And so it's not really getting off the ground. Or you set up a group about a certain theme, and it somehow just becomes a general dharma group or a general "let's just sit together because it's nice to sit together, and then we'll share about whatever." All of that's wonderful. And if that's clear, then that can be the primary intention.

The larger point—which I've said so many times on this retreat—is about the importance of being aware of what my intention is, because that will determine what unfolds. So some people in the group wanting soul-making, for example, and some people just wanting sangha, or primarily wanting sangha—that group is going to be frustrating, probably for both, but certainly for the people wanting soul-making. Do you understand?

Staying with that idea of soul-making: it's certainly true that soul-making practices will build and grow the sense of sangha. Absolutely they will. For sure they will, because of all that lovely intimacy and sharing. But it's the primacy of intention—our intentions and desires and what they are—the primacy of that in determining what's possible and what unfolds in a group.

Or again, it could be that we have a group, or even just my dharma practice, and the intention is because I want to rectify my energy problems or my energy constrictions, or I want to heal my energy blocks—and not whatever the group was set up for: soulmaking dharma, or this or that, or even just dharma in general. Again, that lack of clarity or lack of honesty about what the intentions are will have an effect. Same issues.

So this is all stuff to think about going forward. It's all, I feel, really important stuff.

But let's end now. I wanted to say thank you to my three helpers. So I see Nick here and Lawrence, but I don't know if Leah's here. She's not here. Well, it's ten to twelve. So yes, thank you to Nick and Lawrence and Leah, who's not here, because I certainly wouldn't have been able to get here every day, and we wouldn't have been able to do this without you. So it's really hugely appreciated.

And thank you to Sari and to Kirsten and to Robert, who's left again. Just so valuable—your help and your input and being there and working together. Couldn't have happened without you.

Why don't we just take a moment to dedicate from our practice together. So just as Sari led us beautifully before, see if you can open to connect with a sense of appreciation for your efforts. Just bypassing the whole question of success, failure, and how well you practiced or what you achieved. It's actually impossible to know quite what the fruits of our practice are and will be as time unfolds, as conditions meet other conditions, as what has ripened and matured and been worked on here ripples out into the world in so many different ways. It's impossible to know what the fruits are. It's impossible to assess, measure, or judge that.

Know that you have shown up. Know that you have been willing, repeatedly, to work through the difficult, through the challenging, through the lovely. That you've been curious. Can you see in that the beauty of your intention? Over and over. The beauty of your intentions. Countless moments of intention. Countless, countless. Rain into the sea. All those raindrops of beautiful intention, of willingness, of courage, dignity, nobility, effort, wisdom, responsiveness. All that makes karma. It has effects. We don't know. We cannot know all the effects. In the wide, wild mystery of things, we cannot know the course of all that water, all the ripplings out.

But somehow, in the mystery of interconnectedness, in the mystery of dependent arising, may the goodness and beauty of our intention, of our work, of our efforts—may it be for the benefit of those near and dear to us, those who are close to us in life. May it ripple out to touch them, to bless them, perhaps in obvious ways, perhaps in not obvious ways. May they receive the fruits and the blessings of our practice.

And all those beings whom we don't really know but who we encounter in our everyday movements in the world, living their lives, struggling as we do with body, with mind, with relationships. We don't know them. Brief encounters here and there. Somehow, may they too receive the blessings and the fruits of our practice. All beings we will never meet face to face, we will never encounter directly. Again, somehow—perhaps in obvious, direct ways, somehow in the mystery of things, in not so obvious ways, in indirect ways—

May they too be touched, be blessed by the goodness and beauty of our intentions. May they receive the blessings and the fruits of our practice.

For those whose lives are caught up in war, living in fear, not in safety—may they receive the fruits and blessings of our practice.

For those tormented in mind and heart, not at ease—may they receive the fruits and blessings of our practice.

Those in the world living in areas of famine, of shortage, of scarcity—may they receive the fruits and the blessings of our practice.

And for all those beings, human and non-human, whose lives have become hounded by ecological devastation, who have to flee their homes, their homelands—may our practice be of benefit, be of support.

May all beings everywhere, without exception, receive the fruits and the blessings of our practice.

Thank you again. Go safely wherever you're going and practice with intelligence, with playfulness, with love and with enjoyment.

CHAPTER 225

Emptiness and Ways of Looking

Rob Burbea · 2h09

Rob Burbea examines the ways of looking approach to emptiness, a distinctive paradigm within Buddhist practice that investigates how different ways of relating to phenomena affect what we perceive. Drawing from concepts found throughout the Pali Canon, including dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) and the mutual dependency of nāmarūpa and consciousness, he clarifies how this approach differs from conventional mindfulness teachings.

Burbea addresses common misunderstandings, such as the notion that one can "rest from ways of looking" or that there exists a privileged lens revealing "how things really are." He emphasizes that every moment of consciousness involves a way of looking, and that different degrees of clinging (upādāna) in our relationship to phenomena determine what gets fabricated (saṅkhāra) in perception.

The talk explores the radical implications of this understanding: that time, space, subject, object, and even awareness itself are fabricated through ways of looking rather than being independently existing realities. This connects to the Buddha's teaching of the middle way between "is" and "is not" - the recognition that phenomena are neither ultimately real nor completely non-existent. Burbea concludes by examining how deep emptiness practice opens possibilities for soul-making and imaginal work, while also considering the relationship between emptiness realization and psychological development in contemporary Western contexts.

Welcome everyone.

What I would like to try to do in this short series of talks is perhaps extend some of the lines of inquiry, some of the themes and threads from one of the recent series, The Four Circles for Parables of Stone and Light, and the themes certainly of ethics. I would like to extend and explore that area, that whole domain, as well as opening up some more possibilities for imaginal practice or what imaginal practice soul-making might make possible for us as practices. Some other questions and reflections on ontology and epistemology, and also on tradition and how we think of path and goal and awakening.

I think I want to start—and it makes sense to start—talking about ontology. Questions and explorations of ontology, the theme of ontology, we've woven throughout these talks, but I want to start a little bit with that.

Ontology is, to say what it is, to define it very briefly—actually best for our purposes, defined as the views and beliefs we have about what is real and what is not real, and what kinds of reality or what kinds of beings, what kinds of being different things have. So a dream has a different kind of reality than what we perceive in waking consciousness, we tend to assume. That's an ontology, it's an ontological view right there. The views and beliefs about what is real, what is not real, what kind of reality and being different things have.

Usually ontology is a word used in a very philosophical context—philosophical systems and sophisticated philosophical analysis. I mean to include all that, but the reason I'm defining it as views and beliefs is partly because, as I want to emphasize again and again, we're always with an ontology. Whether we philosophize or not, whether we read those kinds of books, whether we think in a certain way or wonder in a certain way about what's real or not real, we always have views and beliefs and conceptual frameworks, conscious or unconscious, operating. The words "view" and "belief" give much more sense of the immediacy and inevitability of ontology in our lives and in our practice, in our experience.

Particularly what I want to focus on today is emptiness and the ways of looking approach.

The ways of looking approach to emptiness—which is, if you like, the bulk of what Seeing That Frees is devoted to—is quite unusual as an approach to emptiness and certainly as an approach to Dharma. The whole ways of looking approach to Dharma is quite unusual, but it's also unusual as an approach to emptiness.

What I've come to understand is that it's quite easy or quite possible—actually quite easy and relatively common—for it to be not quite understood in the correct way. People bring to that paradigm, the ways of looking approach, ideas, beliefs, formulations and frameworks that they've encountered elsewhere, read or heard—even within other Buddha Dharma contexts, of course. They bring all that to hearing or reading about the ways of looking approach to emptiness, and some of that other material comes in so that what they hear or read about the ways of looking approach is actually a little bit twisted or shaped or shaved to conform to the ideas that they already have. This is a very normal human occurrence and human propensity, something we need to be aware of and take care of in whatever it is we're talking about or trying to explain or trying to understand.

So the ways of looking approach—I've gone into this elsewhere in great detail and recently in the online seminars—has two key themes.

One is ways of looking. I'm not going to go into this now in detail, I'm just mentioning it. There are ways of looking, that we as human beings can look at things in different ways, that we have a range there, a possibility of flexibility there, a possibility of extending that range. Ways of looking mean the whole—in any moment, how are we relating to something? What ideas, conceptions, assumptions, beliefs, reactions, tendencies, likes, dislikes, propensities, emphases, kinds of attention or areas of attention—all of that together makes up the way of looking in any moment. We have the possibility as human beings to explore that consciously and really, as I said, extend that range, play with it, discover new ways of looking, develop them.

So one concept is ways of looking.

The second concept is fabrication. One realizes that different ways of looking have different amounts and kinds and levels of what we call clinging wrapped up in them. Clinging is a word that I use very elastically, meaning obviously what it tends to mean to most people—something very gross, really gripping onto something, not wanting to let go, in a very obvious or even dramatic way—all the way down to something really, really subtle.

Different ways of looking have different amounts, kinds, levels of clinging to them. That clinging turns out to be extremely important in determining what is fabricated in perception through the way of looking. In other words, a way of looking shapes, forms, fabricates what we then perceive. Look at something in this way, and that means I have that whole relationship with it. I see it, perceive it, sense it differently than when I look at it in another way.

One of the key constituents there of the way of looking is the clinging, because dependent on the clinging, the degree of fabrication—not just of how much suffering there is, fabrication of suffering, which of course is a key emphasis and inquiry in Buddhist practice, not just the fabrication of suffering, but also the fabrication of self, other, world, time, space, the whole show, the whole magic show of perception—is dependent on the kinds, amounts, and levels of clinging involved.

And so really what the ways of looking approach is, is taking those two ideas—ways of looking and fabrication, maybe a third idea, clinging, as we just said—and exploring what that is and what it involves at different levels, what might it involve. And just exploring that and seeing what's possible. What can I understand about fabrication here? How can I extend and develop my ways of looking? What does clinging involve at different levels? And through that, understanding something about the fabricated nature of things, of all things, all phenomena, all experience, all appearances.

This is a very deep, beautiful exploration. And then at a certain point, going even beyond the notion of fabrication, when one sees that time is empty and fabrication is empty, and that opens up a whole other level of the inquiry into emptiness.

So, very brief summary. I've explained that before. I'm not going to go into it in any more detail. But I want to pick up on a few of the possible ways it might be misunderstood or incompletely understood. Or we could say just fill out the understanding, hopefully make certain things a bit more clear, if that's possible.

Sometimes it has happened quite a few times that someone has been quite excited about the whole ways of looking approach and exploring it and found it very valuable. But then they say something or write something that makes it clear that they haven't really understood the sort of radicality of it or the fundamentality of it or just how pervasive it is, how pervasively it applies as an idea.

What can be quite common is for someone to say, "I play with my ways of looking, I practice that way," or even if they're a teacher, "I teach ways of looking. But then I tell people, perhaps at the end of the class or the end of the course or whatever it is, now you can rest from ways of looking." Or, "I do that, but then I just like to—I do that in my practice. I play with different ways of looking. I explore it. It's exciting. It's wonderful. But then I like to just be. I just like to rest from any way of looking."

If someone says something like that, it really means they haven't understood that it's impossible to have a moment of consciousness, a moment of perceiving anything, of experiencing anything, a moment of anything appearing without there being a way of looking. We cannot rest from a way of looking. Actually, not even the unfabricated, not even cessation of perception and feeling is really technically a rest from a way of looking. Anything we see, sense, anything we sense at all, anything we experience at all is always experienced through a way of looking.

Now, of course, we may or may not realize that. We may or may not be conscious of what the way of looking is at any time. We may or may not be deliberately playing with the way of looking, but there is always a way of looking. So it's not possible to let go of way of looking.

This isn't just a little pernickety sort of point, because if one doesn't understand that, one actually has undermined the whole structure of the ways of looking approach. It can no longer function in a profoundly and widely liberating way. If one has just converted the phrase "ways of looking" to "ways of practicing," and there's this kind of way of practicing, or this practice and that practice—there's all these practices, which one might find all very powerful, very helpful. But then there's a time where I'm just resting from all that.

And that time of resting from all that assumes, in this kind of not-quite understanding of the approach, that time assumes that there's a possibility of not having a way of looking at any moment. And that has great implications for our understanding of the nature of perception, of fabrication, of reality, of emptiness. It limits it hugely.

So that's one thing that's very, very important.

A second thing—a minor thing, I actually mentioned it the other day in a talk, but I'll say it here as well. Although it's not possible to rest from a way of looking in any moment of consciousness, it is possible, however, to rest from deliberately practicing a way of looking. So I might be practicing a certain way of looking, whatever it is, and then I might decide to rest from that. Or I might move from that way of looking, that deliberate way of looking, to practice another way of looking.

The important thing is that I cannot rest completely from ways of looking, but also that it's actually important to move between ways of looking and pay attention to what happens when I move between ways of looking—whether I just rest from any deliberate way of looking and then I just fall back into a kind of default mode of way of looking, or whether I switch from one deliberate way of looking to another way of looking. It's actually important to see the effects, the changes brought to perception by changing ways of looking, either to the default one or to another deliberate one.

Through the contrast between what I perceive, what I experience, between this way of looking and the other way of looking—the point I was making the other day in a talk was this way of practicing insight meditation based on ways of looking is not so dependent on keeping the continuity going. Not "eighteen, maybe twenty hours a day of continuous mindfulness" and through that the mindfulness accumulates a kind of intensity and pervasiveness which allows it to see reality as it is or peers through illusion to see reality.

Here we actually need to rest from ways of looking at times, from deliberate ways of looking—excuse me—or change them in order to see the contrast. Because it's the contrast, it's seeing the contrast, the differences wrought in perception by different ways of looking that bring me the insights.

Connected to that, or a modification of that, sometimes you hear or read someone, maybe not using the language of ways of looking, maybe using the language of lenses—the lens of anattā, seeing things as not me, not mine, or the lens of impermanence. And they're using that kind of flexibility of ways of looking with a slightly different language. But then they drop back into talking about being with what is, or the way things really are. And what they mean—and it's clear that what they mean by the way things really are—is not emptiness.

They don't mean emptiness. They don't mean the emptiness of any real way things are. They don't mean that the way things really are is that they're not any real way. As if all these lenses—the couple or two or three lenses that they've sort of described and practiced with—are kind of superficial levels, above a level where it's possible to be with what is, supposedly, and the way things really are. As if there's another mode of being that is not a lens, or as if there's a particular lens that is the lens that reveals the way things really are—that's bare attention, which is a conceptually-free sort of vividness of reality.

There's a similar kind of misunderstanding here, a similar kind of truncating of the whole possibility of deepening insight, a similar kind of roadblock in the road of deeper insight. Because one has assumed there's a "what is." One has assumed an end of fabrication somewhere that's not the end of fabrication. There's assumed a lens that will show me how things really are—a privileged lens, if one is using that language, a privileged way of looking. Not understanding that one can possibly travel the road of emptiness, exploring emptiness, beyond any notion of what is or the way things really are.

There is no independent reality, independent of a way of looking, of a lens. So we are just left with lenses, ways of looking. This too betrays a kind of similarly limited understanding or even a misunderstanding—a limited use of this approach. But it was really significant. Very, very significant.

Another version of this sort of thing, this sort of misunderstanding—a very limited understanding and a very problematic understanding—happens when someone talks about ways of looking, emptiness, no real way things are, just ways of looking, and then says something like, "All there really is is a flux or a flow out of which the way of looking shapes this or that perception or appearance. But all there really is, is a flux or flow." They don't actually explain a flux or flow of what, but the problem really is in that "all there really is, is a flow, a flux of something or other." And a flux, a flow is a process, something that happens in time.

So again, there is something that's assumed to be a reality independent of a way of looking—this basic flux or flow and time, in which flux or flow must happen. Flux or flow must happen in time. And it's out of that basic reality that the way of looking then shapes this or that more familiar objects of experience that we know. But again, it's limiting, it's truncating the process of insight, truncating and limiting the possible depth of insight.

Time is also empty. Time arises through ways of looking. Take away the clinging, enough. Take away the avijjā, enough. Time is not there. Time does not get fabricated.

So there's a real danger there again, that practicing ways of looking with such an understanding, harboring in the background this "all there really is, is a flux or flow of whatever"—practicing ways of looking that way will not lead to an opening to the actual unfabricated, because it's staying entrenched in and clinging to a notion of time as something basically existing, really existing. It may even limit the amount of unfabricating that can happen with such a view in the background. Even if it's not in the foreground, even if it's not clearly articulated, maybe the practicing under the umbrella of such a view, having that view in the background, actually brings pretty limited unfabricating through practice.

So very significant, quite dangerous in a way, in terms of the way they will really confine our openings, our understandings—really our sense of what emptiness is, and of how far practicing it can go, but really of what emptiness is, and thus of what reality is. So that's a couple of things that are really important.

The second thing is a bit more subtle, but sometimes people when they're talking about their insight practice or reporting their insight practice to me—and perhaps they've come from another tradition—they might use the language of "drilling down through illusion" or of "seeing through self." For example, "I see through self" or "I see through a certain manifestation of the meditator ego" or something.

And that language of "seeing through" is very different than the language implied by a ways of looking approach, which is more "seeing as." So, for example, when I practice anattā, a way of looking, when I practice the anattā view, I'm seeing as: this phenomenon, this experience, this thing is not me, not mine. I'm seeing it as not me, not mine, rather than as me or mine. I'm not seeing through it.

The important thing here is that "seeing through"—the phrase "seeing through," the idea to see through something, to me—has certain implications and assumptions wrapped up in it, as does the phrase "drill down." It has certain implications and assumptions, including an implicit realism. I'm seeing through, I'm seeing through the illusion, seeing through this veil to something else, which is the reality that is veiled.

And that sounds—again, it might sound persnickety, but that's actually fundamentally different in terms of the presupposition of what we are doing and how we are approaching understanding emptiness, how we are approaching this inquiry and exploration into emptiness. It's fundamentally different than the language of "seeing as."

"Seeing through," as I said, has certain implications and a certain kind of realism, a certain assumed reality implicit in it, as does the phrase "drill down." "Seeing as," to me, just implies that there are a range of ways of looking whose effects on perception interest me, and whose effects on perception, particularly regarding fabrication and dependent arising and the implicit emptiness of all that, that interests me. I can see it as this—this pain, this physical thing, this phenomenon. I can see it as this, I can see it as that. I can look in this way, I can look in that way. And that's different than seeing through.

Similarly, the language can be quite similar, and again, this is something I mentioned the other day, but it bears repeating. That word "fabrication" wasn't so popular a number of years ago, and I'm aware that some people have picked up that word now, or repicked it up—perhaps they used it ages ago. Because it's a Pali word and it's a good translation of the word sankāra or sankhata as fabricated, people thinking about Dharma or teaching Dharma or reflecting on their own practice will very commonly agree it's an important concept. After all, the Buddha uses it. It's right there in the Wheel of Dependent Origination. It's right there regularly in the Pali Canon.

And they think of fabrication as an important concept. Seeing through the fabricated is important. For instance, one very common idea would be that what's fabricated is papañca—in the common understanding, proliferation, making a fuss, getting in a tizzy over something, catastrophizing, blowing things up out of all proportion. That's all fabrication. And when we let go of that through mindfulness and bare attention and equanimity, we're actually not fabricating. We are in contact with the unfabricated.

So mindfulness, bare attention, equanimity—these are ways of looking, modes of looking that reveal the unfabricated, just things as they are.

A person might, at the same time, be interested in the concept of fabrication, agree it's an important concept, and whether they use the word "unfabricated" or not, they might implicitly agree there is an unfabricated perception that we can be in contact with, that can be revealed to us. But they have no interest in the mystical depth of the unfabricated as I would understand it—as something beyond any sense of subject, object, space, time, awareness, beyond all phenomena. They have no interest in that kind of deep, mystical unfabricated, or it feels irrelevant to life as we know it, or it's only for some people who are kind of into that.

But holding all those views together would in a strange way be making a kind of arbitrary and artificial distinction between everyday life, or life itself, and what is mystical. Because this concept of fabrication, or rather fabricating, the possibility of fabricating, is actually one strand—there's one strand of fabricating in the ways of looking approach that I would like to support and make clearer.

We're not actually presupposing what the end of fabrication is. I'm not deciding in advance: fabrication stops at a kind of bare, pristine reality of things appearing to me, or it stops at the kind of view that most people would agree on when they're not in papañca or not in a tizzy. Papañca is a Pali word actually used at many different levels. It's come to be used really at a much more gross level. So that's just one end of the spectrum of fabricating—papañca is very gross fabricating.

But if we follow this idea of clinging deeper and deeper and keep the idea, just withhold any presupposition or any quick deciding on where fabrication ends—so fabrication itself is an open concept—let's find out through exploring ways of looking, through getting more skilled at letting go of subtler and subtler and deeper and more refined levels of clinging. Let's just see where this process of fabrication stops and where the unfabricated is.

It's actually just one spectrum. And to me, it goes all the way from papañca through everyday normal perception, through quieter, more pristine awareness of that, and then through a whole series of fading. All this is one spectrum, and that series of fading goes all the way down to the fading, the unfabricating of any sense of subject, any sense of object, any sense of space or time or consciousness or anything like that.

So if it's one spectrum, one inquiry into fabrication and how we can let go of fabrication, why has a person drawn the line where they have? They need to somehow justify that. If you draw the line at just what appears when we agree with most of the other people on the planet about what is real, or what appears when things look really shiny and clear, as they will with a kind of bright mindfulness—it's just a point on that spectrum of non-fabricating. So where exactly do you draw the line, and why exactly have you drawn the line there?

This principle of fabrication, clinging and fading—it's one principle, and it's the same principle that a person is drawing on when they say fabrication is an important concept, and papañca is what's fabricated, and we want to unfabricate that, get rid of that, so we can be with what's unfabricated. It's the same principle, but it's one spectrum continuing much, much deeper than that.

It's only presuppositions—essentially unquestioned reality assumptions—that one is dragging in to what's really, as I said, one spectrum and therefore a coherent system, coherent principle: fabrication, clinging and fading. It's one system, a coherent system. And then one is dividing that spectrum either arbitrarily or just in line with one's presuppositions, dividing what was coherent and undivided, a continuous spectrum, and in some way by dividing it, actually making it incoherent.

Now one can do that, of course one can, but what's the justification? It seems to me one would need a pretty strong, philosophically worked out justification if you're going to do that—to make something that was coherent incoherent.

And similarly, we encounter these minor misunderstandings, a little bit related to something we said earlier today. Sometimes someone reports to me, "I'm trying to get rid of the usual relentless sense of self." And that's actually how they're approaching their meditative practice. Again, they might have heard some teachings or picked up a book and have somehow twisted or distorted the intention—very understandably—toward trying to get rid, even momentarily, of the usual relentless sense of self. "I'm trying to unfabricate something, I'm trying to get rid of something."

That intention, to try to get rid—even if it's just for a moment, to have a moment's taste free of the usual relentless sense of self—may be coming either from an idea that's being dragged in about the reality of no-self. It's a very common understanding to drag in, to understand what we're doing in emptiness explorations as "we want to see that what's real is that there is no self." And then one's taking that idea—wherever one has heard it or read it or misunderstood it—and bringing that in, so then "I'm trying to get rid of this usual sense of self."

So maybe one drags in an idea, a habitual idea, a common idea, that the reality is that there is no self. That's the ontological truth of things—that the self has no reality, or that what is real is no-self. So one may be coming from an idea, or it may be coming from an aversion, or even a neurosis, a sort of aversion to oneself and the sense of self, or the kinds of ways that the self arises.

This is really not helpful. Aversion will certainly not help in the whole investigation. If aversion is there unconsciously, it won't help in the investigation of ways of looking at fabrication and emptiness. And if it's there driving things, it will tend to actually just fabricate more. But also it's not helpful because the understanding is wrong. One has dragged in another understanding, another assumption about reality and truth that is different than the assumptions that ground the ways of looking approach into emptiness.

Some of this will be obvious for some of you, and some will seem not obvious at all and a bit like hair-splitting, but actually it's really, really important. And you will see it in the fruits. Because if these sort of basic grounding ideas are not correct or they're limited, they will be limiting. And what they deliver in terms of the way the whole process—meditation exploration—opens up, and what it delivers and the degree of unfabricating it delivers and the degree of understanding emptiness that it delivers, that will all be limited because some kind of basic assumptions are getting in the way or distorting things or limiting things.

So when we talk about ways of looking, what are we talking about? We're talking about the whole collection or weave, as I said, of what's involved in the relationship with anything that one's experiencing in any moment. So the tendency to grasp or hold on or push away to whatever degree—clinging in that obvious sense—the appropriation of self, the assumptions about its reality, all kinds of other assumptions, the ideas, the conceptual frameworks, the belief in time—all that is woven into the way of looking.

When we practice ways of looking, what we're really doing is taking certain elements of that whole collection of what's in a way of looking at any moment, just focusing on certain elements and changing them. So for example, the one we used earlier was anatta: not me, not mine. The habitual way of looking—without thinking about it, without it being a conscious action in the mind, or something we can even often realize is going on, certainly without it being verbal—is "me, mine, me, mine" to this experience, that experience, this object, whatever. And what we're doing when we practice the anatta way of looking is we're just changing that, changing that to "not me, not mine."

And this "not me, not mine" is something that's very, very lightly held in the way of looking, or say inserted into the way of looking. Actually, we're removing the usual "me-mine," and very, very lightly and delicately it's there in the way of looking.

Ways of looking, as we practice them, have subtexts. So when we say "empty," for example, as a way of looking, we don't really say it. We might say it just as a whisper in the mind, or we look at something and look at it as empty. That's practicing a way of looking. But what that means—we could write an essay on it, or a book even. What does it mean? We're not going through all that every time, but it has to be implicitly woven into the way of looking when we look at things as empty. So the subtext, if you like—the sometimes jokingly called "small print" of a way of looking—is often very complex, and it has to be held very, very lightly. It's implicit there in the way of looking.

If we return to the anatta way of looking, I'll focus on something that was interesting. I was talking to someone the other day, so this just serves as a good example. They had moved on from practicing the anatta way of looking with, for example, body sensations and thoughts and mindstates and things like that. They had actually moved on to what's usually more difficult, to a stage of anatta practice where one's regarding awareness itself, the consciousness itself as anatta, as not me, not mine.

And in the course of the conversation, it became clear that the subtext here is a little more complex. So what's involved here? This person was aware that it meant there's no doing of awareness. So for them, what the anatta of awareness, what was...

The only thing that was in their anatta way of looking when they turned it on awareness was that there's no doing of awareness, which actually means there's no agency. So they needed to have that language slightly altered. It's not that there's no doing—it's that there's no one doing it. It's not that there's no effort and no doing, because when one really begins to understand at a very deep level and practice at a deep level, you see that any moment of experience, any moment of appearance and perception, or any arising of any phenomenon at all, involves doing on the part of the subject. It's not non-doing. It's the fact that we could say there's no agent, there's no agency. It's not me doing. The effort and the doing that go with awareness are not me, not mine.

So that was one thing he needed expanding. Because what he was finding was, unlike when he did anatta practice—anatta way of looking—on other phenomena, where it worked quite well with the fading and the release of dukkha, when he was trying to do the anatta awareness, it seemed to be quite limited. So we were finding out why. It's because there wasn't enough in his way of looking when he looked at awareness and said anatta—when he looked at it with the view anatta, rather.

So it's not that there's no doing of awareness; it's that there's no agency. That was one thing. But he was also missing two other factors. One is that there's no possession of awareness. It's not mine. So there's no entity of self that owns this awareness, of which the awareness makes up a part of this self, this entity. And there's also, thirdly, no identification with awareness. The awareness, the consciousness, is not me.

So we have no possession, no identification, and no agency. If you want a little acronym—if this is helpful—you can think there's no P-I-A: no possession, no identification, no agency. That understanding is tacitly wrapped up and present in the subtext of just attending to the sense of awareness and looking at it as anatta.

So even there, even before we get on to how it's empty in itself or empty-empty, even there with the anatta of awareness, what's involved in the subtext is actually fairly complex. And it needs to be woven in and understood as part of the way of looking. The way of looking needs to have that understanding in it.

This is not just about the details there, but the general principle is very important. This business with ways of looking is really—we're not talking about something abstract, we're talking about practice, and it's really an art, and in some cases a very subtle and delicate art and skill that we need to develop. It's not just going to happen like that, and it's certainly not abstract.

Do you know for yourself firsthand the effect of sensing something through the lens of a way of looking where you're regarding it as empty, compared to what happens when you're sensing something through a way of looking that just automatically, as a default, regards it as real, as inherently existing? These two have massively different effects on perception. When you're really regarding something through a lens that really understands its emptiness, there's profound fading that happens. Of course, we move in the world and only very little fading happens when we're essentially practicing unconsciously and automatically and by habit, the view that comes out of what the Buddha would call avijjā—ignorance, delusion—which assumes the reality, the inherent existence of phenomena.

So we're not talking about something abstract here when we talk about ontology and ways of looking and emptiness. We're really talking about practices which are real arts to develop.

If one just tries it, it's unlikely that it will have any effect to just regard things as empty or not real, unless it really means something—unless I'm very clear what it means and I have ground or reason. So if I just regard something as empty while I'm paying attention to it, unless that word "empty" really means something, and unless I have really good grounds or reasons to believe that it's empty based on my experience, based on something—an understanding, an insight I've really consolidated through practice—it won't do anything. It's just a word. You might as well say "octopus" or something.

So these ways of looking need to be understood by us. What does it mean? What's involved? What's the subtext in that way of looking? And we need to have confidence in that subtext, in what it means. I have confidence. There's a real grounding in my being. There's a real reason why I can sense something, pay attention to something, and at the same time as I'm paying attention to it, regard it as empty. That has to be based on a clear understanding and a solid, consolidated foundation of understanding through experience.

I know it's empty. I know why it's empty. I know why I think it's empty - why I know it's empty.

Secondly, and related to what I said earlier, we're not talking about big, chunky, gross philosophical ramblings rumbling through the mind. We're not talking about thinking about things. We're talking about a way of looking. These understandings, these convictions, these clarities are very subtly woven into the way of looking, so that the way of looking itself is very delicate, very agile. We're actually sensing things that way. We're not busy thinking about some philosophy.

That ability to convert clear, essentially clear philosophical understanding based on experience into a very delicate and agile and subtle way of looking - a way of sensing something in any of the six senses - takes practice to develop, usually almost always.

But I would say, I wonder if there's anything in life, anything in existence, anything that we could spend our time developing in the interval between birth and death - is there anything more worth it than developing ways of looking? If I want the fullest, deepest, widest liberation, I think that comes through liberating ways of looking: the liberation of ways of looking, the development of ways of looking, of a range of ways of looking. Because that will open up this whole territory of emptiness.

We could say, in the end, what liberation is - as well as the liberation of suffering - is the liberation of ways of looking. In other words, ways of looking become available to us. We're not imprisoned. We're not constrained. There's liberation from the prison of only certain fixed ways of looking at things, only certain fixed relationships with the world and perceptions of self, other, world, time. So full liberation is a liberation of ways of looking - liberation into accessibility of ways of looking. And of course, that enables more liberation from suffering.

But even more, if I want the fullest, deepest, widest love - not just liberation, but if I want the fullest, deepest, widest love - then if I follow that love, if I follow the eros, if I follow the metta, and I pay attention to the ways of looking, it naturally opens. And then I practice those ways of looking. What that does is it increases the metta, increases the eros. And because of that, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, is ignited further, galvanized further, opens further.

There's more eros, but more psyche and logos. I'm trying to say that as image. There's more sense of things. The sense of things opens up. They show us more aspects. We can see sense levels of them, other perceptions of them - psyche. And logos - the whole idea, the whole conception of things, the perception, the conception. Psyche and logos: the perception, conception of things opens up. And in that opening up of psyche and logos, of perception and conception, idea of things, that can stimulate the eros even more. There's more ways of looking opened up. The whole thing opens up through following the ways of looking that we find are there when there is eros, and when there is metta or karuṇā. And then developing those ways, looking at what opens up further, further, further, further.

We've explained this many times in the Ecology of Love series of talks - how the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic works, how the soul-making dynamic works in the opening up of love, basically, to whole other levels, whole other domains, whole other spread, range.

So if we want the fullest, deepest, widest liberation: ways of looking. If we want the fullest, deepest, widest love: ways of looking. If we want also the fullest, deepest, widest meaningfulness and beauty in our existence, in our life - the sense of meaningfulness and beauty - if we want that to be the fullest, the richest, the deepest, the widest, again, trusting that perception of meaningfulness and beauty enough to discern what are the ways of looking that are there when those senses are around of meaningfulness and beauty. And there will be many. And then practicing them. And what that does again is open up further the sense of soul-making. Meaningfulness and beauty are integral to soul-making.

And that will open up further the sense of beauty, and suggest, open up more ways of looking. This is all just part, again, of how the soul-making dynamic works.

It's a general principle here. If we want something—whether it's to understand emptiness, whether it's liberation, whether it's love, whether it's soul-making—we need to practice ways of looking that lead to that. Practice ways of looking in ways that lead to understanding emptiness, to a sense of liberation, to love, to a sense of soul-making.

And then what those ways of looking deliver—understanding emptiness, liberation, love or soul-making—those deliverances will also open us to more ways of looking or deliver to us a greater range of ways of looking. We practice ways of looking as powerful means to open to what it is that we want, whatever that is, what we want deeply: emptiness understanding, liberation, love, soul-making dynamic, soul-making generally.

And then we let that opening that the ways of looking have delivered—we let that, or it will, open up more ways of looking. That's how the soul-making dynamic works. It's how liberation works. It's how an understanding of emptiness works. Practice ways of looking to get X, and then let X deliver to us, suggest to us, open for us even more ways of looking.

Sometimes I think there's nothing more worthwhile in life than developing the whole notion and idea of ways of looking.

As I said, let me just revisit this point. It's quite easy to hear about the ways of looking approach and hear about emptiness and how they relate, and jump to certain conclusions before we've practiced it, or even start—get off on the wrong foot in our understanding. So a few things here, particularly with regard to ethics.

Someone might hear the teachings about emptiness and start, so to speak, at the end, as if they're being asked to believe something—which is that everything, all things are empty. They might hear that or read it: all things are absolutely empty. And then they've forgotten about the whole ways of looking thing and they just interpret as if they're being asked to believe something, that all things are empty. Whereas that's a conclusion.

So in practice, we don't start by believing anything like that. We don't start with the conclusion, because someone who would start in such a way would understandably have the concern: but then I wouldn't care, or nothing would matter, and what about ethics and that sort of thing if everything's empty? They're trying to understand it from their usual conventional point of view without really understanding it, which can only really come about through practice.

Rather, we start with these two notions that I mentioned before. Start with the possibility that there is the possibility of a range of ways of looking—that's part of what it is to have a human mind and heart, a human citta. And secondly, that we explore the fabrication of suffering, of self, and other through different ways of looking.

And that exploration, as I said, is an open-ended, experiential, and experimental inquiry, without pre-deciding the limit of fabrication, or without pre-deciding that fabrication just ends here—thank you very much, it doesn't go down to all that deep fading business and that mystical stuff—without pre-deciding that. Or nor, without pre-deciding that everything is empty and everything is an illusion. Even though we might be told that may be the conclusion, we don't know what that means yet, and it would be silly to start with a conclusion that we don't really understand. Let's keep it open and find out.

Just take those two ideas: the possibility of flexibility of ways of looking and the extension of that range, and this idea of fabrication of suffering, self, and other. And then open-ended, experimental, experiential inquiry without pre-deciding either way.

So that should allay, to a certain extent, someone's fears around: well, you're asking me to believe this and that everything is empty, and that, to me, implies that I'm not going to care or nothing matters or ethics won't matter, etc.

But a few more things that it's important to say here. Emptiness ways of looking—in other words, ways of looking that see something or see experience, phenomena, objects, to some level or other as empty—any emptiness ways of looking is just a way of looking which we can pick up and put down. In other words, it's not an ultimate truth. It's not somewhere to park your way of looking as if we could forever stay in a certain way of looking. The whole thing is flexible and it needs to keep a range and flexibility. We pick up and put down emptiness ways of looking.

So sometimes we want to put down emptiness ways of looking and pick up a rarefied view of self, of other, of suffering, of this or that, of some ethical situation, even of something like responsibility in an ethical misdemeanor.

So how do we decide what we pick up and put down in terms of a way of looking? Well, we're responsive to what's needed. And in Buddha Dharma, we base our choice of way of looking in any moment on what reduces suffering. In soul-making Dharma, our choice is based on what opens up the soul-making. Suffering, if we're basing it on the reduction of suffering, is of self, of other, and world.

But emptiness ways of looking are things we pick up and put down. They're not—now I'm going to all the time be in this emptiness ways of looking or this view of the emptiness of all things and I'm sort of stuck there and how will the ethics come in and things like that. So that's the second point, very important.

The third point again relates to the fact that understanding emptiness or exploring emptiness through the ways of looking approach is probably more unusual. And what's more common, perhaps, is that emptiness is equated not with the kind of understanding that comes out of the whole journey through the ways of looking approach, but rather emptiness is equated with either a sort of big empty space in which appear just insubstantial objects without much self or personality, it seems, or much doing—and that's often someone's understanding of emptiness.

Or a second understanding can be: emptiness kind of refers to just a sort of machine-like process of the aggregates, the five aggregates of being.

Body, vedana, perception, mental formations, and consciousness. What's really empty is the self itself. Here emptiness means impermanence—impermanent—because there is just the impermanent moment-to-moment arising and passing of that process of aggregates in time, a bit like a machine. And that's what emptiness means to some people, or that's a common view.

So either it's a big empty space of insubstantiality—not much self, not much doing it seems—or it's this kind of emptiness of the self which actually relates to the impermanent nature of the aggregates as a process in time. But neither of those two understandings or views of emptiness has any obvious connection with dependent arising, nor does it easily bring out the connection with dependent arising and also with karma, which are two sides of the same thing—dependent arising and karma. So those two views of emptiness make the connection not obvious.

However, one of the reasons one might want to explore emptiness through the ways of looking and fabrication paradigm is that if we start with those notions—ways of looking and fabrication—then dependent arising is woven in always, right from the beginning. That's totally what we're exploring, what we're paying attention to. Dependent on this way of looking, dependent on this mind-state-attitude relationship that's all woven into the way of looking, dependent on this way of looking, then suffering and self and other and world arise and appear a lot, a little, or like this or like that, dependent on the way of looking. Dependent arising is woven into it.

So even something like generosity becomes a way of looking. When I'm generous, the self, other, world arise a certain way. I feel myself a certain way. If I really practice generosity, if I really am very generous and open-hearted, then I'll notice something about how self, other, world appear—if I really take it on as an inquiry. And also that suffering gets reduced through generosity in the now, in the giving. I mean, of course, you can have some suffering because you've given so much that you're afraid, etc. But generally speaking, one really explores it over time with wisdom. One sees that basically generosity becomes—we could call it—a way of looking. You see how expansive that term is.

But when there's generosity, I sense things, I sense self, other, world a certain way, and suffering is reduced. When there's the opposite, the absence of generosity—when there's, let's say, stinginess—then self, other, world get fabricated very differently: more separate, more contracted, more hard, more solid, and suffering increases.

So in this way of working with emptiness, the ways of looking approach and fabrication approach to emptiness, then ethics is integrated into emptiness right from the beginning. It's unavoidable. The approach integrates karma into our understanding of emptiness unavoidably. We see it, we know it, we feel it firsthand. And as we go deeper, we see the world is different, dependent on the way of looking.

Those other two understandings of emptiness that I mentioned briefly—the sort of big space of insubstantiality and the sort of moment-to-moment arising and passing of aggregates—it's possible, or rather it's more possible that they can lead to a kind of moral nihilism. One might assume, well, there's no self there, therefore there'll be no selfishness. There's no self in that machine-like process of the aggregates in time—momentary arising and passing—nor is there much self in that big empty space. And with less self, there's less selfishness.

So one might think, oh, they should help with morality, and maybe they will. But neither actually—is there much of a world there, and the effects of ways of looking and of actions kind of get dissolved and not noticed in that big space or in the kind of microscopic, myopic attention to the momentary arising and passing. And then it might well be that ethics needs supplementation by separate teaching, separate teaching about sila. Because it's not quite clear what these understandings of emptiness have to do with ethics.

This is also the case a lot in the Tibetan tradition, how they emphasize repeatedly the importance of ethics almost as a separate domain than the understanding of emptiness. It's like it gets re-emphasized as if—don't forget about karma. Karma is more important than shunyata, the Dalai Lama would say.

So sometimes either their approach to emptiness is not coming through the ways of looking fabrication dependent arising paradigm—it's coming through an analytical approach where one just analyzes logically to see that things can have no inherent existence—or it's coming through some level of a big space approach to emptiness. And then those two approaches too will need this kind of supplementary teaching on ethics, because it's not at all obvious what the connection is, and there's a danger of nihilism. It's not wrapped up—the way appearances arise dependently, and arise as this or that, as well as suffering, nor the fact of arising, that it arises dependently on the way of looking. No clinging, no arising. No avijja, no arising.

But in the ways of looking fabrication approach—the ways of looking approach to emptiness—there may be no need for extra ethical teaching in terms of basic ethics, because experience through the practice teaches ethics and karma through inquiry into ways of looking, fabrication, dependent arising. It's right there.

I remember interviews really quite some years ago, and someone came in for the interview, and as part of it he said, "Well, you know, this view you have about the non-reality of things and emptiness, that really is challenging." And he was a bit concerned about it, but he couldn't quite make the challenge himself. But he said, "It's just not right, it's not right." Now, I know that he was very concerned about things like climate change. So I can't remember how the conversation panned out because he had never practiced ways of looking, etc.

I don't remember exactly how that conversation unfolded, since he had never practiced ways of looking. But it would have been worth examining among dharma teachers who are the ones who seem less engaged with social justice or environmental issues—the very things he cared about. His concern was that if you hold this notion of the emptiness of things, it becomes dangerous to caring about climate and other urgent matters.

Yet he knew I was deeply concerned with climate issues and quite active in environmental work. Rather than dismissing the emptiness view, he might have asked a more penetrating question: How is it that you can understand the emptiness of things and still be so dedicated to climate and environmental issues, working so diligently to raise consciousness about them? That would have been far more appropriate.

If we look carefully at who thinks, practices, teaches, and talks in terms of the deepest and most comprehensive emptiness, we find they are often people with deeply engaged practice—their conception and practice of dharma extends naturally to engagement with social justice and ecological issues. Meanwhile, those who hold the most realist views, contrary to this person's easy assumption that non-realist views create problems, often show less engagement when we examine their actual practice.

Even if someone doesn't completely grasp the whole deep and comprehensive emptiness teaching firsthand, if they're drawn to it, it will still guide their philosophy and what they aspire to realize in practice. The comparison reveals something profound.

To put this whole matter more clearly: the coexistence of deep, thorough emptiness view with radical, long-term commitment to engagement should have led him to question his fears and assumptions that emptiness gives rise to moral nihilism.

We might also reflect—and I'll speak more about ethics in future talks—that it's not the non-reification or seeing the emptiness of things that leads to lack of ethical care. That's the common assumption, as this person made. But really, it's reification that leads to harm: reification of self as a center of gravity for acquisition, reification of other, reification of objects we want as real things that will give us something. That's what leads to unethical behavior.

With non-reification of self and other, the impulses to acquire things harmfully actually decrease. This deserves deeper reflection, and I'll return to speak more about ethics later.

It's very easy to misunderstand or only partially grasp this whole understanding of emptiness and the ways of looking approach, or to drag other assumptions into it. Bertrand Russell wrote something I read recently—I'm not sure of the context, though he sounds rather ticked off and judgmental: "A stupid man's report of what a clever man says can never be accurate, because he unconsciously translates what he hears into something he can understand."

I don't know the context, and it does sound judgmental, but the general point is well-taken. As human beings, it's easy for us to read or hear something subtle and sophisticated and simply squeeze it into the box of what we already understand or know. We chop bits off, shave away parts, turn things around, squeeze and change their relationships so they fit into our existing framework of understanding.

This business of emptiness is deep and subtle. Throughout Buddhist history, there's been tremendous care around emptiness teachings, and also around tantric and vajrayana teachings. Great care about who receives them and how they need to be set up. Tantric teachings have parallels, similarities at least, with soul-making dharma teachings.

Do we really need to take care that both the emptiness and the soul-making are not misunderstood, distorted, twisted, only partially understood, or grasped at a superficial level? That we don't get sloppy with all this? I think so. Throughout the history of Buddha-dharma, through millennia until very recently, there's been tremendous care around how and when teachings are given and disseminated.

It's possible for us to be sloppy in our understanding of emptiness. It's subtle, sophisticated, and runs very, very deep. For example, when asked what emptiness means, we might say it means there is no real way anything is. But that fact of emptiness—that there is no real way anything is—does not entail that a thing can be anything. The absence of a real way things are doesn't mean anything can be anything.

Put slightly differently: the fact that there is no way a thing really is does not imply that there is no way it really isn't. It's not simply saying, "Oh, things are empty, therefore anything can be anything," or "a thing can be anything." This is subtle and sophisticated territory.

So I really think it's important not to be sloppy with all this business about emptiness. We're talking about a very refined understanding. And that middle way of emptiness is really a razor's edge—a very fine line between nihilism and realism. You need to take care not to be sloppy.

Some people say—this is not so much sloppiness, but just a little more precision is needed—I've heard several times someone say, "We need to understand emptiness before we practice soul-making dharma, because otherwise we're going to reify the images." A couple of things here.

First of all, not necessarily. I don't think James Hillman was reifying his images. Very much the sense I get from reading him was that he was really interested in that territory of as-if, what we would call neither real nor not real—the imaginal middle way. And I don't think he had any training in emptiness or Buddhist philosophy or anything like that. It's more almost an aesthetic disposition, more an intuitive understanding of what the imaginal involves.

But secondly, and more importantly, the non-reification of images involves more than just seeing that they're empty. It involves the recognition of their different ontological status than the ontological status of conventionally agreed upon objects or material things or emotions.

So emptiness is something that applies to all objects. It applies to, like we said at the beginning, this solid desk—it's empty of inherent existence. But it also applies to the dream your daughter had of a monster chasing her that came out from under her bed, as it applies to an imaginal image in meditation. Emptiness applies to all objects. It's not enough of an ontological assessment here.

What we need to do is understand that an image, an imaginal image, has a different ontological status. It's not just that it's empty. There's a different ontological status than conventionally agreed upon material objects. So that if that lion in the image wants to rip me apart and eat me and devour me, I understand in the meditation that there is a different ontological status than were it a real lion—but they're both empty. So there's something we need to understand a bit more precisely. It's not just the fact of emptiness that allows us to navigate imaginal practice. Different ontological status of images and conventional objects, but both empty.

When it comes to emptiness practice, and something I've said recently that I want to highlight again, is I think eros is really needed. We really need to be erotically curious about emptiness and the practice. We need to be passionately interested and excited even. You know, the necessity of eros for practice is actually the necessity of eros in life and in helping with all kinds of things—something we should emphasize.

So I think of someone I know, she's probably 85, and she has never trained her mind in meditation, not interested in any of all that. She's 85 and she has some physical dukkha, but a fair amount of mental dukkha in relationship to her physical dukkha and other things. But she has never trained her mind. So her reactivity is going to be more than someone who has trained their mind through mindfulness and meditation. And she's got lots of habits of the citta, habits of the way she relates to things, that are not going to really help, that will actually increase her dukkha.

So you'd think, okay, mindfulness will help her, training in mindfulness will help her, and undoubtedly it will. But I have a question: is it mindfulness that would help her the most? Because this person is also, I would say, not actually deeply interested in anything. And I've known her for quite some years, and I would say that she's never really been deeply interested in anything.

So she's been happy enough in her life, periods of less happy and all that. And now she's getting old. She is old. There's more mental dukkha. But is it the mindfulness that would actually help her most? Because she's also not deeply interested in anything. There's very little, in other words, eros in her life—eros to this deep interest in something that would give her life soulfulness, meaningfulness, beauty, vitality. In that, there'd be an increase in well-being and happiness.

So which is the more important ingredient? The mindfulness or the eros? The eros is really, really important in life.

In relationship to suffering, yes, eros cuts, but without it, a life without eros will inevitably have some form of depression in it.

To get back to what I was saying before, I think emptiness practices need to be fueled by eros, by a kind of erotic curiosity and excitement. They will be much more profoundly and widely helpful and liberating if one is really interested in emptiness, excited and passionate about it, loves it, loves exploring it. Instead of emptiness and emptiness practices just being a set of techniques to reduce suffering—which they can be regarded as: "Look at this this way, practice this way of looking and there will be much less suffering"—but if they're just related to as a set of techniques to reduce suffering and decrease unhelpful cognitive patterns, I don't think we're going to get all the wide, deep, liberating juice out of it.

Actually, we could say that with any practice—mindfulness, metta, generosity, compassion—we need eros for that practice.

In the Mahayana suttas, I'm pretty sure it's from the different Prajnaparamita suttas but maybe other places as well, they say things like: a bodhisattva only teaches emptiness to those whose hair stands on end when they hear about it. They're so excited. Or they shed tears of joy or being moved, even if they don't understand it. It's only to those people. In other words, emptiness—the teachings of emptiness and the practice of emptiness—are not being set or received in fertile ground if it's coming with, "Oh, I should practice emptiness. My dharma friends are into it, or they say it's the best thing. Emptiness is the best, or emptiness is necessary. You can't be a proper practitioner if you don't practice it, or it's advanced, so my ego gets a certain boost or gratification in practicing that level of teachings."

All that will be a dry soil, an unfertile soil.

Practice of emptiness, practices of emptiness, inquiry into emptiness, exploration of it, needs eros. Absolutely. I think to be really fertile, it's the juice, it's the moisture, the water in the soil that allows it to be fertile. And it's that eros that also will prevent us being sloppy with it. We're not satisfied. The eros wants to go to more refined understanding, a more subtle understanding, a more careful and precise understanding of emptiness. So again, care with the sloppiness.

Care, as well as I said before, in regard to the ethics question, care not to start with a conclusion about emptiness. So someone—I had a question from someone a while ago that ended up on my desk and they were asking about trauma. And they were saying, "Well, in your book Seeing That Frees, basically, or the book Seeing That Frees is basically saying that trauma is empty, whereas there was another book they were reading and it was basically saying that trauma is real and it's neurologically wired and it's a real physical factor." And then the phrase they used was "the body keeps the score."

So you get these two views. Either it's empty—which was attributed to, "That's what Seeing That Frees says, that's what Rob is saying, it's just empty"—or this other view: it's a real thing. It's an absolutely real thing, and it's real because it's neurologically wired. You can't get away from the physical reality of that.

So why not bring a bit more care and openness and subtlety to the investigation here? This is a really, really important investigation. Why not acknowledge some dependence—there must be at least some dependence of the experience of trauma on factors in the present? So here's this traumatic event or series of events, maybe even series over a long time, and just acknowledge that how that arises for me, its effect in the present, how it comes up in the present, depends on factors in the present. It depends whether it's met by love, met by warmth, met by spaciousness, or whether it's met by harshness and judgmentalism and contraction and all kinds of other assumptions and all kinds of things. There's some dependence. We must know. Everyone must agree on that.

The experience of trauma, how I actually experience it in this moment, depends to some extent on factors in the present. And maybe just start with that without assuming either of those other extreme views. "Rob says trauma is empty," or the extreme view of "it's a real thing, the body keeps the score, it's an absolutely hardwired real thing." That's not what I'm saying, by the way, that one extreme view. It's not what Seeing That Frees says or the way it approaches it anyway.

But why not just start with some—acknowledge there's some dependency of the actual experience of trauma on factors in the present? The experience of trauma depends, to some degree, on factors in the present. And then, just start with that, and then keep exploring. Exploring with practice and with ways of looking without presupposing either extreme view.

Or again, presupposing how much or where is the limit of the effect of conditions in the present on trauma. Same principle. Keep it open. Keep it an investigation. Don't jump to either a realist or a nihilist view—what the Buddha called extreme views. The middle way is the middle between extreme views.

What else is trauma after all but an experience? We don't talk about trauma if it's gone completely and there's no experience, it has no effects whatsoever in the present. Trauma is its effects in the present. So that's what we're talking about.

This is really, really important. You're just starting with the idea—a very gentle, open idea. I don't know. They must be somewhat dependent on present factors. This experience of trauma must be somewhat dependent on factors in the present. Let's find out how much. That would be a ways of looking approach. And the way I would teach it is to find out. Find out. Just keep going. If you come to an absolute, that's it, okay. But find out. Because it also might be the case... I'm just pursuing this particular theme around trauma, that other factors are at play here.

So again, rather than argue between two views that are kind of absolute, abstract—abstract by which I mean they're taken as positions by belief rather than experiential inquiry—rather than argue between two views that are extreme with regard to trauma, either that it's an inherently existent, unbudgeable reality of the body and nervous system, on the one hand, or that it's empty on the other hand, it would be much more helpful to start with what should be quite obvious: that traumatic experiences will vary differently and have very different effects dependent on the attitudes, habit patterns of mind, heart, will, soul, and relationality that accompany them.

And those habit patterns might have been already established as habits before the occurrence of the traumatic incidents. This person might already have had, before this traumatic series of incidents, a quite strong tendency to aversion. Might already have entrenched, unfortunately, a habit towards what we might call laziness—a habit towards easily collapsing psychically, in terms of her strength and power and uprightness. Might also unfortunately have a lack of wisdom and a habitual avoidance of challenge, an avoidance of the unpleasant that became inculcated as a habit into the life, into the mind and being. Might have developed in many areas a weak will, and yet in other areas a kind of stubborn will.

All these pre-constituted habits and factors may be part of determining—more than the actual traumatic incidents themselves—how the trauma and its effects play out in her life over decades. It's not so much the trauma; it's the fact that those traumatic incidents landed in a soil that was already teeming with not-so-helpful ingredients. And they were habitual ingredients. So when the trauma comes up again—which again is already a presupposing notion—when it comes up again, it meets those same unhelpful habits, and it plays out in the soil of those unhelpful habits, and they create a really much more difficult soup.

Which bits the trauma? Which bits the pre-existing habit that was developed? So there's a lot to inquire into, and sometimes we're too quick, too sloppy in saying either our trauma is just empty, don't look at the past, or just giving it some kind of inherent reality without looking carefully enough at conditions. And it's exactly looking at conditions and what we can do with conditions in the present, including insight ways of looking, including bringing other factors in—it's exactly that that's going to help.

So how can I help in the present ends up being the same inquiry as what's inherently existent here. They go together because of the whole ways of looking approach. Because in the ways of looking approach we're interested in what gives rise to more suffering here, what locks suffering into place right now in this moment, and what decreases suffering. So the whole inquiry into ontology and into reality is totally connected with the inquiry into what's helpful with regard to my suffering. Sometimes people again have the idea of emptiness as being something very abstract or not really relevant to their life, but it's really not.

Another thing people sometimes—or it's tempting, again very understandably tempting to do—is to equate the understandings of emptiness with the understandings of quantum physics. So the understanding of emptiness, ways of looking paradigm with the understanding of quantum physics. Again, this is very tempting. There's certainly some really, really interesting parallels, I think, and fruitful parallels. But I think we have to be a little careful here, partly because physics as a discipline can change, and trends in physics can change at any time. What Thomas Kuhn calls paradigms in physics can change at any time, and then change back.

So we have to be a little careful with equating the two and then using quantum physics as a sort of foundation where our understanding of emptiness depends on quantum physics or our belief in emptiness depends on quantum physics. I know I've talked about it in the past and I think it's really interesting, but it's more wanting to use those understandings to really shake up and shake loose and challenge the kind of usual assumptions and beliefs about reality, which often boil down to beliefs about material reality and the way it must exist independent of the observer, in a kind of Cartesian, Newtonian way. And really wanting to expose and shake up those assumptions and beliefs in response to what can often be—and even in the history of the Buddha Dharma, there's a sense of—the outrage at hearing emptiness teachings, the conclusions that a practical expression of emptiness yields.

So Einstein, as many of you might know, was very, very opposed to the whole implications of quantum physics. This idea that the moon doesn't really exist, or the moon isn't really there until you look at it. It's not there when we aren't looking. That seems to be what quantum mechanics, quantum physics is implying. And in various ways over many years, he tried to expose the flaws in quantum physics. But every time he failed. And at one point he teamed up with two other guys, Podolsky and Rosen, and they came up with a kind of thought experiment that seemed to really undermine the framework of quantum physics and this idea that things might not exist independently of our way of looking, of our observation.

And then, after he died—yes, it must be after he died—a physicist called David Bell came up with a way that one might actually decide whether Einstein, Podolsky, and Rosen were right or whether quantum physics was right. And then I think after David

Bell died, a French physicist called Alain Aspect devised an experiment and was actually able to test it. And what it found were two results that are kind of not really arguable with.

One is that in some instances, non-locality is a fact of nature. Two particles are somehow woven together. They can affect each other, or it seems they can affect each other, across massive distances of space instantaneously, faster than the speed of light. In other words, space isn't quite what it seems to be. But the second one, for our purposes—interestingly, that first one is the second one for our purposes—is that quantum particles do only become real, become only this or that when we observe them. So this was a result of this experiment by Alain Aspect. Quantum particles are actually only real when we observe them.

And Einstein was really clinging to his preferred beliefs regarding reality, regarding nature, regarding the cosmos. Again, this is like, how passionate am I about wanting to go deep with these questions? And also the importance of recognizing what is it that I want to be true, which I've talked about a lot before.

Well, so in the—I've said this before, but the Schrödinger wave equation is a complex mathematical equation in abstract mathematical multidimensional space. And in a way, it describes what we will see, or the probability of what we will see when we look in certain ways at subatomic particles. When we look, we see something. And dependent on how we look, we see this or that, a wave or a particle, etc. But the Schrödinger equation kind of depicts, if you like, what exists when we're not observing. But it's not really something we could call real in the sense that it doesn't depict a thing that exists in time. As I said, it's an abstract mathematical equation in multidimensional space. It's as if there's a kind of indefiniteness of matter, an indeterminacy of matter before observation.

So again, there are parallels here to the ways of looking and emptiness understanding that I would like to offer. It's not saying there is the complete non-existence of matter. Matter is a complete illusion. It's just a mental projection. Some spiritual teachings say that. There is no matter. Matter is just purely mind. What the ways of looking and this emptiness approach and other approaches to emptiness stress much more is not that there's nothing there at all, there is no matter, but that it's dependent on the way of looking, that it forms to be anything and what it forms and where it is and all that.

So there's again a parallel between this ways of looking, understanding emptiness and certain quantum physics understandings, for example, the Schrödinger equation. Matter is—again, it's not that anything can arise, because there's no way something is, because the Schrödinger equation is essentially indeterminate, it just gives probabilities, it doesn't then mean that anything can arise. It's not the case that it was an electron in one moment, and then when I looked in the next moment, it was the Hollywood set of Mary Poppins, or a Boris Johnson speech, or the 1917 Bolshevik revolution in Russia, or whatever. It's not the case that anything can come from something.

But matter is indeterminate, indefinite before observation—an object, a phenomenon in experience. It's indeterminate, indefinite. It's the observation, it's the looking, it's the relating to that makes it something.

And dependent on the way of looking in that moment is what we experience. So there are parallels there with quantum physics.

I think in one of those Dharma seminars recently—maybe it was one on ontology, I can't remember—but ontology is basic and unavoidable in life. Again, when we talk about ontology and emptiness, we're not talking about abstract philosophies. We're not talking about something that only is really relevant in microscopic, super-advanced physics or whatever. Ontology—views and beliefs about reality—are basic and completely unavoidable in life.

As I said, you would have a very different response, a different kind of concern, if your daughter reported, when she came down for breakfast in the morning, that there was a monster under her bed in the night and was chasing her. You would have a very different concern if you just thought that's a dream. Maybe some of you would be concerned what it meant about her unconscious and whatever psychological problems she had. But it would be very different from the concern than if you actually thought there was some kind of monster there, or a bear, or a tiger, or a snake, or something. So ontology is just part of our life. In every moment, we're making decisions about what's real, what's not. It's woven into our perception of everything.

That's why I said before, if you really practice and know how to practice the ways of looking and get to the point where you can engage a way of looking that holds something in attention and regards it as empty, and see what a vast, radical difference that makes to the experience of that thing compared to just the normal way of looking where there is the assumption of the reality of that thing. And that assumption of the reality is just normally woven into our experience. There's always an ontology, an ontological conception.

This is part of a larger point about there always being conception. There's always an ontology and an ontological conception woven into the perception of anything. But unless one has experienced holding, in one's way of looking, a different ontological conception, practicing that, practicing with the agility of that, and seeing what it does, one probably doesn't even realize that, or one thinks it's something one doesn't realize that ontology is woven into perception. But it's inevitable, and it brings with it, of course, a hierarchy of value judgments.

I mentioned this the other day in the talk at Guy House. Again, relating to your daughter reporting a monster under her bed. Our ontological assessment brings in a certain value judgment. What do I need to do? But in practice, the hierarchy of value judgments that goes with ontology is actually constitutive and active in and as practice.

So, for example, in mindfulness practice, there's the idea communicated, the teaching communicated that papañca and story and self are somehow not real. They're fabrications. They're less real than what we might encounter as bare sensation or what is revealed with bare attention, with mindfulness or equanimity, etc. In Dzogchen and Mahamudra teachings, the nature of mind—which can be interpreted in all kinds of different ways and at different levels—is real, whereas this or that other thing is not real or less real. Or in Zen teachings, some Zen teachings, often what we know through thinking and concepts is not real.

So these ontological judgments are wrapped up with value judgments and they constitute and are active in and as practice. They get reinforced by the teachings and sort of indirectly by a kind of even non-verbal rhetoric, if we could even use such a phrase, without much philosophical or psychological unpacking, explaining, questioning, probing. But it's there.

So that, of course, in, let's say, mindfulness teachings, the relationship with image, imagination, the possible imaginal, would be, well, that's not what's there in bare attention and mindfulness. It has a much lesser status, it has a much lower place in the hierarchy of things. Occasionally it might be helpful if a person gets stuck or it might be helpful for the arising of faith. Imagine the Buddha or imagine this or that. Or if you just can't do it without mindfulness alone—as if mindfulness alone, that's the real practice. Real practitioners don't need this second-best use of the imagination, this unreal thing. That's kind of for weaklings or people who, when you hit a hard spot, you just need a little extra help.

So all these kinds of... Ontology is inevitable. It brings with it value judgments, not just reality judgments, which is what ontology means. Those reality judgments involve or imply value judgments. And all that's wrapped into practice, often in ways that, as I said, are communicated very, very strongly and repeatedly through different streams of Dharma and different styles of teaching, but not with a lot of real unpacking philosophically or psychologically.

So we need to be aware of that, I think. The importance of ontology, the importance of asking into all this, how we approach these questions and these explorations and inquiries into ontology will determine so much of what our practice is and what our practice delivers, what is legitimate and what opens for us.

So for the Buddha, I would say he was very concerned with this. Again, it's maybe popular these days to say he wasn't interested in that at all, he wasn't a philosopher, da-da-da. But I would say he was very concerned. There is, of course, his... You know, some people say there's only two suttas in the Pali Canon which address emptiness, and they've got emptiness in the title. It's the Greater and Shorter Discourses on Emptiness, or something like that. One of which isn't really about emptiness in any sense at all.

It's a strangely given title. And this reading back of Mahayana versions of emptiness as not what the Buddha originally taught is just, again, a little sloppy, a little lazy.

There are so many incidents one could point to in the Pali Canon. A lot of them are explored in Seeing That Frees, but there are many, many examples. When Kaccayana asked the Buddha, "What do you teach about right view?" the Buddha replied, "I teach the middle way, the middle way between is and is not. That's the middle view. Most people assume phenomena either exist—they are—or they do not exist—they are not. But I, the Buddha, teach the middle way: neither is nor is not."

What does this mean? It means the whole emptiness teaching, and it takes a lot to unpack what he means by that: neither real nor not real, neither is nor is not. It takes considerable exploration, but it's right there. And in the many investigations of dependent arising and dependent ceasing and dependent origination as a whole, it's right there.

There's a case where Sariputta is talking to a monk called Mahakotthita, and he tries to explain dependent arising. He explains how consciousness depends on nama-rupa. Nama-rupa means not just body, but the perception of forms, and perception itself, and attention, and contact, and vedana, and intention. Sariputta explains that perception and vedana depend on consciousness. Then he goes on to explain that consciousness depends on intention, perception, attention, feeling. So perception depends on consciousness, and consciousness depends on perception. Vedana depends on consciousness, and consciousness depends on vedana. Mahakotthita responds, "Excuse me, what?"

Of course, it's baffling. But Sariputta is pointing to this mutual dependency, which is exactly what we mean by emptiness. These two things—consciousness and perception—they're not two, but neither are they one. They're neither one nor two. They're empty. They're mutually empty. They're mutually dependent.

So it's there throughout, in many places in the Pali Canon. And it's, of course, tied to... the Buddha was concerned with this, and an understanding of ontology was very much tied to what he meant by liberation. It's there in his definition of right view—one of the definitions of right view. It's there completely in what he pointed to as the most central insight of his night of awakening: this dependent arising, and particularly the mutual dependent arising of nama-rupa and consciousness, of perception, vedana, and consciousness. Mutual interpenetration, mutual inseparability, mutual dependence. This causes that, but that causes this at the same time.

Dependent arising is the thing to understand, the thing that a liberated arahant understands, has penetrated. Similarly, the Buddha didn't just talk about the anatta of phenomena—that they're not me, not mine. He also used the word sunya: they're void. This means something different. They're void in themselves, they're empty in themselves. He gives different analogies regarding the aggregates and how they're empty of substance, empty of inherent existence.

So it's totally there in the Pali Canon, if one looks for it and knows what to look for.

Regarding awakening and emptiness, I think we need to make another point, which I've alluded to several times recently, but I'd like to draw out more fully. Someone was asking whether they just need to understand emptiness to be liberated, or whether there's a certain amount of psychological work they need to do as well. "Do I need to resolve and understand my psychological stuff?"

What's interesting is we never seem to hear anything like that in the Pali Canon about people's self-judgment or their inner critic, or their incapacity to sustain intimate romantic relationships, or their inability to commit, or their frustration at their own lack of self-expression or inauthenticity, or anything like that. There seems to be no report of that kind of dukkha in the Pali Canon.

It's also interestingly absent in, for example, the teachings of Ramana Maharshi or Nisargadatta Maharaj. You just hear these teachings about emptiness or the nature of awareness or that kind of thing. So why the absence? Is it that in the time of the Buddha in India, they just had better parenting? So people didn't have psychological issues? Or is it that the sense of self and the expectations of self and of relationship are very different now than they were in the time of the Buddha's India?

In terms of awakening and the self-view and penetrating the self-view in the first fetter of stream entry, we nowadays need and want and expect practices and realizations to address and to decrease or even eradicate that kind of suffering – the suffering around self that comes from a certain set of expectations and a certain self-sense and a certain expectations of self and of relationship. We expect, need, want practice and realization to address all that.

So I have a question: Do practices and realizations need to be different now? Or is it enough that we can just work with the emptiness? Those teachers like Nisargadatta and Ramana had very different socially constructed senses of self that they had to deal with than we do. Very different socially constructed senses of self they had to deal with in themselves and also in the issues brought to them by seekers and students. And on top of that, their role and status as constructed by Indian spiritual customs with respect to the guru – there's a whole way you are, a way you hang out with, a way you talk to the guru. There's a whole relational paradigm there. They have a certain role and status and it's determined within a certain range how you hang out with them, what you do, what you ask them for, what you expect from them, what the social situation allows and what their role and status determines.

So that meant that they also didn't have to deal with or even encounter a lot of the self-burdens and self-expectations and shapes and relational dynamics and relational expectations that most of us do. And we're expecting this one thing, this insight into emptiness, even if it's the emptiness of everything, to address what may be very different selves, different self-sense, different socially constructed self that we have nowadays in the West. Different sufferings, different challenges to address.

I can think of, and probably many of you can think of, people who seem to have had tremendous depth of practice in the past, whether it's jhānic, samādhi and emptiness understanding, but they don't seem to have much capacity or skill with, let's say, personal intimacy and personal connection. Maybe our notion of awakening needs to involve more than just insight, more than just insight into emptiness. Maybe awakening or enlightenment, or liberation, also implies certain skills with respect to the kinds of challenges that we have to address because of the society we live in, and because of the way the self is constructed differently in our society.

So yes, emptiness. Yes, it's empty. But I still have to have a certain set of skills. I have to be able – you know, if I realize that everything is empty, but I'm really insensitive in relationship, my capacity for intimacy, I just don't seem to be able to meet people and navigate that territory in terms of deep connection with people. Is that awakened? Am I satisfied with that?

So it might be, I do need to work on some of my psychological stuff, if we use that term broadly. And those kinds of skills, as well as the emptiness understanding and skill in emptiness practice, become a part of, or aspects of, a much larger thing called awakening.

But the emptiness piece delivers a lot. It really delivers a lot and it really opens up a lot. Even if it's not in itself the single thing that we can rely on and hope that everything in our life gets taken care of. But it does open a lot of doors the deeper we go into it.

So if we take it very deeply in practice, that the middle way of emptiness can, for example, open up the conceptual legitimacy and practice possibilities of flexible ways of looking and perceptions, for example, of particular divinities, not just universal sense of divinity and sacredness, of universal emptiness, but of particular divinities and particular sacrednesses that we go into with the soul-making practices. If I go deep enough in emptiness practice, it opens up the conceptual legitimacy for those, and it opens up the practice possibilities as well, for the flexibility of ways of looking and of perception that perceive particular divinity and not just universal divinity, particular sacrednesses and not just universal ones.

And actually more broadly, we could say that the realization of deep and comprehensive emptiness, really go deep, we've realized there is no ultimately true conceptual framework regarding conventional reality. There's no ultimately true way that we can explain the workings of conventional reality. Again, that doesn't equate to saying all conceptual frameworks are equally true or valid, but that there is no ultimately true conceptual framework regarding conventional reality.

And that understanding comes out of emptiness going very, very deep and very wide. That then legitimizes and opens up the possibility of a range and a flexibility of conceptual frameworks and ways of looking within conceptual frameworks. It's not just ways of looking, but whole ideas or systems of thought. We can also move between them with the same ease and flexibility and agility and lightness of touch, lightness of holding as we move between ways of looking. This comes out deep practice of emptiness. And of course, that too is very relevant to soul-making dharma, soul-making practice. It's one of the things we emphasize quite a lot.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 226

The Ontology of the Soul, and the Soul of Ontology

Rob Burbea · 2h09

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines fundamental ontological questions in relation to soul-making practice. He begins by distinguishing between the imaginal middle way—a quality of images that appear neither real nor not real—and the middle way of emptiness taught by the Buddha in the Kaccāyanagotta Sutta (SN 12.15). While emptiness practice aims toward precise ontological understanding through careful inquiry, imaginal practice deliberately leaves ontological questions open, allowing for multiple conceptual frameworks.
>
> Burbea explores how conventional truths shape our experience, examining concepts like willpower, discipline, and sacrifice through both etymological and phenomenological lenses. He suggests that what appears as mere willpower might better be understood as eros for the sacred, calling of the daemon, or duty to the angel. The talk delves into how eros itself can have ontological disclosure value, drawing on contemporary theology to argue that emotions and desire—traditionally excluded from scientific inquiry—may reveal truth when reality is understood as infinitely penetrable rather than independently existing.
>
> The discussion extends to fundamental questions about time, consciousness, and healing, showing how our ontological assumptions either open or limit possibilities for transformation. Burbea demonstrates how soul-making dharma necessarily rests on sophisticated ontological foundations while remaining practically accessible through the imaginal middle way.

Let's continue on the track of ontology for a little bit, as there are several points I would like to make so we can weave them together.

The first comes up in relation to a question that someone asked: What is the difference between the imaginal middle way and the middle way of emptiness? This is an important ontological inquiry, an important ontological clarification that needs to be made here.

The middle way of emptiness was a term coined by the Buddha in the Kaccāyanagotta Sutta, which I mentioned the other day in the Pali Canon, where he answers Kaccāyana's question about right view. The Buddha says right view is his middle way, which falls between the two extreme views of "it is" or "it exists" on one hand, and "it isn't" or "it doesn't exist" on the other hand. That's his definition of the middle way. Much more commonly, what most people are familiar with is the Buddha defining the middle way as between sensual indulgence—indulgence in sense pleasures—and hardcore asceticism on the other hand.

But there's a second meaning of middle way that the Buddha used in the Pali Canon, and that second meaning became the primary meaning in the Mahāyāna teachings. Nāgārjuna and others picked up on this, and you could say the whole elaboration and profundity and sophistication and breadth of the teachings on emptiness in the Mahāyāna, Prajñāpāramitā and Vajrayāna comes really out of that couple of sentences exchange in the Pali Canon between the Buddha and Kaccāyana, where the Buddha uses the term middle way as an ontological kind of teaching. It really has to do with emptiness, although he doesn't use the word empty or emptiness in that exchange. It's still what we're talking about when we use those terms empty and emptiness.

So there's the middle way of emptiness. And then in the soul-making teachings, when we talk about the nodes of the lattice or the elements or the aspects of the imaginal, we also have something called the imaginal middle way. What's the difference between these two? Because they've got similar sounding titles, are they the same? Are they different? Well, they're different, and it's important to actually clarify this.

That element of the lattice we call imaginal middle way, we can also call "theatre-like quality," and we do, or "neither real nor not real." Those are perfectly adequate synonyms and adequate terms for what we mean by the imaginal middle way. So all three—imaginal middle way, theatre-like quality, neither real nor not real—they're all saying the same thing.

As an element of the imaginal, it is, like the other elements of the imaginal, primarily a description of the qualities of the imaginal realm. Something we notice, something noticed or empirically observed that is characteristic of images when they are more fully imaginal. That's how the whole elements teaching arose. It was really me trying to pinpoint the flavor of the terrain, the flavor of the realm, what's characteristic of the realm of the imaginal. Because it's clear to me that images that I would call imaginal had different sets of qualities and implications and aspects than images used in other ways or in other systems, whether it's Ridwan or other psychologies or other approaches.

I was trying to designate, to pinpoint what's the difference. As such, what was involved was simply a sort of hanging out with an image in the mundus imaginalis, in the imaginal realm—and even that, the mundus imaginalis is Corbin's term, and so we're using it differently, the word imaginal, than he used it, which is different than how Hillman used it. But it was really hanging out and then just noticing these subtle differences or subtle characteristics of what I would call images that are more fully imaginal in contrast to images that are not really what we would call imaginal.

So it's a description, an observation, something we notice. And in that, this imaginal middle way is quite a wide designation. Theatre-like quality, neither real nor not real—it's quite broad, like the other elements. The word itself, the concept itself, the designation and pinpointing itself needs to allow room to be able to stretch. I'll come back to that in a minute—to be able to stretch, to broaden, to have soft and elastic edges. It's quite a wide designation.

In contrast, when we talk about the emptiness middle way, the middle way of emptiness that the Buddha was talking about and Nāgārjuna and others picked up on, the emptiness middle way is the result of a very careful, usually long ontological inquiry in practice and in conception. In other words, after practicing with emptiness practices or ways of looking or analytical practices, after really thinking it through and thinking it through in a very subtle way, and bringing together philosophy with practice and conceptual work, meditative practice and conceptual work, what results is the middle way of emptiness. It's the result of that ontological inquiry.

While we can and we do entertain various ontological systems and conceptual frameworks when we practice the imaginal and sensing the soul, there is not one ontology or ontological view that we are aiming towards, that we are hoping to arrive at or adopting exclusively. The imaginal middle way leaves ontological inquiry out of the forefront of imaginal practice and sensing the soul practice.

So emptiness and the middle way is a result of an ontological inquiry, and in imaginal practice we're leaving that aside. We might do it beforehand or around it, but the actual imaginal practice doesn't involve ontological inquiry.

And there's no one ontology that we're hoping to arrive at and claim as our definitive position. Of course, and I'll return to this, ontological inquiries may themselves become soul-making for some people at certain times. This whole question of ontology becomes very exciting for the soul, and thus images and fantasies naturally build up around and in relation to ontological inquiries and ontological ideas. It's also the case that the soul-making dynamic, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, will eventually shake up and expand whatever ontologies we profess or hold. But still, ontological inquiry is not primary in imaginal or sensing with soul practice. We are not seeking an answer to an ontological question there, whereas in emptiness practice we are. We want to come to the answer, the truth about the fact of emptiness—the universal truth there.

As emptiness practices and understandings deepen and refine, the emptiness middle way becomes clearer and in a sense narrower. It's more like a razor's edge. It's very fine, this position between "it is" and "it is not," "it exists" and "it does not," "neither real nor not real." From the emptiness point of view, the emptiness middle way becomes clearer and much more like a razor's edge. In other words, the tendencies towards nihilism—"it's not real, this isn't real, nothing's real"—on the one hand, and reification—"it's real, it is, it really exists"—on the other hand, these two extreme views that the Buddha pointed to, and which the Mahayana picks up on extensively, these tendencies are gradually diminished as we go deeper with emptiness practice and understanding. As our understanding comes closer and closer to the narrow tightrope of the middle way of emptiness.

To contrast, the imaginal middle way is not such a precise or narrow concept. Partly because the whole imaginal process admits various ontologies or ontological systems, as we've pointed out several times and illustrated in different talks. So it's less of a tightrope or a razor's edge, and more like an avenue, a wide road, a boulevard rather than a razor's edge or tightrope. Within the range of the imaginal middle way, there can be various positions of more or less reification.

The concept of the imaginal middle way, like the other concepts in soul-making dharma, has soft and elastic edges. Still, starting soul-making practice with a careful emphasis on curbing the reificationist tendency, and then only later, in time, widening the range of ontological views in play—widening the range of ontological views about image or what we're sensing with soul, exploring positions at different points on the width of that broad road of the imaginal middle way—this will be the most fruitful way to progress. This order of starting with careful emphasis on curbing the reificationist tendency and then broadening out from there slowly, gradually.

If one has in the past only reified images—and that's mostly the case for those who use images in psychological or spiritual or shamanic practice, where they're usually reified—remember, even if a person says, "Well, I'm not reifying," unless they're really making it clear that they're not reifying, you can pretty much bet that they're reifying. You may not hear that word, but it takes a lot of work to not reify something.

So if one's used images in other ways, more conventional ways—psychotherapies or spiritualities or shamanic practices—and the images have been reified, then it will be very difficult to come out of that habit of reification and move towards the other side of this wide road of the imaginal middle way, to have the facility to explore a less reified stance. If one cannot move away from the reificationist side of the road to explore the less reified road, then that whole side of the road, that whole territory of soul-making possibility won't open up.

The opposite direction of movement, from a stricter non-reifying—which is what we tend to emphasize at first—gradually to explore more reifying positions, that won't be so difficult or face so much inertia. This is because reifying is actually a normal human tendency, especially when we feel touched by an image or perception, when it matters to us, when it helps us.

A greater total territory will be accessible and open to us if we proceed gradually in this order—from emphasizing the non-reifying at first and then gradually expanding to more reified ontologies—for most people. It's all very individual, but generally speaking, this approach allows a greater total territory to become accessible if we go from emphasizing the non-reifying at first and then gradually expand to more reified ontologies that reify images more.

So the imaginal middle way, just to sum up, is really just something observed, something noticed about a quality, an aspect, a characteristic of images that are more fully imaginal. The emptiness middle way is a result of careful ontological inquiry in practice and conception. In the emptiness middle way, we're aiming for an answer, a result, to understand what that really means—it's one very narrow, razor's edge, tightrope of truth between "is" and "isn't."

In imaginal practice, we're not sticking to one ontology or ontological view, or even one ontological system. We can just as easily entertain an idea of a providential divinity, a providential dharmakāya or Buddha-nature that makes appear to us images and even events and persons in our life in response to what we need at a certain time in our path. We can entertain that kind of ontology as well as an ontology of a Buddha-nature and dharmakāya and divinity that does no such thing, that has no providence. We can equally entertain an ontology where there's no such thing as Buddha-nature or divinity or dharmakāya in any of those transcendent ways.

So we have a range of ontologies and we're not aiming at one necessarily. Ontology is not forefront in our practice. The imaginal middle way, in contrast to this narrow tightrope of truth that we're aiming for as a result of our inquiry, is a wide boulevard. We want to have freedom to take up any ontological position regarding reification at any of the points across that width of the boulevard and see what each one does.

but it might be easier if we start with the non-reification one. Because if we get too much into a habit of reifying images, it will be very hard to then open up non-reified images and all the soul realms and soul worlds that they open up.

So that's a clarification, hopefully, between the emptiness way and the imaginal way.

As far as emptiness is concerned, it's important to point out that from a strictly narrow Buddhadharma perspective, all we need to know about ontology for the sake of liberation from suffering and liberation from avijja, fundamental ignorance, is that things are thoroughly, completely empty. And that realization of emptiness needs to have woven into it, or alongside it—hopefully woven into it—an understanding that we need to respect conventional reality. There are some conventional realities that we really need to respect.

As I pointed out yesterday, if we have penetrated to that result of the emptiness Middle Way—the understanding of the thorough, deep, radical, and comprehensive emptiness of all things—if we have done that via the ways of looking approach, then ethics and karma and dependent arising of world, self, and world dependent on attitude, dependent on action, dependent on mind state, all of that is obvious and in fact woven in. It's obvious because it's woven into the very investigation into emptiness right from the beginning, as we talked about yesterday.

If we go deep enough in our inquiry into emptiness, in our penetration of the truth of emptiness, to understand the Middle Way of emptiness in its deepest and most precise sense, then we see that no-self also is just a view. We can pick it up—there is no-self—but it's just a view. It's not an ultimate truth. And the view of self becomes just as available, or available again, if you like, as the view of no-self. Emptiness is just a view. Emptiness is empty. Not-self is just a view. Self is just a view. And all of these become available as views. We are only left with ways of looking.

But from a Dharma perspective, this is all we need to know about ontology—that things are empty, because that's what liberates us from suffering and from the root cause of suffering, which is avijja. And hopefully woven into that understanding, that ontological understanding that everything is empty, we also understand the need to respect certain conventional realities, particularly around ethical consequences, karma, dependent arising in that sense. And secondly, that we have the flexibility to respect self as much as no-self, emptiness as much as not-emptiness—to not just respect but to practice and to see those ways.

So that's from a strictly Buddhadharma perspective. That's actually all we need to understand ontologically.

And if you've really gone into the question of emptiness, you will realize that even a realization, a full realization of emptiness, still leaves a lot of questions about the exact ontology of different conventional realities, of different relative truths. In the history of Buddhism, there has been vehement argument about this over 2,500 years. Certainly once you get into the Mahayana and certainly in Tibet, really quite a lot of very sophisticated and hot-blooded polemic debate around all this.

You only have to look at Mipham Rinpoche from the turn of the twentieth century, just before and into the early twentieth century, and his engagements and dialogues with other traditions, including Gelug scholars, or look at some of the writings of the Karmapas, particularly the Eighth Karmapa, Mikyö Dorjé. Especially when it comes to this question of the relationship between conventional and ultimate reality, conventional truths and the truth of emptiness, the thingness of things and the emptiness of things. This is really quite a long-standing argument. And in terms of how it then applies to Tantra as well and much else, there's a lot there that's left open and open to debate.

Some of that debate, particularly some of the things that Mipham and Mikyö Dorjé got interested in, actually bears very much on what we actually understand by the emptiness of something. So some of the areas of that argument pertain to the status of tantric deities, the ontological status of tantric deities and other things. But some of it actually pertains to what does emptiness mean? And therefore, is this version of emptiness actually liberating or not?

I've gone into this briefly, but in a fair amount of detail. It's quite a central piece of the last portions of Seeing That Frees, so you can find it there, and you can also find some references there if you're interested. But the main point is that even a full comprehensive understanding of emptiness still leaves questions regarding the exact ontology of conventional realities.

We could say the same might be true of, for example, quantum physics as it goes deeper. What exactly is the ontological status, the reality status of a basic particle? We think this table is made from molecules and atoms, and those are made of protons and neutrons and electrons, and then we go down—there's even more basic particles, though an electron is classified as a basic particle still. What is the reality status, what is the ontological status of those basic particles? And it's not simple.

I mentioned the other day, Niels Bohr, one of the founders of quantum physics and a Nobel Prize winner, said everything we think of as real is made up of things that we cannot think of as real. But now, even more, since his death, even space and time are regarded as emergent and not fundamental phenomena. At a quantum level, they emerge, they're constructions, and in some sense also dependent on the observer. Einstein did some of that work with his relativity theories, and even more so at a quantum level.

So we're still left with these questions about the ontology of different conventional realities. And this is important.

When we then come to soul-making teachings, of course they cannot help stimulating such questions, or they should stimulate such questions, and they do stimulate such questions. Not for everyone, but certainly for some people. Some people will get very derisive. Some people will be too easy, perhaps too lazy and quick to just adopt a certain ontological acceptance. But it's up to them.

And I've been through all this in other talks, so I won't dwell on it too much anymore. But the questions pertain—ontological questions don't go away with regard to soul and image and soul-making. They are all empty, yes, but as I said, emptiness realization, gone all the way to the end, still leaves questions about the exact ontology of different conventional realities.

So what about the ontology of soul? This is something we've talked about quite a lot, but very briefly, just to repeat: we can define soul in a couple of ways. One is that soul is simply a kind of way of looking—or even a group of ways of looking. Soul is the collection of ways of looking that are soul-making, that open up a sense of soulfulness. That's what soul is: those ways of looking that open up the elements of the imaginal, that deliver the elements of the imaginal. Soul is just a way of looking; it's not an entity.

Or, if we want to define soul as a kind of entity, it's that entity, that instrument, that organ, so to speak, in the human being which looks in those ways—looks in those ways that open up soulfulness, that support soulfulness, that engender soulfulness and soul-making. Soul-making then, if we think of soul as an entity, is a kind of making or growing of that organ, of that instrument—a growing of its size, of its range, of its capacities, like a muscle that grows, or an organ, or a child's brain that's growing in its capacity as an entity.

So either it's not an entity—we think of it just as a kind of way of looking—or it's an entity, but that entity is just as empty as any other entity. It's just as empty as a self, and we use the language of self without too much problem in our conventional exchanges with each other, in the way we think about our lives, in the way we relate to what's actually very important in our lives. We use the language of self: "I want this, I don't want that, I really hope that, I feel this," etc.

But if we use entity language for soul, then that entity of soul is empty like self is empty. Like the aggregates are empty. Like the body is empty. Empty in itself. Empty of phenomenal existence. Empty of truly being an inherently existent thing. Vedanā is empty. Consciousness is empty. A moment is empty. All the aggregates are empty; any phenomenon is empty.

When I talked—I think it was in The Mirrored Gates—and began to talk about sensing the soul, actually playing a little bit with opening up the ontological considerations or possibilities of more reification, a bit more reification when we're practicing sensing the soul and the perceptions that come up with soul—that's a really interesting area as well.

So why bother to go into all that? Well, partly for our own purposes, in the sense that our conceptual framework, the whole logos of soul-making dharma, is really based in and on emptiness. It's based in ideas like create/discover, neither real nor not real, and all that. So it's rooted in that kind of—I would say—more sophisticated ontology, a participatory ontology, or an ontology of participation, rather than stark notions of independent existence, as if that's what qualifies for reality. It's based on a more sophisticated ontology, this whole logos, this whole conceptual framework of soul-making dharma.

But partly I'm explaining the ontology of soul—just briefly, just now repeating what I've said elsewhere—partly also to kind of proactively rebuff certain expected objections and critiques from either Buddhists who tend to think in a very narrow and common way, perhaps with not very well worked out ontology. I'm trying to rebuff certain objections and critiques: "Well, that's not Buddha-dharma if you're talking about soul. Didn't the Buddha say that's not something real, that's just metaphysical speculation? Any language of soul must be just metaphysical speculation, and it's the opposite of phenomenology," etc.

I've gone into this at great length elsewhere; I'm not going to repeat it too much now, except I will say a couple of things. So partly it's in response to that kind of somewhat typical or typically expected objection. And partly it's for our own purposes, because soul-making is necessarily rooted in a more sophisticated ontology and epistemology than the ones that most people in our culture are used to, and that our culture typically regards as simply: "This is what's real, that's not real, this is what's true," and it's because of this or that, in terms of independent existence, etc.—socially agreed upon perceptions.

It's interesting, if we just linger on this a little bit longer. Some people in the dharma, some expositions of Buddha-dharma, some explanations of Buddha-dharma, or simply of mindfulness extractions from Buddha-dharma, some people use reductionist materialism in a kind of obvious and explicit way. And they explain dharma and explain meditation and even explain liberation, perhaps, from those premises, from the premises of a sort of reductionist materialism. In other words, in terms of atoms and neurological networks, etc., and neurotransmitters and all the rest of it. And they explain what's happening in meditation and liberation as perhaps a change or even a kind of increased efficacy of, for example, neural pathways.

Other expositions of Buddha-dharma never mention atoms or those sorts of things, the components or the elements of reductionist materialism. They never mention them. They never perhaps even mention the classical scientific materialist worldview. But they try to present a more—what might seem to be a more phenomenological, let's put that in inverted commas—more "phenomenological" dharma or a more existential, existentialist dharma, and a more phenomenological existentialist idea of suffering, of what suffering is, what the problem is, and of what liberation from suffering is or might be.

The whole endeavor is given a more phenomenological or existential approach without mentioning scientific materialist elements or views. But when I explore such an approach more deeply, I quickly realize that this kind of phenomenology is very limited. There's only one way of looking that's admitted, and that way of looking supposedly sees the truth. This phenomenology assumes that all human beings, if they are honest and brave, will experience self and world in exactly this way. This is what such phenomenologies claim, and what many attempts at phenomenological philosophy and psychology do.

There's no place in this view for different ways of looking, no recognition that different ways of looking can open up entirely different perceptions and senses of self, world, and cosmos. Similarly, existentialist dharma rests on an assumption that the meaningless, flat cosmos of classical scientific materialism represents proven reality. It rests on reductionist, materialist ideas as a presumed background and basis, even when they're never explicitly mentioned.

It's interesting that this assumption—that reductionist materialist conceptions are irrevocably proven as fact—may be part of what gives some existential Buddhists their often haughty and unbudgeable arrogance that comes across in their stance and tone.

The problem with all this is that physics itself—the same scientific method that delivered that worldview starting in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—has, as it developed, begun to bring about the crumbling of that very basis. Not just physics, but also contemporary Western philosophy has contributed to this dissolution, as has Nagarjuna's dharma and the whole Mahayana understanding of emptiness—the deeper working out of what emptiness truly means.

So that whole background view and basis—never mentioned but assumed real and relied upon—is no longer tenable or certain as truth, as the reality of things. We find ourselves in an interesting place right now in terms of Western philosophy, Buddhadharma, and certainly modern science.

I think ontology and epistemology—which naturally accompanies it—are never-ending explorations and questions. Epistemology asks: How can I trust this knowledge about what's real? What do I trust? My senses? My thinking? Scripture? Other people's opinions? I've talked about this extensively elsewhere, but I want to emphasize now that ontology and epistemology represent inexhaustible explorations and questions. I don't think humanity will ever come to the end of these inquiries, their possibilities, or the questions they raise.

Because of this never-ending quality of ontological and epistemological exploration, there can be eros for it. Ontology itself, as I alluded to earlier, can become for us an erotic, imaginal other. The whole domain, the entire inquiry, the image of oneself as ontological inquirer—all of this can become imaginal. There can be soul-making arising from that erotic-imaginal relationship with the inexhaustible nature of ontology, with ontological questions and explorations.

We can become very excited about this, deeply engaged with its possibilities for the soul. Soul-making can arise from ontology, from certain ontological views—I'll return to this point. But it can also emerge in relationship to ontology itself.

I don't remember if I said this in the Four Parables of Stone and Light series, but I was thinking: if you hear someone claim, regarding ontology or epistemology, or even concerning human emotions and ethics, that they've figured it out, that they now know the answers—in any of these areas—run a mile. I would run from such a person. Whether they claim to have come to the end of ontological inquiry, epistemological inquiry, to have fully understood what human emotions are and involve, how they arise, what they can be, or to have resolved ethical questions—I would run a mile.

Equally problematic is what's perhaps just as popular these days, especially among people influenced by some recent Western philosophy: the claim that ontology and epistemology are irrelevant. "I'm not interested in ontology or epistemology. That's all metaphysics. I put that aside. It's not relevant. It's not what the Buddha taught. It's not relevant to life." From this attitude too, I would run a mile. You should run a mile. Either of these extreme positions is, to me, deeply problematic.

I'll just say it's problematic. As I said the other day, and I've pointed out several times recently, ontology and epistemology are inevitable. They're inevitable in the very fabric of our perception—not even as big philosophical rambling inquiries with all this conceptual grinding, but they are woven in. Ontological assessments, epistemological assessments, are implicitly non-verbally, non-thinkingly woven in as conceptions into every perception we have as human beings. They're inevitable. Even if they're inconcludable questions, ontology and epistemology are inevitable.

I don't know, but I have a sense really that Western philosophy went through a phase and called itself post-metaphysical. Well, we might now be in a post-post-metaphysical phase, or just about to be, or something like that. So there's a lot here, again, that can open up soul-making, that can be soul-making for us in these inquiries, but also allow more soul-making to open up. I want to come back to that, but let's just stay with this for a while and actually bring in the connection between eros and ontology.

Let me try to convey what I'm getting at here. The scientific method attempted—it started with this attempt—to exclude affect, human affect, in other words emotion and desire (which could be regarded as an affect), from the process of inquiring into truth. When the scientific method arose in the seventeenth century and really got going, it attempted to exclude affect and desire from the process of inquiring into truth. This instigated and then installed for modernity, for modern culture, a definition of truth as partly that which is independent of the affect or desire of an observer.

So it started with that—this is our modus operandi, this is how we're going to go about things. And then that became a definition of truth. It instigated it, then it installed it. So that's how we tend to think of what is true: truth is that which is independent of the affect or desire of an observer.

But if one realizes, as one goes deeper into all these things, that there is no truth independent of the observer... Again, this seems to be very much what quantum physics, as much as some people don't like that conclusion, is concluding. It's remained unchallenged for getting on for a hundred years now. Not unchallenged, but it has remained without convincing challenge at all. Some people still really don't like it. Very few people have really picked it up and inquired and opened up and looked further into its implications. But that seems to be, so far, unbudgeable.

So if one realizes there's no truth independent of the observer—similar conclusions from Western philosophies and certainly from Buddha-Dharma and emptiness and the ways of looking approach—if one realizes there is no truth independent of the observer, then the way of looking of the observer must be considered. And why then can't affect be readmitted? In my readmission of the observer and the position of the observer and what the observer does and how the observer looks, why can't I readmit affect and desire, and even eros? And perhaps they're given even equal status with any other affects. So desire and eros are given equal status with other affects. They're just all part of this idea that truth doesn't exist independently of the observer. There are just ways of looking, no ultimate truth, just ways of looking. And so there's what I see with this affect, what I see with that affect, what I see when there's eros, what I see when there's some other emotion, etc.

We can go a little bit further into this, push in a slightly different way. If the truth—put that even in inverted commas—is instead something that's infinitely penetrable... So it's not so much that there are lots of different angles on something, but it's more that truth is something infinitely penetrable, is a journey into dimensionality. And yes, we might say dimensionality and divinity—a journey of penetration, if you like, or opening to, if you want a more receptive mode, opening deeper to, opening oneself deeper to.

Then, if truth is defined that way, as infinitely penetrable and a journey, then there is no one final ultimate truth, except this general journey into more disclosures, more discoveries. And if that is what reality is—this deepening journey, never-ending journey, infinite penetrative movement—if that's what reality is, then it is exactly eros in the way that we are using that word.

Eros as we define it wants closeness, contact, wants to know, wants to connect with. And in that wanting more penetration, wanting more opening, it ignites a soul-making dynamic, and that allows more deeper penetration, the generation of more beyonds, the discovery of more facets and aspects of what it is that we're in relationship with, what our subject is, what we're penetrating.

So it's exactly eros in the way that we, in soul-making, are using that word. It's exactly eros which reveals the truth and reality. And in that case, eros is more valuable than other affects, and than an absence of affect, an emotion. You understand? Because eros has this tendency to penetrate further. And if truth is something that's infinitely penetrable, rather than just horizontally infinite in terms of perspectives around a circle, then it's exactly eros which opens it.

And that view of truth and reality does not posit truth and reality as what is independent of the observer, independent of observing. It recognizes the profound participation of the soul in creating, discovering what is disclosed.

Creating, discovering what is disclosed. To me this is an interesting development—this idea of eros as having actual ontological value, more significant and powerful epistemological and ontological value.

The theologian and philosopher John Milbank—I'm just beginning to explore his work, and I find it fascinating, particularly the overlaps and common desires between his work in what they call the radical orthodoxy movement in Catholic theology. I know his work only a little, but there's a famous book he wrote, "Theology and Social Theory," which I've just picked up. I was reading the preface to the second edition, where he wrote about "the nihilistic vision"—what he means by this flat, purposeless cosmos of scientism, scientific materialism.

He writes that the nihilistic vision "makes its conclusions from a cold reason that disallows to the moods of eros, anxiety, boredom, trust, poetic response, faith, hope, charity, and so forth, an ontologically disclosive status." This is exactly what I was saying before—affect is from the start ruled out of any definition of truth. The moods and affects of eros, anxiety, boredom, trust, poetic response, faith, hope, charity are disallowed any ontologically disclosive status. They don't reveal anything to us. They don't open for us any knowledge about anything that's real. Ontologically, they disclose nothing.

But if our ontology admits a category of the real which includes our participation and creativity, our poetic response as well, then eros—and secondarily other emotions like those Milbank listed—does disclose or open up to us the truth, or we could say truths, or truth as a journey into infinitely penetrable truth, as I explained. To me this is really, really interesting.

The second point in the scientific method's starting assumptions—what was initially axiomatic in terms of methodological approach but then spread from methodological technique to become an unquestioned assumption about reality—concerns the ruling out of affect and desire. Truth becomes only what is observed in the absence of affect and desire. This has been questioned from other directions as well, but I first encountered a particular critique in reading Catherine Pickstock's book "After Writing." I found it quite difficult to read, but she's a colleague of John Milbank, and she makes the point that Descartes, one of the founders of the scientific method, defined reality as that which is clear, discrete, and easily comprehended by the mind.

That definition or delineation of objects to be investigated—what is reality? It's what's clear, discrete, and easily comprehended by mind. That's what we should investigate. We should forget about everything else because it's not real, and we want to investigate the real. That's what science is.

But this definition came itself to be taken as truth. Initially it was simply: these are the objects we're going to investigate—the ones that are clear, discrete, and easily comprehended by the mind. But at some point it became: this is what is true. Anything that did not fit that definition was regarded as untrue, unreal, and unworthy of attention.

You can see this again in quantum physics or relativistic physics. If someone tries to say that the really simple, clear, discrete things easily comprehended are these little billiard balls of basic particles, or things like space and time as Newton defined them—absolute space, absolute time, just kind of there, a big empty space not doing anything, not affected by anything, with time just flowing—these little billiard balls seem like the simplest, most discrete, clear things, very easy to understand.

But starting from Descartes' view, quantum physics has completely overturned this. If you ask someone what really is an electron, you better have a lot of patience because we don't know. The answer is definitely not simple, definitely not something that's clear or discrete or easily comprehended by the mind.

The very starting premise of this mode of investigation became a definition of truth, and when the scientific method continued along those lines, it completely decimated its own starting point and definition.

For our purposes, I want to say something about eros in relationship to ontology—the ontological value and place, the epistemological and ontological value of eros. Because eros, when allowed to stimulate the soul-making dynamic—and that's what we mean by eros in its larger definition—will open up exactly what does not fit inside Descartes' definition. When there's eros for an object, in relationship to it, that object begins to become more mysterious to us, less comprehensible, because it becomes unfathomable.

It becomes not discrete, because it possesses dimensionality, shading into divinity. It possesses soft and elastic edges. It becomes polyaspected and complex rather than single and simple. So again, it's eros that opens up exactly—or that bursts open—Descartes' definition in much the same way as physics has done.

It's interesting too, and I want to pick up on just one of those words in that little quote from John Milbank. I noted the word "boredom" there, which I found intriguing. You tend to think, oh well, that's not a very productive or creative affect or emotion. So I don't know quite what he meant, but it was there in a list of affects with truth-indicative power, truth-indicating power, with potentially ontological disclosive status. Actually, all he was saying in that quote was that it had been ruled out, but by implication, might it be there? Even boredom.

Our boredom with, for example, this sort of typical, common insistence on the hegemony of the truth of a flatly materialist cosmos—might our boredom with that idea, our boredom with this insistence that "this is the existential reality of things," a boredom with the sort of little billiard ball idea of matter, and now even of mind, a boredom with reductionist materialism—might our boredom at those views, at being inundated and surrounded by those views, being inflicted on us and oppressed by them, might our boredom be a feeling to trust, telling us that something in that picture is not right, not true?

So I don't know what Milbank meant, but that's something I was wondering. Boredom as a valid, affective and effective indicator of truth—truth, in inverted commas, if we have this more open idea of what truth is.

Actually, just lingering with that—if we conceive of truth, and again, I feel like I want to put it in inverted commas, but truth conceived more as a process, a journey, a deepening and opening that is never-ending, if we conceive it that way, and if it is eros above or as much as anything else which drives that journey and reveals or opens truth because of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, then the discoveries on the way are still valid as partial, provisional truths. They may be partial truths, but they're provisional truths.

And so we see parallels to that in science. Again, some of this overlaps with things I said in the Four Parables series. Just as in the history of science, Newton's laws of mechanics and gravitation, for example, function—they do function—very well to predict outcomes within a limited range. Within a limited range of accuracy, but also of the phenomena that we're dealing with. Newton's laws function very well to predict outcomes. It was Newton's laws that enabled us to land a rocket on the moon—very complicated mathematics working that out. And even to send probes to Jupiter or Neptune, with tremendous accuracy of prediction. It was all coming basically from Newtonian mathematics and equations.

They function very well to predict outcomes: how this cannonball will fly, exactly where this tennis ball will land, how high it will go, and so forth, within a limited range. And because of that, because they predicted outcomes so well for so long before there was stuff that didn't fit, they seemed, for so long, absolutely true—because they functioned so well to predict outcomes.

But in fact, Newton's laws are only—and does the word "law" even qualify anymore?—they're only, in fact, partially or provisionally true. They've been superseded by Einstein's special and general relativity theories, the conceptions and the equations. And so there's something in science where we see this—what we can call provisional truth. It's not like Newton's laws are completely not true or irrelevant, but they are not completely adequate beyond a certain level. It depends what we want to do, and depends also not just what we want to do or want to calculate or want to figure out or explain, but also depends on what our idea of truth is.

But we see a similar thing in Dharma. The relative truth of dependent fabrication, dependent unfabricating—it still functions. From its basis, from an understanding of "yes, if there's clinging, if there's aversion, if there's selfing to some degree, it will fabricate more; if, to the degree that I let go of clinging, let go of aversion, let go of fabricating, let go of delusion, avijjā, there will be unfabricating"—from the basis of that relative truth, we can accurately predict, as I was sharing recently, the fact that when you direct mettā at phenomena, keeping this phenomenon in your attention but directing mettā and compassion right at it as you pay attention to it, the phenomenon fades.

Or the same thing as I mentioned yesterday: if I view something as anattā as I'm paying attention to it, or any of the other three characteristics, there'll be some degree of fading. Even though fabrication and dependent origination, as we would conventionally understand them to be operating between separable phenomena—"this gives rise to that, dependent on this comes this," etc., as if they're separable and real entities, phenomena—that whole view of fabrication and dependent arising is not ultimately true. "This is fabricated by the mind," or "self is fabricated by clinging," or "this link in dependent origination is dependent on that link of dependent origination"—the twelve links as separable, real entities—that's not actually ultimately true.

But the relative truth of dependent fabrication and dependent unfabricating still functions, just as Newton's law still functions. They have a provisional truth to them. And impermanence as well is a provisional truth—a relative or conventional truth. Ultimately, neither impermanent nor permanent is true of anything, as Nagarjuna points out, because time is empty. Other reasons too.

So there's a parallel here in these three domains: science, classical dharma, and when we get into soul-making. The whole idea that conventional truths—the truths that open up through science, through the conventional truths of classical dharma, and the conventional truths of what we encounter in soul-making—these are provisional truths. They're provisional truths, but we can still have a journey, a directionality, a sort of infinite penetrability into truth in the bigger sense.

If we stay with this idea of conventional truth, something else I want to point out is that very easily conventional truths are assumed real. That's why I say conventional truths are provisional truths. It doesn't mean they're worthless. It doesn't mean they don't have a place. It doesn't mean they can't be relied on. Cause and effect reliably—if I drop something heavy on my head, it'll... Well, it's actually not such a good example, but cause and effect, conventional truth still functions. It's a provisional truth.

Provisional truth can still be relied upon to a certain extent within certain provisos, within certain limits. What happens is conventional truths are then usually assumed to be real in all kinds of ways. Conventional truths are typically assumed to be real, assumed to be ultimate truths. So that's really one thing to be very, very important, very aware of and to be concerned with. It's something I've talked about and written about so much.

There's a second thing, which is also important. I've mentioned it before, but it's really worth emphasizing again, maybe with a slightly different illustration and angle. When we assume or when we adopt a conventional truth, one question is: is it real? Is it ultimately real or is it just a conventional provisional truth? But a second question is: what does the adoption of this conventional truth lead to? When I assume and conceive and look in the terms of this conventional truth, this provisional truth, what does it open up for me and what does it close for me? What does it bar from my experience, from my understanding, from my journey, from my life and practice?

Let me give an example. Recently, I taught the jhana retreat at Gaia House, and I am very, very ill, probably in the last stages of my life, with a lot of pain, and experimenting with—the doctors are experimenting, trying to find the right medication for pain, sometimes just making me foggy and affecting me in all kinds of ways, and tired, and other times really not touching the pain very much. There's a lot of pain, there's a lot of difficulty, there's not a lot of energy. A lot of my time is spent struggling with my digestion, or on the toilet, or whatever.

And I managed, with the help of the angels I think, to teach a twenty-three-day retreat just recently at Gaia House, jhana retreat, and several people said or wrote to me something like, "Your willpower is amazing. Wow, you have such willpower." But I appreciate the affection and the kind of compliment there, though I want to just linger on this, although it sounds analytical and nitpicky.

I just want to linger on this, because if a person is conceiving of what a dying person is choosing to do and then somehow able to sustain over time, teaching every day for hours despite all the other challenges—and if one conceives of that as a result of willpower, what's that actually implying?

Willpower to me implies—what is willpower? Will. What is the will? It's a faculty of the ego or the self that can decide autonomously to do or not to do something arbitrary. In other words, what it decides to do or not do is irrelevant. You understand? It's just a matter of something called willpower. The ability, the capacity is purely a matter of the strength and steadiness of something called will.

What about love? What about love of something? What about eros again?

Does that have no place in why something is possible? Why something is sustainable? What about the call, the calling or the wish of the daemon, the demon? What about a sense of duty, a sense that honoring the demands of the angel is more important, more beautiful, more sacred than living comfortably or longer even, or living with pleasant vedanā or at least minimally unpleasant vedanā?

Of course, even before we get talking about eros and angels and soul duty and love and all that, what about just other factors like the capacity to see in different ways, the emptiness of dukkha, the emptiness of difficulty? What about qualities like patience? Patience to stay with what's difficult, what we call forbearance. It's one of the six paramis in—I think it's one of the six paramis of the Buddha religion, certainly one of the ten paramis of Mahayana. So there's a whole level that we could just look at in terms of classical Buddha Dharma teachings that's actually involved, rather than just simplifying it into this thing called will.

But what I want to emphasize more is, what about other dimensions of being? Aspects of our psychology, love, eros, again, the calling of the daemon, the sense of duty, the demands of the angel and the sense of that being more important than anything else in life. The honoring of that. That's more important, more beautiful, more sacred, as I said, than comfort or minimizing unpleasantness.

And if such a person is thinking in this way that doesn't include love, eros, the demand of the angel, the phenomenological fact of the call or the wish of the daemon, or the sense of the duty to the angel, if they are thinking without any of that, and if they are, on top of that, explicitly or even subtly, implicitly comparing—let's say themselves and their willpower to mine, and judging mine, again I want to put that in inverted commas because I don't think of it in terms of willpower really, and they're judging mine to be more, then they may be simply rather not understanding their own psychology, let alone my psychology—their own psychology or finely or accurately or carefully enough so their what seems like to them perhaps their relative absence of or their relatively weak willpower is—I say really, because otherwise they would mention it. Otherwise it would be included in how they assessed this, what seems to them, something quite remarkable, this feat of teaching through all that.

Their relative absence of something called willpower, relatively weak willpower, is really an absence of connection with their daemon, or their angel. A blocking, perhaps, somehow, of that connection and of their eros. And an inability to sense themselves as image and sense their lives with soul.

So I may come back to this, because all this actually bears on questions of ethics, on ethical choices. It applies, let's say, to ethical choices and to our individual ethos, our individual character. We may come back to this in another talk.

Now, of course, it's not that someone who has the kind of erotic relationship with a calling or a project or a creative project or an offering that they want to give or a service that they want to do, it's not that someone who has a sense of eros and duty to the angel and demands of the daemon and all that love—it's not that they will always feel that way. They always feel filled with love and eros and the juiciness of all that. So, of course, there will be times when the sense of calling, of love, eros, is not there, or is much diminished. And then there's, there may be at those times a reliance on something we could call will, or resolution, or discipline, or something. Actually, I'm going to come back to those words.

But it's like parenting or being in a long-term relationship. You know deep down that you love something, and that you're totally committed to it, and that it's meaningful and important. You know that even at the times you are not, and it's that knowledge that sustains. It's not simple willpower, it's a knowledge of the soul depth of something. Even at the time you're not feeling that love or eros so directly.

So, at the risk, considerable risk probably, of sounding anal and maybe crossing the line into some kind of pedantry about words and the words people use. If someone had said to me, or if they'd used the word discipline, on the other hand, rather than will, because will just means, from the Latin, just means I want, I want something. It's from, just to stay with the intention. Discipline, on the other hand, is related to the word disciple, and from the Latin disciplina, which means teaching, or discipulus, which is a pupil, disceres, is to learn in Latin.

If a person uses that word, or if I think about it in those terms, there's a discipline involved in staying steady and showing up and offering that despite everything, all the challenges. Discipline implies that it's not self-enclosed. It's not self-deciding. It's not totally self-instigating and self-actualizing, as the word will is. We now commonly understand, actually, both words, will and discipline. But going more into the root of the word discipline, it could open out a different sense. It implies a relationship. At least its etymology implies a relationship. An imaginal relationship, perhaps. The image of offering something. The image of being a servant, doing one's duty. The image of what one wants to offer. The image of the retreat. The image of the teachings. The image of passing something on. The word discipline, in its more etymological meaning, invokes, implies, involves relationship.

It can become imaginal relationship and humility. I have to be humble to learn from this person or that person, or this thing, or that event or situation, or this experience. I have to be humble. Something has to be greater than me—the one who teaches, the thing that teaches me. And it implies, in all that, there is implied an other, and that can become an erotic, imaginal other.

So it's possible that the whole thing becomes an imaginal constellation. If we're talking about ethics and what it takes to stay true to one's ethics—really stand firm, courageously, unmovingly, unwaveringly—it may be that there's an image of that virtue, as we touched on in the Soulmaking Dharma talks on the Four Parables retreat. The virtue itself has become image, has become imaginal. And there's other there, and I'm in erotic, imaginal relationship with that other. I'm a discipulus and humble in relation to that other.

But it also might be a work project, a certain duty, a creative art project. Etienne Souriau talks about the angel of the work, the disciple of the angel of the work, perhaps. Just opening up words now to get a fuller sense of what can be involved here, when things are difficult, when things are challenging. When we want—how our sense of things can be extended. Put it that way. And not shrunken and amputated to fit into narrow and flat psychologies and philosophies.

So the word discipline could potentially, if we look at its etymology, open up more. Another word is resolve. A person could have used the word resolve: "Oh, you have such incredible resolve." Again, we typically hear these words—discipline, resolve, etc.—just as we hear the word will, as something totally self-instigated, self-initiated, self-sustaining, self-actualizing.

But the word resolve is from Latin re solvere, which means re, again, and solvere is to loosen, to loosen again. And solvere means to loosen or to release, but one of its meanings is to free from debt. So to free from debt again. What might it mean? To free from debt to the angel again, because the angel's demands are infinite and never-ending.

So I honor the angel by trying as best as I can to discern what my duty is and to carry that out as best as I can. And it will be not an exact copy of whatever the image is, or whatever the angel seems to be completely. I will always fall short. We've talked about this before. But there's, in that resolve, I'm freeing myself from debt because I'm paying my debt. Then I'm freed from that debt—the debt to the angel, to the daimon, the duty. And re again, because it will never end. And there's another duty, and the angel is always out ahead.

Or again, if we want to open up the potential meanings here, someone might have used the word sacrifice. I think someone did. And that means in Latin, sacer facere—facere is to make, and sacer is related to sacred, holy, to make holy or sacred.

Now, this isn't about me. I really want to point—again, I want to point something out about what I started with here, which was the general point about what conventional truths are we adopting? What do they lead to? The conventional truths that we adopt, the provisional truths that we adopt—in this case about psychology—what do they lead to? What do they open up or what do they limit?

Someone thinks in terms of certain ways, in terms of words like will, discipline, resolve, thinks of them as being self-enclosed, self-instigating, etc. Sacrifice already, hopefully it's already got the hint of another level in it, because it's already got the implication of making something holy or sacred. But it can lose that—it has lost that a lot in our culture.

So this isn't about me. I want to open up something about the ways that we tend to think about our psychology, about what drives us, about what we're doing, about what makes certain things possible or not. The question is: what do these ideas, what do the truths we are grasping at and holding onto, or even just adopting, open up or not? Where do they take us?

So if we go with the etymology of sacrifice—making holy, making sacred—what's holy? What's sacred here?

Again, the angel and the angel of the work. Very often these days when I teach, I carry an image not just of contemporary practitioners and students, but of unknown future practitioners - those who will never be known to me, existing elsewhere in space and time. This future sangha becomes a sacred, imaginal other to me, sensed as sacred.

To refract that angel of the work into this plane of existence, to bring forth that refraction, is sacred. To labor for this is doing for what is sacred. Fiche - doing. Sacre - sacred. Sacrifice: doing for what is sacred. Feel it as a making sacred.

If we're accustomed to certain psychological frameworks, all this may sound pompous or grandiose, and of course there's that danger. The ego can seize upon it, reify it, and create all manner of complications. But when held in the right way, in the soul-making way, it actually opens up dimensions and distances, perspectives and possibilities. We're then fueled and supported by something very different from my will and our flatly conceived notions of motivation.

It's important to understand that there will be times - of course there are times - when one doesn't have the sense of the other, of the calling, of the eros, of the love. Then perhaps we're in a mode of simply getting through, where the sense of the other, the love, the eros, the images, is much diminished.

Here we encounter another word: commitment. In long-term relationships or parenting, one is committed. Com derives from the Latin, meaning "to put together" or "to join." When you make a commitment, you join. But what are we joining here? In partnership, in commitment to our children's education, upbringing, safety - what exactly are we joining?

We could say that in those times when it feels flat, like drudgery, when we're not seeing with a sense of soul, when there isn't the depth and eros and calling and love - when we lack that sense in the moment - what are we joining? We're joining that very flat drudgery to the knowledge of the holy. In long-term commitments, relationships, or parenting, we rest upon that knowledge. We're joining what feels like flat drudgery to the holy, joining the holy to the flat drudgery. It's connected as if by an umbilical cord, fed by that knowledge and that sense.

Even this morning, I felt the effects of medication - so tired, lacking in mental energy, deeply sleepy. How would I manage these talks? With what seemed like very reduced mental capacity, sitting in attempted meditation, at some point the ideas themselves - these very ideas I'm speaking about today - became sensed as angels.

The ideas became erotic, imaginal, other, angelic. They wanted to be communicated. These concepts, some of the things I've been exploring today, want to be shared. There's a parallel here with the notion of the ideation of the imaginal, which I introduced on the Four Parables retreat. The ideas become sensed with soul and transform into images, into imaginal images.

Even when my mind feels tired, foggy, sleepy, lacking in energy and brightness, I can sense as other - not other than me, but as other - their energy, these idea angels, these angel ideas. I can sense their energy, their brightness, their desire and eros to be made manifest. Somehow I can trust that their eros will enable that manifestation.

This question - what does a conventional truth that I'm adopting deliver? Where does it take me? What does it open up? What does it close? - reveals that selves and others and worlds and cosmoses depend on the conventional truths I entertain or adopt, and much more powerfully when I assume they're real. These truths might limit certain avenues, entire realms of opening and being, possibility, conception - all of it.

Again, willpower versus eros or daemon. It's a helpful psychological notion—psychological theories, assumptions, so-called realities. It's a helpful idea. But compared with eros and daemon, it's very much less rich. And if we just have notions of willpower, we're actually missing part of our psychology. We're totally not seeing part of our psychology.

One could even go further and try to reduce willpower. You know, there are currents of reductionism in psychology that exist. And you could try to reduce willpower to a kind of quasi-electronic circuit of intentions and vedanā. Then the question becomes whether the reactions to vedanā—either unpleasant vedanā or pleasant vedanā that are not associated with what your intention has set out to do—overpower or deflect the intention.

Someone might experience the pleasant vedanā of having a nice long rest when they could be up preparing talks or interviewing. Or the pleasant vedanā of eating something that might be pleasant in the mouth, but will later be difficult in the digestive system, which may affect their capacity to teach.

One could try to reduce willpower to this idea of a quasi-electronic circuit of intentions moving along electronic pathways and vedanā. The question becomes whether reactions to the vedanā overpower or deflect the intention. You have a series of little gates in the circuit—one, zero, zero, one; one, zero, zero, one; zero, zero, zero, one. It depends on each electronic circuit junction whether a reaction has overpowered or deflected the intention, or whether the intention has stayed true to its course.

One can have a neurological model that's something along these lines—probably a lot more complex, but something along these lines.

Does that kind of reductionist explanation constitute for us an understanding? What does it do to our lives? Does it enrich our lives?

It might help at times to frame our process, our experience, our practice in those kinds of ways. Here's an intention, here's a vedanā arising—careful with the reaction. Can my reaction be taken care of so it doesn't deflect the intention from its course or overpower it?

But that's only one conceptual framework, really—one way of looking. And the important thing I want to say right now is it misses so much else.

Even if we think and practice that way, and even if through thinking and practicing that way we're able to better stay with an intention despite many incidents of that intention encountering unpleasant vedanā or pleasant vedanā pulling it away, or thoughts and beliefs that may deflect it—even if we're able to do that so that we get to do what was important or meaningful for us because our intentions stayed steady—such a framework does nothing to illuminate what actually is meaningful to us. It does nothing to illuminate meaningfulness itself.

What is meaningfulness in such a framework? How am I going to explain meaningfulness in terms of these neural circuits and gates shutting or opening, or neurotransmitters being secreted from one neuron to another, or movement of atoms and molecules across a membrane, or electrons?

Well, we'd have to reduce meaningfulness again. What is meaningful? It's just another pleasant vedanā. It's just another one or zero. Or meaningfulness just becomes the meaningfulness node of the circuit—just another one or zero on the binary circuit computer model of the brain.

This is such a poor and impoverishing psychology. Yes, to a certain extent it might be useful—we can adapt that kind of thinking to a way of thinking about mindfulness practice—but it leaves so much out. It's poor and impoverishing as a psychology.

All this becomes really important when we talk about ethics, and I hope to do so in a few days—to talk more about ethics and virtues and reductionist, behaviorist explanations that try to reduce our notions of ethics or virtues and really decimate them into more reductive and behaviorist notions.

Charles Taylor has written about this several times—he's a Canadian philosopher. I think he's still alive, though he's pretty old now. One of the things he says in his book Sources of the Self, and elsewhere as well, is that explanations like that actually end up being of no use—I would say almost no use—for a person living life. Certainly when it comes to ethics and virtues, they're no use for a person living life. They leave out what he calls actually indispensable ideas and terms.

This is quite pernicious because we tend to think that a real understanding, a real explanation of ethical behavior or feelings about virtues or what's really going on when we're ethical or virtuous—a real explanation must be based in realities. And the only realities are the realities that natural science, basically physics, has decided are real. In other words, atoms, electrons, neutrons, protons, and all the rest of it. Everything else is not really real. So try and explain everything using those constituents.

There are so many problems with that—I've gone into this already in this talk and in other talks. But the point he makes is that for human beings, in a cosmos where there are human beings, attempts at reductionist and purely neurological explanations—which anyway always fall short of actually explaining anything—they don't explain consciousness or mind from matter. They haven't yet, and I don't think they ever will.

They actually fall short. But apart from that, for human beings in a cosmos where there are human beings, such attempts at purely neurological, purely reductionist so-called explanations don't actually form the best account. The best account means what makes sense of things. What do I need to use as a human being in order to make sense of things, in order to navigate the world of ethical choices?

And I use the term "ethical choices" in a very wide sense to include things like: here is something that feels important to me, and there are a lot of reasons why I could decide not to do it.

And all these other challenging concerns. So that's ethos ethics as well. They're provisional truths, but they're not necessarily the best accounts because they're not the accounts I can work with. I cannot talk in those terms and explain to myself in those terms of reductionist neurology in a way that makes sense to me of the choices I need to make and of what will help me make those choices and help me to carry them out and stay steady.

Just as certain notions or models in physics—it's called the standard model of particle physics—seem to be, for now (it's actually hitting some serious problems), but seem to be, for now, for us, the best account we can manage of physical reality. When we get to the human reality, they're not the best account anymore. They're simply not the best account.

So this question, this inquiry, is really important, so crucial. What does this conventional truth that I'm holding, that I'm adopting, that I'm even just entertaining—what does it lead me to? What does it bring? What are its consequences for my experience, for my sense of things, for my sense of self and world and other? So it's that question. And there's the question: am I assuming it's real? Am I actually assuming a conventional truth is an ultimate truth? Is something real? This idea, this model, this notion is actually a reality. Am I assuming that?

So two questions there. We need to be careful with assumptions, but we also need to be careful with conclusions.

Sometimes we have a notion and a model, and it does function in the way that good science functions, where a theory or a law equation in science works as a provisional truth. It works, as we said, because it has predictive power—because that notion enables you to predict something happening or occurring or unfolding, if this or this is the case, that otherwise you wouldn't have been able to predict. So it has predictive power.

An example from the soul-making logos, from the soul-making Dharma logos, would be this: we can predict, we can expect, that unless we block the soul-making dynamic, unless we block the eros, or psyche or logos is blocked in some way, we can expect that the natural process of the soul-making dynamic will begin to involve not just the imaginal object, but also the self becoming imaginal, and then also the world becoming imaginal in some kind of cosmic theosis. Or if we start with the self in other and world or whatever, that this spreading will include self, other, world—and in fact, as we've discussed many times, self, other, world, eros—all become imaginal. They become infused with the imaginal, become infected, drawn in, involved, caught up in the whole soul-making dynamic and become imaginal. That's a prediction that we can make so that we expect that it bears out.

In our practice we can notice it. In doing interviews you can notice it. You can expect it. You can look for it. And if it's not happening, it's pointing to something being blocked. And then the question is: okay, where is it blocked?

So that would be an example of a conventional truth, or a conventional notion, that has only conventional truth and still has predictive power, and therefore is a useful provisional truth, a useful provisional tool, a useful notion.

Or take the whole notion of the soul-making dynamic itself—that eros will ignite that whole dynamic so that psyche, eros in seeking more, pothos in eros in seeking more, will open up more beyonds in psyche: more images, more dimensions, more aspects. So more will be perceived. And that will inflame eros even more. And the whole process opens up even more until it pushes on logos. And I'm describing it in one order—there are many possible permutations of how it opens. Pushing on logos and then the ideation changes. Either it's stretched or shattered. And all that opens up the sense of the beloved other even more, and there's even more eros. And so the eros-psyche-logos dynamic will work like that.

Both of these predictions—that self, other, world, eros become imaginal, and that the eros-psyche-logos will galvanize each other, deepen, widen, open, complexify each other—both of those predictions come from the very basic sort of provisional truth or notion or theory: soul loves soul-making. Soul loves soul-making. Just that simple kind of axiom leads to these other levels of notions. It's all provisional truth, you could say. But there's predictive power in provisional truth, again, unless they're blocked—but in that case it points to: aha, okay, where's the block? And you can find the block, perhaps unblock it, and then you see the process happening as predicted.

So that's an example of a provisional truth being used to make valid, helpful conclusions through its predictive power.

But careful with this. Some while ago—well, in fact many times—people, in my own experience as well, find that they've independently received or arrived at or opened to the same or very similar images. Either both have similar images of one person in a dyad, or they've arrived at them independently in all kinds of ways. But it's not that one person shared an image with the other and described it, and then the other person got a sense of the image.

They arrived at them kind of separately. But the people themselves were connected in some soul-making relationship. And I'm careful of what does that imply. What does that imply?

So here's an image that's shared, and one of the perhaps tempting conclusions is that from the fact that two or more people spontaneously share the same or a similar image, it could be that the image itself, its content, should be reified. Now because we've arrived at this independently, it must mean there's something true about this image—true in the sense of real.

It doesn't need to imply that. It doesn't automatically imply that. So careful about conclusions as well. Careful about assumptions, but careful about conclusions as well.

It may imply—this fact that two or more people independently share the same or a very similar image may imply, or it's more likely that it implies—something like the fact that the citta, the mind or the soul or consciousness, is not as bound by and not as bound to the individual physical organism as we typically assume in our modern culture.

So there are two conclusions there, and to me the second is the more justifiable conclusion, or step towards a conclusion. It suggests more than a reification of images.

The imaginal middle way doesn't apply to the latter conclusion, or the suggestion that minds are not really just bound up and ending with our skin—they're not bound up with my neurons, my brain, bound to and by individual physical organisms as we tend to assume so easily in our modern culture. That may be suggesting a fact of conventional or provisional truth.

The imaginal middle way doesn't apply because we're not talking about images then. We're talking about the nature of the citta and the capacities of the citta, the boundaries of the citta. The imaginal middle way should still apply to the image, in soul-making logos anyway. So it applies still to the image, even though they've both been arrived at independently, sharing the same image or a similar image. But the imaginal middle way doesn't apply to questions about where is the boundary of the mind here? Is it just as we tend to think, within the physical organism?

Sometimes things like this happen. Many things happen, and we have to—in soul-making practice, all kinds of things happen, and it's extremely interesting. But careful of our sort of logical process and what we tend to think something implies, what the conclusions are, what's suggested by some experience that's happened.

Especially something like that, because one of the things in our culture—one of the sort of ontological and epistemological assumptions in our culture that's pretty entrenched—is that if a perception is socially agreed upon, in other words, if it's not just me perceiving something and you can't perceive it, if we—you and I and another person—perceive the same thing, then that social agreement of a perception tends to validate the reality of that perception for us.

That's one of our epistemologies: that we need to socially agree on something for it to be real. And anything that isn't socially agreed upon is not regarded as real. So that's one of our received criteria for what is real and what constitutes knowledge of the real. It's received and usually unquestioned epistemology and ontology.

So it can be tricky. Because we're sharing an image spontaneously, we tend to think, "Well, it must be real," because that's one of the criteria we tend to use for deciding what counts as real.

Let me take this point a little further about assumptions and conclusions and conventional truths. The question is: what do they lead to? What am I assuming? What am I concluding? What conventional truths am I adopting or clinging to? And what does that lead to?

We've talked about something very different. Now let me talk about the nature of time, for example, and explain something briefly.

Going back centuries and centuries—millennia, really—there were two views of time, two persistent views of time we can trace through the centuries in Western and I think also in Asian thought and Eastern thought. One of them is that time is something real. It's essentially a substance, like Newton's idea.

The other, though, is that time is essentially the product of the soul. It's something that the soul kind of creates, let's say, or co-creates.

The second point of view—that time is a product of the soul—was the view of Plotinus, who is regarded as the founder of Neoplatonism. He probably would have regarded himself just as a Platonist, but anyway. He held that point of view, and his explanation for it is that the soul is unable to grasp the contents of Intelligence. I have to explain what that word Intelligence means in this context.

Intelligence means, we could say, the attributes of Buddha-nature, or the attributes of divinity, or the attributes of the ultimate One, the angelic essences, you could say. The soul is unable to grasp the contents of that pleroma of Intelligences, those attributes of divinity.

In other words, here you have Buddha-nature, you have God, or you have the ultimate One. And just as with Dharmakāya, we could say the attributes of the Dharmakāya, there's a kind of transcendent nature beyond being and non-being, a kind of unity.

And then there's another level where the attributes of the Dharmakaya—love and compassion and power and countless other aspects—become manifest or visible at a level of reality before they become physically manifest. So there's a way that this Dharmakaya, for example, if we use Buddhist language, can be conceived as totally beyond any attributes, totally beyond even the attribute of being or non-being, one or nothing, or many.

And then another level where one can focus on the attributes of God, the names of God, the attributes of the Dharmakaya. So the soul is not able to grasp all that in one movement, in one indivisible act. Instead, it must approach them one by one, or perhaps in groups, and it must come into contact with, and behold, and get to know, and open to, and get to love, and practice manifesting those aspects of the divinity of the Dharmakaya. Let's say several at a time. Can't do it all at once. Maybe one by one, maybe several at a time.

But in so doing, it engenders time and produces the sensible world as a temporal world. Soul here really means world soul. So these hierarchies of reality where soul—world soul—engenders time. Time is a product of the soul because of its need to know and manifest those attributes of the transcendent divine, but its inability to do so in one gulp, in one gestalt. So it does so bit by bit or aspect by aspect, one by one or several at a time, and in doing so it engenders time—engenders time and also the sensible temporal world that we live in. World soul and our soul as part of, or as mimicking, the world soul.

It's a very different idea of time than absolute time as Newton would have it—independently existing time.

Now, in a very different way, the whole ways of looking approach and inquiry into emptiness that I talked about before, and that I've outlined in Seeing That Frees and other places—this phenomenological approach to emptiness and dependent arising—comes to similar kinds of conclusions. That time is a dependent arising, dependent on the way of looking. Even time, even something so basic, is fabricated. We've arrived at similar conclusions, though here we have what sounds like a very metaphysical or arbitrary metaphysical theory. I doubt that it was. I think it was probably as much something that came out of philosophical thinking as it was something that came out of meditative exploration, I'm guessing, for Plotinus and others.

And in Seeing That Frees and this phenomenological approach, ways of looking approach to emptiness and dependent arising, you have something that comes out of meditation and then realizes time is empty—the sense of time is a dependent arising. And then again, as I mentioned earlier, in recent years in quantum physics, there's also this sense that perhaps time is not a fundamental reality, but an emergent reality. And quantum reality as such is dependent on the observer.

So even within Neoplatonism, by the way, there were different points of view. Plotinus had that point of view. Iamblichus had a different point of view, a more substantial view of time, apparently. Alexander of Aphrodisias, who was actually a commentator on Aristotle, said that humans are poetae of time—the poetic creators of time. Time is part of our poiesis, and we talk about cosmopoiesis. Well, so there's a poiesis of time. So it's the subjectivity of time as its primary ontological reality, as opposed to the objective existence of time.

But what I want to ask again is, if time has no ultimately real existence, no inherent existence independent of the soul or the observer, what does that imply? What does it lead to and what does it imply for liberation? What kind of liberation does such an insight bring? What scope does it mean for what liberation means and involves? What also does it mean for soul-making? What does it mean for psychological healing?

We tend so much to think of the past caused this difficulty in the present. Time moves that way and it's an inexorable reality—time and the placement of things and the direction of causality, etc. So what does it mean then for psychological healing? Again this question: what we hold onto, what we adopt, what we grasp in terms of assumptions, conclusions and conventional provisional truths—what do they deliver? What do they open up for us and what do they limit for us?

So what becomes possible is a whole new way of approaching psychological healing, and doors that might open up—depths and areas of psychological healing that may not be reachable, possible, touchable through any other means—may be opened up, for instance, just from a different metaphysic of time. The whole notion of healing and how healing might be or what it needs or what's involved, but also a notion of human beings.

If our notion of time is not of something ultimately real, independently existing, what does that mean for a human being? What does it mean about death? I'm hoping to come back to talk about perspectives on death, different perspectives on death. But we jump so easily into very simplistic notions, all of them reified, around death and imper-manence and time. And also around a human being. A human being is someone who's born and then dies and that's it. Whatever. Or they live forever in heaven or hell or whatever it is. Too simple. Too reified.

I mean, you know, again, valid, conventionally helpful, conventionally perhaps to a certain point, but provisional truths. Maybe not the whole truth.

Well, if you can see then, you can understand what gets blocked, what avenues, what openings, what experiences, perceptions, understandings, transformations become impossible if we're entrenched in the conventional view of time.

For example, I was talking about thinking of ways of looking, practicing ways of looking, teaching ways of looking, but actually harboring this idea of some fundamental, basic, sort of nebulous flow or flux to which we apply ways of looking and get this or that appearance of this or that object, but that basic flux being real, and time with it being real. And what that then prevents us from opening to, understanding, reaching, being touched by, what vistas, what realms get prevented, how significant this is.

But if time can also be opened up that way, conventional truths about time, different conventional truths about time can be adopted. What might that do? How might that open up for us areas and questions such as psychological healing and the nature of a human being and death? Not to mention liberation and soul-making.

These are important questions, important realizations.

Okay, I think we'll stop there for today. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 227

Pain, as Void and as Sacrament

Rob Burbea · 2h34

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea offers a comprehensive exploration of working with physical pain through meditation, presenting practices that range from accessible techniques to advanced approaches that can dramatically transform our relationship with dukkha. Drawing from both classical Buddhist teachings and soul-making dharma, he outlines methods that can reduce suffering around pain, attenuate the actual intensity of painful sensations, and even sanctify pain as sacred experience.
>
> Burbea begins with foundational practices like simple mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) and spacious awareness, explaining how dropping stories, temporal extension, and reactive patterns can reduce both suffering and pain itself. He then explores more sophisticated insight practices using the three characteristics (tilakkhana) - anicca, dukkha, and anattā - as ways of looking that unfabricate painful vedanā through reduced clinging (upādāna) and ignorance (avijjā). For experienced practitioners, he presents jhāna-based techniques where pain can be transformed into pleasure by adopting the primary nimitta of different jhānic states.
>
> The talk culminates in soul-making approaches that engage pain as sacred gift and divine offering. Through personal examples from his own experience with terminal cancer, Burbea demonstrates how pain can become imaginal material for profound spiritual transformation, touching on themes of ritual, sacrifice, and the mysterious necessity of our particular sufferings. He emphasizes that while relief from pain is valuable, the deeper purposes are insight into emptiness (śūnyatā) and the opening of sacred dimensionality that transforms our entire relationship with existence.

What I would like to do today is to offer a few things that might be helpful working with pain, working with predominantly physical pain. Although some of what I'll share will also apply very well to mental pain, I want to offer approaches that may be helpful in working with physical pain in meditation. These are skills and arts that can certainly reduce the suffering around and in relation to pain, but also actually attenuate, ease pain, and reduce the actual sensations of pain. Or, as well as that, can sanctify the pain, the very unpleasant sensations, transubstantiate them, divinize them. I'll explain what's involved there and what we mean by that.

So certainly, what I want to address is meditative skills and approaches—development of those arts of meditation that can reduce the suffering that comes with pain in relationship to pain, can also reduce pain, the actual intensity of the pain, sometimes quite dramatically, and also the kind of transubstantiation, divinization, sacramentalization of pain.

I should say that I'm personally aware through direct experience and painfully aware that there are three types of pain. There's occasional pain, from sitting a really long time in meditation, repeatedly on retreat—back hurts, knees hurt, hips hurt. There's also chronically recurrent pain as a kind of second category. It's maybe not all the time in an uninterrupted way, but it keeps returning. Maybe it never fades completely. Maybe it does fade completely at times, or fade naturally and just go away. But it keeps coming back. It's a chronic feature of one's life. One has to deal with that. And then there's simply chronic pain. It's just there all the time.

What I'd like to offer here—ways of working in meditation—applies across the board to all kinds of pain. However, in the third category, where there's pain that's just chronic, it won't be possible all the time to engage some of these practices because one's life will naturally need to be busy doing other stuff, interacting with other people, working. I have to meet the world, be in the world, do in the world, in relationship and work and whatever else. And there's this pain pulling on the attention, but it's not possible to give it the wholehearted fullness of intention or the kind of skill and subtlety and sophistication of attention of some of the practices I'm going to talk about all the time. Because I'm busy doing other stuff. I can't give it the same quality of attention as I can when I'm sitting down or standing or walking to meditate.

And so, of course, thankfully now, most people, certainly in the West, and hopefully more and more in developing countries have access to pain-killing medication. Not to forget that if there's just chronic pain, because we can't be in deliberate, full-on, artful meditative attention with it all the time. But actually, what I'm talking about applies to all three categories.

Partly what I'm going to do is just briefly list a selection of practices, not an exhaustive list at all. What it is, though, is a list in a little bit of a progressive or ascending order of skill or development or art. In other words, I'll start with practices and approaches, meditative approaches that are relatively easy, relatively well-known as well, and then include more and more that are actually a lot more powerful, but also a lot more difficult to develop.

What I really want to stress, though, is that they're absolutely possible. I'm not talking about anything that's not possible. So if some of this, towards the end of the list, or even the middle of the list, sounds completely outlandish and otherworldly and impossible for a human being with a physical body to accomplish, that's just not true. It's so much a matter of finding the right ways to practice and applying oneself in the right ways and really developing one's art stage by stage.

Some of the things later in the list will depend on the arts developed in the earlier stages of the list. They build on those stages as platforms. And then what we're talking about is absolutely possible. Absolutely possible. And available, accessible to us as human beings. No reason why not.

I'm not going to go into too much detail around technique because I've done so for actually most of these practices elsewhere and either written about them in Seeing That Frees or talked about them in different talks over the years and given quite a lot of detail of technique there. But what I do want to do is mention them and give some explanations of what we need to understand here. And I also want to include soul-making practices in relation to pain, sensing pain with soul, and so forth.

So, talking predominantly about physical pain, but much that I'm saying will apply to mental dukkha as well. If you're listening at a time when mental dukkha is what's interesting to you, then see if you can see how much of what I'm offering here is adaptable. And try it. And occasionally, of course, as I go, I'll try to remember and remind and put things in terms of mental dukkha as well.

The first practice is—well, the first thing I should say is probably everyone knows after being a young child that if we tense up, if we tense our muscles with pain, it usually makes things worse. Not always, but usually makes things worse. So if there's pain, a first thing to do for working in meditation is just relax the rest of the body as much as possible, because that tensing of the musculature is only adding to the problem.

The first thing may be very obvious, but it's actually quite important—just relax the body as much as possible.

The first practice is what we might call simple mindfulness or bare attention. So we're bringing mindfulness and a kind of bare attention to the pain.

What does that mean? It means trying to drop the story around the pain—the story that goes with it of how it shouldn't be there, and why me, and maybe I'll be a cripple the rest of my life, or whatever it is. Whether it's "I am this way" or "it's not fair" or comparisons to other people, whatever story there is, the attempt with the way of looking we call simple mindfulness or bare attention is to drop the story. That's one of the strands of unhelpful relationship that we're trying to drop—dropping the story.

And seeing if it's possible to come, as part of dropping the story, to really come into the present moment, into bare or direct contact with the sensations of the pain. So less story—just what does this actually feel like? What does it feel like now, in this present moment? Not dwelling on how long it has been that way, how long this pain has been around, not dwelling on how long it will be or might be this way. So we're not joining the dots.

If you know the practice, I talk about sometimes about dot-to-dot, seeing how pain gets constructed—or actually, most phenomena get constructed, but certainly dukkha phenomena get constructed by joining the dots in time and joining the dots in space. So that's part of dropping the story. But really seeing: can I come in now? What does it feel like now? What's the sense of it now? What's my experience of it now? Really getting that sense in the present moment, coming back to the present moment.

What's happening, if you like, is we're jettisoning the story, but we're also jettisoning the projections of the mind into the past and the future, so that what we're relating to and what we're actually perceiving and carrying in the moment is not a temporally extended experience that's then made heavier and more difficult by that sense of temporal extension—all the way back in the past, all the way potentially in the future with the worry of all that. What it really is, is this sensation right now, these sensations right now.

It might also be possible, as an aspect of what we call mindfulness and bare attention, to even sometimes drop the label "pain." Sometimes even that word "pain," the labeling of it, starts to constitute something as pain. In other words, the label is not a neutral factor. It's not that there is something and then I label it afterwards and it would feel just the same if I labeled it "tomato" or "pleasure" or whatever. We start to realize that "pain" is actually a fabricating, constitutive factor. So part of the attempt in the way of looking that we call mindfulness, simple mindfulness or bare attention, is to see if I can drop the labeling "pain" that the mind is either doing automatically or deliberately.

Sometimes it might be labeling in a Mahasi technique way, which can be really helpful, but at a certain point it's like: hmm, maybe that labeling is actually not so helpful, because it's actually part of consolidating, solidifying, promulgating something. So that's really interesting as well.

So less story, more present moment, which means less temporal extension, less past and future and the worry that goes with that. Less construction by joining the dots in time. And I could say also in space, perhaps, but let's just stick with the time one for now. Dropping the labeling of pain, etc. And in all that, there's less reactivity, we could say. And in a way one's also trying to be less reactive. It's part of even that initial movement of just relaxing—just relax the body. See if I can be less reactive here at different levels of my being.

What this can lead to, if I just stay steady with that practice, keep trying with that practice, bringing that way of looking, the mindfulness and bare attention, is that the pain might just become—it's just sensations. It's stripped of all these other levels of story and temporal extension and all that. And it might even be stripped of the label of pain. It's just unpleasant sensations.

It might be, if the mindfulness is really strong, that even you find, even at this very basic level, that if you really sustain the mindfulness in these ways—keep dropping those unhelpful factors out: the temporal extending, the story, the labeling, the reactivity at a certain level—that if the mindfulness is really sustained and really strong and there's quite an intensity to the mindfulness, the degree of unpleasantness, which really means the degree of pain, reduces right there as I'm attending to it very carefully, very intently with the mindfulness moment after moment.

So that's what we might call the first practice. Actually, we might call it one version of the first practice, because a second way of doing that practice would be pretty much the same thing, but with a much more spacious awareness.

So in the first practice, let's say it was my back hurting, or the small of my back or my knee or something, I focus the attention in a narrow way on those sensations there and just work to support the way of looking we're calling mindfulness or bare attention —which when we unpacked it meant those things that I explained. I'm just focusing there in that small region, narrow attention, over and over, supporting and engaging that way of looking that we call mindfulness or bare attention.

But one could also do the same thing within a much, much larger space. So actually, again, relax the body, then let the awareness get really large. I mean, larger than the room that you're in, as large as up to the sky, even larger, if it's possible.

One way of really helping open up the awareness to a more spacious awareness is through listening, because sounds come from all different distances and directions. Simply give some attention to listening. If you can do that for a while, disregarding the pain entirely, that's wonderful. If you need to include the pain while opening to listening, that works too. Either way, support and allow the awareness to open up much more spaciously.

Then, as you hold the sensations of pain—the vedanā, the unpleasant vedanā—within this vast space, you'll notice they arise and pass away, flickering. As we pay closer attention, we naturally observe all kinds of qualities in their texture: the way they throb, pulse, and flicker. All of this movement means they're changing in time. This entire dance of appearing, disappearing, throbbing, pulsating, fluctuating sensations occurs somewhere in the body, but now exists within the much larger context of this vastly expanded space. The unpleasant sensations are simply a small area bubbling away within a much, much larger context.

You have to practice this to actually discover how remarkably helpful this approach can be. In a way, we could say that instead of the pain occupying perhaps ninety or a hundred percent of our awareness, it now takes up much, much less. We actually have that felt sense: here is just this small area of pain within a much vaster space. Its impact on the being, on the psyche, on the citta, becomes something relatively small within a much larger expanse.

We can stay with even this level of practice, and it can lead to very deep, beautiful places, transforming our whole sense of experience and opening up our entire perspective. Whether we practice with narrow attention, as I first described, or with this much more spacious awareness, both approaches to mindfulness or bare attention will lead to a lessening of suffering in the moment. There will be less suffering in relation to, or arising from, the pain.

I could say there is less fabrication of the suffering, because we begin to realize that the pain becomes stronger only when we look in those other ways—when we unwittingly drag in temporal extension, when we bring in our story and the "poor me" and "why me," when we engage in the kind of labeling that actually constitutes and solidifies something. It's only when we do that that the suffering intensifies. When we let go, when we drop these elements from our way of looking, we discover that suffering was stronger when those fabrications were present. When we release them, the suffering lessens.

In other words, through this way of looking—mindfulness, bare attention, whether with narrow or spacious awareness—we fabricate less suffering. There is less suffering fabricated. As we practice, there's a fairly good chance that at times there will also be less fabrication of the unpleasant vedanā itself—actually less pain, not just less suffering in relationship to the pain, but less pain too.

All these factors—bringing the self in, bringing the story in, bringing reactivity in, papañca, temporal extension, labeling—they're all fabricators of vedanā. We really want to understand this. Sometimes people speak as if vedanā is simply a given, just what it is, and all we can do is minimize the suffering—the second arrow—in relationship to it. With just this first practice, or these two versions of it, that might indeed be what we see: yes, I can minimize the suffering around it, but the intensity of the unpleasant pain remains unchanged.

As we move into other practices, that whole teaching about the two arrows—the idea that suffering is an unnecessary addition to pain—reveals itself as a provisional truth, a provisional teaching. We begin to realize that, as with the wheel of dependent origination and its twelve links, the fabrications of self, papañca, reactivity fabricate all the elements of that wheel, all the links of that chain. So as there's more fabrication—more stories of self, more "poor me," more "why me," more comparing myself to other people who I'm sure can sit comfortably—as these fabrications increase, there's more fabrication of suffering. But there's also possibly more fabrication of the pain itself, the unpleasant vedanā. We may start to see this even at this level, or it may become apparent only as we move into the next levels of practice.

Usually where there's vedanā, there's some form of clinging. Let me expand what I mean by clinging. Always where there's vedanā, there's clinging. The habitual response to pleasant or unpleasant vedanā is clinging. We try to hang on to the pleasant or get more of it, and we try to push away or feel averse to the unpleasant. Even with the so-called neutral vedanā—neither pleasant nor unpleasant—we tend to fall asleep, and actually there's a kind of clinging in that too.

Or get dull, disinterested, bored, uninterested.

So this clinging—what we want to understand is how this clinging works as a fabricator. There's one way, as I mentioned, when there's really a lot of pushing away or trying to hold on, where the pain's very strong, there's a contraction of the muscles, and that contraction doesn't help. There's also contraction of awareness that happens with clinging. And as we discussed when we talked about the second version of mindfulness with much more spacious awareness, that contraction of awareness also doesn't help. It partly increases, as we said before, the sense of how pervasive the pain is—that it's taking up the whole of consciousness, the whole of experience.

There's also a way in which we could say that a smaller awareness puts pressure on something. It's like having a gas in a container—if we squeeze that container and shrink it, the pressure of the gas will increase. The intensity, the pressure in physics, is related to the speed of the movement, the momentum, the kinetic energy of the movement. So analogously, the pain increases when there's contraction of awareness.

But there's something more fundamental than this muscular contraction or contraction of awareness. There's something more fundamental to the way that clinging works. The degree of fabrication of vedanā is dependent on clinging. More clinging, more vedanā is fabricated. Certainly it's highly obvious to most practitioners, even after they've practiced just a little bit of insight meditation: more clinging, more suffering. But another level is more clinging, not just more fabrication of suffering, but more fabrication of vedanā itself.

This level of practice is really important and it's a basic skill for everyone to develop. It may or may not, as I said, reveal this deeper level of understanding about dependent origination and the way clinging fabricates vedanā. But then there's a whole other level.

For example, there are practices such as the three characteristics as ways of looking. Again, all this is in Seeing That Frees. But practicing the three characteristics in very specific ways—really engaging them as ways of looking. Those three, or actually any emptiness way of looking. Again, many, many in Seeing That Frees. So the three characteristics are dukkha and anicca and anattā. There's what I call Dukkha Method 1 and Dukkha Method 2, and then with Dukkha Method 2, there are different variations. I'm not going into detail because I've done this in so much detail elsewhere. You can find it certainly in Seeing That Frees, and you can find recordings that talk about it.

But there are many variations, and we can talk about welcoming practice—again, both with narrow attention and with spacious attention or awareness. We can talk about directing mettā to phenomena, to dharmas. Many, many practices here, again, can be done in narrow and spacious attention.

We can talk about emptiness practices such as seeing the whole and the parts of something—let's say a pain or a region of pain—contemplating the mutual dependent rising and mutual emptiness of the whole and the parts of the pain. We can talk about the practice of not one, not many. This pain is not one, not many. And that's a way of seeing its emptiness—looking at it, attending to the pain, feeling, sensing the pain. At the same time we have this very delicate, agile, sophisticated understanding, very lightly, almost like in shorthand, very delicately in the way of looking, wrapped up in the way of looking. It's not one, not many, meaning it's empty.

And in that very beautiful, profound practice, we can again feel the pain but be aware of the emptiness of any dualities, or particularly the emptiness of the duality of pain and pleasure. We can look at the pain and analyze it with the sevenfold reasoning or other reasonings. Many, many possibilities here. Very, very powerful practices.

What we're doing there—again, most of them can be done with narrow attention focused on the pain, or with wider attention—many possibilities here, and many variations for each possibility in many cases. And what we're doing here is we're engaging a way of looking, meditatively, lightly—as I said the other day in the talk on emptiness and ways of looking—that has much less clinging in it, much, much less clinging in it.

So you can see that in the Dukkha Method 2, it's actually deliberately getting a sense, in some way or other, of the clinging in the moment—any push-pull, any aversion, any hanging on, any tension in the relationship with a phenomenon that one is attending to—and relaxing that clinging. Some of them work obviously very directly with the clinging, some much more indirectly. Or they're working with the avijjā and reducing the avijjā in the moment, in the way of looking.

So I'm attending to this phenomenon, this pain, with some degree of less clinging at some level, some aspect of clinging, and some degree and some aspect of avijjā has gone. And again, because of the map that the Buddha gave of the links of dependent origination: less clinging, less fabrication. Less avijjā, also less fabrication. As I said the other day, avijjā also is actually just another mode of clinging—it's a subtle mode of clinging. It's seen as such in Mahāyāna terminology. But this is what we're doing.

And this is what an insight way of looking is, basically. It's relating to, attending to, sensing something or other—any phenomenon whatsoever—through a lens that has, in some way or another, a little or a lot less clinging in it, a little or a lot less avijja.

And because of that, that phenomena right now, right here, right now, in this moment that I'm still attending to it, is fabricated less. The intensity of the unpleasant vedana actually starts to decrease, and sometimes dramatically so.

We can talk about a kind of hierarchy of potency of these kinds of practices in a way that's partly traced through the thread of "Seeing That Frees." As I mentioned the other day, to look at something through the lens of emptiness, understanding that it's fabricated, is much more potent as a way of looking than just looking at it as anatta, which is usually more potent than, let's say, just impermanence. And looking at it through a lens of the awareness that knows it is anatta—is not me, not mine—is usually more potent than regarding this pain as not me, not mine.

It's empty of inherent existence. It's empty of having any phenomenal self, this pain. That's even more powerful, and so forth. So there's a kind of hierarchy, and in a way, "Seeing That Frees" is loosely organized in the progression of that hierarchy of potency, just because it's actually a hierarchy of, or a progression of both meditative skill and also depth of understanding—understanding that comes from experience.

As I said the other day, I can't look at something with a way of looking that understands it's empty until I have really understood for myself that it's empty. For example, because I've seen that it's fabricated, because I've looked at it with the second dukkha method or the first dukkha method or anatta and seen that it fades—therefore it's fabricated, dependent on the way of looking. When that's seen so many times and felt, and the impact on the being felt so many times, that understanding is consolidated. Then that consolidated understanding can be engaged, can be used as a way of looking. I've moved to another level of practice there, another depth.

So there are lots of these kinds of practices, these unfabricating ways of looking, these insight ways of looking. There are lots of them, but there's also lots to them.

As I said, for example, take the dukkha method—what I call dukkha method number two—lots of variations. Or we just mentioned the anatta—not me, not mine. We can regard the pain itself, the unpleasant vedana, as not me, not mine. But we can also attend to the unpleasant vedana, the pain, at the same time we're including an awareness of the awareness of that pain, including both, and then regard the awareness of the pain—our awareness of it—as anatta.

Or, for example, the usually completely unnoticed, so to speak, unconscious intention to pay attention. Whenever we pay attention to something—I don't just mean as a deliberate "oh, right now I've really got to pay attention," or deliberately in meditation. I mean just paying attention to anything. Whenever we hear a sound, there's a movement of the attention there. If we hear a sound, there's a movement of attention towards that object. And so that attention is something that needs an intention behind it. That intention is almost always unconscious—we don't realize it, unless we're actually making an exercise of trying to pay attention. But even then, we only realize, usually, a very gross level of that intention.

In every moment of consciousness, you could say, the mind is attending to something. It has to be. In any moment of experience, which means any moment of perception, which means any moment of appearance or phenomena, the mind is paying attention. And with that, there is an intention to pay attention to that phenomena.

Now, we could, as we're attending to the pain, also include in our awareness the very, very subtle sense of the intention to pay attention. It's a very, very subtle, moment-to-moment, almost throbbing movement, very, very subtle in the mind. And we could regard that intention to pay attention as anatta, as not me, not mine.

Or we could regard our aversion—notice there's some aversion to this pain, and what if I regard the aversion, the pushing away? I'm talking about aversion, not at the level of the mind saying, "Oh, this is terrible, I wish it would go away." Just the subtle energetic pushing, energetic trying to distance oneself. We could regard that aversion as anatta. We could adopt a way of looking where the actual object includes not just the pain, but also the sense of aversion to the pain, and regard the aversion as anatta, as not me, not mine. It's a more sophisticated way of looking.

And the same if we move to a level where we're engaging a way of looking that understands empty—looking at things as empty. So there are all those possible objects: not just the unpleasant vedana, not just the pain, but also the awareness of the pain is also empty, which again means more than it's not me, not mine. It's not just not me, not mine. It's empty of phenomenal existence. That's a very, very deep level of practice and quite sophisticated awareness—sophisticated understanding, excuse me.

So to be able to do that, and again, with the intention to pay attention, with the aversion—the aversion has no inherent existence. The aversion is empty, et cetera.

So there are many objects. It's as if what we could say is that pain is a dependent arising.

Through these practices, we begin to see how pain is a dependent arising because it's dependent on the way of looking. When you start to see that you can really pay attention and engage some of these ways of looking, the pain just fades. It disappears, dissipates, dissolves—or at least it attenuates. We begin to understand that the pain, the unpleasant vedanā, is dependent on my way of looking. But it's also dependent on all these other factors: attention, my identifying with the awareness of it, and many, many more.

So we could say that pain itself is a dependent arising in that it is a constellation—many things threaded together, woven together. It's already a thicket of things, hard to separate out these elements. But meditatively, one can separate them out enough. Ultimately, they're not separable, and that's one of the real deep understandings that emptiness teaches. But meditatively, practically, in our art—in our meditative art—it's possible to separate them out enough to isolate them, to work on ways of looking that target, that pinpoint different twigs in this thicket, different thorns in this thicket, different threads in this tangle. And that starts doing something.

But really, pain is a constellation. Any or all of those elements within the constellation of what we call pain can be objects of an insight way of looking. We can practice, we can train our insight way of looking on those objects. So pain is a dependent arising fabricated by the whole constellation, and it's also a dependent arising fabricated by unskillful ways of looking at the whole constellation. Most of them are just habitual and completely unconscious. Pain itself is a dependent arising in terms of being fabricated by all these other factors of attention and whatnot. But it's also dependent on ways of looking—it's a fabrication dependent on ways of looking at that whole constellation.

There's a huge area here, and I've gone into it in lots of detail elsewhere, so I'm just listing it and unpacking a bit of the understanding right now.

A third possibility, for those of you who have developed jhāna practice to some degree, offers a quite lovely and also quite amazing way of practicing. I actually offered it on a recent Jhāna Retreat at Gaia House, and I think a lot of people were just amazed at what happened—the magic of it, and that it would be possible, and what it suggested about the nature of things, the reality of things that we believe were just givens, just primary.

As I said, oftentimes our understanding of Buddha Dharma is that vedanā is just a given. It's just what it is—this is what we're given. Unpleasant vedanā, pleasant, neither. It might vary from person to person: this person likes that sound, another person doesn't, and that might depend on history. But in the moment, it's just a given. And there's a whole other level of understanding which really understands that's actually not the case. Vedanā is not a given. Vedanā is a dependent arising, dependent on how we're looking at it in the moment, on the way of relating to it in the moment, the way of looking at it in the moment.

So here, once one's developed enough familiarity or mastery at a certain level of jhāna—wherever that is, first jhāna, fourth jhāna, whatever—then one can, if one has practiced enough with that familiarity and there's enough skill with it, actually begin to take what I call the primary nimitta of that jhāna. For example, in the first jhāna, it would be pīti. That's the dominant flavor of the first jhāna and the thing that I'm giving most attention to, the primary perception.

And if one's familiar enough and skilled enough with the first jhāna, here's this area of pain in the body. And one can just decide to see it, to feel it, to sense it as pīti—which means bliss or ecstasy or rapture, or certainly means pleasant feeling. So what was unpleasant, one just decides to see as pleasant, based on my familiarity with that perception from my jhānic experience.

And if one is skilled in the second jhāna, one can feel, sense, see this area of pain in the body as happiness. It's no longer dukkha.

It's no longer unpleasant. It has become pleasant. Its very texture and vibration is happiness. Or again, through the different jhānas, a kind of luminous stillness it can become. It's not even pleasant anymore—it's very subtly pleasant, really, but technically speaking, it's a kind of neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Actually, it's subtly pleasant. So this area of pain has just now become an area of luminous stillness. There's no pain there.

In the fifth jhāna, it has just become empty space, or it's become consciousness. If I take the primary nimitta from the sixth jhāna, it's become nothingness, and so forth.

Again, this might sound completely unbelievable, but as I said, many people who'd never even heard of this possibility before coming on retreat at Gaia House, just over three weeks' duration of retreat, began playing with this when I suggested it and found —wow, wow—this is really possible. We're, you could say, coloring the perception of an area, we're changing the perception of an area. There's a kind of magic involved, just as there will be if one really develops the insight ways of looking practice. There will be a sense of: wow, this dependent origination business is magic. There's something in this unfabricating, fabricating, dependent on the way of looking in the moment. It's really magic. It feels like magic.

Our ability to do this—to take, let's say, an area of pain in the body and to just have the intention of feeling it as pleasure, as sukha, or as pīti, or whatever it is, or as nothingness—our ability to do that strongly implies there's only one conclusion: it's empty. It doesn't exist, this pain, as a given. This unpleasant burden doesn't exist as a given, as a thing that's a kind of absolute reality independent of the way of looking. It doesn't exist only from its own side, so to speak. It doesn't have inherent existence.

When we practice this way—let's say we develop jhānas and do that, or let's say the insight ways of looking and that happens—we understand it's empty. It's a dependent arising, but dependent on the present, not just dependent on the past. Yes, this pain is dependent on my injury. Yes, this pain is dependent on my illness, whatever it is. Yes, this pain is dependent on sitting hours and hours and hours and the body getting stiff or whatever. It's a dependent arising dependent on the way of looking in the moment as well.

So we understand something, we have that insight, and we get that. We get that it's empty, it's dependent arising, and it's malleable. It's a fabrication dependent on the way of looking, and it's malleable. It's not a solid, fixed thing—not just that it's impermanent and not fixed in that way, and not solid in that way. It's actually malleable. Our way of looking shapes it, can shape it, does shape it, and with development of our skill in meditation, can shape it from pain to pleasure, and all different flavors of pleasure, in fact. Because that deep nothingness is also, in a strange kind of mystical way, a kind of pleasure. Even in its being neither pleasant nor unpleasant, it's actually a kind of pleasure.

The Buddha talks—sometimes he says, "Sometimes I teach three kinds of vedanā: pleasant, unpleasant, neither pleasant nor unpleasant. Other times I teach just pleasant and unpleasant." The two kinds of vedanā model is a more subtle teaching.

Seeing this in practice, feeling it in practice, doing it in practice, and feeling, sensing the results firsthand—that area of pain there—it's not that I'll just go and pay attention to where it feels good. I mean, that's a skillful thing to do, as we explained on the jhāna retreat as well. But I'm looking at that pain there, and that pain transforms. It is malleable. It's transformed through adopting a different way of looking at it.

So we understand that. The very understanding of the emptiness, the dependent origination, the fabricated nature and the malleability of vedanā, of perception—in this case of pain—implies the possibility. It strengthens and adds to our sense that this is possible, that perception is malleable, that vedanā is malleable.

So we do it, we understand the emptiness, the dependent origination, the malleability, and that understanding of the emptiness, the dependent origination, the malleability actually shores up our sense of the possibility and actually increases our skill. It's somehow like our very knowing of that—technically, our very knowing of the emptiness, the dependent origination, the malleability of it—when we have that knowing, there's less avijjā. Because there's less avijjā, the pain is actually more malleable, because it's avijjā which fabricates the pain, fabricates the kind of solidity.

Actually, when we're engaging, when we're confident, and we're approaching something with a way of looking that knows that it's malleable, it actually becomes more malleable. But that knowledge of malleability needs to be first dependent on our experience, as before.

It might be through these practices, through these emptiness practices, that there's no unpleasantness present at all. But it may be that we replace the pain with pleasure, or that it's replaced with a very deep fading and unfabricating of vedanā. For example, when we play with perception in a way that we're just seeing consciousness there, or we're just seeing nothingness there, there's a very deep fading, a very deep unfabricating of vedanā. It is not yet a complete unfabricating—it's not a complete cessation of perception and vedanā—but it's very deep. It's gone beyond the vedanā of pleasure, beyond the perception of pleasure.

These practices might sound esoteric, but they're really not. I'm moving through them quickly because I've talked and written elsewhere about them in detail.

There's a fourth possibility, or fourth basket of possibilities—a deeper level of possibilities. Once one has developed skill in these emptiness ways of looking and insight ways of looking, it's actually possible to look at the pain, to sense the pain—and you can listen and see how much of this will apply to all kinds of other phenomena, not just physical pain, but mental pain and other experiences as well. There are much broader lessons and broader relevance here.

Once one has really developed the art and skill in these emptiness ways of looking, one can engage an emptiness way of looking while modulating its intensity. Let's say I'm looking at something as empty, understanding that it means fabricated, or just a perception, or empty of having inherent existence—because I've done the sevenfold reasoning before and seen it many times, recognizing that it can't have inherent existence. So I'm engaging one of these deep emptiness practices, but it's as if I'm not completely putting my foot down on the insight pedal, so to speak.

In my way of looking, there's not the full amount of the tincture of emptiness insight. I'm putting in maybe half the amount. In the car analogy, I'm pressing on the accelerator, but not completely. There's a whole range of how much I can lean on the knowing of emptiness within the way of looking in any moment.

This might sound outrageously sophisticated and impossible, but it's really not. It just takes practice—practicing in a certain way. It won't come about just because I've spent ten thousand hours on a cushion trying to be mindful. I have to practice in certain ways so that this kind of artistry is developed, building up stage by stage.

What happens here is that I am engaging a deep emptiness way of looking, but I'm playing with the intensity of the emphasis on emptiness within that way of looking—how much I'm leaning on that insight of emptiness, how much I'm pressing on that pedal, how many drops of this tincture of insight are in the way of looking. Then there's some fading, but not complete fading.

If I've developed those practices, those insight ways of looking—particularly emptiness ways of looking—then when I attend to pain and look at it as empty, and I've consolidated that practice, developed it, that pain will fade and disappear. Here, I'm actually looking at it as empty, but not allowing it to completely fade.

You might think, "Well, why would you do that? Why would you bother to do that if you can have it completely fade?" This is a very interesting question, and there are two answers we could give. The first one is what I would consider the more important one, and I'll state the answer as a question.

Here's the question we started with: Why would you want to only partially fade some pain when you could completely fade it? It's dukkha, it's unpleasant. Why would you not just want to fade it completely?

The answer, in the form of a question, I would put like this: What is most sacred? What is most sacred? That's the answer to this question of why I might only want to partially fade it at times.

Now this question—what is most sacred—is actually a question only for those practitioners who know, through their own experience in meditation, through their own repeated experience in meditation and their understanding, who know this deep, complete fading of things. Who know the unfabricated, who know cessation, and the implications of deep fading—implying the total emptiness of any phenomenal reality, any experience, any appearance, any perception, any vedanā.

So this answer that I'm going to give will only really make sense to people who know about very deep fading and know personally through their experience, through having developed the practices that I've just talked about, particularly those insight ways of looking, which must be based on mindfulness and so forth.

The answer is a question: what is most sacred? If you know, and you've gone as far as that complete cessation, complete deep fading, reached the unfabricated, recognized the fabricated and therefore illusory nature of all phenomenal reality, then you're at a point when there is likely to be a hierarchy of sacredness.

Phenomenal reality is an illusion. It's a fabrication, which has this connotation of illusion and lie, as does the word "concoction," both in translations of sankhāra, in contrast to which the unfabricated, the complete fading of all perception and all vedanā, is real, is true, because it's unfabricated. It's not a dependent arising, it seems. So one is probably at that point leaning or looking at the world as the lower tier, if you like, in a hierarchy: the fabricated in contrast to the unfabricated. And the unfabricated is the true and the holy, if you like, the sacred.

But as I've explained elsewhere, we cannot stop at that point. We can go deeper in our exploration of fabrication and emptiness. I'm not going to explain it here again—it's in Seeing That Frees, and in that talk, it's a two-part talk, "Approaching the Dharma," I think it's called "Other Places," as well.

We begin to see the emptiness of fabrication, emptiness of the process of fabrication, and emptiness of time—because fabrication is a process in time. The emptiness of fabrications, the emptiness of the process of fabrication, and the emptiness of time. And all that, as we go deeper then, we start to realize the emptiness of the unfabricated, which exists in a kind of dualistic opposition with the fabricated.

If the fabricated is empty, there's not really a fabricated, then the unfabricated too, as a dualistic contrast, kind of collapses. Not as an experience, but as a duality, it's collapsed. There is no hierarchy. And we come to a deeper level of realization, deeper even than realizing the unfabricated through the cessation, the total unfabricating of the phenomenal world of perception of vedanā. We come to a deeper realization that's non-dualistic.

What opens up for us then is a sense of a world of empty, divine and magical appearances—already magical to see that they're dependent on the way of looking, dependent on fabricating in the moment. But magical at a whole other level when you also realize that fabrication too is not a real thing, and a time in which things could be fabricated is not a real thing. The whole—you're at the edge of the level of what even "magical" might possibly mean.

Now emptiness starts to have a bigger meaning than fabrication. At first they were a little bit synonymous if you follow the ways of looking approach. Now emptiness means more than fabrication. And because there's no hierarchy of holiness, of sacredness, divinity everywhere, holiness, sacredness everywhere. The world of phenomena becomes a world of empty, magical and divine appearances.

But here's where language gets so tricky, because someone could hear something like that and perhaps they only know a level—still a very lovely level of practice, but perhaps they only know that level of practice that I call the vastness of awareness, where there's a very spacious, kind of effortless-seeming awareness, and phenomena arise and pass within that vast awareness, within that space, spacious awareness, and they seem very insubstantial, these phenomena. They're just diaphanous, see-through. They're of the nature, the substance of the awareness. Some people call that the opening to the nature of mind or the realization of the nature of mind, etc.

So someone just familiar with that level of practice could say, "Yes, yes, it's a world of empty, magical and divine appearances. I know exactly what you're talking about." But no, no, no, no, no—this is really, really important. I'm talking about a whole other level.

So beautiful as those openings and those perceptions are at the level of what I call the vastness of awareness—a really, really important stage for a lot of practitioners, maybe the majority of insight meditation practitioners—we're talking now about a whole other level. As I said, this is only for people who've gone beyond that, to the total fading and cessation, to the complete unfabricated, beyond any sense of space, any sense of awareness in that sense of vastness of awareness. Any sense of phenomena arising. Any sense of all of that. Any sense of time. Any sense of the present moment. Understood the implications of that and then gone beyond even that.

So we're talking really about several quite significant stages further than this vastness of awareness of what some people call the nature of mind—realization of practice of the nature of mind, nature of awareness.

When I use—this is where, you know, the same words can be understood or used at very different levels. So here, when we understand a world of empty, magical and divine appearances...

all three of those words—empty, magical, and divine—have just very different levels of connotation. They're imbued with a very different level of understanding. I'm really stretched further there.

So, the question I asked in response to the question, "Why would you only want to half-fade when you can fully fade pain and unpleasantness?" is: What is most sacred?

If this sense of non-dualistic world of empty, magical, divine appearances means that pain—that half-faded pain, I should say, will attenuate a little bit, can't help but attenuate some—that pain is empty, magical, and divine. And I've not just gotten rid of pain; I've maybe attenuated it somewhat, but it's become empty, magical, and divine.

If I care about sacredness, and if sacredness is part of what I want—or let's say it's not, let's say at least that it's not that all I ever want is to get rid of my pain, all I ever want is a reduction in dukkha—then this level actually becomes very important.

And this ability to, based on my understanding of this non-duality between fabricated and unfabricated, which is based on my understanding of the emptiness of fabricated, unfabricated, fabrications, time, the process of fabricating, which is based on my understanding of fabrication in the first place, which is based on my practice of ways of looking—then that actually becomes the one that opens me in this moment to a beautiful sense of sacredness, deep, profound, mystical, and that touches me deeply.

I still got some pain there in that moment, but there's a whole different sense of the pain, self, and existence, if I care about sacredness.

So that, I think, is, for me, the most important answer to the question, "Why would I only want to, why would I want an incomplete fade, want this, you know, only half-fading when I could actually fade the pain completely?" I would say that's the most important answer.

But historically, there's a very related answer, but it has to do with Buddhology, the notion of what a Buddha is. And I'm only going to allude to this. I may or may not come back to it in the context of another talk at some future time.

But there's a difference—there's quite a big difference between the notion, the Theravāda notion of what a Buddha is and what a Buddha mind is and does, and a Mahāyāna notion of what a Buddha is and what a Buddha mind is and does. In other words, the Buddhologies between Theravāda and Mahāyāna are actually quite different.

And in the Mahāyāna teachings, it's said—I think I mentioned this the other day in a talk at Gaia House, I'm pretty sure—it's said only a Buddha can look at a phenomenon and thoroughly look at it, knowing its emptiness, without it completely fading. Only the non-dual—it's called gnosis, wisdom awareness—only the non-dual wisdom awareness, or jñāna in Sanskrit, only the non-dual jñāna of a Buddha is capable of fully knowing the emptiness of appearances, fully knowing in that moment the emptiness of appearances, at the same time as keeping those appearances from fading.

So that's a kind of very basic tenet in Mahāyāna teachings. It's in the Mahāyāna Sūtrālaṅkāra and the Mahāyāna Saṅgraha, a very core text of Mahāyāna teaching. Tsongkhapa, a great Tibetan teacher, founder of the Gelug school, reiterates it in his Illumination of Thought, commentary on a basic text of Candrakīrti centuries earlier. Mipham Rinpoche comes back to it from a different stream—he's a Nyingma master. So it's in the different streams of the Tibetan lineages as well.

Not a lot of people know it, though. Not a lot of people know that teaching or know just quite the import and the significance of that teaching in the Mahāyāna, for Mahāyāna philosophy. So it has to do with Buddhology.

I'm not going to go into this too much. And what is the aim of practice? So a Bodhisattva is someone who's aiming or has vowed to become a Buddha. But in the Mahāyāna, a Buddha is not someone who is then born—like the story of Siddhartha then becomes a Buddha, teaches for a while, and then dies, and just disappears because they're not reborn anymore, like an Arahant.

In the Mahāyāna version of Buddhology, a Buddha is someone who is able to be fully awakened, fully enlightened. That means no more avijjā at all, but they can be in the world. They are reborn, so to speak, or at least in most of the Mahāyāna Buddhologies, an emanation of them appears in the world—the Rūpakāya, the three bodies of a Buddha, the Rūpakāya, the emanation of the Buddha.

There's all kinds of, you know, arcane sounding and convoluted seeming and sophisticated Mahāyāna teachings that actually come back or trace, are rooted in this basic problem: How is it that if I don't have any avijjā in any moment, that I perceive anything?

Because for a normal human being, as the Mahāyāna Saṅgraha says, and those Mahāyāna texts, for a normal human being, when I look at something, when I engage a way of looking that has no avijjā in it, then that phenomenon fades. There's no perception of that phenomenon. There's less avijjā, therefore—well, there's no avijjā, therefore, no perception.

So the question is, how can a Buddha then be reborn into the world of perception? How can they be in the world, or at least an emanation of them, be in the world and help, continue to help, instead of just reaching enlightenment, teaching for a few years, and then not being reborn, and therefore not being of help?

So, with the full weight and force of their complete prajñā, paññā wisdom, insight and jñāna, their gnosis, which means no avijjā, and with no unskillful saṅkhāras, no karma of subtle craving or clinging—how can a Buddha be reborn without avijjā and without any saṅkhāras, unskillful saṅkhāras, be reborn so that they can be in the world, which means that they have to perceive, so that they can help?

To help you have to perceive, which means there needs to be a world, there needs to be a perception of a world.

So some versions: an Arahant is totally liberated, but has removed their avijjā completely, but they still have a kind of momentum of saṅkhāras, karmic momentum of saṅkhāras, that's only exhausted when the Arahant dies.

So it's a bit like a car that's been running and then runs out of petrol. And its momentum, even though it's run out of petrol, it's run out of the avidyā that would keep it going, it's still going to go for a while until the conditions are such that the friction of the road or whatever or hill makes it stop.

This represents one model for how an arahant exists in the world. Their continued existence until death is simply propelled by old karma, the stream of sankharas arising from past actions. At death, this karmic momentum is exhausted, and they are never reborn because there remains no more avijja and the stream of sankharas has been depleted.

But if you're not reborn, then you cannot help. And if you don't perceive—if you're not reborn into the world, or the world of perception is not reborn—you cannot help. Without this capacity, you cannot embody infinite compassion.

The bodhisattva in Mahayana teaching has a different aim. They seek to remain in the world with that full prajna, complete jnana—which means no avijja—while maintaining the ability to perceive simultaneously. This spawns all kinds of complicated conundrums and philosophies within the Mahayana tradition. Yet very few people understand the roots of these teachings. It's as if the Mahayana were given a kind of riddle to solve, which they did beautifully, creatively, and in various ways.

Vajrayana practice is essentially a mimicking of the Buddha mind. Tantra and Vajrayana involve this seeing of divinities and perceiving appearances as divinities. Tantric texts speak extensively about seeing the elements—earth, air, fire, and water—as divinities. "Seeing appearances as divine" is a fundamental Vajrayana phrase.

When practicing different Vajrayana methods, we can understand them as mimicking a Buddha's mind. The hope is that through this mimicry, we eventually become like a Buddha through the habit of imitation. What we're mimicking is that ability to fully know the emptiness of something while simultaneously sustaining the appearances without them fading.

Only the non-dual jnana, the wisdom awareness of a Mahayana Buddha, can fully know the emptiness of appearances without those appearances dissolving. For all the rest of us, we must either lean fully on the emptiness—in which case the appearance we're observing will fade and disappear, and perception won't be fabricated—or we must back off and allow the appearance to reconstitute.

When we play with this incomplete fading, we're actually practicing a light touching, a gentle including and emphasizing of the emptiness within our way of looking, ensuring it doesn't completely fade. In this way, we're mimicking the Buddha mind, Buddha perception. As I explained earlier, it becomes possible in that space, in that middle ground, dependent on all the insight and art of practice cultivated before, to begin perceiving all things as bliss—primordial, cosmic, divine bliss, not merely as piti.

Yes, they are pleasant, yes divine, but blessed. The bliss here means something deeper in Vajrayana teachings. The nature of all things is bliss, as the teachings declare—not simply that everything is pleasant, but that all is divine and blessed.

Dzogchen is said to contain nine levels of teaching within it. Yet it's not uncommon to encounter Dzogchen teachings, practice them, or read about them while understanding them only at the most basic level—in terms of the vastness of awareness and the so-called nature of mind. Many of the words can be employed at different levels, different depths of understanding and different stages in the art of practice: divine, magical appearances, bliss, insubstantial, empty.

There is much more here, but I won't elaborate further now. What I will say is this: through developing both our insight and our meditative art—this practice I'm describing of deliberate incomplete fading—through the gradual cultivation of our insight into emptiness and our meditative skill, we are granted both the license and the ability to fabricate for the sake of greater sacredness.

We fabricate to be touched by a sense of the sacred, of divinity, of beauty—to open to that reality, immerse ourselves in it, dwell within it. This serves sacredness and beauty and opens a completely different level of what we might call healing. There is physical healing, the fading of pain and finding relief. But there is also this divine contextualizing, this transubstantiation of pain into something magical, empty, and divine within a cosmos that is magical, empty, and divine—a universe of appearances that are magical, empty, and divine. This constitutes an entirely different dimension of healing.

The license to fabricate for this purpose and in this way is based on understanding that this represents a deeper insight. It is actually more profound than going completely into the unfabricated, than complete unfabricating. But it is only a deeper insight if we have experienced and understood that deeper or complete fading, that total unfabricating, the unfabricated itself.

If I haven't understood this completely, then merely a relative insubstantializing of pain or phenomena is not necessarily the deeper insight. But if I have gone all the way—gone completely to the unfabricated and then moved beyond that—then I understand that this partial place, this partial fading, this middle region of empty yet appearing, embodies and manifests the deeper insight. This understanding is only possible if I have gone deeper in terms of fading experience and realization.

So we have these four groups of practices: mindfulness in various forms, insight ways of looking, the playing with perception and jhanic qualities, and the deep emptiness ways of looking without complete fading—all oriented toward sacredness. There is also an entire set of practices usually called exchanging self and other, truly exchanging the happiness of self and other.

I won't say too much about that, but again, it's covered in Seeing That Frees. There's a section on exchanging self and other, and by that point, what becomes possible in this set of practices depends greatly on what one has developed through previous insight ways of looking practices and understandings of emptiness and fabrication.

Essentially, when we encounter pain or dukkha—and this applies equally to mental dukkha, hindrances, depression, or whatever arises—we begin relating to it in a completely different way. While actually in contact with this dukkha, paying attention to this experience here and now, I say: "I take on, I accept, I want this dukkha." I take it from someone somewhere else, someone I will never know or meet, to relieve them of their burden of suffering.

This involves a kind of magical thinking. We can also practice the opposite with happiness. When experiencing joy, or even just imagining a specific experience of happiness, we give that away to someone else in meditation.

Again, we're speaking not of a philosophy or way of living, but of a meditative way of looking—which means it's light, delicate, agile, and subtle. If we're working with physical pain, we remain in contact with that pain while looking at it in this particular way. By taking it on, by welcoming it in this manner, the practice relates closely to welcoming practice and certain versions of the dukkha method.

This is a very beautiful practice that connects us with others through the heart, beautiful intention, love, and compassion. It's also magical, opening so many possibilities.

When I decide to take on this suffering—this present experience of suffering—that very act lessens my normal, habitual, compulsive aversion and pushing away. I'm relaxing that aversion, which begins to attenuate the unpleasantness because there's less aversion, less clinging, and therefore less fabrication of the unpleasant. This actually makes the pain easier to bear.

If I can linger in that beautiful space where the heart is connected, the pain is somewhat eased, and I'm taking on suffering for others, I remain connected with compassion, beautiful intention, and sacrificial intention. My attention stays with the unpleasant vedanā, which attenuates as I change my relationship to it in the moment.

One can also mix this with emptiness. As the sensations become more unfabricated through this practice, I might taste unfabrication for the first time and realize their emptiness. Or perhaps I already understand emptiness from other insight ways of looking, and then I can work with these empty sensations, this empty unpleasantness, taking it on while knowing it's empty—which makes it easier to accept for the sake of others.

There are so many variations and possibilities here, such a beautiful realm of practices. This can be tremendously creative, opening up the malleability of perception and the sense of divinity in perception. By mixing love with emptiness, we move toward Buddha mind, or at least mimic Buddha mind, heading in directions that echo tantric and Vajrayana practices.

What often happens understandably when there's dukkha—mental or physical—is that the self contracts around it, becoming hard and woven around the pain. Here, we're opening up that sense of self, releasing that contraction. This is part of what's occurring in these practices.

The possibilities are vast and creative, engaging the imagination and opening pathways that are tantric, quasi-tantric, or Vajrayana-like. But there's also the possibility of imaginal practices within this realm, as I mentioned at the beginning. One possibility might be somewhat similar to exchanging self and other, related through its use of imagination and engagement with the self.

So where there's an imaginal relationship with an object, with pain, it will start to involve the sense of self. The soul-making dynamic and the imaginer will spread to include the sense of self. We can actually deliberately include the sense of self from the beginning.

Let me explore this a little more deeply. Here's this pain, here's this dukkha, here's this illness, here's whatever it is. One can have some kind of image of it as a sacrifice, or oneself as a sacrifice, as a sacrificial victim, if you like. This may be a fully blown image of a sacrifice with oneself in that role. It could also be much more subtle than that. But in some way, the pain and the suffering and the self are woven into an image of sacrifice.

This might manifest as a detailed, prominent image of being a sacrificial victim in relationship to the pain. Or it might be that the whole notion of sacrifice and sacrificial victim remains vague, not so filled out as an image but rather a kind of potent idea. Rather than paying attention to an actual image of being burnt on an altar or whatever it might be, it's actually just the notion – like a tincture – the idea of a sacrificial victim that remains vague. It might be just a kind of archetypal idea.

This archetypal sense might remain in the background while what's more in the foreground is the pain itself. The image functions more as an ideational background or a sense of a vague archetype. Or it might work through a very specific archetype – the obvious one being Christ. Perhaps there's an identification with Christ's passion, Christ on the cross.

Again, this could manifest in different ways. The image of Christ might come very much to the foreground while the pain is still there, but the image of Christ and the sense of identification becomes more prominent. Or it could work the other way – it's just in the background, the archetypal idea and sense and resonances and soul beauty of the archetype of Christ and the identification with that remains in the background, while what's in the foreground is myself, my particulars, this experience. But that has become imaginal, and partly the image of it is sustained by the background archetype.

