationship, how in some ways we get to know the unfolding of another being. What a mysterious invitation that is.

Well, you've said so many beautiful things. It feels like in some way a great place for us to end the evening. There was Nancy teaching us about compassion behind everything from Father Greg and her understanding. There was Jeff speaking about not editing—enjoying editing the text, yes, but something much deeper than that, really, of connection and the good that you do for one another. And Padma going way beyond her fear to realize that there was a joy in her heart saying we're all one. And now you. These are all such beautiful teachings. I thank you all who offered them.

So sweet to listen, to feel, to sense the genuineness and the shared wisdom and the shared compassion.

So maybe let yourself look at all the little squares on the screen for a moment. You could even unmute if you feel like it and just offer your blessings. Send joy and well-being to the hearts of everyone you see on the screen, all these beings in so many forms.

Thank you, Helga, for the "we shall overcome" sign.

All right. Take care. We're in this together, baby. Let's make something beautiful out of it all.

See you later.

CHAPTER 55

Monday Night Dharma Talk: Stories as Medicine

Jack Kornfield · 1h12

> In this warm and engaging talk, Jack Kornfield returns from a journey to India where he met with the Dalai Lama at a Mind and Life Institute gathering focused on AI and consciousness. The Dalai Lama's insight that compassion requires the capacity to feel pain sets the stage for an evening of storytelling as spiritual medicine.
> Kornfield shares tales from his new book, weaving together ancient wisdom and contemporary experiences. He recounts the transformative power of being truly seen—from Ram Dass's encounter with his guru's 'glance of mercy' to a middle school teacher's profound connection with a difficult student. Through the charming George and Martha story, he illustrates how friends must speak truth with kindness, while the tale of Lieutenant Colonel Hughes in Najaf demonstrates how a gesture of respect can defuse conflict.
> The talk explores intention as the root of karma, offering practical guidance for navigating conflict by pausing to ask 'What is my heart's best intention?' Kornfield addresses the struggles many face—existential angst, anger, the desire for revenge—with compassionate presence and the reminder that we can hold our vulnerability with mettā. Drawing on Thich Nhat Hanh's teaching about the leaf returning to nourish the tree, he invites listeners into the mystery of existence, encouraging us to rest in the great heart of loving-kindness as both personal practice and gift to the world.

So, you online people and campers here, I just got back to California not that many days ago. Trudy and I went to India and we went to Dharamsala for a Mind and Life Institute meeting with the Dalai Lama and a number of lamas and contemplatives and a bunch of scientists focusing on AI.

The Dalai Lama was not really teaching much now at ninety, but he did blessings, and I got to have a little conversation with him, which was wonderful. Somebody asked him, "Do you think AI can feel compassion?" And he reflected and said, "Can it feel pain?" You know, he's got this great kind of mind to turn things around. The technologist building it said, "I don't think so." And then the Dalai Lama said, "Well, if it can't feel pain, it won't feel compassion."

That's a really interesting thing—that actually, in order to have compassion, we have to be able to feel. We are in relationship. This is like two different kinds of minds, the silicon mind and the human mind. How many of you spend a fair amount of time engaged with your computers, your phone, television, electronic media? For most of us, it's a big chunk of our time. So our lives are woven together. Part of the question at the conference was: how do we have a wise relationship to it in ourselves? And then also, how do we steer it so that it actually is beneficial for humanity?

After Dharamsala, we went to Varanasi, which is perhaps the oldest existing city in the world, on the banks of the Ganges. We stayed right on the river, and there are the ghats, the docks. There's the bathing ghat where people come down to bathe in the holy Ganges. There's the laundry ghat where sheets that people have been washing are laid out on all the steps. There's the cow ghat where the cows are tied up. And there's the burning ghat, which is amazing, because especially when you go at night, it feels like you're entering Dante's lower realms. There are always fires burning and bodies there.

About every twenty minutes, through the day and through the night, people will be carrying a bamboo stretcher with a body wrapped in silk, chanting, "Ram Nam Satya He"—the only truth is the truth of God. Then they deliver it, put it on a pyre with wood. So there are always bodies burning there. They carry them through the streets.

You might think it's gruesome or weird. But there you are, and you notice, if you pay attention, that there are beggars in Varanasi, especially along the river in the old ancient part of the city. Tied in the corner of their shawl are enough coins to pay for the wood, for the fire, for their cremation. You might look at them with a lot of pity—oh, what a struggle your life is, there you are a beggar. And they look back at you and they go, "You don't get it. I'm in Varanasi." Varanasi is the portal to the realm of liberation, to the awakened, liberated space of life and heart. Anyone who's cremated in Varanasi is saved in the deepest way. They look and say, "You think I'm in trouble? How about you, baby?"

It just melds your mind in these different directions, which is really good because we're all in it together, basically.

So anyway, we had this trip to India and other places. And then I came back and this book came out. It's a lot of my favorite stories, some long, some short. I'm basically a storyteller. I love telling stories. Some of them you'll have heard—they're repeats. I don't mind repeating a story. It's like kids saying, "Read that one again," right? These are not the kind of stories where you say, "Oh, read the next one." You can do that, but you can also read that one again.

For me, stories are a medicine. That's really what's in this book—stories for healing, stories of medicine, stories of awakening, stories of community. We need them. Some have a little humor, or are poignant.

There's the story of a little boy who goes out with his parents. He's seven years old, and they go to a restaurant to have dinner. The waitress comes to take their order and says, "What will you have, little boy?" He says, "I'd like a hot dog and a Coke." His mother says, "He'll have the meatloaf, mashed potatoes, and milk." The waitress goes around and takes the rest of the orders. As she's leaving the table, she turns back to that little boy and says, "Do you want ketchup or mustard on your hot dog?"

And this big grin spreads across his face and he says, "She thinks I'm real."

There's something both poignant and humorous in that story.

I was teaching up here at some point with a Tibetan Lama, and I was cracking jokes or whatever. And he said, "I get it. You get them to laugh, and then when their mouths are open, you can pop the pill of wisdom in." I thought, well, that's a kind of nice interpretation of it. But there's something else in it too.

Ram Dass talked about how his life was transformed when he met his guru. He tells the same story over and over again. He went there thinking, "Oh my God, another Indian guru." And he meets the guru, and the guru starts messing with him. "That's a really nice car, the Land Rover you drove up here. That'd be great for the guru. Would you maybe think about giving that?" And Ram Dass says, "Oh my God, what a huckster, this guy."

They sit and they talk a little bit, and they get quiet. Then the guru says, "Come close." And he says—being translated from Hindi into English—"Last night under the stars, your mother. You were thinking about her." Ram Dass says, "Well, that's not such a magic thing. You think about your mother." And the guru said, "Big belly, right?" Ram Dass goes, "Hmm." And then his guru says in English, which he doesn't speak, "Spleen."

Spleen, and Ram Dass's mind just kind of breaks open. He said, "Wait a second. Did the CIA come and tell him about my life? How could he know that I was thinking about my mother who died this year of cancer, of the spleen?"

And so when his guru was training him and looked at him—there's a phrase in India called the glance of mercy, where your guru or this person looks at you, and as Ram Dass said, they can see into your soul. And they love you anyway. Like, how could that be? Really, they see how weird you are in every part, and they can say you're completely worthy of love. And it changes you. It kind of changes your DNA.

So that's one of his favorite stories. And what it does is it invites us to imagine what it would be like to be seen in that way, or maybe to see ourselves in that way.

Somebody gave me recently—I was in Hawaii actually, and I met up with these old friends and they said, "Do you remember? More than fifty years ago..." And I had this book. Some of you may know the book of Frog and Toad. Those are great children's stories. But this is a book of George and Martha, who are hippopotami, by James Marshall. I don't even know if it's still in print. I love these images. Five stories about two great friends.

Here's story number one. It's not going to take that long to read.

Martha was very fond of making split pea soup. Sometimes she made it all day long—pots and pots of split pea soup. Here she is in her skirt or apron in the kitchen. If there was one thing that George was not fond of, it was split pea soup. He's frowning. George hated split pea soup. You can hear a kid smiling, of course. "Ew, I hate..." He hated it more than anything else in the world. This is the way a child thinks, right? But it was so hard to tell Martha.

One day after George had eaten ten bowls of Martha's soup, he said to himself, "I just can't stand another bowl. Not even another spoonful." So while Martha was in the kitchen, George carefully poured the rest of his soup into his loafers under the table. "Now she will think I have eaten it."

But Martha was watching from the kitchen.

So there's this picture of his shoes getting filled with split pea soup. Last page.

"How do you expect to walk home with your loafers full of split pea soup?" she asked George.

"Oh dear," said George. "You saw me."

"And why didn't you tell me that you hate my split pea soup?"

"I didn't want to hurt your feelings," said George.

"That's silly," said Martha. "Friends should always tell each other the truth. As a matter of fact, I don't like split pea soup very much myself. I just like to make it. From now on, you'll never have to eat that awful soup again."

"What a relief," George sighed.

"Would you like some chocolate chip cookies instead?" asked Martha.

"Oh, that would be lovely," said George.

"Then you shall have them." And she placed a plate of chocolate chip cookies on the table.

It's just four pages—very, very short. But stories tell us things. And yes, it's for little kids, but it speaks to the way we hide things from one another. What does it mean to actually connect with each other in a more genuine way, in a kind way?

What I hoped from this book is that these are stories that touch the heart—that you read and think, "Oh yes."

Let me share another story. Many of you have heard it before.

This is the story of a middle school teacher in her first year of teaching. She says, "In my classroom I had one particularly difficult young woman." This was eighth grade. "She would interrupt the class, she would stand up and walk around, she would make rude comments, she would disrupt everything we were doing. And I tried every intervention that a teacher knows. I made contracts with her, I praised her, I gave her special rewards she could work toward. I threatened consequences. I went into the teacher's lounge and the other teachers looked at me and said, 'Oh, you have Shay in your class. We're so sorry. Maybe you should transfer her out.' But I was a new teacher. I decided I was going to keep the students they gave me and work with them."

And so it continued through much of the year like that—not easy.

The last day came and the class was dismissed. She said, "I watched Shay walk out the door and thought, 'Well, that was a failure.'" Then about fifteen minutes later, as she was gathering her things at the end of the school year, in walked Shay. She had called the girl's home. No one answered. She had tried to talk to her family. She wasn't sure Shay even had family that paid attention to her.

And what was she doing back? The teacher thought, "One more last act of terrorism in my classroom."

Shay marched right up to her and thrust into her hand a little bowl—the kind students make in ceramics class. On the bottom it had her name inscribed: Shay. She looked at her teacher, handed her the bowl, and said, "Thank you for trying to like me." Then she turned around and walked out.

"I have never left that bowl out of my classroom. Then I became a school principal and a superintendent, and Shay's bowl is right there on my desk."

This is the work we have to do. These are the kind of stories in this book that remind us of what it means to meet each other with deep respect.

There's a wonderful long story many of you know—of Sir Gawain and the Loathly Lady, this great ancient tale told in different places.

Chaucer told a version of it. And the essence of this story is the question that was posed to Sir Gawain by the hag that he meets in the deep dark forest to help him find his way out: What do women want? He can't figure it out, so he says, "All right, give me a year." He goes around with this big old book and asks everybody, comes back, and still doesn't have the right answer. And then there's a very magical kind of ending to it.

Part of that story, which leads the first section, along with that story of the little seven-year-old boy and the waitress, is a section on seeing each other with respect. What does that mean? Even the Dalai Lama has used the phrase "my friend the enemy"—that he's unwilling to put them out of his heart even though they're functioning in their role as an enemy.

So I'm reading you some stories, ones I like.

"Tell me the weight of a snowflake," a small bird, a titmouse, asked a wild dove. "Nothing more than nothing," was the answer. "In that case, I must tell you a marvelous story."

And this story is really for all of you who have some sense of despair in these times. Wade Davis, the great explorer, says despair is a failure of imagination—that we can imagine something bigger than the troubles we're in.

"In that case, I'll tell you a marvelous story," the titmouse says. "I sat on the branch of a fir tree close to the trunk when it began to snow. Not heavily, not in a giant blizzard, no. Just like in a dream, without any violence. Since I didn't have anything better to do, I counted the snowflakes settling on the twigs and needles of my branch. Their number was exactly 3,741,952. When the next snowflake dropped onto the branch—nothing more than nothing, as you say—the branch broke off." Having said that, the titmouse flew away. And the dove, since Noah's time an authority about change in the world, thought about the story for a moment and finally said, "Perhaps there's only one person's voice lacking for peace to come about in this world."

It's a really beautiful reminder. We don't know what will break the branch off, what will tip the direction that we go, but we have the opportunity to reach out and mend something in the fabric of life. And if you don't do it, if you stay in contraction or fear or despair or overwhelm, it actually leaves you stuck in a sorrowful place. It's action that somehow undoes anxiety. It's making even the tiniest difference to others that begins to change the direction of your life, your circumstances, and the circumstances of the world around you.

There are stories of my teacher Ajahn Chah. In the morning we would go out with our alms bowls just at dawn and walk for five miles or however long it was, barefoot, to the nearby villages. The villagers would wait and offer food into the bowls. Mostly it was the older women who would wait. They were the ones who got up early and cooked, and they'd put food in the monks' bowls. They sort of adopted us. We were kind of like their pets or something. They loved us. They would come to the temple while we'd be trying to meditate and get enlightened and stuff. On every week—new moon, quarter moon, whatever—there'd be an all-night sit and we'd be meditating. And these women, they would sit down. They were the great yogis, actually. We thought we were cool. They were much better. They sort of said, "Okay, we'll feed you. We'll take care of you." It was very sweet.

So we were crossing the little dike in the rice paddies, and there was this giant boulder across the field. Ajahn Chah said to the monks who were with him in this little group, "Monks, is that boulder heavy?" And, being Ivy League educated, "Yes it is," right? He smiled and said, "Not if you don't pick it up."

There was so much wisdom in that tiny little interaction about how we deal with this world. Yes, you can see it, but do you pick it up?

You have a choice.

There's a long story in here about Vimalakirti, who is a great Mahayana bodhisattva. It's really a story of dueling spiritual teachers. I'm sure you would never imagine that great bodhisattvas and spiritual teachers would have conflict—unless, well, in my industry, the swamis and lamas and mamas and whatever they are, they have their differences. And sometimes it's not even very pretty.

But anyway, it's a story of how they work this out. And of course it turns everything on its head, because the protagonist—the Buddha—sends his disciples to help Vimalakirti, who is pretending to be sick. And so all these great bodhisattvas go to take care of this lay person who's supposed to be much lower on the spiritual totem pole. And of course, he one-ups all of them. It's sort of great because it asks: what are your ideas about how you should be as a spiritual person? These are accounts that are modern as well as ancient, because they're part of our human character—how we work with each other, how we judge.

There's also a long story in here of the Buddha's last year of his life. It tells about all the different things he encountered in his last year at age eighty, which happens to be my age. What was difficult and what was important and what his last teachings were—reminders, people coming. And then how he died, and how that affected people.

The story begins, and the text actually, with a phrase that's pretty much like "once upon a time." Because these big stories—Vimalakirti, or Sir Gawain, or the big story of the Buddha's last year—are really mythological stories, which is to say they're archetypal or universal. And as you read them, you find yourself somewhere in that story. Are you that person coming, beseeching the Buddha, "Give me the last teachings because I didn't quite get it. This is my last chance. Come on, help me"? Or are you the person who gives him his last meal, but it turns out he gets sick from that meal? And then that person feels really bad, thinking, "I'm the person who gave the Buddha dysentery. What kind of bad karma is that?"

And then the Buddha calls him and says, "You don't understand. The first meal and the last meal are like the holiest meals that you can offer. It doesn't matter what happened to my body—it was ready anyway. You are blessed because your intention was so pure." And what matters is really the intention of the heart. And so you read and you get these kinds of reminders.

There are stories of conflict resolution, because—in case you have noticed or not noticed—we are in times of conflict. Political conflict, the poly-crisis: climate, AI, political divisiveness, continuing warfare, continuing racism. What do we do with this?

So this story: In the early years of the Iraq war, an article in The New Yorker described how a small unit of American soldiers were assigned to go to the holy city of Najaf, one of the sacred cities of Iraq. This was a delicate mission, as the presence of Americans in uniform was seen as a desecration of this sacred place. When they approached one of the most revered mosques, hundreds of Iraqis poured out of the buildings on either side, fists waving, shouting, throats taut. They pressed in on the fifteen Americans. The reporter witnessing it said he felt afraid. The Americans glanced at one another in terror, afraid that a shot would come from somewhere, that someone would open fire and it would turn into a massacre.

Quite suddenly, in the middle of it all, the American officer in charge stopped, held his rifle high over his head with the barrel pointed to the ground, and stood there against the backdrop of a seething crowd that was almost a thousand people deep now, shouting. It was a striking gesture, the reporter wrote—almost biblical. And then he took a knee.

The officer, his eyes hidden behind his mirrored sunglasses, held his position and instructed his men to follow. The soldiers looked at him as if he were crazy, and then one after another, swaying in their bulky body armor and gear, they knelt before the boiling crowd, pointed their guns at the ground in the same position as their officer. And the crowd fell silent. Their anger subsided, and the officer ordered his men to withdraw.

Dan Baum, the writer of the story, said it took him months to track down Lieutenant Colonel Chris Hughes, the officer in this account. When he found him, he asked Colonel Hughes who had taught him to calm a crowd by pointing his rifle down and kneeling in a war zone in a distant country. The colonel replied that while they would typically fire warning shots in such a situation, the problem with doing so is that the next thing that happens is people start shooting for real. He went on to say the Iraqis felt that the presence of these armed American soldiers was disrespectful to their mosque, to their religion, to the culture of this holy city—and that the obvious solution was a gesture of respect.

What do we need?

In our lives, in the conflicts we face, in the conflicts of the world—to be able to meet one another with that kind of respect changes everything.

I like to talk about this often because one of the key teachings is that more than anything, intention has great power in your life. Intention is the root of karma. What does that mean? Well, suppose there's a person who backs out of his driveway, hits the gas, and crashes through the fence of the house next door into the living room. Now suppose that person did that because he was really upset—his next-door neighbor had cut down all the big beautiful trees on their joint property line, and he was, how do you say it, a little bit pissed off by that. If that happened, the police would come with their blue lights and haul him away.

On the other hand, suppose when he backed out of his driveway the accelerator pedal stuck, and he couldn't help it, and it crashed through the fence into that person's house. People would come out and say, "Are you okay? Is everything all right?" It wouldn't be the police—it might be an ambulance if you were hurt. The exact same act: crashing through the fence into the house. What made the difference? The intention.

So intention is incredibly important in how we resolve our conflicts, how we deal with one another. And one of the most significant tools you have in conflict with other people—should that happen in your life, or if you're in a little argument with the people you love a lot but who aren't behaving the way you wish they would... It would never happen to me as a teacher, of course, but just in case—I'm married to a Dharma teacher, and we would never have an argument. Anyway, if you take a breath in the middle of it, a mindful pause, just half a minute, and you ask yourself, "What's my best intention?" There you are. And you realize, well, my best intention is actually to work this out, to love this person, to figure out our way.

If you ask, "What's my heart's best intention?" almost immediately it changes your tone of voice, your eyes soften, and instead of working to be right—because of course I am right, right?—you shift. But it's not about being right. Would you rather be right, or would you rather be happy? Checking in with your intention is one way we commune, one way we find love. In a moment, your demeanor changes and that person feels it. And all of a sudden, with that kind of respect and care, you're in a different movie—a much more benevolent one.

So, there's another story in here. I'm just telling stories. Is that okay? Do you mind? I mean, that's what we're doing tonight, right? And then we'll take some time for dialogue.

I led a men's retreat here some years ago with good friends—Robert Hall, Tisha Bell, Wes Nisker. We led a series of them. In the evening, after we'd sat together for the day, we'd have a kind of council. We'd sit in a circle, and then Robert or one of the others would raise a question for the men. "Let's talk about money. What's your relationship to money?" And all these men who never talked about that, really, unless it was their business—they would open up. Or, "Let's talk about sex." And it would come out. Or, "Let's talk about the things that really are there in our lives." The men would come together, maybe forming a smaller circle, and six or eight men would come and talk about what they were struggling with. All the other men would be nodding—yeah, me too.

Anyway, one of the themes was also talking about what's our relationship to the men who are much less well-off than ourselves, which is true for all of us. Those of us who are in this room primarily have a somewhat privileged life on this planet. So there was a man in that circle who said, "Well, I have this job." He talked about it, then said, "But on Sundays in LA, I'm a DJ and I have a blues show that I do. I love the blues." He said, "One day I got a letter from a man"—we'll call him Joseph Brown—"and it was one of those kinds of letters. I get them."

You can see in the upper corner where it came from—the correctional institution. And Mr. Joseph Brown wrote and said, "I'm incarcerated here, and I listen to your show." Apparently this fellow said, "I have a big following in the prisons." And Joseph Brown said, "I want to ask you a favor. Would you play some of the early blues greats? Muddy Waters, Blind Lemon Jefferson, some of the original Delta Blues—Mississippi John Hurt, and so forth. I sure would appreciate it."

So the next week, as a DJ, he read the letter out loud and he said, "I'm going to play a few of these great old blues masters." He played Mississippi John Hurt, Blind Lemon Jefferson, and so forth. A couple of weeks later, a letter came to him. "Dear Joseph," it said, "thank you for playing that music. It really touched me. This is the first time I can remember hearing my name said with respect." Because he said, "This is a man who obviously knows the blues when he announced it. This is someone who's really tuned in to the origins of the blues. I thank him for asking. Somebody finally offered me some respect."

And then we just all looked at each other as men and said, can we do that for one another?

These are stories in here. It's really also mysterious. I mean, here we are Monday night. We had twenty, twenty-five years in the trailers on the land. How many of you were here when we had the trailers? Yeah, a quarter, half of you or something like that. We had bigger crowds than we could have had here, but because of COVID and flu and such, I just wanted to keep it a little less packed in. And we had amazing teachers—Thich Nhat Hanh came, the Dalai Lama came, Tibetan lamas and mamas and swamis and great various teachers. All that was fabulous.

Anyway, one night it happened to be a full moon night that also happened to be Halloween. I'm not making this up. People came a little bit in costume, and we had candy at the door. We'd arranged for the Ganden Shartse monks to come and visit. They were touring. There are a couple of groups—one, the Gyuto Tantra Choir, and the Shartse monks have a tantra choir. They're some of the monks that do the multi-vocal chanting with all the overtones, quite extraordinary. So they were going to come and sing for us before our meditation. This is cool, it's Halloween, it's great.

And then they said, "Halloween, what's this?" And we said, "Well, costumes." They said, "Oh, we can do that too." And they opened their van. They said, "We've got a lot of costumes. Let's do the skeleton dance!" And they pulled out their skeleton costumes and went out in the meadow there under the moonlight, chanting and dancing. And I'm going like, what kind of reality is this that appears in West Marin? How does this happen?

But it's so mysterious. For us, we think we're in charge.

My dear friend Sharon Salzberg—she was seventeen or eighteen years old, a freshman at University of Buffalo. Brilliant, but also with a tremendous amount of trauma. And then she got this little fellowship or something to go to India. She was interested. And the Lama Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche came to give a public lecture. She raised her hand and she said, "I'm about to go to India for the first time. Which teachers should I visit? Who should I go see?"

And Trungpa, who had many sides to him, shall we say, good and otherwise, but he was quite eloquent—he looked back at her and he said, "Madam, best to follow the pretense of accident."

I thought it was profound and witty. And true. How does this happen? We didn't have Spirit Rock. We looked at places in the Russian River and places down near Santa Cruz—things that were too small, that were too large, that were far too expensive. Some of them were too far away. We wanted it to be closer to the city.

And we gave up after two or three years of looking.

Then a friend from Zen Center called and said, "You know, there's this piece of land in San Geronimo Valley near this little village of Woodacre. It's owned by Nature Conservancy, but they want to sell it to buy rainforest land in South America. They don't need it anymore. Do you know where Woodacre is?"

And I said, "Well, actually, my wife and I have been living in San Anselmo, but we just decided to buy a house in Woodacre. We know it very well. We've been shopping for a home here."

In fact, we had our realtor, and they said, "Well, this place..." We didn't want to build a place, but they said, "Okay, you have to go look." And we came, and of course, it's gorgeous. Alright, it's a lot of work to build a place.

Then this wonderful philanthropist from the East Coast who was also a dharma teacher wrote a note and said, "I hear you're trying to buy some land and build a center. Here's a little check for you—one million dollars." I thought, "Gee, I could go to Tahiti and live a long time with this check." But in fact, the land was $950,000, which all went to buy 50,000 acres of rainforest. And we ended up with Spirit Rock. Why? How? We had no idea.

The same was true for our center in Massachusetts, Insight Meditation Society. We had rented some Boy Scout camps and done retreats in 1975, and we did our first three-month retreat in a Catholic monastery on the coast of Maine, in Bucksport. Actually, it was next to a big logging operation, so people would be sitting and they'd hear the logs being unloaded. Anyway, we held a three-month retreat, and when we finished—there had been a Catholic nun who came—everybody said, "Wouldn't it be nice to have our own place?"

So we started to look. There was a team of a few very devoted students who looked at places. Some of them were giant, too big; some a little too far—all the usual Goldilocks problems: too small, too large, or something.

Finally this place, which became Insight Meditation Society in Barre, had been a monastery for the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament. It had eighty little rooms, a swimming pool, a tennis court, and eighty acres of land. There were seven fathers left there and three nuns in the annex. The problem was that during the Jimmy Carter years the price of oil spiked, and they were spending hundreds of thousands of dollars just to heat it so it wouldn't fall apart.

They put it on the market for two million dollars. We negotiated and they said, "How about a million?" Of course we didn't have anything like that at all, but they needed to unload it. Nobody wanted eighty little rooms—what do you do with that?

So anyway, it got down to where we could buy it for $150,000. Eighty acres, swimming pool, tennis court, kitchen. They said, "We'll leave the pots and pans." Phenomenal.

But even that was a lot of money for us ex-hippies. There were a couple of friends who had some family money and they each threw in $15,000. We got $50,000 to start, and then went to the bank to borrow the other $100,000. They were going to sign off for it. The bank said, "What are you doing this for?"

"Well, with IMS, the Insight Meditation Society, we're going to make a meditation center."

They said, "Great, how much do you want?" Because IMS were the same initials as the International Meditation Society of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi and the Beatles. At that time, that was a big thing. "Oh, the Beatles are behind this? No problem. How much money? Where do we sign?"

We did not correct the misperception. They gave us the money.

And what can you buy for $150,000 now? So something mysterious unfolds. As the Ojibwe say, sometimes I go about pitying myself, and all the while I'm being carried by great winds across the sky.

There's something so mysterious about how things unfold. Some of them are terrible—it's not like it's all easy. But we live in something so huge and magnificent, and we get into small mind about how it should be. You don't know. We honestly don't know so much.

So, the last thing I'm going to read from Thich Nhat Hanh:

I asked the leaf whether it was frightened because it was autumn and the other leaves were falling. The leaf told me, "No. During the whole spring and summer, I was completely alive. I worked hard to help nourish the tree, and now much of me is in the tree. I'm not limited by this form. I am also now the whole tree, and when I go back to the soil, I will continue to nourish the tree. So I don't worry at all. As I leave this branch and float to the ground, I will wave to the tree and tell her, 'I'll see you again very soon.'"

This is Thich Nhat Hanh. He writes as if it would be a children's book, but it's like deep children, right?

That day there was a wind blowing, and after a while I saw the leaf leave the branch and float down to the soil, dancing joyfully, because as it floated it saw itself already there in the tree again. It was so happy. I bowed my head, knowing that I have a lot to learn from the leaf, because it is not afraid. It knew that nothing can be born and nothing can die.

There's something in the stories that we tell. We come together for the Dharma, which means the law, the way things are—and it's really the truth of love. And mystery. Being able to be in the presence of mystery.

It's weird. I don't know how you got in there, in your body. Do you? You don't remember, do you? But you got here for some reason, and then you have this human body, which is a strange thing. I talk about the hole in which you stuff dead plants and animals and grind them up with the bones and glug them through the tube. And then you have eyeballs—they're weird. And ears that stick out, mine pretty far. And then I can wiggle my tongue and say "Eiffel Tower," and you can see the Eiffel Tower in your mind. Nobody knows how that happens. Yeah, the tympanic membrane and the little electrochemical signals to the auditory cortex... "Eiffel Tower"—come on. No one knows how it happens.

You have a little vestigial tail reminding you of your past incarnations. You ambulate by falling one direction as a biped, catching yourself, and then falling the other direction. It's a weird thing. If you don't think that's weird, pay attention when you make love. It's a cool thing to do—I love it—but it's bizarre. It is. I mean, come on, let's get real.

So here we are in this mystery, and part of our meditation is yes, you quiet your mind. Yes, you see that with attachment things get worse, and with love and graciousness things get easier. But also there's this invitation—for liberation and for wonder, instead of holding on.

I mean, can you speak a little bit not about my own intention, but about giving people grace with their intentions?

So keep the microphone for a second because I might want to ask you a question. Thank you for this. This is a really good question. What makes you ask it?

It's a struggle I have. It's a practice to come back to not reacting.

And who are you struggling with? Where is that?

Driving, a lot of the time. Driving in traffic, on the road.

Driving—oh God, those people, yes. And I'm one of them because I was a taxi driver in Boston for three years. I got some very bad driving habits. I apologize.

But all right, so now picture yourself driving and some nasty driver cuts you off, or gets upset and gives you the finger and cuts you off. Close your eyes. All right. So your concern is with their intention. And they might just be pissed off, right, or something. Now notice how it works in you when you see that and you're upset about their intention. How does that feel? Just notice. What do you notice, keeping your eyes closed, in your body?

Gripping.

Gripping. Tight.