We talked about this word "sacrifice" just the other day, very briefly, but the etymology here is "to make sacred." In Latin, it means to make sacred, to make something sacred. I'm not talking about Hollywood meanings of the word sacrifice with strange rituals on altars with blood and weird stuff that we don't understand. It might include that, but the question, as always with soul-making practice, is: is it soul-making? What's needed here? What degree of image, what degree of image in the background, what kind of image? It might be very subtle, or it might be dramatic and intense, but the question is: right now, what's soul-making?

Be careful not to buy into a gory, Hollywood, incomprehensible understanding of the word sacrifice. But in including the self in what's happening, and maybe this imaginal notion or image sense of sacrifice, sacrificial victim, then the whole thing can become imaginal. The elements of the imaginal can ignite – the divinity, the beauty – and it starts to really include the person and my particulars, and maybe even the sense of the necessity of this suffering, the necessity of this sacrifice, the necessity of this dukkha to the divine. I'll return to that.

Before I come back to it, let me say a few things about all this. Any Dharma practice should bring about a reduction of pain in the here and now, in the present. Even something like doing mettā for other beings, or compassion, or whatever it is – any dharma practice should bring about a reduction of pain, even if that's not what one is aiming for, even if one isn't trying to or isn't paying much attention to the pain, or if one is, or if one can't help including it in the attention. Any dharma practice should bring a reduction in pain to some degree.

Why? Because any dharma practice – all dharma practices, even practices like mettā – are effectively reductions in the moment of clinging. Reducing clinging brings a reduction of fabrication, and with the reduction of fabrication, the pain gets fabricated less, the unpleasant vedanā get fabricated less. So any Dharma practice should bring a reduction in pain right now – not because I'm distracting myself by paying attention to my metaphors or whatever, but actually because there's less clinging. It should bring some degree of reduction in pain, even if it's just a little bit, in the here and now, not because one is distracting oneself through practice, but because there's actually less clinging.

That's the understanding of dependent arising.

But more importantly, I think—again, what's the point here? What's the point?

The Buddha spoke about meditation, particularly jhāna, but actually all meditation, as pleasant abiding in the here and now. This being one of the reasons to practice meditation—that one is actually able to abide, to be, to dwell in a pleasant state in the here and now. Pleasant abiding in the here and now is one of the reasons for meditation, for developing meditation.

But the other reason the Buddha gave, of course, is for the development of insight and the ending of the fetters, the ending of the āsavas, liberation, nibbāna. Obviously we regard meditation as a process leading to, developing that insight so that there is at some point liberation.

This first reason he gave—pleasant abiding in the here and now—is often not so much emphasized in contemporary teachings, but it's a reason he gave: this is why we practice meditation, for a pleasant abiding in the here and now. In other words, can I abide pain-free? But also to develop insight. And that second reason, the development of insight, is actually the main point. Or rather, it's more important than pleasant abiding in the here and now.

Sometimes people say, "Well, this can't be right, what you said about fabrication and all that business about emptiness and pain disappearing and fading and not being fabricated, because the Buddha suffered from back pain. So you're telling me that it's possible not to fabricate physical pain, but the Buddha had back pain?"

But the Buddha said he could be without his back pain as an old man when he entered certain states of meditation—very deep, unfabricated states—and then the pain would disappear, unfabricate. When he moved about the world, as I said right at the beginning, when he moved around in the world and was interacting outside of that degree of meditative art and deliberate meditative attention, the pain was experienced again, refabricated again.

What's more important here, though, is that the point of these teachings—the main point of these teachings about fabricating and emptiness and learning to unfabricate—is not, or at least not primarily, to live free of pain, to live a life that just isn't touched by pain because one has learned these tricks so that one never has to experience pain anymore. This pleasant abiding is a secondary level of reason. It's important. It's a relief. We need to have some relief. We need to have that release from dukkha as much as is possible for us.

But the primary reason is not to live free of pain. Rather, it's in seeing the dependent arising, unfabricating, and therefore the emptiness of pain that there's a much more general sense, a profound sense of freedom in relation to existence that emerges for a human being. Because I see the emptiness of things—not just pain, but emptiness of everything—a much broader, deeper and more general sense of freedom in relation to the whole of existence emerges. That's more important. The insight is more important.

And that sense of existence changes, and this sense of the emptiness of all things—that has a bearing on my whole life. It influences my relationship with the whole of my life: the painful, the pleasant, how long my life is, how short my life is, how I feel about all that. It depends on this level of insight. This level of insight into emptiness changes my whole sense of things.

But I would say even more important, more primary than that, is not just this changed sense of freedom, of liberation in relationship to the whole of my life and my death. Even more important, and I'd say even more primary, is that seeing the emptiness of things deepens and opens a sense of the sacredness and mystery of all things as well. A really deep emptiness, as we talked about the other day—and actually, I talked about it on the jhāna retreat as well, and a little bit today in this talk—opens up and deepens a sense of sacredness.

And to me, that's the most primary point. Second is this profound and widespread sense of liberation in relation to my whole life and death. And then third is the very gift we're very grateful for: the possibility of pleasant abiding in the here and now, relief from pain.

To me they have a hierarchy there, which I think I mentioned also in one of those emptiness seminars, in response to a question.

But also in soulmaking practice, that again translates as... Some of these soulmaking practices—and I'll describe one in a minute, or like what I alluded to with the playing with the idea of sacrifice—they will attenuate, they will reduce the sense of unpleasantness, the amount of pain, the intensity of pain in the moment. But still, that's not the point. Soulmaking is the point when we're doing soulmaking practice.

So all this, of course, is related in the Dharma to what I said about that middle space of half-fading, that region of the spectrum of fabrication, spectrum of fading. It's also related to the exchanging self. In other words, in those practices there is a sacredness, a beauty, a divinity that we open up to.

But when we come to soulmaking practice, soulmaking is the point of soulmaking practice. This is the primary point.

And yes, secondarily, we can often experience dissolving of suffering, relief from suffering, relief from dukkha. But the primary point of soul-making practice is soul-making.

I remember recently hearing that old gospel song "Oh, Happy Days." I was listening to it—I hadn't heard it for years and years—and I realized that I had been carrying the wrong lyrics in my mind for many years. The actual lyrics are "Oh, happy days when Jesus washed my sins away," but the version I thought I knew was "Oh, happy days when Jesus walked." I much preferred my mistaken version—not "when Jesus washed my sins away," but simply "when Jesus walked." That touched me and touched my soul much more.

In other words, there was an image wrapped up in simply Jesus walking, maybe with some of his disciples. The image wasn't Jesus Christ with trumpets blaring and triumphant glory and little pink cherubs floating around with gallons of white light gushing down from the heavens. It wasn't that. It was sort of not even that distinct as an image, but in a way very ordinary looking—just Jesus as a young man walking, perhaps with some disciples and other people around, just walking. That was it.

But captured in that image of Jesus walking was all the stuff that I can't put into words: Jesus, his mercy, the mystery, the beauty, the divinity, the humility, the tenderness, the love, the compassion. When I think "when Jesus washed my sins away," it's almost like "Oh, happy days, happy because my sins are washed away"—there's a release, something for the self's process. The image I had with my wrong lyrics was just Jesus walking. There was nothing for the self's process in there. It was just the imaginal beauty of that. As I said, it was even a really subtle, vague image, but it moved me so much more than something oriented around being happy because he washed my sins away.

The gift and the grace in the image was not in washing my sins away, not in being saved—"Amazing grace that saved a wretch like me." The gift and the grace was much more mysteriously and subtly, and all the more powerfully for how mysteriously and subtly and quietly it was woven into just the image of Jesus in that sort of very earthy, humble, but divine way with all that beauty there.

So what's important in our dharma practice? Of course, you have to decide what's important for you. I'm just sharing that for me, if I put these things in a hierarchy, even in deep emptiness understanding, the most important thing is the sacredness. The freedom comes, the pleasant abiding comes, of course. But if I had to put them in a hierarchy of what the point of all this is, I would put the sacredness on the top, even above the freedom. And in soul-making practice, it's the sacredness too, and the soul-making, basically.

Just to fill out a little bit with an example from myself a few months ago: I've been in quite a lot of pain for the last few months in different ways from the cancer. So I was meditating and was in quite a lot of pain, and I just want to describe one possibility to get a little bit of a sense, hopefully to amplify and illustrate in a helpful way.

First, sitting in meditation with lots of possibilities—could have done all those emptiness things, or the jhanic thing, whatever—but at that point I was more inclined toward seeing what was possible in terms of soul-making practice, in terms of sensing the soul. That very intention invites and demands a certain poise of soul-making, which means I need to be there with my energy body awareness, I need to be there with that open and filled with that kind of sensitivity. I need to be there also with a receptivity and opportunism even around the sense of soulfulness.

Part of that poise is also confidence that it's possible that something here can be sensed with soul, that soul-making is possible in relationship to this dukkha. So there's energy body awareness, there's receptivity to the sense of soulfulness, there's a little bit of opportunism, also dependent on a kind of quiet background confidence, which is partly based on experience—or it might need to just inject a little bit of trust. There's also humility in the poise.

Here's a very challenging situation: dying of cancer, pain coming in often baffling ways and quite intense ways for long periods of time. Humility in relation to that situation, but also humility in relation to soul. That's part of what we might call the poise of soul-making—the sort of space in which the possibilities of soul-making are supported or prized. We're ready for that. Also, the knowledge that image or sensing the soul is a way of looking, something that I need to engage.

I'm not going to just be given it. I need to make sure that I take care of the elements, take care of looking in certain ways, the way of looking, and so forth.

Part of the poise also might be what we call the soul-making poise—but just slightly less fabricating. So that's one of the elements of the imaginal: just slightly less fabricating. And also the fullness of intention. The intention is soul-making—not just relief of dukkha, not just whatever else it might be.

Also, within this poise, or what I've called at other times the kind of crucible, I need to feel both the painful, difficult, or uncomfortable sensations. So I can't draw away from them. They have to be included. I need to feel them, feel the dukkha of that. I need also to feel the emotions initially as emotions. There needs to be some pathos there, some dukkha—you know, the emotions that go with this pain. I didn't understand what could help it, even physically. I was trying to stretch, wondering if it was my back, or this, or that. There's a lot of confusion, and a lot of work and time and energy going into trying to figure it out.

So there are all kinds of emotional strands and aspects within a kind of heart pathos. There's the physical dukkha and then there are the emotions. And at first I need to actually feel those emotions as emotions. Feel the dukkha there and some compassion for it. Compassion in the mix. Some amount of—really it was just spontaneous compassion that was there. This is all part of what I'm calling the poise of soul-making, or what makes the vessel, the space ready for soul-making. Part of what I have called in the past the crucible.

In other words, included in it is—we are deliberately including, I was deliberately including the emotions. They weren't super strong at that time, but even if they were, if they were super strong, that would need to be what's included. There's dukkha here, there's a kind of grief here, and so on. So it's including the emotions and a kind of softness in holding them. This is also part of the art, part of weaving that crucible or forming that crucible.

So I'm not relating to the emotions in a way that they're just becoming sensations. Nor am I relating to them and to the dukkha—their emotional and physical—as without story. When I talked about the mindfulness approach, I'm sort of relinquishing story, putting it aside, dropping story. Here, I'm not relating to it without story. So I'm actually including the story, the story of my life, the narrative of my life, the sense of myself in time. That's all part of the ingredients.

And so including the story also means including time. So I'm not just focusing on just this moment, just this now of these sensations. And the time awareness, as I'll describe as I go into explaining what happened, the time awareness actually is quite multileveled and complex. Because the time awareness included, as things opened up, it included the flow of time, it included this moment's experience of whatever was happening in this moment with the pain, and so forth. But it also included what I've described several times before as a sense of my whole life—what's this—sub specie aeternitatis, from the perspective of eternity, from the perspective of after death.

And the narrative of my life, almost like the whole narrative story of my life, viewed from, so to speak, beyond time or after death. The whole narrative of my life seen from that perspective of eternity—like it's an eternal sort of snapshot but it's got the whole narrative in it. So the time awareness involved, or that came, actually included all of that. Includes the story, includes the sense, or really the image of my life, of my whole life.

So my whole life, when it's looked at in that kind of sub specie aeternitatis, that eternality, that perspective from beyond death, is already kind of well on its way to becoming image, a fully imaginal image.

So including everything that I've just said in the poise of soul-making, including the self and the sense or image of my whole life, especially in the face of death, knowing I have a terminal diagnosis, knowing I'm dying. And this sense of self and the sense of my life is kind of circumscribed by the before life, before birth and after death times or periods. So somehow in the time awareness, there are all kinds of different senses and levels of time that we're talking about.

I may come back to this, but this relates to what I was talking about in yesterday's talk about the emptiness of time and what that might open up for us in terms of healing. I hope to come back to that in a moment.

But what came—so all these ingredients there, and then what came was a kind of sense of a ritualistic giving back of the moments of physical dukkha, the physical challenges and illnesses throughout my life. And I've had long years of chronic illnesses—a kind of ritualistic giving back of all those moments of physical dukkha, physical challenges, physical illnesses, to the divine, to the gods, to the angels.

But these gods, divinities, angels—they were not vividly seen at that moment. So we're not talking about that kind of image where they were vividly seen in the imagination. The sense of them was there, it was clearly felt, it was palpable. So they were very much a part of the image, their presence was felt, but they were not vividly seen in the imagination.

But there was this ritualistic giving back of these moments of physical dukkha and all the illness, the physical illness, moments of illness. And the sense of those sensations over a life as holy gift, sacred gift, which I was asked and agreed to bear. This was the imaginal sense that just came. All the soul-making poise and possibilities were there, and there was the receptivity and the attentiveness and a certain sense of one's whole life, sub specie aeternitatis. Somehow wrapped up in this ritualistic giving back of what I was given as sacred gift, as holy gift, which I was asked and somehow agreed to bear. It was a grace that

It was given to me. Someone had to carry this. For some reason, I didn't understand. I didn't know. And now there was, in the meditation, the handing them back with reverence. Of course, that handing back also echoed a little with the sense of dying soon, but in the meditation, handing them back with reverence and with care in this kind of ritualized, sacramental way.

The image was as if of passing back a ritual object in a ceremony. Again, this wasn't visually clear in terms of distinct, clear visual details—other images are, but this wasn't. Rather, it was the imagistic sense, the imaginal sense of the whole thing. It's part idea, part sense—not just the moment, but actually the whole of life and the whole transaction of life.

This touched my heart deeply, and the heart became very tender with it all. Peace came, and actually then pleasure in the body. Where there was pain, actually pleasure spread. So that's not the point, but there was this attenuation of the unpleasant vedanā, and pleasant vedanā came—to some degree, the reduction of the discomfort in the here and now.

But all the elements of the imaginal were there, and this sense of grace and beauty and all the rest of it. And then the painful sensations were also there. It was almost like they were still there as well as the pleasant, in this curious, mystically colored, mystically flavored mix of sensations—the painful and the pleasant. And the painful sensations became kind of like ethereal jewels floating in space, radiant jewels floating in space. And the heart bowed to all of that.

And the weariness of chronic illness—for some of you who have had chronic illness, you know just how tiring it can be for the psyche to have to deal with that day in, day out, month in, month out, year in, year out. Acute illnesses are very dramatic and, you know, both for the person going through it and also for people who love them or people around them. They stimulate a lot of interest and compassion. And there's a way in which chronic illnesses—they might be less intense sometimes, but they're asking something different of the psyche: to bear over a long time. And it can be wearying.

The weariness of the chronic illness was redeemed and given dimensionality and this divinity and eternality and meaningfulness and duty and purpose. But duty and purpose that the rational mind could not understand. I don't understand. What's my duty? What's the purpose of this? But it feels like it has a duty, a purpose to it. It feels like there's some meaning to it, wrapped up in the meaningfulness. But I cannot say what it is. I cannot understand with my logical mind what it is, what it could be. Beauty, love, lightness, the melting of the heart.

I mentioned Plotinus, this founder of Neoplatonism, the other day, and in the last years of his life he had developed some kind of illness. It's not really clear to us now what that illness was, but at any rate, he was abandoned by all his students because they feared that they would catch his illness. They feared that his illness was contagious. So I think for the last two or more years of his life, he basically lived in a kind of solitary exile.

There was one of his students who was also a doctor who stayed with him through that period, whose name I've forgotten now. But he was abandoned by the rest of his students and he lay dying. And as he lay dying, the doctor was with him, tending to him, just being with him as he died. And after he died, the doctor wrote down his last words.

Unfortunately, this doctor—which seems to be the case for doctors nowadays as well—had not very good handwriting. So it's a little bit unclear exactly, but it was one of two things that he said. Either it was a description of what he was doing as he was dying, and he said, "I'm trying to bring back or trying to give back the divine in myself to the divine in the universe." Or he said, as an instruction, "Give back the divine in yourself to the divine in the universe." And those were his last words.

Give back the divine in yourself to the divine in the universe.

And so this reminded me a little of that. We could say, oh, just awareness is divine in terms of it's the same substance, the same divine nature of mind in everyone. But that's all just like water everywhere.

It's all water. There's no difference between my awareness and your awareness and the next person's awareness. It's all just the divine substance of awareness. Once you mix it back into divinity, it's all just the same, like mixing water in water.

There's another kind of sacredness and divinity, a kind of sanctification of our personhood that we're very much interested in as human beings in soul-making practice. And that's more inclusive of our particulars and our particular narrative and our particular dukkha and the necessity—as I mentioned earlier—the necessity of our particularities and our personality and our dukkha to the Divine.

So in this sense, in this image of this kind of ritualistic giving back of these moments of physical dukkha, these physical challenges, to the divine, to the angels, to the gods, whose presence I felt but didn't really see vividly. And the sense of these sensations over a life being given to me as a grace, as a sacred gift. Because someone had to carry this for some reason I didn't understand. Something I was asked to do and agreed to do.

All of this, neither real nor not real. All of it theatre. Understood that way because it's image. But in that way, the divine in me being given back was something very personal. It wasn't just my awareness, let's say, being the same nature as everyone's awareness, universal awareness. So this, perhaps just as an illustration, one possibility.

I mentioned very briefly—we talked about time the other day and the different views of time as different conventional views of time one's adopting and what they open or close. And I mentioned that idea of the Neoplatonic idea of the soul engendering time because it wants to know the divine attributes or the level of angels or what was called intelligences or ideas or forms. It wants to know them and they are eternal and timeless and it can't grasp them, it can't know them all at once. So it engenders time. Soul engenders time so that it can know them all. But they have to be one after the other in sequence, in temporal sequence. We mentioned that the other day.

And because the self is always more than one thing or more than one way of looking at it, more than one narrative, more even than one soul narrative, because we have many angels, not just one angel, out ahead. So you could say the soul engenders time to know that particular angel, where there is this eternity of contract of being given as grace, as gift, a sacred gift, this pain. And then that's played out or stretched out over time, over fifty-something years, between birth and death. Because I also need to have times within that, other times, where I know other senses of self, other angels. Not just that one—I'm more than that. There's more to my soul than one story, one narrative, one angel. There are more angels to my soul than one. So it's just an illustration.

I don't know if we can make a summary, but there's a lot about the poise, the soul-making poise, if that's our intention for soul-making with a certain dukkha, with a certain physical pain. There were a lot of elements, a lot of aspects to that that I ran through. And then potentially this including the self, including this kind of beyond death, this sub specie aeternitatis, this view of one's whole life, one's whole narrative. So time and timeless get woven in. The way of being with the dukkha and the emotions and the story that don't cut them out, but also don't squeeze them or look at them in a way where they just become sensations. So all this is part of the crucible. And then an image, right? There's one possible illustration.

As I was reflecting on that a little later, I also wondered then, in that image sense of receiving these pains, these discomforts, these health difficulties, chronic health difficulties—in the image sense of receiving all that from the divine, from beyond or before life as part of my image, the image of me, the angel of me, the image of it as my duty to carry this for some reason, to manifest, to express it. And the image then of giving them back ritually, reverentially. And again, none of that reified—neither real nor not real, imagine a middle way, theatre-like quality.

Reflecting on all that, I reflected on a couple of things about ritual, actually. And I have to tell another little story here. There was a period after about a year... Actually, you're supposed to get, for the cancer I had, typical or standard treatment is six months of chemotherapy. And I persuaded the doctor—because I knew it was stage 4 cancer and the prognosis was very poor—I persuaded the doctor if he would just continue giving me chemotherapy after the six months. And reluctantly he agreed.

But after two more months, I actually developed an infection, what's called a sepsis, which is very dangerous, as some of you will know, when you're on chemotherapy because chemotherapy depletes your immune system. So you have this infection which could rapidly spread and just kill you because you don't have an immune system up and running strongly because the chemotherapy has knocked out your immune system.

So after about eight months of chemo, I ended up in hospital with this sepsis, and the doctor was really quite concerned, and he said, "Absolutely no more chemo," etc.

And so he said no more chemo, and I had to take a break. He didn't want to give me any more after that, which I understand—he was very concerned. It's a long story, and I won't go into all the parts of it, but I found another doctor who was willing to give me more chemotherapy. This new doctor, on the other hand, was more anxious: "You better start it soon, because if you wait too long, the cancer's just going to come back."

But in that time when I wasn't on chemo, my body also started to recover from the effects of the chemotherapy, which is really quite toxic and depleting and damaging to all kinds of organs and systems in the body. So I was beginning just to feel a little more human, a little better. It had been, as I've shared in other talks, really quite a lot of dukkha going through the chemo—not just because of its effects on my body and energy, making me feel sick with diarrhea and all the rest of it, but also, as I've shared elsewhere, just how difficult it was to go into that chemo ward and the soullessness of it.

So in this period where I had been almost three months without chemo, and some people—this doctor and others—were really anxious for me to start again, I could really feel a part of me that was saying, "I really don't know if I can." It was really hard to envision putting myself back in that soulless chemo ward and putting my body through that—primarily the soullessness.

Then I remember working with Catherine one night on soul-making practice, and I asked if we could do a ritual. I had decided I would go back to chemo, but it was a big deal—it felt like a big ask of myself. So we did a ritual one night that I devised. I can't remember exactly now, but we had a little crucible, and I cut some of my fingernails and put them in there, along with a bit of my hair, facial hair, some dead skin I peeled off, some saliva, and body hair from my arm—different body parts, as the Buddha enumerates in the Satipatthana Sutta.

I put these in the crucible and then offered this up—offered my body in anticipation and ritual preparation for re-entering chemo, trying to relate to it soulfully, in a soul-making way, in relation to the challenge and dukkha of that coming experience. We burnt those body elements, those parts of the body. There were other aspects—I included some element for my mind and perceptions, because that was what was quite difficult as well in the chemo ward: the soullessness, the plastic, the atmosphere, what people talked about and what they didn't talk about.

The point is, we made this ritual, Catherine and I did it together, and it was very beautiful. It really helped me take that next step and re-enter chemo.

But one of the things I was wondering about—especially after this image of a ritual in the "Sensing the Pain with Soul" meditation I described earlier—is this question: When does materialization in ritual actually increase and support the soul-making? And when does it decrease the soul power and the soul-making?

To me, this is a really important question, because in the meditation I described earlier in this talk, it was an image of a ritual with no action. I was just sitting cross-legged in meditation posture, just meditating. There was no materialization of anything. In the pre-chemo ritual with Catherine, there was materialization. So when does materialization enhance the soul-making and the soul power? And when does it decrease it? And why?

This parallels other questions—for instance, when you get a sense in meditation of your energy body moving in certain ways, or dancing, or vocalizing, or roaring, or whatever it is: When does it help for that to be actually materialized, concretized, acted upon? And when does it actually disempower it to do so? When does it have much more soul power, much more soul-making power, when there's no materialization, no concretization or actualization in physical reality of that image of what's happening in the energy body or what the energy body wants to do?

I think this is a really important question, and we need to be open to both approaches and able to do both artfully. But when is one going to be more helpful than the other, more soul-making, and why?

Some go back to Neoplatonism—Plotinus held that action is always inferior to contemplation. But I would disagree. We do include rituals on our soul-making retreats, and we have included movement, and hopefully will include vocalization and other practices at different times. But still there's this question of when to act and materialize, when not to, and why it helps sometimes and not others. Other times the reverse is true.

So that's one question.

This remains an ongoing question, and I find it truly fascinating. But a second inquiry emerged following that meditation experience I described—an illustration of the possibility of working with pain through imaginal sensing. I began to wonder whether giving is always a necessary ingredient of soulful ritual.

Consider the Eucharist, for example, the Catholic Mass. In that vision I described, there was receiving—the sense of being given something—and then the reverential giving back. All of it was ritualistic receiving and being given, then ritualistically offering it back, all pervaded by a sense of reverence and beauty. But I wondered: is this always a necessary ingredient for ritual? Or is it one of the more empowering elements that can enhance ritual?

I still don't know the answer, actually, but I wanted to share this ongoing inquiry with you. It is intriguing. I became curious about the word "Eucharist" itself and began exploring its etymology. Eucharist actually means thankfulness, thanks—implying a gift. Of course, there's the gift of the body and blood of Christ that one receives in the Catholic Eucharist. But there's also the gift of Christ's peace, when he says, "My peace I give unto you." Beautiful. There's the gift of that dimensional, divine, sacred peace, and all the dimensionality of what that can mean—Christ's peace given to us, "My peace I give to you."

But there's also, as far as I understand it—I didn't grow up Catholic—a gift from the congregation to each other. They give that peace they've received from Christ to one another. So there's this dynamic of giving and receiving, which is part of what I was wondering about.

It's also interesting that another word for Eucharist, or for similar ceremonies in other Christian denominations, is communion—holy communion. Communion suggests something like union with God—not so much oneness, but being together. There's communion with God and communion with the church, with the body of Christ, which also means the church itself. And so there's a giving of oneself in communion.

Another word for Eucharist is Mass, from the Latin "misa," which derives from the verb "mittere"—to send away. In English we have "dismiss," and words like "missive" or "mission." We're sent on a mission; a missive is something we send. There's a dismissal at the end of the Mass, and that's where it gets its name. You're sent away with the priest's blessing and having received the Holy Sacrament. Perhaps one interpretation is that we who have received what has been given to us in ritual—this gift from God—then go out as gifts from God to the world, to others. We're giving ourselves, passing on that gift; we become the gift that's passed on.

I don't know the answer yet. But since ritual is very much a part of soul-making practice, and I'm deeply interested in understanding what's involved and what's important in developing that dimension, this remains an ongoing inquiry. We don't have set, prescribed, formulaic rituals—we haven't so far. We've kept them very open; they're always created there and then on the retreats when we've done them. Sometimes they have spontaneous elements. We don't have one ritual or even several rituals that we repeat. So far, I like it that way, though I remain open. But I'm very interested in this question: is receiving and giving a necessary part of ritual, or is it an ingredient—a possible ingredient—that can be very empowering?

One last thing, connected to what I just said: I am actually open to the idea of developing set ritual formulae that get repeated. I'm certainly not closed to that possibility. But I do think there's something valuable in this capacity to create and discover rituals that are new, fresh for soul-making work.

Connected to that, I described that practice, that imaginal practice of sensing pain with soul. But what I really want to communicate—what I most want to illustrate—is a possibility, and to give a general sense of what may need to be involved.

Some or all of what I pointed to in terms of the poise and other elements—what I really want to say is please don't assume that imaginal practice is formulaic, that there's a formula. Sometimes it might seem that way, but for me it really needs to, I think for its full flourishing and the fullness of its possibilities, retain a sense of improvisation and creativity, opportunism and openness and flexibility.

Some of those earlier practices I described with insight, ways of looking or whatever, we could say they're more or less formulaic. Actually, even then, there are lots of improvisatory possibilities and variations. But I think when we come to imaginal practice and the art of that, we need to be careful of getting into a sort of formulaic way of thinking—first I do this, then one, two, three, like that.

It's so often the case if I'm working with someone in an interview that I have an intuitive sense at some point; it just comes that this or that needs to happen, X or Y needs to happen, or something needs to be put in relationship with this image or whatever. But that X or Y that needs to happen, or whatever it is, is often not something I've actually thought of before or mentioned in talks, or systematized in the teachings.

So to me, part of the beauty comes in the improvised, open, attentive nature of the way we approach the practice with this flexibility. And there's grace there, because when one gets an intuitive sense—oh, this needs to happen, or this needs to get emphasized, or I need to put this image in relationship with this other thing, another image, or another particular dukkha or whatever it is—and they're not things that one has thought of before or formulated, then that's part of the grace. That's part of the discover-create. It's part of the humility in relation to soul as well.

So yes, we certainly can talk about what goes into making a crucible for soul-making work with dukkha. We can talk about the elements of the imaginal. We can talk about what I called today the poise of soul-making, of readiness for soul-making. We can talk about what goes on in there, but there's not necessarily a certain order. And there might be other things that get left out or things that occur to us, that are given to us as graces.

So the whole thing really becomes an art that's partly improvised, and not just stuff that I'm doing, that's coming from my will. It's in relationship—so to speak, in relationship to soul, to angel—we are given. And part of what we're given is an intuition, or intuitions about what might be included, what might need to happen.

So yes, of course, this is part of the balance. There is a place for working, for technique, for art. But there's also the place for grace, and the other, and soul, and the infinity of soul as other, and the notion of receiving from soul what we hadn't formalized, hadn't occurred to us, hadn't figured out. It's not a technical step. So both. There's a balance. There's a straddling of those two aspects or moments, directions.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 228

The Image of Ethics (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 2h12

In this opening talk of his series on ethics, Rob Burbea argues for a radical expansion of how we approach ethical questions. Moving beyond the contemporary reduction of ethics to law, rights, and "what to do," he advocates for reclaiming the deeper question of "what makes life beautiful and worth living." Drawing on his earlier Sīla and Soul series, Burbea explores how soul-making dharma can provide a compass for ethical navigation through love and eros for virtues, rather than mere moral rules. He critiques the slide of ethics into legal frameworks and rights-based thinking, examining how this creates a "moral vacuum" lacking deeper foundations. Using examples from climate activism and historical contexts, he demonstrates the limitations of current ethical discourse. Central to his proposal is the necessity of dimensionality in ethical thinking—the sense that meaningfulness, purpose, and sanctity reside in higher dimensions that can be accessed through soul-making practice. This approach allows virtues to become imaginal realities we can approach erotically, transforming ethics from boring obligation into beautiful aspiration. Burbea weaves together themes of ontology, epistemology, and the role of disciplined eros in discerning ethical truth, suggesting that soul-making practice offers a viable foundation for contemporary ethical challenges.

Tonight I'd like to start talking about ethics and pick up some of what I was speaking about in the Sila and Soul series—I think it's nine or ten parts there. I'd like to elaborate certain elements of that and extend what we said there. So these talks on ethics are very much based on those Sila and Soul talks. They're presuming them and, as I said, elaborate on certain strands there and extend it, and I hope take it just a little bit further at least.

Ethics is one of those subjects that's infinite, that I don't think we should ever finally arrive at a full stop and answer where we're completely satisfied. So whatever I say in these talks is really just a snapshot of this time in my own studies and reflections regarding ethics and particularly regarding their connection with soul-making, dharma and practice. So it's just a snapshot now of what could be and what should be, I think, a never-ending exploration.

I'm doing it now partly because I'm concerned there won't be another chance. I hope, obviously I hope there will, but if not, or even if there is for me, that others will explore this whole area and these themes further, more deeply, more widely than I have done, and develop the soul-making dharma in lots of ways, but also in relation to ethics and the ethical aspects of directions within soul-making dharma. And that others would also study other ethical philosophies and perhaps there can be fruitful dialogue in the wider sense at some point.

Pretty much everything I say here rests on an understanding and a digestion of what I said in Sila and Soul, elaborates and extends that. I won't repeat the explanations and the vocabulary that I introduced in those talks very minimally. So I'm assuming that you're up to speed with that.

And why now? Well, because it seems obvious to me that there's an urgent need in our world at present to rethink and to reformulate ethics, to put it on a firmer foundation, to make it more coherent, to make it more central to our lives, and also to make it something beautiful, something attractive, this whole domain, this whole area of exploration. There's an urgent, urgent need for that.

And valuable and important as offering mindfulness to the world and to different demographics in society and the wider world, valuable and important as that is, I would say an even more pressing need, an even more urgent and more basic need is to open up and revivify the whole exploration of ethics and offer something there in terms of education, formulation, and practice. So that strikes me as a very urgent need.

It also strikes me after the Sila and Soul talks that I was perhaps a little too restrained there, a little too modest, if that's the right word, with respect to what I now think soul-making dharma might actually offer to the area of ethics. Sometimes people get very excited about soul-making dharma and I almost find myself taking the other pole of like, well, you know, let's see, it's not for everyone, and I tend to take the pole of the more unenthusiastic partner there. But perhaps in retrospect I was, as I said, a little too restrained, too modest regarding what soul-making dharma might offer and might inject into the discourse about ethics and how it might open it out and what it might give it and what questions it might bring to bear as well.

So in many ways this talk is questioning about what we need in ethical systems, but it's also a kind of proffering or putting forward or advocating of soul-making dharma as possibly a really potent and viable injection into the way we think about and relate to ethics—an injection into the wider society, not just soul-making dharma practitioners. So it's a little more positive as a stance, perhaps, at least I'm hoping, a little less restrained, a little less modest.

One of the things I think I touched on in the Sila and Soul talks was the very real danger that ethics, the whole area of ethics, slides or has already slid to really become a question of law and legality. So ethics as an area of philosophy has slid or is in the process of sliding to law. And the debate about ethics has slid to almost a debate about laws for the most part. Law ensuring as best as possible, whatever that might mean, that everyone's right to pursue what they want to pursue is protected, as long as it does not infringe on others' similar rights to pursue what they want to pursue in society.

So the whole debate and question, the whole way we see ethics, slides to a question of what laws do we need to put in place? Or what behavior do we need to ensure that will, in turn, ensure that, as best as possible, everyone's right to go after and do what they want to go after and do is protected, as long as, or to the degree that it doesn't infringe on other people's similar rights to pursue what they want to pursue. So that's the ideal of this kind of thinking, this level of thinking about ethics where it's really slid to a level of thinking about law, legality and rights.

And of course this makes sense and it's a good idea and historically it came—Thomas Hobbes was one of the people behind it at the time of the English Civil Wars, utter brutality and chaos and violence and bloodshed. And so thinking about ethics in this way and offering that as an idea was a really good idea and makes sense at a certain level.

But one of the things I want to point out is that it's a limited way of thinking about ethics and it will be limiting. Not to mention, of course, the fact that it's not very well implemented in our societies. The rights of the rich to pursue what they want to pursue seem protected often above the rights of the poor to pursue what they want to pursue even if they're just the rights to basic human needs, or the rights of one ethnic group over another. So it's not very well implemented, both in terms of economic status and race and other social status.

But just as important as that, it has no basis, and this is a big part of what I want to go into—there's no basis underlying that whole ideology. There's not a sufficient basis to decide between someone claiming, "This is my right to pursue this," and someone saying, "Oh, but that infringes on my right to do that." The philosophical theory, the ethical theory, just stops at this kind of unidimensional flat level of rights and law and has no deeper structure or ideation on which that level rests. And so it becomes, without basis, very difficult to actually go into certain thorny ethical difficulties. Nothing's in place to help us there.

And so ethics slides to a kind of law, and underneath that law is a kind of moral nihilism—a vacuum, a kind of moral vacuum where higher ethical sensibilities in particular, higher values and ethical discourse should or could be.

So the whole thing becomes a slide into a kind of contest or conflict between so-called rights—my right to do this, your right to do that. And there's no really good, well thought out or deep basis for deciding between these conflicting rights, or even for approaching the issue ethically at any deeper level.

One of the things I'd like to explore in these talks is asking the question: what do we need? What do we need in an approach to ethics? What do we need in an ethical philosophy? I want to use that question of what we need to help direct and navigate us through different possible ethical theories, seeing how soul-making Dharma and soul-making ethical Dharma might supply us with those needs and help us navigate what has become a kind of quagmire without signposts.

First of all, generally speaking, what we need is not primarily guidance about what to do, or guidelines and instructions—moral laws about what to do. I don't think any ethical system—utilitarianism, Kant's ethics, Habermas's open dialogue idea—is actually able to inform us or give us that information of what to do in every situation. There will always be moral antinomies, as I explained at length in the Sila and Soul talks.

Sometimes a person wants to just know what to do: "I just want to know what's right and what's wrong. Tell me what to do. Give me a list." Sometimes that need or felt need to know what to do may just be coming from a kind of ego fear. Sometimes it can be a lack of full engagement of the soul with these questions—a lack of full engagement that's actually open to the difficulties, for example, the antinomies between different values.

If I feel agitated regarding some ethical choice or ethical situation, can I tell the difference between what we might call ego—a more superficial level of my being and its concerns and agitations—and an agitation that's more rooted at a soul level, a deeper agitation? Or do I just have an aversion to any level of agitation, any difficulty, whether it's at an ego level or a soul level?

Generally speaking, I don't think that's what we actually need. Yet oftentimes that's how we think about ethics, or that's how ethics has come to be amputated as a subject. Ethics becomes: "Let's get a system or a way of thinking that will tell us what to do." And that's how the discourse has shrunk.

Rather, I think generally what we need is related more to the question: what is worthwhile? What is really worthwhile in life? What makes life beautiful? What opens up and supports and gives life to a beautiful life—what gives the beauty to a beautiful life? What brings a sense of depth to our existence, makes life worth living, makes a life really worth living, brings some sacredness—including a sense of sacredness regarding the human being, who one is, what one is as a human being?

And sacredness regarding our relationship with others, with society. And sacredness regarding our relationship with the world, the earth, with nature, with the cosmos. Because we are human beings in a cosmos. We are human beings on earth as well as human beings in society.

Actually, I think this is what ethics needs. Very generally speaking, ethics needs that. We need to think about it in a broader way. We need to approach it looking for something much broader, something which has been amputated from the whole exploration, the philosophical domain of inquiry, and the whole conversation. It's what matters in that sense—about living a life worth living, in that direction, toward a life of beauty.

This is, I think, most generally speaking, what's needed to save ethics, to redeem it, to re-elevate it, and open it out again into a really flourishing subject—an area of exploration that's actually commensurate with our problems, capable of addressing the immense problems we have now as a species and the immense problems we're causing other species and the immense problems we have in society. An ethics that's actually adequate to that task.

So very generally speaking, we need to move from the question not only of what to do, but what makes life beautiful? What makes life really a life that is worth living? What is the good, to use the ancient terminology that I talked about in Sila and Soul?

This is more than just law, and it's also more than economy. We think the economy matters because if the economy is okay, then people will be okay because then they'll be able to pursue what they want to pursue. So if we take care of the law and the economy, then within that framework, everyone can decide for themselves what they want to do and what they feel is important. We need more than that. We absolutely need more than that, and I'm not the first person to recognize this and to say something about it.

But on the other hand, I don't think it's possible anymore in modern or postmodern society to impose this or that particular belief or activity as "this is what you must do ethically to be an ethical person." We have the law for that limited area, but beyond that, it's actually no longer possible to impose any particular belief or activity from the outside.

So what matters? What makes life important?

What makes life rather deep, beautiful, meaningful, worth living? These are the questions that need opening up again, I think. And as I said, that's related to a sense of sacredness—the sacredness of the human being as well as the sacredness of the earth, the cosmos, and our social relations.

But with regard to the human being, we also have to not be completely naive. Perhaps looking back at the sixties, a lot of people felt love and flower power, and it was all a little naive in terms of what that could really accomplish without what it was supposing of human nature, and also what could be accomplished without a more sophisticated practice and philosophy. So on the one hand, not wanting to be naive about human beings and the nature of human beings, but also not wanting to be pessimistic about human beings. And I want to come back to this as one of the themes that's quite central as well.

So it's quite a big ask. And also, you know, I touched on this with Buddha Dharma as well. Just following the five precepts could be regarded as only a kind of safeguard for society. If everyone did that, then society would be a safe place that would allow people to do what they want to do. And if part of what they want to do is get awakened, then that's good on the one hand, or a kind of minimum safeguard for personal liberation on the other.

So we're really talking here about ethics as ethos, as I explained in Sila and Soul, as something that's much bigger and has to do with meaningfulness and making life beautiful and worthwhile, and that whole question, and the sense of sacredness.

So what we need is a way of navigating that area, an instrument, something like a compass. And we need training and education in how to use such an instrument. We need to open up what ethics means beyond just taking care of law and economy to try and ensure everyone's rights are not trampled on by someone else's actions. But we also can't impose "everyone goes northeast" or whatever. We need a way of navigating, methods of navigating, an instrument—something like a compass—and training, education in how to use that instrument.

So a way of orienting that's different than a prescribed direction. As I said, not "everyone go northeast." Or prescribed direction together with proscribed directions—prohibited directions—regarding material things, material activities.

Do you understand the difference there? So rather than saying this actual activity or this thing is wrong, that one is right in itself, in themselves—these things, those things, those activities, prescribe this one and we proscribe that one, prohibit that one—we need a way of orienting. It's not so much the thing in itself, the activity in itself, but a way of orienting to this whole question.

And it might be for the, let's say, the least capable in society, it may be necessary that they are limited to prescribed and proscribed directions. It may be. But there's also this question: what's innate capacity and innate limitation with regard to ethics? And what's possible with education? It's a tricky question. It has history far back as, well, before the Enlightenment when they took a certain stand on that, and they believed everyone was tabula rasa—it was just a matter of education. It's tricky.

But might it be possible for there to be a more widespread education at some point? This might sound very elitist, but might it be possible for there to be a more widespread education that offers and teaches us, trains us in ways of orienting, in practices that help us orient in the realm of ethos and opening up that sense of life and navigating well, opening up the sense of beautiful life, deep, meaningful life, and navigating well—knowing that that might be different between different people to a certain extent?

And I think part of that, part of what immediately is kind of required and suggested by that way of thinking about ethics and opening up the idea of what we're actually after there, what we actually need in the most general sense—what comes immediately is the possibility and the need for a relationship of love and of eros with the virtues, with the values, as I talked about in Sila and Soul. And as I'm going to go into in a minute, then this opens up in many ways how we can think about and explore the whole domain of ethics. Things like sins of omission start to have their place. Emotion with regard to ethics starts to have its place, but a more mature place. I'll come back to these things.

So if I think about what's my sort of wish list, if you like, for an ethical system or an approach to ethics, a way of thinking about ethics, or what do we need? What do we need? What does it seem to me that we need as a species right now in terms of approaching ethics, thinking about ethics, constructed frameworks for ethics?

I would say, partly what I've already said, that ethics needs to be more than law. More than law and more important than law. And ethics needs also to be more than just an idea of "my rights, your rights." It needs more than just an idea of our individual rights. More generally, as I said, it needs to open up beyond this whole question of what to do.

"What should I do? What's right here?" Right in a different sense. And more fundamentally, this question about how to live: What is a beautiful life? What makes a life really worth living? What gives it depth? So ethics needs to be more than law, more than that singular question, more than law, more than rights—all these elements are interconnected.

It needs to allow place for the idea of sins of omission—sins of omission that recognize we can neglect to do certain things. It needs to expand that notion and give it space. These are the threads I'm going to weave through this talk, coming and going, in and out as we proceed.

As I've said, ethics must include emotion, but it must transcend emotion. Rather, it must be more than just emotion and give a mature place to our emotions. So that's our third point—or fourth, depending on how you're counting. Let me organize this: Not just "what to do" is one. More than laws and rights, that's two. Having space for sins of omission, three. Fourth is including emotion but not reducing ethics to emotion, not limiting it by emotion, and giving mature place to emotion.

Fifth, it must include love and eros, as I mentioned. Number six—and this is really important—it must have dimensionality. I touched on this in the Sīla and Soul talks, but for ethics to work, and all these needs and requirements on this wish list are connected, which is why I can only weave them together rather than present them separately—something needs to be sensed as or granted a higher dimensionality, a dimensionality in which meaningfulness and purpose and sanctity actually reside.

Without something being sensed as having, or granted, or believed to have, or felt to have higher dimensionality, it's very difficult to make any ethical headway, to say anything meaningful or justifiable about ethics. The justification of whatever we do in ethics needs to be rooted in another dimension. Even if you say "don't kill," the question becomes: why? The why needs to reach into another dimension. Meaningfulness, purpose, and sanctity organically, intrinsically reside in some other dimension. We need to sense ethics that way, even if sanctity is something secularly conceived—it doesn't matter.

This is a vast subject, and I want to explore what this means. How has it been attempted in the past? How might we attempt it now? Attempts without dimensionality, as I'll explain, usually just fail. They have failed. Attempts to explain ethics without dimensionality, to promote an ethical system without dimensionality—they've simply failed.

So that's six—dimensionality. Seven would be connected to this: questions of ontology. If we're talking about dimensionality, we need to address why you can claim something as having a certain dimensionality and therefore intrinsic meaningfulness, purposefulness, sanctity. You need ontological and epistemological arguments for that, justifications for that. Woven into all this are questions of ontology and epistemology—as always, unavoidable. And certainly as Buddhists, we need to go beyond the limited ontology of just emptiness as an answer to everything. I explained this a little in one of the other talks.

Number eight would be a sense of what a human being is. What does it mean to be a human being, and what can a human being become?

All of this is tied together—these eight items on the list of what an ethical system needs nowadays, what I think we need as a species for an ethical system. Eight interconnected elements. They're not really separate in any meaningful way.

One implies the other, drags in another. And so, yes, as I said, I can't really go through this in a linear way.

So there's a little bit of introduction. Some of what I'm going to say tonight—we'll see how far we get—but some of it may well still sound introductory to a superficial listening. Some of you might feel you're waiting for the meaty bit. Some of you won't, of course, but some of you might be. To a superficial ear, it might sound a little bit introductory.

But if you understand the basic theme of what I'm trying to get at here, what I'm offering—which is: why should we get behind the approach of sensing the soul?—then you'll already have heard what we've said so far. The basic theme is an advocacy of the sensing the soul approach to ethics. If you understand that theme, you'll have immediately heard that what we've already said is completely wrapped up in that theme, and there are already some very good reasons emerging from what we've covered for why sensing the soul would be a helpful approach—one really helpful approach to ethics.

Now, I mentioned this aspect where the way we think about ethics needs to be more than just questions of law and rights. We need to prevent this kind of slide of ethics down to questions of law and rights. It's interesting, some of what happened in the Extinction Rebellion protests recently, and how some people on the street were saying, "These XR activists have no respect for law and order. They don't care about law and order."

Let's go into this a little bit. Law and order are definitely—or is, if we take them together—a value in society. But its rank as a value in the hierarchy of values must always be subordinate to the ethical values it upholds and supports. The rank of law and order as a value has to be subordinate to the ethical values that law and order are upholding.

Law and order were healthy, robust, and respected in Nazi Germany and in Mussolini's Italy—two cultures with a lot of law and order, as far as I understand from the history books. But ethically, the whole thing was on a very dubious, completely unethical foundation. Therefore, the law and order there were not valuable—they were antivalues.

So law and order is not in itself a value. It depends on the ethical values it's trying to uphold. The purpose of law and order is to uphold ethical values. Somehow we've kind of divorced them. Law and order has gotten divorced from ethics, so that people are valuing law and order in and of itself, regardless of whether that law and order is supporting good ethics or bad ethics.

It was interesting when Yanai was in court for one of his XR actions. At some point in the proceedings, Yanai was allowed to present his case. He tried to present an ethical case, ethical grounds for breaking the law, for breaking law and order. And the judge at some point responded that this is a court of law and not a court of ethics.

Now, it sounds like this judge was actually pretty good, but his hands were tied. And he made a very valuable point. He doesn't sound like he really drew out all the implications, or maybe even all of what he felt about that limitation. "This is a court of law, not a court of ethics." He might have really wished that it was a court of ethics and been able to come down much more on the side of the Extinction Rebellion protesters being tried there.

But basically, we are not set up in our society—we are not equipped to have such ethical discussions or ethical courts. There's no basis. There's very little dialogue. I mean, people debate whether using stem cells is ethical, or euthanasia, or what's called dignified assisted suicide. Again, it's back to this question: What is it right to do? What ought I to do? What ought I not to do? That kind of level of discussion. What is right? What is wrong? What ought I to do? What ought I not to do?

And as Charles Taylor puts it, the "ought to do" has become divorced from the "good to be."

The "ought to do" becomes the limitation, the circumscribing of the ethical investigation. What ought I to do? As I said before. And that whole question has been divorced from the much deeper question of what is it good to be? And this whole notion of the good and the beautiful. This question of what is it good to be, which is this question of what makes a life really worthwhile, what makes a life a beautiful life—that has been jettisoned. It's been jettisoned from philosophical discussion, from ethical discussion. They're divorced and then they're jettisoned.

And that brings problems—huge problems. One of them is the problems it brings of this divorce of questions of law from questions of ethics. I don't know what the judge was thinking or feeling, but maybe someone will have the kind of courage at some point. Someone in that position will have the courage, or we will have the courage to admit the gap—admit the gap there, admit the whole, admit the kind of yawning nihilistic abyss above which the pomp and power of the law courts attempts to suspend themselves. It's resting on either nothing, a kind of moralistic nihilism, or very, very thin ice.

And this is connected to the whole question about my right to do this and your right to do that, my right to do whatever it is—my right to go on holiday, my right to enjoy myself after work, my right to whatever. And so much gets dragged into these kind of claims of rights.

Now, it might be soon that my right to fly for a holiday is reckoned legally, or recognised legally somehow, ethically and then legally, as less of a right than the right of others to have a home that's not flooded or not on fire or in drought. The right for others to live in a habitable planet might be regarded as a right that trumps my right to fly on holiday when I feel like it after I've worked hard. It might be that that day comes, and it might be that that day comes sooner—I hope it does—but sooner than later.

But even then, even if there is that sort of switch in the degree of rights, the hierarchy of rights in public opinion, and that gets enshrined in law somehow, in the wider ethical mindset and in law—even then, I would say it's still not an adequate and fertile basis for ethics. Something is missing. It's still just about those rights and the sort of competing rights, contesting rights, and then a decision that this right actually always trumps that right. Even then, still then, it won't be adequate and it won't be fertile as a basis—just that question about rights.

And you can see, even at that level of competing or conflicting rights, there's so much dishonesty and distortion that comes in when people talk on that level. And that, to me, betrays the fact that we're actually lacking a means of approaching ethical questions. So we just have this conversation about rights, but there's no actual way of approaching ethical questions. The means, the practices, the way of thinking about it just becomes my right versus your right, or your right versus my sense of those people on the other side of the world and their rights.

So much dishonesty and distortion that just partly—partly—betrays, not something so much about human nature, perhaps, but just our lacking of a means of approaching ethical questions.

Some of you may know this, but there were a couple of groups who tried to shut down airports or prevent planes from taking off and landing to draw attention to the huge and often unnecessary amount of carbon emissions that come from flying. And they attempted in different ways to stop the functioning of airports for a few hours or a day or two days or whatever it was.

And it was, I say interesting, but it was also kind of alarming and also totally to be expected and kind of normalised—the response of the airport authorities and others. So this happened, I think, one situation was a city airport in the middle of London, and a lot of activists went there and just sat in the lobby and sort of blocked entrances and things like that, in an attempt to stop planes flying for a while.

And the sort of dishonest and distorted rhetoric of the response and the statements from the city airport authorities, who talked about needing to ensure the safe running or the safe operation of this airport, and then gleefully reported that they had ensured that when the police had cleared the protesters. And this is just completely normal and expected kind of language and trope and attitude and response.

It hides so much, because the use of that word "the safe operation" is a deliberate deflection and distortion. It links the XR protests with terrorism, which, if you've read the news recently, apparently they were linked anyway by a police organisation called Prevent, and now they've retracted that link, but anyway. There was, in the rhetoric, in the spin of the response, this deliberate deflection and distortion as if XR protesters are like terrorists, airport functioning is safe.

But, you know, the carbon dioxide emissions from flying is not safe. And doubly so in an airport like City Airport, where it's mostly really very rich people and corporate executives flying here and there, where they don't need to fly to Manchester or—you know how long that is on the train, a couple of hours or whatever it is. The emissions are not necessary. The emissions are not safe. We know that now. Carbon dioxide emissions are not safe.

Was there anyone whose safety was affected, whose actual safety was affected by that XR sit-in protest? It's a spin. You might as well talk about the safe running of Auschwitz and wanting to ensure the safe running of Auschwitz. Okay, it's maybe extreme, but there's a parallel there. How ridiculous that sounds.

Even more insidious, I think, is the kind of incomplete honesty and distortion that gets deployed through certain common tropes—particularly that XR protests were preventing normal, hard-working people from putting food on their table and keeping a roof above their heads. These are normal people who want to go about their normal lives.

I heard this on a TV debate. I don't have a better idea about how consciousness can be changed in relation to climate change and species extinction, how the alarm can be better sounded. I don't have a better idea than XR. I have many difficulties with how XR does things or what it decides to do, but I really don't know a better approach, speaking as someone who's been involved in environmental activism for decades—writing countless letters, trying to pursue change through so-called democratic processes. I genuinely don't have a better idea.

But then there's this trope in response: these XR people are preventing normal, hard-working people from putting food on their table, having a roof above their heads—normal people who want to go about their normal lives.

Is that even really true? Did the XR protests really prevent hard-working people from putting food on their table that evening, or from having a roof above their heads? Is that really true? It might be in a couple of cases, but what proportion of cases? It's just a trope, a spin.

And regarding normal life—what if so-called normal life brings very abnormal disaster for others? Abnormal like the fires in Australia. Normal life brings abnormal disaster for others, and then for myself in my normal life too. Normal life was pursued in 1938 Nazi Germany by a lot of people. "I just want to go about my normal life"—but there's a bigger ethical question here.

Mass extinction, mass extermination of species is not normal. It's by far the most abnormal thing that has occurred on Earth since the planet has existed, perhaps apart from the beginning of life itself.

There's something even more insidious going on with this particular trope. Almost no one wants to say they don't care if anyone is deprived of food or loses their job. In this gig economy, some people have no benefits, no safety net at all. They're not slaves, but there's very little protection. This has become a reality—the gig economy and the economy of austerity.

So it might be true that for some people, getting blocked by an XR protest makes them late for work, they get fired from their gig economy job, and they're really on the edge, living at that level of poverty and vulnerability in society. Of course, that might be true.

But first, how many people does that actually affect? More importantly, what has happened in this trope is that the protesters—the people disrupting—get blamed for decades of systematic political and socioeconomic policies of austerity and the gig economy. They do something and they're blamed for the potential results, when actually most of these conditions rest in decades of socioeconomic policies that themselves rest on very shaky ethical foundations.

Yes, certain XR actions could have been better thought out in terms of demographics, areas, and who exactly they would affect. I really do think that. But there's also something more than a little sneaky, insidious, dishonest, disorienting, and distorting about what has become quite a typical response—such an easy trope that's hiding something.

The larger point, again, is about our ethical thinking needing to be more than law. We can't slide into thinking it's just about law and that's all we can talk about, or that ethics is just about rights—protecting people's rights. If we expand the conversation, expand the idea of what ethics is, then it opens up areas for what used to be called, I think, in the Catholic church, sins of omission—neglecting to do something.

This has quite important implications for me. Just as a thought experiment, let's take Nazi Germany as a setting. Compare ethical transgressions:

Person A speaks out during the Third Reich against Nazi policy and ideas, publicly and at the risk of their life. Privately, they're having an extramarital affair.

They're involved with someone other than their spouse—romantically, sexually involved with someone else. That's person A.

Person B is completely faithful to their partner, their spouse, but does not speak up about the Nazi policies, Nazi ideas. After the war, they may say, along with so many others, that they disagreed with Nazi policies and thought Nazism was terrible. But they say that after the war, when it was safe.

Person A, person B, and what they do—they're not antinomians. The point here is to ask and see how you, I, each of us tend to assess ethical misdemeanors. What's your reaction to person A, and your ethical reaction and assessment of person A compared to your ethical reaction to person B? Person A spoke out at the risk of their life, but they were having an extramarital affair. Person B was completely faithful to their spouse, but did not speak up until after the war, when they said they disagreed and thought Nazism was terrible. Maybe they did disagree and think Nazism was terrible, but during the Nazi reign, they did not speak up.

I invite you to ask and see how you tend to relatively assess those ethical misdemeanors. One of them is an omission, a sin of omission—person B. And this also, as I pointed out in "The Necessity of Fantasy," relates to how in the five precepts, as they're usually presented negatively, there's no place for a sin of omission. Walking by on the edge of a lake where someone is drowning, and simply keeping walking mindfully by while the person drowns or someone else has to save them—technically speaking, that's not a transgression, not an ethical transgression, not a sin. I'm still keeping the five precepts. Technically speaking.

Of course, Thich Nhat Hanh has added the positive side to the precepts, which is very helpful. But technically speaking, the Buddhist precepts, as they're usually thought of in terms of the five precepts, don't leave room for how much we can rise up ethically and extend ourselves to the higher virtues.

Now, what if we translate this hypothetical scenario, these hypothetical ethical transgressions—there are two kinds of transgressions there: Person A's transgression in terms of their marriage, and Person B's transgression in terms of their sin of omission, what they have failed to rise up to—what happens if you translate that to our situation now, where we know about and somehow even participate in a willful extinction, extermination of millions of species and climate change? We know that's going on, that those actions, those policies are perpetuated in our time by our societies, just as in Nazi Germany it was clear what was perpetrated. People said they didn't know about what was going to happen to the Jews and the Roma and the homosexuals and the Communists. Most people knew.

Translate that to our situation now.

This phrase, "sins of omission," can mean different things. But what I want to point to here is that we need to open up—I think we're talking about needs now. What do we need to bring to an ethical system? What does an ethical system need to have? It needs to have a place in it, a space in it, spaces and places in it for the possibility of aspiring to higher values and virtues, for the recognition that it's important and good to aspire to higher values, higher virtues.

There's limited space for that in ethical systems that are not based on virtue. I wonder about this. I wonder if there's limited space for those kinds of aspirations or the recognition of their importance in ethical systems that are not based on virtue. I wonder—I'm not sure if that's correct, but it may be. These ethical systems based on virtue make that much more clear, let's put it that way.

If we go back to the legal thing—I think I've moved, I've lost count now. Since I got ill, I was living at Gaia House, I got ill, and I moved. Basically I moved out the morning of my operation. That was it. I never went back to Gaia House since then. I think I've moved four or five times since then, renting one place or another. I've never rented in England before because I lived in the States, so I don't know if it's an English thing or what, but I would say I had four or five places and three different landlords, I think.

While it's very clear that none of my landlords have acted illegally—they've always kept within the bounds of the law in terms of how they do things or raise the rent or limit things in this way or that way—and one could say from a certain point of view that they've acted ethically, they haven't acted unethically, one would be very hard pushed to find anyone who would say these people have acted virtuously in being a landlord or in their dealings with the tenant.

There's, again, in the wider society, this shrinking away from the idea or the attraction to higher values and higher virtues and the place for that as a possibility, the encouragement to aspire and to reach out to that kind of level. We just need to keep within the bounds of law—there's a sort of minimum, the lowest common denominator—and then that's regarded as ethical.

Sometimes ethical is a bit more than the law, but there's a shrinking here. So I don't know—I'm not sure that it's the case that this kind of thing is not possible with other ethical systems. There's something about a virtue-based ethical system that makes it more apparent, that invites it, that sets it up that way.

Going back to Hartman's hierarchy of values, and still with the notion that the higher values will need to rest on the lower, and including the knowing that there will be inevitable antinomies between different values, particularly values at the same level—that kind of virtue-based system, value-based system, still keeps this whole notion open, what I'm calling sins of omission. And this possibility and encouragement, stimulation, invitation to aspire higher, to higher values, higher virtues. So different ethical systems open in different ways. They open more or less.

Not too long ago, I overheard a conversation between two people who, each of them was a relatively new parent. It was a man and a woman—they weren't a couple. So they were each in a partnership and each had a young child, one young child. They seemed to agree very easily that very close bonding between mother and child, where the mum rarely goes away and breastfeeding is continued until late, et cetera—that this kind of very close bonding would guarantee that the child, when grown, would not cause harm in the world. I just wondered whether that was a bit naive.

Peer influence becomes huge as time goes on, as does the influence of advertisement and social and cultural norms, including ethical ones. I can think of a family that I've known for many years—the children in that family, the parents and the children—and I've known the children since they were babies. They're now mostly in their twenties, and they have all become very nice, relatively well-balanced psychologically. They're polite, there's a degree of kindness there, they're okay with expressing affection with their parents and their social relations, and so on. But they don't think twice, for example, about flying many times a year. They're quite wealthy, and they don't think twice about what that might contribute to the suffering of others, human and non-human. There is also, it seems to me, very little interest or impetus towards the higher virtues.

This is not quite what I mean by sins of omission, but it's related. So is it enough, this idea that we won't cause harm if we have very affectionate parenting with healthy physical contact with mum and dad, good family dynamics, and all that? The affection from and healthy attachment to mother or primary caregiver—it's probably not enough to bring about the kind of ethical maturity the world needs now.

We may need moral education, which, as I said, has gone away. It's been ruled taboo. It's hard to find in our society. We may need further moral education, whether by the family or otherwise. The role of education and moral education might be huge, but as I said, in our society we lack any but the most basic moral education. Even that may be less really a moral education than one about conforming to norms and obeying the law.

So what do we need to open up a range of possibility—the impetus and the interest in the higher virtues, as well as this whole notion of sins of omission? Some kind of moral education that is not in place at present in Western societies, and that needs to be based on probably a very different way of framing and relating to ethics than is there presently. The two issues—the lack of education and the lack of a good way of framing and relating to ethics—are completely related.

When there is the possibility to aspire, when that's opened and deemed important, the possibility to aspire to higher values, when it's recognized as something good, then love and eros for virtues becomes possible and becomes normal. Because there's that possibility of a beyond, that possibility of extending, rather than just a kind of disgust at what one sees or decides is unethical, or a kind of sentimentality—the sort you'd get in tabloid newspapers or the Daily Mail. It's all pretty limited ethically. Not only is it trammeled in just one direction—it's pretty obvious what they're going to oppose or not—but it's very limited in terms of the emotionality in it. There's no real place there for genuine love of virtue or ethics and genuine eros.

So again, this is part of the list of needs: ethics needs to become an area and a domain in relation to which we can and do feel love and eros and plenty of it, and beauty, because that's all going to be tied in. I'm using that word eros in the soul-making sense. I'm not only saying this because I think ethics is an interesting subject and I love it—it's that exactly that is the appropriate relationship with this subject.

If we're thinking about what is a beautiful life, what is a life worth living, what is a life with depth and dimensionality and meaningfulness, and with this possibility for higher virtues and the beauty of that and extending myself, then it's exactly eros and love that is an appropriate relationship with that whole domain, with that whole subject.

I remember in the Sīla Soul talks, I played a little bit with different etymologies connected with the word virtue, and I offered different ones. I don't know if I mentioned these two—these two may be a repeat.

Looking at the phonetic or associative connections with the word virtue, I want to highlight two relationships that illuminate what I've just shared about eros and ethics.

Consider our colloquial use of "virtually" - we speak of virtual reality, virtual media. This virtual realm exists as image, electronically manifested. The connection between "virtual" and "virtue" suggests something profound: that virtues themselves can be understood as imaginal realities. They exist as images we can approach, ideals that beckon us forward.

Our other common usage of "virtually" - meaning "almost" or "approaching" - carries similar implications. When we say someone was "virtually exhausted" or "virtually there," we're describing movement toward something, an approximation of a fuller reality.

Both meanings point toward the same truth: virtues exist as imaginal idealities that we imperfectly approach through our lived behavior. Here is the ideational, imaginal reality of compassion or courage or wisdom, and we always approach it imperfectly in the instances of our actions. Our behavior becomes the instantiation of these ideal realities - not the complete embodiment, but the lived attempt to manifest what calls to us from beyond our current capacity.

This understanding naturally invites eros. When there exists an imaginal beyond, a higher dimension we cannot quite reach but yearn to approach, dimensionality opens. When virtues become ideational images rather than mere behavioral prescriptions, eros becomes not just possible but inevitable.

As I mentioned the other day regarding people who marvel at apparent willpower - perhaps what they're witnessing is actually eros. Eros for certain virtues and values. Eros for the ideas seeking expression through us. Eros for the future sangha we envision. Love and attraction, more than mere force of will.

Of course, in any long creative project, in sustained relationships, in parenting, there will be times when we don't feel that animating eros. The same holds true for our relationship with ethics and virtue. There will be periods when practice feels dry, when we're not inspired or called toward what's more beautiful. This is natural, even inevitable.

But when we have the right relationship to virtue - as we might with a long-term creative endeavor, an enduring friendship, or the ongoing project of raising children - we can remain rooted in knowing even when feeling has temporarily withdrawn. We know firsthand: this matters to me. This is part of my path. I love this work, even when love isn't immediately accessible as feeling.

This knowing itself carries eros, even in dormant periods. We can recognize the many elements of the imaginal present even when we're not actively enchanted.

This connects to another crucial need in how we approach ethics: our understanding must include more than just emotion or moral feeling. While I don't believe ethics should be reduced to cold rationality - as some philosophical systems attempt - neither can it rest solely on feeling-states. Our hearts and their responses form part of our moral instrument, part of our ethical compass, but not the entirety.

It's an element of our compass. So we need emotions and moral feelings, but we need also more than that.

Eros is actually, as you know, more than an emotion. And eros—again, I mean eros in the whole soul-making sense that we use that term—so yes, we need emotion, but we need more than emotion. And part of what's more is we need eros, and partly we need a hierarchy of values, or some sense of a hierarchy of values. I want to come back to that because I want to spin that a little bit differently as we go on. But what that really means is we need a conceptual framework.

So we need emotion, but we need more than emotion. We need eros, we need a conceptual framework, and we need ways of orienting, ways of practicing. More than just emotion to guide us.

Obviously, the value of something like passion depends on what it serves and what the intention is, just like we talked about law and order. Passion is an emotion, but its value—actually, its moral value—depends on what it's serving and what its intention is. Loyalty, I'm not sure if it's an emotion or a stance, but it's connected. The value of loyalty, even passionate loyalty, also depends on its object.

A football supporter completely loyal to their team has a certain value, but a pretty limited value in terms of how valuable that passion and loyalty truly is. Sometimes you see grown men, and the only place where they're really expressing any emotion, or any place you'd see them cry, might be in relation to a football result. You have to wonder what's happening there with the heart. Why so limited? Why so strong in this area and so limited in other areas? And what value does it have, really, if it's just about whether a football team loses or wins?

So the value is dependent on the value of its object. And of course, the value of the loyalty of an SS officer—again, taking Nazi Germany as an example—the loyalty of an SS officer to Himmler, the head of the SS, that's highly questionable what value that has.

I say this because sometimes I run into people who love the sound of soul-making and even start playing with images, but seem to shrink their sense of what's important down to passion—the sense of passion as something really important. It's not important. Just the emotion of passion is not inherently important. It depends what it's connected to, what it serves, what the intentions are, what its objects are.

I want to say something as well, just in connection with the emotions again. As I said, I feel like they're very important, they have a very important place in terms of our ethical sensibility and how we're going to approach ethics and how we orient and navigate with our ethical instrument, our soul instrument regarding ethics. But we can also sometimes overdo that and not see—kind of blind ourselves a little bit, blinker ourselves to other things—if we put too much emphasis on the emotion.

Take, for example, the idea of grief rituals and grief ceremonies, which some of us have been involved in and are starting more widely now, say with regard to species extinction or climate change. It's interesting: in those grief rituals, the person might come expecting a space where they can really grieve and wail and cry and it be okay and be supported and mirrored, where there's a shared space for intense, deep griefing emotion. But what people can find—and I think you will find if you attend a few of these things—is that a grief ritual may not lead to or support an emotion of grief. And it may not at all be because anything weird is going on in the dynamics, or it wasn't a trustworthy or safe space. It actually depends how the ritual is done and how it's held.

Oftentimes, a ritual distills something and contains it and connects levels. A ritual connects levels, and this is very important for soul-making. So, for example, we connect matter and the imaginal dimensions or the dimensions of divinity. That's the transubstantiation of objects and matter. That's something that happens in, or can happen in, a ritual. It's very powerful for the soul. And as I mentioned the other day, it may involve giving and receiving and grace.

These elements—this distilling of something, this containing of something, and particularly this element of connecting levels, and also this giving and receiving and grace—all of that may not lead to a sort of opening of the floodgates of, in this case, grief. So it depends what the ritual is trying to do and how it is set up and what levels it's aimed at. This is actually quite important, I think, for soul-makers to understand.

Is there a place for both? Spaces—call them rituals or ceremonies or whatever—where there can be collective grief and the depth of that grief regarding species loss, extinction, extermination, can be felt and held together in a safe space and recognized and valued and moved through? This feeling the grief, opening to it, and the importance also there of the heart's capacity expanding. Because as I said many times recently, there can be so much grief there. Part of the work that we do in meditation is to actually expand the heart's capacity, that it knows it can feel this terrible, awful, seemingly bottomless grief—a lot of it's not even mine—and the heart is big enough and knows how to let that move through and how to hold it well.

So can we have place for that kind of space and ritual together? And do we know how to set that up? And can there also be this contextualizing of grief through ritual?

The ritual that holds space in a different way—understanding how we human beings relate to the whole situation of species loss and ecological devastation—contextualizes grief through dimension and imagination, contextualizing it for the soul, not just for the heart. This kind of ritual might be much calmer, more sober, perhaps even silent. But from it might emerge strength, power, and stamina.

Theoretically, yes, just having the grief and opening to it allows one to move through grief toward empowerment to act. But there's openness and strength available from both kinds of rituals. Potentially, there's openness and strength, power and stamina through both approaches—but they come in very different ways, and they're given to the being in very different ways.

Emotions are vital, but they're not enough.

So we're exploring the possibility of soul-making practice as a basis and approach to ethics. This can happen in two ways, as I explained in the Sila and Soul talks. One is through values and virtues becoming—or being allowed to become—imaginal images, ideational imaginal images, imaginal ideas, whatever we call them. The values and virtues themselves become imaginal.

The second way comes through an image, an imaginal figure, and that imaginal figure implies, or has implicit within it, certain values and certain virtues. Our life then begins to refract and express those values and virtues in its imperfect mimicry and echoing of the image, responding to the duty that flows from the image.

If we talk about ethics in terms of virtues—virtue ethics—then virtues rest on a sense of values rather than on a rational system or enforcement of law. That's the fundamental tenor of virtue ethics: it rests on my sense of values. The soul-making approach would most easily fit with virtue ethics, and it too rests on a sense of values rather than a rationally worked out system or guidelines or enforcement.

A sense of values—extrapolating from much of what we explored in Sila and Soul—really involves sensing them with soul. In other words, sensing the ideational imaginal, and sensing with soul implies all the eros and everything else: the sense of beauty and devotion and duty and meaningfulness, all the elements. Ethics, in this sense, implies and needs sensing with soul, to a certain extent, with respect to values.

Let's explore this further. When we sense the things and beings of the world with soul, values are there, and reverence is there, as elements of the imaginal. There's a natural ethical relationship with whatever we're sensing with soul.

However, there will always be something—some object or person—left out of our sensing with soul until we notice them and give them attention, allowing them to be subsumed into the soul-making dynamic. It's also true that some fantasies involve enemies. So the question arises: what becomes of our ethical relationship with those who are our imaginal or fantastical enemies? If I have an image of a warrior protecting the earth from enemies, what about our ethical relationship with those enemies?

Here we can talk about imaginal duty and its refraction, but also the theater-like nature we've explored before. In a way, those enemies need to be subsumed—they need to become imaginal as well. Otherwise there's danger of reifying the enemy too much.

It's too much to expect anyone to be sensing with soul all the time and with respect to everything. It's actually impossible to be sensing with soul with respect to everything, because "everything" becomes a category that expands when the soul-making dynamic kicks in, creating and discovering more things, more aspects.

But it may be that as sensing with soul becomes more normal and digested, any situation or thing we attend to or experience—with respect to which we have to make some important choice, one that feels major—may become sensed with soul. Therefore our relationship with it becomes ethical, because it's reverential.

If we take sensing with soul as the basic approach to virtue or ethical living, it will not rid us of the inevitability of antinomies between values at the same level. That cannot happen.

I mean, it may rid a person of an antinomy they have between two values. Sometimes when I explore a dilemma, when I bring the soul-making sensibility and practice to it, I actually find that X is more soul-making for me than Y, even though someone else may have the reverse sense—they might find Y more soul-making than X.

But if everyone were trained in soul-making dharma practice and in approaching ethical choices through it, that person's choice, even though another person disagrees—they choose X, I choose Y; they choose X over Y, I choose Y over X—if everyone were trained in soul-making dharma and that approach to ethics, the person's choice would still be respected as valid if we sensed that it was honestly and authentically sensed with soul.

So what I'm exploring here is this: is it possible that sensing the soul could become a more widely established practice and basis even for ethics? I mean, that might be a total pipe dream, but I'm still exploring the theoretical possibility, at least the theoretical side of the possibility.

Part of the problem with ethics as we think about them now is that when we don't have a notion of dimensionality—when we don't have a sense of dimensionality, or when any idea or notion of dimensionality has been refused, has been shut out, disallowed, as is quite common and quite popular these days—then actually there can be no shared ethics. There's nothing then to prevent someone's ethics from being purely contingent, learned, arbitrary. Someone says, "This is my right, that's your right, this is how I think about ethics, that's how you think about ethics." But it could be held for purely contingent or arbitrary reasons, or held principally for what are actually not ethical reasons at all. It's something amoral—not immoral, as in wrong, but amoral, having nothing to do with morality.

So without dimensionality, it's hard to justify, and it's hard to even know where a person's so-called ethics are coming from. Ethics becomes exactly prey to postmodern nihilistic relativism because of this absence of dimensionality.

If we pick up a few strands from what we've talked about here and in the Zealand Soul Talks and put them together—if we combine Hartman's notion of that firmament of values, which has an objective existence but has a kind of range and width that usually almost always exceeds the focus of any age, any culture, or any individual, and that also contains within it numerous antinomies—we combine that idea of affirmative values with a demand for a sense of dimensionality. I'll come back to this dimensionality question in more detail later, but if we combine this idea of affirmative values, we need to avoid this kind of postmodern nihilistic relativism with regard to ethics. Some kind of ethics needs to be rooted in something.

So I'm talking about what wishes or needs, let's say, a demand for some kind of sense of dimensionality. What will give us that? Well, soul-making, sensing the soul, gives us a sense of dimensionality implicitly. It's one of the elements. So we can get a sense of dimensionality for this or that virtue or ethic, or even just this or that action we're thinking about, from soul-making dharma practice and with all that implies about the ideational-imaginable.

So those two things—the firmament of values, which does have a kind of objective existence, and a sense of dimensionality, an actual practical, practiced sense of dimensionality—and we add the notion that we can trust the disciplined or trained soul to sense the ethical and to be touched by it, to want to move towards it, to have an erotic relationship with it and to want to manifest some or other of those inherently existing values. In other words, the duty is part of it as well.

If we combine all that—this kind of trust in the soul-making dharma practice, a demand for a sense of dimensionality which we can get also through soul-making dharma practice, and this notion of an objective but hugely ranged firmament of values—then there is an objectively or independently existing ethics to a certain extent, which we can discern epistemologically through the practice, by our careful sensibility and sensitivity, something which can be trained. Maybe there are other ways apart from soul-making dharma practice, but certainly including by training in soul-making and a recognition of and familiarity with the elements of the imaginal. This familiarity and recognition of the elements of the imaginal tell me when I'm on the right track, when the whole thing has become soulful, has that sense of dimensionality, and that I can trust this.

Still, there will be antinomies and differences of opinion and inclination and feeling between different people, of course. But antinomies exist anyway for individuals within themselves. Antinomies are unavoidable in ethical life, as I stressed in the Zealand Soul Talks—they're unavoidable.

But if we ourselves and society are aware of both the independent existence of this value firmament, its wide range, and the inevitability of antinomies both within and between individuals, then at least a more understanding and harmonious existence in society might be possible. Do you understand? If we and most or a lot of other people in society are aware there is this independently existing value firmament with a huge range, and that there will inevitably be antinomies both within myself and within individuals, then at least we can have more understanding and a more harmonious coexistence in society.

Of course, it might also be—I think it probably would be the case—that if soul-making training and sensibilities were almost universally trained in members of society (let's just dream that for a minute), certain seeming antinomies would be universally understood to be not really antinomies, but oppositions between moral or soulful values and amoral values that are ego values or greed values. Not really antinomies at all. For example, I don't know, like the expansion of Heathrow Airport.

So again, the relationship with emotions. Notice one can have strong opinions and feelings regarding a value without a sense of soul-making and soulfulness there. If there's no dimensionality, then in the soul-making way of approaching ethics, it wouldn't be trustworthy. Just because there's an intense feeling, just because there's a strong opinion, without that sense of dimensionality and without the beauty and the other elements of the imaginal, it's not trustworthy. It's not fully trustworthy in that way of thinking about it.

This is hard as a dream, if we're dreaming this or proposing this. To kind of proffer that as desirable—to say it would be great if everyone, or at least a lot of people, approached ethics through sensing the soul, from soul-making dharma practice—

That would be, you know, actually to insist on, or at least to say is desirable, basically a new epistemology. You're basically insisting on a new epistemology, or saying it's better to have a new epistemology, at least for the domain of ethics. And for any new epistemology to take root and spread and even come to be a norm one day in the wider society is quite an ask and a pretty rare thing. I don't know—perhaps the last sort of major shift of epistemology was the shift to the scientific materialist worldview and its epistemology hundreds of years ago.

So an epistemology is already dominant in a culture. We inherit it and it's hard to question it. Still though, trying to place a new ontology first, in other words, before the epistemology—in other words, just saying, "This is ethical, this is the truth"—before an epistemology, before a way of teaching people how they might recognize something as more valuable, in other words, just presenting ontology, "This is more valuable than that," is probably harder than opening the epistemology in the area of ethics. Actually, how might one sense for oneself that this is more valuable than that?

So in this hope, wish, fantasy, dream, ridiculous impossibility, pipe dream, it's a big ask. Shifting ontology is huge. Shifting ontology just sort of out of the blue and kind of cold is probably very hard before we've shifted and offered the possibility of epistemology. And by epistemology I mean the practice by which one can come to experience things and sense things for oneself palpably, to measure between different values or different ethical choices.

So the other day, I can't remember which talk it was—probably the one on ontology—we talked about the possibility of opening up and moving forward our sense of ontology and epistemology by allowing and giving place and importance, significant place, to eros. In other words, almost partly basing ontology and epistemology on eros. Of course, that's an idea that a lot of people would very quickly object to and be horrified by.

I read not too long ago a paper by—I don't know if he's a philosopher or a historian of philosophy or something—a guy called Wayne Hankey, who I must say I'm not a huge fan of. And it was a paper quite polemically critiquing John Milbank, the theologian-philosopher I mentioned the other day, who's associated with what they call the radical orthodoxy movement these days.

I want to read a little bit of what Wayne Hankey says and what he criticizes in John Milbank's approach. And as I mentioned the other day, John Milbank's approach seems to have a lot of affinity and overlap and commonality with what we've been working out with the soul-making dharma, but he's done it in an Orthodox Christian context and through very, very different channels of Neoplatonism and so forth through Western philosophy and theology. So he's done it through very different channels than we have. But to me it's quite exciting—at least the little bit I've read so far and what I've seen on YouTube and things—but quite keen.

Anyway, I read this Wayne Hankey paper and I'm going to read a little bit of his critiques. So he says, in trying to sum up what he's attacking here in John Milbank's approach, he says: "Theory belongs to composition and is not separable from it." I have to translate a bit. He means really that theory is something that we can just create. So again we have this poiesis common with our notions and this possibility of creating conceptual frameworks and so forth. So it's definitely not exactly the same—there's probably quite a lot of differences between what John Milbank's saying and what we're opening up, and he's, I think, still very much seeing his project as very much in process. But anyway.

"Theory belongs to composition"—in other words, it's a creative, artistic endeavor—"and is not separable from it. The requirement that we join in the cosmic and divine poiesis," creativity, artistic creativity, "governed not by truth but by desire, means that there can be no theoretical distance or objectivity. Theory occurs as a necessarily incomplete moment within praxis."

So to translate that, basically in our terms it's saying: This is terrible. If you follow your desire, eros, and not something called truth, and you create theory or create conceptual frameworks guided by your eros and desire, then there can be no theoretical objectivity, and it's just something that occurs as a stage, as an incomplete movement, direction, thrust, and temporary stage within practice. So in a way that sounds very similar to the kind of logos of logoi in soul-making dharma.

But then he doesn't like this at all, Wayne Hankey. He doesn't like this at all. He continues: "What belongs to theory is self-consciously constructed within poiesis, practice and desire in order to stand against modern theoretical truthfulness."

So there's this—again, in our language—this kind of standoff of this kind of notion of the emptiness of ultimate truth and any singly, finally true conceptual framework of things, and then our participation in the creation and discovery of theory and conceptual framework and logoi, using all the aspects of our soul and our eros, and that stands against and kind of in opposition to what he's called modern theoretical truthfulness in terms of classical thinking about there being an objective truth.

And he continues: "When we know that"—quote—"we know what we want to know, will to know in accord with desire, and cannot submit that desire to knowledge or knowledge to truth, the nihilist gap has already opened."

When we know that—when we understand that knowledge is something that, and even truth is something that's guided by desire, whether we admit it or not, whether we're conscious of it or not, that eros comes into our decisions about what is true, what conceptual frameworks we pick up—when we know that, and when we, rather than see that as a problem, when we take it on board and go with it in the deepest and fullest and richest and most soulful way that we can, and when we will to know in accord with our desire, as he said, and cannot submit that desire to knowledge or knowledge to truth—in other words, we leave totally aside any requirements that the desire guiding our knowledge be limited by something called truth or objective knowledge—then the nihilist gap has already opened. There's a gap of thinking anything, believing anything, ethically, philosophically, religiously, and so forth.

So just to say I wouldn't agree with that: "cannot submit that desire to knowledge or knowledge to truth." There are, as I said in the talks on the Four Parables series, and just touched on it briefly the other day, there are limits to the eros. It's not just that there are other constraints in our movement towards truth, and one of them is just this power of predictability we talked about in scientific provisional truths, for example. That's the kind of thing that tells me that I know something—it predicts, like Newton's laws predicts. We gave that example. But also dependent fading is telling me that I...

you know, is a prediction that tells me there's something valid here, a provisional truth.

But he said, if that's the case, if we know what we want to know, and we will to know in accord with desire, now that we've let the Eros lead, then the nihilist gap has already opened.

But I would say the nihilist gap has not opened if the desire is disciplined. If it's disciplined desire. By which I mean that it's rooted in and shaped by a really sophisticated and deep and careful practice like soul-making practice. And then the eros there is disciplined. It's not just desire, willy-nilly, random desire that would open the nihilist gap. This is something else. It's actually disciplined and so that gap doesn't open in the way that Wayne Hankey thinks.

So, what does open is a truth that's neither objective nor subjective. Because this kind of trying to cling to a purely objective truth, or notions that truth is something purely objective, completely independently objective, it's very hard to kind of sustain that anymore, as I explained the other day. But with the inclusion and cooperation of Eros as a guide for our conceptual frameworks, for our logoi, for our ideas, for our notions, for our provisional truths, the discipline of eros when it's in practice in a soul-making way, in sensing the soul, then we arrive at something that's neither objective nor subjective.

We arrive at truths, logoi, conceptual frameworks that are true but neither objective nor subjective, which must be part of a new definition of truth. Because the old one of something purely objective is very hard, as I said, to hang on to. And then it's not a nihilistic free-for-all. And in the area of ethics, similarly, it's not a nihilistic free-for-all.

When we were talking the other day about an ontology or epistemology based partly on Eros and how Eros might be redeemed along with other aspects of our being and affects, might be redeemed and given place in a sort of more sophisticated and more powerful and more far-reaching ontology, we talked about truth being not something one finally ever arrives at, but more of a journey. We talked about this notion of truth that Descartes had, that the truth, true or real things are just what's clear and discreet and easily comprehended by the mind. And how if we don't buy into that definition, and if we also see that truth may be more a journey, and there are provisional truths in science as there are in Dharma, and there's a whole journey there.

Eros doesn't leave us with clear, discrete things easily comprehended by the mind, but opens up their dimensions and their shading into divinity and their unfathomability and their complexity and multi-aspected nature. All this taken together, again, suggests that eros may be, in John Milbank's word, ontologically disclosive, may have a status that is ontologically disclosive. In other words, it tells us about the truth. It tells us about reality, it leads us, and it opens, discloses, to open up for us what might be truth, but truth in inverted commas, because truth is understood differently than in the sort of, well, let's say definitely in classical modernist terms.

So Eros redeemed and given ontological and epistemological value regarding objects but also regarding conceptual frameworks—this to me is a really exciting and important possibility, way of opening up our thinking and validating it perhaps more positively. Validating Eros, validating our soul-making experience, validating what's possible there.

Last thing, I think, for today. It's interesting, just sticking with this idea about—so we're talking about the possibility of soul-making practice as basis and approach to ethics. That can happen in different ways. And what might it be just to dream into the possibility of that being more widely spread in society? And part of that, what would be needed there, is a recognition of the necessity to give some ontological and epistemological value, or value regarding ontology and epistemology to Eros. And the notion of participation, and the notion of truth that is not a final, ultimate, objective, independently existent truth, but a journey, a continuous opening up of provisional truths and participatory.

Last thing to say is interesting in this connection. Years ago, I told this story in some other place for some other reason, but years ago my colleague Stephen Batchelor shared he was scheduled to teach a retreat on ethics. Ethics was the subject. And no one signed up for it. It got zero interest. And of course that wouldn't happen these days because he's just very famous and people would go just for his name. But I thought that was very telling, the fact that no one signed up for that retreat because clearly no one was interested in ethics.

And in a way, ethics can seem like a very boring subject. And again, if you go back to what John Milbank, where I read that quote from John Milbank the other day, boredom, if you remember, was one of the, was in his list. In his list of what was kind of disallowed as having any ontological disclosive status. So eros, anxiety, boredom, trust, poetic response, faith, hope, charity, and so forth, are disallowed ontologically disclosive status, he said.

Well, one way of understanding a lack of interest is also something as boring. People don't sign up because it's not interesting, because it seems boring.

Boredom is also, we can understand, a lack of eros. When there's boredom, there's an absence of eros. When there's eros, there's no boredom.

But if we expand a little on this idea of the ontological and epistemological value of eros, potentially, then it might be that boredom—as an absence of eros—is telling me something. At its best, I mean boredom at its best. When I'm bored with something, it's not because I'm not open to being erotically engaged, not open to being mentally and soulfully engaged. Rather, boredom at its best might be telling me there's not enough here—in these ideas or this presentation or this picture of how things are. There's not enough truth value or truth possibility here, if we understand truth as a journey. There's not enough truth possibility.

So the usual way we think about ethics—why people didn't sign up—is possibly because how they thought about ethics is just not interesting. It's actually boring. Because the way it's presented, flatly, as a question of right and wrong and ought to do, without this other dimension, or these whole other dimensions, this whole other depth of richness and soulfulness around the question of what is it good to be? What is the worthwhile life? What is the beautiful life?

It might be that people were sensing there's not enough truth value. When ethics as a subject is trammeled and amputated and dis-dimensionalized in that way, there's not enough truth possibility here. And that's actually where the boredom sense is coming from. There's also not enough erotic possibility—they're linked together. And that's where the boredom is coming from. There's neither enough juice nor enough truth possibility in the way we usually conceive of ethics.

CHAPTER 229

The Image of Ethics (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 2h05

> In this continuation of his exploration of ethics through soul-making dharma, Rob Burbea delves deeper into the question of what constitutes a worthwhile life beyond mere moral rules. He examines how the Protestant Reformation's rejection of intermediaries between humans and the divine inadvertently stripped away the dimensionality necessary for robust ethical frameworks. Burbea discusses the distinction between shallow shame and what he calls 'soul shame' - drawing on the Buddha's teaching of hiri and ottappa as 'guardians of the world.' He introduces a practice of 'three-ness' - balancing attention between self, other, and imaginal figure in ethical situations. The talk addresses how scientific materialism's reductionism flattens our understanding of values, making it impossible to ground ethics in anything meaningful. Burbea outlines four historical attempts to provide dimensionality to ethics: rationality (from Plato to Kant), cosmic order (both vertical hierarchy and horizontal functioning), voluntarism (divine command), and utilitarianism (reducing suffering/increasing happiness). He argues that without sensing something as having higher or deeper dimensionality - where meaningfulness, value, and sanctity naturally reside - ethical systems become merely parasitic philosophies that attack other positions without offering constructive frameworks.

Let me offer a short recap before we see how far we can progress today.

We are essentially putting forward and exploring soul-making practice—soul-making dharma, sensing with soul—as an approach to ethical practice and ethical philosophy. We're both working with and thinking about ethics in a new way.

I do feel this approach was implicit in the earlier sila and soul talks, but as I mentioned, I was perhaps too restrained there, too held back and modest on behalf of soul-making dharma. I also have a tendency to assume that what is implicit in what I say or write will be understood by anyone listening or reading, or by most people. This is really not a good assumption—it's quite naive. This is something I learned from writing Seeing That Frees. Much of what I thought were obvious conclusions, or implicit connections that one could make independently without my spelling them out, was clearly not the case for most people. So I'm trying to redress that tendency and hopefully be more helpful in opening things up.

To recap: we're exploring sensing with soul as an approach to ethical practice and philosophy, examining what this might offer. One thing we started with in the last talk was expanding our notion of what we're actually discussing—what ethics is and what we need to do in thinking about and approaching ethics.

Usually, or very commonly these days, ethics is thought of and approached as the philosophy or set of guidelines, laws, or prescriptions for what to do. What should I do? What ought I to do in this or that situation? We want to include those kinds of questions and ways of approaching them, of course—what should I do here, what ought I to do—but include them within a much larger question and exploration: what is of value?

I'm not the first person to insist on this expansion. Just in modern times, Nicolai Hartmann would say that before you can answer the question "what ought I to do," you have to answer the question "what is of value?" You need to understand this—it's really important. Think this through if it doesn't make sense. What is of value in life? Not just what should I do, but what is of value? What should I love because it's valuable, highly valuable, or ultimately valuable? This will imply, suggest, and direct me in terms of what I should do to a large extent.

We have Hartmann, and we have Charles Taylor, whom I mentioned the other day, who speaks about expanding the exploration from "ought to do" to "good to be" or "good to love." So not just what ought I to do, but what is it good to be as a human being? What ought I to love? What is it good to love as a human being? What should I love?

This expansion is really crucial to opening up ethics so that it becomes a much more fertile area and more dynamic, instead of something that just grinds to a halt or devolves into opposing parties shouting louder and louder at each other from opposite poles of some ethical debate.

What has happened is that this question—what is it good to be, what should I love, what is it good to love, what makes life worthwhile, what is it to live a really worthwhile life—became separated from the question of what is right or wrong to do in certain situations or across the board in all situations. Philosophy has stopped posing that first question: What is it good to be? What is it good to love? What should I love as a human being? What is a worthwhile life? It certainly doesn't attempt to give any answers anymore. It's stopped asking the question, has deemed it irrelevant to ethics, and doesn't include it in ethical philosophy, or only very rarely.

Gradually, whether philosophers, students of philosophy, or ordinary people on the street, it becomes hard to even see a connection between those two questions: What is it good to be and good to love? And what ought I to do? What's right or wrong in a certain situation? You can see a connection there. If it's not obvious, think it through—hopefully it will become more obvious as we continue talking.

As I said on a recent retreat: think on your toes, meaning engage actively. We learn much more when we think actively.

With all this, and as the years of modernity progressed into post-modernity, it became almost agreed upon in modern cultures that no one can impose this or that regarding what people should strive for, what they should aspire to. This cannot be imposed universally by anybody, nor can it be imposed by any individual on another individual anymore.

This freedom that has emerged brings with it tremendous possibilities—we're not all obliged to follow the same view about what is most worthwhile, what we really should be aspiring for. No longer does anyone dictate that "this is really better," leaving those who don't measure up feeling they've settled for a second-class existence.

We have the gift of great freedom these days because there exists, if you like, an imposition of the rule that no one can impose what we should strive for or aspire to, what constitutes the best thing. So we have a kind of imposition about barring an imposition.

This freedom opens up a great space—multidirectional possibilities for our lives, for how we can shape our existence, because of this debarring, this disallowing of any imposition from anyone onto anyone else. Of course, in other religious cultures, some still existing, this is much less the case. And there are many in-between areas as well. But certainly in secular-dominated society, this is indeed the case, though there remain many grey areas—societies that are religious in some ways and deeply secular in others, which is quite common these days.

So it brings freedom, but also brings massive, wide and deep problems. I'll return to that.

But just to get a sense of this, if you're not quite sure you understand what this points to, simply compare: Notice how acceptable it is and how common for people or groups to argue with others, to accuse them of doing something ethically wrong, with the other party arguing back. It's often unpleasant, but it's perfectly acceptable in our society and quite common—it goes on all the time.

But consider how unacceptable it is and how very uncommon to accuse another of living a life that is not worthwhile. "Look at your life. Actually, you're really not living with any deep meaningfulness. It's not a worthy life. It's not a worthwhile life." This is not acceptable to say to someone, and it's very, very uncommon to actually say it, even less common probably to even think it, because we're barred from that kind of view.

It would be unheard of if someone said, "I see you have family and children you care for, you have fun and many experiences, you travel, you're relatively kind—but actually, it's kind of meaningless. It's not a worthwhile life you're living." This is completely unacceptable in our society and pretty much unheard of. This gives you a sense of how far the divorce and division between these two questions has gone.

What happens then is that this first question about a worthwhile life—about what's good to be and good to love, what ought I to love, should I aspire to, what's the best thing to aspire to—is actually forgotten. Often it's not given attention. The question is forgotten and neglected.

On a social level, what emerges is a kind of directionless society without any basis or substantial foundation, without deep soil, deep fundament on which to erect an ethics or even decide about ethics. As advances in technology, consumerism, global population, and globalization thrust upon us different ethical emergencies, dilemmas, situations that need response, we have less and less soil, less foundation on which to grapple with such issues. On a societal level, we get a kind of rudderlessness—not only without rudder, but without even training in how to use one.

But it's generally said that people should decide this question for themselves about what's worthwhile, what it's good to be, what it's good to love, to aspire for, to strive for, what constitutes a truly meaningful life.

But what does "decide for themselves" really mean? Is it something they truly, deeply ponder with all their heart and mind and soul? Or do we just not think about it much? Or think about it briefly in our teens and then get pulled along by something, following what colleagues are following, just following the vedanā—following the pleasant vedanā, avoiding the unpleasant?

What actually happens to that whole question? It's quite interesting. It's not black and white. Some people do ask, "What's a beautiful life?" as I explored in the Sila and Soul talks. When you think of a beautiful life or the good life—yes, it's good to be rich, it's good to be handsome or beautiful.

It's good to be popular, maybe even famous if I can. It's good to have this and that and other material things. And it's good to have and get pleasant and interesting experiences and travel and all that. That would be one answer.

A more conscious answer would perhaps not even be stated as such, but rather incorporated into the direction and choices of one's life. A spiritual practitioner, Buddhist or otherwise, might say: well, it's good to be kind. It's good to be warm. It's not good to be arrogant. It's good to be helpful to the world in some way. It's good to be relatively confident so that I can actually manifest that kindness and warmth and help.

What we recognize here is the language of values and virtues, but they're only half anchored in dimensionality. It's just good to be those things. It's appealing to be kind, warm, not arrogant, helpful, relatively confident. But this is only half anchored in dimensionality, and therefore it's only half-hearted.

Yes, this person might appear kind and warm and not arrogant and helpful and relatively confident. This person has achieved that. It's good. Maybe it took them a little work. Maybe not so much. But because it was only half-anchored, only half-rooted in a deep dimensionality, it's only half-hearted, their attitude to those values and virtues. It's only half-souled.

Or there may be a kind of dim or vague sense of the dimensionality and divinity of those values, virtues, qualities—kindness, warmth, relative humility, helpfulness, confidence. So there's maybe a dim or vague sense of their dimensionality or divinity. But neither the conceptual framework around their dimensionality, nor the eros in relationship to them—and those things are completely related, the conceptual framework and the eros—neither are allowed to operate fully. This could be for all kinds of different reasons: a block to the eros, a conceptual framework that one hasn't troubled to think through because one's just adopted bits and bobs of other conceptual frameworks and has a bit of a hodgepodge that remains incoherent and therefore not as powerful and galvanizing and as delivering as it could be.

This is actually relatively common among people who would consider themselves, for example, Buddhist practitioners.

What's rarer among Buddhists, certainly in the West, is another type of response to all this. It's rarer, but it exists in certain Abhidhamma-dominated schools of Buddhism. If even a Western practitioner has been saturated or open to that so much it begins to really pervade their way of thinking, then they do think a lot perhaps about what's the good life, what's a really worthwhile life. It's the maximization of positive qualities of the citta. The maximization of mind moments of positive qualities—this mind moment of kindness, this mind moment of helpfulness, this mind moment of compassion. And a minimizing of negative qualities or minimizing of mind moments dominated by negative qualities as they're classified by the Abhidhamma.

The whole way of thinking about the thing is as if it's some kind of mechanical system. These people are much less rare in certain insight meditation circles. In other insight meditation circles, you'll come across them quite a lot. So it depends what circles you move in.

But it could well be that someone listening to a person like that is actually a little disturbed. It sounds almost scary. It sounds so one-dimensional—a machine-like notion, logos, of the human being. This mechanical system of maximizing the positive mind moments and minimizing the negative moments is supposed to somehow deliver us to nibbāna.

A person can come away and feel: whoa, they're making all the right noises as far as Buddhist philosophy is concerned, I guess. It kind of gels with the teachings, but there's something almost ghoulish about it, ghost-like almost, monstrous, inhuman, Frankenstein-like. There's something hollowed out in the human being there. This is somehow not a beautiful life. Somehow it's almost not quite human. And for all the carefully, precisely incisive talk about virtues, what sounds like a very careful, discriminating, precise intelligence at work somehow also sounds sparkingly stupid in some way.

Or, you know, the whole thing—this whole talk about worthwhile life and values and virtues and aspirations, striving—can just go for a person right into the inner critic.

And the inner critic can just appropriate that whole set of ideas and that whole question and turn on oneself. The inner critic attacks the being, and the whole thing becomes very tight, very contracted, very self-depreciating and self-destructive—not soulful at all. Just as certain kinds of Abhidhamma-dominated Buddhists might come across as what we would call extremely unsoulful, similarly someone who's not even thinking that way can find that the inner critic hijacks the whole conversation. And that's not soulful at all.

But this divorce, this split and jettisoning and forgetting or ignoring—this debarring from approaching the first question of what is it good to be, what is a worthwhile life, what is a beautiful life, what is of utmost value—this relegating and forgetting, or only half-heartedly thinking about and including these questions, is part of the wider and deeper great crisis of modernity and post-modernity.

In our modernist, post-modernist culture, we can easily talk about the need to reduce suffering. But how do we calculate that? How do we compare different sufferings, different kinds of sufferings? What even are the different kinds of sufferings? That's related to what are the different kinds of value, of meaningfulness, and how they stand in relationship to each other.

Again, we can talk about wanting to reduce suffering or wanting to support human flourishing—another kind of modernist and post-modern trope. But what on earth does human flourishing mean? Unless you're talking about just biological survival, we can have a very poor understanding of what human flourishing means, good as it sounds, important as it sounds, wondrously enlightened and noble and modern as it sounds. Unless we actually go into this question of what is of value, what is really good, what is the ultimate good, what makes a life really worthwhile, we cannot possibly decide what human flourishing involves.

So one big need is to expand the conversation so that there are two questions, not just what I ought to do, but what it's good to be and what maybe I ought to love—included and put together, with one as a subset of the other.

The second thing we discussed was what would be a list of wishes or needs for an ethical system to be incorporated into ethical practice. I ran through a list of, depending on how you count it, six or seven items. If we include this expansion of the domain of what ethics means, which we just talked about, there are also other needs for an ethical system.

It needs to be more than a legal system. We need to be talking about something that's more than law and more than just rights—my rights to this, your rights to that, combating rights. It needs to include, secondly, the possibility of what we call sins of omission, which really means a sort of direction, the possibility and space for higher aspiration, for ethical growth.

Third, it needs to include and engage our emotions, the whole range of our emotional life and our heart capacity. That needs to be very much a part of what we bring to ethics and what ethics actually involves for us. But it needs to be more than that—more than just our emotions or just being governed by emotions, more than just involving our emotions as instrument and guide.

Another need is that we must be talking about, thinking about and practicing ethics in a way that allows love of ethics—and even eros for ethics, for values and virtues and living ethically—to come in, to be given space, and to be honored. It's not just natural for it to be there, but it's actually intrinsic and necessary.

Then we also talked about dimensionality, and that's mostly what I want to start talking about today. We need some kind of rooting in other dimensions, some kind of sense of dimensionality to the whole notion of ethics. Ethics needs rooting in other dimensions. All this requires ontologies and epistemologies that ground it and make sense of it. If we're Buddhist, that means our ontology needs to be more than just saying everything's empty.

Lastly, another need is that all this be related to the sense of what a human being is and what a human being can be.

So all those—seven or eight needs, depending on how we count. They're not separate, and you can't go through them in a linear order, at least I can't see a way of doing so. They involve and imply each other, these different needs.

For example, when we talked about emotions the other day, I mentioned the grief ritual. There's a kind of grief ritual conceived as and functioning effectively as a space where people can really let their grief rip, where they can cry or feel emotions deeply and not be shamed for that, maybe even be held for that.

There's that kind of grief ritual, so conceived, so functioning. And there's another kind of grief ritual, which is more to contextualize the grief. And part of the way it puts the grief into context is by connecting levels. And that would be exactly connecting levels, for example, of human being and soulful being or spiritual being, connecting levels in the cosmos between matter and whatever we're going to say—matter and soul, whatever. But other rituals function to connect levels and then even to transform levels. And partly what they do then is they contextualize.

Such a grief ritual is conceived and probably won't function in the same way as the first kind of grief ritual. It won't give rise to such a great amount of emotion and tears. But it's still extremely important—extremely important, I would say. So they're both important. There's something about the second one that's easily overlooked.

So emotions are not always the most important thing. And again, in the absence of a place for dimensionality—because that's what the second kind of ritual does: it connects dimensions, or it gives dimensionality, and that's part of the contextualizing of grief or contextualizing of matter or contextualizing of life or contextualizing of death or whatever it is. But in the absence of a place for dimensionality, then our conceptual framework, again implicit or explicit, whether it's conscious and explicitly spelled out or implicit, it can become limited and limiting, even when we're very well-intended.

We really need to feel our emotions about species loss or species extermination. It's very well-intended, but there's something I'm not understanding. There's more to this than my emotion of grief, no matter how deep and bottomless the grief can feel. Actually, the bottomlessness of the grief may be a clue that another dimension is needed. And until that other dimension is conceived and sensed—even if both the conception and the sense are vague—until then, that grief will be literally bottomless, because it's not contacting another dimension.

So that would be an example of how these different needs are not separate. The question of emotionality and the place of emotions is very connected to the place of the need for dimensionality. We could give a million different examples here, but they're really not separate. So I don't think there's a linear way through this.

When we come to thinking about how could we approach ethics through sensing the soul, through soul-making dharma and practice, first of all, a reminder regarding the soul-making dharma approach: this was all arrived at, or is being arrived at, through what we call a phenomenological approach. In other words, through our experience.

For some of us, it was arrived at through just the experience of appearances, of experiences, of perceptions, the whole ways of looking and fabrication notion—which is what I call the phenomenological approach, as far as it relates to emptiness. Just staying with that phenomenological approach all the way to the unfabricated, past the unfabricated, and then opening out and legitimizing the possibility of imaginal practice. So for some, the whole thing is just based on one phenomenological approach, or rather a thread that just evolves.

Or the phenomenological approach in the sense based on experience of having images and then paying attention to: hmm, these images sometimes feel a certain way, or I notice certain things about them, and that's what we'll begin to call, that's what makes them imaginal. The twenty-eight elements—that's, and other things not included in the list of the twenty-eight. I'm just going phenomenologically, I'm just going from my experience, including the experience of "this is important." There's something about images when they come like this, when they're imaginal, that's important.

So all this, just as a reminder, was arrived at through phenomenological approaches together with a kind of just bold and vigorous questioning of typical assumptions that we have in our culture or that we have in our subcultures, dharma or otherwise—typical logoi. So it was really just arrived at through phenomenology, meaning through our experience and through questioning certain inherited indoctrinations. It was not arrived at through some kind of abstract metaphysical speculation. So I think it's important not to lose sight of that in this day and age, where abstract metaphysical speculation has for hundreds of years now such a bad press.

When we come to thinking about soul-making dharma approach to ethics—and we said, well, basically, you could say, broadly speaking, we could divide that in two. One is through working with the imaginal figure, and the other is through the sense of values or virtues becoming imaginal ideas, the ideational imaginal. So two broad ways.

And just very, very briefly to say, well, okay, what does that mean in practice? So, for example, what does that mean in practice with regard to ethics? How would I bring such teachings and approaches to bear on ethics?

So very, very sketchily, let's say I feel drawn to do X, whatever it is—to express something, to write something, to do something, to refuse to do something, whatever it is. I feel drawn to do that, though I can see some ethical reasons why I shouldn't do that. So here's my ethical dilemma.

Is there an image, an imaginal image, related to doing X, related to doing X?

Again, it might be the very crucible of not knowing and the heat of the situation, the pressure of the situation I feel in the soul that gives birth—that in the alchemy of the heat and pressure in the crucible, it gives birth to an image, it gives rise to an image. But is there an image related to doing X? It might be of doing X, but is it related to doing X? Is it a soul-making image? Is it what we call the authentic imaginal? Is it genuine imaginal? Are all the elements there?

We have to be so careful with this, so careful. So is there a sense of duty in relation to that image? And what's the sense of the refraction of the duty? Am I taking it literally? Am I taking it concretely? Is there autonomy of self? Do I have a choice here? Is there humility? Is there fullness of intention? These are really—I'm just selecting some of the really, really obviously important elements here. Is there fullness of intention here? Why do I want to do X? Is there the fullness of intention?

So that's really a question. I have to explore it imaginally. Is there an image? And is that really a truly imaginal image with all the elements there? And even then, that's not quite enough. What's the refraction?

And then maybe one thinks about not doing X, whatever X is. And maybe there is an image related to that. Or maybe actually there isn't an image, and that's partly why one feels not so cool that way. One can still see that ethically one could make a case that it's important to not do X. So maybe there's a sense of values there. So if there's not an image, it's like, oh, what are the values that are related to not doing X? Not doing X expresses or upholds certain ethical values. And can I sense into those values with soul? Can I relate to those imaginal ideas, those values, those virtues, with soul?

So even though doing X might be actually an imaginal figure, not doing X may be an imaginal figure, may be just a sense of the ideational-imaginal. But I have to really, really work the practice with all the sophistication, all the care, and all the subtlety of attention and all that attunement. And then compare the soulfulness, compare the sense of soul-making either way, and use that as a guide to ethical choice.

Or it might be that here's an ethical choice that I'm needing to make. Here's some situation in my life. And I can see values on both sides, in either branch of this forking of the road. Choose this, there are values. Choose that, there are values. There is what Hartman would call an antinomy. There's a moral antinomy there. Actually, it might be a question of hierarchical difference. Either way, it doesn't matter. Can I sense with soul into each value and each choice, the imaginal idea, the ideational image of each value and each choice, and do that very carefully?

I sense the values on both sides. It's either an antinomy or maybe a hierarchy—hierarchical choice—but I'm sensing what Hartman would call antinomy versus hierarchy. I'm sensing each of these imaginal ideas, these values, each choice, with soul as carefully as I can. Again, then I'm comparing the soulfulnesses on each side.

So very, very briefly, that would be a way to proceed, very sketchily. It's the kind of thing we're talking about as a basic idea.

If we think about this whole approach to ethics, we can divide it up broadly into an approach with an imaginal figure and an approach with an imaginal idea, virtues or values.

So if we talk about the first approach—let's not go too far, let's spend a little time with working with an imaginal figure.

An imaginal figure has an ethos. It has an ethos and it has an ethical perspective. That's partly why values is one of the 28 elements of the imaginal. An imaginal figure has an ethos and an ethical perspective. This figure, that monster, that snake, whatever it is, that flower, that tree.

So there's another possibility for practice here that I would like to suggest and just sketch some instructions. You're familiar by now with the practice we sometimes call twoness, sometimes the balance of attention. I'd like to introduce the practice of threeness and a balance of attention within threeness.

In a situation—let's really talk about practice now. Here's a situation: maybe I'm with someone else, or I'm having some kind of dialogue with someone, or they're saying something to me, or it's a difficult interaction, whatever, some kind of situation. There's an other, there's myself, and then there's a third, which is an imaginal figure that has come to me. It might be an old imaginal figure that I've known for years, or one that's just come very recently or even in that moment perhaps.

Can I play with the balance of attention, the relative weighting of my attention between the three? So what is it? I'm here with this other person in this situation or here with this situation. Ten percent of my attention, let's say, with the imaginal figure, and the other divided between myself and the other, myself as a regular human being. Or divide three ways equally, 33% each, or 50% with the imaginal figure, or whatever. It's similar to the twoness balance of attention exercise, but now it's threeness.

The question is, what then happens to my sense of the situation? What then happens to my sense of the situation with this other person or some other situation?

One could do it in real time. In other words, this is going on now. I'm putting myself in a situation and trying this. I think I gave an example several times over recent years of that image I have of me as a jazz musician, which is actually kind of its real life, its memory. I was a jazz musician, but it's become image for me in all kinds of ways and very rich ways and sometimes difficult ways and sometimes just very beautiful ways. But sometimes I think I shared a couple of times that having that sense of jazz musician just a tiny little bit in the very background, let's say in an interview, in a dharma interview. It's just very much there in the background, but it's affecting my whole sense of the situation and how I respond and the whole dance of the interaction. It's very, very subtle.

So that would be an example. That's using it in the now, because one could do this—here's a present situation, and one's using an image, it's a past image, one's resurrecting it deliberately, deliberately calling it to life in the moment, and then just having it be in the background, or more in the foreground, or whatever it is, for a situation that's happening now.

One can also do this with a memory of a situation, a memory perhaps of a difficult situation or a confusing situation or one that we ended up feeling very contracted from or we ended up judging ourselves or whatever it is.

So that's one thing—bringing the image into the situation, then playing with the balance of attention, seeing how it affects the sense of the situation. Playing with the balance of attention three ways, and how do the relative balances affect the sense of the situation? Whether it's the memory of a situation or a situation in the present life.

Then there's also the possibility here: can I sense into the imaginal figure's perspective, their feelings, their evaluation of things? So it might be the imaginal figure's evaluation of me. The imaginal figure's evaluation of my stuff, or even my old stuff, the place where I trip up, the place where I get caught again. How do they see it? What's their perspective on it? On my stuff, my difficulties, my mistakes. I feel like if I'm doing it from there, I feel like I did make a mistake there. Can I get a sense of the imaginal figure's perspectives, feelings and evaluations on me, my stuff, my difficulties, my blocks, my mistakes?

Can I get a sense of the imaginal perspectives, feelings and perspectives of the other? Can I get a sense of the imaginal figure's perspectives and feelings and evaluation of the whole situation, whether it's an obviously ethical situation or not? I think there's a lot of potential here.

Can I enter into the imaginal figure, inhabit it, see through its eyes, sense through its senses, feel through its heart? It might be a stage further of really immersing there into that. So this is more than seeing an image and seeing what it does in imaginal meditation. And it's also more than just an image of sense of me. There's a lot of possibilities here.

But an imaginal figure has an ethos and an ethical perspective. Sometimes what happens is we get blinkered or caught or blinded ethically. And sometimes an imaginal figure, because values is one of the elements of the imaginal, can shine a different light on a situation, an ethical situation, on ourselves, on an interaction, on our difficulties, on our mistakes, on all kinds of things.

So again, a very brief sketch of another kind of practice, but I think very certainly soul-making, potentially, and also helpful in all kinds of ways. One of the ways I'm thinking about is with regard to shame. Because there might be either in a situation or after a situation we feel inadequate, or our shame, our kind of habitual sense of shame locks in. So doing this kind of practice, either now live or in memory, can really open things up and actually begin to separate out what we might call a shallow kind of shame. There's nothing but dukkha there. It's not necessary. It's not serving any function other than creating dukkha and a binding for ourself—ego shame, shallow shame.

Separating that out from what we might call a kind of soul shame, or soul-level shame, which may be more authentic, may have more necessity, maybe will be more fruitful. I think I gave a talk on the Path of the Imaginal retreat called something like "The Love and the Demands of the Imaginal," deliberately putting in the title what can seem like they don't go together—the love and the demands of the imaginal. Opening up the whole notion of duty to image, duty to soul.

So there's so much here that's potentially important, potentially healing at different levels, just in terms of dissolving or blowing away the kind of shallow shame, but also opening up to maybe a level of shame that is actually in itself healing—something we don't tend to think of—a healthy shame, a healing shame that connects us more with our soul power and soulfulness and sense of duty and meaningfulness and redeems something, reconnects, recontextualizes something or contextualizes it. I think there are a lot of possibilities here.

Let's linger. Again, let's not go too fast. I do want to talk about dimensionality primarily. I just want to linger a little bit on this whole question of shame and guilt.

Very loosely, I would say shame has to do with—at least the way I would define it—a negative view of how I am. I am bad or I am worthless or whatever it is. I am. It's a painful belief and binding belief about how I am. Guilt is a view or views about what I did or what I neglected to do. And it's quite possible, of course—there's a connection here—because it's quite possible that if I'm not careful with a guilt I feel in relation to what I did and didn't do, that I felt I should or shouldn't have done, it's possible that that guilt starts congealing, mortifying, and actually like a kind of rigor mortis into a sense of shame. It becomes something more pervasive, a conclusion that I then carry around or walk around in about who I am. It's quite possible that the guilt, if we're not careful with it, can lead to a more pervasive and long-lasting shame about who I am.

Of course, it's also possible the other way around. To the degree that I have a shame and I carry around or walk around in a shame about who I am, it's more likely that I will perceive situations and conclude without much thought at all that I am guilty of doing this wrong or neglecting to do that, which would have been better.

So these are loaded subjects in our culture, shame and guilt. And a lot of us inherit, of course, as part of our inheritance around ethics and morals, quite a painful relationship with these ideas of shame and guilt coming, some would say, through certain Christian teachings or interpretations of different teachings—different Christian teachings of original sin or whatever it is. Of course, that's not the case with all people. It doesn't have to be the case for Christian teachings. But I think a lot of people do feel that way.

And so the whole area of shame and guilt is something one just can't go near—those terms or those experiences as human beings—in any way that's helpful at all, other than trying to dissolve them or dismiss them. And then a lot of people come to Buddha Dharma because it seems that Buddha Dharma doesn't talk in terms of original sin and guilt and that sort of thing. And indeed, a lot of the way it is taught now in the West is very free of such terms and such even suggestions as shame and guilt and all that.

But the Buddha did in fact talk about these kinds of things. And he talked about hiri and ottappa. Two Pali words—hiri and ottappa. And he called them the guardians of the world. Hiri and ottappa, the guardians of the world. He said when these qualities wane—hiri and ottappa wane—human society moves towards the animal realm. Humans become more like animals and human society becomes more like the animal realm.

What's he talking about? Hiri is something we could say more—I don't know if internally directed is the right word—but it's really the innate sense of shame over a moral transgression. So we really feel ashamed for doing something wrong. And it's connected with our own self-respect. It's related to a sense of our personal honor. This is in the Itivuttaka, for those of you who are interested, among other places, I think.

And then Otapa is more externally oriented—though I don't find that a completely satisfying division. It's the moral dread, sometimes translated as fear of the results of moral wrongdoing. So while Hiri is this innate sense of shame over a moral transgression, Otapa is a moral dread or fear of the results of wrongdoing, which includes fear of blame and punishment by others. The Buddha says these are really important qualities. We need to be afraid of being blamed and punished by others in our community, in our society. It's also a fear of the karmic consequences of wrongdoing, and a fear that by wrongdoing I will scupper my chances of attaining Nibbana.

Buddhaghosa gives a striking analogy. It's like having an iron rod where Hiri is the excrement smeared on one end of the rod—you wouldn't want to pick up the rod there. But Otapa is as if the other end has been placed in a fire and is red hot—you wouldn't want to pick up the rod there either. So there's Hiri, a kind of disgust or shame at picking up the rod at the defiled end, and there's Otapa, the fear of picking up the burning end and completely scorching your hand.

Shame or disgust, and moral dread or fear of the result of moral wrongdoing. The Buddha says whatever evil arises springs from a lack of Hiri and Otapa. He also says all virtuous deeds spring from the sense of Hiri and Otapa—which I find interesting, though somewhat problematic and limiting, because it leaves no room for eros. All vir-tuous deeds spring from a sense of shame or fear? Where's the room for eros there? Still, these teachings are clearly there in the Buddha's words, and you can hear just how much he emphasized them and how strong he was in articulating their importance.

It's interesting too because nowadays in postmodern society, we put a lot of emphasis on recognizing whether something is socially or communally constructed and contingent. And it sounds, to a large degree, like some of what the Buddha is talking about here in Otapa is exactly that. This raises questions about whether that's necessarily problematic, or what it means for its ontological status—though I won't go into that now.

Going back to the Sila and Soul talks, we discussed following Hartmann the idea that there is and should be a place for healthy shame and healthy guilt. That's what Hartmann mostly talks about—healthy guilt. I wonder whether there's a way of redeeming this whole area in terms of our ethical practice, our ethical sensibility, and our approach to ethics.

After the Nuremberg trials, Nazi war criminals were named and shamed, then executed. Nowadays there's this teaching about "don't name and shame," but they were named and shamed. It may have to do with what is deemed in society at the time as outrageous enough to warrant naming and shaming. So there's maybe a place—and there is a place, as I've written about and talked about—for ending or dissolving feelings of guilt, thinking more about actions and the conditions that gave rise to actions rather than persons. The importance of that approach is clear. But maybe there's also a place for taking responsibility and cultivating a healthy sense of guilt.

I saw headlines recently about how in Dutch culture, in Holland, flight shaming is becoming more acceptable—that it's increasingly okay to suggest to someone that they're flying too much and unnecessarily, pointing out the ethical cost of that. Well, why should that not be okay? Or shaming someone for driving SUVs? These vehicles use so much more fuel and emit so much more carbon than regular cars, requiring so many more resources. They're the fastest-growing segment of the automotive industry, so much so that the industry is not reducing its overall emissions at all—it's actually increasing them because of the proliferation of SUVs sold.

I don't know. Maybe there's a place for shaming. Maybe it's a necessary thing.

In terms of flight patterns, I didn't read the full articles, but I do remember being around different groups of senior teachers and sometimes hearing them talk about flying all over to teach retreats, discussing their frequent flyer status. Sometimes when people talk about this, it almost sounds like subtle boasting, or identification with being important because one flies a lot.

Perhaps the culture and society will hopefully, in not too long a time, evolve to a point where that kind of subtle boasting or identification as being important will be about as acceptable as subtly boasting about how many slaves one owns. I've talked about this before. It's easy to say, "But I'm flying for the Dharma. Because I'm teaching Dharma, it's contributing to less suffering"—just as the slave owner would say, "Well, I'm helping the economy, aren't I?"

Sometimes this whole idea of what it's okay to shame and what it isn't is really socially determined, based on where the average or lowest bar of ethical views of right and wrong have reached in a society at any given time.

Anyway, it might be that, certainly with regard to the ideation of the imaginal—the imaginal ideas of values and virtues—there can be, as Hartman said, a sense of guilt. He said that in the sincere soul, there needs to be a sense of guilt. There needs to be a place for that, as something that's inevitable in ethical life and practice. So maybe that has its place.

Also, with regard to imaginal figures, reverence is one of the elements of the imaginal. When I was trying to find the right term, I remember looking up the word "reverence," and it's related, I think from the Latin, to the capacity to feel fear and awe in relationship to something. So maybe this too—wrapped up in the reverence, there's a place for something like hiri and otappa. Whether we're talking about imaginal ideas of values and virtues, or an imaginal figure and how we are or are not refracting that figure, there's a possibility of shame or guilt—ahiri, atappa—for not trying to approach something, a situation, an ethical choice, without having tried to approach it with sensing the soul. And then feeling hiri or otappa, some kind of shame or guilt for that, but a healthy one—one that takes us forward, that inspires us to do something differently when the next situation comes.

Remember, all this, when we're talking about soul-making and the imaginal, is in the context of the benevolence of an image. Love and loving. Love and being loved. Being loved—that's an element of the imaginal. And I would say also, when you really get into the practice of the ideational imaginal, the ideas also can love you. They will love you.

They do love you. So in the ideational imaginal, there's a sense of benevolence. We are in relationship with beings, figures, imaginal ideas that love us and place demands on us. Love and demands of the imaginal, love and demands of imaginal ideas.

That word "benevolence," again from Latin—bene vol, where vol is related to our will, to wanting. Bene, good—they want what's good for us. There's a beneficence; they want what's good for us. Benevolent—that's what it actually means.

Someone asked me a little while ago what I mean by this element of dimensionality shading into divinity. Partly in trying to open it out a bit more with words, I'd say it's pointing to a sense of benevolent mystery. So when I have a sense of an image having this dimensionality shading into divinity, I partly mean there's a sense of benevolent mystery there. Mystery, but also benevolent. And one senses that, even if only subtly and vaguely.

Dimensionality is, to me, related to the word depth. And depth—one way of understanding what that word means—is that something's deep if it's not immediately apparent or immediately obvious. So that's the mystery. There's a benevolent mystery. That's part of what mystery means: depth. Not immediately obvious. Something is not immediately obvious. It's kind of hidden from immediate, obvious view.

But the hiddenness that's part of this dimensionality shading into divinity is not menacing. It's not like something I can't make out that's kind of sinister or menacing, or where the fact that I can't sense what it is clearly is somehow ominous. So this benevolence is very much part of what we mean by dimensionality shading into divinity.

It also means, as related to having soft and elastic edges—which is another of the elements—the dimensionality and the divinity is not sharply defined or clearly delineated.

So, dimensionality—that's what I wanted to begin talking about today. And I said in the last talk, you know, ethics needs something in order to ground ethics, in order to make sense of ethics, in order to evaluate between different ethical choices, in order for the whole thing to really function without any...

Continue beautifying this talk (part 11/17). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

[PRECEDING CONTEXT]
But the hiddenness there
that's part of this dimensionality shading into divinity is not menacing.
It's not like something I can't make out and it's kind of sinister or menacing or the fact that I can't sense what it is clearly is kind of ominous in some way.

So that's this benevolence is very much part of what we mean by dimensionality shading into divinity.
It also means as related to having soft and elastic edges, which is another of the elements.
The dimensionality and the divinity is not sharply defined, clearly delineated.
So, dimensionality, I said that's what I wanted to begin talking about today.
And I said in the last talk, you know, ethics needs, it needs something in order to ground ethics, in order to make sense of ethics, in order to evaluate between different ethical choices, in order for the whole thing to kind of really function without any meaning in our lives and any vitality in our lives, something needs to be sensed or granted as having a higher or deeper dimension, order, or level.
[END CONTEXT]

In that higher, deeper dimension or order, because of this very depth, meaningfulness, value, purpose, and sanctity—in the broadest range of that term—naturally reside there. Without that sense of granting or sensing dimensionality in something, ethics cannot really work. It simply doesn't function very well.

Scientific materialism—a way of thinking that attempts to explain everything, all phenomena and experience, the whole of the cosmos both inner and outer—tries to reduce everything to purely material things, to small material elements like billiard balls. As an approach or enterprise to explain the whole of existence and all our experience, scientific materialism implies that there isn't a reality to values. They're not grounded in anything real. There's no possibility of grounding values in anything substantial.

This creates profound difficulties. It becomes very hard in such an enterprise of scientific materialism to even justify why we should try to reduce suffering in the world. Because suffering itself is scientifically and materialistically reduced—it's just the movement of particles in the universe. What's suffering? Well, it's really a material thing, some neurological impulses. That's really what suffering is, because that's what everything is. And neurological impulses can be reduced to neurotransmitters and molecules across neurological synapses, all of which come down to molecules, down to subatomic particles. Really, suffering is just a shifting, a moving around of particles in the universe. It has no more or less worth than anything else.

So even trying to justify why we should reduce suffering and make that the basis of ethics can have no grounding. If there's no dimensionality, everything's equal—it's just matter. Everything.

The scientific method also rules out human feeling regarding anything. In the scientific method, we try to put aside my feelings, my affects, my desires and wishes. That's all second-class citizen, a distorting thing. Put that aside. So my feelings about anything, including my feelings about values and what's valuable and deeply valuable, the scientific method sidelines.

Now the scientific method may study feelings and even measure them more recently. But it still can offer no real grounding or basis for them. As a psychologist, I might decide to study human feelings and measure them through brainwave activity or questionnaires or whatever. But I still can give no real grounding or basis for them.

Scientific materialism becomes impossible as a foundation from which to root any ontology of ethics. There's nothing real to give any rooting for ethics. There's no recourse to something of value to explain why we should do this and why we shouldn't do that ethically.

Let me point out something about reductionism and dimensionality. A kind of scientific reductionism that reduces everything down to billiard ball-like particles is a reduction merely to smaller units of the same kind of stuff. It's a flattening reductionism. If I start with something that feels rich, like my sense of value, and reduce it down to billiard ball-like particles, I'm taking something that was dimensional and rich and reducing it to something very flat.

If I'm talking about matter and reduce this table down to billiard ball-like particles in my theory of it, that's also a flattening reductionism—a reductionism that doesn't introduce another dimension.

However, if my scientific reduction goes down past such basic particles, down to quantum mathematical probability functions—which exist as complex mathematical functions related to probability in a kind of multidimensional abstract mathematical space—then something different happens. I've gone past electrons. What's an electron? Actually, an electron is this: we can't point to a particle or a wave. All we can point to is this kind of abstract, multidimensional, mathematical entity existing in mathematically multidimensional space. It's not even matter anymore. We've reduced to something of a different kind, a different order. Then we have given a kind of dimensionality.

It's not a flattening, but we've actually dimensionalized matter. We've gone from something that seems obvious - even if it's just small bits of solidity - to something that we can't even really say is the same kind or order of stuff. There's a different dimension there. So that's also a reduction, but it's got dimensionalizing in it.

Still, that second kind of reduction that is dimensionalizing - where we go down to these very abstract entities, where what's really real is not the table, not even the electron or the proton, but these abstract, very complex, very sophisticated mathematical entities, mathematical functions, equations that exist in a strange, abstract, mathematically multidimensional space - that's what's real. It gives a kind of dimensionalizing, but it would still be problematic if that view attempts to "explain" - put that in quotes - things like human love and sense of meaning through that reduction. In other words, again, if it's scientistic, if it attempts a reduction of the totality of existence, of being, and so forth, it's still not flattening, but it would be very problematic. It's not capable of doing so. It's not capable of making sense that way.

So dimensionality is what I'm going to start looking at now. We've just touched on it already briefly. It's a complicated subject and difficult to even find the right language to talk about it, but one way that a sense of dimensionality has historically been ripped out of our exploration of ethics is something we can trace historically.

One of its roots actually came from the Protestant Reformation. One way that emerged from that seed, from that revolution really, ended up impoverishing the kinds of dimensionality that human beings could feel and conceive of and sense in existence - in relation to all kinds of things and also in relation to ethics. It came through the Protestant Reformation partly because one of the main things the Protestant Reformation set out to do was to abolish and reject any kind of mediation between a human being and God. This was one of its central attempts and thrusts and insistencies: to reject anything that was intermediate between the human being and God.

So no priests - no priests with any kind of higher function or who served as intermediaries in any way. No sacraments either - no holy ritual or holy object, no sanctified object, whatever it is, that could mediate or was necessary to mediate between a human being and God. There was this attempt at completely getting rid of any intermediaries: priests, sacraments, and so forth.

What that brought with it was also a kind of affirmation or elevation or emphasis on ordinary life. It wasn't just the life in the church, and certainly not the Eucharist or the Mass or the priest who was needed as an intermediary. They also - not quite the same point, but connected - kind of rejected monasticism, monks and nuns. For a slightly different reason, probably connected, but one reason given was just basically: there's nothing between you and God, and it's totally up to you and God, that relationship. All of us need to have total commitment. There's no such thing as a person having more or less commitment. You either have a full commitment, or you're damned. A monastic was regarded as someone who had decided, "Yes, I do want to give everything to God. I do want to focus wholeheartedly on that. That is the highest thing. And my commitment is total."

In the Protestant Reformation, the view was that this just wasn't a healthy notion because all of us need to have a total commitment. So no monastics. But in a way that's silly, isn't it? It doesn't really bear out, just looking around us at humans. Clearly there are people with very different levels of motivation and commitment, even if we just talk about their music or art or poetry or whatever. We see it definitely as well in the world of Dharma and practice - there are people with very different motivations and also different levels of talent. So there's something a little bit silly with that. Anyway, that's a side point.

The principal thing I want to focus on now is this rejection of mediation: rejection of priests, of sacraments, but also a rejection of angels as intermediaries. All this came with the Protestant Reformation - rejection of angels and saints, and the Virgin Mary, anything that was an intermediary or could be seen or regarded as an intermediary between the human being and God.

There's a rejection of angels, and including therefore the role of angels as reflecting and refracting at different levels the totally inconceivable reality, nature, or being of God. We reject intermediaries, then angels get rejected, and their role of reflecting and refracting at different levels this totally inconceivable nature of God - that gets rejected as well. Also rejected is the understanding of angels as beings the human can in turn refract and mirror. That we can, as we talk about refracting the angel, reflecting, refracting the daimon, mirroring in our life the image - that gets rejected, thrown out as well.

Rejecting angels as beings that reflect and refract at different levels - you know, the totally inconceivable nature of God.

The transcendent, almost unknowable being-in-itself of God, and the rejection of angels as beings that humans can in turn refract, reflect, mirror, and be called by. In being called by these intermediaries, we come into more intimate relationship with and sense of the attributes of the divine. In refracting and mirroring the angels, we express and manifest in human life the attributes of the divine.

All this has to do with a hierarchy of being, a hierarchy of cosmic being: God, hierarchy of angels, human being, nature. I've touched on this before, but these Platonic ideas and forms are sometimes called—and they came to be regarded as—the attributes of God. We can think of them, as I said in the soul talks, as the ideational, imaginal.

They're related to these Platonic notions of ideas and forms and images—attributes of God and angels. Ideas, forms, ideational, imaginal, and images all can be seen and regarded as the attributes of God and angels.

So there's a dimensionality here that was scrapped, done away with, outlawed. A hierarchy of intermediaries, and that whole dimensionality that opened up with that, that was very much related to what was ultimately good, pointed and drew us towards what was good, that enabled us to refract and be drawn towards what was virtuous. It embodied virtue, connected virtue with the divine in that ultimate dimensionality, connected virtue with holiness, with that whole scale.

When we talk about images in soul-making dharma, and we talk about the ideational images, we can say that they are a dimension, as angels are in this old sense, pre-Reformation. They are a dimension, and we feel that we're refracting, reflecting something of a different level. We can also say, and we do say, they have dimensionality. Experientially, it's as if the sense of an image is as if in itself it has a dimensionality shading into divinity. So they are a dimension—their very existence tells us of a dimensionality—but they have in themselves, so to speak, or in our sense of them, they have, their being has a kind of dimensionality shading into divinity. They are and they have dimensionality.

In soul-making dharma, this dimensionality is a connection. This whole order of angels and angels as intermediaries is really something that connects. It's sometimes called a chain of being, although that phrase became mixed up and two very different ideas got confused in what that meant. But it connects with one thread these different levels of being, different dimensions.

When I pray to the angels in a supplicatory way, when I ask for help from the angels—and sometimes I do, sometimes I have a sense of the soul-making angels, the angels of soul-making—being so ill and unwell, sometimes trying to give talks and feeling in myself not able to, I will pray to the angels, my sense of the soul-making angel, the image, the imaginal sense of soul-making dharma angels.

In my sense of these angels and the supplication to them, they are not me, but they're also not not-me. They are not me, but they're not other than me. Or they are other, but there is this direct line from my being, from them to my being, that somehow includes my being. To say it another way, I participate in the angels, and they participate in me. I participate in an image, and this imaginal figure participates in me.

Historically, one of the things that happened in the Protestant Reformation—one of the seeds there—ended up having quite a devastating effect in all kinds of ways. There were a lot of really good things obviously as well, but it had quite devastating effects on how we relate to the legitimacy of the world of angels and any sense of intermediaries with divinity or a sense of dimensionality in all kinds of ways in our existence. We inherit that partly as imaginal practitioners. We inherit the history of Western theology and Western philosophy. We can't help bumping into or being buffeted by or constrained by the different elements of that history of Western thought.

Again, what happens when we don't have dimensionality is that it affects our sense of ethics. This illustrates one way it affects the sense of the imaginal, but also our sense of angels as reflecting the virtues, and the virtues being the ideas, the forms, which are the divine attributes of a God, of a divinity whose nature is actually completely transcendent and unspeakable, and beyond any attributes. When we rule out dimensionality, we actually limit what we can do with ethics.

I think human rights, which is something we've become so used to as a notion now, has its roots in Hobbes and Grotius and some others. The notion of civil rights—the roots of that are in Hobbes and Grotius—but it's not because a human being has these rights because, for example, they're made in the divine image, which would be calling on the divinity and the fact of human beings being made in the divine image to give a kind of dimensionality to justify the sanctity and the careful treating of human beings because they're made in the divine image.

When we say, "Why should human beings have rights? Because they're made in the divine image," it's giving a dimension as an explanation, as a grounding.

But the original movement and development of the idea of rights in society wasn't coming from the idea of divine image or that kind of grounding. It was coming, again, post-Reformation, as a kind of... people were trying to figure out a basis for law. So it wasn't even a question of morality and virtue, really. It was trying to ensure stable society, stable societies.

And it was devised, it came up as an idea in the times of the post-Reformation wars—enormous bloodshed and brutality in Europe at that time, and also the civil war in England, likewise very bloody and traumatic. How can we have a sort of basis for law? When people started thinking away from purely theological and soul questions and dimensions to ground ethics, to more legal ways of thinking about it, and contractual. What's the social contract? These are all ideas that were born then, post-Reformation, in attempts at a purely secular moral philosophy—in other words, one that wasn't grounded, or was only very little grounded, in recourse to the dimensionality of divinity.

This is a complete aside. I don't know if I've mentioned this in another talk. I was reading a book called—I think it's called Epistemologies of the South. It's a collection of academic essays by sort of post-colonial or anti-colonial thinkers. And one of them was pointing out that the whole notion of human rights was a colonial notion and a Western notion, and they were rejecting it. So it's a very surprising thing to read because we're so used to thinking—I'm so used to thinking of that as a kind of, this is really basic and important universal notion. Everyone could sign up to this. And this person was saying, no, that's something created by colonial white guys. Anyway, that's an aside.

So when there's no dimensionality, then it's very easy for ethics to slide into what really becomes just law, or this kind of trying to figure out, okay, what are people's rights? And then you get this argument between rights, which is very hard to adjudicate, but it's partly because there's the withdrawing or the ruling out of any other dimensionality. And it has consequences.

So something needs to be sensed, sensed as or granted a higher dimensionality, a deeper dimensionality. It needs to be felt to be of a different level or order. And in that other level somehow naturally reside meaningfulness, value, purpose, sanctity, etc. And without that, we run into a lot of problems in our approach to ethics, in our trying to figure out ethical philosophies or practices.

Something or other needs to be sensed or granted as being of a higher, deeper dimensionality, level, order—whatever we're going to call it. And what happens—this is partly something I read in Charles Taylor recently. He uses a very different language and is coming at the thing from a slightly different angle. But when in the language we're using, when there's no dimensionality, or when the dimensionality is kind of hidden or unconscious—or we could also say in the language I've used in the past, when the soul preferences, because what I give dimensionality to has also to do with where my sense of soul-making is.

But when the dimensionality of my soul and or my soul preferences are hidden or unconscious, it brings certain consequences to the philosophy. So we've talked about—I talked about in other talks in the past—what happens... Or rather, am I choosing a dharma? Am I choosing a notion of awakening and goal and all that? Am I choosing a dharma based on really what my soul is desiring as a way of feeling myself and the cosmos? What kind of cosmos do I want to live in? What's my fantasy of self and cosmos? And then building the dharma around that. And that not being admitted. That actually I want to see the cosmos this way and I want to see myself in relation to the cosmos this way and that's why I'm choosing this kind of version of the Dharma.

So when a dimensionality is refused or it's hidden, unconscious, what you get is a kind of—Charles Taylor says in his words—parasitic philosophies. And I'm not sure whether he said this for all or at least some of what he calls Enlightenment-derived modern positions. I don't think it's all of them, but I'm not sure if he actually says that. They're parasitic in that they're actually relying on some already established moral assumptions about right or wrong, about what should be right—what should be done or not done. But they're refusing to give a why. They're refusing, in other words, to give a dimensionality. There's no grounding in anything else.

So they're parasitic on older philosophies that already, or older notions, older currents in the society that already established these assumptions around ethics. And they just take the same assumptions. They don't change them at all. They just piggyback on them, but they withdraw the why.

They actually don't need to provide a why because there's already a current of people established in those moral assumptions about right and wrong. But also—and this is Charles Taylor pointing out—they provide no positive view, no constructive practice.

I would want to agree with this and actually elaborate on it. There's no positive view or positive framework of philosophy or practice, whether personal or governmental. You can tell when a philosophy is parasitic in this way—or even a dharma or approach—because it's characterized mostly by its polemic attack on other positions. Mostly what you hear is very little that's positive in the sense of constructing views, constructing practices, constructing coherent frameworks. Mostly what you would hear and read is polemic attack on some other view. Or if something is constructive, it's very thin soup.

I was giving you an example in some of those online seminars about trying to construct a Buddhist aesthetics just around the Buddhist notion of impermanence—where art always has to point to impermanence, whatever kind of art. And it's terribly thin as an idea or framework. Very, very thin.

Without something being granted or sensed with a dimension—a deeper dimension, a higher, deeper dimension, order, level—it's actually impossible. It's impossible to ground ethics. It's impossible to make sense of it. It's impossible to even construct and give a why we should do this and not that.

I talk in the Sila talks about Richard Rorty and how, if you read his writings carefully, he will say: "We cannot ground it. There's no such thing as another dimension. There's no higher grounding. You cannot ground ethics in anything else." But then it just slips out in the language that he uses—he's using notions of what's good or bad. But he has no way of explaining or justifying why that is, because there's no other grounding.

I don't know exactly who Charles Taylor meant, but somehow in reading I got a sense that he was referring to what I think are called the New Atheists. There's nothing there except polemic attack on other positions. In terms of what's being offered as coherent construction of frameworks—conceptual frameworks—what's being offered in terms of practice, there's either nothing there at all or very thin soup. There's no way forward offered, really.

Again, with the soul-making dharma, there's both. We've tried to really create and discover a coherent conceptual framework that has depth and range, possibility of elasticity, but also practice. So conceptual framework and practice. And when we talk about ways of looking—practice, practice. It's not just the idea of ways of looking; it's the practice.

As we said, so many of these modern philosophers completely lack any practice. They might talk, like Richard Rorty does, about being open to different views: "keep the conversation going." But they have no way—as I've said this before—no way of actually practicing different ways of looking. So it's all just empty rhetoric. And again, you find there's actually very little offered.

Richard Rorty says—okay, so he's deconstructed this and that, and it's very good, excellent deconstruction of things to a certain extent—and he says what we really need to do is "keep the conversation going." That's his ethical standpoint: keep the conversation going. One of his main ethical standpoints.

But there is no conversation. There's just nothing to discuss. There's nothing offered. I can't take on other viewpoints to really engage in a conversation, and I'm not really offering anything of myself because I have no framework, because I have no dimensionality. All this is connected.

Looking back historically—and I should note I'm not a historian—we can see different ways that ethics has been provided with dimensionality, different attempts at giving ethics a foundation that would make sense of things, offer reasons, provide orientation, help adjudicate conflicts, and give justification.

I want to briefly mention these approaches now, though we'll return to explore them more deeply in our next talk. We could separate them into four main ways, though these are neither separate nor simple. I'm not presenting them chronologically, and in fact they aren't really chronologically divided either. They overlap, with different versions and variations arising on different timelines, along with modifications and combinations.

These four ways represent different attempts at providing dimensionality—another level, order, or dimension that can support ethics.

The first is what we might call rationality. This goes back to Plato, perhaps even Pythagoras, and who knows how much further back. But I want to emphasize that "rationality" is not a simple word. If you consider four philosophers—Plato, Locke, Kant, and Hegel—for whom rationality was central to their thinking about ethics, that word meant something very different to each of them.

There are at least two main ways rationality has been conceived, though there are many others as well. These different meanings of rationality connect with the second way of giving dimensionality to ethics: cosmic order.

One ancient way of conceiving and sensing the cosmos—lasting up through the Middle Ages—was as having a hierarchical, vertical order. That hierarchy of angels I mentioned earlier would be part of this structure. There's a kind of vertical ordering from the ultimate levels of the Godhead, the mystery of the divine, all the way down to the barest matter. We can speak of things being closer to or further from the divine. This is complex, with many different variations.

Another way of thinking about cosmic order, which came later, sees it as a more horizontal structure—the co-functioning of parts, like how an ecosystem works, or a machine, or a clock. Different parts exist at essentially the same level, functioning together, moving together, perhaps feeding off each other. It's a more horizontal order.

These two ways of thinking about cosmic order correspond to two ways of using either notion of order to ground ethics. For Plato, rationality meant seeing, sensing, and knowing this vertical cosmic order, then orienting one's life in relationship to it. It becomes clear what the highest good is, and what kind of scale or stairway leads to it. To be rational means to uncover this order, to see and sense it, and to live one's life in accordance with what it naturally suggests and demands.

For someone like Locke, rationality meant something very different—something more akin to what we mean today: being logical. Hegel understood it differently still, as did Kant. We'll explore these distinctions more deeply.

The third way of dimensionalizing ethics has been called voluntarism. This essentially says something is ethical because God said so—because God declared it in the Bible, or because the Bible records that God said it. There's dimensionality here because God is, by definition, a being of a different order, a different dimension, a different level. In this view, God possesses completely free will, and what grounds ethics is simply that God willed it so.

It has nothing to do with the structure of the universe. It has nothing to do with human rationality or our logic being able to discover what the most ethical thing is. It's simply God said so. God exists at a different level, in a different dimension, and therefore ethics gains its dimensionality through God's will. This is what philosophy calls voluntarism—God said so.

A fourth approach grounds ethics in suffering, or we might turn it around and say happiness. This involves attempting to calculate or estimate how much suffering this or that action would cause in comparison with another action, how much happiness would result, and trying to ground ethics in these notions of suffering and happiness.

Do you see how each of these makes its appeal as a dimension? There is an appeal in each to something intrinsically sacred, meaningful, good, valuable, true, higher. Actually, not the last one—I'm including it for now, but the utilitarian approach isn't really a dimension, which is part of its problem. This utilitarianism—thinking that reducing suffering is the most important thing, that increasing happiness is the most important thing—we'll return to this, I hope. But at least the other three, and in some way this fourth one, tries to mask itself as if it were another dimension.

So each of them appeals to something intrinsically sacred or good, ultimately valuable, meaningful, true, higher in some way. This implies or provides a why and a basis for ethics, whether it's an ethics of wrong and right or an ethics of what is good to love, good to be.

But each of these—rationality, cosmic order, voluntarism, reduction of suffering, increase of happiness—each has problems, has run into ways that it failed in the history of our culture. There are places where it fails. Some would say they have failed historically or philosophically, but each brings problems, has problems. There are places where it's easy to find where it simply doesn't function or no longer functions, where something becomes impossible.

I think I'll stop there for today. I just wanted to mention these approaches—these are the kinds of things that have been attempted as ways of providing dimensionality, or assumed to provide dimensionality, to ethics.

An example of a problem or failure was that notion of cosmic order. After the Protestant Reformation, and even more so with the Scientific Revolution, that idea of hierarchical order and an order of angels was either theologically brought into question, and then increasingly became more and more impossible to take seriously as reality as the scientific revolution grew. So that would be an example of the crumbling and disappearing of that as a possible way of dimensionalizing or giving dimension to ethics.

But I want to return to that as a possibility, in fact, in a different way. As with each of them, we could go through each one and see how it brings different problems.

But let's stop there for today.

CHAPTER 230

The Image of Ethics (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 2h22

> In this third part of his ethics series, Rob Burbea delves deeper into the need for dimensionality in ethical systems - the requirement for ethics to be rooted in something beyond the purely human realm. He examines four historical approaches to providing this dimensionality: voluntarism (God's commands), cosmic order (hierarchical universe), rationality as divine faculty, and simple utility (reducing suffering/increasing pleasure).
>
> Burbea traces how the Protestant Reformation's emphasis on God's absolute sovereignty eliminated intermediaries like angels, while the scientific revolution flattened our sense of cosmic hierarchy into purely mechanical order. He argues that soul-making dharma offers a sophisticated alternative through imaginal figures that provide dimensionality while avoiding naive dualistic ontology. Drawing on Augustine's notion of 'ordered love' and exploring participatory reality, he shows how sensing with soul naturally generates ethical orientation through recognition of divinity in phenomena.
>
> The talk challenges common Buddhist assumptions about suffering-reduction as sufficient ethical ground, arguing for more nuanced understanding of hierarchies of value and meaning. Burbea demonstrates how soul-making practice both procedurally guides ethical discernment and substantively grounds ethics in participatory encounter with the sacred dimensions of existence.

So again, we're looking at how soul-making dharma and soul-making practice can be used as an approach to ethics. Soul-making dharma both in terms of the philosophy, the conceptual framework, and also the nuts and bolts, sensitivities, sensibilities, and capabilities amassed and developed in soul-making practice—how all that can be brought to bear on the whole question of ethics.

We outlined at the beginning of these ethics talks seven or eight kinds of needs that I felt an ethical system should have—seven or eight items on a wish list for an ethical approach. One of them was dimensionality, and we've started to talk a little bit about it. I want to spend more time talking about that today: that particular need, the need to root ethics in some other sense, some other dimension, something deeper, higher, another level of being. The need to have recourse to some sense of dimensionality or some other level to justify, explain with regard to ethical choices, with regard to ethics as a whole—why ethics, why this ethics, why that choice.

One of the things that's happened historically is that a certain kind of dimensionality was provided by what we would call images, or what we have come to call images in soul-making dharma—imaginal images. A certain kind of dimensionality given historically by angels or daemons, or whatever one may call them, as we still call them as well: imaginal figures, angels, daemons. The kind of dimensionality they provide as being intermediate between human being and the transcendent, ineffable, completely beyond of the ultimate godhead, of the divinity, of the Buddha nature, of the Dharmakaya.

And that whole dimensionality that they provide just by being intermediate. We talked about how they reflect the attributes of God, of this otherwise completely transcendent being of whom one cannot ascribe any attributes. The angels, the daemons as refracting, reflecting, radiating those attributes of God. And our possibility as human beings, our birthright as human beings to be called by angels and to learn about and get closer to the attributes of God through the angels, and also to reflect and refract those attributes of the Dharmakaya.

Remember that etymology of the Dharmakaya: a body of dharmas, a body of qualities, a body of attributes of a Buddha, of a cosmic Buddha, one could say in the Mahayana. And that we can reflect, express, manifest that through our relationship with the angels.

But come the Protestant Reformation, with its central insistence on the ruling out of any intermediaries between human and God. And then come further the scientific revolution and the rise of secularism, the steady, slow rise of secularism. We are left in a position nowadays of needing to legitimize angels, images, daemons as teachers or guides of virtue, of value, of ethics.

So we've needed to put the whole thing in a new conceptual framework that takes into account and addresses everything that has come between the Middle Ages, medieval theology and thinking, the thinking at the time of the Buddha, and what we have now in contemporary Western societies.

So I can say, I can share, when I did share about a sense of praying to the angels, that has maybe quite a different sense than it might have had taken literally hundreds of years ago, perhaps. And I can share that and I can say that sometimes I can sense that I participate in the being of those angels. I'm being very careful with the language here. Sometimes I can sense that I participate in the being of those angels, but that likewise they participate in my being.

Looking more carefully, more closely, I can sometimes sense that I participate in their thought, in the thought of these angels. I participate in their sensing, in their action, in their speech. And again, likewise, they participate in my thinking. The angels participate in my thought—sometimes I can sense that. They participate in my sensing, especially when they're sensing the soul. The angels then are participating in my sensing, and I in theirs. They participate in my action, in my speech and communication. Sometimes I can sense all that.

And the whole thing has both a sense and a concept undergirded by the Imaginal Middle Way—neither real nor not real. So neither real nor not real, but yet I can pray, and yet it is still powerful. That prayer is powerful. So the ontology here and the epistemology here is different. And we've had to shape that because of everything that's come between, partly resting on a lot of what's come between.

I want to look a little further into this whole question of this whole area or element of our wish list—this item on our need list of dimensionality. I started outlining four ways that dimensionality might have been provided in the past, and I want to pick that up again.

The point here—just to be sure—this is definitely not a history lesson, but the question is more what can we learn here? What might we learn? And learn in the best sense. I mean learn in terms of what does it imply for our way forward? What might we take from that? What might we have to modify? And as well, what might soul-making dharma offer?

to these ways, to these possibilities of dimensionalizing, of providing some recourse to some sense of dimension? What ways might soul-making dharma and that whole conceptual framework modify some of these attempts or ways of providing dimension, dimensionality? So that's really the point.

We talked about these four approaches, and one of them was what has been called voluntarism. In other words, God commanded it. So why is this thing right or wrong to do? Because God commanded it. It's there in the Bible. And this is necessarily a dimension, it should be obvious, because God, by nature—his nature in this way of thinking—is a being of a different dimension. So if God commands it, the command of God, the word of God, is automatically something coming from a different dimension. That's kind of all the grounding you need, all the sense of dimensionality. Still, be clear, there's a very clear dimensionality there.

Notice here the epistemology. God commanded it. How do you know? What's in the Bible? So the epistemological recourse—the authority about knowledge, remember what epistemology means, what knowledge can I trust—is a reliance on scripture.

Now, to some of us that sounds completely ridiculous or archaic, but it's very much there in the Buddhist tradition. If you look, there are plenty of Mahayana texts, certainly in Tibetan tradition, probably in the Indian Mahayana as well—I'm pretty sure, in fact almost certainly—there will be texts devoted just to epistemology. How do we, as I said, epistemology... we need to base our understanding of emptiness and our process with emptiness on an epistemology. Otherwise, how do you know? You had this meditation experience, something faded. If you're doing it that way, how do you know you can trust that knowledge? Or you used your logical, analytical meditation and you saw it must be empty—how do you know you can trust logic? These all need to be epistemologically grounded.

Always in these Mahayana texts on epistemology, there's one category of epistemology, one sort of category of valid knowledge, which is scripture. Which is, well, it's in a sutta. The Buddha said it. So that's always regarded that way. To some, this sounds, as I said, kind of completely archaic and a little even silly, but it's actually very, very common among most Western Buddhists—this recourse to what did the Buddha say, and finding something in a sutta, and it goes back to "the Buddha said."

I've touched on this elsewhere—it's a sensitive subject—but I just want to point out, in this voluntarism, what we're calling that, as trying to provide dimensionality, there is this epistemological basis in scripture. The Buddhist tradition has had that very strongly for hundreds and hundreds of years. It's still alive and well, certainly in Asian Buddhism, and actually very much in Western-born and Western Buddhists as well.

The ontology regarding God here is usually a kind of very simple, reified "God just is, definitely God exists." Sometimes it's a more sophisticated ontology in which God kind of exists more than anything else exists. Very occasionally, it's an extremely sophisticated ontology in the medieval—actually pre-ancient, going from Pseudo-Dionysius and Plato, in fact. Well, its roots are there. It wouldn't be... With Dionysius, you get this recourse to scripture as well, so it probably started around then—maybe Philo, actually even earlier, Philo of Alexandria. It doesn't matter anyway. The nature of God is beyond existing and not existing, and it's quite sophisticated, a sort of negative theology that's incorporated. But usually people who put a lot of emphasis on this just very simple voluntarism—God commanded it, end of story, about what's ethical and what's not—usually the ontology regarding God is very, very simple, almost startlingly, naively simplistic, usually.

But something's quite interesting about this voluntarism, because after the Middle Ages and from the start of the Protestant Reformation, something also was central in the thrust of the Protestant Reformation and what they insisted on. A lot of what they insisted on was based in a theology of God's total and totally free sovereignty. In other words, God's sovereignty, God's power was completely unimpeded by anything at all. God was free to make the universe any old way, in a completely irrational way. God could have said it's ethical to kill and lie and cheat and steal and commit adultery and not respect your parents. He could have turned the Ten Commandments completely upside down, apart from the first one or two that are actually about God. So God is completely free.

What they were reacting to here was a tradition from Platonism and even Pythagoreanism—that there's a kind of order in the universe, a rational order, so that the whole creation, if you like, of the universe had to be ordered in a certain way. It was inevitably flowing or emanating from the very nature of God, so that the universe had to be a certain way. Within that, ethics and the good life and virtue, they all had to be a certain way.

The Protestant Reformation—a lot of what they were insisting on was really based in a sort of really strident reaction to that idea. God is not impelled or constrained or trammeled to create the universe in any way at all. There's no rational order that kind of flows out. It's completely God's will, and that's a totally free will, totally free power and sovereignty. So there's no rationality in the sense of a cosmic order or rational cosmic order in the first sense that I think we touched on the other day—I'll come back to that today. There's no cosmic order that implies or underlies ethics.

It's just God's will. And that's a completely free will. There's nothing at all in any way that limits or constrains God's power. And so the whole thinking of the Protestant Reformation was thinking partly from that very germ. We have to think of God this way—William of Ockham and people like that. Nothing at all to limit God's totally free sovereignty and power.

Which also meant, as we touched on the other day, there's no place then for ceremonies to make anything holy. There's no place for ceremonies to be in part unnecessary for our salvation. There's no place for sacraments. There's no place for intermediaries, as we touched on. There's also no place for human action and human development to bring about salvation.

Salvation is something completely God-given, completely dependent on the will or the whims of a totally free God. Nothing you can do as a human being to change that. And there are no intermediaries, no sacraments, no ceremonies that can help, no development of character, no development of virtues, etc. Nothing at all to limit the sense of God's power. Everything completely dependent on God's power.

And with that, as we touched on briefly, no ceremonies, no sacraments, etc. No intermediaries, no priests. And no special human action. So no development, no dedicated intense development in a monastery or anything like that made any sense. Salvation comes only from God.

And therefore with that, as a kind of corollary, there's this elevation of ordinary life. There's no longer a better kind of life. The really good life is if you can become a monk or a nun and give yourself completely to God, or be a priest, or it's the time in church, the time of the sacrament—that's the blessed space and something else is not.

So there's this elevation then. With the wiping away of any place for ceremony, sacraments, intermediaries, human effort, human striving, human action—with the wiping away of any place for all that—then ordinary life necessarily expands. The place for ordinary life necessarily expands to fill that vacuum, if you like. So there's this elevation of ordinary life that comes with and after the Protestant Reformation.

These things don't happen overnight; they're gradual. But it was there from the start, right from the start. Luther cancelling his monastic celibacy vows and marrying, the whole Protestant work ethic—it's all tied into this.

Now the elevation of ordinary life might sound to us at first like, "Oh, that's really non-dual." Then you have a really kind of what we would in Dharma language call a non-dual approach or view, because everything becomes holy. Ordinary life becomes holy. It's very Zen almost—some schools of Zen.

But it's interesting. It might sound non-dual, but it's actually totally and radically dualistic in its theological origin. There's this infinitely powerful God, and then anything else, anything human beings can work to develop or strive to grow in themselves, is irrelevant. So it sounds non-dual, but actually it's coming from a radically dualistic theological origin.

And just to make a sort of side point: sometimes people think the Protestant Reformation was in objection to, or in reaction to, the corruption in the priesthood. But actually it wasn't primarily—that wasn't the main point. The main point was a theological point, going back to William of Ockham. It was about God's power and not wanting to limit God's power.

If we think about this idea of voluntarism today, there are people in the world who still think that way from different religious traditions. It's just right or it's just wrong because it's there in the scripture. And it's taken very simply and concretely like that. There's very little other thought about ethics or other grounding needed for ethics.

And of course, at the same time in our world today, there are billions probably of atheists. So atheism is very prevalent. Such an idea as voluntarism to ground ethics is completely not a viable, sustainable idea nowadays for many people. And as I said, when there is a voluntarism alive today, it's usually interpreted, again, through a kind of radical duality of human and God, and a kind of literalism.

And if you remember back, I must have been in the Sila and Soul talks, probably near the beginning, where I did a little exercise comparing someone who was a fundamentalist religious terrorist and their views, which on a very superficial hearing can sound like they're saying and thinking some of the similar things that soul-makers seem to say. I spent time debunking that by going and pointing out the differences there.

If you remember that—I'm not going to do it again—but if you remember that, two of the problems with that sort of fundamentalist stance and two of the differences from soul-making Dharma were exactly that: the kind of radical duality of human and God, which is not really entertained, or is very difficult to entertain within a soul-making Dharma context. I mean, you can, but even that's within a backdrop of it not being really radically dual. It's sort of temporarily entertaining something that's really hard to sustain within the bigger framework of participation and creation and discovery and dependent on ways of looking and all that. Radical duality between human and God and literalism are two of the main differences.

So I suppose this voluntarism could be reinvigorated through a soul-making dharma framework and reinvigorated imaginally with notions of duty and things like that, as there are elements of the imaginal in our imaginal. But again, you have to be really careful if one chooses to play with that, because it really needs all the elements of the imaginal—all the elements of the imaginal, neither real nor not real, which are not literalist, this participation, creation, discovery, humility. We ran through all that in those talks before on the Sila and Soul. And it really needs all the elements.

So maybe not impossible, but harder today. And certainly I would be a lot less nervous about it, as I think most people would be nervous about it perhaps, but I would be less so if it was within a soul-making Dharma framework with all the protection and the softening and the flexibility and the wisdom of the soul-making Dharma framework itself and all the elements in the imaginal.

Anyway, that's voluntarism, which we talked about. The second one we talked about—I'm taking them in a different order tonight than last night—was the cosmic order. And the cosmic order, the order of the cosmos being something that implied and guided our ethical stance, our ethical responses to life and our ethical direction and development of our ethos.

So you get this in Plato, you probably get it in Pythagoreanism—I don't know much about it—but certainly you get it in Plato. So the cosmic order itself, once we see it, we can't help but feel drawn towards the higher, using the lower elements of the order as kind of—not really rungs, but something like rungs—or they draw us up, let's put it that way, they draw us up to the higher, towards the higher.

So you get that very much in Plato and in Platonic philosophy. And then you come to someone like Augustine, St. Augustine of Hippo, and he's very much influenced by Platonic philosophy. His Christianity was a molding, his theology was a molding, really, of Platonic and Christian elements. And so he writes something—now talking about cosmic order as looking at the possibility of the notions of cosmic order providing a kind of dimensionality for ethics, providing a sense of other dimensions which can ground and inform our ethics.

So this is from Augustine from his De Civitate Dei. He says: "Bodily loveliness is made by God but is nevertheless temporal, carnal, and a lesser good. It is wrongly loved if it is loved above God, the eternal, inward, and lasting good. Just as the covetous man subordinates justice, the value of justice, to his love of gold"—think of someone who doesn't care about justice, he just wants to steal gold or get rich or whatever it is—"Just as the covetous man subordinates justice to his love of gold, through no fault in the gold but in himself, so it is with all things. They are all good in themselves and capable of being loved either well or badly. They are loved well when the right order is kept, loved badly when this order is upset. Hence it seems to me that the briefest and truest definition of virtue is that it is the order of love."

There are two elements there that he's stressing: an order in the cosmos in terms of a ranking of what's higher or lower. So to rank the value of justice above gold, above money, above getting rich, is appropriate valuing. Hopefully most of us would tend to agree with that. To rank gold above justice, to love, pursue getting rich above justice—common in the world—is the wrong order. We're loving things not according to their order. So order and love, cosmic order and love go together. There's an order of things and there's an order of valuing that completely corresponds to that, and our love needs to be ordered with those scales of the cosmic order of things and their value that goes with it.

So one interesting exercise would be to consider how that compares and contrasts with Hartmann's scale of values. And for example, the transgressions that Hartmann talks about—transgressions of lower values being more grievous transgressions than the omission or neglect or failure in higher values. So that if we fail to stretch or aspire to some really high value, that's not such a big sin in Hartmann's thinking than it is to transgress a lower value, like steal or kill or whatever it is.

In Augustine, in just that little paragraph of Augustine—Augustine is a little too short because then we wonder again about things like how Augustine's conception would handle the possibilities of antinomies at the same level. What do we do with that in Augustine's conception? Because there will be certain values that exist at the same level, or maybe he's suggesting there aren't. Anyway, that's an interesting kind of exercise. I'm not going to go into elaborating on that. It might be interesting for some of you to explore.

So first of all, I just want to say: how do you hear that passage from Augustine? Do you hear the kind of beauty of the ideas there, or do you hear it as some kind of Christian oppression, anti-physical, anti-body, anti-sexual, etc.? I can certainly—I didn't grow up feeling oppressed by Christianity because I didn't grow up Christian, but I can hear the beauty in it.

There's something very beautiful there, very generous almost, very lovely in what he's trying to put out there—this ordered love for things corresponding to their place in the cosmic order and hierarchy, and therefore their value.

But how different is our modern conception? Just notice how different our modern conception and sense of the cosmos is, as only ordered by its meaningless and purposeless physical laws. We have a sense, most people these days, of living in an uncaring, purposeless and meaningless universe, without divinity or dimensions other than the physical laws.

Physical laws are a kind of dimension. I said the other day that the laws describing an electron's motion under certain forces are a kind of dimension, or can be seen as another dimension. The mathematical laws that describe an electron's motion can be seen as another dimension other than the actual material thing of an electron, or a muon, or a gluon, or a pion, or whatever particle or quark. Physical laws can be discerned as another dimension. But that's all there is in terms of order and dimensionality.

So for us, citizens and children of modernity and post-modernity, the only order in the cosmos is really the physical laws. That's the only order in the cosmos. Tom Caputo, a philosopher, says science is all the metaphysics you're going to get, or you're allowed.

I think his stance is very anti-metaphysical, as was popular until very recently. And this came or grew as a consequence—it developed as a consequence of Descartes and Galileo and others and their decision regarding what is real, what are real objects of knowledge. We touched on that. So when we said this is the only thing that's real, then it becomes: well, these are the only way in which the universe is ordered.

Understand they go together. If we just decide only these kinds of things are real, these kinds of things are secondary, these kinds of things are really, really tertiary—so even color was something secondary, because it's something the human perceives. Again, it's not an objective, independently existing reality like mass or length. And this was the thinking pre-relativity, pre-quantum mechanics. They decided what was real, and then you're just left with a flat universe only ordered according to physical laws.

But Augustine wants to put love and order together—love of virtue and order together, love of things and the cosmic order together. And with respect to love, we do have strong feelings. We have strong love and strong eros in relationship with what we sense as deep, high, holy, divine, as having another dimension.

So this initial marriage and correspondence that Augustine wants to make or emphasize—re-emphasize—is between our love for everything. We can love everything. We need to love it in the right order. Our love needs to be ordered, corresponding to its intrinsic value, which corresponds itself naturally to its place in the cosmic hierarchy, in the cosmic order, the hierarchical order of the cosmos.

Actually, even if just briefly as an aside, there seems to be an order in reading the Pali Canon and the sense of the cosmos there. The word cosmos means order, by the way, from the Greek. But reading the Pali Canon, getting a sense of the cosmos, it seems a very different cosmos than most Westerners, post-Enlightenment, would consider themselves, or feel themselves, sense themselves, take themselves seriously as living in. The Pali Canon cosmos seems to have different levels of being, divinities, and it seems to be ordered by karma and rebirth and transmigration between levels. You can be reborn in the Brahma heaven level and then in this hell or the hungry ghost realm or whatever it is. So these different levels, but still, there's a hierarchical order of a kind, but the whole thing is still kind of purposeless. The cosmos itself is kind of purposeless, and not basically or overall good.

And that would be a fundamental Augustinian and Platonic notion, I think—certainly Augustinian—that the cosmos is good, and its ordering is good. In the Pali Canon cosmos, there's some kind of order, there's hierarchies, there's different levels of being, but the whole thing is essentially purposeless and not, as I said, fundamentally or taken overall, regarded as good. "The cosmos is good. God's work is good"—it's not really there.

So we've inherited, mostly from the West—we don't really inherit Pali Canon cosmos, most people, maybe some do, but most people in the West inherit this sense of order we have in the cosmos, this absence of hierarchy. It's no wonder it's hard for most of us these days to seriously entertain Augustine's sense of the ethical life. The ethical life is one that loves all things, but loves all things in an ordered way, according to where they are in the hierarchy, where the value is, and loves, values things, and loves the value in things, in a hierarchically ordered way. It's very hard to seriously entertain that whole conception.

So if we, in our modern and post-modern predicament, are not already sort of fallen into its abyss, we sort of teeter on the brink of postmodern nihilism, both in terms of metaphysics and in terms of ethics.

Because we don't have that kind of dimensionality. So thinking about this cosmic order as a possible dimensionalizing and rooting, a kind of guidance for ethics, support for ethics.

I think that even the vaguest sensing with soul, the slightest movement into sensing with soul with regard to nature and the things of nature—even the vaguest exploration of that—can get a sense that something like mass species extinction going on right now, species extermination, almost runaway climate change, that these are sins against the order of the cosmos. That sense would be there because even the vaguest sensing with soul brings some sense of the holiness of things and the dimensionality shading into divinity.

Species extinction, climate change—these would be felt as sins against the order of the cosmos, whatever words you want to choose. There's something greater than the sin against the possible uses for humanity—if this bacteria in the Amazon or this fungus found only in such a rainforest or ecosystem gets lost to humanity, or if humanity has less pasture land and less drinking water. Even greater, perhaps, than the sin to humanity of that loss, or the suffering for animals, there is a sense of a sin against the order of the cosmos, something that goes so deep as a kind of affront and pain to the soul.

Of course, all three concerns are there—the concern for the plight of humanity, particularly the poorest and marginalized, and the concern for the suffering of animals with their extinction and the way we treat them in industrial farming. Of course they're there. But there's something almost of a different order—this pain when we sense that we are implicated in this massive, imponderable transgression against the order of the cosmos.

We can have a sense of an ordered cosmos, ordered hierarchically in this way, and we can have that sense in sensing with soul. But in Soul-making Dharma practice, we can also deliberately move between entertaining different kinds of cosmologies—Augustine's cosmology, the flat modern and postmodern one, the Pali Canon one. The cosmopoiesis can come first. We can simply entertain a certain concept or vision of what the cosmos is and how it is ordered, then practice with it. We can move between different cosmological ideas and see what opens up, see what happens to the actual sense of things.

With enough Soul-making Dharma practice and all the sensitivity, receptivity, and meditative skill developed there, we can actually move deliberately between different cosmoses and see what they do—what they do to us, to the heart, to the soul, to the very sense of things, the very sense of matter.

Returning to Augustine's example of bodily loveliness—in certain religious traditions, bodies are not holy. He's not quite saying that; he's placing them on a hierarchy. But with Soul-making Dharma, the question is whether this body, whatever body I'm speaking of—mine, my lover's, or someone attractive to me—is sensed with eros, sensed with soul. Remember, eros means far more than sexual attraction. I'm sensing this person's body with eros. There may be no sexual attraction whatsoever, but there's eros there, in our sense of the word.

In Soul-making Dharma, the question is whether this body is sensed with soul, sensed with eros. When it is, when there is eros in our sense, and that is allowed to ignite, instigate, catalyze the soul-making dynamic in psyche and logos, then there will be a sense of divinity in and through that body.

Here we have—and this is so important—a sense of ordering, and our love being commensurate and correspondent to that hierarchical ordering in the sense of divinity. But the position of something on that hierarchy does not rest in the thing itself alone, independently, inherently, intrinsically. It comes in participation. How am I relating to it? When I relate and sense with eros, when I sense with soul, then the divinity is right there in and through that body, and therefore it takes a high place on the hierarchy. It's not the thing itself. It's what's co-created, co-discovered in sensing with soul, in the relationship with the thing.

This is really key in terms of ontology and how Soul-making Dharma can approach this question of dimensionalizing and cosmic order—to open it up or shake it up in a different way, reorder the sense of order.

Let's linger with these questions of dimensionality and ontology. Grounding our ethics in the dimensionality of a cosmic hierarchy like Augustine's usually assumes, or subsumes within it, a naive ontology—an ontology that most people today still carry of independent objective existence. Most people today don't believe in any kind of cosmic hierarchy, but there's still a naive ontology assumed within us of independent objective existence. If we're talking about cosmic order, this hierarchy has independent objective existence.

With the scientific revolution and then the Western Enlightenment, that whole notion seems trashed, completely trashed. How can a person believe in such a hierarchical cosmic order as Augustine describes after the scientific revolution and Western Enlightenment became embedded in the culture?

However, as we've discussed many times, today, with developments in quantum physics, with our understanding of emptiness as I would understand it, with developments in Western philosophy over the last fifty years or more—any one of those delivers or opens for us possibilities of ontologies that don't assume independent objective existence, but rather involve a more participatory ontology. We participate in creating, discovering reality.

John Wheeler, the great twentieth-century physicist at the forefront of so many developments in quantum physics, general relativity, and other areas of modern physics, spoke of a participatory universe.

This is the nature of our universe—it's participatory. And let me be really clear about what this means. It doesn't simply mean that we take part in the universe. Of course we participate in the universe just by existing and breathing. I breathe in the universe, I breathe it out. I eat it in, I excrete it out. I drink it in, I pee it out. We participate in society by expressing ourselves and voting. But that's not what Wheeler meant, and it's not what we mean here.

We're talking about something much more radical and fundamental. This subatomic particle, this so-called fundamental particle—this quark, this electron, this muon, this pion, this photon—where it is, what it is, whether it's a wave or a particle, whether it is a thing at all in any sense that we can meaningfully use the language of a real thing, how fast it goes, how much it weighs—its very beingness is dependent on the way we look, the way it's observed. It's dependent on the observer. We participate in the creation of the most fundamental constituents of the universe. That's why we call it the participatory universe.

So there's now the possibility of different, non-naive ontologies that don't assume independent objective existence, but rather assume participatory reality. Existence is participatory in this very deep sense.

Soul-making dharma practice both leads to and involves, I would say, loving order in this way—loving what is sensed as highest or divine or whatever words we might use in the cosmic order. And it recognizes that this sense of order, this sense of divinity, this sense of what is highest or deepest, is neither objective nor subjective. We've gone beyond such naive polarities of ontological thinking.

So it loves order, it loves the high and the deep and the divine and the dimensionalized, but it recognizes that this order is neither objective nor subjective. Soul-making dharma also provides the training to be able to sense in that way—to sense the divinity, to actually sense it, to really have that impact on the soul, to recognize it. It provides the techniques, the practices to do that, and also to feel, to sense, to open to and handle the eros that comes with it. All of that soul-making dharma allows and supports, both in philosophy and in practice.

And it doesn't need to only transcend the object—"this is just a material object, this is just form, I want the unformed, the unfabricated." Yes, that movement and that possibility is very much part of what we're including as soul-making dharma. But it doesn't only need to do that. That's not the only place where the highest resides—in the more unfabricated. I don't only need to transcend; it's just one of the possibilities. It certainly doesn't do away with transcendence and dimensionality and just flatten the cosmos or assume the reality of a flat cosmos.

Very loosely, there's a kind of historical parallel to this with Eriugena—again, Platonically influenced, influenced by Pseudo-Dionysius. I think he was a monk, an Irish monk, and quite a radical, novel theologian. In his thought—and there's a very loose parallel here—humans are created in the image of God, which means that they can, so to speak, think God's thoughts. If we use our mind well, if we use our soul well, then the thoughts that we have will correspond to God's thoughts because we are made in God's image. And God's thoughts are the structure of the universe. This is a very Platonically influenced theology. So if we use the soul or use the mind well, the order we discover through using our soul and mind well in the universe is just the order that God created and intended. A very loose parallel.

With the sensibility of sensing with soul, what it does is open up our trust for our sense of the divinity in things, of the Buddha nature in things. And that trusting of our sense of the divinity that comes with sensing with soul automatically brings love and reverence towards that sense, towards what we sense as divine. Automatically comes ethics—a steering of the ethics, an ethical stance, and an ethical rooting in that sense of another dimension. But it's, again, neither objective nor subjective. It's participatory. There's a much more sophisticated ontology recognized here.

I remember—it must have been certainly in the last year—I was in the chemo ward getting chemo in the hospital. I was sitting next to a guy who also had pancreatic cancer, metastatic pancreatic cancer, and we talked a little bit while we were getting chemo. He was on a slightly different chemo drug than I was, but essentially the same. We both knew that we were in a process of dying. His process too was quite drawn out. And we both, of course, knew the debilitating and limiting effects of chemo on the body and on the life, really—limiting very much what's possible with the life.

But it was only in the 18th century that this affection for one's spouse and children began to be seen as something that could constitute the meaning of one's life, or be the basis of a meaningful life, or be what makes life worthwhile. Before that, it was just assumed that of course you love your spouse and children - that's natural and beautiful - but that's not what gives life meaning. Meaning came from something else, something beyond the domestic sphere.

Similarly, it was only in the modern period that romantic love began to be seen as something that could be the foundation of a meaningful existence. Before that, romantic love was certainly recognized and celebrated - think of the troubadours and courtly love traditions - but it wasn't seen as the thing that makes life worth living. It was understood to be one beautiful dimension of human experience among others, but not the ultimate source of meaning.

These shifts in what we consider to constitute a meaningful life are historically contingent. They're not universal truths about human nature or the good life. They're particular ways of seeing that have emerged in our culture at specific times. And once we recognize this historical contingency, we can begin to question whether our current assumptions about what makes life meaningful are actually serving the soul.

This connects back to what I was saying about hierarchy and ordering. In our culture, we've largely flattened the hierarchy of values. We've said that all ways of finding meaning are equally valid, all pursuits are equally worthwhile. But this flattening can actually impoverish the soul. When we don't discriminate between different levels of meaning, different qualities of engagement with life, we can end up settling for something that doesn't actually nourish us at the deepest level.

This doesn't mean we need to go back to some pre-modern hierarchy that dismisses domestic life or romantic love as unimportant. Rather, it means we need to develop our capacity for discernment - our ability to sense into the different qualities of meaning that different activities and relationships offer, and to order our lives accordingly. We need to cultivate what we might call "vertical sensitivity" - the ability to sense when something is opening us to deeper dimensions of meaning and when something is keeping us on the surface.

There has been affection for spouses and children throughout human history—this affection was always present between family members, though not universally. But it was only beginning in the eighteenth century that such affection came to be considered truly important, truly one of the things that makes life worthy. It began to be seen as a significant constituent or qualification for a worthwhile life, a beautiful life. This shift arose from the elevation of ordinary life. But as I mentioned, we don't recognize this historical contingency. Something has become entrenched, and what has also become entrenched is this taboo against questioning what makes a worthwhile life—whether you or I are really living a worthwhile life, orienting our lives in that direction. It becomes socially taboo to suggest this, to bring it up, to question someone else in this way.

Historically, there was this long-standing idea from ancient times through the Middle Ages of a hierarchically ordered cosmos. Then with the scientific revolution and the Protestant Reformation, there was a collapse of this understanding—at least for large segments of the population who could no longer really entertain that idea. What emerged instead was an emphasis on order in the universe, but not hierarchical order as Plato and Augustine would have it.

Moral philosophers like Locke and Hutcheson also emphasized order—the order of the universe—but not hierarchical order. The order they invoked to support another dimension for ethics was a much more Cartesian order, deriving from Descartes. This was the idea of the universe as clockwork, interlocking parts designed by God to work together for the mutual preservation and flourishing of human beings. But again, I return to this question of what flourishing means—this too is very contingent on philosophy and our sense of dimensionality. All these things are tied together.

Essentially what we have here is an order that's horizontal and flat, not dimensional. There's no hierarchical order, just a flat order of the cosmos. With this comes an idea of good—of moral good, of the good life—as being only happiness or pleasant sensations. The good life and beautiful life is no longer one directed toward the highest, oriented upward on the scale, on the rungs of the cosmic order's staircase. Instead, what is good becomes only pleasant sensations and happiness.

This was claimed to result from "natural" observation of biological and physical systems—this is what human beings want, perhaps animals too. Only happiness or pleasant sensations. Jeremy Bentham, regarded as the father of utilitarianism, embodied this philosophy. He wrote that wanting anything higher than simple, natural pleasant sensations of the body and happiness—wanting anything higher is just pride or comes from superstitious fear.

Again, we see Charles Taylor's observation that many such philosophies were parasitic. When Bentham claimed that wanting anything higher in life stems from pride—thinking you're better than you are, thinking human beings are better than they are—or from superstitious fear of divine punishment, Taylor points out that this rhetoric and judgment was actually parasitic on the Protestant Reformation's well-established ethic of ordinary life. This elevation and affirmation of ordinary life had already become established versus any kind of hierarchical ethics regarding virtues and values. Bentham could make such polemic statements because they rested on this well-established ethic of ordinary life. He would say: don't try to rise above gross sense pleasures.

So there's a shift in order from vertical to horizontal, and with this horizontal view comes a flattening of ethics' goal—what we need to care for in society and what we should aim for in ourselves. Nothing high, just pleasant sensations, just simple, natural happiness.

This is quite interesting. Post-Reformation, there was often really vitriolic rejection of asceticism and high moral goals—for example, those espoused by devoted religious or spiritual practitioners. There was scathing rejection of asceticism and high moral aims. Some of this related to the elevation and affirmation of ordinary life and the dedimensionalizing of hierarchical cosmic order. But some of it, particularly from thinkers like Montaigne or Hume, came from a psychology of needing relief from high moral standards, from pushing oneself and striving to be good, striving toward high virtues.

The thrust in Montaigne and Hume was often: give me a break, don't be proud, get real about what a human being is and should strive for, about our capacities. This attitude remains very common today and can be heard in many Dharma voices as well.

And there's a kind—sometimes it goes with a kind of despising of what is lofty, a kind of despising of what is noble. I'm using the word "noble" here as in aspiring highly with the dignity of aspiring to high virtues and what's beyond reach. I'm not using noble right now in Hartman's way that we talked about in Sila and Soul.

So I wonder quite what's going on here. And I wonder if in fact that whole attitude reflects an anti-libidinal stance—reflects a refusal of eros. We talked about this, I'm pretty sure it was in the Eros Unfettered talks, but it might have been in another series. Is my philosophy, my dharma, my ethical thinking, my ethical philosophy and practice, my whole life—is it actually driven by a refusal of eros and a kind of anti-libidinality? A fear of libidinality or imposition of a limit on it? Or is it held, this whole philosophy, in a very limited range of eros and libido?

Someone who holds this kind of view doesn't like the idea of very lofty striving, doesn't like the noble, despises it in some ways. More "give myself a break, get real, don't be proud." Sometimes such a person is very friendly, relatively warm. They enjoy socializing, they enjoy a glass of good wine with a good meal. But all of that—the friendliness, the relative warmth, enjoying socializing, the wine and the good meal—that's not what we call eros.

You can have all that, and it looks like the person's living, they're enjoying company and interaction with human beings, they're warm, and they're enjoying simple pleasures of life—food, good food, good wine, whatever, in moderation. But there can still be all that, and it's held within anti-libidinality.

The striving ascetic, who may be living in solitude or seeking out solitude, who doesn't go for the good wine, who seems a little aloof maybe—the striving ascetic may have much more eros, much more libido. So I wonder, sometimes at least, is it actually this that they're objecting to, that they're shrinking from, that they're uncomfortable with—the eros and the libido that go with lofty aspirations, moral aspirations, and the elevation of that, or the striving towards what is elevated? Is it actually an objection to, a recoiling from, a fear of the eros and the libido—a refusal of that that's driving things?

So that's to me a really important question. Again, what's the psychology, what's the soul-style that underlies, in this case, the ethical style? The picture of the dharma, the range of the dharma, the vision of awakening.

We talked about this before—something particular about anti-libidinal stances, anti-libidinal positions of soul, imprisonments of soul. Because if the soul loves soul-making, if that's a sort of axiomatic principle—the soul loves soul-making—it must love eros and be okay with eros in order to let the soul-making, in order for soul-making to happen, because soul-making needs eros. So an anti-libidinality is kind of a locking of the soul, preventing it or limiting the range of its soul-making, and therefore limiting the range of what it can sense, what it can view, how it can conceive, and how it conceives whatever—ethics, dharma, human existence, etc.

So that's one thing I'm wondering about. But also, the second thing, very importantly as well, is that with a soul-making dharma approach to ethics, then there isn't an insistence on an absolute material standard or demand regarding ethics and virtues. It's rather only a kind of—soul-making dharma really only gives us a kind of request or invitation to a process, to a practice, to a training in approaching questions of ethics and ethical situations.

And that training, I would say, is not more difficult than either Montaigne's or Hume's trainings in philosophy, in literature, in introspection. Some people regard both of them, or one of them, as great introspectionists, masters of the art of introspection. So it's not that ethics imposes an absolute material standard or demand. It's an invitation to a process, a practice that brings a different relationship with the things of the world and different ethical interactions, virtues, etc.

But you can get a sense with all this of how there is perhaps a suppression, or at least the absence, the disallowing of eros and love—maybe the total suppression, or the partial suppressing of eros and love in relation to ethics, in relation to values and virtues.

If we think about Francis Bacon—he was, I think, a Puritan, certainly very influenced by Puritanism. And he's one of the philosophers who was really emphatic—we can see historically, he really emphasized this sort of instrumental stance. Science, knowledge needs to give us power—power over nature, power to do, power to make things work, technology.

And it's just worth pointing out that originally there was a real religious reasoning and motivation behind this instrumental stance. As I said, he was a Puritan, or certainly very influenced by that Puritan outlook. So science is, in this view, the correct and God-willed view and use of things, and also because it brings human dignity of having rational control—that rational control over things and in relation to things gives a human being dignity. But it's also the correct and God-willed view and use of the things of the world for our preservation and for our pleasure and happiness.

So the instrumental stance was seen as, initially, still religiously rooted. The instrumental stance—meaning how we approach the things of the world, how can we use them, make them part of our technology, technologize them—the instrumental stance originally was part of the way we serve God in creation, by preserving ourselves and by preserving God's horizontal order. And there's also the injunction there to treat things as instruments, not as ends in themselves.

So you can hear the kind of puritanical tenor of that. I want to briefly read something from Charles Taylor writing about this instrumental stance in modern culture:

"The instrumental stance in modern culture is supported not just by the new science, the scientific revolution, not just by the dignity attaching to disengaged rational control. It was also central to the ethic of ordinary life from its theological origins on. Affirming ordinary life has meant valuing the efficacious control of things by which it is preserved and enhanced, as well as valuing the detachment from purely personal enjoyments, which would blunt our dedication to its general flourishing."

As I'll explain, as time went by, the theological origins got forgotten and the whole theology got jettisoned from all this. But initially, this was the religious, puritanically influenced passage of the idea of the instrumental stance in relationship to the horizontal order that God designed.

But then what happens when the vertical order is abolished and a horizontal order takes primary place in the cosmology, in our view of things? That horizontal order is no longer an order of divine signs, of divine forms and ideas. Rather, we're talking about an order where things become parts of a machine. It's not that this thing or that event or that person is a refraction of an angel, a sign, a theophany of an angel, an expression or manifestation of an attribute of God. That's all gone.

Rather, things become not diaphanous reflections and refractions of particular aspects of divinity, particular attributes of the Dharmakaya, the Buddha nature of the divine. Instead, they become parts of a machine whose parts work together to bring about God's plan. It's quite a different view.

This cosmic order is just one dimension—what we might call horizontal. It's a clockwork kind of ecosystem view. An ecosystem is still horizontal in the way most people think about it these days. It might have the top of the food chain as this animal or that, but there's no difference of dimensionality between the bottom and the top of the food chain. There's only a qualitative difference in terms of who eats whom and how much. So the whole thing's actually horizontal, the way we think about interconnectedness and ecosystems these days.

The cosmic order becomes this one-dimensional, horizontal kind of clockwork machine. If that's the view, then something like species extinction is not really a problem unless it affects the functioning of the ecosystem, unless it affects the functioning of the whole, unless the function of the whole is impaired, unless the working of the clock is affected in a way that is problematic enough for us as humans—because of our investment and our dependence—or is problematic for large other parts of the mechanism. In other words, the whole mechanism itself might be impaired.

The reverence there for order is not reverence in a soul or religious sense. It's a kind of marveling, perhaps, at the intricacy of the web of life, the horizontal order of the cosmos—whether that's regarded as being designed by God or just evolved purely materially without God. It's not reverence in the way we would use that term. It's the whole mechanism's functioning that is important, rather than each of the individual elements being holy just because they are, just because they're connected to the divine through their places in the order as they would be in a hierarchical cosmic order.

Each thing a sign, a theophany, a showing of one or other of the attributes of God. Each expressing an attribute, an aspect, a quality of the Buddha nature, of the Dharmakaya, of what in Platonic terms are the intelligences, the thoughts of God. Each thing a sign, a form, a refraction, an expression of that.

Think about species extinction and a horizontal view of the cosmos. It only matters if it affects us—when we lose that species like the bees, people often say, "Oh, if the bees go then the pollination will go and we'll go hungry." But isn't there something else about our care for the bees and the plight of the bees as a species—something of a sense of their necessity, their beauty, and that beauty has a dimensionality and depth, as we talked about before when we discussed beauty in other talks and series?

In a hierarchically ordered cosmos, each thing has its value, has its place, and it is a refraction of God, of the divine. But in a horizontal cosmos, we can lose this species, that species, and that whole thing, as long as it doesn't affect the whole ecosystem or us.

Note also how totally anthropocentric was the view and concern of those who promulgated this horizontalizing of the cosmic order when it first emerged and its relation with ethics. Adam Smith, John Locke, Jeremy Bentham—this idea of everyone's happiness being prioritized. But who's the everyone? It's very anthropocentric. Actually, it was even more circumscribed than that, I would say.

So there's voluntarism, there's the notion of cosmic order in different ways that can give dimensionality, underpinning to ethics. We talked about how soul-making dharma might come in and modify, support different versions of that. Rationality was another one we mentioned—rationality as a kind of dimensionality.

For someone like Kant, Immanuel Kant, rationality—which was very much connected, for him, with morality and our freedom—were just facets of the same thing. To be rational was more important than to be happy and to have pleasure. Right there, you sense he's establishing a dimensionality. Dimensionality and rationality. Rationality is more important than being happy or having pleasurable feelings. So rationality as an attempt, a way of providing dimensionality for ethics.

And an ability to... Again, what are we going to root our ethics in? What are we going to have recourse to? What is it going to be supported by? It needs to be made sense of in another dimension, by its relationship with another dimension, by the implications streaming from another dimension. And so one of them could be simply rationality, as it was for Kant.

Now, rationality in the usual way that we would understand it is just our ability to think clearly, our ability to make conclusions, deductions, and so forth—our ability to be logical. That as an underpinning of ethics, as a dimensionality of ethics, that human, well, presumably human, merely human capacity to do that.

But rationality as we conceive it in that way is actually a kind of skill. Unless we're just following a rule that's devised or discovered—a rational rule devised or discovered by someone else—then for us to be rational actually means we're relying on a skill that we have developed as human beings, something we've been taught in school and so forth.

And I think: that's interesting. If you want to make that a dimension, then comparing with soul-making practice, isn't discerning soulfulness, or discerning whether something is soul-making, whether this sense of virtue is more soul-making than that, that value is more soul-making than that, or discerning the soul-making, the soulfulness in regard to an image—isn't that also a skill?

I think most people would think, on first reaction to such a thought: "Yes, but soul-making—the skill in soul-making—is much, much harder to develop than a skill in logical thinking, in rationality." That was my first thought. But then I thought, well, maybe that's just because of what we've been taught, how we've been educated. That rationality is the norm, that we're taught from an early age... There's a great deal of emphasis in our culture placed on being able to think clearly, rationally, in that sense.

So that becomes the norm, and therefore that seems to us much... I'm not sure if this is right, but is it that it's just an educational thing? It seems much easier to use our rational intellect. In our culture, it seems much easier than learning all the subtleties and sophistications of soul-making Dharma practice. I'm not sure. It's really a question.

But it's interesting to note that John Locke was also sceptical. So he was a big promoter of human rationality, this capacity to function and use our thinking mind as a basis for ethics. He was one of the main promoters of that, but at the same time he was also sceptical of most humans' ability to be instrumentally rational regarding ethics. So he believed as well that God's law, as it was written in the Bible, as well as God's threat of eternal punishment or eternal reward in hell or heaven, was actually a help from God, a help to humans to make the right choices.

Because though he was principally promoting rationality, he was also sceptical of humans' ability to actually be rational in an instrumental way. So God, in God's mercy, seeing that, actually then put out these promises of eternal reward if you are ethical, and promises of eternal punishment if you're not, and that helped human beings make the right choices.

So that's very interesting. The point I also want to make is: here was a new idea to base ethics in the dimension of rationality, and even the instigator of that idea was saying, "I'm not sure if everyone can do this, actually. I think ideally everyone should be able to do this, but I'm actually not sure. So we have recourse to another idea."

Maybe also with a soul-making approach to ethics. It's like, yes, ideally it would be great if everyone could be taught soul-making dharma and soul-making practice and actually learn that. If the whole culture was so radically, extravagantly, wildly different that that was the case, and still have the thought: hmm, not sure, not sure that everyone would be able to do that. I don't know, it's a question.

So I think I mentioned this when we just introduced the notion of rationality as a dimension, as a possible dimension the other day. But again, drawing on Charles Taylor, he makes the distinction—I'm not sure it's his originally, but it might be—between two uses or two meanings of the word rational. There's what we might call procedural rationality and substantive rationality.

So I'll explain those briefly. Procedural is what I just referred to. It's the ability to use the mind, use the process of logic and clear rational thinking to deduce something, to decide something. There's a procedure. Rationality is a procedure, a way of using the mind—instrumental rationality.

On the other hand, substantive rationality is more what someone like Plato and people much earlier than John Locke really meant by rationality. It was really that there is an order to the cosmos, and human beings, to be rational, means to perceive that order, perceive that hierarchy, and to conform one's being, one's whole mind and soul and heart, and eros in correspondence with that rational order of the cosmos. That's what it meant to be rational—to perceive and to order one's life rationally meant living in correspondence with this cosmic order. So that's substantive rationality.

The word rationality has meant very different things and has come to be used in diverse ways. If we say rationality as a basis or dimension for ethics, it has come to be employed in vastly different ways.

For example, Philo of Alexandria is a very significant figure because he was the first person to combine Platonic philosophies with the Jewish religion. He was actually disregarded in the evolving stream of Jewish theology, but in Christian theology, he was absolutely seminal—the first person to integrate those two traditions, the Platonic and the Hebrew scriptures. Later people would incorporate the New Testament as well.

Philo believed that the human mind, because it's akin to God, is like God's mind. Eugena picks up on this idea much later, but its origins lie partly with Philo. The human mind is akin to God because it's made in the image of the divine logos. It's interesting that in the New Testament, John's Gospel begins, "In the beginning was the Logos, in the beginning was the Word." That idea of Logos actually comes from Platonic thinking and very much from Philo's influence.

This idea of human beings being made in the image of the divine Logos—which means the divine reason, the divine rationality—is rooted in the Old Testament, in Genesis, where it says that God made man in the image of God, in the image of the divine. Later, in medieval times, Maimonides interpreted this in what I think was a procedural way. In other words, we are given this rational functioning, and that's what it means to be made in the image of the divine—we can use our minds in this procedural, rational way.

With Philo, I think it probably meant something different. It meant we are made in the image of the divine logos, the divine reason, and therefore we have, to some degree, a capability to receive and discover the truth about realities beyond time and space—about what exists higher in the cosmic order: the angels, the intelligences, the levels of divinity. So Philo is using a more substantive notion of rationality there.

These are very different—procedural rationality and substantive rationality represent very different meanings of the term rationality. Yet through history, there are times when they're often used together.

When you think about Soulmaking Dharma practice as a sort of process or guide for ethics, it's primarily procedural in that language, because we're really talking about a practice or procedure, just like using our minds logically is a kind of procedure that we can be trained in. We have some innate capacity for logical thinking, for the rational procedure, but we can be trained. Some people become extraordinarily skilled in their ability to use the rational mind in a procedural way.

So when we think about Soulmaking Dharma practice as a process or guide to ethics, as an approach to ethics, it appears primarily procedural because you're doing this practice and using it to support, discriminate, or arrive at an ethical choice.

But Soulmaking Dharma practice could also be regarded as substantive, if we borrow Charles Taylor's terms. If we entertain a logos, a conceptual framework, that eros is epistemologically significant—that it has, in John Milbank's words, ontological disclosure. We talked about this the other day, and it's really, really important.

If we entertain the idea that truth is this journey rather than a final arriving point, and that together with other navigations, eros has epistemological significance because it can open up for us the levels of truth—it's the engine for that journey. And we're understanding truth in a participatory way, as something that's create-discovered rather than just discovered.

So if we entertain a conceptual framework that involves a different view of eros and gives it an important place in our ontology and epistemology, and if we think of truth in this way as more of a journey—an infinite journey into the truth of things—and we appreciate that it's create-discovered, that we participate in that, then we might also see Soulmaking Dharma as substantive, as related to something that's true. But the whole notion of truth and how that relation comes about is developed quite differently than we might usually think.

Origen was one of the great early Christian theologians, and he wrote something like this—I'm quoting now from someone writing about Origen, a scholar called Chadwick: "The soul of man has an intuitive longing for God." Origen was insistent that he won't believe that this yearning we have, this eros we have, can have been implanted in a human being's heart and soul unless it is capable of being satisfied. An interesting point: just as each faculty of our senses is related to a specific category of objects, so our nous —which we can translate as our soul knowing—is the corollary of God.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 14/18). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

So we're set up to move into truth, and our eros is actually implanted by God, and it wouldn't be implanted as divine unless it was capable of being satisfied. So again, we can translate that into soul-making terms. Soul-making is never finally satisfied, but it gets satisfied on the journey—the infinite journey of soul-making, the infinite journey into truth.

And this, again, in what he's saying, we can have the sense, we will have the sense, as we develop soul-making practice, of our eros being divine, having its roots in the divine, being given to us by the Buddha nature, by the Dharmakaya, whatever words you like. And in the movements of soul-making, as the soul-making dynamic opens, further levels, aspects, beyonds, dimensions open. That eros is satisfied, and then it moves again. But there's something in the infinite movement that is not unsatisfying at a deep level, but profoundly satisfying.

So again, we take these ideas, and they have to be understood differently, modified through the understandings and the conceptual framework of soul-making dharma.

The procedural rationality—what Taylor calls the procedural rationality—that the Western Enlightenment assumed, along with a throwing off of superstitions and being natural in terms of just what was natural human pleasure, being natural without imposing religious dogma and ideas on top, there was an assumption that that kind of rationality and naturality would bring pleasure, happiness, and would also bring the universal good.

And obviously there's some truth to that, definitely. A lot of moral progress came from the Western Enlightenment. But this kind of faith in that kind of rationality was shaken, I think, by Freud in terms of: is it actually possible for us—for that rationality to really rule in the psyche? The psyche full of other horrors and repressions and kind of bestial uncivilized impulses and movements and realities abiding in the id. So that started to question things a little bit.

By the time World War I was finished, the First World War was finished—absolute carnage and devastation and incredible loss of life there—people started to really question whether rationality itself, or rationality alone, was enough, and whether it would just deliver pleasure, happiness and the universal good.

In the Western Enlightenment thinking it was also assumed that a disengaged rationality, that sort of stance of the scientific method, that through that a person adopting a disengaged rationality towards their existence would obviously see the bigger picture. And in seeing the bigger picture of things they would let go of their selfish interest because they can see the bigger picture. Again, there may be some truth in that, but others said that no, the turning and tuning to nature is what allows us to see a bigger picture and let go of selfish interest.

I don't know. Maybe the bigger picture is only ever as big as the conceptual framework's big picture. Maybe what really will rule is the conceptual framework. And in the Enlightenment there was a certain conceptual framework of what the big picture of the universe was, and what human being's place in that universe was. So it's the conceptual framework that will limit what the big picture is. How big the big picture is depends on how big the big picture is in the conceptual framework, more than anything.

And then again, it's interesting: in the soul-making dharma we have this theory or idea that the soul-making dynamic, the dynamic of eros, psyche, logos, will mean that the conceptual framework, whatever conceptual framework we entertain, will—there will be a breaking of the vessels just through the expansion and the stretching that come with the soul-making dynamic, the stretching and the walls of the structures of the conceptual framework and the image and the idea of things through the expansion and deepening fertilization of psyche and logos and eros. There will be a breaking of the vessels, a stretching of the conceptual framework and maybe a breaking of the vessel of the conceptual framework, and a new conceptual framework has to be created-discovered. So that's in the soul-making dharma sort of meta-conceptual framework as well.

There were a lot of assumptions in the Western Enlightenment, some of them were borne out and some of them clearly, historically, seemed to be misplaced or only partially valid.

So, for Kant, for Immanuel Kant and others, human rationality was God-made, God-given and God-made, and was also, as I said, in the image of God. I think that's what Maimonides took that to mean. But for Kant it certainly was. And human rationality was also the same as our freedom. Our freedom was bound up with our being rational. We are moral, rational agents. That's our fundamental, true nature.

With Hegel, who came a little later, human thought and art and religious explorations and expansions of religions—human endeavor, in all that, is just an expression, a movement of expression of a larger progress or movement of what could be translated as reason, often is translated as reason. And that's a divine thing. So whether we take the Kantian view—human rationality is God-made as part of what it means to be made in the image of God—or the sort of bigger Hegelian view that human thought, human rationality, human art, human religion are expressions of a larger movement of kind of cosmic reason, developing itself, growing, expressing itself, and that is a kind of divinity. These were prevalent and very powerful views.

But then historically what happened was rationality was held up as important and offered and assumed as a dimension for ethics, as a supporting dimension for ethics, without any reference to God. So the God bit got jettisoned, got cut off. Similarly, the notion of hierarchical order was dismissed and replaced with an interconnected horizontal order that was designed by God, and then eventually just a horizontal order without any reference to God. There's a movement through history.

So just left with rationality, meaning instrumental rationality, what Taylor calls procedural rationality—our ability to think logically. Jean-Jacques Rousseau said, "Rationality which knows no principle will not raise me above the beasts." So there's this question—this is a very important question—is rationality, is our capacity to think logically and clearly and make deductions, is rationality sufficient as a dimension for ethics? As a soil for ethics? As a dimension that actually provides recourse for ethical thinking and practice? Is rationality sufficient?

We still have to decide what are the aims of rationality, what is rationality trying to judge. So is it that we're just, for example, trying to judge, as the utilitarians would say, just increase pleasure, increase something called happiness and decrease suffering, without trying to discriminate among all the varieties of happiness and suffering and put them in some order? And why? And if we say all human beings are worthy of respect, then why are we saying that?

That has to be grounded in another dimension. Why are all human beings worthy of respect? For Kant, it was because human beings are, in their true nature, rational beings. And that rationality was God-given, created in the image of God. Rationality itself possessed an almost semi-numinous quality—something almost holy, belonging to another dimension entirely.

So we need some kind of metaphysics. I wonder—would people hold that view of rationality today? That it contains a kind of divinity or divine dimension, or even exists as a higher dimension? Is our simple ability to be logical enough grounding for ethics?

Does ethics require a more sophisticated, powerful, or convincing metaphysics? For example, why are all human beings worthy of respect? Because of the spark of divinity within them? Because of the Buddha nature they embody, carry, and express? Because they are theophanies? The question I'm wrestling with is whether rationality alone suffices as a dimension.

Today we conceive of rationality differently than Kant and Hegel did. Even Locke, who conceived it more thinly than those who came after him, still maintained another level—that of God. If we've lost all that, don't we need a more robust metaphysics to justify why all human beings are worthy of respect? Why they are equally worthy of respect? How do we ground such claims?

As I mentioned in the Soul Talks, someone like Richard Rorty attempts to eliminate dimensions entirely—they're absolutely ruled out, flatly and explicitly. There's no recourse to any other level of explanation, meaning, or dimension. But he ends up talking in circles or betraying himself, because his writing slips and reveals these very recourses. It's impossible not to rely on them.

So I wonder—is rationality sufficient? I suspect we still need some kind of metaphysics, even if it's a metaphysics of the numinosity of rationality itself. But that implies a dimensionality that perhaps suggests another dimension altogether.

Again, soulmaking provides other metaphysics, other groundings, other dimensions—but in an ontologically novel way.

We've examined voluntarism, cosmic order, and rationality. The fourth approach grounds ethics simply in reducing suffering and increasing pleasure and happiness. This sounds very Buddhist, doesn't it? While voluntarism remains active for some people, cosmic order and rationality have largely fallen away. But many Buddhists hold this principle—reducing suffering—as paramount. This guides their ethics and provides the foundation for their ethical reasoning.

Let's examine this approach. There were certain assumptions underlying it. Adam Smith, regardless of being considered the father of modern economics or capitalist economics, along with others, assumed a potential harmony of interests. If everyone simply pursues their own happiness and pleasure, society and economy will naturally structure themselves in mutually beneficial ways, because of this inherent harmony of interest between human beings.

I'm not sure everyone agrees with that assumption. There are ways it could be true, though I wonder what Karl Marx would think. And we can observe ways this clearly doesn't work—sociologically, economically, politically speaking.

But what about ethics specifically? What about antinomies—defined as precisely not a harmony of interest, but conflicts of ethical pulls, conflicts between values? These occur within individuals, between people, or among groups. And what about hierarchical comparisons?

Even more important is this complete flattening that occurs with this kind of view—a flattening of any means to evaluate, discover, or create a sense of hierarchy and hierarchical comparison between different kinds of suffering, different kinds of pleasure, different kinds of happiness.

If we say that reducing suffering is the most important thing—that this is our compass, our purpose, our highest value, and all we need to think about in terms of ethics—many Buddhists, if you push them, would indeed say something like that. And I ask: why? Why is reducing suffering the highest value? Why is that the compass, the purpose, the most important thing?

As I pointed out in the last talk and previously in the Sīla and Soul talks, it depends on the view of suffering, which depends on ontologies and all kinds of things. For example, if I'm a staunch materialist, then actually it's hard for me to justify this idea that reducing suffering is important, because really what suffering is, is just a kind of movement—it has no reality in itself. It's just the movement of particles in the universe, just like anything else. So again, reducing suffering, making that the highest value, or increasing pleasure, increasing happiness—I have to base that in something else, in another level of ontology, another dimension. I have to justify it somehow.

It also doesn't really help. Reducing suffering seems simple—okay, that's really simple. That's my compass in life. That's what I do as a Buddhist, perhaps. That's how I decide things. But it often won't help very much at all in deciding what to do in a situation. If I do this, this much suffering will follow. If I do that, that much suffering will follow. But actually we need an infinite kind of arithmetic. Who the hell is going to know the full consequences as they play out in the web of existence? This affects that, and that condition affects that condition. And this incoming condition affects how that condition progresses or not, or what it affects. There's an infinite arithmetic required to discern which action in many, many cases.

And I think even more importantly, what about this question of hierarchy of suffering? There's certainly this infinite calculation that's needed that's kind of impossible. But what about this hierarchy of suffering? We still need to acknowledge a hierarchy. Even if it's just individually determined—this person's hierarchy—this suffering feels worse to bear, this suffering has not so much impact as that kind of suffering. Even if it's individually determined, we still need to acknowledge that there is a hierarchy, and somehow have a way of sorting through the various kinds of suffering.

What about the sufferings of meaninglessness? What about the suffering of a lack of soulfulness in life, of soullessness? What about the suffering of having a sense that I'm not really doing my duty—I have no idea what my duty is, or I do know what it is and I'm just not doing it? How does that measure up in the hierarchy with physical pain and suffering, or with dying early and having a relatively short life, or not being able to go on holiday? How do we demarcate, delineate, measure? There is hierarchy, even if it's personal.

So I think with this one, we really need to think a little harder if that's what we say —"It's just about reducing suffering." Jeremy Bentham, who promoted utilitarianism, held this idea: it's just about maximizing happiness, pleasure, minimizing unpleasantness. That kind of idea—and it can be certain interpretations of Buddhadharma—is just about reducing suffering. It's just very, very simple like that.

That's the kind of view that's held and the answer that will be given, whether it's just self-suffering or self and others in a kind of more Mahāyāna, supposedly Mahāyāna kind of view. So the interpretations of what reducing suffering means and what the motivations are involved in reducing suffering—reducing the unpleasant—this is what human beings want: just reduce the unpleasant vedanā, reduce suffering, increase the pleasant vedanā.

This reflects a kind of small, flat psychology. It won't do—it's too impoverished. And the idea that we can somehow successfully compute massive totals of suffering from one choice versus another choice—this sort of vast, impossible project of one-dimensional arithmetic—simply doesn't stand up to scrutiny.

With the Western Enlightenment, there was a very strong current of "utility only"—the notion that people naturally desire pleasant pleasure and happiness and the absence of pain. Any conception of the cosmic order of things becomes completely irrelevant; only the consequences in terms of pleasure and pain matter. How can we maximize pleasure and something called happiness? How can we minimize pain and unpleasantness?

This entire philosophy, this whole ethical system, is actually an attempt at non-dimensionalizing. There's no dimensionality there. I'm not even sure I should have included it, since it's actually a form of non-dimensionalism—though I include it because many people think this way. But the very sense we have of a hierarchy of sufferings—even if it's individual, even if mine differs from yours—suggests, hints at, points toward some kind of dimensionality, some ordering of values. Utilitarianism completely ignores this, completely disregards any possible relative hierarchizing of values. When things exist in hierarchy, it's because they're rooted in, they somehow correspond to, a dimensionality. The sense of hierarchy of sufferings itself hints at, points to, suggests this deeper ordering.

You may have heard a teaching in the Buddha Dharma that's fairly common: You realize you're falling. You're falling without a parachute through space. Massive dukkha—falling! Then at some point you notice there's no ground. There's no ground. I'm just falling, but there's no ground. Therefore, there's no problem, because I'm not going to smash into something and die. So falling, but there's no ground.

This is often given as a teaching on emptiness or groundlessness, though when you examine what's actually being taught, it's more about impermanence. But either way, that doesn't matter for what I want to explore here.

What if the meaning—the highest meaning in life—was to recognize that there is no ground, so there is no problem, so there's no suffering? And perhaps, if you want, you could add helping and showing others this realization, so they too see there's no problem. That becomes the highest meaning in life: to recognize there's no ground, therefore no problem, therefore no suffering for yourself, and then to help others see there's no ground, no problem, no suffering.

How does that sit with you?

Just imagine people falling through space, initially terrified, then realizing there's no ground and explaining this to each other. Eventually, everyone is simply falling through space without any sense of problem, without dukkha. Linger with this as the highest meaning of life, moving toward this vision as the ultimate purpose. Imagine these beings falling through empty space, none troubled by it. That's the goal.

How does that sit with you?

If you feel called to defend this view of life's meaning—reducing suffering and helping others reduce their suffering—I want to say: Look closer. Just look closer. Consider this goal of realizing there's nothing to do, nowhere to go, and then no suffering. We're just falling through space, but there's no problem. We help each other see there's no problem.

With this goal of not suffering, of helping others see no suffering, I want to ask: If you look closer, if you linger with it and examine more deeply, doesn't it have some other appeal too? For example, when we're not worrying about the falling, when we simply realize we're just falling—going nowhere, nothing to do, no problem—then we sense the beauty or the radiance or the Buddha nature or the holiness, the mystery.

The appeal of "less suffering and help others suffer less" has something hiding behind it, something that's not being articulated, something hidden.

So you might have to stay with that a little longer.

But this is one of the central contentions, insistencies, explorations, theses of soul-making Dharma. There's something often unexpressed, unarticulated, hiding behind the view we have, the conceptual framework we have of Buddhadharma—for example, the way we explain it to ourselves and to others—that's not quite fully illuminated, not even fully self-honest, let's say. And soul-making Dharma tries to expose that, point out there's something hiding behind it, there's something that's not being articulated here, usually. Or at least that it needs another level. It needs something more than the ending of suffering, even if that's the ending of suffering for all beings.

So this is one of the areas where soul-making Dharma comes in and tries to open things out, give more of what might be needed, offer more of what might be needed.

Okay. So voluntarism, sense of the order of the cosmos, rationality, decreasing suffering, increasing happiness—these are some of the ideas, some of the ways the dimensionality or rooting of ethics has been offered, and the varieties of them through history. And again, I'm just using them as a framework, really, to understand something, open something up, see what soul-making Dharma and practice can offer into this question of ethical philosophy and practice and the dimensionality that's needed there—dimensionality that we need to ground and root our ethics.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit DharmaSeed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 231

The Image of Ethics (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h52

> In this fourth exploration of ethics through the lens of soul-making dharma, Rob Burbea addresses the crucial question of what it means to be human and how this understanding must inform our ethical life. Drawing on the experiential foundation of imaginal practice, he invites listeners to compare their ordinary sense of humanity with the profound sense of self that emerges when sensing with soul.
>
> Burbea traces historical developments that have shaped our contemporary view of human nature, from the Protestant Reformation's emphasis on human depravity and total dependence on divine grace, through the secularization of ethics that divorced moral questions from religious dimensions. He examines how figures like Luther and Melanchthon created a radical separation between theology and ethics, leading to our current flattened conception of human being.
>
> The talk explores how soul-making dharma offers a different possibility - neither the Protestant view of total dependence on grace nor secular humanism's purely rational approach, but a participatory understanding where human eros and capacity for soul-making are themselves divine. This perspective allows for a rehabilitation of concepts like telos (the soul's calling) and magnanimity (big soul) while integrating healthy shame and guilt as soul phenomena. Burbea concludes by questioning what viable ways exist today for conceiving our humanity that support a genuine sense of blessedness and dignity.

Let's continue our exploration, inquiry, and unpacking of what soul-making dharma and the practice of sensing the soul might bring to the whole domain of ethics—how we think about ethics, how we relate to ethics and our ethical choices, our ethical life. How can soul-making dharma really include ethics and support our notion of ethics, our idea of ethical life, perhaps in ways that it needs supporting these days?

Indeed, that's where we began with this idea that perhaps there are some needs we can identify. We listed seven or eight needs that any approach to ethics, any system of ethics, might have to incorporate somehow these days—at least that's how I would think of it. We've explored a few of these needs, and they're all completely interrelated, implying each other, involving each other.

Today I'd like to explore the need related to the sense and idea of what a human is, what a human being is, and what a human being can be. How we think about ethics and how we approach ethics must somehow impinge and affect, hopefully in a helpful way, the sense and notion of what a human being is and what a human being can be. That whole idea and sense of our humanity is very much—and should be very much—tied in with our sense of ethics, so that the two, our sense of ethics and our sense of our humanity, should imply each other, should feed each other, should support each other, should be congruent with each other.

Just to make sure that all this doesn't sound like a very abstract exercise in philosophy or worse, a history of Western society or Western philosophy, I wonder if we can really ground what we're talking about today in a real lived sense, in a real experiential feel for: "Oh yes, this is what we're talking about and this matters."

Perhaps most people listening to this talk have had enough experience with soul-making dharma practice that they've had even just a couple of images that have really touched them deeply. The whole experience of the way the imaginal opened up and how pertinent it was to the particulars of their life and situation, and the sense of beyonds there, the sense of the other elements: duty and beauty and eros and loving and being loved and eternality and reverence and grace and all of that.

Most people listening, hopefully, will have had at least one or two experiences where the soul has been really impacted. In that—as we say—because when an imaginal image is allowed to do its thing, when the soul-making dynamic is not interrupted, not blocked, there is the image as an erotic imaginal object, so to speak, and then the self will also become imaginable.

So hopefully most people listening will have had that kind of experience, maybe even once or twice, where the whole imaginal constellation has begun to subsume the sense of self. The self becomes sensed with soul, imaginal, so to speak. If you can remember back to those experiences and the profundity of them, and the sense of: "Oh, wow, wow, wow, this is really another order of sense of things than I'm used to, a different order of a sense of self than I'm used to"—different even than emptiness or dissolving in jhāna or mettā or whatever it is.

If you can just get a sense of that—is it possible to remember that? You don't have to invoke it completely, but just remember a little bit about it right now.

Perhaps we can delineate a spectrum. At one end of this spectrum, you have such an experience of your humanity. Not just a sense of yourself—what I want to point to is your sense of your humanity. In that experience, when the self was brought in and involved in the soul-making dynamic, when the self became imaginal and the self was sensed with soul, yes, there's a different sense of self, but with that too, there's a different sense of your humanity, your depths, who you are, your relationship with divinity or Buddha-nature and the cosmos and all of that.

So you can remember the sense of your humanity there, the sense and the logos also of your humanity there as part of the sense of self that was there when you were sensing yourself with soul. Maybe that's at one end of a spectrum.

At the other end is just the normal, perhaps, sense of humanity that we—most people—walk around with and move around with today in our culture of Western secular modernity. Just the normal sense of what the human being is, the normal feel of that, the normal idea of that. Of course we could go further—when someone's full of self-hatred, etc.—but let's just stay with that norm, that norm of Western modernity. So that norm of Western modernity, that sense of your humanity, of our humanity at one end, and at the other end, this sense of humanity when the self is sensed with soul, part of an imaginal constellation: self, other, world.

Maybe in the middle, for some, there's a continuum where, depending on what circles you move in, there may be a prevalence of new age ideas about angels and being shamans or witches and that sort of identification, and maybe even practices and rituals. Also maybe the sense of your humanity that you might have had if you take seriously the Bodhisattva vow, or if you're in a ceremony of taking the Bodhisattva vows and feeling the self as bodhisattva with that aspiration—perhaps that affected the sense of your humanity in some way, or the idea of having Buddha-nature or being Buddha-nature. There are many possibilities.

At the risk of being contentious, let's put that in the middle. What I'm pointing to is more just when there's a kind of idea of something, and maybe a kind of practice, but it hasn't really turned the soil and ignited in the way that you know soul-making practice can. So there's a kind of something, a kind of different ideation that's supported by the people around you. Maybe there are ceremonies and rituals and certain language. Maybe certain practices, maybe a change in experience, but it's not quite of the order of what we're talking about when soul-making practice really ignites and the imaginal really gets going, the authentic imaginal.

So we have this spectrum: the norms of secular modernity, this middle ground where certain ideas are doing something in the psyche—maybe certain practices, certain rituals, certain ceremonies, certain communities and languages—and then the soul-making sense of one's humanity.

Can you linger with that spectrum, either the two ends or the whole spectrum, and just compare? Compare the senses of humanity, the ideas, but also the very sense of one's humanity. This is what I'm talking about. It's not abstract.

We're really talking about something that's not just in the realm of ideas or philosophy or history. It really has to do with that, and that degree of import and impact to the human being, to you, to me.

And then I wonder, as we go through the talk tonight, if you can hold that remembered sense or those remembered senses—the remembered sense of the normal human sense of your humanity, or that contemporarily normal sense of that, and also alternating with your remembered sense of your humanity when you were profoundly touched by an imaginal practice or soul-making sense or sensing with soul.

Just lightly, in the back of your mind, in the back of the citta, as a kind of reference, or references, throughout this talk, throughout the listening. Just to really make sure, as I said, that it's anchored in a sense of the import, in a realization, a palpable realization of the import of what we're talking about. We're not talking abstractly here.

So just as much as possible, very lightly in the background, I wonder if that might help digest and assimilate and empower, really, the listening.

So this is the wish list item I want to look at today: a sense and the idea of what it is to be human and what a human being can be.

Last time we talked about dimensionality. We gave out these four ways that sort of dimensionalize ethics, or provide something or other in another dimension to secure, to found, to root, to ground the ethical thinking and the ethical justifications. There were four ways, principal ways in which that was sort of given in history, and we looked at how soul-making Dharma kind of could modify them or what it would have to say about them.

One of them was actually a non-dimensionalizing: a utilitarian, or commonly for some people a kind of Buddhist notion, just decreasing suffering. That's the most important thing. That's the primary issue and the primary purpose. Decreasing suffering or increasing pleasure or happiness. And without really spending any time differentiating between the different kinds of suffering.

When we talk about differentiating between different kinds of suffering, I'm not talking about, for instance, your child getting upset in the supermarket when they see some candy that they want and you say no, and they start crying, and they're suffering. And in your mind, it's like, "Well, they're suffering now, but I'm saving their teeth later, and their metabolism, and possibly their brain from deteriorating into ADHD." We're not talking about that kind of comparison of suffering. We're not talking about, as I think it was Ajahn Chah who said—we're not talking about the suffering now comparing a suffering now that just ripens in more suffering compared to a suffering now that brings about or enables less suffering in the future. We're not talking about that kind of comparison.

We're talking about more things like the examples I gave the other day, or have given examples of in the past. Like why chemo was so difficult for me. Going into a certain chemo ward in a certain hospital felt very, very difficult. And I pinpointed it—it was a soul suffering more than a body suffering. Body sufferings, there were plenty of body sufferings wrapped up with chemo. But something caused a suffering in my soul that was really, really difficult to deal with, the hardest thing for me to deal with.

So then I was trying to explain—we had set up this ritual with Catherine when I was going back to chemo, just trying to find the right soul orientation to it. I had this little crucible and was cutting fingernails and bits of hair and pricking myself with bits of blood, bodily elements in there, giving them up. And the question of whether giving is a part of soulful ritual, a necessary part of soulful ritual.

But there was something—which I actually can't remember—I was thinking about my eyes and my ears and the mind and what that has to encounter in there, that that feels like a wounding to the soul. So there was something in the ritual which I just can't remember now that captured the soul suffering and the suffering for the mind, for tomorrow's mind that would go into the chemo tomorrow. This giving up, this giving of elements of my body today. There was something for the mind, I can't remember.

But anyway, what we're really talking about is different kinds of suffering. There's a way of approaching ethics that just ignores any difference between different kinds of suffering. Soul suffering, for example, versus bodily suffering. Sufferings of meaninglessness versus physical pain.

What I want to say now is that refusing to make a differentiation between different kinds of suffering, refusing any hierarchy of sufferings—that they're actually sufferings of a different level in the being—and that refusal in utilitarian ethics or ethics in some kind of, for some people, their Buddhist-based ethics that is just about reducing suffering... In utilitarian ethics, just about increasing pleasure and happiness and reducing unpleasantness, reducing suffering, reducing pain.

What I want to say is that refusal of differentiating and hierarchizing suffering corresponds with a flattening of the human being—a refusal to acknowledge and to conceive and to sense that a human being also has dimensions. And these different kinds of suffering are, if you like, wounds at different levels of, or different dimensions of the human being.

If we talk about that other potential dimensionalizing, which is an attempt to dimensionalize in what's called voluntarism—just that God said so—usually that's conceived with the human being quite flatly conceived. And it goes very much with a post-Reformation theology without intermediaries, and the human is just flatly conceived. The dimensionality comes in the radical duality and the huge distance between the human being and God. But the human being themselves, or humanity themselves, is actually quite flatly conceived, usually in that voluntarist philosophical basis for ethics.

If we take the attempt to provide dimension for ethics in the cosmic order, then the vertical cosmic order, the hierarchical cosmic order, usually always goes with a sense of the dimensionality of a human being. A human being in themselves, or is themselves, a kind of being that is characterized by having different dimensions, different levels of our being, different levels of our soul.

Whereas the horizontal cosmic order, which came to prevail and predominate historically much more over a notion of a vertical cosmic order, that horizontal cosmic order, again, unsurprisingly...

brought with it, concomitant with that, was a notion of the human being—a flat notion of a human being, much more in common with aspects of our contemporary notion of human being. Not completely, because there are other complications historically. For instance, our interiority and things that came later have a long history as well. But generally speaking, we can say there's a flattening, in the sense that I want to talk about, of the human being.

If we try to offer rationality as a possible dimension in which to ground our ethics, then it depends on the metaphysics that goes with the whole idea of rationality. For Kant, for Hegel, certainly for Plato, rationality implied dimensionality of the human. For Plato and Hegel it certainly implied a kind of dimensionality of the cosmos—in very different ways between Plato and Hegel, but they're implied in that idea of rationality.

Again, there's a correspondence of the human being to the cosmic order. And to open to the cosmic order, and then to set one's life up erotically in correspondence with that order—that's rational human behavior and rational human thinking in the largest sense of the word for Plato. For Kant, the rationality had a kind of numinosity to it, because it was part of our essential nature, part of what God had given us, part of what it means to be made in the image of God.

But with our current dominant use of what we mean by rationality—just what's called procedural rationality—again, at first it might have been conceived as God-given, this capacity as God-given. But now, over time and through history and with increasing secularization, I'm not sure how different people view rationality and how capable it is of providing that other dimension that ethics needs. And it almost never really does. No one would ever really claim that, for example.

Say this is where a human being's dignity lies—in their rationality. Because then someone who's brain damaged or has impaired mental functioning in terms of their logical, rational capabilities... if a person was strict with the view that rationality provided that dimension, then we would treat them with much less respect, which is generally not what we do in Western courts in terms of human rights.

But the question here, again, what I want to focus on today is: what do all these different ideas and attempts at dimensionality, how do they influence our sense of what a human being is?

We looked too briefly at the history of the Protestant Reformation and their rejection of any intermediaries between humanity and God, and that meant a rejection of angels as well—angels as intermediaries. Which means, in our language, no images, no devas to refract the divine attributes.

If you think of a kind of pure, bright, intense white light, and it reaches a prism, and then it refracts into different colors, all coming out at different angles—different wavelengths, different frequencies coming out at different angles. Maybe that's one way of understanding this pure, white, undifferentiated light of God. It has all these different attributes, all these different colors and wavelengths in it, but the prism refracts them differently. The angelic world refracts them differently, so we can separate them out, so we can digest them more, see their beauty more.

So the white light is definitely beautiful, but then this rainbow of other colors—we see more the beauty of the divine, the Buddha nature, and we see it in a bigger way. We spread it out through the prism. Perhaps that's a way of thinking of what the world of the angels does, and what images do. But in the Protestant Reformation, there was this refusal of intermediaries, therefore refusal of angels, therefore refusal of a dimension that refracted the divine attributes, and a refusal then of seeing ourselves also as in turn reflecting and refracting those divine attributes through a sort of ladder from the divine, from the Buddha nature, into the world of devas and angels, and into human being.

So this rejection had a lot of influence in history regarding what a human is—a lot of impact on the notion, the sense of what a human being is and on their relationship to God and on their relationship to the cosmic order or the cosmos.

So what is a human being? If we talk again, tying in with something like species extinction and the crime of species extinction... So yes, of course, that's a crime against the individual animals—uncountable numbers, uncountable suffering of individual animals. And yes, of course, it's a crime against the species. If we can say, can there be a crime against a species? We talked about Polly Higgins and the crime of ecocide, hopefully making it into international law. So yes, yes.

And then is species extinction a crime against animals? Yes. Is it a crime against a species? Yes. Is it a crime against the cosmic order, or even the planetary order, the order of life on Earth? Yes. But is it not—I feel it is also, or can it be regarded as—a crime against humanity too?

Species extinction is a crime against humanity too, not just because we are probably biologically dependent on many of these species and the way they work in the ecosystem. What I want to focus on more now, right now, is because of our potential soul connection with other species and with ecosystems. Ecosystem is such a cold, scientific sounding word. Let's say with forests, for example, with coral reefs, with oceans.

One way of understanding what a human being is, is that they're profoundly connected. Our soul, as a human being, is profoundly connected with other species, other ecosystems. They are theophanies that we are called to witness, to open to, to sense with soul, to know their beauty, to know their depth, to know their divinity. And that potential soul connection—because of course it's often really not realized, that potential. We don't feel these things as a crime against humanity, or not enough people do, not enough human beings do.

But maybe that very potential soul connection—that capability to sense with soul and feel species and ecosystems that way—is whatever you want to call it, deep or high, part of our humanity. It's an aspect of our soul, a dimension of our soul.

Or even consider light pollution—the fact that it's so difficult now to find a place in the northern hemisphere, in the western world, where one can truly see the stars well. To lie down on the earth at night and open up to the magnificence of the heavens, the mystery, the sheer scale of it, the radiance, the depth of it. Is the fact that there are fewer and fewer places where one can actually see that many stars also a crime against humanity?

Or noise pollution—there are so few places outside where the dominant sound is not mostly some kind of internal combustion engine burning fossil fuels loudly, as opposed to the sound of birdsong or wind in trees. Are these too crimes against our humanity?

What does it mean to be a human being? What is a human being? What can it mean to be a human being? What should it mean to be a human being? To me, these are really important questions.

We've talked about the Protestant Reformation. I certainly don't want to vilify it, because a great deal of good came out of it, despite the difficulties—the wars and other problems, and the historical threads we're tracing that had their origins there.

Martin Luther, in instigating the Protestant Reformation, held a very pessimistic and impoverished view of the human being. So poor that the human being was totally reliant on divine grace in Luther's view, in the Protestant view. There was very little a human being could do to work toward or ensure their own salvation. There was total reliance on the free will of God to save us.

The corollary of this, which we touched on the other day, is that there's very little place for the cultivation of ethical virtue. That loses its place as anything that might move you closer to God or open up the sense of the divine for you. Any kind of extra striving on behalf of monks or nuns becomes pointless. Ethical virtue itself, the whole notion of the virtues, gets undermined. The cultivation of and aspiration to the virtues gets undermined in terms of salvation, as does any notion of ritual or sacrament or other extraordinary activity.

There's very little place, then, for the lava, the eros—for that extra reaching that souls are capable of, that super ire, that going beyond.

At the time of the Renaissance, you had people like Nicholas of Cusa, Marsilio Ficino, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola—they held and promoted a more exalted view of the human being. Pico wrote a very beautiful text about that. Luther was really moving in the opposite direction.

He emphasized the fall—Adam and Eve eating the apple, getting expelled from the garden. That was central to his theology. Of course, the fall and expulsion from Eden was always present in Christianity and Judaism. Even when people espoused a more exalted and exalting view of the human being, there was still always some mention of the fall. But Martin Luther insisted on placing it very centrally, and that human nature was completely corrupted by original sin. Why? Because the flip side of that is the necessity of total dependence on redemption through God, through Christ. Salvation only comes through God. There's nothing in us that we can rely on, develop, work on.

Paraphrasing the historian Jill Kraye: humanity was therefore unable to make any contribution to one's own salvation. It's all up to God. In Protestant thought, the spiritual impotence and depravity of post-lapsarian man—that means post-fall, post-expulsion from the Garden of Eden, which is simply how we are now—the spiritual impotence and depravity of post-lapsarian man became a central doctrine.

Calvin, who was very central in this Protestant movement, believed that man's high opinion of himself had to be deflated. He had to be convinced of his own corruption and debility. For only then would man realize he was lost and helpless without divine grace.

We mentioned the other day Michel de Montaigne. Though he was a Catholic and not a Protestant, he similarly set about taking humanity down a good few rungs in one's self-assessment. Kraye writes: "Montaigne was concerned to destroy man's presumption and lower his excessive estimate of his own worth."

One of the upshots of this for ethics was very significant, because Protestantism brought much less place and regard for ethics and virtue cultivation. It's all dependent on God.

Later, I want to read you something from Melanchthon, a reformist thinker who again stressed the fall, the expulsion from the Garden of Eden. But he did something very interesting...

almost separated out the realm of ethics, in fact he did separate out the realm of ethics from the realm of religion, theology. This came as part of a movement of Protestant theology—a separating out. First there's no place for ethics, and then ethics comes back in, but it's separated from any connection with religion, real connection with divinity or divine aspiration.

This separation came from Melanchthon. As Jill Cray writes, ethics had nothing to do with the will of God or the remission of sins. It was exclusively concerned with rules governing external action and civil society. Conversely, theology had nothing to do with these ethical rules. You can see how this recourse to dimensionalizing ethics by placing it in relationship to divinity gets totally shattered here as they are pulled apart. Ethics has nothing to do with God, nothing to do with religious aspiration, nothing to do with salvation even.

By delineating these two different spheres of influence, Melanchthon was effectively applying Luther's doctrine of the two kingdoms to ethics. Luther had this idea: there's a kingdom of Christ, and there's a secular kingdom. They coexist—not in different places or times so much as they coexist. Yes, we live in civil society, but that's not the kingdom of Christ. The kingdom of Christ can be something constituted by some members of civil society, but it exists among them and in their relationship to each other and to God.

Luther distinguished between the sacred kingdom, in which true Christians are ruled by Christ through the Holy Spirit, and the secular kingdom, in which non-Christians are ruled by political authorities through laws and coercion. Since the secular kingdom is also established by God and is necessary to preserve society, Christians must obey its authority, provided it doesn't impinge on their higher loyalty to God by interfering in matters of faith.

There's a separation saying yes, you have to follow the laws and even the coercion of the ruler of your society. But that's only to preserve society because God said that's good too. It has nothing to do with that whole realm of ethics. The whole realm of ethics has nothing to do with your relationship with God. Nothing to do with theology.

Luther had really objected to scholastic theology and the influence of Aristotle, particularly Aristotle's Ethics. He regarded it as the worst enemy of grace. You get this polarizing: if you want to totally prioritize grace, divine grace, and dependence on divine grace, then you totally dismiss any place for ethics. And if you give a central place to ethics and ethical aspiration and virtues—perhaps even a road to growing into God, to theosis, to divinification—then you're shrinking the power of God and the place for God's grace.

Luther was very anti-Aristotle and anti-Aristotelian influence in the Middle Ages and scholastic theology, because of how he saw it compromising and limiting our dependence on divine grace. Whereas Melanchthon came in and completely separated ethics and theology, then was able to reclaim a place for even the ancient pagan philosophers like Aristotle—separate from one's relationship with God.

So ethics and that kind of ethical philosophy governed the external actions of those who had not yet been enlightened by the Holy Spirit, and simply helped to preserve the peace and order of civil society. This divorce of ethical from religious questions is extremely significant—the dimensionality rooting the ethical sense is lost, and only rationality steps in, in the procedural sense, in the flat sense.

In a way, the whole Western Enlightenment and secularism partly had its roots in the very Protestant Reformation. It didn't start as secular at all. It started as an attempt at increasing religiosity. But there were seed ideas there that, when they grew and their consequences were extrapolated over time, had enormous consequences both for religion in general and the religious sensibility, but also on society and on ethics.

Interestingly, Melanchthon hated Plato because with Plato there's this teaching that one can purify—there's this kind of ladder, rational order to the universe, and one's sense of the virtues and values corresponds to that ladder, a bit like Augustine. One can climb up this ladder by purifying the virtues and moving closer to God, closer to a vision of God. Melanchthon thought that was literally the invention of the devil—as if you could live by that kind of rationality alone, without Christianity and without divine grace.

But Melanchthon's sharp delineation, splitting between ethics and theology, allowed even Aristotelian moral philosophy to become reintegrated into standard Protestant education. Enormous, enormous consequences of all this played out gradually over quite a while.

This emphasis in the Protestant Reformation—the emphasis on the fall, on the expulsion from Eden, on original sin, and the rejection of mediation by priests, by any elite, rejection of the sacraments and the sacred—all meaning that salvation is completely and only dependent on divine grace. All this, in terms of what it means for humanity, wraps up in a total and radical duality of God and human. God is completely and utterly different, and that's that.

There's no ladder in between. There are no dimensions of our being. There's no possible way of moving closer. There are no intermediaries that refract and reflect and function as theophanies in the world. It's all dependent on divine grace.

So again, if we bring soul-making dharma here, we have grace as an element of the imaginal. But in soul-making dharma, in contrast to this Protestant teaching where everything is dependent on divine grace—that's all there is, you can't do anything—we have something different. In soul-making dharma, interestingly, if you reflect on this, we have grace as an element of the imaginal, this sense of inexplicable gift. I've been given this image or this sense of things, and I couldn't really engineer it. I'm not the master of it. It's an inexplicable gift from the divine.

But that element is balanced by other elements. We need to develop energy body awareness—this is something we can do. The very idea that an image is a way of looking implies that there are ways of looking we can play with. It's dependent on us. Those two elements or nodes of the lattice. Also the autonomy, not just of the image, but of the self—that we have to assent, that we participate. In fact, the node of create-discover, the emphasis on creation and not just discovery. All of these balance the node of the element of grace.

Do you understand? Instead of the Protestant view where it's all grace, you get this much more balanced, fluid network.

And if we entertain the idea that soul-making gives us the sense that our eros—our eros—my eros right now is divine. Maybe my psyche, the image, my capacity to have images, my soul, the logos, the thoughts I have, the insights, the conceptions. Either entertaining that idea or actually having those senses and ideas arise naturally through soul-making practice—it is divine and it's from the divine.

And again, either entertaining the idea or it arising naturally from soul-making practice that our egoic and neurotic shapes are kind of impoverished echoes or impoverished reflections of divinity, of angel, of image. These ideas and these senses very much provide a counterweight to a reliance on grace, on the guru, on whatever it is, on the divine completely. It's not totally up to me either. It's not just a matter of me becoming a master of soul-making technique, imaginal technique, practice technique.

But of course, we have to point out that those ideas and those perspectives—that my eros is divine, comes from the divine, that my egoic neurotic shapes are really just slightly distorted, impoverished reflections of the divine, of the angel, of the daemon, the image—could be corrupted. They can be corrupted, they can be faked, we can be mistaken about that. Just like there were corrupt priests in the Catholic Church at the time of the Protestant Reformation, and the Protestant Reformation was pointing fingers and objecting to that.

But actually, as I think I said the other day, that wasn't the main point of the Protestant Reformation. It wasn't an attempt to weed out corrupt priests—let's have a whole overhaul while we're doing that. Actually, the fundamental idea was theological. The fundamental point was a theological revolution, reformation. And that was this emphasis on the total power of God, on not imprisoning God's total freedom and power.

Just so, in soul-making, the fundamental point is on the possibility—through disciplined practice and sensitivity—to create and discover as sacred and as divine, as rooted in divine and as divinizable, with a conception of ontic roots in divine, with lived possibilities of human being. The fundamental point of soul-making is the possibility, through disciplined practice and the kind of sensitivity that goes with disciplined practice, to create, discover anything as sacred and divine, especially including human beings.

We're emphasizing this today because the sense of human being has, through modernity and even through humanism and secular humanism, become flattened. First it was divorced from a radically different God, as we said in the Protestant Reformation. And then, with the gradual rise of atheistic secularism through different stages—many stages including deism, as some of you probably know—it was simply flattened. Not even just divorced from God, because God became non-existent, so divorce from God made no sense. It was simply a flat view of the human being.

All this has enormous effects on how we feel, sense and think of ourselves and our humanity. And we've used several times over the past four or five years this idea of telos—to think theologically or to conceive theologically the telos of the human being. For instance, the angel out ahead calling me.

In Plato, there's a kind of idea of telos, of the human moving towards, rising towards, if you like, the world of what's called the intelligences, the world of ideas, the realm of ideas, which is talked about in the Sila and Sol talks, the realm of forms. In some versions of Platonism, Neo-Platonism, there's an idea of humanity in general, but in others there's also included the idea of your individual form, the ideal version of you. We talked about that on Sila and Sol.

And there's this—that's there in the whole metaphysic and cosmology of Platonism. And again, to be rational meant to see that, to acknowledge it, to feel it, and to be drawn naturally through seeing it and through love of it and through eros for it, towards moving towards it. So there's a certain telos, there's a certain natural movement of humanity. This is our destiny, if you like. It's another word for telos.

When Aristotle came along after Plato, he had a different idea of telos. More eventually biological, if you like, but really, there's an Aristotelian telos as well, the idea of a natural inclination or a goal of our nature.

We naturally move towards. These whole ideas—that we naturally move towards the angel, we naturally move towards God, that we're built for this, that this is the natural inclination, the natural way we will grow if we don't distort that—these ideas were decimated, severed, beginning really with William of Ockham and others.

Often this transformation is presented as a kind of argument between what's called nominalists and realists, as if it's a philosophical argument about universals and particulars. Are universals real? "Table," as opposed to "this table." This table is clearly a real thing—but "table" as a universal, is it not a real thing? It's presented these days as if all the fuss was about some kind of pretty abstract-sounding philosophical argument.

Actually, it was fundamentally a theological argument again. And again, it had to do with refusing to limit God's power, God's fiat. Fiat means "let it be"—"let there be light" in Latin—God's ability to just, through God's will, decide what happens whenever, wherever, however. So the theological idea was nothing should limit that infinite and endless possibility and power of God's fiat, the enaction of God's will.

If there's a natural telos for the human being—how human beings naturally grow if things don't block it—that's actually a limit to God's fiat. Because then their growth, their salvation, their liberation, their nirvana, whatever you want to call it, their realization, their awakening, is something that's not entirely dependent on God, if there's a human telos.

Do you hear how significant this is? It came from a theological argument about not wanting to limit God's power. And then eventually, over time, that very idea became the seed for this mechanistic universe, because it was only a kind of flat and mechanistic universe that was compatible, really fully compatible, with this sort of endless and infinite freedom of God's fiat, of God's power.

It's complex—I'm oversimplifying—because with the idea of the mechanistic universe came also the encouragement for humans to exercise their power and technology. And we talked about Locke and the instrumental stance and human control, human fear. So it's complex. But still, there was something in the seed idea that had all kinds of implications and consequences about our sense of our humanity, our sense of ourselves, our sense of our souls.

No more possible the telos of the soul, the calling of the soul. This idea of an angel out ahead, completely ruled out. There's a radical duality between God and the human soul. Can't have—in that view, this idea we have that the angel is me and it's not me, ruled out. Or that there's a spark of divinity in me, or there's a natural inclining, natural inclination, growth, natural reach to the divine. All these would be impossible views.

So again, in soul-making dharma, what we've done, or there's an attempt to do, is to rehabilitate, to redeem notions like telos, and also ethics, obviously, but again, with a different ontology and epistemology. We need a different ontology and epistemology in order to make sense of these ideas. We can't just go back to the Middle Ages or ancient Greece. So the different ontology and epistemology, and with practice, and with the subtleties and sophistications of practice and what that opens up and the senses that that opens up in the being—with practice, with care and practice, the eros opens up the psyche and the logos, the ideation as well, the idea of things and the idea of human being.

If we just linger—so there was this pessimism, that's the right word, regarding morality and human nature that came with, or that grew with, the Protestant Reformation. And then, historically, jumping forward some hundreds of years, there was even more of this pessimism regarding morality and human nature that came with Freud. We touched on that the other day. The influence of Freud's ideas in Western culture were quite pervasive.

And then getting into the twentieth century—World War I, World War II, the Holocaust, Stalin—there has been a kind of trend of pessimism regarding morality and human nature. That's one of the trends. There's also been a pessimism, if we want to use that word, regarding the human being's capacity for ontology and epistemology and what we can hope for there.

In a way, starting with Kant—I mean, it goes way before Kant really, but he, in many ways, what he did philosophically really started to undermine, in a way that became much more popular, the belief that we could really know things as they are, or know reality, and have a kind of pure knowledge of things. And since Kant, it's grown even more with postmodernity and other thinkers and lots of things.

So again, soul-making dharma comes in, is born in that kind of crucible, in that kind of soup, in that kind of opening of historical contingency. Part of what soul-making dharma says is not that it's possible to prove absolute truths about ethics or about ontology or about epistemology, about human nature, but what is possible through soul-making dharma is that we can, in practice and in concept, conceptually, relate to these areas—ethics, ontology, epistemology—so that they are fruitful, so that they are meaning-making, and so that they make possible for us a real sense of a genuine ethical nobility and beauty, without one fixed view or truth either.

This is the way things are: neither totally objective nor subjective, but participatory.

Through soul-making dharma and practice, it becomes possible to have this sense of dimensionality—a dimensionality that's potent and trustworthy, offering a genuine sense of nobility. While the history of Buddhadharma is probably most relevant to us as practitioners, perhaps even more impactful on how we sense our existence, the cosmos, and our humanity is the history of Western theology.

With all good intentions, the secularization of ethics brought about a view that there are no dimensional or transcendent principles, values, or virtues. What's more, it established the idea that there's no possibility of knowing any such dimensions or values. This becomes almost axiomatic. Then the question becomes: How do we organize society so that each person can pursue what they want and protect their right to do that—to pursue what they want and decide what it is they want—without causing civil war or social breakdown?

Starting with good intentions, this secularization removed dimensionality and the possibility of knowing such dimensionality, or even refused to believe such dimensions exist. Ethics then gets transposed into organizing society to prevent chaos and mutual destruction. Eventually this goes so far as to become game theory approaches to society—it's not even ethics anymore.

Consider the prisoner's dilemma: If I want to get what I want, should I trust other people, knowing they want to get what they want, which probably conflicts with what I want? Should I believe them? Should I trust them? Should I team up with them? This is now how people think about society and our social predicament.

Or consider explanations of altruism like Richard Dawkins' selfish gene theory, so popular in the 1980s. In that view, what looks like altruism is actually an illusion—merely biological evolutionary strategies for survival of the gene, not even the human being. The nobility of human altruism doesn't really exist; what's really happening is the gene trying to ensure its own survival through its own selfishness. This whole evolution of thinking ends up with such ideas applied to game theory, ethics, society, and economics.

Going back to Descartes, Locke, and Kant—for them, rationality and the capacity for rationality was part of what conferred and secured human dignity. The Western Enlightenment implied: let's not put our belief in superstitions about gods; let's realize our own dignity as human beings.

As time went by, however, the notion of human beings as having intrinsic dignity, or even of most human beings acting in a dignified way most of the time, seemed to get very thin, especially moving into the twentieth century. Perhaps the idea of innate human dignity was seen to fail or seemed to be an illusion.

Can we provide, find, create, or discover another basis for human nobility, human possibility, human essence and depth, and our sense of place in the cosmos? This is very much part of what soul-making dharma and practice does—it's one possibility, one way of opening up, deepening, and rescuing the sense of human being.

But it's tricky. We need only look in the newspaper or turn on the news, and it's hard to reconcile dignity, nobility, and human possibility with what we see of depravity. This brings us back to that question of shame we touched on the other day, which I want to revisit now.

We talked about naming and shaming and how it's often looked down upon in spiritual circles—certainly in some spiritual circles, at least the ones I move in. But when we read what the Buddha has to say about hiri and ottappa, it's clear they have a social dimension. His emphasis on them very much draws on our place in society and our connection with others in the community, with hiri and ottappa very much connected to that social fabric.

And it might be, just reflecting on this a little bit more, that naming and shaming may be a part of what keeps a society or community or culture healthy and ethically healthy. When there's naming and shaming, we are clear that this is wrong and that you have done wrong. It's clear and we're making it clear for everyone to see. It's part of making the ethics clear. So it has a function, and it's also a sign that the ethics is clear, perhaps.

Conversely, our shying away from naming and shaming may be due in part to our postmodern barring of a unanimous ethical view—partly a sign of our ethical confusion and lack of basis. I don't know. Maybe in terms of society and community, naming and shaming have their place or can have a place. But again, you just have to hear or read or sometimes witness how that can move over into something that's completely horrific—a naming and shaming that has become completely abusive and run away with itself. It's tricky.

But as was implied in our wish list for ethics, there needs to be a place for shame and guilt. As the Buddha said, for hiri and ottappa, the guardians of the world, he called them. So we need a place for shame and guilt, yet to me, it needs to not be everything. It's not everything about ethics.

So I was slightly taken aback to read the Buddha said all virtuous deeds spring from hiri and ottappa—spring from shame and moral dread—all virtuous deeds, leaving no place for eros, for our eros for virtues and values, or indirectly through an imaginal figure. So I would say we need place too for love and eros, as I've said before, with respect to virtues and values and ethics. There needs to be a place for shame and guilt, but it's not everything. It doesn't take up the whole space.

Can we integrate shame and guilt into our soul-making dharma conceptual framework, into our view, as soul questions, as soul issues? See them, feel them, work with them as soul questions and soul issues. Can the whole of ethics be approached with soul first? With an idea and a conception of soul first? And the scope of that.

So is what I called the other day superficial shame—I mean, it may not feel or seem superficial at all; it may feel like it goes to the core of one's being, so deep, the shame—but from our language, is that superficial shame, because it doesn't seem, it seems deep, but actually doesn't involve soul? Is that superficial shame an impoverished reflection of a soul shame? It's an important question, because it might be, but I don't know. Probably not always. It's still important to ask.

And I think I used the phrase "healthy shame," again drawing on Hartman and others. But I didn't mean to make a distinction between healthy shame and soul shame. I'd say healthy shame is soul shame. If we really open up what we mean by soul-making dharma to include, to incorporate ethics, and if we really approach ethics in a way that soul-making dharma is really integrated into that approach, then healthy shame means soul shame. In other words, it has a sense of the dimensionality and divinity and of our duty to images, to our images. Healthy shame is soul shame.

Anytime we feel shame that is healthy, what we mean by healthy is it's a soul shame because it's got this dimensionality, divinity, and sense of duty to images. And healthy guilt is soul guilt because, again, it's got this sense of dimensionality, divinity, of eros, of duty to values and virtues as ideational images.

So sure, we can approach all this area of ethics and shame and guilt without soul-making conception, soul-making practice. But what if we actually bring it right in, really incorporate it, really embrace that whole domain with the soul-making dharma conception? And healthy shame is soul shame. It will have that sense and that feel to it. There's dimensionality and divinity here and duty that I've let down. And healthy guilt is soul guilt—dimensionality, duty, divinity, eros to these ideational images, to these ideas, values, virtues.

And again, when I said the other day, sometimes people who are a bit more engaged in psychological work and spiritual work and work on their psycho-spiritual process and a bit more conscious—what they call conscious living—there can be, of course, included in that very naturally is, to some extent, an orientation and a devotion to virtues and values. But it's limited without a person even realizing it because their whole conceptual framework doesn't involve a sense of dimensionality. It doesn't invoke, it doesn't incorporate a sense of dimensionality. Or the eros is blocked and the eros is limited.

So yeah, this is warm and kind and not arrogant, whatever else I said. But it's somehow just—it's not really on fire. It's not really full. The soul is not really stretched that way. The eros is not really ignited.

It's not really soulful. And it's because the conceptual framework that's being entertained doesn't have an integrated and central place for dimensionality. And maybe the eros is blocked or limited in some way. This prevents the ethos and prevents the whole sense of ethics from its fullness. Prevents the ethics from its fullness.

Now I don't know how that sounds. Does it sound stern or strict or judgmental or forbidding? We have these puritanical associations with even just the word and the area of ethics. So I don't know how that sounds. But what I really mean is that ethics and the ethos is prevented from its full beauty—from its full beauty, from its sense of divinity, from its unfathomability, from its mystery. Because it's not seen as integrated with soul. It's not seen as part of soul. It's not in-souled.

So this question: what is the image of ethics? What is the image of ethics that we are operating with, that we are living our life with? Something kind of necessary? It's necessary to care about ethics. It's necessary to talk about them and have a good solid basis. Something necessary but kind of boring, maybe stern, maybe punitive. Something that has to limit. It limits us by its nature. That's what ethics does. It limits what we can do and say and all the rest of it. And itself, it's kind of limited in its scope. Or it's a kind of preliminary basis—sīla, okay, taking care of that, then samādhi and paññā, for example. So is it that? What's the image of ethics?

Or is it something soulful, something beautiful, something infinite in its reaches and its callings? Something we love, something we have eros for, something soul-making.

What does the word magnanimity mean? I'm not sure. It probably means different things, and it has meant different things at different times, and maybe means different things to different people. Magnanimity. Sometimes it just means generosity. It can mean other things as well. But the etymology: magna animus—a big soul.

What supports a human being to grow into magnanimity? Big soul means more than a big heart. Big-hearted. This person, that person—oh, they've got a big heart. What does it mean to have a big soul? What might it mean to have a big soul?

I wonder whether to fully honor human life, for it to have deep dignity, for our sense of our humanity as well to be deeply honored, it must include a kind of love and eros for something that's more than my human life—certainly more than my survival, something of a different order. Again, something I'm willing even to sacrifice my life for. Again, we have that etymology of the word sacrifice: to make sacred.

To me, if there's something that I'm willing to sacrifice my pleasure, my well-being, my happiness even, my life for—my actual, the prolongation of my life—this is part of the realization of that, the sense of that, the love and commitment for that, whatever that is. But it's another dimension other than just my life. That's part of what it means to fully honor human life, I'm wondering. For life to have deep dignity.

But you know, that love and that passion—again, that love and that willingness to sacrifice—it's like when we talked about passion. It depends on what the thing is. Just to be willing to sacrifice for some cause—well, it depends what the cause is. Just to be willing to sacrifice for some sense of this or that—it depends what the this or that are, and the sense of it is.

This is related to everything we're talking about—dimensionality and the other wish list elements and other list of needs about ethics, and related to what a human being is, what a human being can be, what a human being should be.

In ancient times, they had what at some point came to be called the honor ethic. This, in a way, only applied to a certain stratum of society—warriors, perhaps knights and rulers—whose lives were oriented to, centered on, and governed by this honor ethic concerning honor and glory. The central element was a willingness to risk one's own life for the sake of honor.

Within the honor ethic, there existed a hierarchy that regarded someone living this way, bound by this kind of honor ethic, as having a life at a different level than others who were concerned only with their ordinary life and prolonging it. Hannah Arendt wrote about this and modified it, discussing the citizen ethic in modern society as a kind of parallel to the honor ethic relative to work and labor.

She and others have argued that modern culture is really defined by this turning upside down, this dismissal of the honor ethic and a kind of leveling out—a demolition of that hierarchy. So again, we see this flattening of a hierarchical view and the affirmation of ordinary life: work, production, family, spouse and children. Higher aims and strivings are criticized.

Yesterday we pointed out the historical contingency of our taken-for-granted sense of ordinary life and its importance. Before the eighteenth century, this wasn't really seen, felt, and thought of in the ways that we typically do now, ways that most people kind of agree on.

You've probably come across this sort of thing—I'm sure most people have. When looking at alternative cancer treatments, on different websites where people discuss such things, sometimes they say: "I've got cancer and how much I want to live." It's very, very common to hear something like: "I so want to live. I want to be here. I want to survive to hear my daughter's first words, my baby daughter's first words, or see her take her first steps." There's often fear: "I'm scared that I won't be there," or grief: "It grieves me that I might not be able to be there for that."

Or her first day of school, or her graduation from college, or her marriage, or her children—my grandchildren—I won't see them. It's very common to hear this sort of thing offered as a justification, as a reason for why "I want to live longer," even though the so-called quality of life—which usually means the relative ratio of pleasant to unpleasant—is poor.

But that thing is important. That thing—seeing ordinary life, witnessing ordinary life in my family—is more important. That this was given such import, put forward as a reason to live, as something that made life worthwhile, that qualified as an orientation and a wish, that qualified as the worthy life, a kind of worthy life—this was not thought before sometime in the eighteenth century.

We have to understand: this wasn't the case that everyone secretly felt that way and saw things that way, and only until the oppression of the church was lifted could they then admit it. It wasn't that all this time they were actually feeling that way, viewing their existence that way, viewing what was most important that way, but just couldn't admit it out loud, so they hid it and kept it secret. That wasn't the case. They actually didn't think that way. People actually didn't think that way.

It didn't qualify as something of that import, as something that would qualify as the good life, the beautiful life—"This is something that makes life worthwhile. This qualifies as me living a life that's worthwhile." This view of life or existence, in terms of what was most important, what qualified as making life worthwhile—this is a historically contingent development.

It's hard for us, or for many of us, to even grasp, to even stand outside that view. It's so taken for granted. This affirmation, elevation of ordinary life has become so pervasive, so entrenched.

I'm pointing out its historical contingency, but what does the fact of its historical contingency imply? What does it actually imply? What we take it to imply actually depends on our view of history, our view of the process of history. That's another question I've gone into in other talks in recent years. But still, it's worth acknowledging this. It's worth realizing this fact of historical contingency. How we interpret it is another matter, but I think it's important to be aware of it.

As I said, at a certain point, or over time, there evolved a demolition or flattening of hierarchies—hierarchy of values, hierarchy of strivings—actually an inversion of hierarchy. It was the affirmation then of ordinary life, work, production, family life, and an inversion because higher aims and strivings were put down, were criticized. To some extent a flattening, and to some extent an inversion evolved of that original hierarchy, that original hierarchy of values.

In Francis Bacon, in a way one of the founders of the scientific revolution, science was not the higher pursuit of knowledge, the higher quest to penetrate the mysteries of the universe, of the cosmos. Science was for the sake of technological power over nature in the service of ordinary life.

So all these trends and movements and developments in history, or through history, made it less possible to have, conceive of, feel a certain way towards something higher or more important than life, than preserving one's life, than ordinary existence, work, production, family.

And again, the question I have is: what does that do to our sense and our idea of human being, of our humanity?

And again, with soul-making Dharma, what does that offer us or open out in terms of possibility for what we might sense and feel and conceive of as higher or larger or more important than, say, having a long life or surviving physically or having more pleasant than unpleasant sensations or reducing pain or whatever?

Soul-making Dharma should, if one's practicing right, go right to the heart of that question, and it should open out a sense of that. For me, very, very potently and clearly, it should. In what soul-making Dharma practice opens, that should be one of the things that it opens: the sense of something or things—or whatever you're going to call them, dimensions or directions—that are higher, larger, more important than my living a long life, than my survival, more important than my not being in pain or reducing pain or whatever.

So this question—we talk about providing different dimensions, or attempting to provide different dimensions, or not providing any dimensions—and the question today is: what is the result of any of those dimensions, or the refusal to provide dimensions? What's the result with respect to what we might call anthropology, our idea of what it means to be a human being, what we've been talking about today?

What is the result? Also, of course, for theology, for our sense of divinity or Buddha nature. What's the result for our sense of existence? The different ideas of dimensions, or the refusal of dimension, will influence and have an impact on our theologies and sense of existence, and also on our understanding of human being. Of course, it works the other way as well. Different senses of human being, or theology, will provide or disallow certain dimensions and non-dimensions for ethics.

I haven't talked much about Aristotle in this series of talks—I've mentioned him briefly in the Sīla and Soul talks—but Aristotelian virtue ethics were, as far as I understand, grounded in a notion of the common good of the polis, the city-state. A virtue had to be something which contributed, or at least didn't take away from, the common good of the city-state. Actually, he left out slaves and other strata of that society, so it was an even smaller view. But it's curious—is the dimensionality there in lateral number, in how many people, or in service of the nation or city-state, as if that's a kind of transcendent object in itself that provides the dimensionality? Is that related to the citizen ethic that Hannah Arendt was talking about? The question is: what does this do to our sense of human being and our humanity?

If we think about the Pali Canon and Buddha-Dharma with its cosmology of karma and rebirth, the rationale for simplification gives reasons for ethics: if you act unethically, you'll get a bad rebirth and reap bad karma. If you act ethically, you'll reap good karma. Moreover, if you act ethically, the complexities of your life and the agitations and busyness of your mind will simplify. That simplification allows practice—samādhi, then paññā, then liberation. You can see how the purpose of ethics is revealing something here as well.

In this way of understanding the Pali Canon, there's a pragmatic reason for ethics, a practical reason for sīla in concern for one's karma within that cosmological notion, and also because it allows meditation, insight, and liberation. So it's practical, but there's no ontological dimensionality or grounding for the ethics there.

You get something similar in John Locke—a kind of grounding in rational, pragmatic hedonism that many people objected to. In a way, you find this in Epicureanism too: just follow the pleasure. In good, charitable interpretations of Epicureanism, it's like the Pali Canon Buddhism—following the jhānas. I'll take this pleasure over the pleasure of the senses, then the second jhāna as a better kind of pleasure than the first, and so on. One goes up the rungs of the ladder, letting go of what has come before because one has found a better pleasure, until one actually lets go completely, having reached the highest kind of pleasure. Then one lets go into the so-called pleasure of nibbāna.

So there's a kind of rational pragmatic hedonism—which people vilify John Locke for, and Epicurus for Epicureanism—that has its parallels in Pali Canon Buddhism. But the grounding is pragmatic rather than what we could call ontological. There's no sense of the Good or this higher order that gives us our ethics through some kind of participation. We might say rebirth in a Brahmā realm is a kind of deification that becomes ontological, but that would be stretching it a little.

Again, if we take the dimensionality of rationality—rationality as a dimension—people think of this in very different ways. For some of the German idealists like Kant, our capacity for rationality might have had this quasi-numinous, quasi-holy character. It's a kind of divine faculty, or divinely given faculty. Rationality itself was almost potentially, in our words, a kind of erotic-imaginative object.

What do all these ideas do—these ideas about dimensions and non-dimensions—for our sense of human being, of humanity, of our humanity?

In Platonic ethics and cosmology, almost every level of being is refracting and reflecting somehow the Good, the divine. It's existing in an analogous way. The world is analogy; the world is sign; the world is partial expression, is refraction, reflection in a hierarchical order of the divine, of the Good, of the ultimately Good. We can approach that. We can climb that ladder. We can read the cosmos, if you like.

That reading of the cosmos, that soul resonating with the theophanies, with the signs and the forms and the refractions and reflections of the Good, the divine, allows us to draw closer to the divine. We ourselves can become analogies of our image, or our angel, or our daimon, and in that way reflect and refract the divine, grow towards the divine. So there's also this eros and inexhaustibility of this transcendent Good, this transcendent divine, where, as human beings, we're connected intimately in our being with that divinity, with that Buddha-nature, Dharmakāya. But we're also separate from it. We're separate and not separate. We're in the image and likeness.

And we are, in our very essence, analogy. My life, if I live it with soul, becomes an analogy to my angel—a reflection of my angel which reflects God, which reflects the Buddha nature, which expresses an attribute of the Dharmakaya.

So there exists both: we are separate and not separate. We are connected in this most intimate way, by analogy, or potentially by analogy, in our very being. And there opens this possibility of direction, of growth, towards the divine—of theosis, as we call it in the Orthodox Church.

You can hear how this entire way of thinking about dimensionality serves as a grounding for ethics, construing the human being and our humanity in quite a powerful way that remains consistent, or relatively consistent—much more similar to what we encounter in the soul-making dharma, to what can possibly open for us in soul-making dharma and practice. The senses we can have that open, rather than the ideas we start from—the senses that can open through practice. Again, it is a phenomenological approach, rather than starting with metaphysics.

When we look at all this, whatever valid reason or support or dimension for ethics one tries to provide, it tends to be related to the conceived purpose of ethics, certainly, but also to the conceived purpose of life. Consider the Pali Canon Buddha Dharma: the purpose of life, the purpose of ethics, the given reasons for ethics are intimately connected with what we understand as the purpose of life, the purpose of existence—which is to reach Nibbana. And so it is in these other systems as well.

There has been this divorce of ethics from law, but the way we think about ethics—certainly related to the conceived purpose of ethics—the way we try to provide dimensionality for ethics connects intimately with the conceived purpose of ethics and the conceived purpose of our existence. What does this imply about how we set up law, the purpose of law, and how we conceive of law? All this is connected.

Depending on how we think through this connection, which remains whole, it follows through to how we think of life, how we think of ethics, what dimensionality we give—then how we think of what the law is actually trying to accomplish, what the legal system is trying to accomplish. All is connected.

Again, if we simply ask this question: what is possible? Not just what is possible for us as human beings, but what is possible in terms of viable, valuable, and tenable ways we can conceive of and sense our humanity? What is possible there? What viable, tenable, and valuable ways exist for us to conceive of and to sense our human being today, now?

So much will depend on that—whether we feel blessed, whether our sense of existence is blessed, whether the sense of the cosmos is blessed. All depends on these questions, depends on these directions and decisions, these orientations.

If I want to live with a sense of blessedness, how can I support that possibility really, genuinely, deeply, robustly?

CHAPTER 232

The Image of Ethics (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 2h11

In this fifth part of his ethics series, Rob Burbea delves deeply into the ontological and epistemological questions that underpin any viable approach to ethics in our contemporary world. He examines how different Buddhist traditions—from Pali Canon realism through Mahāyāna emptiness teachings to Vajrayāna transgression—approach the reality of virtues and values, noting both their strengths and limitations.

Burbea argues that while emptiness teachings are sufficient for liberation, they may not provide adequate grounding for soul-making practice or a full engagement with ethical life. He explores how soul-making dharma offers an alternative ontological middle way—neither purely objective nor subjective—where values and virtues gain their reality through being sensed with soul rather than existing as universal truths about actions in themselves. Drawing on Augustine's theory of divine illumination and Hartmann's value philosophy, he suggests how ethics might be rooted in dimensionality while avoiding both naive realism and nihilistic relativism.

The talk concludes with provocative reflections on democracy, expertise, and the possibility of training in ethical discernment, questioning whether our current cultural approaches to moral decision-making are adequate for the complex challenges we face. Burbea envisions a potential future where soul-making practice becomes as foundational to education as mathematics or literacy, enabling deeper sensitivity to the larger questions of what constitutes a beautiful and worthwhile life.

When I talked right at the beginning of this talk on ethics and said it seems to me that any really valuable and viable approach to ethics nowadays would need certain things—and I listed seven or eight items of a wish list—I've been following through that thread through this whole talk. I mentioned ontology and epistemology as one of the more important considerations, explorations around ontology and epistemology.

I've already, in the parts of this talk, woven in questions of epistemology and ontology and ideas and possible new ways of thinking about ontology and epistemology—how that might be worked into older ideas to adapt them, modify them, open them out in a different way, allow them to deliver something they otherwise would not be able to deliver to us today. Of course I've talked a lot and written about ontology in previous talks, and some of Sila and Soul was also devoted to ontology and epistemology regarding ethics, regarding values and virtues.

So nowadays in our postmodern culture, most people who think about these kinds of things—philosophers, for instance—would probably tend to agree that ontology is impossible to come to conclusions around, that it's kind of an intrinsically inconclusive subject. But as I've pointed out several times now here and elsewhere, ontology and epistemology are inevitable to our lives, to living our lives, to making choices in our lives, and they're also inevitable to any moment of consciousness, I would say. We're always making ontological and epistemological choices, assessments and judgments about what we sense, what we experience.

We can't really avoid it. It's there anyway, and it's having an effect anyway. Ontology and epistemology are there anyway, in any moment of our consciousness. Certainly they're there in our life, certainly there in regard to our practice—dharma practice. Certainly they're there in regard to ethics in some way or another. And they're unavoidable; they're having an effect. They affect everything. They affect what we choose, they affect how we think, they affect our orientations.

The question, or a question then becomes—always this question—well, what does the ontology and what does the epistemology that I am holding right now lead to? What does the ontology and epistemology that underpins my dharma practice lead to? What does it open? What does it close? What does it bring? What does it deliver? And the same thing for soul-making dharma practice. In soul-making dharma practice we can understand different ontologies and epistemologies, but always this question: what does it bring? Which is a different question—related by is a different question—than just, is it true?

We can have different attitudes and orientations to ontology. Indeed, we do, of course. And there's a whole range there. I think in this talk, what I really want to do is, in terms of my aims and the scope of this talk, not too different from what I've done in the past, which is three things, really.

One is just to bring to light and mull over and discuss ontological questions and issues and epistemological questions and issues that we need to consider, that we need to at least acknowledge and realize. Just to bring them to light and acknowledge and realize them, see that they're in the picture and discuss them a little bit.

The second thing is to, so to speak, elbow enough room philosophically from entrenched and usually unquestioned ontological and epistemological assumptions. People tend to believe, or we as human beings tend to just believe this or that about what's real or about what constitutes valid knowledge. After many years of modern philosophy and dharma and modern physics, a lot of that is no longer actually tenable as true. A lot of those old assumptions, those entrenched ontological and epistemological assumptions, they're not really viable. So that's the second kind of aim: to elbow enough room and enough space to be creative and to discover. To see if there are other ways forward, but also what might just be allowed because of that space, so that something is not being illegitimately strangled out, illegitimately prevented from taking a viable place in our life, in our consciousness, in our practice, in our view.

And the third is to offer lightly possible alternative ontologies and epistemologies. But I do say lightly, because this elbowing of enough room—the second kind of aim—and this third aim of offering possible alternative ontology and epistemology, doesn't equate to an assertion of any definite ontology or epistemology. It's just doing enough that we can move forward, create, discover ontologies, epistemologies, attitudes that allow us to move forward, create and discover with regard to values, with regard to ethics, with regard to soul-making.

So let's start with a few considerations. If we take Buddha dharma, and especially Pali Canon Buddha dharma, the sense, the reading I have there is really that virtues and values, whatever you might call them, have karmic effects. I'm not even talking about future lives; I'm talking about in this life. They affect the citta, the tenor of the citta, the quality of the citta, the perception of self and other, all that. And that's what's important. So the ontology is just that much ontology: they have karmic effects, and that's what's important.

In Pali Canon Buddhism, particularly as understood in the Theravada tradition, this basic ontological framework predominates. However, in the Mahayana, there emerges a much greater emphasis on the emptiness of phenomena, including the emptiness of citta qualities, values, and virtues. We encounter the teaching of the two truths: the ultimate truth of emptiness and the conventional truth of relative reality.

While these values and virtues are completely empty—this is emphasized, acknowledged, taught, and studied—simultaneously, at the level of conventional reality, they function. They produce karmic effects through different values, virtues, vices, or what we might call disvalues. Thus the emptiness, in a way, becomes less of an issue. The ontological fact of the emptiness of virtues and virtuous qualities of the citta doesn't necessarily impede their practical function.

In the Vajrayana, we again find tremendous emphasis on the emptiness of these phenomena. Yet there also appears in Tantric texts and Vajrayana teachings a certain encouragement to transgress against what is valuable and virtuous. This presents a complicated subject, though typically the commentaries explain that such transgression is purely symbolic. When texts speak of killing your mother and father, this doesn't mean literal matricide or patricide—mother and father symbolize particular psychological states, and their "killing" represents specific transformative processes.

From a soul-making perspective, we might think similarly to both Pali Canon and Mahayana Buddhism. The crucial question becomes: what is the effect of values and virtues? What happens when we relate to them seriously, when we take them as meaningful? And conversely, what occurs when we ignore them or consider them merely empty?

Actually, this question requires more precision, because if we follow everything we've been exploring in this talk, the effect of virtues and values depends entirely on our conceptual framework and our relationship to them. To what extent am I permitted an erotic relationship with values and virtues? What is my conceptual framework, and does that framework root them in another dimension?

We can broadly break down the ontological approaches within Buddha Dharma—though the categories aren't entirely clean-cut—into two fundamental attitudes. The first appears in Pali Canon Buddhism, especially as commonly interpreted through the Abhidhamma lens in Theravada tradition: virtues and values are real phenomena, real components of mind moments.

The Abhidhamma system categorizes a specific number of possible mental qualities that can arise in any mind moment. It provides an exhaustive list—this many qualities and not another number. In this framework, both the moment and its mental qualities are viewed as real, as inherently existent.

It was precisely this view of inherent existence that Nagarjuna challenged. Much of his writing consists of polemic attacks against this reified understanding of virtue, of mind qualities within mind moments. But our present question is: what does such a realist view, as we find in the Abhidhamma, do to our relationship with ethics, virtues, and values?

In our current language, such a view grants them reality—they're deemed tremendously important—but the entire conception remains what we would call flat, mechanical, almost cold. These mind moments and qualities lack soft, elastic edges. Something feels limited and limiting in this approach. It allows very little scope for eros or soul-making in relationship to ethics. There's no genuine sense of dimensionality, of infinitude, and quite an impoverished understanding of the human being.

At the other end of the spectrum lies the view that everything is empty, including virtues, mind states, values—all empty. Ethics itself is empty.

I think one crucial consideration here is questioning any immature or overly hasty relativism regarding the ontology and epistemology of ethics—any premature nihilism concerning ethical life. As we've touched on before in the Senior Soul talks and here, several thinkers, including philosopher W.T. Stace, have pointed out that just because people have failed to conclusively prove an independent existence of ethics doesn't mean such independent existence is impossible. To conclude otherwise from humanity's current inability to demonstrate this doesn't logically follow.

Similarly, a scientistic worldview that regards as real only what is measurable and material—this reductionist scientific perspective that leaves no place for questions of value or feelings toward value, dismissing them as merely illusory—represents immature, partial, blinkered thinking.

Ethics exists for human beings. As long as there are human beings in the universe, ethics has reality because there are human beings. Just because it only exists for human beings doesn't mean that it has less reality. This goes back to Descartes and Galileo and all that.

Or consider someone like the philosopher Richard Rorty, whom we've discussed as well. He dismisses any ontology or epistemology underlying ethics, then simply insists that what we need to do ethically is just keep the conversation going. We need to keep the conversation going. Well, why? Why do we need to keep the conversation going? That's an ethical assertion, and on what are you basing it? But because he's ruled out from the beginning any possibility of basing ethics in anything else, in any other dimension or value-giving dimension, he can't answer that. And so much of the time he just talks in circles.

We can have a similar kind of immaturity in bringing the teachings of emptiness to bear on the whole domain of ethics. Actually, before I get to that, it seems to me—and I've probably said this elsewhere—that those who emphasize, whether they're in the Dharma or outside of the Dharma, the impossibility of knowing any dimension or ground for ethics, for virtues, for values, are at the same time clinging, sometimes explicitly, more usually tacitly, to the classical scientific materialist view of reality. So very postmodern in the domain of ethics and other domains, but underneath that, or in other areas of life, just actually really clinging to the classical scientific materialist view—very not postmodern.

In this view, anything that Cartesian, Galilean science posits or explains as real is real. And anything else—for example, ethics or values—is not. But we've talked about Descartes. Actually, that came just from a decision made in the first place. And Galileo also made a decision that became a truth. But then eventually even the whole scientific method, which they helped to start, sort of ended up pulling the rug out from under their starting modus operandi and their starting definitions.

We also pointed out how those definitions about what was real and how that scientific methodology over time started with people who were religious. Yes, Galileo was subject to the Inquisition or oppressed by the Inquisition, but they were still religious. Descartes was a very religious person. In fact, much of his so-called logic relies on the existence of God. The taken-for-granted existence of God proves other parts of his logical edifice. There are all kinds of doubt—that's his Cartesian skepticism. But actually, one thing he didn't doubt was the existence of God. Others—Locke—these were all genuinely religious thinkers. And what they started was rooted in and motivated even by religious thinking and religious aspiration to a certain extent.

But then over history, as we've traced a little bit in this talk, following that thread about "okay, this is real and that's not," all kinds of implications and consequences, including implications and consequences for ethics, unfolded through history over several hundred years. One step was taken and it in turn, in time, implied another step, or together with certain social developments, it implied another step.

But anyway, if we come back to emptiness, it's really important to realize that knowing the emptiness of all things, understanding in one's heart the emptiness of all things, will not lead to a nihilistic morality. It absolutely won't. At least, it's not the way I understand it. I've said this before: emptiness means things are not real. It also means things are not not-real. Neither real nor not-real.

And to me, the indicator of insight into emptiness is care—even an increase in care. Care for others, care for the world. An indicator of insight is the presence and even the increased felt sense of importance of values and virtues, the increased orientation to them—not a decrease, not a letting go and a negligence—an increase in compassion. These are the indicators to me of insight into emptiness. If that's not there and someone's talking about emptiness, either I'm not interested, but if I'm in a teaching position, I'm very interested because something's really not right. Something's off. It's not the Middle Way of emptiness.

I would also say, certainly in the way at least I would teach emptiness and the practices that lead to it, there's so much sensitivity required and cultivated in that path of practice. I think sensitivity too, including heart sensitivity and ethical sensitivity—all that will grow in the course of deepening one's insight into emptiness.

We've talked about much of this before. Sometimes people say, when they hear about emptiness, they think, "Oh, but then I won't—everything's empty, so I won't care about ethics."

Just briefly recapping what must have been the first talk of this series on emptiness and ways of looking—in the way I would teach emptiness through ways of looking and fabrication, we're not starting with asking anyone to believe in the emptiness of all things. That would be really unwise. Usually almost everyone would just say, "But then I wouldn't care, or then nothing would matter." They don't really understand. They're not ready to jump to that level.

We start with two threads: the possibility of ways of looking—the possibility of developing flexibility of ways of looking—and the notion of the fabrication of suffering, of self, and eventually of world, of objects. Start even just with the notion of fabrication of suffering, and then have a look at how the self is fabricated. Just start with those two possibilities, which almost no one can deny, and explore through an open-ended, experiential, first-hand experiential inquiry, rather than starting by believing something and then trying to act ethically on this belief that I don't really understand.

Open-ended means one doesn't decide the limit of fabrication, or pre-decide that everything is empty, everything is an illusion. One doesn't know what that means yet.

Secondly, emptiness ways of looking, as you develop lots of them, become different lenses—different ways of looking that we can pick up and put down at any time, based on or responsive to the needs of the situation. What helps to reduce suffering here, if that's my intention, for self, for other, for world?

I also said that in other ways of approaching emptiness—through analyses or intellectual analysis practice as they do in the Gelug tradition in Tibet, or through the idea of emptiness as a sort of big empty space with substantial objects and not much self, or the kind of interpretation of a Theravadan view of emptiness as the machine-like process of aggregates—none of those three will automatically weave in or integrate the understanding and exploration of dependent arising, which is the exploration of karma and how this intention, that way of looking, this way of acting actually brings about this sense of self, this sense of world, this much suffering, this kind of suffering.

We're seeing dependent origination and karma work right there when we're approaching it through the ways of looking and fabrication approach. So ethics is integrated unavoidably right from the beginning. Karma is integrated unavoidably right from the beginning into the emptiness exploration, into the emptiness teachings. And it's something we see and know and feel firsthand. That runs all the way through, as opposed to teaching emptiness in some way and then somehow having to stick ethics back into it because we're concerned that what we've done with emptiness might imply that ethics is irrelevant, or we might have forgotten about it.

But we need to be careful again with the whole emptiness thing, not to be lazy and sloppy. There are many ways we can be, certainly around the relationship of emptiness and ethics. So ethics are empty—therefore what? Just because there's no universal agreement doesn't necessarily imply that ethics are empty. What do I even mean when I say ethics are empty?

But even take something like "killing is wrong." Ethics is empty, therefore it's not true to say killing is wrong, or it doesn't apply. Going into this just even a little bit more carefully, we'll see that actually in relation to the notion of killing being wrong, there's always in all cultures and societies—and this is where it gets interesting, or if you like where the emptiness resides—the question of when is it deemed okay to kill. So it's not a blanket, sloppy "killing is wrong" or "no, because ethics is empty and everything's empty, killing is okay." It's neither simply wrong nor right. It's in the detail. When is it deemed okay?

There's putting to sleep a pet that we love, there's the question of euthanasia, there's the question of assisted dignified dying, assisted suicide when someone's terminally ill. Is it okay to kill when you prevent a murderer, you prevent a mass murderer, you prevent someone like Hitler? All these questions. Is there such a thing as a justifiable war? This is where it gets interesting. And we can still say ethics is empty because those details are hard to work out. Maybe we cannot arrive at a very clear, final, definite conclusion to some of these questions. That's where the emptiness resides.

Or similarly, if you think everything's empty—okay, well, is two plus two equals four? Is that empty of truth? Is that empty of being true? So what's the whole relationship between truth and emptiness? You could say two plus two equals four is dependent on counting to understand it. And you could even say two plus two equals four, in order to be a truth, is dependent on the specification of the base, the numerical base—for example, in base 10.

We call that. But in base 3, 2 plus 2 equals... What would it equal? It would equal 11. 2 plus 2 equals 1, 1. You could say 2 plus 2 is 4 is dependent on perception of 2 and perception of 1, etc. You could say all that. But any of those qualifications and dependencies don't deprive the equation two plus two equals four of a certain inviolable and non-empty truth.

And it may be similar with ethics. There may be lots that is dependent on individual or cultural perspectives. And as we said, on just the fact of human being, there are truths for human beings. But it still might be the case that Hartmann's firmament of values may have an absolute, relatively independent existence, reality, truth to it.

Two things here. One is that when we use the teachings of emptiness, it's really important, whether it's in regard to ethics, certainly in regard to ethics, but also in regard to soul-making and imaginal practice. To me, it's important not to be sloppy and lazy. So that's one thing. And the second thing is with regard to ethics, you know, the ontological and epistemological questions and issues and needs surpass what can be provided by just the notion that things are empty.

So we said, yeah, for liberation, emptiness is enough. For lots of other things, it's not enough. As an ontological stance, we've said that in one of the early talks of this series. And we also said ontology, epistemology, ethics, emotions - these areas of our existence, and they are areas of our existence, they're not just philosophical areas, as I said. Ontology, epistemology, ethics, emotions, probably others - they're endless. I don't think humanity will ever come to an end of their explorations.

And what did I say? You know, if someone says, "I figured them all out, I figured," or any one of those, "I figured ontology, I figured it all out," or epistemology, or whatever it is, run away from that person as a teacher. And if someone says, "You know, don't bother, it's not interesting, it's not useful, it's a waste of time, there's no point. Just ignore ontology and epistemology," I would run away from them as well, as a teacher.

As we said, really right from the beginning, I think, in the soul-making Dharma teachings, ontology and epistemology, or considering ontologies and epistemology and questions and issues there, really support soul-making. It really gives ground to, opens up space for, and also furthers soul-making practice and soul-making possibilities.

Soul-making needs ontology and epistemology, and I would say ethics too. Actually, by this point you might have got a sense that ethics is just a part of soul-making. Soul-making is an approach to ethics, but ethics is definitely a part of soul-making. Soul-making, therefore ethics, needs ontology and epistemology, needs us to turn that soil, to mull over, to be creative, to discover, to question, to open up, to play and construct.

And ontology and epistemology, like ethics and the area of emotionality, all these areas, all these domains, can themselves become erotic, imaginal objects for us. Our relationship to them in themselves can become soul-making and soulful.

So I think these areas are endless. And I hope, you know, my hope is that others, someone or some others in the future will, sometime in the future, will add to what we've been developing here and develop it further and build on it.

I think we need to - certainly in soul-making dharma, again, ethics is a part of that. We need to, and I would say any ethics, needs to include ontology. There needs to be the inclusion of ontology. So I would say soul-making dharma needs the inclusion of ontology, but let's say inconclusively. In other words, in this open-ended way. And it might be the same with regard to anyone trying to move forward with ethics these days. The ontology needs to be included, but in a kind of inconclusive way, maybe. But in a way, that kind of attitude to ontology and epistemology is kind of axiomatic to, fundamental to soul-making dharma.

We can look back in history in the sort of, let's say, the kind of literalism, ontological literalism of the belief in God in the ancient Judaic tradition, for example, of the Old Testament, or that kind of ontology, or Plato's ontology, or Descartes, or Galileo's ontology, or Bacon's - it was very similar, of course - or a kind of monistic materialism, "there is nothing but matter, mind is really just material." That kind of ontology, or the notions of truth that Karl Popper put forward, etc. All of these, over history, seem to have flourished and then kind of run into problems, gone out of fashion, failed, fallen short in some way.

And again, we can have that sort of what in some postmodern circles becomes a kind of widespread view, which is, "Oh, just forget the whole thing about ontology." Or we can say, still we can move forward here. Still we can play. Still we can create and discover.

As I said, regarding ethics, it's important to recognize how ontology and epistemology relate intimately to dimensionality. The ontology and epistemology of dimensionality is the crucial part in the ethical question. It becomes important to establish - or perhaps more accurately, to construct, create, discover, provide, explore - elbow space against the sort of inevitable, usually default indoctrination of ideas around ontology and epistemology, particularly with regard to dimensionality and whatever ways we're trying to give dimension to values, virtues, and ethics.

We spent considerable time in the Sila and Soul talk of the Four Parables of Stone and Light series exploring the notion of ideal reality, or the realm of ideas, beginning with Plato. Hartmann, whose moral philosophy we discussed extensively, picked up this notion of ideal reality - the realm of ideas - with values being part of that realm. The realm of values exists within the ideal realm, the realm of ideas.

Regarding the ontology there, Hartmann pointed out that values exist for human beings, but that doesn't mean they're not real. As he would say, just as geometrical laws exist for spatial figures, and physiological laws exist for organic beings, moral laws exist for human beings. This doesn't take anything away from their reality. A geometrical law simply is true - it exists, but only for spatial beings. Geometrical law has nothing whatsoever to say about anger, for example. No geometrical law addresses anger at all.

For both Plato and Hartmann, the realm of ideas, which includes values, exists. It has ontological validity - it exists as a kind of reality. For Plato, the realm of ideas, the realm of forms, was more real than any instantiation of that form. Beauty as ideal reality was more real than any material instantiation of something beautiful. This represents a very rare perspective in contemporary ontology.

Someone like J.N. Findlay, whom I've discussed in previous talks, upheld this kind of inversion of the usual ontological hierarchy - that instantiations of things were less real than the ideal realm. I paralleled this in mathematics when discussing the number pi and other concepts.

Earlier in this talk, we also explored the possible etymology or phonetic relationship between the words "virtue" and "virtual," meaning something that's an image of something. The thing itself is more real; the image is less real. So our virtues in the world are just an image, a copy - a not-quite-real copy of something that's more real, a really existing virtue or value. The word "virtually" might possibly be interpreted as "not quite the real thing" - virtually the real thing. Virtual reality would be the image, and "virtually" means almost, not quite the real thing.

Plato held this ontology - which sounds very unusual to most people today - about this level of the realm of ideas being more real than the level of material reality, things, tables, horses, or whatever.

For Hartmann, however, the level of ideal reality was less real. It was still real, possessing a kind of reality, but actually less real. Ideal being, he said, was "a kind of thinner, floating, insubstantial being, half being, so to speak," which "still lacks the full weight of being" - being what is primarily material.

In his view, there was a hierarchy of reality, from what was most real: inorganic being. Dependent on inorganic being, there was organic being - dependent on chemicals, there is life, some kind of living organism. Dependent on there being a living organism, there is mental being, which depends on organic being. And dependent on mental being, there is spiritual being.

What Hartmann meant by spiritual being was the whole realm of language, ethics, morality, arts, religion, law, politics, philosophy, ideology, historical consciousness, and so forth. That's what he primarily meant by spiritual being.

However, this view that Hartmann held has been brought into question. That hierarchy - which most people would agree with, minus even his... Most people would agree the most real thing is matter, and stacked on that hierarchy, you get things that are kind of real, and then you enter this area where they're sort of real, but not really real. When you reach values, many people would disagree: do those have reality in themselves? Do those have an independent existence?

Owen Barfield, for instance, represents a philosopher who questioned that whole typical hierarchy of reality, that ontological hierarchy that Hartmann put forward. In his well-known book Saving the Appearances, he really pulled that apart. Again, developments in physics, particularly in quantum mechanics, really question that order. It's worth pointing out that Hartmann himself was quite strong in his criticism of Plato's hierarchical ontology.

Hartmann believed that Plato's notion of an ideal realm being more real than the material world—where divine forms possess greater reality than earthly things—could only lead to devaluation and disregard of this actual world. If one believes some other realm is higher and more real while this world is merely illusory, it can only result in dismissing the significance of our present reality.

This perspective is certainly possible, and such philosophical attitudes have indeed fueled worldly disengagement at various times throughout history. However, when this material world becomes the sole reality, viewed purely in materialistic terms, we have witnessed how impoverished an ethics this ultimately delivers.

Actually, the notion that an ideal realm exists—that divine attributes, intelligences, and angels possess greater reality than this world—need not necessarily lead to devaluation of the material realm. This world might be understood as images and refractions of those ideals, or as completely real but having its origins in that ideal sphere. Rather than diminishing material reality, this can actually enhance it.

Quite the opposite effect often occurs. Because things reflect and find their roots in the divine attributes within this realm of ideas, there emerges a greater sanctity in the things of this world. Even for someone with a thoroughly secular mindset—imagine a physicist contemplating how everything originates in the mathematical laws and equations governing the universe—there frequently arises a profound sense of sanctity. This ideal realm of mathematics bestows a level of reverence upon the material things and everyday objects we encounter.

I disagree with Hartmann's assertion that Platonic idealism necessarily demeans worldly things or leads to their devaluation. This interpretation is so commonly presented and accepted as obvious, but I believe we should seriously question the actual implications of any particular ontology.

Returning to physics: if a quark—supposedly a fundamental particle—exists as a "thing" only for observers, becoming substantial only in the presence of observation with location, time, and properties like mass, direction, and velocity, then absent observation, only an ultra-complex, multi-dimensional mathematical idea remains. This suggests two important considerations.

First, this represents an instance where ideal reality—the mathematical idea—possesses more fundamental reality than the quark's apparent manifestation, which only emerges when observed. Indeed, some contemporary physicists propose that only the mathematical laws governing the universe are truly real. Matter, space, time—all are secondary to these mathematical principles.

Second, if quarks exist as things only for observers while fundamentally remaining complex mathematical ideas, then our assumed ontological comparison with "hard matter" becomes significantly softened. At minimum, this challenges our conventional notions of material solidity.

We encounter something similar when discussing emptiness as providing minimal ontology for justifying soul-making dharma and imaginal practice. Images often face immediate ontological dismissal—there's something in the mind saying, "Yes, but it's not real." An image gets compared unfavorably with objects assumed to be genuinely real, like this table.

At minimum, recognizing the emptiness of all phenomena removes any absolutely real reference point. While acknowledging ontological differences and varying ontic status between physical tables and imaginal ones, we dissolve the backdrop objection to taking images seriously.

Regarding Hegel's philosophy—though my knowledge is limited—certain interpretations might allow the ideal level more fundamental reality while involving and expressing itself through material movements, political developments, and historical processes. Different Hegelian interpretations may offer varying configurations of this ontological hierarchy between ideal being and what we typically consider material reality.

This could prove quite fascinating to explore further. If ideal being possesses more fundamental existence, then translating this to ethics, values would have more fundamental existence than their instantiations. In Hegel's framework, the development, movement, and history of values becomes primary, subsuming the material and historical within that process. What's actually occurring is an evolution of value at the ideal level.

We cannot escape epistemological questions regarding anything—material things, ethical matters, meditative experiences. This remains crucially important to acknowledge, even concerning virtues, values, and ethics.

Consider this: even when someone claims it's difficult or impossible to prove the reality of values, they continue acting and choosing according to their values. What I would add to this observation is...

Nietzsche said, well, yeah, most of that's just they're acting from indoctrination, from stupidity, from habit, etc. Their values are basically indoctrination, stupidity and habit. A pretty critical view.

But what I want to say is we still act and choose according to our values. All human beings do. And it's not all because of fear and conformity. Something's happening in our choices, in our ethical choices regarding values. We're trusting something.

What are we trusting as an epistemic authority? What are we trusting as, "I know this, I feel this way," or "I think," or whatever it is. What are we trusting? And usually it's some sense, it's some felt sense, a moral sense, a conscience, a sense of nobility or beauty, some push or pull in the being, some sense of that.

Could it be that anyway we're trusting something, and what we're trusting is some sense, and could it be that that some sense that we're trusting is maybe the very beginnings of a kind of sensing with soul, sensibility, regarding values and virtues and the choices we make.

So I don't know, is anyone entirely logical and rational in the substance and the basis of their ethical choices? Is there anyone who just kind of computes like a machine? I mean, people more or less. But I think there's always some sense, some moral sense. And I wonder if part of that moral sense has to do with a sense of what's noble, what's beautiful, something pulling me, calling me, something I push away from.

And could that be that in a very inchoate form, just the beginning, the germ, just a fraction, a portion of soul-making sensibility with regard to values and virtues. We are trusting some sense, and I would say we do have some hierarchical differentiation between different values, contrary to what the utilitarians would say or allow us or give any weight to. And also those who just interpret the Buddha Dharma perspective as just saying, well, just reduce suffering, just reduce suffering.

This "just reduce suffering," this goal to reduce suffering or end suffering, is usually for something else, even if I haven't articulated what that something else is, even if I don't realize that it's for something else. So when I gave the sort of thought experiment of that falling and then realizing there's no ground, how that would be, just to imagine everyone's okay with that. You've worked towards everyone being okay with that just falling. The reduction of suffering is for something else in the end, or let's say past a certain point of reduction of suffering, something that we feel is good in some kind of alternate way—worthwhile, beautiful, meaningful.

Some people are scared of this idea. Sometimes I've mentioned it to people who are very committed Buddhists or they've heard me say it in a talk or something. Maybe ending suffering isn't the, or reducing suffering isn't the main thing or isn't the final goal or whatever. And it seems like it really stirs, it really bothers some people.

But again, my invitation is to just have a look, have a look, sense in, feel in, if that thought experiment works for you or something similar. Even if you're scared of the idea, see, is there not something else behind, underneath your concern and your efforts to reduce suffering and your focus on reducing suffering? Isn't there something else, another level?

So it could be that already what's operating for us, even if a person has never heard of soul-making or has heard of it and doesn't like it or doesn't practice it or whatever, it could already be that a part of how we are navigating our ethical choices is actually through the means of some very kind of inchoate and dimly sensed version of sensing the soul, of soul-making practice with regard to ethics. It could already be that that's what people are doing, we are doing.

So is it possible to develop that? Ontologically there, epistemologically there, there's this, we're already trusting something. What are we trusting? How's it working in us? And is it possibly the case that what we're actually already trusting is the beginnings of soul-making approach, but we don't know that language, or we don't know that practice, or another part of our mind objects to it, but actually that's already part of what's going on, part of how we're functioning epistemologically with regard to ethics and ethical choices and values.

So maybe that's already the case. Maybe it's something that can be developed. We've already said, we've already considered a couple of times already the possibility of regarding eros as epistemologically valid and as ontologically guiding and validating, as John Milbank wrote, giving it an ontologically disclosive status.

The eros, if we have a view of truth not as a definite this or that and a final arriving point, but more as this journey of provisional truths, as it in fact is the actuality in science, as a journey of provisional truths, progressive stages of provisional truth. And if we have that idea and how congruent that is with the way eros works, eros as what takes us, what galvanizes the soul-making dynamic, which also means the perception, of course, of psyche, the sense of what we're in relationship with and the idea of it, the logos, and taking us more into depth, the eros is what opens up the depth, what opens us up to the depth.

And the successive openings, the successive disclosures of truth or reality, but truth and reality just conceived a little bit more maturely, really, or differently. So eros as epistemologically valid and also as ontologically guiding and validating in terms of depth, but also in terms of direction, so that there's, I would say, there can be and there will be with soul-making practice, a trust of the kind of the compass needle, the orientation of eros. Not just that it will take me deeper, but also where it points, the direction.

And all this is within the careful discipline of soul-making dharma practice and sensibility. It's not just, oh, so truth can be whatever I like, or whatever you like. No, we're talking about a real discipline here, and anyone who knows soul-making down the practice, and really practices, understands that, should understand that.

It's a difficult training, asking a great deal—even of those who have already undertaken extensive meditative training. Yet I wonder whether what's unfolding for many practitioners is actually the beginning, the fragmentary emergence of a small version of soul-making sensibility operating in the realm of ethics. Can we fill this out? Can we provide it with greater ontological and epistemological support in our thinking, creating more conceptual space and offering possible frameworks for understanding the ontology and epistemology that might take this further, exploring what emerges from such an approach?

We have already examined how soul-making dharma can offer modifications and sophistications of ontology and epistemology with respect to the dimensions provided through notions of cosmic order or voluntarism. Soul-making dharma can reimagine these entire possibilities, placing them on different ontological and epistemological foundations.

Interestingly, while I find Hartman's conception of a value firmament and its hierarchy compelling, as far as I could discern from his writings, he simply asserts the independent existence of this firmament of values. It exists, he suggests, though we cannot grasp it all at once, and some people lack talent for recognizing and differentiating values.

Let us compare this assertion with something else from St. Augustine, drawn from his text on the Trinity. Here he explores his theory of illumination—the understanding that our minds and hearts remain fundamentally open to the light of God, capable of being illuminated by divine light. They function through this light; the light of the divine permeates our hearts and minds. This is a beautiful conception, a luminous image.

Augustine writes: "God is holy everywhere, whence it is that the mind lives and moves and has its being in him, and therefore it can remember him. Not that it remembers him because it knew him in Adam, or at any other time and place before entering the life of its body, or at the time it was created and inserted into its body—it remembers none of these things, whichever of them really happened to it. They are all consigned to oblivion. It remembers him by turning towards the Lord, as to the light which in some fashion had reached it even while it had been turned away from him."

He continues: "This is the reason why the wicked, too, can think of eternity and make correct judgments of approval and disapproval about human conduct. What are the rules according to which they judge, but the rules which show everyone how to live, even though they may not themselves live according to them? How do they know them? Certainly not in their own natures. For although undoubtedly it is by the mind that these things are seen, it is clear that their minds are changeable, whereas whoever perceives in his mind these rules as the standard of conduct also perceives them to be unchangeable."

Again, we encounter this notion of eternal, independent, objective existence of values and ethical principles. Augustine asks: "Where then are these rules written? Where is it the unjust can discover what is just? Where do they see what they ought to have and lack? Where are the rules written but in the book of that light which we call truth. Here it is that all the rules of righteousness are inscribed, and it is from here that they pass into the heart of the just man, not by bodily transfer, but as though leaving their imprint on him, just as the design of a seal is impressed in the wax without leaving the seal."

I recognize that this language may not resonate with everyone. Some will object for various reasons, and many carry wounds from certain histories that make such expressions difficult to hear. I don't share that particular history, so I find these words deeply moving, even when I may not agree with every aspect. There's something profoundly beautiful in this conception of an absolute light of God—like the light through the prism we discussed, with the attributes of God as refracted wavelengths, each color possessing its own beauty. This light permeates our soul, our mind, making values accessible to us. These values are eternal because they participate in that light, and they remain accessible because this light suffuses our consciousness, our very being.

Yet one phrase Augustine uses strikes me as ambiguous: "This is the reason why the wicked, too, can think of eternity and make correct judgments of approval and disapproval about human conduct." Does he mean thinking of eternity in terms of hell and its punishments, leading to fearful repentance? Or does he intend something far more congruent with soul-making dharma—contemplating the timeless, experiencing a sense of the timeless dimension?

Perhaps this sense of timelessness opens awareness of dimensionality, of divinity, of the soul-making dynamic itself, which naturally opens the soul. This opening then reveals the ideational and imaginal dimensions, the dimensionality and divinity of values and virtues themselves. Does Augustine mean timelessness in this sense, or does he refer to eternity as eternal punishment and reward? The text remains beautifully ambiguous on this crucial point.

Actually, I don't know enough of his work to know. But even if he meant eternal punishment and reward in that sense, we could, again, soul-making dharma could modify what he wrote there and take the beautiful idea—this idea of something that is absolute in this sense of beyond all categories, beyond all attributes, like when people talk about the dharmakaya, or people talk in the via negativa about the nature of the ultimate godhead, beyond anything that can be said about it—and take that beautiful idea, that light permeating our consciousness. It's one of the elements of the imaginal that then opens up the whole sense, and within that whole sense there will be a soul-making sense of values, and they will have dimensionality and divinity and beauty and duty and necessity.

So it's possible he meant eternal punishment and reward, but we can modify that. This beautiful idea and beautiful language that he's using can be modified from the perspective and understanding of soul-making dharma. But what it will lead to is a slightly different conclusion, I think, than what Augustine is implying. Because it won't necessarily always imply the same conclusions about an activity or a thing in itself. Rather, this activity or that thing will be sensed with soul, and then implicit in that is the sense of divinity and dimensionality and duty and the self's autonomy—duty and my autonomy, beauty, creation, discovery, fullness of intention. All that will be there.

So not the thing in itself, but a different sense of this thing compared to that thing, this choice compared to that choice. And can we trust that? The fullness of intention and all the other soul-making dharma elements. So there's a soul-making dharma modification, perhaps, of what he said—probably, I would guess, but I don't know—in terms of what he said about eternity, the eternal, contemplating the eternal.

But there's also probably a modification, as we've said before, in terms of where it delivers us. It won't be a universal "this thing or that thing, this activity or that activity is taboo, proscribed or prescribed." Rather, what we're delivered to is a soul, a soul-making sense of something over something else. And that can guide us. Can we trust that to guide us?

I don't know if I mentioned this the other day—I think I mentioned it very briefly—but is there any place for antinomies in Augustine's view of ethics? We talked a lot about them in Eros Unfettered. It may well be the case that through soul-making dharma practice, soul-making practice in relation to ethical choices, antinomies are there, are felt, but they're resolved, they're solved for us through bringing the soul-making practice to bear. Because okay, I appreciate that these are antinomies, there are two moral pulls in different directions, but I feel, for me, guided to choose this one. I can trust that it's ethical, but I also know—I'm mature enough to know—that yes, this means I'm neglecting this other one. There's an antinomy there, as Hartman says, and I emphasize so much here.

I don't know if Augustine doesn't see that or tries to avoid the whole issue. But soul-making dharma practice helps us navigate those antinomies and accept the inevitable guilt, if we're going to call it guilt—the fact that in navigating an antinomy, in making a choice in life, and I have to make choices in life. Sitting on a fence forever is not—as Hartman calls it, that's really a sin. But I accept the inevitable guilt.

One example I've given several times: I wrote a letter to dharma teachers ten years ago about climate change and about flying so much in the dharma. I was fully aware there was a very strident tone, very critical, very aggressive, perhaps even sounded arrogant. I was very aware of that. And I was aware that it was going to piss people off and hurt people—people would feel hurt, rather. But I sent it anyway. And yes, quite a lot of people apparently were not happy at all. But I still to this day do not regret sending it. It was a soul choice.

I was tuning in to the... There was an antinomy there—to write it that way, to write it another way, to send it, to not send it. So it was soul that was guiding me, really. Even though at that time my understanding of all that was much less clear to me, much less articulated, much less explored, it was really soul that was guiding me. And I fully accept that I was in a way neglecting other moral values and virtues through the tone of the letter. But somehow it seemed necessary to write it in that way, in that tone. So I accept the guilt of neglecting those other values in the way that I wrote it.

Now if all this sounds... maybe for some people, again, who are not that experienced in actual soul-making dharma practice—I know there are some people who have listened to loads of talks, maybe all the talks on soul-making dharma, but actually haven't practiced much at all, or not in any way that it's really taken off and made a big impact on their being and practice. Maybe touched by the talks, or for whatever reason they're listening, maybe heard other people talk about it. But if you're in that camp, and this makes you... I think if you've done a lot of practice, this idea of soul-making practice, this idea of approaching ethics with soul-making sensibility and conceptual framework and practices, it won't alarm you.

There may be some people who just say, "Oh, I'm really not sure, I'm really not sure. How do I know I can trust that?" The practice hasn't matured enough to give you that trust in the whole paradigm yet. And maybe then an experiment. If you're really interested in the question, "Can I trust this? Is this a way forward?"

If you're really interested in the question, just take the trouble to do a little experiment: here's an ethical choice, and practice sensing with soul with regard to that ethical choice. As I said when I introduced it, either through an image, an imaginal figure that comes up, or through the values and virtues involved as ideal images. Practice sensing with soul that way in regard to that ethical choice, without carrying out the action that practice implies or suggests, without carrying out that choice, unless the same conclusion as what the soul-making practice suggests is provided via whatever your usual mode of approaching and judging ethical choices is.

You understand? So you're not actually doing anything different. You're not doing or choosing anything different than you would usually do or choose. But you're adding this practice. And do that many times with many different situations and many different kinds of choices. And see what happens.

If you don't really care, you're not going to bother to do that. But if you do care, if you're actually really interested in this question—can I really trust this with regard to ethics? Shouldn't we have another basis in ethics? Surely we can't put soul-making as a basis for ethics. There must be ethics as a basis, then soul-making. Surely. Especially when I hear you talking about all those weird images you have, Rob, of devouring and devouring beloveds and blood everywhere and ritual slaughter and all that—surely we must put ethics first and then the soul-making.

So if you're really interested in that question, actually do some experimentation on your own, as I've suggested. Do that many times in many different ethical situations and see. And see if what happens is you don't learn to trust that actually the soul-making could be a basis for the ethics. You'll know for yourself, and you won't have done anything differently in the course of the experiment. You're not being asked to do anything different than you would have done anyway, or chosen anyway.

One of the modifications, a very central modification that the soul-making Dharma paradigm brings, as we said in regard to the Augustine example and others, and also Augustine's example of the cosmic order, was that it's no longer the thing or the action in itself, universally, that is decreed right or wrong, valuable or not valuable, ethical or not. It's the question of whether it's ensouled and ensoulable. This is really important.

Yesterday we talked about the whole notion of this post-Protestant Reformation affirmation and elevation of ordinary life—work and production and family and children. Historically, there was this equalization of ordinary life, where it was prior to that perhaps seen as less valuable than a life obviously devoted to and consecrated to God. Then there was historically, post-Reformation or with the Reformation, this equalization of ordinary life, this affirmation and elevation of it.

Originally, historically, we were seen as taking part in God's plans. So it mattered how we approached that, that we saw our ordinary life and our work and our family as really taking part in God's plan. And that plan eventually was connected with this more horizontal cosmic order. But anyway, we were taking part in God's plan. And over time, it became just ordinary life without any reference to God. Ordinary life was seen as valuable, as worthwhile, as in itself not just okay but important, as qualifying as the good life. But the reference to God had gone. It was a historical sort of evolution, devolution, development.

Now, with soul-making Dharma approach, what we're saying is it's not that ordinary life is or isn't worthwhile or good with a capital G or beautiful in itself, but it's how we sense it and how we sense the things of ordinary life—family, work, children. Are we sensing them with soul? Because when we are, then they're rooted in a sense, in our sense, our palpable sense of divinity, Buddha nature, whatever you want to call it.

But the ontology there is not simply objective and not simply subjective. So it's not in the thing itself as a universal—the value resides universally in this thing for everyone, and that's just true. It's in the sense of the sensing of the soul. It's in the soul-making sense. And that gives us the sense of divinity. But that sense of divinity is also neither simply objective nor simply subjective. Different ontology.

So in a way, we're not really making a statement about ordinary life or family life and its values. What matters is the relationship. What matters is, is it sensed with soul? And that's what makes it worthwhile, what makes it qualified as living a really worthwhile life.

The soul is more than the heart. That's what makes it beautiful in that way. So we're not saying for or against ordinary life or family life or anything like that. That's important. What's important is that it's sensed with soul—that's the guide for how to live, what to live for, what's worthwhile. This speaks to the bigger question of ethics.

So we just said, neither simply objective nor simply subjective. That's the ontology that's wrapped up in all this, or that's underpinning all this.

We could leave things there, but we might go a little further and extend into a slightly different connection here. With the risk and probability of actually leaving things a little inconclusive—but I still think it's worth exploring—we've been considering ethical values, but we can also consider aesthetic values, or beauty itself as a value too.

I want to explore this now. I've spoken about it before and written about it recently, which will be published sometime in the future. In both talking about it and writing about it, I've emphasized how important and instructive it is to actually inquire into beauty—our notions of beauty and our sense of beauty. How important and instructive that is with regard to soul-making dharma and practice. How intimate the connection is there.

So beauty is a value too. What's the ontology of beauty?

Again, William Stace and others can jump right in and say, "Well, the fact that you can't prove that this or that thing is beautiful, the fact that people don't agree, doesn't mean—does not imply—that there doesn't exist an objective independent truth to beauty."

Some people also nowadays would like to say that values, ethical values, are illusions, actually. There are different ways of saying that, different explanations for why they think this. They might say there's no such thing as beauty, really. What there is is a sense of pleasure.

And Hartman and others would say, "Well, beauty exists for human beings, just like values exist for human beings."

In Charles Taylor's words, just as our best account of material reality includes things like quarks—our current best account includes things like quarks to talk about and explain how material reality is and what it is—our best account of our humanity and our human concerns must include things like values and beauty. Because without them, without those notions and without that kind of vocabulary, it's not just hard but actually impossible to choose and to navigate in life.

We touched on this before. I might have an idea that it's all just atoms or whatever, or even that I'm choosing this because it's pleasant or unpleasant. But that's not really what's happening—it's not really the best account of what's moving me in this or that situation, or how I choose.

So there are different ontologies with regard to beauty: whether it has independent existence, whether it's completely an illusion, or whether it's neither wholly created by my way of looking nor fully, objectively, independently there. It's not just in the eyes of the beholder, but nor is it completely in the object alone. It's create-discovered. Again, this kind of alternate ontology. Alternative ontology.

Remember, quarks are participatory too. So the whole thing gets a little more—hmm, that's interesting. I'm not sure what the degree of prevalence is, but certainly a lot of people who really think hard about quantum physics—a lot of physicists don't think hard about quantum physics, but for the people who do—there's some portion that takes seriously the notion that quarks and everything else that is so-called material is participatory. As I said, it doesn't exist independent of the observer, and how it is and what it is and where it is all depends on the observer.

So it's an alternative ontology—this neither subjective nor objective, fully, simply. But it may not just apply to things like values and beauty. It may also apply to material things, as we've talked about.

And whatever the ontological status of beauty is, and of values—these things are deeply important to the soul. And somehow they're communicated soul to soul. Beauty can be communicated soul to soul and shared between souls. And a sense of value. And the beauty of value as well.

How wonderful, how amazing this possibility of communication. How wonderful, how amazing the depth to which we can care about these things, to which we feel they're important.

So it might be that there's a kind of ontological middle way with regard to beauty that's actually pretty similar to the imaginal middle way. And that's similar to one of the possible ontologies—the same kind of ontological middle way regarding values. That would be different, or in some ways of construing it, that would be different than Hartman's idea of a firmament of values objectively existing. But actually it could still be made congruent. It could still be made congruent.

But it depends on our notion of what the mind is.

It's interesting, too, if we just reflect a little bit on our culture, or where our culture is at, regarding ontologies of three different domains: mathematics, ethics, and aesthetics.

With regard to mathematics, I think most people in our Western culture would agree that there are independently existing mathematical truths, and also that there is a difference in human beings' innate talent to understand those truths and to realize those mathematical truths. Some people are obviously much more trained than others, and we trust those people who are trained more than we trust people who are not trained with regard to what's true in mathematics. These mathematical truths are widely regarded as independently true, whether you're a mathematician or not.

With regard to ethics, it's quite a bit more complicated. If we think about this question of ethos—of what's a really worthwhile life, what's a really beautiful life—then it seems almost fundamentally given in our Western culture to say there's no independent truth about that. No one can tell you what's a worthwhile life, what's a beautiful life. So there's quite a strong view that ethics, in that larger sense about what is a worthwhile life, what is really good—there's no independent truth to that.

When we shrink the domain of ethics down to the question of right and wrong, then people often say there is an independent truth. There is a truth here about what's right and wrong. The very fact that there's so much argument about what's right and wrong for so many questions and issues should make us wonder whether our aggressive belief that there is a right or wrong is actually tenable.

With regard to talent, I think most people would probably believe that some psychopaths or other people who have a mental illness are not capable, or much less capable, of recognizing right and wrong. But in regard to the area of ethics that has to do with what's worthwhile, what's a worthwhile life, what's a beautiful life, the idea of someone being more talented in that domain or being better trained in that domain—it's not universally accepted at all. It's probably universally dismissed.

Mathematics, ethics, aesthetics—then again it gets really interesting. It seems to me that with classical art—figurative classical art, literature, music, classical music, classical literature, classical architecture—people are often willing to admit there's an independent truth there, but say, "I'm not capable of judging it because I leave that to the experts." So we agree that there's a training possible there, there's maybe talent possible in ascertaining these things, and there must be an independent truth, interestingly. And the expert knows that independent truth.

When it comes to more contemporary art, then it gets really, really more complicated and messy in a way.

Here's an interesting thing, I think: if one cares really deeply about art—and by art I mean all the arts—if one cares deeply about art, then one's relationship to art is actually related to what one wants art to do and to affect. So what do I—if I really care about art, I'm looking to art for something. I want it to have certain effects. I want it to do something in my soul, or maybe even in the world, if I really care about it.

And that question of what I want it to do, what I want art to do in my being or hopefully in other beings, that question is related to ethics in the sense of what I consider good, what I consider is a life worth living. It's connected to my sense of dimensionality and maybe even divinity.

So if I care deeply about art, I care deeply about what I want art to do. I have certain things that I want art to do, to effect. And that's related to my ethics in the larger sense—my sense of what's good, what makes life worth living, my sense of dimensionality and all that in existence. Maybe my sense of divinity, even if I don't use that word—sacredness.

And maybe then, if all that's there, I tend to harbor a view that tends towards a sense of the independent existence of truths regarding both ethics and aesthetics. If I care deeply about art, care deeply about what art does and what it affects in my being and hopefully in others' beings, and that's related to my sense of what's good, what's worthwhile, what's deep, what's really meaningful, what's really important in life—then it's often the case that I harbor, even if I conceal it a little bit from others, a view that tends towards more the notion of the independent existence of truths about both what is ethical in the sense of meaningful and what constitutes a life worth living, and also what's of value aesthetically.

So personally—and I've said this before—I cannot agree that the collected works of John Coltrane are equal in value to the collected works of the Smurfs, or even the collected works of Britney Spears, or whatever. I just can't agree, really, if I'm honest. I can't agree. To me, there's a whole different order of value—aesthetic value, which touches on spiritual value, which touches on ethics.

And what I want John Coltrane—when I hear his music, when I'm open to his music, what it does to me, what it can do to me—is totally related to my sense of existence, my sense of soul. It's totally related to my sense of what makes life worth living, and my sense of God, and my sense of dimensionality. The ethics and the aesthetics are connected here, if I care deeply about art, and I tend towards a more realist view of independent existence of value there.

I really cannot agree, if you're going to say, the Smurfs are just as valuable as John Coltrane.

But it's complex, because there seems to be also a kind of taboo more widely about asserting an independent truth regarding the aesthetic worth of something that's non-classical. I mean, you get sometimes the immature "oh, that's shit, that's shit." Usually it's just because someone's unfamiliar with some form or some kind of new contemporary music or contemporary art. But usually the person that says that—art is not that important to them. It's just "shit." It's not coming from a place where art is actually really important to them, something that they spend a lot of time opening themselves to and resonating with and feeling. It's just that something's unfamiliar, so they just say "shit." They're not trained in a way.

So I don't know—mathematics, ethics in both senses, in the wider sense that we've been trying to open up here: what makes life worthwhile? What makes life really meaningful? What's a life worth living? What is the beautiful life? What is really good that I should aspire to? And in the smaller sense of right and wrong. And aesthetics—the value in art is just a part of aesthetics, the question of value in art and whether that has independent objective existence.

There's a kind of confusion, I find, when you look at the culture and where we are in the culture with these things. Why am I bringing this up? Partly just because of the interesting connection in ontology between—we talked about mathematics in the realm of ideas and ideation and imagination and values. We've talked about ethics, ontology, and then the corresponding ontologies of beauty. To me that's just interesting.

But I'm also bringing up the cultural question of where we are, where we tend to be, our society, the kind of views that are prevalent around all that. Because soul-making Dharma is born now, at this time, in our culture. And so it's born into a set, or a soup really, of ontological and epistemological views and beliefs and questions and possibilities, but also unquestioned assumptions and rigidities and all kinds of things. So it's quite interesting and relevant to also reflect or kind of get a sense of where the culture is on these questions of ontology and epistemology with regard to different domains—mathematics, ethical domains in two senses, and aesthetics.

Because it may be that someone listening to all this, or someone listening to even previous talks before the ethics ones, thinks, "Well, all this soul-making Dharma business and soul-making practice, it's a bit elitist, isn't it? I mean, you have to have done all this other practice and understand this, and you're talking about all this sophisticated philosophy and psychology and Dharma understanding. Isn't that all a bit elitist?" And there's a certain kind of reaction in relationship to that born in a culture.

Then we say, "Well, if you're trying to propose a soul-making Dharma approach to ethics, then that's really elitist. You're expecting too much from people. Only a very elite few would be able to do that."

So it's interesting. You think, "Okay, well, if that's the case, why is it not like mathematics, where you would give the ethical questions to experts—elite, those who are trained—or train yourself?" And epistemologically speaking, giving something to an expert or relying on expert opinions—as I pointed out sometime or other in a talk, that's a kind of epistemology as well. We do that all the time with science. We do that with medicine. You know, if the doctor tells me, "Yeah, your cancer has come back," how do you know? "Well, this and this and this, the blood tests..." or whatever. "This is the probable prognosis." I'm relying on the expert opinion, and we do that all the time in lots of fields, primarily medicine and science, but as I said, also classical art and classical literature. Someone says, "This is good," so yeah, probably it is good.

But what about doing that with ethics? It's not that simple. We acknowledge, as I said, for mathematics and for aesthetics that there are experts and they've probably had a long and difficult training that's necessary to reach that level of expertise, and maybe they had some innate talent or dispositional propensity to that area. And we give those questions and those issues to them.

Well, one of the reasons we don't do that with ethics as well is because it affects—it is going to affect my life and my choices much more directly, it seems, than questions of aesthetics or mathematics. I can't avoid it like I can avoid mathematics, and I can even avoid art to a certain extent. I mean, soul-making practice is not something anyone else can really do for you anyway. It's your personal practice.

But maybe politically speaking, socially speaking, in issues and matters that affect everyone—so for example, Heathrow expansion, or they're talking about this HS2 rail line, high-speed rail line linking the south and the north of England, supposedly to more equalize the relative wealth and economic growth in the North and South, where it hasn't been equal so far. But while they're in the process of even beginning to build this HS2 railway line, high-speed railway line, it's decimating ecological reserves and nature reserves, some with endangered species and all kinds of things, felling lots of trees. Or as I said, Heathrow expansion. These kinds of issues that will affect a lot of people, or maybe even everyone.

Is democracy the best way of deciding? I touched on this, I think, in the Cedar and Soul talk. Maybe, maybe not anymore. I don't know. In a world of equal democracy, but there's Facebook and Google and who knows who tracking my preferences and opinions online and then feeding me both information and marketing in line with my history and my propensities and not opening me up to other views. On top of which there's the spreading of fake news, there's Russian cyber influence and who knows what else, there's the whole unrestrained global capitalist market, global market capitalism, and advertising in a way promoting sometimes the lowest common denominator of desires.

Even decisions about what appears on television—how much does that truly emerge from democratic processes? And can such processes be trusted anymore? For numerous reasons, I believe they cannot. Partly this stems from ethical grounds: as I've explored throughout this extensive talk, we have essentially lost our foundation for ethical thinking and ethical discernment. We've certainly lost the ground—indeed, we've lost even the question itself and the space—for ethics in its larger sense. I mean the profound questions of what constitutes a worthwhile life, what is good, what is beautiful. What is a beautiful life? We have simply lost this entirely.

Given this loss, is handing these decisions to the people through supposedly equal democratic processes really the wisest course anymore? I honestly don't know. It's obviously an extraordinarily complex question.

If everyone were trained in sensing the soul and educated in virtue ethics—approaching the soul through that pathway—then democracy and these decisions would be fundamentally different. These questions about what is worthwhile, what is beautiful, what is truly important, what makes life worth living—they do bear significantly upon political, social, and economic questions. So if everyone were trained in opening that sense and skilled in discernment, democracy would be an entirely different phenomenon.

In Plato's Republic, one of his major texts, he describes an ideal society governed by a kind of spiritual elite—specially trained and dedicated individuals who make the important decisions. This is genuinely dangerous territory for Western culture and society, a dangerous and difficult idea, repugnant to most people when they consider it: the notion of a spiritual elite. But is democracy really in such a healthy state anymore? For many different reasons, I'm not certain it is.

I'm not sure what the answers are. But yes, in Plato's Republic—which reads almost like a fantasy novel, a utopian counterpoint to George Orwell—there exists this spiritual elite that educates and establishes a hierarchy of moral purposes. But what would it look like if that hierarchy related to sensing the soul rather than to particular activities in themselves? Quite complex territory.

I should also note that it's not as though we don't already have elites governing our democracies. Consider the ultra-wealthy: thirteen individuals possess wealth equivalent to that of roughly fifty percent of women in the developing world—I can't recall the exact statistic. These ultra-rich individuals and corporations already determine laws and policies within our supposedly democratic systems. Or consider political leaders like Trump, Putin, or even Boris Johnson, who demonstrate both willingness and ability to override, disregard, or circumvent democratic processes entirely.

So while we maintain this ideal of democracy, it's sagging at best and riddled with significant holes. I don't claim to know the answers to any of this. The idea of a spiritual elite is both repugnant and alarming to me as well. But who do you want wielding power? It's not as though elites aren't already running things at this moment.

These are simply questions I'm raising—opening territory that proves more inconclusive than conclusive.

It would be wonderful if we were all taught and trained to develop practices—if not soul-making, then something similar that helps us discern, navigate, relate to, and remain truly alive and sensitive to questions within this much larger conception of ethics. What constitutes the beautiful life? What makes a life beautiful? What is genuinely worthwhile? In what can I anchor my ethics? What sense of another dimension can ground my ethics—not merely my understanding of right and wrong, but also my sense of what is worthwhile and beautiful?

It would be wonderful if we were all trained to develop practices like soul-making dharma or something analogous that assists us in that territory, in that domain—practices that help the soul, help the mind and heart become sensitive, navigate skillfully, and possess a reliable compass. Just as most of us in Western societies ideally receive training in mathematics, reading and writing, logic to some degree, and now even computer skills as part of standard education, with mindfulness meditation increasingly taught in schools.

Part of me believes it's a complete fantasy that society could ever reach a place where these kinds of practices, tools, approaches, and ways of thinking—not necessarily soul-making specifically, but something similar—would enable our beings to bring our sensitivity, discernment, deep soul, and profound intelligence to bear on this domain, on these essential questions. In some ways, I think it's an utter pipe dream.

Yet we have established these other forms of training as cultural norms, and that establishment required considerable time. I'm uncertain whether mindfulness in schools has yet become standard, but it may well be soon. So who knows? Perhaps it's not such an impossible dream after all.

And perhaps we need not wait for the entire culture to adopt something or for it to become culturally established. We can begin ourselves.

And obviously, for ourselves, we can find out for ourselves: what does this do to my image of ethics? What does it do to my sense of existence and my sense of navigating choices in life, responding to ethical situations, responding to social, political, economic issues, environmental issues? What does it do to my whole sense of myself and my life and the possibilities of my life?

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 233

The Image of Ethics (Part 6 - An Inconclusive Conclusion, or A Prolegomenon)

Rob Burbea · 58 min

In this concluding yet open-ended exploration, Rob Burbea addresses potential concerns about soul-making dharma's approach to ethics while emphasizing that any ethical system, including the Five Precepts, has inherent limitations. He critiques the complacency that can arise from relying solely on traditional Buddhist precepts, noting how contemporary Buddhism was late to address climate change despite its ethical foundations.

Burbea proposes three developmental stages for integrating ethics with soul-making practice: first, establishing the Five Precepts as a foundation; second, allowing soul-making practice to naturally expand one's ethical range and sensitivity; and third, developing sufficient trust in sensing with soul to use it as a direct basis for ethical discernment. He emphasizes that values are intrinsically woven into imaginal practice, with hierarchy of values being a natural human phenomenon rather than an imposed system.

The talk addresses concerns about freely available teachings, drawing parallels with historical cautions around emptiness instruction. Burbea stresses that his approach integrates ethics from the beginning, avoiding the dangers of separating relative and absolute truths. He concludes by acknowledging these as ongoing questions rather than definitive answers, inviting further careful development of soul-making dharma's ethical dimensions.

I think it may be wise—or certainly helpful in a number of ways and for different reasons—to say a few more things after everything we've explored regarding ethics and soul-making so far. The Sensing with Soul talks, the Image of Ethics talks—and I emphasize those words "so far," as I've said before.

To me, these are endless subjects, endless inquiries, and they really should be endless inquiries—an active process. So whatever I've said now, as I mentioned at the beginning of the Image of Ethics talks, represents merely a snapshot of a process and evolution. I hope that others, when they've digested everything—and that's a prerequisite for soul-making Dharma—when they've truly digested soul-making Dharma practice and what's been said so far around ethics, may be able to contribute in a very careful and rigorous way. In an intelligent and soulful way, with integrity—moral integrity—they can contribute to the further evolution of the whole soul-making Dharma logos, and particularly this branch, this domain around ethics and soul-making Dharma.

What I'm going to say now is not really conclusive. It's not really a conclusion in any definitive way. You could say these are more preliminary remarks. You could hear this more as an introduction to the whole Image of Ethics talks. Some of what I'll say today is, in fact, just reminders of things I've already said, but because there's been so much covered, it's easy to lose track of much of it.

Part of the reason for offering this additional piece now is because some people may have listened to Sensing with Soul and Image of Ethics, or other material within soul-making, and feel quite confused or even concerned about what they're concluding are the implications or probabilities that emerge from what's been said. I think it's worthwhile addressing that.

I also want to remind people that when talks get posted on Dharma Seed, there's usually a caveat, a warning, user guidelines that say it's probably not a good idea to listen to certain talks until you've really digested X, Y, and Z. In the case of these talks and the Sensing with Soul talks, unless one has truly digested—not just intellectually, but in practice as well—the principles of soul-making dharma and its practices, not just played with them a little bit, but really gained a sense of what the authentic imaginal is like, the terrain of it, listening to these talks beforehand will highly likely give only partial understanding, probably misunderstandings, and naturally give rise to all kinds of concerns.

We post these notes, but I know for a fact that a good percentage of people simply ignore them and listen anyway because the title looks interesting.

The first thing to say—and this is something I've emphasized before—is that I believe any ethical system will be incomplete. It will have its strengths and weaknesses, but it will always have shortcomings and inadequacies. I think this applies to any ethical system that anyone anywhere in the history of humanity has offered, developed, established, or based their life upon. This includes whatever we've said so far about sensing with soul and soul-making dharma and practice as an approach to ethics, as forming a kind of ethical system.

Any ethical system will be incomplete, will have its strengths and weaknesses, places where it doesn't reach far enough or proves inadequate. This includes the soul-making dharma approach to ethics. It includes sensing with soul. It's really, really important to understand this—not just about what I've offered so far around ethics, but about any system, any ethical system.

I include absolutely Buddhist ethics, and particularly the Buddhist Five Precepts. They're wonderful, fantastic, and they have shortcomings and inadequacies. They have strengths and weaknesses. I would even extend this to those who keep more precepts—ten precepts, or the monastic Vinaya with its 236 precepts or whatever number exists in the Theravada monastic Vinaya. Even with all those precepts, all those laws and rules that can't be broken, all those guidelines, there's still the current—what feels like totally entrenched and unquestionable—current of patriarchy. You see this reflected in the ongoing battle around validating nuns' ordination, the general tenor of patriarchal hierarchy that runs through monastic life and the monastic sangha, despite all those precepts, manifesting in many other ways as well.

So I include sensing with soul, soul-making Dharma and practice as an approach to ethics, as a system for ethics—it's not going to be perfect. But neither are the precepts and approaches of Buddha Dharma, I would say.

One of the issues with Buddha Dharma and the Five Precepts is the idea of just reducing suffering. "As a Buddhist, I'm just interested in reducing suffering. That's what I care about. That's the primary thing. That's the orientation of my life. That's how we think about everything." With those two things together—the primacy of the view that the primary intention is to reduce suffering (suffering of self and other, all beings, the bodhisattva vow and everything), that view and the Five Precepts—it's very easy to slip into a kind of complacency. "Oh, it's all sorted, ethics is sorted, because I've got the Five Precepts, and I've got this intention as a Buddhist to reduce suffering, and that's the most important thing." Very easily, one can simply tick the box of ethics and sīla: "That's done. All I need to do is take care that I'm keeping the precepts, and the whole philosophy of it is complete. I don't really need to think about it much anymore."

There's a kind of complacency—or rather, kinds of complacency—that creep in. They're very, very dangerous and, I would say, very common within the world of Buddhism.

So there are many issues with the Five Precepts as an approach to ethics, many shortcomings. The shortcomings exist not only in the fact that people interpret the precepts very differently—hugely differently. The fifth precept about substances and alcohol. The third precept about sexuality. Heaven knows what people do with the fourth precept on speech.

The very formulation of the precepts creates a certain kind of limitation in our ethical thinking. It gets interpreted very, very differently. Vegetarianism, and so forth—so many different interpretations. Again, what does that show us? What does it imply? There are all these different interpretations, yet we feel secure in the notion of the five precepts, that we're on the right track ethically.

And it's not only because lots of so-called Buddhists break the precepts all the time—all the time, or quite frequently. Nor is it only because many Buddhists in power, as we've been hearing about and reading about in the news recently, as it has come to light, many Buddhists in power are actually abusing their power and breaking the precepts in doing so. That's not even the only issue. That's not only the reason why we need to wake up a little bit and expand the whole conversation about ethics, why the five precepts are not enough.

Nor is it only that, or even in addition to that, something in the Buddhist precepts and, as I've talked about before, in the kind of archetypes that rule over and through Buddhism but are not consciously recognized as archetypes and images that are ruling over Buddhism: equanimity, gentleness, non-harshness, that kind of kindness—all these images of what awakening looks like, of what a good Buddhist looks like, that are often semi-conscious. Semi-conscious is the power of that typical Buddha-rūpa image: sitting cross-legged meditatively with his eyes shut, very still, very calm, very unengaged. I've talked about all this before.

And what that does together—we've got the five precepts and these kinds of unrecognized precepts in their power and their pervasiveness, and what they do as images, as archetypes running through and ruling over Buddhadharma and its practitioners. What comes out then sometimes is a sort of passive aggression, for instance in speech and communication, because actually good Buddhists don't get angry and raise their voices. But what comes out is a kind of passive-aggressive abuse of power, passive-aggressive communication, and so forth. Or when people are getting a little upset, others kind of superciliously look at them as if, "Well, you're not really practicing well right now because you're not being really equanimous and calm."

But even all those put together—all those reasons: people interpret precepts differently, they break precepts, Buddhists in power abuse precepts together with an abuse of their power, there's a kind of passive aggression for which plenty of room and space is left in a kind of Buddhist shadow—not even all those together, important as they are, really important issues and questions, constitute the main point. It's simply the fact that the precepts are not enough as an approach to ethics, as a way of thinking about ethics, as a way of taking care with ethics. They're just not enough, I would say. I certainly know one of my teachers would very much disagree, but I would say they're just not enough.

Thich Nhat Hanh's addition to each of the five precepts of adding a positive version—not just "don't take what's not given" but "practice generosity," not just "don't harm life" but "practice kindness," and so forth—this is really, really valuable. Really helpful, I think, in terms of opening things up further in a way that they need to be opened up. And for some people, that will be enough. That feels like it's enough. It's one approach to opening things up larger. But I still think there are larger questions here that need looking at and that need investigation.

Precepts are actually not values. So we talk about them as training guidelines, and the actual Pali is "I undertake the training guideline to refrain from whatever it is." That's the translation of the Pali, of the precepts: I undertake the training guideline or the training rule to undertake, to try to do this as a training rule. So it's very different from "thou shalt not."

But I would say they're still not values. A precept formulated like that is not a value. It's not a commandment either—it's somewhere in between—but it's actually more like a rule or a commandment than it is like a value. Now certainly there are values wrapped up in, or implied, or suggested by any of those five precepts, or we bring a sense of what values may be wrapped up in or implied or suggested in them. But actually, it's not very clear. They're wrapped up in them, but if you think your way through—I'm not going to unpack it for you, think your way through this—yes, values are implied. What values? What values are implied, and what are the limitations in terms of just connoting or pointing to that value through the formulation of a precept? It's not clear. It's simply not clear.

So I'll come back to this about the precepts. As I say, I don't think they're enough. And one of the indications that they're not enough, as I've started talking about in The Meditator's Revolutionary and The Necessity of Fantasy, one of the indicators that they're not enough is simply if we ask the question: why is it that Buddhists...

came so late to the party addressing climate change? Why so late? And I mean that as a real question—there's a real question there, not just a criticism. Why? Why so late? But really, why?

What was it, or what is it, in Buddhist practice and teaching and thinking and formulations—the way we think about ethics and the way we frame ethics and the limitations of the way we think about ethics—that meant that probably of all the major religions, it was contemporary Buddhism that was the latest in really stepping up? Thankfully it's really beginning to change now, but it's taken quite a lot of work from a number of people. But this is a real question. Why? Why so late? Why were the Christians already there first and others? What was going on?

What was there in the way that we were thinking about ethics and thinking about practice and thinking about liberation and thinking about the world that actually wasn't picked up? Some of the teachers, when interviewed by David Loy years ago, some of them like Joseph, were just honest enough to actually really question themselves: "Yeah, that's interesting. I don't know. Why haven't I thought about that?" And even then, the galvanization is slow. Even when it's pointed out—why are we not thinking about it?—even then, there's a real question there.

This is part of my questioning: is it enough just to fall back on the five precepts, just to rest on the kind of presumed safety, the presumed laurels of the five precepts?

Someone asked why we don't have the five precepts as a ceremony when we begin soulmaking retreats, that it would help them feel safe. I think this is something we really have to listen to. Hopefully in future soulmaking retreats we can do that and create a space at the beginning of retreats for a ceremony to really invoke and establish the five precepts and give them a really central and sacred place.

To me, I think that's important. And for some people, it will help them feel safe. That's important—it's important that people feel safe. But to me, there would be a grave error and a grave shortcoming and a grave disservice to both the Dharma and certainly to soulmaking Dharma if we just stopped there. "Okay, that's the ethics piece that we're resting on." It's not enough.

So yes, I think it might be important to establish that as a ceremony in future retreats. Sometimes there's so much to get through that it gets squeezed out. There's also the case that at Gaia House we have a kind of legacy because of certain teachers. Since Gaia House was created, there was a real tenor of frowning on ceremonies and not having any ceremonies for anything at all. So at Gaia House we're a little bit battling that history and legacy. Even to have the ceremonies that we do is already sort of pushing the envelope, but I think that might be important because it is important that people feel safe. However, it's not enough. It's really not enough.

I think if we do have a ceremony, it should also be seen that it's a preliminary. I was thinking recently about how people approach the area of ethics and its relationship to soulmaking dharma and soulmaking dharma practice. So often with Buddha Dharma, you get taught the ethics first and say, "Okay, let's agree to that, and then you practice."

Ideally, that's what you do. Here are the five precepts, and then you practice. As I think I shared once, that's how it worked for me. I just heard them—first Dharma talk ever—it made complete sense, just immediately took them on, changed my life quite drastically, and then got into meditation immediately after that.

For a lot of people that isn't the case. But still, I think it might be—and I'm not sure if this is right, so I'm kind of thinking out loud here—it might be that for many people, the start of soulmaking practice comes through other dharma practice. Soulmaking dharma practice, just like other dharma practice, should be resting on and should be really taking for granted the care for and the adherence to the five precepts. I think I said that in a podcast interview maybe a couple of times with different interviewers: it rests on the five precepts absolutely, but maybe we should make that a little more clear.

So that's a beginning. One starts, already has a basis in the five precepts and a basis in everything else that we usually ask for before people come on soulmaking dharma retreats: mindfulness, insight meditation, samādhi, some understanding of emptiness, certainly mettā and things like that, and energy body. And then one begins practicing and developing one's soulmaking practice, one's imaginal practice. And then one starts to see...

Soul-making practice, because values are one of the elements of the imaginal, they're actually implied and involved inextricably in any imaginal practice, in any sense of soul-making. Even if it's a so-called extra-psychic image with a sensing with soul with a tree, or with a landscape, or with whatever it is, ethics are involved.

Again, with the elements, sometimes you have to notice and think, "Oh, I didn't even notice that at first, that element." It's like your eyes getting used to the dark. "Oh, there's that there as well." Like, "I don't notice that I'm being loved," or whatever it is. So these elements—it's like one really has to get used to the terrain of soul, the landscapes of soul and the landscapes of the imaginal.

And then one starts to realize not only are values there, but actually, inevitably, soul-making practice will start expanding—not contracting—the range of ethics and the care for ethics, but actually expanding it, making it larger, more, certainly deeper and richer, but also wider. A greater range.

As I've talked about before, we start noticing the gaps in just the five precepts and start expanding the whole notion of what an awakened being looks like and talks like, what are the dominant archetypes that are operating and running things and ruling things and sending things only down certain channels and expressions and activism only down certain channels of "this is what they look like, this is the tone, this is what we do, this is what we don't do." One starts to wake up to that and expand the range there. More becomes permissible in one's ethical stance, in one's ethical response and one's ethical actions.

And also the whole nature of the world starts to expand. "Oh, maybe I'm responsible for more ethically here because the whole nature of the world comes alive." So that may be a second stage.

First stage is just the five precepts as usual, alongside your regular insight meditation practice and what you know from there. Those are two platforms you start practicing with. And through the practice itself—through having proper, genuine, genuinely imaginal experiences and working with that, grappling with that and listening to teachings and trying to understand, having a range of sensing with soul experiences and all that—then something, you will see, something expands. Doesn't contract—expands. Is more demanding. There's a greater range. So that would be the second stage.

And then at a third stage, at some point, with enough practice—through lots and lots of practice experience with sensing with soul and imaginal and soul-making dharma, and lots and lots and more thorough and deep understandings, both practice experiences and understanding—we start to, I think inevitably, reach a point where we trust enough in soul-making dharma and practice that we trust that sensing with soul can actually become a basis for ethics through, as I've described in this Image of Ethics talk, through a sensing with soul with regard to values, to virtues, to ethical choices and situations.

So there are three stages there. We're not starting with the third stage of asking someone to buy into some whole ethical system that might sound very odd or strange or might raise some concerns. So you're not asking them to buy into that before these other stages.

As I say, I'm thinking out loud here. I'm wondering about order, what the order is. People often ask me in what order should I listen to talks, in what order should I... So I'm thinking out loud. I don't know what the order is for sensing with soul practice, for soul-making dharma. But that might be one way of thinking about it, just these three stages, very different from putting the ethics—in the soul-making dharma sort of understanding of ethics—putting that first. That would be kind of ridiculous, because people wouldn't really know, have an ability to do that, or know what we're talking about, and would easily be misunderstood, misinterpreted, all kinds of things.

So there are lots of questions about this. What's the order? What's a prerequisite for soul-making dharma practice? And so one question we still have—I don't think it's quite resolved yet—is exactly how much real understanding of emptiness should a person have before they really get into soul-making dharma. And I've said just briefly as sort of secondary comments, you know, "I'm not sure yet, I'm not sure yet," but in several conversations there are people who think one really needs to have quite a deep understanding of emptiness, or quite a sure understanding of emptiness. And I mean emptiness as I teach it, that really thorough emptiness, not just a little bit about the sort of "emptiness is impermanence" or "aggregates in time."

That's also a question, it's a parallel question. How much emptiness practice and understanding do people have? Should we stipulate or even demand that people have emptiness before they do soul-making practice, maybe before they're even allowed to hear soul-making teachings? I don't know. These are all open questions. I'm really not sure yet.

So some may have heard in the totality of the ethics talk so far, the Sila and Soul and the Image of Ethics, this thing about hierarchies of values, for instance, and I don't like the idea of lower versus higher. So a few things about that.

Remember, and perhaps I didn't make this clear sufficiently at all in the Sila and Soul talks, but Hartman was really addressing a different question than, say, Kant. And we are prone these days, as I'm trying to make very clear in the Image of Ethics talks—we are prone these days to approach ethics with immediately the question of what's right, what's wrong. "This is what I want from an ethical system. I want a stipulation about what's right and what's wrong."

And Hartman actually said no, the fundamental question is what is of value?

And that's a bigger question - what is really good with a capital G? What is the good, as the ancients used to talk about? What is a life that's really worthwhile? What is the beautiful life? And that's a bigger question than what's right and what's wrong.

Before you can answer the question what's right and wrong, what should I do, what ought I to do in this or that situation, you have to actually answer or look at the larger question of what is of value. It's not so much replacing one question with another, but providing a ground - a wider and deeper ground for the question "what ought I to do?" - with the wider and deeper question "what is of value?"

And then, this whole question, or this whole exploration of a hierarchy of values is necessarily called in when we ask that bigger question. And the question of what's right, what's wrong, sits within that bigger question. I hope that's something that the Image of Ethics talks makes clear.

And the fact is we do have hierarchies of values. You have them anyway. So again, it's just a bit like the soul-making Dharma and practice - just making clear what goes on for us as human beings anyway. Soul-making Dharma, or in relation to eros when we really love something, and in relation to ethics when we make ethical choices, when we're arguing with someone about right and wrong and it's just stuck - we actually have hierarchies anyways.

In a way, we're exposing something, and we need to talk about this because it's already there. And we need to talk about it because actually we need to expand the conversation, the range of conversation. What are we trying to actually ask and address and inquire into? What's the fundamental question here?

Because a person says, "I don't like this idea of a hierarchy of values." Okay, well think back, for example, to Augustine's hierarchy and the example he used - or the example we used of an example he used. He says justice compared to gold. He said these are both wonderful things. They both have value. They're both part of God's creation. And as such, both of them should be loved. But for Augustine, it's clear there's a hierarchy here. Justice has a higher value than gold, and we should orient that way. We should appreciate the hierarchy of values and love justice and gold according to their place in that hierarchy. In other words, we should love justice more than gold - gold, personal profit.

And then one can say, "Oh, I could use that personal profit for justice." Okay, but the point he's making here is for personally used material gain. So if you think you don't like hierarchies of values, then just use Augustine's example. Do you really disapprove of the idea that it's better to love justice over your personal profit that you would use for your personal use? Most of us, even if we find it hard to live up to sometimes, would say justice is the higher value. There's a hierarchy there. And we would agree with Augustine, maybe, that we should love according to that hierarchy. We should love justice over our love and our desire for gold.

So this is the kind of thing that's being pointed to. And just to ask yourself, if you have this objection to a sense of hierarchy - do you object to that hierarchy?

Or to take another example from Nikolai Hartmann. So he has two values: the value of altruism and the value of egoism, of selfish interest, of selfishness of interest. They're in a hierarchical relationship to each other. Altruism is the higher value. It's higher than selfishness of interest. Selfishness of interest is still a value. Egoism is still a value. We need to take care of ourselves and our own needs. But how do we know there's a hierarchy there? Or how can you sense if you already feel there's a hierarchy there? That's the more important question.

How does your heart respond to stories of altruism? Or when you witness great altruism? Are you not moved and impressed? And how does your heart respond when you just see someone just taking care of their own needs? It may not even be at the obvious expense of anyone else.

But the way these things touch our heart and impress upon our heart, the way our heart responds when we witness altruism compared to when we witness egoism, is already implying that we sense a hierarchy there.

Now, of course, you may not. But I think a lot of people—maybe it's universal, maybe it's just a cultural thing that's come post-Christianity—experience this. My point is more for you to introspect a little bit here. Just see: is your heart not more impressed upon, more moved? Are you not more impressed when you witness altruism compared to when you witness just some example of someone taking care of their own interests? Kind of egoism.

Hartman adds to this: yes, there's a hierarchy here, but if it's completely, utterly lopsided, and there's way too much altruism and almost no selfish interest, it's so imbalanced between those two hierarchies that it borders on stupidity and dysfunction. So yes, there's a hierarchy, but still there's a qualification that one is not at the complete expense of the other. Altruism is not at the complete expense of taking care of oneself, of egoism. So there's a hierarchy, but it's got other considerations that are woven into the sense of that hierarchy—if we want a kind of wisdom with regard to the hierarchy.

There may have been things, for instance, in the Soulmaking Dharma talks, or even in the Images of Ethics talks, where I talked about a certain value and it just didn't resonate for some people. Of course not. So again, maybe I just didn't make this clear enough: if certain values don't resonate, you know, they're just rarer values and they're not for everyone.

For example, what Hartman calls the value of nobility, noble-mindedness—in his sense of the word, the very particular usage he has of that word in an ethical context, in the context of values and virtues that we talked about in Soulmaking Dharma—really means for him the opening up of the kind of vision or sensibility or realizational capacities of the culture at any time. Opening up the telescope lens wider, opening up the focus of the telescope lens wider as it looks on the firmament of values.

Remember, every culture, every person has a limited scope, and the noble-minded nobility with regard to values actually stretches that scope. Such a person begins to discern new values that the culture at that time hasn't sensed yet. Their antennae are more receptive. They're ahead of their time, in a way—in much the same way that Christianity itself now has become such entrenched values. Even if one isn't a Christian or isn't religious or objects to our inheritance from Christianity and all the wrong that's been done and this and that, we've still absorbed so much from Christian morality.

At its time, though, it was a novel value. Novel and noble value, in the sense that Jesus and the first apostles and disciples were really feeling into the ether, into the firmament of values, and picking up on a new set of values, or stretching of the values: love over law. The value of love over the value of biblical law, of Moses' law. So at that point, those who were sensible to that and preached that were embodying, manifesting the value, the virtue of nobility in Hartman's sense. Now, of course, it's just totally old hat, as I said. But there's a value in nobility. And some people have that calling and some people just don't relate to that at all.

Again, if I talk about higher values or use that language, it does not mean a higher value is at the complete expense of a lower value. So for example, we're talking about love of the remote. Love of the remote really means love of those in the future, but those most excellent in the future—those most likely able to offer something really beautiful to the world and really valuable to the world in the future, and caring for those people who one doesn't even know or meet, one might not even be sure if they get the message, et cetera.

Comparing that or contrasting that with love of one's neighbor, which is those around one, the everyday sort of interactions—and some people like Nietzsche, almost discovering the love of the remote and prioritizing that to the complete expense of the love of his neighbor... You know, I don't know. He eventually went mad, but it was probably a biological thing, an illness, a physical illness that affected his brain. But anyway, it was a mistake.

Sometimes, in fact, as Hartman points out, sometimes people discovering new things get a little extreme at times. They're out in territory where no one else goes, exploring ideas or creative projects, and it's all a little bonkers. And I think I know that territory a little bit from peers in my life—creative projects that one feels very alone with and, yeah, gets a little mad.

Anyway, the point is: if we make a hierarchy between those values, love of the remote is not, absolutely not, at the complete expense of love of the neighbor. To prioritize it completely would be a mistake. And secondly, it's not for everyone. That one. We could talk about other values. They're just not for everyone. It's fine. We're just talking about things that, you know, for some people, it might make more sense.

I seem to be caring about something else that I can't quite articulate. So putting out a teaching like this may be helpful for those people who will almost certainly be in a minority, but who have been grappling with trying to make sense of their own life and their choices. They seem to not be completely doing what standard ethics would suggest they do. It's like, "Oh, okay, we need to expand our thinking here." And it's not for everyone. So if it's not for you, just leave it.

We could give lots of different examples here. But even more importantly, I think—now from the Image of Ethics talks it should be clear, again, that it's not in the thing itself. Eventually we can just use the soul-making sense as our guide. So it's not intrinsically—if we take, for example, that love of the row is higher than love of one's neighbor or whatever—it's not intrinsically in the thing itself. We've emphasized this several times when we talked about the ontology of values in the Image of Ethics talks.

It's more that if I personally or you personally have developed your soul-making practice, you start to get a sense of: is this or that value soul-making for you? Some people will hear about certain values and it just doesn't resonate—it never will resonate. And for other people, they start to really get a sense that the soul is called in a certain direction.

And again, even if it is, it doesn't mean to follow that call or to prioritize that call at the complete expense and total disregard of another value that might seem lower in your personal soul-making sense of hierarchy. So this is really important. Eventually one can use one's own personal soul-making sense, and that's different than decreeing that this is for everyone a so-called higher value, and that is for everyone a so-called lower value.

Again, I'll be repeating myself. If that sounds alarming, and you think, "Oh, so it can just be anything you like, any whim—you can decide what's a higher or lower value," then you haven't understood yet the discipline and the demands of soul-making practice and understanding, the discipline and demands of a disciplined eros, disciplined sensing with soul.

And again, to repeat, we're putting out, exploring, unfolding, supporting ethics with a different ontology and a different epistemology, different than Hartman's, and different than usual ontologies and epistemologies that we're used to. Certainly different than the usual one of modernity, or of postmodernity, or of premodernity. We've gone into this before.

But as I said, even that might sound alarming to people. Let it go for now, if it sounds alarming. It's really important to trust your concerns and leave what sounds alarming or what you don't like, or better, discuss it with others. Really discuss it. And it might be that you leave that part alone—just leave it, just go back to what you feel you can trust ethically, what makes sense, actually what really makes sense to you.

More than feel comfortable—it's like we need to be stretched and challenged with ethics and not necessarily comfortable. But I mean what feels that you can trust ethically. Leave it. And if you're still really attracted to soul-making practice, get into the soul-making practice. And it's probable that that evolution I was talking about before, those three stages—you'll start to realize, "Oh, now the soul-making business is opening up my whole ethical outlook and questioning and sensibility and ethical demands on me and the range of that and the range of expressions and all that."

And then eventually, it will mature even more, and you will feel that you can trust your soul-making sense with regard to ethics. And you will feel hierarchy of values, but it's your personal hierarchy of values, and you will feel that you can trust that. There's no danger. We can't say, "Oh, everyone can decide for themselves, so this mass murderer could just decide that this is how..." We've been through all that.

But if it's alarming for you now, it just means you're not ready for it. Just leave it. Put it down. Come back to what you feel you can trust, both ethically and in terms of practice. If you feel drawn to soul-making, just get into it. And if you really develop it, if you put the time in and you love it and it develops, at some point there will be these stages of evolution that will open up and transform your relationship with ethics and ethical questions and ethical issues.

So really important, I think, to establish the imaginal practice first—practicing with the imaginal, the soul-making, sensing with soul practice first, if you want to, if you feel called that way. And so establish that first, before you can really even properly, I think, for most people, probably even assess these whole teachings about ethics now.

And I really mean imaginal practice. I don't just mean the use of the imagination in meditation. And I mean more than just some images coming or working with some images in meditation or in therapy or somewhere else where that image has felt very healing, perhaps psychologically or whatever. I really mean imaginal in the sense of what we tried to outline—the aspects, the elements of the authentically, the genuinely imaginal, with all the elements and with all the ways it spreads and all that business.

So really establish that first and really get, as I said, familiar with that whole landscape of the imaginal. And then you see, "Oh yeah, there are values implicit there. And some of them—just the fact of what values are in place—are actually expanding and making demands and stretching your ethical range and sensibility and inquiry." And there's the fullness of intention there. It's not that we're in the grip of some selfish intention.

With the fullness of intention, there's an ethical safeguard that goes with it. And there's the imaginal middle way – we're not rarefying, we're not concretizing, mistaking images for reality and acting on them indiscriminately.

There's also a crucial distinction between eros and craving. Craving always wants to possess its objects, always needs to have more, and that more spreads horizontally, as we've been talking about. I want to possess more and more objects, more and more experiences, at the risk of disregarding ethical concerns. I don't care. And it's not even that I think I don't care – I just don't see. This is what craving does when it's not allowed to become eros.

Eros, as we talked about, opens up the imaginal, the vertical dimensions. It can get the more it wants in this endless opening up of one image. It doesn't need to have more objects, possess them concretely. It's getting what it wants through that opening up.

And the dharma, again, it's not literal, but it's refracted into life. So even the dark images – if there are images of killing and sacrifice and drinking blood and rampage and whatever it is – they're refracted into act or speech. They're metaphors. The image can stay what it is, but it refracts into something that ostensibly doesn't even look like it. So I can see all those soldier-warrior images that I used to have, how they have been refracted into my life through my teachings. My teachings have been, one could say from a certain point, warrior-like. I'm certainly not going to join the army, get a sword, hurt anyone physically or anything like that.

So, touching on something I said before, there's been a question with the whole soul-making teachings. Really, almost from the beginning, not quite, but almost from the beginning, I somehow felt a duty when I started teaching soul-making and imaginal work. I somehow felt a duty in putting it out there in the Dharma context, and shaking things up, and asking questions, and expanding things. I felt a duty in doing that, a soul duty in doing that.

But quite quickly there came a question, and Catherine and I return to this question quite regularly: Should these teachings be freely available? I'm talking about the whole soul-making Dharma teaching, the imaginal teaching. They're just there on Dharma Seed, literally freely available. Anyone can listen. It's just open on the internet. You don't need to do anything. You just need to click on a button and you can hear all this material.

And is that appropriate? There are a number of reasons to ask: Should they be freely available? Or should there be a whole series of preliminary stages that we demand, require people to go through? Not even just suggest they go through, as we sometimes do, but demand that they go through before they can even listen to any teachings. Qualifications that they need to have to access the teachings and practices like it used to be in, for example, Tibetan Tantric teachings. And it's much less so these days, but still somewhat so. Before you can hear certain teachings, before you have access to the teacher, before you are given any practice instructions whatsoever.

So that's still an ongoing question. I'm not sure. I don't know. But I'm just sharing that this is a question that has been around for a while now and that we take very seriously as a real ongoing inquiry.

And, you know, historically, the same thing with regard to emptiness teachings. I think I shared this. You look at the old Mahayana texts and they say: don't teach emptiness to someone who's not excited about it, to someone who's not ready for it. We do that these days, certainly I do that, but I can see the wisdom in that teaching. What a difficulty it is when the person is not ready, when they're not excited, and when they jump to all kinds of conclusions just from hearing the emptiness teachings. I'm not even talking about ethics teachings, I'm talking about emptiness teachings.

And one of the things they jump to – this is what I shared a couple of times in this series of talks – is what does it imply about ethics? They hear about where emptiness might go, and they think, oh, that means I'm not going to care about anything, it means nothing matters, it means I'm not going to care about ethics because ethics must be empty, or blah, blah, blah. And as we said: no, no, no, no, no. Don't start at the end, start at the beginning. And the beginning is just these ideas about the flexibility of ways of looking, and there's this notion of fabrication. Both of them can start as really simple ideas. Papañca is more fabricated than normal consciousness.

Ways of looking, it's like this: simply compare mindfulness to non-mindfulness. Compare a way of looking that has emerged from some metta practice to a regular way of looking, or to when you're feeling grumpy or angry. Just really, really simple. Take it from there.

Take these two concepts, these strands of inquiry—ways of looking and fabrication—just take them for a ride and eventually see what they imply about ethics. In this way of approaching it, as we've said several times, the ethics is woven in from the beginning. You can't not see it. It's unavoidable. It's inextricably woven in.

In this way of approaching emptiness, there's never a division, never a separation between so-called relative and absolute—relative truth and absolute truth. Mahayana and Vajrayana teachings speak of the union of the two truths: conventional relative truth and ultimate truth. In this way of practicing emptiness, it's entirely obvious, as I said—inescapable, central at every level of the exploration of emptiness using this approach of ways of looking and fabrication.

So there's never any danger from the insights that come from this approach. There's never any danger of choosing the absolute over the relative, so to speak, or trying to justify some behavior, action, or speech through an appeal to the deeper truth of the absolute, of emptiness, or oneness.

If we approach emptiness in other ways or have different understandings of emptiness—that everything exists in the mind or that all is one—then danger can creep in. If everything is one, then no problem: it doesn't matter what we talked about before. It doesn't matter if this person dies or that person is miserable or if a whole ecosystem disappears—it's all one. You can't take away anything from the one. The one is infinitely one, no matter what disappears. Or if it's all in the mind, it's not a real thing in that sense.

So there are issues around emptiness teachings, but I think this way of teaching it has a really good safeguard, because the ethics is integrated from the beginning.

But again, just to say: these are questions, and they are questions with some history, if we look at the relationship of Buddhism and Buddhist teachers to teaching emptiness. You see this even in Prajnaparamita texts—core Buddhist texts—but certainly in many other texts. I'm pretty sure it's there with emptiness.

Now we have the same kinds of questions regarding who to teach soul-making dharma to. Should this material just be freely available, with all the instructions and examples and dharma ideas and philosophy? Should it just be freely available? I don't know. At the moment it is, but as I said, it's an ongoing question. It's something we take very seriously.

There's much in process now, and much that we're debating and thinking about as well. So I wanted to share this—as I said at the beginning, not conclusive remarks in conclusion, but more open-ended remarks, questions, and in a way, preliminary ones.

I hope that's in some way helpful. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 234

Practising with Death and Dying

Rob Burbea · 2h35

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines how we might approach death and dying through the lens of soul-making practice, moving beyond the typical cultural frameworks of impermanence, eternalism, or nihilism. Drawing from his own experience with terminal cancer, he explores how emptiness practice—particularly the realization of the unfabricated and the emptiness of time—can radically transform our relationship with death. Burbea introduces a sophisticated understanding of human relationships as multi-dimensional, involving both human-to-human and imaginal levels of connection that persist beyond physical death. Through a detailed account of a friend's journey with his diagnosis, he demonstrates how the question "Can this become soul-making?" can transform grief and loss into imaginal encounters of extraordinary beauty. The talk reveals how death itself can become image—not as metaphysical belief but as lived phenomenological reality—opening dimensions of love, meaning, and sacredness that make death not just bearable but beautiful. This approach offers practitioners tools for meeting death with soul, whether their own or that of loved ones, discovering possibilities for continued relationship and profound transformation of suffering.

So tonight I'd like to offer to share just a few reflections on death and dying.

I suppose in our culture, primarily if people are going to broach the subject of death, there are a few primary or most popular directions through which they approach the subject.

One is, of course, just the fact of impermanence. The fact that we, our lives, like everything else, are impermanent. And that awareness, or the primacy of that awareness, is really spread throughout the culture, I would say. Somewhere I've said before, it seems to me it's the dominant theme in modern poetry, certain modern English poetry. Some way or another have to do with the poignancy of impermanence, the tragedy of temporal finitude, the ending of things, the fragility of things, the loss, the poignancy and heartache of separation and loss and the need to acknowledge that. This is part of life. This is what we will meet. This is what we will face. Our own and others' death. Of course, the cherry blossoms falling from the trees.

So there is, in the dominance of that theme in a lot of modern English language poetry, a lot wrapped up there. There's a sort of gentle encouragement to open to it, but there's also basically a whole metaphysical stance about what's important, about what's real, about what's perhaps the only thing that's really real, about what it means to live life truly, openly, with an open heart, with open eyes. Of course, that's huge. Can we open the heart to that? Can we bear that poignancy, loss, separation from those we love?

Sometimes, whether it's in poetry or whether it's in the Dharma, this emphasis on impermanence can have a whole other level which is really a metaphysical level and a metaphysical stance and assumption of what the Buddha would call nihilism, what the Buddha would call annihilationism, and criticize very strongly, together with its opposite pole of eternalism, criticizing both very strongly as extreme views to be rejected and avoided. The idea that everything ends in death, that we disappear in death, that there's nothing left. It's a contrasting paired view that the soul just goes on forever, lasts forever in time.

But often, nowadays, even in the Dharma, there is this kind of undergirding in the drawing attention to the impermanence and the poignancy of loss and separation. It's undergirded, again, either explicitly or implicitly by a whole metaphysic, and a whole metaphysical assumption and position that's taken as truth, which is basically what the Buddha called nihilism, annihilationism. Then that's the end. There's a complete erasing of our existence. You can say, yes, well, the atoms that make up our body will be recycled, and whatever actions and speech we've done will somehow ripple out onwards in time. But basically there's a soil underneath there, a whole layer of sediment of nihilism.

But anyway, impermanence, one way or another, or in both ways, is one of the main, most popular, understandably, directions with which to open up and approach the conversation about death.

Another, much more in the wider culture and less in the Dharma culture, of course, is a kind of eternalism. So rooted in teachings about heaven and hell and existing forever in heaven and hell, maybe with some intermediate or rather provisional stopping over places like purgatory, where you get purified before going to heaven, where you'll stay forever or you'll stay forever in hell. And that's a kind of eternalism.

Not so popular these days in widespread culture, but still I think quite popular is the notion and belief in some kind of afterlife which lasts forever. And what has become fairly widespread, quite widespread, is that in this afterlife, which lasts forever, there is a reunion with one's family. And so, again, just tracing that historically, its beginnings can be traced in the 18th and 19th century. Someone called Samuel Lewis wrote a picture of life in Virginia in the USA at the time of Jefferson, Thomas Jefferson. And this was one of the things that was beginning to emerge then. So less this idea of heaven and hell, and more emerging this idea of an afterlife that the hell bit was dropped.

So the worst of all possible fates, hell, burning in hell forever, that was sort of shorn off things. And what was left was, for many people, this idea that after death we are reunited with our loved ones, with family. And this is still very popular. Of course, there are probably quite a few people for whom that very idea of being reunited with one's family forever is exactly a version of hell. It's all dependent, of course, but just tracing ideas is an idea of an afterlife, immortality somewhere. That's part of the again quite common themes or tropes or approaches to the question of death.

And then, of course, a third one in Buddhist circles would be reincarnation or more usually rebirth in Buddhist circles. And I've said this before, in the Pali canon view, rebirth, the whole teaching of rebirth was mostly terrifying. The idea of just literally endless, forever in time, just being reborn, getting ill, dying again, going through all the misery of people around, people you love dying, and just repeating that over and over again, maybe in more or less favorable rebirths, and a lot of the levels of rebirth, pretty miserable. Pretty miserable, not the level of comfort and ease and medical security that we have these days for the most part in the West.

So the whole teachings about samsara and endless rebirth was essentially terrifying. If you were really, really lucky, or rather if you had played your cards right, which you didn't actually know whether you had done in the past, somewhere in my infinite number of past lives, I may have been a really devoted meditator and exceptionally altruistic and maybe at some point that will earn me a rebirth in a high heaven for a while until I die from there and then I'm on the roulette wheel again.

So the whole teaching of samsara and rebirth in that sense was actually terrifying.

Nowadays, most Western Buddhists—and let's acknowledge it's a certain demographic even within Western society—are accustomed to relatively comfortable lives and security regarding illness. Even when we do fall ill, there's generally good care available. So the whole idea of rebirth carries a completely different flavor: "Oh great, we get another chance," or "It goes on for more," or "I wonder what I'll be next time," or "Maybe we'll meet again."

This gives rebirth quite a different tenor than it probably had in Pali Canon Buddhism when the Buddha was urgently teaching: get off that wheel, end rebirth. Can you not see this infinite roulette wheel—round and round and round—birth and misery and death, birth and loss and death, birth and brief happiness and death and illness and sickness and old age and infirmity and loss and separation? Get off the wheel. Really staring at that infinite repetition was just horrifying.

So it carries quite a different tone and flavor in the modern Western notion among both Buddhists and non-Buddhists. This would be another typical approach to the question of death, certainly within Buddhist teachings, but I don't want to approach it from any of those angles tonight.

There's another possible approach—some of you will be familiar with ideas and recent discoveries in quantum physics. I've talked about this in another recent talk, though I can't recall which one. There's something called quantum entanglement. When two subatomic particles, perhaps two photons, become entangled, they're essentially connected to each other. If one has a certain quality—let's call it spin, an "up spin"—then the other will have a "down spin." They're entangled in that way.

But the fuller implication of entanglement is this: when something happens to one particle, it also affects what happens to its entangled partner instantaneously, even over massive distances. It's not that one partner photon signals the other—it simply happens instantaneously.

This idea emerged when Einstein uncovered it as an implication of quantum theory and declared it ridiculous. Two things troubled him: first, this seemed to involve instantaneous communication over vast distances—information appearing to travel faster than the speed of light, which was axiomatically impossible according to his theories. Second, and wrapped up with this, it meant that the object—the photon—doesn't exist as having this spin or that spin, this property or that property, until we observe it.

So there are two implications: first, that a subatomic particle's "thingness" is not defined before we observe it. It's not just that we don't know what it is while it remains a defined thing—it's actually not a defined thing. It's fuzzy, indeterminate, indefinite. It's not a thing as we call a thing. It's not a real thing. And second, there's this possibility of instantaneous connection across potentially billions of miles, light years and light years.

Einstein pointed this out, and Niels Bohr said, "Yes, that's actually right. We're going to call that quantum entanglement. That is a prediction of the theory." Einstein replied, "Well, that's ridiculous," for both reasons I've just explained.

This sparked a debate. Einstein, together with two other physicists, Podolsky and Rosen, wrote a paper in the 1930s with a very clever argument suggesting this was actually the downfall of quantum physics. It proved, they argued, that things could not be fuzzy before observation, could not be dependent on the observer or the way of looking. Things are things, independent of the way of looking.

It was a brilliant paper, but there was little anyone could do with it because they proposed an experiment to decide the matter. Later, an Irish physicist named David Bell —also very suspicious of this quantum idea that fundamentally, things don't exist before they are observed—proposed the actual experiment.

This notion was utterly ridiculous and deeply anathema to Einstein, Podolsky, Rosen, and especially to David Bell. He remained profoundly critical of this fundamental premise, insisting that "there's something rotten at the base of quantum physics."

Then, beginning in the 1970s and continuing into the early 1980s, a series of groundbreaking experiments emerged. Building upon Bell's theorem—a brilliant piece of theoretical work that proposed a way to test these quantum mysteries—researchers finally found a method to put these ideas to experimental scrutiny. A physicist in California, whose name escapes me at the moment, picked up Bell's theoretical framework and conducted experiments that seemed to actually refute both Bell's and Einstein's intuitions. The results suggested that, indeed, things are not definite—there are no independently existing things before observation.

When critics pointed out alternative explanations for these results, researchers refined their approach. Alan Aspect conducted more sophisticated experiments to close potential loopholes. Most recently, scientists performed the same type of experiment using light from two different quasars—ultra-high energy galaxies billions of light years away. This light originated near the birth of the universe, just after the Big Bang. Using such ancient light was meant to eliminate certain variables that might distort the results, though I confess I didn't fully grasp their technical explanation of why this was crucial.

Remarkably, all these experiments have consistently proven the same two fundamental points. First, objects—subatomic particles—are indeed not definite things. They are not things before observation. What they are and how they manifest depends entirely on the kind of observation, the way of looking. They remain fuzzy, indeterminate, indefinite—empty of inherent existence.

Second, these experiments prove that space is not what it seems. Across vast astronomical distances, two particles can be instantaneously connected with no signal traveling between them. The implication is staggering: what we think of and how we sense space is simply not real. Space itself, at some fundamental level, is an illusion.

Time also proves to be not what it seems. Many other results and experiments in both relativity theory and quantum theory have equally profound implications, shattering our sense of the independent existence of space and time. Our common-sense understanding of space and time—the way we typically think about them, what we assume about their nature—is not real. It is illusion. While exactly what's going on remains unclear, it's undeniably clear that our usual perceptions are illusory.

Space is not what it seems. Distance is not what it seems. Things can be intimately, instantaneously connected—entangled with each other across vast distances. Doing something here makes a difference over there. Doing something over there makes a difference over here, precisely because space is not what it seems.

One could certainly take these ideas and explore what they might imply about our notions of death and separation. However, I honestly don't know exactly what this implies regarding death and our experience around death and dying. So I'll leave that inquiry for now.

These are the four most conventional ways of approaching these questions. What I want to explore tonight is a more phenomenological approach—working directly with our experiences and what appears to us. A phenomenological approach involves inquiry and experimentation with our lived experience.

We could indeed pursue this quantum perspective further, because inherited beliefs and ontologies—and we are talking about ontology here—profoundly condition, shape, and limit our experience and what appears to us. Remember, the word "phenomena" means appearance. The ontology of space—does it inherently exist? The ontology of subatomic particles, allegedly the most basic building blocks of matter—what is their fundamental nature?

It may well be that if we begin questioning our inherited beliefs using insights from physics, this might open up our experience with death. Yes, it might. I'm simply not certain what exactly to extract from this beyond the most general notions of interconnectedness.

What I'd rather do tonight—what I'm going to do—is take a more phenomenological approach, starting directly with our experience and approaching inquiry from that foundation.

And especially the phenomenological approach as it pertains to, as it emerges from soul-making dharma and sensing with soul practices and openings.

So what is our experience when we approach death—our death, someone else's death, the whole question of death and dying—with the support of soul-making dharma, and through the modalities of sensing with soul and the kind of openings that sensing with soul brings?

In this phenomenological approach—as much as the phenomenological approach that has to do with ways of looking at emptiness—both of them recognize that ideas, logos, conceptual frameworks are always involved in our experience and that they condition experience. So there's always idea, conception, logos, conceptual framework involved in any experience, and it has a conditioning, shaping, fabricating and limiting influence on our experience. So an intelligent and more powerful phenomenological approach has to acknowledge that, has to recognize that.

And of course, it works the other way too. Our experience, if it's repeated enough and powerful enough, starts to change our ideas, our logos, our conceptions, conceptual framework. That's all part of the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

So this phenomenological approach, as much as it comes out of and is born by the sensing with soul approaches and openings, recognizes that ideas and logos are in our experience inevitably, and that they condition experience. It also recognizes the possibility of our flexibility with our ways of looking and with the ideas that are in the citta, in the way of looking at any moment, and the interest in that flexibility of ways of looking and the conception that's in there at any time, and what that does to experience.

This is really the tack that I want to take tonight.

In terms of ideas, of course, we must acknowledge that we have, or we are the bearers of, a mixed inheritance. As much as we are the bearers of a mixed inheritance with regard to ethics and values, with regard to ontology, with regard to epistemology, we inherit from the culture ideas and perspectives and the actual sense of things. And so with regard to death too, inevitably we also receive a mixed inheritance, a kind of hodgepodge of ideas.