Attachment to the energy.

Yes, attachment. Okay, just feel that. No judgment. You're noticing it.

Now let your attention open as you picture that car that cut you off and that person driving badly. And imagine that they just got the news that their child was in an accident and is in the hospital. Or that their mother fell and is very sick. Or they might get fired and they're so upset and they're trying to race to get there. So there they are, doing the same terrible action, cutting you off and so forth. How does it feel when you picture it then, when you sense that this could also be happening for them? What happens?

There isn't the tension.

It releases the tension. Because you're not so certain that they're just being an asshole, basically, if you'll forgive my language. Right. You might even feel compassion for them if you knew their story.

So here's the thing—this is great, thank you, and thank you for doing that inside. You cannot really know the intention of someone else. There's only one person whose intention you can really know. Guess who that is? As Miss Piggy would say, moi, right?

And so intention is primarily for yourself. Because the intentions of other people can be all kinds of things and you can't really know them. But what you can do, and what matters—I think of Thomas Merton writing to this burned-out activist who said, "I just... people are acting so badly, and I don't know if it's going to be worth anything." And Merton says to him, "You have to focus not on what they're doing. The work you do may succeed. It may not. It may make things worse. That's not what's given to you."

You have to focus on your own heart and on the value and the rightness and the truth, the best of the work you do yourself, and leave it to unfold the best it can.

This is a really important question, and you've sort of started to reflect on it yourself, because we can get rather positional when people are behaving badly—and there are lots of them. But we don't know what's behind it all. Some of it may be terrible, and some of it may be that they're really angry, whatever. But even under that, there's something bigger. And what you get to do is to guide your heart through this world and offer blessings even so.

"Thank you for that, beautiful."

Someone else raised their hand on the far other side.

"I just really wanted to thank you very much for bringing me on this journey tonight. I felt like I went through a great deal of inner movement through the metta meditation and also the stories. I've definitely been struggling with some things, and it brought me back to a sense of peace. It really made me feel a lot of gratitude again. I just wanted to thank you."

"Thank you. What are you struggling with, in general? Family? The world?"

"No, just a real kind of existential angst."

"Okay, close your eyes for a moment. You made the mistake of raising your hand—now you're in trouble. And tell me, when you close your eyes and sort of tune in... because you're not the only one. There are a lot of people who have feelings of despair or existential dread or concern. Where do you feel it in your body?"

"Definitely my heart."

"Okay. What does it feel like in your heart?"

"Dense and heavy."

"Dense and heavy. So feel that and let it just be there—dense and heavy—and then wrap it with kindness. Say, 'Thank you for your concern.' You're not judging it. It's actually there because you care a lot. Say, 'Thank you, thank you for your concern. I appreciate that, thank you.' So you're holding it with appreciation and kindness, not trying to get rid of it. Notice what happens when you do this. Does your heart like it?"

"Not yet."

"Not yet. What does your heart say? That's fine. Okay, what does it say? 'Don't try to steamroll me with that love, baby'?"

"No, that's not it. It actually just was... I suddenly was feeling very exposed and vulnerable, and I didn't like it. And I found that when I was doing the metta and I was doing it with myself, that was the most effective thing."

"Beautiful, beautiful. And it's hard when we feel vulnerable. And it's also vulnerable for you to have the mic in front of the whole room of people. That's completely understandable."

I remember this cartoon from Feiffer. There's a woman standing there with her arms crossed across her chest, and there's a man kneeling on one knee with his arms outstretched. He says, "But I love you." And she says, "Don't you threaten me."

We laugh about it because it's familiar to us. We have all of that inside. So when we're vulnerable, that's also what we feel.

And so you want to hold that vulnerability with kindness and say, "I know we're vulnerable. It's all right."

Because I think that if you let yourself feel more deeply into the existential despair or concern or whatever it is, underneath it is tenderness and grief for the world. And it's very soft. And those are good tears. They're called the tears of the way. They're not just "you were abused"—they're tears because you care so much.

And I hear you as someone who actually cares a lot. And then it's very hard to bear sometimes, but you can. The neuroscience description is that our meditation practice expands the window of tolerance of our heart so that we can bear the depth of our tears and the magnificence of our joy and the humor of our follies—all of those things. And so you're learning that. And that's part of the human awakening in someone.

I love the passage at the end of Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha where he's finally sitting by the river. You all read it in high school, right? And he hears all the voices in the river—the manly voice and the happy voice and the weeping voice, the childish voice and the vulnerable voice—and he said, "Then I heard it differently, and I heard all of them together as a kind of harmony." It was the music of humanity, of being human, with all the tears and all the magnificence. And he said, "Finally I came to peace." Something like that.

Anyway, thank you for that beautiful question.

Maybe one more before we finish. We don't have to, but you know it's dangerous to raise your hand. But sometimes a brave soul...

Yes, the microphone is coming.

"My husband just said, 'Good luck.'"

Hold it close.

"I don't like that."

Yeah, exactly.

"I feel very vulnerable."

Stop first. Just feel that. Not a bad thing. It's very human. Hold it kindly—metta, compassion, vulnerable. It's just how we are as human beings, and kind of brave to stand up, and beautiful. So okay, you feel this. Now what?

"Well, it's embarrassing to admit how much anger I've been having about a situation that happened."

Is it in your family?

"No, it's ex-business partners. It's business related. It's money related. It's bank related."

Yes.

"And I keep mapping it onto what I'm watching on the news with people being dragged away by ICE and arrested and things like that."

And you want him to be dragged away?

"No. I do. No. I will admit it. I mean, it's terrible. Can I call ICE, by the way?"

I've got to give somebody for you to follow. In my worst moments—go ahead—I want revenge. You know, I do.

And so this has been really lovely, because as we sit in loving kindness... Ram Dass used to say, "All you can do for me is work on yourself, and all I can do for you is work on myself."

And I know that if I really take this into my heart and work on it, it's possible that I'll get to loving kindness and forgiveness and all of that. Where I'm struggling is—and I've said this to my husband—I feel like I will need to say the truth somewhere. Like I need to write a letter to various people and entities and say the truth about how unjust this is. And then I will be able to let go. And I don't know, maybe that's not true. I just don't know what to do with it.

All right, so first, be with the not knowing. Not knowing is not a bad place. It's actually a place where you learn things.

Okay.

Secondly, I don't know—is there anyone else in this room who has ever had thoughts of revenge? Don't bother raising your hands. We know.

I think it would be really interesting for you to write the letters. I'm not saying you should mail them, but take it a step at a time. Because in something you're saying, "I need to be witnessed in this. I need others to see this." Maybe you want them to see who you are, that you're the good person and he—or whatever that person, I assume it's a he, it could be a she—is the bad guy.

Yeah, that may be so. There are a lot of bad guys out there, by the way. If you want to write letters, I can give you a list. But this is your personal bad guy.

My bad guy, right.

So you write those letters and you look at them, and you feel into your heart. You say, "Do I need to send this? Is this really going to make things better?"

And there might be one that you really need to say. And then you look, and you ask two questions really. Is it true? Is it kind? Those are the principles of the Eightfold Path, of wise speech, right speech. Is it true? And is it kind? And you look and you say, well, it's kind of bitter, as a matter of fact. So maybe I'll rewrite it a little. I want to say this. And then you look: What's my intention?

So what you're doing is you're turning what you need to do—which is to release this from your heart—into a practice. It may be to send it, it may just be to write it, feel it, rewrite it a few times. Maybe you write it and then you do a ritual and you burn it and you say, "I'm just ready to let this go. I don't even want to think about this person except to wish them well, and we're done." There are all kinds of things you can do.

So it's really good that you bring it up, because you're not the only one in the room with that. And you can't hurry it. You can't kind of cover it over. "Okay, I'll forgive, you know. I still hate him, but I will forgive." It doesn't work that way.

Yeah.

How's this landing?

It's good. It's good. I want to hurry the not knowing what to do part. Like, I want to know—

And you want to know, do it—

And I want to, you know... because I want it settled.

Yes, you want it settled.

Yeah.

So, okay, pause for a moment. Just tell me, how hard is it to stay in the not knowing? Is it scary?

Oh, yeah. Is it?

Okay, so feel that. Hold it, wrap it with some kindness, because we all have that. Don't-know mind—you're staying with not knowing. Ajahn Chah used to say, "It's uncertain, isn't it?" Can you get comfortable with uncertainty right now? It's unresolved. It's painful to feel it. Wrap it with kindness and say, "Yeah." Can you bear it? Can you?

"Yeah."

Because then it slows it down a little. Then you're not quite so desperate. How's that?

"That's good. It's not like I've never done that before. I've been in some pretty scary places not knowing."

So thank you. Thank you.

I shouldn't tell this story, but a very close friend of mine, a colleague and teacher, told me that her best friend, when they were living somewhere in the Midwest, was jilted by her boyfriend in a pretty painful and bad way. She was so upset. And then he was very pleased with himself because he had bought a fancy new pickup truck and lived some towns over. So in the middle of the night, she drove to where his truck was, threw a Molotov cocktail into it, and it burned. She drove away. No one saw it. Some days later, she got a message from her ex saying, "The weirdest thing happened—my truck burned." He never found out.

And I have to say, even though it was a bad and terrible thing that she did, there was a part of me that smiled about it and said, "Go girl." You know, we have all these parts. Let's be honest about it. You don't want to do it where you hurt somebody, and you don't want to do it where you hurt yourself. You're better than that, bigger than that, more loving than that. And I see that in your care, and I believe it. But it is fun to tell the story anyway, you've got to admit.

Okay though, so let's sit for a couple of minutes and return to metta, to the great heart of loving-kindness. As you breathe gently, you can hold your own complicated life with kindness, with compassion. And you can be a lighthouse, a lamp—"make of yourself a light," the Buddha's last words. Shine kindness. No matter—people are difficult, good, bad, everything in between. And in the middle of it all, you can rest in the great heart of kindness and love. Because it's who you really are. It's what we want for this world. And you become that. It alleviates your suffering and it tamps down the suffering of others. It's your gift.

So thank you for your kind attention, for the brave ones who raised their hand, for all of you. Thank you to the people who bought this book—my publisher will be really happy. And thank you for being part of Spirit Rock, online or in person. We need community these days, a lot.

And you become that. It alleviates your suffering and it tamps down the suffering of others. It's your gift.

So thank you for your kind attention, for the brave ones who raised their hand, for all of you. Thank you for those who bought this book—my publisher will be really happy. And thank you for being part of Spirit Rock, online or in person. We need community these days, very much. We need each other.

So I'm grateful. Go out into the evening, drive politely if you can, and we'll see you again.

And remember—you don't have to eat all the pea soup.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 56

Monday Night Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 44 min

> In this Monday night gathering at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield reflects on over four decades of community practice and introduces a guided mettā (loving-kindness) meditation particularly suited for the challenges of modern life and family gatherings during Thanksgiving week. He shares the traditional origin story of mettā practice—how the Buddha taught it to frightened monastics in the forest—and notes its relevance for our contemporary 'jungle' of news and daily stressors.
> Kornfield offers the classical pedagogy of mettā: beginning with those easiest to love, then gradually expanding the circle to include neutral people, oneself, and eventually all beings. He emphasizes the importance of not using meditation as another opportunity for self-judgment, but rather holding all of our humanity—the difficult and beautiful alike—with compassion. The teaching includes the traditional list of benefits from practicing mettā, from sweeter dreams to improved health.
>
> The guided meditation moves through loved ones, allows them to reflect loving-kindness back to the practitioner, and expands outward to groups and all beings everywhere. A particularly moving dialogue follows, including one practitioner's testimony of transformation over fifty years of practice—from initially hating mettā and only being able to practice with her cat, to experiencing profound openness. This honest sharing illuminates how persistent, gentle practice can gradually soften even the most resistant heart.

Good evening, what a pleasure.

It was very sweet arriving because I came about an hour ago and it was just finishing getting dark. There was a little bit of the moon and kind of not quite a black sky yet, still lit up a little bit. It's actually a beautiful night out there. It's cold—it's winter—but it's gorgeous. And you are too, so what to say. Thank you for being here.

This is now maybe the forty-first or forty-second year of the Monday night sitting group that we started. For a lot of years it was in the trailers that we had here in the meadow, and before that in the Fairfax Community Church. Some of you who are that old may even remember. The point of it has been to come together to remember what it's like to quiet our minds and tend the heart and be together in some sense of community doing so—and of course, having some teachings or conversation. All of those are important.

Spirit Rock has grown over these decades. It has so many programs of short and long retreats and trainings and practices, and has had thousands of people come through. When we look at the world—and there's actually a phrase, "the world," in the Sanskrit and Pali Buddhist texts, and it's not like "the world, whoopee!" It's like "the world... oh yeah, right." But at this time in the world, to have places of refuge and places where we steady the heart and quiet ourselves is really important and valuable as a reminder, as a support.

What we usually do on Monday night is meditation for a time, then take a break for five minutes to stretch, and then some teachings followed by dialogue or questions and response. Tonight is also the launch—I don't know what the right word is—the celebration for this new book that came out this last week. I was reading it after I got a copy. It's kind of fun to actually get it when it's finally printed, different than all the drafts and the electronic versions. I had been feeling ambivalent about it, thinking it was okay. And then I read it and thought, "Hey, I really like this. This is actually pretty good."

I got a call from the publisher, Sounds True Macmillan, saying I had done this beautiful course on great teaching stories, and would I like to write a book about that? I listened and said, "You know, I'm not really in the mood to write another book. I've got sixteen published books. I hardly have an unpublished thought. And I've got other things to do." They said, "Well, how about if we take those teachings and edit them into a book, and then you can add things and fix it up?" I said, "That's the kind of writing I like. Thank you." So they did, and they gave it to me, and I added a lot of things that I like or love. That's how it came about. I'll be reading and talking from that and other things about what I think is really helpful for us.

To start for tonight—I'm particularly aware that this is Thanksgiving week. I've been teaching an online course on forgiveness, and I had my class today. We talked about the forgiveness between the Northern Irish Protestants and Catholics, or the Hutus and Tutsis in Rwanda, or the Republicans and Democrats in the US. I asked, "So what does this teaching on forgiveness really touch for you?" People raised their hands electronically, and we had a conversation—and it was all about their families. Forget Ireland, forget Ukraine—"I'm going home, and I need some practices for that."

I reminded them that the Buddha and Jesus both had trouble when they went home, so they should expect that that's part of the game. Family is family. It's wonderful, it's family, and it's other things than that.

So tonight I want us, as we sit, to do a guided loving-kindness meditation. I'll talk about it a tiny bit and then we'll do it. The loving-kindness meditation as a practice was taught—as best we know, all these are kind of mythological stories as well that have been passed down for a couple of thousand years and more. But apparently there was a group of ardent monks and nuns who were meditating with the Buddha, and they went out into the forests so they could practice ardently. At nighttime, they got frightened because there were sounds of wild animals and unknown things.

You know, that was the equivalent of watching the news today. It does the same thing to our nervous system. And so they came running back and said, "What do we do? It's dangerous. It's scary out there." And the Buddha said, "Let me give you a practice that will help you deal with the kind of fears that come." And that was the first occasion to teach loving-kindness meditation—so that when you go back into the jungle, or watch the news, or whatever wild thing you do, you have that as a basis to tend and care for your own heart.

Now, one of the things that's cool about it, and you'll see as we go through the pedagogy, is that you start where it's easy. You don't do loving-kindness meditation and decide, "Okay, I'm going to start with whoever you consider the bad guys." I'm using that particular gender on purpose—there are a bunch of them, you may have noticed. But you don't start there. You actually start where it's most natural and loving and easy, and you soften the heart, and you open it, and you do a few more. Then you go to people that are a little bigger than just the close ones to you, and you wish them well—happiness and safety and so forth. And eventually, if you go through the progression over time, traditionally you go through neutral people. Neutral people are the ones you kind of notice—that person at the checkout place at your grocery store where you go regularly, or at the post office, someplace where you see people but don't really have much thought about them. And then you expand from that to mildly difficult people. Do any of you have mildly difficult people? Don't raise your hands. And then you go on from there.

The neutral people practice is actually kind of interesting. I was doing a retreat on my own of metta at Santa Sabina in San Rafael a couple of decades ago or more, and I was practicing metta, going through it systematically. I thought, "Okay, who's going to be my neutral person?" There was a gardener there, this guy who I would see periodically coming and trimming and cutting, and I'd nod to him. I was being quiet. So I spent a day wishing him well as part of my long metta retreat. Safe, protected, happy—that was my practice. Of course, it made me happy. And then I carried on.

About two days later, I went downstairs and out toward the garden. Around the corner came this guy, and I looked up and said, "Oh, my neutral person—I love you!" It just changed the whole valence of my care, because I had invited him in, in a regular way, into my heart and realized, oh, we're in relation to one another.

Now this is a non-sequitur, but I'm going to say it anyway. Two days ago I did a daylong teaching here on inner technology for outer technology. Some of it was with designers and people who are creating outer technology, and some of it was just people talking about how they use technology or how their kids use it. A lot of it to start with, beside training the inner technology of calm and steadiness and clarity, was recognizing that we're in relationship to technology—that it's actually a relationship and we're embedded in it. We are, you know.

And you'll notice behind me this beautiful Chinese Kuan Yin. Usually she's depicted in the thangkas with hundreds or thousands of arms serving, and eyes to see the whole world, reaching out all these hands. Now she's just—no, she can do it online. She's checking, trying to stay connected to everybody.

Anyhow, it's said when you do metta, loving-kindness practice, that there are many blessings that come as your heart trains itself to be open and kind and loving. There's a list of forty—you know, the Buddha was a list maker. Your dreams become sweet. You fall asleep more easily. I mean, that's enough already, right? You waken contented. Your thoughts are pleasant as you cultivate loving-kindness. Your health improves. Angels and devas will love and protect you, even if you don't believe in them. Animals will sense your love and not harm you.

I think that was part of the Buddhist teaching for those monks and nuns. People will welcome you everywhere. Your babies will be happy in the womb and growing up. If you pass by an elephant, it will nod and bow and honor your loving kindness. You can go to the zoo and try it out. If you lose things, they will be returned to you. If you fall off a cliff, a tree will always be there to catch you. And the world will be more peaceful and loving around you.

So those are some of the forty benefits. This reflects what you might find in a monastery in Burma or Thailand, where they actually do this little recitation. Okay, now I'm motivated. I'm waiting for the elephant. I'm going to do it.

So let's do a bit of practice together. But one more thing first.

There is one basic instruction for all the kinds of meditation—and there are many, many kinds—that you do, and that is not to use it to judge yourself. "Oh, I'm no good at this metta, loving kindness. I must be a bad person. I can't do it." You know how it is, your unworthiness. It's actually kind of boring, but we won't go there for a moment. Honestly, come on, you're bigger than that.

But anyway, you don't want to use this with some ideal. It might be that your attention wanders. It might be that you hate it. And the dance in meditation isn't trying to fix that, but to get curious. "Hmm, I wonder why so much hatred is arising when I'm trying to do metta." Well, maybe I'm really pissed at that person. Which can happen.

I mean, one morning I was leading a retreat years ago, and it was my time to go in—I was scheduled to lead the loving kindness meditation—and I'd had a bad fight with my wife at the time, my ex. She said a bunch of things that were really wrong, we'll say, bad. And I was sitting there kind of steaming. But it was my job to say, "All right, now think of someone you care about and send them some thoughts. May you be safe and well." And I'd be quiet, thinking, "I'm going to call her. I'm going to talk to her and straighten this out." Okay, now think of someone else you love.

And it was so interesting because the mind has no pride. It will do anything. And so the practice is to hold all of that in kindness, to hold your humanity—the tainted glory of your humanity—all of it in loving kindness. All the difficult and beautiful and amazing and horrifying parts that you all have, that we have as humans.

Okay. Sit comfortably. It's very hard to do metta if your knees are killing you.

With metta there are meditations on gratitude and thanks, forgiveness. But here we'll start really simply.

Let your body be settled and at ease and in a comfortable posture. Notice how it's breathing itself, and invite a kind of calm and gentleness to simply hold this breathing body kindly. Notice the stillness, the invitation for things to settle down. Even if there's repeated thoughts or emotions, let them rise and fall like the waves of the ocean. And around them is just a kindness, a field of loving awareness that notices it all without judging, without trying to change—just a loving presence for all of your humanity.

And now let yourself think of, remember, picture in your mind's eye, someone who you have a natural feeling of love or kindness for. Some person or being where it's not conflicted. Basically, there's a natural caring. It could be a child, a friend.

It could even be your dog—you know, you come home and it wags its tail. It doesn't judge you.

Picture this being. And first of all, with this child, this person, simply gaze at them with your mind's eye and feel your natural caring. It's there.

Then in your own way, begin to wish them well. There are some traditional phrases I'll use, but you can modify them in whatever way feels right to your heart.

Can you picture this being?

May you be safe and protected.
May you be well in body and mind.
May you be healthy and strong.
May you be filled with loving-kindness.
May you hold your struggles in compassion.

Every being has their measure of struggles.

May you be peaceful and happy inwardly.

You can repeat it again with whatever language you choose as you gaze at them. May you be safe, protected. You want this for them. May you be well and healthy. May you be filled with loving-kindness, held in it. May your struggles be held in compassion. May your heart be peaceful.

Now bring into the heart and mind another person that you care about—again, where it's easy and natural, not terribly conflicted. Picture them, remember them, think of them. Let the loving-kindness open to include them in this field of care.

You gaze at them: May you too be safe and protected. May you be healthy and well. May you be filled with kindness. May you hold your struggles with compassion—all your struggles, so kindly. May your heart be peaceful and happy, truly happy.

Notice what it feels like to begin this well-wishing to beings you care about.

Now imagine these two standing across from you, gazing back at you. They look at you with kindly eyes and they say, "Just as you wish this well-being and love for us, we want to wish it for you. We want to return it." Because they also care.

Imagine or sense that they're looking at you kindly and saying: May you too be safe and protected. They want this for you. May you be healthy and well. May you be filled with kindness. May you hold your struggles with compassion. They're gazing at you. Hold your struggles with compassion, with kindness. And may your heart be peaceful and happy.

Take in their good wishes. If you're comfortable, put a hand on your heart. They're teaching you.

As they gaze kindly, you accept this and you say—it's hard—May I be safe and protected, just as they want for you. May I be safe and protected. They wish this for you. May I be well and healthy, strong. May it be so. Like you're blessing yourself, and they're with you. May I be filled with kindness toward myself and the whole world. May I hold my struggles in compassion.

You know what they are. Hold them all kindly.

And may my heart be peaceful and happy.

Let it sink in, this well-wishing, just as you wish this for these loved ones and friends. They gaze at you and say: you too, held in the field of loving-kindness.

Now expand it. Open the heart further and picture another person you want to add—someone you feel called to wish well. Again, not a tough one, but a natural one.

May you be safe and protected. May you be well and strong. May you be filled with kindness. May you hold your struggles in compassion, great compassion. May your heart be peaceful and happy.

And now expand it further. Think of a group of people. It could be family coming to Thanksgiving dinner, or friends, or co-workers—some group that you know. There they are, arising in your mind's eye, in your heart. You surround them with loving-kindness. Even though they're a mixed bag of humanity, your loving-kindness is way bigger, and you wish them well.

May you be safe and protected. May you be healthy and well. May you all be filled with kindness—remember and dwell and live in kindness. May you hold your struggles in compassion. And may your hearts be peaceful and happy.

Let the field of loving-kindness that's growing in you now extend, shine out like a lighthouse in all directions—in front of you and behind, to left and right, above and below. Wish beings in every direction on this land well: all the animals, the badgers and worms and mountain lions and crows. May all the beings of this place be happy and protected.

Then out across the land, across the valleys and waters—beings in the cities, beings in the countryside. The light of loving-kindness shines in every direction.

May all beings everywhere, far and near, young and old—may you all be safe and protected. May you be well and healthy, all beings, omitting none. May you all be filled with kindness. May you feel compassion for your struggles. Hold them in compassion. And may your hearts be at peace, whoever you are, wherever you are, beings of every kind. May your hearts be at peace and find true happiness.

You become the lighthouse of loving-kindness, illuminating all directions with care.

Staying with this quality of loving-kindness, allow your eyes to open and look around at the beings sitting near you. Catch their eye, check them out, and continue to wish them well, each one. May you be safe. May you be protected. May you be strong and healed. May you be filled with kindness, each of you. Look around, wish them well—you can do it. I know it's a little unusual, but you can do it. It's not really that hard.

May you hold your struggles in compassion. Anybody in this room not have struggles? Raise your hand. Okay, we've established that. Hold them with kindness, every one of you. And may your hearts be at peace—you and you and you and you. May your hearts be at peace. What a beautiful thing to wish.

Be at peace. Be happy. Wow—be happy. It's okay. And as Guillaume Apollinaire said, sometimes it's good to pause in our pursuit of happiness and just be happy.

So we're going to take a pause for a moment of a different kind, and I want to ask you how that was. Any observations or reports or comments, just for a little bit before we take our break. How was that? Was it hard?

Pedagogically, the reason I started with other people is because most folks find it very hard to do loving-kindness for themselves. It feels squirmy, and "I don't deserve it" and all that kind of stuff comes up. So you picture people you care about, and then they look at you and say, "Yeah, you too—you get in the circle as well."

Someone in the back asked if I could explain a little further about having compassion for your struggles. What makes you ask?

"Sitting here listening to the meditation, my mind kept going, 'How do I have compassion for a struggle?' and I missed the next thing you were saying. I kind of got stuck on that, if I'm honest."

What are the kinds of things you struggle with? Is it family, or friends, or politics? Where's your struggle?

"I think it's all of the above."

All of the above. Okay, check box two, three, four. So one of the things about struggle—thank you for that, this is good—is that it's very easy to judge yourself. "I'm struggling with the conflicts in my family, or the political climate, or the way people are behaving at work." That's part of being human, that we find our way into struggle. There are different ways you can hold it. One is to judge yourself, or just get in it and be right. And then you notice how that works for you. When you live in that—you're shaking your head—like maybe that's not where you want to live.

So instead, you realize: okay, this is being human, to have struggle in family and community and close people and work. Let me be kind and compassionate. Everybody's having to deal with their human life, and they don't always do it very beautifully or graciously. Sometimes they make a mess of it, or they're hard for us. And instead of a lot of judgment, you say, "Ah, let me just hold this with kindness, compassion." That's a beginning of an answer. How does that land?

Someone else shared: "It's been fifty years, and I have to say I am just amazed—because fifty years ago I could not stand to do loving-kindness. I just hated it. It was incredibly, incredibly difficult."

Magnificent.

This is wonderful. You hated it. I love it. Keep going.

And I am just so amazed. It is the best loving-kindness practice I have ever had, and it's just completely different. So I just want to say: persist. I had to start out with my cat, because I could not stand to do it for anyone else. I certainly could not stand to do it for myself. But I could feel it from my cat. And it's just so different here, fifty years later. Little by little, it's changed. And I don't think I actually realized it until tonight.

A testimonial. We love it. We are all your cats now, really. And it says something—that's why it's called practice rather than perfect.

I'm just so amazed and so grateful. I truly appreciate it.

Thank you. Thank you so much. And thank you both for these comments and questions, because they're important.

CHAPTER 57

Solstice

Jack Kornfield · 1h34

> In this winter solstice gathering, Jack Kornfield guides practitioners through a 25-minute meditation focused on breath awareness and loving presence, inviting us to take our seat at "the still point of the turning world." The meditation emphasizes gentle acknowledgment of thoughts and emotions as waves rising and falling, cultivating what Thích Nhất Hạnh calls calm and ease within the breathing body.
> Drawing from the Aṅguttara Nikāya's teachings on impermanence and the Dhammapada's verses on living in joy, Kornfield reflects on the solstice as an invitation to pause amidst life's ten thousand joys and sorrows. He explores the brahmavihāras—the divine abodes of love, compassion, joy, and equanimity—describing how gazing meditation can awaken these qualities and help us see others in a timeless way. The talk weaves together Buddhist wisdom with poetry from Crowfoot elders, T.S. Eliot, and Walt Whitman, alongside stories of ordinary acts of extraordinary generosity.
>
> Kornfield reminds us that meditation has two purposes: to quiet the mind and tend the heart, then to add our gifts to this troubled and magnificent world. Through touching stories—a family helped on Christmas morning, a daughter choosing compassion over caution, a small act of recognition transforming a hospital worker—he illustrates how each of us can be the snowflake that tips the branch toward peace. The teaching concludes with an invitation to recognize the light we carry and share it in the minute particulars of our daily lives.

So here we are, mid-December, not many days before the winter solstice.

One of the beautiful things about living in Marin County where Spirit Rock is located is that there's a group of people who, now for many years, do a trek around Mount Tamalpais—the central mountain in the middle of Marin County, about 2,600 feet. In the morning of the solstice, starting in the dark, they carry candles and sometimes sing and chant. It's as if they bring their voices together with the turning, the music of the spheres.

I remember years ago going to the top of Mount Tamalpais one day when I learned there was a passage of the planet Venus across the face of the sun. I got up there and a number of people had set up their telescopes, some of them quite big. I got to look in the eyepiece of one of the biggest telescopes, and there was the orange-red, roiling, round disk of the face of the sun. It's not at all static when you look closely—it's like all these little wiggly lines of fire and energy moving. It's really quite extraordinary.

On one side of this big orange disk was a little round black pebble that was blocking out the light, pebble-sized as it moved over the course of a few hours across the face of the sun. What was amazing to see, for me anyway, was to feel that here we are on planet Earth, which is about the same size as Venus, and we too are circling our star. You could feel it—this huge star, and then lots of space, and then this tiny black circle going across the sun. If someone were on Mars, they might see the tiny black circle of the Earth sometimes going across the face of the sun. We're in this cosmic dance, the music of the spheres.