I don't know if I'm making too much of this, but something came up the other day that I noticed when I was first diagnosed with cancer. Going to the hospital and going to the oncology ward for the first time—it was actually after my operation, so a few months after I was diagnosed—there was some talk, or there was a sign, a piece of paper talking about different departments within the oncology department. One phrase really struck me: "the end of life pathway"—the patient is on the end of life pathway.

Even now at the hospice, the hospice nurses talk about "end of life" like it's a phrase. And how little I heard the word "dying" or "death." In fact, I'm not even sure if I ever have heard a doctor or nurse utter those words. "Passing on." I'm not sure if I'm sensing something here. It's potentially a very big deal.

I think I'm sensing something underneath that. Are people—is the medical institution—avoiding those terms? And if it is, what's going on? Is it that life is all there is, so they talk about "end of life"?

"End of life pathways" seemed even more bizarre, almost jarring to me, as if the choice of terminology—I wasn't sure whether it had really come from the hospital administrator's flowchart of how they need to manage all these patients. So they have a flowchart of where different patients go: into chemotherapy, into radiotherapy, or after that doesn't work, then they're on this pathway, and then they're on the end-of-life pathway. Whether that's just a term reflecting more their management solutions than actually an existential position, I don't know.

But there seemed to be this avoidance of the terms "death" and "dying." Is that because life is deemed as all there is, and death is not seen in itself as something—an event, a momentous doorway? Even if it might be a doorway to total non-existence, it's still a doorway. If you just avoid that sense, or that whole notion of it, by using different words—"end of life."

Maybe irrelevant. But as I said, we've undeniably picked up a mixed inheritance, as we do for so many things in our culture. Probably even going back to India at the time of the Buddha, the Buddha had a mixed inheritance, and Tibetans have a mixed inheritance. That's just part of living in a culture that's not totally original or paleolithic.

And we inherit then a mixed bag of beliefs with respect to death—religious beliefs and traditions, even if we're not religious, that comes to us from that stream, but also secular or non-religious beliefs.

I use the word "beliefs" very deliberately when speaking of secular or non-religious positions, because usually these are not positions about death that have been thought through with any great intensity or originality. They are something we inherited from the evolving and emerging secularism of our culture over hundreds of years. And they are beliefs—not knowledges, not logical deductions one has carried out independently, not certainties, and as I said, not even rigorously examined with great questioning or intensity or vitality or originality.

So we have—all of us probably, most of us certainly—this mixed bag of beliefs, some religious in origin, some secular in origin, around death. I think it's important to acknowledge this, to realize what's going on within us, what steers and shapes and colors and limits our sense of things, in this case of death and dying.

Since being ill, I've encountered all kinds of expressions that reveal different attitudes and beliefs around death. Sometimes this mixed bag is apparent in a single utterance. I'm thinking of two people now, both staunchly, even aggressively secular. Both received serious cancer diagnoses, though not necessarily fatal. And both of these firmly secular people—one in his fifties when diagnosed, the other in his seventies—said, "I feel cheated."

How does that work? How can you feel cheated while holding such an aggressive secular position? Who is it you feel cheated by? What is it you feel cheated by? Where does this sense of expectation—to eighty years of life—come from? What's going on in the mixed bag of beliefs and inheritances that allows one to feel cheated while simultaneously espousing a strong secular, atheistic view? It's interesting in itself, these strange bedfellows that make up our view, our beliefs, our sense of things, our responses to something as basic as death.

But there's a second piece here. "I feel cheated" reveals something about one's relationship with existence, one's view of existence. The feeling that one is owed something, that one expects something about the duration of life—how different this is from a sense, a view, an idea but also a soul-sense of life and death as gift. Life, illness, and death as gift from the Divine and to the Divine. How different this is from "I feel cheated"—from the position of being owed something, expecting something and not receiving it—versus life and illness and death as gift from the Divine and to the Divine.

I mean this as a sense. All that I'm talking about in this series of talks, and most of what I discuss in the soul-making Dharma teachings, is really based on experience. For someone outside of this sensibility, who hasn't had experiences that open up the sense of things—the sense of self, of other, of the cosmos, of death, of illness—through imaginal practice, through sensing the soul, this sounds alien and disturbing and alarmingly... well, just alarming. The sense that your death and your illness are a gift from God? How does that work? Your early death, your difficult illness, your painful illness and all that limitation—a gift? What are you talking about? It's an affront, a nonsensical notion.

But for someone who has practiced, this kind of blossoming of sensibility—where the very sense of things, including one's illness, including one's early death, can be there as gift from God, from the Divinity, from the Dharmakaya, and gift to the Dharmakaya—becomes possible. A mystical gift from and to the Divinity, to the Dharmakaya.

Even the word "mystical" is problematic for some people. For some it just means nonsense, something that doesn't make sense, or something to do with mystery. But we're not talking about mystery in the sense of the baffledness—why there is existence at all, why there is a universe, why are there human beings. Behind that sense of mystery lies a kind of bewilderment, as if it's all completely arbitrary. That kind of mystery, that kind of question—"Why is there anything at all? Why does anything exist?"—carries a different quality entirely.

What a mystery. Actually, it's already assuming a kind of purposelessness in the question. It's not really a question—it's already assuming purposelessness and calling it mystery. Just this sort of arbitrary, seemingly arbitrary arbitrariness of the fact of any existence of anything.

But here, mystical and mystery mean having dimensions, having unfathomability, inexhaustibility, beauty—all of that. And how different I feel when cheated, expecting however many years, versus the whole movement of life and death as gift—the gift of life and the gift of death, receiving that gift and somehow giving it as well, giving my life, giving my death. That being a very different kind of gift, a mystical gift.

So what I really want to go into tonight is just a few possibilities—many possibilities—of what can make death okay. And even that sounds like a bit of a stupid question, because what do I mean by okay? I don't just mean a kind of shrugging: "Oh well, that's death, that's just life, right? Life goes with death—that's the deal." I certainly don't mean, or I mean much more than that.

I mean also much more—this should already be clear—than just bearing the tragedy of loss. It's not just okay because I can bear our tragic existential situation, can bear the poignancy of it, can bear the fragility of life, can bear even my personal losses and the grief that comes with that in my heart. So yes, that's part of it—can I bear it? Can I hold that? But what can open the whole question up more, the whole issue, the whole panorama, the whole horizon of death up more, without reverting to beliefs in rebirth or eternal afterlife?

This is what I want to offer tonight—a few things, among many possibilities, that may be ways of opening things up, opening the sense of things up.

Now, of course, death is difficult when it's our death we're contemplating. Usually that's a difficult thing. Sometimes not, for different reasons, but that may have nothing to do with deep insight and deep opening. Death is difficult when it's ours, generally speaking, and of course it's also difficult when it's someone else's, when we love someone and there's the looming—death is looming, death is coming as the imminence of our loss. So it's difficult in both those directions, and I want to say a little bit about both.

So, what makes death okay? Clearly—well, it should be clear to most people—accumulating a lot of money is not going to make death okay. Accumulating a lot of pleasant experiences or having more pleasant than unpleasant experiences is also not going to make death okay.

Sometimes, what's more common is people accumulating experiences to make death more okay—and again, it might not be so conscious or articulated, or it might be. We have this idea of the bucket list—the things I want to do before I die, the experiences I want to accumulate. Or even a sense of someone perhaps being told they have a terminal diagnosis, and thinking, "Oh, well, I've had a lot of really good things, I've done a lot of really interesting things, I've traveled here"—whatever it is. I've accumulated experiences. So for some people, that's something they look to to make death more okay. And it might be that works a little bit for some people to some extent.

It might also be—and what I've noticed is this sort of: "Oh, well, I've had a long life," or "They've had a long life," or at least it's as long as or longer than the average length of life. And if it's less than the average, then potentially we can feel cheated. But if it's longer than the average, then there's some okayness there. And again, that may help a little bit with some perspectives.

You can see how in modern culture we have very little wiggle room to really open up the sense of death and how we might feel about it, think about it, and die.

And of course, practicing, noticing impermanence, reflecting on impermanence, letting the fact of the impermanence of all things impress upon you—a lifetime of doing that will also help with regard to death. This is very often stressed in some dharma, in insight dharma as well, as the central reflection that's stressed and practiced. And of course that may help. It may well help. It should help. But it may also be quite limited—just repeated reflection on impermanence, repeated impression of the fact of the impermanence of all things. It may also be relatively limited what that can do in terms of how we actually end up feeling about our death or the death of a loved one. So definitely helpful, but may also be limited.

And then sometimes you get the other view, typical in some streams of dharma: there's no self, really. There's no self that dies. There's just a process of the aggregates.

And so, because there's no self, there's nothing really to fear in death, because what the self really is, is just this process of aggregates in time, the physical and mental aggregates.

I've said before that to have this as the only view of self and existence is—well, I don't know what the word for it is—narrow, certainly, but kind of silly, really. It's not adequate for our psychology, it's not adequate for life, it's not adequate for death, it's not adequate for relationship, which I'll come back to. It's not phenomenologically adequate.

As a temporary mode of relative perspective that can be used as a provisional truth and provisional way of looking, it can be helpful at times on the way to something deeper, for sure. But as a primary way of orienting to the dukkha and the pain of death? Not so sure.

If you ask me—and I have actually shared this elsewhere, written a little bit about it—what is it for me that makes my death okay as I'm approaching it? Much more okay. Like a whole different level of okay, so the word "okay" doesn't really even do it. What is it that opens out the whole sense of death and brings a level of beauty and peace there?

I've shared this with you before, but I think I can divide them into perhaps four. One is emptiness practice and understanding. By which I do not mean that limited view of the self as just the process of aggregates in time. I mean something way beyond that. I mean a practice and understanding that opens to the unfabricated, the complete transcendent beyond, the deathless—no subject, no object, no time, no world, no this, no that, beyond all perception.

That sense of that realm or dimension, as the Buddha sometimes called it, does something. The timelessness of that does something. Sometimes there's a sense of that being just there, as a holy other, transcendent other, and sometimes as shining through existence, through this existence, this world of temporality and thingness and subjects and objects and selves. But it does something, either way, both ways.

Similarly, seeing the emptiness of time—the emptiness of past, future, and present. The complete emptiness of time. The emptiness of any present moment. There's something about that. It would have to be, of course. Death is connected intimately, obviously, with notions of time, senses of time. You see the emptiness of time, and that does something that opens up the sense of death.

And of course, as I've talked about recently and before, even going beyond the unfabricated, where we're open to appearances that are felt and sensed and known as empty, magical and divine. I talked about this earlier in the series somewhere or other. Empty, magical and divine appearances. And in that, with that, shot through all that—in the magic, the emptiness and the divinity—is a sacredness. That sacredness, that sense of sacredness that comes right out of emptiness practice, makes a huge difference. There's so much power in that in relation to death.

The Buddha said, with a few different examples, "One moment of knowing that is worth a hundred years of"—and he gives a lot of examples—"pain-free life, a hundred years of knowing," I think he says even knowing impermanence. One moment of knowing that, and the whole sense of existence... something happens. It's turned inside out. That's not even the right word. But in that, the whole relationship with death is different, is opened out, is pacified and made beautiful.

So for me, that's one real way or direction or approach which really changes the relationship with death, makes it profoundly okay.

A second is related to what I said earlier about this sense of gift—at all different levels, receiving gifts or having received gifts, gifts showered on oneself, and also given gifts. At every level, I can see in my life I've been given a lot of gifts. I never felt growing up, despite all the craziness and difficulty and dysfunction, to use an out-of-date word, in our family and upbringing and all the intensity and intense sort of craziness there—I never felt that I would go hungry or go without a roof over my head. Just that level of gift, and the gift of education, and so many gifts.

At that level, but also the gift of life itself, and the gift of what's given particularly to me, and particularly to you. Your particular gifts. And wrapped up in my particular gifts and your particular gifts is your particular dukkha.

They go together, often. Certainly any gift I'm given brings—any deep gift I'm given seems to bring with it its kind of concomitant accompanying dukkha that's wrapped up in it. And I can see that I've been given certain gifts in this life and certain abilities and capacities and whatever you want to say.

So that's all these senses of gift and the sense of giving, of having given, that that has been important. It's been so important to me to give. Again, lots of different levels—just to practice generosity, but to give of my gifts and to give to the world and to give to the future, and to give of the beauty I sense, the beauties I sense, to pass that on, to communicate, to let something come through, to share that.

So all these different levels and what I talked about—when I think it was in the talk on pain and that kind of thing—this sense of gift, received and given. That sense of existence, and even, as I said, even the illness and the pain and the dukkha and the early death as being part of what I received, part of what was gift to me, part of somehow that I am sacredly giving back, or in a sacramental way giving back. That whole sense of life also does something to our sense of depth. I think very much, or I feel very much.

And then a third way is the sense of having done, having tried to do one's duty, having tried in one's life—even if one hasn't really understood it or had the words or a conceptual framework that will hold it and carry it, not been able to articulate it, only dimly sensed, or maybe not even sensed at all—that one has tried to do one's duty. One has let oneself and worked so that one's life refracts the daimon, reflects the angels out ahead that call to one, that govern one's life. So this sense too. And one can never succeed in that 100%. I've said that the reflection is never completely perfect. Virtually it's always falling short. But one has tried and let that lead one's life, devoted oneself to that, put that as primary. Even as I said, if one doesn't think in these terms at all, that one can hear something like that and understand, yes, I can see that I've done that. I've tried to do that.

And fourthly, connected to the whole thing we were talking about with the ethics talks in this series, that one has lived in a way that's tried to be—one has aspired to living a really worthwhile life, a life that is worth living, a beautiful life. One has aspired towards the good, with a capital G, towards what really matters, a sense of what really matters. Taking the trouble to find out what that is for oneself and to get one's bearings even in times of confusion and being inundated with other pushes and pulls and indoctrinations and advertisements and peer pressure and all kinds of things, risks and threats—that one has lived in that direction, one has tried to live as much as possible in that direction.

So those four things: from the emptiness in that much fuller sense, the sense of gift received and given at all those different levels and all those different ways, the trying to discern and to do one's duty—duty is refracting the daimon—and the attempt to live what really constitutes a worthwhile life, and sense of that, a beautiful life, a really good life, with a capital G. So for me, those are some of the principal things that really make a difference.

And of course, all of those are actually connected, those four things, kind of directions or approaches. Especially they're connected through, of course, soul-making practice and the sensing of soul sensibility—the sense of refracting one's day and undoing one's duty, the sense of life as gift, gifts received and given at all these different levels, the sense of living in the direction of what senses a really beautiful life and the emptiness of it all, the very neither real nor not real nature of all of that. All of that comes together and is intimately woven together in soul-making practice and sensing with soul sensibilities.

Actually, just to add something to that list—because most of what's in that list of four things, four supports or openings that transform the relationship with death, most of what's in there are kind of currents and efforts and movements and openings over a lifetime or over years really, directions. So just to add to that, something which I've already shared in another talk, I think it was in the talk on diet practice, soul-making diet practice, I think it was there, it doesn't really matter, but there is the possibility of being so touched by a soul-making experience, having an opening in imaginal practice or sensing with soul, where one's profoundly moved by a sense of grace, a sense of eternality, a sense of participating in something so unfathomably beautiful and divine.

When we use it as one of the elements of the imaginal—participation—we're really meaning something much more, much more profound than what its usual meaning points to, like participate in this or that. Something almost impossible to articulate: mystery, profundity and sacredness in the sense of that participation, that just having those few minutes of experience transforms the relationship with existence and with death.

So it could be in diet practice or in a group soul-making practice, or it could just be solo with so-called intrapsychic image, or it could be sensing with soul, some experience perhaps in nature where there's the sensing with soul and the soul-making imaginal perception. And one feels as if so much grace bestowed, wonder, the privilege, the profound sacred privilege of opening to something so divine, to the divine in that way, we're just being touched by that, having that grace come, participating that way, having that sense of privilege—it changes the sense of death because of the grace, because of the privilege of participation, because of the opening to eternality, to timelessness.

And that kind of experience is very different than what I was talking about earlier at the start of the talk, trying to accumulate experiences. Because the attitude, the impulse to accumulate experience tends to be restricted to one dimension. It tends to be flat. And therefore it needs more and more experiences. It always needs more experiences because the eros there is limited to one dimensionality. Because it's not, for some reason—either because of the limited logos or for some other reason—not allowed to open up more dimensions, to open to more dimensions. It cannot penetrate and open two-dimensionality. So the pothos in the eros, that which wants more in the eros, cannot go, so to speak, deeper into other dimensions, other aspects, facets of what it wants and what it loves. It has to go, so to speak, horizontally on the same level for more and more experiences. Now I've been there, my travels, I have to go there.

No, I've been there, I have to go somewhere else. More travel, been here, been there, flown here, flown there, seen this, seen that, so to speak. We've explained this in Ecology of Love, I think, Path of the Imaginal, plenty of other places.

When the eros is allowed to open up the dimensionality, open up the logos, open up the psyche—when there's that really profound experience of an opening to some soul-making experience of the imaginal, sensing the soul—then it has, in contrast to this kind of accumulation of experience, such a humility in it. There's a real humility in it, partly because of the sense of grace, of inexplicable gift.

And with it there's also a sense of: this is enough. This is enough. This gift is enough. That glimpse, those couple of minutes, that opening to something, that sense of deep participation, that sense of the privilege of that opening and that bestowal of grace is enough. That gift was enough, those two minutes. And that makes a difference in relation to death—this humility and a sense that this is enough that comes with the grace.

And there is a sense, you know, because our experience fades, of course—experiences are impermanent. Experience fades, but somewhere in our being, even when that sense of things and that experience feels inaccessible, it's not apparent, we can still be left with: I know something. Because I've tasted it, I've experienced it, I know something, even when it's not, at some later time, apparent or accessible.

And this knowing in the being—I know something about existence, I know something about human being, I know something about life—that something that I know, even if I can't quite articulate it, I can't really encapsulate it in words, it does something in relation to, it does something to my relationship with death. It's enough. It's enough. And it makes death much more okay.

So there's also that, which I would say is really important. There's certainly the importance of the currents in one's life, these longer trends and longer strivings and longer devotions, the sense of the whole life with all its beauties and all its difficulties and challenges and travails and tragedies, all of that as gift received, and all the gifts given at so many levels of one's life. These are longer-term devotional trends in the sense of trying to do one's duty, trying to discern and do one's duty, trying to seek out and sense what is the life that's beautiful, that's worthwhile, that's really good. And even the journey into the experience of emptiness—all this is longer-term devotions and trends.

But I just want to add to that: there's also the possibility, I think a very important possibility, of just these openings, sometimes, of soul-making practice that are so profound and so imbued with grace and beauty, and a sense of the privilege of participation—whatever we want to call it—in the divinity of things at such a deep level, that those moments—not so much longer-term trends, but moments or, you know, minutes or whatever, sometimes hours, but sometimes they're just really a few minutes—those experiences potentially can make a huge difference in our relationship with death. It's enough. It's enough. I've had that, and just those two minutes are worth more...

So that's just a little bit. I want to come back later on and share someone else's experience or approach to their own death. There's so much to say—we can only say a little bit.

But of course, like I said, sometimes it's another person's death, someone whose death is very difficult for us. And sometimes we encounter people who... What language could we use here? We feel they've lived their image. They've refracted their daemon. To use that language, we feel that. They've lived their image, they've refracted their daemon. They lived in a way that echoes and mirrors and does the duty of their daemon, of their image, of their—again if we use this language—their individual idea, the idea with a capital I in the ideal realm, individual form, their ideal person. It's a different language.

And when we have that feeling about someone, we are touched deeply by them and their life, and touched by that whole—what we feel we are sensing there and witnessing—because we sense that the divine and the deep soul is coming through that person. I'm thinking of someone like John Coltrane, for me. Early death. But somehow just did what he was here to do so devotedly, so beautifully, really living his image, doing the duty of his daemon.

And it touches profoundly. We have the sense something is going on here that has to do with—whatever your language—divinity, God, deep soul. And the soul loves that. The soul loves seeing that, witnessing that, sensing that. And of course, when we have that sense about someone else, when they die, naturally the grief then is deep for the very same reason. The soul loves that. There's so much beauty there. So much being touched by the divine. So much sense of divinity coming through. When they die, the grief will be deep for just that reason.

But in a way, you know, we have them still too. We have them still after death because in a way they are eternal. Their image has impressed itself on us.

So they can be an image for us, with all the elements of the imaginal, including the eternality and the timelessness. But they're already image. And that image lives on with eternality, with timelessness. So we have them. Yes, there's the loss. Of course there's the loss. And of course there's the grief. But somehow we still have them.

In Bach's St. Matthew Passion, there's a really gorgeous aria. I think it's sung by the baritone or bass, but the character is, I think, Joseph of Arimathea. Some of you will know from the Gospel stories. He agreed to bury Jesus, or he volunteered to bury Jesus after the crucifixion. And the lyrics of this aria are in German, which in slightly archaic English translates as, "Make thee clean my heart, I will bury Jesus." And that's the only lyric of the whole aria. "Make thee clean my heart, make yourself pure my heart, I will bury Jesus."

Again, I know people have different histories with all this, but for me, there's just so much love and soul, certainly in the music, but also in that very sentiment: "Make me clean my heart, I will bury Jesus." What does it mean to bury, in this case, to bury Jesus, bury someone we love, bury someone whom we feel lived their image, through whom the divine came? What does that mean? Bury, to bury Jesus, to bury this person in my heart, in my soul. This is a real possibility for us, that we can do that. Bury this person in the heart, in the soul, really, so that they somehow live in me, live for me, as image, as icon.

So yes, all the grief - I really don't want to say that this erases the grief, that it'll just be no problem - but there's a whole other possibility that can open up. And even if we take that lyric there: "Make thee clean my heart, I will bury Jesus." What does "make me clean" mean? In soul-making dharma, "make yourself clean" means purity, purify. And what does that mean? It means, in soul-making dharma terms, fullness of intention. That's a purification of our intentions. It means all the sensitivity of the poise of sensing the soul and even the preparation for sensing the soul. It means the elements of the imaginal: the humility, the reverence, the grace, the participation, the autonomy also of self and other, the beauty, the eros. This is all part of "make me clean" - all the elements, but particularly fullness of intention, particularly humility, particularly sensitivity, particularly the imaginal middle way.

There's also purification when that starts to either reify or go the other end where images are dismissed. Then we don't have the container for the real power of the imaginal rippling out and opening up more and more horizons. Something will get limited, stuck rigid, like the view of reality is stuck in either realism or kind of dismissive nihilism.

So we do love deeply when we see or sense or when our sense of someone is that they have lived their image, refracted their daimon. It touches us deeply, and then because of that, yes, there's a deep grief, and we don't really want to get rid of it - we want that grief. But at the same time as the grief, alongside it, for the very same reason that there's such deep grief, there is the gift of their impression on us, which has already been made. They've already impressed themselves as image. They've impressed on us. And in that sense, we can bury them, so to speak - keep them, a place for them as image, as icon, in our soul. In our heart.

"Make me clean my heart. I will bury Jesus." I don't know if you can hear all the soul and all the love in there. Again, with the help of soul-making dharma, we can take this and interpret it in different ways that really open it up and open up our sense of life, our sense of death, our sense of, in this case, the death of another.

And it's also the case with all this that, yes, as I said, there will be the grief there, but something is - I don't know what the word is - redeemed? Is that not quite the right word? But in other words, it's not just loss. There's gift here, even in the death. The death is gift. The death is loss and therefore grievable, of course, and grieved, of course. But even what seems like tragic - so Jesus' death, very early death, or John Coltrane's death, very early death - what seems tragic can then have, as well as the grief, as well as the tragedy, this whole other dimension.

Clement of Alexandria, one of the early Christian theologians, understood providence—the way the divine, or translated into Buddhist language, the way the Dharmakaya takes care of us—in a profound way. For him, providence does not prevent evil or tragedy from happening. It does not prevent the early deaths of those we love, or our own premature death. Rather, it seeks to overrule such events for an ultimately good end.

We could hear this as merely doctrine, as something we're asked to believe, as a certain philosophical view. But with soul-making dharma practice—actual practice—we can open up an authentic sense of this truth. This becomes our lived experience.

We don't push away the grief or close the heart, refusing to feel the pain. It doesn't become a superficial "everything's fine" attitude, dismissing difficulty with platitudes about impermanence or getting lost in shiny images that bypass the real hurt. With all the grief present and honored, there is somehow, in the middle of it, in the midst of the difficulty, with the difficulty, around the difficulty, this sense that providence is operating. Somehow this is perfect.

I wrote in my blog once about having a sense that my illness and even my early death is perfect. Someone responded that they really didn't like this statement. I can't remember their exact reasons, but it might have stemmed from certain religious conditioning. The way they were hearing it was as dogma or philosophy—"everything is perfect, oh everything is perfect." This operates at a much more superficial level. You can hear the brittleness in such thinking, the attempt to view everything as perfect as mere mental overlay. It's hollow.

You can tell when it's brittle—it has that brittle feeling. Sometimes it's not brittle but carries a quality of delusion, as if the person simply isn't in touch with dukkha, grief, tragedy, loss, or pain.

I'm not talking about philosophy here. I'm not speaking of religious dogma or views in the limiting sense of that word. I'm talking about soul-making practice, sensing with soul. In sharing about my illness, I was speaking from sensing my condition and prognosis with soul—the difficulty, the physical dukkha, the full knowledge of likely dying early, soon, within a couple of years. Sensing all of this with soul.

Out of the very practice itself—not from some cheap idea or religious teaching or philosophy—but from the practice comes what I can only call a mystical sense that everything is perfect. Not in a way that eliminates dukkha or disconnects us from suffering, but including it all.

This sense of perfection that emerges from practice, like seeing the emptiness of things, should not lead to inaction. If the fruit is "oh, everything's perfect, so I don't need to worry about social injustice, racial injustice, environmental injustice," then something is wrong. Something is off. This indicates the understanding is coming more from undigested ideas rather than from practice itself.

This kind of sense of the perfection of things, this sense of mysterious providence working through tragedy, placing it within a bigger arc, a bigger trajectory, a bigger picture, a bigger unfolding—when it comes from practice, it is not brittle. It includes dukkha very much, includes the softness and sensitivity of heart, the openness of heart, and does not lead to inaction or indifference.

I'm really talking about a sense of things, a view of things, that emerges from practice rather than easy ideas. Most of what I've been sharing, certainly in this series and others, needs to be approached through practice rather than simply hearing without practicing. Just listening and picking up ideas or hearing about far-out sounding experiences will only cause problems or have no effect whatsoever. But when there's really that soil of practice being turned, then you have a very different understanding of what we're exploring here.

Of course, in the examples I gave—Jesus, John Coltrane, and others—these are clearly special people who give us a sense that something profound is happening. They're really living that image, really allowing the divine to come through, whatever language we use.

But this opening up, this redemption of our sense of a loved one's death, is not only for special people. It happens, it can happen, it should happen actually, in any relationship we have—in any deep relationship.

Because in deep relationship, the other becomes image for us. Deep human relationship has imaginal dimensions. I've spoken about this before, and it relates to what I discussed in the Four Parables of Stone and Light series when we explored soul-making diet practice.

So this is part of the phenomenology—in other words, part of the actual experience—of any deep human relationship, any time we really love or are truly devoted to a relationship.

If we can explain it a certain way, perhaps you can see it visually in your mind. We have what's agreed upon in contemporary society—one level of the relationship. There's this human being and that human being. The relationship happens in time. If I know this person long enough, there are the acts between us, the things we've done and the interactions we've had in the past—temporal, but in the past. I still have access to at least some of them through memory. And in an ongoing relationship, there are new actions and interactions, dialogue and all that.

So you have one level—the agreed-upon level of what human relationship is. It happens in time between two human beings who are conceived of as flat, not dimensional, other than being dimensional in the non-soul-making ways we consider human beings dimensional these days, conventionally in the culture.

You can visualize this as a diagram: human and human, with two lines between them—old actions and new actions. All of that unfolds on a temporal level, in time.

But if, in your mental diagram, above each of those humans—human A and human B, in whatever relationship they have—there's the image. Let's keep it singular for now. There's an image of human A and an image of human B. Human A has a sense of their own image, their own daemon—another dimension of their being. But human B also has a sense of their daemon. And each human has a sense of the other's daemon, so to speak.

In soul-making practice, you can play with this, but really what I'm pointing to is what's there anyway in human relationship. So you have a diagram with human A and human B, and then what we'll call image A and image B above them, corresponding to human A and human B.

That level of the image—someone living their image—is a timeless level. The level in time is new and old actions, interactions. But you actually have relationships, or strands and directions of relationships, between every corner here. You have two kinds of strands from the conventionally human to conventionally human level—the new and old interactions make two. You have human A's interaction with their own image, and human A's interaction with human B's image. Human B's interaction with human A's image. And then the images' interaction with each other.

All of this becomes much more discriminated and discrete and apparent when you really explore soul-making practice, as I unpacked in that long talk on soul-making practice in the Four Parables series. But this is a way of thinking of what's actually going on. It becomes more apparent in formal soul-making practice, but I would say it's there in any deep human relationship where there's love and devotion to each other—all these levels and all these possible connections between different levels are going on.

Some people who think this way—they're quite rare these days—use the terms image and analogue. There's the image level, or we could say the daemon level, the angel level of a human being. And then what we've called the human level is called the analogue. The terms don't really matter. We could say image and analogue—image is the timeless, and interactions between the analogue level happen in time. Image to analogue level happens sort of between the timeless and time.

Why is this important? Because, as I said, I think this is what goes on in human relationships anyway. Usually, in our culture's language, the word image is considered a secondary phenomenon. We say "an image of this or that," and this or that is primary. So it's an image of a tree—it's not the real tree.

The real tree is the real thing, and the image of the tree is a secondary thing. It represents something more fundamental or something real.

But as we were talking about just yesterday, I think Plato had that whole ontology reversed—the hierarchy reversed—so that the ideal realm was considered by Plato more real. And this world was a representation, an attempt at reflecting, refracting that more ideal world.

So I think about the image as primary, and the analog—or what we call the human—as secondary. Words are tricky here, but also ontologies are really important here.

Now for what I want to say, actually, we could have either ontology. We could have the image level as primary, and the analog, or human, level as secondary, or we could reverse that and consider the human primary and the image secondary. In a way, it doesn't make much difference, but I do think in the overall scope of soul-making dharma practice, there will come a time inevitably where, at times, the sense of that hierarchy gets reversed. You can play with that, or you can even deliberately play with entertaining such an idea, such a notion, or it would just get reversed anyway in the natural unfolding of soul-making practice for a time.

And again, it's then not clung to as "this is the truth, this is the way things are, this is the correct conceptual framework." It becomes part of a flexibility, a range of flexible conceptual frameworks that we can work with.

One of my favorite composers—I think he's a great composer—Peter Maxwell Davies, died just a few years ago, has what I think is a really stunning, stunningly beautiful, very complex but stunningly beautiful piece called "Image, Reflection, Shadow." I think it's for quintet or sextet. And "image, reflection, shadow"—reading his liner notes, what he meant by that came to him seeing, and somehow it's sort of played out in the music, a seagull over sunlit water by the sea where he lived. He used to live on one of the islands off Scotland and composed a lot of music there, which really has a lot of the atmosphere of the sea and the space and the magic up there.

Anyway, "Image, Reflection, Shadow" was this seagull flying low over the sea, and the sun was out, so it was both reflected in the water—the image of the bird, there was a reflection in the water, there was the image of the bird for his eyes, and there was the reflection in the water, and there was the shadow of the seagull on the water. And so somehow that became a sort of paradigm for the music.

But maybe these words are better: image, reflection, shadow. So reflection or refraction may be a better word than analog for some of us. Image—we are the reflection or refraction, potentially, of an image. And shadow meaning, with that connotation of relative darkness, that even our distortions are somehow poor and blocked vestiges or echoes of an original emanation.

A shadow is that. It's a vestige, it's what's remaining of light that's blocked by something, partially blocked by something, but it's also an echo of light, because it's light reflected off from other places where that thing is not in the way. But even our—we've talked about this before—even our mistakes and our neuroses and our malfunctions can potentially be seen as related to that original emanation from the image.

So we get the reflection or refraction when we're more true to that image. But even our messed up stuff can be seen, our distortions as poor and blocked echoes or vestiges of that.

Actually, in fact, image and whatever we're going to call it—refraction or analog—are mutually dependent. They affect each other. It's not so much that it's not entirely or strictly speaking a one-way emanation process from image to reflection, refraction from image to analog, from image to human. We understand as part of the soul-making dharma understanding that they affect each other. There's a mutual dependency there.

And another thing about this idea, before I say what this has got to do with death—in a way I've touched on it, hinted at it, alluded to it—but we could, and I did when I said, "Can you imagine a diagram where images above?" You'd draw the image above the human just to get a sense of all the different lines between the different corners. Of course, we could, I suppose, conceive the relationship between image and analog here in spatial relationship or spatial constellation as like above, below, or below, above, or around, within, or within, around. The image is within the human, or below it comes up from the depths, the dark, rich depths of the earth, or it comes down from the luminous heights of heaven, or whatever.

We could conceive them in spatial terms like that, in any of those spatial terms. But much better, I think, is probably to jettison the idea of a spatial and a temporal location or existence of image or angel or daemon.

I've touched on this before, sometime in the last year or so. This is really, really important. Perhaps the analog is the manifestation in space and time, a partial and refracted manifestation in space and time, of what is non-spatial, non-temporal, what is timeless, the image. So this image has a kind of timeless existence. The angel is neither spatial nor temporal. And the analog is this refraction or reflection into time and into space of what is not spatial and not temporal.

And again, we can say all this—"Okay, that's really metaphysical, far out metaphysical ideas"—but is it not the kind of sense we have of things if we just open up soul-making practice? That at some point, this is the kind of sense we have of things.

And this is there in a germinal way, at least, or a non-articulated, non-discriminated way, in relationships where there is love, and deep relationships, and intimate relationships, and we have that. That's all mixed up, and it's just our culture doesn't have the language or the conceptual framework that supports that kind of articulation or discrimination.

So what I want to ask now is: what happens to this whole constellation of relationship, which means the sense of relationship after one person dies? Because actually, in a way, most of the fabricating constituents of the sense of—let's say the person who dies, for the person who remains alive—most of the fabricating and the creating, discovering constituents remain.

The image of the other, the memory of past interactions, actions, and even potentially new interactions, but mediated by a purely—I could say purely—imaginal consciousness. So of all the kind of strands of connection in our little diagram, it's only the —

And this brings us to a profound question: what happens to this entire constellation of relationship—to the very sense of relationship itself—after one person dies? Because actually, when we examine it carefully, most of the fabricating constituents of the sense of the person who dies, for the person who remains alive, most of the creating and discovering elements actually remain intact.

The image of the other persists. The memory of past interactions and actions continues. Even potentially new interactions remain possible, though now mediated by what we could call purely imaginal consciousness. In our diagram of connection, it's really only the analog-to-analog, human-to-human level of new actions and fresh interactions that seems to have gone after death.

Most of the fabricating, creating, discovering constituents of the sense of the one who has died—what makes our sense of them—is actually still there, remaining after their death. And honestly, I don't know if any of these constituents are really fully separate from any other. I don't think they are.

But as I've been suggesting, if a human person—what we mean by human, what we sense of a human person—is really comprised of what in this scheme I've tried to explain as image and human, or image and analog, then we must ask: does death really change that much? Is it possible that death changes only a small portion of the actuality of human relationships?

The image-to-image connections remain. The human-to-image and image-to-human relationships continue. The memory of human-to-human actions in time persists. All of this remains intact.

I hope I've explained this clearly enough. I probably could have done better, but this is so different from how we usually think, from what we've inherited in terms of our understanding of human being and what we're in relationship with, what constitutes a person. There's no room in our culture for this imaginal level, or for this idea that somehow this person is refracting something timeless, that relationship is multi-stranded and multi-dimensional between two human beings, that a human being is multi-dimensional.

This notion is very unsupported in our culture, so what I'm trying to say might sound completely bizarre, even ridiculous, if you can follow it at all. And I certainly don't mean to suggest that if you just see things this way, there'll be no grief. But it's certainly not the same as saying, "Oh well, they died, but you've got your memories at least." I'm saying much more than that.

Right now, in relationships with the living, if we open our sense of that, if we can sense with soul, with love, then we begin to sense what's actually there, what's already there in our understanding of human being when they're sensed with soul. And what does this do to our sense of death, our sense of loss? It doesn't take grief away, but it offers something that in many ways we prevent ourselves from receiving, from being open to, from having. We are prevented by the culture, by our linguistic and conceptual inheritances.

When someone we love dies, there are still all these different dimensions of relationship present that were there when they were alive too. It's not as if now they die and suddenly they're moving somewhere in some spirit world, and maybe we can communicate with them through a séance. While we're alive, these other dimensions are already there.

When we acknowledge these other dimensions and connections, these different strands of communication, of love, of connection, of seeing, of intercourse while we're alive, we begin to have a different sense of how much we've actually lost when a person dies. Image remains with us. Image communicates with us. We communicate with image. Image communicates with image. Memory becomes image.

Consider this sense of human being, this sense of human personhood. What is it to really be a person? What would it mean not to limit our sense of what a human being is, what a human person is, what our personhood encompasses?

Much of the Dharma involves deconstructing the sense of self, seeing its fabricated nature, stripping it down. And that's immensely valuable. We can explore completely unfabricating the sense of self, or working with less fabricated senses of self, or discovering the most basic sense of self—just the barest sense of a subject, of awareness, the barest sense of an object, and the most basic sense of time, of a present moment. This represents the most basic level of self-fabrication, just this side of the unfabricated.

And then we fabricate, fabricate, fabricate. One way we can fabricate is toward papañca—crazy ideas about ourselves and others and relationships, all reified and tied up in knots. But there's also skillful fabrication. We've talked about soul-making fabrication, the fabrication of soulful image, the imaginal.

I'm uncertain about the language, but we could say that one is a self whenever there is any perception of objects, whenever there's any subject-object relationship, even the barest—just a nothingness and an awareness, subject-object, object-subject. But we are persons only where there is relationship of some complexity, with some sense for us of meaningfulness and depth and dimensionality of our personhood and another's.

This relationship may be with a physically manifesting sentient being, someone alive with us, or an animal. It may be relationship with a divinity, an angel, something purely imaginally manifesting. Or it may be something in nature, supposedly non-sentient. Perhaps the division between self and person isn't quite right linguistically, but the distinction between subject and person might be useful.

We are persons when we are in relationship, when there is relationship of some complexity for us, with some sense of meaningfulness, of depth, of dimensionality of our own personhood and of the other's. Even when there are just the beginnings of that meaningfulness, that depth, that dimensionality—even just the beginnings of what we might call elements of the imaginal—then we're more than subjects; we're persons.

You can use the word "self" for the whole spectrum if you prefer. But both subjects and persons are empty; they're dependently arisen. And as always—and I keep emphasizing this—the fact of emptiness, the fact of their emptiness, the fact of the emptiness of any conception, any sense, any view of subject, self, or person, means that we are actually free to view in this way, because all views are empty.

We're free to view that way, we're free to pick up that view, if we want. And the question is: what does it lead to? What does it open for us? And what does it limit?

As I said, if I love someone, and I think, "Oh, they died or they're dying," and so I'll use my Buddhist history and practice and regard them as a process of the aggregates—it just does not do justice to our relationship, to their personhood, to their life. It certainly doesn't do justice to soul; it's phenomenologically incomplete. What will it lead to if that's my only view? If I'm always trying to, or thinking I should, see the other person as a process of aggregates?

Just going back to teachings we've given for a while, there's the whole teaching about fabrication: there's unfabricating, and there's skillful fabricating and unskillful fabricating. The question is: what does it lead to? All of it's empty. All of it's empty. So we can pick up anywhere on the spectrum and adopt a view. And the question is: what does it open for us? What does it deliver? What does it give us?

I hope you followed this. I probably could have explained it better, but I think it would be very common to think, "Well, okay, that's all a metaphysical theory about what a human being is and about an image and an angel and a level of angels and all this stuff." Is it though? Or again, is it more a phenomenological account? In other words, it's how we experience persons in relation to our person anyway, when there's love, when there's a real depth of connection, when there's a soulfulness in the connection. When we have a sense of a relationship that we're devoted to.

We have been gradually, over the course of history, over recent history, indoctrinated to believe and then to experience in line with a view of what a human being is and what the cosmos is. Some of this we traced in the recent talks on ethics, the image of ethics. It started from metaphysical theories, from philosophies, from theological moves about not having intermediaries and about the elevation of ordinary life and not having hierarchical order of the cosmos, which then got replaced with horizontal order.

All those philosophical, metaphysical and theological moves had repercussions. This has been very sketchily traced through history. So what we feel now as normal and non-metaphysical—we feel like we're just seeing things as they are naturally without any overlay or distortion through metaphysics and philosophy and strange religious notions—actually had its roots in philosophy, metaphysics, theology and religious notions.

It also had its roots in the gradual birth of the modern novel, this view of humanity with emphasis on particularities, on ordinary life. One of the main origins, one of the seeds of the modern novel, was journals written by Puritans. You had this view of very personal, unmediated relationship with God in a non-hierarchical universe.

So all this—we tend to think, "Oh, you've just described some really complex, bizarre metaphysics as some kind of weird idea that you're trying to superimpose on the way things really are." But maybe our sense of the way things really are is actually, first, an indoctrination, an inculcation, an inheritance from something that started there, from metaphysics, theology, philosophy. And second, our sense of the way things are is not actually an accurate report for us of the way things are for us.

Look closer, sense closer when there's love and the relationship is really alive that way. Again, is it not the case that at least the germs of what I'm trying to talk about here are actually already there in the sense we have of things? There's something that we've inherited that just makes us rule that out, or not take that seriously, or not see it even—not sense it, not discriminate, discern, and articulate it, and then in that way give it support.

So we lose someone to death, they die, we're left. And yet it may be that a lot more is possible in terms of the continuing sense of relationship, connection with them than we tend to think. That a lot less of the real whole of what was there in our relationship, what flowed in our relationship—a lot less is lost of the whole than we thought. That much more is still open, still possible, still alive really.

And yes, there's still grief. There's still loss. There's still the pain of that. There's still the wishing it weren't the case, perhaps. But to open this up, it's almost like we have to allow ourselves to see and sense—the sensing the soul will really help to open up this sense.

So that's one possibility, that's a few possibilities. I want to share something from a close friend in relationship. She was okay for me to share this; I asked her. A slightly different—well, quite different—journey and approach to the loss of a loved one. In this case, my being given a metastatic diagnosis: pancreatic cancer, which is pretty much always fatal. And it was shortly after I got that diagnosis, with all the implications that we knew, that life was—I was going to die from this, probably quite soon.

So this is part of her report I will read.

Again, what I'm really showing here is how can this terrible, deep grief and loss at the death of someone we love be opened up in a different way? How can the soul-making and the sensing of the soul help and support that to be opened up in a different way? A different sense of that, different possibilities.

So I'd gotten that diagnosis and knew what it meant and the implications of dying, that I would not be cured from this disease, that it would kill me relatively soon. And so she was quite upset and quite distraught. This is only part of her account, so this is in her words now.

"Can this become soul-making?" he gently asked—he is me. "Can this become soul-making?" he gently asked, reminding me through his question that this was possible and what I wanted. Thank you. Yes, it can, I said. Recognizing in that moment I was a little stuck and in some vague contention with the reality of the situation. And while contention felt better than collapsing, it definitely wasn't soul-making. And so perhaps this can be my question now as we embark on this leg of the journey.

And she kind of just lists her awareness of what this leg of the journey would involve and imply, and the dukkha and the loss and all of that. "And so, can this become soul-making? In theory, yes, it can. And what will support that? Remembering this question for a start and recognizing that caring for the dukkha in this way could be a fitting and beautiful offering to my beloved friend"—in other words, caring for the dukkha through soul-making. "My faith tells me this is possible. I have faith in soul-making. I've done a lot of soul-making practice. My faith tells me this is possible, but I do not know what this will look like as we face this time, or if I am up to the task. But I can see that the question itself offers a frame, a way to orient to the time ahead, whatever it may bring."

So I really want you to hear the wisdom in this. It's all about the skill in the approach, and the wisdom in the approach. There's this difficulty, stuckness, then contention, collapse, then just contention, then it's, oh, can it be soul-making? Yes, it can. I have some faith in that. So that's already a big step. And then what will support that? And the question, can it be soul-making? What will support the soul-making here itself? That question, as she says, offers a frame, a way to orient the time ahead, whatever it may bring, whatever the time ahead may bring.

She continues: "And as I let the question strike me, I light up. My sense and my posture straighten naturally, and I line up as if I'm filled with trillions of iron fillings that line up before a magnet." Okay, I recognize this is helpful. She's using the energy body sense as telling her she's on the right track. Taking on this question, can this become soul-making? "I am already much less in contention with the reality of the situation. And my loving desire is switched on again towards what I most love, soul-making. This lining up, as well as being strengthening and helpful, seems to make my human heart at once incredibly vulnerable, impactable and tender, and at the same time, steady, bright and unwavering, as if allowing this question to strike me has the effect of beginning to shape me into the kind of organism that might be able to perceive all of this soulfully."

See the art and the skill here? Just, can this become soul-making? What will support that? And that question, together with a little bit of faith, starts to do something. Starts to shape her into the kind of organism, as she writes, that might be able to perceive all of this soulfully.

"I sense myself at a threshold now, where the conventional sense of myself, who is looking forward in time to the painful and demanding journey ahead, gets the sense of more possibilities with this inevitable dukkha. Something in the air is attractive to me, and my soulful antennae, my soul antennae are piqued. More is possible here," she realizes. More is possible here. "And, staying close to the emotional impact of this news, I feel first what I might still call a contention with reality."

I don't want you to die. I don't want my beloved friend to die. Because I don't. But I let myself sense this without collapsing around it.

She lets herself sense the contention—I don't want you to die—without collapsing around it. And then comes the desire. That's the other side of "I don't want you to die." I feel a strong desire, a desire for him to be well and a desire for him to live forever. I want you to live forever. Not cutting that off for being ridiculous and unrealistic. Just letting myself have it. So human, so understandable, so passionate.

And very close to this desire, I feel a kind of objective helplessness of being human beings in the face of death.

So there's so much here. There's the contention, the "don't want," then realizing there's a want that's the flip side of the "don't want." Not dismissing the want, even if it sounds ridiculous—I want you to live forever, how could that possibly be? Unrealistic. Letting herself have it, letting herself have that very human, understandable passion. And then, close to that desire, very naturally, there should be this sense of helplessness. We're helpless as human beings in the face of death.

And she continues: As I sense the current of the desire in my body—this desire, I want you to live forever—it comes through this vulnerable and utterly human spot in my heart. And that narrow spot in my heart starts to expand with the current. And as it expands, it is also illuminated. And as everything gets brighter in the whole citta, I am stopped in my tracks. My senses are arrested by a beauty that I start to sense.

Something is happening here and a beauty is opening up, and it's arresting. Right there, not divorced from the pain and reality of the situation, not losing any of its personalness, right there, he and I are being woven into image—the soul-scape of extraordinary beauty. Horizontal time is relieved from being the whole and the only truth. And I am somehow being loved by this whole scene, by the whole image.

He and I woven into image, and horizontal time not the whole truth. The whole scene is loving her—that's her sense.

And the grace of this—until now only unwanted suffering—the grace is apparent and makes me humble. His illness and imminent death, not reducible to a single meaning for him, for me, or for the Sangha. This perception is so blessed, so blessed.

Pain is not necessarily taken away, but it is happening within a soulful cosmos, where dimensionality and meaningfulness are shimmering with a startling beauty right here in the tragedy and loss, at once deeply human and utterly beyond.

Can this become soul-making? Yes, it can. And I bow.

This was the first stage, actually, of a journey with this whole ensouled relationship with death. It started to really open something up.

A little while later, she had a dream. In the dream, there was a black snake coming out from down under a kitchen counter in the house where she grew up, and she was sitting in the dream with her family, and everyone was sort of horrified—oh my god, it's a black snake, that shouldn't be there. At some point in the dream it shifted to, somehow, that's not wrong. It's not wrong that this snake is there. At first it felt it was wrong, and then somehow it didn't.

So in the way that sometimes what is immediately disturbing to the mind, the usual mind, or the mind thinks, "oh, that's wrong, that can't be right," in imaginal practice—in a similar way, that shift happened in the dream.

The next morning, she took that image of the black snake into her meditation practice and let it become imaginal, helped it become imaginal, and found that the snake loved her as it would if it becomes imaginal—it's one of the elements of the imaginal—but also that the snake itself seemed to kind of contain multiple images. And one of these images related to, or kind of related to then, my death and her feelings about my death.

So again, at some point later on, there was again this "I don't want you to die." And again, she really let herself feel it. And letting herself have this "I don't want," loosened something. Really letting herself have this "I don't want you to die" loosened something without dissolving the "I don't want."

So we can loosen things so that they dissolve and completely unfabricate, or we can loosen things so that enough slight unfabricating occurs that they can actually become more soul-making.

So it's like a cry out to the cosmos: "I don't want you to die. I don't want you to die." And she also realized that if she were either a good Buddhist or a good existentialist, she wouldn't have this thought, "I don't want you to die." And again, "I want you to live forever"—how ridiculous that sounds from either a Buddhist perspective or an existentialist perspective.

With all this, she noticed something else: that her sense of death, her almost subliminal sense of death, was a kind of big black empty space. And she realized—very subtle discrimination—she realized, "Oh, this is the usual sense of death in the cultures that I move in." Either it's a kind of nihilistic nothingness, just a big black empty space, the end of personhood, or it's a kind of spiritual big black empty space, a kind of universal emptiness of oneness or essence.

She thought, "Hmm, my logos here, what I'm used to thinking, my habitual conception and notion is part of my sense of death here. That's being brought in automatically, and it's coloring, it's shaping, it's forming and limiting the view I have of death"—either to the standard secular view, a kind of nihilistic view, or a kind of spiritual assumption of dissolving into universal emptiness.

Realizing she was conditioned by the logos, as we talked about right at the beginning tonight. And that realization—ah, that there's some conditioning by the logos, by the imported habitual notions here that she gets from the two main cultures she moves in: mainstream secular culture and the culture of Buddha Dharma, spiritual circles. Realizing that fact of the conditioning by a logos, by an idea, by imported habitual, unquestioned ideas—in realizing it, that lost its grip, and the sense of my death was allowed, and death itself was allowed to become more imaginal.

She also realized something else: that there was a notion that if she could accept the pain, then she would be at peace with it, or she should be at peace with it. So there was a lot of realizing about what the imprisoning logos was, what the limiting logoi were, and where she'd gotten them—because the acceptance and peace with it also comes from Buddhist and spiritual teachings.

It was that realization that loosened something, and then the sense of death could become imaginal. And then she said there was a sense: "Then I got the sense that your death is eternal. It's always here. My friend's death is eternal, it's always here." So it was more than accepting death—it certainly wasn't not wanting death, but it was more than accepting death.

As it was allowed to become image and become eternal and always here—"your death is always here"—then she got the sense, the very palpable and moving sense: "Your death loves me. Your death loves me."

Of course, from a mainstream, conventional, typical perspective: what on earth does that mean? "Your death loves me"? But when things and events become imaginal, when we sense them with soul—even things and events, not even talking about sentient or inorganic beings like trees, but things and events, "your death"—when it becomes imaginal, when they become imaginal, they have personhood. They have intelligence and autonomy and love and eros.

There's so much skill here and beauty in the way of working—very difficult, but then so much being touched, the soul being touched by this sense of "your death loves me, your death loves me, and your death is eternal, it's always here, it's always already happening." The death has become image with all the beauty and all the gifts that are given to us when we sense something with soul, all the gifts that opens up in our sense of something.

In a way, that was a second stage. And then something happened, perhaps more long-term, in her logos and the ideation that she carried around: that death is not only an impersonal thing, and more importantly, that impersonal depth is not more true than personhood. As if that big black empty space from a spiritual perspective or from a nihilistic perspective is somehow more true—well, actually she's talking mostly in a spiritual context. Sometimes we're taught to see that emptiness is more true, that the absolute is more true than personhood.

Now with these experiences, impersonal depth is not necessarily more true than personhood. So it opened up something more permanently in her ideation and perspective, her logos around death.

This becoming image of my death, becoming imaginal, my death loving her, a little later on enabled her death to become image for herself, to become imaginal image. So here is the third stage.

She's describing a practice she did actually while she was taking a flight. So she was practicing on a plane, and her death became image. She writes: "My death as beloved other, as deity, as enchanted—the most fulfilling perception. I love the image of my death. She is here as beloved other, the most intimate other. She knows me so well. I feel loved in a way I had never before known."

So my death is here as beloved other, the most intimate other who knows me so well, and I feel loved by this, my death, in a way that I have never known.

I love her, and I ask, "How can I come closer to you? I want to know you more." So there's the eros, an eros in a way that's going to allow the whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic to ignite further, open, expand, complexify, deepen.

And she writes, "I contract for a moment in judgment as fellow passengers on this flight throw away their plastic cups after one drink. I contract and lose sight of my death, of the sense of the image of her death. The destruction of the planet and our ignorance, seemingly more real than my beloved. But I see my heart is lost for that moment, and so I light a candle at the altar of my beloved, and I kneel."

Again, just to highlight the skill in working, something distracts, something contracts her. In this case, she's on a flight that she had thought a lot about even taking, given the climate crisis, decided to take it, decided on the balance of things it was the right thing to do and her soul felt the soul-making choice to do. And then contracting at this throwing away of plastic so easily. That distracts her and interrupts her process. There's a contraction of the being, and she loses the image. And she says, "Okay, I recognize what's going on. Can I, so to speak, light a candle at the altar of my beloved and kneel?" So there's the taking care of what I called the other day the poise for soul-making that enables us to open to soul-making, to image.

And then she says, "Tears upon my return and the settling of the disorientation that came in the contracting. I love you"—she's talking about her death—"I love my death. I love you. You feel like the most meaningful relationship I have ever had. In so many ways it is as if you were there before I was born."

Again, from the mainstream point of view, this probably sounds completely mad—someone talking about the image of their death: "I love you. It is as if you were there before I was born. You define my existence, not in the existentialist or literal ways of being an end point. Your reality status is not end point. That designation flattens you, and in so doing one would not see your beauty. You are more a beginning point, if anything."

But careful—there's no implication here of the usual beliefs of afterlife or rebirth or whatever. She's not talking about beginning point in those senses, the beginning of the afterlife, the beginning of the next birth or whatever.

"You are the most beautiful image I have ever seen, and the death of my body in time seems like one tiny image within your numberless dimensions. I can hardly believe it. It is not that physical death is insignificant—it is indeed one image in the wings of your magnificence, but you are so much more. You, my death, are resounding right through the cosmos. You are so intimately personal to me, and yet you seem to ring everywhere in many spheres, all at the same time. You know me as a point of time and space, and you love me as a human more closely and precisely than anything, and yet you also intimately mirror a multitude of other images that seem to exist in multiple other realms."

So the whole image is, again, doing exactly what we'd expect if eros is allowed to galvanize and open the soul-making dynamic—eros, psyche, logos—and mutually fertilize each other, complexify, take each other deeper, wider, further.

She continues: "This is different from the personal and seemingly eternal death in Carlos Castaneda"—I don't really know that work, but she's referring to it—"where one can consult this intimate companion about how to love one's life, knowing that death is always here at your shoulder. My death is not principally a point in time, or related to the point of space and time of my physical death, and nor is my death an annihilation, and nor is she impersonal. My death is somehow my fulfillment, and meeting her now I am called to my fulfillment. But this fulfillment is now, and eternally now, when she is known in erotic, imaginal meeting. I am drawn to this fulfillment, but it is not a fulfillment of accumulation of qualities—it's not that kind of fulfillment. It is a fulfillment of knowing my place as soul in a sacred cosmos, so completely woven into all dimensions, and that guiding divine being is my death."

"Here, death as idea is soft and elastic, and death in time is one image in the divine theater. It is not about making my physical death unimportant or relativized or small. To say 'small' would contrast it with 'big' or 'bigger,' and this is not the correct word for what is more than or more than one image. Logically, one should be able to say that the collective of multiple images is bigger than or greater than one image, like ten is more than one. However, in imaginal tonality and in the imaginal middle way, 'smaller than' and 'bigger than' do not make sense. In eternality, in an imaginal middle way, 'smaller than' and 'bigger than' do not make sense. It is not governed by logic. Size and proportions only belong with the arising of time and space and the appearance of this world. This lack of proportions is somehow very significant."

"And this is very different from the results of Buddhist reflections on death, as I have practiced them at least. This reflection does not rouse my passion as an urgency for a path of practice in time"—that's how we usually, or one of the ways we usually teach reflection on death, to arouse urgency for practice, path of practice in time—"but it does rouse my passion as a tremendous eros for eternality, for timelessness. It does also bring a steadying of my heart, but I wouldn't say it is an equanimity born from understanding and including the whole picture and being able to see the conditions of the world of time and space from a great view"—it's not that kind of standard way, one of the standard ways we reach equanimity, seeing the whole picture, stepping back, taking a larger view of conditions and the large span of time and space. "Rather, the steadying comes from the mind easily concentrating because this is the most compelling, meaningful and loving encounter."

There is no effort to steady the heart. We could unpack this a lot more, I think, and explore the steadiness and equanimity from many other aspects. She's touched on some of that in other talks about eros and equanimity. But there's so much to say here.

She says, "My death smiles at me as I recognize this. My duty is to re-enchant death."

So much here, in terms of the skillful ways of working, in terms of the ways something can start as a difficulty. Just asking the question, "Can this be soul-making?" Can we allow it to open up, get a different sense of it? Then that can be added to by an image that at first seems to have nothing to do with it—a black snake—and open further. And then we get a very different sense of things, a very different sense in this case of her friend's death.

This gave her confidence and a platform, or I feel like was a spark that in turn allowed her to sense her own death with soul, for her own death to become image. And that opening up all the sense of beauty and dimensionality there, sacredness—in terms of the death, but also in terms of the whole cosmos.

So much that's instructive, I think, in all this. I wanted to include that for that reason, as well as what I shared earlier—to offer some possibilities for opening up our sense of death and dying, whether it's our own or another's. What can we bring to that? How can we meet that with soul, genuinely? What happens, what might happen when we do?

These are real possibilities for the soul, possibilities that make a real difference. So important. So there for us.

CHAPTER 235

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h42

> In this foundational talk from the Vajra Music series, Rob Burbea presents preliminary exercises centered on movement, gesture, and voice as essential components for soul-making practice. Drawing parallels between dharma training and musical education, he emphasizes how certain subtle capacities—like the tiny bones in a bird's wing—may seem insignificant but are indispensable for the full flowering of practice.
>
> Burbea introduces two core exercises: a movement practice involving physical or imagined gestures while expanding energy body awareness to fill one's environment, and a voice exercise using extended tones to explore centers of emanation throughout the body. Both practices emphasize sensitivity to the energy body, spatial awareness, and the capacity for projection beyond habitual limitations. He addresses common practitioner inertia around active engagement with teachings, encouraging listeners to extract meditation instructions and principles from dharma talks rather than passively receiving information.
>
> The talk explores fundamental questions about practice motivation and the fantasy of awakening, arguing against limited views that reduce meditation to mere stress relief or calm. Instead, Burbea presents dharma practice as an artistic endeavor—infinite, creative, and calling forth our deepest capacities for discovery and expression through embodied spiritual work.

Hello everyone.

There are a few things I would like to offer as I'm making these recordings. Usually I would probably have waited a little longer—first, to gather a little more material around these topics, and second, to hope that I felt a little bit more capable physically and mentally. But despite the difficulties, I think it's probably wiser not to wait and just take this window of opportunity as it presents itself right now, as I don't know what the future will bring.

So I wanted to offer a few things, and really they're mostly exercises—that's the way I'm thinking about them. Like etudes, or exercises, or preliminaries, if you know that word used in Tibetan Buddhist circles: preliminary exercises, preliminary trainings, preliminary requirements, preliminary developments.

Of course, there's something a little strange about beginning to put out and accrue a set of preliminary exercises however many years we are into unfolding the soul-making teachings. But the teachings have grown very organically, and as we grow, we recognize: ah, this is needed, that's needed, this is what we need to add here. So it doesn't matter anyway.

I'd like to offer some what we might call preliminaries—some exercises. Primarily, these exercises involve and center around movement and gesture, so the physical body and movement and gesture, or the bodily experience of movement and gesture, and voice. Movement, gesture and voice.

Woven into that, I'd like to include some thoughts and teachings about soul, about personhood and about human being—anthropology, if you like—because it's very much woven into the way we're thinking about all this.

So preliminary, at this stage of development of the organic growth of the teachings. This is a beginning, and whatever I will offer in these talks is a beginning that can hopefully be developed. It should be developed. It will naturally evoke, suggest, and elicit development. And hopefully that development will be very discerning, congruent, sensitive, appropriate, and intelligent.

Movement, gesture, voice. These are huge areas. We can add all kinds of things willy-nilly just because we like them or we have a history there, or they make us feel good, or whatever. But hopefully, these kinds of exercises can be added to and can be developed naturally. As is the way of soul-making, things that get swept up into the soul-making dynamic will develop—they have to develop.

So this is a beginning. Hopefully they will be developed and grow and become more sophisticated, wider, further, deeper, more varied.

Actually, it's not even a complete beginning, because I have offered—and many of you will already know—other teachings that focus on movement, gesture, voice, and so forth. So in a way, what we're going to say in these talks adds to that thread that's already there. In fact, through other talks, through other exercises I've given out in the past, through instructions and guided meditations from the past—however long it is, five or six years.

I had a quick look earlier today and I remember there were a couple of talks called "Voice, Movement and the Possibilities of Soul"—guided meditations, exercises, instructions. There's something called "Movement of Devotion," if I remember, and a couple of versions of that. Perhaps that may have been the first one, though I think I started it all too subtly, too difficultly for a first teaching. So as I said, the teachings are growing organically rather than in any linear way. They're presented over the years in ways where the chronological order of presentation doesn't necessarily match how one would unfold the soul-making dharma if one was starting from zero. It doesn't match that at all.

So there's that "Movement of Devotion." There are even things like guided meditations we did—"Hearing All Sounds as Mantra," "A Dual Line World," those kinds of things we've done where there's a lot going on. There's a lot of instructions going out. I'm asking people in the room to chant and move and do this and that and interact with each other. And while they're doing that, I may have been giving instructions, throwing them into the space at the same time.

Very understandably, if a lot of those instructions didn't get well absorbed or taken on, if that kind of practice didn't get built on and repeated, if the principles hidden in those instructions—in the mix of this very complex, intensive social situation of guided meditation and new experiences—if the understanding of the principles underlying and girding the instructions were not drawn out and capitalized upon and made clear, of course that's very understandable.

Similarly, in rituals and ceremonies that we've done and played with, there are often background instructions thrown in. But there's so much going on in the choreography and the sociality and interactions of that whole larger situation that it would be very surprising if those were taken on board as instructions in a way that one would actually build on them, or even recognize that there was anything there to build on or extract. So all that's completely understandable.

Even recently, in the last few months, I remember in one of those online seminars—I can't remember what it was called, but it was something to do with engagement and activism—I remember just saying something about the energy body and devotion, throwing something out and intending it really as a set of meditation instructions.

But I was way too quick. Way too quick in explaining that and expecting people to actually hear, "Oh, this is a set of instructions. And I can take this and practice it and do it a lot like I do my breath meditation a lot." So I didn't set it up that way. I didn't take the time that way, just because there's a million other things to talk about, or it seems to me there always is, so I'm always in a rush.

And similarly on the jhāna retreat, actually at some point—it might even have been in the opening talk—I did guide people very briefly through a meditation with body and devotion and energy body. But again, how many people will actually take that out and extract it and capitalize on it and repeat it, isolate it and repeat it as something, as a practice, as a set of instructions that are developable, remains to be seen.

Anyway. So a beginning here that will be developed, but actually not really a beginning because it ties in with other threads that we've put out in all these different talks.

In a way, following on from what I've just said, there's an implication which here I'm going to draw out now. One could, if one gets really interested in this stuff, go back to all those talks and listen again and listen to what's being said in the background and those instructions that one might miss, and take the material out, extract it. Write it down. Make a set of instructions. Start practicing it.

So there's an invitation there. Of course, that's much more work for you as a listener or as a saṅgha than if I just offer these instructions there and it's a separate thing and all you have to do is press play and follow the instructions. But there's the invitation.

So, why this area? I'm going to explain more why this area around movement, gesture and voice. I'm going to explain more later as we go on. But it's very much connected with this idea of preliminaries and what's necessary, what's required to, if we use a certain analogy, to be able to fly in soul-making practice—to really be able to soar on the air currents and glide easily and gracefully and freely, to wheel around and cartwheel and maneuver. A lot is required.

And sometimes the pieces that are required, they're really obvious, like, well, two wings are required, whatever that analogy might be in soul-making dharma. We need these really big structural pieces. But other times what's required may not be obvious at all.

So in this beautiful bird's anatomy, there may be a tiny little bone somewhere that just connects, for instance, this part of this bone in the neck, let's say, to a bone, a particular bone in the wings—a tiny little bone in the muscles, or a tiny little muscle. It doesn't seem that significant, but take it away, and maybe the bird can even still fly a little bit, but what its freedom of movement, its ease, its gracefulness, its security—severely curtailed there.

So to be able to fly, we need all kinds of things, some of which are obvious, and some of which are less obvious. There are some trainings which are really obvious, and some trainings which are really less obvious. And some which are obviously very central, and some which are really not. We don't actually notice them at first. So it might be something like that, as an analogy. Not central, but indispensable, really, in the long run, to really have that freedom—the freedom to fly in soul-making practice, and the whole range of soul-making practice, and the whole potential range of soul-making practice.

Or, you know, like an airplane—similar, same analogy. You look: oh, it needs its engine, it needs its propellers or whatever they are, wings, of course, it needs this and that. But maybe there's just one bolt somewhere, and it's just a tiny little piece, but if it's missing, it's a big deal. Maybe you only notice it when you're trying to do a certain thing, like, I don't know, land, or turn around, or whatever it is. So that kind of thing.

The soul-making dynamic, it should be clear to you by now from past teachings, will eventually expand because of the way that psychologos dynamic works. It will expand, and it will expand to include within itself, to involve within its dynamic, within its creativity and discovery—it will expand to include every aspect of our being and every aspect of our life. Even more aspects than we even realize exist now. "I didn't even know I had that aspect to my being or that aspect to my life." And then it starts to come to be involved, to be ensouled, to be involved in the soul-making dynamic.

So just so, as the soul-making dynamic expands, it should, it wants naturally to start including movement, gesture and voice. And these areas—movement, gesture, voice—can also be particular areas where our relationship to them is also, without us even realizing it, a little bit blocked. We're blocking something there. We're holding back something there. So the soul-making dynamic doesn't naturally flow in to open them further. It doesn't actually manage to quite reach them. And we don't quite realize it. I'm going to expand on this later.

So there are a number of reasons for this particular focus on movement, gesture, and voice right now. But again, by way of introduction—a slightly long introduction before we get to the material—I want to say something about listening. And it connects with something I mentioned just now.

I think often when I'm teaching, I probably go too fast. I speak very quickly, and for me it feels like there's so much to say, so much to put in a talk. There's so much I want to share and convey, and time is limited in all kinds of ways. But often I'm aware that I go very fast.

Occasionally a person says to me, "Oh, I heard your talks. It's mostly repetition." But when I hear back about what they're thinking and how they're practicing, it's clear that they've actually missed a lot. They're not hearing many of the details. So I actually think the opposite is true—I'm going too fast rather than lingering and repeating.

What I often don't do is stop and give you an exercise, give you homework—especially if I'm recording like I am now, alone at home. On retreat, you can sometimes slow things down, feel what's happening in the room and what's appropriate for what people need there. But often I don't stop and isolate something, extract it and point it out: "This is a set of instructions—one, two, three, four, five. Do that." I don't set it up, give it a name, make it a thing. And again, it's just not very skillful teaching to expect people to do that work themselves. Partly naively, a part of me was expecting that, or has been in the past. But I think it's naive.

So time is still limited, and I'm going to try to do exactly that—give you exercises to do, and so forth. But still, when you listen to this set of talks, when you listen to talks that have already been given—maybe by me, maybe by another teacher—is it possible to think about listening more actively? Actually, there might be a job for you, or several jobs for you to do as a listener.

One of them might be for you to actively extract meditations and exercises from what's being said. What would it be to listen to a talk—even maybe a talk you've listened to before but haven't listened to with those kinds of ears on? Instead of just sitting and hearing it, being touched by it, or getting the ideas, what would it be to actually put on the hat of that particular job? You're actively extracting meditations and exercises. That's number one.

Number two: is it possible to actively extract larger principles? Sometimes these are even less obvious. Of course, sometimes I'll linger extensively on a larger principle, explaining something and why it's important, what the concept is, how it all fits together, even why it's important in our history—all kinds of things. But sometimes not, or to differing degrees.

So what would it be for you as a listener also to listen at times with the hat on of extracting larger principles? These are sometimes less obvious, and they'll be especially less obvious if I don't even bother to explain why we're doing this or that in a certain ritual or ceremony that we've just made up and maybe will only do once. Of course, that's not going to be obvious. But there are reasons—why we choose to do this, why I said that, why all of it. And so that takes quite a lot of intelligence, perhaps, to listen that way and try to extract those larger principles.

So, two possibilities for listening at different times. Number one: extracting meditation possibilities and exercises. Number two: extracting larger principles, which may be more or less explicit. Just like the exercises, I may make a very light suggestion—maybe explicit, but I just touch on it so quickly. It may just be implicit in what I'm saying.

So there's an invitation. Maybe think about doing that sometimes. Experiment with that kind of listening.

I taught a recent retreat at Gaia House on the theme of the jhānas, jhāna practice. And one of the things I mentioned there was about inertia—our inertia as practitioners, as students of the Dharma, but also as human beings. I would have, had there been more time, spent much longer really exploring that theme of inertia, really asking people to inquire into where inertia operates for them—how and where and in what ways does inertia operate in the way they relate to their practice, in the way that they practice, in the way that they listen, what they practice and how they practice, all that.

To me there's a huge, really important inquiry there. But I just mentioned it on the retreat and sort of pulled back from giving people too much to do, even though we had three and a half weeks. It still felt like it would be a bit much. But in my mind it felt actually really, really important.

Recently, still on this theme of listening, Nick and Sarah were listening to some talks together. As people sometimes do, they decided they would listen and then spontaneously ask each other, "Can I press pause for a second?" They would pause and say, "Should we just do that practice he just mentioned?" Sometimes it wasn't even when there was an actual guided meditation—I might have just been implying a practice or mentioning it in passing.

So they were really listening in quite a different way, and being together enabled them to listen like this. They got into a mode of listening where they were pressing pause quite frequently—to stop and actually discuss something they'd just heard, to question something, or if one person didn't quite understand. Sometimes questioning, "That can't be right," or whatever arose. A two-hour talk—I have no idea how long it ended up taking them to listen to. But it certainly sounded like they were having a lot of fun doing it that way. Maybe it was more fun, I don't know. Maybe other times it's much more fun listening on your own, straight through without interruption. Maybe they were digesting more, assimilating more.

So there's a question here. We can have active listening modes, if we call that active listening, as well as receptive listening—just letting it come in without interrupting, without stopping to turn the soil. But what is it to till the soil, to till the soul? It will need tilling at some point, the soil of the soul. Whether that's while I'm listening or afterward, at some point it needs that. And that cannot happen without you being active, without you taking some kind of initiative and responsibility and making choices and being intelligent. Listening on the tip of your toes or at the edge of your seat, as I think I said on a recent retreat.

Similar goes for reading. Some people, unfortunately—a surprising amount of people—make it clear that they read Seeing That Frees without doing any of the practices or without really spending much time at all on any of the practices. To my mind, it's like, how much can you hope to really get out of it? There's not enough working of the soil. And even reading it too quickly—that particular book is very dense. There's a lot there. Why that word? What does it mean? What does it imply? What does it suggest about my practice? What does it suggest about what I'm thinking and how what's being written might be a little bit different, or even a lot different, from what I'm actually thinking?

So anyway, just this question about inertia—in this case an inertia about how we practice, also an inertia about how we listen. We get stuck in certain modes of listening, certain modes of reading. And it takes a bit of work to push ourselves out of that particular groove or rut that we're in. It's inertia. In physics, it takes work to overcome, it takes force to overcome.

Again, there can be an inertia regarding what we hear, what we read. Without even realizing it, we actually end up hearing and reading what we already think we know. I'm literally chopping off, shaving off, just not hearing or seeing what doesn't actually fit into what I think I already know. So I end up reading something that's in fact quite different, quite challenging to what I already know, but I think I've just read something that completely confirms it, or just says what I already know in different words.

So there are all kinds of possibilities here for energizing and bringing some oomph and electricity and fire and soul—really more soul—into our listening and reading. All kinds of possibilities.

There's also the question—and this is related to what I've just said—when we're listening and reading, we can't help but have a process, usually unconscious, where we're determining or trying to determine, judging the significance of this or that thing we're hearing right now. Here's a talk that's an hour or two hours long: this part's not that significant, now that part's significant. Or here's something I'm reading, whatever. This, I think, is just natural to the way we need to listen as human beings—to structure, to make sense of what we're listening to or reading. What is the significance of this? How much significance does it have?

Some of what we're going to explore in this series—however long it ends up being—some of these exercises will probably not seem that significant. I'm going to say that right now. They probably won't seem that significant, but it's a bit like that tiny bone at the bird's shoulder that connects the wing—one little bone and small filaments of muscle connecting to another bone in the chest. It doesn't seem that significant. Or that single bolt in the airplane.

Some of these exercises won't seem that significant. We can tend to think, especially with soul-making practice, imaginal practice, that if there's an image—especially if I get a clear image and a clear sense of the image—that's significant. But if I'm just doing something and there's no real movement or gesturing or voice, no real image, it may not seem that significant.

Something can seem to have more impact, and it can certainly seem more to the point of what imaginal practice is, obviously. If there is an image and we're impacted, it can seem that that's more significant, but in the long run it may not be. You might get lots of "wow, image"—you've definitely felt impacted and affected and it was beautiful—but in the long run it may not be that significant.

Just the fact that we talk about imaginal practice—well, obviously images must be significant. Well, it may or may not be, relatively speaking. Sometimes it's hard to be that wisely discerning in assessing what actually is significant and what is its significance. It's hard for us. All this is very normal.

I think I remember at some point using the phrase "structural listening"—I can't remember how often or even when, but it feels like a long time ago. Can we listen to a dharma talk structurally or read a book structurally? Seeing the whole structurally? This capacity is very, very rare—the ability to listen for the larger structure of ideas, the way it all hangs together, the progress of ideas, the larger conceptual framework.

What would it be to actually develop that capacity? That's a training. That's a big deal. So it's very rare. What would it be to listen or read for and from the whole conceptual framework? I'm listening or reading to get a sense of what the whole conceptual framework is. And then when I think I have that, I'm listening from the perspective of the whole conceptual framework.

That listening from an understanding of the whole conceptual framework—holding it there—frames my listening. Whether it's soul-making dharma, that conceptual framework, whether it's emptiness or mainstream dharma, whatever it is, that frames my listening and creates a kind of meta-view from which I can then discern with intelligence. It helps me discern the relative significance and the relative place of this or that thing I'm hearing, or this or that instruction, or even this or that word I'm hearing or reading right now.

This is hard. Or rather, it's very rare. It's rare for someone to have that as normally the way they go about things. It does exist, but it's very rare. It can be trained.

Listen, read for and from the whole conceptual framework. In the end, it ends up being a lot less work to do things that way, because things are ordered. The very conceptual framework tells me where things belong and informs me about what I might do in practice at any moment. It suggests and tells me how ideas fit together, so they're not just random—here's another idea, here's another idea, here's another one. I don't just have this pile of stuff to sort through, random objects, most of which maybe look a little interesting or glistening or curious. Instead, I have this big structure where they fit together and I can understand where things are.

Because I understand where things are and how they work, I can find them a lot easier. Things make sense. They're more accessible. I can make choices a lot easier, a lot more intuitively eventually, and a lot more intelligently, a lot more helpfully.

Even just now, up to this point, we've thrown out this idea about inertia and this question: actually taking on this inquiry—where is the inertia for me in relation to dharma practice? How and what I practice in relationship to how and what I study or hear or how I listen. Where is the inertia?

And how does that inertia balance with a need for steadiness? I actually need to stay with something for a while, yet I can get too entrenched in something. So all this inquiry into inertia—now I would say that this inquiry into inertia, even though we're not really going into it at the moment, again I'm postponing it or just mentioning it...

I don't know if I'll ever get back to it. I would actually say that inquiry into inertia is more important as a teaching, as an area of investigation. Structurally it's more important—at the meta level, it's more important than anything else I might say in this set of talks about movement and gesture or any other topic.

A similar dynamic arose on the recent jhana retreat. We talked about all these different techniques—where you can move between this jhana and that, how you can do this and that. All really important material. Great. But what I think was much more important for most people—and if it wasn't during those three and a half weeks, it will be at some point, or will have been at some point—much more important than all those little bits of really valuable technique, was the whole relationship with desire.

Jhana practice is a goal-oriented practice. I need desire because I'm moving toward something. I want to achieve whatever it is—the third jhana or whatever. This is what I'm aiming for. I have an aim. I need to put in effort and I need desire. And then the whole question arises—the whole area of questions around difficulties, around complications, around my relationship with desire, my relationship with goals, my relationship with effort. All that comes up.

How much there is to explore there. Much more important in the long run to really open that up, to understand oneself within that territory, to liberate oneself in relationship to desire—being able to sustain a desire, a deep desire, and move toward a goal without getting completely tied up in knots.

First of all, it's important because I'm going to need that capacity to do the jhana practice. As much as I need to hear this little tip or technique for moving between one jhana and another, I'm also going to bump into—I can't help but move in—the domain of my desires and the difficulties of my desires. So I'm going to need that understanding for jhana practice.

And it's a subject that pertains to any other practice I do—pretty much any dharma practice I engage with—and loads of situations outside my meditation practice. It pertains to my life. Structurally, it's a much, much more important issue, an area of investigation and concern, and possibility of freedom in the broader sense—much broader freedom than just technique, or this piece of technique.

So again, even here, I mentioned inertia tonight. Even that inquiry is structurally more important than anything else, even though these other pieces are, as I said, really important.

There's a lot here, but I'm just... this is all by way of introduction. A little bit more introduction, actually, if you can stand it.

As I said, I will hopefully unfold more about the why of these exercises—why I'm offering them now, why I'm emphasizing them now. That will, as the talks unfold and the instructions unfold, hopefully include more about the why.

But just to say right now: of course, the why of these exercises is related to the why of practice in general. It has to be, right? Of course. The larger question of why I'm practicing informs the smaller question of why these exercises—why practice these exercises, why might they be important?

So the why of these exercises is related to the bigger why of why practice. Why am I practicing? It has to be, of course. Just think that through if it's not obvious.

And that, of course, is intimately related to what we've been calling the fantasy of the path—the fantasy of the goal of the path, the fantasy of awakening, the fantasy of the self on the path, or fantasies plural.

So the why of these exercises—the reasons why we're addressing, focusing, emphasizing, filling them out now, opening them out now—is related to the why of practice and the fantasies of practice, path, awakening, self as practitioner, self on the path.

Most of you will have heard me talk about, sort of emphasize, how crucial this is—this why. Why am I practicing? What's my idea of why I'm practicing? And what's my image or fantasy of practice, of path, of where it's leading, and of myself on the path?

Those ideas and those images and fantasies will always have consequences—major, major consequences. Consequences at every level of our dharma practice, actually at every level of our life. Our ideas about why we practice and our fantasies of path, goal, self, awakening, etc., will have massive consequences, certainly in our practice, at every level of our practice, and also beyond our practice in the rest of our life.

And one of the questions is: A, do we realize it? Second question is: do we realize that these ideas and fantasies can be limiting? They can also be nonsensical. So we can end up with a sort of conglomerate of ideas and fantasies about the why of practice and what practice is and where we're going that actually don't really make sense together. They're not very coherent. They're also limited. That's possible. That's very, very possible.

They will always have consequences. The question is, do we want to unlimit them if they're limited in an unhelpful way? Do we want them to be coherent and to make sense if they don't actually make sense once we start looking at them and questioning them and prodding them a bit—which often we don't. Often practitioners don't really. We've talked about all this before in other talks. There will always be consequences. We have to realize that.

I remember teaching in another country, this is quite some years ago now. And I was talking with a woman—I can't remember the context. I don't think it was in an interview. It was either before or after the retreat or some other situation. And she said to me, or to a group of us, "My husband doesn't need to meditate." She was probably in her late 60s then, is my guess, and I'm assuming her husband was a similar age.

"My husband doesn't need to meditate." And I don't know if she elaborated on that. Certainly my ears pricked up at that point. What she then said made it clear that what she meant is he's already calm—he's already a very steady character and calm. And of course, implicit in that was her view that calmness and steadiness was the point and the goal of meditation. And that's why she was coming to retreat, and that's why her husband didn't need to, because he was already calm and steady.

The situation wasn't such that I was in the teacher role at that point, or I can't remember exactly, but it didn't seem appropriate for me to ask a question in response or probe that a little more. But to me, it was very clear that she was holding a very limited idea of what she was there for on retreat, what she hoped to get from meditation, what meditation was for. And this was, in fact, borne out by other interactions I had with her and things that I saw.

Now, that's fine if that's her view or if that's her thoroughly investigated view, and that's where she arrives at, freely and independently: "This is all I want meditation to be. I know there's this option, that option, that option, that option, that option as well, but I actually just want it to be calm and steady because I've looked at my life and looked at everything else and all the other things. Either I can get them elsewhere—I can understand the emptiness of awareness elsewhere, which is highly unlikely of course, or some other kind of freedom I can get, whatever it is. Or they're just not things I'm interested in."

But my sense was that she hadn't actually thoroughly opened up that inquiry. And so there was this quite small area delineated for the range and the purpose of meditation and retreat and all that. And you could also pick that up in other ways in terms of her responses and reactions to teachings that went beyond that.

Now, it could have been something else. She or someone else could have said it, you know, maybe not calm and steady. They could have replaced it by, "Oh, he, she, they have so much patience. They don't need to meditate. They're just so patient." Or "They have just unshakable metta and compassion. They just seem to love everyone, and it's just not shakable. Someone can be really difficult or whatever, and they're just always kind. They don't need to meditate." Or "They have incredible equanimity. This or that happens and they're just really steady." "They're just naturally mindful. You know, I forget this and I forget that. They're just naturally mindful." Or even, "They don't experience the self. I've talked to them and they don't actually experience the self. And they only experience this sort of flow of moments or whatever it is that they would explain." Et cetera, et cetera.

It could be anything. We could put anything there. "They don't need to meditate because..."—fill it with whatever you want.

But compare that to saying something like, "My husband doesn't need to make art, doesn't need to make music," or if they're an artist or a musician, "doesn't need..." If they're a scientific researcher, if we look at some of these other fantasies that we've talked about, fantasies of the past, "They don't need to do scientific research anymore. Or ever." Or the fantasy of the lover...

They don't need what? They don't need to make love. They don't need to spend time with their beloved. They don't need to expand or let expand, support the expansion of the range of landscapes and soul territories that one moves through and in with one's lover, creates and discovers with one's lover.

To compare it to saying something like that—don't need to meditate because they don't need to make art. They don't need to make music, they don't need to do scientific research, or any more scientific research, or they don't need to be in love anymore, and be in love, and do in love, and be together in love, in relationship anymore.

That need—to one who feels the need in the beauty of those needs, maybe for some people they only really relate to the in-love one, I don't know, but for me certainly, a scientific researcher, the artist, making music, meaning composing music, improvising music, whatever it is—to one who feels that need, feels the depth of that need, and the infinite depth of that need, those needs, and the beauty of those needs. The inexhaustibility of those needs, the mystery of those needs.

Those kinds of needs are not needs that there is really an end to. Not if you're really called that way. If the soul is called, if the soul is on fire. You don't think, "Oh, I get to the point where I don't need to do any more scientific research. I don't need to write any more music or whatever it is. I don't need to..." They're not—there's no end to that and you wouldn't want there to be an end to it because if there's an end to it, something has died and it's not about reaching an end.

It's not about achieving calmness, or "I've just discovered, imagine some, you know, I've just discovered this in physics. Great, okay, I think I'm done now. That's all I wanted to know." That's not how that kind of deep curiosity works. What person has written, "You know, I wrote one song, I wrote one piece of music, or I had that time improvising there, I took a solo or whatever it was, and I don't think I need to do it anymore." That's not how it works.

It's insatiable. It's bottomless. It's not even ours. It's calling us from a distance that is beyond us. It is not ours and it's ours. It's infinitely far away and it's the most intimate thing. It's not something that there is an end to. It's not something we would want there to be an end to. It comes out of love, out of beauty, out of eros and delight, out of soul, out of curiosity, out of the depths of our being, just as can the intention for meditation practice come out of love, of beauty, of eros, delight, soul, curiosity, depth—rather than "I want to be steady like my husband is steady, or calmer, or whatever." Or even "I want to experience this thing where I don't have a self and there's just a sort of flow of moments."

Why stop there? Why stop there? Gosh, there's so much more than that. Wonderful as that might be.

And of course, if you're listening to this and you're just really caught up in dukkha, it seems like it has no... nothing. But dukkha, of course, we're going to want the calmness. And we've talked about this before. But once you've reached, let's say, even that place where there's just this kind of open self, or there's just an open sense of awareness, and —I'll put this in strong inverted commas—"no self," why stop there? Why stop there? Honestly, it would be like Einstein saying, "I've done my special theory of relativity, I think I'll stop there." Or Beethoven saying, "Yeah, I wrote my second symphony, I think that's it now." It doesn't make sense.

We're talking about allowing a desire to come from a different place, recognizing that a desire comes from a different place. And this very much has to do, again, with who we are as human beings. It's mine and it's not mine. It comes from an infinite distance, an infinite beyond, and it's the most intimate thing. And it's beautiful. The desire itself is beautiful, so we wouldn't want it to end.

And yes, along with that very desire, it brings difficulties. It brings frustrations, exasperations, challenges. We feel we're stuck at different points. It burns. It hurts. There's disappointment. There's all that, along with the beauty and the joys and the gifts and the creations, discoveries of it all.

So the why of these exercises is related to the why—why am I practicing?—has to be related to that in the larger sense. And that is related to my fantasy of the self and the path.

All of this is tied together. What ideas, what images do I have that are operating? How helpful are they? How limiting are they? How much sense do they even make? How coherent are they? They will have consequences.

I remember talking to people from very different dharma backgrounds than this woman I described, who had been trained from the beginning in a presentation of the dharma that didn't actually present much more than that basic framework. So that's what she had been taught the dharma was.

In these very different dharma scenes, with different teachings, sometimes people get caught up in certain ideas about what they're doing, certain fantasies. There's the idea that because the dharma has to do with liberation and freedom, it therefore has to do with not struggling. And if we're into something called non-duality, then we should just drop the struggle right now. Don't struggle in meditation. Don't struggle at all. Don't even struggle to stay awake. Just don't struggle.

This idea often goes together with narrow conceptions of non-duality. Don't deal with concepts. Just don't be conceptual. Drop the whole conceptual thing. It's easier, simpler, less struggle, more spiritual, because non-conceptuality and spirituality go together, right?

Out of all this comes a kind of mode of practicing, effectively a technique—although one tries to think of it as not a technique, because one isn't struggling or supposedly not struggling, not doing, not thinking. And it's non-dual. The idea is that it's open, but it actually ends up being very closed, because we've cut off a bunch of possibilities.

No struggling in any way at all, no thinking. But you have to think, you have to conceive. The only little bit of conceiving you're allowed is that conceiving isn't allowed, and you should try to be non-dualistic. Whatever that means.

What this also means, if we link it to other fantasies, is that there can be very little art, because there's very little doing. There's a shrinking of options, a shrinking of the possibilities for creation and discovery. It's not this infinite range and expanding playground of creation, discovery, of artistic possibilities. Practice just ends up being almost like one thing. In all this rhetoric and these convincing ideas and images about openness and liberation, it actually ends up being quite narrow—just doing the same thing over and over. It's one thing, and it's not really leading anywhere except to the same thing over and over. So what's supposed to be open ends up being actually quite closed, closing possibilities, closing the possibility of art in the largest sense.

When we come to soul-making dharma—and we've said this and emphasized it—we could pick other dharma areas like emptiness or whatever, but let's just say soul-making dharma. It requires so much by way of bases, of stepping stones, of prerequisites, preliminaries. It's so sophisticated and subtle, so wide and so deep. So many dimensions and aspects of our being are involved and demanded. Demands are made from them, requiring a lot of sophistication and subtlety and ability and facility in all these different areas.

One could say it's pretty elitist. And actually, I would agree. I think it is elitist in that sense. I'm not sure what the etymology of "elitist" is—it has to do with choosing—but it is elitist in the sense that, well, let me put it the other way around.

Picking up the music analogy a little bit, maybe a better image, a better way of thinking about what we're doing when we're teaching soul-making dharma practice—we could even teach jhana practice or whatever—is different from the usual ways we frame practice. Typically we say this is to do with liberation from suffering, or at least reducing suffering. And as such, as a teaching about the reduction of suffering, reduction of stress, it's for everyone and available to everyone. Therefore we want teachings that anyone can apply, anyone can understand, and it's really important that they're accessible in that way.

There's a kind of legacy we get from the Four Noble Truths, which is that this is basically for reducing suffering—if we water it down a little bit and just say reducing suffering. Of course, it's a wonderful legacy we get from the Four Noble Truths, so rich and brilliant as a teaching, and so powerful. I've talked about that lots before. But it's actually a mixed blessing, this legacy. It has a shadow side, and I've talked about that as well.

Particularly it has a shadow side when in this day and age we start to actually question: what does a reduction in suffering actually mean, and what does it look like, and how noticeable is it at different levels?

When we've done away with the universality of belief—there is no more universal agreement that the end of suffering means the ending of rebirth—what exactly do we mean by ending suffering? I've explored all this before. But despite the massive confusion that surrounds these questions, we still want to understand: what actually do we mean by the third noble truth? And by implication, the first noble truth, and then of course the second and fourth, but principally the first and the third. What do we mean by suffering? What do we mean by ending suffering?

In the swamp of confusion that has emerged from dropping this universality of understanding—whether it's a Theravada universality, a Mahayana universality, or whatever—coupled with the notion that because dharma is about reducing suffering, it somehow needs to apply equally to everyone and be accessible to all, this model brings with it all kinds of issues and problems, its own stumbling blocks and limitations.

Sometimes, more recently, I've been thinking: why not just conceive the whole thing like music school or art school? We teach all levels at this music school or art school—from beginners who have never put their lips to a recorder, never banged on a drum with their fingers, never even shook a rattle. We teach all levels, from that beginner level all the way up, and there's actually no end to it. There's no point where we stop. This music school can just keep going.

But we understand that only some of the people who want to take up music and come to learn and play and develop and practice will have that really deep desire to play at the highest, deepest, freest levels. Of course, only some people have this. In that sense, it's elitist. But if "elite" is etymologically related to "elect" and "choose," then it's your choice—your choice how far you want to go.

Everyone will be challenged by something within that whole range of what's possible in practice and development, but it's your choice. Your choice about what you desire and how far you want to go and how much you want to develop. So yes, it's elitist—what's the problem with being elitist? It's elitist in the same way that music school is elitist. It's not refusing anyone entry. It's just saying that if you want to do that advanced thing, then you need to do this foundational work first, because otherwise you won't be able to do that. But we can teach you this, and after you do that, then let's talk about the other thing if that's what you really want.

We're hampered and tied to thinking about words like liberation and ending suffering or reducing suffering, and there are all kinds of accretions that go with that, particularly around non-elitism and accessibility and the idea that "it's for everyone." Sometimes it might be simpler to change the analogy.

I want to extend this musical analogy, though it gets a little limited here and has clear limitations like any analogy. Since music is something I have a history with, I know that whole area. I was a different kind of musician at different times—a composer, but before that a jazz musician. I studied jazz and worked to develop the art of improvising on the guitar in different jazz idioms, something I was completely dedicated to and put enormous energy into.

When you're learning to improvise jazz guitar, you've got many different skills and arts within one thing. It's not one thing—it's many, many different abilities. And it's open-ended, infinite in its possibilities. Sometimes, when you really get into all this and give yourself to it, there's a sudden growth of ability—of what you can do, what you can play or create or improvise. And you're not even quite sure how that sudden jump of level happened.

Of course it comes out of love—loving what you're doing and loving that whole area and loving the music. It comes out of listening, listening with love and listening with eros to other musicians and music you love. It comes out of playing, and it definitely comes out of practicing. So it emerges from all four of these things. But it's not necessarily the case that I practiced X and then I was able to do X. Sometimes it is, of course, but not always.

Sometimes I practiced X and then eventually I was able to do X. Great, so now I can do X. It's added to my playground. It's added to the freedom that I have to create and discover musically in the moment. But other times I don't practice X, and somehow I'm able to do X in some way I don't even understand how it happened.

Probably more often than not, however, I don't practice X, and then I'm never able to do X, whatever X is. It will never appear in my playing. It will never appear in my creating, discovering, my improvisation, because I never practiced it.

I could talk extensively about this, but I want to keep it brief. If I had to look at death now and reflect back on my life, I think there's one grief. There's one grief in my soul that I think I will take with me to my grave, and it feels like a deep soul grief. That is specifically around not developing certain things in jazz guitar—my ability to do certain things to a level that I would have liked. A level of virtuosity and fluidity, specifically, that I would have desired. So it's actually about technique.

I don't know, maybe that sounds very strange to some people—to look back at life and think that's an odd thing to have grief about. But for me, that's what it is. And it goes very deep. As far as I can tell, it's the one thing, and it's a real soul grief.

In a way, there's a story behind that. I did develop all kinds of abilities on jazz guitar—some very rare abilities, I would say, capacities to do things that are really quite uncommon. Other things that were perhaps less rare or more seemingly obvious, I never got the chance to develop. The reason I never got that chance was partly, well, mostly because they weren't taught.

There was no one at that time—there is now, how many years later, more than thirty years later—but back then there were no people teaching electric guitar technique with a plectrum, with a pick. I went to music conservatories and colleges, and no one could teach that. They could teach it for every other instrument because all those other instruments had hundreds of years of history behind them for people to figure out how to teach piano technique so that people can be very fluid and fly in that way. But on the guitar, it seemed like no one really—if they could do that, they didn't really know how they figured it out. It was something they just stumbled across, and they didn't even realize quite what they were doing. They'd never put it under a microscope. It just worked, so they went with it. But a lot of people couldn't actually do that stuff to the level I'm talking about, so I wasn't alone in this boat.

I had to kind of make do with what I could do and work around my inabilities, my incapacities. I feel really good about that, but there's a grief here. And it has to do with this deep, unfathomably deep, visceral desire, calling, vocation for music to come through, which was then not physically enabled to be fully physically manifest.

I'm going to say that again because this is really key to what I'm talking about in all these talks: it was not enabled to become fully physically manifest. It was never explained to me. I couldn't find anyone to explain, to teach me those things which on other instruments would be completely basic—exercises and such that are just part of how you learn the instrument.

So there's a grief for me there. It's too late to go back. I eventually gave up the guitar, got more into composing, partly because of that, because I felt the limitations. I eventually gave up that and became a Dharma teacher. So who knows? Had I had available to me that enabling and that teaching of technique, and was enabled to fully physically manifest that degree of musical creation in improvisation, maybe I wouldn't have taken those other steps. I wouldn't be giving this talk today; I wouldn't be a Dharma teacher. But that's also been very wonderful, of course, and I feel very much that it's part of my calling too.

Anyway, the main point here—there's lots relevant, but for this talk there's one main reason for sharing this—it's about exercises that allow something to become fully physically manifest, that enable those possibilities.

Just as there are many elements or techniques and capacities and abilities that go together to make up being an improvising jazz guitarist, there are many that go to make up Dharma practice. There's a lot in there, and there's a lot even that goes to make up soul-making Dharma practice.

So when we come to soul-making Dharma practice, when we come to wanting to live a life of soul, we can hope that just practicing, just loving all this soul-making business, listening to the talks and loving them for the most part...

play and I meet with friends and we play soul-making together and all that. And it may be—or I can hope—that it opens possibilities. And it will open possibilities.

But the question is: will it leave some possibilities not opened to me, to my practice, to my soul-making dharma practice, but also to my life and my life in soul, and my soul in life?

We can hope, and maybe it will to a certain extent, but maybe not. When we talk about exercises and techniques, they're not everything. Some of you will be musicians—you know that when you're playing a scale, it's not really music yet. And some of these things we're going to talk about, they're not necessarily even soul-making. I mean, they might be, but like that bone in the wing of the bird or near the wing of the bird, or like just the ability to do certain things—they're crucial. They're absolutely crucial.

They're not everything, but they're necessary for music. They're necessary for the fullness of soul—the fullness of soul-making, formal practice, and the fullness of soul-making in one's life, and soul in one's life, and soul through one's life, and life in soul.

So what I want to offer—okay, that's the end of the introduction—what I want to offer is five exercises. And exercises means they're for practice, which means, in this sense, like doing technical exercises on the piano or whatever it is, or the scale. The point is repeating them, maybe. Gaining facility through the repetition. Not just something to do maybe once or twice, but actually doing them until you really don't need to do them anymore.

They're not necessarily soul-making, as we just said. They won't necessarily—these exercises—bring a kind of sense of a wow experience or some kind of dramatic shift in anything. "Suddenly I was doing this thing and this exercise and following the recording and suddenly there was a shift." They won't necessarily do that. They might, but they won't necessarily.

So five exercises. There's no prescribed order, I don't think, between these five. But I'm regarding them as preliminaries—and I hope you can get a sense of what I mean by that—so even if you're well into soul-making dharma practice by now, there would still be good to add, I think, and to explore. No prescribed order. They form part of what we might call a set of preliminaries, or might hopefully develop into a set of preliminaries. I'll talk about other ones later on.

And so I want to explain more about the why as we go through.

Okay, so five exercises, no prescribed order. Well, I need to choose where to start, so I'll start with one which I'll call exercise number one—but not because it's really number one. We're just calling it that. And it's a movement exercise, okay? All of them have movement, gesture, and voice, and some of them are a lot more complex. So this starts relatively simple. Relatively simply.

Okay, exercise number one.

Now, immediately you're going to hear there's lots of variations. So there's five exercises, but lots of variations within each exercise. This exercise can be done in two ways. It can be done as an actual physical movement—your actual physical body is moving and someone else in the room can see that you're moving. Or it can be done just with the energy body and the imagination, and there's no physical movement.

So all the different variations within this exercise number one can be done either physically or just in the energy body and the imagination without the physical movement. Between these two possibilities—physical body or just energy body—there isn't an order. Or I don't think there's an order. Try. Try different—you know, if you're going to do these a number of times at least, I hope, then experiment with different orders. First the physical and then not, and then the other way around.

Okay, so two large camps: physical and just the energy body. Also then, starting in four postures. So already we've got eight variations, right? We haven't actually started yet. So four postures: sitting, standing, walking, and lying down. The four classic postures of the Satipatthana Sutta.

So that already leads to eight, and then the actual parts of the exercise—we're going to say there's five. Actually, even more. But you can see, it's just already proliferating variation. So it could be just in the energy body, standing, okay?

And then, or physical movement, starting in the walking posture. There are different variations within these different categories of choice.

So one category is whether it's physical or whether it's just energy body. The second category is which of the four postures you're going to start in. Well, let's take, as an example, let's say you start standing.

Then there are five parts of the exercise.

First, you adopt your starting posture and you feel the energy body. So let's say it's standing. You adopt the standing posture and you feel your energy body in that posture. And then you feel or imagine the energy body extending to fill the room that you're in, so that it touches the walls. This isn't something we would always want to do with the energy body at all. Usually we talk about energy body just a little bit bigger than the physical body. But here, with your primarily kinesthetic imagination, you're feeling, imagining your energy body extending to fill the room and touch the walls of the room and the ceiling and the floor. And what does that feel like? Maybe there's some visuals to it, but primarily you want it kinesthetic.

So that's the first thing. You're just standing and you're imagining doing that.

Second, you begin to move. So you have to really take your time working through this. We really want the experience. The intention here—I'll repeat this at the end—the intention here is sensitivity to the energy body and in this case also the projected or expanded energy body, and the space you're in. So really feeling a sense of sensitivity to the energy body, sensitivity to the expanded energy body, and the inhabiting or filling of the space you're in. That's the intention. It's primarily about sensitivity.

So you've adopted the starting posture, you've expanded and you're feeling that. You've extended the energy body and you're feeling that. Second, you start moving your hands and your wrists and your arms slowly, just in an improvised way. Move your hands and wrists and arms any way you want and feel your energy body. And feel and sense, imagine the space, as if you're pushing water or air—which you're doing as you move, you're pushing the air or the energy in the room. Or just imagine you're standing in a swimming pool or floating in a swimming pool, and you're alone in the swimming pool, and just the movement of your arms is going to send ripples out. The movement of the body will automatically send ripples out through the space, through the water there in the pool, and they will reach the sides and then they will bounce off.

We're not just talking about the space of awareness. We're not just talking about expanding the space of awareness—that's a different practice. We're talking about energy body sense expanding, moving and feeling, sensing and imagining not just the space of the energy body in its usual size, but also the extended sense of the energy in the room and how that's connected with and impacted by and filled by the energy of your body movements.

So it's more than just the space of the awareness. We're talking about energy body movements, sensitivity here. Of course, the awareness must extend, if we're going to do this exercise, from, for example, the palms of my hands to the walls. So actually, I first have to have that much expansion of the awareness. But we're saying more than that. Then it's this sense, imagination, felt kinesthetic sense of energy through the movement, in the movement, with the movement, initiated by the movement, propped up by the movement, occupying, filling the whole space.

This is just the second part of this: your hands, your wrists and your arms. Remember this can be done physically. It can be done just in the imagination with the energy body. There's no obvious physical movement there.

It could be done from the standing posture, lying down posture, or sitting posture - there are all these variations.

Spend some time doing that.

The third possibility, the third stage, is to then move your head and neck. You could stop moving your hands and arms and wrists and just move your head and neck. But with the same awareness, the same sensitivity, the same expansion, the same kinesthetic sense and imagination and feeling extending there. Or you could make it cumulative - so now you're moving your hands and wrists and arms and your head and neck freely, improvisationally. Same sensitivity, the same imagination, the projection, the inhabiting, the filling of the space.

Then the fourth stage is to add your legs, your feet, your ankles. They can start moving slowly, improvisatively. Again, that could be where everything else becomes still and you just move them, or you add that to the other areas of the body that are already moving.

And then a final stage - free and improvised movement including the whole body. So the hips, the pelvis, everything.

There are lots of variations, lots of possibilities. The intention is sensitivity to the energy body in the usual sense of size, but also to the much more projected, larger, expanded energy body, and the whole sense of the space that you're in - of inhabiting and filling that space with the energy body, or letting the energy body project to fill that space.

Another variation is that we can do the same thing with faster movements. I would probably start slower because there's much more chance of sensitivity. This really does take a lot of sensitivity - this is the prime intention of this exercise. Actually many of these exercises focus on sensitivity, and also the capacity to expand, the capacity to project and not always be held back. I'll talk more about this later.

But when you've done this for a while, when you've practiced this a few times, then you may want to experiment with faster movements. It may well be that doing it faster is much more tricky to maintain and really tune in and feel and have a good kinesthetic sense or imagination there. But see what happens. If it's too fast, then you need to slow it down until you can find what does work. Or maybe just stay with the fast a little longer because maybe it will come alive.

So that's the first exercise. You can see lots of different variations there. I'm not going to repeat that because you can just rewind and listen to it again.

The second exercise - I realize there are lots of variations, but relatively speaking, it's pretty simple. It gets maybe a little more involved later on in the exercise.

So the second exercise is a voice exercise. The first one is really movement, we could say. The second one is a voice exercise.

Again, broadly speaking, we can do it two ways. We can do this voicing, making an actual sound that's audible to ourselves and to others. Or we can do it only imagining making a sound and feeling that in the energy body, with image and energy body sense. There's no physical sound and no physical movement here. So two ways of doing it, and two ways of doing any element of it.

What we're going to do here is sound extended tones, extended notes - vowels probably, or syllables, or maybe mantric syllables. In this exercise, it doesn't matter which sound, or if it's a mantric syllable, which one. It doesn't matter for this purpose at all.

So make them extended - you hold a note for a long time. Not till you're out of breath, but the idea is long notes. And within that, you have notes at different pitches - higher notes or lower notes.

Use your full range—however high you can go, however low you can go. This isn't directly about stretching that range, though eventually it may connect with that. Use your full range without being uncomfortable, exploring both high and low notes.

The first thing to notice is: where in the body is the center of emanation of this sound you're making right now? Can you notice and feel this? While you're standing there practicing, you're still feeling your whole energy body as we do in pretty much any practice—maintaining that whole energy body awareness as at least a background. But where in the body is the center of the emanation of the sound? Can you notice and feel that?

Any trained singer will be aware of this. Different pitches will feel like they're coming from different places in the body. A very high pitch comes from actually higher in the body, or feels like it does—from the top of the head. From the crown of your head to the pelvic bone is the usual range where a singer will feel the center of resonance, the center of emanation of the sound.

So the first thing is: can you just notice and feel where it's coming from? Within that range, from the top of your head down to your pelvic bone, right down to your perineum, you've got the whole energy body awareness. Then you notice where the center is. Can you include the arms and legs? Can you feel the sound as also emanating from your arms and legs? Can it come from the whole energy body? Remember, the energy body is usually bigger than the physical body.

Do you notice that it's easier to feel and sound from certain places than others? Not so much hitting the note, but actually feeling the center of emanation and being comfortable with it really emanating strongly and surely and full-bloodedly and embodiedly from that center.

Over time, you might notice patterns. Perhaps it's the lower belly that's hard for you to really inhabit and fill out, hard to let that really be a center. Something's blocked there, or just not available. Or perhaps something up in the throat is much more possible, or a higher note. Other people experience the reverse. Just notice.

Maybe over time, with practice, the whole range becomes more evenly available—so that the sound your body is making can emanate full-bloodedly, full-bodiedly, with full presence and full power from any place in the body. And you're comfortable with this. It doesn't feel like there's a dead spot or that it's hard to get feeling there.

That's the first part of this second exercise. The second part is: can I have the sense of the whole energy body emanating? Where is your voice coming from? It seems to come from your mouth and throat, right? But what is it to really feel and let yourself imagine—with kinesthetic imagination, a felt sense—the whole energy body emanating that sound? The sound is really coming from that whole space, which extends a little beyond the physical body.

The third part: can the sound you're making and the sense of the energy body feel like they're mixed together—to quote the Buddha—like water in milk? They're not exactly the same thing, but once you mix them together, it becomes almost impossible to tell them apart. They're not going to separate like oil and water. Can you sense—get a kinesthetic sense and an aural sense—of the sound and the energy body mixed together almost indistinguishably? Hard to tell, almost impossible to separate them apart. They've almost become palpably the same thing. Sound is the energy body, is vibration. The vibration is the sound. The energy body is sound, has become sound, has become vibration.

The fourth part of the exercise: we've got this awareness of the energy body, as usual, and awareness of the sound, of course. Now add to it, similar to the first exercise, a sense of the space around you—the waves in the pool, the ripples in the pool around you. After all, sound is in fact waves in the air.

That's what actually makes sound—sound is waves in air. What is it to have the energy body awareness, to have the awareness of the sound, to be really in that, open to that, sensitive to that, and then also open the awareness to the sense of the space around, the sense of the medium, if you like?

Imagine, feel, hear that medium resonating with the sound, filled with the sound. That sound, that energy that you are sounding, that's coming through you, is filling the space, is reaching the walls. Can you get a kinesthetic felt sense, a kinesthetic imaginative sense, hearing it and feeling it as reaching the walls, the ceiling, the floor, filling the space?

And sometimes you think, oh, well, I need to get louder. Not necessarily. So here's a little sub-variation. Sometimes it's good to get loud. Let yourself get loud, because sometimes that's also—and this is very related to one of the reasons why I'm doing this—sometimes some people really hold themselves back from being loud as a whole. I'll return to this. So sometimes let yourself get loud as part of filling the space.

But you can also have this sense of filling the space, of projecting with the energy body and the sound and letting it fill and impact and shape and flow through and penetrate the medium when you're not necessarily getting louder, even in a big room. And it still feels like you're imagining that it's projecting. You're feeling it as projecting and filling the room.

So that was actually the fifth variation—sometimes you do it loud and sometimes you do it soft. I've run through these because I've woven some of them together.

So the first part is—remember, all this can be with sound or just with the imagination and the energy body. Extended tones, doesn't matter what—high, low pitches, different pitches over your whole range. First part: where in the body is the center of emanation of the sound? Can you notice that? Can you feel it? Whole tip of head to pelvis, and then actually include more and see where it's easier. And what happens over time to that sense of where it's easier to have that sense of the center of emanation?

Second part: can you have a felt sense, a felt imagination of the whole body emanating? The whole body radiating sound that way.

Third part: can the sound emanate and the energy body become mixed? The vibration, the resonance, and the energy body become mixed like water and milk, like milk and water.

Fourth part: with the energy body and the sound awareness, the awareness of the energy body and the awareness of sound, can we also feel, imagine, hear, get a kinesthetic, an aural sense of the whole medium of the space that we're in, and the whole space that we're in resonant with that sound, filled with, filling that space with sound and energy, reaching the walls?

And fifth: can we do that both loudly and softly, but it still fills, expands, radiates?

So I'm going to stop there now and introduce and go through the other exercises in another part. These are relatively simple, but still I think really worth doing. They may sound completely boring or pointless to you. Hopefully I'll explain more about why they're important. But I hope that's clear enough for now. We'll stop there.

CHAPTER 236

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h50

> In this continuation of his teaching on movement, gesture, and voice preliminaries, Rob Burbea presents exercise three—a series of five practices designed to open blocked circuits that prevent soul from expressing through the body. The practices include 'Thunderclap' (emphatic brief gestures that consolidate mind, intention, soul and body), 'Born Aloft by Angels' (surrendering to being held and moved by ethereal beings), 'Raging Beast' (allowing primal energy to move through without implying evil), 'Immovable Protector' (embodying steadfast guardianship), and 'The Serpent' (left deliberately undefined for personal exploration).
>
> Burbea emphasizes these are technical exercises like musical scales rather than experiences meant to produce dramatic openings. He explores why certain soul expressions may be blocked for decades, preventing particular images from arising in practice and limiting soul's manifestation in daily life. The teaching addresses resistance to such practices, noting how blocked circuits can affect everything from anger expression to black-and-white thinking patterns. He discusses the relationship between allowing 'darker' expressions and opening to the full range of imaginal possibilities, stressing that soul needs access to the complete palette for its art. Each exercise can be practiced both physically and through the energy body alone.

These movement, gesture, and voice exercises that we're exploring are intended to be added to what is already available in previous talks recorded over the years. I tried to give a list earlier, though I know there are some I'm forgetting. In fact, I remember sitting right here recording something about ensouling the voice, offering instructions or possibilities for meditation, but I cannot for the life of me recollect where that recording is. So there may be other material as well, but it's all to be taken together as a body of material—a strand within the soul-making dharma, within the practices.

Some of what we'll explore in this set of talks will repeat material from earlier recordings, and some will be unique to each. There will be material in previous talks that I won't repeat here, and conversely, there will be new material here that wasn't covered before. I'm actually curious about how many people who listened to or participated in those earlier exercises—I believe they were part of talks called "Voice, Movement and the Possibilities of Soul" on Dharma Seed—how many actually picked up those exercises and practiced them repeatedly? Even more basically, how many listened and practiced rather than simply listened? And really, how many actually incorporated those exercises into ongoing practice and developed them further?

I'm genuinely curious about this. I'm also genuinely curious that if people heard those talks or experimented briefly but didn't pursue the practices, why not? I think it would be good for all of us to be genuinely curious about this question. Why not? I mean this as a genuine inquiry, not as judgment—not the kind of "Why didn't you do that?" that becomes self-criticism about another thing we failed at or neglected.

This becomes an interesting question insofar as it might shed light on those areas and issues we touched on yesterday: inertia, and the capacity to discriminate significance or the failure to discern significance. Maybe I didn't pursue those practices because of various forms of inertia—inertia in my practice, in my relationship with practice, in what and how I practice. The form of practice can become rigidified, set in particular ways. Practice becomes something where you don't move much, don't make noise, certainly nothing loud or wild or rambunctious like some of those exercises were.

So was it partly inertia, or was it that I simply didn't discern the significance—didn't grasp these practices as something important? There were, as I mentioned yesterday, other reasons having to do with how I presented the teaching, not taking enough time, rushing through material. But insofar as this inquiry sheds light on those two areas—inertia and the capacity to discern significance—it becomes pedagogically interesting as we go forward. Perhaps we need to take more time, really earmark something as significant, put a ring fence around it and establish it clearly as a practice.

So I'll leave that inquiry with you.

We introduced yesterday the first two exercises, and to briefly repeat some of the reasoning behind them: first, they develop sensitivity. The development of sensitivity is such an integral, necessary part of soul-making dharma practices. These practices depend so much on sensitivity—in this case, sensitivity to movement, to gesture, to voice, sensitivity to energy bodies, to space, to sound. All of this was present in exercises one and two: the possibility of developing sensitivity and recognizing how important this is in soul-making dharma practice. We're increasing both the scope of what we're sensitive to—the range of aspects of being and expression to which we're attuned—and deepening the quality of that sensitivity itself.

The second reason has to do with how we can live as human beings in this complex culture of ours, with its intricate social dynamics and psychologies, and find that our energy, our voice, our body can be held in, held back habitually. Often this happens unconsciously, not through conscious choice. We're holding ourselves back, holding ourselves in as a habitual pattern.

And that holding back of our energy and our voice, holding back of our bodily expression as well, is actually a holding back of our libido, of our life energy, of our life force, and also of our eros—again, in the larger, fuller, richer sense of that word eros. It is a holding back of our soul.

This, I think, is very, very common in our culture, and it may be common—I'm going to say more about this as we go on—it may be especially common in certain ways in some dharma cultures.

So there's the development of sensitivity in certain areas, and the increase of sensitivity both in refinement and depth, but also in scope. And there's this question: Is there a habitual holding back or holding in of my energy, of my voice, through my body, which is actually a holding back of my libido and my soul? Do I have a choice in that? Am I even conscious of that? This is very important—very, very important. I'll elaborate as we go forward.

We've talked about using this language of preliminaries and exercises. Just as it's probably obvious, if we call those exercises and the other exercises we'll give today and hopefully in the coming days preliminaries, they're also presupposing other preliminaries—for example, mindfulness, some degree of energy body awareness. So there are preliminaries that are resting on other preliminaries, you could say. That's probably obvious.

But also, if you've been listening to the teachings over the last while, even just over the last couple of years, you can see that some of what we might call preliminaries—what we might ask for as preliminaries from a practitioner as prerequisites—can then become ensouled. This relates to another thread we talked about: the difference between foundation and root, with a root being something that can actually grow. The foundation is something that's fixed. So what is a kind of prerequisite or preliminary can then become an ensouled area and grow and be developed to other levels that we had never even anticipated or intuited or dreamt of.

This is very clear, for example, if we take two areas that we can consider as preliminaries. The energy body—we've seen that it's this kind of thing, this kind of awareness, this kind of sense of the body. People get a hang of that. But after a while, we talked about the imaginal energy body—that very sense of the energy body can become imaginal and can be related to as imaginal image. So it's not just a sort of basic instrument; it becomes itself an erotic, imaginal object. It becomes ensouled, it becomes alive and ensouled. Its depth, the range of its possibility, what it can be, how it can manifest, how we can feel it, the whole relationship with it becomes erotic and imaginal. The whole thing just balloons out exponentially to include other possibilities.

That would be one example of a preliminary or prerequisite that then becomes ensouled and completely opens out—actually infinitely—to other possibilities.

A second example would be sīla, ethics. Again, we rest our teaching as dharma teachings within the dharma framework of sīla, of ethics—in our case, the five precepts that we receive from the Theravāda Buddhist tradition, taking those very seriously as a basis. As practice develops—and I've outlined this in two sets of talks now, "Sīla and Soul" and "The Image of Ethics"—as practice develops and the soul-making dynamic starts involving ethics, sīla itself becomes... values and virtues become erotic imaginal objects, and the whole domain of sīla becomes erotically alive and alive to the soul and for the soul. Then that whole preliminary basis of the five precepts again just balloons out in complexity and depth and dimensionality and range and demand and beauty—all of that.

Those would be two examples of areas where preliminary becomes ensouled and then becomes something that's potentially the opposite of preliminary—super advanced. But the same could be said of something like dāna or even mindfulness. There are lots of possibilities in relation to this idea of preliminaries.

And again, to touch on this thread I'll keep coming back to: the why of all this. Let me repeat something I think I said yesterday. Why preliminaries? Why these exercises, these kinds of exercises? Why even think in terms of exercises or preliminaries?

As I said, we can just hope that the soul-making dynamic—we know, we've heard, or we've even had experience of what the soul-making dynamic does—will expand things. It will expand its range. It will include more and more, and it will expand something that it's got in its vortex, in its dynamics—some area or aspect of our being, our life. It expands that area, we expand with it, our understanding and our experience of that area or aspect of being expands with it, or shatters in the breaking of the vessels and has to be built in a larger way, a deeper, more full, far-reaching way.

So it might be that we can just hope that if we're practicing soul-making—we like it, we're practicing—we can just hope that the soul-making dynamic will expand, will get hold, in its expansion or in the breaking of vessels that happens occasionally from time to time. Sometimes it's just a stretch, sometimes it's actually a shattering. In that whole process, over time, eventually it will just, by itself, come to involve and include and ensoul movement, gesture, voice. We can just hope for that, because that's what the soul-making dynamic does.

However, if those areas—movement, gesture, and voice, or some directions and possibilities within movement, gesture, and voice—if the blocks there that we have are really entrenched, if they're entrenched enough, then the power of expansion of the soul-making dynamic propelled by eros and the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, if the blocks are more entrenched and effectively more powerful than the soul-making dynamic at that point, it won't ensoul those areas, or those possibilities within those areas. Sometimes it does.

Sometimes the eros in the soul-making act simply does its work—it overcomes or stretches those walls, those blocks we've explored before, whether they arise from eros, psyche, logos, or elsewhere. But sometimes that same force encounters barriers it cannot penetrate. The blocks have become too entrenched, too deeply rooted. When this happens, those areas remain outside the soul-making dynamic. They cannot be ensouled. Certain possibilities simply won't open. The movement stops there, the walls remain unmoved, the limitations stay exactly where they are.

Can we know in advance whether any blocks we carry—often unconsciously—will prove weaker or stronger than the soul-making dynamic's push? How could we predict whether the fermentation and force of soul-making will successfully penetrate those particular areas of our being and life as it reaches them? I don't believe we can know this beforehand.

Certainly, in many cases the dynamic does expand those limits, pushing open walls, creating and discovering new possibilities—new roads for soul, new territories and landscapes to explore. But inevitably there will be blocks and walls that soul encounters in its process that it simply cannot overcome. The movement stops there. Those areas remain unreachable, unopened. No entry. The road remains closed.

What does it actually mean for movement, gesture, and voice to be ensouled? When we speak of these aspects of our being becoming ensouled, what exactly are we pointing toward? I believe it means at least two significant things, both quite profound.

First, it means that when soul wants to express and communicate through or using these aspects of our being—movement, gesture, voice—it can. These domains become available. Roads open within them, travel becomes possible, expansion can occur. The degree of possible development here is infinite. Consider the analogy of music and how completely open-ended the development of these arts can be—the art of movement in dance, of gesture, of voice. The art of soul expressing through these media has no limits in terms of depth, height, or breadth. What some artists achieve is simply staggering, not merely in technical mastery, but in the profound soul power that flows through great art when deep technique couples with the full dimensions of soul.

For most of us, though, this availability probably manifests more simply—as soul expressing naturally in everyday life, in living soulfully or fulfilling what we might call our soul duties. When soul wants to express and communicate through these aspects of being, it can. This might involve developing movement, gesture, or voice to some degree, perhaps even extraordinarily, but more likely it means these channels remain open for soul's ordinary manifestation in daily life. Nothing bars these directions and domains from being ensouled; nothing prevents soul from flowing through and expressing itself in and through these aspects of our being.

The second meaning is equally important: the movement, gesture, and voice of oneself or another—in their everyday, ordinary usages—can be sensed with soul. A voice simply speaking in conversation, exclaiming something; a hand moving as it accompanies speech—these ordinary expressions of movement, gesture, and voice can be sensed as angelic, as refracting the angel, the daemon. They are perceived as dimensional, unfathomable, divine in origin, echoing the eternal.

These two meanings of what it means for movement, gesture, and voice to be ensouled are both essential if we speak of opening our lives to soul-making or allowing our lives to be open to soul.

I've shared about what I call my grief—though perhaps regret captures it better—particularly regarding jazz guitar improvisation and the technical mastery I never achieved. When people ask about approaching death and whether there's anything I regret, I can honestly say there's just one thing.

And it's that. Why the word regret? Because even though I did go to music school and conservatory, you actually end up having to figure out a lot of stuff on your own, especially if you're doing jazz. You have to find your own ways to do things, your own avenues that you're interested in and develop them.

So there were plenty of things, even within jazz, that I figured out on my own, so to speak—picking up different pieces here and there, following my intuition, following my eros, essentially, and playing, experimenting, creating, discovering. Plenty of things I figured out on my own. And looking back, of course, I could have chosen technique in the sense that I was talking about the other day, this particular kind of technical area. I could have chosen that as something to focus on and say, "Let me just really try and figure this out and get really interested in it."

But actually, I effectively chose other areas instead—other areas of music, other areas of guitar playing as well. And I developed them. That was wonderful and very fruitful and beautiful. But I could have chosen technique. So it's actually a kind of regret. Yes, I wasn't taught it because, as I said, there wasn't the pedagogy there at that time. But I could have just kept bashing away in this kind of dogged way that one has if one really wants something. But I didn't. I chose other things instead. So there's regret. There's some responsibility that falls on me.

So in a way, offering these particular teachings now—offering them so that there's the possibility that you can practice. Practice so that you don't end up regretting. That you don't end up regretting not supporting yourself fully or allowing yourself or enabling yourself fully to move in the direction or be moved in the direction of what you want with respect to soul-making dharma. And also what you want with respect to soul in life—the expression and the living of soul in life, your soul in your life. We must call that soul-making dharma. It's not something separate.

So offering these is part of why I share the story of that grief and regret. Because sometimes there are things that are really important to our soul, and it's only the fact that we didn't take care of some really basic nuts and bolts that we actually were not able then to reap the benefit and play in the fields of the territories that we would have loved to explore.

So this offering is so that you have that choice, and you have a conscious choice. You can practice so you don't regret.

We said yesterday that these are small pieces, these exercises, this emphasis on movement, gesture, voice, and the exercises we'll do—they're kind of small, little small pieces, but they're indispensable, both. So they're not super central, not a super big deal, but they're indispensable, both. There's a kind of—not contradictory, but two sides of that statement, obviously.

How do you pick it up? What does hearing something like that do to your relationship and attitude to this whole notion of preliminaries and exercises and these particular ones that we're working through?

You probably want to avoid two extremes here. There's the "small pieces" side—therefore one hears "nah, it's not important," and one maybe never bothers to do these exercises. Or, well, okay, I do them once or twice. That would be one extreme, and I think it would probably be a mistake for most people. Maybe not for everyone, but for most people.

The other extreme you want to avoid is when you hear this "small pieces but indispensable" and therefore drop everything else and spend hours every day doing these exercises, vowing to do no other practices until you've completed three years of just these exercises every day or whatever it is.

As usual, a little bit of middle way can go a long way—bringing some intelligence here, knowing one's patterns, recognizing the kinds of inertia one typically gets entrenched in, falls into. All that's really important. As usual, it's really about discernment and intelligence and applying that to one's practice.

And just a small but important practical thing that I didn't say yesterday: if anything in these exercises, for any reasons—physical reasons or reasons of your health—if any part of an exercise or any exercise feels like that wouldn't be good for my body or that's just not possible for my body or it would be dangerous or something (which is the case for me at this point for one or two of these things), just don't do it or adapt it. Find, get, understand, discern what the kernel of it is, what the point is, and adapt it. Adapt it to your body, your body's condition right now, and the needs and capabilities of your body right now.

Okay, so let's move on and introduce exercise three. Now again, there are five exercises within this, so whether it's actually exercise three or exercise series three—it doesn't matter.

But there's five within them, I'll go through them. Again, each of these five could be done physically—concretized into actual movement and vocalization. It could be done concretely, physically, or it can be done just with the energy body, in the sense of the energy body, in the imagination only, where there's nothing physical or audible, perceptible there.

So each of the five can be done in either or both of those ways, and I would encourage exploring both—really, really encourage exploring both the concrete physical and the not concretized, not physicalized, just the energy body, just the image sense.

I can give these sort of little nicknames to these five. I'm not sure I'm such a fan of the nicknames—I've just come up with them very hastily—but it doesn't really matter. You could just go by numbers or you can make your own nickname.

The first one of the five, I've just called something like Thunderclap or Thunder and Lightning. But don't take that too literally and don't take it too narrowly either. What I mean by this exercise, what I want to get at by this exercise—and I think this one is really, really important—actually this one more than any other of all the exercises I'm offering was the start of this idea that something needs to be offered. It would be a good idea to offer something. This one I think is very important.

What I mean is: the object is an emphatic, brief or sudden gesture or movement, maybe with a vocalization, but the whole thing is maybe two seconds, roughly. Something very emphatic and relatively short. If there's a vocalization, it's also relatively short.

But within that, emphatic means there's force in it. There's power in it. There's energy and strength in it. And there is soul coming through. In this case, I mean soul in a slightly more limited sense, or rather as a minimum in a limited sense. It may come through in this fully imaginal sense, but I don't necessarily mean that at the start. It's just an exercise. I mean soul coming through—I mean soul as the spirit, the life force, the being, the person, the energy.

And really, it's coming through in a consolidation, in a gesture, in a movement, in a vocalization that consolidates, coheres, coalesces mind, intention, soul and body, in and through body movement, gesture or voice.

So something like just a stamp of the foot and maybe some kind of gesture with the arms or the fists, or just a gesture with the arms, or just stamping the feet, or a kick, or a step, or a karate chop. It's the movement itself. Anyone can do the movement—well, some of us can't do these kinds of movement at this point. But most people without physical difficulty can do something like that movement.

What's much harder is to have that sense of real coming together, coherence, congruence, consolidation, coalescence, integration. In that brief two seconds, the integration of mind, intention, body, person, in and through the body, movement, gesture, and voice.

And again, the vocalization could be anything. It could be a "ha," or a slightly longer tone. It really doesn't matter. And again, it could be spontaneous—you don't actually know what you're going to do. You just feel the impulse and let that coalesce and let it come out. Or it could be precise—you've rehearsed it and you know exactly what it looks like and what it's going to sound like and you do that. This will apply to all of these five examples: those two alternatives.

It would be easier if you could see me and I could demonstrate, even though I'm very limited in what I could do physically right now. But I hope you can get the sense of this. When someone is doing Kung Fu or Karate, in a way that's what they're doing. They chop bricks or whatever it is, or they make a move. That's part of their training: to bring everything together—mind, intention, soul and body like that.

And it's surprisingly rare, and in some circles it's even more rare than it might be in other circles. So can I do this? Can I train in doing that?

And as I said, I think this is the most important one, perhaps even of everything I'm going to offer. There are reasons for me saying that, which I'll come back to. But it may be that you just think, well, I don't know, that doesn't sound very interesting at all. Just notice your response.

After you've done your gesture, if this was on retreat—if we were doing this on retreat and I was introducing this—I would say, okay, the way we're going to do this is, let's say we have this whole week retreat. Every day you're going to come into an interview room with me, and I'm going to sit there while you do this thunderclap or thunder and lightning movement, gesture, vocalization thing. You just come in, prepare yourself, and then you do it in front of me while I'm watching you.

Then after you do it, you assess it. Maybe you say, "Oh yeah, felt like I wasn't quite in my feet there," or "I could feel I was holding back a little in my voice," or "I could feel like the energy was really coming through, but it was more hysterical than coherent. It wasn't really congruent."

And then after you assess, I assess. I assess you.

This might sound odd in our culture, in our dharma culture—a kind of little exam where you have to do something in front of the teacher and then they assess you. I'll explain why that would even be part of it in a retreat setting. Of course, if you're not in a retreat setting, then either you have to do it on your own and assess yourself, or you could do it with a dharma friend.

But I think even the ability to really read these things in another person and sense them is quite rare and something that needs developing. It will probably only develop through practice for most people—through doing it oneself. Then some people will develop the ability to sense these things with other people. We can be easily misled in these areas, very easily misled, and that's something I'll come back to later.

So again, if we were in a retreat setting and I was introducing this, I'd say, "Come once a day. You're going to do this thing. It will be a thread through your retreat." You can practice these exercises on your own as much as you want in motionless silent meditation, as I said, just with the energy body and with the imaginal sense. And you can also practice—for example, if we were at Gaia House—you can go out onto the grounds and just practice as much as you want. Then once a day, you'd come and do this thing.

I'll come back to what that assessment bit is about. Anyway, that's number one. So I hope I've conveyed something there. It would be easier to just see me, but anyway, we're recording this.

That's the first one. The second thread of this exercise is—and again, I'm not sure about the name—something like "born aloft by angels."

Here, not two seconds. Maybe you've got a maximum of two minutes. You don't have to use all that time—a maximum of two minutes. Certainly more than twenty or thirty seconds, but somewhere between, let's say, thirty seconds and two minutes.

You let your body, or you express with your body, the image of being born aloft by angels. Somehow these beings who have no weight are bearing you aloft, holding up your body on these gossamer threads of love and light, making your body buoyant, floating, light, weightless. Your body can give itself to being held by the angels and moved by these angels.

The body, in giving itself, can become fluid. Your body becomes fluid in this—almost the way that sometimes when they celebrate at a party, you can lift someone up, and if there's enough people, you can pass them along. Or in a big crowd or at a concert, you know, pass people along hand to hand. A big crowd passes a person along. Something like that, but much more delicate and almost ethereal.

The body becomes fluid in surrendering oneself to that being held and being moved. Another part of it is the surrendering oneself—surrendering one's energy body and physical body and heart as much as possible, and soul.

Probably in this one there's no vocal component. It's just moving your body in a way that expresses that as much as possible. And again, if we were on retreat, you and I might take turns in assessing that.

The third part of this exercise, or the third exercise in this series of exercises, is what we might call "the raging beast."

I don't know what even comes up in your mind now as a reaction when you hear "raging beast." Of course there are many types of beast. Some have tails, some have horns, some have fangs, some have teeth, some have tongues—all kinds of stuff. Many kinds of beasts. We're not going to put a limit on that. It's just a raging beast or the raging beast.

Maybe it's a ravenous beast, maybe it's not. Maybe it's just raging. Careful how you hear this. Do you hear "raging beast" and then hear evil, for instance, or ill-will? I certainly don't hear that implication. To me, it doesn't imply that at all. So I want to be very clear about this: it does not necessarily imply evil or ill-will.

Again, somewhere between thirty seconds and two minutes. It might be that within those thirty seconds to two minutes, there are bursts. So you have a little burst of letting this thing come through your body, or feeling into your body, and the movement and gesture and vocalization that might come with that. Then that subsides a little, you let it go, and you gather the intention, gather the citta, gather the energy, body, awareness, and then do it again. Another burst of, you know, up to fifteen seconds, whatever it is. This is all quite loose. Or it may be just two minutes straight—you're just really in this thing. Whatever.

Again, vocalization is possible but not necessary. So maybe sometimes you do it and there are vocals that come with it, sometimes not. Maybe try both ways. And again, depending on the context, we would both take turns in assessing that, getting more discerning and discriminating about what's working there, what's blocked, what's being included, what the issues are, what areas of the body or ranges are opening or not.

The fourth one is something we might call the immovable protector or the immovable guardian. Maybe they're human, maybe they're inhuman, maybe they're demonic, maybe they're angelic, maybe they're animal. Maybe they're some kind of mythic creature. It doesn't really matter.

The immovable protector or guardian—what are they protecting? Maybe they're protecting the earth. Maybe they're protecting in relation to some kind of social injustice or racial injustice. That might change from time to time. What's core here is this immovable protector or immovable guardian.

Again, a maximum of two minutes. It may be that within those two minutes it's broken up into little bursts of expression, of movement, gesture, voice—perhaps up to fifteen seconds, then gathering, stopping, regrouping, another burst. It may be, even in the name "immovable protector," that there's very little movement. But in the stance, in the gesture, in the feel of the energy body, the being, the mind, the soul, that image of an immovable protector guardian is gathered and expressed and manifest.

So maybe a lot of movement, maybe a little movement, maybe very little movement, or even no movement. But it's in the gesture, it's in the stance, it's in the posture, it's in the feel of the energy body, or it may be in the voice. And again, if we were in a certain context, we would do this double assessment.

The fifth one I'm just going to call the serpent. The serpent. But I'm not going to say anything about it. What does it mean, the serpent? What might it mean? What's the range of possibility that it might mean? The serpent. Again, maybe up to two minutes, and may include vocal, maybe not. The serpent. There are a couple of deliberate reasons I'm not saying anything in terms of what that might be.

So five parts, each possibly both concretized and physical, or just in the energy body, just in the imaginal sense, image sense, imaginative sense—because as I said, it might not be completely imaginal, and that's fine. And also, as mentioned, it might be that they're just spontaneous and improvised movements, gestures, vocalizations, or it might be that they're quite rehearsed and you know precisely what the body and voice are going to do beforehand. So try both ways.

Those are the five, with variations, for what we'll call exercise series number three.

A little bit more about the why. As I said, especially that first one—what we're calling the thunderclap, or thunder and lightning—this ability to really gather the citta, the intention, the soul, the mind, the body, the movement, the gesture, the voice, to gather it powerfully into one coherent, congruent expression, gesture, movement, energy—it's quite rare.

And I have come to wonder recently whether it's even rarer in some Dharma circles, including our own. This capacity to actually gather everything—the citta, intention, soul, mind, body, movement, gesture, voice—into one coherent, congruent expression seems quite rare. In different ways, a person avoids it, never manifests it, falls short of it, falls shy of it, prevents it, has a bit of it but with a hollow space in the middle. There are many, many possibilities for how we avoid this wholeness.

Often that kind of coherence of body, mind, energy and soul is missing as a possibility. It's like the circuits are simply not there, or they're cut, or they're missing. When these circuits are severed, something profound happens: certain kinds and ranges of images won't arise for a soul-making practitioner interested in imaginal practice. Something is blocked in those circuits, and it limits what arises imaginally.

As we said before, if the eros-psyche-logos dynamic is strong enough—more powerful in its movement than whatever blocks or limits or holdings are there—then an image can arise that actually breaks open those walls, reconnects those circuits. A flame, a spark jumps over, and in jumping over, connects two points, reignites, makes available again, reconfigures that circuit. This comes from the power of the soul-making dynamic constellating an image, and that image does something. The power of the image is allowed to do something, or has enough soul-making power to reconstitute, reconfigure, reform that circuit.

But oftentimes, as I said, that won't happen. These circuits remain cut, and certain kinds of images, a certain range of images, simply won't arise in practice. They can't, because the circuit is severed. It's cut in relationship to movement, gesture, voice, energy, body, possibility, and self-view—all kinds of things are involved.

Without those images, there won't be soul-making in that direction. There won't be soul-making in formal practice, in meditation practice in that direction, because the circuits are cut. But it may also be the case that there won't be soul and soul-making in certain areas of one's life—no possibility of ensoulment in certain directions of duty and certain kinds of manifestation.

Both these lacunae, both these gaps—the impossibility of certain images arising and the impossibility of soul opening, traveling, moving, manifesting in certain directions in one's life—have profound consequences. They affect one's psychology, one's whole psyche, the heart, relationships with others, one's duties in life including soul duties, possibilities for one's life, work, life choices we make. And we may not even realize this is happening, or understand why we're making this choice and not that choice. We don't realize it's because this circuit is blocked, unavailable. Therefore the soul-making and the soul cannot move in that direction, and certain choices don't even occur to us.

This kind of pattern often operates beneath our awareness, setting all kinds of consequences—psychological, emotional, relational, in terms of work, life choices, duties, possibilities. Some will say about these exercises: "I don't know, this just isn't me," or "It's not relevant to me." They might participate a few times but feel it's just not interesting or applicable. It will seem that way, but actually it's because the circuit is cut. This makes it very hard to discern what's really going on.

All this is by way of saying: be careful if you have resistance to some of these exercises. Such resistance is probably very normal, and of course you're free to do whatever you want, to pick up and put down as you choose. I'm simply inviting you to take care, to have a closer look, to engage in real questioning and inquiring, rummaging around and wondering.

In this case, it means wondering about one's whole life and the patterns of one's life. It's not just wondering about how you felt in that moment when someone suggested an exercise and you thought, "Yeah, okay" or listened and felt, "All right." The invitation is to really inquire: is there something here—a much larger trajectory, or absence of trajectory, patterning, limitation, blind spots, incapacities, impossibilities?

You can do what you want, but I offer this invitation to take care and to really inquire. If you try these practices once or twice and then neglect them, again the question arises: why?

Why would you neglect this? And again, as a real question, as a genuine inquiry.

As I said, it's not that everyone needs to do all this, because some people may already have all that range available—if we just talk about these five we just talked about today, or include the ones we did yesterday—may already have all that range available. It's all there vividly and vitally and juicily and soulfully in image, in the energy body, in their physical body and voice in the manifestation there, available in their life. For some people, it's all there, right? "I'm not really interested in spending my time doing that," and yes, why would you need to? You don't need to. I don't need to practice the C major scale again, or practice that particular technique again, because I've taken it as far as it's going to be developed. I can move on to developing other things.

But just to know that if that's not the case, if all that range is really not available, or not really available in the range of images, in the energy body, in the physical body, in the life, in the directions of one's life, in the expressions and manifestations of one's life—then there will be consequences. Most likely there will be consequences, there will be further consequences, and those consequences will include limitations on soul-making in life. There'll be consequences to neglecting and not picking up and just kind of giving in to one's inertia without really examining it and questioning it.

So always the choice must be yours. You must have that autonomy. But just a real—you can hear it's a strong encouragement to inquire and to question: do I really know what's going on for me here? And here doesn't just mean here and now; it means in my life, in the patterns of my life, in the choices of my life, in the directions I end up taking and not taking.

Some of these examples we said take two seconds or three seconds or less to do. But the circuits they need may have been shut down or short-circuited or chopped or snipped or whatever for decades. Decades. So it can seem like the exercise is really not a big deal—this is a two-second thing. But the circuits that they need, or the circuits that are involved in these exercises, or that these exercises in a way are trying to reinstate, may have been shut down for decades.

And therefore it may take repeated practice, certainly maybe a long time of practice, to be able to do these exercises well, to do them properly. Even that first one I was talking about, this sort of sudden, emphatic, thunderous gesture and movement and vocalization—to really show up there, coalesce with force, with all my soul force and power, not held back, embodied, fully embodied, fully congruent. It may take a while to do them well, to do them properly, to develop that.

All this is not for the sake of self-empowerment. It's not for the sake of winning friends and influencing people. It's not for the sake of making you more attractive. It's not for the sake of making you more whole or more integrated. It's not for the sake of some kind of catharsis—"Oh yeah, get my anger out" or whatever it is.

But it's primarily so that, as I said, if the soul wants to manifest in image, in energy body, in emotion, or in life and in duty in life, using these kinds of faces, expressing these kinds of theophanies—if that's what soul wants through you, through image, through energy body, through emotion, through life and duty—if that's what soul wants, it can. That's the primary purpose for these kinds of exercises.

Secondarily, through that, I think, through doing these exercises and some of the ones we've done on other retreats as well, and some of the ones we did yesterday, it can also, as I said, begin to awaken and ignite the possibility of sensing our everyday movement, gesture, and vocalizations of them being sensed with soul, without them being in any way extraordinary. And this is part of sensing ourselves and sensing others with soul. Other aspects of the being, other aspects of life begin to be dimensionalized in that way, as we said.

So why this business about the assessment and the sort of exam situation? Very unusual in our dharma tradition. Of course, in other dharma traditions it's rare, but it does exist absolutely in other Buddhist dharma traditions. Why would I include that if we were in a different situation, if we were actually on retreat and I was introducing this? Why?

Because being seen and judged makes it usually, for most people, more challenging. One gets self-conscious, one holds back, all kinds of reasons. Someone doesn't even know the reason. But that's actually part of it. Because again, if we think about what the relationship here is between these exercises and the possible manifestations or duties, work, whatever it is that soul will ask you to do, will want you to do—those two, the manifestations of your duties, will be seen and judged in the world and by the world.

And what happens then? What happens to our energy, to our voice, to our expression through the body when we feel or know that we are being seen and judged in and by the world?

So putting that piece in—the assessment, the examination element—actually makes it more difficult usually and more challenging. And that's actually part of it, because that reflects, mimics the actual situation that soul finds itself in, in life. Soul is in life. And so that's what we need to work with.

And still, I wonder if it can be hard, not easy to understand why these exercises, why we're introducing this. So I've introduced it with a few people now, just a few. And sometimes in the exchanges, trying to explain it, sometimes the person understands immediately—but actually it's often easier when I'm demonstrating something that they seem to understand immediately. But then often after that, they sort of forget and they veer off into something else. Something's happened—the practice has diverted, or they forget. Something that they understood instantaneously with me working one-on-one in a room with them, showing them something, and they just got it immediately through me giving examples with body, voice and gesture, and they seemed to get it and it was all fine. And then it just kind of veers off into something else. They've lost the understanding of why, or they forget, or they drag in other kinds of propensities or habits of view.

Or what can happen is, if I'm not demonstrating, it's actually very difficult for a person to understand what it is that we're talking about or why this is important. Sometimes even working with a person with energy body and voice, it can feel very alien, or they're not really sure what we're getting at, or they can't really tell the difference in two movements or vocalizations they made. They can't really even tell the difference between them in regard to what we're talking about—how much one is there, how much it's radiating and filling a space, these kinds of things.

Or sometimes I might suggest to a person, "Why don't you learn to sing that song and sing it in a way with the full energy and really with the whole body, like we were talking about in yesterday's exercises, and with the whole presence there and being and person coming through, and not held back in the voice and the body and all of that." And I remember one person suggesting, the first time I suggested the idea, he was saying, "You know, choose something like a heavy metal song or a punk song or something." And that was a misdirection in terms of the teaching I gave. It can be that genre, but actually the singer, if we're talking about singers, is quite held back and contracted, and they're not really fully in their voice, or fully—their body is not really expressing things.

And it might, at a superficial glance, be quite hard to even discern in other people. It might look like, well, the guy's raging around and jumping about on stage, and he's clearly very angry about something or other, but actually there's a tremendous amount of contraction and block there, and the voice is almost being squeezed out through a tiny little hole. Or with this song and that song, we don't recognize where this singer is actually fully, let's say, not holding back in their voice. They're fully inhabiting their voice and their energy is fully inhabiting the space that they're in and fully reaching the audience, the physical space that they're in, and their whole body is involved, and their whole body is emanating, radiating the sound and the song and the spirit of the song. And other times it can be hard for someone to realize when that's the case and when it's not the case. They're both good songs, they're both good singers. We're talking about something else here.

Or, as I said, might be, try this with people and they just didn't—I don't know, that just didn't land. It just doesn't seem—I don't think that's relevant to me. It might be for other people, I don't think it's relevant to me, or I don't think I need that. Or it just doesn't interest me. So that's also something that I've encountered.

In exactly those instances, I would really disagree with their assessment there. It's precisely a small but absolutely indispensable piece that they don't have yet, that's very relevant, that they do need, and that they should be interested in, would be my opinion. So it's really interesting what can happen here in terms of the whole sense and view of this whole area. It can just completely pass one by, like we just don't recognize there's anything of significance or value or personal relevance here at all.

Or for other people it can be just the whole thing—and I think this was the case when we did those exercises in that retreat, which admittedly were, some of them were quite intense, but some of them were comical. And the person can be—was it the voice movement? Possibly it was the Soul retreat, I think. And I think for a couple of people it's just so alien. Those kinds of ranges of vocalization or expression or manifestation or body or gesture, just really unusual for them. And not at all what they associate with spirituality or dharma or anything like that. Now, they might not even say that, perhaps out of respect, but it's there. And it just doesn't fit a kind of picture or idea or view that they have. And it's very, very alien.

So, to me, this is not just the doing of it, but also the whole sense of it, and the whole capacity to discern both its significance, but also its presence or its absence. As we were just talking about the first of these five exercises, we could talk about any of them, this is something that can be strikingly undeveloped for practitioners who, in other ways, may be very well developed. Very well developed. So I find that really, really interesting.

Sometimes, again, I'm still on the why aspects. Sometimes working with someone in an interview one-to-one or whatever, and it might be there's an emotion or a dukkha or a frustration or something that's there that they've brought in—maybe they weren't even aware of it when they came in, maybe they were aware of it, it doesn't matter.

This emerges—this emotion, this dukkha, this frustration. And with guidance, with one-to-one guidance, they can help to relate to that emotion, dukkha, or frustration so that it opens something, creates something, instigates something in the energy body, perhaps as an image. Maybe both, maybe in any order—perhaps the image comes first, then the energy body experience, or vice versa.

Here's this difficulty, and then with guidance and the kind of crucible of care that's there, something emerges, or it transforms. The alchemy there allows something to transubstantiate, really, and manifest in the energy body as image. And that manifestation in the energy body and as image opens up, in that moment, a whole new sense of self and also a sense of the body. I've given different examples of that over the years in talks. That would be quite a common occurrence.

But often what happens is that new sense of self and open sense of body—whatever capacity, etc.—will revert back to the usual shapes and structures. And oftentimes that reversion happens after not very long at all. Sometimes not, but that's also quite common.

When it happens, it's quite a dramatic experience—the sense of something alchemically emerging in the energy body and the image, the beauty and power of the image, the soul being touched by the image, and the new sense of self. It's all like, "Wow."

But the purpose here in these exercises is not so much the wow and the dramatic experience. What we have in those examples from interviews is a kind of dramatic, usually dramatic emergence of something that does very understandably trigger a kind of wow response, and is a dramatic, compelling experience. This is not what we're aiming for here.

It's more like, as I said, we're talking about etudes—or even less than etudes. Certainly in these first three exercises, they're more like just scales or technical exercises. They're not necessarily going to feel amazing. They probably won't. I mean, they might do, actually—you really don't want to limit things. But the point is to view them more as scales and technical exercises.

On that point, and again thinking about pedagogy in a larger way, if you were to ask me, looking back over my Dharma practice and retreats and all that, about dramatic experiences and dramatic openings that I've had over the years, I could describe many, I'm sure. I could say, "Oh, that happened in this situation, that other thing happened in that situation," whatever it is. So I could tell you about dramatic experiences and dramatic openings.

But if you ask me another question—what has made really long-term differences in terms of long-term openings or long-term being helpful long-term—the answer would not necessarily be the same as dramatic experiences.

I think about, for example, different week or ten-day retreats that I've done. There have been a number where I could say, "Oh yes, it was on that week retreat where I had that experience—that was pretty amazing. And on that other week retreat that dramatic experience happened." But the answer to the second question about what made long-term differences would not be the same.

Actually, what seems to have made long-term differences, if I'm answering this question just for myself now, is the possibility or when I have been able to repeat something—repeat a practice, do it over and over again. A practice or approach that's helpful, relevant, but also has some eros for me, that's alive for me, that's growthful, and that's an edge, and that therefore is interesting and exciting.

And I've been in a situation—either because I'm on personal retreat and I don't have to listen to everyday new instructions from the teacher and go along with the group, I've been on personal retreat and I just follow my own thread there and develop this thing, develop this practice that I'm exploring or discovering—or in everyday life, just every day getting on a track of something that I'm really interested in and repeating it, developing it, growing with it.

So that would be more my answer to what has really made genuine long-term difference in helpful ways, different kinds of helpful ways. The answers to what has been amazing, dramatic, wow experiences—how much does it overlap with my answer to what has really made long-term, genuine, genuinely helpful differences?

If I asked you the same question, what would you think? What would you answer? And careful not to confuse the wow factor, the feel-good factor, the dramatic factor with what makes a long-term difference. That may be something you want to reflect on. Of course, you might have a different answer, but it may be something you want to reflect on.

I've been on other retreats—I remember going on some Goenka retreats and getting a lift back with a group of people in a big truck or van. We were all talking and listening, and a lot of them, it seemed, had come from backgrounds where they were really kind of—I don't know what the word would be—like they partied hard. They had very little discipline in their lives, and some of them had addiction issues, and that's how they would put it.

And then they came on a Goenka retreat, and it's suddenly almost like being thrown into a high-discipline prison sort of structure compared to their life, where there was no discipline. Sit, sit, sit. They don't even walk—just sit, sit, sit. And sit through the pain again, again, again, many hours a day.

And for quite a few of these people, it seemed that doing this ten-day ultra-disciplined Goenka course for them really did kind of dramatically break the momentum of the unhelpful patterns in their life.

The lack of discipline in their lives, the hard partying, and whatever else—being thrown into that context of the Goenka retreat with all its discipline and pressure and intensity, that continuity of intense effort, created a dramatic break. After the retreat, this dramatic break was enough to generate a kind of momentum that could change their everyday practice and life, helping them maintain discipline and good habits they felt they had previously lacked.

So it may well be that in those kinds of cases, drama and the dramatic "wow" experience—even if dramatically unpleasant, though often there would be a breakthrough in the retreat and things would become easier and pleasant—did allow and support more long-term helpful changes in life as well.

But will it be the same in other styles or emphases of practice? Soul-making retreats, for example, have a very different flavor. The whole tenor, atmosphere, what we're doing, how we're doing it—the flavor of softness as opposed to intense pressure and effort—all these things are different. Particularly what we're doing and how we approach it is not the same.

So it may not apply in the same way. The fact that you go somewhere and have an amazing experience—so beautiful on that seven-day soul-making retreat, or perhaps a metta retreat, or some other kind where something touches one deeply—of course that's important and lovely, but it doesn't necessarily translate into making a long-term difference.

This is something to think about as we go forward as a sangha with soul-making. Pedagogically, we need to consider: is this model of week-long group retreats really the most fertile, the most soul-making in the end? Beautiful as the experience of that week can be, touching as some of those experiences are, might it be that something more steady—courses, classes, groups—actually provides more support? A different kind of support, but a necessary kind of support for making a real, more long-term difference in terms of soul and soul-making, what soul needs.

I don't know, I'm just thinking about it. But really, with these exercises, think of them more as technical exercises, like practicing scales, as opposed to something that's going to suddenly create an amazing experience because this image came or that something happened. It might be, but that's not the point so much, and that's certainly not how we should judge them.

It's something like practicing scales, or to shift the analogy from musician to instrument—if you had a piano where certain keys get stuck when they're not played regularly, so when you press them, no sound comes out, then you try to play or improvise something and reach that note only to find nothing comes because the key is stuck. This isn't a perfect analogy, but perhaps if those keys were played more regularly, they could be freed up so they don't get stuck, making them available for the music.

What we're really talking about again is what soul might need. Yes, there are psychological health reasons why these exercises might be beneficial for some people at certain stages of their lives. But even those psychological health reasons can be conceived as being on a continuum with soul reasons. The soul might need that kind of psychological health. The soul might need for those circuits to be connected, working, and available in movement, gesture, body, and voice. As I've said, there may be consequences—all kinds of consequences that aren't necessarily obvious at all.

Sometimes what happens is we don't let certain kinds of body movement or expression, certain manifestations of voice, into the body, into the possibilities of movement and gesture. It might be certain—I'm going to use the word "dark," though it can mean many different things—some of the darker faces and expressions given as examples in exercise number three. Again, this has nothing to do with evil; I'm not using those words synonymously at all. But they're not let into the body. The body is not open to that. The expression, voice, gesture, and movement are not open to that.

Sometimes those kinds of things may come as images for a person, but it may not be enough. It may be that their soul wants more images like that, or a fuller range, or more depth to images like that, and we're only getting a trickle of what could come through. Or it may be that having images alone is not enough—I'll come back to that.

It may even be that in blocking the dark images, somehow there's also a blocking of more—if you like—light images. More conventionally or traditionally angelic kinds of images. This isn't obvious at all. Because I'm not letting this darkness into the body, there's also a block in my imaginal practice of a certain range of light images. We want the whole range of images. Soul wants the whole range of images to be available.

Remember that talk, "The Spreading of Five Wings," I think it's called. This very much has to do with inertia and limits and blocks and ideas and stuck places and contractions—five kinds of range that we want to check we're open to.

The spreading of five wings, I think it was called. We want the whole range of images. Soul wants the whole palette to be available for its art. And it wants that not just in imaginal practice, but also in the body and in the voice, in the expressions of body and voice, movement, gesture, and so forth. So there are consequences—consequences for our formal practice, consequences for our life, consequences for what soul can do. Maybe other consequences as well.

It might be that, for example, in not letting some of the kinds of movement, gesture and voice that we've pointed to in the exercises today, in exercise number three, it may be that this also affects how we are with anger. So it might be that in not opening up the circuits in the body and the voice in these ways, this actually affects the mind in terms of anger. And the kind of anger that's possible then doesn't have body and voice in it. It might also not have a range of images, as we said, in it. It has a very narrow range.

And in that narrowness, it might be a couple of things. It might be then that the mind gets into quite black and white thinking and viewing. And that's something that often goes with anger when anger is not so healthy—it gets very black and white, the thinking and the viewing. But there may well be a relationship between the prevention, the absence, the block, the non-existence of those circuits of movement, gesture and voice, and the entrenchment and habit of black and white thinking and viewing.

Even when things are rosy and we think something's wonderful—and that's just all taken as the truth. It really is this way. This person really is that way. We never think, what's the connection? And I think there's a connection between what we allow to move through and to open through and open in and as movement, gesture, voice—what's available there. There's a connection between that and something like the kind of black and white thinking and viewing that's really not helpful, certainly not when there's anger, but also when there's a kind of positive assessment of something. Even if you're praising someone, they might end up feeling a little bit put in a box that they don't feel comfortable with, even if you're saying this or that about them or about something they've done. But actually, it's black and white. It's something entrenched.

This is connected with the second aspect I wanted to draw a link to. Because something can be brittle here, without letting things, without opening up the movement, gesture, voice in these kinds of ways. Something can get not just black and white in our thinking, viewing, when we're angry or when there's positivity, but also then brittle. And again, if we're talking about anger, that anger can be merely cold anger, and that's all that's available to me, as opposed to a hot, juicy anger. Cold anger is not far from hatred in certain ways of using those words. But cold anger is also kind of brittle.

And again, there's a kind of brittleness that can come into the being through just through the non-availability of some of these circuits with regard to body and voice. Anger can be brittle and not have depth to it, not have juice, not have—I don't know, I'm thinking of a spicy, juicy curry sauce. It doesn't have that in it. There's something cold and brittle in it. And then being brittle, it easily shatters. And something shatters in the being not in a helpful way, and something shatters in the anger, in what we're trying to stand up against or for, what we're trying to express and the point we're trying to make. Something shatters and there's a collapse, a collapse in the being. And there's no strength there.

So the collapse, because of the shattering, because of the brittleness, because of the non-availability of these areas and circuits and directions and possibilities in movement, gesture and voice. The connection with all that with black and white thinking, black and white viewing. So this is not, I think, obvious at first. Again, I would say in some cases, I think it's significant and important to be investigated. I certainly wouldn't insist this is the only way things work or it works like this for everyone—not at all—but to be investigated. This is the kind of thing we would never think to connect these aspects.

So there's a relationship here to everything that we're talking about. There is a relationship to the question which I've brought up, I think, several times, but recently—gosh, now I can't remember. It might have been in the talk about pain on Psyche's Orchard. But anyway, somewhere, a few places in the last while, I brought up this question, I have at least, about, for example, ritual practices.

And when is it necessary? We have this question in relation to the energy body and movement. We've had it before, long before, the questions about ritual. When is it necessary for, let's say, an image of ritual to be manifested and concretized in an actual ritual? So this whole question about movement, gesture, body, movement, gesture, voice, vocalization is connected with that. When is it necessary for an image to be manifested, concretized as an image, or if it's an image of dancing or moving or whatever it is to be manifest that way?

And then we can break that question down into two kind of temporal levels. So one is, when is it necessary for the sense and the possibility of soul-making in the moment? Do I open up more of a sense of soul-making right now by actually concretizing a ritual gesture, manifesting it, or a movement in the body that's connected with the image? Or do I get more soul-making? Does more soul-making open if I don't, and I just let it brew in the image and in the energy body and in the soul resonances, and the physical body remains still?

But then there's a second temporal level. What about the possibility of soul-making in one's life, more long-term? So what is necessary to, if you like, open up, support the most soul-making right now, in this moment? And then what about in one's life and more long-term? Concretization, manifestation, or not. And it can work both ways. So it's not like there's one answer. It's a question. It's a living question. Again, back to the question of subtle soul discernment, receptivity, openness of being, inertia.

So, two temporalities to concern ourselves with. If we're talking about, let's take the example that this image comes. And right now, with this image, what is it that allows it to become more soul-making? Is it moving the body, or is it being still? Is it concretizing or not? And then the second, what is it that allows that image to engender and open and instigate more, you know, the fullness or a fuller soul-making in my life over the long term?

So it may not need concretization or expression, a reflection of the image in body or voice, but it will at least need a kind of refraction into dharma. The image needs to be refracted somehow into dharma. And what will that need? What will that need from movement, gesture, voice? And are they available for that? Are they open? Are the circuits working?

So there's lots of discernment, lots of questions here. And you know, sometimes the soul may want to express itself through movement, gesture, voice, but those are blocked. And they block so much—this relates to what I said earlier—that the person doesn't even feel the want. Those circuits are so cut, there's such an absence of electric flow there, if we use that analogy, that they don't even feel the soul wanting to express in that way, through movement, gesture, voice.

So maybe that if some of these exercises re-establish the circuits, reconnect those circuits, then we have an actual choice. Listening is possible. We will recognize a want. Then we can choose whether we can discern what's right and how, etc. Sometimes something is so cut that we don't even feel the soul's want. If the circuit is alive, we're more likely to be able to feel the soul's want, if there is one. And then we can make the choice. Then we can listen better.

So sometimes in all these kinds of openings, it's normal for a human being to have blocks, to have limits, to have areas of soul that are just not in soul yet, not alive yet, to have areas of unconsciousness. All this is very, very normal. Areas of limitation, areas where there's just barred entry, all that is very, very normal. So please understand that in context as well.

And sometimes what happens is the angels come, the daimones come, an image come, imaginal figures come and help you, help me with something that is not, that is a difficulty for me, that hasn't been alive, that's been an impossibility. So it could be exactly these kinds of ranges of movement, gesture, voice that we've been talking about, these kinds of expression. The angels come and they help. An image comes, an imaginal figure comes. And so from the power of the image, given with the image, and through the way of relating to the image, I am helped to revitalize, open, and travel in that area of being, an area of life.

It may be other issues. It may be, you know, in the Ridhwan school, Catherine was telling me they have this thing, I think they call it impeccability.

And what they really mean is the capability and the capacity to really be steady and grounded and consistent—to follow through with your plans or what you said, to honor your word. If you said you would do something, to really do it. I think it's called impeccability. It's like one of their foundational areas.

So it may be, for instance, that this quality is not really present, or in some areas it's not there. And we are helped by the visitations of the angels and the demons, and the ministrations of the angels and the demons, and the encouragement and the prodding —and sometimes the tough love—of the angels, the demons, the imaginal figures. And then we're able to access that area; it opens to us, it comes alive, we're able to travel in that landscape, that territory, that soul territory, both in imaginal practice and in life.

Or as I said, it might be the range of bodily and vocal openings and expressions that we're talking about in these talks. And then they become available, we can use them, and that's wonderful. And it was from the grace of the angel, in a way. Also, of course, it needs me to—as always—relate, to assent, and to relate in certain ways that allow that image to become genuinely imaginal, so that it has its full soul power.

So sometimes things work that way around: from the angel, so to speak, by the grace of the angel, still needing our work. But other times it's the exercises themselves which will support soul-making at the two temporal levels that we talked about. The exercises will open the possibility of images that are impermanent, but that come and that feel and are soul-making and soulful in that time that they're around, and maybe whenever they visit after that. But these exercises may also support the longer term, the longer arc of manifestation and opening of soul in one's life—the refraction of the daimon, daimons in one's life, the duty to the images in one's life, the human being living one's image.

The capacity of the person to live one's image, to really live one's image, to embody it, to manifest, to refract. So sometimes we're helped by the angels and the angels open the territory. The angels reconnect the circuits. And sometimes we have to do this kind of more exercise work, and that opens the circuits, and then they're open for the angels. Our practice and our life is open for soul, for the images, for the angels, and for our human refracting of daimon, of angels—for our expressions and manifestations of soul.

CHAPTER 237

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h21

> In this third part of the series on voice, movement, and gesture, Rob Burbea delves deeply into the conceptual framework underlying soul-making dharma vocabulary. He shares a personal example of losing connection with 'the angels' during a pressured period, contrasting this with conventional notions of 'centering.' Burbea examines how terms like 'centering' imply interiority, circumscription, and singularity, while soul-making concepts point toward expanded notions of human being as both image and analogue—neither simply singular nor bounded.
>
> The talk explores why some practitioners feel they don't receive images or angelic visitations, suggesting factors like lack of genuine desire, absence of soul stretch, or unwillingness to face antinomies. Burbea addresses resistance to the word 'soul' itself, comparing it to initially unfamiliar Buddhist terms like 'aggregate' (khandha) that become meaningful through practice.
>
> The session introduces the fourth exercise: a dyadic blessing practice where partners take turns blessing each other through movement, gesture, and voice—but without using known language. This evolves into a second part that drops even the attempt to convey meaning, moving beyond conventional blessing toward pure expression of soul through embodied presence. The practice aims to expand sensitivity, range, and receptivity to soul while serving as a vehicle for soul's expression.

I'm not quite sure what will be possible today, but I would like to introduce the fourth exercise, which could be seen as two exercises, as I'll explain when I get to it. I'd like to introduce that, and maybe the fifth one.

But before even introducing the fourth, I just thought I'd spend a little time opening up and considering some of the words and vocabulary we've been using. By now these words and terms are quite familiar to many of you who are familiar with soul-making dharma teachings, particularly as they inform and inflect and open up our sense of human being and our human person and personhood—what it is to be a person.

A few weeks ago, I was feeling really quite pressured and thrown off centre, unbalanced, pressured, flattened. There were many things that seemed like they needed deciding at the time—practical things in relation to preparing for death, my will, the future of the teachings, teacher training, and all kinds of things. Many things that seemed to need figuring out and arranging before my death. Within that, there seemed to be lots of different people's requests and opinions and voices. It was to do with those kinds of things, particularly in relation to the teachings and the future of the teachings and teachers.

At some point I realized that I'm really not feeling okay with all this. It's all gone a bit crazy. The language that came to me, the language that seemed very natural at that point to describe what was missing for myself—and that language was also very insightful—came very naturally. It was not the language of "I've lost my centre" or "I'm uncentred" or "I need to get centred, I need to regain my centre, or centre myself." That wasn't the language that came. I would understand, of course, that in those kinds of situations, when feeling flustered and pulled in so many directions with so many decisions, that would very easily be a way that someone in our contemporary society might describe to themselves what has happened and then what needs to happen.

But the words that came, the description that came organically, naturally, spontaneously—and that contained the insight, the seeds of insight for what I needed to do to redress the situation—was that I've lost my connection with the angels. I've lost my connection with the daimon. I need to somehow reconnect, find that connection again with the angel, with the daimon, with the image.

As I said, the insight was there. In the description of the problem was the insight of the direction needed for a solution—where I needed to orient, what I needed to do, how I needed to look, how I needed to relate and think about things. And that was exactly what did indeed help: finding again these connections with the angels in relation to all this, all that was difficult, and what was at the middle, the pith of the difficulty in relation to the teachings. Most of it centered around the teachings and the future of the teachings. Finding again my connection with the angels in my relationship with them in relation to the teachings.

That's what I'd got lost. I was trying to figure out, solve, find answers to get through many decisions and things that needed to be made. It all felt quite pressured. But I had lost that connection. I'd gone into a much more one-dimensional mode of understanding and relating to all that set of issues and decisions and problems and conundrum. It was all one-dimensional. The angel wasn't there. I wasn't in relationship with the angel with all of that.

So when a person today uses language like "I've lost my centre, need to get centred or centre myself or find my centre, regain my centre," what does that word tend to imply? What's wrapped up in that kind of notion, in that kind of vocabulary? Particularly, what does it tend to imply about the human being and about the self and about the person? What's the logos, the conceptual framework of human being, self, person, that is implicitly tied in with a notion such as centering?

There are probably quite a few possibilities—it's not set in stone, and it may vary—but consider a few of them. For instance, interiority is one of them. Generally, not necessarily, but generally, the centre of gravity, my centre of gravity, and therefore my sense of balance, my point of balance, is conceived usually as somehow within me. Here one's feeling perhaps pulled out, so to speak, to all these diverse distractions or pulls or demands or questions or whatever it is. And the center of gravity, the still point, the balance point, is conceived of as within, usually. So there's a kind of interiority there that's part of the conceptual framework of the human being that goes with words like centering and notions like centering.

Secondly, there's perhaps a notion of circumscription of the human being, of the self. Like, where do I end? I end here, the world starts there, or you start there, or whatever it is. So when we talk about a center, it's about a center of something. Usually it's a center of a circle, a center of a geometrical structure, or whatever it is. Center of a limited space, a limited area. Center of a country, whatever. So there's a delimited space, a circumscribed space. Where I end, that's my boundary, that's my border. That notion also seems wrapped up subtly, implicitly with the notion of centering.

Now, I could still have a circumscribed notion of where I end. That could still be involved when I use the language and idea of connection with the daimon, connection with the angel. But what I mean by that connection with the angels, what I would like to emphasize right now by that refinding of connection with the angels, is more an expanded notion or sense of a human being. As we talked about in the talk on death and dying in Psyche's Orchard, rather than "this area is me," we have a sense of the larger human being as both image and analogue.

So there are a couple of parts to that. The first part has to do with circumscription. The second part has to do with singularity. But just to stay with circumscription for now. Image and analogue. I, in my life to the best of my ability, more or less at different times, am the analogue of that image, of that angel. And where then do I end? If I have this more expanded notion of self, I am actually this whole—"system" is too technical a word—but this whole gestalt, this whole constellation of image and analogue, maybe images and analogues, and that's all me, then where do I end in that? Where is my circumscription in that, exactly?

And anyway, the image, because the element's the imaginal, the angel, the image—where does the image end? Because that's going to be unfathomable and have unfathomable beyonds. Where do I draw the line then of self there? Of my human being? And so where then exactly is the center of it? If I can't draw the line of the edge of the circle or whatever, I don't know where to place the center. I cannot say the center is here or there.

So that's another aspect: interiority, circumscription, but also, as I mentioned, singularity. Sometimes, usually with this notion of centering, there's the sense of the singularity of self. I need to find my center. I, as a singular self, need to have recourse to myself, find my resource in myself, in my center. And the sense then is the self as singular.

Now, a person in contemporary society could say, "I feel terrible, I feel really pressured," and reach out to friends and colleagues or whatever it is, reaching out socially, horizontally, to the horizontal sense of society and friends. But one could also reach out more plurally, not so much just to the singular self, not only reaching out horizontally to the flatly conceived society of others in which I exist, but rather conceiving of the self as a plurality.

Just the fact of conceiving of the human being, conceiving of the human person—as described and as I tried to really emphasize in that talk on death and dying—conceiving of the human person actually phenomenologically: when we have a deep sense both of ourselves and of another, and when another has a deep sense of ourselves, that the experience is not necessarily completely singular. And I don't mean it's fragmented in the way sometimes anatta gets taught. But I mean it's plural, or rather not simply singular, in the way that we are both image and analogue, or images and analogues. Several angels, perhaps, and servant to, analogue to that plurality even of angels.

So, quite different notions there. Interiority, circumscription and borders and singularity are not the default mode of sense of the human being, the human person. And they weren't in that case, and as I find more and more these days when things are difficult, when there's challenge in different ways, that the sense—and I mean that word in its double meaning, the sense, the actual perception and the idea of my human being or another human being—is more along the lines of this image and analogue, having angelic dimensions which are refracted into the human life, more or less, at different times, with a duty to that. There's a kind of doubleness there.

So it's also not—and we think about centering, that word centering—taking a fourth aspect or fourth notion that might be wrapped up in it: that one then encounters one's self, or one's true self, or one's core, at the center. Introspecting, one then finds oneself at the center. And, you know, maybe not Dharma 101, but pretty soon in the Dharma, you're going to encounter the idea—and it's not just particular to Buddha Dharma—that when I look for the self, I can't find it, actually.

So we're not talking about centering as needing to encounter the self at our center. It could be that what we're expecting at the center is a kind of infinite depth of still nothingness—of stillness and nothingness, which is a wonderful sense. One can look inside and discover different kinds of nothingness, different kinds of stillness, but that infinite depth of stillness and nothingness is what one perhaps encounters at the center.

In the Christian tradition of the twentieth century, there was a re-stimulation, a revivification of some contemplative practices in the Catholic tradition—centering prayer. Originally it meant just that: at the center is this still nothingness beyond any image of God, beyond any word or directive—just a kind of emptiness. This is tied up with the Via Negativa, the apophatic tradition. Looking deep inside myself, I encounter nothing, and that nothingness is the same—the depth of that nothingness is the same as the depth of the nothingness of God.

This is wonderful, and this is a real mystical resource. But it still means something quite different if I'm not gravitating toward that notion and movement of centering and needing centering. It's not that I'm expecting to encounter myself at the center, nor am I hoping for an experience of still nothingness at the center, which may of course be very helpful at different times. Rather, there's a need to reconnect with the angels.

The angel, the image, is other and self. It's both and neither. It's me and not me, and it's not me and not not me. This angel, in the mystery of their being, the mystery of this angelic constellation, this angelic relationship—this angel is both other and self, but it's the theophany. It's a face of the divine. It's an expression of the divine, which is different than an emptiness. Emptiness is not a theophany. Emptiness is usually construed as an essence—a transcendent essence beyond all attributes. A theophany is a face, a presentation of what we could say are attributes, or is a being in itself, a person in itself.

So rather than encountering myself at the center, rather than encountering a deep well of still nothness—wonderful as that might be—actually, not at the center, but in relationship with a theophany. Not at the center of anything, but in relationship with. Where exactly is that? In space.

These are quite different notions, and some of this will be familiar to different degrees if you're familiar with soul-making dharma—some of the ways we use these words, and really what I'm pointing to is where the words point to, the direction of possibility in which these words and terms point. As opposed to the words themselves defining this or that, circumscribing and delimiting. More to get a sense that the words are directions—directions of soul possibility, directions of soul experience and soul conception.

Let us linger on this word "angel" a little bit. We've used it quite a lot over recent years, but I want to say a few more things about it. Be careful, for instance, of a limiting idea that the angel or an angel or an image kind of shows up out of the blue and will help you with something, or give you an idea or creative impulse—whatever it is, a seed or something. It might. It might show up out of the blue.

We've talked about—and I can't remember when—the phrase "soul-making poise." In other words, taking care of the stance, the poise of one's being, one's energy body, one's attention, one's receptivity, one's humility, and all of that. In that poise, in the soul-making poise, there's a sort of opening of the space, priming and preparing the space—thinking now of parallels with the Jewish tradition of preparing for the Sabbath. The Sabbath is the reception of the Shekhinah, the reception of the Sabbath angel who visits, who comes on that evening, on that day. The human being's job is partly to prepare—to make the space and the time beautiful, ready, prepared, holy, special, hospitable.

So it may well be that with an attitude of humility, we learn to take care with that soul-making poise. In that way, we are in a kind of humbly waiting and primed or prepared space. Our being becomes that space—a space of hospitality for the angels. They may visit then, sort of out of the blue, and with that there may be a gift. We may be helped with this or that in our lives, given something, given an idea, given creative seeds, whatever.

But be careful of that as an idea that might limit our sense of angels and what they are and how they arise and what our relationship with them is. Because it's often the case—and this is something I've shared before—it's often the case that one has already started something. Perhaps it's a creative project or a big piece of work, an idea. Perhaps it feels like a lot. It feels like a stretch or a challenge.

And the angel comes then. Then, and the coming of the angel might be the actual work itself, or this project itself becoming imaginal. It becomes angelic.

So it might be there's me, and there's this project, and there's this third character called the angel that's going to help me in my relationship with the project. But it might also be that the work itself, or the idea that's beginning to take shape, that I'm grappling with, that I'm kind of gestating, or is wanting to come through—whatever it is, or this big project that I need to do—that it becomes angel. It becomes angelic. It becomes imaginal person, with autonomy, with desire, its own eros, its own desire.

So, careful again of not delimiting too tightly what we mean by angel. We have to delimit it somewhat—we're not just open for any old ideas about angels and all that business. As I said, the words, the concepts are pointing us in a direction, pointing us along a road, but that road is infinite. It has boundaries. It's not like anything can fall under the scope of that road and we can just call anything angel, which is, you know, in some circles fairly common—just using that word too easily, whether it's used completely unspiritually, just as a kind of term of endearment, or in certain spiritual New Age circles or whatever. We're not using it in those ways.

So maybe that's a good analogy. It's like we're pointing in a certain direction, and we can just keep travelling in that direction. And the road changes. The road develops. The terrain around the road develops as you walk down that road.

But another way of saying this is an angel is also, like everything, a dependent arising. So in what I was just talking about, it's almost like—or we could say in the first instance—it's dependent on the poise of soul-making. The visitation of the Shekhinah on Shabbat is dependent on the reverence and humility and the eros of the soul and the love of the soul for the Shekhinah and for the Divine. And expressing that by the way it takes care of creating the space for the Sabbath, in terms of body and house and setting and environment. Of course, all this applies in so many ways to soul-making and imaginal work and ritual and all that.

But an angel is a dependent arising also in possibly another sense, which is that something is already there. It's already stretching me. And then the angel visits in response to that stretch, in response to that task that I'm given, in response to that work that I have to do. And it might be that one possibility within that is that the work itself, the task itself becomes angel. It becomes imaginal, angelic.

So I've touched on this before, actually quite a few times—this question of someone saying, "I don't get any images," and sometimes people are okay with that, but sometimes it's like people get a little bit frustrated or wonder why don't I get images? Or they might say, using slightly different language, having heard other language being used, they might say, "Why don't the angels seem to come to me? Why don't they seem to come to other people? Or I hear this person or that person talk about the angels coming or the angel coming or whatever. Why don't they seem to come to me?"

Or it might be voiced as, "The angels, the gods, they don't seem to want anything from me. I hear this person or that person talk, and I hear them talk about the demand of the angel, the demand of the imaginal, or the duty, or this or that. But they don't seem to come to me, or they don't seem to want anything from me."

So this whole constellation of ideas and perceptions and things that people might think—I've talked about quite a lot over the years. Why don't I get images and what do we actually mean by image? And what are the kinds of preparations, poises of soul, but also relationships with one's emotions and energy body and all kinds of other factors that support the generation, the arising, the creation, discovery of images, angels, etc. So there are lots of reasons which I've elaborated elsewhere.

One I've touched on, I just want to touch on again, and that actually has to do with desire and need—maybe two aspects. Sometimes someone says, "Why don't I get images?" Well, I don't know. Other reasons that I've elaborated elsewhere aside—so there may well be, actually for many people, this isn't a relevant reason, what I'm about to say. Maybe there are just other things there, not relating in the right way to their emotions, or whatever it is. But sometimes it's like, actually, if you really, really deeply wanted images, they would come. You would have images. Images would visit you. They would arise. If you really deeply wanted them.

So something sometimes, for some people, the issue is one of desire. A person who wonders, "Why don't I get images, or they seem to get more—this person seems to get more than I do"—it may be that actually it's not something we really deeply want, and so they don't necessarily arise. Maybe, sometimes for some people, this actually is the relevant factor.

Or—and maybe they're related—it might be that for some people at some time, again this is not going to be relevant to some people, or in some instances it won't be relevant, but it may be: why don't the angels seem to come to me? Why don't the gods, the angels seem to want anything from me? It may be that you and I and the imaginal figures, the angels, don't need each other. They don't need me and I don't need them. They don't need you and you don't need them.

Because there's nothing in the way a person is living and the choices that a person is making that needs the help or presence of the angels, of the imaginal figures. There's nothing really on the line, so to speak. There isn't really a soul stretch. We touched on this before, if you remember—I can't remember where. There isn't really—they're not living and choosing in their life in ways that really stretch their soul or that open them to soul risks, if we might use that phrase. There's nothing really on the line.

They might be stretched in all kinds of ways, might be very busy, might be stretched doing something very helpful in the world, whatever—but it's not actually a soul stretch. There's no real risk there. And maybe it's that the angels, the imaginal figures, the daimons, don't need and won't choose someone who is not willing to stretch. Stretch themselves, stretch their lives, stretch their soul. So this is also a factor to consider. It won't be relevant in a lot of instances, but sometimes it is important to realize this is actually what's happening, and this is a reason why something is not happening.

It may also be that the—and again, this will be even only perhaps some instances of the instances that I've just talked about where that is the case—it may be that the kind of stretch needed to invite or call forth the angel, the angels, the kind of stretch to which they respond, maybe it needs to be one which involves or must involve a sense of antinomy. Remember that word from the ethics talks, from Sila and Soul and the Image of Ethics.

Antinomy is deeply felt in the soul. Having to choose, faced with that antinomy—the branches, the roads of their divergent pulls and callings felt sharply, deeply, genuinely in the soul. One is almost crucified, pulled this way and that, by two opposing values, by the love of and the duty to antinomical values. And it may be that that kind of stretch, that kind of difficulty, is the kind of stretch that sometimes—or maybe, I don't know, maybe it's in every case—is needed. That's part of what it means to be stretched. Maybe that's just a certain kind of stretch. I'm not sure.

So all these are things to ponder. And of course, some people—like I said earlier—well, it might not actually bother me that much that this sense of angels that I hear people talking about, or images, don't come to me. If it doesn't, okay, leave it. But if it actually does, then these are things that you might want to include in your inquiry and self-questioning.

Just briefly, I heard someone saying something about Soulmaking Dharma, and basically one of the pieces was—well, I'm sure it's all really great, but I'm very much paraphrasing—"I don't really relate to the word soul." This was from a person who'd been practicing Dharma a long, long time, who'd been teaching for decades and decades. Which is probably quite a common reaction, I imagine. Not really relating to that word soul at all.

Oftentimes, it's the "making" that people don't relate to. The word making—of course, if you understand the whole track of exploration of ways of looking and fabrication, fabrication is just another word for making, and how that deepens and how it opens out and the understanding it opens out—then the word making is almost an indispensable word in Soulmaking. But for a lot of people it's very puzzling because you'd usually put a kind of—you'd usually think of the word soul or have a sense of soul, use that in a very rarefied way. It wouldn't be something that we make; it would be something that is, or we discover, or that just is a level of being, or whatever.

Anyway, this person, it was the word soul, and I thought about that and know them a little, and said, "Well, it's interesting—do you really relate, you know, you've been involved in Buddhism for thirty, forty years, whatever it is—do you really relate to the word aggregate, khandha, skandha in Sanskrit? Or put the question in the past tense: did you really relate to that word when you first heard it, or the words emptiness or anattā, no-self, those kinds of words and concepts?"

Probably not. But what's happened—it might be sometimes with words like emptiness, you know, sort of a predisposition that many people, many Dharma folk have, to that kind of intuition, if you like, of that insight and that whole direction, and that whole teaching even before one's even encountered the teaching. But a word like aggregate—it's hard to think that one would really relate to that immediately when one hears it. Might be, but probably not.

What has probably happened instead is one has been trained and trained oneself to use words like aggregate as skillful and helpful concepts, and then perhaps even as ways of looking. One has been trained in the use of a word like aggregate or a concept like aggregate, trained to use them and think of them in skillful and helpful ways. And they're not ultimate truths—this is something I've said many times. Five aggregates is not at all an obvious way of dividing up a human being. It's hardly, I would suspect, a way of thinking about self that one would have arrived at by oneself if one wasn't actually handed this teaching: five aggregates, and this is what they are, and—

It was handed to us by someone in a position of authority, with the authority of 2,500 years of Buddhist tradition, and then we trained ourselves in those words.

So just the fact that one doesn't really relate to a word that one is not familiar with means nothing much at all. Couldn't the word "soul" be similarly unfamiliar at first, but eventually, with practice and understanding, actually become—like the word "aggregate"—very fruitful? And in fact, couldn't the word "soul," the concept of soul, be something that contributes to and supports the reduction of particular sorts of suffering, just as the concept of aggregates does?

That's the function of the word "aggregate." It's not an ultimate truth. What the teachings of the aggregates do, or are supposed to do, or are designed to do, is just that—they're a group of concepts in the service of reducing suffering. It's not an ultimate truth. And couldn't "soul" be something similar? Unfamiliar at first, but with training, with practice, as understanding grows, it becomes very fruitful as a term of vocabulary and a concept—fruitful in many ways, but in one particular way: reducing certain kinds of suffering.

For example, the word "aggregate" will not on its own authentically and finally reduce the suffering of soullessness. Again, if we open up the question: what does that first noble truth mean? What kinds of suffering are there? And therefore, what does the third noble truth mean—ending suffering?

We could say these days there is the suffering of soullessness in our society, in our culture. The suffering of meaninglessness. We could bundle it all together as the suffering of soullessness. It's also to do with lack of beauty and aesthetics, lack of depth, refusal of dimensionality—all kinds of things. But the word "aggregate" on its own will not finally, fully, and authentically reduce that kind of suffering. In fact, it might even support it. The suffering of soullessness may be worsened by the teachings on the aggregates if I'm not careful how I pick them up and when I put them down.

We could choose other words as well, even words from our contemporary culture, not from Buddhist culture, like "trauma." It's an idea, and actually it's a whole conceptual framework. When we speak psychologically and draw on that word, we're actually invoking "trauma" and implying a whole conceptual framework of psychology there. I don't really relate to that. In other times, other cultures, other periods of history, it would have been quite a bizarre notion—or even just the broader notion that early parenting experiences shape psychology, or are a dominant factor in shaping later psychology.

Again, there's a whole conceptual framework—actually there are many conceptual frameworks, many alternate frameworks which overlap—that we're invoking when we use words that point to these ideas. They could be really, really helpful, but we may not relate to them at first. They may be very useful, these words borrowed from psychology and these psychological concepts and notions.

Even when we use the word "brain"—certainly in the Buddha's time, they were aware there was an organ in the head. They had their word for it; I've forgotten what the Pali is. They had looked at corpses and dissected them. But the way we use the word "brain" now, or the way many people in our culture use it—as synonymous with mind—might not be, or definitely was not at all, how the Buddha meant it. The Buddha didn't see mind as something that was necessarily primarily physical, or certainly not completely physical.

So there are lots of words and concepts. At this time in history, in culture, or at this time in my evolution and my practice and my journey, I don't really relate to this word. So what? It doesn't mean that it cannot then become, with training, a very useful, very fruitful, very freeing idea, word, term of vocabulary, and concept.

Going back to that word "aggregates"—even if it's just picked up as a notion without much skill in using it as a way of looking in terms of anattā, it still functions to fabricate less. As a term of vocabulary, it fabricates less suffering; it certainly fabricates less self-sense. It dissects and undercuts self-construction, self-fabrication. It might do that at different levels, depending on how much skill one has in actually practicing with that notion.

But as a term, what it does is move in the direction of less fabrication of suffering and of self—of some sufferings and of some levels of self. But in so doing, in its movement towards fabricating less self, at the same time, the other side of the coin is that it doesn't honor and respect and keep in focus the person. The person as someone in relationship, in meaningful relationship—that gets lost.

The minute we start emphasizing talk of the aggregates and a view of the aggregates, we simultaneously lose sight of, lose sense of, the richness and multidimensionality of personhood and the relationality of personhood. Again, I'm going back to that talk—I'm pretty sure it was one on death and dying—where we're thinking: what could we use this word "person" to mean when we're talking about a human subject, a human being that's more than just a subject because they're in meaningful relationship? They're more than just self. They become a person if we really want to honor and respect and keep in our sense, in our senses, and keep making sense of the personhood of a person.

Looking at these divergent directions or modes - the notion of the aggregates versus the notion of soul - we find something fascinating in the later Vajrayana teachings. There, we discover the possibility of seeing the aggregates, the five aggregates, as divine, as holy. But even then, we actually lose the personhood of the person. It dimensionalizes in a different way.

Each aggregate, depending on different tantras, becomes associated with a different divinity, a different Buddha or Buddha's consort or dakini. So there's a wonderful kind of dimensionalizing and divinizing that can emerge through that approach, but it still misses the person - this beautiful range of practices that still misses the person.

The term "aggregates" and the term "soul" almost instigate mutually exclusive opposite movements. Almost. So we can talk about soul, talk about angels, talk about all this, but in dyadic practice, in soul-making practice, and even in some of these exercises, all this that we're pointing to now - when we talk about these different words and all the different shades and meanings and scopes and dimensions of what these words mean, what they point away from, where they point towards, and what they open up - all this emerges naturally, I would say, through the process of sensing the soul.

You've probably experienced it if you've done dyad practice: at certain points, the question arises - who am I in relationship to here? Who is this other, or in triad work, who are these others? Sometimes when we've been leading that on retreat, you'll hear on the recording how we stimulate a shift in the sense towards sensing the soul, towards sensing the other as angel, others as angel, just by asking the question. When there is soulfulness, when there's soulfulness in the field, and then asking that question: who are these others? Who is this now that I'm beholding?

Just asking the question in a field of soulfulness can stimulate a further opening of the sensing of the soul. We begin to perceive other as angel. Other times we might deliberately suggest: can you see them now as angels? Or we deliberately start speaking of these others as angels, or a person makes that deliberate shift in their sensing - like deliberately calling up an image, deliberately deciding to sense, see other as angel.

But all these words - angel, soul, image - they imply an unfathomability. They also imply, going back to something I said earlier today, a kind of neither simple singularity nor simple doubleness. If I'm seeing this person as angel, I'm seeing them as neither simply single nor double. They are unusual Tom, Dick, or Harry and Tom, Dick, or Harry's angel. There's a mystery in the impossibility of finally dividing them up as one or two - this being that I'm encountering, this being whose soul I'm sensing.

Whenever we use words like angel or soul or "my soul," or any time we talk about image, there's that unfathomability present. There's this quality of being neither one nor two - not really simply - as well as the dimensionality, the divinity, the infinite echoing and mirroring implied in the words angel, soul, image.

This infinite echoing and mirroring flows from the angel into this person's life and being, and this person's life and being becomes the infinite echoing and mirroring of the angel. The angel also serves as a mirror and echo of the being in a kind of two-way exchange, echoing and mirroring each other. The mystery of that kind of sense and notion is also wrapped up in our understanding of angel and soul.

As, of course, is also the imaginal middle way - neither real nor not real, the theatre-like quality. When we use these words - angel, soul, just like image - all this is wrapped up there. And also eternality.

The angelic dimension is the timeless dimension. To perceive this person as angel, to perceive an angel or just an image, or the angel that I'm in relationship to, or the soul - eternality is implied. The angel, as we said in that talk on death and dying, is not of space or time. The being of the angel, the dimension of the being of the angel, is not located in space. It's not inside me or next to me or behind me or above me or below me. Nor is it located in time.

It's refracted, this angel - he, she, they are refracted into space and time. There's a sense, too, of participation. The angel is something - going back to examples - when I say "I need to reconnect with the angels," there's also a sense of re-participating in something, or reconnecting with my sense of participating in something, in the mystery of that word.

When we use these words, all these other notions become woven into their meaning. They become very rich words - soul, angel, just like image. Again, similar to the analogy I offered about these words being like roads, they point in a certain direction. That road goes on forever.

It's another way of saying all these words and concepts and perceptions, especially like soul and angel, have soft and elastic edges. Actually, all those words - participation and divinity and eternality and all of them - soft and elastic edges. They will stretch. So our notion of what we're talking about when we say soul and angel will stretch over time. It will deepen.

It will be deepened, complexified, and variegated as the sensing of soul is encouraged, as soul-making goes on, as the soul-making dynamic is allowed to do what it wants to do. Soft and elastic edges—they will stretch, deepen, complexify, and vary again.

So let's introduce what we might call the fourth exercise. We might consider it two exercises—the fourth and fifth—or a set of exercises. This one is in fact a dyad exercise, as are these next two.

In the first part—whether we call it two exercises or one exercise in two parts—we work in a dyad, setting it up with whatever is needed in terms of the temenos, the space, the presence. In this first part, one person in the dyad blesses the other, and the other person receives that blessing. One is blessing, one is receiving.

We've done quite a bit of this in different ways in the past, but I want to add a few more pieces, a few more variations. Some will be familiar, and some perhaps less so.

The person who is blessing offers their blessing through movement, gesture, and voice. But what you cannot do as the blesser is use any known language—any language known to human beings. You can utter sounds, use your voice, but not any known language. Somehow you're conveying blessing and emanating blessing, expressing and manifesting blessing.

One thing here is: what does that word "blessing" mean? And again, back to what we just said about these words—soft and elastic edges that will grow and deepen. The meaning of the word "blessing" may already be very wide, or it may not. I'm not even sure what it means exactly. But it is potentially wide, deep, multidimensional, open, elastic—soft and elastic.

As we practice more sensing the soul, especially in relation to blessing and being blessed, we can hopefully create and discover more and more of what blessing might mean. It might start, for instance, as just metta. "I'm not really sure about that word 'blessing,' but I know what metta means, and I'm familiar with that." So it might just start there. Let it start as that.

Maybe it includes praise—what they call doxology. Words of praise, or in this case, movements, gestures, and vocalizations of praise. So maybe that's a slight expansion from just the notion of metta. Maybe it includes gratitude—that in one's praise there's gratitude wrapped up in it. Remember that word "Eucharist" actually means thankfulness, gratitude in Greek.

It may be that as we work within this exercise, or as we repeat it, or as we generally do more soul-making practice and our sense of soulfulness grows and the range of experience and ideation grows, this whole notion grows of what it means to bless and what it means to be blessed.

In the exercise, it might be that as we're doing it, the self, the sense of the other, and the sense of the world, the environment—maybe even time or whatever—all this can become image. Maybe as I'm trying to use my voice without language, trying to bless but without language, the sounds—not even words, but the sounds uttered and heard—become image. They become imaginal.

And who is blessing? Who is blessed? All this becomes image. In so doing, it becomes imaginal images, and its meaning expands and deepens.

you're in a dyad, you're facing each other.

One person takes the first turn to be blessed. So the other person becomes the one who offers the blessing. For the one who is blessed, their task is twofold, but it really has to do with silent sensitivity and receptivity.

They want to notice—they're looking at and listening to and opening their whole energy body. We've done all this kind of thing before. Open the whole energy body and all the senses to the other and their blessing, their movement and voice and gesture. Open to the sound and the visuals and all the sense of the whole energy body in relationship with, sensing with the whole energy body. But then also sensitive to one's own experiences—one's own experiences as the one who is blessed, one's own experiences of the energy body. And that includes whatever emotions, whatever soul resonances arise and pass within that.

So for the one who's blessed, it's a task in sensitivity and opening the energy body and the senses to that really full relationship with the one who is blessing, and then tracking, noticing what happens primarily in the energy body and the emotions as this person blesses you.

One wants to establish that—a really good energy body and emotional sensitivity and awareness. And then on top of that, when that's ready—probably that needs to be there before one then opens it up to include any sensing the soul or soul sense of the whole relational field there. The whole experience of being blessed, the other, the self, the moment, all of it.

But practically speaking, or at least from the outside, one is just silent and still and open, and the task is one of sensitivity—the energy body and the emotion, and then the soul sense. So one's not responding.

Then maybe after ten minutes—well, you can time it yourself; ten minutes might feel like a lot doing something like this. So it may be that this is really quite difficult. Some people find it's really quite difficult. They're a bit baffled or stumped what to do, how to do this at all. But hopefully it could also be fun.

So after about ten minutes you can reverse roles, and maybe you need some silent meditation or something in between perhaps to gather—maybe not, you'll have to see. Ten minutes as I said may feel very long, or it may be that it feels very difficult and awkward and one isn't quite sure what to do and what sounds to make. Or it may be that actually it needs ten minutes or it needs a little longer to get going, to get into a kind of groove because it's unfamiliar. For some people it may not be at all. But either way, even if it's difficult, hopefully it can be fun as well—lots to discover there as an exercise.

So if you're in the blessing role, then you can improvise your utterances. Improvise what comes through your mouth. Take your time. It may be very fast—a very fast flow or a very slow flow. It may be there are pauses in between utterances or movements or gestures, or that it's just continuous streams. Or maybe a continuous stream, then a pause, or whatever. It may be loud or soft.

See if you can let your sense of any soulfulness that's there, any sense of soul-making, let that sense guide you, just as we use that as a guide in imaginal practice. And again, you want to be feeling, sensing the energy body, the resonances in the soul and the energy body. You want to be putting your whole energy body in relationship with the other as your blessing.

It may be that you deliberately bring in or play with the deliberate introduction of an image of yourself, that you inhabit a certain image perhaps that you're familiar with or certainly that's arising at the time, or an image of the other, a sensing soul of the other, or of the space you're in, or of the movements and gestures and utterances themselves—that you bring in deliberate images, a deliberate imaginal sense of what they are.

It may be that there's an image that you bring in that's a third, so that this imaginal figure is somehow coming together or in touch with you, and through you they are blessing the other. But it's really coming from this. So there are all kinds of possibilities here.

For some people this is going to be really quite strange and may take a little getting used to. It may feel a little awkward. Others will just—maybe not at all—and it's just easeful and delightful and fun.

Then a few variations. One is, you can—the only rule is no words. You can make any movement or any gesture or any vocalization. So any movement, gesture or vocalization is okay, but not words. So no language.

A second possibility is—

You can make any movement or any gesture or any vocalization. So any movement, gesture or vocalization is fine, but no words—no language.

A second possibility is no words and also no vocalizations. You can only use movement and gesture, no voice. It's still about how you bless, just through movement and gesture—what wants to come, what feels soulful there. Can I sense that, be in relationship with it, and follow that thread?

A third possibility is no words, but no movements or gestures either—only vocalizations. So you have three variations: movements, gestures and vocalizations all permitted; only movement and gestures; or only vocalizations.

Sometimes it might occur to you to sing a melody if you're allowed to vocalize, and that's fine. Maybe humming or singing something becomes part of the blessing. If you do choose to sing, make sure that sometimes you try it without melody, without singing anything. We're interested in really opening up ranges here.

The second part—which you could conceive as a separate exercise or simply segue into—involves the same thing, but dropping any idea of attempting to express or convey some meaning. In other words, something that could be put into words. Even blessing may contain aspects that could translate into words, but now you're taking it to another level, really dropping any attempt to express or convey meaning—something that could be articulated or an emotion you're trying to convey. You're not expressing an emotion or an image or an event or a story—your story or anyone's story. There's just movement, gesture, and voice, and you drop any sense of attempting to express something with that, to convey something meaningful.

Remember, we have this element of the imaginable, meaningfulness, yet soul is also not reduced to a single meaning. What happens when we recognize that soul is more than this or that meaning? Even if meanings are important, even if meanings matter to soul, soul is more than any particular meaning. And soul is also more than heart.

What happens now? Perhaps the notion of blessing itself gets altered or dropped. In this second part, we might say we've gone beyond blessing in the usual sense. Blessing is an interesting word—it occupies an area at the edge of what could be put into other words. But in the second part of this exercise, we're encouraging what we're doing through movement and gesture and voice to extend beyond the notion of blessing in the usual sense, because we're trying to drop any attempt at expressing or conveying meaning or anything that could be put into words.

I think we'll stop here for today and add the fifth exercise at a different time. Hopefully this is enough to work with and makes sense—you can play with these variations.

As I've said, it might feel very awkward or strange for some people, and maybe not at all for others—everything in between is possible. It might feel difficult; you might feel very self-conscious. All kinds of reactions can arise. But it might also be fun.

Wherever it starts, it can grow. Even if it feels nice and perhaps you're used to similar work from different retreats we've done, it can still grow and deepen and complexify, becoming much more subtle and involving much greater sensitivity—both on the part of the one who blesses and the one who is blessed.

In the second part of this exercise, we're perhaps talking about something beyond the notion of blessing as we usually understand that word. There is simply an exercise, a dyad using movement, gesture, and voice with the purpose and intention of deepening sensitivity, extending range, and being receptive to soul—receptive to soul and a vehicle for soul, a vehicle of soul.

All of this—the sensitivity, the opening up of where we can sense soul, how soul can express through us, and what we can recognize as soul—

All that becomes the main point, and that has an extraordinary range of subtlety that's possible there—sensitivity and growth and dimensionality. So that's really a big part of this practice: exploring range and depth, sensitivity that includes subtlety. Of course, it doesn't have to be subtle only, but it can move into that territory more and more as the practice matures.

So that's what this exercise is for. That's the purpose of this exploration. That's the invitation I'm offering you—to step into this realm where blessing becomes a vehicle for soul, where sensitivity opens doorways to dimensions of experience that can transform not only how we give and receive, but how we understand the very nature of our interconnection and the sacred possibilities that live within the simplest human exchanges.

CHAPTER 238

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h59

In this fourth part of his series on voice, movement, and gesture, Rob Burbea expands on Exercise Four's blessing practice while introducing Exercise Five focusing on iconic moments. He explores two modes of approaching these practices: starting with conceptual ideas versus beginning with pure intention and allowing movement to emerge organically through sensitivity to soulfulness. Burbea offers examples from various traditions - Christ carrying the cross, Buddha's Bhumi Sparsha Mudra (earth-touching gesture), Abraham's hospitality to angels, and Rosa Parks' courageous refusal to give up her bus seat. Throughout, he emphasizes that these are not acting exercises but opportunities to sense into archetypal moments and allow authentic expression through the body. The talk addresses common challenges like self-consciousness and provides practical guidance for maintaining the soul-making orientation. Burbea concludes by connecting these practices to the tantric understanding of dwelling in the 'diamond heart essence of the body, speech and mind of all Tathāgatas,' showing how embodied practice can become a vehicle for expressing our deepest soul calling and dharmic duty.

Before I introduce exercise five or the fifth set of exercises, I'd like to say a bit more about exercise four and add a possible variation.

Given the instructions for exercise four and the first part with blessing, it would be quite normal and certainly understandable to hear those instructions and think, "What does blessing look like? What does blessing sound like? What would that look like as a movement or gesture?" There's a kind of process instigated by the mind, perhaps drawing upon past associations with blessing—though in our culture it's not a word in common currency anymore, having much currency only within certain circles.

We might think of placing hands on the head, as in some traditions one blesses by placing one's hands on someone's head and uttering a blessing. Or in other traditions, marking a cross or small crucifix on the forehead of the one blessed, or gesturing in the air marking a crucifix—all very beautiful gestures from other traditions. We might think blessing involves bowing, or hands in namaste prayer pose, or palms tracing over the energy body, conveying and conferring the energy of blessing through the hands into that space, penetrating the energy body and energy field with blessing.

When we think this is what blessing looks like or sounds like, out of that thinking and those associations comes the movement, gesture, or vocalization. All that's really great. When we've done rituals and ceremonies on past retreats and included these kinds of instructions with blessings, this is part of what's gone on for people, and it's wonderful, beautiful, and can be very powerful.

But it's possible to open up the recognition of a slightly different way of entering into this intention—where the whole propulsion and instigation of the movement, gesture, or vocalization doesn't come so much from an idea. Not so much an idea leading to an action, an idea of blessing or associations about what blessing looks like. Yes, that has its place, but I want to invite and open up space for a different possibility.

Starting instead just with the intention of blessing, even if I'm not quite sure what that actually means for me. Let it be an open word. Go with what I've got. Let the word itself be a seed—who knows what will germinate, what will sprout from that seed. Just start with the intention of blessing and begin moving, gesturing, vocalizing, whatever it is, depending on which part of the exercise you're doing.

So there's the intention, even if it's not quite clear what that word "blessing" exactly means, and just start moving with the intention. Almost like incorporating feedback from the movements, gestures, and vocalizations you're doing. Sense as you're moving, gesturing, vocalizing: Does this feel soulful? If I do this, does it feel more soulful? If I do that, does it feel less soulful?

Just as we do with imaginal practice and soul-making practice, maintain a part of your awareness as very attentive, refined, careful mindfulness on the sense of soulfulness in the moment—what is supporting that and what is not supporting that, where it opens and blossoms and grows and deepens, and where it shuts down a bit or gets flat or narrow. It could be the sense of soulfulness, the sense of blessing, or both.

What you're really doing is starting with an intention and beginning to move with that intention. Whatever actions, movements, gestures, vocalizations you're doing, you're receptive to and attuned to how that feels in line with the intention. Let the movement, gesture, vocalization shape the action in time as it goes—playing it by ear, creating it like pottery on the potter's wheel as you're going, through the feel of it, through the feedback and signals of soul and blessedness coming back to you. This is slightly different than starting with an idea and then replicating that idea, perhaps without putting so much attention on what feels soulful and what doesn't.

Both approaches are good, but I really want to open up that space. If we have space for that second possibility, if we do it that second way, or if at least some of the time we're in that second mode, then a couple of things arise. One is: what helps me be in that mode? It's quite difficult—actually quite difficult to dance, for example, and really be sensitive to the sense of soul-making in terms of the genuine, authentic imaginal and all the elements. So what would support it?

Well, one thing may or may not be—I have to find out—do I need to slow down? So do I need to slow the whole movements down, for instance, or pause between movements? What's the kind of rhythm that allows me to read, to sense, to be attuned and receptive to the sense of soulfulness in the moment and whether it's being opened and supported or closed and not supported—the sense of blessing?

So what pace do I need to go at? It's just like doing walking meditation, doing any kind of walking meditation. There's always this question: what pace should I walk at that right now most helps whatever meditation I'm trying to do, whatever way of looking I'm engaging in that walking posture?

So one is a question of pacing. It might be slowing it down. It might not be. So don't necessarily assume it is. But sometimes going slower allows us, affords us a greater sensitivity, a greater attunement and a greater reading of the soulfulness and the sense of soul-making, the sense of blessing that is there.

A second consideration may just be—and this goes for so much, of course—to the degree that we're judging ourselves in the moment, that will usually, almost always, shut down my sensitivity, my capacity to notice the sense of soulfulness and blessedness in the moment.

This is strange, you know, by most people's—by conventional behavior in our society, all this is pretty strange, some of these exercises. And this one in particular may be very strange. And then you're doing it in a group. So there are all kinds of reasons it would be quite normal and expected for fear of judgment or self-judgment to arise. "Oh, I'm silly" or whatever it is. "I look silly. I'm not getting it. I'm not doing it very well." Whatever it is. Is it possible to just let that go? It's a question. But I'll come back to that actually a little bit later.

But to the degree that there's judging there, self-judging there, and fear of judgment from another, to that degree it shuts down our sensitivity generally speaking, but also in this particular exercise and the kinds of sensitivity we need in this particular exercise.

But this second way of doing it, where we're sort of just focusing on the intention, planting the intention, letting the intention instigate and lead our actions, even if the intention is not fully comprehended by us. What does blessing mean? What does it mean to bless someone? I don't know. Maybe, or I only know a little bit, or whatever it is.

But in the second way of doing it, or second leaning, let's say, second emphasis, then we're letting that intention lead us and just starting the movement and kind of reading it, surfing the whole situation, responding with our receptivity, with our sensitivity, responding to what we sense in terms of the soulfulness and the blessedness, and letting that shape the movements, the gestures, the vocalizations we're doing. So we're letting the body and the energy body and the sense of the soulfulness in the moment guide the movements, the gestures, the vocalizations, at times at least.

Seeing if it's possible to lean into that mode, let's say more, sometimes at least, more than the other mode, which is a kind of—almost like a preconception, an idea, a notion, a memory, an association of blessing and what it looks like or sounds like. An idea of what the movements, gestures and vocalizations convey blessing.

So both good, both fruitful, but see if you can sometimes get a sense of moving between those different modes, or at least between those two different emphases, let's say, because it might not be so black and white.

As I said, this is quite a strange exercise by sort of conventional understandings and the way we conventionally understand what the voice is and how we use the voice, for example, how we communicate. So usually, of course, we use the voice and we think of the voice as an instrument, a vehicle through which, by which we communicate, share or communicate something. And that usually implies describing something.

Through our voice, we share, communicate, and thus describe what I'm feeling or my story or something that happened or an idea or an image or whatever it is. And that's usually the way we relate to how we use the voice and what the voice is—communicating something through trying to describe it, to represent it.

And even often sometimes when we're doing mantra practice or we introduce chanting and we kind of hear, "Okay, this is the mantra," we learn the melody and the syllables or whatever. And part of us is thinking, "Okay, what does it mean?" Or if not, "What does it mean?" What's the character of this mantra? Whose mantra is it? Which deity does it belong to? "Ah, it's, for example, Avalokiteśvara. Then I know. Then I know."

It's invoking compassion because Avalokiteshvara. So that in the chanting of the mantra, the reciting of the mantra, I'm invoking, I'm thinking—I'm obviously concentrating on the sound and the voice, but I'm invoking the meaning of compassion. Even if those syllables, I don't know what they mean, and some of them don't actually mean anything. They're seed syllables that don't actually have meanings. Others are seed meanings as well, in different mantras, but anyway.

But oftentimes we as Westerners will want to know, well, who am I invoking? So that when I'm chanting the Om Mani Padme Hum, and it's Avalokiteshvara, it's compassion. And part of me is thinking about the meaning of compassion. Again, I don't mean a lot of discursive thought, but I mean the whole vibe of compassion. And I realize that that's what this mantra means.

Now, of course, that's not wrong. It's not wrong at all for a mantra. And it wouldn't be wrong for the first part of this exercise, exercise four, where the intention is towards blessing, letting that word blessing be soft and elastic and expandable. But what if the sound itself, as sound, was sensed with soul? Not to do with its meaning. This is where the second part of the exercise comes in. Maybe they're already coming through and being predominant even at times in the first part of the exercise where there is the blessing.

So some sound itself sensed with soul. We're moving towards a jungle of sound, a landscape of vocalizations, mysterious, because not necessarily meaning anything, or at least not just meaning anything.

Now I've said this before—I've mentioned it several times, I don't know how much it's landed, because again I've been too quick, too brief in going through it—but the voice itself, my voice now, is trying to convey certain meanings. And there's a logical path through what I'm saying, and each sentence is structured grammatically, syntactically, and all that. But at the same time, there's a level of the sounds that you're hearing that transcends meaning.

Yes, there's a meaning there, and hopefully you're listening for the meaning, and you're understanding it, so you can apply it in exercises and understand soul-making and all that. But there's also a music here. There's also just the sensing the soul of the sound. The mystery, the ineffable mystery of the sounds, and so the sounds right now of my voice. And there's an unfathomable mystery in that, if it's sensed with soul. If I can sense it with soul. It opens up a whole other—it opens up other dimensions, but it opens up a whole other direction of dimensionality.

So the dimensionality of any kind of verbal utterance can be through the meaning. For instance, when we convey something and it's beautiful or poetic or we convey an image or even convey our life story or something that happened or how we're feeling or an image, in the meaning of what we're conveying, we can convey mystery—the mystery of what we're conveying, the mystery of our being, the mystery of being in general, the unfathomability of it, for example, the unfathomability of the image. All that's conveyed when we share an image and the person gets the image or starts resonating with the image.

So the person listening also—the dimensions of what is heard, of the sounds that are heard, open up through meaning, but also not through meaning, through just sound themselves, sensing the soul of the sound themselves. Now, as I said, they can be there both at the same time, if we enter a certain mode of listening and mode of speaking. So right now, for instance. The meaning of this and the dimensionality of the meaning of this and the sensing the soul of what's opened up through the meaning of what's being said in my voice. But also the dimensions that are opened up just through the sound, through the music of it, the mystery of it, the miracle of hearing and of sound. This particular sound right now. This particular music. Different than other musics, unique, particular.

So, both can be there at the same time, depending on both how one is speaking, but also how one is listening, whether we are sensing the soul, of course. In this exercise, especially in the second part of this exercise, we really want to emphasize—really in both parts, because we're not using verbal sounds, we're not using traditionally understood verbal sounds, or verbal sounds as traditionally understood in the first part of the blessing. But there's still meaning there. But in this exercise, especially in the second part, we want to emphasize that second direction of opening up dimensionality, beyond meaning, just in the sensing the soul of the sounds themselves, and the mystery of that, the incantation, the invocation, the spell-making.

So in terms of instructions for this exercise number four, for the witness, the person who's just silently watching, sensing with all their senses and the whole energy body, remember, and listening and looking at the person blessing or the person moving, gesturing, vocalizing. In a way, the exercise there, or the emphasis of the exercise, is really just on noticing.

And I think we demonstrated this at the beginning, if I remember, of movement, voice, and the possibilities of soul, or something like that. And Catherine and I demonstrated as a duet, and I asked her to move, and she made very, very subtle movements. Very subtle. In fact, almost none. She hardly did anything apart from blink a few times, if I remember. But if I'm open enough, and the whole body in relationship, sensing with the whole energy body—we talked about this several times, bringing the whole energy body into sensual relationship there, without touching in this case—then even the blinking of an eye, I'm going to notice that that has an effect in my energy body, even in my emotional body, and in my soul.

Actually, any movement, any gesture, any vocalization will affect the energy body, and the emotions, but we're talking about very, very subtle. If it's a very subtle movement, it might be very subtle, or it might be very, very strong.

It depends on all kinds of things, of course. But there's no pressure for the witness—no expectation that it must be this or that experience. Really, I'm simply noticing what effects I observe in my energy body and in the field through these movements, gestures, vocalizations, pauses, silences, and all the rest. Just noticing. It doesn't have to conform to any particular expectation.

So it becomes, for the witness—for that person in that role—truly an exercise in relational sensitivity. And that's the emphasis.

For the person who's moving or gesturing or vocalizing, it may be that one feels quite baffled by these instructions, or it goes along well initially, then one becomes completely stumped, or at a loss for what to do, how to move, what to vocalize. Again, this would be very understandable, very normal, and completely okay.

If this happens, one way of responding is simply to pause, just stop, and sense. Sense the self, sense the other, sense the space you're in, sense the energy body, sense what's happening emotionally, and just be with that sensing. From this sensing in the pause, without pressure, perhaps allow yourself to truly pause—not feeling compelled to keep producing some kind of movement or gesture or vocalization. Allow yourself to stop, pause and sense, taking the pressure off in this way, while remaining attentive and connected and alive and attuned to the experience of self, other, world, energy body and emotional body.

Then perhaps out of that—out of that sensitivity and attunement in the pause—comes the instigation, the seed of the next movement or gesture.

Another approach is almost the opposite, or complementary: don't stop. So I'm baffled and stumped and somewhat at a loss for what to do, but see if you can simply keep moving or gesturing. As I said before, let the material—the movement, the gesture, the voice—continue flowing. The material is still there. You're not taking your hands off the clay on the potter's wheel. You're not removing your hands from the piano. You keep them moving on the piano, making sounds as you move them, and you're responding to the sounds you hear, to how they make you feel, to your sense of them.

Rather than stopping the vocalization and gesture and movement, you actually just keep going. Don't stop. Don't let the bafflement or confusion halt the flow. You continue, but sense as you're doing so and see if you can follow what feels in any way soulful.

Again, like with the piano. I'm fumbling around, confused. I don't know what I'm doing—I'm not a piano player. But when I press these keys in the low register very softly... oh, yes, okay. Very soft and quiet in the low register, somewhat dissonant perhaps. That creates something. I can feel a certain mood with that, something stirring in my energy body and soul. Then it occurs to me, from this very sensitivity, that delicate darts of notes high up on the piano might complement that. So I do that. I'm not a piano player. I don't know what I'm doing. I'm simply responding to the feel, but I don't stop the flow of material—the flow of sounds that come from my fingers striking the keys.

In this exercise, I don't stop the flow of material. I don't stop moving, gesturing and vocalizing, but I'm tuning in and sensing as it unfolds, as there's this flow of material, and I follow what feels, as best as I can, what feels in any way soulful.

As I said before, I'm letting the material shape the creation rather than pausing in innocence and silence, then creating ex nihilo, or working from some preconceived notion or idea of what it should look like.

As I mentioned, it would be quite normal for self-consciousness to arise for the person moving, gesturing, vocalizing. It might manifest in all kinds of ways—variations on fear of looking silly, sounding silly, seeming silly, being thought of as silly; fear of being blocked and then judged as blocked, or simply judging oneself as blocked.

It could be all kinds of things. So much depends on background and history and conditioning and upbringing, as well as many other factors—personality and soul style.

We might even expect this to arise. It could be good to just expect self-consciousness and awkwardness and a little fear of judgment to come up. We can include this as an expectation, and also include it when it actually arises. Sometimes it may not need very much—we just keep going, and it's included through mindfulness. The mindfulness simply expands to include that: "Oh, okay, there's self-consciousness going on as well, there's a bit of anxiety, or even a lot of anxiety about looking silly or sounding silly."

Can there be a bit more space in the consciousness? Anxiety will contract the space of awareness, and sometimes just creating a bit more space can help.

Self-consciousness arises, and in the very nature of what we mean by self-consciousness in that sense, it's a kind of unskillful contraction of attention and consciousness to the self—not a skillful, careful, and caring examination or inquiry or awareness, but contraction, almost like an obsessive attention that's out of balance and contracted. So opening up the awareness—for instance, of the sky—just that opening out of more space for the attention, for the awareness, counteracts the contraction that's inherent in self-consciousness, in that kind of afflictive self-consciousness.

What we're doing here, working with the dyads, involves opening out the attentions—still aware of the other, still aware of what one is doing, the movements, gestures, and the whole resonances of all of that, the vocalizations, aware of self, energy body, all of that, aware of other, but also all that in a larger space. Just that movement, that opening out of the attentions to include more, to cover a broader space, to encompass and open to a broader space can be really helpful as one continues with the practice.

And of course, again, the fear of judgment from others or self-judgment—how important are the qualities of mettā and compassion? As always with these kinds of dyad exercises, we've talked about this before, but to stress it again: it can be so helpful as part of setting up the space, the field, setting up the dyad, setting up the temenos, to include either deliberately and formally, or rather informally, specific mettā practice. It can be just a few seconds, or a few minutes, or longer—whatever we need. We can set that up at the beginning.

Or, as we've discussed before regarding temenos, sometimes we're just with a person and we can rest assured that there's temenos there—we don't have to actually re-establish it. But if certain exercises or situations are likely to trigger self-consciousness, self-anxiety, fear of judgment, fear of self-judgment, inner critic—all of that—then taking care to actually put a little more emphasis and spend a little more time setting up the temenos at the beginning, particularly the aspects of mettā and compassion within the temenos, can be really, really useful.

This mettā and compassion can also be something we introduce by just pausing. Something's happening, it's getting in the way, I feel blocked here, there's a lot of judgment or fear of judgment or whatever it is. We can just pause and pause the exercise. We can voice that and actually articulate something to the dyad partner, or not voice it—it could be silent. We're just saying, "Okay, let's just spend a bit of time with mettā and compassion," not necessarily telling the other what we're doing right then, but just in that pause, however long it is, moving into a mettā and compassion practice.

I would suggest mettā and compassion for oneself, certainly, because that's where the affliction is, but also for the other. And maybe even again, a sense of a larger space—the space that you're in imbued with mettā and compassion in which you are both sitting. So all these are possibilities if or when self-consciousness arises.

It may be too that there's something accessible—a sense accessible, a perception accessible—in the dyad at that time of oneself, of the other, of the space that you're in, of the whole environment, the world, that can be sensed with soul. Some perception of sensing something or other with soul in all that configuration may be really helpful. This may have perhaps started to happen earlier in the exercise, and you can bring it back, bring it back a bit more deliberately, or lean on it a bit more.

When we're sensing with soul, it will tend to counter that kind of rarefied and contracted self-consciousness, self-obsession, because that's not really a soul movement. It's maybe a kind of squeezed, impoverished reflection of what's originally, if you like, a soul movement, but in itself it's not. So when we sense with soul, something opens that out.

There are actually all kinds of possibilities, but really to expect it, to include it—this possibility of self-consciousness and the affliction of that. We don't have to fight it. We can also, as I said, allow it, but also place it humbly, so to speak, in the sight of the angels, in the purview, in the holding of the angels.

What does that mean? Well, it's an open statement—what that means to your soul, what that means in that situation. Of course, it's connected to what we've said about sensing with soul. We can deliberately draw on or reignite a certain sensing of soul, a certain image or imaginal sense of what's happening that places this very self-consciousness and the problem of that in the sight of the angels, in the holding of the angels, in the lap of the angels. See what that does.

One can also, for instance, just recognize one's fullness of intention or reignite one's fullness of intention as one of the elements of the imaginal. Why am I doing this? What's the primary intention? Is it to look good, to impress? Is it just simply to avoid being judged or to avoid looking silly or whatever?

Of course, no one's going to start an exercise like this, a dyad exercise like this in soul-making, with that limited intention. But very easily and without our recognizing it, our intention can slip in a fraction of a moment, or just gradually it can slip so that what started perhaps as a fullness of intention toward everything that soul-making beckons us to open to and move toward—what can start as that ends up shrunken to an intention, again without our realizing it quite easily, of just trying to get through the exercise, just trying to get through the time, make it through the time with a minimum of looking silly or being judged.

So again, it's not to judge that slipping from a fullness of intention.

Fullness of intention is, as I've said many times, quite a rare phenomenon. It's rare for that element to really be there in its fullness. So we're simply reminding ourselves and recognizing that capacity of the soul, that inclination of the soul—in fact, that eros of the soul that wants to have a fullness of intention. It's already there as a soul desire.

Remember, the fundamental action of all soul-making teachings is that soul wants soul-making. In a way, that desire, that eros of the soul for soul-making, is the most primary desire of the soul. So it's already there. It's a matter of recognizing it, reminding ourselves of it, re-accessing it, as opposed to judging that it's not there at that moment. It's a difficult one, but it's also the most fundamental one. Interesting.

On another level, kind of less soulful if you like, simply remind yourself or recognize the fact that this is an exercise, an exercise and a practice. It's not a performance. I'm not performing for the other, I'm not performing for myself or the teacher or the sangha or whatever it is. It's an exercise and a practice, and that means it doesn't have to be perfect. My very first teacher said to me, "If everything was perfect, why would you need to practice?" It's an exercise, a practice, an exploration. So all kinds of things are going to happen. I'm not going to get it totally right and be dazzling all the time. Very much of the time it's an exercise. So all kinds of possibilities if or when self-consciousness arises in that afflictive way.

What can happen as we do this exercise number four, or many of these exercises with movement, gesture, voice, is that something in the larger constellation, the larger configuration of what is present, what is unfolding—something in that larger constellation may at some point ignite and become image.

So it could be a kind of general sense of divinity, that divinity is present in all of it or in some elements of it, shining through it, being refracted through some or more or all of the components, the constituents of what's happening at any time. It may be that the movement, the gesture, the voice themselves become imaginal. We sense them with soul. It may be the sense of self. It may be the sense of even something like tradition.

And you might feel like, "Well, what tradition is this? I've never done anything like this. Sort of nonsense syllables and improvised movements that don't have any meaning, that look potentially very silly probably to most people. What tradition is that?" Well, I don't know, but it doesn't matter. There may still be an imaginal sense of tapping into and being in the stream of some kind of imaginal tradition. And that could be a tradition of the imaginal, or just an imaginal tradition, some esoteric practice of sacramentalizing, making holy.

As things become image, or if things become image, here's a reminder: none of them need to be very clear and well-defined in order to be an imaginal image with soul-making power. I don't need to be exactly clear what my image of the tradition is, or what exactly the image—if I had to describe the image of the self, maybe it's hard to describe, maybe it's not so vivid, not so well-defined. But it can still—I've said this so many times in talks over the last years—it can still have tremendous soul-making power without being clearly defined and perceived on a sensorial level. So it can be fully authentically imaginal; it can be a fully imaginal image without being necessarily clear or well-defined.

It could be an image of the other. It could be an image of the space we're in. Where are we when we're doing this, when this is happening? Or if you like, the time that we're in. There's a sense of even just fragments or moments in this exercise of the blessing and being blessed, of moving and gesturing and vocalizing—there's a sense that even moments of that could be reflecting something that is always already happening. We are playing something out. We are analogues of an image that is always already happening in hierophantic time.

And as always, when something ignites, some constituent of the larger constellation configuration becomes image—just like with the elements of the imaginal, when one of them ignites—then it's possible that the whole then ignites, and the whole thing is then perceived at a whole other level of sensing with soul, with a whole other level of soulfulness, sense of soulfulness and soul-making there. So that's part of one of the possibilities of what may happen here in different directions.

Now I said I wanted to introduce a variation for this exercise number four. And in a way it's related to what I've just said, but it's a deliberate move rather than something that might just occur spontaneously. That variation, that possibility, is that it still remains a dyadic exercise, an exercise in a dyad, but your dyad partner is actually a so-called intra-psychic image. In other words, you're not doing this with another actual physical human being. You're doing this in dyadic relationship with an image. Same thing though.

So you take your turn to move the body and make gestures and vocalize to the angel, to your angel who is your dyad partner, to the image there, to the imaginal figure.

And then you receive in your imagination the movements, the gestures, the vocalizations, the blessing and the mystery of that communication from the angel in your imagination.

In the first of those two possibilities, when it's your turn to move, gesture, and vocalize to the angel, to the image, again, like in other exercises, it could be that this is physically concretized. In other words, someone else looking on, a third person looking on could see you move, see your physical body move and gesture and hear you. Or it could be, again, just in the energy body and in the imaginal sense, in the image sense, in the imagination.

So there's a whole other variation for this one, which is in a purely imaginal dyad. Why? Well, there are a few reasons for opening up that variation or suggesting that variation at times.

One is, in relation to what we said before, that it may be that doing it on our own, especially if we're on our own in a room somewhere, that we're actually less self-conscious because we're not being... So if that's an issue, if that comes up, as it might for some people, that actually just doing it on one's own in the privacy of one's own meditation space, just with the imaginal figure, that there's less chance of self-consciousness arising because we're less under the, or we feel ourselves less under the scrutiny of another human being.

But secondly, there's also a possibility—not necessary, but a possibility—that in doing it with an imaginal figure as your dyad partner, that the whole thing can actually become more subtle. The whole thing has to be, it's almost like because perhaps we're in relationship with a more subtle entity, an imaginal figure, our movements, gestures and vocalizations can be allowed to become correspondingly subtle. They have to, we're less pulled into the gross.

And there's a related reason, a third reason, related to that opening up the possibility of allowing the movements, gestures, vocalizations to become more subtle. Which, as I've said many times, in imaginal practice, soul-making practice, but also in other practices, oftentimes the movement into depth is a movement into more subtlety. So we really want to keep that range of things, the more subtle range, open and keep exploring it. Not at the exclusion of the grosser, but just a reminder that sometimes the more subtle is actually the more powerful and the more fertile and the more profound.

Let's say tied in, there might be a third reason, which is for doing it this way sometimes, doing it within, intra-psychically, so to speak, is that we may, it may allow the movements, gestures and vocalizations to be more unusual, stranger. And in the sense that whatever we're doing in moving and gesturing and vocalizing, it no longer has to look or sound so much like praising or anything recognizable at all. It may be, at least, that maybe some of the pressure that may be constraining movements, gestures, vocalizations, and also perceptions of sensing the soul, gets removed by removing the physically present other. It may be.

For other times or with other people, it works the other way. The actual presence of a physical human being with all their dimensions allows something, allows what comes through me, and what I allow myself to do allows that to have more range, both in subtlety and in the unusualness of what I'm doing. But do it both ways, play both ways, with an actual human being, a physically present human being, and with an intrapsychic image.

So maybe there are a few reasons why this helps with just doing it with an imaginal figure and not with a physically present human. Fourth reason why is, I'm just going to touch on this briefly and just say, it may be that the soul needs some things that are, so to speak, only between me and the angels. Their secrets, their soul secrets, their treasures and precious confidences between me and the angels and only between me and the angels, only between you and your angels.

And it might be, as much as the soul needs to realize its soul-making and its sensing the soul in relationship with physical beings, actual human beings, and again the whole range and dimensionality of what that means—materiality and nature and human beings—as much as that's the case as a support and a foundation and the field for a lot of soul-making, it may still be that the soul still at times needs some things that are only between me and the angels, only between you and the angels.

So there's a variation there of this exercise number four.

And remember, if you are doing it, particularly if you're doing it with—and it's maybe more likely, a sort of near enemy or far enemy, but certainly a deviation, a perversion a little bit from the intention of the practice, whether it's more likely to come up if we're doing it without a physically present—a physical human being present in a dyad with just the angel. It's more likely, I'm not sure, for it to come up.

Remember, we're not here seeking information. So if the imaginal figure, the angel, is gesturing and moving in my imagination or vocalizing towards me, I'm not in that communication, in that sharing, in the very broad senses of those words. I am not seeking information. That is not my primary intention by far.

That kind of thing may occur at times, but it's not equivalent to soul-making. Knowing the future or this or that happens or something psychic or whatever like that. It may occur at times, sure, it may occur, but it's not the same thing as soul-making, it's not the primary intention.

Usually when the intention goes into that kind of thing, that's when I'm seeking information. Usually that information is for the sake of the reified self and what this self can get, or how it can aggrandize itself in some way. And then what we refer to for the fullness of intention has slipped at that point, or it hasn't been allowed to supersede that other narrow intention for the self. What can I get here? Issues of power and self-aggrandizement.

When there's the fullness of intention, that those other intentions get pacified and they get hugely superseded. The fullness of intention is much more powerful, much more primal, fundamental, beautiful, sacred intention than these other intentions that are more to do with the reified self and power and what it can get, and so forth.

So that's exercise four, the diet exercise, with two main variations in terms of whether we do it with an actual human being, with a soul-making partner, or with an imaginal figure, an angel. And also the variations to do with whether it's intentionally blessing or just moving completely beyond communicating any meaning, and the variations of which aspects of movement, gesture, and voice—which combinations of those are included and allowed at different times. So there are many variations within exercise four.

Exercise five might be viewed as a series of exercises. I'm not sure quite what to call it—I'm not sure it needs a name—but in a way it's really about iconic moments, iconic movements and gestures, and entering into them. Movements, gestures, moments that can become iconic for us, that can themselves become image or have for a culture at different times, or for subcultures, become iconic.

The exercise is to take one of these moments and embody it. Feel into the soul sense of that moment and then let your body and your voice and your gesture and movement embody it. Let the energy body and the soul sense really get a sense, and then see what comes. In a way, this might sound easier, but the level I want to talk about it at is perhaps a little more unusual, and perhaps even a little stranger than some of the other practices.

The first one we might call something like the Via Dolorosa—you know that name from the Passion of Christ, when Christ had been sentenced to death by crucifixion by Pontius Pilate. He was beaten and then was given this cross, this heavy cross. Those who were going to be crucified had to carry their own crosses, weakened and injured from torture and mistreatment and imprisonment, and then had to still carry their crosses to the place, to Golgotha, where they were going to be crucified, going to be executed. If you know from the Catholic tradition, there's the Stations of the Cross that they do every year, and there are certain moments on that whole path that get contemplated, meditated upon in that meditation on the Stations of the Cross. But that whole journey towards one's execution—that's the iconic movement or moment.

So Christ carrying his cross, it could be on the Via Dolorosa. It doesn't have to be Christ. It could be someone anywhere about to be executed. It could be, again borrowing from the Christian tradition, the martyrs about to be thrown to the lions or walking out into the amphitheater before the lions, so they know what's coming. Maybe they can even see or hear the lions, and they're just there in that amphitheater in the moments before their execution, before their death.

What's key in this is that they are surrounded—or Christ, or this person who's to be executed, or the martyrs in the amphitheater, or someone before a firing squad—surrounded by those who are certainly willing one's death, but even more than that, they're mocking and jeering. It may or may not be everyone in the crowd, but certainly a good portion, and maybe everyone, is mocking and jeering the victim of execution.

And yet, and this is all part of describing this moment, the one about to be executed has faith. What does that mean? Faith in what? Has a sense of the angel somehow. Has perhaps even a sense of themselves as image, or even the whole scene as image, and the whole event as image, and the whole transpiring of their execution and death and the mockery and the loneliness. Has a sense of somehow, in this horrific and tragic death, execution, brutality, there is somehow my telos here. This is somehow part of what I've been called towards. Somehow this is part of my fulfilling my duty to the angels, to the daemon, to the divine, to the images.

It's not that the horror and the suffering and the death itself, or taken alone, so to speak, form the telos, that constitute the telos, but rather they are somehow part of a piece of a much larger soul movement and soul duty because of how the soul is moving through the whole thing, how the soul is relating to it. It's that together with the suffering. And also because of what and who the soul, whom the soul is standing with. Because of what and whom the soul is standing with and standing for. It's this standing with and standing for and the how—the ways in which the soul is moving through that dukkha, that suffering, and seeing it, and sensing it with soul, and relating to it—that this becomes, all this becomes somehow, mysteriously part of a larger, wider and more profound telos, movement of soul.

And of course, it may well be that amongst all this sense of rightness and the presence of the angel and the dimensionality, it may be that, probably would be that, amongst all that, there can certainly be, probably will be, some fear, some terror, some sense of torment, some doubt, sense of loss and grief. Of course, the sense of the soul being stretched to its limits by what it's being asked to go through, almost perhaps to breaking point, whatever that might mean. So that kind of complex of emotional and soul reactions can be there too. So there is plenty here that can be very, very rich.

So it could be any of those. It could be Christ carrying the cross on the Via Dolorosa, if that works for you. It could be the Christian martyrs to the lions. It could be just someone somewhere at some time before a firing squad being executed. Perhaps they're a political prisoner and they're being executed for speaking the truth, speaking out against power. The outer environment of that whole image has with it this jeering and this incredible cruelty. The inner environment, so to speak, or the soul environment, has with it faith, a sense of the angel, a sense of sensing the soul, self as image, others, maybe the whole scene as image, a sense of one's telos, one's duty.

Again, it could be really quite specific or really not very specific. And the exercise here—this is the first part of exercise five—they don't have to be in any order. I think there are four parts for now; we could add or change some. I'm just throwing out some examples here.

But that's not what I was talking about. The serpent was more a certain quality of energy, a certain quality of aliveness, a certain quality of movement that has perhaps a sinuous quality, perhaps a sensual quality, perhaps something that's emerging from the earth energies or connected with the earth energies. It may not look like a snake at all to an outside observer.

Similarly here, with these iconic moments, we're not trying to create a recognizable performance or mime. We're sensing into the soul dimension of these profound moments and allowing that to inform our embodiment. The gesture of touching the earth, for instance—it's not about perfectly replicating the mudra as carved in stone. It's about sensing into that moment of calling upon the earth as witness, that profound gesture of claiming one's right to seek awakening, that quality of invoking the support of the whole cosmos in one's spiritual endeavor.

So in both of these examples—the figure facing execution or the Buddha touching the earth—what we're interested in is the soul resonance, the archetypal quality, the depth dimension that lives in these images. And then allowing that soul sense to move through the energy body in whatever way feels authentic and supportive of that inner resonance.

The third example I want to offer is completely different from the first two. This one comes from the realm of what we might call sacred ceremony or ritual. Imagine the moment of offering incense at an altar, or making an offering to the sacred, or perhaps the gesture of blessing.

This could be quite specific—maybe you're a priest or priestess in some ancient temple, lifting your hands in blessing over the community. Or it could be more general—simply the archetypal gesture of offering something precious to the divine, or invoking blessing and protection.

Again, the outer circumstances might vary widely, but there's something about that quality of the sacred offering, of blessing, of connecting the human realm with the divine realm through gesture and intention.

The fourth possibility is the gesture or moment of deep listening—perhaps the moment when the oracle receives the divine word, or when the sage sits in profound receptivity to wisdom. It's that quality of being so open, so receptive, that wisdom or guidance can come through.

These are just examples to give you a sense of the range of what we might work with in this exercise. The key is to find something that has soul resonance for you, something that touches that deeper archetypal dimension, and then to sense into it with the whole energy body.

So maybe I get on the ground and put my arms by my side and sort of wriggle around or writhe around, finding a way of moving kind of like a snake, and then someone could tell it's a snake, or a worm, or something. That's not the point. That wasn't the point in that exercise either.

And it may be, also, that in these kinds of exercises—whether it's Serpent, or these ones we've just talked about—it may be that there's not much movement at all. Of course, with the Buddha's Bhumi Sparsha Mudra, one could actually just replicate that movement. And of course that's very easy to do, just take your hand and touch the earth. But what we really want is the whole arena and nexus and field of heightened sensitivity and soul sense and resonance. Then one's open to all kinds of other movements, gestures and vocalizations as well.

But it may be that actually in this exercise with the serpent, or one of these from exercise number five, there's actually not much movement or sound at all. I'm just standing in front of the firing squad, but everything else that's endemic to that image—in the larger sense of the image, the sense of duty, the sense of angel, the sense of calling and telos, and also the mystery of that, as well as the sorrow, as well as the fear, the beauty of that, the sense of faith, the sense of knowing one is doing the right thing, all of that, the nobility—all that is there. And it may or may not transfer to much movement or sound at all, but that's the key thing.

So one goes from that, so to speak, inner imaginal sense, the energy body sense. This sensitivity is more important. And in a lot of these exercises, you know, the emphasis on the sensitivity even more than a sort of clarity of an image.

We've mentioned several times that it's actually quite hard to, let's say, dance and at the same time have a genuinely imaginal image, a fully authentically imaginal image at the same time as one is dancing. It's actually quite difficult. It's not to say that one might not feel a kind of soulfulness in dancing or really enjoy it or it's wonderful in all kinds of ways or it's soul-making in some ways, but actually to hold a fully authentic imaginal image and be in relation to that image and dance at the same time in a way that both the dancing and the image, the soulfulness of both and the sensing the soul of both is kind of mutually enhanced and mutually woven together and implicated—that's actually quite hard for most people. Even most people who have a practice of dance, and of the imaginal, to really knead them together, stitch them together, is actually quite difficult.

So more important, I think, in a lot of these exercises, is the sensitivity. More important than, say, the clarity of an image, or even the presence of an image in some cases. And sometimes it can be better then to start with the idea of developing the sensitivity to subtlety and going from there. So we've said that before.

Okay, so like I said, I'll throw out four possibilities for this fifth exercise of iconic moments. And the third, again, I don't quite know what to call it—perhaps "waiting for the angels," or "the hospitality to the angels."

Some of you may have come across a couple of online seminars that I did some months ago. They were filmed, and so they're somewhere on the web. There's a set of eleven, but a couple of them have the title something like "Dharma and Art" or "Arts and Dharma." One of the things, one of the illustrations I used for something I was trying to communicate was an icon by Rublev. It's quite a famous icon in the Orthodox Church. It has two names: "The Trinity" and "The Hospitality of Abraham."

It refers to an Old Testament story of Abraham in his tent in the wilderness, in the desert. He sees three travelers walking through the desert and he runs out to meet them and makes them at home, offers his hospitality to them. They turn out to be angels—three angels. So he feeds them and gives them drink and gives them a cool place to rest in the shade.

So that fragment of a story from the Old Testament, from Genesis—Abraham's hospitality to the angels. If you have come across, or if you do in the future come across those arts and dharma seminars, what I'm talking about here for the purpose of this exercise is really the moment or the time prior to the scene in the icon. Because the scene in the icon is actually just the three angels. Abraham is no longer there, and the three angels, or the three persons of the Holy Trinity, are just there at the table having received Abraham's hospitality.

So this refers, in this exercise, to the time prior to that—to Abraham and his openness of soul, his soul antenna, his receptivity, his hospitality to the angels and the imaginal figures.

Well, what exactly is prescribed as a movement or a gesture or a vocalization there? I don't know. But what would it be just to take that? And it's quite, as I said, at one level some of these, this exercise number five, I'm just acting something. But when it's not even obvious what movement goes with it, and I'm not even that interested in it looking like that scene, then it becomes an exercise at a whole other level—to do with sensitivity and attunement and openness and just seeing, connecting soul, movement, gesture, voice.

So it's not at all obvious. What's the kind of prescribed movement, gesture, voice there? Can I feel my way in? And how do I feel my way into that? Maybe I don't even know the story. I'm not familiar with the Old Testament or even Abraham and the rest of it.

Well, Abraham's hospitality to the angels offers another way of understanding this - it represents the soul-making poise we've explored in recent talks. It's the waiting in meditation for an image, making oneself available for the visitation of angels, creating, opening, allowing and supporting a space - a psychic space that can be visited by imaginal figures, in which the imaginal figures can be created, discovered, born, can come.

When we speak of the Old Testament story, we're really talking about the soul-making poise, that stance which involves many factors we've discussed. There's humility, reverence - present even before the image has come, there in relation to the potential of the image, in relation to the place or the level from which the angels come, from which images arise. In relation to that source, there is humility and reverence.

The elements of the imaginal are already present: the sensitivity of the energy body, the recognition that images are both created and discovered, that they emerge through a way of looking requiring our participation as much as they arrive through grace. All this and more forms part of the soul-making poise.

This icon of Abraham's hospitality to the angels connects with theology itself - the Trinity understood as a kind of openness to each other, an economy, what they call the Trinitarian economy. It embodies the poise in relationship to the soul-making stance.

Through the history of our soul-making practice, we develop an increasingly familiar sense of this poise. Not that it becomes narrowly or rigidly defined - like everything else, it maintains a range, remaining elastic with soft edges. But we grow familiar with that space, with the range of possibilities it encompasses, what it can be and what it involves.

The soul-making poise itself can become sensed with soul. It too can become image. As I mentioned, perhaps in The Path of the Imaginal, even the experience of sitting in meditation, open to the possibility of images coming, can itself become image. Any element of the whole constellation of the imaginal can become image. The reverence itself, as part of the soul-making poise, may become imaginal, or the humility, or whatever aspect emerges.

Another iconic moment that may help some find their way into this third part of our example is the preparation for the Sabbath - the Friday preparation for welcoming the Jewish Sabbath. The Sabbath represents the visitation of the Shekhinah, the female aspect of God, sometimes called the bride of God, the bride of the divine. The Sabbath is a kind of visitation into our lives, into this plane of existence, of that level of the divine, that aspect or face of the divine.

What does it mean to humbly and reverentially, with sensitivity and care, open up space and create space in one's house, in one's being, in the house of one's body, in the physical space one occupies? To open that space for the imminent visitation, the blessing, the arrival of the bride - the bride of God, the Sabbath bride, the Shekhinah?

So these are the third possibilities: Abraham's hospitality to the angels, the preparation for welcoming the Sabbath, the soul-making poise itself. Again, it's very difficult to know what's prescribed or what such practices might look like. Perhaps not much movement or sound is involved at all, or perhaps there's a great deal. You must feel your way into these territories.

The last possibility I want to offer for now - and you can hear in what I'm describing that many possibilities exist - is the example of Rosa Parks. Many know this story and its significance in human history, particularly in civil rights and racial justice history in the United States.

In 1955, in Montgomery, Alabama, racist laws enforced segregation on public transport, creating an apartheid system. The bus driver had discretionary power to extend the whites-only section when it became full, forcing African Americans to surrender their seats and stand so white passengers could sit.

Rosa Parks, already an activist who understood her purpose, was returning from work when exactly this situation arose. She had taken her seat in the so-called colored section early in the journey. After several stops, the whites-only section filled, and the bus driver ordered her and three or four other African Americans to move. The others complied; she refused. That refusal represents the iconic moment.

Unlike the firing squad or Daniel in the lion's den, where consequences remain unclear, Rosa Parks's situation held obvious danger. What she was doing was dangerous and would bring negative, probably harmful consequences. This was clear, and therefore her action required courage. She knew this, and she also knew something was right about what she was doing and something was wrong about what racist law was enforcing.

So she was actually fired from her job. She worked as a seamstress in a local department store, and she was fired because of this act. In fact, she received death threats for years as a consequence of this immovability.

In her autobiography, she describes that moment when the white bus driver came back and ordered them out of their seats. "I felt a determination cover my body like a quilt on a winter night," she wrote. Already in what she's describing, there's the body—her bodily experience was central to this act of courage.

All these exercises we're exploring have to do with body and soul, and the connection between them. Her knowledge of what was right, her clarity about values and virtue, was intimately connected with her bodily experience. We've discussed in other talks how the whole arena of ethics, morality, values, and virtues can be understood from the perspective of soul. These concerns are central to soul—values, virtues, ethics are not separate from soul's deepest concerns.

But I want to emphasize how, in her very experience, the body was central. What enabled her to act as she did was perhaps the integration of her bodily sense with soul sense, integrated with ethical sense—these three aspects not separate but unified. Through all five of these exercises, this is what I'm wanting to knead together, knit together, help grow into each other: body, soul, soul sense, and voice.

In terms of her voice, she was already an activist, already outspoken, and she continued to be for the rest of her life. Another powerful thing she said was that in that moment when she didn't move, "I just thought of Emmett Till and I just couldn't go back—couldn't go back to where he was telling me to go."

Emmett Till was a fourteen-year-old African-American boy who was accused—though it's very unclear what, if anything, actually happened—of offending or perhaps flirting with a white woman in a grocery store. He was basically lynched and murdered by four white men. There was a trial, but those four white men were acquitted of his murder. This happened not long before Rosa Parks' act in 1955.

She said when that bus driver came back, "I just thought of Emmett Till and I just couldn't move." Again, it's not for me to suppose the workings of her mind and soul and heart, but you can recognize that she drew on an image, the image and memory of Emmett Till—someone who had become deeply meaningful in her life because of her involvement in the movement for justice.

What enabled this immovability, this conviction, this courage not to move, this courage to break the law and defy what she was being told to do? She writes in her autobiography: "People always say I didn't give up my seat because I was tired. That's not true. I was not tired physically, or no more tired than I usually was at the end of a working day. I was not old, although some people have an image of me as being old then. I was forty-two. No, the only tired I was was tired of giving in—tired of giving in to racial injustice."

One of the beautiful consequences—and this is part of what we don't know when we act in line with the duty of our soul and the callings of our soul—is that we can't always foresee the beauty and fruit that comes from such acts. The African-American residents of Montgomery boycotted the public bus service. While Rosa Parks' court case was being delayed, they had to exercise tremendous tenacity—walking to work, car sharing where they had cars, staying steady when it would have been much easier to take the buses.

They boycotted the buses, putting financial pressure on the bus company. Many buses stood empty in the garages because the African-American people weren't filling them, weren't paying the fares that kept the system running.

So eventually the city retracted, repealed the law requiring segregation on public buses. Of course, there's a larger story there with the whole civil rights movement and the US Supreme Court, but this is the essence of what I'm drawing on here. These don't have to be exact—I'm just picking examples to give you a sense of the kind of things you might explore in these exercises.

Apparently Rosa Parks, as a personality, carried herself with a naturally dignified demeanor. She was quite quiet as a person, and serene, but dignified without in any way being pompous or putting on airs. And that too is part of the flavor of this image I want to communicate here. Her demeanor, her personality was quiet and serene, dignified, but you can hear—I hope you can get a sense of—the soul power there and the soul conviction and how much her body was involved in that, the soul stretch and all of it.

Now, this represents a certain personality, a certain kind of style of expression. It's not to say, certainly not to imply, that the only way to stand firm is in a quiet and serene way—I don't want to imply that at all. But if this is the kind of iconic moment we're drawing on for this part of this exercise, then that's actually part of the image: that it is quiet and serene.

So maybe you can get a sense of that whole gestalt, the whole configuration of that moment, that image, that time, that iconic moment. Then see how that wants to be mirrored or refracted or expressed with body gesture, movement gesture, voice, or what wants to manifest or express in response to that or from that as a seed.

You can hear three slightly different directions there. One is embodying it. One is reflecting it, one is more refracting. And one is just seeing what happens in my soul, from my soul—or better, included in my soul, including the aspects of my soul which are my movement, my body, my gesture, my voice. Including those aspects of the soul, what wants to manifest? Either because it's refracting it, reflecting it, or thirdly, just in response to it or from it.

These kinds of exercises may feel at one level very easy, but at another level—or perhaps they're just open-ended and you can hear there's quite a lot of subtlety here possible—could be quite difficult. I don't know. You'll have to find your way in and play and see.

So all these exercises are really offerings as seeds. It's not my intention at all that these exercises become canonical or rigid—"this is now what we do, this is our canon of exercises in this soul-making tradition." That's not my intention at all. There are many more possibilities. We'll see how time and opportunities unfold, but maybe we'll add to them or change things.

Some of what I've offered, the examples of certain directions and emphases in these exercises, are in response to different students I've been working with. A different sangha, a different set of students, a different situation would almost certainly have given rise to somewhat different content, different emphases—different needs would have emerged. And so there would have been either slightly or very different exercises.

But the principles remain: developing sensitivity with the energy body, with the emotional body, developing range. The principles of developing sensitivity and depth and range with sensing the soul. The principle of kneading together, knitting together, weaving together, stitching together to make one movement, to make one body and soul.

It's not like there is the soul and there is the body, but actually making the body just a part of the soul, not as something other. Just as perception can be either at times a soulful perception, sensing the soul, or at other times not, or more or less so—so also the body, so also the movements, the gestures, the voice. It's not really like they're two things.

Take away my sensing, take away my thinking, my imagining—where is the soul then? Similar to taking away the movement, voice, gesture. These are aspects of soul. And it's like either the blood can get there, or not. Actually, there's always a spectrum. How much can the blood flow? How much can the blood of the soul, the waters of the soul, the fires of the soul—whatever analogy you want to use—how much can that reach those aspects of our being? How much does it reach? Or is it blocked? Are they integrated or are they divorced?

So all these central principles of sensitivity, of range, of energy, of body, emotional and sensing the soul, and this kneading together, this knitting together, this integrating of body and soul—body, voice and soul—all of this applies to these exercises. And as we talked about earlier, these principles relate to practice and one's life, to soul-making in one's life, to soul-expressing and manifesting in one's life and in one's duty. All of that remains steady.

As I said, it's not really my intention for the details to become canonical, to become rigid necessarily. It's much better, as always, to understand through this structural listening—what's the real main point here? But be a little bit careful, because sometimes people think, "Oh yeah, I understand the main point." And then the habit of soul, or the habit of the psychology, reasserts itself.

For instance, in the first part of exercise number three—the thunderclap, or thunder and lightning—there's this quality of showing up with strong integration of thunderous energy. But this is so much out of the habit of movement, gesture, voice that someone might do it a few times, get it, understand the principles of why we're doing this, and then somehow their prevailing habit reasserts itself. They think, "Rob said the movements aren't important. He doesn't want us to get too rigid around the movements." And then they're back to choosing, perhaps, something like Born Aloft by Angels, or some opposite kind of movement—just very fluid and watery. They keep gravitating towards that kind of movement.

They've forgotten the principle. They might have understood it at one point, but they've forgotten it. In not keeping the principle current, they've allowed the force of probably long-standing habit to take over. As I said, usually the habits here have been reiterated and strengthened over decades—decades. Some other possibilities have atrophied; some other avenues have been blocked for decades.

So in the absence of really thinking, "Why am I doing this? Oh yeah, right—because of the principle," in the absence of reminding myself why, then the habit takes over. The habit might be for the weaker movement, the more flowy movement, the softer movement, the pink fluffy angels. Perhaps.

But if I remind myself of the principle—this is what I meant about structural listening and understanding things structurally—the principle tells me something important. If I understand the principle, then I'll say, "Oh yeah, it's about range. It's about having range of movement, gesture, voice, of having those avenues and pathways be fully open, fully available for the influx of soul and the efflux of soul and the manifestation of soul in life." Remember, that's the principle.

So I want range there. I want all of these to be open. If I just remember the principle, then the range of what I'm doing will not shrink to just the ones I'm used to doing out of habit, or indoctrination, or the cultures I've moved in, or personal history, or trauma, whatever it is.

This is so important—whether we're talking about jhāna retreat or emptiness practice. Understanding the meta-principles, the larger structural principles, will help us, will guide us, will inform us in terms of what practice to do and how to do this or that practice. Everything depends so much on understanding why, which has to do with the structural principles undergirding the whole thing.

So this is what we want: the body and the soul integrated together. We want the possibility of soul to manifest, express, flow through and flow from all aspects of the being—including the body movement, the body sense, the gesturing, the voice, the language, all of it. We want that soul to be able to come through there as soul wants to come through there, so that we can follow our telos. We can discharge our duty. We can carry that out. We can have a fuller sense of ourselves—sense ourselves with soul, sense our life with soul, our work, our duty.

Our relationships. Our being. The aspects of our being. This is what we want.

I think it was in the Eros Unfettered series where I quoted a Sanskrit line from the Guhyasamaja Tantra. It's actually a line that's quite common—almost a stock phrase or stock sentence introducing some tantras. In English it says, "Thus have I heard: on one occasion, the Bhagavan, the Blessed One, was dwelling..."—and then it gives a long compound describing where he was dwelling.

So where is the Blessed One dwelling on this occasion? You get this compound, which is like a jewel, a multifaceted jewel that, because of the structure of the Sanskrit language, can yield so many different permutations of meaning. What does it exactly mean for the Bhagavan, the Blessed One, to be dwelling in that—whatever that is, this whole Sanskrit compound? It means multiple things. It means many things at different levels. Even each way we might carve up that compound, grammatically and syntactically, can mean many things at different levels.

Sarva Tathagata means in Sanskrit "all the Tathagatas." Tathagata, some of you will know, is an epithet that the Buddha used to refer to himself. He didn't call himself the Buddha—I mean, he did once in a while, but mostly he called himself the Tathagata. And Tathagata was a word that was, I think, around before the Buddha's time. He picked it up. Even he gave multiple possible interpretations of what that word Tathagata could mean—what the name he had given himself could mean. Once you came to the Mahayana, there were even more interpretations, probably before him there were others. There's a kind of proliferation of meanings as you get into the Mahayana and the Vajrayana.

Sarva Tathagata—all the Tathagatas. So the Blessed One was dwelling in something, something of all the Tathagatas. Tathagata is also an interesting word because, due to the structure of the Sanskrit language and the way words are put together—called sandhi—it can mean many things. It can mean the one who has gone to the truth, or gone to suchness, gone to reality. But it can also mean the one who has come from the truth, come from reality. So it has multiple meanings just in the word Tathagata: gone to reality, come from reality, come from the truth, the realm of truth, the realm of suchness.

So the Blessed One was dwelling in the kayavakchitta, the body, speech, and mind. What kind of body, speech, mind? The body, speech, mind of all the Tathagatas, but also qualified by some adjectives. And again, this depends on how you carve out that Sanskrit compound.

Guhya is a word that's sometimes there in the tantric texts, sometimes not. I'll put it in right now—it doesn't really matter. It's optional. But two others that are definitely there are hridaya and vajra. Vajra is diamond, and hridaya is something like heart essence, and guhya is secret. So the Blessed One, the Bhagavan was dwelling in the diamond—which also means indestructible, eternal. He was dwelling in the indestructible, the diamond heart essence, or the diamond secret heart essence, or the diamond heart essence of the secret—you can carve it many ways—of the body, speech and mind of all Tathagatas, of all Buddhas, of all those who are gone to and come from the truth.

There are so many directions of meaning, so many ways the light can reflect from and refract through this multifaceted jewel of this phrase, of this Sanskrit compound. Actually, there's even more there. I'm just taking these phrases.

Is it possible that we too, in our lives, in soul-making, when we're sensing the soul with that soul-making poise, when the elements of the imaginal are ignited, when we are sensing the soul, that we too have opened up the body, the avenues of the body, of the voice, of movement, the gesture, the range, the possibility, the depth, the sensitivity, the beauty? So that they too, like a multifaceted diamond, have that range of directionality—all the attributes of Buddhahood, all that dharmakaya, the body of the attributes of the Buddha, of the transcendent Buddha, the primordial Buddha. Can we exercise and open up the...

channels of our being, the movements we make, the body, the sense of the body, the sense of the emotions, the gestures, the voice, so that at times at least we too are dwelling—vidyaharas—in the diamond, the indestructible, the eternal heart essence of the body, speech and mind of all Buddhas, all Tathagatas, all those who go to and come from this transcendent truth, this transcendent reality, this reality that is both transcendent and immanent.

So I want, if I can, to actually talk a bit more about Buddha nature and this kind of thing. I just want to tie it to what we've just done. That movement, gesture, voice, body and speech, as well as mind—sensing and thinking, cognition, which we've talked much more about in The Balance of Things, in the Soul Making Dharma. All of that can be open to, can reflect and refract the soul making of the dharmakaya, the sensing of the soul of the dharmakaya, the soul duty of the dharmakaya, which is my soul duty, the one that soul wants to come through me.

So have I opened up those channels? Have I exercised them? Have I pushed them out and stretched them from any kind of habitual collapse or block that might have accrued there, as I said, over years or decades for all kinds of reasons, so that more and more of my being, more and more of the aspects of my being are available, are open for soul to come through, to be soul and to make soul. So this is part of the why we're doing all this.

Just to say one last thing for now in regard to these exercises and this notion of preliminaries. And, you know, I've said part of it before, which is that we can have a preliminary exercise or a sort of foundation exercise. And as we develop that and as the soul-making develops, the range, both in terms of lateral scope, breadth, and depth, and dimensionality, and the sensitivity, and the subtlety, and all the rest of it, of that practice really starts to expand as we practice the exercises, as the soul-making kicks in, in relation to those preliminary exercises, and that field, that arena, or domain. What started as a preliminary becomes in itself soul-making and gets stretched in all kinds of ways. So I want to repeat that as well here now.

The second thing, and very related, is if you ask, say, a Tibetan Rinpoche or someone with a lot of practice in the Tibetan tradition, or who's even regarded as a master, and you ask them, let's say a Dzogchen master or something like that, where there's so much emphasis on Dzogchen or not doing, the ultimate practice and that kind of language or some language or traditions etc and you actually ask them or they report what they spend most of their formal practice time doing, they still, even after many years, spend perhaps most of their time doing what are basically preliminary exercises. Ngöndro is the Tibetan, some of you will know.

So yes, preliminary, this needs to come first, this is what precedes. But it doesn't necessarily mean that then, okay, now I've done that, and then I stop. First we do this, then I stop doing that because I've done it, and I've accomplished what I want to accomplish, and I can just do my sort of more advanced practice. So there's that whole relationship with this notion of preliminaries that's very much the kind of dominant one, actually, in people who take their practice in Tibetan Buddhism very, very seriously and Rinpoches and masters, etc.

And I'm not really sure about this word preliminary. I'm partly picking it and using it because there are preliminaries, as we've tried to explain, to certain areas, directions, domains of our being and our lives opening up with soul. So in some ways they are preliminaries, but they're also, as we've explained, they can be expanded, stretched, developed, they can become soul-making in themselves—extraordinary and not basic at all. So there's a whole range, and I think you will get that sense with all this.

So how does one relate to all these practices over time as one's developing one's soul-making practices? There's preliminaries and then soul-making, maybe there's a parallel, these two and going back and forth, and the periods of one or the other, all that. So I don't know that that's necessarily universally formulaic. But for right now we can use the word preliminary with that caveat.

CHAPTER 239

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 12 min

> In this practice session from the Vajra Music series, Rob Burbea introduces a multifaceted exercise that integrates vocal expression with conscious movement and gesture. Drawing on previous retreat work with micro-movements and posture, he guides practitioners through combining melodic vocalization using syllables like 'ma' with various arm positions and gentle rotational movements.
>
> The exercise offers multiple variations: practitioners can experiment with different postures (arms spread wide, hands crossed over the chest), vary the pitch register from high to low, and modulate volume from loud expression to internal whisper. Burbea emphasizes that this is fundamentally an exercise in cultivating sensitivity—training practitioners to feel into how the combination of sound and movement affects the energy body, emotions, and potential arising of images or soul-sense.
>
> This approach reflects the broader Vajra Music methodology of using voice, movement, and gesture as tools for spiritual exploration. Rather than being a core meditation technique, Burbea frames these exercises as supplementary practices that help 'fill cracks in the soul-scape,' developing sensitivity to subtle inner states and the interconnection between physical expression and consciousness.

Here's another exercise. Remember, it's only an exercise, like some of the other things we've done. It reminds me of a variation of something we did on the retreat—some of the movement exercises where we just moved the body in almost micro-movements and held a posture. We saw what that did to the energy body, to the emotions, to the soul sense, if images arose or if not. Just an exercise.

What we're doing here is training sensibility, training sensitivity.

There are many possibilities. You can start with an image and then let the body, let the voice move from the image, move into the voice, express, manifest through the voice, through the posture or the movement. Or we can start with the movement and see what happens in the soul. There are two ways to do it.

So there are all kinds of variations. We're going to combine voice and gesture or posture. This is just an exercise. I don't think we've done it before with this combination, but you can get to think in a certain way about exercises. It's not a big deal. It's like a screw on an airplane—if it's missing, it might be a big deal, but in terms of the bigger structure of the aircraft, how it works, it's not such a big deal. It's not a central component.

So these exercises, occasionally or for a while emphasizing them, are filling out cracks that have not been filled in the soul-scape.

There are two elements: a sound element—sonic, a voicing element—and a gesture or posture element, a movement element.

For this, if we start with the sound, with the voicing, it goes with a little melody. I'll try and sing it more strongly. It's just repeating. I'm singing it more clearly than you need to—it's part of your variation, how you sing it. It's just that fragment repeating with the syllable, for instance, "ma, ma..." Something like that, something rhythmically close to that.

I'm holding roughly the long note for a count of three or six, and the rest is one each—six eighth notes. That's a vague thing that you voice with the syllable "ma," just to stop.

As you do it, you can do it standing up. What are your arms going to do? You can open them wide, spread your arms down to the tips of your fingers to either side, parallel to the floor. So it's a very open posture. You sing it like that.

Maybe there's a slight movement, like rotating just very slightly, slowly, side to side, so that the angle of your arms—the angle your arms make with the body, with the feet, which are stationary—changes slightly as you rotate, slowly and slightly. Really, your job is to feel into this, feel into what that combination feels like—that movement, that gesture, that posture, and the sound, the sounding.

Maybe you have another posture gesture: your hands crossed, one hand up by one shoulder—the right hand up by the left shoulder, the left hand up by the right shoulder—and then hanging down from there so they cross over the abdomen, over the torso. And the same melody. You don't have to sing it like I'm singing it; I'm just trying to make it clear for you. You do that together.

What happens if you fold your hands like people commonly fold—cross your arms across your chest? Play with different postures of your hands, different slight movements, with the same sounding melody.

Maybe you want to vary the syllable, so it's not "ba," but "pa," or "ta," or "oo," or "ee"—exploring the different vowels. There are all kinds of combinations you can discover with what you're sounding and with your gesture, posture, and movement.

Go slow, take your time, but really repeat one variation for several minutes so you can truly enter into it and feel what it's doing, if it's doing anything. Some of these effects might be very, very subtle.

You can vary your posture, your position, your movement, your gesture—that's the first dimension of exploration. You can vary the pitch and the range at which you sing. Not the melody itself—keep roughly what I've been demonstrating—but it could go much higher in your range where it's more comfortable for you. Or it could stretch into the very heights of your vocal range. Or low, deep in the body, stretching down into those lower registers. So play with the register of what you're singing, the pitch of what you're voicing. That's the second variation.

The third variation is volume—all the way from really loud to moderate to a whisper, to internally where only you can hear it inside yourself. Throughout all of this, you keep exploring the other aspects: the gesturing, the pitch. There's tremendous variation possible here.

Your task is really an exercise in sensitivity. Your job is to feel into it deeply. How does it feel? What happens in the energy body? Remember our expanded understanding of energy body now. What happens emotionally, in the emotional body? And what happens, if anything, in image or soul? The soul responds.

It's very simple, with lots of variations. It's really about sensitivity—it's an exercise in attunement. Don't expect too much. Your job is simply sensitivity. Sensitivity.

You can do this whole exploration with another melody that comes to you, that occurs to you spontaneously, or a fragment that you know from something that touches your soul. What happens when you sing it, when you voice it, when you sound it in these different ways while your body moves and gestures in these different expressions? Put them together.

It's just an exercise in sensitivity. So that's another addition to our collection of contemplative practices. I hope that's clear enough.

CHAPTER 240

Perfection and Christ's Blessing

Rob Burbea · 4 min

> In this deeply personal and contemplative dharma talk, Rob Burbea shares intimate reflections on experiencing a profound sense of divine perfection and Christ's blessing while facing severe physical deterioration. Speaking from his own experience of illness and bodily weakness, he explores how traditional notions of perfection—as the accumulation of wonderful capacities—give way to a radically different understanding: perfection discovered through stripping away, loss, and even dukkha itself.
>
> Burbea touches on the theological concept of theodicy—how suffering and difficulty can coexist with divine goodness—while emphasizing that this understanding comes not through intellectual reasoning but through direct heart-knowing and soul-sensing. He describes moments of washing his hands or hair, feeling the profound weakness of his wasted body, yet simultaneously experiencing an ineffable sense of Christ's blessing permeating everything, including the dukkha itself.
>
> This talk offers a unique perspective on finding the sacred within suffering, challenging conventional spiritual ideals of perfection and inviting practitioners to consider how divine grace might be discovered not despite our limitations and pain, but precisely within them. Burbea's teaching bridges contemplative Christianity and Buddhist understanding of dukkha, offering comfort and insight for anyone facing physical decline or spiritual crisis.

We have a very different sense of perfection—our perfection, the perfection of being. Perfection runs through being, through existence itself.

Washing my hair. It's so bony now. I've lost so much weight. I feel my body wasted away—very much just bones, really. I can't see properly. I can't stand up. I don't have any balance. I'm washing my hands after going to the toilet, trying to be careful because of the virus. There you go. So now we're in touch—one hand on the other, the soap and the touch. And there's some kind of perfection there, some kind of beauty of God's grace.

This has nothing to do with perfection in the way that we usually understand it or think of it—becoming perfect. It's a way of seeing. It's very personal. I mean, it's universal and it's personal. Somehow the love in there, somehow the being known in there, the knowing. All of this is wrapped up in a perfection. A perfection wraps it up. It permeates through, it shoots through, it exudes it, it expresses it.

I'm feeling so bad, feeling so weak and tired and lost in almost all capacities. Somehow, Jesus' blessing is on everything. I don't know what that means. What does it mean? The heart—meaning the heart and the soul—knows something, feels something, senses something, opens to something, realizes something. Jesus' blessing is on everything, and that blessing is a perfection.

It is the opposite of accumulating wonderful capacities. It's in the stripping away, the loss, the misery, the incapacity. There's this word in theology—theodicy—which is like trying to explain how the occurrence of difficult, bad, even evil things is congruent or makes sense with a good God. Theodicy. There are all these different theories and perspectives.

Maybe it's something to do with what we need to sense in the soul. The soul senses something. We open to something. We glimpse something. We taste something. Our heart knows something. The heart of our soul knows something. We see it. We feel it. Jesus' blessing is on everything. Christ's blessing is on everything, in everything—in the dukkha itself, right there in the powerful dukkha.

It's a very different sense of perfection.

CHAPTER 241

Follow Your Heartbreak

Rob Burbea · 38 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea draws from his recent self-retreat experience and engagement with Andrew Harvey's "The Hope: A Guide to Sacred Activism" to explore the essential role of heartbreak in spiritual transformation. He examines how both personal awakening and collective evolution require us to courageously face suffering rather than avoid it, referencing the classical Theravāda Progress of Insight teachings that map the challenging terrain of deepening practice—from dissolution through fear, misery, and the "dark night of the soul" to ultimate liberation.
>
> Burbea connects this individual journey to Joseph Campbell's Hero's Journey archetype and suggests we are collectively experiencing a "dark night of the species"—referencing the Hindu concept of Kali Yuga while also recognizing unprecedented opportunities for consciousness evolution. He explores how the Buddha's First Noble Truth of dukkha serves not as pessimism but as the necessary starting point for freedom, emphasizing that "you can't bypass" suffering to reach awakening.
>
> The talk culminates in Harvey's concept of "sacred activism"—following your heartbreak as a compass for meaningful engagement with world suffering. Whether responding to environmental destruction, social injustice, or personal loss, Burbea suggests that our broken-open hearts become doorways to wisdom, compassion, and effective action. He guides listeners through a contemplative practice of touching their own heartbreak with the breath and bodhicitta, encouraging transformation of pain into fuel for awakening and service.

I wasn't here last week because I was on a self-retreat, which was really wonderful. Both sitting with people is really good, and sitting on your own—if you've been practicing and you kind of know the territory—has its own sweetness as well.

I went to this very small center called Silent Stay, which is just on the border of Napa Valley in Vacaville. It has room for about six people, and I recommend it if you just look up Silent Stay. The couple that runs it previously ran a retreat center in Assisi, Italy for twelve years. There was recently a CNN list of the top ten retreat centers in the world—at least that was their list. Spirit Rock was number one, by the way, and their center in Assisi was on that list too. They came back here about seven months ago and opened up this center, which is kind of a clone of the one there. They brought all their statues and art, so it's quite nice.

During this nine-day self-retreat, we'd sit a couple of times together with whoever was there—there were a couple of other people during my stay. It wasn't an intensive kind of retreat as I often do, with sitting and walking and sitting and walking, just building more and more momentum of mindfulness. I tried to be mindful in everything I did and sat maybe three to five times a day, usually about four or five times a day. I also did some writing, which was wonderful, and caught up on my email for the first four days after I'd been away.

But I also did some reading, and I've been hanging out with this book. I think I've mentioned it here once, but I've been with it for a couple of months, and the retreat was largely about digesting the full impact of this book, which is by Andrew Harvey, called The Hope: A Guide to Sacred Activism.

He's the person—if you were here sometime in the last few months—maybe you were here the time that I played through my computer him reading Rumi about passion. Do you remember that one? "Passion, passion, passion, passion," and then he riffs on it. That touched me deeply, blew my mind, opened up my heart when I first heard it a couple of years ago, and I play it regularly.

I decided to reach out and have a conversation with him because he's open to that at times, and we had a rather rich conversation. He said, "Okay, read the book—read my book and tell me if it feels like you want to keep on hanging out. Read that first." And I read it.

He's brilliant, by the way. And he knows he's brilliant, but he also knows his impatience and his arrogance at times. He writes all about that, about all the places inside that come with having a mind and a heart like he does. But it's brilliant.

I've been really inspired by it as a kind of guidebook to a new area that I feel myself moving into, which is sacred activism. He presents this very sobering and very inspiring vision of where we are now as a species, in the evolution of humanity and in our consciousness. He doesn't hold back at all on both ends—both the sobering, overwhelming crisis of greed and fear, anger, outrage, disconnect from the natural world, a world gone mad. You don't need much to find confirmation or evidence. You'd have to be closing your eyes and walling yourself off in a cave to not see that aspect of where we are—a world gone mad.

What he calls being in the dark night of the species. As I was thinking about this, I thought about the Kali Yuga. Perhaps you're familiar with this—in the Hindu perspective, there are different epics of time, and many have talked about us being in the Kali Yuga now.

There are four different yugas—epochs of time—and the Kali Yuga, which if you're familiar with Kali, the divine dark mother that eats everything, that's one way to think of the Kali Yuga. But actually, as I looked it up, the Kali is actually referring to a demonic kind of Kali, not a beneficent Kali.

So if we are in the Kali Yuga, this is the prophecy for events in the Kali Yuga. In some schemas, the Kali Yuga is supposedly ending around 2025—who knows? There are others that say it's happening a whole different way. But anyway, it seems like we're in the Kali Yuga.

Some of the things that happen in the Kali Yuga: Rulers will become unreasonable. They will levy taxes unfairly. The rulers will no longer see it as their duty to promote spirituality or protect their subjects and will become a danger to the world. People will start migrating, seeking countries where wheat and barley form the staple food source as opposed to rice. At the end, avarice and wrath will be common. Humans will openly display animosity towards each other. Ignorance of the dharma will occur. People will have thoughts of murder with no justification and will see nothing wrong in that.

We just saw this in the news in the last couple of days—those kids that were just bored and shot that Australian baseball player. This is the prediction. I wonder when it was predicted, and if it wasn't like that then, what that might have been like.

But anyway, as Andrew Harvey talks about this dark night of the species, the inspiration is that it's held in a perspective, in the context of the potential of birthing an awakening of humanity that's never been seen before. And he's not the only one that holds this. If you're familiar with the harmonic convergence, there was that same kind of Mayan prophecy where there'd be a window of time where there'd be a lot of dukkha with the potential to shift things. That there can be, through the dukkha, through the suffering, a kind of new emerging of a consciousness and connection to the planet and to respect for life.

He talks a lot about how the divine feminine is going to play a key role in this, which I have felt for some time. The guys just haven't done such a good job. He talks about many different elements of both the death and the birth that is potentially here.

So that kind of perspective gives meaning to the tragedy and the heartbreak that probably many of us feel. It's like the system needs to crash before it can reboot. That's one way of thinking about it.

I'm not just going to focus on this global level, but I want to see it as a natural process on many levels—global unfolding of the species and the personal spiritual journey. I'd like to talk about and focus a bit more on that, and then we can open it up to looking at the bigger perspective as well.

We can see the same process that Andrew Harvey talks about—this very chaotic, confused, frightening place that the species is going through as an emergence, as a necessary emergence to something greater. This is exactly the process of our spiritual journey.

If you're new to this kind of work, I'm reminded of a line from Trungpa Rinpoche, who was one of the most quotable beings I ever met. In one lecture he said, "The spiritual journey is fraught with perils and dangers. So consider very carefully before you start." Then he paused for a while and said, "But once you start, it's best to finish."

It's not that it's some kind of mistake, some kind of warped sense of humor that would set up the game like this. This is an essential unfolding in our lives.

Anyone who's done a retreat knows it's not that you sit there and say, "Oh, how nice it is to be with the moment," and then that's how it is for the next five or ten days. "Oh yeah, they talk about being in the present, and how lovely—now I have ten days to just be in the present. How cool. This is better than Bali. What a cool vacation."

It's rare that that's somebody's experience. It can happen, actually does happen at times. But it's not usually your introduction to sitting there with your mind and your heart for however long it is. By the second day, the common question is: What am I doing here? Why did I sign up for this? What was I thinking? Or what was my friend thinking when they said it would be a good thing?

There's ups and there's downs and there's challenges. That's an essential part of the trip because in that journey, how else can you discover you have the capacity to be with everything? How else can you discover that you have the courage and the strength and the wisdom and the compassion and the love and the peace that can hold all of that, that can go through even all of those challenges and difficulties? How else could you find out? How else could you discover for yourself what's called verified faith, where you know absolutely the power of presence and the power of a loving presence or a kind awareness?

This is the way of this journey. It's forged by facing the very demons that we usually distract ourselves from. Through that being forged through the heat, there's a tempering, like iron is tempered into steel, and a strengthening that opens you up to places you didn't know were there. One could say it's a trial by fire.

I don't want to frighten people saying, "Oh my God, he just said sign up for a five-day retreat." No, it's not always this and it's not this every moment, but there are parts of it that are like this and that are okay. There's also being present in a way that you've never seen before and waking up to being alive and waking up to your own goodness and feeling a connection with life. There's, as the saying goes, the 10,000 joys and the 10,000 sorrows. You get to be here and sit with it all and see through it all.

You know that line, "What doesn't kill you makes you stronger"? Well, not that you're going to get killed, but you are challenged. More and more, what happens as you go through those challenges, you have more and more confidence that it becomes less and less scary. It becomes more and more a place that you're drawn to again and again because you touch something that's so pure that you can't keep away. It's something that calls you.

It's just like something has called everybody here, even if it's just out of curiosity for the first time, that has called you through whatever challenges you've gone through in your life that has kept on pulling you through and facing you in the direction of being hungry to awaken to truth or love or whatever you want to call it.

There's a line that I like from Helen Keller. She says, "Character cannot be developed in ease and quiet. Only through experience of trial and suffering can the soul be strengthened, ambition inspired, and success achieved. All the world is full of suffering. It is also full of overcoming."

That's one reason why the Buddha starts out with a very sobering fact. There's suffering in life. He doesn't sugarcoat it. There's suffering in life. And he says, the more one can learn to open up to suffering, the more the possibility of coming to the end of suffering. As probably many of you are familiar with his response when he was asked, "What do you teach?" He says, "I teach about suffering and the end of suffering."

But you can't bypass it. Awakening joy sounds good. "Okay, I'll just go for feeling good." Awakening joy, an essential part of it, is opening up to all the difficulties and challenges in your life.

I also want to mention another classical teaching that talks about this in another level besides just going through one retreat where you go through your ups and downs. And that's over the course of one spiritual journey. The classical model of awakening in the Theravadan teachings called the Progress of Insight. You can look this up online. It's no secret. But sometimes it's a little warning not to read too much about it because then you kind of see, "Oh, where am I? Have I made progress? Oh, no." It's like chutes and ladders. But it's good to have a sense of the different places that one goes to so that you don't get confused if you're finding yourself not on a bliss trip, even after you've been doing this for a while.

In the Progress of Insight, which kicks in after one has done some practice and really seen in a profound way some basic realities of life, some basic principles of life, after one is deeply moved by seeing the arising and passing of everything—what's sometimes called a mini-Nibbana, a mini-enlightenment—

After the profound awakening experience—that glimpse of the arising and passing away of all things, sometimes called a mini-Nibbana—you might feel absolutely certain you've reached full enlightenment. But you haven't quite arrived there yet. However, something fundamental has shifted. You don't forget what you've seen.

As I share this, I must offer an important caveat: don't try to match your experience exactly to the progress of insight maps. The journey doesn't always unfold so neatly or linearly. But in the classical textbook version—which sometimes happens and sometimes doesn't follow such a tidy progression—after glimpsing that profound understanding of everything arising and passing away, you often begin to notice primarily how everything is dissolving.

This marks what's called the dissolution stage, where there's no solid ground anywhere because everything reveals itself as utterly empty. You see the complete insubstantiality of all phenomena. Where is anything, really? There's no security, no place to stand. While this recognition of emptiness and insubstantiality is profoundly important, when that sense of solid ground begins to give way, it becomes unsettling and shaky.

The next classical stages unfold predictably: fear emerges as you realize everything is dissolving and there's nowhere to stand. Then comes what's sometimes called the "rolling up the mat stage"—misery so intense that the yogi simply wants to pack up and go home. This refers to the meditation mats used in India, Burma, and Thailand. Remarkably, this represents a very high stage of practice, though it can last anywhere from a brief moment to an extended period.

Following this comes terror, then loathing and disgust, where you find yourself asking, "My God, what was I so attached to? There's nothing substantial here. What was I craving so desperately?" This is the Pali term nibbida—seeing the essential emptiness of everything. Sometimes this manifests as complete dispassion.

This profound seeing naturally leads to the urge for deliverance. A deep longing arises: "I want freedom. I don't want another ice cream cone—I can see that won't satisfy me. I want true liberation."

In recognizing the insubstantiality of all phenomena, you also begin to see that your fears themselves are insubstantial—the terror, the misery, all of it. While you're not as frightened, you're left wondering: what is there, really? What will truly fulfill?

Eventually, you begin to see both the beautiful and the terrible with equanimity. You recognize that everything unfolds on its own—that whatever you do won't fundamentally change the nature of things. This opens into a space of profound balance and equanimity around all phenomena.

This equanimity becomes the direct precursor to genuine freedom, to liberation, to Nibbana—the unconditioned reality that can manifest in various ways.

I share all this not to frighten you, but to offer comfort. If you find yourself experiencing terror, loathing, or disgust, it's reassuring to know this could indicate a very high stage of practice rather than spiritual failure. In touching such immediacy and intensity, in allowing your heart to be broken open, you're passing through necessary fire. For some, this process happens quickly; for others, it takes longer. But as long as you maintain sincere direction and genuine desire for freedom, it must be answered.

This progress of insight corresponds beautifully to what Joseph Campbell identified as the Hero's Journey—that archetypal pattern he discovered running through all great myths, fairy tales, and folk stories across human cultures. Campbell's insights into humanity's journey toward freedom are truly remarkable.

The Hero's Journey begins when something motivates the hero to leave their complacent routine—a call to quest that says, "Yes, there's something more." In answering that call, they inevitably encounter hardship. This pattern underlies virtually every action movie you've ever seen. Through that hardship, the hero faces great challenges, ultimate tests—the dark night of the soul.

And through that, there is victorious triumph. The hero or heroine wins and there's freedom. This pattern holds true whether we're speaking of Perseus in mythology, all the great heroes and heroines, Ulysses, or the Buddha himself.

Consider the Buddha going through his quest. Just before his enlightenment, there is Mara throwing everything at him after six years of the most intense asceticism and hardship. And there he is, with Mara saying, "Who the heck do you think you are? What makes you think you have the right?" Mara tries to frighten him, tries to seduce him with visions, but then comes the final test—doubt. The Buddha touches the earth and becomes enlightened, declaring through his gesture: "By all the work that I have done, I know I have the right to be here."

Or consider Jesus on the cross, going through crucifixion and reaching that point where he cries, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" And then comes the resurrection.

In modern representations, we see this in the Star Wars movies. Luke Skywalker embodies the ultimate hero's journey, particularly in The Empire Strikes Back. There he is, going through his training while Yoda counsels, "Just slow down a bit. You've got to slow down." But Luke is impatient, filled with impetuosity. "I've got to do it. I'm ready," he insists.

"Okay, you're ready?" Yoda responds. "Take that lightsaber, go into that cave, and face your darkest demons. Hopefully one of you will come out alive." That's how he becomes a Jedi Master—by facing his greatest demons.

Or consider the recent Hunger Games with Katniss Everdeen finally making it through her trials. This is the path. There's no way around it.

Andrew Harvey makes a profound point: both on a personal level and on a global level, we have to let our hearts be shattered. We have to be willing to let our hearts be shattered. You can't protect yourself anyway. You might try, saying, "Oh no, I can't bear it anymore." Sometimes protecting yourself is important because the overwhelm becomes too much. But at some point, when you have the courage to become a warrior for goodness, a sacred activist, you have to let your heart be broken.

And in that breaking, it breaks open, just like on retreat. It breaks open to all the possibilities inside. Here lies this incredible paradox: in our protection, we cut ourselves off from all the good stuff within. But when we let ourselves be broken open and shattered, when we reach that point where we finally say, "I give up," when we feel we've hit rock bottom—that's the time we're reborn. That's when the ego truly surrenders and something mystical enters. But it requires our willingness to be shattered, and that means being shattered on purpose, not only on a personal level but also on a global level, emerging on the other side as warriors for goodness and peace.

In Harvey's beautiful presentation of death leading to rebirth, he speaks of all the awful conditions that are part of our death. But in our rebirth emerge aspects that have never been here before. Let me mention just some of the most important features of this birth to offer you some uplift as you go through this process.

The crisis itself demands a response, and people are responding and waking up in a way that has never happened before in this human experiment. Never before.

As my friend Roger Walsh says, we're in a race between fear and consciousness. Who knows what's going to win? If we have enough time, I always think that consciousness trumps fear. But whatever happens, the darkness brings out the light. So the crisis and our response to it become inseparable.

One of the responses he explores comes from Paul Hawken's book, Blessed Unrest. Hawken set out to discover just how many progressive movements—devoted to environment, human rights, gay and lesbian rights, animal rights, and so on—have been sparked by where we are. What he discovered and calculated is that there are between one and two million organizations on the earth now actively working toward ecological sustainability and social justice. In his book Blessed Unrest, this is not just hypothetical. He goes out and takes a look at what's actually out there. That's a little encouraging, isn't it?

The technologies, as destructive as they have been, are also leading to possibilities that have never happened before. We have instant access to all information that has ever been. Isn't that amazing? Think about that—all the information that has ever been. Never before on this planet has that been available. And not only available to some, but as he says, there are new forms of democratizing media. It's available to all. And it doesn't matter what the powers that try to control things are—the jig is up. The cat is out of the bag. There can be attempts at suppression, but it's too late for that. It's available to all.

There's the mystical renaissance. There has never been a renaissance of spirituality that's not just defined by one doctrine or dogma, but goes way beyond any one religion to the point where it's emerged above organized religion in this renaissance of spirituality.

The evolving philosophy of non-violence has emerged—which, just in the last hundred years or so with Gandhi and then Martin Luther King and the Dalai Lama and Nelson Mandela, shows us new ways of dealing with our struggle for sanity in this insane world. Non-violence, the power of non-violence.

The return of the divine feminine—as we can see just in the last fifty years, the feminist movement being such a key thing in bringing more compassion and more love and more understanding to the world, growing more and more in its power.

And then the last, as he calls it, the divine willing and blessing the birth of the divine human. That gets into something mystical. But he's saying if you look at all the signs, there is this birthing of a consciousness that wants to manifest more and more through all of us, through all the ones who are sacred activists.

And he talks about letting your heart be shattered—not just as bad news, but as the doorway to how much you feel and care and are connected with life. As he says, if you want to know what to do, how can I contribute in this world? He says: follow your heartbreak. Follow where your heart is broken, which might be gay rights, might be human rights, might be animal rights, might be the environment—there are so many to choose from. Follow your heartbreak because that's where the juice is. That's where the aliveness is, right there, if you let it lead you.

And out of that, there is this sense of joy in letting all your frustration and fear and anger be transmuted into love, into caring, and into compassion, into making a difference that awakens that same quality in others that you touch.

So I want to ask for a moment, as I stop my speaking, to reflect inside and see where your heart has been broken, how your heart has been broken—whether it's some personal challenge that you've gone through or your heart broken by picking up a newspaper and what really touches you or gets to you.

Let yourself first, for a moment, just breathe. Just breathe. You need to breathe. You need to give yourself all the space and support you can. You can't do this all in one breath or session, but just a little at a time. See, like in the Tibetan practice of tonglen, that it's possible to take in the suffering and have it held with something much deeper than that suffering—with that beautiful seed of enlightenment, your bodhicitta, your true nature that can hold your broken heart with compassion.

See what either you've learned from heartbreak in the past. You might reflect on that for a moment before we go on. Just heartbreaks in the past. What have you learned? How have you gotten stronger? How have they supported you in your development? How have you discovered places inside that you didn't know were possible, that were there?

To connect with some verified faith for just a few moments. And then, in your breaking heart, wherever it might be these days—maybe somebody that you care about going through a hard time, or going through grieving or loss or some challenge, something that touches you—what can you see? How can you possibly envision awakening to a new level of wise, loving response, to a new level of awakening that not only benefits you, but everybody who meets that awakened heart?

Don't be afraid to touch it. Touch it in whatever doses work for you. And if it gets too overwhelming, then you can always back off. But don't be afraid to touch it because right in there is the secret. Right in there is the possibility of transformation. Right in there is the hero's journey or heroine's journey that you're on, and that we're all sharing together.

And celebrate that you're on this journey. As scary as it can get sometimes, as scary as the world might seem sometimes, there's transformation—there's the dying and the being reborn on every level, from personal to global. And what an amazing opportunity and gift that we are given, that joyful responsibility that we are given as we go through this together.

Seeing how it's near the end of the evening, we'll just close with sharing merit. May our own journey be used for the benefit of all beings. May we awaken to the courage and the strength and the love and the wisdom that can hold all of the dark, frightening places. May confusion dawn as wisdom. And may our own practice be a gift to everyone in our lives and the world and the planet that so welcomes us in that way.

So thank you for your attention. That was what was coming out this evening. Have a good week and share your practice with the world.

CHAPTER 242

(On Climate Change) Earth's Crisis - On the Edge of the Roof

Rob Burbea · 26 min

> In this profound guided meditation, we explore our intimate connection with the earth through embodied awareness and presence. The practice begins with establishing mindful posture and breath awareness, then systematically relaxes the body while cultivating receptive attention to sensations and aliveness within.
>
> The meditation emphasizes sensing ourselves as 'earth in this particular vibrant, vital form,' inviting us to feel the earth's aliveness flowing through our bodies. This embodied approach to environmental awareness offers a contemplative foundation for understanding our interconnectedness with the natural world. Through practices of softening, letting go, and receptive listening, we develop the inner stillness and presence needed to truly feel our place within the larger web of life.
>
> The session integrates traditional mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) with somatic awareness and earth-connection practices. Participants learn to 'arrive again' in present-moment awareness when the mind wanders, cultivating the alert inner stillness that reveals our essential nature. This approach to meditation offers both personal transformation and a deepened sense of environmental responsibility through direct experiential connection with the earth's vital energies.

Take a moment to set yourself for the sitting. Find a way of sitting where you're upright so you feel quality of alertness, sitting tall. Sense the balance so that if you for a moment lean forward and then lean backwards, then lean to your left, lean to your right. Move around a bit and then come center and really feel that quality of sitting in a way that's balanced, centered.

Let your breathing deepen, expanding, extending the in-breath so it's fuller. And a slow out-breath. And again, inhaling deeply and fully. Slow out-breath. One more time, nice full in-breath, filling the lungs. And a slow out-breath. And letting the breath resume in its natural rhythm. Being mindful of the inflow, outflow, and relaxing with that.

Sensing increased quality of presence as you begin to slow down and pay attention to what's right here, to your senses. Letting the attention come into the heart area, so that we together can reflect, as we do most weeks, on what brings us here, taking some moments to feel the sincerity of your own intention.

What is your intention tonight? From the deepest, wisest, most sincere place in you, what most matters? You might sense this as a longing or a prayer, perhaps for presence, for open-heartedness, to realize the more full truth of who you are, to touch peace. Just sensing the flavor of caring as you bring your palms together, letting them touch lightly at the heart area.

And we'll chant the mantra Aum. Chant it three times. Please inhale deeply.

Aum.
Aum.
Aum.

Thank you.

Bringing the attention into the body first by simply softening around the eyes as if you could smile into the eyes. Let the brow be smooth, relaxing in the whole forehead area and just feeling the sensations of life that are there as you relax. Receptive, present.

Relaxing the jaw. Relaxing down to the root of the tongue. Letting the tongue spread, feeling it in the lower jaw. Soft. You might sense a slight smile at the mouth. A smile on the inside of the mouth. And feel the sensations that wake up as you relax through the mouth area.

Feeling the life inside the shoulders, sensing the possibility of softening, relaxing there. You might imagine a melting or dissolving, a letting go. And as you do, notice in an intimate way the play of sensations in the shoulders.

Feeling the length of the arms, letting the hands rest in a very easy and effortless way, softening the hands. And again, with the receptive attention, feeling the life, the play of sensations inside the hands, from the inside out. Notice that if you soften the hands even more, there's even more sensitivity to sensation.

Bringing the awareness to the region of the chest and the heart. You might imagine smiling into the heart, putting a smile spread through the heart and the chest area. This isn't to paper over what's there but rather to make space for it. Relaxed presence. Feeling from the inside out the sensations and aliveness in the heart area.

Scanning down the torso, relaxing the belly. You might again sense that curve and sense of a smile at the belly. Visualizing and feeling that. Letting this next breath be received in a softening belly. This breath. This breath. And again. Relaxing and sensing the aliveness and sensation in the belly.

Scanning deep into the torso, relaxing the whole pelvic region. And from the inside out, allowing yourself to feel the sensations and aliveness that's there, that spreads through genital region, the hips, the buttocks.

Scanning down, feeling the length of the legs. Right into the feet so that you feel the feet from the inside out. Softening, relaxing.

Feeling the play of sensation in the feet. Allow the awareness to sink deep into the earth, sensing the whole field of aliveness of this earth body, feeling it flowing through the feet, through our bodies, animating in a dynamic moment-to-moment way our forms.

Feel simultaneously this whole body as a field of sensation. Not stopping anything or opposing anything. Let this life live through you, including the dance of sound so that you're listening not just with your ears but your whole awareness. Let sounds wash through you.

Listen to and feel the whole moment. Sense the sounds, sensations, feelings, right here. And also be aware in the background of this presence, this alert inner stillness that's aware—that beingness which is the very essence of what we are.

At some point you'll realize that the mind has drifted and quite naturally has left that quality of beingness, contracting back into a narrative, a story, a comment, the future, the past. Without any judgment, see if you can simply notice that this has happened and pause. Then just arrive again. Come back to noticing the aliveness that's right here. This play of sensation. Letting sounds wash through.

For some, the mind will become more steady and quiet if you notice the sensations of the breath—the inflow and outflow, perhaps at the nose or the chest or the belly, or even feeling the whole body breathing, expanding, settling. We bring the attention back to what's right here in our senses. In that way we come back home to the presence, that awakeness and space and tenderness that's our deepest nature.

Notice that you can start fresh in any moment. If the mind has gotten lost in virtual reality, gently come back to your senses, right here, right now. You might ask yourself if it's possible to relax just a little bit more right now. Let go a little bit more.

As we explored earlier, let your awareness descend and immerse deep into the earth, feeling this earth body, this extension of our body, its full aliveness and creativity flowing through us—recognizing that you are earth in this particular vibrant, vital form.

Sensing the whole play of tingling and vibrating. Pressure, flow, light, dark. Sensing the play of sound washing through. And the vast awake silence that's aware.

CHAPTER 243

All In This Together

Rob Burbea · 57 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses the intersection of contemplative practice and our shared planetary crisis during Earth Care Week. He explores how the Buddha's teachings on interdependence reveal that there is no separation between 'inner' and 'outer' work—our individual meditation practice is intrinsically connected to our collective well-being. Drawing on the Satipaṭṭhāna teachings and insights from contemporary teachers like John Francis (Planet Walker), Burbea examines how genuine spiritual practice must embrace both the silence of the sage and the passion of the activist.
>
> The talk explores key Buddhist concepts including citta (heart-mind), śūnyatā vihāra (dwelling in emptiness), and the brahmavihāras (divine abodes), showing how deepening meditation naturally leads to greater capacity for responding to suffering. Burbea discusses how awakening manifests differently across historical conditions, suggesting that our contemporary awakening must address climate crisis and social justice. He concludes with Śāntideva's Bodhicaryāvatāra verses on dedicating practice for all beings, emphasizing that individual liberation and collective healing are inseparable aspects of the dharma path.

So I want to start from a different angle tonight, our last night together—and of course most of you will be going home tomorrow. I want to approach what we're doing here from what you might initially see as a bigger perspective, prompted by today being October 7th. In our tradition, though it's not huge, I'll say a little about this particular lineage.

This week, from October 1st to the 7th, is being celebrated as Earth Care Week in our lineage of lay insight meditation tradition. Today is the last day of it, so I wanted to make reference to this. In our sister centers in different parts of the world—we're not a huge lineage, but it's mostly Western and quite big in America—there are centers and teachers and students that have come out from California from the teacher Jack Kornfield, who many of you have probably heard of, and on the East Coast from Joseph Goldstein and Sharon Salzberg. There's a big network over there.

We're part of the same lineage here, and there are sister centers in California, Switzerland, France, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand—so it's mostly Western, as you can see. Although our teachers all came originally from the East, from the Buddhist countries of Thailand, Burma, and others.

This week has been nominated—and this is the first year it's being celebrated—as a response to the very real need that we have as a human species at the moment with our Earth, or our Earth has with us, whichever way we like to look at it. What would it mean to bring the Dharma to the table more and more fully in this discussion which we're all going to need to have together as the years move on? Already many are suffering from the effects of this, particularly in the global south, particularly people with less privilege than most of us.

In response to this reality, what does it mean to bring the teachings that on one level can look so inner—and they are, the inner work is absolutely crucial—to this kind of big question where some of us will go, "Oh my God, I hope she's not going to talk about climate change. It's way too big."

Where we can suddenly feel overwhelmed by things of such proportion, where the interconnection is so clear. So clear. You probably don't need me to spell it out, but there is no little separate ground on this earth where I can do my own thing and it not affect the whole. There never was. But it's more obvious now. Emissions that happen here affect someone there. And we're reaping the collective emissions from fifty years ago—those are the ones we're seeing the effects of now.

So I just wanted to name that, and I want to speak about what it has to do with this very fine, quiet work that we're doing here. What's the truth here for us, all of us?

I want you to check in right now and see what's the response in just hearing that much. Where does your mind go with issues of great proportion? Does it go to, "Oh my God, I was just managing my knee pain. Please leave me alone"? Or, "I've got enough in my heart already. I can't take that all on. Please give me a break"? Or, "I tried to take all that on, but it nearly killed me. And now I'm recovering and learning how to manage what's here"? Or maybe, "Oh goody, the Dharma and the world. Good." Or sometimes we feel our guilt and want to quickly say, "Okay, just give me the collection box. I'll put something in."

Whatever is our particular way of handling this intimate truth that we're all in this together. And I don't just mean about the planet right now. We always were all in it together. We could never have been otherwise. It's just that we hadn't yet woken up. And this is asking us to wake up to the fact that we're all in this together. All of us.

Is that okay by you? Is it okay by you that we're all in this together? All of us, even the ones you don't like. Or the ones you think are the ones causing the problems. The ones—if we could just get rid of those ones—which ones would you get rid of?

I want to really bring it into what the beauty of the Dharma means in our practice sitting here tonight, because otherwise we can go to the extreme of getting revved up and charged up in response to suffering, feeling impulsively compelled to act. And there's one thing the Buddha is clear about: that freedom is freedom from compulsion, freedom from being motivated by our guilt, freedom from being motivated by the impulsive restlessness that's actually spinning a lot of our wheels.

How can we still love that call to complete peace? The utter, utter, empty, transparent vastness, the undisturbed truth of what we are—and we love that and be in the world. And actually there isn't another way to be in the world or the world will spin us.

It's bringing together really the silence that we love—and you might not always love the silence, but what it calls you to in the depth, the unperturbable, the Buddha calls it. The unshakable release.

Many Dharma practitioners sometimes find this tricky edge. I'm bringing it down from this very big picture right now, but many of us have seen a kind of duality arise between doing the inner work and attending to our life, or the outer work, so to speak. And if there was another thing the Buddha was really clear about, it's that the perception of inner and the perception of outer are an illusion. He didn't say the world is an illusion—he's not doing that kind of nihilistic thing—but the separation of inner and outer, those are sort of superficial distinctions that help me recognize that I'm sitting here and you're sitting over there, help us function in conventional reality. But if we explore it deeply for ourself, that which appears to separate us, when we see it, we see that it's a construction of the mind.

And this is what we're waking up to—because we wake up to this for our own joy and love of seeing the truth more clearly, and because this serves the whole.

I want to share something I found useful. Let me talk about two teachers. There's a wonderful man I've discovered from North America, an African-American man called John Francis. You can check him out on the internet—he's called Planet Walker. Back in the seventies, he was in San Francisco and witnessed one of the oil spills in the water there and the devastation that caused to the wildlife. At that point, he was very disturbed by this and sensitive and open to that. He made a vow of silence and decided never to use any oil-based transport for a little while to see how it went. Kind of a pretty strong response.

And it turned out—he's a lovely man if you look at him, listen to his teachings—he kept checking it out year by year, and in the end he spent seventeen years in silence. He walked all across North America on foot. He got three degrees in that time. He managed to do three university degrees in silence. This was his response. This was a real response for this man.

And what he says about the environment is beautiful. When you see him, there is a radiance about him, and he keeps it really simple. He says, "We are the environment. How we treat each other—this is the environment." This is what he's boiled it down to from what can seem like overwhelming proportions of "Oh my god, what are we going to do?" to his years of contemplation and silence. He puts it quite funnily—he could never shut up before, so he was doing it as a gift to other people to just be quiet for a while. But he's brought it down to something right here in this.

This is the environment. Sometimes we think it's all the green stuff, or it's the trees, or it's all of that. But what he's saying is it's right here in this. That's where, as humans, we create and perpetuate the causes and conditions that either lead towards more happiness and freedom, or lead toward more suffering.

Right here. He boils it right down to this, because moment to moment we're always in relationship with something. We're in relationship with ourself, and as the silence settles and deepens, we see that we're always in relationship with everything else. Every action we do has an effect on the whole.

One of my teacher's teachers said that his Asian master would come in to give the Dharma talk and he would make a gesture like this sometimes. In fact, you're doing kind of stuff like that all day. When we get it, when we perceive it from the silence, what was he communicating there? This action affects the whole. There is no action that happens in isolation. It never could, it never did, and it never will. Check it out. We have to know that from the depths.

Because the ordinary perception just tells us, "Yeah, you're over there and I'm over here. It looks separate." Dharma teachings are about going deeper than appearances. Hurrah! Who's a little bit tired of living in appearances?

Going deeper to the cooling and the dispassion. The Buddha talks about waking up to the dispassion, the cooling out—the dispassion that can hold passions. So that our passion isn't running us. It's held in a context where the action that is born of love and energy and vitality is coming from the place that is not attached to the result.

So this is the bit from my teacher that I was going to read, my other teacher. He says, when the Buddha speaks about the world, uses the phrase "the world," what he means is the inner domains of mind and beliefs and all that happens—so-called inner—and the immaterial outer world, culture, social structures. All of it, all of it co-arising together. This is the world, he says. And the Buddha refers to and addresses this world with his practice and map of awakening. He's not just addressing the bit that arises in here. This is really important.

The Buddha taught the Dharma Vinaya. The Dharma addresses the practices of the teachings, we could say, and the Vinaya is about the behavior and our conduct in the world. It's for the monks and nuns—they have a very particular code of conduct that is designed to have them live, even if they haven't fully realized it yet, in complete harmony with the environment, the totality. Living in a way that is harmless, that is supportive, that is relational, that is living the interdependence even if we haven't fully gotten it yet at all levels.

So he goes on to say: We humans are an intrinsic aspect of this world. We are an aspect of this world that can reflect on itself and that can thereby develop a holistic wisdom that embraces—so just see this from what we've been doing here—that embraces and transcends any point or detail within the whole.

So right now you don't have to think of the big world. We can, if you like. You can look at this world that arises on your cushion. It's our microcosm, right? That embraces and transcends any detail that arises within the whole. And you see that that's what we've been practicing. The details arise. The thoughts, the feelings, the sensations, the emotions. Mind states. They're the details, always the details, that embrace the details. We don't go, "Oh, there's no details, it's all empty, forget about it." Embraces the details and transcends the details.

So a wisdom that embraces and transcends any point or detail within the whole. Such wisdom accepts and cares for all but is not attached to or confined to any position within the cosmos. How about that? Not attached to or confined by any position in the cosmos. You're not saying it has to be like this now. You know when action comes from that, it leads to more stress. Not attached to any position. Whether that be self, other, a mind state, a tree, a society, or infinite consciousness.

How about that? You're not confined to infinite consciousness. Doesn't sound bad, does it, to be confined to infinite consciousness? Not confined by any of it. This, he says, is what the Buddha referred to as awakening. This is awakening—embracing and transcending all the details, not being confined to any one piece of it and in the service of it all. This is awakening.

So how are we doing that here? We do our work at Gaia House. You've been doing your work to clarify what's arising in your location, right? The heart-mind keeps bringing things for us to see and at some point we go, "Oh yeah, okay." We try and ignore them, we try and fix them, we try and squeeze them, we try and do something other than experience them. Finally we go, "Oh okay, okay, it's this, it's this pain, it's this contraction, it's this expansion, it's this thought, it's this jealousy, it's this envy, it's this loneliness."

This arises in our heart-mind. There is our responsibility for what arises here.

Not what we should have done way back, but that's just coming into the present for us to hold the detail and transcend the detail. To both see it clearly and feel it at the same time.

So let's bring it right back to the brass tacks. That's the expression, isn't it? Breathing in and breathing out. Breathing in. Anybody holding their breath? Because now we've got to fix the world. We don't. That's actually one of the beauties.

And somebody saw it today in the group actually, seeing for herself where the mind was spinning stories about her work in one of the caring professions and seeing that she was spinning scenarios. And when she looked at it, she saw it was always going to try to fix the suffering, which sounds really reasonable, doesn't it? It sounds so reasonable. Like, thank you, someone cares, right? But she actually realized that wasn't where she was and didn't need to be happening. But there was, I think she said something a bit compulsive about it.

When she saw that she wanted to fix, that released, that detail was seen and transcended, that then let her see—I'm trying to remember what happened next, there was a number of insights along the way—that then let her see that there was something in the fixing that just wanted everything to be alright. Again, understandable, right? I just want everything to be alright.

What she saw though, even though that's on some level wholesome, what she saw was that wanting everything to be alright had a little bit of not quite allowing the suffering to be there first. It's a little like I said earlier, sometimes the reaction to suffering is, oh, let me do something about it. Because it's hard to bear, it's hard to bear, it's hard to witness the way we are together sometimes and the results of that. It's hard to bear without tightening and closing.

And as she saw that, a hole in her belly opened. Again, a transcending of that detail of the compulsive need to fix. She widened in the belly. She saw her people that she cares about come to mind. And there's first allowing. It's like this. Resting with the allowing. And from there, there can be action.

Compassion sometimes wants to act, very often wants to act. But the compassion that we all have for caring enough to even sit with our own mind, that compassion can widen and deepen. Like the metta we explored today, it is a boundless quality. It can go wider and include more detail of suffering without becoming it. Include the detail and in transcending it, resonating with the detail of our own karmic inheritance, our own and our own. It's all our own.

So when we sit on our cushion and have the courage to breathe in and out and let go of, for a moment, some of the compulsions of mind or action. One of the things we notice is that some of it can show up first, like we're looking outside for something to tell us, like someone to smile at us or somebody to... Basically, we want something to resonate with as human beings. We are resonant creatures. We resonate, we feel.

This citta, the citta is the heart-mind, it's the whole resonant... receptive, intelligent, touchable, available, feelableness that we are. This is called the citta. It's not just this mind, it's the whole heart, mind, sensitivity, availability. Responsivity can also respond. That resonates and we like it to resonate because otherwise we don't feel alive. We want something to chime with. Right? Right?

We like things that we chime with. We have friends that we like the resonance with. We hang out with people that we like. What happens here when we're with them?

On retreat we have a little bit of a fast from these kinds of external resonances, and we miss that sometimes. It's like longing for our cat or someone to smile at us, or at least a note on the board sometimes. Have you ever done that yet in these three days? Like hanging around at the notice board hoping someone's written you a note. We want something to resonate with, want to feel seen, want something to chime with—I'm here.

We mostly don't know that's what we're seeking. But that's what we are—resonant creatures. We want to feel. We want to feel alive.

I was hanging around that washing up area once—there are nicer places in the world. But I was hanging around that washing up area and there were buckets, where you put the dirty tea towels, the used tea towels. I was hanging around there until I clocked it, like, oh, what's going on? What am I doing hanging around the washing up area? And there was a bucket there that had the words "used tea towels" on it in red pen that I had written about three years before.

Sometimes it can feel so lonely. I was happy with a bucket. The heart was lonely. It did want something to say, "Yeah, you're all right, Catherine. It's okay." It's that sort of tragicomic human thing, isn't it?

But the point of that is—we could say that's really sad—but the point of that is, if we go through those thresholds where there isn't something that's resonating, it invites the citta to start to resonate with itself. Rather than needing my cat to snuggle up to in order to feel softness, the citta doesn't have that here. The citta, the heart-mind, has to start resonating with itself.

As it starts resonating with itself, it resonates with the pockets of places we haven't been able to resonate with before—like the loneliness, like the barren parts of the heart-mind that haven't been breathed into life, haven't had that detail embraced yet and transcended yet with compassion and wisdom. The stale parts of the citta—they're just kind of stagnant sometimes, pockets of our soul, so to speak.

As well as what starts to resonate are all the noble qualities. Also what is our aspiration, our joy, our kindness, our consideration, our gratitude, our appreciation—they start to resonate more as well.

That's the point of all this fasting from having a good time—that the citta starts to resonate with itself and we do the work. This is our world work while we're here on this cushion. Because as we let those old stagnant or crusty pockets start to be allowed into the light of awareness, they start to break up, dissolve, be digested, move on, liberate—and it leaves a little bit more space.

For what? The Buddha—it said that a Buddha, and Buddha means awake, it doesn't just mean a man from North India 2,600 years ago, it means awake, awakening that in us which is awake. That sacred aspect that can see what's happening, touch the detail intimately and automatically is wider than it. It's said that a Buddha lives in—I like this phrase—sunyata vihara. Vihara means a dwelling place where you hang out. Sunyata means empty.

Buddha dwells in sunyata vihara—empty. He hangs out in emptiness. Empty here does not mean deficient or lacking or looking around for something to do. It means he's emptied out the greed, the hate, the confusion. I've gotten emptied out, which leaves an awful lot of room. An awful lot of room to be alive, to be a human being. Because the citta, the heart-mind is responsive.

And he made a big response—the one from 2,600 years ago. It's a big response, a big teaching that he offered. It's called the turning of the wheel—a map, a human map for us to look at and discover for ourselves the fruits of.

A Buddha lives in shunyata vihara. So we do our work, our own work of emptying out. It clarifies the citta, it gets a little bit more clarified. Do any of you have that sense that—it's not like it's being evaluated, we see it for ourselves. We just start to see things more clearly. That's a function of being a bit more clarified. The grass looks greener. We see the angry thought as an angry thought. We see the light in someone else's eyes. We see the dodgy bits in our own heart. We see the light in our own heart. We see the still, dark peace of our own heart.

And we do our work, right? The work is the part where there we are in a moment of calm, a moment of peace, of ease, of resonating, of openness, hanging out, sensing—and before we know it something's arisen into consciousness and we've spun it and we're holding on tightly to a thought. Somebody—I don't know what—somebody did something. Somebody always does something. Somebody did something and we're reacting in some way, or they didn't do something and we're reacting in some way. Maybe, let's say, we find ourselves angry and we're spinning the story around that.

Here's the work. It's not that that shouldn't happen. There may be old angry pockets to digest. Don't go looking for them, but they pop up. There it is. We're holding on without that sacred knowing aspect. We're spinning this anger and then we spin another plate, another story of "I shouldn't be angry." Then we've got two plates spinning. And then we do another one called meditation and we spin that and we tighten and we lock down and then we're in a real pickle.

In the middle of the spinning, whatever it is you're spinning, can you see it? That something has just gotten picked up out of the infinite sea of possibilities of what consciousness can come up with—and it can come up with anything. Look what it does. In the infinite sea of that, we've picked something up and we've become it. The sense of separate self is born right there and then.

Our work is to stand in that sacred knowing in the moment: "Ah, this is anger." That which sees the anger is not bound. That which perceives the heat of the anger is not burning in misery. It's seen. This is sacred. This is sacred right there—that can see the detail and is already wider than it.

In the middle of the spin we wake up. We fall awake right there. Don't create a counter spin that says "I shouldn't be having that," or create the counter spin of holding on to my breath and widening, softening, transcending, breathing with the heat, letting our self sense it. This is sacred. This is awake. This is not perpetuating more dukkha in the world and it's clarifying and clearing up what arises on this seat.

Sometimes we wake up in the middle of a psychodrama. It's okay. It's the waking up that is our refuge. That seeing, hearing, that which hears the cry of the world.

You know, one thing that's said about this image here, Kuan Yin—she's embodying a quality that is a human quality of compassion. And it's said that—I think this is very interesting—two things are said: that she came to awakening by inquiring, "Who hears? What is that that hears?" Can you just sense it right now?

What sees the hearing? What is it that's hearing this voice making sounds right now, creating impressions? Is it you? What hears the silence in this very moment?

Through this inquiry into the nature of hearing, Kuan Yin came to her awakening. And it's also said that she hears the cries of the world and pours her healing balsam upon them. This capacity to hear the world's cries develops as our own awareness expands. We begin to hear the cries that arise internally—our old material, the places within us that haven't yet been truly heard. But it extends far beyond this personal realm.

The cries of the world arise right here, on this very seat where we sit. All beings, if we remain present long enough, keep appearing in this location. The sad one, the righteous one, the warring one, the benevolent one. The loving one, the hateful one, the one that wants to annihilate, the one that would give everything in love. They all arise here—both the personal detail and something immeasurably vaster than any detail.

How would it be to rest in that knowing, in that kind of expansive awareness?

I notice either the lights grow dimmer each year, or I'm simply getting older. It's definitely the latter. The arrogance of youth—I still carry it, though I'm probably humbly youthful compared to what I'll understand in ten, twenty, thirty, forty years' time. Each year when I write up the group lists, I think, "I need to write them bigger. Not everyone will be able to see those small letters." These small privileges we have in good health that we don't even recognize as privileges.

This passage from Hermann Hesse's Siddhartha speaks to this expanded hearing: "Siddhartha listened. He was now listening intently, completely absorbed, quite empty, taking in everything. He felt that he had now completely learned the art of listening. He had often heard all this before, all these numerous voices in the river. But today they sounded different. He could no longer distinguish the different voices—the merry voice from the weeping one, the childish from the manly one. They all belonged to each other: the lament of those who yearn, the laughter of the wise, the cry of the indignant, and the groan of the dying. They were all interwoven and interlocked, entwined in a thousand ways. All the voices, all the goals, all the yearnings, the sorrows, the pleasures, all the good and the evil—all of them together was the world, all of them together was the stream of events and the music of life.

"When Siddhartha listened attentively to this river, to this song of a thousand voices, when he did not listen to the sorrow or the laughter, when he did not bind himself to any one particular voice and absorb himself into it, but heard them all, the whole, the unity, then the great song of a thousand voices consisted of one word: perfection."

And our mind cries out, "But it's not perfect! It's terrible!"

Yes? And what sees that? What really serves that protest? What is it that truly serves?

In some of the literature emerging around the interface of Eastern spiritual practice and social change—and I'm sure many of you know far more than I do or have worked in these fields—there's a beautiful way this integration is being spoken about. They call it the coming together of the silence of the sage and the passion of the activist. Neither alone is sufficient for our times.

Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese Zen master, is known for saying that the next Buddha will be—are you ready for this? Do you want it to be you? Oh God, I hope it's not me—the next Buddha will be the Sangha.

Sangha is a word we haven't used much here. It means all like-minded beings, and you don't need to be Buddhist to be like-minded—all beings who sincerely walk a path of ethics, cultivation of mind, and awakening.

The next Buddha will be the Sangha.

Let's sit with that for a moment. It takes the pressure off, doesn't it? But it also applies the pressure, because it requires all of us. And here, "us" is not meant in any exclusive sense.

It's us waking up together as a planet.

The next Buddha will be the Sangha.

The definition of awakening that I gave from my other teacher in the beginning: to develop holistic wisdom that embraces and transcends any point or detail. Such wisdom accepts and cares for all but is not attached to or confined to any position within the cosmos, whether that be self, other, mind state, tree, society or infinite consciousness.

Maybe that's something we do together. Maybe we wake up together this time around.

Awakening is awakening. That sacred knowing awakeness is what it is. It's timeless. But the way awakening manifests in the world changes according to conditions. The Buddha woke up in a different world—pre-industrial, agrarian, pre-carbon. We're waking up in this world, and one of the things about awakening is that while it is timeless and beyond time and space, the face that it takes in the world keeps changing. It's always a creative response.

Somebody once asked a Zen Master, "What was the Buddha doing during her lifetime?" I like the poetic opening there. And the Zen Master replied, "An appropriate response." They're good, aren't they? They're just to the point. Don't have to sit here for 45 minutes. An appropriate response.

Awakening is freed up. It's shunyata vihara—emptied out, done its work, and freed up to respond. Not necessarily the response that I think I have to make, but the response that comes when we're knowing our non-separateness. We know that more and more, the separating boundaries soften. They show up here because we need to work with them. We'll feel our separateness more acutely at times because the light's shining on it. We go, "Whoa, look at that. I feel really isolated, really separate, really different." That's because the light's bright and we're seeing it.

We're falling awake together right here and now because there isn't another moment. We don't have to tighten down around suffering. That's really one of the primary lessons we're learning here. Our capacity grows. We don't have to fling ourselves or force ourselves beyond our capacity. Our work in any one time might be something really detailed and look mundane on some level. Other times it might look really big. But the extent to which we're able to be authentic is really the point.

Sometimes our work is just to keep our feet on the ground. Thank you for doing that. Sometimes our work is to stay silent for 17 years. Thank you, John Francis, for doing that. Sometimes our work is to be really out there in the precinct. Thank you for doing that. Sometimes our work is to retreat.

Staying as close as we can to finding the appropriate response that's authentic, that's where we are—not who we think we should be, because that just kills the joy. And when the joy is killed, the life goes out of our best intentions. But also not to underestimate or overlook ourselves as part of all of this together.

One of the things that I found very humbling about our community picking up this Earth Care Week was getting emails from teacher colleagues in the USA about events in Washington DC and discussions and social action things. We're talking to each other about this with the love of the dharma as its basis, and that's linking us up in a whole new way. It's like lights—you know, like you see with the internet when they do a map of it—lights connecting dots all the way around. Yes, Brad clearly and beautifully pointed to the limitations and where we get hooked and sucked and lost in all of that, but one of the beauties of it is that it actually depends on the consciousness that engages that technology as to where we go with it.

There's something about that linking up—lighting up with my colleagues that I don't see because I'm over here, but have been dharma friends from donkey's years ago wherever they are, San Francisco. Coming together with this love of the silence.

And our inevitable intimacy with each other. And I'm not just meaning these practitioners here now, I'm meaning all of us.

As we wake up, we feel more... Well, let me put it from one of the Zen teachers—they do it better. He said, "To study the Buddha way is to study the self. To study the self is to fully acknowledge the self. To fully acknowledge the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to become intimate with all things—is to know our intimacy with all things."

And if the word intimacy doesn't work for you, if you cringe with that word—it's not some kind of smothering thing. It's free. And it's just how it is. The air we breathe—it's not ours, it belongs to all of us.

The practice we do, even as we see as we go along the path—and maybe you know this very well for yourself—isn't just for us. It can't be. There isn't such an isolated thing. And yet you're fully included, more magnificently than our small mind could know.

I think I'll finish with this, or this... I'm going to be greedy and do both. What do you do when you want to do everything? Maybe I'll do this one now and one tomorrow. How about that?

This is a very famous verse from the tradition, from Shantideva—the verses of the Bodhisattva, the one who dedicates their practice of awakening for the benefit of all, of the whole. And try not to take it all logically or argue with the sort of poetry of it. Let it resonate with the heart-mind in the place that may know this on some level, or very deeply.

"May I be the medicine for the sick and the weary. May I be their physician and their nurse until disease appears no more. May I strike down the anguish of thirst and hunger with rains of food and drink. May I be food and drink to those in famine and disaster. May I be an inexhaustible treasure for those in need. May I give them all they desire, now and forevermore, everywhere.

"May I be a protector for the unprotected, a guide for wanderers, a boat, a bridge, a causeway for those who desire the other shore, a lamp for those who need a lamp, a bed for those who need a bed. And may I be a wishing jewel, an inexhaustible vase, a magic spell, a great medicine, a wish-fulfilling tree, a cow of plenty for all beings.

"As the elements of earth and water and fire and air are for the use of all beings who dwell in all of space, in many ways may I be the means of sustenance for the realm of beings in all of space until they have passed into complete freedom.

"And by my practice may the blind see and the deaf hear. May the fearful cease to tremble and the afflicted be consoled and the weary be made content. May the sick be made whole again and those in bondage freed. May the weak be strong and loving.

"And as long as the earth and the sky shall last, may I remain here to heal the sorrows of the world. As long as the earth and the sky shall last, may I remain here to be with all beings as we wake up together."

CHAPTER 244

Learning from Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 42 min

> In this compelling dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses climate change not merely as an environmental issue, but as a fundamental teaching about impermanence, interconnection, and the need for collective awakening. Drawing on insights from eco-philosophers Thomas Berry and Arne Ness, as well as Buddhist teacher Joanna Macy, Burbea explores how ecological crisis mirrors the Buddha's teaching on dukkha and serves as a call to transcend the individualistic worldview of the "Age of Reason."
>
> Burbea emphasizes that our discomfort with climate reality contains vital information, much like the feedback loops in natural systems. He suggests that truly digesting this information requires the same mindful attention we bring to meditation practice—staying present with difficult feelings rather than turning away. The teacher draws parallels between personal awakening and collective transformation, noting how species-level challenges have historically catalyzed evolutionary leaps.
>
> The talk weaves together Buddhist concepts of interconnectedness with contemporary ecological wisdom, suggesting that climate change offers an opportunity to develop what Ness calls "ecological self"—an identity that encompasses all life on Earth. Burbea concludes by framing our current crisis as an invitation to deeper spiritual maturity, requiring both individual practice and collective response to this "most burning issue" of our time.

I was recently at a gathering of teachers from America and Europe at Spirit Rock. The main theme of this gathering was how we can incorporate climate change into the teaching. Most of all, how can we speak about it without making people feel so uncomfortable that they don't want to come back?

This is a kind of conundrum, because if we really want to speak honestly about the situation, then if you don't feel uncomfortable when you think about it, you either have worked through a lot of this material already or you are completely cut off. It's a very complex issue and very complex to communicate. I have read extensively about it and try to translate it into simple language, attempting to communicate what I feel is going on. I feel very concerned.

When I think about teaching, there's actually nothing else I'd like to speak about in terms of Dhamma, of course. But this is for me the most burning issue. Everything else pales in front of the theme of climate change, I feel.

Polls conducted last year indicate that about seventy percent of people here in America consider that climate change is a real issue and that we have a big problem. But at the same time, those people, most of them, also think that we don't stand a chance, really, and that we don't know what to do—which is actually completely wrong. Because we know very well what we need to do. We do have the know-how and we do have the skills to do it.

But there's this emotional block that all of us—I can observe it even in myself, of course—experience when we hear of something big happening, something that is forever changing our situation. Like a shock, so to say, when a loved one dies, or when you suddenly receive a diagnosis that you have cancer, or maybe you have a big accident. This is so big that usually it takes us some time to really take it in. A shock is occurring—trauma.

Then we tend, normally we tend to shut down and go into disbelief for some time. There are different phases of how an average human being works through traumatic news. It starts with disbelief and then anger, and then if we don't stop there, if we really digest it, if we let it sink into our being, then we emerge from it usually strengthened. Because these issues of old age, sickness and death, impermanence—this is just part and parcel of being a human being. And because it is part and parcel of being a human being, we do have the innate strength and also intelligence to deal with those things if we open ourselves to it rather than turning away from it.

Around climate change there are so many very confusing messages given out. Scientists tell us the situation is really urgent, affecting every detail of our lives—from water and air and food, there's nothing which is exempt. There are these big corporations which are still interested to not change their ways of producing and selling goods, and they try to dilute this information. So there's a lot of confusing information, and people find it difficult to know what to believe. Even people who come here usually, I think, are better informed and have more capacity to open up to very inconvenient truth.

But actually, being a human being living in the world, discomfort always holds a message for us. For example, if we are going too close to fire, it becomes very hot. We feel this is dangerous, and this is good information. If we don't have this information, if we don't take this discomfort to heart and see what it is telling us, we will not be able to make it for a long time. So nature is built like this—discomfort has information for us.

We can develop what's called in system theory a feedback loop, a negative feedback loop. We get a sign of discomfort and then we adjust our way of going about life. When the next sign comes, we adjust again and again, and through that we can stay on course. At the moment we are getting huge, huge signs that the worldviews we are living by are not any more adequate to the conditions.

But those signs and those situations have been with us human beings since we have lived in the caves. There were always times when the old way of living wasn't any more adequate and there was a lot of dissonance. And then we had to make a shift. So it's not like this is happening for the first time. It has happened many, many times, and we have come a long way.

Human beings like us, similar to us, have lived on this planet for about 250,000 years. That's how we have evolved from using very simple stone tools and living in caves to living like we live now. We have always taken these negative feedback loops as a ladder, really, to climb up, so to say, in terms of developing skills which are very complex.

So evolution has this inbuilt intelligence and we are part of it. There is something much bigger happening than just what a human brain can understand. There's something much bigger happening than we can objectify or really conceptualize. We have to also try to work with this intuition. It's not that we have to throw away all of our intelligence or our reasoning.

reasoning overboard, but we need to balance it with our intuition, with what the heart knows. I found a very beautiful insight from Thomas Berry, an American priest who was also one of the first eco-philosophers in America. He says, "The universe itself is the primary sacred scripture."

The evolution of the universe from the Big Bang until today tells the story. We don't necessarily need religious scriptures—we can simply witness this amazing process, which is like one great example of impermanence and one magnificent example of something far greater than ourselves, of which we are part.

But the dominant worldview in our consumerist society, so heavily influenced by technology and rational thinking, is actually from the 17th and 18th centuries. It is no longer adequate for the conditions we face now. When this worldview entered the mainstream, there was only about a fifth of the current global population. There was still a stable climate and abundant resources—at that time, one could live this way.

This was called the Age of Reason or the Enlightenment, which began in Europe with René Descartes and in England with Isaac Newton. They were emerging from the Middle Ages, when large portions of society were oppressed by aristocracy and the church. People were fed up after living under such conditions for hundreds of years, and they insisted they could think for themselves. This kind of thinking had its place then—it was necessary to break free from an earlier worldview that had lost its validity.

We have been living with this Age of Reason thinking for three or four hundred years now. But conditions have changed dramatically. There are many more people on this planet, and we can no longer live as if everyone can simply think for themselves. We must return to a way of thinking where we consider ourselves as "we" rather than just "me," because there are too many people and too few resources. This old way of operating is outmoded.

Yet our media, politicians, and educational systems still function according to these outdated principles. We too have been taught this way—that we are on top of this planet and can manipulate everything. If we just study hard and become skillful and intelligent, we can make lots of money, be truly safe, and remain in control. This is how I was taught.

Now we find ourselves fully immersed in a situation where this simply isn't the case. Despite all the intelligence we thought we possessed, there were so many things we didn't consider because we couldn't see them—countless details of the complex web of life that makes up this planet and of which we are part. For example, just one small thing stops functioning, one kind of insect dies out, and then certain natural processes cease, crops fail. It's such an amazing system because it's all interconnected. With our limited brains, still functioning perhaps as they did in the 17th and 18th centuries, we cannot comprehend it all.

This is why I find Thomas Berry's quote so beautiful: the universe itself is the primary sacred scripture because it contains inherent guidance and meaning. It breaks all our concepts of how things work because we cannot understand it with the thinking mind alone—it's far too vast. But we can trust it if we have heart, if we can respect it and open ourselves to it, even when we don't understand it intellectually. There is something much more powerful than what the thinking mind can grasp, and the time has come when we all must be willing to remain uncomfortable long enough for this process to unfold.

We receive the news, we listen to talks like this, we read excellent books, and the information enters our brains, our intellect. But then we must truly be with it, sit with it, and digest it. This involves a certain amount of discomfort—feeling guilty, feeling despair, not knowing what to do. But if we don't allow that process to happen, we will never know what to do. The capacity to know what to do, the strength to act, and the will to act—these arise from taking in the news and digesting it.

This has happened many times in your life, I'm sure. Perhaps not about climate change, but other uncomfortable truths. There have been several instances in my life when I first heard difficult news and thought, "This is the end of the life I wanted to live. I'm no longer interested because this is too painful. I don't want to deal with this." But when I had no choice other than accepting it—because we can struggle against reality, but it doesn't change—accepting it and opening to it, sometimes after years, I realized that it was actually a stepping stone to greater maturity, wisdom, and compassion. These experiences shattered my previous understanding of what had to be in place for me to be happy.

I believe this so-called climate crisis, which is here right now and will remain for many generations to deal with and clean up, is simultaneously a great learning opportunity. This is how this miraculous cosmos seems to work—again and again, it comes to what we might call a bottleneck, but it doesn't stop there. Species or systems that cannot adapt to the shift simply transform into something else.

You've probably heard that we are currently in the midst of what's called the sixth mass extinction since the Big Bang.

And you know, the last one was when a meteor struck planet Earth before the dinosaurs emerged. That massive collision caused tremendous loss of life, filling the sky with so much ash that sunlight couldn't penetrate. The planet cooled dramatically for millions of years, food became scarce, and countless species perished. Yet after that devastation came another explosion of life. This pattern has repeated six times throughout Earth's history.

We find ourselves in the midst of the sixth mass extinction now, evidenced by the accelerated rate of species loss since the Industrial Revolution. The pace far exceeds natural background extinction rates, and there's overwhelming scientific consensus—about 97% of climate scientists agree—that human activity drives this crisis.

For the longest time, we simply didn't know. But over the past thirty years, the message has gradually spread: our actions are directly connected to these changes. If we continue on this trajectory, we risk eliminating ourselves as well. Yet we genuinely do have a choice.

The crucial point is viewing this entire situation within a much broader context. What learning does the climate crisis actually support? What is it calling us toward?

The learning involves stepping beyond the edge of reason—that worldview which served humanity well in transitioning from medieval times into the Enlightenment, but which has now reached its limitations. The Enlightenment paradigm treats the world as a machine and human beings as little machines running around, assuming that once we understand all the mechanical laws, we'll achieve complete control.

Obviously, this approach isn't working. If we truly were in control, we wouldn't have generated such massive pollution. If we possessed real mastery, we would have created something far more beautiful. The truth is we're not in control because we can only recognize certain depths of the process. We simply cannot fathom the mystery of this universe.

We're awakening to the recognition that we are actually part of it. We're not positioned above it, observing and manipulating from some external vantage point. That doesn't work—we're far too small-minded for such a role. More fundamentally, that's not our place because we belong within the web of existence.

The climate crisis serves as the very impetus that can provide the energy to catapult ourselves into the next worldview. We can cooperate with this movement, flow along with it, or simply pretend it's not happening and turn away, going down in flames.

I've brought some quotes that I find deeply inspiring. One comes from Thich Nhat Hanh, who has written about these issues for decades: "When we recognize the virtues, the talent, the beauty of Mother Earth, something is born in us. Some kind of connection. Love is born. We want to be connected. That is the meaning of love—to be at one. You would do anything for the benefit of the earth, and the earth will do anything for your well-being."

Another voice is Arne Naess, the Norwegian eco-philosopher, speaking as a scientist: "When we perceive our deeper identity as an ecological self that includes not just us, but also all life on Earth, then acting for the sake of our world doesn't seem like a sacrifice. It seems a natural thing to do."

This points toward opening ourselves to a deeper identity by moving through the discomfort, sitting with the dissonance that arises when we encounter this information. Often guilt, shock, panic, and many other feelings surface. If we can truly sit with these responses...

There's a wonderful woman named Joanna Macy who teaches extensively about this process. She's also taught at Spirit Rock.

She lives in Berkeley. She's in her eighties, and she's been working with this issue for forty years or so. She's a Buddhist, and she brings in a lot of Buddhist technology—the technology of meditation and of opening to one's feelings, to one's emotions, and through digesting them, coming to know what to do as an individual, because we all have a different role to play.

She speaks about opening to the pain for our world, and opening to all of the powerful emotions that can be triggered through this information. Not being ashamed for feeling really, really concerned, and maybe for a few days feeling really panicky about it, or feeling totally disturbed about it, or totally sad about it. This is all part of the process, because it is very, very urgent for people to wake up.

Because there's so much distraction in this culture—all around the planet there's so much consumerism, so many opportunities to distract ourselves, and the media constantly try to distract us—it is actually not easy to stay with the information long enough so that it translates into a new way of approaching one's life. It really takes time, and it takes a lot of samatha, I think, to be able to stay with it.

Whenever you get distracted into whatever—and it doesn't all have to be negative distractions—nevertheless, this is the most important thing we have to pay attention to, more important than anything else. Because if this course we are on, if we don't come off this course, then we don't need to do anything else anymore because we won't be here.

So we have to build resilience to be able to deal with all of the impacts that are on the horizon. And we do have the skills to contain the warming to degrees where human beings can still live here. Scientists think that we can contain it between two to four degrees Celsius. But even two degrees Celsius is already a very, very different way of living than what we live now, let alone four degrees. And if we don't change course, we're going to go toward ten degrees by the end of the century. There won't be any human beings around.

To really stop long enough to take this in, and do it together with other people, and really realize we can meet this together. Today is such an example—we hear this together, we speak about this together, because we have to meet it all together. We are all together in this. There's nowhere to go. There are some very weird people who think we can go to another planet, but I don't think that's going to work. I don't think there's any planet close enough we can go to. And then it would be only like a few very rich people who could go, so I'm sure we won't be able to go. So we have to make it work here.

What I found very interesting is that through not distracting ourselves, and through really paying attention to how we live, there arises a certain repulsion with the excessive way we live—a lot of everything, a lot of this, a lot of that. We can trust that if we really take in the information, our lifestyle by itself will make us feel uncomfortable with certain things we haven't felt uncomfortable with maybe just a few months ago. But if we take in the situation—because we are part of nature, we are part of the cosmos, and the cosmos gets to know itself through us, through human beings, because we have this capacity to reflect on what we are doing—because we are part of the cosmos, we are part of that shift, if we can really open ourselves up to it.

If we can start to see how all of this connects, which we will start to see if we really pay attention, certain things will start to become apparent to us. Then certain things we don't want to do anymore because they don't bring us joy anymore. And we don't have to be afraid of that, because it is the only way forward.

It might look bleak right now, but if we clear out these channels of ignorance—that we are really not aware of what we are doing—if we manage to clear this out through paying more attention, then through this clearing out we also feel much more connected to the universe itself. We experience ourselves much more as an intimate part of it.

Because we can only live the way we live on this planet because we are not connected enough with it. We are not feeling the pain of it. Or like Thich Nhat Hanh says, we are not aware of the crying of the earth because we are deaf to it. We are too invested in doing all other things and listening to other things. But if this rather inconvenient information makes us pay more attention—if we don't do it for the sake of ourselves, then maybe for the sake of our children or our future generations—then through listening and through paying attention, we also have the benefit of feeling more connected.

Through feeling more connected, we have much more resilience. It's like our roots go very, very deep into this very big web of life. We can actually connect into it because we are part of it. And then through that, the strength and the knowing what to do will flow through it. But first we have to build the connection.

This is all something that can be directed by the intention and by how we put our minds, where we put our minds. Do we put our minds into the next thing we want to buy, the next gadget, the next car, the next this, the next that?

Or do we put our attention to where does this all come from, actually? How does this all work? So do we go into the depths, or do we go into the flatland? It's up to us, really.

Because now, if we want to respond skillfully, we have to really go more into the depths. We can't go more and more outward to have more and more, because the conditions have changed.

There's a very good example of the Easter Islands, which are down in the Pacific, far away from here, between South America and Asia. They had quite a thriving culture at one time, and they had these huge monuments, which you have probably seen—these big heads that were buried half into the ground. There were huge blocks of stone they had to transport from certain quarries to the places where they had their shrines. In order to transport these stones, they needed a lot of trees to roll the stone blocks on. So they were cutting down all of the trees on Easter Island because the priests got slightly carried away, as they often do.

Then they cut away all the trees. And through cutting away all the trees, all of the soil was washed off. The whole culture completely collapsed. I think there are no more original Easter Islanders left. People who are living there now are different—people who came with boats later on.

That was an example which the explorers of Captain Cook's time witnessed when they came to the Easter Islands. The people had already died out. There were just a few people left. And that was once a very evolved culture. They had not paid any attention because they were so carried away with their power and with their glory that they completely lost everything. That's a good example of what we are doing now on a global level, really.

But seeing things in this bigger context can really help us to get the learning opportunity which we are having now. Because it's not that we are losing something which is worth having. This process of the universe is all about evolution and about constant change. We have the tendency to relate everything back to ourselves. This is just how it is when we are ignorant human beings.

But we already have stepped into the Dhamma because we have had a certain amount of dissonance in our lives already. Otherwise, we'd never come that far that we spend a Friday evening here with three shaved-headed women. We'd rather go somewhere else. So you can keep on going now. You don't have to stop just with putting your toe into the water. You can go into it deeper. Because you're already going in the right direction. You can go further. And you have to go further because this is the only way to go.

Yesterday was the Independence of America Day, the 4th of July, which is also our child's birthday. We hope that she's going to be blessed because she had such an auspicious birthday. There were lots of fireworks going on, and because my room is in the backyard, there are all of those yards and I can hear people celebrating—glasses and cutlery and all of the sounds. It's very nice.

But then at the same time I was thinking of this beautiful poem by Rumi, and I thought this is so illustrative. He says: "Sit, be still and listen, for you are drunk, and we are at the edge of the roof." And it's exactly what I felt so much yesterday. We are all celebrating, fireworks and everything, but we are really at the edge of the roof, and if we just go one step further, we're going to fall down.

I think the human condition has always been like this, because this is a profoundly unstable situation—old age, sickness and death, impermanence, we never know what's going to happen next. It has always been like this, but there are times where we become more aware of it than others. And this is really such a time, like maybe the French Revolution was, or the Dark Ages were. There were always times when an old worldview broke down and a new one wasn't really formed yet. But it was clear that the old one didn't work anymore. Conditions came together and it all broke down. There was a lot of calamity and panic, a lot of disaster, a lot of people died.

And a big mess, you know. And we are now at the brink of something like that again.

But if you see it in a bigger context, then I feel much more equipped to be able to open to it and to accept it and have the humility to surrender to it as good as I can. And try to see what is my part in this, what can I do to make it a bit more bearable for everybody else, including myself. And at least to keep calm enough so that one can try to help other people to see the bigger meaning of this, which it totally has.

And knowing that this is an excellent opportunity for practice, because there's nowhere else you can go to escape it. So it's really, we have cornered ourselves.

Because this intelligent process which is called cosmos or universe, it wants to go to ever greater complexity and greater embrace of all that is living. And it doesn't shy away from the most powerful means to make that evolution happen. And if it has to make a climate crisis, it will make it. It has already made it.

And, you know, we can either really open ourselves to that truth and grow with it and through it, or we can just kind of despairingly try to distract ourselves and not look.

So, you know, I want now over the next months and so on, I'd like to study more about it and maybe speak some more in other evenings because there's lots of good material out there of people who are very wise and very connected and who are working with these issues for many, many years. A lot of Christian people as well.

So I'm very interested to go deeper into it and see the intelligence of this universe and how it wants to flourish really.

Okay, I stop here. Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 245

The Broader Context of Mindfulness

Rob Burbea · 57 min

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses the popularization and potential misunderstanding of mindfulness practice, exploring how authentic mindfulness extends far beyond simple attention or passive observation. Drawing from his recent backpacking experiences in the Sierra Nevada mountains, he illustrates how mindful awareness naturally draws together wholesome qualities like equanimity, patience, restraint, and wise discernment.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that in the Buddha's teaching, mindfulness (sati) is embedded within the Eightfold Path's broader context of sīla (ethics), samādhi (meditation), and paññā (wisdom). He distinguishes between right mindfulness and unwise attention, showing how true mindfulness serves the cultivation of well-being rather than selfish manipulation. The talk explores how mindful awareness illuminates the causes of dukkha (suffering) and naturally leads to skillful action based on understanding karma and interdependence.
>
> Through personal stories and classical examples, including the Buddha's intervention to prevent warfare, Burbea demonstrates that authentic practice involves both the receptive capacity to be present with what cannot be changed and the dynamic wisdom to act skillfully when circumstances call for engagement. He concludes by challenging practitioners to reflect on how their mindfulness practice informs their actions and what areas of life might be calling for more engaged response.

The title of tonight's talk is "Mindfulness is More Than Paying Attention," and this is partly in response to the popularization of mindfulness and the decontextualizing of mindfulness from its root tradition. There's been a flurry of articles from the Huffington Post and other places about "McMindfulness"—a critique of people like me who are teaching mindfulness in corporations and other institutions. There's this fear of the dumbing down of mindfulness, or the commercialization of mindfulness, or the commodification of mindfulness, which is all probable.

Western culture, capitalist culture tends to gobble up and spit out anything that it sees for its advantage, and mindfulness is no different than anything else. As you can see, there's a huge interest in mindfulness and a greater accessibility and reach—in schools and prisons and in business and in psychology and healthcare. This is wonderful because these practices of awareness are incredibly powerful, incredibly liberating, and help an enormous number of people work with their own minds and hearts and situations and suffering.

At the same time, whenever anything becomes mass marketed—mass produced, widely available—there's an inevitable chance for misinterpretation and misunderstanding, and people teaching who haven't really had thorough training. In this tradition, generally people only start teaching at the invitation of their teacher, and that usually has necessitated some substantive long-term relationship with the teacher—sometimes decades of practice. But of course, now you can just do an online course and then start teaching, or not even do an online course, just read a book.

So there are various fears, and rightly so, that the depth and the scope of the teaching, and the subtlety, is being missed. I'm not particularly speaking to that tonight, although I could go on a long rant. I'm just speaking to a piece of it—helping to remember the broader spectrum of the place that mindfulness is embedded within the tradition and within the teachings, and all the various concomitant related factors of mind that go to support this quality of mindful awareness that we are working to establish in our lives.

I'm going to thread throughout this talk my time up in the mountains. I'm an avid nature lover, backpacker, hiker, and so any excuse I get, I'll go outside. I hadn't been able to get to the mountains this year, mostly because of working and teaching. I figured this—we're in late September, sort of touch and go—might be the last chance to get up to the mountains and go camping before the snow and some of the roads close, including Tioga Pass up in Yosemite.

On the spur of the moment Friday morning, I decided to go camping for the weekend, backpacking. I threw my stuff in my backpack, somewhat hastily because I was eager to get up there before sunset. I got to the park, got my wilderness permit, and hiked about two miles to this beautiful lake. It was just past the full moon, so I was camping underneath Mount Hoffman, a beautiful peak of about ten thousand eight hundred feet.

I thought I'd go for a full moon hike to the top because the moon was pretty bright. It was about a fifteen hundred-foot climb, but not too difficult—steep, but doable. I happened to bump into some young men who were out backpacking for the first time, and they got excited by this idea of a full moon hike, so a couple of them came along.

Not knowing how difficult the hike was, it was probably about ten o'clock at night, really windy and starting to get cold, close to freezing. We got about two-thirds of the way up when one of the men became really exhausted from his backpacking that day and said he was going to stop—why didn't we two go to the top? We made a plan, made sure he was warm and had food and was protected from the elements. The two of us continued to the top to see the stunning views. From the mountaintop, you could still see the burning fires from the Yosemite fire on the western side—quite stunning, mostly fading out but still smoking with little embers here and there.

Coming back down, we were having trouble locating our friend. We knew roughly where he was, but eventually we found him. He was really freaked out with the cold and was shaking. He'd never been out backpacking before, never really been out at ten thousand feet up a mountain, alone, hearing—and he lived in LA, so he wasn't quite used to the sounds. He was worried about bears and cougars and things like that. By the time we got to him, he was having a full-blown panic attack.

Fortunately, I'm quite familiar with panic attacks and know how to work with people when they're in panic. I sat him down, put my hands on his shoulders, looked him in the eyes, and said, "Look at me, look at me, breathe with me, breathe with me, just breathe." He started breathing slowly, and I told him to put his feet on the ground, push his feet on the ground, feel your feet, feel your breath. I had his friend sit behind him in a kind of bear hug.

I said, "Feel into your friend, feel into the warmth. Tell me something that you really long for."

He said, "My warm bed."

I said, "Okay, imagine you're in your warm bed. Breathe."

He started panicking again. "Breathe, breathe," I said, "calming down, calming down." After about half an hour, he slowly got to where he could stand. He started crawling down the mountain because he was afraid to stand, but eventually he gathered himself. It all worked out fine. We got him down, got him to bed, and all was good.

I thought, you never know when your practice is going to come in handy. We take for granted the practice of meditation and breathing, and yet in those kinds of situations, it's so profound.

When you actually get someone to just stay right here—look at me, stay here, this moment, this breath, feel your feet, you're here, you're surrounded by friends, breathe—and just this, over time that breath works through, cuts through, melts the fear and the anxiety.

So I went to visit him the next morning just to see how he was doing, and his friend said, "Wow, he was lucky to find someone like you on the mountain." I have other stories which I'll tell you later about backpacking where the situation was a little reversed, to my great humility. But that's for later.

As I mentioned earlier, the main association with mindfulness is attention. And it's true that an important component of mindfulness is attending—being attentive to what's here, being attentive to what's happening, knowing what's happening with clear awareness, clear attention. But it's not just about attention. We have to understand it in a broader context, because the Buddha was teaching it within the context of the Eightfold Path, within the context of a whole path of awakening.

So often—and I hear this again and again—the interpretation that many people have about mindfulness is that it leads to passivity. That we're watching, we're noticing, we're observing, we're being with, we're allowing, and we become a doormat, something non-responsive and non-acting. But for the Buddha, mindfulness was clearly in the context of a much more dynamic view of practice.

To give an example of this: that night after I put this guy to bed, I went to my camp spot. I had found this little ledge overlooking this beautiful valley, with Half Dome on one side and Mount Dana on the other—a beautiful 180-degree view. It was kind of a slightly precarious ledge, but I liked nice views and wanted to see the sunrise. So I decided not to sleep with my tent, even though it was a little cold.

I got my sleeping bag, but realized the zipper didn't work. I had a very flimsy old bag, so I sort of wrapped it around me like a blanket. But because it was windy, it didn't really work so well, so I was kind of freezing. But I was very attached to this morning view of the sunrise hitting Half Dome and all the various mountains that I like to see.

So I'd curl up, you know how you do when you're camping—you're hiding from every little air pocket and every little breeze that's coming in. I'd get little bits of sleep here and there, and then about three or four in the morning I was just—it was hopeless, just wind. And the thought came: just put your tent up. Just get in the tent! Ding! Right. Wise discernment leads to wise action.

And this is what the Buddha's teaching about. We see what's happening—in this case, my attachment to this view, to having this experience—and then get over it. It's not worth what's happening. You're freezing, you've got hypothermia. Go in your sleeping bag, go in your tent. So I did.

There are times when we can act on that discernment—many times, in fact. Much of the practice is about cultivating and discerning what brings about wholesome states of mind, what brings about happiness.

But of course there are many other times when we can't take action. The things that we're facing are out of our control, beyond our means to influence in some way—whether it's a larger political or economic situation, or just a personal situation that's beyond our control.

I was hiking the next day on an eight-mile hike, wearing these really old hiking boots. I'm not really sounding like this great wilderness trip leader at this point, and you'll hear more as the trip goes on. I was wearing—this is the last time I wore these hiking boots—and I got innumerable blisters from my very comfortable, very worn-in boots that somehow didn't seem to protect from blisters.

In that situation, I was hiking from A to B, and I had to get to this camp to meet some people I was planned to be with. There was a lot of pain, a lot of physical pain. My ankle was playing out, my knee was playing out, the blisters were terrible. And nothing to do. I'm five miles down the trail. I put on as much moleskin and band-aids and whatever else I could find. And then you just deal with the pain, just like in life, right? Whether you have physical injury, chronic illness, you're grieving somebody—there's only so much we can do.

And then we draw on that capacity of equanimity that comes from the practice of mindfulness, the dedication of being with.

So practice has both sides, both ends of the spectrum. It does have this profound quality of being with, resting in being, allowing, resting in awareness and allowing things to be as they are. And there's also the dynamic element.

As I said, in the Buddhist teachings, in the Eightfold Path, mindfulness is embedded within the threefold way of ethics, meditation, and wisdom. Mindfulness comes in the basket of meditation, supported by our efforts, supported by concentration. We develop this lucid awareness.

We use this capacity of mindfulness to understand karma—to understand how our actions bear fruit. When we practice, it bears fruit. When we don't practice, it bears fruit. When we're unskillful, when we're unkind, when we're self-centered, it has a certain kind of fruit. When we're generous, when we're kind, when we're caring, it has a different fruit entirely.

With wise understanding, meditation supports clarity of view. What brings happiness? Why am I suffering? Why am I here tonight? What's causing me to look inside myself? Why, with all the conditions I have in my life, am I unhappy? Why do I leave peace behind so easily?

Did anybody stay peaceful from when you woke up this morning until now? Anybody remain serenely at peace? No? Well, what's going on? Something's happening, and we want to get curious about it.

It's a beautiful day—an exquisite day. What rubs us? What takes away that sense of ease or well-being? We're well-fed, it's safe, it's a gorgeous day. But we suffer, tormenting ourselves with our fears and worries, our projections and anxieties, our self-worth issues. We might find ourselves worrying about whether Larry Ellison will win the America's Cup, feeling contraction or delight at the comeback—who knows?

The point is to understand that our actions have consequences. I'm fascinated by the dialogue around Syria these past weeks, in contrast to the dialogue that happened post-9/11—or the lack of dialogue when going into Afghanistan—and the growing awareness around the consequences of those actions: bombing, killing innocent people. When we understand more deeply, there's greater discernment, wiser action. Hopefully, in this case, politically.

But the Buddha said there's right mindfulness and then there's wrong mindfulness, or more accurately, unwise attention. You might think, "What do you mean there's wrong mindfulness? I thought mindfulness was a good thing." What does it mean to have unwise mindfulness?

Unwise mindfulness would be using that attention in service of what causes suffering. We can all use our attention in skillful or unskillful ways, so we want to reflect on how we direct our awareness. Do we use it to manipulate or selfishly get what we want?

A thief, a burglar, is very attentive. Think of a pickpocket—probably more attentive than most of us in here, certainly more focused. But not necessarily mindful in the true sense. Mindfulness is really only used in the context of serving or supporting wellness of being.

When our attention is used for selfish means—in this case, thieving—it's not true mindfulness. This raises contentious questions around teaching mindfulness to the military. Do we want to create better snipers? More accurate marksmen? These questions are genuinely tricky.

A friend of mine, Richard Miller, teaches Yoga Nidra, which is very similar to mindfulness practice but from the yoga tradition, specifically from Kashmir Shaivism. He's developed a successful protocol to teach Yoga Nidra—a deep form of meditative relaxation—to veterans, especially combat veterans returning from Iraq and Afghanistan, but also to people preparing for active duty.

He once had a meeting with top brass at the Pentagon about his program. The research was showing very favorable results, so they were questioning him closely. They asked why he thought this would be beneficial for soldiers before going into active duty. His response was fascinating. He said—let me see if I can remember this accurately—"Would you rather..."

find out now whether someone can follow through with orders—in this case, orders to kill—would you rather find out they have the capacity to do that now or in the field? Because if they discover this in the field, they put their entire squadron at risk.

What he was essentially communicating was that when you teach people self-awareness, they can more accurately discern their capabilities and capacities. Actually, it becomes a life-saving practice for those people to know their own capacity. In the end, they adopted his programs.

Again, it's a very tricky area. Another piece of data he was using was that people in active service who had some kind of contemplative practice demonstrated much better emotional self-regulation and were therefore much less likely to be emotionally reactive. So much bloodshed has been caused by people in active service who are traumatized and triggered, with so much fear running through them, acting out in ways that are incredibly harmful. The more people actually have the capacity to work with their own fear and anger, the less bloodshed occurs.

So it's complex territory. I don't know what the Buddha would say about this in the context of sammā-sati, or right mindfulness, but if you examine it through the lens of what relieves suffering—all beings are suffering, and people serving in active duty, whether in Iraq, Afghanistan, or elsewhere, experience intense states of suffering. I'm not advocating a position one way or the other, but I offer this as a reflection.

Another example of someone practicing unwise mindfulness would be someone on the sociopathic spectrum who uses that skilled attention to manipulate others. What other examples can you think of that would involve utilizing this quality of attention in ways that fall into the category of unwise mindfulness?

"Advertising."

Right. Say more.

"People who are looking at how to capture your attention in various ways—they're very attentive."

Exactly. So advertising falls into that spectrum of using attention to cultivate more greed, desire, longing, or wanting. Advertising for Marlboros, for instance. What else? On a more personal level, what comes to mind?

"Trying to gain friendships for status."

Yes, trying to use that skilled attention for social gain.

"Influencing someone's will."

Can you say more about that?

"Oh, someone's will as in their estate—convincing them that I'm a really worthy cause for a bequest."

Right, there's considerable elder abuse around exactly that kind of manipulation.

"For seduction."

For seduction, yes. There's a whole spectrum of ways we can use our attention to get our own way, to be self-serving.

Now, from the other side of things—when mindful awareness is established, when you're feeling that sense of clarity, attentiveness, presence—call to mind a moment or situation. Maybe it was during our last meditation, or perhaps right now, or a moment at work, with your family, or out in nature where you felt connected with a quality of mindful awareness.

Notice and reflect on what other qualities are present when you're in that place, when you're established in that clarity of awareness.

"Safety."

Safety. Do you mean you feel safe? Or that it feels safe in general? Like a safe refuge?

When mindfulness deepens, it creates a sanctuary where stories stop playing. The observation feels unfiltered and honest—safe from our own inner torments. This quality of safety that emerges is beautifully captured in the first metta phrase: "May I be safe from inner and outer harm." We find refuge from the mental constructions that usually capture our attention.

What other qualities arise when mindfulness is present? "I feel like I'm running on all cylinders," one practitioner shares. "You're in the zone," I respond. There's an aliveness, a sense of operating at full capacity. Time becomes fluid—you lose track of its linear progression and step into something more timeless.

Thinking becomes less dominant, and intuition emerges. There's a sense of accuracy in communication, as if words arise from a clearer source. The practitioner notices cohesion—things feeling in order both internally and in the outer environment. This is the capacity of clarity to perceive the natural harmony that's always present.

This sounds like homo sapiens sapiens—the self-knowing one, the knowing of the clarity itself. What's particularly fascinating is the absence of desire, or perhaps more precisely, the absence of identification with desire. When desire arises in mindfulness, it's seen clearly without the usual sense of "I want this" or "I must have that."

This points to a deeper level of freedom—not suppressing desire, but not being caught by it either. There's a happiness that comes from this peace with what is, an inner joy that doesn't depend on getting anything or going anywhere. It's the contentment of simply being present with whatever arises in awareness.

A sense of happiness and joy in being at peace with what is, not fighting with reality. There's a heartfulness in the quality of presence, a lightness.

As you're hearing these descriptions, we're evoking these qualities together in this room. I want you to notice what's getting stirred in your own body or being as people speak. We have both unique and shared collective experience here. Every time I hear something, I think, "Oh yes, I know that. That flavor's present sometimes. Oh yes, that too. Yes, that cohesion. Oh yes, that kindness. Yes, that's present as well."

What else emerges? In the sense of oneness, behavior seems spontaneous. There's a spontaneity and an aliveness. Intuitiveness arises. Less delusion. There's more clarity, more wisdom.

This is what I love about the model of the Eightfold Path—the mindfulness and meditative qualities lead to wisdom and understanding. Why is it understanding? It's the wisdom of knowing what's true. Out of that understanding arises the movement into the world, into life, into action. We move so that what emerges from understanding becomes our motivation.

When we become clearer and understand that things have consequences, that we're connected, when we understand suffering and its causes, happiness and its causes, this changes our motivation. We want to move in ways that cause well-being, peace, kindness, clarity, and connection. This informs our actions—that motivation shapes how we act.

In the Eightfold Path, this becomes the practice of ethical conduct: acting in non-harming ways, speaking truthfully and kindly and harmoniously, choosing work and engaging with physical reality in ways that bring about life, generation, nourishment.

So much bigger than just attention, right? Buddhist psychology tells us that mindfulness gathers other wholesome qualities to it—whether clarity or kindness or cohesion or whatever else.

Someone raises a concern about mindfulness being used as control by parents or teachers, creating fear in children to "get the job done" but not supporting their well-being. This highlights that mindfulness is fundamentally about giving up controlling and allowing things to be. Out of that allowing comes wise parenting, wise teaching—not acting or ruling through fear.

Another person notices that mindfulness makes the five senses keener and sharper, especially smell, which can transport them back to moments in the past, binding whole experiences together. Yes, mindfulness does awaken and enliven the five senses in profound ways.

These are the more receptive, gathering qualities that mindfulness draws to itself. There's a quality of restraint that naturally arises—a restraint from that which leads to suffering. When mindfulness is established, there's greater capacity to pause and slow down before reacting, before we hit that "send" button on an email because someone has angered us. You know how easily we can feel slighted through email, through some misunderstanding or text. Perhaps the boss said something belittling—there are countless ways we can feel hurt through these communications.

It's the pause that matters—that moment before hitting send when we think, "Oh, maybe I should just breathe for a few minutes. Maybe I should let this sit in my outbox for half an hour and see how it feels. Maybe I should give myself twenty-four hours." And we look at it the next day and think, "God, what was I thinking? I can't believe I was going to send that—and I had 'reply all' on too!" That's always a disaster.

I actually received an email today from someone on a board I serve on. One person was talking about someone else in a very dismissive way, speaking as you might to a friend in a coffee shop, not through a "reply all" email to the entire board. I was horrified. That was clearly a case of someone not being mindful in their speech, not practicing restraint. Consider the ripple of suffering that creates, especially if it gets back to the person being discussed.

Mindfulness also draws to it the quality of patience—a tremendously helpful quality. I unfortunately do a lot of flying to various teaching venues, and I find flying to be excellent practice. It's a parami practice—parami meaning perfection—a practice of patience. Whether it's the security lines or, in my case, always being seated in front of crying babies, that's become my practice. I've come to expect it now. When I see a couple of young families boarding, I think, "There are my teachers for this flight."

With mindfulness, there's that moment of recognition: "Ah, okay, this is the teacher for this trip. She's one year old and having trouble with the ear pressure changes." Without that awareness, it's just reactivity and suffering—misery, self-pity, blame, and anger.

Mindfulness also supports another key quality: non-identification. We're not so enmeshed and tied up with our stories, our narrative of "Oh, this is spoiling my flight. I was supposed to have a nice, peaceful ride to New York, and now it's terrible, and poor me..." We can still feel irritated or angry—that's okay. But when there's that quality of presence that can observe these emotions arising, we're not caught by them. They're just emotions playing themselves out, samskaras—habitual reactions and tendencies expressing themselves. And somehow, it's not so bothersome.

We might not choose to have a baby screaming for five hours, but I'm reminded of a story that always struck me. When Matt Damon won an Oscar—I think it was for Good Will Hunting—he was interviewed afterward and said something startling: "I hope I didn't hurt anybody to get this, because it's just not worth it."

Here's someone speaking about using mindfulness to get ahead, for social recognition, and he offers this beautiful example of non-identification. There's enough clarity in him not to be identified with this piece of brass or gold or whatever Oscars are made of. "I hope I didn't step on anybody to get this Oscar because it's not worth it."

Mindfulness also draws in equanimity, which relates to everything I've been speaking about. You can see how all these qualities are interconnected. It gives us capacity—like when I was hiking—to simply hang in with difficulties.

Sometimes, however, that discernment, that knowing, that equanimity, that clarity does require action.

Returning to my hiking story: I'd hiked about eight miles down the trail, and because it was a very hasty trip, I hadn't really checked the weather. It was sunny and I thought I'd get in before the snow, so I wasn't thinking about snow and rain. Remember it was really pouring with rain here on Saturday? Well, four hours later it gets to the mountains and usually turns to snow.

So it was about three in the afternoon and it started to drizzle. I was like, "Oh, it's pretty." I was sitting by a lake, watching all the hail making these patterns on the water, thinking how beautiful it was, being up in the mountains. Then I started walking and it continued to rain, getting gray and darker. I thought, "This isn't looking so good," but I continued anyway.

I had this very light windbreaker—not really waterproof. I mean, it's sort of waterproof, but not really. Nothing's waterproof after a while unless it's plastic. So I get to camp and I'm waiting for my friends to show up. I'm in the middle of nowhere with just me and one other guy, who ends up starting a fire in his tent to keep warm that night—a canvas tent, which was a whole other story.

It starts to rain heavily and my friend shows up. Someone had just told me that heavy snowfall was coming and it would drop down to twenty-four degrees, and we should get out because we might get snowed in. But it was another six miles with a backpack in pouring rain. I thought, "Nah."

This was a really great case of how to stay present and not let fear and anxiety make the decision. The fear would have had me hike out in the pouring rain, which would have been quite challenging. So I decided to stay with these two friends.

By that time, pretty much everything was wet—my gear, my down jacket, warm gear, sleeping bags damp. The tent I had was really a summer tent, very lightweight. It's a three-season tent, but not what you want in snow and rain. We ate and I started shivering, getting really cold because I had nothing warm. I only had down, which stays warm when wet, but it was wet.

I started thinking, "Well, the tables are really turned." The night before I was rescuing somebody having a panic attack, and now I was starting to get really anxious—mostly about not being able to get warm in my tent. It's a very unsatisfying feeling.

So I went to bed early, wrapped myself up, and I was just freezing and shaking. I had to put my wilderness tail between my legs. I got up, found my friends at this temporary tarp they'd rigged as a kitchen, and said, "I'm really cold, I need help." One of them gave me their down jacket, which helped calm my nervous system down a little bit. But I realized I couldn't sleep in my tent—it was so exposed to the elements and everything was damp.

So I had to sleep with them, all squashed into this little tent, which was very cozy. It was a three-person tent, so it was actually fine. But it was just a great lesson in humility and discernment and staying steady, thinking, "What's the wise decision?" If I'd let my ego self run the show, I would have stuck in my tent, toughed it out, frozen to death, gotten hypothermia, versus "Oh, what's the situation here? I'm cold. I'm wet. I can do something more creative about this."

In the end it turned out to be kind of a fun adventure. The tent was like a little igloo in the morning. Fortunately it wasn't too heavy a snowfall and it was actually very beautiful in the morning with clear sky. Everything was frozen, but we weren't. It was a beautiful day and a bear came sniffing around the campsite. All's well that ends well. And I've now thrown my boots away and I'm doing a lot of shopping at REI.

I think of one of my favorite stories of the Buddha and an example of his—anyway, his life was very dynamic even though he was a meditator and mystic and teacher. He was very active in creating teachings and this body of students, traveling and walking the plains of northern India and the forests for forty-five years.

One story that I'm particularly fond of: he was from a kingdom—my Indian history is going to go out the window here—he mostly was living in the kingdom of Magadha, but he was born in a kingdom up north somewhere on the Nepalese border. These two kingdoms in northern India at the time of the Buddha were very feudal...

a lot of war, a lot of ongoing wars, a lot of bloodshed.

At some point during the Buddha's life after his enlightenment, he heard disturbing news. He had many students who were from the courts—princes and kings and queens—and he would often give advice and help resolve conflicts through diplomacy. The king of Magadha was particularly warlike, and he had decided to march to war against the kingdom where the Buddha was born, where many of his family and friends lived, many from the princely castes.

When the Buddha heard that the king was marching out with his army, he went and sat by an old dead tree by the roadside. As the king and his forces passed by, the king had the army stop, dismounted from his horse, went to the Buddha, and paid his respects. "Why are you sitting by this old dead tree?" he asked.

The Buddha replied, "This tree is in the land of my home. This is dear to me. And I sit here as a request to stop the bloodshed."

The king was so moved by the Buddha's presence and his wish that he ceased his march, turned back, and war was averted. The same scenario actually happened a second time, with similar circumstances, and again the Buddha sat by the roadside. That time, however, the king ignored the Buddha's wish and there was great bloodshed.

What strikes me about this story is that the Buddha wasn't just sitting around in the forest navel-gazing. That's not the point of mindfulness practice. The point is to take this practice out into the world—to use this clarity, awareness, discernment, compassion, and kindness to take steps that relieve suffering for ourselves, our loved ones, our community, our country, however and wherever it manifests.

The last story I'll share is a more contemporary example. My first Vipassana teacher, Christopher Titmuss, and I would study together every year in Bodh Gaya, where the Buddha attained his awakening. The temple there was a simple complex of old buildings and one large stupa.

One year, the Sri Lankan government—a Buddhist government—decided to take better care of the temple and particularly the Bodhi tree, which was a descendant of the tree under which the Buddha was supposed to have attained enlightenment. In their good-hearted wishes to protect the tree, they erected a gold-plated fence around it, quite high and very incongruous to the idea of awakening and freedom—basically gold prison bars around the tree.

This was in Bihar, the poorest state in India, an area of incredible poverty. When you erect a million-dollar gold fence around a tree in such circumstances, what's going to happen? You're going to attract bandits who want to steal it. So they had to station a 24-hour armed guard at the temple to protect the gold. The whole thing was quite farcical.

Before they erected and inaugurated the fence, the Sri Lankan president came to visit and give his blessing, bringing the security that often accompanies such situations—military and guards everywhere. Christopher had been a lover of this particular village, the Buddha, and the people there, and was horrified by this development. He was determined to intervene, much as the Buddha had done, to say, "Please come to your senses and put that money toward building schools or hospitals, not a fence that people want to steal."

Despite the big procession and heavy military presence, Christopher somehow meandered his way through all the guards with their rifles and managed to stand right in front of the president. "Please," he said, "can you change your actions? Can you put this money to better use?"

He didn't get his way. But again, here's the principle of using clarity and discernment, of speaking one's truth and standing up to what's perceived as injustice or unskillfulness.

These are just some reflections as I wrap up here. Really, this is just the beginning of our conversation about how to understand mindfulness in a broader context—in the context of the Eightfold Path, and also in the context of how it leads to and supports wise action, wise engagement, wise discernment, which leads to moving more skillfully in the world.

A couple of reflections for you: In what ways does mindful awareness inform your actions? In what ways does your practice of mindfulness inform your actions? And second, what are you seeing with mindfulness that requires action that you are not taking? What are you discerning and yet not acting upon? Just reflections for the week.

Next week I'll be back here, and it will be the beginning of Earth Care Week. In our last International Buddhist Teacher Meeting, we had a session on climate change, and there was a strong desire in the community to begin speaking much more directly about the climate crisis.

No, we don't have those flyers yet.

So next week I'm going to give a talk about climate change and the Buddhist response to what's happening ecologically, and we'll have information and resources available. What the International Buddhist Teacher Group decided to do was dedicate the first week in October to raising awareness around these issues and our response as a Buddhist community to the climate crisis. There will be information and handouts available next week.

So I hope you can come, and have a wonderful week. Blessings on your practice and your week.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 246

The Meditator as Revolutionary

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this provocative dharma talk, Rob Burbea challenges practitioners to examine their fantasies about awakening and the role of meditation in our troubled times. He questions whether the traditional archetype of the serene, aloof sage is adequate for addressing contemporary global crises like climate change, environmental destruction, and systemic injustice. Drawing on the Buddha's teaching that he taught 'suffering and the end of suffering,' Burbea explores how our understanding of dukkha must expand beyond individual pain to include social and environmental suffering.
>
> Burbea examines how cultural values of consumerism, individualism, and the myth of objective detachment create delusion and increase suffering. He argues that dharma practice must develop not just the capacity for personal equanimity, but the courage to feel and respond to the world's pain without denial, overwhelm, or ill will. The talk challenges practitioners to consider whether their practice leads to creative maladjustment rather than comfortable conformity, echoing Martin Luther King Jr.'s call for 'transformed nonconformists' who can address humanity's urgent challenges.
>
> This revolutionary approach to dharma suggests that true liberation involves both turning inward to examine our individual suffering and turning outward to engage with collective pain, making the meditator not a detached observer but an active participant in the world's healing.

I'd like to talk about something tonight that usually, if I talked about it at all on a group retreat, I would probably choose to do at the end—perhaps as the last evening's talk as you're moving back into the world, the other world. But for different reasons, we've decided to do it now, and some of the themes I'll pick up later on.

I'm going to start with a question for you: Where do you think all this is leading? Where do you think it's going? What's your sense of that? What's your fantasy of that? And fantasy is a good word here—it's not a bad word. We need fantasy; we need a fantasy of practice. It's very important. What's your fantasy? What's your sense? Where is it going?

Some people will be familiar, from hearing or reading, with the idea of awakening or liberation. Some may not have heard those terms before, or may have heard them but don't really relate to them. So whether I do relate to that kind of idea—awakening, liberation, something like that—or whether I don't, whether I'm a practitioner of many years or someone very new to practice, what's the sense of where this is leading? Am I aware of my fantasy of where practice is headed?

We usually don't think this way consciously, but to me it's very important to be conscious. What's going on there? Not because it's a bad thing and I shouldn't have one—I should have one. I need to have one; otherwise I can't motivate myself. But I need to be aware of it.

So do I, for instance, somehow dimly or more consciously imagine that when I'm awakened, or more awakened, or further down the line, everything will be easier? I'll be much calmer? Everything will be simpler? The world and its complications will be simpler to my eyes? Do I expect that? Do I want that?

Consider the Buddha statue—the Buddha Rupa. You can get them at garden centers nowadays. What does it say to you? It's a really powerful image, an archetype already. Not quite as prevalent in our culture as the crucifixion, but it's there in our culture by virtue of the fact that you can get it in a garden store. People know what that is. What's it saying? What does it say? What's he communicating? What's that archetype communicating? What's he doing? What does it show him doing?

He's sitting there, very serene, very still, very undisturbed, oftentimes with his eyes closed in meditation. That's a powerful archetypal image being communicated there. And through the image, much else gets communicated. He is the archetype, or an archetype, of the equanimous sage—the sage, the wise one. Equanimous through his sagacity, through his wisdom.

But there is a kind of aloofness in it. If you read the ancient texts, there is an aloofness, a transcendence of the world that's very much there in the original texts. We don't like that so much nowadays, so we kind of paper it over to fit more of our contemporary view. But it's still communicating something about an equanimity that comes out of a certain kind of wisdom that has a kind of aloofness in it—separation, distance. Not good, not bad, but it has an effect.