So now the time of solstice has come for us. The beautiful thing about solstice is that it invites us to stop, to pause—like a sacred pause—to take a breath. Because the meaning of solstice (sol is sun) is that the sun stands still for a moment. And we get to stand still. When we do stand still, we can see in a new and different way.

I want to read a tiny poem from Crowfoot, one of the Blackfoot Nation elders:

What is life?
It is the flash of a firefly in the night.
It is the breath of a buffalo in wintertime.
It is the little shadow that runs across the grass and loses itself in sunset.

Disappear in the flash of the firefly. This is us. We feel very permanent to ourselves, but actually it's all this amazing, ever-changing dance.

What you get to do, and what we get to do together now, is some meditation—to take our seat at what the poet T.S. Eliot called the still point of the turning worlds.

So settle yourself. We'll sit for twenty-five minutes or so. Find a way to sit that's stable and comfortable and at ease. Let yourself sink down into this seat or the chair or wherever you are. Feel the solidity beneath your seat that goes all the way down to the center of the earth. You're held by Mother Earth as you take your seat—your seat at the still point in the middle of all the turning.

Let your eyes close gently. Take two or three long breaths. Let things relax as you do. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Maybe let your head move in a little circle to release your neck and let it find a simple upright position. Let the shoulders relax, and let arms and hands rest easily. Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with a spirit of kindness and compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, bring your mindful loving awareness to feel and sense and notice how your body is breathing itself just now. No need to change or alter anything, just to kindly notice. As you relax, you'll become aware that you are being breathed—that the earth is breathing you, your body and the ocean of air in a dance together.

Relax with it. Soften. Let each breath come and go as it will, feeling the rhythm of life moving through your body.

This breath, if you're in North America, came across the Pacific Ocean. It dusted the tops of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa in Hawaii. It dusted the Fukushima nuclear reactor in Japan. It moved across the waves of the ocean, the sea of air, and now comes into your own lungs and body, gently and graciously. Receive it with kindness.

Thich Nhat Hanh recommends adding a soft whisper of a word as you breathe. Calm. Or ease. In the background, very softly—ease or calm—as the breath breathes itself. Let the awareness of the breath be an invitation for the whole body, heart, and mind to quiet, to calm, to settle.

You might feel the movement of breath as coolness in the nostrils, the air coming in and out, or on the upper lip. Perhaps you'll feel it as the rise and fall of chest or belly. Let it breathe itself. And if you have any difficulty sensing the breath—if it's soft, hard to feel, or there's too much else going on—take one hand and put it on your belly and feel the belly rise and fall in the palm of your hand.

As you sense the breath, naturally after a bit of time, the attention will wander. It might be a breath or two later or six breaths later—no matter. You can notice where it's wandered very gently. Let the thoughts or plans or memories or sensations, the images, the emotions, whatever pulls you from the breath, let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Notice if you've been carried off by a thought or an emotion. If you like, you can whisper gently: thinking, remembering, planning. Or sadness, excitement, love, fear.

When you notice the thought or the feeling, let it go, sink back like the waves of the ocean. Just acknowledge gently—oh yes, sadness or excitement or planning—and come back to the next breath. Rest your loving awareness with the sensations of the breath or the rise and fall in the palm of your hand. Let things quiet, steady.

When you notice that a wave has arisen around the breath and pulls the attention away, acknowledge it kindly with loving awareness. Remembering. Planning. Thinking. Worrying. Delighting. Let that simple acknowledgement be enough. Let that experience, like the waves of the ocean, dissolve. Return back for a few more breaths, training the mind and heart and breath to be together, breath by breath.

Thich Nhat Hanh recommends putting a half smile on your lips. Notice the breathing body with loving awareness—this breath and this one—kindly, with ease, a steady and calm presence, returning over and over to the breath very gently. Each time a wave arises and carries the attention, name it gently. If it feels really strong—a strong pain, a great moment of sadness or elation or delighting or fear, a compelling plan—you can stay with it for a little bit. Name it gently. Planning. You can say thank you. What a beautiful plan. Thank you. Celebration—something good has happened. Let yourself feel it with loving awareness, and then let it go.

You become the silent loving witness to the breath, the breath of life, and this helps you to quiet the mind and tend the heart. You become the loving witness of the waves of human experience. Imagination and judgment, connection, all the emotions, ideas—they rise and fall like waves. And you are the still point. The silent center. You are the loving awareness itself, noticing it all, kindly. This breath.

This moment.

It doesn't matter how long the attention wanders or drifts. The beautiful thing is the moment that you reawaken and say, "Oh yes, here we are, this timeless moment." And the loving awareness acknowledges just this, just now. The spacious awareness of the breath and the world itself rising and passing away. And you are silent and loving in the middle of it all.

The still point. Silent, loving awareness. Just here.

The still point of the turning world. It's a refreshing thing to do, to sit with a mindful, loving presence as the breath breathes itself and the waves of experience arise and pass. It puts us more in harmony with the real rhythms of life.

It's a pleasure to come and sit together as we did. Monday Night Sitting Group is now in its forty-first year—forty-one years of teaching this, starting in someone's living room in San Anselmo and in the Fairfax Community Church, and then for a long time, thirty-five years, on the land at Spirit Rock. To be able to come together and not do anything is an extraordinary thing in our culture and our time. You have to admit, we get so busy. There's so many things and so much input and so much to tend to.

And then the solstice comes. The mystery of the solstice—the sun standing still for a moment, as it was believed, changing course and coming back. It's a timeless pause, a sacred pause really. In the Northern hemisphere for us, it's the pause in the darkness, in the fertile darkness from which everything comes.

We live in a culture that's in many ways characterized by the absence of the sacred. Christmas is primarily about shopping, among other things, and family—beautiful things—but not much about sacred silence and mystery. The question is, how do we hold this human life that we've been given, especially without the sacred rituals of old? The fact that we can come together and sit in silence is already a beautiful thing. Listen to the body and the heart and the world.

And it's not easy. From the Anguttara Nikaya, the Buddhist words: "It seems that although we thought ourselves permanent, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not." This is the uncertainty of samsara, of existence. All things are impermanent. These were among the last words of the Buddha: awaken to this.

When we sit still, we also feel how much we carry of the movement and the ten thousand joys and the ten thousand sorrows. For now, there have been mass shootings and the tremendous grief and inhumanity of them. The anti-Semitism and anti-Muslim sentiment and anti-immigrant sentiment. The continuing warfare and divisiveness and growing dictatorships.

In some way, many of us are touched more by the shootings—the school shootings and that kind of violence—than we are by the tens of thousands of people who have died or are under siege in Sudan, or the Rohingya who fled the horrible treatment in Burma. There's something about it being more immediate and small and understandable. And it's heartbreaking to carry all this. It's part of being human. Birth and death. Joy and sorrow. Gain and loss. Fame and disrepute.

And while on one side there are the wars and the shootings and the divisiveness, today on this earth there are 249,762 new babies born. They came out saying, "Look, I'm here! I'm with you." Every day, a quarter of a million new people saying, "Hey, count me in."

I don't know how it happens. I mean, I do know.

Their mothers carry them and give birth to them. That's an astonishing, weird, amazing thing—that we grow in the body of another person, our mother, and then we come out and say, "I'm here. Let me have a life."

And so there's all the suffering, and there's also the unbearable beauty of it. Of a single tree. Or a flower. Or the field of lilies. Or the beauty of a sunset.

I was reading this poem by an Inuit poet living up past the Arctic Circle, and he was celebrating the magic of sunrise, the amazing thing when the sun rises. And then I realized—oh, he's talking about the fact that he hasn't seen the sun for three or four months and now it's coming back. This is a really amazing thing. It's returned. But he says, what a magical thing for the sun to rise and fill the world with light every single day, and fill the world with 250,000 new babies.

So here we are in this mystery. How do we hold it? What do we do with it?

For many years—for more than fifty years—I worked together with a very dear heart friend and colleague, Stanislav Grof, who was the last legitimate LSD researcher in the late 1960s and early seventies at Johns Hopkins University, before it was all shut down. He'd come from Prague. And then after LSD was made illegal, teaching together with Stan and all these other people who were still very interested in the transformation of consciousness that psychedelics could offer, he developed with his wife Christina a very deep holotropic breathwork process. People would breathe in this intense way with music, and it would open them very much like psychedelics.

Of course, we'd been working together a long time, and I was quite tuned to it because I'd been in a Burmese monastery of Sunlun Sayadaw, where we would sit several times a day for an hour or an hour and a half without moving. And the first forty-five minutes of it was to breathe as hard and fast as you could. The Sayadaw, the teacher there, said, "The modern world is too distracted. We need something to really help you find your attention." Close your eyes, and he would ring this huge gong at the end of the room. Then, kind of like a coach, he'd say, "All right, now get to it, start breathing." Periodically he would encourage: "Breathe harder, breathe faster"—for forty-five minutes. Then he would ring the gong and everything would get silent. And he'd say, "Stay in that silent openness and notice what wants to open for the next forty-five minutes." We'd do that two or three times a day. It was quite wild.

So we did the same in holotropic breathwork, and Stan added this whole sequence of driving and compelling music that would start soft and then have a beat to help people breathe. If you walked into the room—we often worked in groups of two or three hundred people, and they would be paired up, someone lying there breathing while the other person sat with them, tending to anything they needed: a glass of water, a blanket, being held, whatever—you'd walk into the room with a few hundred people breathing to this loud, amazing, shamanic kind of music. It was a little like going into Dante's Divine Comedy.

There would be thirty people in the middle of getting born, some birth process coming out, or being the mother giving birth to them. And there'd be twenty people over there who were dying in different ways—some with memories of having been in battles in past lives, or dying old, or dying young, or remembering being with someone else who died and feeling that whole process. And some of them were in bliss, just in these divine heaven realms, beatific smiles radiating light. And some of them were struggling like they were in Dante's lower realms of pain and suffering, reliving trauma. It was all there.

And the amazing thing is, it's all in here. We carry all of this. As Whitman says, we are larger than we think, because you are the universe—it's all inside you, all of that. "We contain multitudes," he said.

One of my favorite group meditation practices—something I'll do at a retreat like the Ram Dass retreat or others I've done for years—is to have people pair off and look in each other's eyes. Particularly to evoke the divine abodes of the Buddhist teachings, the four immeasurables or the Brahmaviharas of the awakened heart: love and compassion, joy and peace.

People gaze at each other for ten, fifteen minutes, and they fall in love with each other. They see the beauty behind the eyes, and this great love comes. They see the measure of sorrows that everyone carries, the struggles in every life, and great compassion awakens as they gaze. Joy, the child of the spirit.

And then finally, in the section of peace and equanimity, the awakened heart, they're now invited to gaze even more deeply, in a timeless way, and to see that at another time and another place, the person across from you has been your mother or father or your child—your son or your daughter—or your teacher, or your student.

And they continue to gaze. The Tibetans say that every being you meet—there have been so many countless lifetimes—every being you meet has been your mother at some other time. But here, gazing, you really see it.

What it would have been like to have that person be your mother, or father, or daughter, or son, teacher, or student. And then one of the wild ones: at some other time and place, they were your friend, and you feel this warmth of heart. And then you look deeper, and in another time and place, they were your enemy. And it's amazing how in just a few seconds, the gaze changes and you see how they could be your enemy. Because we are large and we contain multitudes. We contain so much. All of it possible.

And when you see in this way, you start to see in a timeless way, just as we did when we took that seat, the still point in the middle of all life. When you can really gaze at another, or gaze at this mystery of the little planets going around our fiery star, and we're the little bugs on this planet—there's this tiny little planet across the face of the sun and it has all these little bugs on it. That's us. Bugs are us.

When we see in this timeless way, we see life. We see each person, the ones in our gaze, in our eyes. What opens is mercy, tenderness, love. Because then what matters? Here we are in this human incarnation. We get quiet. The world is turning. The spheres, the music of the spheres, are dancing. And our life, as the Buddha said—did we think that it was permanent? It's dancing too. We have a beginning and changes and changes, evolution of our own physical body and heart and mind. And then this particular dance ends, and you'll see—you'll be surprised or not when you float out of your body. Wow, that was an amazing incarnation, wasn't it? Wow.

But then what matters? What opens is tenderness, compassion, love, mercy.

I remember teaching with Stephen Levine, wonderful dear friend, colleague, meditation teacher. He worked a lot with people who were in hospice or dying or attending the dying. And one of the questions he would come to as the retreat went on—he would have people practice, say, "Imagine this is your last day. You have one more day on this earth in this incarnation." And after people had a few moments to imagine that, he would say, "Who would you call? What would you say?" And then: "Why are you waiting?"

It was that third question that was the killer, right? Who would you call? And why are you waiting? Why are you waiting to speak from that place of tenderness and love and mercy—or whatever matters?

William Blake said that if we are to do good on this earth, in this human life, it must be done in the minute particulars, in the immediate particulars. General good, he went on, is the plea of the flatterer, the scoundrel, and the liar. The minute particulars.

So here it is. This is from Mark Morford's commentary. He says: "Stop thinking our global crisis is all there is. Realize that for every ongoing war and religious outrage and shooting and environmental disaster, there are a thousand counterbalancing acts of staggering generosity and humanity and art and beauty, all happening all over the world right now on a breathtaking scale. From flower box to cathedral, resist the temptation to drown in fatalism, to shake your head and sigh and just throw in the karmic towel. Realize that this is the perfect moment to re-envision the enchantment of the world, to change the energy of the world, to step right up and crank your personal volume right when it seems dark, bitter, offensive, acrimonious, conflicted, bilious. There's your opening right here. Remember mystery. Believe in the seeds that you plant."

As Thoreau said, "I am prepared to expect miracles." Let the seeds be part of a groundswell of resistance, each a seemingly small but actually very, very large and important karmic shift that's happening.

The beginning of something new and potent and unstoppable.

Here's an old story for you, because it is the solstice and the holiday time.

A light drizzle was falling as my sister Jill and I ran out of the Methodist church. This was Christmas morning in 1951. Across the street from the church was a Pan Am gas station where the Greyhound bus stopped. It was closed for Christmas, and I noticed a family standing outside there.

Once we got home, there was barely time to enjoy our presents. We had to go off to our grandparents'. And as we piled back in the car with our presents, my father began to drive more slowly. He noticed the family that was still sitting there outside the closed gas station in the cold. The closer we got, the slower the car went. Suddenly my father pulled over and said, "I can't stand it."

"What?" asked my mother.

"It's that family back there at Pan Am, standing in the rain and the snow. They've got children. It's Christmas."

When my father pulled over into the service station, I saw that there were five of them. Parents, three children—two girls and a small boy. My father rolled down his window. "Merry Christmas," he said.

"Howdy," the man replied. He was tall and had to stoop slightly to peer into the car. Jill, Sharon, and I stared at the three children outside.

"Waiting on the bus?" my father asked, as the children stared back.

The man said they were going to Birmingham, where he had a brother and prospects of a job.

"Well, that bus isn't going to come along for some hours, and you're getting wet standing here. Windburn's just a couple miles up the road. They've got a shed with a cover there, some benches," my father said. "Why don't you all get in the car and I'll run you up there?"

The man thought about it for a moment, then beckoned to his family. They climbed in the car. No luggage, only the clothes they were wearing. Once they were settled in, my father looked back over his shoulder and asked the children if Santa had found them yet. Three glum faces.

"I think so," said my father, winking at my mother. "Because when I saw Santa this morning, he told me he was having trouble finding y'all and asked me if he could leave your toys at our house. We'll go get them before I take you to the bus stop."

When we got out of the car at our house, the three children ran through the front door straight to the toys that were spread out under our Christmas tree. One of the girls spied Jill's doll and immediately hugged it to her breast. Another girl picked up something of mine. All this happened a long time ago, but the memory of it remains clear. This was the Christmas when my sisters and I learned the joy of making others happy.

My mother noticed that the middle child was wearing a short-sleeved dress, so she gave the girl Jill's only sweater to wear. My father invited them to join us at grandparents' for Christmas dinner, but the parents refused.

Back in the car on the way to Windburn, my father asked the man if he had money for the bus fare. His brother had sent the ticket, the man said. My dad reached into his pocket and pulled out five dollars, which was all he had left until his next payday. He pressed the money into the man's hand. The man tried to give it back, but my father insisted. "It'll be late when you get to Birmingham, and these children will be hungry before then. Take it. I've been broke before. I know what it's like when you can't feed your family."

We left them there at the bus stop in Windburn. And as we drove away, I watched out the window as long as I could, looking back at the little girl hugging her new doll.

This is what we remember, you know, in the Buddhist teachings about the end of life.

One of the beautiful teachings is to say that as you approach your death, as you approach the end of your life, think back and bring into the heart and mind a few things, a few moments of goodness that you participated in. It doesn't have to be Mother Teresa building a nonprofit and saving thousands of lives. A few moments of goodness that gladden the heart—it makes such a difference to do so.

And here we are, the solstice coming, and there are thousands of acts of staggering generosity all day long. Mothers putting their tortillas and rice gruel and croissant or whatever it happens to be, the millet, in the bowls of their children. People helping one another who are having trouble walking or opening a door or crossing the street.

The solstice invites us to see with the eyes of wonder. And things keep getting reborn. Every day, there are a hundred billion new blood cells born in your body. Two million blood cells in a second. I say that sentence and you've got ten million new blood cells. How does that happen? They're busy replicating and making new cells. It's extraordinary. And you get half a million new skin cells every hour, so that when you reach over and kiss someone's cheek, you leave a few skin cells, you take some, they drop on the floor. It's okay, your body says, here's another half million in the next hour.

I remember going to where there'd been a big forest fire in Point Reyes National Park and being shocked two years later—because it's an area where there's rain, so it's not slow like a desert to rebuild itself—and there were bushes and trees already. It was like filling itself up. Life does not want to stop.

And I remember being in the hospital with my twin brother when he was dying of blood cancer. He was in this great giant hospital, and about every twenty or thirty minutes, there would be this beautiful chime that came over the loudspeaker. A nurse came in and I said, "What's that chime?" And she said, "Oh, a baby's been born."

It's so amazing what we are and how we sit. The eyes of wonder, astonishing. And the solstice says, yes, here we are. Let's just stop and listen. And then the heart can't do anything but tenderness and mercy when we really listen. We light our candles to remember, to join in, to carry our inner beauty and join it with the light of the heart of the world, of so many beings. So many staggering acts of generosity.

One more story, another tearjerker—forgive me. My daughter was telling me about how she was hanging out downtown with a friend this weekend when a very visibly pregnant woman with a thirteen-month-old toddler in a stroller approached her. The woman needed money for a hotel room. It was nighttime and she and her baby were cold. A stranger had given them a blanket but didn't want to give her the ninety dollars she needed for a hotel room in case it was a scam. So my daughter sent her seventy dollars by an app on the spot, and her friend gave her all the cash he had in his wallet. She had more than ninety.

When I asked her about it, my daughter told me she would rather be the kind of person who got scammed out of seventy dollars than the kind of person who didn't help a mama and her baby sleep in a warm place. That's what you carry. That's who you really are. That's what was born in you—the great heart of compassion and tenderness.

So the goal: to see this world with mercy, with tenderness, to see it with the eyes of wonder.

Sharon Salzberg, beloved loving-kindness teacher, colleague, friend for fifty years—when she was in India, because she'd suffered tremendously, she really had a background of great trauma, and she had an ability to take that and turn it and go very deep. She became a really profound meditator in a year or two with her teacher. And one day, this was maybe 1971, somebody gave her a copy of the new book at the time called Zen Mind, Beginner's Mind. And she looked at it, a Zen book, Beginner's Mind—she said, "I'm not a beginner," and tossed it aside, so she says. And then a little while later, some days later, she picked it up, thumbed through it, and she read the beginning, the astonishing, beautiful words of Suzuki Roshi: that the goal of meditation is always to keep your beginner's mind, to see with eyes of mindful, loving awareness.

And when we sit together in that stillness, it's as if it invites in us the birth of the child of the spirit—to quiet the mind, to tend the heart. That's meditation. Mystery, quiet, tend, open.

And then what? You know, in Zen, there are only two things. You sit and you sweep the garden. And it doesn't matter how big the garden is. This is what we're here for. We sit and quiet the mind and open the heart. And then we add our gifts. We add our light. We add our heart, our understanding to this troubled and magnificent and amazing and beautiful world.

The great explorer Wade Davis explained, despair is a failure of imagination. And so when you tend the garden, it doesn't have to be grand. It doesn't have to be the great nonprofit, the Mother Teresa sleeping on the streets with the dying homeless in Calcutta. As she started, you can start small. You get quiet and you ask yourself, what wants to be born? What can I touch in the fabric of the world with the light of my own heart and mercy? Where can I mend a little bit of that fabric? My words, my care, my energy, my gifts, my resources.

Here's a story. You may have heard it, but it's worthy for the time of the approaching solstice.

"Tell me the weight of a snowflake," a tiny mouse asked a wild dove. "Nothing more than nothing," came the answer. "In that case, I must tell you a marvelous story," the tiny mouse replied. "I sat on a branch of a fir tree close to its trunk when it began to snow. Not a blizzard, no, just like in a dream, without a sound, without any violence, and having nothing better to do"—and you've all been in those quiet snowstorms—"I decided to count the snowflakes settling on the twigs of my branch. And the number was exactly 3,741,952. When the 3,741,953rd snowflake dropped onto the branch—nothing more than nothing, as you would say—the branch broke off." Having said that, the mouse went away. And the dove, an authority on spiritual matters since the time of Noah, thought about this to herself and said, "Perhaps there's only one person's voice lacking for peace to come about in this world."

You have gifts. You have a light that you carry. You can see it in others. You want to protect it. You want to share it. And when you do, you become a bodhisattva—not in some grand "sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all" kind of way, but the bodhisattva who turns her heart to compassion, to care for all she encounters. Even if the sun should arise in the West, the bodhisattva has only one way. No matter what happens, this is the light of your heart. This is what you're here for—to add your gifts and your light to yourself too. You know how that goes.

And remember the instructions from the Buddha, from the verses in the Dhammapada, some of the most beloved verses repeated for 2,600 years again and again: Live in joy, in love, even among those who hate. Live in joy, in health, even among the afflicted. Live in joy, in peace, even among the troubled. Look within, be still, free from fears and attachment. Know the sweet joy of living in the way, the Dharma, bringing that joy into the world.

Solstice—a great invitation. Take your time. Time stops. It's timeless. It says, listen. What really matters? Who would you call? What would you say? Why are you waiting?

It was so great. Stephen would just get everybody to stop for a moment and go, "Oh, yeah." So beautiful. And you are that. You are that. That's what's born in you, and you get to give it. That's what you're here for.

And so the great Christian theologian and mystic Howard Thurman says: "When the song of the angels is stilled, when the star in the sky is gone, when the kings and princes are home, when the shepherds are back with their flocks, the work of Christmas year round begins. To find the lost, to heal the broken, to feed the hungry, to release the prisoner, to rebuild the nations, to bring peace among the peoples, and to make music in the heart."

So let's sit for a few moments. Just notice, rest.

All right, dear ones. We have a bit of time for dialogue—questions, reports, descriptions of what's happening. You can raise your hand. Sobat is what the Sufis call it, which is a conversation of the heart.

"Hi, Jack."

"Hi, Susie."

"It's been many, many years that we've been sitting on Monday nights."

"Yes, many, many years."

"And I left Marin and here I am in San Diego. That was many years ago. I wrote my first book of fiction, and one of the reviews said, 'My mother was a drug addict. I could never understand why this happened to her until I read this little book. And I got it. And it wasn't my fault.' It was such an amazing thing to have happen. I've worked with tons of women and children who have been in terrible situations, but to know that just this tiny book reaches out to someone's heart—it just made me so open, and I was so grateful to be able to reach out and still touch people at eighty in San Diego."

"Hey, you look pretty good for eighty."

"So do you! We're a month apart. We're hanging in there."

"Yeah, we are. I look like my grandmother."

"Well, you do as well. That happens. I have a grandfather, yeah."

"So, Susie, I have to say—I want to raise my candle up for you. The fact that you were able to touch this person's heart like that, this is the kind of thing you remember at the end of your life. Just that one thing makes such a difference in this world. And I'm so touched by it. For those of us who live with a lot of suffering in our families—yes, there's enormous suffering in societies, in the world—but children tend to think it's their fault. Because to think it's the big people's fault is scarier."

It's terrifying to contemplate. What do I do with that? But if you think it's your fault, you think, well, maybe if I make myself better, things will change. And your gift to her was such a beautiful gift. Thank you.

I love you so much.

Well, I love you too. This is wonderful.

Happy eighty. You've got some more beautiful things to do.

We both do.

Peace out.

Good solstice to you.

I just want to thank you for that dharma talk. It's just what I needed, and I feel really opened and hopeful and connected to sangha. I really appreciate the words that you share.

Thank you so much. I just want to stay with you for a moment because there's a little glow. I'm very glad about that. Does it inspire you to manifest in any particular way? Just curious.

Well, I think I've been struggling with negativity around me. It inspires me to hold my course.

And is it people around you, or is it the culture, the politics?

Well, it's probably everything, but it's some people. I moved away from my home where I've lived for many, many years. I moved down to Marin County to be near my grandkids, which is wonderful, but I haven't found my dear friends and family. So I'm around people whose outlook on life isn't where I want my path to be going.

Pause for a moment. This is really important, what you're talking about. Yes, there is negativity around, and people we know are in the society at large. That's part of the game. There were these monks and nuns who came to the Buddha and said, "Things are really negative around us. Maybe we should leave, go somewhere else." And he said, "Do you think you won't find it somewhere else? We stay." Then he said, "Stay. Hold the course. Stay with what's true for you."

Stay with what's true for you, which is your carrying of the light you have. If you could put it in a sentence or two, what would that message be? That's your message, not theirs.

Nothing's permanent. And just go towards the love. That's what helps. Go toward the love.

I'll put it on a bumper sticker. I like it. Especially since you're driving and you're going somewhere, you might as well drive toward the love.

Thank you, Claire.

Hi, Jack.

Hi, Toby. Hello, dear.

First of all, thank you, because no matter what happens, every so often I think, "Oh God, there's so much anger and violence and malice going on—how do you do anything about it?"

When 9/11 happened, I was in a skyscraper in New York, and people were telling me there might be another plane coming. I remember thinking, "If I die today, at least everybody that I love knows I love them." I remember thinking, okay, I really don't want to die, but at least that. At least that.

And so over the years since then, I've thought about what happens to the people who don't know that anybody loves them. There are so many kinds of love—I don't mean it has to even be personal. I do volunteer work, and I get to see a lot of people. And I realized how many of them have no idea that anybody sees them at all.

This is why I love the story about the dove, because I think maybe just to make a little difference—a little branch, maybe, for that dove to land on.

I've always been, although most people don't believe it, really shy. I feel I don't want to be intrusive. And I finally thought: just do it. So what if they don't like it?

I chose one person in particular who had what we might call a menial but really important job, because this is a rehab hospital. Nobody speaks to her, and she speaks to nobody. One time I asked her what she was doing for Thanksgiving. She said, "Oh, I'm feeding the homeless."

A couple of months later, I said, "Can I speak to you?" She said, "Is something wrong?" And I said, "No, I have a little gift for you, because I thought of you the other day and I thought how remarkable you are. And I bet nobody here knows." She said, "No, they don't. They don't know." She said, "This is wonderful. You made my day."

Now she waves to me. She smiles. And I thought, it's not a big thing, but at least she knows.

I've tried this in different ways. It's not about me—it's about seeing this response of somebody. Someone said to me, "This is about love." And it is about love. I found myself so much more open. My husband would laugh when a good waiter would come on a busy day and I'd say, "Should I tell your manager?" And then he saw them say, "Don't move—my manager's over there. I'm bringing him over this minute to hear that you thought I was good."

So what you did for me tonight, and you've done it for forty years—thank you—is that you let me see that maybe it's not unimportant. Maybe it's something to just keep doing, because maybe I might be the only voice that person hears. And if so, maybe that counts.

So touched. I'd like you to look at all the little people in the squares on the screen. See them, and realize that what you just described, you can do that. They're all now being seen and recognized and kind of loved up by you. You can do that.

Even tonight, what you described, that woman didn't know she was being recognized. Her beauty wasn't being seen. And there they are, all these people, many of them smiling, being acknowledged. I hope—because I think this is what we can do for each other. Maybe we can't contribute financially or maybe we can't physically do some things, but we can see each other.

And the thing it's done for me is it has convinced me how many more wonderful, beautiful people there are in this world than nasty, vindictive, or disturbed people. And I'm so much richer for knowing that. In so many ways.

Thank you, Toby.

Thank you, Jack. That's a gift.

You have really made this possible.

Well, you too. We're in it together.

Let's do one more. Nancy.

Hi, Nancy.

I don't know if you remember me, but a couple months ago you were doing a talk and I had just been to Homeboy Industries. So we were talking about the wonderful work that he does, just loving everyone—loving even the... He does work with gang members who've killed people, and he just loves them. He loves them back to sanity and he loves them back to wholeness.

That has really been helpful in my life, to love family members that are having a hard time. But I have to say that just recently I read your book, A Path with Heart, finally. I think I had read it once before, because when I went to find it on my Kindle, it was there already. And at the very end of it, you describe how when you were a monk, at one point you were asked to bow to the leaders, to the teachers. And that was fine. And then you were asked to bow to your peers, and that was a little bit difficult. But eventually you loved it, because you could see the respect. And you realized that bowing to every single person, no matter who they are or what they do... at least this is what I got out of it. And all of a sudden I realized that respect is just as important as love—or it's kind of like a different kind of love. Anyway, that really touched me deeply, and I thank you for it.

I thank you too. And I want to acknowledge a couple of things. Yes, I remember our conversation. So for those listening, if you have not read Father Greg Boyle's book Tattoos on the Heart, it's one of the most astonishing modern books of spiritual teaching that I could recommend to anyone. The fact that he does that work, as you say, with gang members who've been shooting at each other, and then they're there in the same room with him, ones who are enemies—his wisdom and his big heart is enough to hold them all. It's just remarkable.