Compare this to the story of Jesus overturning the tables of the moneylenders—this hot-headed young man in the temple. It's a different archetype being communicated.

Not good, not bad, just different and has different effects. I don't even consciously think about these archetypes, but they permeate our culture and our meditation culture and spiritual culture. They most certainly have their effect, even for people who are new to practice and don't think about concepts like liberation.

Why is this important? Because the fantasy I have in relationship to practice will determine what my practice becomes. It determines the direction of my practice—it cannot help but have an effect there. It might also be that I choose the fantasies and archetypes I relate to depending on what I want. Perhaps I want less bother, less impingement, less hassle, less disturbance, less agitation. So I zero in on the spiritual archetypes that seem to communicate that possibility.

A little while ago I was talking to a good friend. She was telling me that when she was growing up, as a child and into her adolescence, she felt visceral pain looking around her at the world—the pollution one can be aware of, the plastic in the oceans and environment, all kinds of things. She actually felt real pain with that. As she got older and encountered the possibility of learning meditation and Buddhism, her thought was: "If I practice, maybe that pain will die down. Maybe I'll have some freedom from that pain."

But that's not what happened. Actually, there was an increase in sensitivity. An increase in sensitivity with deepening practice as the heart opens—this comes with that price. Alongside a kind of equanimity, yes, but the sensitivity is growing.

In the Buddha's time, 2500 years ago, the whole fabric of society and culture was different. They couldn't have conceived that human population would grow so exponentially, or the rapidity of technological innovation and industrialization. They couldn't have conceived that humanity would be able to have such a devastating effect on the climate—it just didn't enter the picture. Couldn't have conceived of the kind of juggernaut of globalization that is now full steam ahead. It was a very small society: me and the acts I do and their immediate consequences.

When you have globalization, it's a much more complex picture. Where did this shirt come from? What effect does it have on someone in Bangladesh? So what does all that mean? It's a very different situation we're dealing with now.

What do I imagine as I move towards awakening—if I think in those terms at all? That everything will become easier, feel easier, appear simpler, more calm? That everything calms down? Some things, yes—and I can only share from where I am and my own experience—some things, most definitely: much more calm, much more ease, much more simplicity. Some dukkha, some areas of suffering, just gone. Cut off at the root, in Buddhist terms—they can't come up again. Absolutely.

But given all that complexity, some situations and some sufferings that we are in the midst of in our life, in our culture and society and global society nowadays—the answers are not so easy. The whole situation is not so easy at all.

The question is: Am I willing to be uncomfortable? How willing am I to open to that discomfort? This being, this heart and mind—am I willing to actually bear all that and have that kind of vulnerability?

What do I want? Is it my own private nirvana? If you think in nirvanic terms—which many people don't. Or maybe I don't think in terms of nirvana; I just have an image. As I grow in practice and hopefully develop, maybe I have this distant image: Someday, maybe my heart will be touched by this stuff, but not really disturbed. I'll have a kind of soft, open heart, which is nice—it's nice to have that—but there's not a sense of deep disturbing.

Some of you probably know the novel Franny and Zooey by J.D. Salinger. Do you know this?

It's a really fabulous, wonderful novel. They're sister and brother—Franny's the sister and Zooey's the brother. And they're talking. Zooey is in his thirties, I think, and he has an ulcer. So Franny's asking him about his ulcer. When his sister asks him about it, he says, "Yes, I have an ulcer for Christ's sake. This is Kali Yuga, buddy, the Iron Age. Anybody over sixteen without an ulcer is a goddamn spy." Typical J.D. Salinger language, but you get the point.

I was at a party two weeks ago or something, and I was talking with a friend of a friend. She made a very insightful comment. She's not a dharma practitioner, but just to preface it a little bit: Buddhism, the dharma, talks about suffering and the end of suffering. That's the thread through all dharma teachings and everything—suffering and the end of suffering. It's a very famous comment of the Buddha: "I teach suffering and the end of suffering."

But what does that mean, suffering? What does suffering mean? Nowadays it has a ton of different interpretations. What did the Buddha mean when he said suffering? What do I mean when I say suffering? What do you mean when you say suffering? And what do you mean when you say the end of suffering?

So this woman at the party was really insightful. She said, "Well, historically in the West, if you go back to Freud and this idea that we need to open the awareness to the depths of the psyche, to intra-psychic suffering that can come from that—understand that and relate to that. And a little time goes by, and psychoanalysts and psychologists understand that actually the family influence is really important."

So for Freud, it was all here—one was projecting onto the family, but the problem was really here. A few decades go by, and now there's a bigger understanding: the problem comes from the family, from stuff that happened in childhood. Nowadays, it's almost unheard of—you don't meet anyone who doesn't acknowledge that there's some suffering that comes from that. We all think, "Oh, my childhood and my parents were like this and this and this." And it's understood: I need to work with that, I need to explore that, I need to heal that.

So there's been this growth of understanding which you never encounter in the Buddha's teachings. He never talks about someone having a painful childhood or their parents being difficult. It just wasn't there in the understanding. But nowadays we wouldn't think twice about it. Maybe some people are now beginning to consider the influence slightly wider—of gender and race, maybe a little bit. But what about one step further: the society and the environment and the suffering that comes to me from that? You understand? The whole picture is getting bigger and bigger, and there's a growth in understanding here.

So Freud talked about the repressed—what am I repressing that can come up and cause me pain? But it's a hundred and something years later now. We all know about this childhood pain; it's very important. But is that really where the repressed is these days?

Looking at the cultural landscape today, I find myself wondering: is childhood pain truly what we're repressing in our current era? Or has the source of our repression shifted to entirely different territories? This remains an open question for me.

What feels clear is that the social and environmental situation affects us deeply, just as we affect it in return. Just as we've learned the value of exploring and healing family wounds and childhood trauma, so too must we attend to social and environmental pain.

With all this awareness, I notice something paradoxical about practice. Some agitation naturally lessens as we develop our meditation, yet I feel certain forms of agitation can actually intensify—and perhaps they should.

The same friend I mentioned shared stories of her many retreats in Bodh Gaya, the place of the Buddha's enlightenment, at a monastery in Bihar, which is among the poorest states in India. There, suffering confronts you directly—children begging, incredible poverty, poor hygiene, malnutrition, disease. This reality permeates your meditation practice in ways utterly different from our protected environment here.

For her, this proved profoundly helpful, offering genuine perspective on her own pain and suffering. Not dismissing personal pain—never that—but contextualizing it meaningfully. Looking back, she observed how some retreatants found the conditions too overwhelming. They kept the suffering at arm's length, attempting to create a protective cocoon. But she witnessed the consequences of such cocooning over the years, seeing how it carries its own significant costs.

This presents a fascinating paradox. Dharma practice is often described as revolutionary—and indeed it is. The revolution lies in learning to turn inward rather than constantly chasing external experiences, in staying present with our difficulties and emotions instead of running away. This turning inward remains absolutely essential.

Yet here we encounter one of life's many double-edged swords. Dharma practice itself can sometimes become insular, even self-obsessed. We might develop compassion for others, but only for certain kinds of pain—those we can readily relate to or understand. I'm not saying this inevitably happens, but it represents a potential shadow we must guard against.

Consider relationships—whether friendship, family, romantic partnership, or marriage. When difficulty and pain arise, the solution isn't always to let go internally, to look inside and work solely with our emotions as we're practicing here. Sometimes we need to communicate directly. Sometimes we need to take action.

The same principle applies to social and environmental difficulties that impact us. The work isn't only internal. Sometimes I need to speak out. Sometimes I need to act. Revolution requires both turning inward and turning outward.

This brings me back to the question I posed earlier: What do we want from working with emotions? What are we truly seeking? I suggested we compile a list throughout this retreat, adding insights as they arise. We've already identified several important elements.

For me, one goal feels particularly crucial: developing both the courage and capacity to feel the pain of our times. When I teach—when I focus on helping people meet their individual suffering through metta practice and other techniques—I always carry another intention in the background. Beyond individual healing, I'm interested in something more expansive: growing your heart's capacity and developing the courage to feel.

Can we cultivate this capacity to feel the pain of our era without denial? Can we develop this sensitivity with less numbness, less apathy, less overwhelm, less ill will? None of this comes easily—I truly don't believe it's simple at all.

About a month ago, I encountered a news story online that some of you may have seen as well.

It was there for a day or two, then it disappeared. Marine scientists are almost certain now that they haven't considered the combination of three factors: climate change, global warming with ocean warming, ocean acidification, and I think the third one was pollution. They hadn't considered how those three act together. And they concluded from very recent research that there's almost certainty that we are on the brink, in the next decades, of the largest marine species extinction—not in the history of humanity but in the geological history of the earth.

So that appeared for a day or two on the internet and then disappeared again. I don't know—I mean, that really affects me. I don't know where it lands with you. I find such grief when I open to that.

Or what's going on in Somalia and the Horn of Africa right now? And again, it appears a little bit and then it seems to disappear. So the famine and the drought there—perhaps you heard this too—in that area of the world, of course sub-Saharan Africa, the rains used to fail every ten to twelve years. That was kind of typical, and there would be drought and famine and massive crisis as there is now. And now more recently they're failing every other year, every two years. Why? I didn't read the next part of the sentence. I would guess from climate change.

And similarly, on the same theme, climate scientists and environmentalists are pretty sure that the chances to limit global warming to two degrees Celsius are pretty much gone. We can pretty much say goodbye to that. And we're looking at the moment at more like 3.5 degrees or something, which is actually a massive difference because it's above the limit that causes runaway climate change. We can actually predict what happens there.

So how does it feel? How is that? These are our times. This is what we're living in.

Now I know, and I know for a fact—and it's really important not to judge here, it's really important not to judge—sometimes a person cannot find any care in relationship to all that. It seems abstract. It seems like it doesn't involve me. I'm preoccupied with other stuff. Or for other reasons, there's no care. Could be all kinds of reasons.

But if that's the case, and that's really okay—so it's really important not to judge here—okay, to gently inquire: Well, what's behind that lack of care? What's supporting that lack of care? Why is it that there's this lack of care? It could be all different reasons. So where does that lack of care come from? That lack of connection, that lack of relationship with not just the earth and the biosphere, but also people elsewhere, humans?

Someone pointed out—George Marshall pointed out—climate change is principally a human rights issue. Forget about the environment; the earth's going to be fine. It's principally a human rights issue, which is a whole other way of looking at it.

So very easily it could be that the lack of care, in some cases, is from overwhelm or from a sense of powerlessness. Because what am I going to do? There are already seven billion people. It's already all out of control. And that's just too painful. Or it could be for many reasons.

It's really important that the inner critic, which Chris spoke about, doesn't come into these kinds of inquiries. But that there can be a gentle questioning there, a loving questioning.

There is, I think, what practice can offer—this capacity and courage to develop the capacity and courage to hold and respond to the world's pain.

Sometimes what we want is—because the situation now is so complex and the intricacy on the economic, political, sociological, biospherical, technological levels, all this comes together. It's so complex, and we want simplicity. I want things to be simple.

And that's interesting because part of this is asking: What does it mean to be an ethical human being these days? So the Buddha had a list of five things which Andy told you about—five precepts on the opening evening. You know, try not to do this and this and this and this and this. And one of my teachers said, "That's great. It's like you just do that, you take care of it, and then forget about it and don't wrap yourself up in complexity and guilt." Really wise.

But I don't know how well that fits anymore.

Sometimes we might want, or a part of us might want, to open the textbook, read the list of rules and tick them off. And it's all very simple, though it can be helpful. Chris will talk about the Eightfold Path and the Four Noble Truths, but I wonder if they need expanding nowadays. I don't know. I think so. I feel that practice and the path and our whole notion of what we're doing needs to address our relationship with the world's difficulties. To me that seems important.

I know some people don't feel it's relevant at all and would even find it weird that I would be giving this talk. You might find it weird that I'm giving this talk right now. And you might feel this is a very strange talk to be giving on the second night of a retreat, when people generally have bodies that are aching, minds that are aching, when they're a bit fed up, they're wondering if it was really a good idea to come, they're tired. I know all that.

But that was part of the reason for giving it tonight. As I say, I usually give it on this night, because if I think this talk doesn't fit here, maybe it's not the talk that needs to move and shift. Maybe it's my view of what meditation and what practice is that needs to shift. If I feel that addressing these issues doesn't belong here on the second night, on a night of difficulty.

So the world and its events and the world and its suffering and the ideas in the world and the values in the world and the assumptions in the world—they do affect me. They affect us enormously and insidiously. And I can't turn a blind eye to all that. Yukio Mishima, in a book called Spring Snow, said, "To live in the midst of an era is to be oblivious to its style." There's a lot in the air, in more ways than one, that we're oblivious of. We just absorb it. We just drink it in and it becomes how we see.

So what is this situation? We have touched on it already, but this is from Lieutenant General Dallaire. He was the general in charge of the UN peacekeeping mission in Rwanda when there was the genocide there. And he said, "At the Canadian Forces Peace Support Training Center, teachers use a slide to explain to Canadian soldiers the nature of our world. If the entire population of the planet is represented by 100 people"—this is from 2006, I think, so it's out of date—"57 live in Asia, 21 in Europe, 14 in North and South America, and 8 in Africa. The numbers of Asians and Africans are increasing every year, while the number of Europeans and North Americans is decreasing. 50% of the wealth is in the hands of six people, all of whom are Americans. 70 people are unable to read or write. 50 suffer from malnutrition due to insufficient nutrition. 35 do not have access to safe drinking water. 80 live in substandard housing. Only one has a university or college education. Only one."

Most of the population of the globe live in substantially different circumstances than those we in the first world take for granted.

Here's another thing I came across in a fantastic book called Requiem for a Species by Clive Hamilton. It's about climate change. He said, "In 2007, the International Panel for Climate Change updated its assessment of the economic costs of emission abatement by bringing together and assessing the results of a wide range of economic models. What did it show? To be fair, let's consider the worst case for the economy—in other words, the most expensive it could be, which is usually the best case for the climate. So doing the utmost you can for the climate at the most cost to the economy.

"The most stringent target assessed involved cutting emissions to ensure that greenhouse gases in the atmosphere are stabilized at 450 parts per million of CO2 equivalent in 2050. The economic model showing the highest cost of reaching this target estimates that pursuing it would cause a reduction of global GDP of 5.5% in 2050." Okay, all very abstract. Most models show lower costs. "Bearing in mind that world income will be very unevenly distributed, what would that mean to the typical individual? Global population, according to the UN average estimate, is expected to increase from 6.7 billion in 2007 to 9.2 billion in 2050. If incomes grow at the anticipated 1.75% each year, average incomes will double by 2047. If we took stringent measures to restrict greenhouse gas emissions so that they stabilize at 450 parts per million, then, according to the models that show the greatest economic damage, at most the effect on the world economy would be such that the doubling of average incomes would be held back until 2050—a delay of three years.

"I have selected the most pessimistic numbers. A more typical estimate of the cost to GDP is 2%, which would mean the loss of only one year's income growth between now and 2050." So he concludes, "A one-year delay in the doubling of average incomes is the basis for the belief that pursuing a safe level of climate protection would be too expensive."

So you read something like that, you hear something like that and you think, what is going on with us as a species?

What's going on? Something is happening, and I think it's really complex. I don't even pretend to understand it fully. Something is going on. I certainly don't want to dismiss modern culture, which gives us so many gifts. But some of the values and ideas that underpin modern society and culture basically increase suffering for ourselves and for others. And this is where the Dharma comes in.

So let's examine some of these underlying assumptions. Back in the 17th century there was the Enlightenment with Descartes and Newton and others. The idea emerged that we could know an objective reality from a distance—the universe does its thing separate from us and we can objectively know that. There arose at that time, and it persists until today, this myth of detached knowledge, of objective knowledge.

Julie Nelson, who is an economist, calls this objectivism. She describes it as "a romantic belief in the possibility of connection-free knowledge from an outside-of-nature, perspective-free viewpoint." This worldview praises emotional distance, autonomy, rationality, disinterestedness, and "hard" knowledge—all of which amounts to a deluded self-conception. This perspective persists in our view of nature, but also in our understanding of economics and politics. And this will come up in another talk—the whole idea of objectively knowing and experiencing meditation is also a myth, but we'll return to that.

Connected to this is another prevalent idea: that people are fundamentally rational beings. Really, when you give them the facts and lay out the information in front of them—whether about climate change or anything else—they'll see the pros and cons and dangers and choose the rational thing to do. This was assumed for hundreds of years to be how human beings operate.

But a host of recent psychological studies has shown that this is almost never what human beings actually do. Quite the opposite. In fact, sense of identity and sense of values almost always determines what information we accept. We accept only information that confirms our identity and values. We shape our thinking around protecting our social identity. When you present someone with inconvenient facts—like something about climate change and culture—that tends to actually harden their resistance and close them down even more. It's fascinating.

Researchers have furthered this work by distinguishing between what they call extrinsic values and intrinsic values. Extrinsic values include things like caring what other people think about me, financial success, status. Intrinsic values encompass caring about relationships, community, self-acceptance—values that transcend self-interest. People score differently on these value measurements. We're all mixed; there's a mixture there.

But this was a remarkably good predictor. Where someone fell in terms of their constellation of values was almost 100% predictive across numerous studies of how they would feel about the environment, human rights, their comfort with manipulation, and their relationship to prejudice.

What does this have to do with the Dharma? All of this relates directly to Dharma and Dharma practice, so please keep that in mind.

Another sociological survey recently tracking values and attitudes clearly showed that culture, society, and the messages within culture severely shape the values that people hold. In other words, whether we tend toward extrinsic or intrinsic values is shaped by the messages we receive from society—advertising and media in particular, but also political messages.

Advertising and media deliberately generate feelings of inadequacy. "I'm not good enough. I need to buy this. I need to change that and get this." They deliberately cultivate feelings of insecurity and inadequacy. Intrinsic feelings are dampened, squashed, while extrinsic feelings rise.

Do I think I'm immune to this because I'm a meditator? Maybe I've been meditating for decades and think this doesn't affect me? Here's something from Tom Crompton, who works for the World Wildlife Fund as a researcher: Advertisers employ huge numbers of psychologists. I don't know if you knew that—they employ vast numbers of psychologists.

Guy Murphy, who is Global Planning Director for the marketing company JWT, puts it in his own words—this is a marketing director speaking: "Marketers should see themselves as trying to manipulate culture, being social engineers, not brand managers, manipulating cultural forces, not brand impressions."

The more they foster these extrinsic values, Tom Crompton observes, the easier it becomes to sell their products. So we have this massive inundation of marketing and messages deliberately engineered to tinker with our values and change our value system. All of this feeds consumerism, feeds the whole mindset of consumerism and individualism. Out of that emerge new values, and the whole thing cycles upon itself.

This is again from Clive Hamilton. In all of this, it makes certain types of thinking and conclusions feel completely unavoidable—obvious. Something like how we think about economic growth, for instance, and the whole notion of the growth machine.

"The growth machine, which we thought we had built to enhance our own ends, has taken on a life of its own and resists fiercely the slow awakening to its perils of the humans it is supposed to serve." Strong language. "The closer some get to the levers of the machine, the more they must be committed to its goals. It is hard to imagine that anyone who believes that economic growth is part of the problem would ever be allowed near those levers. More likely they would be ridiculed in the newspapers and denounced in the parliaments. Ordinary people may at times question the wisdom of relentless growth and conclude that it cannot go on forever, yet they are soon bounced out of their subversive reverie by the inducements to go shopping. The system has created the type of people who are perfectly suited to what it needs: unending expansion. In this way the growth system governs itself. We think we have power, but the growth system awards power only to those who will advance its objective. We internalize the discourse so that we begin to articulate the interests of the system and govern ourselves according to its rules."

So the whole thing starts feeding on itself. We're in the middle of that, and Dharma practice is in the middle of that. Consumerism and economic thinking and values play into each other, and a snowball effect happens. Relevant to the practices we're doing: the emotions I feel—how much of them come from the ideas and values that I have? Ideas and values really give rise to emotions.

As a meditator, because a practitioner is interested in delusion, and here is a gross delusion, to me that makes it part of the remit of a meditator—because it's delusion.

With all of this comes a kind of falling, a fragmentation of the social fabric. Everyone's individually pursuing their ends. We've lost this sense of common endeavor, of being in it together, supporting each other in society.

Václav Havel also comments on the current zeitgeist: "We are living in the first truly global civilization. This means that whatever comes into existence can very quickly span the whole world." We've already said that. He continues, "We are also living in the first atheistic civilization—in other words, a civilization that has lost its connection with the infinite and eternity. For that reason, it prefers short-term profit to long-term gain."

I find this very interesting. I want to return later in the retreat to this whole idea of the infinite and eternity and nihilism, because I don't think it's wrong to be nihilistic necessarily—but what does it lead to? If I'm going to be nihilistic, can I be fully one hundred percent nihilistic and really go into it and explore that? Because that would be different. But I'll come back to that.

So what are our reactions to all this? To me it's so complex—this whole situation—and equally complex are the reactions we have. We have to look at ourselves with compassion and have a compassionate view of ourselves. Are my reactions helpful or not? This is always the question in the Dharma: My responses—are they helpful or not?

One can hear all this—about which cities in the world on coastlines will be underwater in so many years' time—and the mind may start going, "Well, the house on the hill is starting to look pretty good. Maybe I can get somewhere that's a little high up where the waters don't reach." But it's also a metaphor, because maybe I won't be able to afford a house on a hill. It's a metaphor for taking care of me and mine.

But that very self-preservation thinking is part of the problem. It's part of this—it feeds a kind of disconnection, and in doing that it feeds suffering. I feel the only way we're going to relate to this well is if there's a real sense that we are in it together. When the waters rise, they rise everywhere for everyone together. I'm not going to run up that hill and shut my doors and bolt my doors and stand at the window with a shotgun, or have my wealth preserve a place for me and preserve my security.

I'm running out of time, but it's very interesting—in some research I've been reading about the psychology of what happens in relationship to the threat of climate change, which isn't an immediate danger. That's partly why it's so difficult; I don't feel immediate danger with it. But basically there are all kinds of what are called maladaptive strategies we can have in response to the threat: denial, distraction, minimizing the threat, distancing it—"It's just somewhere in the future."

A researcher called Anthony Leiserowitz was asked in 2006 to write a report for the US government, and he concluded regarding the attitudes of the US population: "As a whole, the US public is currently in what he called a wishful thinking stage of opinion formation, in which they hope the problem can be solved by someone else without changes in their own priorities, decision-making, or behavior." So it's kind of just mañana, mañana.

The pleasure-seeking is another maladaptive strategy, as is blame-shifting—it's easy to blame China now because of all their coal-powered plants they're building. There's also apathy, and what Clive Hamilton calls a "false optimism." He says about that: "Scientific observations of climate change have taken such an alarming turn in the last few years and global action remains so inadequate that pretending to oneself that it'll work out is a dangerous disconnection from reality."

It's actually a kind of disconnection from the reality of things. So it might not feel painful. Sometimes people don't feel any pain in relation to this. But I wonder about an analogy with that. You know, you can have cancer and be in a life-threatening situation or HIV, and there's no pain up to a certain point.

Or maybe a more accurate analogy—I worked for a very short time in a leprosy community in India, and I didn't know this until I got there. But the problem with leprosy, why they lose their fingers and things, is because what they actually lose with the disease is the nerve functioning in the extremities first. So they put their hand in a fire or something and they don't actually realize that it's hot because they don't feel it. And then fingers get burned and infected and they lose them.

Can I learn to tolerate these feelings? Really tolerate this—what I said earlier, this capacity. And I said in the opening, the range of the human heart and the capacity of the human heart is extraordinary. Can I learn to tolerate the feelings? Say with climate change—I'm using climate change just because it's in a way the most pressing issue of our times and certainly the most comprehensive.

Tolerate the feelings of, say, realizing that a major disruption above those two degrees which would trigger runaway climate change—can I tolerate those feelings that a major disruption in the climate is probably no longer avoidable? And what does that do? Can I tolerate those feelings? And can I practice so that I can tolerate those feelings?

So all kinds of unhelpful relationships and reactions we can have to all that. But also helpful, also helpful. And I don't have any easy answers at all, and I don't actually think anyone does.

So turning out, I call this talk "The Meditator as Revolutionary." So turn in and turn out. Revolution means to turn around, to turn out. But in a way, when I turn out the attention in terms of suffering, it's also relieving.

I feel this pain in life, and as I said earlier, maybe my pain in my life is not my fault. Maybe it's not my fault. Why can't I get it together? Maybe it's not my fault. Maybe it's the fault of the fabric of the society that we live in.

This is from James Hillman, a psychoanalytic thinker: "It's only depressing if you're in the posture of the child and feeling powerless, and then there's still another big thing out there to blame and you can't do anything about it. But for me it doesn't feel depressing. It feels relieving, immensely relieving to know that it's not me that's at fault and I don't have to own and be the cause of all my misery. There's something fundamentally wrong in society and this relieves me of the blame, first of all. And second of all, it relieves me of the guilt. And third, it excites me, draws my attention outside to more than myself. That's not depressing."

So he's a psychotherapist and he thinks a lot about therapy. Therapy could be causing depression as much as curing it. So everything he says about therapy we can say about the Dharma and practice. Therapy could be causing depression as much as curing it, because the classic symptoms of depression are remorse, a concentration on oneself and repetition. "What's wrong with me? How did it get this way? I shouldn't have done that." Feeling poor and broke and without energy. In other words, a withdrawal of libido from the world. The moment you're focusing back on the world as dysfunctional, you're drawing attention to the world and that's not depressing.

He also, in conversation with a guy called James Ventura—fascinating conversation to read—they're talking about different kinds of therapy situations. It's not just your parents, your childhood, or your relationship with your marriage. There is a dysfunction in the society that is affecting us.

And the second step is, I cannot repair it in myself, in my own relationships alone, because my problem is social dysfunction. So how is settling things with my wife going to repair the dysfunction of the general situation? That's a romantic delusion—that if we could just get our sex right, our conversations right, if I could just find the right relationship, if my little home could be perfect, could be safe, if I could find balance in my home, I'd be happy.

Talk to my kid, talk to my wife, quit drinking, get laid decently a couple of times a week, get on a decent diet, get exercise, make a little more money—then I would really be okay. Except you won't, because you still live in this crazy world of dysfunction that impinges on you and influences you and yours twenty-four hours a day. Where the school isn't right for my kids, where the food I eat is not right, where the air I breathe is not right, where the architecture in which I spend my time assaults me. The lighting and the chairs and the smells and the plastic are not right, where the words that I hear on TV and are printed in the newspaper are lies, where the people who are in charge of things are not right because they are hypocritical and hiding what they are really doing. So how can I ever get it right within my home and within my marriage?

One of the things we are saying is, you can't make a separate peace. You can't sign a peace treaty with the society through therapy, and I would add, or meditation, or dharma practice.

One of the things they talk about, say for example, working with an eating disorder—people go to a group and discuss and support each other with an eating disorder. But actually you have to include in that conversation, in my group from now on, we must talk about agribusiness, fertilizers, pesticides, packaging, advertising, school lunches, fast foods, diets. We have to talk about the entire thing because that's the situation, that's what's impinging.

So, meditator is revolutionary. Turning in, turning out.

Caroline Lucas, MP, said—I heard her speak and she was calling for national acts of civil disobedience from an MP. Cool. I don't know. You decide what it means. Meditator is revolutionary. You decide what that means for you. I need to look at my stuff. Definitely I need to look at my stuff. That's what we're doing. We're really looking at my pain and my stuff.

One of the words that dharma means, the original word dharma, also one of its meanings is duty. It's interesting. One of its meanings is duty. So we think, what is my duty in life? What is my duty to my family? My parents as they grow old, my children, my spouse, my partner, whatever it is. What's my duty? Duty can be a heavy word for us though. But what is my larger duty or my larger love and the movement of my larger love?

So all this to me very much affects dharma practice and how I feel I need to think about and relate to dharma teaching. This is James Hillman again. If you've never heard of him, he was head of the Jung Institute in Zurich. So he was at the head of Jungian psychotherapy world for ten years or something. He was head of their education department. And he's totally embedded in the psychotherapeutic culture for decades. He's probably in his late eighties now. And he comments a lot on that culture, but from within. So it's not an outsider.

And he says, suppose that we entertain the idea—he's a very radical thinker—suppose we entertain the idea that psychotherapy makes people mediocre. And suppose we entertain the idea that the world is in extremis, suffering an acute, perhaps fatal disorder at the edge of extinction. Then I would claim that what the world needs most is radical and original extremes of feeling and thinking in order for its crisis to be met with equal intensity. The supportive and tolerant understanding of psychotherapy is hardly up to the task. It produces counterphobic attitudes to chaos, marginality and extremes.

Strong words now. Therapy as sedation, benumbing, anesthesia so that we calm down, relieve stress, relax, find acceptance, balance, support, empathy, the middle ground, mediocrity. Strong words.

But everything that's said there, I have to ask myself as a dharma teacher, am I supporting that? Is that what I'm in the business of doing? I have to be careful what I say. I feel I really need to be asking myself these questions. What am I modeling as a dharma teacher? Am I modeling a kind of nice security of fitting nicely in as a well-respected citizen?

Am I modeling that? Well-adapted, well-trained, well-tamed.

So again, I might imagine as a meditator—I've been meditating, I'm conscious because that's what meditators do, we're into consciousness—I imagine then that I'm immune to the effects of all this insidious value manipulation. Do I imagine that, and what am I going to do about it?

This reflection comes from Bhikkhu Bodhi, a monk and translator of the original Buddhist texts: "The special challenge facing Buddhism in our age is to stand up as an advocate of justice in the world, a voice of conscience for those victims of social, economic and political injustice who cannot stand up for themselves. This is a deeply ethical challenge marking a watershed in the modern expression of Buddhism."

The Buddha said the gift of the Dharma is the highest gift you can give someone. But what is the Dharma? What is it?

To me the Dharma is about values. So when I'm teaching the Dharma, I'm also teaching about values—values that matter, values that go deep. What that means is if you, if I, want to give the gift of the Dharma, it means speaking up about values. It means engaging this debate, starting a debate in the culture about values, a deep revolution in the discourse about values in our culture.

But this is hard. I don't have any simple answers at all. I'm fascinated and flabbergasted at the complexity of it all and the difficulty of it all. Sometimes it seems like we need a long view somehow. And also our time is running out, and we need a long view.

James Ventura relates a lovely passage from a conversation. He says just around when his kid was turning thirteen, "My kid came home one night after dark, sat on the couch"—and think of a thirteen-year-old boy where the sensibility is still there, the tenderness is still there, and the eyes are opening at that age and the adventuring is happening. This tenderness and openness of sensibility is going out to the world and exploring the world.

"He came home one night after dark, sat on the couch and in a kind of fury suddenly burst out with, 'It's fucked. It's so fucked, man. The whole thing is fucking fucked. What do you do in this world, man?' What could I say to him? That things are going to be alright when they're not? That it'll be okay when he grows up and gets a job when it won't?"

"I got a little crazy and impassioned and I said something like this: That we are living in a dark age, and we are not going to see the end of it. Nor are our children, nor probably our children's children. And our job, every single one of us, is to cherish whatever in the human heritage we love, and to feed it and keep it going and pass it on. Because this dark age isn't going to go on forever. And when it stops, those people are going to need the pieces that we pass on. They are not going to be able to build a new world without us passing on whatever we can—ideas, art, knowledge, skills, or just plain old fragile love. How we treat people, how we help people, that's something to be passed on."

Maybe you know the story: Once upon a time, two masons worked on a building site. A passing pilgrim asked the first what he was doing. "I'm just chipping away at another block of rock until payday on Friday," the man replied. The pilgrim turned to the second who said, "I'm building a great cathedral that will not be finished until long after I'm gone."

We need that long view.

And what's the difference? It's so easy for fear to come up in relationship to all this. I've heard fellow Dharma practitioners, seasoned Dharma practitioners say, "I don't get involved in all that because it's just going down the road of fear."

But what's the difference between fear and concern? What's the difference between being afraid and being concerned? There's a big difference. To me, concern has stability, rootedness, strength and balance in it, which fear does not.

And the same person also said, "I don't go there because it just seems like a lot of anger, getting angry."

But again I ask, what's the difference between anger and ill will?

Ill will is when I want to hurt someone, when I want to put someone down and make them suffer. We could say anger is energized responsiveness at something that's not right—when I don't want to hurt anyone. Out of all that can come a fearlessness.

That's possible for us, that there can be a fearlessness in relationship to all this, just as much as in relationship to our emotions, also in relationship to the world situation.

There was a practitioner called Jesse Maceo, and there was an interview with him ages ago. He's interesting because he takes quite strong stands. He refused to pay taxes in the US because of military funding through taxes. When asked to explain himself, he basically said, "The deeper I go into my practice, the less I'm willing to behave in ways that diminish my sense of purpose on this earth."

He takes a really strong stand. So I don't know what that means for you. I know that part of practice is taking risks—that's for sure. To deepen in practice involves taking risks. And taking risks and insight feed each other. The more insight I have, the more risks I can take. The more risks I take, the more insight I get. They're mutually supportive.

I don't know what that looks like for you. Perhaps you feel a lot about this stuff I'm talking about, or perhaps you feel a little bit. But you might also notice that in certain groups or situations or with friends there can be a fear or hesitancy or reluctance to speak up—that it becomes uncomfortable in the room or that they might think you're such and such or whatever. Fear of speaking out. Is that something that I need to be constrained by? Or can I be radical? Can I let my voice sing out? My concerns sing out?

Hannah Arendt, writing after the Holocaust, was a commentator on the Holocaust and other things. She wrote: "There was once a wicked time when intellectuals grew feeble-minded and declared life to be the highest good. But death begins his reign of terror precisely when life becomes the highest good." She goes on to say, "If you are no longer willing to die for anything, you will die for having done nothing."

She's talking about the Holocaust, but why I bring that up is—what's going to give me a freeing perspective on this, a powerful perspective and relationship with all this?

Psychological studies also recently show that if you think about death a little bit, just a little bit, you tend to get more selfish and more self-interested. Being reminded of death tends to stimulate self-interest and selfishness and self-protection. But thinking about death a lot, about your mortality, has the opposite effect. It releases us—we let go of self-interest and self-imprisonment.

So the contemplation of our mortality actually is quite central here. It relativizes the whole relationship with self and other and existence. That's a factor—less self-focused values. Obviously the practices that we're doing and developing this capacity to hold what's moving through. So I can hold my own individual pain. Eventually maybe I can hold this bigger pain too. It's possible. It doesn't mean it's not going to feel like a lot, but it's possible. Absolutely possible.

And we haven't talked about this yet on the retreat—there are these very deep teachings of emptiness in the tradition. A whole re-understanding of the nature of existence and reality. And that brings with it equanimity, deep equanimity, deep spaciousness, deep strength and deep courage in relationship to all this.

So I want to finish just with some words from Martin Luther King. I was in London some months ago, and I met an artist who was also a bit of a journalist working in environmental areas. She had been to some conference with lots of dignitaries—kings and queens and world leaders—and they were discussing nuclear disarmament. But every time they talked about nuclear issues, they kept prefacing it with "It's the second most urgent problem of humanity," the first one being climate change.

So when Martin Luther King said this, I think he was talking obviously about civil rights but also about the threat of nuclear catastrophe in the 60s. But to me it applies as strongly today.

"This hour in history needs a dedicated circle of transformed non-conformists. The saving of our world from pending doom will come not through the complacent adjustment of the conforming majority, but through the creative maladjustment of a non-conforming minority. Human salvation lies in the hands of the creatively maladjusted."

These words feel so relevant to our present moment. Whether we're facing the existential threat of climate change or the ongoing challenges of social justice and human dignity, the call remains the same: we need those who are willing to step outside conventional ways of seeing and being.

The dharma path itself is a form of creative maladjustment—a willingness to question the assumptions that most people take for granted about happiness, security, and what makes life meaningful. When we cultivate mindfulness, when we develop loving-kindness for all beings, when we see through the illusion of separation, we become beautifully maladjusted to a world that operates primarily from greed, hatred, and delusion.

This is not about being different for the sake of being different, but about being transformed by wisdom and compassion in ways that allow us to respond rather than react, to love rather than fear, to serve the wellbeing of all life rather than just our narrow self-interest.

The dedicated circle of transformed non-conformists that our world needs are those who have done the inner work—who have faced their own suffering with courage, who have cultivated genuine equanimity, and who can therefore offer something genuinely healing to our troubled world.

Shall we have some silent time together?

CHAPTER 247

The Brahmavihāras and the Climate Challenge

Rob Burbea · 52 min

In this profound dharma talk, Ayya Santacitta addresses one of our time's most challenging issues: how to practice with climate anxiety and environmental crisis. Drawing from her own meditation experience, she demonstrates how the four brahmavihāras (divine abodes) - mettā (loving-kindness), karuṇā (compassion), muditā (appreciative joy), and upekkhā (equanimity) - provide essential tools for meeting overwhelming global circumstances with wisdom rather than despair.

Ayya Santacitta emphasizes that true dharma practice cannot ignore the larger context of our planetary crisis. She guides practitioners through the progression of the brahmavihāras: first establishing mettā to calm the anxious heart, then opening with karuṇā to the genuine suffering present, finding muditā in the beauty that still exists, and finally cultivating upekkhā - the broad perspective that sees both ultimate and conventional truth. Like the Buddha caring for the sick monk covered in excrement, we must respond with compassion to our ailing planet while understanding the deeper nature of impermanence.

The talk integrates traditional Buddhist teachings with contemporary environmental awareness, showing how the Noble Eightfold Path's right intention - including thoughts of renunciation and non-harm - applies directly to our consumption patterns and lifestyle choices. Ayya Santacitta encourages practitioners to neither turn away from difficult realities nor become paralyzed by them, but to use Buddhist tools to transform climate anxiety into skillful action grounded in wisdom and love.

Namo'etassa bhagavato arahato sammasambuddhassa. Namo tassa bhagavato arahato samma sambhutassa. Namo tassa bhagavato arahato samma sambhutassa. Buddhaṃ tamaṃ saṅghaṃ namassami.

This is my first time here at this group. It's not my first time in the monastery, but my first time coming to this group. I want to thank you all for your welcome, and it is very lovely to see this room filled with people. When I was first sitting here, I thought most of these people will probably have a very long practice because I know that James's group has been going for a very long time. Then I realized there are a lot of people here for the first time. So there's probably quite a mixture of folks—very seasoned practitioners and those just dipping in and beginning. It's lovely to have that mix.

It's very inspiring to see so many people interested in the practice who are here at this time in the world. I think it's very important that there is a real deep interest in the practice, in the Buddha's path, because we're in quite turbulent times now. They say there's a Chinese curse: "May you be born in interesting times." We're certainly living in interesting times. Whether it's a curse or a blessing depends on what we do with it. It depends on how we meet it.

When we first start to practice, we begin by learning to train the mind a little bit, settle the mind, focus the mind. In doing that, we see how it's pulled here and there—the tendencies, the particular tendencies we have. Maybe we have a lot of sensual desire and we're always pulled out into beautiful things, delicious things. Or we might have a lot of ill will and we always see what's wrong with the situation or what's wrong with a person or what's wrong with what's being said. Or we may be delusional, get confused easily, or get spun out into wonderful dreams that can't quite get realized.

When we start to practice meditation, we get to know these different tendencies of our own mind. We've all got different leanings and different ways those manifest. We get to know the parts, the volition of the mind that pulls us around. Before we get a handle on it, we're just following those forces.

As we continue the practice, we start to see: "Oh, I want to sit for thirty minutes and my mind is being pulled into wanting to do some really nice thing somewhere else. I don't want to be here." Or it's lost in a sense of aversion because our seat isn't comfortable enough, our body hurts, it's really irritating, or it's too noisy—that crow outside is distracting us. We get lost in these mind states. But as we practice meditation, we start to see those mind states. The more that we see them, the more of a handle we have. We have a choice. We don't have to be driven by them anymore.

Even though we get caught—we forget and we get caught up—then we have to remind ourselves again. That's all very much part of the practice, part of the training: to come back and start again, and remind ourselves of our potential.

I always like to reflect on the fact that the Buddha was a human being. He was born from his mother's womb. He was nursed at his mother's breast and then at his aunt's breast when his mother died. He was raised with food and exercise and education. He grew to be a man and then he went on his spiritual quest. He went to quite extremes on his spiritual quest before his enlightenment. But he's a human being as we are.

What he discovered—the awakened mind that he discovered—is not unique to the Buddha. The way of finding it was unique to the Buddha, but the awakeness itself is our birthright, our inherent nature. We can easily forget that. We get caught up in the personality, the stories, the scenarios of our lives. Maybe we come and practice and we're just trying to get a little bit more peaceful or a little bit less angry or a little bit clearer. That's good. It's good to do that. But not to forget that the actual legacy of the Buddha is much greater than that. It is a path of awakening. We all have the potential to fully awaken, and we find that moment by moment through training our minds.

So as I've witnessed the process of this practice, we start—often, I'll say we, it might be different for you—but often we begin with a lot of confusion, a lot of chaos of mind, a lot of maybe strong emotions. And then we start to meditate, start to train the mind. And maybe we can even have some quite good concentration, so we can drop away from the turbulence of mind into some very pleasant states. And then we come out of those pleasant states and oh, there's the world again, challenging me, irritating me, provoking me.

So the practice is balancing. We have to have enough collectedness of mind that we're not just wandering, the mind isn't just wandering here and there. But we also need the continuity. So not only to sit in meditation, have a nice experience, and then not worry too much about what you're doing the rest of the time, but to use the practice in a continuous way.

So it might be that the meditation, particular sitting, is not very focused, a little bit distracted. The mind is agitated. And then we might think, oh, I didn't have a good sit. And then another time we sit and we go into a state of bliss and the body feels really relaxed and everything falls away for a while. Oh, I had a really good sit. That was really good. So it's like, this is actually, I had a pleasant sit and I had an unpleasant sit. That's true. But a good sit and a not good sit, that maybe is not so true.

So what makes a meditation really valuable is the awareness that we bring to it. So if we sit for forty minutes and we're sitting with a lot of, let's say, agitation or anxiety, then if the awareness is really present, there's knowing. This is the state of the mind. The mind is agitated, it's restless, it's anxious. And then we can bring a sense of well-wishing towards ourselves. We can use the breath to help calm. And it may or may not subside—the anxiety or the agitation may or may not subside. But the important thing is that we're staying present with what's going on. We're keeping the awareness with what's going on.

So awareness itself, it doesn't have a preference whether what it's aware of is pleasant or painful, dull or interesting. The awareness is embracing all of it. It is fully present with all of it. And this is the practice that we need to cultivate, the practice of strengthening awareness.

So I'm very aware that at this time we have this interesting situation, this challenging situation, where we take on the practice and it's about calming and getting more clarity and living in a more skillful way. And then what can arise is a sense of... We might have like a peaceful meditation, but there's a certain sense of kind of tension or anxiety. I think it's a very, very common problem, a common phenomena now at this time is people live with a lot of anxiety or depression.

And when I look at the situation of the world that we're in at this time, I think, well, that's very healthy. That's very appropriate. Because it's pretty anxiety-provoking, what we're in the midst of. And for a long time there's been a kind of a denial of what's going on. And I was very encouraged to hear our President Obama actually kind of say the climate change is a reality. We don't have time for meeting with the Flat Earth Society. This is the truth. We are in a very challenging situation.

I think one of the difficulties is if we let it in, it's so overwhelming that we feel that we're just going to fall apart and we don't know what to do. So we'd rather just not really let it in. Let's just keep working with this heart here. May all beings be well. Try not to do too much flying and use ecological washing-up liquid and everything will be all right. And it helps. It's good that we do those things. But it's not... You know, there is more than that.

So the other week I was just sitting with this feeling of the tremors and the overwhelm and the anxiety that arises in the heart when you really take in the situation that we're in as a planet. And the sense of, you know, a few generations in my grandmother's time, it was normal to assume that you'd probably have children and they could have children and they could have children and on it would go if you were that way inclined to have children. And now it's a little bit different. You know, you have children and you wonder what are they going to be growing up into? What are they going to have to deal with?

Our children or our grandchildren—what are they going to have to meet in this world? Are they going to be able to survive even? This is a very different situation than we've ever known as a species before. We might have encountered it in pockets, but not at this global level. This is not a small thing.

To take this in is scary and overwhelming. If we absorb the whole picture, if we consume too much scientific information about all of it, we can become paralyzed and catatonic because it's simply too much. Yet I think it's vital not to turn away from this situation. When we remain in our little bubble, doing our practice while this bigger picture unfolds—something we don't really want to acknowledge but know is there—we create tremendous stress for ourselves. This cannot truly be a path of awakening. As long as we're keeping so much out, it isn't really a full path of awakening.

As I was sitting with this feeling—we'd been speaking in our little community about this intense situation—we went into our daily meditation. I sat there with this turbulent heart, observing it, and I could see that this state wouldn't actually help anything. I couldn't make wise decisions from this place. I couldn't take skillful action. It only created more stress.

Sitting in meditation, what immediately arose was the qualities of loving kindness—soothing the heart with metta: "May I be well. May I be free from all suffering. May all beings be well. May all beings be free from all suffering." I connected fully with that intention, and as I did, the heart began to calm and settle. But you don't want to stop there.

From that foundation came a natural progression. The metta, the loving kindness, provided the support to move into compassion. Compassion means opening to the suffering—opening to the suffering of others, of oneself, being present with it, allowing the heart to open. Because there was the support of metta, because the heart was calmed, it could open to the suffering without being thrown around by it. There was a foundation on which this could be felt.

I let my heart feel that painful feeling. I felt with the anger of an eleven-year-old I'd spoken with recently about environmental issues—the rage she felt at being a little girl growing up in this situation. I took in her anger, the fear of grandparents, the anxiety of probably all of us caught in this mesmerizing way of living that's difficult to escape. We're all part of it. There's actually no finger to point—we're all part of it.

Taking that in, feeling it: Yes, this is what's happening. The body is here, there's a certain foundation, and this is unfolding. Then I moved naturally to mudita. At first I wondered: What joy could I feel in the midst of this rather tragic situation? Where is the joy in that?

Then I thought of the sound of wind in the trees, the creatures living on planet Earth, the movement of river water. I thought of human beings with their dreams and intentions and love for their dear ones. Animals and birds do the same—they care for and love their families, their young. Thinking of this, of the beauty of this planet...

This planet appears like a jewel when viewed from space—a beautiful blue, green, and white sphere suspended in the cosmos. Simply feeling this sense of mudita for the beauty of our world, for the love that exists throughout this realm of sentient beings, naturally brings a sense of uplift and joy.

Then there is upekkhā, equanimity. This is a tremendously important quality—I think of equanimity as a very high form of love, a pure form of love. Equanimity involves looking from a broad perspective, not from a distance in the sense of distancing oneself from what's happening, but rather gaining the expansive view of understanding.

I'm reminded of the pelicans I watch near Ocean Beach. While other birds flap frantically and people rush about on the shore below, these ancient creatures—survivors since the time of dinosaurs—cruise peacefully along, doing their thing. They glide slowly, then descend to skim the water's surface before rising again, unhurried and serene. To me, they embody the manifest symbol of upekkhā. Having survived for eons, they demonstrate how that quality of maintaining a broader perspective, of not being caught in the rush of circumstances, possesses endurance and lasting value.

The Sanskrit root of upekkhā literally means "having a broader view." When we look at our situation with the mind of a mouse, everything becomes terrifyingly overwhelming. We don't want to venture out our front door or engage with anything because we're examining life from such close proximity that we become paralyzed by the intensity.

But when we adopt the view of the pelican—the broad perspective—we begin to see the changing nature of all things. We can zoom out into the cosmos and observe our beautiful planet Earth within this solar system, within this galaxy, which itself exists among perhaps two or three billion other galaxies in the universe. The scale is mind-boggling, inconceivable. This vast context helps us understand our place in the larger scheme of existence.

Similarly, when we examine life not with mouse-like anxiety but with microscopic precision, we observe the constant flux of all phenomena. Everything remains in perpetual motion. What I call "me" never arrives anywhere permanent—it continuously changes. Everything functions this way, always.

Even Berkeley Buddhist Monastery has arisen at this particular time and exists in the process of being Berkeley Buddhist Monastery. Eventually it will become something else. It is already decaying and will continue to decay, perhaps crumbling, with parts potentially repurposed or a forest growing here one day. This represents the nature of all existence—constant transformation.

Nothing can be permanently fixed or reach a point where everything remains safe and settled forever. Life simply doesn't operate that way. You might wonder, given this reality, why we should concern ourselves with anything at all. Why bother caring whether our grandchildren will have a habitable world, if everything changes anyway?

What's the problem?

So this is like the ultimate view. And then there's the conventional view. The Buddha brought these two together—the ultimate and the conventional—like two palms of the hand. You could say the ultimate view is like the wisdom view, cutting through, seeing the true nature of things: empty, changing, constantly changing. And then the compassionate view is seeing the sentience.

Here we are, sentient beings. We can pretend that we're empty, but we're sentient. We're both, actually. We're sentient beings, so we feel. We're influenced by, we pick up, we respond. And not just human beings, but every living being on this planet. So compassion meets the sentience—it meets life with tenderness.

There's a story in the suttas which you may be familiar with about the Buddha as he's wandering. He comes to a group of monks and most of them are sitting in meditation, practicing. But there's this one monk who's inside, lying in his own dysentery. He's lying in his own excrement. He's alive, he's living, but he's very sick.

So the Buddha asks the monks, "Why is this monk lying here in his own excrement?"

And they say, "Oh, you know, he's had dysentery for ages. He's sick. He can't do anything. He's of no use. So we just leave him there and we just get on with our practice."

The Buddha is with Ananda, his attendant, and so he asks Ananda, "Please get me some water and a cloth." So Ananda gets him some water and a cloth, and the Buddha bathes this monk. He takes off his robes, he bathes his body, cleans him of excrement, of dysentery—filthy, stinking stuff. He bathes him, gives him fresh sheets, makes sure he's comfortable.

And then he says to the monks, "You must take care of your fellow monks." He uses the example that now we don't have family because we go forth from home to homelessness. So he's saying now you don't have family—well, you maybe have family—so we have to take care of each other. You can't just leave people like that. You have to take care. Nobody else is going to come and do it. You have to do it.

The Buddha knew very, very deeply—as deeply as it gets—that everything is in a state of flux, that all that is born must die, everyone that is born must die, everything that comes into form even must break up. The Buddha knew that more deeply than anybody else in the world. And yet he responded to that sick monk in the way of: you have to take care. He wasn't afraid to get his hands dirty. You have to take care.

So this is how it is. We're here on this planet Earth, which is maybe a little bit in the state of that monk. There's a lot of pollution. There's also a lot of taking. There's a lot of—resources are being used up. And there's a culture of taking and throwing away. I watch it every day. I see people buying drinks that last for maybe five or ten minutes in plastic cups which last for thousands of years. They have their drink, throw it in the bin. Don't even manage to get it into the recycling bin. This is the culture that we live in. It's asleep to the realities of change and of impermanence.

So we're in this situation where it could be in our lifetime—it's quite possible in our lifetime—that we meet with very extreme change. And if we pretend it's not going to happen, it's not going to help.

If we get overwhelmed and frightened and freaked out, it's not going to help. So we need to learn how to open with awareness, open to the way things are. Open to the sentient reality, the reality of our vulnerability, of our mortality. And open also to the ultimate reality, that on an ultimate level, everything's okay. Everything is in fact perfect, doing its thing. We were never going to survive anyway. We were born, we go through our life, we're going to die—that's how it goes. But meanwhile, we take care, the best care we can, out of love, out of compassion, out of understanding our sentience.

So I really hope that you will not just hear this talk and go home and say, "Oh yeah, I heard a talk by a nun," but actually take it into your lives and see: What can I do in my life—even if you're already doing a lot—what can I do in my life that brings this a little bit more deeply, a little bit more clearly, where I can live from a place of increased integrity?

Like I say, we're all part of this. Nobody's got clean hands here. We're all part of it because we've grown up in a culture that didn't actually know. And now we're starting to wake up to the effects of our actions, cause and effect. Once you know, then that's a whole different thing. Then we have a certain responsibility to meet this situation. We all have different strengths, different qualities, different abilities, different connections. So we'll all do what we do in different ways. But I just really ask you, implore you, and hope that you will really take this in and not just put it on the shelf because it's too uncomfortable or because you don't quite know how to meet it.

Let the discomfort come in. It's not going to kill you. Let the discomfort come in. Don't get overwhelmed. Stay in your body. Keep breathing. Keep breathing. But let the discomfort come in. And then use the tools that the Buddha gave, the Brahma Viharas, those four beautiful tools of the heart, to guide your heart in the right direction and strengthen your heart and mind. So it's all Dhamma. None of it is other than Dhamma. And it's how we meet it that is important.

So you may be familiar with the Eightfold Path. The Buddha speaks in terms of right intention. He speaks about thoughts or intentions of renunciation, of non-harm and non-ill will. So non-harm can be like wishing for the well-being of others, not wanting to see others experience harm. It's loving kindness, compassion, and non-ill will.

So getting angry at the big powers—it's okay if it gets you motivated to do something, but it's not a place to stay. It's not to just remain angry. That doesn't help. So to use the energy that this brings up, guide it in the right direction. Don't just get caught in aversion, anger, resentment. It's not going to help.

And then the intentions of renunciation. Just looking in your life: In what ways can I give up a little more? Because if we all give up a bit of comfort now, we can save a lot of discomfort in the future, whether it's for ourselves or for others.

Just to see—I mean, I'm a nun, so I give up things that you might take for granted, but I still enjoy comfort. I like nice things. I'm not beyond sense pleasure. But still, to bring that thought when you're going to go and buy something: Do I need it? How would it be if I didn't have it? Maybe, what if the money I'm going to spend on this big drink, I just have some water and then give that to some other more useful cause?

So just to bring in those thoughts of renunciation, intentions of renunciation. And renunciation, the true renunciation, it's not giving up to be pious and be really holy, but it's about giving up—what is good in order to receive what is much better. That's actually how it works. Otherwise nobody would be doing it. I wouldn't have been doing this for twenty-something years if it wasn't like that. You give up what is good, what gives you some happiness, in order to open to what is much, much greater than that.

So I offer these words for your encouragement and reflection. And we have about maybe ten minutes if anyone would like to ask questions about anything I've said or share anything in particular on this theme.

[A participant raises their hand and speaks]

Thank you very much for the talk because I live with this discomfort that you're talking about all the time. I actually was really serious back in December—I had a lot of anxiety, just an extreme amount of anxiety. But I have a meditation practice and a yoga practice that I do on a really regular basis. And now I feel like it's been about six months or over six months, and I wasn't so in the grip of it, really trying, like feeling like I might kind of drown in it and just keeping my head above water. And so with my practice and with feeling, using my mind and my feelings, I have been able to get to a place where I feel like that grip is loosening somewhat. But it is still very challenging to face the situation that we're in. So thank you.

Thank you.

Could you elaborate more about the sunflowers, purifying things?

Well, I can only say—I don't know a lot—but as far as I know, when you plant sunflower seeds in the ground, or little seedlings in the ground, if the ground is toxic... I mean, I don't actually know which toxins, so obviously some things will kill sunflowers, but if the ground has toxicity in it, then the plant transforms that. So the sunflowers will take in the nutrients from the earth and they—I'm not sure what they put back—but they somehow transform that toxicity and produce these beautiful flowers.

I actually don't know enough about it to give you a proper answer. There might be someone else here, but apparently there was a young man who does know better than I do, who had the idea: wouldn't it be a nice symbol if people on this walk held a sunflower to remind that this is possible? And then to actually plant—his idea was to plant sunflower seeds there on the site, which may not happen because it's a privately owned company and all that. But there will be, I think, a garden somewhere nearby where sunflowers will be planted as a symbol of that possibility for transformation.

I just wanted to say I really appreciated how you shared the fruit of your actual practice about this. It was very meaningful and very close to what it is when you sit with these kinds of questions. So thank you.

Could you tell us a little bit more about your monastery that you're trying to set up?

Yes, so at the moment we, as I say, live in a little house in the Sunset District near the ocean. And we came to San Francisco—the idea was this was like a little transition time. We thought maybe a year maximum, two years, and then we would move to the country. So we've been there for three and a half years now. And it has been a wonderful place. It's a lovely place. And I do encourage you to come and have a look for yourselves.

But we are actually forest nuns by practice. So forest nuns meaning naturally we would live in nature. Nature being like a support for the practice in terms of quietude. And also when you live in nature and observe nature, it is teaching the Dhamma all the time. The teaching is going on all the time.

And there's something about being in a city, even though we're right on the edge of it, we're on the kind of quiet edge of it. You know, it's mind-made. It's constructed from people's thoughts and intentions. And nature is kind of from the mind of nature rather than the mind of nature through the human being.

So, you know, I was just recently co-teaching a retreat in the wilderness. And while I was there, it was so clear—this process, the ever-changing process of nature was just so clear. And that shift that I was talking about between the emptiness that everything is—it's kind of emptiness, sort of flux—and the sentience, because all of these swallows were having chicks and the little chicks were flying and we were watching and they were kind of like, "Oh look, they got their first flight."

So there was the sentience, the kind of marvel of the way they would sort of snuggle up together and the way the mother and the father would take care and the whole kind of process of that sentient aspect. And then recognizing this is a constant changing process. It never arrives anywhere. It's changing all the time.

And then coming back—and we were teaching this retreat just a few hundred yards from the ocean, so out in the wilderness on the big flats of the Lost Coast. Then I came back to San Francisco to our little monastery, which is almost exactly the same distance from the ocean as we were there. And yet we're in a house, there's cars, there's music going on around, there's people, there's all this stuff going on. There's a computer, there's a telephone.

So it's a very different scene.

By our practice we're forest nuns and we naturally live in a rural environment, but because we've come over here as foreigners really to start a monastery, we wanted to be in a central place where we could get to know people and make contacts. So we've been there for three and a half years and we're now actively looking to move into a rural environment.

During this month, we're looking at three different areas. Actually today I came back from Sonora. We're also going to look out in the Placerville, Sutter Creek area. And we're also looking in Sonoma County. So those are the three areas that we've been exploring.

One of the reasons that we want to move from where we are—it's not because it's not a nice place—but because we're a community of three nuns and we have one lay steward. And we have requests from women who are interested to live as nuns, who would like to try out the life. We don't really have anywhere to put them. So we're looking for a place where it's of a similar price but with more rooms and a bit of land so that flow can start to happen.

"Could you say a few words about how Ajahn Amaro is doing? I was so disappointed when he left here and went back to England. I probably sent him at least 75 articles because I thought he was bored up there in the sticks. He's got a bit of work to do. And I just wonder how he's doing."

I haven't had a lot of contact with him actually, so I can't tell you how he's doing right now. But as far as I know, he's just come back from a pilgrimage to Mount Kailash. He went on pilgrimage to Mount Kailash and he's just back very recently. And he did come to see us in October last year. He was doing very well, very well indeed.

The Amaravati Buddhist Monastery is a complex place. It's a big place. There's a lot of people coming through. There's a lot of people living there. And it's pretty complex. And he's doing a great job in pulling it all together and getting some cohesion there. I think he's far from bored! He seemed to really be very happy and enjoying the challenge of it all.

"So speaking of Ajahn Amaro and Amaravati, is there any change in the status of women? Because my understanding is one of the things he's going to be doing was making some change around that. Has anything happened that you know of?"

Well... I know that's a big subject. It's a big subject. I should just make it clear that I trained in that community and I was part of that community for 18 years. But since I've been in America, we actually left that community in order to take full ordination. So I'm no longer officially part... Our little monastery is no longer officially part of that lineage because we decided to take full ordination, which is not possible in that lineage.

So I think around the time that we were leaving—it wasn't the cause of our leaving, but it just happened to coincide—there was a lot of difficulties between the monks and the nuns, and the nuns' position was pretty difficult. It was not good, which is why I ended up leaving the lineage and quite a number of people left that community of nuns and a small number of monks also because of the real difficulties in the gender discrimination.

And so far as I know it's on a day-to-day level much better for the nuns now in terms of it's not so challenging as it was during those last couple of years. But no, there are no actual changes made in terms of the status of nuns and so on. It's the same. But you don't get your nose rubbed in it every day. So yeah.

"We've just got a couple of minutes. Don't ask me a big question."

"Can you talk about your process of transitioning from being a civilian to being a nun?"

It's kind of a big question. I'll try and tell you really short. I came across, I kind of went through, I had quite an insight when I was about 13 into death, where I just realized that we're all going to die at some point, and that this whole process that we're in, whatever we do, is going to end in death. And that was kind of a bit of a wake-up call. And it was quite a difficult thing to take on at that age because you're supposed to be preparing for the future. It's all about preparing for the future and becoming somebody. And it was like, oh, and then we're going to die. So what is it all about?

So I had that when I was 13. And then fortunately, I got very depressed from that.

and probably a few other things too. And then when I was 14, by my good fortune, I came across the Four Noble Truths—the very heart of the Buddha's teaching—in a book. That really changed my life because it offered a sense of the way out of suffering. You don't have to wait until you die, but you can find it here and now somehow.

When I read that, I would say from that day on, I had faith that the Buddha knows the way out of suffering. I didn't really understand how to find it, but I just trusted that over time I would start to understand it.

Then when I was 20, I met someone who had just come back from Thailand and had stayed with monks there. I didn't know that there were monastics alive at this time—I thought they had died out centuries ago. When I heard that, I remember saying within about five minutes, "That's what I want to do. I want to be a Buddhist nun." Sometime later on, after I've enjoyed myself a bit more.

I did have a little time to enjoy myself, but I must say it was shorter than I planned. I thought I'd ordain in my thirties. I was imagining thirty-six as my ideal age. But the calling was very, very strong. When I was twenty-two, I first visited a monastery and had just a feeling of coming home. Then I was a bit frightened because I felt I was much too young. So I managed to stave it off for a couple of years.

When I was twenty-four, I went to live in the monastery for a year, knowing that it would be a one-way ticket. I left my partner, whom I loved very much. I said to him, "I think it's kind of a one-way ticket." He was like, "In a year, you'll be out"—because he'd also spent time in the monastery himself and knew how challenging it could be.

I actually had quite a difficult year. But at the end of that year, it was clear that I needed to carry on. And it just unfolded from there, really. It was a calling. In some ways I would say it wasn't my choice. Sometimes people ask why that particular lineage, why that tradition. It was a calling. It just fitted together. Perhaps it was karmic—I don't know what you could say.

I can say I'm very grateful that I had that opportunity. I have a lot of joy in my life and I really love to live as a nun. I'm very grateful also to have been received so well here, that we have been received so well in this country. It's not an easy path because we're kind of having to reclaim the path in a way—the nuns' community—but it's worthwhile.

Do you have a closing? Do you do a sharing of merit at the end? We have a chant that we do, but you won't know that chant probably, so how do you normally do it? We'll chant the sharing of blessings in English. If you don't know it, just align your heart with the intention. This is really bringing to mind the goodness of your practice, the effort it takes to continue in this practice, the fruits that you've gained through the practice, and that you share those generously and liberally with all beings.

Now let us chant the verses of sharing and aspiration:

Through the goodness that arises from my practice, may my spiritual teachers and guides of great virtue, my mother, my father and my relatives, the sun and the moon, and all virtuous leaders of the world, may the highest devas and evil forces, celestial beings, guardian spirits of the earth and the Lord of death, may those who are friendly, indifferent or hostile, may all beings receive the blessings of my life. May they soon attain the threefold bliss and realize the deathless.

Through the goodness that arises from my practice and through this act of sharing, may all desires and attachments quickly cease and all harmful states of mind. Until I realize Nibbana, in every kind of birth, may I have an upright mind with mindfulness and wisdom, austerity and vigor. May the forces of delusion not take hold nor weaken my resolve.

The Buddha is my excellent refuge. Unsurpassed is the protection of the Dhamma. The solitary Buddha is my noble guide. The Sangha is my supreme support. Through the supreme power of all these, may darkness and delusion be dispelled.

Maybe see you next week.

I'll be back next week, all being well.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharma-seed.org.

CHAPTER 248

400 and Rising

Rob Burbea · 42 min

> In this deeply personal dharma talk, Rob Burbea shares reflections from recent travels to Buddhist communities in the Pacific Northwest, weaving together observations about monastic life, encounters with nature, and the pressing reality of climate change. The title refers to atmospheric CO_2 levels reaching 400 parts per million - well beyond the safe level of 350 ppm.
>
> Burbea explores how to apply Buddhist teachings, particularly the four brahmavihāras (loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, and equanimity), to environmental grief and our collective responsibility for planetary destruction. He discusses the challenge of holding both ultimate truth (impermanence, anattā) and relative truth (our duty to care for sentient beings and the Earth), drawing on the Buddha's teaching about caring for sick monks as an analogy for tending to our ailing planet.
>
> The talk emphasizes moving beyond spiritual bypassing or despair toward conscious engagement with climate reality, supported by mettā, karuṇā, muditā, and upekkhā. Burbea reflects on karma as both individual and collective inheritance, encouraging listeners to open their hearts to difficult truths while maintaining the mudita of appreciating life's beauty and potential for positive action.

It's very lovely to see everyone here. There's a few new faces also, and it seems like a lot's been going on. There's been a lot going on for us over the last while.

We had a trip up to the Pacific Northwest. We drove up with Dennis and Claire and stopped off at Davis on our way, where we met Amanda and got a feel for the town of Davis, which is a lovely place. Then we drove up to Shasta Abbey, which sits just at the foot of Mount Shasta, where there's a very mature Buddhist Zen community of Western monks. They're women and men, and they're all known as monks there.

They've been going for quite some time. Some of them have been in the robes since 1971, I think, for the most senior. But most of them have been thirty or forty years in the robes. They have a real—it's very inspiring and beautiful to be in their presence. Very humble, warm-hearted, kind, dedicated people and celibate monastics living in a relatively remote monastery up in Mount Shasta.

When I was with them, I had a sense that they're like river rocks, you know—all the hard edges have been worn away where you can see all the colors and the grain of the character, but without all of the sharp edges that most of us still have. I can see that living in community for a long time, you have to work through a lot of the difficulties and opinions and views that we all have. You have to keep letting go and letting go and letting go until you soften, but it's softening in a strong way, not in a kind of flabby way. So it was very inspiring to go there and meet those who had been there before, just to spend a bit of time with that community and be very warmly received.

Then we went on to White Salmon, which is in Washington, just across the border into Washington State, and spent a few days near the Pacific Hermitage there. This is three monks living in a very beautiful little hermitage with five acres of land, and they're very well supported by the local community. They didn't know when they moved there that there would be many Buddhist practitioners, but once they arrived and started to teach, they discovered that there were many people in the town who meditated and who knew each other but didn't know that each other meditated. So then they brought everybody together, and they have quite a nice community that supports them. They go on alms run every day and have very good support there in the community.

We met them, and then we went down to Portland and met with the board who supported them to become established. We learned a few useful shortcuts from the board about how to not get into too much conflict, because they pointed out that there are visionaries and nuts-and-bolts people. The nuts-and-bolts people get really annoyed—this is like in life, you know. The nuts-and-bolts people, the people who just want to get on with things and do things step by step, get very frustrated with the visionaries because the visionaries may have a vision that's bigger than the nuts-and-bolts people can actually meet or feel would be possible. Then the visionaries get really frustrated with the nuts-and-bolts people because they feel like, "Come on, you know, there's so much potential, there's so much that can be done. If we just stay looking at every little nut and bolt, we're never going to get there."

At first they had quite a bit of conflict, and then they realized that what they needed to do was step in the shoes of the other. So the nuts-and-bolts people would look from the eyes of the visionaries and learn a little bit from them. And then the visionaries would step over into the shoes of the nuts-and-bolts people and learn a bit from them. In that way they were able to work together and support each other, and they've done an amazing job, I have to say. It's very inspiring.

Also while we were up there, we got in a few fun things. We went kayaking and saw a heron with two huge great chicks in her nest—enormous, great big things, big massive nest. Then we kayaked a little bit further and saw a bald eagle in her nest up on a tree. Then there were quite a number of what we didn't know were young—they were juvenile eagles. We thought they were female eagles actually, but they were juvenile, kind of brown and tawny with a little bit of white on the head but not much.

So we were watching these vast, huge, magnificent birds flying, and one came quite nearby. We could go in a little bit further in our boats and get close to the logs where it was standing and just watch this great, beautiful bird. It's the first time I've seen bald eagles. They're huge, magnificent birds, beautiful.

One of the attributes of an eagle is that it has the ability to see from a vast—it can fly very high. Some of them go very, very high. So it can see a big area from a large distance, so it can have the grand vision. And it can also focus down on the prey, so it can have detailed vision. So it has both of those qualities.

As we were kayaking, we were all there in our—I guess they're fiberglass maybe—kayaks and plastic paddles, and we had our little life vests on and everything. So it was like modern kayaking. But as we were going along, it gave me this sense of timelessness. I realized people have been traveling in this way along rivers and so on for thousands of years. Quietly. Being part of nature in that way. And seeing creatures in the way that we were seeing them. This was a normal thing at one time and probably still is in some places. And it was such a peace and a joy actually to be in that... position where one is more quietly simply part of nature.

In the city, it's very mind-oriented and people-oriented. It's very different when a few people move out into the large space of nature, and you see your place in it all. As humans we're very vulnerable. We've lost a lot of the natural skills that we might have had at one time, and we need a lot of support in order to get even just to go out there for a while. So you get a feel for how vulnerable we are and how vast nature is.

For me in some ways it's reassuring to get that perspective again, because I think as human beings we've lost the plot a little bit. We've gotten into this grandiosity, and we've believed it quite deeply—that we are not part of nature, which is a misunderstanding, and that everything is here for us, and that we can control it.

We have learned to control nature to some degree: genetically modified food, the way animals are farmed now as a commodity rather than as living beings, and medicine, surgery, all kinds of things that we've learned to do that give us the illusion of being in control. We've been running on this one for quite a long time now, this perception of being superior in some way and in control.

Part of what has been very prominent in my heart over the last few weeks is some of the results of this misunderstanding that we've been operating from.

Emily and I went to a rally outside the city hall shortly after she arrived. It was very poorly attended—there were about forty people there. It was very small. It was to encourage the divestment of government money from fossil fuels, started by a student, with very inspiring young people there.

Bill McKibben, who some of you might have heard of and who established 350.org about five years ago, came and spoke. He's been going around the country to encourage and rally people to really wake up to the situation that we are in—not just to sit back and say, "Oh yes, it is difficult, what a shame, the poor polar bears," but to actually take it in and make a stand and try to start to change the course of events that we've been actively encouraging at one time and, for many people, maybe more passively allowing more recently.

At one time people didn't really understand the results of, for example, burning fossil fuels. It wasn't seen within the bigger context because we didn't have the bigger context. But certainly in my lifetime, the trip to the moon where people first saw the planet earth as a whole—we have a picture of it by our shrine—people started to see for the first time: "Oh, it's a whole planet. It's not just about us and them and this border and that border and that continent. It is one planet." This was 1969, quite a long time ago.

Somehow we're very slow in really getting to grips with the fact that it is one planet—a unique and beautiful planet. Meanwhile we're still in this illusion of separation, and it's very difficult to wake up out of. But if we don't, well, we'll see, but it will have very serious consequences.

Bill McKibben established this organization called 350.org. The number 350 is what is considered a safe level of carbon dioxide in the environment—350 parts per million is considered safe. When he started the organization, there were 390 parts per million, so the intention was to try to get it down to 350. About a week ago, it was announced that that number has just reached 400, and there's no obvious indication that it's going to go down. If anything, it's going to go up.

This is part of the context within which we are living, and we are all part of it in our different ways. None of us are free from contributing to this, and I think for most people we prefer not to look at it because we don't know what to do. Maybe we don't really want to change our lifestyle, and there are things that we know are not that great but we're going to do anyway because of this reason and that reason. I have those reasons myself. My family lives in the UK and I hope I will see them again, and that will mean flying, which adds quite largely to the carbon in the atmosphere. So there's this dilemma of being part of this destruction of the planet as we know it and yet not really knowing how to meet that.

While we were in Portland, we went to a teaching of His Holiness the Dalai Lama. He was teaching at an environmental summit over a number of days, and we attended just one afternoon talk. He was full of joy—playful, light, a beautiful spirit—and he was also addressing quite serious issues. He particularly spoke about the importance of the feminine qualities. This isn't about women and men, but about the qualities of compassion, of nurturing, of listening, of dialogue, and how these need to be used at this time. We need to develop those at this time, and education—the importance of education.

For me, one of the most powerful things that happened on that day was on the way back. We were getting a ride with a Buddhist family who went to the Pacific heritage center that we'd visited—a couple with their eleven-year-old daughter and her eleven-year-old friend.

As we walked along, I was talking with them and asking how it was for them going to hear the Dalai Lama speaking about these things. They said, "Oh, he's really great, he's awesome. Dalai Lama, he's so cool." They were being a little bit polite with me because I'm a nun.

When I asked what they thought about what he was talking about, I said something along the lines of, "It's such a big thing, we don't really know how to meet it. We have to be able to feel the sense of fear and grief that arises when we look at the situation that we're all in together."

This one girl turned to me and said, "And anger."

And I was very touched by that response. I thought, here is this eleven-year-old girl, and her inheritance is that she's been born into this world at this time, which is looking really serious. At one point her father said, "It's so good that the girls are interested to come to something like this because they are the future, they are the change." As he said it, I thought, surely shouldn't we be the change? Shouldn't we be doing something about it now rather than waiting for them to grow up when it's already maybe too late?

These girls were very conscious of the situation they were living in, very consciously growing up in this reality of inheriting quite a big mess and not knowing—just as we don't know—what to do with it. My feeling is that for many people of our generation, we know about it, but we can forget about it. We can look the other way for long periods of time. But for somebody that age, they can't forget about it. It's very present. And that's really a good thing. It's something we can learn from because it is present. This is the context we're living in.

As we were sitting in meditation, this was quite strong in my heart. I did feel quite emotional about it. It's a very big thing. I was just sitting there thinking, well, what to do? How does the Buddha's teaching come into this? Because there are practical things one can do—there are certainly many petitions to be signed, which I've signed plenty of—but somehow we need to allow it into consciousness enough that it will move us to do something. I know there can be a fear of that or resistance to that, knowing that it's uncomfortable and we don't really want to have to go there.

This is a bit like not acknowledging the fact that we will one day—that this particular body we have now will one day fall apart. That's just a fact. So not acknowledging the bigger picture is like not acknowledging the truth of the way things are. And it is a relative truth. The world and us as sentient beings and separate beings is a relative truth—sensitive and vulnerable as having been born into this world.

The Buddha is pointing to the truth of impermanence, change or flux, and the truth of no-self. So that is ultimately true. There is no self. There is this process that we're all in, or are not in, if you really want to look at it. That is truth. And there is also the truth of these sentient beings who feel and influence each other and affect each other.

As a Buddhist, for quite a number of years before I was a nun, I was very much in that relative truth and very conscious of the effects that human beings are having on the planet. I often used to think that this planet Earth would be a much better place if we didn't have human beings on it. But over time I've come to really appreciate the human race, fortunately. Because we are a marvelous manifestation. We have great potential, incredible potential. There is a lot of good and beauty that I see again and again—in people here who come here, and also when we go out on the street. It's surprising how many acts of kindness and consideration and respect I see, not just towards me as a nun, but toward each other. Many. And it's very beautiful.

It's part of our purpose here, as human beings on the planet, to manifest those qualities. We also have the ability to reflect deeply. So that's also part of our purpose—to understand, to look deeply and understand the truth of the way things are. The human race is not a blight. It doesn't have to be a blight on this planet Earth. We have greater potential than that.

But it is very difficult to know what to do, how to meet it. People can feel a sense of overwhelm or anxiety or maybe self-blame when we start to really open to the situation that we are all in together, and the fact that our actions have influenced that and continue to.

As I was sitting in the meditation, I don't have an answer. Don't look at me waiting for an answer because I haven't got one. I wish I had—it would be wonderful—but I don't. But as I was sitting there in the meditation, what I could see was that a support to opening to this truth is to really bring to mind and use the four brahmavihāras.

So I was sitting there and my heart was feeling quite a lot of turbulence, a lot of sadness. I thought, oh, I'm going to need the tissues next to me when I give the talk because I feel a lot of sorrow at what we've got ourselves into and what we're passing on to future generations.

And then I remembered the quality of loving-kindness. Just bring that quality to this troubled heart at this moment. And as I bring that—I have to do it again now because it's feeling a little turbulent again—but as I bring that, it's not like sugarcoating. That's not what metta does, but it's an acceptance and an easing and a kindness with things as they are.

So as I bring that quality to my troubled heart, then I feel like it starts to calm down, starts to be soothed, and with soothing there's more clarity. So it's not soothing everything away—there, there, it's all right, everything's fine, don't need to worry about it, don't think about it. It's not like that. But it's about letting the heart settle enough that there can be more ease and clarity.

And then bringing in the quality of compassion. And compassion is about feeling with. It's about taking in the suffering of another and feeling with that suffering. So, you know, once you start opening to this big picture, it's pretty vast. And we can—you know, our hearts can break—so be careful not to overdo it. But to just take in part of the picture and really feel with it and allow yourself to feel the suffering, the trembling. It's actually okay to let your heart break. It can be a good thing. But don't let your mind break. Don't go crazy over it.

So really, with the support of the metta, then there's the possibility for the compassion to arise. It's not anger. It's not "it shouldn't be that way." But it's like, it shouldn't be that way and it is that way. So it's like a sense of acceptance—not acceptance in a passive way, but accepting this is the way things are.

And then, I didn't really get to mudita actually in my meditation. I kind of jumped over mudita. Mudita is like having a sense of appreciative joy or altruistic joy, joy for others' well-being. But I think if I were to go there, then I would feel the joy of that river that we kayaked down and the joy of the heron with her two huge chicks and the joy of the eagles as they soared in the sky. And the joy of those eleven-year-old girls who, in the times when they're not angry about the situation they're in, have a life and interest and aspirations.

And connecting with those qualities gives me a sense of—you know, I don't just want to give up. I don't want to say, oh, it's all hopeless. I want to see how can I make—what can I offer? What can I do or offer or renounce perhaps that can give joy to others, give safety to others, give a sense of well-being to others. So I think it's very, very important to connect with that mudita, actually, even though I didn't in the meditation.

And the mudita, for me, like the mudita of a forest, of an old forest which has been allowed to grow in its natural way. Not a sustainable forest for making printer paper, which is a different thing altogether, because there isn't really the time for a whole ecology to evolve in a forest like that. It's a monoculture. The mudita of an old forest that's been allowed to grow and develop in its own way, that has probably billions of different life forms that are part of it.

And also quite a number of our supporters recently have had babies. And it's kind of a mixed bag, isn't it? Because you're bringing children into the world at this time. And what are you bringing them into? But at the same time, I'm seeing really, really good people who have good ethics and will know how to bring their children up well bringing children to the world. And then there's a real sense of mudita also—these kids are getting a really good start, the best as you can get really, at this time. So I feel like to bring those things to mind are really important because that gives a sense of purpose and uplift and generosity and love.

And this helps to keep the heart open and buoyant and keep a sense of purpose and meaning. So it's very important.

And then the fourth of the Brahma Viharas is equanimity. So one might think that equanimity is like a sense of indifference and not really caring or noticing or being attentive to. But equanimity is also one of the enlightenment factors. So indifference is definitely not a factor of enlightenment. So if you're thinking equanimity means it doesn't really matter, then you know you haven't quite got it tuned in right.

But equanimity is partly like having the broad view, seeing like the eagle when it's soaring really high. This is the nature of equanimity—seeing the broad view, seeing the whole picture.

The reflection that the Buddha gives us on equanimity is the reflection on karma. He says, "I am the owner of my karma, heir to my karma. I inherit my karma. I am related to my karma"—or as I discovered when looking up the Pali recently, it also means "bound to" or "attached to my karma." I dwell within my karma; I abide in my karma. The results of what I do will be my home.

Karma literally means action. In Buddhist terms, it means action with intention. It doesn't refer so much to what we receive as to what we do and the intention behind what we do. All action with intention, whether skillful or harmful—of that we will be the heir.

This is a powerful reflection, and this is what the Buddha gives as a reflection on upekkha, equanimity. It's recognizing that when we feel "it shouldn't be this way" or "it's wrong"—well, it's like this. Everything we're experiencing in this moment is the result—maybe not everything, but much is—the coming together of past karma. This is what we call vipaka karma, the result of past karma.

If we're caught in the way of thinking of being separate, solid people, then it can feel a little bit stuck: "I'm just stuck with this karma because it's what I've done in the past." But the beauty of the teaching on karma is that it's a constant process. Whatever we meet at this moment, whatever situation we're in at this moment, how we meet it will determine how it evolves.

We don't really know whether there's time to change the course of events that we've set rolling in terms of the warming of the planet and the increase of carbon and the kind of runaway greed that is motivating all of that. We don't know whether we can change that or not yet. And we don't know that even if we did manage to change it now, whether it would be enough. We don't know.

But we can at least open our minds to it—to the situation that we're in, open our minds to our part in it, what we're doing, and what we can do to change that. The reflection on karma is like accepting, understanding, knowing things are this way. I'm inheriting this because of my personal karma and the collective karma of the human race. It's both. We're not just separate individuals. My intention, my speech and my action influence how things will evolve in the future.

This isn't saying that there's any guaranteed outcome—there never has been for anybody. But it means we have a choice in how we meet the world. First of all, we need to become conscious. We need to allow this into consciousness. Then we need to really bring in the qualities that will support opening to this vulnerable situation we find ourselves in as human beings. And then look at how we can best meet this.

I mentioned earlier that before I was a nun, when I was quite engaged and sensitive to the environmental situation, then as a nun I pretty much put it all on the shelf for many years—for about twenty years almost. I held a much bigger picture in my mind, which is also true. If you read the suttas, the Buddha talks about world expansion and world contraction, and many world expansions and contractions.

I understand that as referring to this physical world, or perhaps the arising of different planets, or the different eras that this planet Earth has been through—the ice age, whole species wiped out, enormous changes that have happened: meteors hitting, volcanoes, all kinds of turbulent processes going on already, and still ongoing.

For a long time I was living in that view of "well, it's all changing anyway, and the world is going to fall apart anyway at some point. That's how it is. That's how it's made." And that is true.

But I feel that to hold just that view is unbalanced, because while that is true, here we are in this situation. The Buddha spoke about the ultimate truth that everything is in a state of flux and the relative truth that a human being needs nurturing, needs food, needs to be careful when sick, needs to keep the ethical precepts so that we don't harm ourselves and others. This is paying attention to the immediate and the sentient.

I want to bring in the reality of the transience of all of this and that on an ultimate level, everything is okay. But on a sentient level, things are seriously not okay.

A story comes to mind of when the Buddha is wandering and goes to where there's a group of monks living together. There's one monk who's very sick with dysentery, lying in his own excrement. He's obviously been lying in his own excrement for days. He's sick and dirty and abandoned by the other monks.

The Buddha asks, "What's going on with this monk here? Why aren't you taking care of him?"

They say, "Well, he's really sick. He can't even go on alms round. He can't do anything. He's useless. So we're just leaving him."

We just leave him. He's of no use. He can't do anything.

So then the Buddha asks his attendant, "Please get me some water." And he gets some water and bathes this monk himself. He takes the dirty sheets away and gives him clean sheets and takes care of him with his own hands. And then he says to those monks, "You must take care of the sick, your sick monks, fellow monks, because when you leave the home life you don't have a family who will look after you anymore, so we have to look after each other."

To me that's a very clear message.

The Buddha gave detailed instruction on contemplation of death and the fact that we all die and the body decomposes and is made up of these elements—flesh and bones and blood. He gave very detailed teachings on this and on the different ways of looking at or approaching anatta or no-self. He gave very detailed teachings on this, but this didn't negate the fact that when somebody is sick and in need of help, we should help them.

So I see this as a very similar analogy.

Now we have this planet that is sick through the poisons that we've put out, which are motivated by greed, hatred and delusion—which are in themselves poisons. So that is the situation we're in. And we can say, "Well, it doesn't matter because everything's going to die anyway. It's all going to arise and cease anyway." But that isn't what the Buddha was pointing to. He was pointing to the care of the sentient realm within the context of understanding the ultimate.

So we have to kind of keep in mind both somehow. We have to make the mind big enough to take in both and not take a position on one or the other. And to remember in the midst of all of that to have the mudita, to look at the potential and the possibility and let that gladden our hearts in the midst of this work.

And maybe also we need to ask for forgiveness. I don't know how you resonate with that. But sometimes when I see what's going on, not that I've directly done something myself, but I just see something really horrendous going on and I just can't help but say, "Please forgive me." Because we're all part of the human race. We're all kind of in this together. And we do all have a part in what's playing out. And because of that, we can all have a part in how it can transform.

Even if that monk that the Buddha bathed died of dysentery a week later, if he was taken care of and bathed each day, and knew that he was cared for, then that's all okay. But if we neglect and turn away from that which needs our care, then we're not living up to our human potential and we're certainly not following the Buddha's instruction.

So that is the sharing from my heart tonight. I hope that your hearts also open to all of this even just a little bit and then a little bit more, and that you look at the ways that you can also influence the people in your own life and the people around you and the wider environment.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 249

The Necessity of Fantasy

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> In this challenging and provocative dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines why contemporary Buddhism has remained largely silent on urgent global issues like climate change, species extinction, and social injustice. He argues that our spiritual fantasies and archetypal images fundamentally shape our ethical responses and perception of dukkha (suffering).
>
> Burbea critiques the dominance of equanimous non-attachment in modern Dharma culture, suggesting it may have contracted our range of spiritual expression and engagement. He explores how the traditional Buddhist emphasis on individual liberation through letting go of the three kilesas (greed, hatred, delusion) may be insufficient for addressing collective and environmental forms of suffering.
>
> The talk calls for expanding our spiritual imagination beyond the archetypal image of calm detachment. Burbea asks what new myths, stories, and fantasies might allow the Dharma to engage meaningfully with civilizational challenges, drawing on the bodhisattva ideal as a potential model for contemporary practice. He suggests that from mythos comes ethos - our deepest stories shape our ethics and capacity for response to the world's needs.

So I really hope that you are feeling met through the interviews—the group interviews and the one-to-one interviews—and through the exchange of questions and answers through notes that happens, and through the instructions that we give each morning and in the afternoon. I hope you feel met where you feel you are, that you feel your experiences are being addressed through what is exchanged and what we're saying. And also that this is happening through at least some of what's said in the evening talks.

Because sometimes that is the purpose of what happens in the evening sessions as well—we're still adding elements to address your experiences as they're unfolding, ways of working, and so forth. But sometimes a talk has a different purpose. It has a different job to do, or different jobs, plural. There are different kinds of talks.

Tonight I want to give a different kind of talk, and talk in a different way about what may be, for many of us, different kinds of material. I want to talk differently in a number of ways.

First, I want to talk about the bigger picture. Some talks are about the bigger picture, and this one definitely is very big picture. My conception—one's conception and view, or imagination—of what the bigger picture is in which my practice takes place always and inevitably must inform and lie underneath my sense and perception and concept, my actual perception of where I am, where I think I am, where I feel I am. Where I feel I am with this particular experience is always informed in a very fundamental way by my sense—even if I haven't articulated it—of the bigger picture. Always. The view of where I am, the perception, but also the response to it, the responses to it, are informed by that. This is a really, really important insight—a massively important insight.

The second way that this talk is different is that it's a difficult talk, not an easy talk. It's difficult for many reasons, and partly because I want to talk about two subjects, and they're both huge. One is nested, if you like, within the other. The first one, or the smaller one, is ethics, which is huge. And that's nested within a larger subject, which is fantasies and image. I hope I can explain what I mean.

So this might be a little dense. Some of the ideas might be quite unfamiliar to many of us, especially people who have been moving in these kinds of circles—quite possibly opposite sorts of ways of thinking, conceptions, assumptions, and so forth. In more ways than one, it's a kind of challenging talk.

There's a real risk here, especially when I talk about the fantasy element. There's a real risk of just not being understood. There's unfortunately a real risk of being misunderstood. Perhaps the best one can hope for is to be partially understood. But c'est la guerre, as they say. We'll take the risk and plough on.

So, ethics. That word, ethics. Let's just pause and stay with the word a little bit, because the relationship with words that we have is important. When you hear that word, what happens? Or the word morality?

For a lot of us in this culture, they're kind of heavy words. We bring in, sometimes unconsciously, associations with judgment, with sin, all of that. If there's a lot of inner critic that has a lot of power operating in the psyche, these words are really difficult, oftentimes. Sometimes when there's a lot of inner critic, the whole realm of ethics becomes just another realm with which to measure the self and find the self lacking. That's all it becomes. The whole thing—as the inner critic does with so much—it can do with practice, and it turns it into something just to measure me and prove what a failure, what a loser I am. The inner critic, if it's too strong, actually blocks authentic self-inquiry into ethics. I just can't have a free inquiry into ethics when the inner critic is strong.

So all this is loaded in our culture. Some modern—well, it actually goes back millennia, but particularly some modern—spiritual traditions just kind of sideline the whole ethical issue. There are quite popular spiritual traditions around, and they literally do not address ethics in their teachings. Then it's quite interesting—the sense, the possibility of freedom or happiness in those kinds of traditions becomes dependent on something more like catharsis. If I release all this stuff stored from the past, if I do that enough, freedom and happiness comes.

That's the model, that's the conception, that's the image.

Or if I release the self-limiting beliefs I have, that brings freedom and happiness.

Right from the beginning, the Buddha is different and places ethics very, very fundamentally on the path. There's a different approach. Theoretically in the Dharma, it's partly the base of the path.

So what does it mean, ethics? Now I'm sure there's a way of precisely defining it philosophically, but I want to just be very loose with this and say what I'm talking about tonight at least is: how do I live? How do I live? And how particularly do I live in relationship to others? What is my relationship with others? So that's a very loose definition of what I mean by ethics.

Recently in this tradition, there's been a lot of crossover between this tradition and other approaches—the Diamond Approach and other sister traditions—and within this tradition, with insight dialogue. There's been quite a number, quite an interest over the last few years in relational practices, where people actually bring awareness and inquiry into working one-to-one with a partner, or in threes, dyads, triads. That sense of needing to work relationally, relational meditation if you like, relational inquiry—the sense of that as something really important has entered the image and the fantasy of what's important, or is starting to. People say this is important, this needs to be addressed.

But not yet the wider dimension. I mean not just two or three and my family and my friends, but the whole of humanity—seven billion people. And what about the other species? And not just now, but what about future others? That is not yet really part of, hasn't come into how we think about practice. We're not yet really addressing that. It's not yet, if you like, part of the image or the fantasy of what Dharma practice really involves. It's not really central to that yet.

I don't need, I hope I don't need to spend long outlining or reminding us all of the immense challenges that we are facing now as a species and through our actions and non-action that we are also giving as a challenge to other species as well. Population, resource scarcity, pollution, climate change, conflicts. Underneath them all, or driving them all, perhaps one of the most fundamental is climate change. That will have more and more dominant impact on all the other factors—all of them—resource scarcity, pollution, all of it.

And the way we, together, we human beings are changing the climate now, today, and have been for the last hundred years—that is going to change the climate not just today or tomorrow, it will change it for thousands of years. The effects are cumulative. The carbon dioxide we're putting into the atmosphere through our actions affects the climate of the Earth for thousands and thousands of years. And this is already in motion. It drives everything.

So one of the things that's quite significant is actually the species extinction. The great biologist E.O. Wilson has reported that at present there is a rate of species extinction that is 100 to 1,000 times the normal rate. And it's been driven by human activity, human action, and climate change is one of the principal drivers of that. 100 to 1,000 times the rate—species are just going extinct, disappearing, never to appear again.

It barely made the news, but scientists and also some politicians are quietly admitting that the goal that was sort of very loosely proffered after the Copenhagen Climate Summit three years ago—that it would be kind of really a good idea if everyone agreed to keep the climate change two degrees or less because above that there is what's called runaway climate change—we don't know where it just starts feeding back on itself. We actually don't know where it will stop.

Now there is a sort of quiet acknowledgment that it's virtually impossible with the momentum that has gathered, the emissions that have already been emitted and what's happening—it's virtually impossible to keep within that two degrees limit. What we're heading for, and even the World Bank wrote this in an article the other day, what we're heading for is more like four degrees to six degrees. And that means, as an initial thing, because as I said, scientists don't even know what starts happening at four degrees or six degrees—a whole bunch of other feedback effects. We don't know. It's like a snowball rolling.

Now, in my mind that sounds quite nice. Add six degrees to here, it's a bit like the south of France. That's pretty nice. But actually that would cause immense and widespread devastation for human civilization, species and others. Massive floods—much more than the inconvenience of not being able to take a train here or there. Cities—London, New York, Mumbai—would probably become submerged, along with other cities. On the other end, droughts, crop failure has already happened in the States last summer.

leading to drastically raised food prices and widespread starvation in the developing world. Storms that we might once have considered normal become hugely magnified in their destructive power. The acidification of oceans threatens the marine life that feeds so much of humanity and has intrinsic worth in itself. And as resources become scarce —less water, less arable land—we face the specter of resource wars.

It seems that in our wider culture, as someone aptly put it, our technological intelligence has somehow raced ahead of our ethical intelligence. We're brilliantly smart with our gadgets and what we can build, yet our ethical intelligence hasn't kept pace. Even our political intelligence lags behind.

When we come together as a collective species to address these questions, we try to address them by scientizing everything. Parts per million of CO2—hugely important, massively important—but these are measurable facts. Perhaps there's a whole other level of discourse that underpins all of this, one that's being missed entirely. It's about values. It's about ethics. And it's simply not being talked about.

We discuss parts per million and changing technologies, but where is the radical questioning of how I am living, how we are living? Where is the radical questioning of what my responsibility is as a human being, given this life shared on earth that I did nothing to earn or create? What is my responsibility? This connects to another meaning of the word dharma—its original implication of responsibility, of duty.

Somehow, collectively, we're like a rabbit or deer entranced by slowly approaching headlights—dazzled by something, not moving, not engaging, not responding appropriately. What are we captivated by collectively as a society and individually? What am I so captivated by?

We speak of the intoxication of youth. What's the intoxication here? What is it that I, or we, are so intoxicated by that we cannot respond adequately? That's an open question, because I'm actually not sure. There are probably many answers. And the headlights are approaching—not the sudden impact of an oncoming car, but more like the slow onslaught of something inexorable.

The wider culture isn't responding, but neither is dharma culture. Buddhism isn't responding. Those of us in the dharma community are usually blessed, very sweet, warm, kind people who often engage in much service. Yet somehow this response hasn't really entered into the story of what we're about.

You may not know this, but Buddhism doesn't have a great track record with this kind of engagement. Perhaps a low point was Japanese Zen during World War II, which wholeheartedly, with great zeal, leapt into the expansionist imperialism of the Japanese war effort. All of Japanese Zen got behind it, with all the slaughter and darkness involved. Why? Something in the culture subsumed the dharma, dragged it along. The dharma couldn't offer anything different—it was simply incorporated into what was happening culturally.

Compare this with someone like Dietrich Bonhoeffer, the Protestant theologian who wouldn't stop speaking out against the Nazis in Nazi Germany. They arrested him, gave him a summary trial, then executed him alongside others who refused to be silenced. Different. I'm not promoting Christianity over Buddhism—I'm simply pointing out that there's something in Buddhism that's not particularly strong in this regard.

You may not know that in the last year, the Buddhist Peace Fellowship—an organization that existed in America for decades, addressing these kinds of issues around peace, conflict, and engaged Buddhism—folded. It dissolved itself. Why? Not enough interest.

In the same period, the annual general meeting of its UK equivalent, the Network of Engaged Buddhists, debated whether they too should dissolve. People weren't interested. They almost did dissolve, but decided to continue.

Meanwhile, at Gaia House, almost every retreat is full these days. Almost every single retreat over the past couple of years. Yet one retreat got so few registrations that it was cancelled—the one on engaged Buddhism, featuring David Loy. Someone simply called and said, "Look, no one's interested."

So he cancelled it.

At the same time, in the culture, there's been a huge spread of the mindfulness movement, which is wonderful. But I don't know. We've had forty years of insight meditation in the West now, dominated by mindfulness as a core practice. And at forty years, I don't know if there's evidence that it's actually leading to practitioners who are really engaging the wider causes of suffering. I'm really looking at that. I can't honestly look at the forty years of insight meditation and say that that's happening. The view of suffering has not so much gone beyond the individual. And we—because that's my tradition, I'm part of that—most of us are not really grappling with these issues. Not even grappling so much with the lifestyle changes that the enormity of the situation is desperately asking of us.

So I don't know if, let alone mindfulness, even the Dharma as it stands can address these issues. I don't know if it has what it takes at the moment to address these issues, if it is actually healing the civilization, if it can. I don't know. And obviously I would love to be able to sit here and say it is, we are, it's happening—but I don't really feel that I can.

David Loy, in a recent essay, asked similar questions: Has there been a commodification of Western Dharma? Is it being co-opted into a self-help stress reduction program that does not challenge what he calls "institutionalized dukkha"—the dukkha that comes from our institutions, our social structures—but actually adapts to it? Doesn't challenge it, but adapts to it. Strong words.

The contemporary philosopher Slavoj Žižek—some of you will know him, definitely not a Buddhist—wrote: "Western Buddhism is becoming the hegemonic, the dominant, ideology of global capitalism, because its meditative stance is arguably the most efficient way for us to fully participate in capitalist dynamics while retaining the appearance of mental sanity. Western Buddhism enables you to fully participate in the frantic pace of the capitalist game while sustaining the illusion that you are not really in it, that you are well aware of how worthless this spectacle is, and that what really matters to you is the peace of the inner self to which you can always withdraw."

Now, any Buddhist knows that Buddhists don't believe in an inner self, so he's got that bit wrong. But actually, there's something here—I want to return to this because I think he's got something else a little bit wrong too. But there's something here I think we need to pay attention to. I want to return to it though.

Someone in an interview a couple of weeks ago was complaining about this and called it "do not disturb Dharma."

A friend went to a conference of environmental scientists who had met a little while before and who—because it's the fantasy of science to be objective, cool, detached, not emotionally involved—were giving out facts and figures about climate change and species loss. But amongst themselves, they were actually experiencing enormous frustration and profound heartache. In this previous meeting, they were asked to make a list of what they would wish for to remedy the situation more widely. I can't remember what the first one was, but the second on this ordering of fifty things they were asking for—the second most frequently and most important thing they asked for—was that spiritual leaders would start voicing this, would start speaking up. That was the scientists. This was the second biggest thing that would make the difference: spiritual leaders need to start talking about this.

And yet, we are silent. We are silent. You might like or not like that word "spiritual," but it means people like me and the Dalai Lama and all the rest of it.

There's enormous suffering involved in all this. The Red Cross, back in 2001, estimated—it's obviously a tricky figure, but they estimated that even in 2001, and it must be much more now—there were already twenty-five million environmental refugees, greater than the number they calculated for those displaced by war. Already in 2001. Massive suffering is unfolding and will unfold.

This is an issue of suffering. We would think that the Dharma and Buddhism is relevant because we talk about suffering—dukkha. So what I'm interested in is: why not? Why are we not addressing it? Why are we so silent about this? What's happening psychologically, spiritually, psycho-spiritually? What's actually going on? Why are we not including this?

To me, that's a fascinating question, a very troubling question, a fascinating one. I actually think there are many reasons. I don't even pretend to know them all or understand them. I just want to talk a little bit about some of them.

Certainly there's the aspect of fear and the psychology of denial. There's also the whole reality that we are part of society, and society is addicted to our way of life, and we're not exempt from that in the Dharma.

There's something more fundamental perhaps, one of the reasons that has more to do with the whole view of what the world is: What is this world that I'm in? It goes back to Descartes and would view the world as basically just stuff—just material stuff that we can shift around, in itself meaningless, in itself valueless.

Some people place the origins of that materialist worldview even earlier, in the twelfth century. It doesn't matter precisely when. You might say, "Well, that sounds like abstract philosophy." But it has become common sense for us. That's how we feel and see the world—common sense. Listen to those words: common sense. We perceive the world that way. What started as abstract philosophy becomes common sense.

And that kind of materialism, in the larger sense, actually saturates our modern Dharma. We're immersed in it. Sometimes we encounter what they call idealism, which views everything as consciousness. That's a bit more rare, but it exists too. Either way, the world becomes just meaningless or valueless—it's just stuff, or it's just consciousness. Who cares what happens?

But actually, that's not what I want to talk about. I want to talk about this piece I mentioned about fantasy, which may seem a very strange way to approach this topic, or would seem unusual at first—image and fantasy.

One person who's troubled by all this said, "Why don't we do what the Protestant Christians do, what Evangelical Christians do? They ask this beautiful question: What would Jesus do in this situation?" Beautiful. What would Jesus do? You use the fantasy, you use the imagination. What would the Buddha do?

Well, actually, I think it's a lovely question, but you run into a problem immediately: Whose Buddha are we talking about? Whose Buddha? If you read enough biographies or even passages referring to the Buddha, you realize it's a fantasy of the Buddha. It's an image of the Buddha. We have a fantasy, an image of the Buddha, and within that, an image, a fantasy of the direction of practice—Buddhahood being the direction of practice, of the goal.

Whose Buddha? Some Buddhas don't give a damn about the world. Some Buddhas are thinking about other things entirely.

But actually, even more than that, with this business of fantasy and image, if you go back and read the original texts, the Pali Canon, you find they are actually saturated—it's not obvious at first—they are saturated in fantasy and image. The whole thing is saturated with a certain fantasy and image, and that is of a kind of equanimous removal from the world. Sometimes we don't quite like that in some aspects, so we've kind of covered it over a bit or filled it out a bit. But actually, that is the dominant archetypal image of Pali Canon Buddhism: in the world but kind of removed, on the way out and not really that involved. Cool, non-attached, equanimous. Maybe warm.

So I wonder if we can question that as the dominant image and actually critique it even. And maybe that makes some of you nervous. But to that I would respond: Why are we not free to question that? Why are we not free to question the dominant images and fantasies of Buddhism, of Dharma? And if I feel, or you feel, that you or I or we are not free to question and critique that, I would just respond—I would ask in response: What fantasy, what story and what imaging tells you or gives you the sense that you're not, that I'm not, that we're not?

Do you see it's a religious fantasy? "I can't go back and question the Buddha." It's part of a religious story. Do you see what I mean? There's a religious fantasy at play even in the non-allowing of the questioning, the non-allowing of shining that kind of light on the tradition.

There are other problems here. In the Dharma we tend to talk a lot about letting go of fantasy, non-fantasy, about being with things as they are, about meeting actuality, letting the story go, and so forth. All of which is quite important, but it's almost an indoctrination there.

We assume that letting go of fantasy is actually possible. If you go deep into Dharma understanding, into emptiness and dependent origination, you actually see that what we perceive—our reality—is being constructed all the time, and the mind is playing the dominant part in that construction. Part of this construction is the fantasy, the image, the story that we have of what we are doing, what life is, what this is and what that is.

Certainly, meditatively it's possible to let go of fantasy. But you don't arrive at a bare actuality—everything empties out. You go into non-appearance, levels of non-appearance. One can emerge out of that meditation, but once I emerge into the world, I'm back into the realm of fantasy, of imaging, of story.

Even now, or monks in the Buddha's time who come out of their meditation, perceive themselves in fantasy, in story, in image: "We are monks in the dispensation of the holy Buddha. He is the holy Buddha. I am on this track of the tradition." Even now, 2,500 years later: "I'm on the track. I see the past behind me, the tradition stretching through this self and this time and this place and all the work that went into it, into the future"—story, fantasy, image.

I'm not denigrating fantasy and image. It's necessary. It's part of the way the psyche works. I'm using it more in the sense that Jung or Hillman or those kinds of psychologists would use it. I'm not talking about being lost in some elaborate daydream. I'm talking about levels of resonance, levels of meaning, colorings of things, the way we give vitality and meaning and direction and beauty and love to things in our existence and the self in that.

Rather than trying to get rid of fantasy or trying to pretend that it's not there, maybe it would be helpful to really acknowledge that it is here—we are saturated in it. The way we tend to talk, the way I dress, the way this place is set up, its decor, certainly the images, what we talk about, what we don't talk about—it's all part of the fantasy and the image, the story of what's happening here. And it's beautiful. But let's acknowledge that it's here and it has tremendous power. It's in everything that we love. It has to be there.

So admit fantasy, image, story. It's here. We cannot live without it. Mythos, fantasy, image, story—from the mythos comes the ethos. From the mythos, from the fantasy image story, comes the ethos, meaning the ethics and the feel of things, the emotional resonance of things.

That's one thing: acknowledging, admitting, recognizing the power. The second thing is, has the Dharma tradition, either recently or right from the beginning, shrunk the range of fantasy and image? Has it contracted it down to predominantly one? The archetypal range of expression—has it contracted it down to one? And is that very singleness the problem, or a problem?

We could ask, here in this culture—and some of you have been around many years—where is the madness? Where is the divine madness? Where is the warrior? Where is the raging? Where is the balls? Where is the wildness? Different kinds of wildness. Where is the diversity of sexual expression? I don't just mean being open to LGBT, important as that is. I mean the different sexual personae, the archetypal ways that can express. Are they given equal honoring? What about sensuality or the breadth of artistic expression and range and feeling?

Is it rather that something—this calmness, equanimity, warm stillness—has actually become the dominant thing, the dominant image, the image to which consciously, explicitly or implicitly we feel we're moving and should move? So other kinds of things, certain other expressions or manifestations or archetypal ranges actually get relegated. Maybe they're seen as morally inferior in some cases.

Maybe they're just relegated or sidelined. Maybe they're tolerated—we can be mindful of that and tolerate it. But it's still one thing that we're drawn into, and we don't actually regard those others, those other images, fantasies, archetypal expressions as equally beautiful, that diversity—honoring them equally. I don't even mean we need to integrate all of that. I'm not even going in that direction now.

Some of you may have heard of the teacher Andrew Cohen. He used to be involved many years ago, before my time, in this tradition at Gaia House. Now he has his own sort of tradition where he is a teacher. I read just a small passage from his biography some years ago, and he relates an incident with one of the senior teachers in this tradition, donkey's years ago. Something happened in an interview or over a couple of interviews, and the teacher—the senior teacher from this tradition—I don't know what happened exactly, something got a little heated and he shouted at Andrew. And Andrew said this was unbelievable. It just blew his mind. How could a spiritual teacher shout? How could they shout? This is showing anger. And how can you be a spiritual teacher and have that? And it ruined it. I don't know if that was the breaking point, but something happened, and off he went and did his own thing.

What's interesting to me there is: what's in the image? What's in the image of what a spiritual teacher is like? And by extension then, what we are moving towards—what this person is supposed to be embodying as someone who's further along on the path.

What's in the image? What's included in the image and what's excluded even from consideration in the image? Shouting, anger—or what? Don't even think that has anything to do with it.

So within the Dharma, there is not—I could look and say it does exist, but generally there is not really much life force in the fantasy of engagement, of dynamic response to these gargantuan crises that we face right now. You certainly get outdoor Dharma, wilderness Dharma, but it's kind of about being equanimous or calm in nature, or connected to nature. It's a different thing. And you certainly get people with veggie gardens and stuff. Great! Is that really going to hack it?

So I don't want to suggest shrinking the fantasy either to one of "now we're all going to be eco-warriors." I'm not suggesting that at all. What I want to really suggest is expanding—expanding the range, that somehow it's gotten too tight.

Let's explore this a little bit more about the image and fantasy, because we have image and fantasy of the goal and of the path. And wrapped up in that, part of it is simplicity. Just to draw out that dimension: we have an idea that both the goal and perhaps the path are simple, that we're aiming for some kind of simplicity. It's so attractive as a notion.

And maybe, secondly, we're also then too simple in the way we regard, say, agitation. So it's interesting—generally we want to do away with agitation, we want to move away from agitation, let that go. And yet certain kinds of agitation are okay. Perhaps if it feels like something is catharting from my childhood or whatever and I'm agitated as I go through that, that's maybe allowed. Or the agitation of, in some traditions, the fourteenth stage of insight or whatever—that's allowed because it's seen, there's a conception behind it that allows it. But generally, we don't like agitation. We let go of agitation.

Or, again, too simple in the way that we're considering rage.

That which rages within us and that which is outraged or might be outraged.

So much of our attraction to simplicity stems from this understanding. But climate change is not simple. It's not a simple issue. And the forces that are coming together to propel this juggernaut—they're not simple at all.

So we like this simplism. And perhaps we're a bit seduced, understandably, by our complex lives. Seduced by what feels like a siren song. And maybe there's something missing in there, something even a bit foolish. Endlessly letting go of agitation, maintaining non-involvement, even using the word equanimity—dressing it up as equanimity when it's actually non-involvement. Is that what's needed? Are we too much in the thrall of one dominant direction?

We use words like wakefulness and awakening. But maybe with all that, we've been lulled to sleep. Or some dimension of the being is being lulled to sleep. And though we might be very alive and sensitive in some area, in some other range or arena, there's actually quite a numbness there. A disengagement.

It's interesting—historically, and I think I mentioned this in the opening talk—Buddhist ethics has a lot to do with simplification, in fact. That's one of the driving reasons behind Buddhist ethics. It's a kind of safety net, as one of my teachers would say. Just keep the five precepts. It forms a safety net for your practice and for your being, for your heart and your consciousness. So I don't have to think about what lie I told to that person. I don't have to remember the lie and how it relates to other things, or who I gossiped about behind their back, or what I took. I don't have to keep being troubled by all that. It simplifies, and that simplification allows calmness because I'm not agitated by my non-keeping of the precepts.

But within that there is a kind of individualism. The range of ethics is very individual, and the notion of awakening is very individual. Nowadays, if we think at all about the bigger picture, the wider picture in modern times, we perhaps hope that by working in our personal way on ethics and meditation and awareness and kindness—in our circle of family and friends and work colleagues—hopefully that will ripple out and cause a wider change in the wider culture. Oftentimes that kind of idea is there.

But maybe we don't quite understand. We're a bit naive, underestimating the power of what we are up against or what we are creating. The enormous power of the social structures and assumptions that form the fabric of our society—a globalized society. Because we do now live in a globalized society, a globalized world. The carbon that we emit, the climate change that is happening—it's not localized, it's globalized. It's everywhere.

Looking into and probing a little bit into Buddhist precepts and ethics and their history, there's a lot about trying not to do. I try to undertake the precept to try not to harm, to try not to kill, to try not to steal, to try not to be abusive sexually, to try not to lie. It's quite negative. But then, quite interesting, like throwing in a moral dilemma.

So if I'm walking by a lake or the sea and a young woman is drowning and shouting for help, is it morally wrong not to help her? Clearly it's good to help her—we say it's good, it's kind or whatever—but is it morally wrong not to? In Dharma language, perhaps it's good karma to help her, but is it bad karma not to help her? And if my equanimity is disturbed or whatever else is disturbed, is it still bad karma? I don't know. Stinginess is bad karma, but you have to kind of search for that teaching.

Now, that's one person passing by another person in trouble. Amplify it to a globalized situation and these moral dilemmas become quite difficult. Because one can always say, "Well, there are other people around, and everyone else is walking by. No one else is stopping, doing this or that, or stopping flying, or whatever it is." The whole situation morally becomes so entangled and so easy to just shrug away.

If I look at it karmically in a globalized situation—if you believe in karma—my bad karma for not jumping in to save her is dissolved in the very globalization, in the very complexity and wideness of what's happening. Is that okay?

Molière, the writer, already in the 17th century, said: "It is not only for what we do that we are responsible, but also for what we do not do." That's a hard thought, especially if the inner critic is strong. It's a hard thought. The inner critic just takes that as so heavy. Not just for what I do, but also for what I do not do. The action I don't take.

Complex—all this is complex and difficult.

This complexity is not easy or simple, and it proves genuinely agitating. Woven into all of this—as part of the images, fantasies, conceptions, views, and assumptions we hold—are our beliefs about the Dharma itself, about practice, about the goal and the path.

We speak of suffering, of dukkha. But what is dukkha? What on earth are we talking about when we use this word? This is the problem, isn't it? Dukkha is the problem. The Buddha said, "I teach suffering and the end of suffering." But what do we mean when we say dukkha? What is the problem we're actually addressing?

And what do I believe? The second noble truth follows the first. If the first is dukkha, what do I believe is its cause? These are fundamental Dharma conceptions. What are we actually talking about? What are we actually addressing?

Because dependent on my conception of what dukkha is and what I believe its cause to be, the other two noble truths emerge—what I believe it looks like to be free of dukkha and what I need to do to get there. Dependent on my conception of the first two truths comes my understanding of the remaining two.

Is dukkha individual? Is it purely personal, or am I including social structures, social assumptions, and by extension, environmental factors? If, for example—and this view is quite popular—my notion of dukkha centers on my patterns, my personal patterns that prevent my freedom of expression, this becomes the dominant framework. My patterns, probably rooted in family and past experiences, become the primary challenge.

Such a view, when it becomes dominant, has enormous effects. It will profoundly shape the fantasy and image of what freedom looks like and what's involved in achieving it. It will determine what I imagine it means to help others achieve freedom. When this perspective shrinks around us as the primary lens, there's no inclusion of attention to social and environmental roots of dukkha.

We have the Four Noble Truths and the three kilesas—greed, hatred, and delusion. We say awakening means eradicating the three kilesas. These lists and concepts, these Dharma frameworks—we use these terms constantly. But they're like skeletons. The Four Noble Truths is a skeleton. The three defilements form a skeleton. They need fleshing out. How do we flesh them out? That's what brings them alive.

It's difficult to read the Pali Canon, the original teachings, without sensing that the goal was to escape the wheel of rebirth, to avoid being reborn again. You can reinterpret and remove elements, but the teachings don't quite hang together without this framework. That's fine—I have no problem with leaving rebirth out of the equation. But if that was the central image and fantasy of what awakening meant, what is it now? What will it be? What is our image and fantasy of awakening, of liberation, without that foundational concept?

For many people, that framework has disappeared as a central organizing principle. What fantasy and image replace it? I've come to think—and I don't see any proof for this—that some people, even engaged Buddhists, claim that when the self is released, when the three kilesas die, a person will naturally become engaged. They argue that having less self automatically leads to addressing the social roots of dukkha, to caring for environmental ethics, to making radical and important changes in lifestyle.

I'm not sure. I don't know.

I was at an engaged Buddhism conference—I don't know when it was, Yuho was there, perhaps a year ago. David Loy was speaking, and he offered an intriguing historical perspective. He suggested that shortly after the Buddha died, monasteries arose—Buddhist institutions that needed the support of local kings, both financial backing and military protection. Because they depended on this support, they couldn't speak out. They had to confine their discourse and teaching to individual dukkha, avoiding any discussion of socially caused suffering and the social roots of dukkha. For that reason, they simply decided to confine their teachings to individual dukkha and maintain the status quo. According to this view, that's why we have Buddhism as it is now.

It's a nice idea, but I don't know—it's conjecture. Is it true? We have modern traditions like this one that have no need to pay lip service to any government, military ruler, or king. Other contemporary approaches—the Diamond Approach, modern Advaita—all point quite similarly at the self and seeing through the illusion of the self in some way or other, using different language, yet they offer very little discourse about engagement.

So perhaps the idea that the self, the ego, is the problem may not be psychologically sophisticated enough in relation to all this. Maybe we need new fantasies, or there's one thing we certainly need: new fantasies, new myths, new images to be included. Mindfulness alone, but even insight alone, perhaps without the right fantasies or appropriate images, simply will not bear that fruit. It will not give birth to that kind of engagement, that kind of wrestling.

So can I, can we as teachers, give you new myths? What new myths? What new stories? What new fantasies? What images? Will you demand of me new myths, new stories, new images, new fantasies? And what will they be?

From the fantasies, from the images, from the stories, from the mythos comes the ethos—comes the ethics. In the wider culture, what are the images? What are the fantasies? Norman Brown said that if you want to change a civilization, you need to change the imagination of the masses. That's what actually transforms things—you change the imagination of the masses. Ben Okri puts it more gracefully: "Stories are the secret reservoir of values. Change the stories individuals and nations live by and tell themselves, and you change the individuals and nations."

The stories, the fantasies—they also condition the emotions we have. The very fact that we're not speaking and sharing with each other much in our culture about the enormous grief of species loss, of climate change, of what we are actually engaging in together and giving rise to—this is partly because it's not in the image. It's not being nourished by the right image. Grief and outrage haven't become normalized through images and fantasies.

Anthropologists and historians recognize how the emotions we feel as human beings—emotions we consider so primary, so natural—are actually deeply conditioned by the stories and conceptions in our culture. In medieval Europe, there existed a whole range of emotions that we have completely lost because they were tied to certain conceptions of God that no longer exist in our culture. Conversely, we experience emotions they never knew because we inhabit entirely different fantasies, images, and conceptions of self.

So what fantasies? What images? In the wider culture, there's something very beautiful from the wonderful astronomer and physicist Carl Sagan. In an address he gave to a graduating class at an American university—it must have been shortly before he died—he showed them a large photograph taken by the Voyager 1 spacecraft a few years earlier. He's offering them an image, giving the world an image:

"We succeeded in taking that picture from deep space, and if you look at it, you see a dot. That's here. That's home."

That's us.

On it, everyone you ever heard of, every human being who ever lived, lived out their lives—the aggregate of all our joys and sufferings, thousands of confident religions, ideologies and economic doctrines, every hunter and forager, every hero and coward, every creator and destroyer of civilizations, every king and peasant, every young couple in love, every hopeful child, every mother and father, every inventor and explorer, every teacher of morals, every corrupt politician, every superstar, every supreme leader, every saint and sinner in the history of our species lived there on a mote of dust suspended in a sunbeam.

The earth is a very small stage in a vast cosmic arena. Think of the rivers of blood spilled by all those generals and emperors so that in glory and in triumph they could become the momentary masters of a fraction of a dot. Think of the endless cruelties visited by the inhabitants of one corner of the dot on scarcely distinguishable inhabitants of some other corner of the dot. How frequent their misunderstandings, how eager they are to kill one another, how fervent their hatreds.

Our posturings, our imagined self-importance, the delusion that we have some privileged position in the universe are challenged by this point of pale light. Our planet is a lonely speck in the great enveloping cosmic dark. In our obscurity, in all this dark vastness, there is no hint that help will come from elsewhere to save us from ourselves. It is up to us.

It's been said that astronomy is a humbling and, I might add, a character-building experience. To my mind, there is perhaps no better demonstration of the folly of human conceits than this distant image of our tiny world. To me, it underscores our responsibility to deal more kindly and compassionately with one another and to preserve and cherish that pale blue dot, the only home we've ever known.

To me that's beautiful. It's an image, and wrapped up in it is a certain fantasy—a cosmic fantasy of our cosmic situation, and the rhetoric goes with it. It's beautiful rhetoric. No problem with rhetoric. Image, fantasy brings rhetoric. We have rhetoric in here. No problem. As I said, fantasy is good. It brings meaning, brings image.

But we've had that image since 1969, when Apollo went up and turned around and took the photo. Maybe it's not enough for all. Maybe we need a plurality of images and fantasies, and this is really what I'm getting at.

So what image, what fantasy, what do you love? Because there's so much love coming through what he's saying. And maybe it works for you—for me it moves me tremendously. It doesn't work for everyone. It will not work for everyone.

What do you love? What do you love? What has more meaning for you even than your life? What has more beauty and more importance than your pleasure or your pain, your suffering? More beauty and more importance than anything else. What image, what fantasy gives that?

What happens if we don't have a fantasy? If we don't have a spiritual, a meaningful, deep image in the psyche—or images in the psyche? One thing that can happen is we start sacrificing at the altar of the god of convenience. Convenience fills up the void left by the absence of meaningful fantasy, of vitalizing fantasies.

Sacrificing what? Sacrifice used to mean "make something sacred," but it's the opposite. We're actually letting go of what's sacred. Everything's about convenience. That's one possibility. Or perhaps convenience itself becomes the fantasy. But it's a pretty thin fantasy. It's a pretty meager fantasy. A mean fantasy, actually.

that shopping in big supermarkets feels so wounding to the sensitive soul? Sometimes people who've done a lot of retreats think it's because there's so much sensory stimulation. I actually don't think it's that at all.

I wonder—and all this is questioning, I don't know the answers to any of these things—I wonder if it's actually because what is the supermarket? There isn't the deep care for deep beauty. It's gone. It's not addressed. It's not brought into the equation, into the economic equation, the fiscal equation. There is also not any real intimacy with either the produce or those who sell. It's a place of non-intimacy. What it is a place of is convenience. Let's put everything in one place and people can park and it's convenient. And that trumps what is more meaningful and more deeply beautiful. And it's painful and it has an effect.

So in the wider culture, what are the fantasies that we can maybe give rise to, that we need to give rise to? What are the dominant ones? What ones can we question? What ones can we bring in?

But in the Dharma culture as well, and this is my world and that's what I want to address, can we shake something up? Can we open something up? So that there's less of a kind of monolithic dominance of the equanimous, non-attached acceptance of a situation, the doing nothing attitude as a style of existence. Less monolithic the simple, the simplifying, the non-agitation, the non-fire of rage. Can there be a greater range? Can we admit and open up a greater range?

It was interesting when the Occupy movement was there and Rowan Williams, then the Archbishop of Canterbury, had no problem actually publicly saying, "Yes, I agree, this is great, there should be a Robin Hood tax," making political suggestions. Archbishop of Canterbury. As far as I was aware, no one in my Dharma circle felt it was appropriate for a spiritual person to be commenting on matters like that, about social structure, etc. Why? It's not in the image.

Or again, if we go back to that situation with Andrew Cohen and his teacher back then, we might notice and question and feel morally troubled if a teacher or someone who's been practicing a long time is, for instance, promiscuous, and we think, well, that can't be morally right—sexual promiscuity. Or if there's a bit of wildness in how they are and what they express, or if what seems like rage or anger is coming through, we maybe notice that more than we would notice non-engagement. It's an absence—we don't notice an absence. What if we turn that around and actually one starts to question the non-engagement? Say, that can't be quite right, maybe.

Go back to that Žižek quote. He's saying, "You guys, you're retreating to your thing and you can just turn the world off with your meditation." I think what he got wrong there is people need to rest. Even a soldier—apparently you can only give soldiers sixty continuous hours of combat before they start to lose it. But even an activist needs to rest. Meditation is rest, deep rest.

What he's mistaken is the dominant image in Buddhism, in Dharma, is not so much of meditation as entering into deep calm and then emerging. It's actually the dominant image is a life of calm, a pervasive equanimity. So even if people say, "It's okay if you can't get deeply calm," the implicit, often, or explicit image is of a life of equanimity. And that is poisonous, perhaps.

It's fine—I mean, beautiful—to be able to rest deeply, but to try and have a calm life, an untroubled life, an equanimous life, so that the image, the fantasy that's beginning to get quite pervasive is one of an equanimous or spacious busyness. So I can do all this stuff and be really busy with the demands of modern life and yet inside I'm equanimous and spacious. And maybe that's not such a great fantasy and image to have, popular and attractive as it might seem.

Maybe again, included in the range of images can be this sense of: is there a place for a kind of Dharma that's not about me? It's just not me and my suffering. It's much wider.

So can maybe, as a part of all this increasing the range—we can't force anyone into falling in love with or adopting a certain fantasy or image. It's impossible, especially in a postmodern era. Sometimes the eco-psychology movement, I feel, tries to sell this kind of Mother Nature image, but it won't be. Some people just think Mother Nature—they feel there's a bunch of hippies talking. I don't relate to it. It won't be for everyone.

Going back to the Buddhist tradition, we have the fantasy, the image of the bodhisattva. But it's not forced on anyone. At the beginning, when it came to preeminence—when it was arising—this bodhisattva image, this fantasy, actually found expression in monasteries where people who took up that fantasy and image coexisted very well and very peacefully and amicably with people who didn't take it up. Mahayana and Hinayana, no problem living together and simply saying, "That's your fantasy, it's fine, this is mine." No problem. There has to be, perhaps, a plurality.

Originally this bodhisattva fantasy and image involved the idea of many lives and a kind of transcendent goal of unbelievably transcendent Buddhahood, almost difficult to even wrap one's head around. What might it mean now? What might it involve now—a modern version of the bodhisattva? What image might that be, without all this business about lives and other realms and transcendence?

Might it be a range of images, and within that greater space, a wider range of fantasy and wilder range? The fantasy, the images, admit wider and wilder.

The Buddha in the time of the Buddha talked about the lion's roar of the awakened ones. Upon awakening they utter the lion's roar. What is the modern lion's roar? What might be included in the modern lion's roar of awakening?

So is it that these other aspects that we tend to perhaps dismiss or just not notice or not give life to or feel troubled by—we tend to want to try and tame them or look down on them. Maybe there's something about honoring them deeply, allowing them, making them available.

And if you're listening and you think, "That sounds dangerous, all this talk about wildness and rage and outrage—it sounds dangerous"—maybe it is. Maybe there's no such thing as a path without danger. I don't think there is. Any path has dangers—eyes open to danger. There's always danger.

But if the only or the dominant image is equanimous non-involvement, warm but not really getting involved—it seems safe, seems like there's no danger. Safe, sane, sanitized. But maybe there's a huge danger lurking there through the very non-involvement, the non-agitation, the non-outrage.

So maybe one element in all this that we're facing—one small but perhaps important piece—is to do with widening the range of what we honor. And I really mean honor in the fullest sense, not just tolerate: honor the images that emerge, the fantasies that emerge. And then maybe that's one element that allows—that will, might allow, might contribute to allowing—the Dharma to actually really offer something to the world at this time.

CHAPTER 250

Planet Earth as Divine Messenger

Rob Burbea · 52 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea draws parallels between the Buddha's encounter with the divine messengers and our current ecological crisis. He begins by exploring the traditional story of the young Buddha witnessing old age, sickness, and death for the first time, which sparked his spiritual quest. Burbea explains how the Pali term dukkha—often translated as suffering—actually means 'unsatisfactoriness,' like a wheel with an axle that doesn't fit properly, creating a bumpy ride through life.
>
> The talk then expands this teaching to address climate change as a contemporary divine messenger. Just as the Buddha recognized impermanence through witnessing bodily decay, we are now called to recognize the impermanence and interconnectedness of our planetary home. Burbea examines how our consumer culture conditions us to turn away from discomfort rather than toward it, yet the Buddha's path requires us to face suffering directly as the doorway to liberation.
>
> Drawing on insights from eco-philosophy and the Four Noble Truths, Burbea challenges us to develop what Arne Naess called an 'ecological self'—an identity that includes all life on Earth. He emphasizes that responding to climate change is not sacrifice but natural action when we perceive our deeper interconnectedness. The talk concludes with practical encouragement for both personal lifestyle changes and collective action, viewing our current crisis as an unprecedented opportunity for awakening.

Good evening again. I hope you have meanwhile arrived fully—not just the body, but also the mind. Always take some time after rushing around the whole day, perhaps coming from work or from another engagement. It takes time for the body and the mind to come together. Once we become aware of how we feel and how the body is right now, that really helps us to fully be where we are.

The Buddha's teaching is all about pointing us in the right direction, which is where we are. In the present moment is where we can learn more about how our mind works and also how the bigger context operates. Through shedding different levels of concepts, we arrive more and more at clarity, which helps us to live our lives with less and less friction. Our expectations change through getting to know the way things really are, rather than what we have learned through our conditioning from the day we were born, or maybe even over lifetimes, if we can open up to that way of thinking.

One way of summarizing the Buddha's teaching is this: the Buddha said, "I teach about suffering and the end of suffering." That was one way he expressed what his teaching is all about, especially in the Theravada presentation, which I think is the basis of how Philip also teaches here.

The word "suffering" in the Pali language—or rather, the word dukkha, which is one of the three characteristics of existence—is often translated as suffering. But actually, in the original Pali, dukkha doesn't mean suffering. It means rather unsatisfactoriness. Originally, the word dukkha consists of two parts. The prefix du- means difficult or not really fitting. The second part of the word, kha, means the axle of a wheel—the hole in the center of a wheel where the axle is inserted. It means that this axle doesn't perfectly fit into the hole, so it isn't a perfect fit. Because of that, the wheel doesn't run smoothly. That's the example of how this unsatisfactoriness, which is one of the three characteristics of life, is illustrated.

Basically, it says this life is a rather bumpy ride. If we expect it to be a smooth ride, we will suffer. But if we can adjust ourselves, if we can move with the bumps, then we won't suffer. Instead, we understand how this process works better—inside ourselves and also outside. Even ultimately, there is no inside and outside, but that's how we experience it as human beings.

The Buddha said this was his whole intention in trying to share what he understood in the process we call enlightenment. He understood that the life process is unsatisfactory, which means it can't give us any lasting solutions for anything other than really opening up to impermanence. That was the first insight he had, which sent him onto the path.

The tradition has it that the Buddha, as a young man, grew up in quite privileged circumstances. It is said that for quite a long time he wasn't aware of impermanence because he had so much access to all kinds of entertainments—beautiful people, beautiful clothes, good food, everything—so he wasn't really aware that there is actually a lot of uncertainty in this life.

At one point he became tired of those different sense pleasures and wanted to know more about life. The story has it that he was going out with his charioteer into the town. At that outing—it might not have really been a first outing, but it was the first time he became aware of certain aspects he had never really taken in consciously before. Even though he had maybe seen these people, he hadn't really seen them with his heart. He just saw them maybe with his eyes, but he really didn't take it in.

He saw what are called the divine messengers. He saw a sick person, he saw an old person, and he saw a dead person. When he saw them, he suddenly realized that he himself would also be sick, old, and would die. That was just a shocking recognition for him.

At the end of this outing, he also saw what's called a truth seeker—somebody dressed in robes who obviously had dedicated their life to really investigating their own experience and had dedicated their life to getting deeply in touch with reality. He felt very inspired by that sight. That was his entrance into the path.

After that, the story has it that he lost interest in his privileged situation and chose to dedicate his life to trying to find the truth.

This experience of having a body as a human being operates according to laws of nature which we can get to know. We can adapt ourselves to those laws, accept them for what they are, and then work together with those laws of nature. But we can't stop them from happening. This can be a very sobering insight when we really start to notice that this doesn't happen only to other people—it happens also to ourselves.

This is a contemplation which we as monastics are taught to contemplate every day—to every day contemplate the fact that our bodies do age, they get sick, and they're going to die. It's considered that these contemplations, if you really take them deep, give us a sense of urgency for practice.

Our culture and upbringing doesn't encourage us at all in these contemplations. Instead, our culture tries to hide these facts of aging, illness, and death. If you look at how we live, especially here in the West, we try to separate those things out. People who undergo these laws of nature in a big way—those who are very ill or very old—are very difficult to actually see if we don't have them in our own families. This is something we have to really make an effort to consider.

I wanted to speak about this today because I feel that nowadays, we not only have our personal bodies to contemplate, but it's happening in a much bigger way as we become aware of what changes our planet is undergoing right now. A similar process becomes apparent when we hear about climate change, because our planet is also quite sick right now. If we don't pay attention to that, we don't know what's going to happen. As a human race, we have never been in such a situation. We have been on this planet for about 250,000 years now, and it has never been this way.

I think it's very important nowadays to extrapolate these reflections about old age, sickness, and death in relation to our personal bodies and extend them to the planet as well. We need to take the teachings of the Buddha further and see our personal suffering and the ways we cope with it in a much larger context.

When the Buddha was walking the planet about 2,500 years ago, the situation was very different. Climate change definitely was not an issue. People were under the impression that this planet and its resources—the air, the water—were all limitless because there were so few people living on the planet, perhaps a fifth or even less than today. So that wasn't an issue the Buddha addressed directly.

The Buddha did speak about world systems arising and ceasing, but he didn't speak about it in terms of an experience you could have within your own lifetime, because those changes happen on such a big scale that we can't really witness them directly. But because modern science has developed many different tools that allow us to look into the past and future, to go into the depths, we have extended our sense organs in such a way that we can actually witness some of those changes now.

One result of this is that we know this climate change taking place now is heading in a direction that is very disconcerting when we think about future generations and our responsibility to them. We need to find ways to translate this information into action. I think quite a few people know about these facts—I'm one of those people and I've read quite a lot about it—but I also came here with someone driving me in a car, and I'm going to go back the same way because I wouldn't even know how to get back otherwise. The systems are not in place.

The question is: How can we as a society translate information into action? The teaching of the Buddha offers a whole array of skillful means for how we can translate information—for example, about old age, sickness, and death, about impermanence—and let it really sink into our being so that our actions are informed by that information. There seems to be a disconnect.

There are many books and websites where you can see the warming and the predictions for the future: that if we don't make some real big changes around 2030, we will have reached a degree of warming where very dangerous feedback loops could kick in, which would then be basically unstoppable. But if we were to really start changing our ways now, we actually could contain the warming at manageable levels. Yet somehow, as a society, we are not able to organize ourselves accordingly.

I'm not thinking that I'm good at this either. I'm just trying to reflect on the fact that we have so much information because science is so advanced, but somehow we lack the connection between the heart and the information. Those channels are so clogged up with conditioning that we can't really bring it home in a way that allows us to live accordingly.

This is exactly what the Buddha was saying 2,500 years ago. We see all of these things going on, but we live as if they weren't happening. What's going on here, really? Why are we like that? Including myself, of course.

Somehow, we are not really aware that we are all part of this planet Earth. We live on it as if it were just some kind of environment where we can take what we want and dump what we don't need, assuming it will be cleaned up by somebody else. But who is that somebody?

I find it very interesting to reflect on this work...

The word ecology is fascinating—its first part, "eco," comes from the Greek word "oikos," which means house or home. So ecology literally means to study one's home. The word economy shares the same root, meaning to look after one's home, to care for one's house. I looked this up on Wikipedia, and discovered that the word economy was first used in the 14th century in a book about monastery administration—how to care for the monastic home in the best possible way so residents could live a healthy life and leave behind a dwelling that future inhabitants could also enjoy.

Yet somehow we're not living this way. We inhabit the Earth like careless teenagers who don't think about tomorrow, trusting that parents will clean up after them. These young people haven't yet made the connection between where food comes from and how difficult it is to maintain a household. They're simply mindless. And this is exactly how we live—because we don't see our lives within the bigger context, we haven't truly understood our situation. If we had, we would live differently.

It's illuminating to contrast "ego"—the limited self that doesn't understand the larger context—with "eco," the bigger self, the broader perspective. If we could see ourselves and our lives within this expanded context, we could step out of identification with our personal likes and dislikes and embrace a more encompassing view of existence.

This is what the dharma wants to open us up to. The teaching points us toward the dissonance we experience in life. But in our consumerist culture, we're conditioned to always move to the next thing, and the next, and the next. We never turn toward the dissonance because we haven't been trained to do so. The Buddha's teaching offers various means to turn toward difficulty, trusting that the healing direction lies within the suffering itself. Only by facing our pain can we break through the delusion of our conditioning, the identification with our thinking about how things are. The doorway to freedom is suffering itself.

Philip Moffat writes about this in his book "Dancing with Life," where he explores the Four Noble Truths—the essence of Buddha's teaching. The First Noble Truth acknowledges that there is suffering, dissonance, unsatisfactoriness in life. The healing lies in turning toward it rather than away from it. Modern consumerist culture excels at turning toward the next thing, but it's poor at facing dissonance. Now the planet is sternly telling us we must wean ourselves from dependence on endless consumption because we simply don't have the resources. We're living far beyond our means.

I've read that American culture lives as if we had six planets' worth of resources to exploit, but we have only one—and it's on its last legs in terms of sustaining human life. The Earth will continue, of course, but we won't be part of it. We're taking many other species down with us.

I don't say this to assign blame, because we've only been aware of this crisis as a society for about thirty years. We're slow learners, and it takes time to translate information into action. But circumstances are becoming increasingly urgent. If we don't change our ways dramatically by 2020, we face the possibility of severe changes that will make it extremely difficult for humans to remain here—shortages of food, water, clean air, fertile soil, widespread illness, climate refugees, and resource scarcity. We're looking toward an extremely turbulent future.

Some difficulties are inherent in human existence—old age, sickness, and death. We can't do anything about these; they're simply part of the human experience, and they have their own beauty. Like flowers that bloom, reach their peak beauty, return to earth, and bloom again, the human body follows this natural cycle with tremendous built-in intelligence that can leave the human mind speechless.

But other forms of suffering—like how we live on the planet—represent choices. We can live differently. This kind of suffering isn't inherent in human existence; it's the result of ignorance. Here we can take action, because we don't need to live as we currently do.

It's not needed to live in this kind of way, really squandering the resources as we do. I've brought a quote from a Christian priest named Thomas Berry, who died perhaps twenty years ago. I found a very powerful, very short quote from him. He says, "The universe itself is the primary sacred scripture."

To look at the process of the evolution of the universe, which modern science tells us has been going on for over thirteen billion years since the Big Bang - this planet has developed such amazing life forms, and we are one of those. This process has a very mysterious intelligence built into it, moving toward ever greater complexity, ever greater levels of inclusion, and also greater levels of diversity.

As the human race, I think what this means is that greater levels of inclusion and diversity require us to see ourselves not on top of the planet and all the different species that are here. They are not here for our use - it's more like we are just one of them. Meditation is a technology we can use to tear away those veils of delusion that make us believe we are separate from everything else and that we can somehow control this.

Even though there is so much information telling us we cannot - otherwise we wouldn't have created such a mess. We would really be able to control it because I think the intentions were good. But obviously the ignorance was so great we did not know so many things which we thought had no real value. Nowadays we know that if just one kind of insect dies out, a whole process is interrupted. We just didn't know any better.

But now we start to understand that there's so much we cannot fathom with our little minds. So I think it's very important to develop this kind of respect for that which we do not know. It is difficult, but I think the practice is there exactly for that.

One other central insight the Buddha had when he experienced what's called enlightenment was the insight into emptiness. Or in the Pali canon, it's often expressed as not-self or anatta. This means that the way we understand reality when we look at it with our senses - when we touch things or see things or hear things, taste things and so on - this is one way we can interpret experience, but this is not really reality in the ultimate sense.

With our sense organs, we do experience ourselves as separate entities, walking around and doing things. But in reality, this is not the way things are. We are all part of something much bigger than ourselves. This being part of something much bigger than ourselves is a responsibility and at the same time a great privilege, because we sustain ourselves through that.

But in terms of awareness and consciousness, we somehow seem to be like teenagers. If you have had children - I didn't have children, but I have read in psychology books - teenagers want to be independent, they want to do what they like, but at the same time, they want to be taken care of by their parents. This is our level of consciousness in terms of how we live on this planet. We just want to take whatever we like, but we don't want to have any rules to live by. We want to have the best of everything.

Now our parents, so to say - if we want to call the planet our parents - show us the limits and say, "No, stop now. You can't go this way any longer. You have to turn inward and learn to live with dissonance, learn to live with greed and hatred and learn to transform it rather than try to always get your way." This is what maturity is all about - to be able to know what you are feeling and to be able to hold this feeling and not necessarily act on it.

The teachings give us different tools so that we can develop the strength to be with what is, go through it, come out at the other end, and respond in a way that is appropriate to the situation.

Here is a quote from a Norwegian eco-philosopher named Arne Naess: "When we perceive our deeper identity as an ecological self that includes not just us, but also all life on Earth, then acting for the sake of our world doesn't seem like a sacrifice. It seems a natural thing to do."

It is exactly that ability to perceive our deeper identity which we have to train ourselves to develop. We have to really be able to stay long enough with our experience so we can go deeper. The meditation teachings are the skillful means by which we can work on this deepening and on the letting go of identifying with more surface concepts that our culture is bombarding us with all the time, especially the media. The media are just very irresponsible.

It takes a lot of strength to really stay alert. Coming to a sangha like this on a regular basis is a very powerful reminder that we have to help each other to really stay vigilant with this. There's a lot at stake - what is on stake is just immense right now, and it's very difficult to stay conscious of it because wherever you go you are bombarded with messages that point in all different directions, only not in the most important one.

So I hope that you'll be willing to take in the message I try to give.

These messages may not be pleasant to hear, most likely. But I believe they are important. We have a very powerful opportunity for practice now because there's nowhere to run anymore, really. The only escape we have is into awareness, because the planet has become a very small place with over seven billion people. The only place to go is to wake up.

In terms of practice, it's a very good opportunity because there are many delusions we simply can't afford to maintain anymore. So in terms of practice, it's a very powerful time.

I also want to end by saying that we do have all of the skills and all of the knowledge to make the changes that need to be made. The challenge is that the media are not willing to make this known because they are supported by businesses that have enormous investments in the old ways of doing things. They don't support information that would end their dominion over our bank accounts. This is the conundrum of how to support the dissemination of this information.

I think we can all do our part. I certainly try to do that and work to bring this awareness more and more into the teaching evenings we hold in the Bay Area and other places. I'm also working with all of the feelings this brings up within myself and within the sangha, and witnessing the changes that are occurring. A few years ago, people weren't really very interested in hearing this, but now there's more and more capacity and space for people who want to hear it. That's a very good development.

So there are five or ten minutes left. If there are any questions, please ask. Do you have a microphone here?

[Question about Spirit Rock teacher meeting and environmental leadership]

Thank you for that question. Yes, I was at that meeting. This environmental awareness is one of the main themes we're addressing as dharma teachers. We had a presenter who is one of the top advisors on climate change for the Obama administration give a presentation to the teachers. We've formed a group and are having our first conference call on the 17th of this month to develop ways to bring this more into our teaching. We've received very good information presented in a simple way about what's happening.

We're working on having an Earth Care Week in the first week of October, with all the teachers connected to Spirit Rock, IMS, Gaia House in England, and Beatenberg in Switzerland working together on this.

Our little vihara personally attends different rallies on climate change. We were at the rally on June 20th to stop the pipeline, at the Golden Gate Bridge. There's a very big rally organized for August 3rd in Richmond, walking to the Chevron refinery exactly one year after the big explosion. It's a rally demanding the transition from fossil fuels to renewable energy, and I'll be there as well. Please join us. We meet at 10 a.m. at the Richmond BART station on August 3rd—that's a Saturday. You can find all the information online.

You can visit our website—it's all there under what's new, and it's also on the homepage where you can click. We're very happy to meet you there at the rally. It's all non-violent and peaceful, and people are encouraged to bring a sunflower as a weapon with you.

I feel that it's this concern—how we leave this planet for future generations—which brings people from all walks of life together. Because we share this responsibility together, and we have to start somewhere. It's not clear how all of this will unfold, but we don't need to know. Because we are all part of this planet, and we can trust that if we really start to listen collectively to what is needed, we will find a way to do it.

We just have to start. We don't have to know the whole thing. We just need to know the next step—just like life. It's not different from life; it's just part of life.

I want to make a comment more than a question. It's fine to go and protest at a refinery, but I think the reality is that what every person as an individual can do in their life is what's most important. Where does your water come from? Most people don't know. How do you heat your home? Maybe you can make changes. Maybe you can use public transportation more. Maybe you can get a different kind of car. There are so many things—from using our bag to go to the grocery store to how we recycle our garbage. Just so many personal things that we take for granted, and it has to start from us. Of course, we need to reach out to our families and the community, but the us part, the me—we're not doing that.

I think both are important. The systems have to change. We little beings also have to do what we can. But we can only do what the systems support us to do, so we have both. You have to look at what you do, but we also have to collectively act. So it's everything—everybody has to find their own ways to respond, of course. But I think to collectively respond by urging the administrations of our different areas in society, the big changes also have to be implemented. It's all important.

Many times humanity has given up an old world for a new one. You know, 250,000 years ago we were living in caves. Now we don't live in caves anymore—well, just a few people maybe. So we have many times already left behind old ways of doing things. We are good at that. But every time, before you do it, you think, "Ah, this I can't do. It's too much," because we are afraid of what we don't know.

But we have stepped into the not-knowing so many times. When you were giving birth to a child, you didn't know before how it would be, and you did it—somehow it came out. And that's again like this, by just opening to it.

I'd like to end with a beautiful quote by Joanna Macy: "If a hole appears, just walk through it. See what's on the other side. You'll never be lost because this emptiness is central to life, figured into the nature of all things."

The hole is maybe not knowing how to respond. But to just really open up to not knowing how to respond other than taking the next step. Right now you don't know how to respond, and I also don't really know how to respond.

But for example, what you can do right now is keep your heart open to this information, even if it's very uncomfortable. You might feel like you don't want to know, and then go to your car, drive home, eat something, turn on the TV and forget about it. Or you can consciously keep your heart open and go home and perhaps start to read something about this—look up 350.org or Sierra Club or whatever—and maybe join such a site where you get regular information about these things. You just put your toe into the water and go a step further, and go a step further, and do what you can rather than turning away from it.

That's how it starts. And that would be a good thing to do.

CHAPTER 251

Practicing in Times of Big Changes

Rob Burbea · 35 min

> In this profound talk, Rob Burbea addresses how Buddhist practice can support us during times of unprecedented global change, particularly the environmental crisis facing our planet. Drawing on the middle way teaching that "everything is already perfect, but there's a lot of room for improvement," he explores how we can find stability amid uncertainty through developing wisdom (paññā) and equanimity (upekkhā), one of the four brahmavihāras.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that true wisdom is not accumulated knowledge but rather the capacity to be present with experience before conceptual thinking arises - what he describes as "before knowledge" (pra-jñā). He discusses how practice helps us develop tolerance for difficult feelings, which are often the entry point where we can interrupt the cycle of dependent origination (paṭiccasamuppāda) before reactive patterns take hold. Using the metaphor of a caterpillar's transformation into a butterfly, he suggests that practitioners can serve as "imaginary cells" - agents of positive transformation during societal breakdown and renewal.
>
> The talk weaves together personal practice with collective responsibility, showing how inner transformation through meditation naturally supports outer change. Burbea draws on the Buddha's enlightenment story, where Māra's attacks transformed into flowers, illustrating how challenges become the very soil for wisdom and compassion to grow. This teaching offers both practical guidance for working with difficult emotions and a broader vision of how dharma practice can contribute to navigating our current global crises.

Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Samma-Sambuddhassa. Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Samma-Sambuddhassa. Namo Tassa Bhagavato Arahato Samma-Sambuddhassa.

Good morning, and thank you for inviting me to speak here today. This is a very beautiful place, and I was deeply moved by the request you made earlier.

I'd like to begin with a quote from Suzuki Roshi, the founding teacher of your lineage: "Everything is already perfect, but there's a lot of room for improvement." I've always found this to be a profound reflection on what we call in the Theravada school —and I've heard in the Tibetan school as well—the middle way, the middle path between two extremes. On one hand, ultimately everything is already perfect as it is. But conventionally, we often find ourselves unable to connect with that perfection, particularly when we're thrown about by afflictive emotions and when strong energies move through our body and mind. In such moments, it can be quite difficult to connect with the innate perfection of everything just as it is.

Because of the power of these disturbances, I have chosen to live this life in a way that provides strong support to help me hold steady in the midst of challenges—when greed, hatred, and delusion are triggered by different experiences, people, and relationships we encounter in the world. All of this can be included in practice, but remembering this when we are triggered is another matter entirely. We tend to forget that our whole life can be called an opportunity for practice, especially when it would actually be most beneficial to remember it.

In this day and age, I feel there is tremendous uncertainty. Of course, there is always uncertainty, but it has never been so much "in your face" as it is nowadays with the whole issue of climate change. We could reach a tipping point of what this planet can cope with at any moment—we don't know when it's going to happen, but it's something that's very much on the cards and could hit us at any time.

I believe having a strong practice has never been more important than it is right now, because there's really nowhere to go anymore. We can only wake up. That's the only place to go—within rather than without—because in the external world there isn't much space left. So much has been impacted by our greed, hatred, and delusion that the situation is looking quite dire.

Yet even this huge perspective—that we may be wiping ourselves off the planet—can be an opportunity for practice if we have enough wisdom and compassion to open up to it and not see it as something outside of practice. However, I think it's such a massive issue that many people still don't want to hear about it. There's a lot of denial, and much misinformation comes to us through the media. To really sort this out, we need to take a genuine interest in what's happening.

In terms of the elements that come together to produce mind states for us, this isn't very different from other challenges we face. It's just that the magnitude of this particular situation is unprecedented.

Coming together as a group like this today to sit with this truth can be very powerful and empowering, because we are not alone in this—we are all in this together. Once we really take that to heart, I feel a new window of opportunity opens up, because this togetherness, this third refuge of sangha, is a very powerful agent for transformation and support.

Those of you here who have a regular practice are very fortunate in this time, because you have something to fall back on and something that helps make sense of the whole situation. This environmental crisis is something we have been co-creating with nature because we haven't truly understood how nature works. For quite some time, we've been doing things that have produced effects we never intended. Now we seem to be waking up to this reality as a society more and more.

People who have a spiritual practice tend to be quicker in picking things up because there is generally more capacity for sensitivity. You've been meditating for some time and have developed a certain understanding of how the mind works. You're generally less afraid of feeling, and that's a very good beginning, because we can connect to life only through feeling. If we cut ourselves off from feeling, we cut ourselves off from life. This disconnection from feeling is one of the main issues that has brought us to this environmental crisis.

Our culture has become quite cynical about feeling and cynical about the feminine aspect—which is present in all genders—the aspect that is open to feeling and able to hold both chaos and creativity. This aspect has been relegated to second place for hundreds of years because of the direction our evolution has taken. There's nobody to blame; it's simply how things have unfolded.

We are waking up to a time when we very much need this capacity to open to chaos and, in a sense, to admit defeat. We cannot control nature because we are part of nature. But we can get to know her, and we can make friends with her.

A practice like this is a technology for learning how to make friends with the laws of nature. By simply sitting down in the way you're doing and listening—listening to what nature has to say, what she has to tell us about how our minds work and how our bodies work—we gain increasing clarity. This clarity doesn't come from storing up more information or knowledge, but rather from tearing away veils of delusion, releasing certain assumptions we've held about the way things work that have turned out to be utterly misguided.

We have been polluting so much, yet that wasn't our intention. As a human species, we originally simply wanted to flourish and thrive. But somewhere along the way, our methods became disconnected from wisdom, and now we find ourselves needing to reconnect with the deeper intelligence that practice can offer.

We originally intended to create abundance so everyone could share. But instead, we've created a severely polluted planet where resources are concentrated in the hands of very few, while countless people have nothing or very little. Our approach has failed because we operate from ignorance, not paying attention to how things truly work.

Now we face an enormous wake-up call. We've pushed nearly to the limits of what our planet can sustain. We're being forced to change our ways, which is perhaps fortunate—otherwise we might never have transformed.

Holding this reality in mind can serve as a sobering incentive for practice. We must trust that within the depths of our connection to life lies guidance—we need only develop the heart to listen. Someone truly connected to life's guidance is what I would call a wise being. They may have studied extensively, or they may not have. Wisdom isn't accumulated book knowledge or memorized suttas and instructions.

Wisdom is not a body of knowledge but a capacity to be with things as they are without overlaying concepts, allowing ourselves to be informed by the process we call nature without creating barriers. The Sanskrit word prajña illuminates this beautifully. Jña means knowledge, while pra adds a dynamic quality meaning "before." So wisdom literally means "before knowledge"—that moment when we encounter something before the mind begins thinking. This is when wisdom arises, when we're directly present with reality without imposing past stories.

These moments of being with things in their suchness cultivate wisdom. As we accumulate such moments, wisdom permeates our being, becoming part of who we are rather than something stored in the brain. When triggers arise, we don't need to recall that Buddha taught impermanence—we simply know it. This knowing provides less surface for difficulties to impact us. Wisdom makes us fluent and flowing rather than rigid, able to be with reality as it is.

This doesn't make us victims of circumstance. Rather, we recognize ourselves as part of nature, not separate from her. We participate in life's process without falling into extremes—the middle way between "everything is perfect" and "everything is terrible and out to get me." Most of us fluctuate between these poles. Some people, labeled bipolar, experience such extreme swings they can no longer function, but we all carry this tendency to some degree while managing to get by.

Our practice brings the pendulum to ever-smaller swings through insight into how things work. With less rigidity comes less surface to be disturbed. Equilibrium—upekkhā or equanimity—is one of the four brahmavihāras, the divine abidings. It results from wisdom while simultaneously providing ground for wisdom to grow.

When I first heard about the middle way, it captured my attention completely. I felt deeply drawn to this teaching because I'd never considered such an approach. Like most young people, I was attracted to extremes, believing that standing out through extreme positions was admirable. Over the years, this approach becomes exhausting. Eventually, we may feel ready for a less challenging way of living. That's when I became ripe to truly hear and consider this teaching.

when I heard this about the middle way, it sounded so healing to me—that there's a possibility here to have somewhere to observe everything from.

The founder of the lineage I have been trained in, the forest tradition, was a Thai master named Ajahn Chah, who passed away in the 1990s. When people would ask him questions, he would say something to one person and then something completely different to another person. People would wonder, "What kind of teacher is this? He says this to you and this to me. It doesn't make any sense."

He would explain: if somebody goes too far to the right, he would say, go to the left. If somebody goes too far to the left, he would say, go to the right. When people were too much on one side of the extremes, he was simply guiding them back to the middle. This is the ground from which we can observe how life works, and through this observation we can grow in wisdom and compassion. It's not like going up, up, up, but rather going down, down, down into the depths of the process of life, allowing the process to reveal itself to us.

The foremost quality we need to develop for this is the willingness to be with feeling—which is not an easy thing to do. Living these very privileged lives in Western society, with all our conveniences, we are especially susceptible to having little tolerance for difficult feelings. We simply press a button here and press a button there—making it hotter, colder, this and that. We have very low tolerance.

In this time of impending great changes, we need to increase our tolerance for many things we haven't been thinking about much. We have all been schooled in a culture that believes in endless growth, endless improvement, endless "making it all better" and "making it all more." But we have reached a point where it's obvious things won't continue that way.

This is where we can consider ourselves very fortunate to have a practice and teaching that contains all the information we need to strengthen our capacity to be with the way things are and to learn from it. From that equilibrium—this equanimity which results from practice—comes wisdom and compassion that we can bring into our lives and share with others. It's a great privilege to be able to do that.

A precious human life coinciding with meeting a teaching like this is considered very fortunate. We can take solace from that. Whatever is going to happen next, at least we have a framework within which we can hold all of it.

I recently read a beautiful analogy about our situation called the butterfly story, which I'd like to share with you. Initially, a butterfly is a caterpillar. At one point in its existence, that caterpillar starts to overeat—consuming about three hundred times its body weight in a day. It begins to horrendously overconsume. There's some comparison there with our culture as well.

The caterpillar overconsumes until it can't move anymore. It becomes very sluggish and heavy, then hangs itself from a tree or somewhere. The skin starts to harden and becomes what's called a chrysalis. The body of the caterpillar inside the chrysalis begins to dissolve into a soup. For a long time, it wasn't clear how one creature—a caterpillar—could transform into a butterfly.

But scientists discovered that during the lifetime of the caterpillar, there are so-called imaginal cells already built into the caterpillar's system. In the time of crisis, those imaginal cells start to wake up. Through the soup of the dissolved caterpillar, these imaginal cells multiply. At one point, there's a tipping point and the imaginal cells take over. A completely new creature—a butterfly—is formed, and eventually slips out of the chrysalis and flies away.

This is a beautiful analogy for when one worldview is breaking down. There are always some people who are those imaginal cells, coexisting with the old system for some time. At one point, the tipping point sets in, and they start to multiply very quickly and link up with each other. Then the new worldview—the butterfly—is born.

I recently heard that for a tipping point to occur, only seven percent of the population is needed. After that, there's no return. I find this very encouraging—it's not so many people, actually. We could all be those imaginal cells.

With the practice we have, we possess all the tools to strengthen ourselves so we can hold the friction that a change of worldview inevitably brings. We also develop the capacity to truly look at what's happening, because if you don't fully look at it, the change won't be born. Change comes from really seeing what's going on. The change isn't something we have to force—we simply have to take in what's happening, and then change is born out of seeing clearly.

But to see clearly, we have to look, and look long enough. We don't have to force ourselves, but simply see. Notice how quickly we need to do something else after looking at difficult information. Even if action needs to be taken, just notice that impulse.

This is all part of the process—really noticing how we busy ourselves with things that may not be so important. See if there's an element of wanting to distract ourselves because we don't know what to do, and we think that because we don't know what to do, we shouldn't look.

Consider how the Buddha realized enlightenment. There's another beautiful analogy: when the Buddha was sitting under the Bodhi tree on the night of his enlightenment, various personifications of Mara came to him, hurling weapons against him and sending beautiful women and all manner of temptations.

And he just decided to simply sit there and not move. And then all of those assaults, those weapons, they turned into flowers. They turned into blessings because they were the soil for wisdom and compassion to grow out of.

If there's no experience, there's no process. There's no learning. We need those experiences. They are the soil for those flowers to grow. And whatever soil is there, that's what we have to work with. We don't have a choice about saying, "Oh, I want a different experience." We don't have a choice here. But we have total choice to really make the most out of it in terms of practice. This is where we have a choice.

And then, you know, if the internal changes, the external will change as well. And the climate crisis today is just like a reflection of the collective internal. It doesn't look very nice. But if we do our bit, we can contribute to that shift. And that's what I'd like to do, to the best of my abilities. And sometimes I also just go to sleep, but I try to at least be aware of it—that sometimes I just need to turn away from it and rest. That's okay too.

So there's not much time left, but if anybody would like to comment or ask a question, please feel free.

A participant asks about the distinction between emotions and feelings, and requests more explanation about vipassana as feeling being the main way to connect with our inner connection to other beings.

I think generally, how I understand it, feeling is a part of emotion. For example, a feeling arises, and then we're maybe not aware enough, not mindful enough, so we start thinking about it. And then it becomes an emotion. It starts with a feeling, and then we put thinking into it, and then it becomes a whole mix. Or sometimes it can be just thinking something, and then a feeling arises.

So feeling is more basic—there's neutral feeling, pleasant feeling, and unpleasant feeling. Neutral feeling we are mostly not aware of, but we are very aware of unpleasant feeling and pleasant feeling. Emotion is much more than just feeling. So anger, jealousy, infatuation—all of that are emotions, and feeling is just a part of it.

The emotions which are built up around pleasant feeling—we want more of those, isn't it? But what they all have is a quite deluding quality, because if we experience a certain situation or relationship through that veil of emotions, then we don't really experience what's there. It can be very colored, very selective. We pick up certain clues, but we don't see others, and then we just go down that road and maybe complicate our lives.

In terms of what I was saying about prajna, or pañña in the Pali language—it was very surprising for me to hear that pañña or prajna is not a body of knowledge, but the capacity to be with suchness, to be with the way things are. And in any moment, we can be fully with experience as it is without putting something on top of it. We actually are collecting information about the way things truly are.

That's what we do in formal meditation first, but then ideally we bring that into our daily lives. And then, when a certain amount of information is collected, at one point it shifts into an insight. Suddenly you see into the depths of something, or you see the connections of something, and then you have an insight. If that's a really deep insight, it can be what you call satori in Zen—then it becomes something which is a permanent change of the consciousness of that being. There might be certain what we call in Pali language "fetters"—which bind us to the wheel of becoming, of being born in ignorance again and again.

And then if there are certain insights which are very deep, some of those fetters are cut off permanently. And then these kinds of delusions won't be produced any longer. And then there is more capacity to be with the way things are, if some of those delusions fall away permanently.

I don't know if you have observed it in your own life, but what is the most difficult element to be with is very strong feelings. And in what's called the dependent origination...

It's at feeling where that wheel of becoming can be stopped. When feeling becomes grasping, attaching and grasping—this is where, if we wake up to it, we can step out. But if we don't let go, then we become it, and then we'll be born into aging, sickness and death. We're already down the drain.

So it's at feeling where we can step out—at the junction of feeling and attaching. If we can wake up to that moment when the feeling comes... but this is a very fast process. When the feeling arises, when the attaching or the pushing away begins—when that reaction, the very nature of reaction, occurs—if we notice it with mindfulness, there we can step out.

But if we don't step out there, then we are just... we're already becoming it. We're already the angry one who has been saying those things. But if we notice the contraction in the body, the heat coming up, the thoughts—if we notice it in that moment—we can still step out.

This is the precious opportunity that each moment offers us: to wake up at the very point where suffering is born, to step out of the wheel of becoming through the power of mindful awareness. In this stepping out, we find our freedom.

CHAPTER 252

The Dhamma of Global Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines global climate change through the lens of core Buddhist teachings, revealing how our fundamental delusions contribute to environmental destruction. Drawing on the Four Noble Truths, he explores how our addiction to sense pleasures (kāma-taṇhā) drives energy-intensive lifestyles that conflict with natural cycles. He discusses how wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) around ownership versus stewardship of Earth's resources stems from the illusion of a separate self (attā), and how this fundamental ignorance (avijjā) prevents us from seeing our deep interconnectedness (paṭiccasamuppāda).
>
> Burbea argues that climate change is not merely a political issue but a moral one requiring inner transformation. He explains how the Buddha's teaching that "all experience is preceded by mind" (from the Dhammapada) applies directly to our environmental crisis - our collective delusion manifests as ecological destruction. The path forward involves cultivating contentment (santuṭṭhi), practicing ethical conduct (sīla) based on non-harming (ahiṃsā), and developing wise view that recognizes our role as stewards rather than owners.
>
> The talk emphasizes how mindfulness practice enables us to see cause and effect (kamma) clearly, transforming our worldview "from me to we." Burbea suggests that addressing climate change requires the same fundamental practice taught by the Buddha: learning to see things as they actually are, which naturally gives rise to compassion and appropriate action for all beings.

How about now? Excellent. Thank you. How's everyone doing tonight? It's an interesting day. Yes. Different. How many people found parts of today challenging? Yeah. Yes. These human relationships. It's so much easier when we're just like this.

So this is the talk now. How many times have you heard yourself ask this, or another student? They'll say, "Why should I pay attention to this? Or what's the reason for paying attention to this?" And the teacher says, "Because it's happening. Because that's what's happening." Have you heard that? It's a very common thing. We're aware of what's present. Why? Because it's what's happening. It's what's presenting itself to us in our life at that moment. It could be anything.

There's one thing that's happening now, and it's not unique to any one of us. It is and will be impacting us for a long time. And that thing that's happening that I'd like to talk about tonight is global climate change.

Just this idea, just to frame the talk: it's the same reason on one level that you would be aware of pain in your knee. Why? Because it's what's happening in it. And in order to have a correct relationship with it, or a helpful relationship with it, it's good to get to know it and to connect with it and learn about it and learn about what our relationship to it might be. So we do that with everything—with a thought, with the sound of a cricket. And so because it's happening, then the practice tells us it would be good to do that with global climate change as well.

So this can be a little bit of an interesting subject, sometimes maybe hard. So I want you to just keep checking in with your bodies. Perhaps notice any reactivity you might have. It's not going to be a doom and gloom talk, so don't worry about that. But it might be good to just stay connected and feel into, "Oh, how am I actually relating to this?"

I'm not going to go into a lot of statistics here—how many feet sea level is going to rise, or how many degrees Celsius the average temperature is going to go up, or by what date will there be no ice in the Arctic, that kind of stuff. That information is out there. It's available. It's easy to find. And if that interests you, you can do that. So this talk isn't going to go down that road.

This is more about beginning to talk about and grapple with this situation that is currently impacting us and will continue to impact us on a greater and greater level far into the future. This is going to keep going. So it's very important to consciously turn towards what's occurring.

The reason that it's important to consciously do it is there's this interesting study that I read about where the study subjects were put into a room and told to fill out some form. That's what they thought they were doing. What they did—there was an air vent and they pumped in smoke through the air vent. When that happened, the people would see that and go, "Wow, something's wrong. We're out of here." They'd go out of the room and they'd go to the researchers and say, "Hey, there's something wrong in that room. Smoke's coming out of the vent." So kind of very natural and appropriate behavior.

Then they would have, so let's say there would be six people...

Then they repeated the experiment with five subjects and one plant—one person who wasn't a real subject but was in on what was going on. They would pump smoke in again, and the plant wouldn't notice it. They would keep filling out their forms. Even as the smoke poured into the room, they would just keep working as if nothing was happening.

They did this many, many times. People would look at the person who wasn't reacting and would keep doing what they were doing. They wouldn't get up and leave until much, much later. There was a really strong impact of that one person carrying on with business as usual. In the face of someone carrying on with business as usual, when people were faced with that, their own natural response to what was difficult went right out the window.

I tell that story because this is actually where we're at with climate change. The smoke is coming through the vents. It's very clear. But there are strong forces—which I'll talk about later—that are carrying on with business as usual. We all get caught up in it. We get frozen. There's not really a national dialogue about it. We're like those other people who see, "Well, someone's not reacting to this. Well, okay."

For that reason alone, it's helpful to consciously turn toward this and start talking about it so we break the freeze. For us as dharma practitioners, this talk is to show how the teachings we've all been studying and practicing can shed light both on how we've gotten to this point and what an appropriate response might be.

Just to be clear: climate change is not a political issue. I'm not sitting up here talking politically from one side or another. Of course, climate change does end up being talked about in politics, but it's not inherently a political thing. It's about the truth of what's happening right now, what's going to happen in the near future, and what is going to happen in fifty or one hundred years.

The biosphere—that layer of life on earth from a few inches down in the soil up to the atmosphere where birds and insects live, very thin, quite thin—is rapidly changing. Faster than it ever has in history. The species that live in this biosphere, and in turn make up part of it, are suffering and dying off. We are currently in the midst of the largest species die-off, or mass extinction, since the dinosaurs died out sixty-five million years ago.

People are suffering, and they will continue to suffer at an exponentially increasing rate as time goes by. This is not a political issue—it's a moral issue. It transcends political, cultural, and religious boundaries because it's happening to the whole planet.

Even though all people will be impacted and will be increasingly impacted by climate change, not everyone will be impacted in the same way. Unfortunately, as with other crises—political turmoil, economic turmoil—people who are most advantaged tend to be more buffered, while people who are more disadvantaged take the brunt of it. It's going to be the same way, at least to some degree, with climate change. People who are more advantaged will have some buffering. The disenfranchised people are going to bear the brunt of it.

But everyone will be impacted. Even people who might be quite buffered from it—it's going to depend on how they work with that gap between themselves and disenfranchised people. If they don't bridge that gap somehow consciously and just stay in their white castle or whatever, they may not be impacted so much on a physical level, at least for some time. But to do that, the level of cutting off one would have to do—they're going to be impacted by that. They're going to have to live with that.

The analogy that came to me was when the Titanic sank. The people in first class were in the lifeboats, and the people in second and third class didn't get to be in the lifeboats. There they were in the lifeboats while the ship was sinking and people were suffering. Yes, they were safe and dry in their lifeboats, but they had to live with the knowledge that maybe they didn't row back. They didn't bridge that gap. They didn't row back for the people. "We're safe over here."

So everyone's going to be impacted. Everyone's going to have to deal with this, even if in slightly different ways. For some it might be more physical. Some people might be dealing with it more on the heart-mind level.

Just to say, that's about as grim as it's going to get in this talk.

Two fundamental questions emerge from this recognition: How do the teachings of the dharma shed light on global climate change? And how can we respond skillfully to such an immense challenge?

One of the first dharma teachings that illuminates our climate crisis is the deeply ingrained habit pattern we have for craving sense pleasures. We are naturally drawn to what feels pleasant and recoil from what feels unpleasant. This fundamental tendency lies at the heart of the Four Noble Truths—particularly the second truth, which identifies the cause of suffering as our desire for sense pleasures. This same craving that creates personal suffering also serves as a root cause of global climate change.

We inhabit a world of constant flux, where conditions perpetually shift between pleasant and unpleasant, comfortable and uncomfortable. Sound emerges and dissolves into silence. Some experiences delight our senses and feel genuinely enjoyable. Others feel disagreeable or painful. This is simply the nature of our existence—the fundamental truth of our world.

Yet we carry within us a profound habit pattern of wanting only what brings pleasure while rejecting what causes discomfort. Here lies the discord—a fundamental misalignment with the way things actually are.

Maintaining this discord requires tremendous energy. Consider holding an object against gravity's natural pull. Initially manageable, this resistance becomes increasingly taxing. You can feel your arms beginning to shake as the effort intensifies. The longer we remain out of alignment with natural forces, the more energy we must expend to sustain our position.

As a species, particularly in Western societies, we have organized our entire civilization around this discord with natural conditions. We maintain this misalignment through massive expenditures of literal energy—burning coal, oil, and gas to power our resistance to what is.

On a warm day when it's eighty-five degrees outside, we create seventy-degree environments indoors. The cooler, drier conditions feel more pleasant, more agreeable to our preferences. We actively manufacture these conditions, and something must power those air conditioners—electricity generated somewhere, somehow. When winter brings temperatures ten degrees below zero, we maintain those same seventy-degree indoor environments. This isn't about promoting discomfort or suggesting we should all suffer in harsh conditions as some path to enlightenment or climate salvation. Rather, I'm illustrating how our fundamental unwillingness to be present with natural conditions requires enormous energetic resources to maintain the gap between what is and what we prefer.

The natural tendency seeks equilibrium. Houses want to reach the outside temperature; left to their own devices, they would simply come into balance with their surroundings.

Consider cities in the desert—vast amounts of energy required to sustain them. The Colorado River, once mighty, no longer reaches the ocean. It runs dry one hundred miles before the sea, so much water pumped out to sustain cities where cities were never meant to be. We prefer sunny and eighty degrees in January to the snow and cold of northern winters, so we move to the desert. Our technology makes this possible, but it still requires enormous energy.

Houses built solely for views rather than thoughtful placement on the land that might capture solar gain from south-facing windows. Repainting interiors simply because we no longer like the color, though no repainting is needed—paint that comes from oil. None of these choices are inherently wrong or bad. But when our society's primary paradigm becomes maximizing the pleasant while minimizing the unpleasant, we consume tremendous energy in the process. This approach runs counter to the truth of how things actually are.

Some say the Buddha was the first environmentalist—not because he carried protest signs or campaigned against drilling, but because he was an activist for seeing things as they truly are. This was his mission: walking from village to village, teaching people to follow practices that would reveal the truth of existence. When we see things as they are, we can live in accord with reality. Living in accord with reality requires far less energy.

The Tibetan teacher Atisha offers this wisdom: "Friends, the things you desire give no more satisfaction than drinking seawater. Therefore, practice contentment." Contentment with the way things are—whether pleasant or unpleasant, we simply say, "Okay."

Practicing contentment naturally lowers our carbon footprint. You won't hear this on the evening news alongside advice about compact fluorescent bulbs, but it's profoundly true: contentment reduces our environmental impact.

This first dharma principle—our addiction, our deeply ingrained habit patterns of craving sense pleasures—forms one of the pillars supporting our climate crisis.

A second principle emerges from sila practice, our ethical conduct. I want to examine this from one particular angle: the notion that human beings can own land, that the earth's gifts can become "ours." This belief contradicts the fundamental truth of how things are. We simply made this up—invented the concept of ownership because it serves our purposes, particularly our desire for sense pleasures.

Everything connects to everything else. All phenomena arise in dependence upon all other phenomena, while simultaneously giving rise to everything else. Given this profound level of complex interdependence, how could we possibly extract something from this web and declare it "mine"?

How can we own this? Another really important question we need to ask ourselves is: given such depth and breadth of interdependence, how could it be possible to harm a certain aspect of this world and in turn not harm ourselves?

Of course, the answer to that question is we can't. At least intellectually, it's not much of a stretch to see that we can't. Yet one of the big reasons we've gotten ourselves into this mess is that this wisdom that knows we can't—it's not always present for us when we're making our decisions about our lives and decisions about the things of the world. It's not right there, fully present and necessarily steering the ship.

Our dominant cultural narrative—and that could be the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Europe to some degree, maybe a little bit less—the cultures that tend to have the largest impact on the resources of the world, but also politically and socially, they tend to ripple out into the world. Our dominant cultural narrative is that each of us deserves everything we want, and anything that gets in the way of that is just wrong.

Americans—we deserve whatever we want, and anything that gets in the way of that is not a good thing.

This reminds me of a quote by David Korten, an economist and author who has written extensively about sustainable economics and community development. He points to this very issue—how our cultural assumptions about deserving and entitlement create the conditions for environmental destruction. When we believe we deserve unlimited access to resources, when we see the natural world as existing primarily to serve our desires, we inevitably create systems that cannot sustain themselves.

The Buddhist understanding of interdependence offers us a radically different way of seeing. When we truly understand that we are not separate from the web of life, that harming the earth is harming ourselves, our relationship to consumption and desire naturally begins to shift. We start to see that what we call "our" desires are actually arising from conditions—cultural conditioning, advertising, social pressure—rather than from some inherent truth about what we need to be happy.

When the stories a society shares are out of tune with its circumstances, they can become self-limiting, even a threat to survival. That is our current situation - stories out of tune with our circumstances, not in alignment with the way things are.

It can be difficult, though, to stay connected to basic truths. Our garbage and waste goes somewhere - it doesn't just disappear. Our electronics require an increasing amount of electricity to run. They have to be manufactured somewhere, in factories powered by electricity produced from fossil fuels. It takes electricity to charge the batteries that run them. This all happens - it doesn't happen magically, disconnected from everything else. Yet it's hard to remember this in the moment.

It's hard to remember that every time we get in our car and drive, we're putting carbon dioxide into the air. Every time we board a plane, we're releasing massive amounts of carbon dioxide into the worst part of the atmosphere. It's hard to remember that the strawberry we eat in January probably traveled two or three thousand miles to reach us. This is simply how we live. In the fast pace of our lives - with families, children, jobs - it's difficult to have these truths be present with us much of the time.

These impacts are also physically invisible, at least in this culture, because we are privileged to have them be invisible. In other cultures, they're not invisible. But until now, at least here, they've been invisible. Though we're starting to feel and see the effects of climate change, aren't we? It's not just theory anymore. It's actually happening. It's becoming visible.

I want to point out one example of this wisdom that recognizes we can't harm one part of this interconnected web without harming ourselves - one way we've actually acted on this understanding wisely. In the nuclear arms race, it was clearly known that in an all-out nuclear confrontation, no side would win. The amount of radiation released would be devastating for everyone. Everyone would suffer terribly. So this was one example where we understood that harming one part of the population or system would harm everything. We knew this, and when we know something clearly, we act on it.

Very consciously, there has not been a major nuclear war for this reason - because of that wisdom. It's self-protecting, but it's still wisdom. It's that clear knowledge present as we make our decisions. We can act appropriately when we have the right information, when it's present for us as we're making decisions.

Our task as human beings and as dharma practitioners is to reflect on the understanding that we're all connected. Not only reflect, but by being mindful of things as they are, as they arise, understand through our own experience that we're all connected. We see how conditional things are. Some of you have experienced this and reported it - "Oh, that thought happened because of this. That thought preceded that emotion." It's like recognizing that things are actually connected, not happening in isolation.

To the degree that we start tuning into this cause and effect - which I'll discuss more - it becomes less possible to harm the environment and therefore ourselves. Again, that very natural morality arises from this understanding. This is a deep and undeniable truth, and it's one of the main insights we begin to open to as we walk this path.

Cause and effect - you could call it karma, though they're not exactly the same, but very similar. This is like this because that is like that. As that changes, it affects this. As this changes, it affects that. When we think and act in accordance with this law of cause and effect, the outcome is one of harmony and peace, because again, we're congruent with how things are.

There's no friction. We're going with the flow. When we think and act in opposition to this law, then the outcome is one of disharmony and much suffering.

Let me give you an example of how we got in accord with this law. Back in the 1960s, it was discovered that DDT—I think it was a pesticide—was extremely harmful to living beings and that human beings would suffer if we kept using it. Once that connection was clearly made, DDT was banned. It's very simple. We see cause and effect clearly, so we stop using it.

Now you might be wondering: aren't we making the connection now between CO2 and temperature rise? Aren't we getting that? The more CO2, the higher the temperature. Aren't we seeing that cause and effect? And aren't we even making the connection between temperature increase and human suffering? Isn't that cause and effect starting to dawn?

Well, yes and no. Remember that study I mentioned where people were ignoring the smoke coming through the vents? There are strong forces at play keeping us from making this cause and effect connection. Some of these forces are outside of us and have to do with the industrial political complex that basically runs the show these days. How much airtime global climate change gets on the news is a very calculated, conscious, controlled thing—not just how much, but what gets reported.

Yet there are forces at play inside of us that can keep us from really clearly seeing the cause and effect truths of global climate change. And it is these internal forces—and how to work with them—that our dharma practice can really effectively address. I'm not saying not to address the outer forces, but in terms of looking at our own lives, looking inward at our own hearts and minds, it's the inner forces that our dharma practice will really illuminate.

I'm going to read you an introduction from a wonderful book by Bob Doppelt called From Me to We. If you're at all interested in climate change, it's excellent:

"Economic breakdown, rising unemployment, and escalating political hostility, coming at a time of intensifying climate upheaval—storms, floods, heat waves, and droughts—have left us all confused and despondent. Everywhere we look, the systems we depend on seem to be collapsing.

"Our first reaction is to blame others for these problems, be they greedy Wall Street bankers, rapacious corporations, or dishonest politicians of either the conservative or liberal persuasion. But here's some news for you: Playing the blame game is merely an ingenious avoidance technique. It allows us to place the focus outside of ourselves and steer clear of having to look at our own contribution to today's troubling situations.

"Don't get me wrong—I know some people and organizations do bad things. But we often project onto others the very things we need to examine in ourselves. The economic, social, and environmental ills we face today are of our own making. They are the outcomes of how we see and respond to the world. Unethical corporations and disreputable politicians might seem to cause the most egregious harm, but they are merely taking today's dominant cultural perspectives to the extreme. The challenges our society faces today illuminate the changes each of us needs to make in ourselves."

By the way, he's a dharma practitioner. You can hear some of the dharma wisdom coming through in that.

How does our dharma practice help us to look at ourselves in this way that he's describing? I'm going to read a quote from the Dhammapada, a collection of Buddhist sayings of the Buddha. It's a pithy collection of the most essential teachings, and this is the very first quote of this collection. So you might say it has some weight or importance to it.

This is the Buddha speaking: "All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind. Speak or act with a corrupted mind and suffering follows as the wagon wheel follows the hoof of the ox. All experience is preceded by mind, led by mind, made by mind."

Speak or act with a peaceful mind and happiness follows like a never departing shadow.

But what is a corrupted mind? What is a peaceful mind that the Buddha was speaking to? How do I know what a corrupted mind or a peaceful mind is? How do I know what actually leads to happiness and what actually leads to suffering?

Well, you've been doing it this week. This is how we know. This is how we come to find out in our own experience, not from me or another teacher saying it or something you read in a book. You know for yourselves what actually leads to happiness and what leads to suffering.

Ajahn Chah said, "If you want to understand your own mind, then sit down and look at it." It's that simple. And this is exactly what we're doing here. We're learning to see that we create the world we live in moment by moment.

When I say create, I don't mean like poof—you create the paper. Not so much like that. But if there's a lot of fear in my mind and I'm not aware of it and I'm just really identified with it, I'm living in a fearful world. I'm creating a fearful world in that moment. If there are strong feelings of love and compassion, then the world I live in in that moment is a very loving and compassionate world. That's what they mean by us creating the world, not necessarily physically.

Although we created this retreat center through generosity. Global climate change got created by the mind—it got created by strong greed and sense desire and fear, which I'll talk about in a moment.

This takes us to the last dharma principle I want to discuss. If you dig down to the bottom of why human beings suffer, what we discover is that we mistakenly take ourselves to be solid, unchanging entities that exist separately from everything else. This is what the Buddha said. This is a deep ignorance, called a root defilement.

If we look closely—and that's what we're here for, that's what we're learning to do here, what you've been doing all week—to connect with and look at our experience and understand our experience. If we look closely, we can see that to the degree our thoughts and actions revolve around what I want, what's good for me, what would be most pleasurable for me, and conversely, what I don't want—to the degree that this is the predominant paradigm in our mind running the show—is to the degree that we don't see or understand how we live impacts all of life, that we're deeply connected.

Why? Because we're not looking. I can't see that I'm connected to you if I'm so involved with me. It's not rocket science. If we're so involved with ourselves, we're not going to know, we're not going to understand that we're connected.

This intense focus on self and this belief in this separate self also supports tremendous fear that I won't get what I want or what I need. So a strong sense of a separate self and fear—they're bound together, inseparable. The more our world revolves around a solid, separate sense of self, the more afraid we are. And then the more we consume and try to manipulate our environment to quell that fear.

We're basically acting out of fear. It is this consumption and manipulation of our environment in reaction to being afraid that we won't get what we want and need—which itself stems from this mistaken view that we're separate—that is at the core of why humanity has gotten to this point. Not just in climate change, but in all sorts of difficulties that we're having. When you dig down and ask why, that's the core reason. And it's at the core of why global climate change is happening.

This is by Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, a wonderful, beautiful being, Tibetan master from the last century: "One sees that all human suffering results from one's own and others' fundamental ignorance which misconstrues the infinite display of illusory appearances as being composed of separate permanently existing entities."

Remember right view? Well, this is wrong view—this view of separate self. This wrong view is a self-centered view of the world and not seeing clearly how we create our own suffering.

But when we connect through training our hearts and minds to connect, to be present, by connecting with our own experience, then we can come to know: How does it actually feel to focus so much on ourselves? By spending our resources of time, attention, creativity, money, so as to just make ourselves more comfortable, have more pleasant experiences, and keep away unpleasant experiences?

What is that actual experience like? We want to look and see—for ourselves, each of us. You'll see what you see, but when I look, for me, if I get caught in that self-centered approach, or when I do get caught in it, it feels isolating, deadening, cut off, not connected to life.

And then we want to look and see: How does it actually feel to share our time, energy, money, and other resources with others—basically what Spring was talking about? How does it feel when we're generous? We want to look and see. It feels good. It feels right. It feels enlivening, connecting, open. We love that, even when we're not used to it.

One real simple example that I've noticed, and other people have mentioned too, is very simple. Maybe after a significant weather event like a blizzard or a hurricane, let's say there's your neighbor that you just really never talk to. It's not that you're avoiding them, but whatever—you don't really communicate much. But maybe after the blizzard or the hurricane, you go over and you ask them, "Are you okay? You need anything? Electricity's out. I have a generator and a freezer. If you want to keep your food over there, please bring it over." We feel ourselves open and be generous with our resources. It feels so lovely to do that.

What something like a big weather event does is take us out of our little world. And in a way, it tells us it's okay to do that now. It's okay to reach out now. This is kind of what's called for now. It gives us permission. And we jump on it because we love it.

So based on all of this, how can we respond to global climate change? What would be an appropriate response? This response needs to include a change in worldview from each individual thinking only for themselves to one where we're all in it together. And as Bob wrote in his book, From Me to We—such a great title.