And then you say maybe respect is love, which is one of the themes of the beginning of this new book I have. I start with a story that I've told here probably recently, of a little boy who goes out to a restaurant. He's seven years old, with his parents. The waitress comes and says, "What will you have?" And he says, "I'd like a hot dog and a Coke." And his mom says, "He'll have the meatloaf, mashed potatoes, and a glass of milk." The waitress takes all the other orders, and then as she's leaving the table, she looks back at the little boy and says, "Do you want ketchup or mustard on your hot dog?" And he lights up and says, "She thinks I'm real."

And when you talk about love being respect, it really is a dimension of love—to see with the eyes of respect for everybody. Part of it is to see also what they've suffered. Some of the people who are doing the most egregious things have also suffered: their mental illness, or the suffering of their community, or all kinds of other things. And just from the heart to see with respect everybody's journey.

It doesn't mean you can't stand up, you can't stop. Thank you to Ahmad Ahmed, who grabbed that guy in Sydney with his gun and stopped him from killing more people. Hallelujah. Thank you for doing that. Doesn't mean you can't stand up, but you can do it with love. And that's really what you're saying.

He transforms these guys, and some of them are like his top administrators now. It's just magnificent to see how these people can transform, how we all have the capability of transforming our lives. Seeing the goodness in each being.

And I just thank you for your stories tonight. The snowflake story—there's one person who maybe can change peace for the world. And that can be you or me or any of us tonight.

So let's pause, because I want everybody who's listening to hear that this last half hour or however long it's been, I haven't been actually teaching. I've been going, "Yeah, yeah, yeah, great, thank you." Because the teachings have been coming so beautifully. It's crowdsourced now. We're all carrying it. And we're all carrying our light.

So let's pause for a minute. And just let yourself reflect and sense—as the world is turning and the solstice is coming and the great cosmic pause, the sacred pause—sense that you're here for something, here to add your gifts, here to add your light. And it starts exactly here, where we are. Like the snowflakes, every gesture and voice and moment of respect. What a gift you carry. That's who you are. Don't be shy.

So let's just be quiet for thirty seconds. Maybe look at the screen if you want while you're quiet and beam a little love and light to all the faces in the little squares. Lots of people we know, some we don't know. They're all weird, you know? Take a look, right? Aren't we? And they're all immensely interesting and wild and lovable. They all have a light. They all carry something beautiful. Every one of them.

So thank you, dear ones. Have good holy days, as they're called. It's not just about shopping. It is the holy days. And I'll see you anon. Take good care.

See?

So thank you, dear ones. Have good holy days—as they're called. It's not just about shopping; these truly are the holy days. I'll see you anon. Take good care.

CHAPTER 58

Living with Freedom and Love

Jack Kornfield · 1h41

> In this heartfelt Monday night talk, Jack Kornfield weaves together guided meditation, personal stories, and timeless Buddhist wisdom to address how we can live with freedom and love during challenging times. The evening begins with a profound gratitude meditation, inviting practitioners to thank the breath, body, heart, and mind for all they carry, ultimately resting in the vast field of loving awareness that is our true nature.
> Kornfield shares recent experiences—from Ram Dass legacy retreats to teaching in Costa Rica, working with trauma specialists, and developing ethical AI—illustrating how the Dhamma applies across all contexts. He recounts Christina Figueres' transformative time with Thích Nhất Hạnh before the Paris Climate Accord, demonstrating how shifting from separation to interconnection can change everything. Drawing on teachings from Ajahn Chah, Nisargadatta, and the Majjhima Nikāya, he emphasizes that liberation comes not from attachment to views or preferences, but from recognizing ourselves as the spacious awareness witnessing all experience.
> The talk addresses working with suffering, trauma, and outrage without letting these experiences harden the heart. Kornfield distinguishes between rage and outrage, inviting practitioners to drop beneath reactive emotions to touch the depth of caring underneath. He emphasizes the importance of saṅgha—that we cannot navigate these waters alone but need the collective wisdom and support of spiritual community. The session concludes with questions about caring for aging parents, holding grief alongside gratitude, and the practice of mettā for those who are suffering.

It seems especially important in these somewhat chaotic and, for many people, uncertain and difficult times that we find a way to come together and link our hands and our hearts and our consciousness in a way that brings out benevolence and goodness and courage and presence and love—all those values that are central to the teachings of the Buddha, but that are really part of all natural and wise spiritual life.

Monday nights, for me—I began teaching them more than forty years ago, in the mid-1980s. Over the first thirty-plus years, I taught them every week, which was wonderful, often in person at Spirit Rock. Now, in this cycle of pulling back a bit in certain ways from teaching, I do them periodically for Spirit Rock. What I love about them is they're a way for me to both speak things that are tender and important and hopefully helpful to you—drawing from more than fifty years of practice and teaching as a Buddhist teacher and psychologist—and equally to connect with you in the questions and responses.

Whatever brings you this evening, wherever you are, you're truly welcome. Spirit Rock is a welcoming place that invites you to take your seat among the generations and thousands of years of people who have practiced compassion, loving-kindness, mindfulness, and liberation.

So let's begin. Let yourself find a way to sit that's stable and comfortable and at ease. Once you find a stable way to sit, when you're ready, allow your eyes to close gently. Perhaps take two or three long breaths to help you settle.

The spirit of tonight's meditation of mindful, loving awareness also invites a consciousness infused with gratitude. The great Christian mystic Meister Eckhart said, "If you made no other prayer in your whole life but 'thank you,' that would be enough." Thank you for it all—the beauty and the trouble.

My dear friend and colleague Brother David Steindl-Rast is about to turn one hundred years old. He has a fantastic website called gratefulness.org, full of practices of gratitude.

So here you are. Your eyes are closed. You've taken a few breaths. Let yourself settle. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Roll your head in a little bit of a circle to release your neck. Come to a simple upright posture. Take another deep breath and let the shoulders relax. Let the arms and hands rest easily.

You're inhabiting your whole body with awareness. Feel the weight of your body on the seat and how you can settle in. Sink into it and feel underneath—the ground and the earth. You are part of the earth, which is true. You take your seat, connected and steady.

Let the belly be soft and the breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, to receive whatever arises with kindness, with compassion.

Now, with this embodied presence, begin to notice the experience of this mysterious body that consciousness inhabits. You can feel the whole field of sensations of all different kinds, just now, without trying to fix or change—just open simply. Sense this field of vibration and tingling, warm and cold, the whole body seated on the earth, part of the earth. Relax and settle as you do.

Add a little half-smile to your lips, as Thich Nhat Hanh has suggested. Even if things are difficult, you are the Buddha seated in the midst of it all.

Now notice how your body is breathing itself. Nothing to do or change. Just feel it. It breathes the whole body—or the coolness in the nostrils, or the rise and fall of chest or belly. Wherever you feel the movement of breath, relax into it with a half-smile.

Notice, as you do, inviting the breath to breathe any way it wants, how your breath is your friend. It's kept you alive for all these years. It breathes you together with the people nearby, exchanging breaths in the same room, in the same city, all breathing together. It breathes you with the trees and the plants and the oceans. The whole planet is breathing together.

Relax and feel yourself being breathed.

Half smile, gracious. Relax, sense the rhythm, just as it is.

Now say thank you to your breath. Thank you, dear breath. Thank you for taking care of me, for breathing me again and again. Thank you for connecting me in this ocean of air. Thank you—as if to bow to the breath—for caring and loving me. Smiling a little. And notice how it feels to be grateful for breath.

Now open the mindfulness, the mindful loving awareness, to notice the whole field of sensation of your body. This breathing body. And when you pay attention, there's no solid body. There are areas of warmth and cool, tingling, pressure, pain, pleasure, vibration. The field of the body experience is always changing, even very subtly—vibrating, moving. And you can relax and hold it all in mindful, loving awareness.

Notice what happens when you invite the body to relax, when you hold it in kind attention. You can also notice how much your body carries. Yes, there are pleasures for which you can be grateful. And there are the burdens—the stress that's carried in the shoulders, the tightness in the gut or the back or the jaw. All the things that your body carries for you, along with all the sweetness of life. Notice how much it carries with the same loving awareness, not trying to change it, but holding it in kindness and compassion for all it does.

Now you can say thank you to your body with this loving awareness. Thank you for all you carry, just as you thanked the breath. Thank this body of life for carrying you through pleasure and pain, through difficulty and beauty. Thank you. I'm okay just now, present with you. You can relax. Thank you. And notice, as you hold the whole of your body with kindness, how it responds.

Now shift your attention to the area of the heart—not just the physical heart, but the emotional heart, the feeling heart. Notice the state of your heart just now. Peaceful, sad, excited, longing, loving, anxious, frustrated—all the emotions of the heart. You are acknowledging what's present, what your heart carries just now, with a respectful, loving awareness, just noticing with appreciation how much the heart carries.

And wrap the heart with kindness and compassion, especially the hard things that it carries. Hold it with so much kindness, as if you could hold a child in your arms. This amazing human heart you carry—all the longings and fear and love and opening—you hold it all. So tender. If you want, you can even put a hand on your heart. Wrap it in kindness and compassion. And that little half smile.

And say thank you. Thank you for caring so much. You can relax. I'm meditating. I'm okay just now. Take a deep breath. Invite your heart to relax and put down its worries. It's okay. Thank you for caring so much. We're good right now. Thank you. And notice what happens.

Now shift your attention to your mind—that very, very busy force that secretes thoughts out of nowhere like the salivary gland secretes saliva. They just appear: pictures and words and plans and memories and concerns and hopes and scenarios and music and all the things the mind keeps creating, nonstop. First, you just feel the movement of the mind, and you sense it with mindful, loving awareness.

Not trying to change it or make it different. Just feel its movement and its power. And wrap the whole movement of mind with compassion and kindness. It's so busy trying to take care of you—to plan and protect and imagine and help and create and fix, to be and become.

You just wrap that whole thinking, planning, envisioning, remembering, imagining, creating—you wrap that whole busyness of mind in a great big circle of compassion and kindness. And say thank you. Thank you for working so hard to protect me and help me, to get me through this life in a good way. Working so hard. You can relax now. I'm meditating. It's okay. We're all right just now. Take a rest and soften and quiet, and trust that from this quieter place we can navigate beautifully.

And notice what happens when you bow to the busyness of mind, surround it with kindness and say, thank you, it's okay. Thank you for all you do. You can relax now a bit. You can quiet. We're okay.

And feel the space that gratitude opens, that kindness opens. For who you are is bigger than the mind. You're the awareness, bigger than all the emotions, that notices the joys and sorrows and tears and longing. You're bigger than the changing sensations of the body. You're the field of awareness itself, consciousness itself, that was born into this body. Yes, you've been aware of the feelings and thoughts and body, but who you are is this awareness itself—vast and timeless. Rest in it. Relax into it. It's who you really are.

And notice how in this open awareness, there are not rigid boundaries. Yes, there are boundaries of the body, and deep and shallow breaths, and emotions that come and go. But let yourself feel that you are connected with life, with all of it, and with all that you care about. The breathing and breath and well-being of so many others that share this life. The trees and plants and oceans—you breathe with them all. And when you open, there's this profound caring, because it's all you. It's all who you are. All of it.

And as the great sage Nisargadatta said, wisdom tells me I am nothing, and love tells me I am everything. And in this space of loving awareness, you say thank you. Thank you to the breath that breathes you. Thank you to this amazing body that experiences and carries and opens you. Thank you to your heart and all the love and longing and sweetness and pain, the grief and excitement and tenderness. Thank you. Thank you, dear heart.

And to the busy mind that's trying to help you and protect you, take care of you—thank you. And to all the interwoven life on this earth that you are a part of, the suffering and the joy, the beginnings and endings. Feel the natural care and love for it all, that you will do what you can to care.

And who you are is the vast awareness born into this body, saying thank you. Thank you to it all.

When you're ready, take one more or two more deep breaths and then gently let your eyes open. Make a last bow of thank you to it all.

In a couple of minutes, we'll take a five-minute break before the teachings. In this quiet space, I would invite you to put into the chat anything you learned or discovered or felt or experienced that was meaningful for you in this meditation. We get to share together.

"Being held in a field of love, suddenly everything becomes more simple." "My heart was grateful to rest, dissolving into separateness." "Difficulty, but being held by Jack's voice." "A much needed pause." "Stillness and presence." "I lose sight of my creativity and imagination and wonder—thank you." "Surprised when tears came." "The great vast peace of being." "I loved encouragement to thank my mind." "Like the first things I really heard today, and a deep universal sense of gratitude." So much more.

Thank you all for being part of that meditation, and thank you for joining this evening class and sitting.

Now I'd like to speak to you as a teacher. It's kind of my job—you've got to come here and say something. I want to talk about freedom and liberation and love in a more embodied way.

It's been some months since I've taught a Monday night, and I considered doing a traditional talk—the heart practices, the inner path of insight meditation, or the interpersonal steps of the Eightfold Path: right speech and right action and so forth. Then I thought maybe it would be interesting to be more informal tonight and talk about what life has presented me in the months since I've been here with you.

I've been traveling and also engaged in teachings. I teach online, for example, the MMTCP—Mindfulness Meditation Teacher Certification Program—which has been wonderful and currently has one thousand people in it. We've now had eight thousand people in seventy-five countries who've gone through this training that Tara and Brock and I and others do. It's very inspiring to have people in Nairobi working in a school with kids, or a women's center in Lahore, Pakistan, teaching mindfulness and forgiveness and compassion.

Along with that kind of teaching, Trudy and I were in Hawaii in December—not a hardship post. But we went, as we do every year, for the Ram Dass Legacy Retreat. We'd been with him for many years, and after he died, we and Krishna Das and others kept it going.

I love teaching with Trudy. Basically, I love being married to Trudy because she's like the coolest, best, amazing, wonderful woman I could be with. She's really extraordinary, and I feel so grateful for her—joyful, wise, dharma, playful spirit.

There in Hawaii, there were Ram Dass teachings and stories. I remember when I first met Ram Dass—he was such an amazing teacher back in 1972, and when I listened, he was such a great storyteller. I loved that channel of storytelling. Later on, when I worked with him and visited, after we'd been teaching together, he said, "You know, you tell too many stories." And I said, "Ram Dass, you know, I learned this somewhere, and I still love doing it." And he laughed.

What was beautiful when Ram Dass taught is he talked about the liberation of the heart and how we could love anywhere and love anything. He spoke of what it was like to be with his guru, who accepted every single part of him and saw no impurities. In India, it's called "the glance of mercy"—when someone sees into your heart and your soul and loves you. Ram Dass was so transformed by that.

And at the same time as he was teaching, he was this great public neurotic because he would talk about all the times he flunked the course. When he was a new teacher wearing the white robes and the beard and his beads, he said, "I'd go out there and the first thing I'd do would be to count the house, see how many people came to see me." And of course, then he would share it. There was something so liberating because he wasn't attached to who he was. He was playing with it.

His Be Here Now, which changed much of the culture, really invited us into a field of aloha, of love, using that Hawaiian expression. As it says in the Metta Sutta of loving kindness—omitting none, this is Sylvia Boorstein's favorite phrase—to love, omitting none. And so there was such inspiration from Ram Dass, even at the last of his life, where he became so loving and pure-hearted.

There he was in his wheelchair. He'd been in a wheelchair with this major stroke for twenty years, couldn't move his arm and leg on one side of his body. Lots of pain and infections. Someone who was visiting said, "Ram Dass, are you in pain?" And he said, "Yes, some." He paused for a bit and then said, "I love my pain."

What an extraordinary statement. In the great teachings of Zen Master Sengcan, the Third Zen Patriarch Ancestor, he says, "The great way is not difficult for those who are not attached to their preferences." Ram Dass began to embody for all of us this extraordinary capacity—yes, he had preferences, but not to be attached, to be free.

This is really the teachings. If you look in the texts of the Buddha, he talks about the ways we get attached. And of course my teacher Ajahn Chah was very much—his simple teaching was to let things go. You'd come and he'd ask, "Are you suffering?" If you said no, he said, "Great." And if you said yes, he said, "Oh, something else to let go of."

When you read the teachings of the Buddha, he talks about the way we hold on to our views, to criticism and praise, and so forth. He said first, to be liberated is to not be attached to your views, not to be fixed in the way you think things are supposed to be. And then he went on—this is one of the few times I think he was kind of making a joke in the text—where he said those who cling to their opinions go around the world bothering everyone else. There was this invitation for a gracious heart, peaceful, smiling, not attached to our views and opinions. The great way is not difficult if you are not attached to your preferences of any kind.

It was very pure-hearted at the end of Ram Dass's life, and it inspired me and it should inspire you because this is the invitation to freedom. Not your opinions and not the way it's supposed to be. Sometimes it hurts and sometimes it's pleasurable, and it just is what it is. Who you are is the space of loving awareness, the witness, the consciousness.

So then we went on to Costa Rica to teach, Trudy and I, where we've been going now for several years to write and teach. Trudy calls it adult summer camp because we're there with Dan Siegel and Elissa Epel and Roshi Joan Halifax and Bessel van der Kolk and others.

One of the most inspiring people we were sitting with was Christiana Figueres, whose father was the founding president of Costa Rica, who disbanded the army and said, "We'll put all the military money into health care and education." We were talking about climate change, inner and outer climate.

Before the Paris Climate Accord some years ago, she was a UN diplomat in charge of organizing it. And it was terrible. There was so much infighting between the different countries—whose fault it was and who was going to pay. She was kind of desperate. A friend said, "You know, there's this place in southern France with a Vietnamese monk, Thich Nhat Hanh. I think you should go visit him."

In the midst of this terrible time, she went down and spent a couple of weeks with Thich Nhat Hanh, and it changed everything. She sat and he showed her what it was like to live with a peaceful heart, what it was like not to be attached to your opinions. He had the deep teaching of interdependence that she now teaches. Freedom from separation.

She knew when she spent that time with him that she had to step out of all the conflict of her life. He said, "Walk with me so slowly. Sit. Feel how you're connected with everything. It all breathes together." And it changed her.

She went back to Paris, and instead of seeing the enemies and who was at fault and who was to be judged and who owed money and who was the victim—which was the consciousness of that movement there—she understood from Thich Nhat Hanh that it was all a big family. Of course, you know how families are.

They're not that easy. But we're all there together. And it changed everything. She was able to get—whatever it was—198 countries to sign on to the Paris Climate Accord. And of course, our conversation went on: well, what about now, where it's being undone? But it's not completely undone. We have to stand up and work for it. The consciousness of humanity has changed in many cases. And there was a sense of freedom there—the freedom from separation that the Buddha taught, of liberation, that you're not separate.

A poem from Alison Luderman:

Sun drapes a buttered scarf across my cheek.
Rose opens herself to my glance.
Rain shares its divine melancholy.
The whole world keeps whispering to you,
nibbling your ear like a neglected lover.
Sun drapes a buttered scarf across your cheek.
Rose opens herself to your glance.
Rain shares its divine melancholy.
The whole world keeps whispering to you.

And Christiana embodied this. This was the teaching in the forest monastery—staying connected to the natural world. If you feel bad, don't even bother raising your hand. If things seem really dire, go out and put your hand on a tree. Stand there for five or ten minutes and let it speak to you. Listen to it. Feel the depth. Remember that after the Buddha's enlightenment—at least as the story goes—he moved away from the Bodhi tree and sat for six days and nights in gratitude, simply gazing at the tree and the life and the enlightenment that it had allowed him to have. So when you're lost, find a tree. Find a place in nature.

Then, staying in Costa Rica, I got sick. I'd actually been a little bit sick before I left. I developed a systemic infection and ended up having to go to the hospital for five days. Now I'm quite fine. But I thought, "Ah, hospital—I can practice. I'll do my breath, I'll do mindfulness, whatever. It's okay." And the staff was immensely caring. In Costa Rica, the greeting is pura vida—pure life, or pure heart. They say it and they mean it. And nobody sues. It's a sort of national health care system, so you don't have to worry about litigation. No one scares you, telling you all the horrible things they need to disclose so you don't sue them. Instead, what you get are these loving, caring doctors and nurses and health workers.

I thought, okay. I go in the hospital. I'm cool with it. My daughter came down. She said, "Dad, you're eighty years old. You're in the hospital. I have to spend some time with you." And we had a beautiful time together. Trudy couldn't come because she had a bad cold and didn't want other people to get sick. After my daughter left, I still had all these tubes poked into me. They wake you up at night, they spear you, they do all this. I had a kind of rough night, thinking, "God, how long will this go? Maybe I'll be stuck here for weeks."

Maybe I'll die here, whatever. You know how the mind is. How long will it be? What happens?

And then I remembered visiting Ajahn Chah after he was in his late sixties. He had diabetes, water in the brain. He had been in the hospital and had a shunt put from his brain down. He went through a really very difficult physical time. I was visiting him and I said, "I'm glad you're out of the hospital." And then I said, of course, from the beginning you always gave us the Buddhist teaching that this human life also has old age, sickness, and death. It's kind of like a Buddhist mantra. And I said that to him, and he looked at me—here he was like sixty-eight and I was like twenty-eight—and he shook his head and he said, "Don't you say that so lightly."

You know, it all passed, but it doesn't mean that it's easy. I like Suzuki Roshi's phrase: suffering Buddha, sun Buddha, moon Buddha, joyful Buddha, suffering Buddha. This is the dance of human incarnation. And then when you read the texts of the Buddha, when things that are difficult arise, sometimes there's the phrase: bear it as a noble one, bear it with dignity. And that's your freedom. Not that it's not difficult, but it's all part of the game, because who we are is the loving witness of it. And our body goes through all the things it does.

So I got this message—would I do some teachings for the Mantra Festival in Ukraine? I said, "What do you want me to do?" They said, "We have ten thousand people who come online mostly, who've been experiencing so much loss, so much grief and fear, cruelty, such deep uncertainty. And we want to know if there's some way that you can help us to be with all of this and not let it poison our hearts. Not let it harden our hearts."

And of course, I thought about that statement from the Buddha sitting under the Bodhi tree when he was attacked by the armies of Mara—first all the desire and temptation, then by spears and arrows and armies, and finally by doubt itself: "What right do you have to sit here?" And the Buddha's response was to reach down with one hand and say, "The earth is my witness." The earth is my witness that I have the right to sit here as a human being with dignity and care, to be here with compassion for all, to be free. And this is the invitation for you.

When I think about what I'll be saying to the people in Ukraine, I think about how Ajahn Chah's forest monastery was in the Ubon province, on the border of both Cambodia and Laos, during the American bombing of those countries—enormous amounts of bombing. The jets and bombers would go overhead and people would say, "You have to do something. You have to get out and stop the war." And Ajahn Chah would say, "You have to stop the war where it begins, in your own heart. Learn to sit and stop the war." He said, "Wars come and go. Yes, you can go out and do what you can, but the monastery is a living library, a living legacy to teach you that there can be a place of peace."

The jets would fly overhead, activists would come, people who'd been soldiers. And you'd enter into the monastery, this forest, and people were so respectful and loving. You'd remember: What does it mean to be human? What does it mean to be wise?

Now, it's not that easy. And I don't know what I can say to the people of Ukraine, because I can barely imagine living through what many of them have. But I do know what it's been like to work in the past with people who literally survived the Holocaust in Nazi Germany, or survived genocide—Rohingya, Darfur. And I pass on the teachings of the Buddha and my own understanding, which is kind of limited. But I also borrow the moral authority of my teachers.

I may not be able to say to a Holocaust survivor what they should do about forgiveness or releasing the burdens of their heart, but I can tell them about Maha Ghosananda—after all nineteen members of his family were killed, his temple burned, the whole village destroyed, and two million people killed in the Cambodian genocide. I can describe him standing in front of a hundred thousand people in the refugee camp, chanting, "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed," until they all began to chant with him.

To borrow the moral authority of the Dalai Lama, of Maha Ghosananda, and others, and say: this is possible, and it's possible for you. Don't let them poison your heart.

I've been working with various philanthropists, and I think of one great philanthropist who's kind of like George Soros—enormous benefit, and attacked as George Soros has been.

And I said to them, "You know, all the attacks you're getting for supporting things that we might—some of us anyway—might be in favor of: mitigating climate change, or greater equality, or education for everyone, or care for the poorest, or healthcare across Africa, or whatever it happened to be, lots of those." And I knew how difficult it was, and I said, "You know, you need backup."

They said, "What do you mean by backup?"

The next week I went to visit them, and I brought about a dozen or fifteen photographs. One of Martin Luther King. One of Leymah Gbowee, who got the Nobel Prize in Liberia. Wangari Maathai, who got the Nobel Prize for the Kenyan Green Belt in East Africa. Sojourner Truth. Harriet Tubman. Mahatma Gandhi. I filled out this big table in their office.

And I said, "I want you to sit with them and gaze at them and imagine them gazing back. Because what's happening to you, it's not new. They've been through it. All of them were attacked. Many were in prison. Feel the dignity and the character and the dharma of wisdom and compassion they carried. This is you. This is your birthright. These are your people."

And we sat and we practiced together. Bear it with dignity.

I'm supposed to go teach at Oxford—Trudy and I both—in September. It's one of the biggest trauma conferences in the world, and it has the usual great trauma leaders of this time: Dick Schwartz with Internal Family Systems, Bessel van der Kolk of The Body Keeps the Score, Dan Siegel, probably Elissa Epel. Many of these people are friends of mine.

And I thought, what am I going to teach there? Because all these people gathered at this great conference, and there are already so many people who are helpful for trauma. Then I realized that I had something to say.

When I trained as a psychologist fifty years ago—half a century—trauma was hardly mentioned. It wasn't there much in the clinical world. People were dealing with other things: your family, the judgment inside, all the fears, all that stuff. And then in the decades since, there's been this revolution, when very fine teachers and clinicians have found ways to help with trauma. Peter Levine's Somatic Experiencing, working with the way trauma is held in the body. Bessel van der Kolk. The EMDR work of eye movement that really helps with trauma. Dick Schwartz and Internal Family Systems. Francine Shapiro.

So all this is great. But it's gotten out of balance the other way. Initially, there was not much attention to trauma. And now it's swung so that everything is trauma. "Tell me your name and what's your trauma." People are characterized that way. The problem is that they identify with it. The truth is we all carry trauma, but this trigger warning thing—"Oh, you have to be careful. I'm going to talk about the Cambodian genocide or the Holocaust. I better warn you first."

When you went to see Ajahn Chah in his forest monastery, he had at his fingertips the medicine of the Dharma. If you came in and you were a farmer and your barn burned down, he would help you with that grief. If you came in and you'd been a soldier and you had regrets for what you did, he would give you practices for healing. If you came in and you couldn't steady yourself because you were in a circumstance where you might lose your job and you were frightened and you didn't know what to do, he gave you a practice. If you came in and your children somehow were in danger, he would offer a practice.

For some people, it would be sitting meditation. For others, it would be loving-kindness for themselves or someone else. For some who couldn't even sit still, he would say, "Come here for a week or two and just do walking meditation. Feel your feet on the earth, or maybe touch the tree." For some people who were so discombobulated, he would say, "Go and join the monks and the lay people in the kitchen and spend a few weeks preparing food for others to eat, and let it help regulate you. All this stuff will come."

And we would sit and do some chanting: all things are impermanent, let's hold them all with compassion and loving-kindness, the Four Noble Truths—all of that. But he had the medicine because it was actually not trauma. It was suffering.

It was our universal human condition. And he didn't make it special or say, "You're the one," or "All of you have trauma." What you have is a human incarnation. And then he offered it in a beautiful way, just as the Buddha had said in the Anguttara Nikaya:

"Just as if there were a beautiful pond with pleasant shores, its water being clear, agreeable, cool, transparent. And a person came by, scorched and exhausted by heat and fatigue, parched and thirsty, having suffered greatly. And they would step into the pond and bathe and drink, and all their plight and fatigue and feverishness would be allayed."

And so, my friends, whenever one hears the Buddhist dharma and teachings—whether it be discourses, poetry, prose, explanations, marvelous statements—all one's plight and fatigue and the feverish burning of the heart are allayed.

This is what it was in that monastery. It wasn't "you're traumatized," but "you're human." And of course, we've all suffered loss and disappointment. We've all had this because it's being human. And yet the heart is big enough to hold it all and find a place of peace and dignity and loving awareness amidst it all.

A few more things, and then we'll get to some questions. I've been working in Silicon Valley and become part of a wonderful group of friends doing a venture capital firm called Wisdom Ventures, dedicated to bringing resources from people who want to invest into companies that promote compassion and mutual care and individual and collective well-being. It's been a true pleasure because we have a wonderful team—Bradley Horowitz, our former Surgeon General Vivek Murthy, who's been so great helping us look at companies doing drug development or mental health work and tackling loneliness.

Some of my favorite investments: we invested in a company that put blood pressure cuffs and blood oxygen monitors in Black barbershops across the South, because there are so many people in that community who don't necessarily have easy access to medical care. If you take your blood pressure and it's high, or you have a blood oxygen level that's low, the screen will say, "Here are the clinics, here are the free doctors, here's where you can go to get help."

We're also invested in ethical AI—if such a thing exists—but we're there to try to promote and prompt AI to be as compassionate and caring as it can. All of these efforts, led through my dear friend Bo Xiao, have led to working with many leaders in AI. In particular, I got called by a project called Positive AI. They want to find a way to create filters for wellbeing in all the large AI models—ChatGPT, Claude, Meta, and so forth—for all their answers. What they want to do, and what we've started to do, is create this huge dataset of wisdom and compassion from all traditions: indigenous, religious, psychological, philosophical. Starting with fifty contributors, then five hundred, and then through them, five thousand people beginning to crowdsource all the input we can.

I called in a lot of favors. I called all the spiritual teachers I know and said, "Would you help with this? Would you help us create this?" Because you can already ask ChatGPT or Claude to give you an answer from a place of wisdom. But not many people ask. You still have to ask directly. And remember that for ethics in AI models, most of the ethics come from the ordinary average of the entire internet. Think about that. Is that where we want our ethics to come from?

So instead, we're beginning to help train—through this process that we all hope works—a whole field through which the models and artificial intelligence can begin to sense what the common understandings of the wise heart are, of compassion, of mutual care.

Part of it is also the deep sense of questioning. When I work with people now, it used to be that as a teacher I would just answer questions. People would ask, I'd give an answer, and I thought that's what teachers are supposed to do. But now I'll say, "What makes you ask?" Because they might say, "Tell me about karma," and I could go on for an hour about the many kinds of karma. But if I say, "What makes you ask?" they might say, "Well, my younger sister died," or "My cousin won the lottery," or "My family has to move because of insecurity in the economy or immigration." As soon as they answer immediately and directly, then we can have a real conversation.

As William Blake said, "If one is to do good, it must be in the minute particulars."

So, what makes you ask? We talk about that, and then I'll say, "What does the wisest part of you say to this?" Very often it's amazing what the wisest part will say, but people forget to ask. And then I might say, if it's a group, "What have others learned about this?"—about grieving a family member, or caring for someone, or having to move suddenly. What have others learned? It's a crowdsourcing.

In these times, we need our collective wisdom. This is what we're trying to promote through this project of Positive AI—that it might be this way. We need each other. This is sangha. Sangha is the company of the wise.

And the idea from the Buddhist teachings is that when we're together and committed to compassion and liberation and a free heart and a care for one another, amazing things are possible. And in these times, we need to stand up for the truth, speak up together. That's part of Sangha—being together in the innate dignity of humanity and saying, yes, this is what matters.

There's this verse from the Buddhist text of the Majjhima, where it says: "Others will be cruel, we shall not be cruel—thus we will incline our hearts. Others will kill, we will not kill—thus we will incline our hearts. Others will engage in harmful sexuality, we shall not do this—thus we shall incline our hearts. Others will speak falsehood, we will speak truth—thus we will incline our hearts. Others will be greedy, we shall be generous—thus we will incline our hearts."

And we do this together. We need each other to protect and nourish and share the light of the Dharma, because we all carry it in us.

I love in my work with folks not to say what answer I have, but rather to ask the question: Show me. What do you know? What do others know? And if you read the sutras and the texts, the Buddha asks that. He'll say, "Do you see where this might lead? What do you think?"

There he is wandering, and he meets this farmer. He's carrying his humble alms bowl, and this great wealthy Brahmin farmer says, "I work for a living and therefore I eat. What do you do? You just wander around with your alms bowl." And the Buddha takes his question seriously and says, "I plow, I sow beautiful seeds, and I reap the fruit of the liberated heart." He demonstrates it in this way, and the Brahmin plowman bows to him and says, "I see that you're doing something beautiful."

This is the kind of dialogue and reminder that the Buddha had with everyone—reminding them what they really can see, reminding them what they know. Because our heart does know. We already understand in some way.

The texts say, "Thus shall we think of this fleeting world: as a star at dawn, a bubble in a stream, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a dream." They go on. Says the Buddha, "Look at the bubbles floating along the Ganges." Words, thoughts, images, emotions, bodies—all is impermanent, all empty, all arising for a time, empty of solidity because they don't last. I mean, what happened to yesterday? It is gone. It's back with the pyramids and the dinosaurs. Not to speak of Y2K, or the 1960s, or the 1920s, or whatever it was. We have the moment and then it vanishes like the bubbles on the Ganges.

And we who are wise—which is you—can shift to freedom and love forever. You do this in your meditation, training yourself to quiet the mind and open your heart in some repeated, steady, beautiful way. And then, as we did in our practice tonight, you shift from awareness of breath and body, of emotions and thoughts, and you become the space of awareness itself. You shift from the experiences to becoming what Ajahn Chah called "the one who knows," what the Buddha spoke of as timeless awareness.

And Nisargadatta, that wonderful sage, said, "Wisdom tells me I am nothing, and love tells me I am everything. Between these two, my life flows." There's emptiness and nothing, and yet in that openness—I think I'd call it openness rather than emptiness—everything is love. And that's the game. We practice it to embody it and to live it.

One of the most beautiful texts says, "If there are those who practice wisely"—it says "rightly," but I think wisely is a better word—"the world will not be devoid of awakened beings."

So I thank you for your kind attention.

I'm very grateful that I get to do basically pretty cool things still, so I'm glad to share it with you. And more than anything, I hope it inspires you, because we all have this capacity.

What questions or concerns might people want to raise?

"Hi, I don't know if you recognize me, but I started seeing you thirty years ago when you were coming every week on Monday nights in Marin. I'm grateful that I can still see you online now that I live much further away. Someone told me you weren't feeling well, and I didn't know what was going on, so I'm so glad you're doing well because you mean so much to me. I feel like you're one of my teachers I've had over the years. So much gratitude."

"My questions come about mainly because I'm an only child and I have two parents that are aging. My mom, who used to come with me sometimes—you'd always ask me how she was when I would talk to you—has dementia. But interestingly enough, with her journey, she's gotten very mellow. My local Insight Santa Cruz Center sends meditation volunteers to meditate with her, which has been so wonderful and incredible."

"And then there's my father, who has neurological issues. They don't know quite what's going on. He used to be a very spiritual person, and I'm finding near the end of his life that he seems to be suffering. There's very little I can do to kind of force him to do activities that might help him. So it's been an interesting journey—holding them and loving them and figuring out how not to have my peace of mind focused on trying to help them. I was just wondering if you could speak a little about that, because I've been reading different things about codependence and how I can show up and be there for them without having expectations that my well-being is based on how they're doing."

This is beautiful. And you want to be a good daughter, and you want to be a noble human being, and you want to help him die well. How old is he, your dad?

"He's seventy-nine."

So he's a little younger than me. And your mom?

"Seventy-six. They have the same birthday."

So your mom's doing okay. Hallelujah, sweet.

And your dad—you know, there's that very popular book now called Let Them. I don't know if you've seen it.

"I have it out of the library right now."

Ajahn Chah would be smiling about it because it's got a lot of really deep wisdom.

People die in character. This is one of the teachings I remember hearing first, close to fifty years ago, from Elisabeth Kübler-Ross. You might wish, or you might wish it for yourself: I'm going to lie there and everybody will be around, and I'll have this great kind of celebratory last breath. Hallelujah! Maybe. Maybe not. Maybe I'll be in the hospital with the tubes and pipes and say, "Oh, this is pretty shitty." But then I float out of my body and say, "Wow, that was an intense one." We don't get to choose that.

And we also don't get to change people. When you think about your dad—seventy-nine years—he's got a lot of history behind that.

So what matters? Well, you know what matters. Let me ask you: if you close your eyes for a moment and you think about being with your dad, especially in the very last days of his life, and there you picture yourself being with him—what really matters?

What matters? Tell me.

"Just the love that we've shared over the years. We have a very deep, deep connection. It's just... I guess it's hard for me to see him suffering, having lost his faith as he gets older. But that love is still there."

Yes. So that's very hard. Feel that, feel the suffering—because you're feeling his suffering too.

"It's in my heart center."

So wrap it in compassion, for it's yours. And at least some of it is his. You don't know how much. Just hold it in compassion and see if it can accept a little compassion. You're not trying to fix it. You're just saying, okay, this is suffering, and I'm trying to be present with deep kindness and care. Just be present for it. And notice what happens when you do. Will it accept it?

"I feel like there's a softening."

There's a softening. And you don't know what lesson he needs. I've been with people—I was with somebody dying just a couple of days ago. People die in character, as I said, but they also work things out. The Tibetan bardo doesn't happen after you die and float out of your body, which is what will happen, and you see the lights and such. Trust me, that's likely what you'll see. But it actually starts earlier, and he's in it. He's in the life review, somehow managing within himself, knowing that this is the last act. And you have to let him navigate. Maybe the suffering is the very thing he needs before some other kind of freedom comes. You can't know that. It's not given to you.

There's only one thing given to you. And you said it: to love him just as he is. And to feel compassion. Anything I can do for you, Dad, you can ask. And if he says no, well... trust it. It's not your job to fix him.

"I remember you saying in a previous talk—I think it was you—you can never repay the karmic debt of your parents."

The Buddha said it, actually. I have some backup. But the way to repay that debt is to love him exactly as he is. There he is, suffering Buddha, and you hold him in your heart. If he wants something, he'll tell you. Otherwise, just let him do it his way.

My God, a bossy kid—terrible! Oh, yeah, I just care for him a lot.

Question: Is there a good book on the end of life, the Bardo, that you mentioned, or any good resource?

I don't know, but you might look at Ram Dass's last book called Walking Each Other Home. There's a good book.

Question: I appreciate your teachings tonight. They seem very timely for me and touched me deeply. I could feel, listening to you and practicing the gratitude, a deep sense of softening of the heart. And I have to, at the same time, admit that—without naming names and faces or making it particular—with some of the things going on in the world, I'm feeling a lot of rage too. And I don't know how to put the rage and the futility and that love and gratitude in the same container.

So partly what you're describing—I'm going to change the word a tiny bit—is feeling outrage. Outrage that people are being plucked off the street and thrown into concentration camps, or outrage about whatever it is: Ukraine, Darfur, Sudan, whatever it happens to be.

It's interesting to change the word from rage to outrage, because rage you carry in yourself. And is that good for you? How does that actually feel to carry that? Outrage is because you care so much. How dare they? How could this happen? There's a little change in valence.

Close your eyes for a second, because it's not just your question—it's the question of lots of people on the screen there and in our world. What do we do when there are people causing so much suffering?

One of the things is, you feel all that suffering, you know why you're feeling it: because you care so much. You wouldn't feel it if you didn't care. So drop beneath the rage and the outrage and feel how much you care. Notice what that feels like. And if it could give you a message, what would it say?

Response: The first thing is, I feel like I could cry for a thousand years.

So feel that. This is called the ocean of tears, and you're really crying for humanity. All the Buddha's First Noble Truth of suffering in the world that's caused by hatred and greed. You have this vast ocean of tears—let it open. Let it be as big as it wants. You're allowing the ocean of tears. Fill the earth, fill the galaxy. Breathe and give it space. Notice what it wants to do, what comes.

Response: To take the time I need when I need it, and to do the best I can—to do whatever I can. It's saying, with these tears, care for everyone, and care for yourself.

Don't let it harden your heart. Let yourself feel the tears. Let yourself feel how deeply you care. You wouldn't hurt, you wouldn't have this ocean of tears, if it didn't matter to you. And include yourself in the care—that's what it's telling you. As the Dalai Lama says, so much has been taken.

He's seen so much suffering. Why should I let it also take my well-being?

So when you start to feel those other feelings, which are natural, take a breath and drop to this deeper place—really the cosmos of tears, the suffering of humanity and the depth of your caring—and say, "All right, I'll care in the ways I can," and include yourself. And now you've given teachings to everybody listening. So I thank you.

Student: Thank you, Jack. One more thing that came is that I really owe it not only to myself and the people I care most closely for, but also to the people I hope to go and care for. I owe it to them to do my own practice so that I can show up in a mood that's helpful.

Yes, that's really beautiful and very wise. If you go into a refugee camp, they don't want you to be depressed and angry. They've got enough depression of their own. They actually want somebody who has something to offer, to say, "Even here, there's something you can find. There's love that's possible. There's care between us." So you can do that. And then also, how much gratitude that you're in a position to both practice and to be opened and to do whatever you can.

Student: Yes. And to be sufficient to care and tend and then to express that.

So thank you, Steve.

Let's do one more. Beth?

Student: Hi, Jack. Oh, it's Jeff, the Teamster poet friend.

Hi! You're so kind to say that.

Student: It's doggerel. Doggerel from the docks. I'm going to go ahead and hijack this for my own personal need right now. I have a pretty strong gratitude practice. I understand that the things that are not to my preference—I should also have gratitude for them. But one of my dearest friends, forty years, a carpenter essentially who became a home builder and developer—he has spent tireless hundreds of hours working with a couple hundred people to help them get and stay sober. He went into the hospital to have a knee replacement and got an infection there, pneumonia, kidney shutdown. It was supposed to be a three-day trip. We're going into the third week now. And I would just like to ask all of the good people who are on this call to take a moment in whatever you consider to be a prayer or affirmation—please ask for the rapid improvement, or at least the return to comfort, of my friend Michael.

Where is Michael? What city?

Student: Well, he lives in Berkeley and he's at UCSF.

So we'll envision Michael in UCSF with all the staff, the amazing caring staff there, and his body trying to figure out how to renegotiate being alive, which we all hope for. And so as we envision him there, we do our metta: May you be safe. May you get well. May you feel the strength of our love surround you, infuse you, your mitochondria go, "Oh, whoopee, this is great!" You know, every part of you feels that there's a world of love out here.

And then let the love spread to Michael and all the people who are caring for him so that they can feel it and love him and love everybody else they care for. Beautiful.

And then finally, let his hospital be like a beacon of light, shining love and healing to all the other hospitals and people in illness and difficulty. And this is possible.

We can care for each other. And Michael is showing us how we can do it. He's offering them a chance to be as generous and gracious as they are, and offering you a chance to feel how much tenderness you have in your heart.

It's a time of life too, isn't it? You're 80, I'm 73. You start living it. I just didn't expect this particular guy to be the guy. I'm going to a funeral tomorrow morning, and that guy—I expected that to be the guy, considering how he lived his life.

We're talking about our expectations about how long we have. There's some ticket there. Central Casting said you get this role, and then you get called off stage. It's really mysterious. And what's asked in the mystery is somehow to keep a spacious and open heart and say, yes, we can do this. We can live beautifully. And when it's time, we can also let go beautifully.

How wonderful to have this sangha to rely upon in times like this. It is for all of us, for me too.

Hallelujah.

Buddham saranam gacchami, dhammam saranam gacchami, sangham saranam gacchami.

Refuge in the Awakened One and in all who can awaken—the Buddha nature in all. Refuge in the Dharma, in the teachings of the liberated heart. And refuge in the Sangha, so important. We can't do it alone. We do it together. And you can feel it tonight. We're all in this together.

Mostly, take care of your good selves. Keep your presence and your dignity, your Buddha nature, as you navigate these paths—chaotic at times, difficult waters—but you have the Dharma to protect you, and the Buddha and the Sangha as well.

CHAPTER 59

The Listening Heart

Jack Kornfield · 1h32

> In this heartfelt talk, Jack Kornfield offers teachings on cultivating a listening heart amidst personal and collective difficulties. Beginning with a guided meditation on mindful loving awareness, he invites practitioners to attend to the body, breath, and heart with kindness rather than trying to fix or change what arises. The practice emphasizes receiving whatever emerges—tension, grief, joy, or fear—with compassionate presence.
> Kornfield draws on wisdom from his teacher Ajahn Chah, who taught that our deepest learning often comes through difficulties, and shares stories of resilience from Nelson Mandela, Mahā Ghosānanda walking through the Cambodian killing fields, and the Dalai Lama's response to losing Tibet. He recounts teaching to 10,000 Ukrainians about not letting war imprison their hearts, and tells the inspiring story of Vinoba Bhave's land reform movement, which began simply by sitting and listening deeply to villagers' needs.
> The teaching explores how to respond wisely when triggered by fear or overwhelm—pausing to ask "What is my best intention?" and listening with genuine curiosity rather than reactivity. Kornfield emphasizes that hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed, quoting this ancient teaching from the Dhammapada. He encourages practitioners to trust uncertainty, as Ajahn Chah often taught, and to become "islands of peace" who carry the great heart of the bodhisattva into a troubled world. The talk concludes with reflections on interconnection—how our breath connects us with all beings—and the recognition that each person's loving presence may be the one voice needed for peace to emerge.

And hello, everybody. Glad to see you on this spring day. What a pleasure. And I love hearing that we have a middle school program. I think about middle school and it is a tremendously confusing time. I don't know about you all, but going through puberty and adolescence, trying to find your place in humanity with all those other kids around you, and then the crazy adults in the world.

We've had a family program for a really long time. My memory is when we were—those of you who've been to the land at Spirit Rock—for about twenty years before we had our beautiful built community hall, we had these six trailers that were hooked together, the holy trailers. We had Thich Nhat Hanh and the Dalai Lama and all these great teachers come into the trailers, and we could have four hundred people in that room. We had our family program.

I remember one year, I think it was in the springtime for the holiday of the Buddha's birthday, we had a play that Seth Kesselman, who was running it, choreographed. The kids were all playing different roles in the life of the Buddha under this big tree in the meadow there. And then it was time for the Buddha to sit under the Bodhi tree and get enlightened. But of course, as you know in the plot, Mara with his armies attacked Buddha with desires and aggression, saying you shouldn't be awakened, and the Buddha had to finally call on the earth goddess.

So we're all there and it's sort of late afternoon, and one of the kids is sitting under the tree as the Buddha while the others are his attendants. Then out from behind another tree comes Wavy Gravy, who is now playing Mara, all dressed up in his great Mara costume, tempting the Buddha and attacking him in all these ways. And I thought, you know, this is definitely American dharma—to see Wavy Gravy playing Mara and enjoying it.

Everybody loves the scene with Mara because it's our life, right? It's not just the Buddha, but we all have to deal with desire and fear and the aggression around us in the world. To be able to do it playfully and really talk—this was with middle school kids—about what do you do when fear and aggression and all of that arises, and not in some preacherly way, but have Wavy Gravy come and demonstrate, was just fabulous.

So anyway, here we are. Yesterday we had a very big event at Spirit Rock, which was the opening of the new stupa. Really beautiful, and an acknowledgement of the generations of teachers that have grown. Now we've trained really some thousands of teachers around the world. Those who came stood up and people acknowledged and sent them blessings and gratitude from the very beginning, from the people who helped in the 1980s and 90s. That field of connection and care and gratitude was really quite palpable. Some of you might have been there.

As we have it, I taught Monday night every week for thirty or forty years. Then the last few years, I've pulled back to teaching it once a month or every couple of months, especially since Trudy and I turned eighty this past summer and kind of looked at each other and said, "Hmm, eighty, that's a number. Maybe we should take a little pause. If we're going to do something, maybe we should do it." But here we are. The way Monday night goes, we'll start with a meditation, have a short break, then some teaching and some questions and responses. Whatever brings you, it is a great pleasure to join together.

Spring—I think about Easter, Passover, all the other spring holidays. Something in the world is showing itself anew amidst all the troubles.

So let's start with a sitting. Find a way to sit in which your body is both comfortable and settled, kind of settled down into your seat. Feel the connection with the seat under you and how it goes all the way down through the floor and down into the earth, a kind of steadiness. When you're ready, let your eyes close. Take a couple of deep breaths. Let the eyes and face be soft. Loosen the jaw. Roll your head in a little circle to let it find a simple upright. Let the shoulders relax, and the arms and hands rest easily. Feel the weight and strength of your body and how it rests deeply in the seat where you are on the earth. Let the belly be soft.

The breath natural. Let the heart be soft as well, ready to receive whatever arises with kindness, with compassion.

This meditation of mindfulness and loving kindness, this mindful loving awareness, is not a practice of developing or gaining or making something—although there are times when you can do that in meditation. But more fundamentally, it's an invitation to presence and deep listening.

So with this embodied awareness, begin to notice, feel, listen to how the body breathes itself, wherever you feel it. Coolness in the nostrils. Swirling, tingling at the back of the throat. Rise and fall of chest or belly. And if it's helpful, you can put your hand on your belly. Leave it there. Practice feeling the breath in the palm of your hand as you sit.

Following Thich Nhat Hanh's instruction, with each breath, if you wish, you can whisper calm or ease, inviting the mind to settle, the breath to come to greater ease.

And of course, there will be thoughts and memories, ideas and sensations and sounds. All the other things will arise. Let them rise and fall like waves of the ocean around the breath. Feel how the breath breathes itself in the middle of them all. Just breath.

As you quiet and sense, listen, feel the breath, you can also feel the mystery of the breath breathing itself. You don't have to do it. The earth is breathing you. You can relax. Gratitude to your breath, sustaining you.

Sense how it's breathing you with all the other field of life in this atmosphere. You're breathing with the trees around you and the raccoons and the gophers and the worms. And all the varied people in your neighborhood, on your planet—they're all breathing together. Let your breath gently just breathe. Let it breathe you and invite you to a steady, trusting presence. Just be here, this breath, now. Here and now. Rest in the presence. Calm and ease.

As you quiet down, as you let the mind settle, the breath settle in its own way, notice the state of your body. The meditation isn't primarily to fix yourself, but to listen, to attend with loving awareness, and feel the state of your body this very day in the spring. The ease, the pleasures and sweetness. And the stress and areas of tension—the shoulders and jaw and back and gut. Hold it all with loving awareness, with kindness, as if to say thank you to your body. Thank you for caring so much. I'm okay just now. I'm meditating. You can relax and be at ease.

And if your body has a message for you on this spring day, something to remember, what does it want to say? Listen. You can know.

Resting in the present moment with mindful, loving attention, the body breathes itself and you hold it all with kindness. Notice how your body responds—not trying to fix it, but held in the lap of kindness.

Just as you can sense and listen and feel what's happening in this body and breath, you can open the mindful loving awareness to your heart and to all that it carries. What is it carrying even now? Tears or grief, sadness or longing, sweetness, joy, love, frustration or fears, worry, anxiety. The heart carries so much—anger, overwhelm, tenderness, connection, desire. Notice all that the heart carries and wrap it with loving awareness and compassion. Not trying to fix or change or judge, but offering a tender attention that says yes, wrapped in kindness. Thank you for caring so much, dear heart.

You can relax. I'm meditating now. You can be at ease. Just now, I'm okay. You can rest. Thank you.

Notice what happens when you wrap the heart and all its feelings with kindness and compassion. Thank you. You can relax. I'm okay just now.

And if your heart has a message for you, something for you to remember or know, you can listen, you can hear, you can know.

Rest in the reality of the present—this mystery of a breathing body, a feeling heart. You are the mindful, loving awareness that notices it all. Rest in awareness itself. Relax. You are the kind and loving witness.

As the body breathes, the heart feels. As life moves through you, you are the consciousness, the awareness of it all—spacious, timeless, loving awareness itself. You are awareness.

And finally, there will be a message for you of how to respond to this beautiful and troubled world. What is your unique, best, beautiful response to be? With loving awareness, listen. What is your unique, singular, beautiful, caring, wise response? You can know.

And now, keeping that spirit of loving presence, let your eyes open gently, also carrying the messages you may have received from the body or the heart, or your inquiry. Stay quiet for a bit, just present and listening.

Welcome back. How was that meditation for you? It's good to sit together. A beautiful connection. A simple relief after the news. Coming back to my heart. Magic carpet. Coming back to compassion. My heart loosened. It doesn't take that long—settling into the knowing of the heart, calming, compassionate.

We already understand. We just need to take the time to listen.

So here we are. As I said, spring, renewal, Passover, Easter. It's also a difficult time out there. The polycrisis—climate difficulty, trade, immigration, continuing warfare in so many places. Growing racism, white supremacy. The loss of human rights for many people. These are also difficult. And we know it. We carry them in our heart.

Just as a little note for you: difficulties are inevitable. You happen to be incarnated in the human realm, and that's what we have—conflict and difficulty. But there's also a purpose in it, in some strange way.

And I remember my teacher Ajahn Chah asking us as monks, "When did you learn the most? When things were easy or when things were difficult? When did you learn the deep truths of impermanence and compassion and letting go of the things that need to be let go of and responding wisely? Where did you learn that?" And of course, almost everyone said it was through the difficulties.

So somehow central casting put you here on this planet and said, "Okay, school's open—time to learn." The question is not whether there's suffering, because there is, and some of it's really terrible, and it does want us to pay attention. But then the question is: How do we respond? We can take it into our body and then it becomes like PTSD. We get fear and anxiety, and it triggers fight, flight, or freeze—a kind of catastrophic thinking.

Or, with our practice, as Pablo Neruda, the great poet, said: "You can pick all the flowers, but you can't stop the spring." We can align our hearts with the forces of goodness and rebirth and blessings. My dear friend Joanna Macy, who died this last year—the great environmental sage and Buddhist teacher—calls this the Great Turning. Humanity has come to a point where the economic and political systems of exploitation, of exploiting the earth and exploiting one another, don't work anymore. Fostering more greed and hatred and ignorance no longer serves us. And collectively we can sense and feel and know our interdependence—that your breath and mine is also the breath of the rainforest and the kelp in the ocean. It's the breath of the icy Antarctic and the breath of the Sahara Desert and all that lives upon them.

When things are difficult, we can get triggered and go into a kind of survival brain of fight, flight, or freeze. We can get frozen, or we can get angry, or overwhelmed. The mind races to figure it out, because the work of your mind is to try to protect you. It thinks, "How do I protect? How do I fix?" And you can say thank you to your mind. "Thank you for trying to protect me. I know you're working overtime. It's okay. You can relax." And instead of worrying and rehashing, you can come into the present. Remember that Be Here Now book of Ram Dass? You can be here now.

Recently, I was invited to teach at a kind of seminar and gathering for ten thousand people in Ukraine who were seeking teachings and solace. I asked what it was they were looking for. It felt difficult to imagine how I could speak to them meaningfully when they were in the middle of so much suffering from the war. And they said, "We're overwhelmed. We've got fear and sometimes terror. We have tears and grief for the things we've lost, for the people we've known who've been killed. We're outraged, exhausted. We didn't want this war, and it's happening anyway. We feel guilt. Is it even okay to feel okay in the middle of this?"

And I talked to them about how they've lived through all this, but they don't necessarily need to take the war inside, to let the war take over their hearts. When Nelson Mandela walked out of Robben Island prison after twenty-seven years with so much magnanimity and compassion and graciousness, he changed the world. He said, "They can put your body in prison, but no one can imprison your spirit."

I borrowed the moral authority of my teachers—Maha Ghosananda, who led fifteen years of peace walks through the killing fields, taking people back to their villages after a third of the population was killed in the civil war with the Khmer Rouge. And with each step they chanted together: "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the ancient and eternal law." And they chanted it again and again. I talked about the Dalai Lama losing Tibet, everything being destroyed—monasteries torn down, sacred texts burned, monastics put in prisons, culture under attack. He said, "I've lost so much. They've taken so much. Why should I let them take my heart, take my peace of mind?"

So we talked about the courage it would take to remain an island of peace. To be that one person on the boat that Thich Nhat Hanh talks about, who's centered enough to help everyone around them survive. And we did practices to sweep through the body and drain out the tension, or to hold it with kindness and thank it and relax it. To place your fears in the lap of the Virgin Mary, which is the biggest belief in Ukraine, or to place them under a great tree and ask Mother Earth to hold them. To put your hand on the tree and feel its roots and your roots and the steadiness that has been there for a hundred and a thousand years. To breathe with compassion and mindfulness, to tend yourself, to feel all the other mothers and fathers, to imagine holding hands with them—doing it together, because you are. To sense the ancestors who survived in Ukraine and are now holding you and cheering you on.

As Gandhi said, when I despair, I remember that all through history, the way of truth and love has always won. Yes, there have been tyrants and murderers, and for a time, they can seem invincible. But in the end, they always fall. Remember this. Think of it. They always fall. And feel that you are living through something, but you get to be the zone of peace. You get to be the steady one, the heart that doesn't give up on compassion, that carries humanity.

So here we are practicing in our difficult time, learning to quiet our mind, settle the heart, tend. And as Nelson Mandela said, it's simple. Relax, breathe, tie your shoes and keep walking in the right direction. That is to say, live in the present. The people in Ukraine, if they go to the past, it upsets them terribly. And if they go to the future, it's also so uncertain. But you can live each moment here and now. And how you live now, today, this moment, creates what the future will be. You don't want to let fear take over your heart.

Part of what allows something beautiful to grow from this, when you get quiet and open and listen, is a curiosity. And you can sense it. There you are in a little conversation with someone around you. Let's not talk about Iran and Ukraine and Sudan and the Rohingyas and all the huge conflicts of the world and the tremendous suffering. It's also close to home. We know this as people. We get in conflict even with the people we love the most. Of course, my beloved Trudy and I would never have a conflict, but just in case it happens—the game is to take a mindful pause of breath, tune into yourself, and do two things.

First, ask yourself, what's my best intention? Just like you listen to your body and your heart in that meditation, the heart will speak to you. And when you feel your best or most loving intention, and it will arise, your whole demeanor and language change. Instead of trying to be right and solve it and be the person who really knew the correct thing, which makes the conflict, you see with the eyes of love and realize what matters is that we care about each other. Your tone of voice changes. Your best intention softens your body language.

And then the second thing, from that great intention, is the deep listening. Let's call it curiosity. So that you could say when somebody says something difficult to you, "What did you mean?" in a reactive way—or, with the eyes of care, you can say, "What did you mean? I want to understand." And those very same words have an entirely different valence and flavor and musical sound. Because that curiosity allows you to hear and sense what's really going on for that person. It's that listening heart that has the power to transform and change and open the channel so that we again remember who we are. A kind of deep listening, mindful, loving awareness.

And of course our politics right now fosters the opposite—fear and pain and confusion, fostering us to turn on one another. Thomas Merton put it this way, quite fitting for this week: Of what use is it to travel to the moon if we cannot cross the abyss that separates us from one another?

When my beloved Trudy went to work in the Darfur refugee camps in Africa, she worked with this great organization, iACT, a very small but mighty organization. Instead of the big NGOs that helicopter in with a plan and take over and do things, their very first move was to go and sit in circles, especially with the women in the camps, and listen to them and say, "What do you want? What do you need? What would serve you?" And they said, "Well, we need kindergarten and preschool for our kids. We want them to realize that they can learn and grow. And we want soccer." It was a surprise. Now iACT has for years helped build soccer teams in the camps. The women wanted that because they wanted their children not to give up hope, but to feel that they were part of a bigger world.