This is supported by neuroscience that tells us we're wired to cooperate. That's how we're actually put together. And also evolutionary science that says, yes, we went through a time—a natural evolutionary time—where it was kind of survival as a species, every person or maybe every small band for themselves. We needed to do that to survive. It was appropriate then, 10,000 years ago. But that time has passed. We are evolutionarily in a different time, where what's appropriate now is to be mutually supportive and cooperative.

Listen to what Joanna Macy has to say about this change in worldview in her book Active Hope:

"What inspires people to embark on projects or support campaigns that are not of immediate personal benefit? At the core of our consciousness is a wellspring of caring and compassion. This aspect of ourselves, which we might think of as our connected self, can be nurtured and developed. We can deepen our sense of belonging in the world. Like trees extending their root systems, we can grow into connection, thus allowing ourselves to draw from a deeper pool of strength, accessing the courage and intelligence that we so greatly need right now.

This dimension of the great turning arises from shifts taking place in our hearts and minds and our views of reality. It involves insights and practices that resonate with venerable spiritual traditions while in alignment with revolutionary new understandings from science."

It's not that we don't have a wellspring of caring and compassion. You do. We all do. That isn't the problem. The problem is that these minds that we are constantly creating the world with, moment by moment, are often deluded and not seeing things as they actually are. From not seeing cause and effect, to not seeing the incredible interdependence of things, to believing in a solid separate self, we project this mistaken reality onto life and then live life as though it were real. And we make decisions individually and collectively based on that.

This is Nyosho Kempo Rinpoche, a Tibetan teacher:

We live in illusion and the appearance of things. There is a reality. We are that reality. When we understand this, we see that we are nothing. And being nothing, we see that we are everything. That is all.

So the result of this delusion in the human heart and mind is widespread feelings of fear, isolation and disconnection from life. The result in the outer world is simply a manifestation of this collective, deluded and fearful inner world.

I want to suggest that a very appropriate way—the appropriate way—to address global climate change is to look at the root issues of why we do what we do. Understand it, each of us, for ourselves.

If we can summon up the courage to look closely at our hearts and minds and see for ourselves how the mind gets fooled into thinking things are a certain way, how we mistakenly create our own and others' suffering, then not only will we begin to mitigate the causes and therefore the effects of global climate change, but we will spontaneously open to that wellspring of caring and compassion that Joanna Macy spoke of. We'll open to a level of energy and creativity that has not been known to us. And although when we feel that, we'll know it was already there.

We'll begin to get in touch with the depth of our natural love and compassion for all of life. And the mind's natural radiance that maybe we touched into this morning a little bit in the meditation—the mind's natural radiance that shines the light on the truth of suffering and its causes and on the truth of happiness and its causes—that will dawn. It will begin to be clear to us.

If you think about it, if there ever were a more perfect situation for Dharma practice than global climate change, I don't know what it would be. It's actually a great situation to practice with. It's demanding us to engage in Dharma practice, to see things as they are. It's screaming for us to do that. And if we do, we can completely turn this impending human tragedy into a vehicle for awakening of the human heart and mind. Because it's such an intense thing, that the power of that intensity can be transformed into power of awakening. That's what Joanna Macy is talking about in her book.

And it all starts by learning to be present with ourselves and just what is in the moment. It all starts with that and it actually all ends with that.

I want to end with a quote that speaks to this wonderful transformation that can happen from taking something that's difficult and having it be this jewel for awakening. It's by Jennifer Wellwood, and the title of the poem is "Unconditional."

Willing to discover, willing to experience aloneness,
I discover connection everywhere.
Turning to face my fear,
I meet the warrior who lives within.
Opening to my loss,

I gain the embrace of the universe.
Surrendering into emptiness,
I find fullness without end.
Each condition I flee from pursues me.
Each condition I welcome transforms me and becomes itself transformed into its radiant jewel-like essence.
I bow to the one who has made it so,
who has crafted this master game.
To play it is purest delight.
To honor its form, true devotion.

So through the training of our hearts and minds to connect ever more deeply with life, may we turn global climate change into its radiant, jewel-like essence.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 253

Earth As Witness: International Dharma Teachers' Statement on Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 1h04

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea shares "Earth As Witness," a collaborative statement signed by 170 international Buddhist teachers addressing the climate crisis through the lens of Buddhist wisdom. Drawing from core teachings on dukkha (suffering), the three roots of unwholesome action (lobha, dosa, moha - greed, hatred, delusion), and the Noble Eightfold Path, this presentation demonstrates how climate change represents perhaps humanity's greatest dharma teaching about the consequences of unchecked craving and delusion.
>
> Burbea, working alongside sustainability expert Bob Doppelt, explores how the Buddha's teachings on interconnectedness and dependent origination (paticcasamuppada) reveal our intimate connection with Earth's climate systems through each breath we take. The talk examines how our consumer culture reflects the three poisons that create suffering, and offers a dharma-based pathway forward through wisdom (paññā), ethical conduct (sila), and mindfulness (sati).
>
> The presentation includes practical guidance for reducing personal carbon footprints while emphasizing the need for collective action and systemic change. This talk bridges contemplative practice with engaged Buddhism, showing how mindfulness and loving-kindness (metta) can inspire the consciousness shift needed to address our planetary crisis. Essential listening for practitioners seeking to understand their spiritual responsibility in the face of climate change.

Thank you. So as I said a few moments ago, this is Bob Doppelt. One thing I didn't mention in my introduction about his beautiful work with sustainability and climate change is that he wrote a book I have found to be a great piece of work called From Me to We: The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life.

What Bob did was take some dharma principles—five dharma principles that he feels are the key ones to shift our consciousness if we're going to have a meaningful response to what's lying ahead with climate change—and use it as an opportunity to wake up. He presented this in non-jargon language, and it's a beautiful book that Bill McKibben praises highly, along with many other people. As I said, for years Bob has been a practitioner, and in the last two decades he's been mainly focusing on sustainability and making this a better planet.

When I saw him earlier this year, I said, "Gee, it's so wonderful that your dharma world and your sustainability world have come together." He looked me in the eye and said, "James, the dharma holds the key if this is going to be a meaningful and fruitful shift." That's when I said, "I want all the teachers in our community to hear that right from you." And he's done a beautiful job with that, so it's nice to have you back here, Bob.

Well, thank you. It's nice to be back here with all of you. This is very similar to climate change, where all sorts of things go wrong and you really don't know what's happening or what the outcome is going to be. All we know is something's not working right.

My name is Bob Doppelt. I direct the Resource Innovation Group, a nonprofit affiliated with Willamette University in Oregon, where I'm on faculty part-time. Before that, I was at the University of Oregon for ten years directing an organization called the Climate Leadership Initiative. We have one foot in academia and one foot out, and we've been working on climate change issues around the country for about fifteen years. This has led me to a number of conclusions about where we are and the kind of steps we need to take to really begin to address this issue, and I want to share some of that today.

It led me on a long path back to connecting with James. James and I met twenty-eight years ago at a retreat—a couple of retreats—and reconnected as a result of the book I had published and some other things.

But the first thing I want to do is ask you all to tell me or tell each other: How is it that you are part of the Earth's climate? How are you part of the Earth's climate?

"It's simple enough that I breathe."

You breathe. Thank you. I breathe in oxygen and I exhale carbon dioxide. Right on target.

"I use up resources of the planet, whether it's water or any of the resources."

"I'm a proud driver of a Prius, and so I think that I thereby help the planet a little bit."

So let me rephrase the question then, because this was a trick question. By driving a Prius, how does that make you part of the climate?

"Well, I don't contribute so much in the way of emissions when I go about my daily activities that involve driving. So I'm not contributing so greatly to the problems of the environment."

So you're not affecting the climate necessarily as much?

Not as much, right. And I'm also a vegetarian, which means that I don't eat meat, which means that I don't contribute to methane being put into the atmosphere and thereby causing a problem with the ozone layer.

Anybody else want to take a shot? My son recently graduated in engineering, and I had him do a calculation for me once. If you take any character in history long enough ago so their breath has swirled all around the atmosphere, every breath that I take, every single breath I take, has approximately—we may be off by an order of magnitude—something like half a million molecules that every person in history ever breathed. There you go. And in several hundred years, if there are people still to breathe, the same will be true of my breaths.

I saw one other hand here. Well, I'm aware that we are lit mostly by the use of oil or gas producing the energy that lights our buildings.

The answer to that question is all of the above. But the first answer was really central to the question that I asked: how are you part of the climate? When you sit and meditate and you follow your breath, every time you're breathing in, you're breathing in what?

Oxygen. How many of you know where the oxygen was produced? Where is the oxygen that you're breathing right now that allows your life to exist? Where was that produced?

Plants? Are you sure? Oceans. There you go. About 75% of the oxygen you're breathing right this second that is giving you life was produced through a process called photosynthesis in single-cell green algae in marine environments, estuaries and oceans, and the other 25% roughly in vegetation all around you.

So as you breathe in, in addition to following your breaths and concentrating your mind, what you're also doing is following through on your part, your contribution to the climate system. Complex interactions occurring all around the globe are creating the energy that are allowing you to live right this second.

Then when you breathe out, what happens? We heard it before. You're breathing out CO2, carbon dioxide. What happens to the carbon dioxide that you're breathing out? That's right. So the plants and ocean resources are absorbing that, are sequestering it, and converting it again. That is the natural carbon cycle that has existed on Earth for thousands of years, and we're part of it. Otherwise, we wouldn't be here.

And if you don't believe that the oxygen you're breathing at every moment—produced in these complex processes—is the key to life, I invite everyone to hold your breath for about five minutes.

So we are intimately connected to, we are dependent on, we are part of the climate, part of the Earth's systems in general. But unfortunately, we humans have this fantasy that we are freestanding, independent beings that somehow exist outside of those processes. And that has led to a number of problems. And one of the problems is global climate change. And that's what I want to talk to you about tonight.

For about 10,000 years on Earth, we've had a pretty stable climate. There have been some ups and downs that mostly have to do with when the Earth moves a little bit further away from the sun and then moves a little bit back closer. But the climate has been relatively stable, and it's in that 10,000 years that human civilization developed, that agriculture was able to develop—what we see now took off then.

And that stable period was caused by a relatively stable amount of greenhouse gases that surround the Earth and form a blanket, keeping the Earth warm. By greenhouse gases, I mean a complex mixture of carbon dioxide, nitrous oxide, methane, and a few others. And that mixture has been, from the scientific perspective, between 200 and 280 parts per million—the mixture of those gases and pure oxygen around the atmosphere. And it forms a blanket.

So solar radiation comes in from the sun, comes through that blanket of gases, and hits the Earth's surface. Some of it is then absorbed by plants and other processes. Much of it is actually reflected back out into space. That blanket of gases that surround the Earth trap some of the heat that's being radiated back, and just enough of that heat to keep Earth at just the right temperature to support life. And the rest goes back through that blanket of gases out into the atmosphere, out into space.

That blanket of gases—maintaining between 200 and 280 parts per million—has been precisely the right amount to allow Earth's temperature to stabilize and life to flourish. This delicate balance has sustained our planet for millennia.

But over the last 150 years, we have dramatically altered this equation. We have added greenhouse gases to the atmosphere, pushing concentrations to 400 parts per million—a 40% increase that continues rising rapidly. Consequently, we now have a thicker blanket around the Earth, one that captures more heat, and this is the essence of climate change.

We all exist within a very narrow temperature window. Consider your own body: when your temperature hovers around 98.6 degrees, you feel healthy. But with just a one-degree increase, you begin to feel unwell. At two or three degrees higher, you become quite ill. Should your temperature rise five or six degrees for an extended period, survival itself becomes uncertain.

This same principle applies to all life on Earth, including our planet as a whole. We have already experienced about a 1.6-degree Fahrenheit temperature increase. Without significant changes, we are on a trajectory toward a 6-degree Fahrenheit increase—roughly 4 degrees Celsius—which would essentially spell the end of human civilization as we know it.

When I say we are "on a path," I mean something quite sobering: the warming we witness today results from emissions released into the atmosphere 20, 30, and 40 years ago. The extreme weather events we see occurring with increasing frequency around the world—these are the consequences of greenhouse gases emitted in the 1940s, 50s, and 60s. What we emit today will manifest its impacts 20 to 30 years from now.

We face a very serious problem—one that most of us remain unaware of as we go about our daily activities. Yet we also have an unprecedented opportunity to create meaningful change. We can reduce climate change to manageable levels. While we cannot eliminate it entirely at this point—we have traveled too far down this path—we can still get a handle on it.

Today I want to share one way to do that, and after we explore this together, I will offer you specific suggestions for action—to leave you on a hopeful note.

This can be sobering material. Anyone feeling some anxiety? As the Dharma teaches us, we can only begin to adopt a path toward solutions once we acknowledge the suffering we are experiencing. Understanding what is truly happening becomes essential.

James invited me to speak to the Vipassana Teachers' Council last June about this issue, and a wonderful collaboration has emerged. Teachers around the world have come together to explore how the Dharma can illuminate both the causes of climate change and the path toward solutions. Through tremendous collective effort, this collaboration has produced a statement I would like to share with you.

The full statement spans about three pages. I invite you to listen deeply—perhaps even closing your eyes if you feel comfortable doing so—and let these words enter your being. Rather than analyzing intellectually, notice how this feels in your body, what sensations arise within you. After I read this, we will explore together what emerges in your experience.

This statement, titled "The Earth as Witness," has been signed by 170 Dharma teachers from around the world:

"Today humanity faces an unprecedented crisis of almost unimaginable magnitude. Escalating climate change is altering the global environment so drastically as to force the earth into a new geological age. Unprecedented levels of suffering for all life on earth, including human, will result. Significant reductions in greenhouse gases and other actions will be needed to reduce climate change to manageable levels. But more fundamental changes are also needed, and this is where we can draw guidance from the rich resources of the Buddha's teaching, the Dharma.

"This statement briefly describes core Buddhist insights into the root causes of the climate crisis and suggests ways to minimize its potentially tragic consequences.

"As a starting point, the Dharma states that to formulate meaningful solutions to any problem, we must first acknowledge the truth of our suffering. As shocking and painful as it may be, we must recognize that without swift and dramatic reductions in fossil fuel use and major efforts to increase carbon sequestration, global temperatures will rise close to or beyond 2 degrees Celsius—3.6 degrees Fahrenheit. This increase will lead to injury and death for millions of people worldwide and the extinction of many of Earth's species. Millions more will experience severe trauma and stress that threaten their physical, emotional, and psychological well-being. These stresses will, in turn, trigger social and political unrest.

"In a grave injustice, low-income communities, poor nations, and people systematically subjected to oppression and discrimination—who contributed little to climate change—will initially be harmed the most. Even worse, as frightening as it is, if we fail to make fundamental changes in our energy, manufacturing, transportation, forestry, agriculture, and other systems, along with our consumption patterns, with utmost urgency, in mere decades irreversible climate shifts will occur that undermine the very pillars of human civilization. Only by recognizing these truths can we adopt a meaningful path toward solutions.

"The Dharma teaches us the origin of our suffering. The majority of the world's climate scientists are unequivocal that on the external physical plane, climate change is caused by the historic and ongoing use of fossil fuels and the greenhouse gases they generate when burned. Destructive land management practices such as clearing forests also contribute to reducing nature's capacity to sequester carbon.

"The Dharma informs us, however, that craving, aversion, and delusion within the human mind are the root causes of vast human suffering. Just as these mental factors have throughout history led to the oppression, abuse, and exploitation of indigenous people and others outside the halls of wealth and power, craving, aversion, and delusion are also the root causes of climate change.

"Climate change is perhaps humanity's greatest teacher yet about these mental forces when left unchecked in ourselves and in our institutions, and how they cause harm to other people and the living environment. Led by industrialized nations, the desire for ever more material wealth and power has resulted in the relentless destruction of land and water, excess use of fossil fuels, massive amounts of solid and toxic waste, and other practices that are disrupting the Earth's climate."

However, by acknowledging and addressing these internal mental drivers, we can begin to resolve the external causes of climate change.

The Dharma offers hope by teaching us that it is possible to overcome the detrimental forces of craving, aversion, and delusion. We can use the climate crisis as a catalyst to acknowledge the consequences of our own craving for ever more material wealth and the pursuit of power, and realize we must change our assumptions, attitudes, and behaviors. We can use the climate crisis as a catalyst to educate ourselves about planetary processes so that we understand that the Earth has ecological limits and thresholds that must not be crossed. By learning from our mistaken beliefs and activities, we can create more equitable, compassionate, and mindful societies that generate individual and collective well-being while reducing climate change to manageable levels.

Finally, the Dharma prescribes a pathway of principles and practices we can follow to minimize climate change and the suffering it causes.

The first principle is wisdom. From this point forward in history, we must all acknowledge not only the external causes of climate change, but the internal mental drivers as well and their horrific consequences. To be wise, we must also individually and as a society adopt the firm intention to do whatever is necessary, no matter what the cost, to reduce climate change to manageable levels and over time restabilize the planet's climate.

The second Dharma principle is ethical conduct, which is rooted in the compassionate concern for all living beings in the vast web of life. We need to make a firm moral commitment to adopt ways of living that protect the climate and help restore the Earth's ecosystems and living organisms. In our personal lives, we should recognize the value of contentment and sufficiency and realize that after a certain modest level, additional consumption, material wealth, and power will not bring happiness.

To fulfill our wider moral responsibility, we must join with others, stand up to the vested interests that oppose change, and demand that our economic, social, and political systems and institutions be fundamentally altered so they protect the climate and offer nurturance and support for all of humanity in a just and equitable manner. We must insist that governments and corporations contribute to a stable climate and a healthy environment for all people and cultures worldwide now and in the future. We must further insist that specific scientifically credible global emission reduction targets be set and means adopted to effectively monitor and enforce them.

The third dharma principle, and the one that makes all of the others possible, is mindfulness, or mind control. This offers a way to heighten our awareness of and then to regulate our desires and emotions and the thoughts and behaviors they generate. By continually enhancing our awareness, we can increasingly notice when we are causing harm to others, the climate, or ourselves and strengthen our capacity to rapidly shift gears and think and act constructively.

Mindfulness increases awareness of our own inherent interdependency with other people and the natural environment and of values that enhance human dignity rather than subordinate people, animals, and nature to the craving for more material wealth and power.

As we awaken to the responsibility to follow the path described in the Dharma to help us protect and restore the planet and its inhabitants, we may feel awed by the immensity of the challenge. We should take heart, however, in the power of collective action. Buddhists can join with others in their sanghas, and our sanghas can join hands and hearts with other religious and spiritual traditions, as well as with secular movements focused on promoting change. In this way, we will support each other as we make the necessary shifts in perspectives, lifestyles, and economic and institutional systems required to reduce climate change to manageable levels.

History shows that with concerted, unified, collective efforts, changes that at one time seemed impossible have time and again come to pass. When we come together to celebrate our love for the natural world and all of the beings that inhabit it, and when we take a stand to counter the forces of craving, aversion, and delusion, we reclaim our own inner stability and strength and live closer to the truth, closer to the Dharma. Together, we may seek to ensure that our descendants and fellow species inherit a livable planet. Individually and collectively, we will be honoring the great legacy of the Dharma and fulfill our heart's deepest wish to serve and protect all life.

Would anybody like to share what's going on within you or what went on within you as you heard this? Anybody want to share anything that's happening right now? Anything stand out as you heard it?

As I listened to it, I actually felt more hopeful. I could make a difference. I felt energized. I started thinking through, oh, what could I do? And started reviewing various things that I use and do, and how can I do better?

Anybody else experience anything like that? Anybody else have other reactions?

I thought that it reminded me that one person really can make a difference, but also it sounded very first world to me. And I've seen a lot of people around the world who live for today, and they don't really have the luxury of this type of thought. So I just wonder what you think about that.

It's a very good point. Did you want to say something? Actually, let me respond to that and then talk about some solutions here.

The document actually—what I've just read to you is somewhere between the thirtieth to one hundred thirtieth rendition of the document as it was being written, with thirty or more teachers from all over the world with different perspectives, so it kept changing to reflect all that. One of the pieces of feedback we got in an early document was that it was very Western-focused and wealthy Western-focused, and so it was changed substantially to reflect that. I'm not sure we captured everything, but we also decided we couldn't capture everyone's perspective from all over the world. We could do as best as we can.

But there were two goals in writing this document. The first is to inform all of you—that is to say our sanghas all over the world—about this issue and how the Dharma helps us understand the causes. If there was ever an issue that is a Dharma issue, it is climate change. Yet for many of us, we believe this is not a Dharma issue. It's a political issue. When we walk in here, this is about our own internal process. But in fact, it is our internal processes that have created this external problem. So this is the ultimate Dharma issue. And I'll say if we don't address it through the principles described in the Dharma, we're going to have a very tough time ahead. So one goal is to inspire all of you and all other members of sanghas around the world to engage in solutions.

And there are individual level solutions that can be implemented and can make a big difference. Let me give you one example.

About ten years ago, my wife and I bought a house—not a new house, but an old house, a new place to live. It was not very nicely built, so I spent the first three years on my hands and knees with lots of scars, putting in new insulation and installing new windows and doing all sorts of improvements. We had the energy bills from the people we bought the house from, so we were able to compare our new energy bills with the previous ones. We cut our energy costs—therefore our emissions for the house—by about 40% through that process. Mostly it was because it was an old, leaky house.

But then we thought, that's just not enough. That's a good start, we're glad we did it, we saved some money. So then we looked around and thought about what we're doing personally just out of wanting to have things easy—our craving for comfort—that we really don't need. We did an assessment of the entire house and looked at all the electronic gizmos we had everywhere. We asked, what do we really need? It turns out we needed about a fifth of them.

Then we asked, what of those are on constantly? It turns out we had lights in back rooms that we were only in about once every two weeks—a spare room when somebody came over. So we first recycled or reused all of the electronic items we didn't need, and then we unplugged the rest unless we were using it. We even unplug the toaster now, even though we use it every morning. The hot water heater for tea—everything gets unplugged. We cut our energy use by another 15%. We're down to about 60% of our original usage.

Then we put up a solar electrical system and solar hot water system. Now, we own our house—if you don't own your facility, you may not be able to do that. And we have very good solar access; we bought the house with that in mind. There are no trees in the way, no other buildings blocking the sun. Not everybody can do that. But we put up these solar systems and basically got off the grid. We figured we're going to pay that off in about seven years.

If we can do it—although we have the financial capacity, we owned our home, we had solar access—it just gives you a sense that much of our energy use, at least in this country, in the industrialized nations, is frivolous and wasted. If we can just become aware of that—again, increase our mindfulness of what we're doing and take steps—we will make a big difference.

Just look around Berkeley and San Francisco and Oakland tonight and look at the immense number of lights that are on. How many are really, really necessary?

When I first moved to Oregon in the early seventies to go to grad school, we had a governor named Tom McCall. I don't know if anybody remembers that name, but he was a Republican, and we had a long-term drought. In the Northwest, the power was produced by hydroelectric facilities, so drought means less energy. He knew that we were going to have an energy shortage, so he issued an executive order to all state agencies to turn off all your lights at night. Then he got the Chamber of Commerce in Portland and other major cities to do the same thing.

Our towns went pretty dark at night. And the public loved him. He was revered because he not only had cut energy use, but it was a symbolic act to make it clear. So then the public did the same thing. And what do you know? Lifestyles didn't change. We pretty much went about our business just like normal. But we had now understood—we were more mindful of what we were doing.

And we had no problem with energy use that summer. So we can make these changes—in our own homes, in our sanghas, and in the places we work.

This is one part of what the Teachers Collaborative is trying to motivate you to do: engage in your own homes, in your own lives, in your workplaces. But we also need to realize that systemic change and institutional change are required. You alone aren't going to make the difference, but without your changes, we're not going to get there.

This is because of how our political system works—elected officials follow rather than lead, in our country and in many other democracies. We think they lead, that we're electing leaders, but leaders follow what they perceive people want them to do. Right now, there's a group of people and industries that they're following who are not taking us on the right path. So it's got to be you they follow. That requires you all to engage by modeling it, walking the talk, and then working collaboratively with others.

There is tremendous activity happening behind the scenes that people don't know about. Businesses especially are keeping their heads low. My organization works with many companies—they don't want their names known, but I think this one will: Nike. You all know Nike, the Oregon company. We helped them analyze their entire economic value chain. Where do their raw materials come from? Where are they shipped to be turned into one part of a shoe that goes to the next part, and so on, until they eventually end up on your feet? And what happens after you wear them? Where do they go as waste?

We did this assessment with graduate students—lots of fun. Nike realized they were at great risk from climate impacts and that they were contributing significantly to those impacts. So they've made fundamental changes in their business model, including a commitment to completely get off fossil fuels. A number of other corporations are doing something very similar, but they're keeping quiet. Some won't even talk about it. Others will discuss it, but only privately—they're not putting it on their websites.

This is why I'm optimistic that so much of our energy use and emissions is simply frivolous and wasted. If we become mindful of what we're doing, we can make a difference. Underneath it all, there are many changes happening. If we can get a push over the edge, I think we can make significant progress.

I want to suggest that the Dharma shows us it's absolutely right that first we must acknowledge the suffering that exists and the suffering within ourselves that has caused that external suffering. But the Dharma offers a pathway we can follow simultaneously. If we do follow that path, we have an opportunity to reduce climate change to manageable levels, while also realizing we will see some serious impacts no matter what happens. So we also need to prepare for that.

The second goal of the Teachers Collaborative is to infuse the Dharma—these principles I just read—into the public debate about climate change, with your help and others'. The public and decision makers need to understand the root causes of these problems and the pathway to solutions.

I encourage you to talk about these issues. You can use Dharma language or mainstream language. When you see someone not worrying at all about how they might be contributing to climate change, ask them to take a breath and become aware of their connection with everything—that they don't exist except through these interconnected processes. Those simple steps often help people become much more aware.

Other thoughts or questions at this point?

I'd like to add a couple of things. First, you can see that statement online and sign your name if you want. Go to oneearthsangha.org—"one" either as the number or spelled out. I just wrote an article for the Huffington Post yesterday. The link is there too, or you can Google my name and "Huffington Post." It's called "Inspiration and Joy Amidst Suffering and Loss."

I want to ask you to address something as well. When I read it, I felt a couple of familiar responses. One was, "Oh my goodness, this is really heavy." Another was, "How could the population shift in thinking to the point where we say, 'Yes, we're all on the same team'?"

What I really got from both your presentation at the teachers' conference and your book is a sense of cautious optimism about the possibilities. Your cautious optimism has rubbed off on me a bit. How do we transmit that so it starts to shift consciousness?

Those are both excellent points. Let me address the solar energy question first. The way solar energy works is that during the day, when the sun is shining and your solar panels are producing electricity, that electricity goes directly into your home to power whatever you're using at that moment. When your panels are producing more electricity than you're consuming, that excess gets fed back into the electrical grid. Your electric meter actually runs backwards during those times, giving you credit.

At night or during cloudy periods when your panels aren't producing electricity, you draw power from the grid using those credits you've built up. So yes, technically you are sometimes using electricity that may come from coal-fired power plants. But the net effect is that you're adding clean, renewable energy to the grid during peak sunshine hours when demand is highest, and you're displacing dirty energy sources.

The beautiful thing is that as more and more people install solar panels, we're collectively cleaning up the grid. Each solar installation is like adding another clean energy generator to the system. Over time, as renewable sources grow, the electricity you draw from the grid at night becomes cleaner and cleaner too.

Your second point about your sphere of influence is wonderful and so practical. Thirty family members plus twenty-five tenants—that's fifty-five people you can directly impact! Those programmable thermostats, efficient lighting, water conservation measures—these are exactly the kinds of changes that multiply outward. When people see these practices working and saving money, they adopt them in their own lives and share them with others.

This is how consciousness shifts happen—not through grand gestures, but through these ripple effects of practical changes that make sense to people. One person influences fifty-five people, who each influence their networks, and the change spreads organically. That's the kind of positive momentum we need to build.

I can influence certainly a large body of people, but I would like to hear about the coal aspect of having solar.

I'm not exactly sure what they're talking about. They may have used coal to generate the materials that made the solar system themselves, the actual physical components. Or it could be that it's the backup system. Your solar system isn't producing energy all the time.

"Yeah, I'm still on the grid."

Right, still on the grid. So in the evenings, for example, if your system isn't hydro or some other renewable source—but as we scale that up with more and more renewables, and solar isn't the only one, I think we can find ways to balance out the system. We've seen it in other countries. Germany is actually the largest solar user in all of Europe, and Germany is a lot like Oregon—cloudy and rainy much of the time. Yet they're doing very well. They're even struggling with how the grid can work to absorb that much renewable energy, as we are here in the Pacific Northwest.

So I think these are transition issues for the most part that we'll have to work our way through. Solar isn't like a steady baseload energy system—it doesn't work in the evenings or on cloudy days, and it's not quite as effective in heavy rainstorms. But these are transition issues. We have to just keep at it.

There are a couple of international issues. One is that much of the major pollution around the world is out of the control of either corporate heads like Nike's CEO or democratic governments. Look at Cairo or Tehran or Bangkok or Beijing—the pollution from automobiles is overwhelming, and this isn't something that can be controlled by a government or a movement of people. The other thing is that there are many poor people in the world who want these consumer items from China. So how does that relate to what we can do?

Good questions. I can only say that I've been to two of the UN climate summits, and in both of those, what I see very clearly is that the rest of the world is waiting for the U.S. to act. And not only because of the symbolic nature of it, but because the size of our economy really determines so many things.

If we actually get serious—the president did release the first presidential climate plan ever in July. You might have heard about it. It's a good start, not earth-shattering, but it's the first time a U.S. president has ever done that. If we can actually scale that up by fifty or a hundred percent and then get the U.S. Congress to act as well—which we're not going to get right now but could—we will see other countries act also. We heard that time and again at the climate summits: "If you're not going to do anything, why would we? Our economies are dependent on yours in so many ways."

At the same time, there are negotiations going on now. I think we will start seeing some agreements, just within two or three countries, including the U.S. The U.S. is working with China and a few others. So I think those are going to be smaller-scale agreements.

But the bigger issue—again, I'm not suggesting this is what you're doing at all—is that it's very easy for us to say, "Well, we don't need to do anything because others aren't doing anything." All we can do is control what we can control, which is our own emissions, our own household and family, and then community and organizational and state levels. Once we get that under control, once we realize that that's the power we have, then we have to see if organically—if you will—or because of the interconnected nature of the economies, these things will fall together.

Wait, hold on. There was something a professor at Berkeley, Professor David Roland-Holst, had said. In California, when they were going to limit energy use for big corporations, the corporations were kicking and screaming, saying, "If you try to make us comply with all these energy regulations, we're going to be uncompetitive." When they finally pushed it through anyway, the corporations actually saved a lot of money by implementing all these energy-saving technologies. So maybe the United States can lead the way and show the rest of the world that you can enrich your country by being more energy conscious.

I think that's true. Let me ask you all a question: How many of you really like to make a big change in your behavior? Not many of us, right? So it's a natural response. The first thing you get from any kind of regulation is, "Oh no, don't do that."

You have to change your habits. Some people will lose power. Some people gain power. All those issues are there. So any change, we see that every time business stands up and says the entire economy is going to collapse. It never happens.

That's not to say that some regulations are smart and some are dumb. Of course they are. And we're going to have to learn through the process. We're going to make mistakes. And regulations are not the only tool. But mostly what we're going to find is we're going to become more efficient. We will save more money, and it will spur innovation. That's what you really find. The research shows unequivocally when there is regulation, it spurs more innovation in other ways.

So I don't really worry about it, but we have to go through that dance. That's just the political dance we go through whenever there's regulations proposed.

Let me wrap up so we can get out of here on time. I just want to thank you first for all the work that you're doing and all the impact that you're having in our Dharma community. Just this last week, Bob was working with San Francisco. He was at the city offices today with the San Francisco government, and Oakland as well. He's hitting the whole Bay Area with the Oakland city government today, looking at how cities would deal in a resilient way when things do start getting more and more difficult.

So this guy's working overtime. Sometimes I think that I'm busy, but when I look at his schedule, I hope you're taking care of yourself and finding some balance in there as well. I'm really inspired by everything that you do.

The last thing that just came to my mind is a study that happened quite a while ago—I think Stanford did it—that said what is needed for a shift, a new way of looking at things, is a 7% shift in the population. You don't have to convince everybody. When there's a 7% shift, that seems to be the tipping point, then a new way of thinking becomes more in vogue and accepted. So we can be part of that. It's not like you have to change the whole world. Just in your own commitment, it starts to have its rippling effect. And 7% is not impossible.

Let me just say one quick word about that to summarize. I think this is actually an incredibly exciting time to be alive. We have this scary thing out there that will cause suffering, but it's the suffering that can trigger a new way of being. I think it's an exciting time, and we have tremendous opportunities.

I think mindfulness, being aware of what we're doing and our thoughts and our motivations, is really the key to this. And it's a wonderful opportunity to grow mindfulness in many, many other people. Not everybody has to do it. We just have to get enough. And you're the leaders, along with other Sangha members, to trigger a real fundamental change.

So I encourage you all to stay with it. There will be ups and downs, but stay committed. I think we'll make this.

That was the gist of the article that I wrote—that just like in practice, when you go on a retreat and you go through some really hard times, those difficult moments aren't a mistake. They are the actual initiation, the passageway to a deeper awakening. In the same way, we are having this opportunity now, this awakening of humanity. Suffering is staring us in the face, and suffering shakes us out of our complacency and starts waking us up to a new way of acting and being.

So I do see this, in my bigger perspective moments, as a call to awakening. Thanks for being part of that.

Let's close with a brief loving-kindness meditation. Maybe for a moment feel how much you love this planet and are grateful for the life that you have and that it sustains. Out of that gratitude, connecting with...

your intention to do your part to be as conscious as you can and support its flourishing.

And sending metta to yourself, to all beings in all directions and to this miraculous earth that we live on, live in, live on.

May there be harmony, health, wisdom, love. Peace.

May all beings be happy and free.

And may this planet feel the caring of all who live on it.

The path forward is not always clear, but our commitment to awakening—both personal and collective—can guide us through these challenging times. When we recognize that our individual liberation is intimately connected with the healing of our world, we find the strength and wisdom to act with both urgency and compassion.

This is the dharma calling us home: to remember our interdependence, to cultivate the wisdom that sees through the illusion of separation, and to respond to the suffering of our time with open hearts and skillful action. In doing so, we become part of the great awakening that our world so desperately needs.

CHAPTER 254

Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point

Rob Burbea · 35 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses the challenging intersection of Buddhist practice and environmental crisis. Drawing from recent scientific warnings about climate tipping points and articles by Bhikkhu Bodhi and Joanna Macy, he explores how practitioners can respond to ecological devastation without falling into overwhelm, apathy, or despair.
>
> Burbea examines the Buddhist diagnosis of environmental destruction through the lens of the three root poisons: greed, hatred (arrogance), and delusion (ignorance). He emphasizes how our culture's acceleration of time and focus on immediate gratification obscures the "deep time" perspective needed for wise action. The talk includes a powerful guided exercise where participants imagine speaking from the perspective of beings living 75 years in the future.
>
> Rather than prescribing specific actions, Burbea invites practitioners to hold the climate crisis with loving awareness, recognizing that our caring response arises from compassion while avoiding the extremes of anxious activism and paralyzed despair. He suggests that cultivating consciousness, love, and the capacity to rest in not-knowing may be our most authentic offering to this unprecedented global challenge. The talk beautifully integrates traditional Buddhist wisdom with contemporary environmental awareness.

Perhaps you saw the front page article in last week's San Francisco Chronicle: "Close to Tipping Point of Warming. Only major global effort can halt it, scientists warn."

The article reported that the Earth is reaching a tipping point in climate change that will lead to increasingly rapid and irreversible destruction of the global environment unless its forces are controlled by concerted international action, an international group of scientists warn. Unchecked population growth, the disappearance of critical plant and animal species, the over-exploitation of energy resources, and the rapidly warming climate are all combining to bring mounting pressure on the Earth's environmental health. Scientists from five nations, led by UC Berkeley biologist Anthony Barnofsky, reported their analysis in the journal Nature.

This is both not news and yet when it makes the front page, it's news again. Every so often periodically, we are reminded of the inconvenient truth that things are getting dicey, not to mention the weather patterns that seem to be breaking new records one way or another.

We've talked about this topic in the past, but it's come up again now, both because of the article and also because of the Inquiring Mind issue on "Earth Now." As often the case, the Inquiring Mind issue is very thoughtful, thought-provoking—a deep inquiry into what this means for us as Dharma practitioners and how to respond and incorporate it into our practice. Please take a copy with you. It's not only bad news and depressing; some of it is really inspiring and moving.

What do we do with this? What do we do when we read a front page story saying only major global effort can halt catastrophe? I'm here not to give you the right answer, the right response—this is what you should do or think or act. I'm sharing my own process as we talk, because I've gone through so many different feelings and reactions and responses about this. It's still a work in progress, just as the whole unfolding is.

A couple of years ago, I gave some talks on this topic after reading the book Eaarth by Bill McKibben, which deeply impacted me about where we're headed, what it's going to look like, and what our wisest responses can be. I was kind of on a crusade: "Okay, we've got to do something. And I've got to do something."

Besides giving some talks, I was one of a number of voices at Spirit Rock in the teachers' council saying, "If we're a place of consciousness, we've got to be a leader in consciousness around sustainability and around speaking out about this." I'm happy to say, by the way, that Spirit Rock has evolved into really placing sustainability as a very high priority in our new master plans. We've just started a capital campaign for replacing the community hall—which is trailers—with a community temple that will give us a lot more options and facilities, and teacher and staff quarters that are much needed because they're all twenty-three-year-old trailers. Sustainability is at the highest level, so that's good. That has made a lot of us feel really good.

But as far as whether we're doing enough—if we've got to bring more awareness into our own hearts as well as the community—are we doing enough? So I went through a period like that: "Come on, it's up to us, and particularly what can I do to save the world?"

And then I've gone through periods of real overwhelm that would lead to apathy, that would lead to "Who am I kidding? What can I do? And what's the point? Yeah, I'll do the recycling and I'll do the little things here and there, but this is much bigger than my mind can wrap around."

We go between engagement and acceptance—slash equanimity—or anxiety to apathy and despair and everything in between. Can you relate to those responses?

So I'm not here to preach to you. I'm here to explore with you. And it came up recently again. You know that experience where there's a theme that comes up and then you kind of hear different messages from a lot of different parts in your life? Well, this was happening as I've been exploring this issue. One was a really terrific book that was sent to me by somebody who used to sit with me twenty-five years ago in Oregon, who's taking the Joy course now.

And he said, "I've gotten into this topic and have written a book." His name is Bob Doppelt, and he sent me this book: From Me to We: The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life. He's a systems change expert who wrote about Buddhist principles—though this is a mainstream book, and I'm not sure if he even refers to Buddhist or Buddha in here—but five Dharma principles that he sees as essential for not just personal change but societal change in addressing this. So I got that and started reading and said, "Oh, that's pretty good."

I wrote him, and he was delighted. I said, "If you're ever here in the Bay Area, I want you to come and share." So that came in. And then the Inquiring Mind issue. And then another message, which was having some contact with a few teachers in Europe who are good friends.

Every few years, the teachers have what's called an International Teachers Conference for the Vipassana community. Teachers from Europe and some from even farther away, and the states, East Coast and West Coast, get together and explore the future of the Dharma in our tradition and the vision that we all hold. I said that I'd be part of the planning committee, along with a couple of other friends here, and wanted to involve these two friends from England to be the European representatives of the larger meeting.

They both have a great commitment as far as consciousness around climate change. And they said, "Well, the meetings are wonderful, but each of them independently—I have to really look at when I get on a plane, what's the payoff and what's the price that I pay for using all that energy." They said, "It's something for us all to think about as the future unfolds, how much we're using planes and how much we're teaching locally and at what cost."

I said, "Well, that's fair enough. I really would love to have you here, not only because of your presence, but maybe to lead a conversation around this." We're thinking about maybe doing a webcam for those teachers who don't want to use the transportation and maybe doing a carbon offset. I brought it up to the Spirit Rock teachers at the last teachers' council, and it got people thinking. It's like, "Oh, okay, hadn't been in our consciousness, we've got to start thinking about this." So it's going on the agenda for next year, whether or not these people come: what is our responsibility as far as use of energy and travel in the future?

From all sides, it's up for me. In one of the articles—there were two articles that really struck me that I wanted to share a little bit about and then we can explore together—one was by Bhikkhu Bodhi, who wrote the article "Drawing Back from the Edge of a Cliff." He gives this example of the old Roadrunner cartoons. Remember Roadrunner and Wile E. Coyote would chase the Roadrunner and he'd go off the cliff and there he is spinning his wheels, and then he goes back to the cliff and avoids catastrophe. He says we're kind of like that. We're spinning our wheels off the cliff. Do we wake up in time and draw back, or do we crash?

In his mind, he thinks of the Dharma as helping us to navigate through these dangerous times, first in diagnosing the problem, and then in giving some pragmatic ways to act. As far as diagnosing the problem, probably not hard to see that the problem is the suffering that comes from greed and what he calls arrogance—our ethnocentric view—and ignorance. Just not seeing the consequences of our actions.

He says it's based on the misunderstanding that the key to economic growth is mass consumption. That is a basic fallacious thinking that is propagated by corporations, politicians, and the media. And that in order to make a change, in his opinion, from a dharmic point of view, it requires an immediate response, a long-term pragmatic response, and a systemic response.

I'll just share with you some of his thoughts. The immediate one is we wake up and realize we are destroying the planet, and we stop doing whatever we can. Like the article in the Chronicle says, well, we better stop real fast. And then the long term, just looking for different sources of energy and that the corporations aren't running things. Okay, now that's a pretty big long shot.

The second response requires a long-term pragmatic approach, finding different sources of energy and ensuring that corporations don't run everything. As he acknowledges, that's quite a long shot.

The systemic response calls for nothing less than a change of consciousness—truly seeing that genuine happiness lies somewhere other than in getting our next hit of pleasure. This involves recognizing that fulfillment doesn't come from feeding our cravings, and understanding how our actions have consequences in an interconnected world. As he puts it, this transformation will require a clear, honest understanding of our predicament and ethics grounded in humility, compassion, and global stewardship.

When I read that article, it all made perfect sense. Yet part of me wondered: how could such a transformation actually come about? Good luck with that. Perhaps it happens only when we see there's no turning back—when we're off the cliff, about to fall. It's quite possible.

I've always believed that dukkha is usually what wakes us up, both personally and globally. Perhaps we have to experience enough suffering to finally change. It's so hard to transform our habits. When you think about it in your own practice, even when you know that doing a certain action will lead to regret, you know that mysterious moment where you think, "I know this won't be good in the long run, but it feels so good now. What the heck?"

You know this. Here you are, dharma students trying to be as conscious as possible, and probably you still get deceived from time to time by your own consciousness. So imagine how difficult it is for those who are less aware, or for an entire social psyche to change, unless there are real consequences that are immediately felt.

That's one article. The other piece that really touched me, which I highly recommend, is by Joanna Macy. The title is something like "Woman on the Edge of Time." She's both brilliant and inspiring. I'm sure most of you are familiar with Joanna, who lives right here in Berkeley.

She offers the long-range view, the dharma perspective. She did a three-month self-retreat at her house last year, simply reflecting on these issues—seeking a deeper kind of inquiry. It was a retreat into deep time. Some of her insights were articulated in ways that felt new to me.

One understanding is that our lifestyle masks the perspective of deep time—the perspective that includes the past and all that came before, and the future and all that will unfold. We might grasp this intellectually, but everything in our culture conspires against embracing that long-range view.

I want to share a few of her thoughts that really struck me. In our current life, time becomes an increasingly scarce commodity. Our lives are driven, pressured, and fragmented by hurry. We often blame ourselves for having poor time management skills, but the source of the problem lies in the nature of industrial growth society—specifically, in its technology and market forces.

Searching for efficiency, we develop technologies to increase the speed of every operation and machine, measuring time in ever more minuscule fragments: nanoseconds and fractions of nanoseconds. These speed-induced pressures affect the body, producing many forms of "hurry sickness" and the feeling that things are spinning out of control.

Beyond technology, market forces accelerate time as well. With primacy given to corporate returns, goals are determined and progress measured by how fast profits and market shares increase. Corporations seek not only greater profit every quarter, but also a rising rate of growth. This creates exceedingly short-term thinking, leaving little or no room for reflection or weighing consequences.

In my teaching, I find this theme resonates deeply with young people. Although they enjoy instant communication through electronic devices, they suffer from not having time to finish anything or think through one matter before something else demands attention.

I remember when Sesame Street was just starting when I was young, and I thought, "Wow, the attention span is being narrowed down to two seconds—quite a hit for a young child's brain." And now even that seems long. You see these rapid-fire sequences with fifty images flashing in two seconds. We've forgotten how to think of time in a different way.

We use up everything we can—forests, fisheries, oil, coal—without any thought of what's left for future generations. What we don't consume, we contaminate or destroy: rivers, oceans, topsoil, not to mention cultures. It's strange indeed that we're willing to do this, given the fact that in past eras people labored for generations on cathedrals and sacred cities and irrigation schemes that they didn't expect to see completed in their lifetime. What a different psyche that is.

Yet I've come to believe that this behavior, as distressing as it is, is not because we're evil, but because we're caught up in a mind-destroying acceleration of time. And I also believe that we can begin to free ourselves from this and reclaim our birthright to live in sync with the natural world and in wholesome relation to the past and the future.

She talks about continual connection to the future—continual, while you're living in the present, of course—continual connection to see actions and consequences and to think in terms of what the Native Americans, the Iroquois particularly, would consider: making every decision based on what will be the consequence for the seventh generation from now. There's actually a company that does recycling called Seventh Generation—named for this very principle. What is the consequence of doing this for people and other beings way in the future?

Let me read one more piece, and then I think we'll do a little exercise:

"When fear and despair arise over the state of our world, the deep time perspective helps me look farther down the road and keep on going. There are so many who've gone before and who are coming after. It buoys me to feel linked with them in this ongoing drama, feeling that I can see the work my colleagues and I are doing as giving people an appetite for living with our planet in this fateful time and doing what we can so that the beings of the future can play their part as well. This is my most basic motivation.

Because I think about the future beings so much, there are times when I imagine I hear them. They are right behind my left shoulder and they're telling me not to give up. They're telling me it doesn't matter that I'm not a nuclear physicist or climatologist with expertise and renown. They remind me that what matters is that I'm alive now and they are not, and I can speak for them."

So one exercise that she does—and I thought maybe we could just experiment with this ourselves—is to imagine being a being in the future and looking back at what we would have to say to us, with hopefully as wise and kind a heart as possible.

So I invite you, we'll just experiment with this, to sit up for a moment and close your eyes. Imagine living seventy-five years from now. You can pick the age—you can be a child, a teenager, a young adult, or an adult. First, just hang out with your idea of what life might look like or be like. Just the way it is. This is what life is like now—whether it's something that has some hope or inspiration in your vision or not. There's no right or wrong in this. Just see what comes to you as what somebody seventy-five years from now, what their life might look like—at least the external part, as well as what it feels like inside.

And then, suppose you had a chance to speak to someone today and share any thoughts, any reflections, any questions or words of encouragement to someone today, maybe someone just like you. What would that being want to say?

Now, what I'd like you to do—I've done this exercise myself with Joanna in a slightly different way, but the general idea here is—if you're open to it, get into a triad with two other people and speak from that being who lives seventy-five years from now. You're speaking to two people who are living today and sharing with them what you want them to know or what you want to ask or what you want to say, either for inspiration or for frustration or whatever, and witness each other.

I think we'll take about three minutes each, and I'll ring a bell when it's time. It can be a dyad if it's not evenly divided up. I'd really encourage you to do this. I know you might say, "Oh my goodness, I don't feel like talking to anybody," or "I don't have anything to say." This is kind of showing up for the situation. There's no right or wrong. Let's just see what comes out of you.

So I welcome you to turn to a couple of people near you. You can decide who goes first. The other two are really witnessing—you're witnessing. Ready? First person can go.

So one person speaks at a time. Okay, start finishing up now. You can thank your partners and let's come back together for a few minutes.

First, just notice what's going on for you now inside. And if you can make space enough to hold it all with a very kind, loving awareness, getting in touch with caring inside, held with wisdom.

So we have a few minutes, and I realize that things might get stirred up. Part two, which I thought was next week before I got the dates wrong, is about these different strategies and working with it as practice. I hope you can just hang in there for a couple of weeks.

But anything that came up for you either in that exercise, or as a way that helps you hold in your wisest moments this whole issue?

"I don't know if this is wisdom. It's actually something that bothers me. This is something that I've been thinking about for a while. For myself, I do my best to be as conscientious as possible, and I'm starting to feel this anger towards humanity. And it feels in conflict with my Buddhist practice of compassion. So there's this disdain that's coming up—well, I should feel compassion toward people, but they're so awful, you know, like what we're doing. But then there's this real compassion for the earth, which is suffering. And it's almost like these two things are in conflict: my compassion for the earth and then compassion for people. I've never voiced it out loud, and there's a confusion about how to hold that."

Well, it's understandable to feel anger and outrage because it's coming from caring. So that's the first thing to get in touch with—that's the source. It's a heart that really cares. And I think it's possible to have both anger and frustration on the one hand, and another level of compassion for the ignorance that causes people to act against their own self-interest.

It's like the Buddha saying—everybody he could see wants to be happy and everybody doing exactly the things that cause more suffering. That was 2,600 years ago. Now we've just kind of upped the ante with our modern technology. But it's just ignorance. So it's compassion for the ignorance. Because even the corporate moguls would probably want a better world, a good world for their grandchildren if they could think about it. It's just not connecting the dots.

So there's anger, outrage, caring, and compassion for the confusion behind it all. But you've got to make space for it all. If you say, "Oh no, I shouldn't be feeling that," then you're just working against yourself. So it's just, yes, it's all there, and there's an awareness that can hold it.

As one of the articles talks about, world systems come and go. This is another shift in the Earth's balance. But in one of the other articles that I wanted to share with you, there is—it's just the natural way of things. Even our confusion and our ignorance is part of the natural evolution of things. We're part of that. We just have this image that it's up to us to make it all right. But maybe it's not. Maybe there's something that will come beyond us and after us. But you've got to let go of knowing. That's where the deep time helps so much—you're letting go of figuring out any answers and just allowing yourself to hold it all.

"When this first came up, I pretty immediately go into berating myself and just being like, 'I shouldn't drive or I shouldn't eat tropical fruit or should I get on that plane that I booked a month away?' And then I start coming back to the compassion thing where everything goes and it makes sense and that's why it's the center of the practice—just noticing that that anxiety and that fear of technology or things speeding up isn't productive for myself or my energy or around me or anything. So it's just coming back to seeing that. I think the deep time is really important to just understand that I don't need to solve it or I don't need to feel the guilt, and that it's bigger than that."

I guess it's like you were saying earlier—the difference between apathy and equanimity. If you have compassion for yourself and don't get stuck in that crazy feedback loop where you're just feeling guilty and bad, then you can be aware but not be so swept away by it, moving more toward equanimity. But it's interesting to hear this and to feel it come up, to go through so many things and then come back to just compassion. It's beautiful.

Yes. And the thing is, guilt and fear don't add to the solution. They're just more contraction, putting that energy out into the world. Of course, it's completely understandable and human to feel guilt and fear. It's not that you shouldn't feel them—just like you're not avoiding feeling the anger—but somehow to hold it all in a bigger picture where, oh yes, that's part of being human. And there's something I can do: cultivate a bit more love, a bit more caring, a bit more consciousness. That also is our offering to the world.

Jackie offered another perspective: "I read a long time ago a book by Doris Lessing called Shikasta. She was a follower of G.I. Gurdjieff, but she put his philosophy—which, as I find out more and more about Buddhism, was a Russian interpretation of Buddhism, more or less—into this really long viewpoint. That really helps me when I'm starting to feel discouraged or desperate, or when I'm caught up in how futile my individual efforts seem. I think of that long view, and that each one can do what they can do. If you can keep doing what you can do and have a positive attitude and that hopefulness in the long term, that helps me tremendously."

Yes, and in a couple of weeks I will share both from this book, From Me to We, and also a beautiful piece written by Ernest Callenbach, who wrote Ecotopia. He passed away in April, and I've gotten to be friends with his wife, Christine, who sent me this piece. It was found on his computer after his death—an epistle to the Ecotopians, a visionary letter of how to hold our current situation that really inspired me. One of the essential ingredients he writes about is that the human heart sustains us most through hope—not hope born of fear, but hope arising from possibility. It's so beautiful, and we'll look at that along with From Me to We.

In the meantime, as we close, get in touch with the fact that you care. Remember that it's not up to you to save the world. It's just up to you to perhaps be as conscious and as loving as possible, to have the capacity to hold it all without figuring out any answers—just resting in the not knowing. And that includes not knowing that things might transform into the next visionary possibility. You don't know. Letting go of knowing and just loving.

May we all see through our fear and confusion and hold our lives and our Earth with great kindness and compassion. May all beings come to the end of suffering and express their love well. May you all benefit from our coming here together and sharing the Dharma.

CHAPTER 255

Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point: Concern for the Planet as Dharma Practice

Rob Burbea · 35 min

Rob Burbea addresses the profound challenge of climate change from a Buddhist perspective, exploring how dharma practitioners can respond skillfully to environmental crisis. Drawing on articles by Bhikkhu Bodhi and Joanna Macy, he examines the oscillation between engagement and overwhelm, activism and apathy that many experience when confronting ecological destruction.

Burbea identifies the root causes through a dharmic diagnosis: greed, arrogance, and ignorance driving mass consumption and short-term thinking. He emphasizes how our modern lifestyle masks "deep time" perspective - the awareness of past and future generations that indigenous cultures like the Iroquois embedded in their decision-making through the seven-generation principle.

The talk includes a powerful guided exercise where participants imagine speaking from 75 years in the future to present-day dharma practitioners. Burbea addresses the anger and guilt that naturally arise when witnessing environmental destruction, offering compassion as a way to hold both outrage at harmful actions and understanding of the ignorance behind them. Rather than trying to "save the world," he suggests cultivating consciousness, love, and the capacity to rest in not-knowing while remaining engaged. This approach transforms environmental concern into genuine dharma practice, emphasizing that our caring itself - held with wisdom rather than fear - becomes our offering to the world.

Perhaps you saw the front page article in last week's San Francisco Chronicle: "Close to Tipping Point of Warming." The lead story warned that only major global effort can halt catastrophe, according to scientists. The Earth is reaching a tipping point in climate change that will lead to increasingly rapid and irreversible destruction of the global environment unless its forces are controlled by concerted international action, an international group of scientists warn. Unchecked population growth, the disappearance of critical plant and animal species, the over-exploitation of energy resources, and the rapidly warming climate are all combining to bring mounting pressure on the Earth's environmental health, they say. Scientists from five nations, led by UC Berkeley biologist Anthony Barnofsky, reported their analysis in the journal Nature.

This is both not news and yet when it makes the front page, it's news again. Every so often periodically, we are reminded of the inconvenient truth that things are getting dicey, not to mention whatever the weather patterns are for the day that seem to be breaking new records one way or another.

We've talked about this topic in the past, but it's come up again now, both because of the article and also because of this issue of Inquiring Mind on "Earth Now." As often, the Inquiring Mind issue is very thoughtful, thought-provoking, deep inquiry into what this means for us as Dharma practitioners and how to respond and incorporate it into our practice. Please take a copy with you. It's not only bad news and depressing—some of it is really inspiring and moving.

What do we do with this? What do we do when we read a front page story saying only major global effort can halt catastrophe? I'm here not to give you the right answer, the right response—this is what you should do or think or act. I'm sharing my own process as we talk because I've gone through so many different feelings and reactions and responses about this that it's still a work in progress, just as the whole unfolding is.

A couple of years ago, I gave some talks on this topic after reading the book Eaarth by Bill McKibben, which deeply impacted me about where we're headed, what it's going to look like, and what our wisest responses can be—the possibilities that come out of this. And I was kind of on a crusade. We've got to do something. And I've got to do something. Besides giving some talks, I was one of a number of voices at Spirit Rock in the teachers' council—a few of us, but I was kind of fired up and saying, if we're a place of consciousness, we've got to be a leader in consciousness around sustainability and around speaking out about this.

I'm happy to say, by the way, that Spirit Rock has evolved into really placing sustainability as a very high priority in our new master plans. We've just started a capital campaign for replacing the community hall, which is trailers, with a community temple that will give us a lot more options and facilities, and teacher and staff quarters that are much needed because it's all twenty-three-year-old trailers. Sustainability is at the highest level. That's good. That has made a lot of us feel really good.

But as far as doing enough—if we've got to bring more awareness into our own hearts as well as the community, are we doing enough? So I went through a period like that: come on, it's up to us, and particularly what can I do to play my part to save the world?

And then I've gone through periods of real overwhelm that would lead to apathy. That would lead to, you know, who am I kidding? What can I do? And what's the point? Yeah, I'll do the recycling and I'll do the little things here and there. But this is much bigger than my mind can wrap around.

We go between engagement and acceptance or equanimity, from anxiety to apathy and despair and everything in between. Can you relate to those responses?

So I'm not here to preach to you. I'm here to explore with you. And it came up recently again. You ever have that experience where there's a theme that comes up and then you kind of hear different messages from a lot of different parts in your life? Well, this was happening as I've been exploring this issue. One was a really terrific book that was sent to me by somebody who used to sit with me twenty-five years ago in Oregon, who's taking the Joy course now.

And he sent me this book, From Me to We: The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life. Bob is a systems change expert who wrote about Buddhist principles—though this is a mainstream book and I'm not sure he even refers to Buddha or Buddhism explicitly. But the five dharma principles he identifies are ones he sees as essential not just for personal change, but for societal change in addressing these challenges. I started reading and thought, "This is really good." I wrote to him expressing my appreciation, and he was delighted. I told him if he's ever in the Bay Area, I'd love to have him come and share with our community.

Then came the Inquiring Mind issue. And then another message arrived through some contact with teacher friends in Europe. Every few years, teachers in the Vipassana community hold what's called an International Teachers Conference. Teachers from Europe, some from even farther away, and from the East and West Coasts of the United States gather to explore the future of the dharma in our tradition and the vision we all hold.

I had agreed to be part of the planning committee along with a couple of other friends, and I wanted to involve two friends from England as the European representatives for the larger meeting. They both have a deep commitment to consciousness around climate change. Independently, each of them said, "Well, the meetings are wonderful, but I have to really look at when I get on a plane—what's the payoff and what's the price I pay for using all that energy?" They continued, "It's something for us all to think about as the future unfolds: how much we're using planes, how much we're teaching locally, and at what cost."

I responded, "That's fair enough. I really would love to have you here, not only because of your presence, but maybe to lead a conversation around this." We began thinking about doing a video conference for those teachers who don't want to use the transportation, and maybe arranging carbon offsets. When I brought this up to the Spirit Rock teachers at our last teachers' council, it got people thinking. "Oh, okay, this hadn't been in our consciousness—we need to start thinking about this."

So it's going on the agenda for next year, whether or not these European teachers come: What is our responsibility regarding energy use and travel in the future? From all sides, this question was arising for me.

Among the articles I read, two really struck me, and I want to share a little about them before we explore this together. One was by Bhikkhu Bodhi, titled "Drawing Back from the Edge of a Cliff." He gives the example of the old Roadrunner cartoons—remember how Wile E. Coyote would chase the Roadrunner, run off the cliff, and find himself spinning his wheels in midair before realizing he could go back to the cliff and avoid catastrophe?

Bhikkhu Bodhi suggests we're rather like that—spinning our wheels off the cliff. The question is: Do we wake up in time and draw back, or do we crash? In his view, the dharma can help us navigate through these dangerous times, first by diagnosing the problem, and then by offering pragmatic ways to act.

As for diagnosing the problem, it's probably not hard to see that the suffering comes from greed and what he calls arrogance—our ethnocentric view—and ignorance: simply not seeing the consequences of our actions. This is based on the misunderstanding that the key to economic growth is mass consumption. This is a basic fallacious thinking that's propagated by corporations, politicians, and the media.

To make a change from a dharmic point of view, he believes, requires an immediate response, a long-term pragmatic response, and a systemic response. Let me share some of his thoughts on each.

The immediate response: We wake up and realize we are destroying the planet, and we stop doing whatever harmful things we can stop. As that article in the Chronicle suggests, we'd better stop real fast.

The long-term response involves seeking different sources of energy and ensuring that corporations aren't running everything. Now that's a pretty big long shot.

The second element of the systemic response calls for a fundamental change of consciousness—truly seeing that genuine happiness lies in a different place than getting our next hit of pleasure. This involves recognizing that fulfillment comes not from feeding our cravings, but from understanding how actions have consequences and that we live in an interconnected world. As he says, it will require a clear, honest understanding of the predicament and ethics grounded in humility, compassion, and global stewardship.

When I read that article, it all made perfect sense. And there's a part of me that says, "Yeah, so how could that come about? Good luck." Maybe it comes about when we see there's no turning back—we're off the cliff about to fall. And it's quite possible.

I've always thought that dukkha is usually what wakes us up, both personally and globally. So perhaps we have to go through enough dukkha to change. It's so hard to change habits. When you think about it in your own practice, even when you know that doing a certain action you're going to regret, you know that mysterious moment where you say, "I know this is going to be not so good in the long run, but it feels so good now. What the heck?"

Here you are as dharma students, trying to be as conscious as you can, and probably you get deceived from time to time in your own consciousness. So imagine how hard it is for those not so aware, or for a whole social psyche to change, unless there are real consequences that are immediately felt.

The other article that really touched me and I highly recommend is Joanna Macy's piece called "Woman on the Edge of Time." She's brilliant as well as inspiring. I'm sure most of you are familiar with Joanna, who of course lives right here in Berkeley. She has the long-range view, the dharma perspective.

She did a three-month self-retreat at her house last year, just reflecting on this, inquiring into how to develop a deeper kind of understanding. It was a retreat inquiring into deep time. There were some understandings that were new to me as she articulated them. One is that our lifestyle masks the perspective of deep time—the perspective that includes the past and all that came before, and the future and all that will come about. We might know it intellectually, but everything in our culture conspires against looking at that long-range view.

Time in our current life becomes an increasingly scarce commodity. Our lives are driven, pressured, and fragmented by hurry. We often blame ourselves for having poor time management skills, but the source of the problem is in the nature of the industrial growth society. To be more precise, it is in its technology and its market forces.

Searching for efficiency, we develop technologies to increase the speed of every operation and machine, and start measuring time in ever more minuscule fragments—nanoseconds and fractions of nanoseconds. Speed-induced pressures affect the body, of course, producing many forms of hurry sickness and the feeling that things are out of control.

In addition to technology, market forces are at work in accelerating time. With the primacy given to corporate returns, goals are determined and progress is measured in terms of how fast profits and market shares increase. Corporations seek to show not only a greater profit every quarter, but also a rising rate of growth. This makes for exceedingly short-term thinking. There's little or no room for reflection or weighing consequences.

In my teaching, I find this theme of great interest to young people. Although they enjoy the instant communications through the acceleration of electronic gadgets, they suffer over not having time to finish anything or to think through one thing before something else comes along.

I remember when Sesame Street was just starting out and I was thinking, "Wow, the attention span is narrowed down to two seconds." That's a long hit for a young child's brain. And now that's long by comparison. You see these flashes where there are about fifty pictures in two seconds. We forget how to think of time in a different way.

We use up everything we can—forests, fisheries, oil, coal—without any thought of what's left for future generations. What we don't consume, we contaminate or destroy: rivers, oceans, topsoil, not to mention cultures. It's strange indeed that we're willing to do this given the fact that in past eras people labored for generations on cathedrals and sacred cities and irrigation schemes that they didn't expect to see completed in their lifetime. What a different psyche that is.

Yet I've come to believe that this behavior, as distressing as it is, is not because we're evil, but because we're caught up in a mind-destroying acceleration of time. And I also believe that we can begin to free ourselves from this and reclaim our birthright to live in sync with the natural world and in wholesome relation to the past and the future.

She talks about continual connection to the future—continual, while you're living in the present of course—continual connection to see actions and consequences and to think in terms of how the Native Americans, the Iroquois particularly, would make every decision based on what will be the consequence for the seventh generation from

now. I think that's where one of the companies that does recycling, Seventh Generation, gets its name—from asking, what is the consequence of doing this right for people way in the future, and other beings way in the future?

I'll just read one more piece and then I think we'll do a little exercise:

"When fear and despair arise over the state of our world, the deep time perspective helps me look farther down the road and keep on going. There are so many who've gone before and who are coming after. It buoys me to feel linked with them in this on-going drama, feeling that I can see the work my colleagues and I are doing as giving people an appetite for living with our planet in this fateful time and doing what we can so that the beings of the future can play their part as well. This is my most basic motivation.

Because I think about the future being so much, there are times when I imagine I hear them. They are right behind my left shoulder and they're telling me not to give up. They're telling me it doesn't matter that I'm not a nuclear physicist or climatologist with expertise and renown. They remind me that what matters is that I'm alive now and they are not and I can speak for them."

So one exercise that she does—I thought maybe we could just experiment with this ourselves—is to imagine being a being in the future and looking back, seeing what we would have to say to us, with hopefully as wise and kind a heart as possible.

So I just invite you—we'll just experiment with this—to sit up for a moment and close your eyes.

Imagine living seventy-five years from now. You can pick the age—you can be a child, a teenager, a young adult, or an adult. First, just hang out with your idea of what life might look like or be like. Just the way it is. Oh, this is what life is like now—whether it's something that has some hope or inspiration in your vision or not. There's no right or wrong in this. Just see what comes to you as what somebody seventy-five years from now, what their life might look like—at least the external part, as well as what it feels like inside.

And then, suppose you had a chance to speak to someone today and share any thoughts, any reflections, any questions or words of encouragement to someone today, maybe someone just like you. What would that being want to say?

Now, what I'd like you to do—I've done this exercise myself with Joanna, in a slightly different way, but the general idea here is, if you're open to it, to get into a triad with two other people and speak from that being who lives seventy-five years from now.

You're speaking to two people who are living today and sharing with them what you want them to know or what you want to ask or what you want to say, either for inspiration or for frustration or whatever, and witness each other.

I think we'll take about three minutes each, and I'll ring a bell when it's time. It can be a dyad if it's not evenly divided up. I'd really encourage you to do this. I know you might say, "Oh my goodness, I don't feel like talking to anybody," or "I don't have anything to say." This is kind of showing up for the situation. There's no right or wrong. But let's just see what comes out of you.

So I welcome you to turn to a couple of people near you. You can decide who goes first. The other two are really witnessing—you're witnessing. Ready? First person can go.

Being With the Complexity

First, just notice what's going on for you now inside. And if you can make space enough to hold it all with a very kind, loving awareness, getting in touch with caring inside, held with wisdom.

We have a few minutes, and I realize that things might get stirred up. Part two, which I thought was next week before I got the dates wrong, is about these different strategies and working with it as practice. I hope you can just hang in there for a couple of weeks.

What came up for you either in that exercise, or as a way that helps you hold—in your wisest moments—this whole issue?

"I don't know if this is wisdom. It's actually something that bothers me. This is something that I've been thinking about for a while. For myself, I do my best to be as conscientious as possible. And I'm starting to feel this anger towards humanity. And it feels in conflict with my Buddhist practice of compassion. There's this disdain coming up—like, well, I should feel compassion toward people, but they're so awful, you know, like what we're doing. But then there's this real compassion for the earth, which is suffering. And it's almost like these two things are in conflict: my compassion for the earth and then compassion for people. I've never voiced it out loud. And there's confusion about how to hold that."

Well, it's understandable to feel anger and outrage because it's coming from caring. So that's the first thing to get in touch with—that's the source. It's a heart that really cares.

I think it's possible to have both anger and frustration on the one hand, and another level of compassion for the ignorance that causes people to act against their own self-interest. It's like the Buddha saying everybody he could see wants to be happy and everybody doing exactly the things that cause more suffering. That was 2,600 years ago. Now we've just kind of upped the ante with our modern technology.

But it's just ignorance. So it's compassion for the ignorance. Because even the corporate moguls would probably want a better world, a good world for their grandchildren if they could think about it. It's just like not connecting the dots.

So there's anger, outrage, caring, and compassion for the confusion behind it. But you've got to make space for it all. If you say, "Oh no, I shouldn't be feeling that," then you're just working against yourself. It's just, yep, it's all there, and there's an awareness that can hold it.

As one of the articles talks about, world systems come and go. This is another maybe shift in the Earth's balance. But in one of the other articles that I wanted to share with you, there is—it's just the natural way of things. Even our confusion and our ignorance is part of the natural evolution of things. We're part of that. We just have this image that, oh, it's up to us to make it all right. But maybe it's not. Maybe there's something that will come beyond us and after us.

But you've got to let go of knowing. That's where the deep time helps so much. You're letting go of figuring out any answers and just allowing yourself to hold it all.

Another person shared: "When this first came up, I pretty immediately go into berating myself and just being like, I shouldn't drive or I shouldn't eat tropical fruit or should I get on that plane that I booked a month away? And then I start coming back to the compassion thing where it seems everything goes and it makes sense and that's why it's the center of the practice—just noticing that that anxiety and that fear of technology or things speeding up isn't productive for myself or my energy or around me or anything. So it's just coming back to seeing that. I think the deep time is really important to just understand that I don't need to solve it or I don't need to feel the guilt, and that it's bigger than that."

I guess it's like you were saying earlier—the difference between apathy and equanimity. If you have compassion for yourself and don't get stuck in that crazy feedback loop where you're just feeling guilty and bad, then you can be aware but not be so swept away by it, moving more toward equanimity.

It's interesting to hear this and to feel it come up—to go through so many things and then come back to just compassion. It's beautiful.

Yes. And the thing is, guilt and fear don't add to the solution. They're just more contraction, putting that energy out. Of course, it's completely understandable and human to feel guilt and fear. It's not that you shouldn't feel them, just like you're not suppressing anger. But somehow to hold it in a bigger picture where, oh yes, that's part of being human. And there's something I can do: cultivate a bit more love, a bit more caring, a bit more consciousness. And that also is our offering to the world.

One more comment before we close. Jackie?

I read a long time ago a book by Doris Lessing called Shikasta. She was a follower of G.I. Gurdjieff, who, as I find out more and more about Buddhism, offered a Russian interpretation of Buddhism, more or less. It includes this really long viewpoint, and that helps me a lot when I'm starting to feel discouraged or desperate, when everything feels futile and my individual efforts seem meaningless. I think of that perspective—that each one can do what they can do. If you can keep doing what you can do and have a positive attitude and that hopefulness in the long term, that helps me tremendously.

Great. Thank you.

In a couple of weeks, I'll share both from this book, From Me to We, and also a beautiful piece written by Ernest Callenbach, who wrote Ecotopia and passed away this past April. I've become friends with his wife, Christine. She sent me this—it was printed out, found on his computer after his death. He was this amazing visionary person, and it was a letter, an epistle to the ecotopians—a visionary letter about how to hold our situation that really inspired me.

One of the pieces he writes about is that one of the essential ingredients, one of the things that sustains us most, is hope. Not out of fear, but out of possibility. I wanted to share some of it—it's so beautiful. We'll look at that and the From Me to We material.

In the meantime, as we close, get in touch with the fact that you care. And remember—it's not up to you to save the world. It's just up to you to maybe be as conscious and as loving as possible, and to have the capacity to hold it all without figuring out any answers. Just resting in the not knowing.

And that includes not knowing that things might turn into the next visionary possibility. You don't know. Letting go of knowing and just loving.

May we all see through our fear and confusion and hold our lives and our Earth with great kindness and compassion. May all beings come to the end of suffering and express their love well. May you all benefit from our coming here together and sharing the Dharma.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 256

Seeing the System You Are Part Of

Rob Burbea · 45 min

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines how seeing our interconnectedness with all life is fundamental to addressing our planetary crisis. Drawing from Buddhist teachings on śūnyatā (emptiness) and pratītyasamutpāda (dependent origination), he explores how the illusion of separation drives destructive behaviors. The talk weaves together insights from systems thinking, ecology, and dharma practice, emphasizing the need to shift from 'me to we' consciousness.
>
> Burbea references the work of systems expert Bob Doppelt and visionary Ernest Callenbach, presenting five transformational commitments needed for planetary healing. The first commitment - 'see the systems you are part of' - forms the core teaching, illustrated through scientific understanding of our cellular ecosystem and the interdependent web of life. He guides listeners through contemplative practices to experientially understand our embeddedness in lineages of care, biological systems, and the broader community of life.
>
> This teaching offers both theoretical framework and practical guidance for developing ecological consciousness rooted in fundamental Buddhist insights about the nature of reality and our interconnected existence.

Hi, this is James Barris. I hope you find this talk supports you in your practice. If you'd like to support my teaching, you can use the donate button underneath my picture on Dharma Seed to do that. Your support is greatly appreciated.

First of all, just want to acknowledge it's been a good day for news, at least if you're from Berkeley. Gosh, so now the debates begin, but at least it still might be possible for 30 million people to get health care who need it. The Supreme Court upheld the Health Care Reform Act. You got to really rejoice with every positive step. Not to miss it. Because it's so easy to focus on all the things that are wrong or that seem crazy and insane and the mind goes, where are we headed?

Does your mind ever go down that road? What are we doing to ourselves and to this planet? What are we doing? And will we wake up? And will we wake up in time? As my friend Roger Walsh says, it seems like we're in a race between fear and consciousness. And I believe that in the end, consciousness trumps fear. It's just a matter of—there's a time element here.

That's why I'm calling this series of talks, Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point. Because we, in many people's minds, and I'm sure you've been reading actually recently in the news, we're at a tipping point in our lives, in our evolution and the planet's evolution as far as life on it. And we better wake up soon.

So I wanted to share with you a few things as we continue on with this series. The first is an essay that I found very inspiring that was shared with me. And I know it's not good form to do a lot of reading in a lecture, but I'm going to read a chunk of this essay —not all of it, but a chunk of it because it's articulated in a way much better than I can. It's by Ernest Callenbach, who recently passed away. He passed away in April, April 16th, and he was a professor at Cal and a real visionary who wrote a book called Ecotopia a number of years ago, and Ecotopia Emerging, yeah, was another book.

And he was this amazing visionary who—it's a novel of what the possibilities of humanity might look like if we really woke up. And this was written in the early 70s, I think. Unfortunately, it's still ahead of its time, way ahead of its time. And before he passed away, he wrote what is called an epistle to the ecotopians that was found on his computer after he passed away. It was like his last reflections on where we're heading with a hopeful possibility. And it's just really beautiful. If you Google "Epistle to the Ecotopians" or "epistle" and probably "Callenbach," that'll do it. It's from Tom Dispatch, this blog that's really a progressive visionary blog.

So I'm going to read parts of it that give inspiration as to the possibility.

"To all brothers and sisters who hold the dream in their hearts of a future world in which humans and all other beings live in harmony and mutual support, a world of sustainability, stability, and confidence, a world something like the one I described so long ago in Ecotopia and Ecotopia Emerging.

As I survey my life, which is coming near its end, I want to set down a few thoughts that might be useful to those coming after. It will soon be time for me to give back to Gaia the nutrients that I've used during a long, busy and happy life. I'm not bitter or resentful at the approaching end. I've been one of the extraordinarily lucky ones.

So it behooves me here to gather together some thoughts and attitudes that may prove useful in the dark times we are facing, a century or more of exceedingly difficult times. How will those who survive manage it? What can we teach our friends, our children, our communities? Although we may not be capable of changing history, how can we equip ourselves to survive it? I contemplate these questions in the full consciousness of my own mortality. Being offered an actual number of likely months to live, even though the estimate is uncertain, mightily focuses the mind. On personal things, of course, on loved ones and even loved things, but also on the big picture.

But let us begin with last things first for a change. The analysis will come later for those who wish it."

And then he lays out different qualities that are needed to see through the hard times that lie ahead.

So I wanted to share with you the qualities that he feels will be most important.

One, hope. Children exude hope even under the most terrible conditions, and that must inspire us as our conditions get worse. Hopeful patients recover better. Hopeful test candidates score better. Hopeful builders construct better buildings. Hopeful parents produce secure and resilient children. In groups, an atmosphere of hope is essential to shared successful effort.

"Yes, we can" is not an empty slogan, but a mantra for people who intend to do something together, whether it's rescuing victims of hurricanes, rebuilding flood-damaged buildings on higher ground, helping wounded people through first aid, or inventing new social structures—perhaps one in which only people are persons, not corporations. We cannot know what threats we will face, but ingenuity against adversity is one of our species' built-in resources. We cope, and faith in our coping capacity is perhaps the biggest resource of all.

This is something I have often reflected on and used to motivate myself—to somehow hold a positive vision of the best case scenario. Who knows what that is? But if we throw in the towel and just say, "What's the point? It's hopeless," then what we do is contribute to that despairing energy which finds lots of company in the soup of human consciousness and resonates with others who have that vision.

Of course, we can't be pie in the sky, thinking everything is going to be fine. But along with knowing how difficult the times will probably be, to have a vision—an inspiring vision—what you do is contribute to holding that in the consciousness. That in itself is magnetizing and energizing, and finds others who have that kind of consciousness. Just like in the last election, when there was a groundswell of "Yes, we can"—that was a paradigm shift in feeling of caring and consciousness, the audacity of hope, actually. There's a possibility.

So who knows what's going to happen? But to hold that vision of the best case scenario is something that not only feels good inside, but is also a gift in the larger consciousness. Again, not to live in denial, but to practice what Coleridge called "suspension of disbelief." Instead of thinking, "I know how it's going to end up," we don't know. Nobody knows. We can have an idea of where things might be heading, but all kinds of possibilities are still in the air.

Second, after hope—mutual support, another essential quality. People who do best at basic survival tasks, we know experimentally as well as intuitively, are cooperative, good at teamwork, often altruistic, mindful of the common good. In drastic emergencies like hurricanes or earthquakes, people surprise us by their sacrifice of food, of shelter, even sometimes of life itself. Those who survive social or economic collapse, wars, pandemics, or starvation will be those who manage scarce resources fairly. Hoarders and dominators win only in the short run and end up dead, exiled, or friendless.

So in every way we can, we need to help each other and our children learn to be cooperative rather than competitive, to be helpful rather than hurtful, to look out for the communities of which we are a part and on which we ultimately depend.

Third quality that he sees as essential: practical skills. With the movement into cities of the US population and much of the rest of the world's people, we have had a massive de-skilling in how to do practical tasks. When I was a boy in the country, all of us knew how to build a treehouse or construct a small hut or raise chickens or grow beans or screw pipes together to deliver water. It was a sexist world, of course, so when some of my chums in eighth grade said we wanted to learn "girls'" home skills like making bread or boiling eggs, the teachers were shocked, but we got to do it.

There was widespread competence in fixing things—impossible with most modern contrivances. We all need to learn or relearn how we would keep the rudiments of life going if there were no paid specialists around or means to pay them. Every child should learn elementary carpentry, from layout and sawing to driving nails. Everybody should know how to chop wood safely and build a fire. Everybody should know what to do if dangers appear from fire, flood, electric wires down, and the like. Taking care of each other is one practical step at a time, most of them requiring help from at least one other person. Survival is a team sport.

Next—and there are two more of these—organize. Much of the American ideology, our shared and unusually unspoken assumptions, is hyper-individualistic. We like to imagine that heroes are solitary, have superpowers, glory and violence, and that if our work lives and business lives seem tamer, underneath they are still struggles red in blood and claw. We have sought solitude on the prairies as cowboys, on the range in our dependence on media rather than real people, and even in our cars—armored cabins of solitude. We have an uneasy and doubting attitude about government as if we all reserve the right to be outlaws.

But of course, human society, like ecological webs, is a complex dance of mutual support and restraint. If we're lucky, it operates by laws openly arrived at and approved by the populace. When the group recognizes its group powers, it can limit any distortions that happen. Thinking together is enormously creative.

Looking at this vast perspective, it has enormous survival value. And lastly, we must learn to live with contradiction.

These are dark times. These are bright times. We are implacably making the planet less habitable. Every time a new oil field is discovered, the press cheers—hooray, there's more fuel for the self-destroying machines. We are turning more land into deserts and parking lots. We're wiping out innumerable species that are not only wondrous and beautiful, but might also be useful to us. We're multiplying to the point where our needs and our wastes outweigh the capacities of the biosphere to produce and absorb them.

And yet, despite the bloody headlines and the rocketing military budgets, we are also unbelievably killing fewer of each other proportionately than in earlier centuries. We have mobilized enormous global intelligence and mutual curiosity through the internet and beyond it. We've even evolved, spotily, a global understanding that democracy is better than tyranny, that love and tolerance are better than hate, that hope is better than rage and despair. We're prone, especially in catastrophes, to be astonishingly helpful and cooperative.

We may even have begun to share an understanding that while the dark times may continue for generations, in time new growth and regeneration will begin. In the biological process called succession, a desolate, disturbed area is gradually, by a predictable sequence of returning plants, restored to ecological continuity and durability. When old institutions and habits break down or consume themselves, new experimental shoots begin to appear. And people explore and test and share new and better ways to survive together.

It's never easy or simple, but already we see under the crumbling surface of the conventional world promising developments: new ways of organizing economic activity, like cooperatives, worker-owned companies, nonprofits, trusts; new ways of using low-impact technology to capture solar energy, to sequester carbon dioxide; new ways of building compact, congenial cities that are low in energy use or even self-sufficient, low in waste production, high in recycling of almost everything. A vision of sustainability that sometimes shockingly resembles ecotopia is tremulously coming into existence at the hands of people who've never heard of the book.

Callenbach writes, "When disasters strike and institutions falter, as at the end of empires, it does not mean that the buildings all fall down and everybody dies. Life goes on, and in particular the remaining people fashion new institutions that they hope will better ensure their survival."

So I look to a long-term process of succession, as the biological concept has it, where disturbances kill off an ecosystem, but little by little new plants colonize the devastated area, prepare the soil for larger and more complex plants and other beings who depend on them. Finally the process achieves a flourishing, resilient, complex state—not necessarily what was there before, but durable and richly productive. In a similar way, experiments underway now all over the world are exploring how sustainability can in fact be achieved locally.

I have become less confident of humans' political ability to act on common sense, shared values. Our era has become one of spectacular polarization, with folly multiplying on every hand. That is the way empires crumble—they're taken over by looter elites who sooner or later cause collapse. But then new games become possible.

Humans tend to try to manage things: land, structures, even rivers. We spend enormous amounts of time, energy, and treasure in imposing our will on nature, on pre-existing or inherited structures, dreaming of permanent solutions, monuments to our ambitions and dreams. But in periods of slack, decline, or collapse, our abilities no longer suffice for all this management. We have to let things go.

All things go somewhere. They evolve with or without us into new forms. So as the decades pass, we should try not always to futilely fight these transformations. As the Japanese know, there's much unnoticed beauty in wabi-sabi—the old, the worn, the tumbledown, those things beginning their transformation into something else. We can embrace this process of devolution, embellish it when strength avails, learn to love it.

There is beauty in weathered and unpainted wood, in orchards overgrown, even in abandoned cars being incorporated into the earth. Let us learn, like the Forest Service sometimes does, to put unwise and unneeded roads to bed, help a little in the healing of the natural contours, the revegetation by native plants. Let us embrace decay, for it is the source of all new life and growth.

That is the question and the task—when your mind has a hard time wrapping around it all and making sense of it all, to at some point let go of what you think you know. For me, in the bigger scheme of things, what the Dharma perspective always does is open up to a much larger sense of time rather than this thin slice called now or called this year or this decade. We can see that there is a natural law that we are a part of, and that life finds its own new ways, with or without humanity—but hopefully we can be participating in a new creative possibility.

Given that backdrop I wanted to share as a way that we can hold some vision, I wanted to now start exploring this book I mentioned before the break. It's called From Me to We, with the subtitle "The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life," by Bob Doppelt, who is a systems expert and executive director for the Resource Innovation Group, a sustainability and climate change education, research, and technical assistance organization. It's connected with Willamette University, and he also teaches at the University of Oregon and has written a number of books on sustainable thinking.

But he's an old Dharma friend. He sat with me, oh, twenty-five years ago at Breitenbush. I used to teach there regularly, and he and his partner would come on retreats. He's taking the Joy course now, and he said, "Hey, you might not remember me, but I'm taking this Joy course. I really like it."

He sent me his book, and when it arrived, it was one of those things that sits on your nightstand for a while—you know, thinking, "I really should pick this up and at least honor him by reading a bit of it." I do receive quite a number of books, but the fact that this one was thin certainly helped. And then there was this beautiful piece by Ernest Kallenbach in the Inquiring Mind issue, alongside this book. When I started reading it, I thought, "Oh, this is good. This is really good."

What he does is examine some basic Dharma principles—not new to any of you, probably—but sees them in the context of what would be needed to shift our consciousness, the keys to making that transformation. The not-seeing of these principles is what keeps us bound in ignorance, confusion, and suffering.

When I contemplate the word Dharma, it's often translated as nature or the natural law. Many of the Buddha's teachings were based on observing how things work in nature. He would say, "There are trees and roots of trees. Go sit in nature and see how life works." In that experience of being part of nature and examining the mind and body in that context, you become more connected to the basic principles of life.

What's particularly interesting is that he doesn't use Buddhist jargon in this book—just a brief mention of the Buddha in the preface or introduction. It's written for any mainstream person, yet it's based on Buddha Dharma. These five principles are five Dharma principles, returning to that definition: understanding the natural law, the laws of nature, and applying them to the planet. This is really what deep ecology is about.

It's not just about recycling, doing our part, avoiding further pollution, or shopping locally—though these matter. It's about seeing that the underlying consciousness needed to save us requires a completely different way of bringing practice into this situation. As he says, and as I mentioned in that previous essay, we are right now at a moment of choice, a choice point in our evolution.

His title, "From Me to We," captures the essence of this choice point. We live in a society that, as Ernest Kallenbach observed, glorifies the individual. The shift required is to move away from the erroneous idea that individual focus is where true happiness and fulfillment lie, to see quite the opposite. That individualistic approach is a prescription for doom. The task that all these principles point to is this movement from "me" to "we."

He references Erik Erikson—many of you are probably familiar with his stages of human development. Erikson's theory shows how we start off completely absorbed in "me" and our physiological and emotional needs. In the first year or two, the infant is so me-centered that the whole world is "me." But gradually, from childhood through adolescence and into young adulthood, we begin seeing the importance of connections and love. Moving into greater maturity, there's a movement toward finding fulfillment and happiness through feeling greater connection beyond ourselves. True happiness comes from living a life of contribution—both to those around us through connection and love, and through vision for future generations as well.

This aligns with positive psychology, where authentic happiness, as Martin Seligman describes it, isn't about getting as much as you can as fast as you can. Genuine, deeper, fulfilling happiness comes from discovering your gifts and sharing them with the world. Again, it's that movement from "what's in it for me?" to "what do I have to offer? What do I have to give?"

We are, as Bob describes it, in an adolescent stage of human development, hopefully moving from showing our power and sowing our wild oats to asking, "How can I feel greater connection to others in this world?"

Throughout different periods of human history, there has been this back-and-forth movement from "me" to "we." He points out that hunter-gatherers were completely focused on "me" and getting individual needs met. When agriculture emerged, there was a need to organize and help each other—a shift toward more of a collective approach. Of course, people helped each other in hunting as well, but agriculture created a different kind of cooperation. Then, moving into cities and organizing at that level...

And there have been these oscillations throughout different periods in history—like during the time of the Buddha, which coincided with the emergence of Taoism and Lao Tzu in China and the Golden Age in Greece. That era seemed to represent a flowering of consciousness to some extent. I don't want to romanticize it, but there was a quality of consciousness in human thinking at that time that gave birth to some of the greatest insights about the importance of recognizing that we're part of something much larger.

Then came the dark ages, followed by feudalism, then periods of collective organizing—whether around church or country—each with its own shadow side. This was followed by the age of reason and the period of enlightenment, which emphasized the individual. We've been gradually growing beyond that age of reason with its focus on individualism, and now we're hopefully moving into a new era of "we."

At this crucial choice point, our sustainability depends on looking carefully and considering this movement toward greater connection, this fundamental shift in our life perspective.

Let me give you an overview of the five principles, the five commitments that he discusses. We'll explore just the first one this evening.

The first commitment is: See the systems you are a part of. This encompasses the understanding that we're all interconnected—really seeing deeply into interdependence, into the Buddhist concepts of śūnyatā (emptiness) and anattā (not-self). All of these fall under this commitment, which I'll explore in a moment.

The second commitment: Be accountable for all the consequences of your actions—simply recognizing the law of cause and effect.

The third: Abide by society's most deeply held universal principles of morality and justice.

The fourth: Acknowledge your fiduciary obligations and take responsibility for the continuation of all life. This is compassion in action, compassionate engagement.

And the fifth: Choose your own destiny—which embodies the principle of intention and vision.

The more consciously we can embrace these commitments, the deeper our Dharma practice becomes, both internally and externally. It aligns with recognizing: "This is my part in this puzzle."

So, the first commitment: See the systems you are a part of.

You've probably all encountered the concept of emptiness. Emptiness means being empty of a separate self—empty of anything that exists independently. As John Muir said, "When you try to pick out anything by itself, you find it hitched to everything else in the universe." Nothing can be separated out.

Thich Nhat Hanh offers the example of a piece of paper. He says when you look at a sheet of paper, all of life is present in it. When you look deeply, you see the tree that became this paper, and the rain and the sun, and the logger and the logger's family, and everything that went into the production—the earthworms tilling the soil, the nutrients, everything can be found in this single sheet of paper.

In the same way, when you see yourself as part of a larger system, it shifts your limited worldview.

I want to share another passage I love, from Lewis Thomas. Has anyone read Lives of a Cell? It's a wonderful, slim book written many years ago. This is from the very beginning, and it really captures, at the most fundamental level, the reality that you are not separate from anything:

"A good case can be made for our non-existence as entities. We are not made up, as we had always supposed, of successively enriched packets of our own parts. We are shared, rented, occupied. At the interior of our cells, driving them, providing the oxidative energy that sends us out for the improvement of each shining day, are mitochondria, and in a strict sense they are not ours. They turn out to be little separate creatures, replicating in their own fashion, privately, with their own DNA and RNA quite different from ours. Without them we would not move a muscle, drum a finger, think a thought. Mitochondria are stable and responsible lodgers, and I choose to trust them. But what of the other little animals, similarly established in my cells, sorting and balancing me, clustering me together? My centrioles, basal bodies, and probably a good many other more obscure tiny beings at work inside my cells, each with its own special genome, are as foreign and as essential as aphids in anthills. My cells are no longer the pure line entities I was raised with. They are ecosystems more complex than Jamaica Bay. I like to think that they work in my interest, that each breath they draw for me. But perhaps it is they who walk through the local park in the early morning, sensing my senses, listening to my music, thinking my thoughts."

This is what's really happening.

And if you probably know that you have trillions of bacteria—billions and billions, I should say—of bacteria in your stomach, in your mouth. I love that line Wes Nisker has, that there are more living organisms in your mouth right now than there have been humans since the beginning of time. It's true. And without those bacteria, you're gone. You are an ecosystem. That's an interesting way to think of yourself. But that's how it works.

And when Bob talks about just seeing the world in terms of systems, seeing this emptiness of separate self, this law of interdependence or interconnectedness—when you see there's no separate me, then who are you serving? Who is the you that is wanting things better? If you're an ecosystem, then you're representing a whole lot of beings right in here.

When you think about this, as he says there are systems nested in larger systems, nested in larger systems—if you see how it's all held together, we're connected. We're part of many, many systems, both from the micro to the macro. Where are you in that continuum?

When you think about it, the mitochondria or the cells—when a couple of cells go haywire, it affects the whole system, doesn't it? The cells work together and create a functional tissue which is different in your kidneys than it is in your lungs or your heart or any other organ. Your organs are working together in a complex way, in balance, that creates this pattern of life called you.

And you are part of other systems, starting with your family system, but moving beyond and beyond and beyond—from family to tribe to perhaps geographical region to city, state, country, planet, solar system, galaxy, universe. Where does it stop? You draw a line around and say, "This is me and there's life out there." That's just a very narrow perception of things.

Unfortunately, one of the perceptions that we have not seen, or one of the perceptions that we've fallen into misunderstanding, is the perception of humans separate from the rest of life. Because we think in terms of economic systems—at least that's what's driving our worldview. And in those economic systems, growth can be measured in how many units are consumed. The whole understanding of the whole system needing to be in balance to thrive is missed. And so that's where the real dysfunction comes—just not seeing the systems that you are a part of.

So I'd like to just lead us in a little reflection that can perhaps get us in touch with that aspect of systems.

[A brief interlude about adjusting the fan, with the teacher noting how one little shift in the system has a big effect on the body.]

Just close your eyes for a moment. And first, get a sense of all the beings who've come before you, who've given and passed on love and caring and understanding. Might start with the ones that you've received directly—kindness and caring and wisdom and support.

And get in touch with the next generation back, where they've received their own kindness and caring and love and wisdom that was passed on through your benefactors to you. And back generations—all the lineage of caring and kindness and goodness and compassion and wisdom that's been passed through the generations that has come through those beings and poured into you, into your heart, into your mind. You've been the beneficiary of a lineage of caring and consciousness that's continually evolved and is coming through you right now.

And think of all the people now who are touched by your own goodness and caring.

Maybe friends, relatives, children, people in your life to whom you extend that caring and kindness. And how that ripples out. And how it will ripple out through future generations. Who does that belong to? Who does your caring belong to? Who does your good heart or your love belong to? It's just been passed on. And you've been a fortunate recipient. And you can pass it on. You do pass it on.

And now for a moment, reflect on all the beings who have had an impact on you, one way or another, who shaped who you are through experiences, through interactions, and all the beings who you impact in your own unique way.

And now for a moment, move out of just the limiting human realm and reflect on all the beings right inside of you right now who go into keeping your ecosystem in balance. And all the sources of food that go into your mouth through your alimentary canal, digested into your body for nutrients, for fuel, passed on. The whole recycling process of life—it's just life moving through this form, and the essential importance to keep that life in balance. Know all the systems that you're part of. See the systems that you're part of.

This is the first commitment to bringing more consciousness to this planet. You are not separate. You are simply a vehicle for life to express itself. And the more you see that and care about it, the more you naturally are in harmony with it.

So just as we close, since it's time to close, just appreciate the web of life running through you, called you, and that you are connected with all around you. And send some love and appreciation, well-being inside and outside.

May I care about this being and the systems that it is part of. May I keep in mind my connection with all of life and allow the love and kindness to shine through me. And may all beings find happiness and peace.

So, thank you for your attention, and this week I would really encourage you to just kind of play around with seeing yourself as part of something much bigger—on an on-going practice perspective. Life is just moving through you, in you, within you, without you.

Okay, see you next week.

CHAPTER 257

Karma and Sīla as Gaia Practices

Rob Burbea · 40 min

In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea presents the second and third of five transformational commitments for addressing planetary crisis through Buddhist wisdom. Drawing from Bob Doppelt's "From Me to We," he explores how the fundamental teaching of karma—understanding that all actions have consequences—applies not only to personal practice but to our relationship with the Earth itself.

Burbea examines five common misconceptions about cause and effect that prevent us from seeing the long-term impacts of our choices, from interpersonal relationships to global climate patterns. He connects the Buddha's teaching on karma with the urgent need for environmental consciousness, showing how our daily actions—driving, consuming energy, using resources—create ripple effects throughout interconnected systems.

The talk then turns to sīla (ethical conduct) as the foundation for planetary healing. Burbea frames the traditional precepts of right speech, right action, and right livelihood as "Gaia practices"—acts of care for the Earth community. He presents the vision of an "eco-sattva," a bodhisattva committed to ending environmental suffering, and explores how personal integrity and harmlessness extend naturally to planetary stewardship. This integration of classical Buddhist ethics with ecological awareness offers practitioners a framework for dharma practice that serves both personal liberation and planetary healing.

Hi, this is James Barris. I hope you find this talk supports you in your practice. If you'd like to support my teaching, you can use the donate button underneath my picture on DharmaSeed. Your support is greatly appreciated.

This is the third in a series of four talks with the overall title "Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point." We're exploring how to hold the challenging situation we all face living in today's world with consciousness, with clarity of vision, with seeing how we can bring our Dharma practice to the issue of planetary crisis.

I've been deeply impressed with a book given to me a couple of months ago called From Me to We by Bob Doppelt – "Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life." The overall theme, as the title suggests, is going from me to we – moving from a feeling of separateness, of disconnection, of focusing on personal interests and agendas and gains to having a larger view of your place in the world. This shift in consciousness is essential, recognizing that you are not separate from the rest of life.

The more you can see this basic Buddhist principle of anattā or not-self, seeing the emptiness of self through the delusion of separation, the more you are moving towards freedom in the Buddhist teachings. This basic understanding applied to global consciousness is the key shift that could make a difference in the world. If all of us could somehow open to that reality, this would be a very different world. This is what freedom is about.

There's an irony here: we're caught in focusing on "me," thinking that's where happiness lies, yet it's the very thing that leads to disconnection and unhappiness. This shift is not only global but personal on every level, moving us towards greater well-being.

The first principle – what Bob calls these "commitments" – is to see the systems you are part of. This is basically understanding the law of interdependence, that everything is connected to everything else. As John Muir said, "When you try to pick anything out by itself, you see it's hitched to everything else in the universe." The more you can see that you are part of many webs and systems – from your family system to your clan to your city, ethnic group, country, planet, and universe – and recognize all the systems that make up who you are inside, just within your own body, from all the different biological systems working together, you understand this basic principle of how life operates. As George Harrison said, it's operating "within you and without you" – inside of you and all around you. Seeing your place in this web is the underlying premise of recognizing that you affect everything around you.

The second of these principles and commitments is: be accountable for all the consequences of your actions. This is deeply understanding the law of cause and effect, or in Buddhist teachings, the law of karma – that actions have consequences. What you do matters.

We live in a world of conditioning. Everything has a cause and conditioning. The only level of reality that is not conditioned in the Buddhist teachings is nibbāna – that is the unconditioned. But everything else is arising from causes and conditions. To see this, and see your place in it, and to see that what you do matters, can go very deeply in how you relate to yourself in the world, not only in your personal practice but in global consciousness.

In the subtitle, Bob says these commitments are "required to rescue the planet, your organization, and your life." He's not just thinking in terms of "me and the planet," but recognizing that you have an effect on all the organizations you participate in as well. As a systems analyst, Bob sees everything in terms of nesting, interlocking systems. The more you can bring about greater consciousness within yourself, then you affect the systems you have direct connection to, which in turn spread out to affect all the other organizations and connections that your organization or organizations interface with.

As I was reading this book – and it's one of these books that's really thin, which very much appealed to me at first – I discovered it's one of those thin books where every sentence is chock full of not just information, but depth and understanding. There's so much to share about this principle of accountability for all the consequences of your actions.

One profound idea that struck me while reading this is probably familiar to you: actions have consequences—the fundamental law of cause and effect. Yet most of us don't truly live with this understanding, not just on a global level. It's one thing to intellectually grasp how we affect our entire environment, but even on a personal level, if we genuinely understood that "if I do this, this unpleasant consequence will follow," you'd think that knowledge would be enough to deter us from unskillful actions.

Oh yes, if I eat a third dessert, there might be consequences, but it tastes so good right now. Or if I really let loose and vent, getting something off my chest in a way that feels justified in my self-righteousness—it'll be okay, it'll feel good. We rarely pause to consider the repercussions that follow. How many times have we acted this way? How often have we looked back after acting unskillfully and wondered, "What was I thinking?"

If it's challenging enough on a personal level to truly grasp that actions have consequences, how much more difficult it becomes when we exist in such an amorphous understanding of our place within larger systems, unable to see how our actions ripple out beyond ourselves.

This is about recognizing that we have choice and becoming as conscious as possible about the consequences of our choices. If we genuinely seek real well-being, we need to slow down and see what we're actually choosing.

The Buddha encountered this very predicament when deciding whether to teach. As you've probably heard, when he first became enlightened, he hesitated to go out and teach—it seemed like too much trouble. As the suttas tell us, he thought, "It would be a great vexation to me if I were to go out and try to teach the Dharma that I've seen and people would not understand."

But then, encouraged by a deva to survey the world with his psychic powers, he saw that everybody wants to be happy, yet almost everyone engages in precisely the kind of behavior that leads to more suffering. This recognition motivated him to teach, especially when he saw that many people had "but a little dust covering their eyes," and that if he shared what he had discovered and truly awakened them to deeper happiness, they too could realize what he had come to understand.

This isn't merely our current predicament—this is the human condition. Even when we understand cause and effect, we somehow blind ourselves to it. This is precisely why we practice: to see more clearly, to understand deeply that we have choice, and to connect with what we truly want to create in our lives.

Most people probably acknowledge climate change—not everyone, but most can see that we're in a precarious, even frightening situation. I don't want these talks to discourage you, but it seems essential that we come to terms with what's actually here. Yet despite this recognition, there's often a feeling that nothing can be done about it, leading to helplessness, hopelessness—what's the point? But you simply don't know what it might take to bring about change.

What if people truly decided they wanted a healthy and thriving planet? Here's one of my favorite quotes from John Seed, the brilliant deep ecologist:

"Perhaps if you were able to multiply all the efforts of conservationists by a factor of ten or even a hundred, it might not be enough. So there's nothing on the horizon that can help us. You might think, well, what kind of miracle would it take for there to be change? Well, it would be a very simple one, really. All that would be needed would be for human beings to wake up one day different than they were the day before, realizing that this is the end unless we make these changes, and then decide to make the change.

"Now that doesn't seem like a very likely thing to happen. But on the other hand, the whole road that we've traveled is so littered with miracles that it's only our strange kind of modern psyche that refuses to see it. I mean, the miracle of being descended from a fish that chose to leave the water to walk on land? With a pedigree like that, anything is possible."

What's truly needed is simply to wake up one day different from the day before and say, "Oh wow, this world is worth saving. And what we do matters."

Senge discusses five erroneous views about cause and effect that lead to a narrow way of being in the world, views that obscure how cause and effect truly operates. First, we assume one-way causality instead of feedback loops, and thus fail to account for non-linear consequences.

It means that we think in terms of immediate consequences from our actions—that we can see the results of what we do right away. But really, the web of cause and effect is far more subtle than that.

He uses the example of a workplace situation where you want to feel superior to somebody, so you make a little off-the-cuff mild criticism or playful put-down—something that seems relatively minor to you. But somebody else, just as if you were on the receiving end, takes it in and it hurts. They might not say anything, but you've set in motion a kind of energy that will emerge from them. It might not surface right away, but when they're around you, it will come out in little ways that you don't even realize where it's coming from.

You might just think, "Oh well, I was just teasing, playing around, you know, poking or whatever." But sometimes we hit somebody in a sensitive moment or a sensitive place and it hurts. It might be completely off your radar screen, but they're harboring that pain. So they might respond with little reactions or ways that undermine. Then a kind of tension builds between you. Because they're acting in that particular way, it just builds the system between you. And you might have no idea what the original cause was, but there's something that you've set in motion that you're completely unaware of.

This leads to the second erroneous view: we underestimate or ignore inherent time delays between cause and effect. A little seed that you plant might be sprouting the next day, the next week, a month from now, and you don't realize that seed has been festering or waiting to germinate and come back at you. This is just on an interpersonal level.

Third, we respond to symptoms rather than addressing root causes. Maybe that other person says something really nasty a month down the road. You think, "How could she say something like that? That's not really fair!" Maybe it's five times worse than what you originally said. And then you're addressing the symptom—the immediate interaction, what she says—not realizing the root cause had something to do with what you did. So we look at symptoms and try to address them instead of what underlies that whole setup of energy.

Fourth, we focus on daily events rather than long-term patterns. Maybe you try to be really nice to that person and make up to them, saying, "I'm going to really be kind to them today and put an end to this." Except you don't realize how long the conditioning has been going on. So you wonder, "Gee, why don't they get off it? Why are they so nasty to me?" But you're not realizing there's been a pattern that is very hard to change.

And finally, we assume that the whole system will be improved by optimizing its parts. This means thinking that if one person is feeling better—say in this situation, if I'm trying my best and feeling better—then everybody else will feel better too. But really, he makes the point that in a system when there's a balance, if anything is thrown out of balance and some position is improved for one element of that balance, it's usually throwing the whole system out of balance. Even though one element feels a lot better, it will have its consequences in another part of the system.

Now, applying these five errors to the earth—not seeing cause and effect, not seeing that what we do will have an effect over time, and that there are patterns that get set up over time that are deeply conditioned, making that conditioning really hard to change unless you're very aware of it.

He uses the example we're all familiar with: burning coal or oil or gas. We've been doing it for so long and thinking there's no problem with that. Even when we know there's a problem, it's hard to change the conditioning. The same with cutting down forests. We've been building and using land for agriculture for so long that in our consciousness, it's just the way things are. So even though you know intellectually that there's harm, that habit is so hard to change.

I was remembering one of the Buddha's discourses where the Buddha gives this example about how impurities can be thrown in a lake and you won't notice the consequences, or impurities can be burned in the air and you won't notice the consequences because it's such a wide space, or impurities can be thrown into the ground and the earth can absorb them.

That's not so, is it? If you think the Buddha knew everything, he wasn't taking into account our current condition where there's a certain point at which laws that have been going on since the beginning of time don't apply. So it's not seeing how those patterns become outdated and are no longer working.

He makes the point with a few facts: the temperature of the earth is now one degree centigrade higher than it was at pre-industrial levels. It seems that right now we're in the middle of it rising another degree, which is having huge impacts. But it could rise by as much as 6.4 degrees centigrade if it continues for the next century or two.

One degree centigrade is where we are now. Can you imagine 6.4 degrees more?

He presents the striking reality that the effects of our actions remain largely invisible to us—we don't see the effect on cutting down the forests, which account for twenty percent of climate disruption. When forests are destroyed, CO2 is released into the air while the trees that would transform that CO2 into oxygen are gone. The plants that naturally cool the earth are no longer there. We might understand this intellectually, but we don't embody it in our hearts.

The effect of just one degree centigrade higher temperature creates a four percent increase in water vapor. As the atmosphere heats up, more water evaporates, causing intense rainstorms and floods, along with record-breaking high temperatures. When he wrote this book, record highs were outnumbering record lows two to one. Just last week I heard on NPR that there were around 2,000 record highs in the United States over the past month or two, compared to only 40 record lows. This is simply climate cause and effect playing out before our eyes.

In the biosphere, we're witnessing a loss of biodiversity without seeing the cause and effect and long-term consequences of this destruction. It disrupts the delicate balance we depend upon. The fires burning in Colorado right now illustrate this interconnectedness perfectly. Much of the devastation stems from pine beetles that have grown unchecked because warmer weather has affected their proliferation. These proliferating pine beetles are devastating the trees, and when a pine beetle attacks a tree, the tree dies and retains only ten percent of its original moisture content. Each piece affects every other piece—all these dead trees become kindling for any spark that ignites. It's quite sobering to contemplate.

Another way we fail to recognize cause and effect appears in our consumption patterns. Population growth combined with our increased technological capacity to exploit Earth's resources has resulted in an astounding increase in material consumption. Consider this: in 1900, the United States consumed approximately 160 million metric tons of material. By the year 2000, we consumed 3 billion metric tons. The author calculates that if everyone lived as North Americans live, we would need seven additional planets to maintain our current material lifestyle.

So, not to depress you entirely, what is the answer? This is where mindfulness becomes essential. We must honestly examine the effect of our personal actions and consider how we want to be present on this planet.

The author offers a stark example: "Our failure to understand or accept that we're pushing the Earth's climate system beyond its limits every time we turn on the lights, use electronic devices, drive vehicles, or in other ways use or burn fossil fuels or denude the forests is a matter of life and death for billions of people."

Now, how do you live with that awareness without becoming completely overwhelmed by guilt? This remains a genuine question for me. I drove here today. Yesterday I was speaking with Jaime, who rides bicycles everywhere. He's put only 3,000 miles on his car over the past two years because he cycles wherever he goes. At the picnic, I found myself feeling inspired by his example while simultaneously feeling like such a glutton—the ugly American, you know.

But I believe there's a balance between overwhelming guilt and genuine awakening to our effect on the planet. We need not become so immobilized by our choices that we can't appreciate and enjoy life, but we can become more conscious of our decisions.

As I reflected on these facts, particularly on cause and effect, I thought of Jaime and another person in my world who often sits on my shoulder—my friend Julia Butterfly Hill, who has visited here several times. I've told her this directly: "If you knew how much you're with me every time I'm about to throw out extra paper..." She laughed when I said, "It's good, though sometimes I wish you weren't in my head, but there you are. What can I say?"

There's something powerful about cultivating mindfulness in how we move through life, especially when we're doing something that, if we pause and really consider it, prompts us to ask: "Is this helpful or not?"

And to just slow down enough to get in touch with your choice rather than acting on automatic pilot—that makes a difference.

So I would like to read this commitment again and have us get in touch with it. Not with heavy-duty weight where we're burdened by it, but where it becomes a source of real joy. Why don't you close your eyes as I say this. In fact, we'll do the first one and the second one—I didn't do that last week.

First commitment: See the systems you're part of. Really recognize the dharma principle of interdependence. No human is an island. How wonderful that life connects you to everything around you. Take that as a dharma practice. See yourself in the web of interconnectedness.

Second commitment: Be accountable for all the consequences of your actions. Can you take that on as a joyful responsibility? To do the best you can, be accountable for all the consequences of your actions—for yourself, for all the people you influence, and for the planet. You might even imagine what that might look like in the places where you go unconscious. Just bring a little bit more consciousness to the fact that your actions have consequences.

Third commitment: Abide by society's most deeply held universal principles of morality and justice. So again, another dharma principle. The first one—interdependence, anatta. Second one—law of cause and effect, karma. And this third principle is the foundation of a good, peaceful heart: sila. Right speech, right action, right livelihood—three components of the Eightfold Path that bring about a sense of ease and peace and openness in the heart.

Bob doesn't talk in terms of dharma principles. He doesn't use jargon at all. He mentions Buddhists briefly in the introduction, but very off-handedly. These are universal principles—the law of moral justice, which exists in every spiritual tradition. But the Buddha particularly said: if you want to find peace in your heart, then don't cause suffering.

Now, more than ever, this principle is essential if we're going to change our place on the planet. More than ever, we are asked to have some restraint, to have some self-control, to be cooperative. We're all in this together. Harmony within the system is essential if we're going to maintain balance—harmony, to the extent that harmony is a conscious choice.

Of course, disharmony is part of the world, just like earthquakes and volcanoes and old age, sickness, and death. But as far as moving from "me" to "we," moving from the individual to the common good—if you have an understanding of the law of interdependence and of cause and effect, then you see that the welfare of others is intrinsically connected to your own welfare.

In the Buddhist tradition and other spiritual traditions, it's often put as "do no harm." That's the basic attitude of right speech, action, and livelihood—not causing suffering. The inverse of the golden rule: don't do to others what you would not want them to do to you. But really, on a more positive expression, the notion of ahimsa—not just nonviolence, but the goodness that comes from caring, from acting in a harmless way. The gift of harmlessness.

I was reading an essay by Stephanie Kaza where she talks about an "eco-sattva"—a bodhisattva pledged to end environmental suffering. It really comes down to the basic fact that all people have a right to live on a healthy planet, a planet with as little toxicity and consumption and climate disruption as possible.

But even beyond all people, beyond human needs—not harming others means taking into consideration all the species that make up this delicate balance, caring for the earth, not harming the earth.

Here, I'll just read—the moral obligation to accept limits on human behavior. This is radically different from how we think in terms of "Well, if it's good for me, why not?" And changing from an us-versus-them mentality to... When I was growing up, I remember when they first had the picture of the Earth from outer space, and there was this big poster—maybe some of you remember it from Buckminster Fuller, I think it was—that said, "We're all passengers on spaceship Earth."

Just having that... oh, I'm getting goosebumps remembering this... just having that experience when we first saw that picture of the Earth from outer space. That was such a radically new visual: "Oh, that's our home. It's not what's in it for me. We're all in this together."

So to change that us-versus-them mentality, a moral obligation, he says, to resolve conflicts peacefully, to cut material energy and consumption, to rise above economic self-interest, to place climate and biosphere needs above human economic needs and rights, to rescue the innocent and protect the most vulnerable, to reduce economic inequality, and a moral obligation for restorative justice.

When we do this, both in our own personal life as well as holding that vision for healing the planet, we affect everybody around us. Just like he says, you don't know the effects of your tiniest actions—you don't know the effects of you living with greater integrity in your life.

So again, as he suggests, to take these commitments—just get in touch with this commitment: the third commitment to abide by society's most deeply held universal principles of morality and justice. That is, as best you can, to live a life of integrity for yourself, for everyone in your life, and for the sake of the planet. If you can see that living by that dharma principle, which I'm sure you're quite familiar with, is an act of caring for the planet, it up-levels your whole motivation to be aligned with your values. "I'm doing this for myself and because I care about the planet." What a joyful responsibility that is.

To really take these basic dharma practices in the context of a larger rippling effect that we have because we care about the planet—it gives a whole other dimension to our dharma practice.

So we just have a few minutes left if anything comes up from any of this that you want to share.

"Hi, I'm Hannah. When you spoke, it reminds me how we have a synchronicity—I kept wanting to say synchronicity—how we are connected, and out of fear we push other things away. But because that connection is intrinsic to who we are, we feel that isolation and loneliness, and it's only when we are fearless and we do connect with that, that we feel a lack of duality and we're able to—which is our essence—we are able to identify with that oneness. Does that make sense?"

"And you're saying that fear gets in the way of feeling that connection?"

"Fear gets in my way of feeling that love and connection. But when I go past the fear and I just stand in it, like if I stay in the suffering and then I transcend it, then I'm able to feel that connection and the fear goes away. And when I'm coming from that, I'm able to be a vehicle of the flow that goes through everything."

"Yeah, lovely. You can just hold on to it. It takes going through the dark places that say, 'Oh no, I can't face that,' to get to that place of real caring. But when we touch the caring and feel connected, then there's a whole different motivation for acting consciously."

"And for me, very much it's beyond the mind, the intellect. I don't have access to it. And I also don't have access to it in the future, in the past. I only have access to it in the present. Right now."

"Yeah. Great. Thank you."

Any other last comments?

Okay, so let's close with a little loving-kindness for ourselves and for the earth. And as you do, seeing the understanding of karma—cause and effect—and sila, acting with integrity, as being gifts to the planet as well as to yourself, because it affects all the systems that you're a part of.

May I feel all the caring inside my heart. And may I share my love well. May I see through fears to open to all the goodness inside. May I help awaken the true nature inside for myself and for all beings. May all appreciate this life...

that we're given and care for the planet.

May our coming here together be of benefit to all beings everywhere.

Next week Lama Palden will be here, and I'll return in a couple of weeks.

Thank you.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 258

Stewardship and Intention as Gaia Practices

Rob Burbea · 39 min

In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea presents the fourth and fifth principles from his series "Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point," drawing from Bob Doppelt's work "From Me to We." He explores the law of trusteeship - understanding that greater power brings greater responsibility to act benevolently - and the law of free will, recognizing that our intentions and choices create our karma and world.

Burbea examines how the Buddha's teaching after his awakening exemplifies compassionate trusteeship, spending 45 years teaching out of care for others' liberation. He discusses the legal duties of trustees - loyalty, prudence, monitoring, and disclosure - applied to our role as planetary stewards. The talk addresses practical obstacles to change, including confirmation bias and stages of transformation from disinterest through deliberation to active engagement.

Connecting Buddhist principles of interdependence, karma, and ethical conduct (sīla) to ecological consciousness, Burbea invites listeners to see themselves as trustees of the living earth. He emphasizes that understanding "we don't own anything" - neither thoughts, emotions, nor planetary resources - can shift us from individual to collective responsibility. This teaching bridges traditional dharma with urgent contemporary environmental concerns, offering a framework for conscious response to climate change.

This is the third talk in this series, which I've been calling Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point. I'm inspired by this book by Bob Doppelt, From Me to We, and also from the current issue of Inquiring Mind, an excellent issue on ecology, deep ecology and concern for the environment.

This book is written by Bob, who is a systems change expert and also a Dharma student, as well as something of an expert on climate change. He teaches up in Oregon at Willamette University and University of Oregon, and has an organization that he heads called the Resource Innovation Group.

He wrote this book as a follow-up to a book he wrote a few years ago on sustainability, where he realized that although he felt good about the book that he wrote, it wasn't clear as to what exactly would be needed to shift our consciousness—what will be needed to shift our consciousness as more and more climate change affects us all, as it already is, and as it seems like it will be continuing in that direction.

What he did was take five Dharma principles, but he doesn't talk in terms of the Dharma. It's very mainstream. He did such a beautiful job in explaining these principles in a non-jargon, non-Buddhist way. Very skillful, as he is an instructor, a teacher, a college professor.

We've taken these five principles—we've gone through three of them so far—each of them based on a natural law. That is another way of saying the Dharma. One aspect of Dharma principles that would lead to a commitment to shift one's consciousness.

So far, the three laws leading to the three commitments that we've covered:

First, the law of interdependence, which means that we are all connected. This is another way of saying emptiness—the emptiness of a separate self—that we are all connected and part of a system much larger than us. These are all supporting this shift of consciousness from me, the individual way of seeing things, to realize that we're part of something much bigger and that we need to care for it. When we can see that other perspective, we're more likely to care for it in a meaningful way.

So that law of interdependence—understanding that we are part of something much larger than our separate self—leads to the first commitment: to see the ecological, social, and economic systems of which you are a part. See your part in the greater systems.

Second, the law of cause and effect—the law of karma. Actions have consequences, which leads to the second commitment: be accountable for all the consequences of your actions and the consequences on those systems.

This is not going to be new to you, but it's seeing ecology in this perspective—to apply these natural laws, which are part of Dharma practice, to a global consciousness. I find it really quite brilliant the way he laid it out.

Third, the law of moral justice. Once you understand that you're part of something larger, then you want to, as you become more conscious, see that happiness lies in non-harming. That is the basis for the Eightfold Path: sila, samadhi, and panna. Sila—right or wise speech, action, and livelihood—that's the basis for the training the mind and the heart and wisdom to arise. The commitment that would come out of that is to abide by society's most deeply held universal principles of morality and justice, that that is where true happiness lies. To just lead an ethical life will start you making wiser choices in your life, especially as you see more that you're part of a larger system.

This leads us to the fourth commitment, based on what he calls the law of trusteeship. Once you...

Once you see that you're part of a bigger system and understand cause and effect—that actions have consequences—and you are living with integrity and an ethical life, then you begin to understand your place in that system.

If you have greater power, if you have the capacity to influence everything around you, that naturally gives rise to a compassionate, caring stance. There is a kind of universal moral principle that the more power one has over others, the greater is the duty to use that power benevolently.

This represents a real leap for most people who have power. This would be a very different world if those who had power realized that it is both their responsibility and a joy to use that power benevolently. But once you are really aligned with the Dharma, you see—oh, of course! How could I want to harm another if I've got the power to relieve suffering? Then it behooves me to do what I can to be benevolent.

So Henderson calls this the law of trusteeship. It's really about expressing your caring and compassion. The basic law of compassion being the natural expression of a wise heart. This is what motivated the Buddha to teach after he was awakened.

"Oh, what do I do now?" And I think I mentioned this here before recently—pardon the redundancy if I have—but there he was, awakened, enlightened, asking, "Oh, wow, well, what do I do now?" At first he wasn't so excited about teaching because he said, "Oh, what if I try to communicate what I've learned and people don't get it? It would be a vexation to me." Those are the words in the discourse. Then he saw that yes, that's what he needed to do, because it's possible for others to wake up. And so he spent the next forty-five years of his life teaching out of compassion.

This law of trusteeship is really also based on the understanding that you don't really own anything on this planet. Somebody says, "Oh, I own this land." In their minds, they do. And relatively, "Oh, I have the deed." But nobody owns land, truly. Nobody owns all the resources on the earth. They might have power and a legal right to say what happens to those resources for a while, but those resources in a world of interconnectedness belong to us all.

As Ram Dass says, we're just accountants in the firm. The wealth or the material that comes through us is moving through us. When you really see the idea of no ownership—which in Dharma practice means you don't own your thoughts (what a relief!), you don't own your emotions (thank goodness!), they're just coming through you, you don't own this body (it has its own laws), you don't own anything—to see on a macro level, we don't own the earth. We're part of the earth. We're part of an ecosystem, one very influential part, but the earth is home to everything that lives on it.

This shifts our consciousness to being trustees, because we have a lot of power and affect what goes on here to an inordinate extent, as never before in history. I was reading—oh, maybe it's in Henderson's book, or maybe it's an article I was reading recently—but some are calling this the Anthropocene Age. You know, the Pleistocene and the Mesozoic and all of those different ages in the history of the planet. This is the first time that one species is the major influence of changes on the planet.

Which has its downside, doesn't it? But if we see ourselves as trustees, then it has an upside if we can wake up in time.

I'm remembering, as I was putting down these thoughts, seeing one of my favorite performers, a musician named Andreas Vollenweider. Anybody know Vollenweider's music? He's the Swiss harpist who writes the most amazing, beautiful music. He was giving a concert in the Greek Theater a number of years ago—a really high guy. And he said something that still touches me when I think about it.

This was around 2003, 2004, during the Iraq War when things were getting intense. And he pleaded with us, saying, "You here in America, we look to you—you're a very important part of our family. You're our big brother in the best sense of the word. And as an elder, as a stronger, more powerful brother, we look to you for support and understanding so you can inspire and guide and lead us to a better world."

I remember it was a fabulous concert, but that was the most memorable moment. Tears were streaming down my face and many others'. It was this heartfelt plea: Look at your place. Look at your place in this world—and beyond just us in this country, but for all humankind, to see our place in the bigger world.

There's what Julia Butterfly Hill calls "a joyful responsibility" once you see the effect you have, that you can really make a difference.

So here we are, trustees. And what Bob does brilliantly in this fourth commitment is examine what being a trustee entails in our society. He looked at all the legal documents of trusteeship and discovered certain duties that come with being a trustee. He simply applied those duties, those obligations, to being trustees for this planet—which in the fullest sense is our living trust. This is our living trust. It's alive, and this is the trust. To see ourselves as trustees means following the basic guidelines of any trustee.

Here are some of those guidelines. First, the duty of loyalty. When one is entrusted with an estate or resources, the duty of loyalty means we act in the best interests of the beneficiaries. In this context, the beneficiaries are all the other beings on the planet and all the generations to come, as well as the human race itself. We all benefit from good trusteeship.

So we act in the best interests of the beneficiaries, which means being completely fair, with no favoritism. If you're dividing an estate, you want to do it as fairly and impartially as possible. A trustee shouldn't appropriate assets for private gain. While a trustee should be compensated for managing a trust, one of the duties is that there be equitable distribution of compensation for the efforts of being a trustee.

Here's where I'll share some rather striking facts about trusteeship, particularly in the US and UK. The top 1% of U.S. earners receive 23% of the nation's total income—almost triple the 8% share they held in 1980. The top 1% also own over 34% of all privately held wealth. This was in 2007; it's probably jumped since then. The top 20% of the population own 85% of the wealth, while the remaining 80% own just 15%.

In the UK, the richest 10% of the population are more than 100 times wealthier than the poorest 10%. The US, with less than 5% of the world's population, holds about 25% of total global wealth. Europe, with about 11% of the world's population, owns about 32% of the total wealth. So 16% of the world's population owns 57% of the total wealth. Less than 1% of the global adult population owns more than a third of the total global household wealth.

Equitable distribution of compensation is a duty. Another aspect of the duty of loyalty as a trustee is to become aware and accept responsibility—not just to make money, but to see the planet, the climate, and the biosphere as public goods, not private assets.

One last duty of loyalty: to treat all beneficiaries fairly. Bob makes the case that in certain countries where there is equitable distribution of assets—namely Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, which have very high standards of living—they have far fewer health and social problems compared to the US and UK. When people are treated fairly, society as a whole is better off. This is just common sense, but we have to get it into our consciousness.

The Buddha, in one discourse, talks about the duties of a king. He says that one of the first duties is to ensure that the poorest of the land are given their needs and necessities. Because if they're not, and there's a big discrepancy between poor and rich, then there will be a disgruntled segment of the population which will have an uprising, causing war and chaos in the land. So he spells it out: A good king, a wise king who doesn't want chaos in the land, distributes the assets in a way that everybody benefits.

So that's trusteeship—the duty of loyalty. Another duty is the duty of prudence: a trustee must discharge duties with care, skill, and prudence.

That means a trustee should avoid risky investments, should acquire knowledge and skills needed to effectively act as responsible trustees and educate themselves, and understand how the living trust works and their responsibilities and how to perform them.

In terms of global trusteeship, it means a duty to abandon the idea of continuous economic growth, that economic growth is what we're based on, is what wins. We need to redesign the consumer paradigm instead of take it, make it, and waste it, to have an understanding of how assets are limited and there's a recycling that's needed, to use resources sustainably, to follow the precautionary principle, which means that the burden of proof is on corporations not to harm rather than on the public to prove that it will harm. And also to prepare for and adapt to climate disruption. To really be seeing in the big picture where this is leading and to have preparation for it, and a duty to monitor and disclose when things are getting out of whack.

So he asks, do you see yourself as a trustee? And before we look at this commitment, I want to just share with you his words: "Do you see yourself as a trustee of the living trust that is the earth? To what extent do you strive to perform your duty of loyalty, duty of prudence, duty to monitor, duty to disclose? Once you understand that what humans do today will determine the health and well-being of everything on the planet, you must acknowledge that we're trustees of the living trust that is the earth."

So here's the commitment, and I'll just put it out to you. If you want to, I invite you to go inside and see if this is something that you could take in and take to heart. Realizing that we need to make the shift from me to we: the commitment to acknowledge your trustee obligations and take responsibility for the continuation of all life on this planet. And as he says, there's a power in taking this commitment inside. You're a trustee on this planet. And it needs you.

Now we get to the fifth commitment which is based on the dharma principle that what we do matters. That basically we have a choice. What he calls the law of free will. And this is really another way of saying that we are creating our karma in every moment. The Buddha said, through intention, we are creating our world. We are what we think; with our thoughts, we make the world. And to really see that you have a choice, the law of free will, breaking free from the false beliefs that control your life and your organization, and to realize you can choose your own destiny. That what you choose matters. And how you participate in this unfolding over the next few years has a very powerful rippling effect.

And he talks about what gets in the way of choosing to participate wholeheartedly as trustees. Even if you know the score, it's not easy to make this commitment. And as I was reading the chapter, I must say there were all kinds of feelings that came to me where I know, and I've been educating myself a bit on this score, and there's a part that is saying, can I really make a difference? What will it take to make a difference? And it depends what day it is for me between saying, what else is there to do? And what can I do? Can you relate to that? And that choice point is really the one to keep alive and see you are choosing one way or another, you're choosing.

And he talks about the things that get in the way, and how the process of self-change happens. First of all, he talks about what's called the confirmation bias. And I've talked about this as well in neuroscience, that once you have a belief, your brain looks to everything that will confirm that belief. And if your belief is, "What's the point? Forget it. Who are we kidding?" Then you will tune into all the information that will corroborate that belief. And you might be aware of the other stuff, but you'll kind of tune it out.

And there's actually a lot of very inspiring information out there. We've never been as conscious as well as we've never been as unconscious in some ways in our consciousness, that can inspire. And once you decide to move towards choosing your destiny and choosing to be a trustee for the earth, then you start to notice all of these inspiring dimensions and you're in the process of change.

And he talks about the process of change. I thought this is really fascinating. There are different stages of change, particularly around this subject of climate change and how the planet is unfolding. The first stage, the disinterested stage, where it

Here are the four expressions within this disinterested stage. First is reluctance—there's too much inertia. "Oh, I'm comfortable where I am. Yes, it's a problem, but it would just be too much to try to make a difference." Second is the rebellion reaction, where you have a high investment in the dysfunction: "What do you mean there's climate change?" Third is resignation, where you feel overwhelmed and lack confidence that any change can happen. And fourth is rationalization: "Oh, it's not my problem. I'm not personally affected, so it's okay."

These overlap but are distinct. Reluctance is inertia and comfort. Rebellion means you're invested in not believing. Resignation feels like too much. And rationalization declares it's not your problem at all.

What changes you, what gets you out of this disinterested stage—which perhaps comes to all of us—is first a disturbance, like a catastrophe that wakes you up. If you're living in Colorado, maybe experiencing all the fires, or Hurricane Katrina, or tsunamis, you start connecting the dots. "Oh my goodness." This is just like the Buddha saying that suffering is what awakens us. There needs to be enough disturbance to shake us out of our complacency.

That's often how we move out of this disinterested stage: through disturbance, awareness building—getting information that challenges our beliefs—seeing that small steps feel good, and having supportive relationships. You're not doing this alone.

If you can move out of the disinterested stage, you enter the deliberation stage of change, where you say, "Okay, I get it. I think I want to be part of more consciousness on this planet in an active way," but you're still deliberating. To move from deliberation, goal setting helps. You've got to weigh the pros and cons, weighing the information. We need to see two upsides for every downside in order to make change. If it's equal, inertia wins out. "Well, I've been doing it this way. I can go along." But if you see the upsides far outweigh the downsides, you're motivated to change.

Then you move to the design stage, where you clearly understand, "I'm going to change"—changing to being an active trustee. In the design stage, you have a plan that works for you with a limited number of clear, workable goals. You don't want to overwhelm yourself.

Next comes the doing stage, where you say, "Oh, I am changing." You hold yourself differently. You have a positive attitude about shifting your identity. Instead of being discouraged by how far there is to go, you're inspired. You start looking for the good feelings and successes that come with that.

Finally, you move to the defending stage, where you're really going from me to we. You're an active trustee, and you realize, "I have changed, or I'm in the process of changing more and more," but that's your identity, and you want to invite others to join you.

He says there are three keys to change: sufficient tension or dissonance between your life and the facts—"Oh my goodness, something's got to give here"—sufficient confidence to do what's necessary to reduce this dissonance between how things are and how you'd like them to be, and seeing that the advantages of change far outweigh the disadvantages.

Given that, here's the fifth commitment, and I invite you once again to take this based on the law of free will: to break free from the false beliefs that control your life and any organization you're part of, to realize you can choose your own destiny, and to choose that destiny as a trustee of the planet.

Just wear that for a moment. I have a choice and what I do matters. What I do matters not only to me, but to everyone I am in contact with. Whatever stage you happen to be in, feel okay about being right where you are and know that you're heading in that healthy, benevolent direction from me to we.

I know this isn't your typical dharma talk, but it feels so inspiring and moving that I appreciate your staying with it.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 6/7). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

I would invite us all to hold these seeds of commitment in our consciousness and to keep allowing them to joyfully sprout in our hearts. I'm not saying I have all the answers, and I'm not claiming I'm at that defending stage. I can do my part, but I want to be more than just talking about it. We really are all in this together.

I know some of you have been very active and committed in your love of the planet and caring for it, and you've inspired me. We all need to inspire each other. That's the spirit I'm sharing from.

We have a few minutes for comments and reflections. Andrew shared this morning that he heard on NPR about the drought in the central part of the country—we haven't had a drought like this since the 1930s, around the time of the Dust Bowl. Usually droughts are in smaller areas here or there while other places get rain, but this huge expanse of land experiencing such drought simultaneously. We're at the tipping point, with more and more signs appearing.

One person shared that she's recently found joy in cooking, making things she used to buy in packages—yogurt, cookies, croutons. It has slowed her down and brought all these other benefits too. That's the beauty of finding joy in small things and thinking, "This is pretty cool."

When asked about deep ecology, I understand it as Joanna Macy and John Seed describe it—not just seeing environmental problems as things that need fixing through recycling and small actions, but recognizing that we are part of a larger system. We see the interconnectedness of things, where we are not separate from the whole, both subject and object, understanding our part in the bigger picture. It's not just about what I can do to make things better "out there," but recognizing that we are the system affecting everything else, all interconnected.

Jenny shared a beautiful example about being asked to care for a chicken. She studies sustainable agriculture but found herself resisting the commitment—having to wake up five minutes earlier to feed the chicken, let her out, watch her. She discovered those same resistances I mentioned, even for this small action. But committing to this little act of caring for this chicken has been profound, connecting her to this being that provides eggs and is part of her little ecosystem. It has connected her to the food system in a larger way and to compassion for animals that give us life through food. It was profound to move through those resistances and make that commitment.

This gives me the opportunity to address something I promised someone who emailed me—a fellow named Carl from San Diego who has been listening to these talks. Carl pointed out that I left out one important piece when discussing carbon footprint problems: the extent of our animal-based diet has a huge impact. I was amazed to learn that an estimated 51% of greenhouse gases come from the livestock industry.

The main sources of greenhouse gases from animal agriculture are fourfold. First, deforestation of the rainforests to grow feed for livestock, which contributes hugely to releasing CO2 instead of converting it to oxygen. Second, methane from manure waste—and methane is seventy-two times more potent as a global warming gas than CO2. Third, the refrigeration and transport of meat around the world. And fourth, the raising, processing, and slaughtering of the animals, which uses massive amounts of water and other resources.

Fifty-one percent. That's just amazing.

So our food choices have a huge impact. I'm not here to say you've got to change your diet, but you might just consider that each time you choose a veggie option instead of a meat one, you're really contributing to the wellbeing of the planet. It's a nice way to look at it instead of feeling guilty. You know, if you eat fish or whatever you eat, you can choose to contribute in a meaningful way.

So I hope we all keep each other awake as we go through these times as consciously as possible.

Let's close with a short loving-kindness meditation. I thank you for your attention.

First, reflect that you are part of a larger system and that your actions matter—your life of integrity matters, your compassion matters—and that you can choose your place in this consciously. Let yourself feel the wholesomeness of choosing to care for yourself and the planet, sending kindness toward yourself and to all beings.

May all be free of suffering. May all know wellbeing. May all wake up to their true nature. And may our coming here together be for the benefit of all beings.

Including the earth in that—may the earth feel our love and our care and be healthy and thriving. May all beings and the earth be at peace and at ease and free of suffering.

Thank you. See you in a month.

CHAPTER 259

Practice & Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses one of our time's greatest challenges by exploring how Buddhist practice can support us in meeting climate change with wisdom and skillful action. Drawing on the teachings of Ajahn Chah and other masters, he examines how meditation practice serves as preparation for 'when the passions touch the heart' - offering three essential dimensions: refuge, resilience, and response.
>
> Burbea discusses the Buddha's teaching on the Three Jewels (Buddha, Dhamma, Sangha) as both external supports and inner resources, emphasizing how samādhi practice helps us discern between the fundamental awareness of citta and the activities of mind. He explores the principle of nekkama (renunciation/simplification) as both a meditation technique and lifestyle practice essential for our times. The talk weaves together classical teachings with contemporary urgency, showing how mindfulness of breathing and ethical conduct create the stability needed to respond rather than react to overwhelming global challenges.
>
> This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners practical guidance on developing inner refuge and resilience while maintaining the capacity for compassionate, wise action in the face of planetary crisis. Burbea's integration of traditional Buddhist wisdom with ecological awareness provides a contemplative framework for engaging with climate change from a place of gathered awareness rather than overwhelm.

A great sense of honor and privilege to come together in this way and have a dedicated space for practice. We're very fortunate to be able to take the time out of our lives to do this, to contemplate the Dharma and cultivate the Dharma. It can be a real refuge for us.

One of the things that a teacher who had a great influence in my life, Ajahn Chah, whom I met first in the UK and then in Thailand, used to say was: this practice is preparation. Preparation for when the passions touch the heart. In that moment, do we react and generate more suffering and complexity, either for ourselves or in the world around us, or can we pause and reflect and apply this training? Moments of gathering, moments of mindfulness, moments of wise reflection.

We practice in these containers that we have built together—the container of the retreat and the retreat place—so that we can have the quiet and the support to reflect inwardly and practice with just the simplicity of being with the day as it unfolds. Very simple things: feeling tired or feeling a bit dislocated, wanting to be here, not wanting to be here, feeling happy, not so happy. All the different kinds of changing moods—to see them come and go and to be able to apply this training of moments of being with the breath, being with the body, being with the reality of the moment and not being so distracted. Not moving out of our habits, particularly when it's uncomfortable and we just shift.

This is a training to be able to withstand impingement from the world around us and from our own internal psychodynamic material—whatever arises—to withstand that without defaulting to patterns of distraction, and through that building some capacity to be more fully here.

When we arrived yesterday at IMS, Kittisaro and I came from Tennessee. We traveled from Atlanta, flew to Boston, and were then driven here. When we woke up this morning, there was a note on the notice board from someone who hoped that during this retreat we would reflect on or give some perspective on practice and climate change.

This is probably one of the biggest issues that we're in the midst of: very compelling, very impactful, very serious, very threatening, very alarming. We practice to be with the reality of life, not to live in some kind of cloud that we float off on, but to actually be more able to be here and meet the moment—meet whatever arises within ourselves and in the world around us. We're not separating out from the world in this practice, but we're learning to have capacity so we can meet the world.

Rather than when we think of something like this, or we read more and more, see more and more, experience more and more what's happening to our earth, it can be very activating for us. It brings up a lot of very strong feelings and reactions, and can activate deeper, sometimes quite primitive and early patterning to do with fear and overwhelm. That can really dislocate us from a sense of deeper sanity and well-being. It's very powerful—things that hit us. Like Ajahn Chah said, when things hit that are very strong, they activate us.

But we are here to practice, to learn that there are alternative ways of responding, that there are alternative resources within this heart and mind that we can draw from, that can resource us, that can support us in the face of whatever we might face, both personally and collectively.

One of the things that Einstein said is that we can't solve a problem from the same consciousness that created it. There has to be a shift somehow when we approach things in life. When we approach difficult things from the same mindset, we tend to just go round and round and round. Sometimes it's these shifts that can happen that bring about a shift in response that can change the whole picture and allow for something quantum-like to happen—some kind of shift that we didn't even know was possible because we've shifted our mindset.

Our usual conditioned mindset has been very much—our human consciousness has been very conditioned by this mind that objectifies, that goes out, this thinking mind. It's called mano-vijñāna in the Buddhist map of the mind: the mind, the vijñāna, the consciousness that goes out to name things. It's a very important aspect of our consciousness, of our awareness, of our mind. It helps us to differentiate and to name and to know and to be able to discern difference.

But it tends to become a way that we become addictively filtering our experience of life just through this primary capacity to objectify the world, and in the process of doing that, create this sense of separation—me and the other, whatever that other is. When there's that separateness, even at a subtle level or not so subtle level, then there's a whole dynamic between me and the other: liking, disliking, wanting, not wanting, fear, lust. It's quite complex within that field between me and the other.

So this mind that's constantly creating an object—when we create the objects of, say, the earth and others around us—we can sometimes in that process lose the reality, the deeper reality of awareness, this deeper dimension of the mind-heart which is aware, which is actually sensitive to and knows the reality of interconnection. That there is no ultimate other; we're part of each other.

The breath that I take in is the carbon dioxide the trees give out. The oxygen that the trees give out allows me to breathe. The food I take is from the earth. Every day is an affirmation that we're not apart from what we experience or see or name or experience through our senses as other than us, different than us. We're actually part of a whole unified web of life.

This is the Dharma: to really know that, not just intellectually—maybe we start there—but to really begin to feel that and ultimately to move from that reality. So to shift—this practice is helping us shift, not to judge how we are or to put down, but just to notice there's another dimension that we can awaken to. We're awakening out of the obsessive objectifying mind that generates this feeling of separative consciousness that's connected with brilliance and creativity but is also connected with suffering and discontent. We're awakening into a deeper dimension. This practice is helping us to awaken into the reality of the seamlessness of the whole. This is a quantum shift.

So in this practice, when we're meeting whatever it is, whatever intensity—whether it's this very big picture that we're now in the midst of and will be for the rest of our lives, the changes happening due to the extreme release of carbon into the atmosphere and the effects of that, or whether it's in our personal life in smaller ways—whenever we meet intensity or difficulty or challenge, this practice does have a lot to offer.

I'd like to talk about three ways of thinking about what this practice can offer us, connected with what we've been doing today.

This practice offers us a whole range of skills and benefits. Let me explore three dimensions: refuge, resilience, and response.

As we begin to practice, we develop familiarity with refuge—a place, a way of abiding that is sustaining and nourishing, that can reorient us. The entry into the Buddhist path begins with this sense of orientation around refuge. Classically, we take refuge in the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha. Initially this may seem like some formula that doesn't have much immediate resonance for us. But as we deepen the practice, these three dimensions reveal themselves as aspects of our own being.

At first they appear external to us. The Buddha as a historical, brilliant teacher who had insight into radical awakening and understanding—insights we're still contemplating two and a half thousand years later. He taught for forty years, challenging the status quo of his time as a revolutionary teacher who split the atom of consciousness and awakened. His resonance reaches us still today.

We can think of the Buddha historically, archetypally, or as those beings who inspire us. When I reflect on our years living and working in South Africa, I think of someone like Nelson Mandela, whose life inspired a whole country. I think of my grandmother, who was extraordinarily sweet and had all the time in the world. If I had come home saying, "Nan, I've just murdered someone," she would have said, "Well, never mind dear, have a cup of tea and we'll talk about it." Whatever you brought to her doorstep was workable—someone who inspires us. She wasn't a Buddha, perhaps, but she was a bodhisattva: someone with compassion, love, and kindness.

I think of our dog Jack, who lived with us for fifteen years as we established our small hermitage on the border of Lesotho. The local Zulus called him "Numsan"—"the man"—because he was such a presence. Retreatants would arrive with stress and difficulties, and he would simply move among them with tremendous love. During practice, he would sit on his cushion, and when we chanted—especially Kuan Yin chants—he would throw himself on his back with legs in the air, making everyone laugh. If he didn't like the Dharma talk, he would get up, shake his collar, and walk out. He was an excellent teacher.

These beings, in whatever forms they come, inspire us. They are the energy that keeps us going.

The Dharma encompasses both the classical teachings—profound, brilliant, well-worn teachings practiced across generations—and the immediate Dharma of everything around us. I wouldn't have known how to practice samadhi, how to return to breath and body, if someone hadn't taught me. They could teach because they had received the teaching themselves—this entire lineage of Dharma teachings that inspire us.

More immediately, everything expresses itself according to Dharma. Nothing exists apart from Dharma nature. Everything teaches us: the trees, the moods of the heart, different people, the various unfoldings in the world. All of it becomes something we can contemplate and be with.

In Sangha, we discover that we can practice. We're not merely leaves in the wind. Whatever arises, we can practice. We can apply mindfulness, reflect wisely, discern clearly, and respond rather than react.

This refuge is an inner orientation we can align with again and again in each present moment. We practice returning, so that when life strikes in a big way or things happen, we know how to come back. We have refuge—an inner refuge not dependent on circumstances around us.

The Buddha also taught the refuge of ethics, of knowing how to align ourselves—as we reflected last night before entering retreat on the five great gifts.

Buddha called the five precepts the great gifts that offer freedom from oppression, freedom from fear, internally and externally. This ethical base is not dependent on external social or religious morals. In fact, often social and religious so-called morals are in direct conflict with an internal ethic. When that conflict arises and there's manipulation of behavior, if we don't have an internal ethic, we can find ourselves getting caught up in unwholesome actions. The karma from that can be very difficult.

To have this inner compass is what the Buddha called the hiri and ottappa - the conscience that can feel and is sensitive to when we move out of alignment with harmony with the Dharma. When we do or say something that was perhaps not skillful, we can feel that. There's a sensation: that didn't really go very well. We feel that and realign ourselves from that information without creating the sense of me as a guilty or bad person. It's much more dispassionate than that. That wasn't very skillful. That speech was hurtful, or that action was colored and tainted and manipulative in some way. I feel that and it informs me to be more careful.

The ottappa is having a sense of wholesome fear. If the mind suddenly gets activated into violence and you feel like you want to do something really outrageous - you're filled with hatred and want to act out of that - then something, when the conscience is working in a purified state, will arise like an internal red light and say, "That's not good. That's damaging. It's going to damage you, damage someone else. Just restrain. Hold back. Wait. Be patient."

The Buddha said these are the guardians of the world - these inner capacities for conscience. This is our internal ethic, and it becomes an internal compass for us, something we can rely on. It's very important in our world when there are so many influences, so many ways that human consciousness is hijacked and distorted and pushed into unwholesome actions of body, speech, and mind.

When Aung San Suu Kyi was under house arrest for many years as she stood for freedom in Burma, one of the things she said was that however much the state machinery oppresses, courage arises again and again. It can never destroy this inner courage, this inner strength, because this is the nature of the deepest heart. This is our deeper nature. It has courage. It's fearless. Yes, we can feel fear, we can feel the loss of courage, but we can return and know our refuge and know that there is capacity. It's been demonstrated by many inspiring people through time facing all sorts of different difficulties within society.

This practice of resilience is part of what we've been doing today - learning in a very simple way to gather, to know that when there is this capacity for samadhi, for gathering, there is a strengthening. From the very simple activity of moments of awareness, moments of mindfulness, moments of just being with one breath at a time, gradually there is this unification that starts to happen.

The gathering of the body starts to be illuminated with the energy of the mind. As the mind - this mental energy that's so fickle - starts to steady on the slow rhythm of the body, the mind starts to calm and the body starts to illuminate and digest some of the stress that it carries. Some of the undigested emotional material that is carried at the felt sense level starts to be digested by this samadhi, this gathering, and clears out our bodily experience energetically.

Then the mind begins - this mental faculty that's untrained and gets very colored by whatever state we experience - to steady and calm on the rhythm of the body. This is a unification, a steadiness. It's very pleasant, very pleasing as this is developed. It becomes an abiding that we can cultivate and return to - this inner steadiness, this singleness of focus in the moment.

This is a great skill to practice little by little, planting the seeds so that whatever arises in the field of our experience, when it hits the mind in that moment, hits the heart, touches the body, we feel it as sensitive beings. We can feel the effect of that. But then there's a moment: do we react? Do we act out of our activation and our patterning? Or can we digest? Can we pause? Can we take a breath? Maybe even one moment of taking a mindful breath may be the difference between creating heaven and hell in that moment.

One great Thai meditation master, Ajahn Tate, said that this practice is to discern the difference between mind and the activity of mind.

This is to discern between the citta, the awareness—the fundamental nature of mind that is aware. It has this knowing quality; it's untainted, luminous, reflective, discerning, clear. To know the difference between this undifferentiated awareness, this presence, and the activity—the mental activity, the movement of what's coming and going—to know the difference, to discern, and to be able to awaken into and recognize and touch, through the simple practice of returning one breath at a time, that which is unmoving, that which is aware, just present as a refuge, as a reference, as a point of well-being in the midst of whatever is happening.

When we think of something like climate change—we're in that reality now—it activates so many strong, destabilizing feelings: dread and fear and outrage, denial, dissociation, anxiety, all of these affects. And if we don't know the difference between that which can know what is arising but not be overwhelmed by what is arising, if we don't know this refuge, this place of returning, this practice, then we can just completely freak out and lose any capacity to respond from a place of clarity.

We're living at a time—we've always lived it, the world's always been unstable—but whatever we've understood as stable is really in question. That is something we can't rely on in perhaps the ways we have done in our world. We're living in circumstances where the chances and the likelihood of whatever's been stable for us, whatever we've relied on, is increasingly becoming unstable. So it's frightening, it's difficult.

Ajahn Chah would always say that if we look for certainty in the uncertain, then we're bound to suffer. We have created a culture and society where we've really tried to create certainty, and yet reality is uncertain—whether it's the reality of our life or our relationships or our economic status or our work or even our moods. But that's one thing. To even begin to take on board the instability of the elements that we're now experiencing—that's a whole other realm, a whole other heightened intensity.

So it means we have to really take this seriously in terms of our practice, to really take seriously and realize it's important that we use this time well, these times that we have to gather, to sow the seeds through this moment-by-moment simple practice that will support well-being, so whatever arises, we can meet it.

There's a poem you must know, "The Guest House" by Rumi: "This being human is a guest house. Every morning a new arrival—a joy, a depression, a meanness, some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor." I don't remember the lines exactly, but you get my drift—"Meet them at the door laughing." Well, it's not always easy to laugh at what we meet, what we might meet and what we are meeting. It's not easy, but this is an aspect of the practice: to know that actually, whatever is arising, there's still this dimension that we can awaken to that is okay.

Or as one of our teachers from Sri Lanka, Godwin Samararatna—I find it difficult to pronounce—would say: "Okay, even when it's not okay." It's not okay, but we can be okay because we know how to return. Even within this heart, this unified heart, it's blissful. It's the place that the Buddha said is more pleasurable than any sense pleasure.

This practice sows the seeds for profound joy. Gathered mind and heart, focused, absorbed, connected, rooted, steadied—it's a very pleasant abiding. It's a very healing abiding. So it's worth cultivating, and it's also an abiding that helps to strengthen us. So that gathered mind that's infused with steadiness, with this practice, when that is turned to whatever it's turned to, whatever touches us, then it's a very different experience than when we're touched by fear or dread and then just get overwhelmed and washed away and reactive.

So it's not easy. This isn't an easy practice. In fact, another great Thai meditation master who's considered a great master of samadhi, Ajahn Lee Dhammadharo, would make an analogy. He said this path, this path of awakening, is a bit like you're building a bridge from one shore to another. It's just an analogy—in some ways the shore that we're on and the shore that we're going to is always here. But it's just an analogy that we're moving; this path is a movement. It's a movement, a transformative process from a place of suffering and constriction and reactivity and stress, transformed into gatheredness, wise reflection, engaging whatever's presenting itself rather than being caught in a reactive experience.

So this is like building a bridge from one shore to another, and that bridge has to have supports. You build a support on the near bank and on the far bank, and those supports you can plunge down into the earth. You can see the earth; you can plunge those supports. But then that middle support—you've got to plunge it down through a fast-flowing river. That's difficult to do. I mean, I'm not an engineer, but I can imagine that would be more complicated.

And it's in the same way with this path, this transformative path that we're practicing. The near bank is the cultivation of ethics, sila, refuge—all of these wholesome qualities. And then that far bank is the wisdom aspect, that which can wisely reflect and notice things are changing, notice "It's like this in this moment. What is my relationship to how it is?" Can adjust, can apply inquiry. But those, he said, in some ways are accessible to us and in some ways easier.

Perhaps that's maybe relatively so. But the middle pillar, he made the analogy to this practice of samadhi, of gathering, which is in a way more patient and challenging work because of the fickle nature of the mind. It's always slipping away because of the momentum of our patterns. The patterns and habits are so powerful that when we sit here we just feel the momentum of that, always pulling. The mind is always like the asavas, always flooding out into our thinking, into our stories, into our distractions, into our wanting not to be here, into our wanting to be somewhere else, whatever it is.

And so plunging and encouraging and returning again and again to the very simple practice of moments of just being here with something that seems to be pretty boring perhaps at first—like one breath—that is challenging. That is not an easy thing to do, to sink that middle pillar.

So this is what we're doing today, what we're gathering. But it is a very vital pillar, because when that samadhi, when that gatheredness starts to really strengthen and become a strong base for practice, then it gives us a lot of capacity.

This capacity, this support in samadhi practice helps us to begin to discern between the activity of the mind and that which is just aware. We've all today experienced a lot of activity—a lot of different feelings, often different body states, a lot of different moods—and yet there is that which is aware, which is present to the experience. It's illuminating the experience actually. We know the experience without this fundamental awareness, this fundamental knowingness.

So to be able to discern that and to gather—gather the body through the mindfulness of the breath into the awareness, to gather the feeling tones of the heart however disparate, however tinged they might be sometimes with pain, to gather those into the awareness, to gather this mental activity into the awareness, to suffuse the awareness through these bodies, energy bodies and physical body, mind body, heart.

This samadhi is supported by many different factors, but one very helpful dharma principle—not only for supporting this practice but also as we talk about how to practice for the times we're in and the increasing destabilization of the elements due to climate change, due to increased destabilization that's creating all the effects of undermining stability and generating migration, beginning to create conflict, resource conflict, wars, beginning to create unpredictable and increased weather patterns, acidification of the oceans, diminishing of food availability. All of these things are beginning to become the world that we're moving into.

So how can we meet this? One of the dharma principles that's very important for us in these times and in our practice—both supporting this moment-by-moment cultivation of attention and for training to meet our lives, whatever our lives are, the bigger context of what's happening globally and then our personal lives, our community lives—is this principle of what's called in Buddhism nekkhamma, which means to simplify, it means to renounce, it means to know how to let go, how to put down.

Rather than—sometimes we can think that sounds like a bit of a drag, to renounce things, to say no to things—but actually in some ways it's saying yes. When you say no, it's saying yes to "there's enough here." To know what is enough is actually a very powerful place to be in, to be free from the conditioning of ever consuming, ever wanting, ever grasping, which leaves us in a weakened, disparate place. It's not our natural state, in fact. Yes, we have desire and needs, but to be always activated into needing more and more and more as an addictive pattern is not natural. It's not our natural health and sanity.

So to simplify is to know we can return to our natural health, our inner capacity for well-being. This works in both very subtle ways—to inwardly be willing, like even the moment of training your mind, train your attention to come to a breath as a moment of renunciation. Give your mind—no, "I want to think about this. I really want to think, it's really important that I kind of chew over that resentment a bit more. What they did, you know." So when you say, "Just put that down," it's a renunciation of ill will or renunciation of having to get right or get back or renunciation of the distracted mind, fantasizing mind.

So even on that subtle level, it's a strength that we're building. The fruit of that can become quite tangible in a retreat experience because then we start to actually connect with more contentment. We realize that something we've just overlooked—the boring breath, another meal, oh, another tree out there—can actually become a source of great fulfillment. You sometimes see yogis just staring at the trees or really enjoying their food because as there's a simplification, there's a sort of heightening of the senses, an appreciation for what is. One breath can be so fulfilling for us. This is a training because it's not usually how the mind works.

Or in our life, to practice: what can we give away? What can we—all the stuff, we have so much stuff—what can we let go of? I feel like I'm in a constant losing battle trying to trim things down because stuff just accumulates. I spent a few months cleaning out our place. There's not actually a lot in there, but it's still enough stuff. Packed it all up: some to the recycling, some to the dump, some to pass on. And I noticed it still seems to accumulate.

So it's a real practice to just keep—there's something about just being able to not be stuck to stuff, to be able to be that fluid. If we needed to leave our stuff, could we just leave it? So this is something we can contemplate. We can practice it and we can contemplate it, just so that there's that sharpness and aliveness of not having to hold so much in our minds and physically. To realize we can live quite simply.

This is one of the encouragements of the Buddha. It's one of the lifestyles he demonstrated in his life: to live very simply, in harmony with nature. To let go—this is what our teacher Ajahn Chah would always talk about—to practice with the mind that lets go, even when we're sitting here, rather than practice with the mind that's trying to attain something.

He said that regardless of time and place, the whole practice of the Dharma comes to completion at the place where there is nothing. It is the place of surrender, of emptiness, of laying down the burden. This is the finish. This is the finish. Coming to this place.

Actually, this is our reality. All of the other stuff is arbitrary in a way. The reality in the moment is the place of nothingness. It's the place of emptying. So when we come back to our one breath in this moment, we're really coming back to an emptying. We're coming back to this simplification, this letting go, this renouncing.

And that's why in some ways it's quite hard because we want to fill ourselves up with stuff—our thoughts and our feelings and our stories and our possessions and our roles and what we've got to do. But it's also a great relief to realize, and I'd like to encourage us, and I'm encouraging myself as well in this practice, because it is a practice that's ongoing. One doesn't just somehow snap out of one's habits. Mostly, for most of us, it's an ongoing practice to explore this willingness to enter into this place of nakedness really—the naked moment, the naked moment of awareness, of our presence, our truth behind all the layers and the patternings of the self, getting somewhere, fearing things, upset about things.

So this being able to surrender, as Ajahn Chah taught, to open into that inner space—it's a place of trust. We then are entering into this dimension that we're awakening into, this profound, alive, aware intelligence of the presence of the knowing of the heart. We're awakening into that.

And then when we listen into that, this is the place of the shift of consciousness. This is the place where we're listening together. I'm listening to that place. I'm listening inwardly, stripping away all of the layers of my stuff into the nakedness of my heart, the awareness here and now. You're listening. We're listening together. The world is listening. The earth is listening.

And it's from this place that response can emerge. A different kind of response, maybe. A response that's not splitting the world up into ten thousand things and creating more aversion.

My friend that I practice with, when she lost her child, the child died as a baby, and when I asked her years later how it was for her now, how she was with that very life-transforming experience of loss, how was she coping? And she said, "You know, when I think about my baby, I feel this tremendous grief. Of course, one would. I feel that anguish of loss. But when I return to my listening heart, to this place, this gathered refuge, this awareness—my child is listening there too. It's the place where we meet. It's where we hear a deeper intelligence. Where we hear the place where all things, as Ajahn Chah said, where they finish."

And it's the place of true response, whatever that response may be. I don't know how we will respond, how you will respond, how I will respond in the times we're in. That's for us to explore—many different kinds of response, whether it's to sit on a mountaintop spreading metta, whether it's to scream at the gates of the White House, whatever it is, this is our response. But can we do it from this heart, from this listening, from this resourcefulness? Can we do it at the door that can laugh, welcoming whatever is here rather than freaking out? Can we do it from a place that contributes to healing rather than continues to split?

This is a challenge. The heart that was demonstrated by Aung San Suu Kyi or Nelson Mandela. So whatever—we don't know. We don't know how it's going to turn out. We don't know. Some people say this sort of time we're in, it's like an excruciating. It's like a crucifixion. Maybe it's bringing forth a new birth.

Maybe that's the picture—that we're evolving something. I hope so. I love that possibility. But maybe not. Maybe it's the great sixth extinction. Who knows? We don't know. We're on the cusp.

But what we can know, what we can do, is turn very simply to this breath and know that we're planting the seeds of our capacity to maintain our sanity, our well-being, our strength, our refuge, our resiliency. All of that will inform whatever response emerges in the conditions we meet.

Ajahn Chah said that this activity of the mind—this mind-world, which are the same thing on some level—is like a cobra. Whether it's good or bad, liked or disliked, when you grasp it, it will poison you. It will affect you with longing and desire or with aversion and resistance. So you must know this mind, you must know this activity of the mind. Whatever it is, whether it's good or whether it's not good, watch it arise and pass. When you can do that, you will know peace—the peace that remains. This peace you can rely on.

This peace of our heart is present here and can be with whatever's unfolding. This peace we can rely on, whatever arises, whatever we meet, whatever responses are taken. We know how to return to this deeper peace.

This is our practice. This is why we do, as Ajahn Chah said, this difficult practice—to prepare, little by little, to plant the seeds. Moment by moment, each moment we return to the breath, we plant the seeds of our sanity, of our well-being, of our capacity. We plant the seeds of our awakening. We plant the seeds of our ability to be here together, listening within the times we're in and cultivating from that listening the optimum response that each of us can make.

CHAPTER 260

Responses to Climate Change: Awareness, Action and Celebration

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this Earth Day dharma talk, James Baraz introduces Bob Doppelt, who presents a framework called "From Me to We: Five Dharma Principles That Could Save the World." Doppelt, a longtime practitioner and climate policy expert, connects Buddhist teachings with environmental sustainability. The talk explores how core dharma principles—interdependence (pratītyasamutpāda), karma (cause and effect), moral conduct (śīla), compassion (karuṇā), and wisdom (prajñā)—offer essential guidance for addressing climate change. Beginning with a meditation on the breath to illustrate our interconnectedness with Earth's ecosystems, Doppelt presents five "natural laws of sustainability": interdependence, cause and effect, moral justice, trusteeship, and free will. He emphasizes how individual awareness and ethical action can create the collective consciousness needed to address global environmental challenges. The presentation includes a call for sangha members to petition dharma teachers for guidance on climate issues, reflecting the traditional relationship between students requesting teachings and teachers responding with wisdom.

So as promised, climate change—one of the reasons that we are here, one of the central topics of our focus in this time, in this era.

We're moving into our second segment of the morning with James Baraz, who you probably are all fairly familiar with. James has been central to the transmission of the Dharma in the West, and most specifically here in the Bay Area, starting many sitting groups and being a co-founder of this beautiful place, Spirit Rock, and author of a book called Awakening Joy. If you need some joy, I highly recommend it. James is going to introduce his co-presenter here, Bob Doppelt. They're calling their segment, "From Me to We: Five Dharma Principles That Could Save the World."

Well, it's so heartening and moving to see everybody here and to have this day together. I think this is a really significant day for us, for our community, for the greater Dharma community. I just want you to know that what you're doing here, people know about far away, too. Email wishes from two teachers in England, Catherine McGee and Chris Cullen. Tara Brach sent an email yesterday saying, "I hope it's a really great day, really successful day." Their communities and a lot of people know what we're doing here.

It is significant because it's our community coming together, taking refuge in the Sangha. This is one of the three jewels. And I think if anything can make a difference, it's all of us coming together to inspire, motivate each other, get in touch with our caring, with our concern for the planet. The more there's a kind of critical mass of people aligned with that intention, both in the Dharma community and, of course, out into the world, then there's a possibility of actually making a difference, making a real difference.

As one friend, a very wise friend and teacher, says, we're in a race between fear and consciousness. I think in the long term, consciousness always trumps fear. However, the question is, is there a long term? And just what's the timing on this? So all we can do is the best we can do and have as much consciousness spreading and addressing the fear. And I think what we have to offer here as Dharma practitioners and lovers of consciousness is something special that we have to offer to this whole question addressing our love for the planet.

The more we can come, as has been said and how Malcolm so beautifully articulated, and I know Joanna so beautifully articulates, the more we come from love and care and equanimity, as well as feeling all of our fear and all the emotions that come up, but not to lead from fear, to lead from love after we've processed all of our concern, the more magnetizing it is for everyone. So I think our dharma practice is key not only for ourselves, but for what we can contribute to the greater question.

I wanted to share that this is something that for a while has come more from practitioners than from teachers. There are a few teachers that are here today, particularly Wes and Donald and Mark and a number of teachers who have been really concerned and articulating so beautifully their care and inspiring others. But many, many teachers have been more focused on intensive practice. We're in the middle of a shift right now. And I want to share with you that shift that you can make a difference in.

At Spirit Rock, we're going to have an international Vipassana teachers' gathering in June, which we do every three or four years, either in Gaia House or Insight Meditation Society or here. It's coming up, and we're going to have it here in June. Mark and I and a couple of others, Sharda Rogel and Catherine McGee in England, are the organizers, and we get to help create the agenda. One of the main agenda items is going to be our role in the coming years, particularly addressing climate change. The role of teachers, the role of our community, the role of the Dharma. What do we have to offer as things start to become more and more important?

One of the things that we wanted to do that affects you or that involves you is that there's a letter that was written up first in England by Catherine and Chris and a couple of other people that is now being spread among various sanghas. Catherine McGee, who's a Gaia House teacher, has gone around to various sanghas as a kind of... You know, the Magna Carta, when the Magna Carta was brought to the king in 1215 from all these different communities saying, we want democracy. Well, we're having different sanghas sign this letter encouraging the teachers for guidance and teachings around this and taking a leadership role, as is customary in the traditional teachings that the students or practitioners request teachings.

If you've ever been to a monastic retreat, you know that the student, one of the students says, please, can you share the Dharma? And when the students request, then the teachers respond. This is a request for teachers to not only reflect for themselves, but to bring some guidance and teachings around this question.

---

blow up as you just at the bottom of the steps for you all to sign and also to take home—there's copies that you can take to your communities and friends either your formal sanghas or your dharma friends petitioning and requesting for teaching and leadership on climate change.

I want to just read to you the letter so you have a sense of it and you don't have to block while everybody is reading it if there's online.

"Dear teachers, the scale of the challenge presented by climate change is perhaps unprecedented in human history. Already it is a cause of immense destructive suffering to many species and ecosystems and to many of the poorest and most vulnerable people on the earth. The world's most respected climate scientists are unanimous that we indeed live in a time of emergency in which urgent action is needed.

We feel profoundly grateful for the teachings of the Buddha Dharma, and we believe that they have a great deal of wisdom to offer not only to Buddhist practitioners, but to wider society at this time of immense challenge. Spiritual and moral guidance is needed if we as a human society are to respond adequately and appropriately to this emergency.

We are therefore writing to ask you for your leadership, guidance, and teaching as we seek to explore the relevance of the Buddha's teachings amidst the crisis that we face. Together, we need to find a wise, engaged, and active Buddhist response. We wish to encourage you to reflect deeply, both as individuals and as a teacher body, and to speak about this issue and give guidance.

We hope that the forthcoming teacher meeting at Spirit Rock Meditation Center in June of 2013 will provide an opportunity for teachers to discuss this issue as a matter of priority and to begin to formulate wise collective responses on behalf of the Global Insight Meditation community. As members of this community, we are ready to engage with you as you do this.

With thanks and appreciation for your sharing of the Buddhist teachings in a world that needs to hear them."

And whatever your signature, you can write. If you want to write your own version of it or share some of your own thoughts, then please feel free to do that. And we're going to present this to the teachers. We'll have thousands of signatures. That's the idea for the teachers to say, "Oh, you know, it's like hitting your send button to move on," and hoping that your senators will get it.

I would like all the teachers to see how much this community cares and our greater community cares about addressing this. So I invite you to please take a look and sign it and take one home.

And now it gives me a great pleasure to introduce to you Bob Doppelt, who is an old friend. We first sat together in the 80s up at Breitenbush. And he's, besides being a longtime Dharma practitioner, one of the leading Dharma voices that is making a difference in this issue. He is the executive director for the Resource Innovation Group, which is based in Oregon. He teaches at Willamette University, and he's on the faculty of University of Oregon.

And he's also one of the organizers of this group collective called the National Climate Ethics Campaign, which is comprised of 135 organizations, 18 of which are working with the White House these days. And he and his group are actually coordinating these meetings. He's going back and forth to Washington a lot because the administration has it on their agenda as a priority. However, with all the other priorities, it's slipping lower on the priority list, but it's still on the priority list. And they're working to craft a narrative for people, for our country and our population to see, "Oh, this is something that affects me. I want to be part of this."

So it's not often that we have a Dharma practitioner that's making a difference in where it counts. And he wrote a book called "From Me to We." It's a fabulous book. Unfortunately, the copies that were supposed to be here didn't arrive in time. But it is a book that I've given a series of talks on in my Berkeley group. It's about five Dharma principles with the subtitle "The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life," put in a very non-jargony, accessible form for the general population of what's going to be needed to shift our consciousness and our action to make a difference in saving this planet and loving this planet for as long as we can.

So I'd like to hand it over to Bob now to share his philosophy and perspective on this.

Well, thank you, James. Thank you. It's wonderful to be here. I come here often for retreats, and it's nice to see all of you here on this Earth Day, and especially an Earth Day focused on climate change, which in fact is an extremely pressing issue that we all face, are going to have to deal with, are already dealing with, and certainly our children and their children are going to be dealing with. This is going to be the issue that all future generations have to adjust to.

What I do for a living is work with local, state, and federal government agencies and private organizations trying to help them think about and learn about ways to address these kinds of complex social, ecological, and economic issues. In the work I've done, I kept trying to find a way—a simple framework to help organizations and people realize the kinds of changes they need to make in their thinking and behavior to really become or adopt a true path to sustainability.

So the framework I'm going to share with you today has really emerged out of many years of experience. And what was remarkable to me was one of those "duh" experiences. I've been practicing socially engaged Buddhism for 25 years and not really connected it to my work on sustainability and climate change issues till 10 years ago or something.

And I realized the dharma principles are in fact the principles that we need to use to make this shift, but most people aren't really going to embrace the dharma right off the bat, especially if it's presented in Buddhist language or Buddhist jargon. So what I've done is tried to put this into a mainstream framework using mainstream language that I want to share with you today.

I'm going to go through this quickly because we don't have a lot of time, but I want to first start with a very simple way to think about the problem of climate change. This is a picture of what's called the Blue Marble—the very first photograph of our home, Earth, taken by the Apollo 17 astronauts in 1972. It's the first picture we ever had of ourselves hanging out there in space.

Now, I want everyone to take a very close look at this picture and see if you can find any intake valves that would allow us to bring in extra resources if we contaminate the ones we have or use up all the ones we have. Anybody see any? None. Now look very closely for the pipes that go away from the Earth that allow us to get rid of our toxicity and pollution and waste—those discharge pipes. Anybody see any there? No.

The Earth is a partially closed system, which means we take in solar radiation and reflect some of it back out into space. Some of it's captured in the mix of gases that surround the Earth, and the gases that are trapped create the heat that make life possible here. Other than that intake and outtake of solar radiation and a few meteorites every now and then, the Earth is a closed system. Everything we make, everything we do stays right here in our biosphere or in our immediate atmosphere.

What climate change is about is that we have actually created an anthropic breakdown of the systems we are part of and created too much growth—too many greenhouse gases that are building up in the immediate atmosphere and warming the Earth beyond what has existed for the last 10,000 years. But it's not just greenhouse gases. Through extensive forestry, converting forest lands to agriculture, filling wetlands, and so forth, we have also undermined or degraded nature's ability to sequester carbon. So we have both a source and a sink problem.

One way to think about the problem is always to think about the Blue Marble. Every decision you make, every product you buy, every time you use energy, any time you use a material, every technology you support or policy you support—ask yourself: How does it affect this closed, semi-closed system that is the Blue Marble?

As James just said it very well, I think we are actually in a race for time now between the growth of consciousness—which is really the growth of awareness of our connectedness with others and the growth of empathy and caring we're going to have to demonstrate in order to address this issue—and the growth of this entropic breakdown that's happening on the planet. The question is: which is going to win out?

I think we have no choice but to make sure that the growth in consciousness, the growth in empathy, the growth in caring for other people and the natural systems that created them and support them and created us and support us wins out. That said, we're also in line for some very difficult times ahead. We're going to hit roughly two degrees Celsius—3.6 degrees Fahrenheit above pre-industrial levels, from what we can tell. The question really is: can we keep it from going beyond that and into runaway climate change? So we've got some tough times ahead.

I want to share a framework that I think could help you think about a way to make this shift in thinking and behavior, and how you can also help others do the same thing. Because I think it's really important that we move beyond ourselves. First, we have to start with ourselves, but then we have to move beyond ourselves and motivate other people that we work with, our families, the organizations, and ultimately the institutions of society that really are controlling things.

I'm going to suggest that there are five interrelated commitments that you can think about to make this shift to increased empathy, increased caring for other people and the systems they're part of. None of these commitments are new. The Buddha talked about them 2,500 years ago. Many other religious leaders have talked about them, and the physical and social scientists describe them today. But they haven't really been put into a framework that I think the average person can understand.

These are really important principles today because they help us align our thinking and behavior with what I call the natural laws of sustainability. That's my own term for a set of universal truths that are going to be essential to follow—to learn how to interact with each other and the planet today if we're going to make this transition, come through this very difficult time that lies ahead, and come out the other end by managing global warming. We're not going to eliminate it. The best we can do now is manage it and then come out at a much better place down the road.

I'm also going to emphasize commitments, which are vows. Commitments reflect our sense of purpose, our values, and our priorities. We're going to have to make some very critical choices about what we're going to do and not do, what we're going to as a society allow and not allow through laws and regulations in order to manage this issue.

And we expand our choices by altering our interpretations of the world—or as the Buddha said, by seeing through the illusions that control our minds and seeing reality for what it is, being truthful about reality. That's what I hope these commitments help us do.

So I want to start by just having you, if you would, for those willing, relax into your body a bit. If you want to close your eyes, you can. Just take a few deep breaths and relax, let yourself settle in, let go of any tensions that you might have, and become aware of your breathing.

As you know, focusing on our breath is a way to concentrate our minds. But it is actually much more than that. I invite you to pay attention to what's actually happening within your body as you take in that breath. You're inhaling oxygen and exhaling carbon dioxide. Most of us don't realize that it is the oxygen we breathe that actually creates the energy that allows us to live. Oxygen metabolizes the food and water that you eat and drink and turns it into energy. Oxygen actually is the most important aspect of life. We can live for a long time without food and water. We can't live very long without oxygen.

Now think about it as you are aware of the breath that you're taking, and try to find out where this oxygen is coming from. What is the source of this oxygen that you're breathing that is allowing you to live right now? Well, about seventy-five percent of it is created through photosynthesis with green cells and green algae and bacteria in marine environments. And the other twenty-five percent of the oxygen you're breathing in right now is created through the same process—photosynthesis and vegetation all around you.

So complex interactions occurring in the oceans and in the estuaries and in vegetation are creating the oxygen that are allowing you to live right now. Just become aware of that. Try to trace in your mind and see if you can feel that oxygen coming in from these other sources and you're exhaling the CO2 that is absorbed by many of those same processes. And then try to ask yourself, how conscious are you of those processes? Every time you take a breath, do you give thanks to the oceans and the vegetation all around you? Of course, most of us don't. That's not something we normally do, but that is reality. This is how life on our planet actually functions.

Here is a fundamental truth: nothing exists on its own on this planet. Everything is created by and sustained by other processes and organisms. This is a core dharma principle and what in mainstream language I call the natural law of interdependence, which is the first and most important natural law of sustainability as I think about it.

In Buddhism, we call this emptiness and dependent origination. Nothing is a solid entity in itself. All things are dependent on multiple causes and multiple conditions. Anatta, or no-self in Buddhism, means that since all things change—our thoughts change, our feelings change, we're breathing oxygen in and it's going out as CO2—there is no such thing as a separate or permanent self. We, in fact, are just mediums through which energy is concentrated for a short period of time through our lifetime, and molecules of food and water and oxygen pass through, pass in and pass out.

Can you become aware of that as you follow your breath? Just how these molecules are entering and passing away, passing out of you. There is no permanent or separate me.

Now if you would come back and notice your own pattern of breathing and become aware of your immediate surroundings. If you would like to open your eyes, come back to the room.

The Buddha said we can give ourselves no greater gift than increasing our own awareness, and no greater gift to another than increasing our own awareness. So give yourself thanks for increasing your awareness of how interconnected we are.

If you are not constantly aware of the complex web of social and ecological systems that created you and sustain you, and create and sustain all other life on Earth, you're likely to do more harm than good. Said differently, if you're not constantly aware, trying to increase your awareness of the true context in which you exist, then we'll do more harm than good.

So the first natural law of sustainability is the law of interdependence. The dharma principle is emptiness, dependent origination. And the commitment then is to see the systems you're part of—to always strive to see the context in which you exist, the systems you're part of. It's very hard to see all the systems that we're part of.

We often have difficulty seeing the vast systems that sustain us. It's hard to perceive the oceans creating the oxygen we breathe. But there are practical tools we can use to develop this awareness. Systems mapping is one such approach. When I work with organizations, I have them map out their social systems on paper. With my college freshmen, I teach systems thinking and have them map their family system, their school system, and the ecological and economic systems they're part of.

If you haven't explored systems mapping, I encourage you to try it. It's a powerful tool that helps organizations truly understand the interconnected systems they inhabit. Unfortunately, most people today don't think systemically. We live in a culture of what I call extreme individualism that has grown for many reasons over the years. We believe we are freestanding, independent entities. In fact, at my college, there's an entire school of economics teaching that we are all separate entities with no responsibility for anyone else—that we should pursue our own economic self-interest without concern, and everything will magically turn out for the better.

A little experience and insight reveals this isn't true. Consider the financial collapse of 2009, when the financial industry pursued its own economic self-interest without considering the broader economic system it was part of, collapsing the entire world economy. Or here in the U.S. and other parts of the West, where we've pursued our economic self-interest by burning massive amounts of fossil fuels, destabilizing the climate system we're intimately part of. This way of thinking simply doesn't work.

We have confused self-centeredness with individual self, and consequently, we are all much less free. All of our children will be much less free in the future if we continue this path.

This brings us to the second natural law of sustainability: the law of cause and effect. Everything happens based on what emerged before it. In today's overcrowded, over-consumed, overheating, and super-connected world, everything we do creates the conditions for what will be possible in the future. This is the Buddhist principle of karma. What we do matters. Your actions have consequences. Everything has causes and conditions. The deeper you go into this understanding, the greater your awareness grows.

The commitment here is to account for all the consequences of your actions. Of course, just like seeing systems, it's difficult to account for all consequences. We often don't know, and sometimes there are unintended consequences we couldn't predict. But tools can help. Have you ever used a fishbone diagram? I have students do this exercise. You place the problem or action you're about to take at the head of what looks like a fish skeleton, then move backwards, outlining all possible consequences that might happen. These simple tools help expand our awareness.

It's never possible to understand all consequences of our actions, but as the Buddha taught, the key is to increase our awareness—always striving to expand our consciousness. This is really about right intention and right thought, becoming aware that we have choices. If we truly want to manage climate change to manageable levels, we must make different choices. This begins with understanding the systems we're part of, then being conscious of what our impacts mean for those systems. This is why we practice meditation—to increase our awareness and clear our minds.

I'd like you to take a journey with me now. Imagine that a genie has swept you away from your everyday job, your house, whatever you do for a living or with your time, and made you the most powerful decision maker on earth. Just play along with me. At your fingertips is any information you want to make any decision, and whatever you decide will happen. Actually, many of you would be excellent as the most powerful decision maker on earth, but bear with me.

There's a catch. This genie has given you a unique form of amnesia. You can't remember your name, where you live, who your family is, your nationality, religious status, or financial status. You don't remember anything about yourself. All you know is that whatever you decide will happen.

Now, how would you make decisions under these circumstances?

What's happening right at this very moment? Be here now. I would consult the wisest people I knew. Okay, so you would consult wise people. But wait—do we have any memory of what we already know or knew? No memory, because we don't know who we are.

Anybody else? "You'd want to help everyone." Wanting to help everyone—good. Okay, I think we have one more. Go ahead. "You don't know the consequences, so how would you make decisions?" Right, exactly. Okay, one more. "Use the seventh generation principle." Use the seventh generation principle—excellent.

I think all of these responses are getting at the core of it. You would adopt some decision-making model similar to the age-old moral rule called "do unto others as you would have them do unto you"—the golden rule. Because those others might be you, right? You don't know who you are.

What I've just described sounds completely far-fetched, doesn't it? It's never going to happen. But what I just described is actually more or less the condition we live in today. Those of us here in California and in the West are emitting greenhouse gas emissions that are affecting people in China, in India, and all over the world. They don't know we decided to drive our car here today and made that decision, but it's going to affect them. And vice versa—they're doing the same thing.

We have globalized environmental problems never before seen on Earth—global issues like climate change, ocean acidification, the breakdown of the biosphere. Each of us now is making decisions that affect everyone else. We're living in a very different era, even from thirty or forty years ago. Because of that, we're going to have to think and act differently.

It starts with first understanding the systems we're part of and the consequences of our actions on those systems. Then we have to decide how we're going to respond. And I think the first response is to adopt a clear moral principle based on what I call moral justice. In Buddhist terms, this is sila—moral conduct—which in Buddhism is the foundation of a peaceful life.

This really means we have to adopt the moral principle, the starting principle, to do no harm. Every religion that I looked at when developing this model begins with the belief that we must do no harm. Even if you can't do good, try not to do harm. That's the first starting point. The commitment is to adopt the universal moral principle to do no harm.

This is about trying to constrain our aggressive and harmful activities. It's not always possible to know all the different aspects of what we do and how it might harm others, but we really need to focus and raise our awareness as much as we can.

So reflect for just a moment: How often do you strive to do no harm? How often are you aware of that moral principle as a driver for your life? Sometimes? Never? Often? We'll come back to this in a second. But just become aware—do you have a core moral principle of doing no harm?

Now I want you to play along with me again for just a second and go back to that first picture we showed of the blue marble. The acceleration of population has led to an acceleration of economic activity, which has led to an acceleration of energy use around the world, and material use, and basically climate change as a result of massive throughput of energy and materials through our economy. Because energy that's used only breaks down and disperses, that's what created climate change.

And so what many scientists are now saying is that this massive increase of human impacts on the planet, on our blue marble, has actually ushered us into a completely new geological era. For the first time in Earth's history, human activities—rather than natural processes—will determine future life on our planet. Natural processes will certainly interact with our actions, but we are now the primary driver. This new era is called the Anthropocene.

Climate scientists and others are speaking about this transformation. Perhaps you've heard this term before—the Anthropocene? They're telling us we've entered a different era now, permanently, for the first time ever. This means that what we determine, what we do, what we decide, the actions we take, the technologies we adopt, the policies we implement—all of this will determine future life on Earth. What lives and what doesn't, where they live and where they cannot, how the entire web of existence shapes itself.

There is a universal moral axiom: the more power you have over another, the more responsibility you have to use that power benevolently. This means we have now become trustees. This is the fourth natural law of sustainability—the law of trusteeship.

This principle embodies karuna, having compassion and taking care of all living organisms. It encompasses mudita, taking joy in others rather than being concerned only with ourselves. And it requires non-attachment. Trusteeship recognizes that each of us is on Earth for only a very short period of time. No one in this room will be here one hundred years from now. This means we are only temporarily managing or responsible for the resources we have stewardship over. We are temporary trustees.

We now bear the responsibility that what we decide as trustees will determine what life on Earth exists fifty, one hundred, one hundred fifty years from now, and where it will exist. We have the responsibility to manage this sacred trust with extraordinary care.

The fourth commitment, therefore, is to adopt your trustee obligations and do good for all life. The first principle of moral justice focuses on trying to do no harm. But now, because climate change has become so serious and other impacts so profound, we also must actively do good.

Different tools and strategies are developing for each of these principles. Most organizations I work with—businesses and governments—are focused on reducing their environmental impacts, which means doing less harm. But we also need to transform our approach entirely and actively do good.

There are emerging fields you might know of, such as biomimicry, where we create new products and services that mimic nature's wisdom. There's green chemistry, which uses natural processes rather than synthetic chemicals. We actually must restore the Earth—we cannot simply reduce the harm we're doing to it. This is the crucial difference between the two approaches.

The final principle I want to share is the principle of free will—the natural law of free will. The Buddha taught often that as we increase our awareness, we become aware that we are free at any moment to make different choices. But this requires greater awareness and deeper understanding.

The dharma principle connected with free will is paññā—the wisdom that leads us out of suffering. This wisdom manifests as increased awareness and increased mindfulness of all our actions, of the systems we participate in, of how we impact those systems. It involves adopting an ethical way of life and understanding that we are trustees.

This is the final principle: choose your own destiny. We do not have to continue down the path we have traveled these last fifty to one hundred years. Throughout history, societies have made fundamentally different changes driven by new ways of thinking and seeing the world—many, many times. We don't always realize this transformation is possible, but it has happened repeatedly. And each time societies have made such fundamental shifts, most people have ended up much better off.