And now, in fact, the Darfur camps have a team that went, I think it was to Doha, for the Refugee World International Tournament, and the people in the camps were watching the TV for their Darfur teams to feel that they're not forgotten.

There's something so beautiful about pausing and listening—with one another, with the community around, with the people that are different from you. To the earth, to the beasts that live on it, as Chief Seattle would say, they all speak to you. They do. And if you listen, your heart knows.

One of my favorite stories is the account of Vinoba Bhave. Vinoba Bhave was the second most significant Gandhian teacher and figure in India after Mahatma Gandhi was assassinated. And after he was assassinated, there was a great despair in the Gandhian nonviolent movement, even though India had gained its independence and Pakistan. They knew that there was still more to do in this nascent nation that had a lot of divisiveness.

After some time of mourning and disarray, they decided to have a big conference and bring together the Gandhian leaders to say, what should we do next? They invited Vinoba because he was the most senior figure after Mahatma Gandhi. And he demurred. He said, "You know, we can't replace Gandhi. He's not someone that we can just go and take over for." But they pressed him. They said, "We need to come together. We need to listen. We need to figure this out."

Eventually he said, "All right, I'll come. But only if you postpone it for a good part of a year so that I have time to walk there." And the conference was at the other side of the Indian subcontinent.

Vinoba set out with his walking stick and his sandals, much like Gandhi. He got to the first village, and each village more or less will have a kind of little square or a big tree at the center where people meet. He sat with the villagers there and said, "I want to hear what's happening for you." He chose to go into the poorest villages as Gandhi would have done. And they said, "It's terrible. We don't have very much money. We want to educate our children, but we don't have any land because we're called untouchables. We're cast aside and we work the land of others and we do the lowest jobs."

Vinoba listened. And kind of sadly at the circumstance, he didn't know what to do. So he said, "Let's meet again tomorrow." And he meditated and sat quietly. He had told them, "Well, maybe I'll go to see Nehru, who's the new prime minister who I know. Maybe I'll tell him about your plight." But in his heart, he felt that was really like a political move that wouldn't make much difference.

The next morning he said, "In the name of Gandhi, I hear what you say. I'm really listening. My tears come. And I want to find a way to help you."

And then a man stood up in the back and said, "I am one of those landowners of this village, a high caste Brahmin. And in the spirit of Gandhiji, I will give"—and there were fourteen of these villagers—"I'll give them each an acre of land. I'll give fourteen acres of my land, an acre apiece to each of them so that they will have their own plot to grow. And I will do it in honor of our new nation and Mahatma Gandhi." And those villagers all got land.

The next day, Vinoba walked to the village ahead and then another village, and brought together especially the poorest people in the village and listened deeply as he had, and heard the same kind of stories of despair and disempowerment. But now he had a story to tell. He said, "Well, in the last village, there were fourteen village families and they had nothing. And one of the Brahmin landholders offered land to each in the spirit of Mahatma Gandhi." And sure enough, in the back, another Brahmin landholder said, "Well, I can do the same. There are twenty villagers here. I will give the twenty acres."

And Vinoba continued to walk. After months of village to village walking, he had collected several thousand acres of land for the poorest villagers on his way.

They met together, and that was the beginning of what was called the Bhoodan Land Reform Movement. The followers of Gandhi became so inspired that they began to walk from village to village with Vinoba and on their own. In the course of several years, they collected fourteen million acres of land from the wealthiest landowners for the very poorest. And it all happened because Vinoba sat and listened.

We need to listen to each other across all these divides. What are you afraid of? What are your longings? What's difficult? And to get quiet and ask, what's my best intention? The heart always answers: to know, to love, to be connected, to serve.

I remember when my twin brother was in the hospital in Boston. He was at Dana-Farber, and he was dying of blood cancer. I spent a long time in that hospital with him, as did my other brothers. What was striking was all the other families that had come, families who had a member with cancer. They'd come from all around the world. It was like we became a family, all of us, carrying the caring for those who were sick, in danger, dying. We held hands together. This is us.

When we quiet the mind and listen to the heart, the truths are so obvious. Yes, the first noble truth—there is suffering and its causes: greed, fear, hatred, ignorance. The more greed and hatred, the more suffering. But the opposite of greed is generosity. The opposite of hatred is love. The opposite of ignorance is wisdom. These are our human birthright. These are possible. And we know it. We can feel it.

Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed. This is the deep truth, and you know it in your heart. Or as Mark Twain said, kindness is the language which the deaf can hear and the blind can see.

We get overwhelmed and think it's not possible. How will we get through this? But we always do, as Gandhi said. And every being, in spite of their deeds and their attitudes, likes to be treated with respect. Every being. It's the great courage and currency and strength of the heart. You feel it.

I was in Dharamsala this fall and got to meet with the Dalai Lama. Most mornings of the week, there's a line of a couple hundred or more Tibetan people, all dressed in their finest with their children and their silk, waiting to see His Holiness. He sits there with some of his attendants, and they slowly go by, and he blesses each one. The feeling you get—and of course, I got a little bit of time with him—is that no matter what, whoever comes, he meets them with respect and care and dignity, whoever they are. You see them all as they walk away in this long line, smiling like they've been touched by the sun. And it's really the sun of love, of respect.

We can do that. It's a kind of humility—not to put ourselves over someone or to judge them, but to be still, to not react, to listen. Then we'll know what the right action is. And to trust the uncertainty, because in fact, often we don't know.

Of course, I'm one of those people—my wife would certainly second this—the Kornfield brothers like to be in charge and think they know what they're doing. She's happy to point that out. But the truth is, we don't know. I don't know.

This was one of Ajahn Chah's favorite teachings. We'd ask him different questions, and he'd say, "It's uncertain, isn't it?" What should we do in this circumstance? He'd smile. "It's uncertain, isn't it?" Well, tell us about enlightenment. He'd laugh. "It's uncertain, isn't it?"

And he was so comfortable with the wisdom of insecurity and uncertainty, just being where we are—not with our fixed ideas, but in the living presence, this moment, with love.

So there's a kind of trust in which you bring your humanity to this world. And that trust is also a trust in the mystery. And the mystery is everything. The fact that we exist, that there's blue sky and blue water and brown earth and mountains and trees and kangaroos. Come on, where did the kangaroos come from? This is crazy. Where does it all come from? Don't know. It's uncertain, isn't it? But it's a lot bigger than our ideas.

It's really the wonderful—I believe it's Mary Oliver's phrase—"I was a bride married to amazement." The wonderful mystery of it.

John Neihardt, who was an anthropologist and writer about the Native American tradition, became close to the great elder Black Elk. Many of you have read Neihardt's book, Black Elk Speaks. The last chapter tells of how Black Elk took his final hike up Harney Peak. Harney Peak was where Black Elk had the vision of the great hoop of humanity and how we were all interconnected, how the native people had this truth that was medicine for the world.

The Sioux holy man explained to Neihardt that when death approached, a Lakota could climb this sacred mountain to see if the Great Spirit approved of his life, and rain would fall on those who had the Great Spirit's blessing. As a young man, Black Elk's vision told him how to save his people and homeland in spite of the armies and settlers that came. And in many ways, he was afraid he had failed.

On the day of this last climb, Black Elk was an old man. He dressed in red long johns, moccasins, war paint, and a feathered headdress. Slowly, laboriously, he climbed to the summit, oblivious to the tourists who stared at him. Neihardt teased him that he should have picked a day with at least one cloud in the sky, but Black Elk rebuked him, saying the rain would have nothing to do with the weather.

At the top of the peak, not far from the tourists, the old man laid down under blue sky. And to his astonishment, Neihardt watched a few small clouds form over Black Elk, and a soft rain began to fall. Black Elk wept with relief. He felt that even though he'd not succeeded in fulfilling his whole vision, the Great Spirit was recognizing he had done his best.

Your life is not separated from the earth and the sun and the stars. It's held by all of it. Your breath is held by the winds that touch the Andes, that touch the mountains of Switzerland and the mountains of China, and all the beings of this world breathing with you together.

So the listening heart, the loving awareness that you are, comes with a kind of trust—that there's something to learn, something to see, something great—and you're invited to hold it with tenderness and wisdom and care, no matter what. And in the midst of despair, in the throes of despair, the instruction is to bring your humanity to it. Sometimes it only takes a little loving awareness at the right time for things to change.

Here's a story for you.

"Tell me the weight of a snowflake," a tiny mouse asked a wild dove.

"Nothing more than nothing," came the answer.

"In that case, I must tell you a marvelous story. I sat on the branch of a fir tree close to its trunk when it began to snow," said the mouse. "Not a blizzard, no, just like in a dream—soft snow without a sound or violence. And having nothing better to do, I counted the snowflakes settling on the twigs and the small sticks of my branch. Eventually the number came to 3,741,952. When the 3,741,953rd snowflake dropped onto the branch—nothing more than nothing, as you might say—the branch broke off."

Having said that, the mouse went away. And the dove, an authority on this since the time of Noah, thought for a time and said to herself, "Perhaps there's only one person's voice, one person's presence lacking for peace to come about on this earth."

So you listen. You add your voice and heart with your humanity, with your care, with your sensitivity. We're all going through it—suffering, pleasure, joy, all of it. Keep your heart strong. You can do this. You've been training for this for a long time. You have all your years of learning and growing, and certainly your meditation practice. You've been training how to be in this world.

And as the Buddhist texts say, even when others are cruel, we shall not be cruel. We shall be kind. Thus we will incline our heart. Even though others might steal and take what's not theirs, we shall be generous.

Thus we shall incline our heart. Even when others speak falsehoods and untruths, we will speak truthfully and kindly. Thus we will incline our hearts. Others may be arrogant—we will be sensitive, humble. Thus we will incline our heart. And even though others may lack wisdom, we shall cultivate understanding. Thus we will incline our heart.

You have been training in steadiness, in compassion. And in difficult times, you become the bodhisattva—the being dedicated to bringing something better into this world, something beautiful, something wise. What better thing is there to do?

As the Dalai Lama says, the only real joy is to make a difference in this world. Raising beautiful children, making a conscious business, standing up for justice. You quiet the mind, listen to the heart, and become still until the right action arises for you.

This listening is a kind of courage. It's like Gandhi being silent one day a week, waiting to listen for what the most effective thing would be that he could do—the march to the sea to take a little bit of salt, standing up for those who were oppressed against the racism and cruelty of the caste system.

Trudy was saying that in Africa, people don't ask how you are. At least she found this in several places. They ask, "How is your family?" What a beautiful greeting. It shows how connected we are. And it is also an invitation to listen. So you listen, and then you know you can touch the fabric of humanity where you can reach and mend that part. You can offer yourself. You stand up for justice. You listen to those who don't have a voice. You listen to those who are different than you, who are in your own mind very different and maybe reviled or judged by others. And you say, "Let me understand you." What a beautiful phrase—let me understand. That is real courage.

Lewis Mumford said a person with courage never needs weapons, but they may need bail. So you stand up in whatever way is right for you.

Carrying on from Thomas Jefferson, who said one person with courage is a majority—I had on my refrigerator for years a picture from around the time of Tiananmen Square. A line of tanks coming down the street in China, and one man who was coming back from the market, standing in the middle of the street with two shopping bags, one in each hand, gazing at the tanks coming and just standing there. And the tanks had stopped.

How is your family? It turns out that if you open the family circle, it's all of us.

So offer your heart. Listen to your body, your breath, your life, the community around you. There's something holy in all this. And your loving attention is part of what's holy. It's a great gift.

I think about the song by Leonard Cohen that so many of us know, where he talks about the holy or the broken, hallelujah. "Even though it all went wrong, I stand before the Lord of song with nothing on my lips but hallelujah."

We get to be the ones. You get to be the Dalai Lama. You get to be the Kuan Yin of your family and neighborhood and culture—to carry the great heart, or to remember it, because everyone has it. But you get to let it shine quietly, humbly at times, listening deeply with the eyes of mercy for everyone.

This is who you are.

And on that page I read this: "The world only changes when we envision the transformation we wish to see. The task for us is to imagine another way and shepherd it into being."

It makes me think—is it possible that we need to write a new myth? One that emphasizes joy and happiness? I mean, we've all learned from suffering. There's no doubt that there's suffering in the world. But could we steer the focus of our thinking more toward the joy and happiness that exists here too?

I know I've mentioned this to you before, but I go to Homeboy Industries. I was there this past week, and they focus entirely on loving each other. What they've accomplished there is just remarkable. These men and women who've been in prison, who've done prison-worthy things—they're now running businesses and having happy families. And it all comes from love, which you talk about so much. I just feel like... let's write new myths. Let's write about how we learn through forgiveness and love and happiness and joy and dancing. Instead of only learning through suffering, let's create more and more myths of transformation through love.

So Nancy, first of all, I see your smile. I feel the joy. I have, of course, been to Homeboy Industries, and Father Greg Boyle is one of my great heroes, someone I deeply admire, because he loves people. He's like Ram Dass. I once asked Ram Dass, "What do you do?" He said, "I love everybody." And Father Greg does exactly that. He does it in the midst of what has been a great deal of suffering in the community around him, and he becomes a light.

So I want to invite you to close your eyes. Because I'm listening to you and receiving this message of joy, and I want you to feel it in your own body. Tell me how you feel it, what it's like.

I'm still a little stirred up...

Keep your eyes closed. It's okay. Feel the excitement—all that energy. Now imagine that it's joy. Joy is bubbling. All that excitement and energy.

I can feel a release.

Yes, there's a relief and a beauty in it.

Yeah.

And now—you came on and told us some beautiful things. There's one more thing you want to say directly to all of us, from this joy and this bubbling up and all this energy. What does your heart most want to say to us all?

Let's create myths where we really, truly envision the world as a place of happiness and love and cherishing.

So we receive that from you. We take it in. Let's change the story. Yes, there's suffering, but there's something much bigger. And let's change it so that we can live that.

Yeah.

And I was thinking—we can say there's eighteen thousand joys and two thousand sorrows. There is. There's joy everywhere. Every blade of grass is singing, saying, "Hey, I love the sunlight. I'm going to make sugar out of light." That's a miracle. "I'm going to turn light into sugar."

And we're going to take what you turn, what you offered, into joy. So thank you. Thank you. Really, thank you from the bottom of my heart for all you do for the world.

For those who have never read The Book of Joy, the dialogue between the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu—they're teasing each other and the Dalai Lama is grabbing Tutu's hat. Then Tutu says, "What's with the big nose, Dalai Lama?" And they just laugh at each other and say, "We're holy men. We're supposed to sit up and act holy," but they tease each other. And they carry that spirit of joy into the world. I can't recommend The Book of Joy more than any other book to speak to just what Nancy said.

A student who had just attended a month-long retreat at Spirit Rock shared her experience. She said, "It was my third long retreat, and I notice now that when I'm around a lot of people, there's always a little judging mind coming up. And what I found, finally what I did is—oh, there's my cousin over there. Oh yeah, there's my niece doing that funny thing. Oh, my old uncle is over there and has to grunt a little bit when they sit down. I had so much more compassion when I would think about the other people in the room. We're all seventy people in silence, right?"

They're family. They're all related. They're all family.

She continued, "Coming out of the retreat, I made an intention that anybody I have interaction with, I want to be loving and accepting to them. This morning I was in the hardware store and I saw this beautiful young man just dusting the metal things, and I said, 'Oh, you're doing a good job,' and he smiled. I asked if he celebrated the weekend, just making little conversation. It opens up the world."

This is really beautiful. I'm glad she had that long sit. And what I feel as she talks is that the practice she did for days and days and days—it's still pouring out of her as this love and care for everybody she runs into.

Close your eyes just for a second. Not much to do, but feel it. Feel how the retreat opened this heart of yours to see everyone as your family, as your children, as your nieces and nephews, brothers and sisters of the world. How big is that love? It's huge. It's huge. You may not always like them, but you love them anyway.

So feel it. Feel how big it is. That's the same thing Mother Teresa said when she said the problem is you draw your family circle too small. And now you open your family circle and look around at all the people here—all these wonderful people looking back at you. And they're all your family. Send them your metta and your love as you look at them. That's what you're sharing. And it's gorgeous.

That's right. Thank you, Jack. Thank you, Mimi. Thank you so, so much. Thank you for your art and your practice.

Well, this is fun. We've had joy and love. Let's see what comes next. Suffering's okay too. It's all good.

Alice. Oh, well. Hi, Jack.

Oh, hi, Alice.

I just wanted to say hello to you. I remember when we sat in Yucca Valley at the Institute of Mental Physics. That was way before Spirit Rock. And I will always, always remember you saying, "All you need to do in life is meditate and sweep the garden. And it does not matter how large the garden is."

Yes. So how have you been since then? That was like the 1970s or 80s. How's it going?

Well, since then, I'm in the school of Ridhwan, Diamond Heart, and I've been doing that practice with Hamid for about thirty years now.

Yes.

So life has really transformed. I'm now eighty-one. Were you born in forty-five as well?

Yes.

Yeah, I thought so. We're the same. I turned eighty-one last Monday.

Happy birthday.

Oh, thank you, Jack. Thank you. And my husband has Alzheimer's and he is in twenty-four-hour care. And I could not—I could not accept this if I didn't really have a meditation practice and also the work that I'm receiving with Diamond Heart.

So let's pause for a moment. First, I'm hearing your decades of practice—meditation and the Diamond Heart work, which is this spiritual, psychological, inner work. And then you were given, in this phase of our life—we're in our eighties—okay, people around us get Alzheimer's or they get other things. They get leukemia or cancer of other kinds or multiple sclerosis or all kinds of things. And here you are, and you say, "Oh, I'm so glad I have a practice that helps me hold all of this together, that I wouldn't have been able to accept it." What in your practice—close your eyes for a moment. We're just tuning in. What is it that's most helped you to get through and accept and stay well? And even you seem to have a really beautiful spirit. What helped you most?

The realization, Jack, that I could not do this without my community and my tribe.

So feel that. Feel how you are woven with your community and your tribe. And how much love there is in that.

Yes, yes, yes.

And I can just feel them holding both me and my husband Ron in their hearts and in their hands.

Yes.

And as you do this, now I want you to extend that, because some of the people on the screen here have a community and tribe, but some of us are also isolated. And so I want you to hold them as if they're part of your family. You know, as Bibi said, we're all family. And imagine that you are sharing that love and that support, even in this kind of mysterious way that we hold each other in our hearts, even if you don't live nearby or know each other personally or individually—that we're in this together. We're practicing together. We share this. And feel all the love, the courage, the grace that comes of feeling connected.

How is this?

Well, it's really interesting, Jack, because I can remember sitting in Yucca Valley and Joseph and you and the other teachers talking about how we're all connected. And I don't know that I've ever really felt that until now.

Isn't that fascinating? That is so fascinating. Well, stay with it because it's a really beautiful understanding and realization.

I will. Can I ask you one question? Do you know how Carol Wilson is? I used to work with her in Yucca Valley and I haven't connected with her in decades.

She's fine. I'll say that. She's doing okay. I'm happy to say. She's traveling now. I think she's in Europe. She's quite fine.

Okay, and is she still back at Barre?

Yeah, she might be there or she might be East Coast or Europe, but she's in California some of the time and she's fine. And that's beautiful because you're asking about someone who was your teacher. And we've had so many teachers, you know, and so we've been blessed.

So thank you, dear. And I love the fact that you're feeling that connection. And then in some way, we're all in that big tent of making it part of our family.

Absolutely. Absolutely.

So let's come back to a little meditation collectively together.

We sat and meditated and offered our thanks to our breath and body and our hearts and all they carry. Thank you. We rest in loving awareness, our true nature, consciousness itself, the loving witness, and feel the freedom of this even now.

We listened to some stories and teachings of things that we already know. Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed—the ancient eternal law. We listened to the stories of the freedom of the heart and what it means to listen and care for one another as family. To listen deeply, kindly.

We heard from others in our tribe about joy, happiness, stepping out of the judging mind and seeing everyone as your brother and sister and niece and nephew and beloveds, and sensing the community that you are inevitably a part of, that you're woven into.

And here we are. This is the big heart.

Rest in the loving awareness. Trust in the mystery and the connection. Take time to quiet your mind. Listen with your heart.

Thank you. Good night.

CHAPTER 60

Identity and Freedom

Jack Kornfield · 1h03

> In this evening dharma talk from a fall retreat at Spirit Rock, Jack Kornfield weaves together personal reflections from visiting his twin brother at a cancer institute with profound teachings on identity and liberation. He explores how the Buddha's teachings invite us to discover that we are not the body that ages, nor the thoughts and emotions that arise and pass, but rather the timeless awareness that witnesses all experience.
> Kornfield draws on the Aṅguttara Nikāya and Saṃyutta Nikāya to illuminate the ephemeral nature of phenomena, comparing this world to "a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud." He shares the pivotal teaching his teacher Ajahn Chah received from Ajahn Mun: to turn attention from the contents of experience back to "the one who knows"—consciousness itself. The talk traces how each aspect of the Buddhist path—dāna (generosity), sīla (virtue), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom)—invites a shift of identity from grasping and separation to freedom and interconnection.
> Practical guidance emerges throughout: how to work with pain, boredom, restlessness, fear, and the judging mind through naming and holding experience with loving awareness. Kornfield emphasizes that difficult experiences are not obstacles but opportunities to discover that we are the spacious awareness that can hold all things. The talk concludes with a call to recognize our true nature as loving awareness itself—the transformation that the world most needs.

As I was walking up the hill to come here this evening to give the talk, I could see a couple of bright planets just near the horizon. There's that sweet turning right before the sitting when we're in that liminal period between day and night, and the light becomes mysterious and magical. This beautiful valley here at Spirit Rock, which holds us, becomes a place where we can step out of the ordinary thrall and busyness of our life and listen in a deeper way.

Every wise culture in the world knows that there are times to go into the mountains or go to the ocean or go out in the desert or someplace where you can listen to your heart, listen to your body, listen to a rhythm that's bigger and deeper than the internet, and escape for a short time the madness of politics. You are so lucky. It's all happening out there, and there's no news, I want to assure you. It's all the same.

But the question when we come on retreat is not so much the future of humanity, but the presence of eternity. Are we connected to something that is timeless and great, that gives us an understanding of how to live in this mysterious life we've been given? Tonight I want to continue the conversation on identity and build on what Trudy spoke of—the wood wide web and the deepening of your presence and working with the breath. I'll also speak about the great matter, as it's called in Zen.

I just came back from Dana-Farber, the wonderful cancer institute connected with Harvard Medical School, being with my twin brother who's doing a bit better, but it's still difficult, dangerous. I was surrounded by a lot of bald-headed people who weren't monks and nuns. Their families and kids and older people and middle-aged, all there together. And I started to do metta for everybody. Metta for those who are sick. Metta for those who are caring for them and their families. Metta for the nurses and the attendants and the doctors and everyone who has to attend people in this particular healing environment—or in this environment where people don't heal.

The Buddha put it this way in the Anguttara Nikaya: it seems as though although we thought ourselves permanent, we are not. Although we thought ourselves settled, we are not. Although we thought we would last forever, we will not. It's very stark there to see it. But this is actually this mysterious human life we've been given, which is finite. And then what do we do with it? How do we live in it wisely? Clearly, there are some questions that can't be answered by Google.

The question of identity is at the heart of much spiritual tradition. Kalu Rinpoche, a wonderful, great old Tibetan master, said: You live in illusion and the appearance of things. There is a reality, but you do not know this, or you forget it. When you understand, you will see that you are nothing. And being nothing, you are everything. That is all.

Or like Nisargadatta, the sage that I studied with in Bombay, who put it differently, the same expression: Wisdom says I am nothing, love says I am everything. Between these two, my life flows.

So who are we? The Buddha spoke about liberation and offered his own experience of freedom, the liberated heart and mind, to all. He said this liberation allows you to move through the world without clinging, without grasping, without being entangled to the things in this world. And why should we learn this? The Buddha went on with these phrases: This world is like a star at dawn, a flash of lightning in a summer cloud, an echo, a rainbow, a phantom, and a dream. It's ephemeral. Yesterday was here and it's gone. Remember Y2K? Gone. Back with the dinosaurs, back with the pyramids. Things arise, they exist, and then they're gone, like that. Yesterday, your hard day for some of you meditating—it's gone. Today, maybe hard, maybe not—gone. Here we have the present as it is, and things arise and then they dissolve like that.

Again, here is the Buddha describing this from the Samyutta Nikaya: Suppose a man or woman who was not blind beheld the many bubbles on the Ganges River as they floated along and carefully examined them, and they would appear to him as empty, unreal, insubstantial. In exactly the same way does the meditator behold bodily phenomena, feelings, perceptions, mental formations, states of consciousness. As they arise and examining them carefully, they appear to them to be empty, insubstantial, void, without a self.

And the good news of this is not that it's a particular philosophy or something that you have to believe. This is really a science of the heart that you get to experiment with yourself. My teacher Ajahn Chah said, of course there are dozens of meditation techniques, but it all comes down to this: just let it be. Step over here where it's cool. Step out of the battle. Why not give it a try? That's his immediate description of the Buddha's freedom offered to all that he encountered.

Now the question is, hearing these lovely teachings, how do we do it?

When Ajahn Chah had practiced for the first eight or nine years in the forest, he got some instruction from teachers who lived in caves and out in the jungle with the tigers and all the wildness of the tradition of the forest monks. He had visions and insights and samadhi states. Then he went to see the greatest master of the time, another Ajahn named Ajahn Mun. After paying his respects, he described all of his meditation. He said, "I had this insight, my body dissolved into light, I had this vision and these states and understanding."

Ajahn Mun looked back at him and said, "Chah, you've missed the point. Those are just experiences. Experiences just arise and pass. They're like movies—a romantic movie, a comedy, a war movie, a documentary. You've all seen a lot of movies, haven't you?" He said, "Those are the movies. But the only way that you will really understand is to turn your attention from the screen, from the contents of thoughts and feelings and the movies and the states, back to the one who knows, back to the knowing itself, which is consciousness. Turn your attention back and become the witnessing, become the one who knows the experience rather than being lost or caught in each experience that arises and passes."

Now you already understand this in some deep way, because what I want to talk about tonight is in fact your own birthright, your own true nature. You understand it in the most simple way when you go and look in the mirror and notice you've aged. Face it—fur is getting lost in some parts and growing in other parts. As Wes says, the hard parts become soft and the soft parts become hard. It wrinkles and it sags and it spots and it does all that stuff. You notice you've aged. But the weird thing is, you don't necessarily feel older. You know that experience? It's quite common.

That's because in the moment of looking in the mirror, you see the body, which ages from being an infant to a toddler to a child, adolescent to young adult and up through middle age and old age. The body exists in time. It grows like a plant and then it fades and dies. But the consciousness that sees, that observes—that's outside of time. And so in that moment, it's like you're looking at your body and saying, "Hmm, aged, hasn't it? How interesting." As if you're looking at your human incarnation and saying, "Oh, where are we now? Let's see, three quarters of the way through, maybe if I'm lucky." Something like that. How's it going in your incarnation?

And the gift is that you're not so identified with this body and mind as the Buddha described—the thoughts and perceptions and feelings.

Here's a poem from Juan Ramón Jiménez: Yo no soy yo. I am not I. I'm this one walking beside me whom I do not see, whom at times I manage to visit and at other times I forget. The one who remains silent when I talk. The one who forgives sweet when I hate. The one who takes a walk when I am indoors. The one who will remain standing when I die.

He's really talking about a timeless spirit or consciousness that was born into your body.

I mean, who do you think you are? The lentils and beet soup that you had—that's what you are? Come on. Who are you really?

And when you don't identify or grasp, there comes a happiness, a joy, a lightness, and an ease. You can move through the world, but in a different way—in a liberated way.

This shift of identity is described in the first teachings of the Buddha, in the turning of the wheel, where he describes the noble truth: there is suffering. Anybody not have that, by the way? Okay, you could have your money back, but apparently... There's cause to suffering—greed, hatred, attachment, confusion. And there's an end of suffering. There's a path to the end of suffering, sometimes called the Eightfold Path: right understanding, right thought or right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration.

The path is summed up—this beautiful path to the end of suffering—sometimes as sīla, samādhi, paññā: virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Or sometimes it's summed up as dāna, sīla, bhāvanā: generosity, virtue, and mental cultivation. But it all describes a way to live in the world—not to remove yourself from the world, because you can't—but to live in the world without being caught by it.

This means you have to hold two realities at the same time. You have to remember your Buddha nature and your social security number and zip code. You have to hold the paradox in that way. And the Buddha begins: O nobly born, remember who you really are. Remember that your true nature is liberation itself. And then each of these trainings is a way to shift identity from being caught in a small sense of self to being free.

Dāna, which means generosity, the first of those qualities—when you become generous, what happens is that you shift your identity from mine and me and grasping, from the small sense of self, and you expand who you are to share with others. It's a really beautiful thing to be able to do this. It's actually a shift of the sense of being separate to being engaged and connected with something much larger.

As Ram Dass used to say, you're just an accountant in the firm anyway. You don't own this stuff. It's like this very wealthy man who died, and somebody was saying, "Gosh, how much did he leave?" And the other person said, "Well, everything, of course." That's how much you leave.

Sharon Salzberg was describing walking along the street in Seattle when a somewhat disheveled homeless person came up to her looking for money, gazed at her, and pleaded, "Don't you know me?" She said it just stopped her in her tracks. First she went through the normal files—do I know this person? Did they come to a retreat with me? Because it could have been. But then she realized that wasn't it. It was a deeper question. Don't you know me? I'm one of you. I'm part of you. Can you help me? Can we share together?

When you go to traditional Buddhist societies in Thailand, Burma, India, and places in East Asia and China, there is so much generosity connected with Buddhist practice. It's really beautiful. There's tentative giving, they describe, and then brotherly or sisterly giving—don't you know me, here, share with this. And then there's royal giving, in which you feel, as Rumi writes, "Walking out of the treasury, I feel generous. On a spring day, how can you not give things away?"

I remember being in very poor villages fifty years ago as a monk during the dry season, not a lot of food. People would come out and they would be so devoted in offering it. It was as if they were saying, "We so value what you represent—the spirit of freedom that you represent as a monk—that we'll give of the little food we have because you buoy up our spirit." It was just the most beautiful thing, to have people take the preciousness of what they had and say, won't you share this too?

Do you know anybody who's generous who isn't happy? Really generous, where that doesn't make happiness? There's a way in which generosity invites your nobility, your Buddha nature you could call it, your true nature, to shift from the small self to say, "It's us." It's what Trudy talked about last night in the description of the trees—how they were, through their roots, feeding not only their babies but sick trees. The trees were taking care of one another.

And that beauty... Larry Brilliant, who's a friend and was one of the people in the WHO who helped to eradicate smallpox—which is an astonishing thing, by the way, because 500 million people died of smallpox in the 20th century. It's hard to believe it was the number one, or one of the number one killers, and terrible deaths. And it's been eradicated.

He said in the last villages that they went to, in these remote villages in Asia, the people didn't want to be inoculated. They believed that smallpox was brought on by the gods for some reason, and you couldn't stop it. So they had to forcibly inoculate the last villages. He said, "We went to this last village, forcibly inoculated the people. They resisted. The village headman, as soon as they were all inoculated, said, 'Bring out the food. These people are our guests.'" And they picked what they had, the little bit they had in their garden, and they made a feast. Because even if you did, he said, what we believe the gods told us you should not do, and you were listening to some other gods, you are still the guests in our village. Imagine that.

So generosity means shifting your identity to something greater. And so does the next step, dāna-sīla—virtue—which we talked about in the beginning of the retreat. Simple precepts: to not kill, not steal, not lie, not misuse sexuality, intoxicants, things like that. It's pretty simple. It's hard to meditate after a day of killing and stealing, right? It doesn't work terribly well.

But more than that, it means a shift from greed and ignorance and being caught in things—because that's what you're caught in when you hate or when you kill or when you steal. You're caught in those powerful forces, and releasing those means shifting your identity from the fear and the grasping to one of reverence for life. Both outwardly, but also inwardly. How do you treat yourself? To care for others and not belittle yourself.

As you act with integrity, the true spirit of integrity is a growing of the heart and mind. It's a kind of freedom. It's a shift of identity. Thomas Jefferson said, "One man or woman with courage is a majority." And that just touches me when I hear it. It means that any human being who's willing to stand up for what really matters in their being can change everything.

So there's a beauty and again a shift of identity invited in this practice of sīla, of integrity. From being caught in the things of this world to discovering that you are free to act with your conscience no matter what the circumstances.

I have this story from Ada Shibley, who was a peacemaker working between Palestine and Israel with different peace groups. She was trying to bring a group of people from Palestine to meet with Israeli counterparts, and particularly this wonderful fellow named Ishmael, who'd gone through losses in his family, had been in prison, but became a great peacemaker. They got to the border crossing, and on their little minibus, a woman who was a soldier came on and said, "Give me your IDs. Oh, you're an Arab. You're a Palestinian. You can't come through this point. You've got to go two hours north and do this, and maybe they'll let you through."

They were on their way to a really important conference that they'd been working for weeks to arrange, bringing these parties together. Ada knew if Ishmael separated from the group, he'd never get in. She was really upset by it. The soldier said, "Get out, you don't have your papers," quite angrily. They were shocked.

And then Ada says, "I looked at this soldier and I saw a woman, a young woman with a uniform covering her youthful, beautiful body. And under her military hat, I saw long black hair tied in a ponytail." And with sharpness, the soldier kept saying, "No, get out. He needs to go to the other checkpoint."

She moved one way, and her hair moved differently. And I started listening to her hair. I didn't judge the human being standing in front of her. I just paused for a while and told her what we were doing. And I said, "Can you find any way to help us? I know the situation is really complicated. I can see that you want to help." Isn't that beautiful?

And somehow in this opening, she sort of moved her gun aside a little bit and said, "See that gate over there? If he walks slowly there and crosses through it, then he can come over and meet your bus on the other side in five minutes." And I said, "Thank you so much." And I told her more about the peace work we were trying to do, and we talked for a while.

And then she said, "I hate this. I hate going home to my mother who's feeding me, and I'm a soldier with a gun, and I can hardly let go of being a soldier. I can't smile." And I became curious. I wanted to ask her about her hair. I was convinced it had its own language. She said, "It's my reminder that I'm a woman. I'm born into life to love. I tend to forget this under this uniform, and I've forgotten how to smile. There's so much suffering I've seen. But then my hair slaps my face. It blows and reminds me I'm a woman. No one can bury this fact under any uniform. So when I'm out of here, I will work for peace like you." And now she was speaking the same language, and her hair was soft and calm.

There's something about our human possibility in which we can be caught up in hate and greed and so forth. And then the teachings invite us to step out of that and to find a truer, freer, bigger heart in the circumstance. It's a shift of identity.

After dāna and sīla comes bhāvanā—cultivation. And it's sometimes divided into two parts or several parts. In this case: sīla, samādhi, and paññā. Samādhi means concentration. And so here you're sitting and walking for the first couple of days, and you may have noticed that the attention is a bit scattered. Yes?

Albert Einstein put it this way. He said—and this was in Scientific American, by the way, it's not an internet artifact—"If you can drive safely while kissing a girl, you're simply not giving the kiss the attention it deserves." And this is really talking about the way we get so lost in electronics. I mean, I'm sorry for you. For our teen retreats, the big moment at the start is when they have to turn in the part of their anatomy that's made by Apple, basically. It's an amazing thing. Who will I be without Instagram and Snapchat, all my friends, and so forth? But you're the victims in a certain way of it as well.

And you sit and you begin to practice, and there comes a shift of identity from the torrent of thoughts that Trudy and West described, from the torrent of emotions, and you begin to let yourself get calmer and clearer, quiet the mind a bit.

Here is a letter written by David Armitage:

"Some years ago, I attended a rigorous six-year academic program at one of the famous colleges in Boston that required me to work during the day, take my classes at night, and do piles of homework on the weekends. On the first summer off, I wanted to get far away from these studies and work with my hands close to the earth, so I went to live with an Amish family in Pennsylvania. The experience renewed me, and I decided to do it again the next summer.

That year, I drove from Boston to Pennsylvania on a holiday weekend. The roads were crowded. A close friend had just died. The trip took hours and hours, and by the time I arrived, just before dusk, I was exhausted and anxious. My Amish host had delayed dinner for me. During the meal, I tried to act natural, but I felt full of nerves."

My host could clearly tell something was amiss, because at the end of dinner he said, "Come with me." I followed him to their backyard, which bordered on an alfalfa field. Although his faith discouraged smoking, the farmer lit a cigarette. Three of his children gambled about while two others clung to him. The farmer stood without saying a word, looking out over the alfalfa, and I did the same.

The dark green field was becoming harder to see in the fading light. The sky was peach at the horizon and deep blue higher up. Stars began to appear. And then, out of the alfalfa, rose fireflies. A few at first, but soon there were hundreds. Their pinpricks of light mingled with the stars—heaven and earth meeting in this humble man's backyard. My nervousness left me. The farmer turned and said, "That's for you."

And this is for you—to come here, to walk among the trees and among these hills, to step out of the busy rounds of your life and let yourself begin to quiet your mind and open your heart so that you can live in a freer and different way.

Samadhi means to calm and steady the mind, to concentrate. But the way that it works, as Trudy talked about last night, is not through striving and tension, but through a dedication or devotion that is both relaxed—here's the key—concentration grows when you are both relaxed and alert, relaxed and present.

Some people, new or even more experienced practitioners, will go on a concentration retreat. Those who practice for a while often find, "This really helped me to just focus on concentration for a while. It steadied me." Others find that there's so much else going on that if they try to concentrate too much in the first days, with all the other things arising, they're struggling against their experience. They need to open their field of attention and just be more mindful of everything. But over these days you will get more concentrated. You will be more present with the breath and body and what arises. And you want to do it gently.

As Julia Child said in her instructions, if you're in the kitchen and you drop the lamb, you can just pick it up. It's the same thing with the breath and your attention. You're there, you're paying attention, your attention goes off a thousand times. It's the very coming back with relaxed ease and dedication that matters. And in concentration, you want to start looking for those moments of ease, of joy, of simplicity—the little half smile that Wes invited you to this morning. Little by little, you start to have these moments where you realize, "Oh, a moment of ease. Two moments of ease. Some sense of joy." We have this negativity bias; we're always looking for problems. But in concentration, you actually want to tune yourself to the glimmers, the beginnings of wellbeing, and let them get nurtured. Concentration grows from trust, spaciousness, practice, and dedication. Little by little, the mind will settle in quiet.

Dana, sila, samadhi, panna—wisdom and mindfulness. So here you are, sitting, walking, mindfully eating on a good day when you're lucky. And the instructions from the Buddha are this: "My friends, there is a most wonderful way for living beings to realize purification, overcome grief and sorrow, end pain and anxiety, travel the true path, and realize liberation of heart and mind. And this is the establishment of mindfulness, mindful awareness."

Establishing mindfulness, the practitioner remains mindful of the body, mindful of feelings, mindful of the mind, and mindful of all the dharmas—of all the relations between things that arise and pass. Sitting, walking, standing, and lying down are all opportunities, the Buddha goes on to say, to practice this liberating quality of mindfulness. This is what we're doing here. And we're calling it also loving awareness—putting mindfulness and metta together.

So you're sitting here feeling the breath, and then after three breaths or five breaths or however long it happens to be, the attention goes elsewhere. What to do when it goes elsewhere? If you're not just devoted in that sitting to concentrating on the breath—which you can be, especially in these first days—you want to allow yourself to shift and receive, with the same careful attention you give to the breath, the other strong experience that's pulled your attention away.

Maybe it's pain in the body. How do you touch the pain that's in your body? With fear? With aversion? Do you tense around it with the desire to get it to go away, to try to fix it? That's our kind of normal strategy, isn't it? But the fact is that you have joy and sorrow, gain and loss, praise and blame, pleasure and pain. Anybody not have these? It's part of the human incarnation ride that you get. We all have it.

So then the question is: Can we be present? Can the identity begin to shift so we're not battling our experience or fighting it, but rather holding it with loving awareness?

And that means when there's pain there, the things you can do are to name it: tightness, throbbing, fire, fire, pain, pain. And to hold it with loving awareness the way you would hold a sick child, maybe, or a child that's crying. You've fed them and diapered them and done all the things, and they're still crying. What do you do? You pick them up, you hold them, and after a while they settle down. With loving awareness, when there's pain or difficulty in the body, you turn your attention to it, receive it with that mindful, spacious attention, and hold it kindly.

And then one of three things will happen. It'll soften and get easier. It'll stay the same, or it will get worse. That's not your job. Yours is to be the loving awareness itself.

Frank Ostaseski, who helped found the Zen Center Hospice, writes about a fellow he worked with who asked if Frank could teach him to meditate. He was in a lot of pain and he was in the last weeks of his life. He had stomach cancer. And it wasn't usually Frank's habit to teach dying people how to meditate, but he said, okay, we'll give it a try. So he oriented his attention toward the painful sensations, except that as soon as he tried to go to the painful sensations, it was too much for him. He started screaming, "I can't, it's too much. It hurts, it hurts, it hurts." Frank said, "Okay, let's try something else." And he put his hand on the man's stomach and said, "How's that?" Very gently, lovingly. He said, "Oh, that hurts too much." Frank said, "Okay." And he put his hands a foot or two away. "How's that?" He said, "Oh, it still hurts." "Okay." And he put his hands way out, made this big field around his body, still kind of focusing on loving kindness. And he said, "Oh, that's a little better." So Frank put his hands further away from him. And he said, "Oh, that's lovely, actually." There's no energetic bodywork, no California voodoo or anything. Just more space, just the space of awareness and love. And his words, not Frank's, not "my meditation," then came: "Oh, rest in love, rest in love." And when he'd get in trouble, he'd push his morphine pump and just repeat to himself, "Rest in love, rest in love." Maybe the morphine helped, who knows?

But you start to realize that you can be in the presence of your experience, your bodily experience, a painful one, or a beautiful, joyful one—receive the opening of the body, which will happen here—all with the space of loving awareness. And then identity begins to change. Because usually you take it as your pain. "Oh, God, I have a headache. My back aches. Poor me. Am I going to have this? Is it going to get worse tomorrow?" You know how the mind is. "Oh, my God, how will I finish ten days? Today's already achy. They're going to have to wheel me out of here." You want to go home to your mother if you had a nice mother. Some of you. Some of you want to go home to your mother and get chicken soup or whatever. And you just build huge stories around that pain. "Oh, I'm going to have to get surgery for my knee pain. I know. I'll be the first person at Spirit Rock to have to get surgery before they leave." And things like that.

But after a time, it shifts from being your pain to just being pain. And as you get wiser, it shifts from being just pain to being the pain.

It's not just your pain actually. When you get quiet and open, you realize it's the pain of having a body. Everybody shares in this. She does and he does—it's part of it.

And there I was at Dana-Farber, looking at all these people tending their loved ones who had cancer. It wasn't somebody's cancer. It was our human lot—that we have at some point in our life aging or sickness or pain. And so it's not that you've done something wrong or that you shouldn't have it. But you become mindful and you note, "Oh, pain." And you touch it and hold it with a merciful, kind attention. And you start to discover that that's not who you are—that you are the loving awareness that can notice it.

And then you notice this other stuff that happens. You get bored or restless. And these are really important—to be bored. It is. And restless. Anybody who hasn't been bored hasn't been paying attention here. I mean, you're just doing your breath, right?

Because when you're home and you're bored, what do you do? You open the refrigerator. Or you get online or something. Because you can't be with yourself. You can't bear your boredom or your loneliness or your restlessness. So you can't actually be a human being who's present for yourself.

So here, if you're bored, be bored. And then you name it. "Bored, bored." There you are breathing. "I feel so bored." "Bored, bored." Or you're restless. And you think, "Oh my god, I'm so restless. I have to go walk. But they haven't rung the bell. I hope they ring the bell." "Hoping, hoping, hoping." And that settles down.

"But I'm so restless." You just name it. "Restless, restless, hoping, hoping." And then it settles down after a while and you can continue. Or maybe it doesn't settle down. It gets worse. "Restless, restless." "I can't stand it. It's too hard. I don't know what to do." It feels like you're jumping out of your skin.

You know what to do? Then you say to yourself, "All right, I'll die of restlessness. I'll be the first person this fall to die of restlessness at Spirit Rock." You surrender. You say, "Take me." And the minute that you say, "Take me, I'll die of restlessness," something interesting happens. Guess what? It gets easier—because most of the difficulty is your resistance to the experience.

"Oh my God, it's terrible, terrible." Dying, dying, dying—you're naming it "dying." OK, dying. I've died for a while. All right, still bored. Restless, restless. Dying, dying. OK, wonder what they're going to have for lunch?

Because the mind has no pride at all. You'll see it. It deals with something, and then it goes on to something else.

Or fear comes, and you think, "Oh, I shouldn't be afraid." Everybody's afraid at some point. Fear is the membrane between what you know and the unknown, and it's part of being human. So what do you do when fear arises? You can either identify with it—"my fear, I'm afraid"—or you name it. "Oh, here it is, strong. Fear, fear." The sweatiness, the stopping of the breath. You feel it in your body. You feel the emotion. And you look at it.

It tells a story. As Mark Twain said, "My life has been filled with terrible misfortunes, most of which never happened." And so you see its story. And the loving awareness is bigger than the fear. Fear, fear. "Oh my God, it's horrible." Terror, terror. "I think I'm going to die." Thinking, thinking. You're not actually dying. "Oh, but I'm doing pretty well with it. I'm hanging in there." Pride, pride. And you just start to notice the different experiences rise and fall in the field of loving awareness.

Or loneliness comes. The poet Hafez says, "Don't surrender your loneliness so quickly. Let it cut more deeply. Let it season you as few ingredients can." So you note it. Lonely, lonely. And then your tears come, because as you sit, the unfinished business of the heart will arise—your loneliness and the regrets and the grief. You want to honor it and bow to it and say, "Ah, grieving. Tears, tears." They're called tears of the way, tears of the Dharma. Weeping, weeping. And you let that happen. And then you think, "What's for lunch?" Because that's what happens. And you start to see that these experiences are not you and they're not personal.

There's an expression I just learned—I think it might be from Russian, it might be Czech—but it's an idiom used about difficulties that goes, "Not my circus, not my monkey." The idiom basically means it's just not your problem. That's true for these emotions. They come and they do their dance—the fear and the joy, the judging mind.

Have you noticed the judging mind? You judge others: how they're practicing, who comes in late, how much food they're taking—all the judgment you project outward. And then all the self-judgment.

What to do? As Florida Scott Maxwell, the novelist, said, "No matter how old she is, a mother looks to her middle-aged children for signs of improvement." We have built into us this history of how we're supposed to be, and it comes out in the judging mind. So you sit here and judgment comes. You say, "I shouldn't judge. Stop judging."

"I hate that judgment." But what's that? Just more judgment.

So what can you do? You bow to it. You name it. "Oh, judging mind. Thank you for your opinion." You know whose voice it is—we won't talk about them. "Thank you for your opinion." And then you feel your breath again.

Or the doubting mind arises: "I can't do this. This is too hard. Everybody else looks like a Buddha, and I'm sitting here completely unable to do it. I'm the loser in the class. I'm the dunce, the Dharma dunce." All those things you tell yourself. And you say, "Thank you for your opinion." That's all. That's just the doubting mind. It's not who you are.

And then with loving awareness, you watch the thoughts that come and go. Little by little and gradually, there comes—equally naturally—a sense of ease and joy and a steadiness of love. That little half smile of the Buddha. You say, "Oh, there's the judging mind again." Or, "I know fear. Oh, I've seen you fifty times this retreat. Hello, fear. I know you." And it loses its power over you because it's not who you are. Who you are is the spirit, is this loving awareness that was born into your body.

When my daughter Cindy was in first grade, we took a trip to California to visit my family. While we were there, she lost a tooth. She ran into the kitchen to show me and asked, "Could the tooth fairy fly that far?" My mom shot me a look of concern and later suggested that by indulging in such fantasies, I was teaching my child not to trust adults. Wasn't Cindy going to feel betrayed when she found out the truth?

So the next time Cindy lost a tooth, she chattered with excitement as I put her to bed. "How does the tooth fairy get in?" she asked. "Through the window," I explained. "Shouldn't we unlock it then?" she asked. "Oh, I do that right before I go to bed," I said. "Why does the tooth fairy want everybody's teeth?" she went on.

I took a deep breath and considered my mother's advice. Cindy would soon figure out the truth anyway, so I told my inquisitive seven-and-a-half-year-old that in fact I was the tooth fairy. She cried hard. I apologized, explained that she was getting to an age at which it was more important for me to be honest with her than to play imaginary games. We cuddled for a while and she stopped crying. She had one last question: "What do you wear?"

You see, your thoughts will tell you all these stories. Not only are there emotions like loneliness and fear and sadness and tears, but there's also the tedium of it all. There's a cartoon in the New Yorker: a car crossing the vast Utah desert, and there's this roadside billboard that reads, "Your own tedious thoughts next 200 miles." Basically a description of meditation.

There are reruns. You're stuck in Motel 6 late at night, and you can't turn the channel, and you can't turn it off. Ninety-some percent of the thoughts you have today were ones you thought yesterday.

They're repeats. Okay, thank you for your opinion.

So instead, you can note: oh, planning mind... oh, remembering... oh, judging mind... doubting mind—and then you come back to your breath. And the loving awareness allows you to step out of the thrall of the judgments and the thoughts, the gaining and the evaluation, and to actually be the presence itself. Sila, samadhi, paññ̃a.

I should probably stop here, but there's one more piece to go, because there are two wings to what allows the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas to move through the world freely. One is the wing of wisdom or mindful understanding, and the other is the wing of love and compassion. They go together, which is why we're talking about loving awareness.

So as you sit, you will have at times expansion and pleasure and delight and joy that opens. Let yourself embody it, tend to it, inhabit it when it comes. And as you sit, you will suffer as well—because you get the tainted glory of humanity, all the beauty of it and the pleasure. You stop running around and running away, and you actually get to be present for it.

The Sufis put it this way: "Overcome any bitterness because you are not up to the magnitude of the pain that was entrusted to you. Like the mother of the world, each of us is sharing a part of her heart, and therefore each human being is endowed with a certain measure of cosmic pain. You are called upon to meet it in compassion instead of self-pity."

Instead of "oh, poor me," we meet it and say: this is the pain of being a human being, along with the pleasure of being a human being. We all carry our measure of this. The question is, again, how do you carry it? Do you take it personally? Do you fight? Do you struggle in unhealthy ways? Or is there a way that you can carry it with dignity, with a free heart?

There's this little passage from Lewis Mumford: "A person of courage never needs weapons, but they may need bail." There's something about the courage of compassion. It's actually what allows you to show up for the world. Without compassion, you can't even be here fully, without this tenderness of heart.

And compassion is actually a strength. In the West, we think of love as a kind of weakness, but love is actually—well, you see these images of mothers picking cars up off their children. It's an immense power. When you begin to discover that within you is the great heart of compassion, then you can carry that anywhere and everywhere.

Thich Nhat Hanh says it so simply: "When the crowded Vietnamese refugee boats met with storms or pirates, if everyone panicked, all would be lost. But if even one person in the boat remained calm and steady, it was enough. It showed the way for everyone to survive."

So you become that one person.

Somebody asked this beautiful question this morning about merit, and buried in the question a little bit—at least as I heard it—was also: are we doing this for ourselves, or is there some other purpose to it? As if, in some way, we could even separate ourselves from the rest. Like the trees that Trudy talked about.

Alice Walker wrote it this way. She said, "One day I was sitting there like a motherless child, which I was. And it came to me, that feeling of being a part of everything. And I knew if I cut a tree, my arm would bleed. And I laughed and I cried and I ran all around the house."

In fact, when it happens, you can't miss it. As we quiet the mind and open the heart, we begin to feel our connection with life. We're not separate from it. Our identity shifts. It is us.

And then you begin to realize as well that what this world needs more than anything is a change of heart, a change of consciousness. Ajahn Chah said, "Dharma means heart. Dharma is the work of the heart."

No amount of computers and internet and nanotechnology and space technology and biotechnology—all these amazing scientific things where we have the great library of Alexandria in our pockets—I mean, you have everything, maybe not everything you need, but all that information. But that isn't enough to stop continuing warfare, continuing racism, continuing environmental destruction. No amount of outer development will do it.

We have all this outer development and look at the world as it is. So at this time, what humanity needs is to match the outer development of life with the inner development. We need wisdom. We need virtue. We need someone who's unafraid to stand up for the truth no matter what. We need generosity to see it's not me, but it's us. As Mother Teresa says, if you're lonely, if you have difficulty, the problem is you draw your family circle too small. It's all us. And so the shift of identity is into the great heart of compassion as well.

There's a book entitled I Wish My Teacher Knew, and these are second and third graders' handwriting—you know, those books with the little scrawly handwriting from kids. "I wish my teacher knew that I don't have pencils at home to do my homework." "I wish my teacher knew that my mom doesn't sign my reading log because she can't read." "I wish my teacher knew that after my mom got diagnosed with cancer, I'd been without a home three different times this year." "I wish my teacher knew that my dad works two jobs and I don't see him hardly at all." "I wish my teacher knew that my little brother gets scared and I get worried when he wakes me every night." "I wish my teacher knew that I'm smarter than she thinks." Isn't that lovely? "I wish my teacher knew that I love animals and would do anything for my animals. I would love to work at the SPCA so I could help animals get adopted." And you just hear the hearts of these children. This is our humanity, but it's not just them. It's you. It's all of us.

I remember sitting here one evening during teachings some years ago. A woman who had practiced here for some time, whose daughter had died, came just torn apart. As you can imagine, the death of your child is something really hard to go through. She said, "In the middle of this retreat is the day my daughter died. So I'd like permission to ring the bell outside 108 times in her honor." And so it was the sitting maybe before the talk or something, just getting dusk, and she went out. We'd had a memorial service for her daughter who had died, her teenage daughter, a few years before and rung the bell 108 times. And she went out and it was as if she was using the bell to talk to her daughter. She took the striker and she just whacked the bell as if her daughter could somehow hear her. We were sitting and I had to tell people why the bell was ringing. I said, "This woman who's on the retreat, her daughter died, teenage daughter, just a few years ago. And this is the day and the time." And we were all sitting there weeping because it wasn't just her daughter, but it was everybody who's ever lost anyone.

Yitzhak Perlman, one of the greatest violinists in the world, had polio as a child and was injured by it so that he has to walk with braces. He can't walk in an easy way. He was playing a violin concerto with the New York Symphony, maybe Lincoln Center or one of the great halls there. He'd walked on stage, put down his walking aids, took out his violin, and began to play. Partway through the performance, where he was doing a solo part, all of a sudden there was this loud crack and a string broke on his violin. Everybody wondered, what is he going to do? I'm sure it was a Stradivarius or some amazing violin. Would he get up and kind of use his braces and walk over and get another violin? Would he get one from the concertmaster? He sat for a moment and paused and then nodded to the conductor to continue, and he played the whole rest of the concerto on three strings. People were riveted because it's not scored in that way and not easy to do. When it was finished, he got this wild applause and standing ovation from everyone. When it quieted down, he sort of quieted everybody down. He had something to say. He looked out and said, "Sometimes in life, what matters is to see how much music you can make with what you have left." It was a metaphor for his whole life, really—the body that he was given, the polio that he had. The string was really just a moment. But there's something deeper.

Oh, nobly born, begin the Buddhist texts. Remember who you really are. Remember your true nature. Your true nature is loving awareness itself. It's the spirit that came into this body. It's the spirit that will leave this body, that animates, that receives all things. Become, as Ajahn Chah said, the one who knows. Become compassion. Become awareness itself.

And what we're doing with this very difficult and beautiful training—you're so lucky. Even with the difficulties, they're actually the best part. They're the part that train the greatness of heart. So they're fine. People come in and say, "I'm having a hard time," as if I'm going to give them a grade of C-minus. But actually I get really interested and appreciative. Oh, how's that going? Can you keep that dignity and loving awareness through it all?

This is our invitation—to sit and walk and be present. And as you transform your heart, you bring the gift that the world most needs to all you touch.

I've seen it in Aung San Suu Kyi and Nelson Mandela. We visited Aung San Suu Kyi after seventeen years of prison and house arrest. She said, "You know, it wasn't really prison or house arrest because I never let myself hate them. I did it as a practice, a seventeen-year retreat." And now she's the light of Burma, running her country. Nelson Mandela walked out of prison with so much magnanimity and graciousness.

And that is your birthright—that you too can practice in this way.

CHAPTER 61

Big Mind Meditation

Jack Kornfield · 38 min

> In this guided meditation from a Fall Insight Meditation Retreat, Jack Kornfield leads practitioners through a contemplative journey from focused attention to expansive awareness. Beginning with mindfulness of sound as a doorway, the practice gradually opens into what various Buddhist traditions call "big mind" or the sky-like nature of awareness itself—vast, transparent, and timeless.
>
> The meditation explores how sounds arise and vanish like clouds or bubbles in the spacious field of consciousness, followed by similar observations of thoughts, bodily sensations, and emotions. Drawing on language resonant with both Theravāda vipassanā and Mahāyāna teachings, Kornfield points to the mind's true nature as open, clear, and unobstructed—containing all phenomena yet not limited by them. The instruction "to know the truth, look directly into the nature of mind itself" echoes classical contemplative guidance found across Buddhist traditions.
> This practice offers a powerful complement to more focused samādhi and satipaṭṭhāna techniques, helping practitioners recognize that awareness itself is inherently spacious and luminous. The meditation concludes by suffusing this vastness with compassion (karuṇā) for all beings who forget their true nature, culminating in what Kornfield calls "loving awareness"—the integration of clear knowing with boundless heart. This approach supports both formal meditation and a way of meeting daily experience with openness and tenderness.

This morning's meditation will be a guided practice, shifting from the focus on breath and body to begin with another doorway of mindfulness: attention to sound.

Let yourself sit, continue to sit as you are, settled and still. And for this time, bring your attention to the doorway of the ear and begin to notice the words as they arise and as they vanish. Notice as well the soft sounds in the room. Notice the sound of the bells that arise. And relax into hearing, allowing distant sounds to come and go.

Like the breath which arises out of emptiness, appears, and then vanishes, so too the sounds appear, experienced for a moment, and then pass away.

As you listen, relax and open. Let yourself sense or feel in any way you can that your mind is not limited to the size of your head. Feel, imagine, sense that your mind is vast like the sky, as big as this room and even bigger, open and spacious. And the sounds that you hear—these words appearing and disappearing, the distant sounds, the soft sounds in the room—all arise and pass like clouds or bubbles in the vast sky of mind. No inside, no outside. Just openness. Awareness itself, vast like the sky.

In the distance, sounds appear and move through one dimension of the sky. Bells arise. Relax into vastness, openness without any borders. Rest in the sky-like nature of your own mind. No inside or outside. Words appear and disappear. Sounds in the room arise and pass. Like clouds. Like bubbles. Leaving no trace.

To know the truth, look directly into the nature of mind itself. In its true state, mind is transparent, vast as the sky, timeless, containing all things, yet not limited by them. Wakefulness itself, pure, clear. Rest in the vast space and let each of the sounds appear like a cloud and dissolve, leaving the space open and empty. Silent.

As you rest in the vastness, let yourself also notice the play of thoughts. Just as sounds come and go, word thoughts and picture thoughts appear in the vast space of mind. A story is told, an image arises, and like clouds, they appear for a time and then disappear, leaving no trace. Sounds arise and vanish in the vastness. Thoughts and images appear like bubbles, like clouds, and then disappear. Rest in the vastness of awareness itself. Relax into it. Trust it. It is your home.

In its true state, say the texts, mind is naked, transparent, immaculate, vast as the sky, allowing for all things, yet not tainted by them. Rest in vast awareness, mind like space. Relax into it.

Notice these words and sounds. They appear and dissolve. Notice the thoughts like clouds arising for a time and vanishing, leaving no trace. You are the vastness. You are the one who knows, the timeless awareness, open like the sky. Rest in this true nature. Relax into it.

Notice too the sensations of the body. If you feel carefully, there is no solid body. There are areas of pressure and hardness, of warmth and cool, of tingling and vibration. All float and change slowly in the vast space of mind. No solid body—a field of changing sensations with space in and around each of them. Tingling, pressure, cool, warm. The field of body sensations floats and slowly changes in the vast space of mind.

Sounds appear and disappear. Thoughts and images arise like clouds, like bubbles in the vastness. They display themselves and vanish, leaving no trace. Sensations float and slowly change. The breath moves like a breeze. No inside or outside—just the soft presence of breath, like a pulsing movement in the vastness. Relax into stillness and openness. You are the vastness. You are the one who knows.

Sounds come and go. Words and images appear and disappear like clouds, like bubbles—empty, nothing solid. Sensations float and slowly change. The breath moves like a breeze, its soft sensations arising in the vastness. The mind is the sky itself—vast and transparent, timeless, knowing all things that arise yet not limited by them.

Emotions can arise like weather: sorrow or laughter, joy, confusion, sadness. They arise and color the flavor of space for a time. And they too vanish without leaving a trace. Relax. Rest in vastness. Trust it. Open into it. It is your home.

As you rest in the vastness that is your own true nature, sounds and sensations appear and float and vanish. Thoughts and emotions arise like clouds or weather, like bubbles. Trust the vastness. Let go into it. Rest in it. Be the one who knows the knowing.

And finally, let this vastness also be filled with a tender-hearted compassion for all those beings who forget who they really are and get caught up in fear and confusion, in hatred and grasping. So many beings who forget their own true nature. Let the tenderness fill the vastness—awareness and love for all that lives, compassion for the sorrows. You are loving awareness: timeless, open, wakeful. Rest in vastness and love. Trust it. Open into it. Loving awareness, wakefulness and love without boundaries, vast.

As you let your eyes open, sense the vastness with sights appearing within it. And let yourself also extend the field of love to all those around you.

You can even look around a little bit at the beings appearing in this vastness and field of love.

CHAPTER 62

The Bodhisattva & Power of Intention

Jack Kornfield · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk from a Fall Insight Meditation Retreat, Jack Kornfield illuminates the path of the Bodhisattva and the transformative power of intention (cetanā). Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that kamma is created by intention, Kornfield explains how the same action can have entirely different karmic significance depending on the heart's motivation behind it.
> Kornfield distinguishes between short-term intention—the "mindful pause" that allows us to ask "What is my best intention here?" before responding—and long-term intention, which sets the compass of the heart toward a guiding north star. He shares the traditional Bodhisattva vows, including Śāntideva's beautiful aspiration that the Dalai Lama recites daily, and invites practitioners to craft their own personal vows. The teaching is enriched by the story of A.T. Ariyaratne's remarkable 500-year peace plan for Sri Lanka, demonstrating how vast vision combined with compassionate intention can transform seemingly intractable conflicts.
> The talk addresses practical wisdom for leaving retreat and returning to daily life: not judging ourselves or others, becoming a "stream of benevolence," and remembering that we carry the great powers of mindfulness and compassion. Kornfield weaves together stories from his own experience—including bringing the Buddha and Quan Yin into difficult divorce negotiations—with teachings from the Dalai Lama, Archbishop Tutu, and others. He concludes with Mary Oliver's poem invoking the Buddha's final instruction: "Make of yourself a light." This teaching offers both the philosophical foundation and practical tools for living as a modern Bodhisattva.

The day that this hall opened, this bell appeared. It was a gift from Zen Center. We kind of wanted a bell, and then this great big beautiful bell just appeared. "Oh yes, you need this," from your friends at Zen Center. I love it. I could just sit and ring it. In fact, I do.

And the other thing that appeared the day we opened was that beautiful carpet out there. A friend who deals in carpets came up. I said, "Come look at our new space." And he said, "Oh, I've had this carpet for a long time, saved for something. I don't know what. Let me try it out up here." He unrolled it, and it was like people just started to pour in gifts for this place. And now, sixteen or seventeen years later, there have been

2.6 million meditation hours in this room. You added your frequent flyer meditation miles. It's such a marvelous and special thing to have a temple that people can come and learn in the way that you have.

So tonight I want to continue the theme of identity and particularly talk about the identity of the Bodhisattva.

This evening, that kind of mist and the rain—like out of one of those beautiful ancient Chinese watercolors.

The question people have is: How to leave the temple? Going back to work, to family, to relationships, to the society and world and to the elections and all of the madness that's out there—and beauty.

There are just a few simple things to remember. The first: you've learned, as you've sat and walked, to not be so judgmental. Your mind has a mind of its own. It's a little bit mad sometimes, you may have noticed—and not just in the angry way, but in the madness way. It has no pride. And to remember not to judge yourself and not to judge others. It's really a treasure to walk through the world in this way.

During my first year of teaching, a girl named Shay was assigned to my middle school seventh grade class. She was a desperately unhappy child and rebelled against the most basic rules, such as stay in your seat, raise your hand to speak. Shay and I battled for control of the classroom. I tried every technique I knew—behavioral contracts, praise, reprimands—none of them worked. I even called Shay's home every week, but no one answered. She lived with and was being raised by an older sister.

I went to the school counselor, who said I'd done my duty and offered to transfer Shay to another classroom. I declined. Shay was my student, and I wasn't going to pass her on to someone else. In the faculty lounge, the older teachers patted me on the back, thankful they didn't have Shay in their classroom.

June finally came. On the last day of school, Shay was quick to head out the door. As I sat contemplating my failure with her, she walked back in. "Oh great," I thought, "one last act of terrorism." In Shay's hand was a small bowl, the kind that students make in ceramics class. She thrust it into my grasp. "Here," she said, "it's the only thing I could think of to give you." I turned the slightly misshapen bowl over and saw Shay's initials etched on the bottom. "Thanks for trying to like me," she said. And before I could speak, she turned and left.

After several more years of teaching, I went on to become a school principal and now a superintendent. Shea's bowl has never left my desk. "Thanks for trying to like me."

As I believe I said in the first talk, from Nelson Mandela: it never hurts to see the good in someone. They often act the better because of it.

And so there is something that's not even personal. It's something bigger than taking the experiences that we have personally. It's allowing yourself to become a stream of benevolence. "Thanks for trying to like me." You leave with great powers. It's quite wonderful. You leave with the powers of mindfulness and compassion, and with them a particular key—a key that's central to the awakening of the Buddha, to Buddhist psychology—which is the key of wise intention.

Karma, that oft-used word that has all kinds of meanings and mis-meanings. You hear the advertisement on the radio: "Please come to this used car dealer in Berkeley because it's his karma to give you cars at the lowest possible price." Your karmic misfortune if you believe him, or whatever. But what does karma really mean? There are many ways to understand it. But at its simple essence, kamma vipaka—karma, cause and result, action and result—comes down to one simple thing: karma is created by intention.

So if you get in your car in the driveway and you pull out and crash into the next door neighbor's house, through the hedge and into their living room, because you are so furious that they cut down all those beautiful trees along the property line, and also that they called the pound on your dog because it went over and did its duty on their lawn, and they tried to get it confiscated, and they did terrible things—and you're just enraged and you do that—the little blue lights will join you, and the police will take you away, and you'll have to deal with the consequences of that violent act.

But if you do the exact same act—you pull out of your driveway and crash through the hedge and into the living room of your neighbor—because the gas pedal stuck, one of those models where that happens, and you couldn't stop it, instead of arrest for your action, even though the neighbor might be upset, there will also be sympathy. "Are you hurt? Are you okay? What can we do? How do we fix all of this?" Exact same action: car, hedge, crash into the house, you at the wheel. The only difference was the intention. Your intention is that which creates the unfolding of your life and your karma.

If you study all the texts that talk about dying, the moment of death, there's weighty karma and habitual karma and proximate karma and random karma—all these kinds of karma. But the most powerful one, or the most significant one, is the habitual karma. What we practice becomes who we are next.

Tomorrow morning we'll talk about ways to support mindfulness and compassion in your daily life—daily practice, community, retreat, and so forth. To be able to pay attention to your karma, or your intention if you will, takes mindfulness. It takes care, which is why you practice. There's no such thing as a one-walk dog, right? You have your dog, and every morning you walk your dog, and hopefully every day also you do your mindfulness practice.

So the key in relationship, in work, in action, is intention. There are both short-term and long-term intentions. Short-term intention can be most usefully described, when you work with it as a practice, as the mindful pause. There you are in the middle of a conversation with your beloved, and there comes to be a little bit of friction—which doesn't happen very often, but could happen even with such enlightened people as ourselves. Couldn't it? I suppose.

And when you find yourself in conflict, in relationship, or in work, or in other circumstances, if you can take a single breath or two, make a little space of pause, and ask yourself, "What is my best intention here? What is my highest? What's my best intention?"—all of a sudden, things will change. Because how you respond or speak matters. You can say, "What did you mean?" in a kind of upset, angry way, where you're trying to be right and be strong and defend yourself. Or you can say, "What did you mean? I want to understand."

You want to listen. You want to learn. There's a caring in it. The tone of voice and the intention to understand versus to barricade and be right takes the conversation in entirely different directions.

Or you're about to answer that email or that text where someone sent you something and there's some concern, some conflict. You look and you take a breath, a mindful pause, and you read it and say, "What's my best intention?" Oh, I want to get along, I want to solve this, I care about this person. Usually it's true—even "I love this person." Then you really say, "I think I'll change a couple of words there. I'll soften the language. Make it a little more connecting before I press send."

Do you understand this? It's not so complicated. To have a mindful pause is making space in which you can then see with the heart and not with the habit of reactivity.

You know when you build a fire—there's this beautiful poem about it: "What makes a fire burn is the space between the logs, the breathing space. Too much of a good thing, too many logs packed in too tight, can squelch the fire as quickly as water." So there's something about making space. It makes a huge amount of difference.

When I was in the middle of what was a painful divorce—there are apparently some divorces that aren't painful, but they're in the minority—dealing with the lawyers and things after a long marriage, it was quite difficult. I was very devoted. But it became clear that we had different needs, and my ex really didn't want to stay married. I'm quite loyal and I would have, but she didn't want to. When it came to dividing everything and various other things, it was pretty painful. Meeting with lawyers was not easy. She was very concerned and worried, which fueled things more.

I would go in, and I would take a breath—or two, or ten. Then I would envision that on one arm was Quan Yin, compassion, and on the other was the Buddha, great equanimity and wisdom, and we would go in together. I would sit down, and by taking the breath and bringing in the Buddha and Quan Yin, I was so much better off than if I'd gone in alone.

It was all because I took the breath and asked, "What is my best intention?" and let me get support for this. You can imagine some difficulty in your life. What would happen if you brought the goddess of compassion and the Buddha—or whoever it is—in with you? Makes it easier, it turns out. They handle it better. They have both concern and listening and tenderness. There's a lot of equanimity. And also a kind of courage—a courage to be present without reactivity.

There's a line I love: "To me, there's no greater act of courage than being the one who kisses first." I'd call it the courage to forgive. There's something really brave about saying, "Alright, I'm here and I'm present and I will tend to what needs to be done, but I'll do it with an open heart." All that comes with a simple pause and asking, "What's my best intention? What's my highest intention?"

Now the other dimension of intention, cetanā, is long-term intention. Long-term intention is a way of setting the compass of the heart, setting the direction of your life toward some north star that really matters to you.

Star is a good image for me to use because when I was a kid, one of the things I liked to do was go out and lie on the grass on a clear night and look at the stars. But what was fun for me was to imagine that I was on the bottom of the earth. Because there really isn't a top and bottom, you know. The maps were made by certain people who thought they should be on top—mostly European white folks who put themselves there.

But there isn't, actually. There's no top or bottom. And I would imagine I was at the bottom, stuck onto the earth by the magnet of gravity, holding on so I didn't fall down. Then I would look down into the sea of stars. There was this kind of little thrill that would come because I'm holding on and I'm not going to fall down into it. But it was marvelous to do.

And there's something about long-term intention in which you sense the vastness of time—not an election cycle, not the rise and fall of a business, not concerns for individuals and people that you love, though all those matter. But they're all taking place in the turning of the seasons and the vastness of the solar system and the galaxies and the enormity of space and time unfolding.

Long-term vows. When you sit in Zen, when you go to a Zen center, or before you do your meditation, you put your hands together in some way or other. "Sentient beings are numberless. I vow to save them all." It's the first of these four vows. "Desires are endless. I vow to master them"—or overcome them, or whatever you want to do with them. And so forth. There are these extraordinary vows of the Bodhisattva. Beings are numberless. I vow to save them all.

Now there's a little problem with this that I've often mentioned when I talk about it. And that is that the beings that you know personally don't want to be saved by you. You might notice that in your family and in your community. So it has to have some other kind of meaning. And it does.

Listen to this bodhisattva vow from Shantideva that the Dalai Lama recites every morning when he wakes up: "May I be a bridge, a boat, a raft to ferry those across the flood. May I be food for the hungry. May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be a lamp in the darkness for all who are lost. May I be medicine for those who are ill. May I be the light that brings awakening to beings. For as long as beings exist, time and space, beyond all that, until all beings are awakened together, may I carry on this work of serving all beings."

Some little vow like that, something like that in the morning. But what's beautiful, if you listen to it, is it's not about saving the person next to you in some kind of misguided way. It's saying, "I set my heart in the direction of compassion for myself and all beings, no matter what happens." The sun can rise in the west, the bodhisattva has only one way, which is the way of compassion, no matter what happens.

One of my favorite examples—and a story I like to tell about this—Trudy and I got to see him this last year when we were teaching together in Singapore. There's a wonderful elder in Sri Lanka named A.T. Ariyaratne. He came to this wisdom conference in Singapore. There were all kinds of great speakers, both spiritual and corporate heads and government people. And then there was Ari, who was like having the Dalai Lama arrive—just a different energy.

Ariyaratne, who's now eighty-four or eighty-five, started a movement called Sarvodaya in which he became the master of service and community development in Sri Lanka. Digging wells, building schools, creating roads, making community for more than half the villages in the entire country. And he said, "We're not in it to build schools or dig wells or make roads. We're in it to make people love one another." That's really why we're doing this. And that intention underneath is what made it work.

But in the middle of a peace accord that was faltering during their recent civil war, Ari called all his followers together to the great temple at Anuradhapura, and 650,000 people came. This is in a country of only eighteen million people. They all gathered there. And he said, "We need to support peace in our country after the civil war. And so what I would like to present to you is the Sarvodaya 500-year peace plan."

He said, "In Buddhist teachings we understand that we should look not just to the results, but to the causes and conditions. And if we look deeply, we can see that it's taken 500 years to create our suffering. Four hundred years of colonial oppression from the British, 500 years of conflict between Muslims and Hindus and Buddhists, 200 years of economic disparity between the rich wet parts and the poor dry parts."

So he said, it took 500 years to get into this conflict. And what I propose is the 500-year peace plan, because that's how long it will take us to undo it. Five years of ceasefire. Ten years of rebuilding roads and schools. Twenty-five years of learning each other's languages and religions. Fifty years of an economic program to develop the poorest parts from the richest parts. And every hundred years we'll have a grand council to see if we're going in the right direction, tune it, and then we'll do it again for another hundred years. Within 500 years, we can solve this problem.

I got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama at one point when I was giving some teachings at a place where he was. And I partly did it because I thought he would like it, because he's in the same position with Tibet—all kinds of terrible things have happened—and to have the long view. Here was somebody who didn't care about the next election cycle, or what was going to happen between one faction or another. He said, this is the direction we go. Ceasefire, peace, caring for one another, even if it takes 500 years. The Dalai Lama, of course, was very happy to hear it, and they're buddies anyway.

So the bodhisattva is a being who is committed to compassion and tending life in all its forms, no matter what—compassion and freedom. And there are all kinds of modern bodhisattva vows. "May I put down the guns, bandage the wounds, carry the water, and share the bread." There's a modern bodhisattva vow.

Or Diane Ackerman—I have always loved this poem: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, and an architect of peace."

So you set your heart in a direction, the compass of your heart, with your own bodhisattva vows. And then—the important and interesting thing, and the secret; you've sat all these days and now you get the secret—the secret is to act well without attachment to the fruits of your actions. To plant beautiful seeds in the world and trust that sooner or later those seeds will bear fruit.

This is Thomas Merton again, Christian mystic. "Do not depend on the hope of results," he writes to a disillusioned activist. "You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all—if not, perhaps at times bring about its opposite. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

And you don't get to choose how it's going to come out. I have this card that I got when we were traveling in Asia, in some pretty remote and not terribly modernized place. They put this card on our bed in this particular hotel. It said, "Dear Guests, it is our pleasure to provide you with a stamped postcard for sending out to your loved ones around the world. Please leave card at the desk or receptionist after filling up the address and your greetings. We will gladly mail for you. Note: due to poor postage system, your postcard may take some time to reach, or even may not always reach to your address. Hotel management."

So you fill it out and you put it in the mail and it gets somewhere—who knows where it gets, right? But the secret of it, and it turns out, is that you don't know what the results will be. That's not what's given to you.

I saw this documentary that the BBC had done on the siege of Leningrad at the end of World War II—three years in which more than half a million people died. Just horrendous. And there was an old woman they were interviewing who lived in Leningrad. She'd been a child during the siege. She described how terrible it was. And as she talked, she said, "Here, I have something else to show you." And she walked down this narrow corridor in her apartment.

She had this sort of railroad apartment. And she said, "When I was seven or eight, during the siege, and the food was so scarce, we would stand in a bread line once a week and they'd give us a piece of bread. It was a rainy day and there was ice on the streets, kind of slippery. I came out carrying the bread and I fell into the mud, and the bread fell with me and got all muddy. I was sitting there in the rain with the bread in the mud. And a woman walked out, an older woman, and she came over to me, helped me up, and she tore her bread in half and gave me half of her bread."

And she said, "Here, look." She opened her cabinet and took out this ceramic bowl and opened it. Inside, wrapped in a blue napkin, was a little piece of that bread. She said that gift, that act from that woman, is what kept them alive. And it wasn't the bread. It was that spirit that kept them alive through all those years.

So it doesn't have to be big things. It's the moment of your intention and your action. And what you start to feel—and you have been empowered to know this—is a shift of identity. Many of you have been rather loyal to your suffering. You know what I mean? And that's okay. You have to suffer it and grieve it and experience it. But my mother would say something in Yiddish: "Enough already." It's time to let go and not to live your life or your meditation as a grim duty.

The dark of the night has its purpose. Know that you are not alone and that this darkness has its purpose. Gradually it will school your eyes to find the gift your life requires hidden in this night corner, illuminating your heart. That's from a poem by John O'Donohue.

You have suffered. Everybody's suffered. Use it well. Instead of being loyal to it, go through it and let it empower you to care for yourself and others in a deeper and more beautiful way. For its true purpose is to open the great heart of compassion in you.

And then you can do what my friend Malidoma Somé, a West African shaman and medicine man, describes in this beautiful West African metaphor: then you can deliver your cargo. He says among the Dagara people, they believe that every being who is born is given a certain cargo to deliver to the earth—your particular gift, your art, your love, your voice, your connection, whatever it is. And the only thing that satisfies you in the fulfillment of your human incarnation is to deliver your cargo.

I love the metaphor. It's very West African—cargo ships and canoes on the river, all of that water culture. So to deliver your cargo, there are a few things that are important if you're not so caught in your own suffering.

One is—and there's a beautiful new book by the Dalai Lama and Archbishop Tutu called The Book of Joy. A friend of ours helped bring them together in Dharamsala. Bishop Tutu flew there, and they spent a week together talking about how they could be happy even amidst the sufferings of their lives. It's really fun to read parts of it because they tease each other constantly. Tutu is eighty-five, I think, and the Dalai Lama is eighty. They're really good buddies.

When Tutu arrived from the airport, there were all these people with flags and banners. And Tutu said, "Oh, thank you for getting all your people out to welcome me." And the Dalai Lama says, "No, no—they were out for me." Then they start bickering. And Tutu says, "Stop it! We're supposed to be holy men. Look, the camera's on."

So the Dalai Lama is saying, "The problem is that our world and our education remain focused on external, materialistic values. We're not concerned enough with the inner values of the heart." And Tutu responds, "It's difficult to follow your profound pronouncements."

I thought you were going to say that in fact when you're pursuing happiness you're not going to find it. It's very elusive. You don't find it by saying, I'm going to forget about everything else and just pursue happiness. There's the title of a book by C.S. Lewis called Surprised by Joy, which I think expresses how it works.

Many people look at you, Tutu continues, and they think of all the awful things that have happened to you. Nothing can be more devastating than being exiled from your home, from the things precious to you, and having the families and people you knew imprisoned or killed. And yet when people come to you, they experience someone who has a wonderful serenity, a beautiful compassion, a mischievousness.

That's the right word, the Dalai Lama says. I don't like too much formality.

Don't interrupt me, Tutu says. Stop that, you know.

Oh, the Dalai Lama says, I'm sorry, I'm sorry, you know.

It's wonderful to discover that what we want is not actually happiness, Tutu goes on. It's not what I would speak of. I would speak of joy. Joy is a far greater thing. Think of a mother who's going to give birth. Almost all of us want to escape pain, and mothers know they're going to have great pain of giving birth, but they accept it. And even after the most painful labor, once the baby is out, you can't measure the mother's joy. A mother can be dead tired from work, worn down by all of the things that have worried her, and then her child is ill. That mother will not remember her exhaustion. She sits by the bedside of her child the night through, and when the child gets better, you see that joy.

So the Dalai Lama says, so much has been taken from me—my home, the temples. They've burned our texts, they've locked up the lamas, and so forth. Why should I also let them take my happiness?

To become a bodhisattva doesn't mean that it's a grim duty. In fact, your gift, what you offer, your cargo, is best offered with joy, best offered with a smile. Even if you go to work in the worst places—and the bodhisattvas sometimes willingly put themselves in the realms that are most difficult, saying, "I'll go there"—it doesn't help to be morose when you do it. It doesn't help anybody. It helps when you're able to be there and express a love that is not limited by the circumstances themselves.

Also, it can't be done by imitation. In this vast universe which now, as Wes was describing, has been recently found to have two trillion galaxies—they added a trillion or more recently to their count—there's never been anyone like you. Ever. Isn't that far out? Life created something completely different and unique in yourself.

Puanani Burgess, an educator in Hawaii, tells this story. One of the practices I like to use, I call "building the beloved community," like Martin Luther King's phrase. And there's an exercise to do this that requires people to tell three stories. The first is the story of your name. The second, the story of your community. And the third is to tell the story of your gift.

Once I did this process with a group in our local high school. We went around the circle and got to this young man, Kele. He told the story of his name well. He told the class the story of his community well. But when it came time to tell the story of his gift, he asked, "What, miss? What kind of gift you think I get, eh? I stay in the special ed class. I get a hard time read. I can't do no math. Why you make me shame for? Asked that kind of question. What kind gift you think I have? If I had gift, you think I'd be here?"

Kele had shut down and shut up, and I felt really ashamed. All the time I've done this, I've never shamed anyone before.

Two weeks later, I'm in our local grocery store and I see him down one of those aisles. I see his back and I turn around. Nope, I'm not going there.

And I start to back away, trying to get away from him. Then he turns around and sees me and throws his arms open and says, "Auntie, Auntie, I've been thinking about you, you know. Two weeks I've been thinking, what my gift, what my gift."

I say, "Okay, brother, what your gift?"

He says, "You know, I've been thinking, thinking. I cannot do the math stuff and I cannot read good, Auntie. But when I stay in the ocean, I can call the fish. And the fish, he come every time. Every time I can put food on my family table. Every time. And sometime I stay in the ocean and the shark, he comes. And he look at me and I look at him and I tell him, Uncle, I'm not going to take plenty fish. I just take one, two fish just for my family. All the rest I leave for you. And so the shark, he say, oh, you cool, brother. And I tell the shark, Uncle, you cool. And the shark, he go his way and I go my way."

I look at this boy Kaylee, and I know what a genius he is. But in our society, the way the schools and education are run, he's rubbish. He's destroyed, not appreciated. So when I talked to his teacher and the principal, I asked them all: What would his life have been? What would our life be if our curriculum, if our education, if our community were based on the gifts that we can give to one another?

You each have this. You are unique. And you have to trust that you have something beautiful to offer. Somerset Maugham said there are three rules for writing the great English novel—unfortunately, no one knows what they are. No one can tell you how to do this, but you set your heart in the right direction, and moment by moment, being present, you plant the seeds of beauty.

And you can't be idealistic about it. In my industry, I get to be with lots of swamis and mamas and lamas and gurus and things like that. They have marvelous teachings and all kinds of benefits. And because they're human, they all have their foibles. Wes tells a story about a great Dzogchen master who's a friend of mine, really afraid to fly in airplanes. He can sit there and tell you to make your mind like sky, but when he's in the airplane in the sky, it's much harder for him. We talked about trauma work for him.

Even the Dalai Lama—Wes tells a story of riding in this little plane from Dharamsala back to Delhi on the edge of the Himalayas. It's bumpy, and the Dalai Lama says he's afraid of flying. Behind Wes is the Dalai Lama with his robe over his head and his people looking up. We're just human.

So the idea isn't to be somebody else. As I said in the first talk, the point isn't to perfect yourself—it's to perfect your love. And trust. Trust that you have the great powers of mindfulness, compassion, loving awareness, and forgiveness. You have them now. They are yours. And you've learned to trust that the heart is big enough to hold the whole world—to hold your tears and sorrow and love and longing and joy and expressions. All of it. And your neurosis. Oh, what a great example of neurosis that is. Thank you. Yes.

The bodhisattva is unafraid to love. There's been so much anti-Muslim rhetoric, so much prejudice and hatred. The greatest peace army the modern world has ever seen was in the 1930s in what was known as the Northwest Frontier Province, which is now part of Pakistan and Afghanistan, organized by Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan. Over one hundred thousand men, warriors, all devout Muslims, vowed to resist British rule without weapons in their hands or violence in their hearts.

They kept their vow despite great provocation and many killings. Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan was a good friend of Gandhi's. It's an amazing thing to think that what we see as this dangerous place, and people upon whom we project our fears—but really, what that speaks to is the dignity of the human spirit. If you give human beings something that is great and beautiful to do, they will rise to it.

So being unafraid to love as the bodhisattva, no matter what.

Wes also went to interview Gary Snyder, a great environmentalist now in his mid-eighties, Pulitzer Prize winner, author of Earth Household and many other works as an environmental visionary. He asked, "Gary, now that you see global warming, climate change, loss of species, what message do you have for us at this time?"

And Gary said, "Don't feel guilty. If you're going to save it, don't save it out of guilt or anger. Too many burned-out activists. Save it because you love it." The other energies—guilt, anger—all those are part of the problem itself in consciousness. If you're going to save it, save it because you love it.

And that's the power of the bodhisattva, the power of love that lets mothers lift cars off their children.

I remember going to see Dipa Ma, this wonderful meditation master, a teacher of mine and Sharon's and Joseph's, in India. I visited her in Calcutta. I was having a hard time. I was a youngish teacher—I suppose I'd been teaching for six or seven years—and I was going through a period of some self-doubt and other kinds of struggles. I went to see her and get some teachings. After a couple of days with her—I'd been in Bodh Gaya before that and then visited her in her little apartment in Calcutta—she said, "Well, let Ma bless you before you go."

She was this tiny little person. And Bengalis hug—it's really great. She threw her arms around me. Then she began to bless me using her hands, whispering metta phrases and patting me all over my body for what must have been five or ten minutes. A long, long blessing. Metta, metta, metta, metta, metta. She was also a yogi with great concentration, deep meditation, and an amazing kind of presence. Then she said, "Okay, go with Ma's blessings."

So I walk out of the apartment and it's a hot day in Calcutta, and the streets are filled with honking taxis and ox carts, people pulling man-pulled rickshaws, people selling things. I go into this traffic jam, and it takes me two hours to get to Dum Dum Airport, which is the name of the Calcutta airport. Then I wait in line for two or three hours—the plane is always delayed, there's no air conditioning, it's sweltering—and finally I get on the plane. I fly to Bangkok, where I was going, and I get out and stand in long lines through Thai customs, and then it's a really hot season there, and the taxi's stuck in traffic.

And the whole time, I am just grinning. For three days, I couldn't stop smiling. Go with Ma's blessing. I was stoned on love.

The power of the bodhisattva is to take that love wherever you are. When we see suffering, we respond. That is the bodhisattva.

Barbara Widener, who founded Grandmothers for Peace, describes it this way: "I began to question what kind of world I'm leaving for my grandchildren. So I got a sign, 'A Grandmother for Peace,' and stood on a street corner. Then I joined others kneeling as a human barrier at a munitions factory"—because the U.S. is the largest exporter of weapons in the world. And then we worry that we're not safe. Crazy. "I joined others kneeling as a human barrier at a munitions factory. I was taken to prison, strip-searched, thrown into a cell. Something happened to me. I realized they couldn't do anything more to me. I was free."

And now Barbara and her organization, Grandmothers for Peace, works in dozens of countries around the world.