I believe that as we expand our consciousness—and perhaps this framework can help you and others do just that—we will all find ourselves much better off.

If we have two more minutes, I'd like each of you to reflect briefly on how often you find yourself following these commitments, essentially following these dharma principles. Then turn to a partner and share for a moment what you discovered.

Evaluate yourself honestly—how well are you doing? How much awareness are you cultivating? Try to stay focused on the dharma principles. For just a very short time, share this reflection with a partner and explore it together. We'll take two minutes for this conversation.

Does anyone want to share something that emerged from this conversation? Anything that became particularly clear or meaningful? I apologize for the brief duration—I encourage you to continue this dialogue afterward for as long as you can. What would anyone like to share?

Absolutely. The point you raise is crucial—it's challenging to make right choices or skillful choices today because of the structure of the systems we're embedded within. I think we all feel this tension deeply.

But this practice is not about achieving perfection. This is about continuously expanding our awareness. As more people expand their awareness, we will generate the collective wisdom and political will necessary to transform those very systems that currently constrain our choices.

So it's really about increased mindfulness and then encouraging others to take the same steps forward.

I think the comment from the back was that we often get stuck thinking only about cause and effect, without considering the systems we're part of and the moral principles we need to adopt. Moral justice needs to guide our thinking and behavior, along with trusteeship. You're absolutely right. That's why I use this framework now with public and private organizations and nonprofits of all kinds, and I find very positive results.

We're actually using it in work I've been coordinating with the administration to encourage a national conversation about climate change. I'm optimistic that something significant is going to happen. They've gotten overwhelmed with the gun debate, healthcare, immigration, and other issues, so finding political space for them to act has been one of our challenges. The structure of the system in which the White House works is also very difficult to navigate, and there are other issues within the administration itself. But I'm optimistic that we will see this administration take more positive steps than any other, by helping them expand their awareness beyond narrow issues.

The point about not getting caught up in self-judgment is absolutely right. The more aware you become of the consequences of your actions, the more you can feel humbled and think, "Oh my gosh, I'm doing all these wrong things." But you have to first realize the systems you're part of—you live in this society. Then constantly grow your awareness and realize that you have a choice.

The more choices you make, the better off you're going to be. Sometimes you make a choice thinking it's not the best one you could have made, that it might have serious impact, but it's the only thing you can do. As long as you're aware of it, next time you can make a different choice. And as other people begin to think the same way, we can create the social change necessary to transform the structures of those systems.

So don't feel bad. This is just the structure of the systems we're working in. But keep growing your awareness.

I want to thank Bob for coming and sharing all the work that he's doing—truly making a difference. And remember to write those letters to teachers to help encourage and motivate them to make a difference.

I'll leave you with this quote from John Seed, who Joanna teaches with—a very inspiring environmental deep ecology being. He says: "Well, you might think there's nothing on the horizon that can help us. And you might wonder what kind of miracle would be needed to make a difference? Well, it would be a very simple one, really. All that it would need would be for human beings to wake up one day different than they were the day before and realize that this is the end unless we make these changes, and then deciding to make the change.

"That doesn't seem like a very likely thing to happen. But on the other hand, the whole road that we've traveled is so littered with miracles that it's only our strange kind of modern psyche that refuses to see it. I mean, the miracle of being descended from a fish that chose to leave the water and walk on the land. Well, anyone with a pedigree like that—you can't lose hope."

Thank you very much.

CHAPTER 261

From Me to We: Five Dharma Principles That Could Save the World

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this powerful Earth Day address, Rob Burbea presents five interconnected dharma principles essential for addressing climate change and environmental crisis. Drawing from core Buddhist teachings including pratītyasamutpāda (dependent origination), karma, śīla (ethical conduct), and karuṇā (compassion), Burbea demonstrates how ancient wisdom provides a framework for contemporary environmental challenges.
>
> The talk explores the 'natural laws of sustainability': interdependence (recognizing our connection to all life systems), cause and effect (understanding karmic consequences), moral justice (commitment to do no harm), trusteeship (compassionate stewardship of Earth), and free will (wisdom to choose different paths). Through guided meditation on breath and oxygen cycles, participants experience viscerally how deeply interconnected we are with marine ecosystems and vegetation that sustain life.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that climate change represents humanity's entry into the Anthropocene epoch, where human decisions determine future life on Earth. This unprecedented responsibility requires moving from 'extreme individualism' to systems awareness, recognizing that our individual choices affect the entire 'blue marble' of Earth. The presentation concludes with practical tools like systems mapping and fishbone diagrams for expanding awareness, while maintaining hope that collective awakening can create the transformation needed for planetary healing.

So as promised, we turn to climate change—one of the reasons we are here, one of the central topics of our focus in this time, in this era. We're moving into our second segment of the morning with James Baraz, who you probably are all fairly familiar with. James has been central to the transmission of the Dharma in the West, and most specifically here in the Bay Area, starting many sitting groups and being a co-founder of this beautiful place, Spirit Rock, and author of a book called Awakening Joy. If you need some joy, I highly recommend it. James is going to introduce his co-presenter here, Bob Doppelt. They're calling their segment "From Me to We: Five Dharma Principles That Could Save the World."

Well, it's so heartening and moving to see everybody here and to have this day together. I think this is a really significant day for us, for our community, for the greater Dharma community. I just want you to know that what you're doing here, people know about far away, too. Email wishes came from two teachers in England, Catherine McGee and Chris Cullen. Tara Brach sent an email yesterday saying, "I hope it's a really great day, really successful day." Their communities and a lot of people know what we're doing here.

And it is significant because it's our community coming together, taking refuge in the Sangha. This is one of the three jewels. And I think if anything can make a difference, it's all of us coming together to inspire and motivate each other, to get in touch with our caring, with our concern for the planet. The more there's a kind of critical mass of people aligned with that intention, both in the Dharma community and, of course, out into the world, then there's a possibility of actually making a difference, making a real difference.

As one friend, a very wise friend and teacher, says, we're in a race between fear and consciousness. I think in the long term, consciousness always trumps fear. However, the question is, is there a long term? And just what's the timing on this? So all we can do is the best we can do and have as much consciousness spreading and addressing the fear. I think what we have to offer here as Dharma practitioners and lovers of consciousness is something special that we have to offer to this whole question of addressing fear and our love for the planet.

The more we can come, as has been said and how Malcolm so beautifully articulated, and I know Joanna so beautifully articulates, the more we come from love and care and equanimity, as well as feeling all of our fear and all the emotions that come up, but not to lead from fear, to lead from love after we've processed all of our concern —the more magnetizing it is for everyone. So I think our dharma practice is key not only for ourselves, but for what we can contribute to the greater question.

I wanted to share that this is something that for a while has come more from practitioners than from teachers. There are a few teachers that are here today, particularly Wes and Donald and Mark and a number of teachers who have been really concerned and articulating so beautifully their care and inspiring others. But many teachers have been more focused on intensive practice. We're in the middle of a shift right now, and I want to share with you that shift that you can make a difference in.

At Spirit Rock, we're going to have an international Vipassana teachers' gathering in June, which we do every three or four years, either in Gaia House or Insight Meditation Society or here. It's coming up, and we're going to have it here in June. Mark and I and a couple of others, Sharda Rogel and Catherine McGee in England, are the organizers, and we get to help create the agenda. One of the main agenda items is going to be our role in the coming years, particularly addressing climate change—the role of teachers, the role of our community, the role of the Dharma. What do we have to offer as things start to become more and more important?

One of the things that we wanted to do that affects you or that involves you is that there's a letter that was written up first in England by Catherine and Chris and a couple of other people that is now being spread among various sanghas. Catherine McGee, who's a Gaia House teacher, has gone around to various sanghas as a kind of—you know, the Magna Carta, when the Magna Carta was brought to the king in 1215 from all these different communities saying, "we want democracy." Well, we're having different sanghas sign this letter encouraging the teachers for guidance and teachings around this and taking a leadership role, as is customary in the traditional teachings that the students or practitioners request teachings.

If you've ever been to a monastic retreat, you know that the student, one of the students says, "Please, can you share the Dharma?" And when the students request, then the teachers respond. And so this is a request for teachers to not only reflect for themselves, but to bring some guidance and teachings around this question. And there is a letter, one copy of this letter...

requesting for teaching and leadership on climate change.

I want to read you this letter so you have a sense of it, and you don't have to struggle reading while everyone else is looking at it online.

"Dear Teachers, the scale of the challenge presented by climate change is perhaps unprecedented in human history. Already it is a cause of immense destructive suffering to many species and ecosystems and to many of the poorest and most vulnerable people on the earth. The world's most respected climate scientists are unanimous that we indeed live in a time of emergency in which urgent action is needed.

We feel profoundly grateful for the teachings of the Buddha Dharma, and we believe that they have a great deal of wisdom to offer not only to Buddhist practitioners, but to wider society. At this time of immense challenge, spiritual and moral guidance is needed if we as a human society are to respond adequately and appropriately to this emergency.

We are therefore writing to ask you for your leadership, guidance, and teaching as we seek to explore the relevance of the Buddha's teachings amidst the crisis that we face. Together, we need to find a wise, engaged, and active Buddhist response.

We wish to encourage you to reflect deeply, both as individuals and as a teacher body, and to speak about this issue and give guidance. We hope that the forthcoming teacher meeting at Spirit Rock Meditation Center in June of 2013 will provide an opportunity for teachers to discuss this issue as a matter of priority and to begin to formulate wise collective responses on behalf of the Global Insight Meditation community. As members of this community, we are ready to engage with you as you do this.

With thanks and appreciation for your sharing of the Buddhist teachings in a world that needs to hear them."

Whatever your signature, you can write your own version or share some of your thoughts if you wish. We're going to present this to the teachers with thousands of signatures. The idea is for the teachers to recognize—like hitting your send button to move on and hoping that your senators will get it. I would like all the teachers to see how much this community cares and our greater community cares about addressing this.

So I invite you to please take a look, sign it, and take one home.

Now it gives me great pleasure to introduce Bob Doppelt, who is an old friend. We first sat together in the 1980s up at Breitenbush. Besides being a longtime Dharma practitioner, he's one of the leading Dharma voices making a real difference on this issue.

He is the executive director of the Resource Innovation Group, based in Oregon. He's associated with Willamette College and is on the faculty of University of Oregon. He's also one of the organizers of the collective called the National Climate Ethics Campaign, which is comprised of 135 organizations, 18 of which are working with the White House these days. He and his group are actually coordinating these meetings. He goes back and forth to Washington frequently because the administration has this on their agenda as a priority. However, with all the other priorities, it's slipping lower on the priority list, but it's still there.

His work is to craft a narrative for people, for our country and our population to see: "Oh, this is something that affects me. I want to be part of this." It's not often that we have a Dharma practitioner making a difference where it counts.

He wrote a book called "From Me to We." It's a fabulous book. Unfortunately, the copies that were supposed to be here didn't arrive in time. But it is a book I've given a series of talks on in my Berkeley group—five Dharma principles with the subtitle "The Five Transformational Commitments Required to Rescue the Planet, Your Organization, and Your Life." It's presented in a very accessible, non-jargony form for the general population about what's needed to shift our consciousness and our action to make a difference in saving this planet and loving this planet for as long as we can.

So I'd like to hand it over to Bob now to share his philosophy and perspective on this.

Well, thank you, James. It's wonderful to be here. I come here often for retreats, and it's nice to see all of you here on this Earth Day—especially an Earth Day focused on climate change, which is indeed an extremely pressing issue that we all face, are going to have to deal with, are already dealing with. Certainly our children and their children are going to be dealing with this. This is going to be the issue that all future generations have to adjust to.

What I do for a living is work with local, state, and federal government agencies and private organizations, trying to help them think about and learn ways to address these kinds of complex social, ecological, and economic issues. In the work I've done, I kept trying to find a simple framework to help organizations and people realize the kinds of changes they need to make in their thinking and behavior to really become or adopt a true path to sustainability.

So the framework I'm going to share with you today has emerged out of many years of experience. What was remarkable to me—it's one of those "duh" experiences—I've been practicing socially engaged Buddhism for 25 years and didn't really connect it to my work on sustainability and climate change issues until about 10 years ago.

And I realized the Dharma principles are in fact the principles we need to use to make this shift, but most people aren't really going to embrace the Dharma right off the bat, especially if it's presented in Buddhist language or Buddhist jargon. So what I've done is tried to put this into a mainstream framework using mainstream language that I want to share with you today.

I'm going to go through it quickly because we don't have a lot of time, but I want to first start with a very simple way to think about the problem of climate change. This is a picture of what's called the Blue Marble - the very first picture of our home, the Earth, taken by the Apollo 17 astronauts in 1972. It's the first picture we ever had of ourselves sort of hanging out there in space.

Now, I want everyone to take a very close look at this picture and see if you can find any intake valves that are allowing us to bring in extra resources if we contaminate the ones we have or use up all the ones we have. Anybody see any? None. Now look very closely for the pipes that go away from the earth that allow us to get rid of our toxicity and pollution and waste, those discharge pipes. Anybody see any there? No.

The Earth is a partially closed system, which means we take in solar radiation and reflect some of it back out into space. Some of it's captured in the mix of gases that surround the Earth, and the gases that are trapped create the heat that make life possible here on Earth. Other than that intake and outtake of solar radiation and a few meteorites every now and then, the Earth is a closed system. Everything we make, everything we do stays right here in our biosphere or in our immediate atmosphere.

What climate change is about is that we have actually created an anthropic breakdown of the systems we are part of and created too much growth - too many greenhouse gases that are building up in the immediate atmosphere and warming the earth beyond what has existed for the last 10,000 years. But it's not just greenhouse gases. Through extensive forestry, converting forest lands to agriculture, filling wetlands, and so forth, we have actually undermined or degraded nature's ability to sequester carbon as well. So we have both a source and a sink problem.

One way to think about the problem is to always think about the blue marble. Every decision you make, every product you buy, every time you use energy, any time you use a material, every technology you support or policy you support - ask yourself: How does it affect this closed, semi-closed system that is the blue marble?

As James just said it very well, I think we are actually in a race for time now between the growth of consciousness - which is really the growth of awareness of our connectedness with others and the growth of the empathy and caring we're going to have to demonstrate in order to address this issue - and the growth of this entropic breakdown that's happening on the planet. The question is, which is going to win out?

I think we have no choice but to make sure that the growth in consciousness, the growth in empathy, the growth in caring for other people and the natural systems that created them and support them and created us and support us win out. But that said, we're also in line for some very difficult times ahead. We're going to hit roughly 2 degrees Celsius, 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit above pre-industrial levels from what we can tell. The question really is, can we keep it from going beyond that and into runaway climate change? So we've got some tough times ahead.

I want to share a framework that I think could help you think about a way to make this shift in thinking and behavior and how you can also help others do the same thing. Because I think it's really important that we move beyond ourselves. First, we have to start with ourselves, but then we have to move beyond ourselves and motivate other people that we work with, our families, the organizations, and ultimately the institutions of society that really are controlling things.

I'm going to suggest that there are five interrelated commitments that you can think about to make this shift to increased empathy, increased caring for other people and the systems they're part of. None of these commitments are new. The Buddha talked about them 2,500 years ago. Many other religious leaders have talked about them. Physical and social scientists describe them today. But they haven't really been put into a framework that I think the average person can understand.

These are really important principles today because they help us align our thinking and behavior with what I call the natural laws of sustainability. That's my own term for a set of universal truths that are going to be essential to follow to learn how to interact with each other and the planet today if we're going to make this transition, come through this very difficult time that lies ahead, and come out the other end by managing global warming. We're not going to eliminate it. The best we can do now is manage it and then come out at a much better place down the road.

I'm also going to emphasize commitments, which are vows. Commitments reflect our sense of purpose, our values, and our priorities. We're going to have to make some very critical choices about what we're going to do and not do, what we're going to as a society allow and not allow through laws and regulations in order to manage this issue.

And we expand our choices by altering our interpretations of the world, or as the Buddha said, by seeing through the illusions that control our minds and seeing reality for what it is—being truthful about reality. That's what I hope these commitments help us do.

So I want to start by inviting you, for those willing, to relax into your body a bit. If you want to close your eyes, you can. Take a few deep breaths. Just relax, let yourself settle in, let go of any tensions you might have, and become aware of your breathing.

As you know, focusing on our breath is a way to concentrate our minds. But it is actually much more than that. I invite you to pay attention to what's actually happening within your body as you take in that breath. You're inhaling oxygen and exhaling carbon dioxide. Anyone who's inhaling carbon dioxide, raise your hand.

Most of us don't realize that it is the oxygen we breathe that actually creates the energy that allows us to live. Oxygen metabolizes the food and water that you eat and drink and turns it into energy. Oxygen is actually the most important aspect of life. If you don't believe me, let's all hold our breath for two or three minutes. We can live for a long time without food and water. We can't live very long without oxygen.

Now think about it as you are aware of the breath you're taking and try to find out where this oxygen is coming from. What is the source of this oxygen you're breathing that is allowing you to live right now?

About seventy-five percent of it is created through photosynthesis with green cells and green algae and bacteria in marine environments. The other twenty-five percent of the oxygen you're breathing right now is created through the same process—photosynthesis in vegetation all around you.

So complex interactions occurring in the oceans and in the estuaries and in vegetation are creating the oxygen that is allowing you to live right now. Just become aware of that. Try to trace in your mind and see if you can feel that oxygen coming in from these other sources as you exhale the carbon dioxide that is absorbed by many of those same processes.

Then try to ask yourself: How conscious are you of those processes? Every time you take a breath, do you give thanks to the oceans and the vegetation all around you? Of course, most of us don't. That's not something we normally do, but that is reality. This is how life on our planet actually functions.

Here is a fundamental truth: Nothing exists on its own on this planet. Everything is created by and sustained by other processes and organisms. This is a core dharma principle and what in mainstream language I call the natural law of interdependence—the first and most important natural law of sustainability.

In Buddhism, we call this śūnyatā and pratītyasamutpāda—emptiness and dependent origination. Nothing is a solid entity in itself. All things are dependent on multiple causes and multiple conditions. Anattā, or no-self in Buddhism, means that since all things change—our thoughts change, our feelings change, we're breathing oxygen in and it's going out as carbon dioxide—there is no such thing as a separate or permanent self.

We, in fact, are just mediums through which energy is concentrated for a short period of time through our lifetime, and molecules of food and water and oxygen pass through—pass in and pass out. Can you become aware of that as you follow your breath? How these molecules are entering and passing away, passing out of you? There is no permanent or separate me.

Now if you would, come back and notice your own pattern of breathing and become aware of your immediate surroundings. If you'd like to open your eyes, come back to the room.

The Buddha said we can give ourselves no greater gift than increasing our own awareness and no greater gift to another than increasing our own awareness. So give yourself thanks for increasing your awareness of how interconnected we are.

If you are not constantly aware of the complex web of social and ecological systems that created you and sustain you, and create and sustain all other life on Earth, you're likely to do more harm than good. Said differently, if you're not constantly aware, trying to increase your awareness of the true context in which you exist, then you'll do more harm than good.

So the first natural law of sustainability is the law of interdependence. The dharma principle is śūnyatā and pratītyasamutpāda—emptiness and dependent origination. And the commitment then is to see the systems you're part of, to always strive to see the context in which you exist—the systems you're part of. It's very hard to see all the systems that we're part of.

We often struggle to see the oceans creating the oxygen we breathe, yet there are practical tools that can help us develop this awareness. Systems mapping, for instance, is a powerful methodology I employ when working with organizations. I have them literally map out their social systems on paper. Similarly, when teaching systems thinking to college freshmen, I guide them through mapping their family systems, school systems, and the ecological and economic systems they participate in.

If you haven't explored systems mapping, I would strongly encourage you to try it. It's a transformative tool that helps organizations truly understand the systems they inhabit. Unfortunately, most people today don't think systemically. We live in a culture of what I call extreme individualism that has grown over the years for various reasons. We have come to believe we are freestanding, independent entities. In my college, there's an entire school of economics that teaches we are all autonomous entities with no responsibility for anyone else—that we should pursue our own economic self-interest without concern, and everything will magically work out for the better.

A little experience and insight suggests this isn't true. Consider the 2008 financial collapse, where the financial industry pursued its own economic self-interest without considering the economic system it was part of, collapsing the entire world economy. Or look at us here in the United States and other parts of the West, where we have pursued our economic self-interest by burning massive amounts of fossil fuels, collapsing the climate system we are intimately part of. This way of thinking simply doesn't work.

We have confused self-centeredness with individual self, and consequently, we are all much less free. Our children will be much less free in the future if we continue down this path.

This brings us to the second natural law of sustainability: the law of cause and effect. Everything happens based on what emerged before it. In today's overcrowded, overconsumed, overheating, and hyper-connected world, everything we do now creates the conditions for what will be possible in the future. This is, of course, the Buddhist principle of karma. What we do matters. Your actions have consequences. Everything has causes and conditions. The deeper you go into this understanding, the better off you'll be as your awareness grows.

The commitment here is to try to account for all the consequences of your actions. Of course, just like seeing systems, it's very difficult to account for all consequences. We often don't know, and sometimes there are unintended consequences we couldn't predict. But there are tools we can use.

Have any of you used a fishbone diagram? It's a simple tool I have students employ. You place the problem or action you're about to take at what looks like the head of a fish, resembling a fish skeleton, and work backwards. You outline all the possible consequences that might happen by taking that step—simple tools to help expand our awareness.

It's never possible to understand all the consequences of our actions, but as the Buddha said, the real key is to increase our awareness. Always try to increase our awareness. This is really about right intention and right thought—becoming aware that we have choices and that if we truly want to manage and reduce climate change to manageable levels, we must make different choices. This starts by first understanding the systems we're part of, then trying to be very conscious of what our impacts mean for those systems.

Of course, this is why we practice meditation—to increase our awareness and clear our minds.

I'd like you to take a journey with me now. Imagine that a genie has swept you away from your everyday job, your house, whatever you do for a living or with your time, and made you the most powerful decision maker on earth. At your fingertips is any information you want to make any decision you want, and whatever you decide will happen. Many of you here would actually be beneficial as the most powerful decision maker on earth, but please, play along with me.

But there is a catch. This genie has given you a unique form of amnesia. You can't remember your name, where you live, who your family is, your nationality, your religious status, or your financial status. You don't remember anything about yourself. All you know is that whatever you decide will happen.

Now, how would you make decisions under that circumstance?

What's happening right at the moment? Be here now. I would consult the wisest people I knew.

Okay, consult the wise people. Do we have any memory of what we already know or knew? No memory, because we don't know who we are. Anybody else?

You'd want to help everyone. Want to help everyone. Okay.

One more? Right. So you don't know the consequences, so how would you make decisions?

Use the seventh generation principle. Use the seventh generation principle, good.

I think all those are getting at the core of it. I think you would adopt some decision-making model that's similar to the age-old moral rule called "do unto others as you would have them do unto you"—the golden rule. Because those others might be you, right? You don't know who you are.

What I describe sounds completely far-fetched, right? It's never going to happen. But what I just described is actually more or less the condition we live in today. Those of us here in California and in the West are emitting greenhouse gas emissions that are affecting people in China, in India, and all over the world. They don't know we've decided to drive our car here today and made that decision, but it's going to affect them. And vice versa—they're doing the same thing.

We have globalized environmental problems never before seen on Earth, these kinds of global issues like climate change, ocean acidification, the breakdown of the biosphere. Each of us now is making decisions that affect everyone else. We're living in a very different era, even than we lived in thirty and forty years ago. Because of that, we're going to have to think and act differently.

It starts with first understanding the systems we're part of and the consequences of those systems, of our actions on those systems. Then we have to decide how we're going to respond.

I think the first response is to adopt a clear moral principle based on the natural law that I call moral justice. In Buddhist terms, this is sila, moral conduct, which in Buddhism is the foundation of a peaceful life. It really means that we have to adopt the moral principle, the starting principle, to do no harm.

Every religion that I looked at when I was developing this model begins with the belief that we must do no harm. Even if you can't do good, try not to do harm. That's the first starting point. The commitment is to adopt the universal moral principle to do no harm. This is about trying to constrain our aggressive and harmful activities that we engage in.

It's not always possible to know all the different aspects of what we do and how it might harm others, but we really need to focus and raise our awareness of it as much as we can.

So reflect for just a moment: How often do you strive to do no harm? How often are you aware of that moral principle as a driver for your life? Sometimes? Never? Often? We'll come back to this in a second. But just become aware. Do you have a core moral principle of doing no harm?

Now I want you to play along with me again for just a second and go back to that first picture we showed on the PowerPoint of the blue marble. The acceleration of the population has led to an acceleration of economic activity, which has led to an acceleration of energy use around the world, and material use, and basically climate change as a result of a massive throughput of energy and materials through our economy. Because energy that's used only breaks down and disperses, that's what created climate change.

And so what many scientists are now saying is that this massive increase of human impacts on the planet, on the blue marble, has actually put us into a very new geological era. For the first time ever, human activities will determine future life on Earth, not natural processes. Of course, natural processes will interact with that. It's called the Anthropocene.

Climate scientists are now talking about this—that we're in a different era now, forever, for the first time ever. This means that what we determine, what we do, what we decide, the actions we take, the technologies we adopt, the policies we adopt, will determine future life on Earth. What lives, what doesn't, and where they live, how things shape up differently.

It is a universal moral axiom that the more power you have over another, the more responsibility you have to use that power benevolently. This means that we are now trustees. This is the fourth natural law of sustainability—the law of trusteeship.

This is actually about karuṇā, having compassion and taking care of all living organisms, muditā, taking joy in others rather than just being concerned about ourselves, and non-attachment. Trusteeship means that each of us here is just on Earth for a very short period of time. No one in this room will be here 100 years from now. This means we're only temporarily managing or responsible for the resources we have. We're just temporary trustees.

We have a responsibility now because what we decide as trustees will determine what life on earth exists 50, 100, 150 years from now and where it will exist. We have a responsibility to manage that very, very carefully.

The fourth commitment is to adopt your trustee obligations and do good for all life. The first principle of moral justice is about trying to do no harm. But now, because climate change is so serious and other impacts are so serious, we also have to do good.

There are different tools and strategies developing for each one of these principles. Most of the organizations I work with, businesses and governments, are trying to reduce their environmental impacts—that is, do less harm. But we also need to flip it around and do good. There are fields you might know of called biomimicry, where we're trying to create new products and services to mimic nature. There's green chemistry using natural processes rather than synthetic chemicals. We actually have to restore the earth. We can't just reduce the harm we're doing to it. That's the difference between the two.

The final principle I'd like to talk about is the principle of free will, the natural law of free will. The Buddha said often that as we increase our awareness, we become aware that we're free at any time to make different choices, but it requires more awareness and more understanding.

The dharma principle with free will is paññā, the wisdom that leads us out of suffering. That wisdom is increased awareness and increased mindfulness of all of our actions, of the systems we're part of, of how we impact those systems and adopting an ethical way of life and understanding that we are trustees.

This is the last principle: to choose your own destiny. We do not have to continue down the path that we have continued down the last 50 to 100 years. In fact, I will say that throughout history, societies have made fundamentally different changes that are driven by different ways of thinking and seeing the world many, many times. We don't realize it, but that has happened. And every time they've made a fundamental change, most people have ended up much better off.

I think as we grow our consciousness—and maybe this framework can help you and others do that—we will all end up much better off.

If we have two more minutes, what I'd like to do is have each of you think just for a second about how often you find yourself following this commitment or basically following these dharma principles. Then turn to a partner and just talk for a second about what you discovered.

Evaluate yourself as to how well you're doing, how much you are aware of and try to stay focused on the dharma principle. Just for a very short period of time, share that with a partner and talk about it.

Does anybody want to share anything that popped up as you had this conversation? Anything that became particularly clear—and I apologize for the short duration of the conversation. I would encourage you to continue that afterwards for as long as you can.

The point that emerges is that it's hard to make the right choices or good choices today because of the structure of the systems we're part of. I think we all feel that. But this is not about being perfect. This is about continuing to expand our awareness. As more people expand their awareness, we will create the political will to change those practices.

So it's really about increased mindfulness and then encouraging others to take the same steps forward.

I think the comment was that we often get stuck on just thinking about cause and effect and don't realize the systems we're part of and the moral principles we need to adopt—moral justice that needs to guide our thinking and behavior, and also trusteeship. I think you're right. That's why I use this framework now with public and private organizations and nonprofits of all kinds, and I find very positive results.

We're even using it in working with the administration and others to try to encourage what the president announced—to create a conversation with Americans about climate change. I'm actually optimistic that something significant is going to happen. They've gotten overwhelmed now with the gun debate and healthcare and immigration and other issues, so finding the political space for them to act has been one of our challenges. The structure of the system in which the White House works is also very difficult to work within, and there are other issues within the administration itself. But I'm optimistic that we will see this administration take some very positive steps more than any other. It really is about helping them and others expand their awareness beyond just thinking about some very narrow issues.

The point was not to get caught up in self-judgment. You're absolutely right. The more you become aware of the consequences of your actions, the more you can be humbled and feel, "Oh my gosh, I'm doing all these wrong things." But again, you have to first realize the systems you're part of. You live in this society. Then constantly grow your awareness and realize that you have a choice. The more choices you make, the better off you're going to be. Sometimes you make a choice and think, "Well, it's not the best one I could have made. It might have a serious impact. But that's the only thing I could do." As long as you're aware of it, next time you can make a different choice. And as I said, as other people begin to think the same way, we can create the social change necessary to really change the structures of those systems.

So don't feel bad. This is just the structure of the systems we're working in. But keep growing your awareness.

I want to leave you with this quote from John Seed, who Joanna teaches a lot with—a very inspiring environmental deep ecology being. He says, "Well, you might think there's nothing on the horizon that can help us. And you might wonder, what kind of miracle would be needed to make a difference? Well, it would be a very simple one, really. All that it would need would be for human beings to wake up one day different than they were the day before and realize that this is the end unless we make these changes, and then deciding to make the change. That doesn't seem like a very likely thing to happen. But on the other hand, the whole road that we've traveled is so littered with miracles that it's only our strange kind of modern psyche that refuses to see it. I mean, the miracle of being descended from a fish that chose to leave the water and walk on the land. Well, anyone with a pedigree like that, you can't lose hope."

CHAPTER 262

Connecting Inner and Outer Responses to Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 37 min

> In this dharma talk, Donald Rothberg addresses the urgent need to connect our inner spiritual practices with outer responses to climate change. Drawing on the bodhisattva ideal from both Theravāda and Mahāyāna traditions, he argues that neither purely private meditation practice nor conventional activism alone is sufficient for our times.
>
> Rothberg explores how traditional Buddhist training in sīla (ethics), samādhi (meditation), and paññā (wisdom) must extend beyond individual liberation to encompass our interconnected response to collective challenges. He references the core teaching of dukkha and interdependence, suggesting that our hyper-individualized sense of self must evolve into an interdependent understanding that naturally responds to the suffering of climate change.
>
> The talk presents practical applications through Joanna Macy's framework of the Great Turning: holding actions, creating new systems, and shifts in consciousness. Rothberg challenges practitioners to examine their carbon footprint and find their authentic calling in climate response, whether through household changes, community organizing, or larger systemic work. He emphasizes that this integration represents an evolutionary development - a contemporary manifestation of the bodhisattva vow to work for the liberation of all beings, now including future generations and the Earth itself.

Our next presenter is sitting up here in his beautiful coat of many colors, Donald Rothberg. He's been practicing the Dharma since 1976, and he's really been very active and a pioneer in bringing the Dharma into the world of activism and peace work. He was instrumental in keeping the Buddhist Peace Fellowship going and teaching classes in communication skills and peace work—all that good stuff. He's the author of The Engaged Spiritual Life: A Buddhist Approach to Transforming Ourselves and the World. So, Donald, welcome.

Thank you very much. I should also mention that I have gone through very rigorous training at the Clown School of San Francisco, which is very important. And I also want to express my sadness that my collaborator, Conda Mason, is not here this afternoon. We had been planning for some time, but difficult personal things came up and it didn't work for her to be here today. I'm going to try to bring in some of her perspective. She is a teacher at the East Bay Meditation Center, very involved with permaculture. She's been developing Hub Oakland and is especially interested in issues of climate justice and really addressing questions of how climate impacts the most vulnerable and the most marginalized. I'm going to bring some of those perspectives in, and I hope we all can bring those perspectives in.

I wanted to begin with a short meditation. I want to do this by saying some lines which I find very beautiful and inspiring. In fact, a lot of times when I practice, I say these lines twenty, thirty, forty, fifty times a day to myself to invoke really a quality of awareness and a quality of mind. You can do this with your eyes open. I was reflecting on this—this really is a kind of invocation that has us see our minds as of the earth. This is from the sixteenth century Tibetan tradition, Dagpo Tashi Namgyal. It goes like this. Just let this influence your awareness:

Open like the sky, pervasive like the earth, unshakeable like a mountain, shining like a flame, lucid like a crystal.

And feel free to take that home and repeat it twenty or thirty or forty times a day. Let me say it one more time:

Open like the sky, pervasive like the earth, unshakeable like a mountain, shining like a flame, lucid like a crystal.

Most days I call my mom up, who's in her eighties, and she likes me to say those words, and we just do it on the telephone every day. I especially like it because it actually cuts through, in a way, the distinction between awareness and the earth, between inner and outer, and lets us really experience those qualities.

I think that's really the essence of what I want to bring up today, which is about the need for a deeper relationship, maybe even a marriage of our inner practices and our outer response. This afternoon, we've really been invited as presenters to move more into the area of how do we respond. What I want to explore particularly in this short period here is the crucial way that we need to connect our inner practices with our outer responses. I think this was very much implied by what James and Rob in particular were saying. But I think that connection of our inner practices and our outer responses is absolutely critical. I think we actually need nothing less than the resources of our spiritual practices, our spiritual principles are needed for what needs to happen.

So I want to explore that in a few different ways. First, talking more about that vision. Then secondly, talking a little bit more about the inner responses. And then last, talking some about the outer responses. I wanted to bring up some, in particular Spirit

Rock as a community, because I think it's very helpful in terms of outer response to think of personal response, the response of one's community or organization or family, and then the larger collective response—to see how we respond in all of those ways.

So first, on that vision—it's very possible that without that marriage, as it were, of inner practices and action, we fall into distortions. If we stay with our inner practices being primarily private and our outer action following models of activism that have been prevalent in the past, I don't think that works.

Without that practice connecting with response to the world's needs, we run the risk of our beautiful practices becoming, in a way, a wonderful, privileged peace while the world burns.

I wanted to read something from a text by Bhikkhu Bodhi from a few years ago, where he said: "It seems to me that we Western Buddhists tend to dwell in a cognitive space that defines the first noble truth largely against the background of our middle-class lifestyles—as the gnawing of discontent, the ennui of oversatiation, the pain of unfulfilling relationships, or in Buddhist theory as bondage to the round of rebirths. Too often we do not focus on the suffering of the world."

Many of the teachers I worked with in Asia, people like Sulak Sivaraksa, and liberation theologians from Latin America, expressed real concern about the future of Buddhism—that it might become, in their words, a kind of escapism.

Yet we also know that traditional, or prevalent modes of action and activism are also very subject to distortions. There's an occupational hazard for people who want to do good: to be self-righteous, to be attached to their views, to be unskillful with challenging emotions—particularly anger—and often to be fueled exclusively by anger. To demonize the enemy, to find themselves burning out and not really able to sustain for the long haul, to lack those qualities of equanimity, and to not be able to be skillful with the immensity of difficulty or suffering.

So guess where activists learn how to correct those possible distortions? Learn about attachment to views, working with difficult emotions? They learn that in the Dharma—right here.

You see that there's such a joining that's really called for. This connection points to something new—the imagination of the earth is coming up with a new kind of being. It's really the bodhisattva of our times that would be able to respond deeply but have the inner skills to do so for the long haul, to be able to be with difficulties, to keep that sense of freedom of mind even with very challenging situations.

My own sense is that this is actually an evolutionary development—something that's being called forth because without those being connected, I don't think we have the resources to really pull off what needs to be done.

And it's very much the spirit of the Buddhist bodhisattva. The bodhisattva is being reborn in our times. Remember who the bodhisattva is? The being that is dedicated both to awakening and to helping others. That makes a commitment: no matter what happens, I will be there for other beings.

From the Theravada bodhisattva tradition: "Crossed, I would cross others. Freed, I would free others. Tamed, I would tame others. Calmed, I would calm others. Comforted, I would comfort others. Purified, I would purify others. Awakened, I would awaken others. Oh, may I awaken to supreme perfect enlightenment and bring well-being and happiness to all beings."

And from the Zen tradition, the Bodhisattva vow:
"Living beings are infinite. I vow to free them.
Delusions are inexhaustible. I vow to cut through them.
Dharma gates are boundless. I vow to enter them.
The Buddha way is unsurpassable. I vow to realize it."

What I find is really being invited is our own way of doing that. And I want to say very directly that for me, this means really finding our own place to be active.

It doesn't mean everyone becomes an activist. I remember that beautiful response from the African-American theologian Howard Thurman, when asked by a young man, "What should I do?" Howard Thurman had created the first interracial church in the Bay Area in the 1940s and was very active. This was near the end of his life, and you might have thought he would have said, "We have this project that needs people. Why don't you do this or that?" Instead he said, "Don't ask what the world needs, but ask what makes you come alive, because what the world needs is people who have come alive."

It's another way of saying what Paul was expressing in terms of being in love with life—ask what makes you come alive. And I think very much of Joanna Macy, my dear sister's teaching, which has stayed with me for a very long time. She says that the great turning, which is what we're in the midst of, has three dimensions. Some of us are drawn to one, some to another, and some to yet another. We all find our place where our gifts are. This is a very important point, because this is not about everyone having to be on the front lines, but really finding where we are, where our gifts call us in the turning.

She said that there are three aspects of the turning. First is what she calls holding actions to prevent further damage. There's a lot of that needed—a tremendous amount. Second is really seeing how our institutions work and developing alternative institutions. This would be developing environmental education in the schools, different kinds of medical approaches, new approaches to parenting or community—really doing things in a way that is sustainable in whatever field we feel drawn to. Very crucial.

And the third is a shift in consciousness, really having one's action be part of this shift towards that sense of interdependence, towards that way of being that is sustainable—whether it's teaching yoga or teaching meditation. What I find crucial is that it's very helpful for all three of those to know that the others exist and to be connected. Some people will be activists, but it's really good to know that part of that turning is a shift in consciousness. I just want to name that because this isn't about telling everyone, "You should do this, you should do that." What's being called for is to feel that inner calling and know what that inner calling is.

So what kind of inner responses are we talking about? I think a lot of it is very connected with what Bob was saying in terms of those principles. I think a lot of it is to really make those connections between inner and outer, very much like Thich Nhat Hanh in the 1950s and 60s, coming out of a traditional monastic life in the presence of crisis.

This is what he said: "When I was in Vietnam, so many of our villages were being bombed. Along with my monastic brothers and sisters, I had to decide what to do. Should we continue to practice in our monasteries, or should we leave the meditation halls in order to help the people who are suffering? After careful reflection, we decided to do both."

That's what this is about—both. To go out and help people and to do so in mindfulness. "We call it engaged Buddhism. Mindfulness must be engaged. Once there is seeing, there must be acting. We must be aware of the real problems of the world. Then with mindfulness, we will know what to do and what not to do to be of help."

Very crucial. And so we can really look at those core principles of our practice.

And I discover that when working over the years with training programs to connect inner work with outer response, our core understandings of the Dharma are often given only in individual interpretations. Our practice develops beautifully in an inner way, but the challenges arise in how we bring our practice into the relational realm and into the collective realm.

Another issue with our practice—and this is offered as a completely loving critique of our beautiful practices, as well as a self-challenge—concerns how we approach the traditional three trainings in the Dharma: ethics, meditation, and wisdom. We tend to emphasize meditation most strongly, while not always emphasizing ethics and wisdom with equal depth. This happens partly because we primarily teach meditation, bringing in the other trainings but not always with the same thoroughness.

When we examine ethics, for example, and very much as Bob was expressing, we commit ourselves to non-harming—but how do we extend that commitment to all aspects of our lives? How do we truly examine our ethical commitment in terms of future generations? Are my present actions harming or tending to harm future generations? Are they harming people in other lands? We know the impact of climate change falls especially on those who are not causing the problems. This is our challenge: How do we look more deeply?

In our wisdom practice, how do we truly see causes and consequences? This requires looking deeply into these core teachings: What are the roots of suffering? How do I understand the structure of self? What kind of self am I? We know that we are very conditioned in this culture—not uniformly, but we tend to maintain a very self-centered self, even as we're meditating. One can be a very deeply self-centered meditator trying to deconstruct the self. There is tension there—do you sense it?

How do we understand that our times are calling for this self-centered, hyper-individualized self to become an interdependent self? This is challenging. It's very difficult sometimes to know what to do in terms of outer response.

Some things we can be very clear about. Looking at Spirit Rock, for example—I've spent the last week reviewing all the documents, and there are beautiful ways that Spirit Rock and its capital campaign are totally dedicated to green buildings and greening everything on the land. It's truly amazing. I was also inspired by attending meetings of the Berkeley Climate Action Coalition, which offers a beautiful, precise analysis of Berkeley's carbon footprint. Someone at the UN called it a model for all cities.

Their analysis was very precise: here's the footprint from transportation—people coming and going from Berkeley; here's the footprint for housing and all its different needs; here's the footprint from waste. Transportation accounted for 46% of the footprint. Berkeley voters committed the city to reduce its carbon footprint by 33% by 2020 and 80% by 2050—which may not be quite enough, but represents significant change.

Our challenge is that we can do wonderful things where we have control—for example, at Spirit Rock with housing, usage, and everything from how we use paper. But what's really challenging? Transportation. This is where we confront our own habits, convenience, perhaps privilege.

To see this graphically: How many of you came here today in a car with one or two people? How many came in a car alone? How many came by bike? How many walked?

What I feel every community needs to do is assess its carbon footprint. Transportation proves especially difficult because it involves the lack of nearby public transportation and would require genuinely encouraging carpooling. But that's challenging, isn't it? Do you feel yourself bumping up against our habits? What would it truly take?

Some people say that in the long run, pulling this off requires a mobilization akin to the mobilization after Pearl Harbor.

If we really thought this was of concern, how would we act? How would we act? And what would we look at in terms of our own behavior? This, for me, is very challenging. And I can feel a little uncomfortable, which I think is healthy.

In terms of responses—outer responses—just to name them, I think we all know there are many responses we can implement in our households that can be quite beautiful, and we can reduce our carbon footprint. I've been reading a book called The Low-Carbon Diet, which promises to help us lose 5,000 pounds a year—because the average American consumes 55,000 pounds of carbon annually. We can very easily cut that. Sweden, which I believe has a higher standard of living than us, consumes 15,000 pounds per person. We consume 55,000. There's so much we can do on a household level, and I think this is within our control. This is accessible.

We can also act in our communities. As I mentioned, already a huge amount is being done. I think everything that's easily within the control of Spirit Rock is being acted upon. The harder things like transportation will take a little more work and some action, I believe.

It's also encouraging to know—this is what I believe—that the large-scale collective solutions are actually pretty clear. Those of you who've read Lester Brown know they're quite straightforward. There's an outline of what needs to be done to reduce by 80% by 2020: increase energy efficiency, shift from fossil fuels to renewable energy, stabilize population and eradicate poverty, restore the earth, feed people. Under each of these, he has fifteen specific actions. So it's quite clear.

Of course, what's challenging is that our leaders are not doing this at all, or very little. How do we find ways to respond at all of those levels in our own ways—personal, community, and that larger level?

Bill McKibben said something very interesting in an article a week or two ago. He said that if 10 or 15% of the population develop impeccable, sustainable ways of being in their own personal lives, it'll be nice, but not much will change. If those 10 or 15% of people choose to be very active with the horizon of helping to shift the larger systems, everything will change.

That really calls forth the bodhisattva. I want to finish with this, and maybe do a little exercise.

As we connect this inner work and deepen it, seeing more and more how to have it flow into the different parts of daily life and into our actions, what can inspire us? I was thinking of the bodhisattva figure.

The bodhisattva figure knows several things—these are really our training areas. First, the bodhisattva knows freedom—knows the freedom of awareness from having practiced, knows how mind states are temporary and can be worked with, knows where he or she gets stuck and how to work with that, and can increasingly touch freedom even in the most challenging situations. The bodhisattva has that training.

The bodhisattva also has the training of knowing how to be with suffering, knowing how to be with difficulties. This is our training—we have to train in this. We have to keep training. The bodhisattva knows how to be with suffering and can be skillful with one's own suffering, with other people's suffering, and is ultimately not scared of suffering, not scared of pain. That's a training we have to have deeply in these times.

The bodhisattva has skillful means—all sorts of tricks, all sorts of ways of working with challenging situations. I think ultimately, in our own being and among the people we know, we have to really encourage this combination of the inner work and the outer response. We have to see where am I called to respond in this area of climate change.

May people who are active gain the gift of dharma practice, and may that give them tools that let them act while avoiding those distortions and problems which are so pervasive. This is very, very crucial.

So I want to invite you to reflect for a moment on that Howard Thurman quote and ask: what makes me come alive in the context of our day? Where are you called right now in terms of your own response? This could be at a personal level, in your community, or helping with the collective issues. What one or two trainings, further practices, or actions are calling you right now?

Take a moment now to find a neighbor and share what pulls you, where you are called particularly in light of our theme for the day. Turn to someone near you and spend just a few minutes sharing what's there for you.

I'd love to hear from a few people about what's calling you right now.

"I'm really called to look at investments and examine what's causing damage and what's beneficial."

Beautiful. Thank you.

"I was thinking how much easier it was for me to answer the question on a day like today, with all these wonderful community organizations present. I'm thinking about not only doing something but joining a community."

Yes, plugging into existing communities and organizations. Thank you.

"I think one of the most common organizations people belong to that's so powerful are churches. Churches are right on the cusp of acknowledging this crisis, but they need to take that further step. Many of us can help them along in that way. The concept of God has often been very disembodied, but there's change happening, and I don't think it has to be that way. There is movement, but we could encourage that."

So being more active in one's community, particularly in churches, synagogues, temples, or meditation centers like Spirit Rock.

"I work for the Marin County Bicycle Coalition, focusing on transportation. One of the things I was called to do a few months ago was to ride the Climate Ride—a 300-mile bike ride down the California coast from Eureka to San Francisco. I am not an athlete. I'm usually the last person in group rides, not one of those fast, energetic riders. So this is a big challenge for me, but it's to raise awareness about climate change and promote bicycling for transportation. I'm raising money for the Marin County Bicycle Coalition. If you'd like to help me out, please find me."

Thank you for that commitment.

I want to end with three very brief passages that capture this marriage of inner and outer, inner response and outer response, and bringing that into the world.

The first is from the Jewish tradition, from the second century. Rabbi Tarfon said: "It is not upon you to finish the work. Neither are you free to desist from it."

It is not upon you to finish the work. Neither are you free to desist from it.

The second passage comes from Odo Sessho Roshi, the Zen teacher who guided Gary Snyder in Japan. He offered this profound simplicity: "Listen to this with a big mind. In Zen, there are only two things. You sit and you sweep the garden. It doesn't matter how big the garden is."

Do you understand? Whether our garden is our own backyard or the entire Earth, the practice remains the same—we tend what is before us with presence and care.

Finally, these words from Dina Metzger, her poem called "Song":

"There are those who are trying to set fire to the world.
We are in danger.
There is time only to work slowly.
There is no time not to love."

In these lines lives the essence of dharma practice—recognizing the urgency while maintaining the patience, holding both the danger and the love, working with deliberate care rather than frantic desperation.

This is how we bring our practice into the world: not trying to finish all the work, but never giving up our part in it; sitting in meditation and sweeping whatever garden we find ourselves in; working slowly with great love, even when—especially when—the world feels like it's on fire.

Thank you.

CHAPTER 263

Active Hope

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> In this powerful dharma talk, renowned eco-dharma teacher Joanna Macy shares her journey from despair about environmental destruction to discovering "active hope" - hope as action rather than wishful thinking. Drawing deeply from Mahāyāna Buddhist teachings, particularly the Prajñāpāramitā literature and Avataṃsaka Sutta, Macy explores how the bodhisattva path provides a framework for engaging with climate change and global crises without falling into panic or paralysis.
>
> Macy recounts her pivotal moment hearing Jacques Cousteau's warning about ocean plankton decline, which opened her to the Buddhist teaching that "the bodhisattva has no place to stand" - finding stability through the twin wings of karuṇā (compassion) and prajñā (wisdom). She emphasizes how bodhicitta, the awakened heart-mind of the bodhisattva, emerges more powerfully through uncertainty, allowing practitioners to act from caring rather than optimism.
>
> The talk weaves together practical activism with profound dharma, including the "ten universal enterings" from the Avataṃsaka Sutta that reveal our holographic interconnection across space and time. Macy demonstrates how facing our climate crisis can become bodhisattva training - learning to be fully present to suffering without being overwhelmed, finding joy in collective action, and expanding our temporal perspective beyond individual lifetimes to include ancestors and future beings.

I love that song. It's my favorite, and Dave Carter wrote it—starting with that single cell, "This Is My Home," all the way through. And Donald, thank you for bringing in the Bodhisattva. When Paul said we can choose whether this is happening to us or for us, my response from deep within, without even thinking, is that it's for us. It's showing us what the Bodhisattva means.

We now have before us this work called Active Hope: How to Face the Mess We're In Without Going Crazy. My favorite part is actually the subtitle. But I need to explain the "active hope" part, because if anybody here was working with me ten or twenty years ago—and I've been around quite a while—you might well remember me saying, "Hope is a killer. Hope is wishful thinking. Don't go there." I never would have imagined that I would write a book with hope in the title.

What I discovered in writing this is that hope is not something you have—it's something you do. It's not a noun; it's a verb. When you see it that way, then you can be doing hope even when you're not hopeful. I have found that this country, built as it is on dreams of manifest destiny and its own exceptionalism, has enshrined optimism to the point where you feel as if there's something wrong with you if you're not hopeful. Being hopeful and smiling becomes the sign of a successful, competent person. It's how you sell politicians and cars and anything. There's a tendency for us to be taking our pulse constantly: "Am I optimistic? Am I hopeful yet?" Thinking that you need to be hopeful in order to step forward for the sake of all beings.

Let me say right away that hope is loving, caring about your world, caring about it enough to step forward whatever you think of your competencies or whether you have a fail-proof plan or not. You probably have a better chance of going somewhere if you don't have a fail-proof plan—if you're just ready to take this next step, and after that, the next step afterwards.

This book was co-authored by Chris Johnstone, who is a physician in the United Kingdom, living in Bristol and now up in northern Scotland. He's not a Buddhist—not in Buddhist practice by any means. He's an addiction specialist, which is appropriate, don't you think? But he's been in the work. We've been working together in group work for helping people tell the truth about what it's like to be alive in the world today, to tell the truth about what they see and feel and know is happening to our world. In that process, they discover huge reservoirs of their own caring and learn to trust that. Really, it's Bodhisattva training, because it involves, as Donald just said, not being afraid of the suffering of our people or of our world. When you're not afraid of that, then nothing can stop you.

Though he's not in Buddhist practice, there are two terms in this book that are in Buddhist Sanskrit. One was Bodhisattva, simply because we couldn't find a term in English that says it. If you have a term, tell me. You can explain it with a phrase—a person who is animated by a lively caring for all beings, a being who knows that we are so interwoven, interconnected, that there's no private salvation, and that the one with the boundless heart... So we said, well, we're just going to keep it in the book.

The other phrase we kept was what's enshrined in the Bodhisattva's heart-mind, which is an intention, an impulse for taking part in the healing of our world, for being in service for all beings. There isn't a word for that either in English. So that word bodhicitta becomes more and more powerful for us, certainly for me, in being alive in this time and also as we look together at what helps us.

Let me scroll back thirty-six years to a turning point in my life. I walked into the Boston Coliseum with my second son, who was a freshman in college, and my daughter, who was still in high school. We were going to a Cousteau Society Day. How many of you remember Jacques-Yves Cousteau? I walked in and heard Cousteau say, "We have, in another thirty years, the plankton in our oceans will be insufficient to provide sufficient oxygen for us."

Somehow—you never know, I could have been looking at what my daughter was wearing or thinking about something else—but that just landed. He only said it once, and it just went right through me.

And it opened me up to a vast anguish of uncertainty. I took Cousteau at his word—he was an oceanographer who had sailed the oceans for decades, one of my heroes. We wouldn't have sufficient oxygen, he said. And now we know we have lost 40% of the plankton we had when he made that statement. I felt as if I'd lost some ground to stand on.

That phrase—"no ground to stand on"—was almost word for word what I was encountering in my studies. I had gone back to school in my forties and was studying the Perfection of Wisdom scriptures, the Prajnaparamita, which first describe the Bodhisattva. I was deeply interested in the descriptions and metaphors because, without needing to explain it to myself, I needed to understand this human capacity.

This was the dawn of the Mahayana, some 500 years after the Buddha's life, when his central teaching of our interdependence had circled around to be perceived with extraordinary power. People realized through meditation and every aspect of Buddhist study and practice that the Bodhisattva was not merely the Buddha's earlier lives, as had been understood before. As practitioners went deeper into the teaching of interdependence—even more than interdependence, inter-existence—they recognized that the Bodhisattva is the one in us that knows there is no private salvation, that we are inextricably part of each other and of Earth, part of this world.

These scriptures made a clarion call: "Wait a minute! We're all bodhisattvas. How can we say we're interdependent, interconnected, and claim it's only the Buddha and his early lives? We're all bodhisattvas."

Among the many descriptors of the bodhisattva, one stood out: the bodhisattva has no place to stand. That's what came to me immediately when I heard about the plankton, when I confronted the incredible uncertainty we're facing as a result of what we have been doing in our culture, our technology, our political economy.

Since then, I have been turning to the bodhisattva teachings to understand how you can be okay and hang in there—hang out deeply, as Malcolm said—when you don't have sure ground, when the situation we're in is so uncertain.

One way the bodhisattva functions without solid ground is by flying. And you fly on two wings. You know what they are: compassion and wisdom. You fly in the deep space of wisdom—a wisdom of our interbeing known as the perfection of wisdom, the mother of all Buddhas.

That Cousteau Day changed my life. After hearing about the plankton, I went to different booths and panels addressing every stress point on our planet. This was 1977, thirty-six years ago. Whether it was oil spills, nuclear weapons, nuclear power, deforestation—climate change wasn't yet prominent in public discourse—the total effect after that word about plankton was to feel in my body-mind that maybe we might not make it.

Not that we were doomed. I wasn't convinced we were doomed. But simply realizing that we might not make it was enough to completely change the frame and feel of the ground under me and to transform my sense of life's purpose.

I could see that our people faced—and what became my chief preoccupation—nuclear radioactive materials from both nuclear power and weapons production, along with an awful lot of other terrifying news. The big question became: how to be open to this, how to be with what we're learning and not go crazy.

This surfaced directly in the book I brought out last year: how to be with what we're doing to the world, how to be fully present to it without panic or paralysis.

I began to see the path we would walk—the Bodhisattva path—as a road with two ditches. On one side, panic and social hysteria; on the other, paralysis. Both are grounded in fear, are they not?

And so how to be with, not caught in fear, is to me the defining journey of my life since then. What I've written and the work I've done, and the help that the Buddha Dharma and the Bodhisattva Yana has been, is how do we be present to a situation in a beloved world that might be going under and not check out. How can we bring our full presence?

Because certainly, you know, in your own life, if your mother or your spouse or your lover or a dear person—your sister, your brother—were there with a terminal disease, you're not going to walk out the door. You're going to be right there. I want us to be with our world with that kind of presence, and I know that we're capable—just absolutely know that we're capable of that. And it became clear to me that this presence, full presence of heart and mind, is the biggest gift we can give our world.

But there was a point right after that plankton moment in my life, after that realization that we might not make it, that there wasn't a ground to stand on, when I really went into despair. I didn't want to tell my family how I felt because I didn't want them to worry about me. I loved them too much. And I didn't tell my friends because I didn't want them to try to cheer me up. That was the last thing I needed—like Job's comforters. I wanted to be with it. But then it was hard to sustain.

So what I did was—God bless whoever did it, maybe it was you, but somebody inside my head told me—get out there and you've got to work with other people. So I joined a team under Ralph Nader's critical mass movement. I got busy in a legal intervention, a kind of lawsuit against the Virginia Electric Power Company.

And boy, that was amazing. These young people were twenty years younger than I was. They were law students. They were sharp. They were full of zest, and they were like ten times smarter than I was, so they wanted to keep me busy. They thought I was very dear, and they sent me to work looking up the health effects around nuclear power plants.

I went into the library of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission—this was before the national security state; under Obama you could do things like that—and I learned a lot. I remember going back to them and saying, "Oh, what I'm learning! I'm learning about miscarriages and tumors and stillbirths and birth deformities. The closer you get to a reactor—it doesn't need to have an accident." And I said, "Oh boy, when we tell people that and we tell the judge, it'll be over for the nuclear power industry."

They looked at me and said, "Uh-huh, yeah, Joanna."

But at any rate, I grew up a lot on that. And what I learned was more important. By the way, we lost. We lost the lawsuit. And it still was one of the most valuable things of my life because I realized the utter joy of working with a group of people whom you automatically love and admire because you're pouring it out and doing something for the larger web of life. And you respect them so.

Don't you love respecting people? Oh, this is the best thing—admiring them. I love admiring people, and here when you start working on a cause like this.

So lesson number one—or maybe three, maybe I gave you some lessons already—but one is: if you want to do something in the world, don't you dare try to do it alone. This is for working with people. And you find out so much when you link arms with them. And it means going to where you can see the problem. Don't just read about it. Go down and look at it. Look at the fact that it's right there on an earthquake fault, that reactor.

I felt the same thing about the tar sands sometime later. It was beginning to worry me, and I thought, "I've heard about this. I need to see it. How do I see it?" Oh, I just got an invitation to give a talk in Alberta. Oh, there's Jennifer Berezan—she's from Alberta. So I said, "Jennifer, will you go with me to see the tar sands?" What we did was organize an event in her hometown at the time of her family in Edmonton, and we took the money that we'd earned by our event, and we went up to Fort McMurray, and we hired an airplane, and we flew out over the tar sands.

I saw hundreds of miles of hell—stinking horror with machines three times the size of this house—and we witnessed it with our own eyes. I just knew I had to see it.

That's another lesson. You may be like me and need to be present to your world, to actually see something. What I didn't know was that Jennifer would turn it into art, and she's ready to sing you her song about the tar sands that resulted from this. That's my lesson number five.

"Joanna, I loved what you said about not doing things alone and the kind of joy that comes from being together, even in the most difficult circumstances. Because I remember getting off that airplane—there were five of us on this little plane. We got off, and it was such a mixed feeling of horror and distress and love. To be there, especially with Joanna, and to witness that together and feel the combination of just rage, really, and the love for the land—that very potent combination—and the feeling of connection to the other people that we were on the plane with that I'll never, ever forget my whole life. So this is a song called 'My Memory Forever.'"

[Jennifer performs her song about the tar sands, accompanied by Eveli Posch and Barbara Borden]

Remember when we got to the airport, Jennifer, before we got on the little plane, there was a First Nations woman going upstream to the settlement there on the Athabasca. The water's poisoned, and the air's poisoned. There are these big ponds, and if geese and ducks fly over—if the ducks land, they're dead. So these big corporations, Suncor and others—it's American money, American corporations up there—they put cannons by them. Boom! They shoot the cannons so that the wildfowl in migration don't land.

Now the Native people—and it's wonderful to see them moving—what they can teach us. Among the things they can teach us is how to mourn. We don't have in our culture funerals for our brother-sister species that are just tipping into extinction, that don't have enough habitat left to survive another generation or two. We have no ways, but we need to develop them. Let's do that here at Spirit Rock, so that we can water our souls in being able to be fully present. Just as you greet the beauty of a child and the wonders or gifts of life, so too can we be washed by those tears. I think Malcolm mentioned that, didn't he, about what tears can do to you.

So this is what climate change can do to you—or for you. Last week there was a conference in the Bay Area on renewable energy, and there was the mayor of a town in Kansas, Greensburg—Bob Dixon. His whole town was wiped out by a tornado. He was telling how the town is completely rebuilt, one hundred percent renewable. He said, "We took the wind that destroyed our town and turned it and built it up to restore our town." This is almost like a tantric flip, isn't it? It's just wonderful.

So we're asked to be inventive like that. We're asked to go totally beyond what we think is going to show us off as a really canny activist. And how not to even try to compute your chances of success.

I brought along my favorite quote from Paul Williams for when feelings of personal futility come over me. He said, "How dare I be discouraged by anything so trivial as fear of personal failure?" Because what you're doing is letting a much larger purpose move through you. That's what uncertainty can do for you. It can acquaint you with this bodhicitta, with the intention of the bodhisattva.

And you can feel it, I've discovered, all the more powerfully because of the uncertainty. Because there's no one—no one can tell us whether we're going to pull through or not. And if they try to, don't believe them. Because it's the not knowing that sharpens our presence and makes us alert, makes us be there, opens us up to the courage and risk-taking that can reveal our true nature.

So you can't count on anything out there. The one thing you can count on is your own caring, your own yearning, because you really give a shit. That you can count on. That's one way to translate bodhicitta.

This is from a climate scientist telling us what we will learn to do in this time, even if we survive, because of the changes already in store for us—the huge changes that climate change will inevitably bring. We might pull through it, but there's going to be very hard slogging.

And so this scientist, Suzanne Mosier, writes: "What then is asked of someone who chooses to be of service in this time? I think it's to be a steward, a shepherd, an arbiter, a crisis manager, a grief counselor, a future builder. You must be capable of helping people face new, more difficult, more pervasive challenges than ever before."

This person—that's you—must be capable of holding that which is happening to and in our world. We will need to mentor, guide, and assist people in processing enormous losses, human distress, constant crises, and seemingly endless need to maintain, restore, and rebuild.

This is made to order. Are we up to it at this point of our evolution to blossom into capacities of wisdom, moral strength? You know you have it in you. You know we're capable of that. We just have to be honest with ourselves. We have so much going for us.

That wasn't a bodhisattva scholar writing that.

What has made the biggest difference for me is expanding my temporal context and working with other people—the time span, the timescape that we're living in, beyond our separate lifetimes. Because the causes of climate change are so far beyond what we brought about, so far beyond our personal culpability. Come on, that could just shut us down. How can I feel responsible for that? How can you?

If you look to the causes and then if you look to the consequences—oh my word—how can one claim to be responsible for something so vast? So what do you do with your own sense of agency and responsibility? You have this life in which to act with your hands, mind, mouth, heart, brain. But you also need, it seems to me, grounding in something so much wider than your lifetime. Because our karma now—the consequences of our actions—extends into geological time spans.

So we can learn what the bodhisattva in Buddhist literature, and particularly in that wonderful school of Mahayana Buddhism conveyed in the Flower Garland Sutra and the Avatamsaka, understands: that on the one hand we are just in this moment, faced with this situation, but on the other hand we've been here since the beginning of time.

Look at your hand. That hand—really, well, look at it. The hand that we can act with now to reach out, to grasp, to lead, to comfort, to guide. Every atom and every molecule and every cell of that hand, of that body, goes back to the first splitting and spinning of the galaxies.

And as one of my teachers, radiologist Sister Rosalie Bertel, says: every being who will ever live in the future is here now. Where? In our ovaries and in our gonads and in our DNA. And the decisions that we make now, pertaining to our policies and how we live in our civilization, will have everything to do with whether future beings a thousand generations from now will be able to be born sound of mind and body.

So they're here, the future ones. And the ancestors are here. They're wanting to help us, but they only have our bodies to work through.

The Avatamsaka Sutra says the bodhisattva knows that there's one body—this body here—but also all the bodies of all the beings. You're working with both. It's as if all of creation, all of that exquisitely interconnected web of life, holds time as well as space.

And I'm imagining that as we face climate change—the causes so distant and the consequences so vast—we are up for a transformation in how we experience space-time.

And to just give you a clue to that, I would like to end with your listening to what's called the Ten Enterings of the Bodhisattva from the Avatamsaka Sutra. I will read it first, and then you'll hear it sung by an anti-nuclear sister of mine.

How does the Bodhisattva—that's you, that's me—how do we perform the ten universal enterings? What are they?

They are to bring all the universes into one hair, and one hair into all the universes. You will see that this is a holographic vision of reality. There are many thinkers in this time—Stan Grof, David Bohm, Karl Pribram, systems theorists—and there you see in science the showing that the whole is in the part. We know about the part being in the whole, but the whole story is also within each part.

To bring all sentient beings' bodies into one body and one body into all sentient beings' bodies. With the radioactivity from Fukushima that is here on the West Coast now and has been for two years, what's happening to the children in Tohoku and northern Japan isn't just there. It's here. It's as if we're in all bodies. Do you follow me? This transformation of our relation to space-time where we are in this moment and at the same time, by this extraordinary development of our karma, we are in intimate interconnection with all that is.

When a Bodhisattva attains the ten wisdoms, she can then perform the ten universal enterings. What are they?

To bring all the universes into one hair, and one hair into all the universes.

To bring all sentient beings' bodies into one body, and one body into all sentient beings' bodies.

To bring inconceivable kalpas into one moment and one moment into inconceivable kalpas.

To bring all the Buddha's dharmas into one dharma and one dharma into all the Buddha's dharmas.

To bring an inconceivable number of places into one place and one place into an inconceivable number of places.

To bring an inconceivable number of organs into one organ and one organ into an inconceivable number of organs.

To make all thoughts into one thought and one thought into all thoughts.

To bring all voices and languages into one voice and language and one voice and language into all voices and languages.

To make all the three times into one time and one time into all the three times.

This is the supreme samadhi.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 264

Reflections on the Day

Rob Burbea · 26 min

> In this unique dharma offering, performance artist Nina Weiss leads the community through an embodied practice before sharing a profound piece of motion theater that weaves together themes of ecological awareness, interconnectedness, and transformation. Beginning with gentle movement to awaken the body, she transitions into storytelling that explores our collective response to climate crisis through the lens of Buddhist understanding.
>
> Weiss shares two powerful stories: her encounter with a young woman grieving after watching a documentary about melting glaciers, and Catherine Sneed's prison garden project that transforms lives through connection with the earth. Through these narratives, she illuminates the Buddhist teaching of interdependence - how we are not separate 'me's but part of an interconnected 'we' that includes all beings and the natural world.
>
> The talk demonstrates how contemplation of impermanence and suffering (dukkha) can lead not to despair but to love and compassionate action. Like the traditional charnel ground meditation that contemplates death to awaken wisdom, facing ecological destruction can open our hearts to deeper connection. The stories reveal how tending to life - whether through gardening or witnessing each other's grief - awakens recognition of our fundamental interconnectedness, echoing the Buddha's teaching of dependent origination (paṭiccasamutpāda).

The impresario Bill Graham once said, "The Grateful Dead are the best at what they do, and they are the only ones who do what they do." The same, I think, could be said of our next performer, speaker, presenter, dancer, spirit, Nina Weiss.

Hi, everybody. What a moving day, an inspirational day. Wow.

I'm going to do a little performance, really little, soon. But I thought it'd be a good time to... have a body. So come to your feet, yeah. And I know you don't have a lot of room around you, so we're gonna adjust to tight space, as if we're seven billion people squished into a half a mile.

Lifting your arms up above your head, and if it's available to you to interlace your fingers, do that. Some of you are really tall. Turn the palms over and reach. And if you can't interlace your fingers, just keep your arms separate from each other. But really press, press, press. And then with the gentle movement of the neck, look up. And on an out-breath, let the arms go gently and go, "Ha." Excellent.

Now roll the shoulders up and back. Up and back in circles and go, "Ba, ba, ba, ba, ba, ba." Good. And front and back and go, "Pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop."

And then gently with the feet about hip width apart—I can't see you all and you can't see me—let the chin come to the chest. The weight of the head falls and then make sure the knees are very soft, a little bit bent. And let the weight of the head carry the spine over so you're hanging from the hinge of the pelvis.

And then say that out loud: "Hanging from the hinge of the pelvis." And say it again and enjoy the sensuality of vowel and consonant. "Hanging from the hinge of the pelvis." Isn't that pleasurable?

Shake the head like you're nodding it, yes. And shake the head like you're shaking it, no. And then shake out the shoulders and go... And then gently roll up the spine one vertebra at a time.

Now take a tiny bit, a little bit of a wider stance and swing gently from side to side. And every once in a while go, "Ha!" Good. "Ha. Ha. Ha. Ha."

Then bring the knees parallel to each other again. I'm making sounds. And bounce and go, "Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha." Shake out the shoulders, spine, tailbone, "Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha."

Palms together, jaw goes slack. You shake your hands and you let the jaw flop in its socket. You go...

Lift the arm up and hold the opposite ear. And then pull the head so the ear comes towards the shoulder. And breathe. And then let the hand go away, but the head stays. And then let the head just float back. Good.

Other arm comes up and around. Hold the ear and just pull the head so the opposite ear comes to the shoulder. And then drop the hand. Keep the head where it is.

And let the head float back. Then one more time—shake it up, add a little vigor.

Okay, you can sit down. Thank you.

You know, I think if we're going to change the world for the better, we're going to have to do a bit more of that.

So I do a form of improvisation called motion theater. It's autobiographical—I tell stories that are true, and I move around while I do it. I need a timekeeper, so Wes, you're my timekeeper. Can you give me a three-minute signal? Like wave your hand? How much time do I have? Twenty minutes? How many have I taken? Or do those not count because they were we and not me?

I've been sitting in the back of the room. It's hard to see from back there because, despite all these years of meditating at Spirit Rock, we are still in the trailer with the very low ceilings and the very lack of sight lines. So I'm craning my neck one way to see Paul and the other way to see Joanna.

Now we are nearing the end of this Earth Day, which we have devoted to devoting ourselves to ending the end of the species. We are going to end our trajectory that is leading us to our end. We are going to turn it around. We are entering the Great Turning. Somehow.

And we are coming to the end of the day, and there are a lot of takeaways. I just can't remember them. No, no, I can. One of them is: I am no longer a me, I am a we. I'm shifting from me to we. I am entering the grand we-dom of the future that may not be. And there are eight steps to doing that, which I do not remember, but there is a book in the back of the room. I'm going to buy the book. I am not going to read the book. I'm going to read the table of contents.

We have spent the entire Earth Day learning about how being outdoors in nature is the only way to really fall in love. We have to fall in love. I have to fall in love. No, no—do not despair, do not despair. Reframe: fall in love. But fall in love from the despair. It is by looking it straight on—we are ending, we are all going to die. Not just me, everyone. Everyone is going to die anyway. No—it's all going to die. It's a charnel ground meditation. The entire species.

We have never, ever seen anything like this before in the history of this species. We do not even know how to understand it. Our DNA is not programmed in a way that we can actually conceive of this magnitude.

of the extinction of the species that we are causing, but it is not my fault. And so I am going to look it in the eye without flinching. And I'm not going to be depressed that we've been in the trailer all day. My neck hurts from craning. My shoulders are getting kind of tense.

Now enter the grief. The Bodhi sought the courage to grieve and then fall in love. And out of the love, I can't remember what comes next.

I was at the Raphael Theater a few weeks ago to see Chasing Ice, that big film. Has anyone seen it? Made by the geologist, the photographer who worked for National Geographic. Despite his knees falling apart and his hips, nevertheless, he put on pitons—is that what they're called? Crampons—and climbed into the remote regions of the Arctic and Antarctic and Siberian tundra in these freezing cold conditions, clamped onto the sides of disintegrating glaciers.

He photographed these amazing glaciers disintegrating, melting away, and it was the most symphonic music, grand ice landscape, beauty, beauty, beauty. I was sitting in my seat with my popcorn just falling in love, falling in love. And then the next year when he went back, the landscape was so different. It had all turned to a kind of brown gravel. These grand ice-blue sculptural, massive, unimaginably large sculptures of ice were gone. They had receded so far that he couldn't even recognize the landscape anymore.

As I left the theater, there was a young woman standing in the aisle. She had very dark hair and bright, freshly painted red lipstick. She was probably wearing a vegan leather jacket. And I noticed that her back was shaking. She was quietly sobbing. And she couldn't move. We were the only two left in the theater. These tears were just cascading down her cheeks, and the mascara was making tracks and collecting in her cleavage.

I didn't know—should I touch her or not? So I stood very close and she said, "Where is everybody?" We were the only two left in the theater. "Where are all the people my age?" she said. She looked like she was maybe twenty-eight, thirty, thirty-one, thirty-two—you can hardly tell, but younger and in that arena. The language when you're weeping is fragmented: "Where... they can't... the where..." And she said, "I have to stop crying so I can get outside."

And I said, "Don't stop. Don't stop." I needed her not to stop crying. "Keep crying and go get the people that are your age." It's like giving her a mission to weep. "Keep weeping. Keep weeping," I said, "and I will weep too." We went out of the theater kind of metaphorically hand in hand, devoted to weeping.

My friend Catherine Sneed tells a story. She was working in the prisons. She was working in the San Francisco Police Department. She's African American and has wild hair and this gap between her teeth. So when she smiles, you kind of celebrate the gap. She's broad-shouldered and kind of broad-waisted and walks with this kind of assurance that she seems to have downloaded from the police department.

She went into the jails and noticed this vacant lot that was full of hypodermic needles and condoms and broken glass and bits of marijuana—roaches, they're called. You kind of hold them with a special piece of equipment.

She decided to make a garden.

So she had to jump through a lot of intensely bureaucratic hoops until she got permission for an hour a day for the men in their orange suits to come out and first clean out the bicycle parts and gear shifts and old tires and hypodermic needles and used condoms. They had to use gloves. Tampons, Barbie doll heads. And then they brought in the shovels, the kinds with the pointed edges, and the kinds with the straight edges, the wooden handles, and the hoes, and the spades. And they turned over the earth.

And then they carried in—these big guys with muscles, because they work out in the jail, shaved their heads, proud of their lost teeth. And they turned the soil with compost and amendments, and then they planted food. Carrots, sweet peas, green beans, cauliflower. When the cauliflower came up, they didn't know what it was, because they hadn't been fed cauliflower. Mustard greens, collard greens, kale. There's a movie you can see.

And what started to happen is the men got released. They missed the garden. So they committed small crimes in order to get back. One of these men looks into the camera and he says, "I planted a seed and the seed sprouted—carrot, the little frilly leaves. And if I didn't water it, it died." He said, "Nothing ever needed me before. And I fell in love with the carrot." And there are tears streaming down his tattooed face because he fell in love with a carrot.

She realized it wasn't such a good plan that the men had to commit crimes to get back to the garden. So she found a vacant lot in Hunters Point and started an out-of-prison garden project, as opposed to the in-prison garden project. And she started to jump through the bureaucratic hoops, but got bored with the tedium of bureaucratic hoops. Because, as they said today, certain systems just are not working, and don't imagine that they ever will.

So instead, they climbed the fence. She and some of those big guys took their shovels and the bare root trees because they were going to turn the vacant lot into a garden in the middle of Hunter's Point. They climbed the chain link fence and dumped the shovels and the hoes and the spades and the amendment on the other side. And they began to amend the soil after ridding it of the needles and the car parts and the condoms with the gloves and the Barbie doll limbs. And they dug a hole.

And as Catherine was kneeling down to plant the bare root of a tree into the Hunter's Point hole, she looked up and there was a young boy about seven holding a gun. Could have been a toy, but it was a gun. And she looked up, and she'd grown up in that part of town, so she knew that it was unlikely she would make her way out of that garden. All of the men who had also grown up in that part of town with the muscles and the tattoos had gone back over the fence, because they knew what it meant to look into the barrel of a gun as well. She turned around, and there was no one there.

And then suddenly one of the ex-cons looked at that boy and he realized that he knew that boy's aunt. And he said, "Your aunt, her name's Maria." And the boy looked up. And another ex-con came back over the fence and he said, "Yeah, I know where you live." And the boy looked up. And suddenly all of the men came back and gathered round and named the streets and the neighborhood and knew which trees grew on which block and knew the colors of the houses and knew the boy's aunt and sister.

Catherine looked at the boy and she said, "Do you want to plant the tree?"

And he put down his gun and he knelt on the earth, holding the bare roots in his bare hand. And he laid the tree into the hole. And she said, "Now you have to fill in the earth and tamp it down." He tamped it down with bare feet. And then they poured water on it. And she saw as the water fell this little moment of recognition in his eyes. That the water was like rain, that rain came from clouds and clouds moved through the sky by wind that was caused by movement of ocean. And that the trees would reach to the sun and the sun had a movement in the sky that defined the movement of the stars and that his own hand, in his own hand, in our own hands, we recognize stardust.

Pressure cookers, shrapnel, nails, childhood of violence. The violence comes at us and we can't help ourselves. We extend it back out. And the way we change is to start to understand I am not me. I never have been.

And "we" isn't a big enough word. Stars, wind, guns, roots. He started to see just for a moment—because she saw the recognition in his eyes—that he was connected to everyone. And he put down the gun.

Imagine driving home, making that right turn at the end of the Spirit Rock driveway, even though I want to turn left. Driving down the road where the green hills are just starting to go brown, and there's that moment where I want them not to turn brown—that color in California we call gold. It's gold. Reframe it.

I'm going to go home and take a hike with my dogs and look really carefully at the lupine that is just starting to burst with its purple flower. And look at the leaf which has five fingers and is shaped just like a hand. And I'm going to see stars.

This is what it means to practice. To slowly, patiently train ourselves to see the interconnection that was always there. To recognize that our own hands hold stardust, that our breath moves with the same wind that carries the clouds. When we truly see this—not just intellectually, but with our whole being—something fundamental shifts. The boundaries that seemed so solid begin to dissolve. The separation that breeds fear and violence reveals itself as illusion.

Each moment of recognition, no matter how brief, plants a seed. Each time we choose to see connection rather than division, we water that seed. This is how transformation happens—not all at once, but through countless small moments of awakening, until one day we look at a lupine leaf shaped like a hand and know, with complete certainty, that we are not separate from anything at all.

CHAPTER 265

Loving the Earth: Awareness, Action and Celebration

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this inspiring dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses how to engage with environmental and social crises from a place of love rather than despair or guilt. Drawing on Gary Snyder's advice to "save the earth because you love it," Burbea weaves together stories of Polynesian navigators, encounters with elephants and dolphins, and teachings on interconnectedness to show how our activism must emerge from recognition of our fundamental unity with all life.
>
> The talk addresses common challenges faced by activists: working with despair, anger, and grief while maintaining joyful responsibility. Burbea emphasizes that we are not separate from nature but are the earth itself, sharing breath with all beings. He introduces the concept of planting seeds of intention rather than trying to control outcomes, referencing the Bhagavad Gītā's teaching on acting without attachment to results.
>
> The session concludes with a powerful meditation expanding awareness from personal identity to cosmic consciousness, followed by the creation of blessing cords tied with three knots representing refuge, compassion, and personal bodhisattva vows. This practice helps participants carry their sacred intentions from the meditation hall into engaged action in the world.

I have a question to start with. Those of you who have been here all day have heard inspiring and visionary calls to action, information, and so forth. What would help you as we prepare to transition from here back out into the dance of the freeways, the blue waters of the bay, and this Easter evening? What themes, what concerns?

James asked me to come in toward the end, and I wasn't sure whether it was tired activists who are here taking a break—"I've tried too hard and I'm carrying the entire world like Sisyphus and I need to take a little rest"—or whether it's people who are aspiring activists actually saying, "Oh, I think it's about time to get my act together." Anyway, themes, topics, anything that you would like.

You can take inspiration—you can take all you want. This is actually the dump. You can leave stuff here, and what you can take is inspiration and spaciousness and what else?

Can you speak about how to work with the despair that comes up? Despair, how to work with despair. Other themes?

Joyful responsibility. Oh, my heavens. That joyful responsibility. Parenting. Reaching people. How to mindfully converse with people who may not quite have the same perspective as we do on some of these crises—what the Dalai Lama calls "his friends the enemy." It's very interesting. He doesn't say "my friends." He says "my friends the enemy that I talk to." Including each other. How do we talk to one another?

Slightly on similar lines to despair, but the anger thing. Anger, how to deal with anger. And all the issues around the animal world—all the many, many other sentient beings that are being affected by everything so deeply. The animal world and the other sentient beings. The grief around that and concern. Grief. Grief, despair, and grief. Anger and conflict about all this.

Grief and despair. Anger and conflict—with those around us, with corporations, with the systems we're embedded in. These are the waters we're swimming in.

Yet somehow I feel called to begin on a different note. I loved sitting here with Wes and Kevin, witnessing how they transform despair and concern into art and community. This creative alchemy feels essential to our time.

Wes recently interviewed Gary Snyder, one of our greatest living environmentalists—Pulitzer Prize-winning poet who was writing about "Earth household" back in the 1950s, long before environmental consciousness had taken root. Wes asked him: "Now you're in your mid-eighties, watching seas rise and species disappear, witnessing this global climate disruption you've long warned about. What advice do you have for us?"

Gary's response was stunning in its simplicity: "Don't feel guilty."

Three words that cut through everything. He continued: "If you're going to save it, save it because you love it. If you go out because you're angry, or bitter, or to fight—it's not going to help you, and it's not going to help the world. The world needs this transformation of consciousness, and it really has to come out of love. It's the only power that's going to make a difference."

Reflecting on Gary's wisdom, I see he's pointing toward something profound: what's going to serve the world is our tenderness and care. That's what it's asking for. That's what any child always asks for. This Earth is both our mother and our child.

This brings me to a poem by Gabriela Mistral, the Chilean poet who won the Nobel Prize in 1945. She was known for her exacting standards—a harsh critic of poetry. But one day a sixteen-year-old boy handed her a sheaf of his poems. After reading them, she looked up and said, "Pablo, you're a real poet. Keep writing." She had just encouraged Pablo Neruda.

Her poem speaks to this quality of heart we need:

A woman is singing in the valley. The shadow falling blots her out, but her song spreads far across the fields. Her heart is broken, like the jar she dropped this afternoon among the pebbles in the brook. And as she sings, the hidden wound sharpens on the thread of her song and becomes thin and hard, and her voice in modulations dampens with blood.

In the fields the other voices die with the dying day, and a moment ago the song of the last bird stopped. But her deathless heart, alive with grief, gathers all the silent voices into her own, sharp now yet very sweet.

Does she sing for a husband who looks at her silently in the dark? Or for a child whom her song caresses? Or does she sing for her own heart, more helpless than a babe at night-fall?

Night grows maternal before this song that goes to meet it. The stars with a sweetness that is human are beginning to come out. The sky full of stars becomes human and understands the sorrows of this world.

And her song, as pure as water filled with light, cleanses the plain and rinses the mean air of day in which men hate. And from the throat of the woman who keeps on singing, day rises nobly, evaporating toward the stars.

A song of tears and beauty, connected to the turning of the earth. Somehow we must find a way to carry all the information—the rising CO2 levels, the corporate malfeasance, the climate disruption—in our hearts, in our bodies, in our being, and do it out of love.

What helps is realizing you're not alone. I don't mean this in the conventional activist sense of "we have a big movement," but in something far more mysterious and wonderful.

My friend Deena Metzger, poet and activist, writes: "Give me everything mangled and bruised and I will make a light of it to make you weep and we will have rain and we will begin again." Take the worst of things and transform them.

She has traveled the world sitting with shamans, healers, sages, and wise women, asking: What do we do in this difficult, perhaps dark time? Her dream was always to sit in council not only with humans but with the non-humans as well.

In Zimbabwe and Botswana, sitting with the traditional healers there, she shared this vision. "Oh yes," they said. When she expressed her longing to sit in council with elephants, they arranged for a truck to take them to a watering hole in the Okavango, near the elephant herds. They parked and sat in a circle in the truck bed, spending half an hour in prayer and peaceful meditation, envisioning their connection with all life—which is real, which we truly have.

Then a very large elephant—though they are all large, aren't they?—approached...

But this was a particularly large—they are all large, aren't they?—but this was a particularly big elephant, female, who walked down from the hills to the truck where they were seated in a circle, stuck her head in the circle, her eye four feet from Dina's, as she said, and stood there with them for twenty minutes without moving while they were all there. Then nodded and walked off.

"Okay, that was pretty wild, all right?" They sat there, made prayers, thanked the elephant, and so forth, turned the truck around, and were getting ready to go when they noticed that the elephant had gone up over the hill and now came back with fifteen or twenty other elephants. They all lined what was a sort of dry riverbed that had a two-track jeep road. They lined the road as if to acknowledge those who had come to listen and sit with them as they all exited.

She said, "I don't know exactly what it means, but I do know that it means that we're not alone, that we're not alone."

I was in Hawaii and met one of my heroes, a man named Nainoa Thompson. How many people have ever heard of Nainoa Thompson? Maybe one or two people in the room—okay, that's good, this is a treat then. I get to tell you.

The Pacific islands were populated by the Polynesians who, if you trace the DNA and so forth, whose genetic tree or stream takes them back to the islanders of the Philippines and Borneo and Southeast Asia. The Polynesians and the Hawaiians and so forth all knew that they had these great voyaging canoes in the old days. There were still pictures and paintings of them.

And they navigated half the earth covered with water, which is the Pacific Ocean, so that when Captain Cook—who was arguably the finest navigator in the Royal Navy of England—went to the South Pacific, to the far islands, he met some of the master navigators there and said, "So tell me about what's here in the South Pacific." They cleared the sand and put 120 stones on it, which were the islands in 4,000 miles of direction from there. Then they took one of these navigators on the ship. Rain, doldrums, dark clouds—you couldn't see the sky at night, no way to know where you were. And whenever they asked, he'd say, "Oh, my island is there, and here's where we're headed."

So the Hawaiians in the '70s decided they would start the voyaging tradition again. They went to the far Marquesas and found a man named Mau, who was one of the last living navigators, who'd been trained in this lineage of shaman navigators. And Nainoa was one of the small group of people that went there to train.

The training was intense. When Mau was trained, he got seasick, so his grandfather tied his hands together with rope, threw him overboard of a little boat, and just towed him around for some weeks until he got used to being part of the ocean. Later on in his training, his testicles were tied to the bottom of the boat for twenty-four hours so that he could feel the waves. There are five levels of waves—the waves that bounce off the islands that are 500 or 1,000 miles away, the deep waves in the ocean—and get them in his body. Learn to read hundreds of stars, to watch the floating things from the seaweed and the birds, to look at the other levels of waves and so forth.

So Nainoa went and did this training. And then they took the first big voyaging canoe—two sixty-foot trees tied together and lashed together in a traditional way—and began to voyage the Pacific. With some difficulties, I won't go into all the stories, but when they finally got to Tahiti, half the population of the island came out to greet them as if they were gods, because they were showing what this beautiful culture had known: the capacity of sailing the ocean without a single instrument and knowing where you were always.

And Nainoa sits like a yogi, and now he's trained his successors, including this young Hawaiian woman. You don't sleep for the whole month or two of the voyage. You sit in a kind of yogic meditation and you always know where you are.

But they decided to do the hardest of all sails, which was to Easter Island—the Rapa Nui—which is the farthest, most remote island in all of the South Pacific. Through the doldrums, through rain, gray skies. And almost getting to that area, Nainoa fell asleep. He woke up and it was the middle of the night and he realized he'd fallen asleep and he didn't know where he was. And he didn't want to tell anyone that he didn't know where he was because they'd been out for six weeks sailing and paddling, and he didn't know where he was. So he just sat not knowing for a couple of days, letting them sail.

And then in the night he heard Mau, his teacher's voice, say, "When you don't know where you are"—it's like Wes's song—he said, "stop and do a very deep meditation and realize where you really are." And he said, "So I just let everything go and realized that I was in the center of the universe, that the boat was the center of the galaxy. We're always in the center. Where are you? Here. Now."

And he said, "All of a sudden I came at rest. I knew what my teacher meant. I was just where I was." He said, "And then if you are still lost," he said, "with your heart and your imagination, raise the islands out of the ocean."

He said, "I didn't quite know what he meant by that, but there I am sitting and realizing now it's dark and I'm in the middle of the universe, and what to do? Just be." Then there was a break in the clouds, the moon came out, and it showed on the horizon the peak of this island, which was Rapa Nui. He said, "It's as if when I was ready, the island appeared for me."

He said, "My teacher could do that at will. You know, we'd be out somewhere, and he'd say, 'All right, this is where we're going,' and things would just appear." He said, "I don't know how he did that, but I've come to trust that I'm part of something so huge, so much bigger than anything that I could possibly imagine with my little brain, that when we go out"—imagine going out for two months through the storms in a double-hulled canoe, basically, to cross the Pacific—"I've come to trust that I am part of something so wondrous and mysterious and enormous. And it's not me who's taking care of it. My job is to become in harmony with this and let my love, my voice, my connection, my vision come out of that."

One day, when I was walking through the Stanford University campus—this is from Vandana Shiva, who is another great activist. Her work a lot was to clean up the Ganges project. She worked with the Mahant of Varanasi of the Tulsi Temple to do this whole project to clean up the Ganges River.

I was walking through the Stanford University campus with a friend when I saw a crowd of people with cameras and video equipment on a little hillside. They were clustered around a pair of chimpanzees—a male running loose and a female on a chain about twenty-five feet long, a light chain. It turned out the male was from Marine World Africa, and the female was being studied for something at Stanford. And who I thought were the spectators were actually scientists and publicity people trying to get them to mate.

The male was eager—you know how they can be. He grunted and grabbed the female's chain and tugged. She whimpered and backed away. He pulled again. She pulled back. Watching the chimps' faces, I began to feel sympathy for the female.

Suddenly, the female chimp yanked her chain out of the male's grasp. And to my amazement, she walked through the crowd straight over to me, took my hand, and led me across the circle to the only other two women in the crowd, and joined hands with them. And now the four of us stood together in a circle. I remember the feeling of that rough palm against mine. The little chimp had recognized us and reached out across all the years of evolution to form her own women's support group.

We're part of something, and that something—which is life, which is huge and mysterious and beautiful—is asking of you to participate in life. And it's asking you all the time. You know, you may not always pick up the phone or answer your text or whatever it is.

This from Alison Luterman, a poet in Oakland. She describes the generosity of life. She said, "In the same way sun drapes a buttered scarf across your face, rose opens herself to your glance, and rain shares its divine melancholy, the whole world keeps whispering or shouting to you, nibbling your ear like a neglected lover."

Here we are on this amazing earth connected with the creatures and the animals and the atmosphere and the food chains and the corporations. We saw these white freshwater dolphins in the Irrawaddy River in March when we were traveling in Burma—the dolphins of the world swimming along with us. And Trudy, my partner, wanted to jump off the boat and swim along with the dolphins because she does that in other places. But I said, "The Irrawaddy is not the right place to do this right now." It was pretty, with lots of other boat traffic and things like that. But we're part of this web. Everybody knows it in some way.

And then the question is: well, what do we do? How do we take the spirit and the song and the vision and the science from this day and bring it—each in our own way—into action?

I would like to use the image of planting seeds. You don't make the fields, you don't make the rain, but you carry seeds in your heart. And the seeds are really the seeds of your best intentions and the seeds of your actions. As Henry David Thoreau said, "Though I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there to plant and I am prepared to expect wonders."

And so it's not given to you to hold the world or change it. It's not your responsibility. That would be pretty egotistical—"Okay, I'm going to do it!" But it is given to you to plant beautiful and amazing seeds and to join with others and to water them and to amend the soil, each in your own way. And it's going to take a while. I'm sorry to say, the earth changes slowly.

My friend—our friend—James and Jane and others know this fellow named Ari Ratana, who is the best, most famous community organizer in Asia. He started the Sarvodaya movement in Sri Lanka that eventually spread to half the villages or more in the country. When the Norwegians were brokering a peace treaty there, Ari called all his people together to Anuradhapura, the great ancient temple there, to talk about how to make peace. Six hundred and fifty thousand people came—and this is a country of only eighteen million people. A quite extraordinary being.

He stood up there and he said, "It took us five hundred years to get into this civil war, this mess. Four hundred years of British colonial oppression, five hundred years of conflict between the Muslims and the Buddhists and the Hindus, two hundred years of disparity between the rich, wet parts and the poor, dry parts of the island. So the Buddha teaches us that things arise according to causes and conditions. If we wish this to change, we will have to change the causes and conditions. Therefore, I offer you the Sarvodaya five-hundred-year peace plan.

"Five years of ceasefire, ten years of rebuilding roads and schools, twenty-five years to learn each other's language and religion, fifty years of an economic plan to bring harmony between the rich and the poor parts of the island. And in one hundred years we'll have a council and we'll sit down and we'll say, 'Twenty percent—how are we doing? Are we on the right track?' And then we'll do it again for the next hundred and the next hundred. And maybe in—"

Five hundred years, and maybe he was half-kidding, but he said, "If we pursue it" – not maybe – "if we plant these seeds in five hundred years, we will have the island of peace that we dream of."

I got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama when I was doing some teaching as part of an event with him. Having the Dalai Lama sit there when you do teaching is actually a very cool thing. I told this story and he was grinning, because he's in the same predicament. He's got Tibet and it's fifty years of Chinese military oppression and the loss of temples and cultures and all those things. Talking about anger and suffering, he said, "They've taken our sacred texts. They've burned our temples. They've taken our ability to practice our religion and rituals. They've taken so much from us. Why should I let them take my happiness?" And then he laughed.

You understand that no one can take away your joy. No one can take that part of your heart from you.

So I got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama, and then share the passage from Thomas Merton, where he writes to an activist and says: "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no results at all, if not at times perhaps bringing about its opposite. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

And so you set an intention in your heart, you align yourself with what the Earth asks of you – because you are of the Earth, you are the Earth – and you plant your seeds. For some it will be demonstrating, and for some it will be teaching kids in a preschool how to make a garden, raising conscious children, running a conscious business. For some it will be teaching not only English to immigrants, but really making immigrants understand that they too are part of the web of the world that's welcome. Or tending the animals and letting them know that you love them, that they're part of you, that we exist with the animal world. In fact, we are the animal world. It's kind of a delusion to think somehow that we're different from all this.

And so you have one foot in the trees and the soil of the earth and the other foot in eternity. Because the question is not the future of the earth or the future of humanity, but it is the presence of something greater, of eternity itself.

And that means somehow that in order to do this work – to not feel guilty, as Gary says, but to do it out of love – requires that you carry first that you set an inner intention that's really beautiful, maybe something you can't possibly do, but you set it as the vision, your bodhisattva vow, you act on it, you plant your seeds.

And here's the secret. It's a summary of the Bhagavad Gita. The secret is to act well without attachment to the fruits of the actions, because it's not given to you to determine how it's going to come out. But what's given to you is to act beautifully and bravely and mercifully and to love. And if you do that, all kinds of things – and the elephants will be cheering you and the dolphins will be swimming with you and the chimpanzees will take your hand and say, "Come on baby, let's do more of this." The earth will be with you. Because the earth wants this as well, and you can begin to trust this.

I'm supposed to teach a meditation. Let me read you one little thing, then we'll do our meditation. It's one of my favorite poems from Diane Ackerman. When I think about people making a bodhisattva vow – you know, "sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all," and so forth – of course, it's very complicated because if you decide to save the sentient beings in your family, they don't necessarily want to be saved by you. Then you realize that saving sentient beings means something a little different than your ideas about how they're supposed to be.

This is Diane Ackerman's version of what I call her version of the Bodhisattva Vows, saying if you were to have prayer in the schools, here's maybe a morning prayer that kids could make: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, as a healer of misery, as a messenger of wonder and an architect of peace."

And so in the meditation, which we'll do now, one of the things I'll ask is if you were to make a little vow, make your own bodhisattva vow from today, what would it be? What would the seeds be? Sometimes it's just as simple: "I vow to be kind to every being I encounter." It can be that simple, but it might be something else and only you can know. It's sort of setting the compass of your heart.

So let your eyes close gently and come back just to feel your breath breathing. The wind that was carried to you, that dusted the peaks of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa, swept across the Pacific to your breath that you take in right now. Of course, it also was the breath of the person sitting next to you a few seconds ago. You don't even have to kiss them – they give you your breath. And it's the breath of the...

raccoons that are in the trees and the deer around us and the earthworms and the sparrows. Let your life breath breathe in and out and bring your attention gently to the area of your heart.

Feel that you've been given life. You've been given this amazing incarnation, this gift of being alive. Sometimes it feels small and you get identified with unworthiness and grief and fear and attachments. But it's also possible to feel the radiance of life given to you that breathes itself and moves. In this there's a deep peace and natural love.

Imagine as you sit now that this love, which is what was born into you—the tenderness and care that's born into every newborn child—fills your body, all the cells of your body with life force and healing and care.

Then imagine somehow that you could expand so that your head poked up from the ceiling and your body got bigger and bigger, and you were bigger than this whole building. All the beings inside here, breathing and meditating, they were all inside you. You become this great vast being who holds Spirit Rock in your body. All their human experiences are breathing and thinking and feelings. Let yourself get bigger and bigger.

Imagine, because identity is so mysterious, that you can feel not just the room, but float up in the sky and be enormous. As if you float over the Bay Area, and all of California is now down there, part of this huge body. You're becoming bigger and bigger. In there is humanity, the human condition of joy and desire and loneliness and caring and violence and the love of parents for their children and failure and creativity—and all the animals, the bay and the ocean, all that is in you.

You're now this vast being and you get bigger and bigger, as if you're so big that the whole earth is there in front of you and you could hold it in your lap. You realize, no, it's part of you. You're as big as the solar system and you expand like the galaxies, huge. Even the little earth is just there, a blue-green ball deep within you, with all its dreams and hopes and hundreds of millions of years of life.

You rest in the vastness that is silent and peaceful and everything that exists is all within you. You are the ancient one. Everything that ever is or was or will be, all time, the dance of the universe is within you. It's silent and peaceful, no boundaries, beyond form.

Gently begin to collect yourself and gently the vastness starts to collect and get smaller. Slowly you feel the galaxies and the solar system and the earth floating within you with all the cities and forests and oceans. Now you look and see the earth and the beings on it and realize you are being given the gift of incarnation to be a little part of the whole and yet at the same time to have one foot in your human body and another in eternity itself, in the timeless.

You can do something beautiful with the life you've been given. You can tend this earth, you can care for all beings, not out of guilt, as Gary says, but out of love and compassion, out of care, for they're all part of you.

Before you come back to your small self, to the limited and beautiful and wonderful incarnation that you've been given in this body, as you look at this earth from this vast perspective, let yourself listen for your own bodhisattva vow or your own highest intention. What would it be that on this day you might say, this is the direction of my heart? What is the spirit and what are the energy and the vision that you want to carry from this day? How can you carry it beautifully in your own form—as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, an architect of peace?

As you envision now coming back to this body and incarnation, let the heart fill with compassion for all the worries and struggles that you and others carry. Let there come an understanding in this tenderness, heart filled with tenderness, of how to navigate the joys and sorrows, the gain and loss, the praise and blame, the birth and death. This is human incarnation. This is this earth. How to carry yourself so beautifully and plant the best of seeds.

As you envision, feel what your body would be like to carry the spirit of awakening. Sense what the quality of your heart will be as you carry this spirit of awakening and care.

As you get ready to re-inhabit this human life with now wisdom and the vows of what you'll do, and a deep sense of tenderness, as you come back, you realize that in your lap, the bodhisattvas and Buddhas, the Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion, has left you a gift. You can picture or imagine that there's a gift in your lap, which is a clear symbol of just what you need to carry you into this work of loving and serving the earth most skillfully.

You open this gift from the goddess of compassion and the Buddhas and bodhisattvas. It's the perfect thing that you need to keep this sense of peace and the beautiful seeds and the action you'll take. Let yourself unwrap it, picture it, imagine it, envision it any way you can. If it's not clear, hold it up in your hands to the sunlight. This is the gift, the clear symbol of just what you need as you leave the temple back to the marketplace.

Finally, coming back to sense yourself seated here now with this gift and with your heart's intention, let there be loving and compassionate awareness of this life you've been given. Think of the people that care about you the most, how they love you and want the best for you. You are a daughter or a son of this earth. You are wanted here.

And let the love in because compassion and love are never complete unless they include the one seated right here on your own cushion. Then the circle is complete and you become an expression of that love. Fill yourself with that love. Let it bless you. Let it touch all the cells of your body, every breath and heartbeat. Take your gift. Remember your vows or your sacred intention. Most of all, remember that you can dance.

Now we're going to create blessing cords together, sacred green cords that will carry your intention. As these cords get passed around, don't tie them on yet. Just hold them and pass them to others near you. You may have seen people wearing blessing or protection cords—red ones and golden ones throughout the world.

Throughout Buddhist Asia, all the way from what were the Buddhist countries of Afghanistan and Pakistan and India, and across Southeast Asia through China and Japan, the sacred thread is used as a symbol of our interbeing and interconnectedness. It's part of all kinds of rituals of blessing and care. Often they're colored red—I received this one from the Dalai Lama—or sometimes they're golden in color. The reason is that they're considered one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun that you wear in the marketplace. It's basically remembering that this is your true nature. You're a monk or a nun in disguise out there in the marketplace. You have to remember that your true home is the temple and that your vows and the intention you set really speak from and to who you are in the deepest and most beautiful way.

These sacred threads carry ancient wisdom. If you go to India and meet a Brahmin priest, they'll wear a white thread around their body for their entire adult life to show that they're living within the understanding that takes every experience, every being, everything they touch as part of the divine, as part of what's holy.

When I first received these protection blessing cords with Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche years ago, somebody asked, "What exactly does this protect you from?" And he said, "Why, yourself, of course."

To create these cords, we're going to put knots in them as a way for them to truly bless you. The first knot is the knot of refuge. Hold your cord and reflect on what is the deepest refuge you can take, the refuge that will carry you and support you. In the Buddhist tradition, sometimes it's refuge in the Buddha and in all awakened beings—the possibility of awakening, seeing the Buddha nature in every being. Refuge in Dharma, in what's true—speaking truth and acting from truth. Refuge in Sangha, the community of all those who are awakening together.

Your refuge could also be refuge in life itself, in Mother Earth, in Pachamama. The refuge could be in the community of all who are serving life. Think for a moment: what is the refuge I turn to for support when things are hard? When I want to sit in council with the elephants or the dolphins? When I know this is really where I go for my connection to all things?

Knowing what your refuge is and that it can support and carry you through anything, take refuge and tie a knot in your cord—a reminder that you are connected with this timeless, eternal refuge, always there for you.

The second knot is the knot of compassion. Traditionally in the creation of a protection cord or when entering a temple or monastery, you would take vows: to refrain from killing or causing harm to living beings; to refrain from stealing or taking that which doesn't belong to you; to refrain from being greedy and disrupting the wise relations of the world by taking what you shouldn't; to refrain from causing harm through speaking falsely or misusing speech; to refrain from causing harm through the misuse of intoxicants or sexuality.

But underlying all of those is simply the heart's vow to move through this world out of compassion for yourself and other beings and not to cause harm—to let your life be one that affirms life. This is the knot of compassion. Hold it up and reflect on your own deep intention not to cause harm and to meet all beings—those who are joyful and those who are suffering, those who are causing suffering and those who are liberating beings from suffering—to meet every being with a tender heart, especially yourself. To be the carrier of compassion.

When you're ready to take the intention or vow of non-harming, tie the second knot in your cord.

Now it's almost fully activated, but not quite. The third knot is the knot of the bodhisattva vow—that intention from when you were coming back to this body and this planet and this life, when you saw what you would take to set the compass of your heart. You each have envisioned something: an intention, a vow, a sacred direction, touched by what you've seen today, by what moved you, by what reminded you who you are, what inspired you.

Now, holding the cord for the third and final knot, tie into it your sacred intention so that you might not forget, but that you might carry it beautifully from this place and this day. And now it is fully activated.

If you want to wear it around your neck, you can put it around your neck. Don't tie it on yet and let the two ends hang down. If you want to wear it around your wrist, or your ankle for that matter if you're feeling particularly creative, whatever feels right. Wrap it around three times and let the two ends hang down.

Before you do anything else with it, I'm going to ask that you turn to a person sitting near you. Before you tie on their blessing cord, when you tie it, really give them a silent blessing. But they have to tell you what their vow was that they made. Because giving it words and saying it out loud brings it more alive on this earth and in your being, in your consciousness.

Then before they tie yours on, you get to tell them what your vow was, what your sacred intention was. And then you tie these together and we'll have a little celebration to end.

So turn to someone, find a partner, whoever's near you. This is not dating, remember. This is just sacred witness. And if there isn't a pair, it could be three people.

The story you're telling is of the third knot—your main intention from the day.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 266

Compassion As We Take Action

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this inspiring dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses the challenges of taking compassionate action in the world without falling into despair, anger, or guilt. Drawing from poet Gary Snyder's advice to 'save the world because you love it,' Burbea weaves together powerful stories of connection—from Polynesian navigators who trust the vastness of the ocean, to shamans sitting in council with elephants, to chimpanzees forming solidarity circles.
>
> The talk explores how to work skillfully with difficult emotions like despair, anger, and grief when facing environmental crises and social injustice. Burbea emphasizes that our responsibility is not to single-handedly save the world, but to plant seeds of intention and action rooted in love and compassion. He draws from the Bhagavad Gītā's teaching on acting without attachment to results, and the Buddha's understanding of dependent origination—that lasting change requires transforming underlying causes and conditions.
>
> The session includes a guided meditation on expanding awareness to cosmic proportions before returning to embody our bodhisattva vows, and concludes with a blessing cord ceremony where participants tie knots representing refuge, compassion, and personal sacred intention. This talk offers profound wisdom for anyone seeking to engage dharma practice with social action while maintaining inner peace and joy.

I have a question to start with. Those of you who have been here all day have heard inspiring and visionary calls to action, information, and so forth. What would help you as we get ready to transition from here back out into the dance of the freeways and the blue waters of the bay and the Easter evening? What themes, what concerns?

James asked me to come in toward the end, and I wasn't sure whether it was tired activists who are here taking a break—who've tried too hard and are carrying the entire world like Sisyphus and need to take a little rest—or whether it's people who are aspiring activists who are saying, "Oh, I think it's about time to get my act together."

What themes or topics would you like to explore? You can leave stuff here, and what you can take is inspiration and spaciousness. What else?

"Can you speak about how to work with the despair that comes up?"

Despair, how to work with despair. Other themes?

"Joyful responsibility."

Oh, that joyful responsibility. Parenting. Reaching people.

"How to mindfully converse with people who may not have the same perspective as we do on some of these crises."

What the Dalai Lama calls "his friends the enemy." It's very interesting—he doesn't say "my friends." He says "my friends the enemy that I talk to." Including each other. How do we talk to one another?

"The anger thing."

Anger, how to deal with anger.

"All the issues around the animal world and all the sentient beings, environmental issues."

All the many other sentient beings that are being affected by everything so deeply—the animal world and the grief around that and concern. Grief, despair, and grief.

"Anger and conflict."

Anger and conflict about all this.

Grief and despair. Anger and conflict—with the people you live with, or perhaps with the corporations that are, after all, also people we share this world with.

I want to weave these concerns into what we explore together today, into our meditation and the setting of intentions. But somehow I feel called to begin on a different note.

I loved sitting here with Wes and Kevin, witnessing how they transform despair and concern and community into art. This is critical work. Wes went to interview Gary Snyder, one of our greatest living environmentalists—Pulitzer Prize-winning poet who wrote "Earth Household" back in the 1950s, when people hadn't yet begun to think environmentally. Wes asked him: "Now you're in your mid-eighties, and you see the seas rising, the extinction of species, global climate disruption, and all these things you've spoken about for decades. What advice do you have for us at this time?"

Gary's response was stunning in its simplicity: "Don't feel guilty."

Three profound words: Don't feel guilty.

He continued: "If you're going to save it, save it because you love it. If you go out because you're angry, or because you're bitter, or to fight—it's not going to help you, and it's actually not going to help the world. The world needs this transformation of consciousness we've been talking about, and it really has to come out of love. It's the only power that's going to make a difference."

Reflecting on Gary's words, what he's really saying is that what will save the world—or serve the world—is your tenderness and your care. Because that's what it's asking for. That's what any child always asks for. The Earth is both our mother and our child.

Here is a poem from Gabriela Mistral, the Chilean poet who won the Nobel Prize in 1945. She was known as a harsh critic of poetry, with extraordinarily high standards. But when a sixteen-year-old boy handed her a sheaf of his poems, she read them, looked back at him and said, "Pablo, you're a real poet. Keep writing." She became the inspiration for Pablo Neruda.

A woman is singing in the valley. The shadow falling blots her out, but her song spreads far across the fields. Her heart is broken, like the jar she dropped this afternoon among the pebbles in the brook. And as she sings, the hidden wound sharpens on the thread of her song and becomes thin and hard, and her voice in modulations dampens with blood.

In the fields the other voices die with the dying day, and a moment ago the song of the last bird stopped. But her deathless heart, alive with grief, gathers all the silent voices into her own, sharp now yet very sweet.

Does she sing for a husband who looks at her silently in the dark? Or for a child whom her song caresses? Or does she sing for her own heart, more helpless than a babe at night-fall?

Night grows maternal before this song that goes to meet it. The stars with a sweetness that is human are beginning to come out. The sky full of stars becomes human and understands the sorrows of this world.

And her song, as pure as water filled with light, cleanses the plain and rinses the mean air of day in which men hate. And from the throat of the woman who keeps on singing, day rises nobly, evaporating toward the stars.

It's a song of tears and beauty and connection with the turning of the Earth. If you were to take all the information—the 360 parts per million, the 410, the 420 that happens to be today's measurement—all the data about global systems and corporate power and climate disruption, somehow you have to find a way to carry it in your heart, in your body, in your being, and do it out of love.

What helps with this is realizing that you're not alone—not in the superficial sense of "we have a big movement," but in something far more mysterious and wonderful.

My friend Dina Metzger, a great activist and poet, once wrote: "Give me everything mangled and bruised and I will make a light of it to make you weep and we will have rain and we will begin again." Take the worst of things and transform them.

Dina has traveled around the world visiting shamans and healers and sages and wise women from many cultures, sitting in council together to ask: What do we do with this difficult, if not dark, time? She said her dream had always been to sit in council not only with humans but with the non-humans.

So when she was in Zimbabwe and Botswana sitting with the sangomas—the shamans there—she shared her dream. "Oh yes," they said. She told them she would love to sit in council with the elephants. They got a large flatbed truck and drove down to the Okavango to a watering hole near where herds of elephants gathered. They parked the truck and sat in a circle in the back for about half an hour, making prayers, sitting peacefully, and envisioning their connection with all of life—which is true, which we have.

Then a very large elephant—though they are all large, aren't they?—

But this was a particularly large elephant—they are all large, aren't they? This was a particularly big female who walked down from the hills to the truck where they were seated in their circle. She stuck her head into the circle, her eye four feet from Dina's, and stood there with them for twenty minutes without moving while they held their sacred space together. Then she nodded and walked off.

"Okay, that was pretty wild," they thought. They sat there, made prayers, thanked the elephant, and prepared to leave. They turned the truck around and were getting ready to go when they noticed that the elephant had gone up over the hill and now returned with fifteen or twenty other elephants. They all lined what was a sort of dry riverbed with a two-track jeep road, positioning themselves as if to acknowledge those who had come to listen and sit with them as they made their exit.

Dina said, "I don't know exactly what it means, but I do know that it means we're not alone—that we're not alone."

I was in Hawaii where I met one of my heroes, a man named Nainoa Thompson. How many people have ever heard of Nainoa Thompson? Maybe one or two people in the room—good, this is a treat then, because I get to tell you his story.

The Pacific islands were populated by the Polynesians, whose genetic lineage, traced through DNA, leads back to the islanders of the Philippines, Borneo, and Southeast Asia. The Polynesians and Hawaiians knew they had these great voyaging canoes in the old days—there were still pictures and paintings of them. They navigated half the earth covered with water, which is the Pacific Ocean.

When Captain Cook, arguably the finest navigator in the Royal Navy of England, went to the South Pacific islands, he met some of the master navigators there and asked them about the South Pacific. They cleared the sand and placed 120 stones on it, representing the islands within 4,000 miles in every direction. Then they took one of these navigators on Cook's ship. Through rain, doldrums, and dark clouds when you couldn't see the sky at night—with no way to know where you were—whenever they asked, he would say, "Oh, my island is there, and here's where we're headed."

In the 1970s, the Hawaiians decided to revive the voyaging tradition. They went to the far Marquesas and found a man named Mau, one of the last living navigators who had been trained in this lineage of shaman navigators. Nainoa was one of the small group who went there to train.

The training was intense. When Mau was trained, he got seasick, so his grandfather tied his hands together with rope, threw him overboard from a small boat, and just towed him around for weeks until he got used to being part of the ocean. Later in his training, his testicles were tied to the bottom of the boat for twenty-four hours so he could feel the waves in his body—there are five levels of waves, including those that bounce off islands 500 or 1,000 miles away and the deep ocean swells. He learned to read hundreds of stars, to watch the floating seaweed and the birds, to feel the different levels of waves.

Nainoa underwent this training, and then they took the first big voyaging canoe—two sixty-foot trees lashed together in the traditional way—and began to voyage across the Pacific. When they finally reached Tahiti, half the population came out to greet them as if they were gods, because they were demonstrating what this beautiful culture had always known: the capacity to sail the ocean without a single instrument while always knowing where you were.

Nainoa sits like a yogi—now he's trained his successors, including a young Hawaiian woman—and during the voyages of one or two months, you don't sleep. You sit in a kind of yogic meditation, and you always know where you are.

They decided to attempt the most difficult voyage of all: to Easter Island, the Rapa Nui, the most remote island in all the South Pacific. Through doldrums, through rain and gray skies, almost reaching that area, Nainoa fell asleep. He woke up in the middle of the night and realized he had fallen asleep—and he didn't know where he was. He didn't want to tell anyone he was lost because they had been sailing and paddling for six weeks. So he just sat, not knowing, for a couple of days, letting them continue to sail.

Then in the night, he heard Mau's voice, his teacher's voice, saying, "When you don't know where you are, stop and do a very deep meditation and realize where you really are."

"So I just let everything go," Nainoa said, "and realized that I was in the center of the universe, that the boat was the center of the galaxy. We're always in the center. Where are you? Here. Now." He said, "All of a sudden I came to rest. I knew what my teacher meant. I was just where I was."

His teacher had told him, "If you are still lost, with your heart and your imagination, raise the islands out of the ocean." Nainoa said, "I didn't quite know what he meant by that, but there I was, sitting and realizing it's dark and I'm in the middle of the universe—what to do but just be."

Then there was a break in the clouds. The moon came out and showed on the horizon the peak of Rapa Nui. "It's as if when I was ready," he said, "the island appeared for me. My teacher could do that at will. We'd be out somewhere and he'd say, 'All right, this is where we're going,' and things would just appear. I don't know how he did that, but I've come to trust that I'm part of something so huge, so much bigger than anything I could possibly imagine with my little brain. When we go out"—imagine going out for two months through storms in a double-hulled canoe to cross the Pacific—"I've come to trust that I am part of something so wondrous and mysterious and enormous. It's not me who's taking care of it. My job is to become in harmony with this and let my love, my voice, my connection, my vision come out of that."

One day when I was walking through the Stanford University campus, I heard this story from Vandana Shiva, another great activist. Much of her work involved the Ganges cleanup project. She worked with the Mahant of Varanasi at the Tulsi Temple on this whole project to clean up the Ganges River.

I was walking through the Stanford University campus with a friend when I saw a crowd of people with cameras and video equipment on a little hillside. They were clustered around a pair of chimpanzees—a male running loose and a female on a chain about twenty-five feet long, a light chain. It turned out the male was from Marine World Africa, and the female was being studied for something at Stanford. And who I thought were spectators were actually scientists and publicity people trying to get them to mate.

The male was eager, you know how they can be. He grunted and grabbed the female's chain and tugged. She whimpered and backed away. He pulled again. She pulled back. Watching the chimps' faces, I began to feel sympathy for the female.

Suddenly, the female chimp yanked her chain out of the male's grasp. And to my amazement, she walked through the crowd straight over to me, took my hand, and led me across the circle to the only other two women in the crowd and joined hands with them. And now the four of us stood together in a circle. I remember the feeling of that rough palm against mine. The little chimp had recognized us and reached out across all the years of evolution to form her own women's support group.

We're part of something, and that something—which is life, which is huge and mysterious and beautiful—is asking of you to participate in life. And it's asking you all the time. You may not always pick up the phone or answer your text, whatever it is.

This from Alison Luterman, poet in Oakland. She describes the generosity of life: "In the same way sun drapes a buttered scarf across your face, rose opens herself to your glance, and rain shares its divine melancholy, the whole world keeps whispering or shouting to you, nibbling your ear like a neglected lover."

Here we are on this amazing earth, connected with the creatures and the animals and the atmosphere and the food chains. We saw these white freshwater dolphins in the Irrawaddy River in March when we were traveling in Burma. The dolphins of the world were swimming along with us. And Trudy, my partner, wanted to jump off the boat and swim along with the dolphins because she does that in other places. But I said, the Irrawaddy is not the right place to do this right now—there was lots of other boat traffic and such. But we're part of this web. Everybody knows it in some way.

And then the question is, well, what do we do? How do we take the spirit and the song and the vision and the science and so forth from this day and bring it each in our own way into action?

I would like to use the image of planting seeds. You don't make the fields, you don't make the rain and so forth, but you carry seeds in your heart. And the seeds are really the seeds of your best intentions and the seeds of your actions. As Henry David Thoreau said, "Though I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there to plant and I am prepared to expect wonders."

It's not given to you to hold the world or change it—that's not your responsibility. That would be pretty egotistical: "Okay, I'm going to do it." But it is given to you to plant beautiful and amazing seeds and to join with others and to water them and to amend the soil, each in your own way.

And it's going to take a while. I'm sorry to say, the earth changes slowly.

Our friend Ari Ariyaratne is the most famous community organizer in Asia. He started the Sarvodaya movement in Sri Lanka that eventually spread to half the villages or more in the country. When the Norwegians were brokering a peace treaty there, Ari called all his people together to Anuradhapura, the great ancient temple there, to talk about how to make peace. Six hundred fifty thousand people came—and this is a country of only eighteen million people. A quite extraordinary being.

He stood up there and he said, "It took us five hundred years to get into this civil war, this mess. Four hundred years of British colonial oppression, five hundred years of conflict between the Muslims and the Buddhists and the Hindus, two hundred years of disparity between the rich, wet parts and the poor, dry parts of the island. So the Buddha teaches us that things arise according to causes and conditions. If we wish this to change, we will have to change the causes and conditions. Therefore, I offer you the Sarvodaya five-hundred-year peace plan.

"Five years of ceasefire, ten years of rebuilding roads and schools, twenty-five years to learn each other's language and religion, fifty years of an economic plan to bring harmony between the rich and the poor parts of the island, and in one hundred years we'll have a council and we'll sit down and we'll say, 'Twenty percent—how are we doing? Are we on the right track?' And then we'll do it again for the next hundred and the next hundred. And maybe in..."

He said, if we pursue it—not maybe, if we plant these seeds—in 500 years, we will have the island of peace that we dream of.

Now I got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama when I was doing some teaching at an event with him. Having the Dalai Lama sit there when you do teaching is actually a very cool thing. I told this story and he was grinning because he's in the same predicament. He's got Tibet and fifty years of Chinese military oppression and the loss of temples and cultures and all those things. And he said—talking about anger and the suffering—he said they've taken our sacred texts. They've burned our temples. They've taken our ability to practice our religion and rituals. They've taken so much from us. "Why should I let them take my happiness?" And then he laughed.

You understand that no one can take away your joy. No one can take that part of your heart from you.

So I got to tell this story to the Dalai Lama. And then there's the passage from Thomas Merton, where he writes to an activist and says, "Do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no results at all, if not at times perhaps bringing about its opposite. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

And so you set an intention in your heart, you align yourself with what the Earth asks of you—because you are of the Earth, you are the Earth—and you plant your seeds. For some it will be demonstrating, and for some it will be teaching kids in a preschool how to make a garden, raising conscious children, running a conscious business. For some it will be teaching not only English to immigrants, but really making immigrants understand that they too are part of the web of the world that's welcome. Or tending the animals and letting them know that you love them, that they're part of you, that we exist with the animal world. In fact, we are the animal world. It's kind of this delusion to think somehow that we're different from all this.

And so you have one foot in the trees and the soil of the earth and the other foot in eternity. Because the question is not the future of the earth or the future of humanity, but it is the presence of something greater, of eternity itself. And that means somehow that in order to do this work—to not feel guilty, as Gary says, but to do it out of love—requires that you first carry, that you set an inner intention that's really beautiful, maybe something you can't possibly do, but you set it as the vision, your bodhisattva vow. You act on it, you plant your seeds.

And here's the secret. It's a summary of the Bhagavad Gita, and you get your money's worth today. This is the secret: to act well without attachment to the fruits of the actions, because it's not given to you to determine how it's going to come out. But what's given to you is to act beautifully and bravely and mercifully and to love. And if you do that, all kinds of things—the elephants will be cheering you and the dolphins will be swimming with you and the chimpanzees will take your hand and say, "Come on baby, let's do more of this." The earth will be with you, because the earth wants this as well, and you can begin to trust this.

So I'm supposed to teach a meditation and we don't have all that much time. Let me think for a second. Anything else that I want to say? Yeah, I'm going to read you one little thing, then we'll do our meditation. It's one of my favorite poems from Diane Ackerman, who's also a good friend. When I think about people making a bodhisattva vow—I think Donald and David Loy talked about the bodhisattva vow: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all," and so forth. Of course, it's very complicated because if you decide to save the sentient beings in your family, they don't necessarily want to be saved by you. Then you realize that saving sentient beings means something a little different than your ideas about how they're supposed to be.

This is Diane Ackerman's version of what I call her version of the Bodhisattva Vows—saying if you were to have prayer in the schools, here's maybe a morning prayer that kids could make: "In the name of daybreak and the eyelids of morning and the wayfaring moon and the night when it departs, I swear I will not dishonor my soul with hatred, but offer myself humbly as a guardian of nature, as a healer of misery, as a messenger of wonder and an architect of peace."

And so in the meditation, which we'll do now, one of the things I'll ask is if you were to make a little vow, make your own bodhisattva vow from today, what would it be? What would the seeds be? Sometimes it's just as simple as "I vow to be kind to every being I encounter." It can be that simple, but it might be something else, and only you can know. It's sort of setting the compass of your heart.

So let your eyes close gently and come back just to feel your breath breathing. The wind that was carried to you that dusted the peaks of Mauna Kea and Mauna Loa, swept across the Pacific to your breath that you take in right now. Of course, it also was the breath of the person sitting next to you a few seconds ago. You don't even have to kiss them—they give you your breath. It's true. And it's the breath of the...

Continue beautifying this talk (part 6/8). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

raccoons that dwell in the trees and the deer that move around us and the earthworms and the sparrows. Let your life breath breathe in and out, and bring your attention gently to the area of your heart.

Feel that you have been given life. You have been given this amazing incarnation, this gift of being alive. Sometimes it feels small, and you become identified with unworthiness and grief and fear and attachments. But it is also possible to feel the radiance of life given to you that breathes itself and moves. In this there dwells a deep peace and natural love.

Imagine as you sit now that this love—which is what was born into you, this tenderness and care that is born into every newborn child—fills your body, all the cells of your body, with life force and healing and care.

Now imagine somehow that you could expand so that your head pokes up through the ceiling and your body grows bigger and bigger until you are larger than this whole building. All the beings inside here, breathing and meditating, are now contained within you. You become this great vast being who holds Spirit Rock in your body. All their human experiences—breathing and thinking and feeling—rest within you.

Let yourself grow bigger and bigger. Imagine, because identity is so mysterious, that you can feel not just the room, but float up into the sky and become enormous. As if you float over the Bay Area, and all of California is now down there, but part of this huge body you are becoming, bigger and bigger.

Within you is humanity—the human condition of joy and desire and loneliness and caring and violence and the love of parents for their children and failure and creativity—and all the animals, the bay and the ocean. All of this dwells in you. You are now this vast being, and you grow bigger and bigger as if you are so immense that the whole earth is there in front of you and you could hold it in your lap. You realize, no—it is part of you.

You are as big as the solar system, and you expand like the galaxies, huge. Even the little earth is just there, a blue-green ball deep within you, with all its dreams and hopes and hundreds of thousands of millions of years of life. You rest in the vastness that is silent and peaceful, where everything that exists dwells within you.

You are the ancient one. Everything that ever is or was or will be, all time, the dance of the universe, exists within you. It is silent and peaceful, without boundaries, beyond form.

Gently begin to collect yourself. Gently the vastness starts to gather and grow smaller. Slowly you feel the galaxies and the solar system and the earth floating within you with all the cities and forests and oceans. Now you look and see the earth and the beings on it, and realize you are being given the gift of incarnation—to be a small part of the whole and yet at the same time to have one foot in your human body and another in eternity itself, in the timeless.

You can do something beautiful with the life you have been given. You can tend this earth, you can care for all beings—not out of guilt, as Gary says, but out of love and compassion, out of care, for they are all part of you.

Before you return to your small self, to the limited and beautiful and wonderful incarnation that you have been given in this body, as you look at this earth from this vast perspective, let yourself listen for your own bodhisattva vow or your own highest intention. What would it be that on this day you might say: "This is the direction of my heart"? What is the spirit and what are the energy and the vision that you want to carry from this day? How can you carry it beautifully in your own form—as a guardian of nature, a healer of misery, a messenger of wonder, an architect of peace?

As you envision now coming back to this body and incarnation, let the heart fill with compassion for all the worries and struggles that you and others carry. Let there come an understanding in this tenderness—heart filled with tenderness—of how to navigate the joys and sorrows, the gain and loss, the praise and blame, the birth and death. This is human incarnation. This is this earth. How to carry yourself so beautifully and plant the best of seeds.

As you envision, feel what your body would be like to carry the spirit of awakening. Sense what the quality of your heart will be as you carry this spirit of awakening and care. As you prepare to re-inhabit this human life with wisdom now, and the vows of what you will do, and a deep sense of tenderness.

As you return, you realize that in your lap, the Bodhisattvas and Buddhas—Kuan Yin, the goddess of infinite compassion—have left you a gift. You can picture or imagine that there is a gift in your lap, which is a clear symbol of just what you need to carry you into this work of loving and serving the earth most skillfully.

You open this gift from the goddess of compassion and the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. It is the perfect thing that you need to keep this sense of peace and the beautiful seeds and the action you will take. Let yourself unwrap it, picture it, imagine it, envision it in any way you can. If it is not clear, hold it up in your hands to the sunlight. This is the gift—the clear symbol of just what you need as you leave the temple and return to the marketplace.

Finally, coming back to sense yourself seated here now with this gift and with your heart's intention, let there be loving and compassionate awareness of this life you have been given. Think of the people who care about you the most, how they love you and want the best for you. You are a daughter or a son of this earth. You are wanted here.

And let the love in, because compassion and love are never complete unless they include the one seated right here on your own cushion. Then the circle is complete and you become an expression of that love. Fill yourself with that love. Let it bless you. Let it touch all the cells of your body, every breath and heartbeat. Take your gift. Remember your vows or your sacred intention. Most of all, remember that you can dance.

[Pause for movement and preparation]

As these cords are passed around, don't tie them on yet. Just hold them and pass them to others near you. You may have seen people wearing blessing or protection cords—there are red ones and golden ones. While they're distributed, let me speak about them briefly.

Throughout Buddhist Asia, from what were the Buddhist countries of Afghanistan and Pakistan and India, all the way across Southeast Asia through China and Japan, the sacred thread is used as a symbol of our interbeing and interconnectedness. It's part of all kinds of rituals of blessing and care. Often they're colored red—I received this one from the Dalai Lama—or sometimes they're golden. The reason is that they're considered one thread from the robe of a monk or a nun that you wear in the marketplace. It's essentially remembering that this is your true nature. You're a monk or a nun in disguise, basically, out there in the marketplace. You have to remember that your true home is the temple and that your vows and the intention you set speak from and to who you are in the deepest and most beautiful way.

These sacred threads appear across traditions. If you go to India and meet a Brahmin priest, they'll wear a white thread around their body for the whole of their adult life to show that they're living within the understanding that takes every experience, every being, everything they touch as part of the divine, as part of what's holy.

When I first participated in these protection blessing cord ceremonies with Lama Chögyam Trungpa Rinpoche years ago, somebody asked, "Well, what exactly does this protect you from?" And he said, "Why, yourself, of course."

To create these cords, we need to tie knots in them as a way for them to truly bless you.

The first knot is the knot of refuge. Hold your cord and reflect on what is the deepest refuge you can take—the refuge that will carry you and support you. In the Buddhist tradition, sometimes it's refuge in the Buddha and in all awakened beings, the possibility of awakening, seeing the Buddha nature in every being. Refuge in Dharma, in what's true, speaking truth and acting from truth. Refuge in Sangha, the community of all those who are awakening together—the ordained Sangha, the Sangha of awakened ones.

But your refuge could also be refuge in life itself, in Mother Earth, in Pachamama. The refuge could be in the community of all who are serving life. Think for a moment: what is the refuge I turn to for support when things are hard? When I want to sit in council with the elephants or the dolphins? When I know that this is really where I go for my connection to all things?

Knowing what your refuge is, and that it can support and carry you through anything, take refuge and tie a knot in your cord that is a reminder that you are connected with this timeless, eternal refuge—always there for you.

The second knot is the knot of compassion. Traditionally, in the creation of a protection cord or when entering a temple or monastery, you would take vows: to refrain from killing or causing harm to living beings; to refrain from stealing or taking that which doesn't belong to you; to refrain from being greedy and disturbing the wise relations of the world by taking what you shouldn't; to refrain from causing harm through speaking falsely or misusing speech; to refrain from causing harm through the misuse of intoxicants or sexuality.

But underlying all of these is simply the heart's vow to move through this world out of compassion for yourself and other beings and not to cause harm—to let your life be one that affirms life. This is the knot of compassion. Hold it and reflect on your own deep intention to not cause harm and to meet all beings—those who are joyful and those who are suffering, those who are causing suffering and those liberating beings from suffering—to meet every being with a tender heart, especially yourself, to be the carrier of compassion.

When you're ready to take the intention or vow of non-harming, tie the second knot in your cord.

Now it's almost fully activated, but not quite. The third knot is the knot of the bodhisattva vow—that intention you held when coming back to this body and this planet and this life, when you saw what you would take to set the compass of your heart. Each of you has envisioned something: an intention, a vow, a sacred direction, touched by what you've seen today, by what moved you, by what reminded you who you are, what inspired you.

Now, holding the cord for the third and final knot, tie into it your sacred intention, so that you might not forget but carry it beautifully from this place and this day.

And now it is fully activated.

If you want to wear it around your neck, you can put it around your neck. Don't tie it on yet—let the two ends hang down. If you want to wear it around your wrist, or your ankle for that matter if you're very hip, whatever. Wrap it around three times and let the two ends hang down.

And then, before you do anything else with it, I'm going to ask that you turn to a person sitting near you in a moment. Before you tie on their blessing cord, and when you tie it, really give them a silent blessing. But first, they have to tell you what their vow was that they made. Because giving it word and saying it out loud brings it more alive on this earth and in your being, in your consciousness.

And then before they tie yours on, you get to tell them what your vow was, what your sacred intention was. Then you get to tie these together, and we'll have a little celebration to end.

So turn to someone, find a partner, whoever's near you. This is not dating, remember. This is just, you know... And if there aren't two people, it could be three.

The story you're telling is of the third knot—your main intention from the day.

CHAPTER 267

How To Be an Earthling

Rob Burbea · 26 min

> In this unique Earth Day celebration, Rob Burbea offers a joyful and profound exploration of what it means to be truly present as inhabitants of this Earth. Beginning with Gary Snyder's ecological Pledge of Allegiance and honoring naturalist John Muir, this talk weaves together environmental consciousness with dharma practice in an unconventional yet deeply meaningful way.
>
> Burbea addresses the overwhelming nature of contemporary crises - climate change, environmental destruction, and social upheaval - while offering the Buddhist teaching of presence as both refuge and response. Drawing on the fundamental dharma principle of interdependence (paṭiccasamuppāda), he explores how recognizing our literal and spiritual connection to all life forms can transform our relationship with the Earth and each other. The talk emphasizes the practice of mindful awareness (sati) as essential for navigating both personal anxiety and collective environmental challenges.
>
> Through humor, music, and poetic reflection, this dharma talk demonstrates how Buddhist practice can inform ecological consciousness and vice versa. Burbea's approach shows how the simple instruction to 'be here now' becomes revolutionary when applied to our role as earthlings, encouraging practitioners to find presence and joy even amid uncertainty while maintaining commitment to protecting our planetary home.

I thought I would begin by leading you all in Gary Snyder's version of the Pledge of Allegiance. Hands on your hearts, hats off.

"I pledge allegiance to the soil of Turtle Island, and to the beings who thereon dwell, one ecosystem in diversity, under the sun, with joyful interpenetration for all."

Those beatniks were our ancestors and heroes who first truly noticed the natural world and what was happening to it. They were perhaps the first generation to really understand and respond to our environmental crisis.

Tomorrow is the birthday of another great hero, John Muir. Think about walking up into the Sierras and how much he did to preserve the most beautiful part of this continent. Here's a poem by him:

"This grand show is eternal. It is always sunrise somewhere. The dew is never all dried at once. A shower is forever falling. Vapor is ever rising. Eternal sunrise, eternal sunset, eternal dawn and gleaming on sea and continent and islands, each in its turn as the round earth rolls."

We've been talking about many difficult issues we're facing, and I want to address what I think is one of the most challenging—the crisis of crisis itself. There is so much crisis. I used to tell my journalist friends, "You are what you cover." These days it feels like apocalypse all the time.

We're bombarded with fears about viruses and diseases, the thinning ozone layer, potential cosmic threats. There are warnings of worldwide food shortages, government instability, and endless conflicts. The constant stream of things that could kill us can leave us dying of broken hearts from overwhelm and despair.

But perhaps before we can get it together, we need to let it all come apart. Sometimes we need to relax into the chaos, to find our ground even amidst the million things that threaten us. There's wisdom in recognizing that our anxiety about death and destruction can become its own form of suffering—one we can learn to hold with greater equanimity.

Don't consume the sugar. Don't consume the salt. Cholesterol clogs your arteries while giant corporations devour your land and computers consume your consciousness. You've heard the temperatures are rising, and the oceans are too. Soon enough, the beach will come to you.

There are a million things that will kill you, and you're dying of a broken heart. There are a million things that will kill you, and you're dying of a broken heart. But before you can get it together, you must allow it all to fall apart.

So just relax. Stop singing the blues. Go out and create your own news. There are a million things that will kill you, and you're dying of a broken heart.

Thank you, Mr. Kevin. That was my burst of energy, and now I'll sit down.

Here's a piece I wrote and rewrote for today. Hello, earthlings. Say hallelujah, because springtime has arrived in the northern hemisphere of Earth, and it's time for our annual springtime spiritual jamboree—with Christians honoring Jesus, Jews honoring Moses, and pagans venturing into the woods to celebrate.

If Moses were alive today, he would likely be organizing a people's revolt against the corporate pharaohs who have transformed millions of us into wage slaves, laboring to construct their pyramids of filthy lucre. If Jesus were alive today, he would undoubtedly be dwelling in the Tenderloin as the rabbi of the homeless and poor, distributing loaves and fishes along with wine to wash them down.

Both Jesus and Moses would be urging people to cease worshiping golden calves, pork futures, and the evil mammon.com. Meanwhile, here in Northern California, we've transformed Passover into a spiritually correct liberation party for everyone who is oppressed—and who isn't, really?

In Berkeley, you can find a prayer book for a socialist Seder where the kugel is divided according to each person's need. At my Passover feast, we always raise a glass of wine to the Buddha, even though there remains some dispute over whether he was Jewish. Nonetheless, he helps lead our minds out of bondage. So here's to you, Buddha: Let my people be here now.

For research into Buddha's Jewish origins, you might consult the Oy Vey Sutra or the more esoteric Double-Breasted Sutra.

It is appropriate and auspicious in this season of spiritual renewal that we celebrate Earth Day, getting down to the real essence, paying respects to Pachamama, the goddess Gaia, this ancient rock of ages. This day should be the most important holy day of all because it can be celebrated by all life, regardless of race, religion, nationality, kingdom, genus, or phylum—regardless of coverings of fur, feathers, scales, skin, leaves, or bark, because this Earth is everybody's neighborhood.

Just consider: here we are, all riding together on our home planet, hurtling through space at incredible speeds, spinning in our orbit around the sun at approximately 66,000 miles per hour. You don't even need to hold on because Earth Mother is holding you, embracing you with her strong arms of gravity.

On Earth Day, we offer gratitude to Uncle Charlie Darwin, who began spinning us a wholly new story about who we are and where we came from. As Sir Charles wrote in the final paragraph of his book on the origin of species: "There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed into a few forms or into one; and that, whilst this planet has gone cycling on according to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a beginning endless forms most beautiful and most wonderful have been, and are being, evolved."

That includes you and me—beautiful and wonderful earthlings born from the three-and-a-half-billion-year dance of life on this planet, a story containing as much awe and wonder as any scripture. To paraphrase cosmologist Brian Swimme: only four billion years ago, the Earth was a ball of molten rock, and now it can play guitar.

Here we are, nearly Earth Day 2014, playing guitar in the Holocene—or is it the Anthropocene? Regardless, it's my scene and your scene, living through this mild interglacial period. But we're heading toward trouble. The biohazards are now in the house: temperatures rising faster than expected, endangered species multiplying, a looming water crisis. There's so much trouble everywhere that the very word "ecology" can make you scream, "Eek-ology!"

What's required of us isn't merely Obama's green economy, recycling, or driving hybrid cars, but a shift of consciousness. We need an upgrade of our mythology. Over centuries, humans have become so arrogant we believe the entire universe was created just for us, that we are separate and specially made. Our major religions have come to regard Earth as some kind of training planet where you learn lessons or burn off karma before departing for your true home elsewhere. This is only a test.

But these beliefs are now dysfunctional because they remove the divine from Earth and extract humans from the great web of life. Hallelujah, because in recent years we've begun telling ourselves a new story about our origins. There's no longer doubt that this evolutionary story is true—at least among people with well-developed forebrains.

Now it's time to embrace that story as our new creation myth. We must create ritual around it, sing and dance it, bring it alive in the corridors of our psyche and the marrow of our bones.

Speaking of bones, friends: our bones are composed of calcium, magnesium, phosphate, silicate—literally the clay of Earth molded into human form. Most of our bodies are liquid, and most of that liquid shares the chemical consistency of oceans. We literally sweat and cry seawater. We're not merely on the Earth; we are of the Earth, made of all-natural ingredients.

We are certified organic.

And we're built out of all the life that came before us. Scientists have discovered that we have three brains inside our skull: a reptilian brain, a mammalian brain, and the neocortex, or new human brain. The latest research indicates that we use our new human brain mostly to make excuses for the behavior generated by our other two brains. We are not so much rational animals as we are rationalizing animals.

And yes, the lizard and the wolf still live inside of us. In fact, in this story of evolution, we find that we're related to every being that ever lived through the miracle molecule of DNA, deoxyribonucleic acid. Too cold and clinical a name for this miraculous substance that separates life from non-life.

So I hereby declare a new acronym. Every time you see or hear the letters DNA, think divine natural abundance. Divine natural abundance.

The unraveling of the genetic code reveals that we share over 98% of our DNA with apes, 70% with worms, nearly 50% with yeast. So if we declare ourselves divine, is not the slime also divine? And if not, where do we draw the line? Let's face it, we are all cell brothers and cell sisters. Can you dig it? A t-shirt from the biology department at UC Santa Cruz makes the point: "You share 25 percent of your DNA with bananas. Get over yourself."

And if we see ourselves in this story of evolution, we find hope because we see that Earth life is tough and creative and has survived comet collisions and continents bumping into each other and ice ages and Dick Cheney. So there's reason for optimism.

I also find hope by reminding myself that the word ecology has only been around for 40 years. And the first UN Conference on the Environment took place in 1970—a blink of a blink of an eye in biological time. We're just now waking up to our impact on the life of the planet, just now learning how we have to change our way of living, change our story.

Turns out that what Mother Earth needs most from humans right now is a few years of negative economic growth. Instead of another stimulus package, what we really need is a sedative package. Let's follow the advice of the great sages and simplify our lives and cut back on consumption in a way that is fair and causes the least amount of suffering for all, and we will all become happier in the process.

And finally, to commemorate Earth Day this year, maybe do something radical. Like, go picket in front of the oil company of your choice. Or go out into the ocean and take a swim in the primal amniotic fluid. And while you're out there, maybe chain yourself to an endangered coral reef. Or just play some soothing music for the fish, who must be very confused lately due to the changing temperature of the oceans.

At least take a vow on this Earth Day, a vow that you will do something more to protect your mother. And at some point in your celebration, take off your shoes, dance on the earth, touching your mother skin to skin, or just lay down flat. Ignore your inner cynic and give your mama a great big hug. As always, she will forgive you and welcome you home.

And this is Scoop saying all praises to the earth. Long may she spin. If you don't like the news, go out and make some of your own.

This is a song whose title comes from Wes, though I can never remember the words properly. I wrote this piece during a family retreat here at Spirit Rock a few years ago. The theme was something like letting go—one of those classic dharma topics. It occurred to me that there was a wonderful line from Wes that would work perfectly with that theme.

This song was actually written on this very land and appears on my Laughing Buddha CD. I have to confess, there's something deeply satisfying about playing heavy metal chords in the Spirit Rock meditation hall—it just does me good somehow.

The song explores our relationship with material abundance and the endless cycle of wanting more. It playfully catalogs the overwhelming array of possessions that fill our lives: technology, entertainment, convenience items, luxury goods—everything from SUVs to virtual pets to summer houses. The repetitive chorus serves as both a mantra and a reality check: "Enough, enough, we got enough stuff."

There's a wonderful contradiction captured in the lyrics: "We got enough to sink a ship and not enough to make your backbone slip." This speaks to how we can be drowning in possessions yet still feel somehow unsatisfied, still lacking something essential.

The song becomes almost absurd in its inventory of modern life's accumulations—credit cards, bodyguards, hundred-acre backyards, drugs that promise superhuman abilities, even pet Tibetan tiger cubs. Each item represents another attempt to fill some perceived emptiness, another promise of satisfaction that never quite delivers.

As dharma practitioners, we recognize this endless cycle of acquisition and craving. The Buddha spoke of tanha—this thirst or craving that drives us to constantly seek more, whether material possessions, experiences, or states of being. The song captures this beautifully through its relentless rhythm and ever-expanding list of stuff.

Yet there's also humor and lightness in this examination of our material excess. Sometimes we need to laugh at ourselves and our tendencies before we can truly see them clearly. The playful tone invites us to examine our own relationships with possessions without the heavy burden of guilt or judgment.

So here we are. Oh, it seems complicated, but it's not that complicated. In fact, it's very simple.

No matter what you do, try to be here now. Be here now, and then be here now again. I'll tell you where and when: here and now. You'll never get away from here, no matter how it may appear. You won't find "there" out there—it's always here, here, here.

And what time is it? You know you can't miss it. It's never the future or past. It's just now, now, now. And forever it will last.

So be here now, and then be here now again. I'll tell you where and when: here and now.

Now we're going to do a little call and response. I'm going to say "where," and you're going to say "here." I'm going to say "when," and you're going to say "now." Everyone ready?

Feel it as you say it: Where? When? Where? When? Where and when? Where and when? Where, when? Where, when?

Where, when—here, now. Where, when—here, now.

Stay here and now. Enjoy your life here and now. Be here now again, and again, and again, and again. I'll tell you where and when: here and now, here and now.

CHAPTER 268

Today's Climate Reality

Rob Burbea · 27 min

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea applies Buddhist wisdom to one of our time's most pressing issues: climate change. Drawing on the First Noble Truth's teaching to look directly at dukkha (suffering), he presents sobering scientific evidence about current climate impacts - from rising seas and extreme weather to ecosystem collapse and human displacement. Burbea connects this examination to fundamental Buddhist principles, noting how the Buddha encouraged us to "look" and "connect with the stress, the suffering" before transformation can occur.
>
> The talk presents detailed findings from recent climate reports, including rising global temperatures, ocean acidification, and accelerating extinction rates. Burbea explains the "terrifying new math" of carbon emissions: we can safely burn only 565 gigatons more carbon to avoid catastrophic warming, yet fossil fuel reserves contain five times that amount. He addresses the economic and political forces perpetuating fossil fuel dependence, including massive government subsidies.
>
> Rather than ending in despair, the talk emphasizes practical solutions and engaged Buddhist response. Burbea outlines concrete steps including carbon pricing, ending fossil fuel subsidies, and supporting renewable energy. He connects environmental action to core Buddhist values of interdependence and compassion, particularly for those most vulnerable to climate impacts. The teaching demonstrates how dharma practice calls us to face difficult truths while maintaining hope and commitment to skillful action for all beings' welfare.

So as I was preparing this, I thought, oh, I'm going to be the bearer of the difficult news. But of course, the Buddha encouraged us to look. The first noble truth—we need to connect with the stress, the suffering, understand what's happening before we can transform it, before we can heal, before we can move to that unlimited way of thinking. So we'll look for thirty minutes. Brace yourself at the reality of what's happening.

I'm drawing upon two reports, one from the American Association for the Advancement of Science, which came out recently. And this is what's happening now, observable now. The evidence is overwhelming, says the AAAS report. Levels of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere are rising and temperatures are going up. Today, our world is the warmest it's been in 100,000 years.

Half the Arctic sea ice is missing. That's an area that's nearly twice the size of Alaska. Glaciers and ice sheets continue to melt rapidly in Greenland and Antarctica and other places, contributing to sea level rise. It's also affecting water supplies for as many as a billion people around the world. The oceans are now 30% more acidic. The current acidification rate is likely to be the fastest in 300 million years.

For anyone who doesn't think climate change is happening now—that it's going to be happening sometime later—it's not the case. This is all happening now.

Because the sea level is rising, storm surges are higher, pushing saltwater into the aquifers that coastal communities depend on for fresh water. There's also an increase in the extent of coastal flooding. Over the last two decades, sea levels have risen almost twice as fast as the average during the previous century. Saltwater is infiltrating coastal wells in southern Florida and other places around the world.

The pattern of precipitation is changing worldwide. In the United States, there's increased flooding in the northeast, the Great Plains, and the Midwest. Drought has increased in the southwest, and we're painfully aware of it here as well. Drought impacted a large area of the United States in 2012.

Since 1950, heat waves worldwide have become longer and more frequent. One study indicates that the global area hit by extremely hot summertime temperatures has increased fifty-fold. Extreme storms like Hurricane Sandy and Super Typhoon Haiyan, which hit the Philippines and was one of the strongest storms recorded on the planet, are now more intense and more frequent. By the way, in this report from the American Association for the Advancement of Science, they used the word "extreme" nineteen times.

Time for a breath.

The area burned by wildfires and the length of the fire season have increased substantially in recent decades. Climate change has increased the threat of megafires—large fires that burn proportionally greater areas—and wildfires are now happening in areas that didn't have them before, at least not in recent history.

So why is this happening? This is the highest level of CO2 in the atmosphere in 800,000 years, and that's because of burning carbon. This is being caused by human activity. The AAAS report wanted to make that clear. They said 97% of climate scientists worldwide agree humans are causing this change. That's the good news, I think, because we can make changes to change that. And this is the same level of consensus—I thought it was brilliant that they brought this out—this is the same level of consensus in the scientific community as the medical community has that smoking contributes to lung cancer and heart disease.

No matter where they live, Americans are experiencing the effects of climate change. And of course, that's also true around the world. On every continent and in every ocean, plants and animals are already moving towards the poles, towards deeper depths and higher altitudes. Migration patterns are changing. Some seasonal behaviors are taking place two or three weeks earlier than they did just a few decades ago. There are many organisms that can't adapt that rapidly, so they're having problems. Climate change threatens to collapse some ecosystems, and it amplifies extinction pressures. We're already experiencing increased extinction rates.

There's another paper that just came out a couple weeks ago from the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. They say heat waves, droughts, floods, cyclones, and wildfires alter the ecosystems.

They disrupt food production and water supply, damage infrastructure, increase morbidity and mortality, and impact mental health and human well-being. As an example, an estimated 70,000 people died prematurely in the 2003 heat wave in Europe. They estimate that 50,000 people died prematurely during the heat wave in Russia in 2010 due to the heat and the air quality caused by the many fires that were burning.

For perhaps the first time in an official report, the IPCC has linked violence to climate change, and it works in multiple directions. Wherever there's violence, populations are more susceptible and vulnerable to climate change impacts because their infrastructure and support systems are likely experiencing breakdowns. But climate change also has such profound effects on populations that violence becomes more likely to occur.

How many of you watched "Years of Living Dangerously" last Sunday? It was the first episode in a series airing on Showtime. Now, we don't have Showtime at the monastery, but the sisters and I were able to watch that first episode streaming over YouTube. One segment they highlighted examined the violence in Syria, showing how it really came on the heels of a prolonged, deep drought that prevented people from farming, from having food and water. When the government was unwilling to respond, this led to violence. When we don't have sufficient food or water, and our government is either unwilling or unable to respond, violence quite naturally follows.

This graphic from the IPCC report gives us an opportunity to see how widespread the impacts of climate change truly are. The solid symbols indicate that climate change is making a major contribution to these problems. The outlined symbols show some contribution from climate change. The snowflakes represent glaciers and ice melts happening on every continent—including the Arctic at the top.

We see water issues in many places where climate change has major impact—in Africa, South America, here in North America, in Australia. Everywhere, on every continent. All these solid green fish symbols indicate high impact of climate change on marine ecosystems. We have high impact on terrestrial systems in many places around the world. We also see impacts on food production, represented by the little tractors. Perhaps not as strong in some places, but significant effects of climate change on the ability to grow food.

This is what's happening now. What are we to expect for the future?

In the near term—the next thirty years—we'll still be dealing with the effects of what has already occurred. Adaptation is essential, and there's extensive guidance in the IPCC report on how to adapt. We've already increased the average global temperature by 0.8 degrees Celsius, and it will probably rise another 0.8 to 1 degrees because we're not going to stop burning fossil fuels tomorrow. The consequences are dangerous now, and everyone agrees that we want to keep the increase below 2 degrees, because that would be a dramatically different world than we have currently.

As Thomas Lovejoy, former chief biodiversity advisor to the World Bank, says: "If we're seeing what we're seeing today at 0.8 degrees Celsius, two degrees is simply too much." NASA scientist James Hansen, probably the planet's most prominent climatologist, says the target discussed in international negotiations for two degrees of warming is actually "a prescription for long-term disaster."

So we want to do all we can to stay below two degrees.

What about the longer-term future? It depends on whether we adopt a low-emission scenario or a high-emission scenario. The IPCC report lays out what's going to happen—what's likely to happen, what the risks are—depending on which path we choose.

With high emissions, we have increased warming that leads to a greater likelihood of severe, pervasive, and irreversible impacts. All the things we just discussed will get worse if we go down that path.

But it's important to say: there's no such thing as too late. Everything we do to reduce emissions, everything we do to sequester carbon, everything we do to employ energy efficiency—it all helps. There's a lot we can do.

Right now, however, we're still on a high emissions path. So I'm duty-bound to explain what that's going to look like, at least a little bit. If the planet warms between 4 and 6 degrees before we make the changes we need to make, it's going to be a very, very different world.

A 5 degree increase ended the last ice age. The American Association for the Advancement of Science reminds us that temperature changes due to CO2 emissions are essentially irreversible for several hundred years, since the CO2 is removed from the atmosphere only very slowly by natural processes. Rates of extinction are likely to place our era among a handful of severe biodiversity crises in Earth's geological record.

People's lives will be directly affected through impacts on livelihoods, reduction in crop yields, and destruction of homes, and indirectly through increased food prices and food insecurity. This is especially true for the poorer people of the world. We'll see breakdown in infrastructure, unplanned migrations, and probably more violence.

A scientist named Michael Werner of the Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory was interviewed by KPFA earlier this month, and he talked more directly about the impact on our area. He says that the snowpack in the Sierras, which largely provides our water in California, and that the faster rate and earlier melting has dire consequences for our reservoirs. He says this will be happening before the middle of the century—not that much more time. In a recent paper, he reported that if we go up to 2.5 degrees warmer, the entire nation will be in severe drought. The West will be in extreme drought. The drought in Mexico, he said, will be off the charts. It will be unlivable. And this, he expects to happen sometime in the latter half of this century. He said this is straightforward based on a knowledge of physics and what happens with evaporation when things get hotter.

Now I'd like to shift our perspective and talk about the emissions that are causing this problem. I don't know if many of you have read Bill McKibben's article, "Global Warming's Terrifying New Math." What's interesting about it is that this math is very simple. It has three numbers involved, and it gives us an idea of exactly where to put our effort.

We've already talked about two degrees. 565 gigatons. Scientists started to wonder how much carbon can we burn before we cross that line of two degrees warmer. They calculated that it's 565 gigatons. They give that a pretty likely possibility, although it's not for sure—it might happen before we burn that much. But that's something to hold as an idea: that we only want to burn 565 more gigatons before we stop using fossil fuels.

So then they looked at how much we're burning now, what the rate of burn is, and how much we're increasing the rate of burn year by year. This was reported in 2012, and they said we have 15 more years. So right now we've got about 13 or 14 years left before we'll cross that line. We need to get to work on this.

Then what's interesting is a team of London financial analysts started looking at how much carbon we actually have. How much is in all the reserves that companies declare on their filings and reports? How much does Venezuela and Kuwait have? They started adding things up and came to a very important number. How much do we already have at our disposal? It's five times the amount that we can safely burn if we call hovering up to two degrees safe. And the fossil fuel companies are still exploring for more every day.

A couple of years ago, the then CEO of ExxonMobil, Rex Tillerson, told Wall Street analysts that the company was planning to spend $37 billion a year through 2016. That's $100 million a day on further exploration. And that's just Exxon, searching for yet more oil and gas.

Now, what makes it so hard for the people involved in the fossil fuel industry to look at the reality of climate change and say, "Wait a minute, this is crazy. What are we doing?" Well, just to give you an idea, all those fossil fuels that are in their reserves contribute to their bottom line, and they're worth on the order of $27 trillion. So when we talk about keeping 80% of that in the ground, they're going to have to write off $20 trillion. I don't think they can wrap their heads around it.

So what's the sensible thing to do? Keep 80% of the fossil fuel in the ground. Remove the subsidies from the fossil fuel industry. What's really interesting is that our governments around the world give money to the fossil fuel companies to continue doing what they're doing. Governmental subsidies globally for fossil fuels increased from $300 billion in 2009 to $544 billion in 2012, according to the International Energy Agency. That came out in The Economist in January of this year. That's almost $1.5 billion a day going to the fossil fuel industry to keep destroying our planet.

If anyone tells you that we have an addiction to fossil fuels, tell them we don't have an addiction to fossil fuels. We'd be just as happy to get in our cars that are powered by the sun or the wind. In fact, a lot happier. It's the people with the $27 trillion that are addicted to fossil fuels. So just remember that. This is where that passion thing starts happening and people go, "Nuns, passionate?" Okay.

In addition to taking away the subsidies, we need to put a tax on carbon so that everybody on the planet wants renewable energy and we start demanding it from our governments and our infrastructure. We need to say, let's stop building more fossil fuel stuff. Stop exploring. Stop putting in new infrastructure. And we need to ban extreme extraction—fracking, deep sea drilling, tar sands, mountaintop removal, Arctic drilling. We're trying to get at every bit of fossil fuel that the Earth has.

James Hansen said that the tar sands in Alberta contain as much as 240 gigatons of carbon. That's almost half of the 565 that we can safely burn. This is dangerous stuff. We need to increase carbon sequestration and energy efficiency.

So why aren't we doing the sensible thing? Well, we're kind of caught in these feelings to some degree and some misinformation. And largely where the misinformation is coming from is the fossil fuel industry has enormous amounts of money to control governments and media. There are also large corporations profiting on the crisis—which is hard to imagine how anyone would want to make that karma—but Nestlé is going into poor countries like Pakistan and buying up whatever clean water is available so they can put it in plastic bottles and sell it to us.

And that's happening while the World Health Organization is telling us that over a billion people in the developing world lack access to sanitary drinking water, and two million people die every year as a result, most of them children under five. So I'd recommend giving up on the bottled water.

So where do we go from here? Well, we know it needs to be done. People have been telling us for quite a while now. Lester Brown, who's an amazing economist and agronomist, has been telling us for a long time. There's a whole plan: Reduce carbon emissions by 80%. When he started talking about it, it looked more possible to do it by 2020, which he says is what's needed. But if we really turn around, if we really start doing the right things, we can go a long way toward that goal.

He also said we need to stabilize world population growth, which is something that happens every time you bring education to women. And when you give women an opportunity to have a say in their government? When you give women a chance to decide how many children they'll have and what their spacing should be, and you give them an education, population growth stabilizes.

One young woman said to me, "Don't feed them." As part of being involved in Buddhist Global Relief, our focus is on chronic hunger and malnutrition. "Don't feed them. They'll just have more children." I said, "No, I know. We have to appreciate that there are different points of view in this world." And the reality is we can create a better life for everybody.

Another of the four points Lester Brown brings up is eradicating poverty. When people have decent medical care and they believe their children are going to live, they don't have as many. I should say we don't have as many—I'm out of that business now.

And then he also says we need to restore our natural systems—our oceans, our rivers, our forests, our farmland.

So we need to understand what prevents us from acting. What are the emotional barriers, the psychological barriers, the physical and financial barriers in our own lives that keep us from really putting the effort out there, making that commitment to be engaged? And we need to determine to not stop until we break through those barriers.

And we really can do this together. Together is how it's going to happen. Thank you.

CHAPTER 269

Right Action on Climate

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> In this compelling dharma talk, Rob Burbea and Ayya Santacitta address the climate crisis through the lens of Buddhist ethics and right action (sammā-kammanta). Drawing on the profound teaching story of the Buddha caring for a sick monk despite understanding the emptiness of all phenomena, they explore how wisdom and compassion must work together in responding to environmental destruction. The teachers examine the resistance within Buddhist communities to engaging with climate issues, often justified through misunderstanding of teachings on impermanence (anicca) and non-attachment. They emphasize that understanding emptiness (suññatā) does not negate the ethical imperative to act with loving-kindness (mettā) and compassion (karuṇā). The talk includes practical guidance on climate activism as spiritual practice, from individual lifestyle changes to collective action, while maintaining the Buddhist principles of non-violence and skillful means (upāya-kausala). This teaching demonstrates how the threefold training of wisdom (paññā), ethical conduct (sīla), and mental cultivation (samādhi) applies directly to our environmental responsibilities as practitioners walking the Noble Eightfold Path.

I was sitting there listening to the different teachings, poems, and songs, feeling very deeply moved by the depth of love and connection to this earth. As each person spoke, you could see behind me the beautiful leaves of the trees, the sun shining on them as they made their food. Those leaves nourishing the tree—all happening right now as we sit here.

I was fortunate enough to grow up in a very rural part of Wales, an ancient land where the land is still considered sacred. When the military tried to take over what was known as the Sacred Mountain, the local people came out—the religious people, the farmers, and the ordinary folks—and they demanded that this land be given back, declaring it sacred. After discussions, demonstrations, and some very strong-willed Welsh folks making their voices heard, the land was returned.

This is still considered sacred land. I realize there aren't so many places in the Western world where we really understand the sacredness of this earth, so I feel very fortunate to have grown up in a place where that is understood. It's as though we are reclaiming something. We Western people who have valued so highly the intellect, individualism, and progress are beginning to remember again where we come from and the sacredness of the earth.

It may sound a little funny to hear a Buddhist nun talking about the sacredness of the earth, because the Buddha speaks about the emptiness of all things. Everything is impermanent. Nothing belongs to us. It's all empty. When I was thinking about what to speak about today, what came up for me quite strongly was the apathy in the Buddhist world around the climate change issue—there's a lot of resistance to looking at it.

I realize that all of you are here because you're not resistant, but many people have reasons why this is seen as not relevant in the Buddhist world. There's the sense that all things are impermanent, so of course the earth is going to die at one point. Of course we're going to die at one point, so why bother? Why bother getting involved?

It could also be not knowing how to deal with the emotions it brings up. I've had a lot of things evoked through this day. I've been very moved in many positive ways, and also heartbroken to hear about Alberta and heartened to hear about Nebraska. There can be a sense of not wanting to go there, not wanting to go into that emotional realm, but to stay centered and calm and equanimous because it looks like a safe place to dwell. But it isn't a safe place to dwell if one isn't open to the realities of what is going on in the world.

There's a story that comes to mind from the suttas, from the Buddha's time. The Buddha was visiting a group of monks who had been living together for some time. He would travel around and visit different monks and nuns who were practicing together in India, checking how they were doing, if they were on track. He went to this group of monks with Venerable Ananda, his cousin, attendant, and spiritual brother. Since you have to walk everywhere, he walked to this place and found among this group of monks one monk in a hut who was sick, lying in his own dysentery. The other monks were out doing what they were doing—going on alms rounds, meditating—and this monk was just lying there in his own excrement, abandoned.

The Buddha, who more than anyone in the world understood the empty nature of all things—the fact that this body, these feelings, these thoughts, perceptions, and sense experience are not me and mine—understood this more profoundly than anybody else on the planet. His response to this monk lying there in his excrement was to ask his attendant to go and get some water. Then with his own hands, he bathed this man. He bathed him, cleaned off the dirt, changed the sheets, made him comfortable.

Then he went to the monks and asked, "Why is this man lying here like this?" They said, "Well, you know, he's sick. He can't do anything. He's of no value, so we're just leaving him there. He'll die. We can't do anything about it."

The Buddha strongly scolded those monks and said, "He is your family now. You've gone forth. He is your family. You must take care of him until his last breath."

This story really touches me. The Buddha, who so deeply knew the emptiness of all things, also so deeply knew the importance of taking care, of loving, of caring. He lived those two truths.

When I think of that story, somehow for me it has a kind of parallel to the situation we are in now on this planet Earth, where we've taken so much from her. We've mined and cut off tops of mountains and poured poisons into the earth to extract more gas.

I mean, it's insane, really, what we're doing. We've been doing it for a very long time, and over the decades we've become more conscious of what we are doing. I think at one time it wasn't really clear, but the mass scale of the destruction that we're causing as a human race is known, and yet we're still doing it.

And I see that as like that monk who's lying there in his own excrement—we're leaving the earth in that state. And do we want to do that? Are we just going to leave it like that and say, "Well, there's nothing I can do about it. It's all too much. I'm just going to get on with my practice"? Or are we going to turn and get our hands dirty?

It's not easy to turn towards the situation we're in. And Ayya Santussika very soon will tell us some of the ways we can meet and address the situation we're in. It's not easy. We have to get our hands dirty. It might smell bad. It might make us feel a little bit difficult and turn our stomachs sometimes. Or we might feel that we can't quite manage it. It's frightening. We don't feel that we've got the means, the skills. But just take a step. Just take a step, and things start to open up. People start to connect together. And even if you feel you really can't do very much, like this beautiful song that you sang—if we sing together, then we have great strength. We can do great things.

To me, this is an ethical issue. There's no doubt that this earth had a beginning. It's going through a process and it will have an end. This has always been the case. There's no doubt that each one of us who has been born and is going through our life will die. There is no question about that. So this isn't about eternal life or making things last forever. This is about responding in an ethical way, in a loving way, in a compassionate way. And holding that truth of emptiness, holding that truth of impermanence while we do it.

So we're not doing it in a desperate way or in a frightened way or trying to make everything all right. But we're doing it out of love and compassion, out of responsiveness. Because it simply is the right thing to do. And because once we know the state of the situation, we can't really get on with our life. We can't really just go home and pretend it's all fine. We can't. This is where the anxiety comes from. This is where the addictions come from. Because we're trying to not feel the enormity of the situation.

So using the skillful means that the Buddha gave us, we need to turn and look and face and step into the situation that we are in. And like I say, the Buddha spoke about world expansion and world contraction. There's a whole sutta about the demise of the human race through following greed, hatred, and delusion. We're witnessing it. We're in the midst of it. And then also the whole planet Earth falling apart and then coming into being again. And this happens. This is natural.

But there's also what we're doing, what the human race has done and is doing that is speeding up that process so rapidly. So that's the part that we can meet and respond to. So I hope that between us we'll be able to offer some suggestions of how each one of us can respond.

Now, I wanted to speak a bit about the crisis which is building up and that this crisis has a purpose. If we have enough resilience to turn towards what is happening inside and outside of ourselves, if we can really recognize that what's going on is not just like a coincidence, but we are in a certain stage of the evolution of consciousness and the external situation actually comes to our aid to create that sense of pressure which we seem to need in order to have enough sense of urgency to really pay attention.

And it's not the first time. Since this planet is spinning and since there's life on this planet—over three billion years—there have been always again and again phases of great pressure, which have been creating such a shift that new forms of being came into life.

And we as a species now, we have that opportunity to use the situation to renew ourselves, to renew our ways of relating to life, to come out of that myth of separation which we have been living in. In terms of the evolutionary progression, we are not doing anything wrong. This is exactly how it's supposed to be. But we can't stop here at this point. We have to keep going because otherwise we will simply disappear from the face of the earth, and the earth will of course go on and other life forms will follow. So it's really up to us what we want to do with the situation we have.

I really think the most important thing is to develop the inner strength and the resilience so that we can use what's happening for the benefit of ourselves and for all beings we're living together with on this planet. How can we do this? The most important thing is to develop the resilience to take in what's happening. And in order to have that resilience, I think we have to try as best we can to live a life which is congruent with what we know to be true.

Because if we increase that congruency, we'll have an increased sense of self-respect, a sense of strength, a sense of peace. And then from that increased sense of strength, we have increased opportunity to make a difference. It's a spiral which can lead us towards an ever greater sense of connectedness.

James, you were speaking about this morning how in the beginning, for two years, you thought you didn't know what to do, and you felt confused and depressed. Then you started, made one step and another step, and connected with some people. And suddenly, seeing we are not alone in this, and there are so many people actually who are waking up to this, and if we work together, we can evoke energies and powers which are far greater than the sum total of the beings who are together in this.

I really have strong faith in that because this process of life evolving on the planet has been going on for so long. I don't have to sort it all out, I don't have to have a plan, but I have to get out of the way and I have to look through my own confusion and my own distortions which I'm getting hijacked into by those strong emotions.

So it's very important to have a good practice so that we can stay centered, but not centered in a way that we are cutting off—because this is not really centeredness, this is just escapism. Being truly centered means to let all of that come through me and to honor the pain, as Joanna Macy says, to honor my pain for the world and not think that there's anything wrong with it. But then not stopping there, going down with the pain, getting all depressed. That's just the first step.

If we can hold steady with it and recognize that we are not alone in that, it starts to change because it's the dark night, and then that pain transforms into a strength. And then from that strength, we can give our gifts. We don't have to sort it all out. You just do your thing.

And if you don't know what your thing is, then I have a whole list of things. I'm always the sister with the list. So I gave my list to you. You'll see it on the side. It's not only mine—we worked together to create concrete action. And I'm going to talk about concrete action after we get the presentation up.

But I want to tell you that I've gone through lots of phases too with regard to this whole area, including the phase where I'm being told, well, be careful. That was a warning, I think. Be careful—you might get to be known as the activist nun. Is that so bad? Right action on climate, what can we do?

Your list is in front of you. My fondest wish is that when you take this list with you, you'll circle some items and you'll make a commitment.

Now, I don't know if you've heard the word adhitthana. Adhitthana is a Pali word, and I was just told today that the adhi part means higher, and tthana means to stand on or a foundation. It's a way to stand higher. So an adhitthana is like a commitment, except it's a commitment you don't put down. You give yourself a time frame, you keep it for that period, and you do it.

There are a number of things on this list, and I want to talk through them just to give you an idea that maybe you're already doing some of these things. You probably are. But there might be some others there that would be a stretch. They certainly were for me a stretch, and it took a commitment to go ahead and do it.

One of the first steps is to become knowledgeable about this area. You've gone a long way with that already, but I wanted to recommend three sources that are worth looking at. One of the papers that I was quoting from this morning is from the American Association of Advancement of Science, and it's called "What We Know." That's worthwhile to read. Watching the "Do the Math" movie that's put out by Bill McKibben and 350.org is very worthwhile. You can find it on Vimeo. This article by Margaret Klein, who's a climate psychologist, was really helpful to me: "Our society is living a massive lie about the threat of climate change and it's time to wake up." This is what really helped me understand how to live in climate truth and how to tell the truth, because at first it's hard to break the ice on that and actually talk about it with people.

Speaking in line with truth means that if somebody says, "Oh, this is natural, these changes happen," then I got the courage, thanks to Margaret, to step up and say something about that in a kind way, in an informative way, in a way that gathers in rather than alienates, hopefully. I'm still practicing on that. Speaking up when people say things that you know are not true, connecting the dots between climate change and the conditions we're experiencing.

Someone said to me, "But they're having really cold weather over there." And of course, that's the problem with calling it global warming. Most climate activists now call it climate change. One friend told me in Canada they're calling it climate weirding. So really just speaking out—like Margaret in her article, she says, if someone said, "Isn't it weird weather?" What if, you know, if that's on Facebook, what if forty-five people wrote back and said, "That's climate change, honey."

This is, I think in some ways, the most exciting time in all of human history. Now, why would I say that? Not because I'm into drama. But it's exciting because it's the very first time ever that everyone on this planet, all human beings, are facing the same threat. Always before it's been one group against another. One group stands to gain and another group stands to lose. And even the people who think they're gaining aren't really, because the world that is being created is not going to be nice for anybody.

So what that means is we can gather people in. We can talk to the people around us. We can talk to the people we're connected to. And we can talk to the people we're not connected to.

I was invited up to Canada to do some teaching. I was invited to British Columbia—to teach in Port Townsend, Washington first, and then Salt Spring Island and Victoria. And then from there, I was going to Alberta. I was going to teach the Dhamma. I went with the themes love, devotion, and determination. So I taught a daylong on Salt Spring Island on that topic, and when I opened the floor for questions, the very first question was about climate change: How do we bring those teachings into climate change?

I don't think they were prepared for what they got. And that night in Victoria, someone in the back of the room said, "I heard you talked about climate change on Salt Spring Island." I'm like, "Were you there?" "No?" "Great, fine."

The British Columbians assured me, "We're very progressive. We're very in touch with environmental issues—we always have been. But everybody east of us wants the tar sands."

So I wondered what I would encounter when I landed in Calgary—tar sands central. What I found were people who were very much opposed to the tar sands. One social worker, wife of a minister, both retired after thirty-five or forty years in their work, told me, "No people of faith want the tar sands."

I started learning that we can very easily think: those people over there, those people with that political leaning, those people with that religion, those people with those ideas—they're outside the group that's going to understand. When people realize what's happening, I realize it takes more than talk. But there's a point at which people understand, and some of them understand now more than we know.

So I've noticed in myself when I start thinking, "Well, I can't talk to them about that," I just override it. Do it anyway. It's very surprising.

Invite people to commit to take action. One of the most wonderful things about this work is participating in these organizations. Every time I do it, I am uplifted. I am so impressed with how peaceful the people are doing these actions, how loving, how much people care about the planet and the beings on it. And they're not all Buddhists—some of them are, but it doesn't matter. We connect at the heart level about all of what's going on.

Doing things together is fun. It's exciting. It relieves and absorbs the anxiety and the fear. So you can connect. These groups have my contact information and they send me things online, and I sign the petitions. Then I go out and participate in rallies. You can do that too.

You'll know which groups resonate with you when you read what they write—whether it has a really peaceful, loving sound or if it has an edge to it. All of these actions need people who will come out with a solid, peaceful base. So you're really needed in this, coming out with your practice, being a source of stability. This is really important.

The online petitions make a difference, and then you can write actual letters. Ayya Santacitta and I walked across the bridge when Nurses United came out in the thousands and spoke out against climate change and their concerns for human health. Walking across the Golden Gate and back was wonderful with my dharma sister. It's good to do things together.

We can persuade our government. It's important to write letters—the ones you send through regular mail have more impact. We can meet with our officials. You can create a relationship with your representatives, with your officials at every level. Go to their office with a group of people with concerns.

Those people are concerned too, and they're under a lot of pressure to do other things than the right thing. So what do you do when a friend is doing the wrong things? You bring equanimity and you try to help them get on the right track. We can feel that way about everybody.

There's an action coming up that's going to be important. The hearings will start in June and July at the California State Assembly for a bill called SB 52, the California Disclose Act. This is a very important part of the whole picture because disclosure of who's paying for political ads is crucial. We need clean money in the political process, not the translation of great wealth into great power in our government. So this is an important piece. You can find out more at cadisclose.org.

We need to resist business as usual.

And I know that may sound like a tall order because we're all kind of caught in this web. However, we can do everything that we can to speak out against the continued extreme fossil fuel extraction in all of its forms. We can even write letters to companies. You know, there are some companies that really do care, and they're really doing sound environmental things, and then there are other companies who are greenwashing. Greenwashing is when they say the right words, and they act like they're going green, but they do exactly the wrong things—they're really doing it as a ruse. So you have to notice that and watch out for it. That's another reason why it's really valuable to be connected with activist groups because you learn what's really going on. You've got friends who are seeing things. You get to understand what's actually happening.

This was the rally against fracking. We want fracking banned in California. The fossil fuel companies are salivating over the Monterey Shale. The Monterey Shale is on the San Andreas Fault. Fracking is creating earthquakes in places like England and Arkansas where they never had earthquakes before. Fracking is hydraulic fracturing. They force, with great pressure, millions of gallons of water down these wells with toxic chemicals and break apart the rocks below in order to get the natural gas or oil out of there. It poisons the land. It poisons the water. The last thing we need to do in California is send millions of gallons of water down a fracking well. And the water is contaminated—it cannot be recovered. The land gets contaminated.

If you've watched Gasland, anybody? And Gasland 2? Josh Fox told us on a conference call not long ago, preparing for this rally, that everywhere he goes where there's fracking, fossil fuel industry people walk out with money in their pockets and the land—the people's property—is destroyed. It's just destruction in their wake. Josh Fox got involved because he was minding his own business, living on his little place in Pennsylvania when someone knocked on the door and wanted to lease his property for fracking. When he started looking into it—he's a filmmaker—he found out how horrible this is and then made these films. They're great. He really helps us understand what's going on. These are things that the fossil fuel industry doesn't really want us to understand.

So this rally—this is Sacramento, the Capitol building—and there were 3,000 or so people who showed up. A friend of mine who works with the government, actually working hard on this clean money issue, said when 3,000 people show up, government officials pay attention. Every time I go to one of these things, I think, wouldn't it be great to have 30,000 people out here? We could have 30,000 people out here. Nobody would be able to ignore that.

A lot of people say, "But I'm not an activist." And that's okay. You don't have to be an activist. All you have to do is show up and walk around with your friends and smile and be peaceful and happy. You might want to carry a sign or not. New York did it, we can too. Grassroots organizing—that's all there was to hold fracking out of New York State, and they're still holding it out of New York State. There's no fracking in New York State at this time. It's a moratorium and not a ban. They need a ban, but Pennsylvania's got fracking all over, just across the river. So it's not because the fossil fuel industry hasn't been wanting to get into New York, it's because the people have said no. And that's what we need to do in California—say no. You get all these signs: Americans against fracking, Californians against fracking, farmers against fracking. Don't think you don't belong in this.

The world watches California. Recently, a number of us involved in the Dharma Teachers Climate Group had a conference call with Kumi Naidoo, who's the executive director of Greenpeace International. Fantastic person, fantastic organizer, fantastic human bodhisattva. One of the things he said—among many important things—was, "If the United States goes to renewable energy, I guarantee China will follow." That was really encouraging, because a lot of people say, "Well, it doesn't really matter that much what we do, because there's China, and there's India." The world still looks to the United States, whether we like it or not, whether it's a good idea or not.

We have the ability to move to entirely renewable energy. This is part of what's so frustrating—we can do this, but we're not, for the reasons we talked about before. And if the world is watching, guess who watches California? It's the rest of America. How many other things have we started over here? So we have this wonderful opportunity. We have a responsibility. If 30,000 Californians came out in Sacramento, the world would notice.

You never know where these nuns might go. Oh, do you know who that is? Venerable Bhikkhu Bodhi. This was mentioned before. He doesn't usually wear a cowboy hat, but he told me he went to this rally in Washington, DC to stop fracking. He said it was so incredibly hot, he couldn't stand it, and someone gave him a cowboy hat. I love that photo.

He's one of my heroes because he's got the Dhamma down in his bones. He knows more about the Pali Canon than anybody I know on the planet. He can tell us everything about why we should be doing this, every reason that's in the Dhamma, and he's out there doing it. Venerable Bhikkhu Bodhi is probably the foremost translator of the Pali texts into English. He's also the founder and chairman of Buddhist Global Relief. He's an amazing man.

Now there are many personal choices we can make in our own lives. Taking every opportunity to reduce the use of fossil fuels. Reduce, reuse, compost, recycle. Someone handed me a piece of paper as I walked out and suggested a book called Meatonomics. Fifty-one percent of climate change comes from animal agriculture, and government subsidies for the meat industry exceed those for the fossil fuel industry. I'd like to know more, but I do know I've been a vegetarian for a really long time. I would encourage any reduction in meat we can make.

And buying local and organic. Agriculture is a very heavily fossil fuel oriented and chemical oriented business. We need to really support organic local farming. We need to support the people who have a different vision about business—a different vision about how we can relate to each other.

When you find someone like that, give them your money. There's a woman I know who has a nail salon, and the way she treats the people who work there, the way she treats her customers, it's really exemplary. I went to a print shop one day, and the way the person operates with the customers—you know that they put people above profit. There are larger companies that do this. Patagonia comes to mind. Credo Mobile, if you haven't switched from AT&T yet, they'll even buy out your contract.

This is important—noticing this new vision that we need to make into a reality about how we interact with each other, how we trade with each other, how we work together.

And gratitude is the best attitude. This gratitude for having people in our lives to share this with, for having the opportunity to go out and make a difference, for having the opportunity to call our representative and have the staff person on the phone say, "Thank you so much for calling. We're getting a lot of calls about this. I am so happy to pass this on to Representative so-and-so." It's very uplifting and encouraging.

A woman from Sacramento raised a question that touches the heart of our daily dilemmas: "We recently had a solar company come out to look at our house, and they said we could have solar, but we'd have to cut down these trees. I'm not willing to cut down my trees because they shade my house. If I cut down the trees that shade my house, then my house will get hot, and then I can use my solar to run my air conditioner." She continued with other examples—electric cars where you still struggle with where the electricity comes from, rebates to replace perfectly good refrigerators with more efficient models, the endless analysis of cloth versus disposable diapers that concluded there was no clear winner. "So I'm constantly having to choose what is the greater evil," she said. "Sometimes I don't feel like there are good choices." She kept her trees, by the way.

I think those are true dilemmas for all of us who care. My personal take is to do the best you can without worrying about it too much, and put your energy into the big pieces. Because it's not individuals who are going to say no to the fossil fuel companies. It's not even individuals putting solar on their houses—though it's important to do if you can. I'm not trying to minimize individual action. But we need to put pressure on our government to make the changes, because it's governments that are going to say no to these big interests. That's where the real power lies. So pay attention to what you can do, but don't get too bogged down in the small details.

Someone recommended a helpful resource: there's a book called Cooler Smarter that the Union of Concerned Scientists put out within the past year. You can get it from their website. The book goes through all those dilemmas and uses data to tell you which way to go, which can help navigate these everyday choices.

Another person added practical wisdom about contacting businesses: "You can also do this with your local grocery stores or coffee shops. If they're having practices that you don't like, let the upper people know—not the staff because they're not in a position to do anything, but if you take the time to write an email or a letter, and if there's enough of you, that makes a difference."

Finally, someone mentioned an organization that hasn't come up yet: movetoamend.org. They're working to amend the Constitution so that corporations are no longer treated like people with the rights of people. This addresses one of the fundamental structural issues we've been discussing—how corporate power shapes our political and economic landscape.

And this is an organization that Pachamama is deeply committed to. I just completed the Game Changer Intensive with Pachamama Alliance, and they strongly recommend this as one of the organizations that could make a tremendous difference if we unite behind this movement. They demonstrated how corporate rights have evolved far beyond their original intention. Originally, in the nineteenth century, corporations were established to serve specific needs and then dissolved once those needs were met. Over time, legislation gradually granted them increasing power. Now they wield more influence than individual citizens, creating what amounts to an oligarchy.

We've faced oligarchy before and successfully dismantled it through antitrust laws in the early twentieth century. We can accomplish this again through peaceful means.

Let me share two additional practical steps. First, anyone with bank accounts can transfer their money to credit unions and small local banks that invest in their communities, rather than supporting the big five banks that fund mountaintop removal and coal expansion.

"I'm glad you brought that up. Is divestment included in that list? I think I missed it in the presentation."

"It is there, though I didn't read it aloud. Divestment from fossil fuels is crucial, along with moving money into credit unions and local banks so funds are invested locally rather than in practices harmful to our planet."

"I have another question about presenting this to people. Meat eaters are often very dedicated to their diet and might easily dismiss this message if told they must stop eating meat. Frankly, I don't understand why that's necessary. How does reducing meat consumption help address climate change?"

This is indeed a recommendation, and I understand your concern. I think it's more effective to suggest people simply try eating less meat. The issue with the meat industry is the tremendous methane production from livestock and dairy operations. Methane is actually a more harmful greenhouse gas than CO2, though it doesn't persist as long in the atmosphere. As global population grows and people in countries like China and India gain more discretionary income, they're consuming more meat and dairy. This means we're raising far more animals than ever before, while simultaneously clearing forests for grazing and feed production.

"What about eggs?"

"I was wondering the same thing."

Consider also the vast quantities of feed grown for livestock. If those grains fed humans directly, it would be far more efficient. When cereals go to animals to produce eggs, milk, or meat, we lose what people could eat directly. It's inefficient and involves tremendous cruelty—the way these animals are confined resembles slavery.

I want to emphasize that I'm not insisting people stop eating meat, dairy, and eggs entirely, but reducing consumption helps both the planet and our personal health. When we choose what's healthy for our bodies, it tends to benefit the planet as well.

There's a wonderful documentary called "Fed Up" premiering this Friday and Saturday at the San Francisco Film Festival before opening nationwide. It promises to spark an important movement.

"Can we take one more question?"

We have to finish now. Thank you so much for your interest and for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 270

Wise Action for the Earth

Rob Burbea · 34 min

> In this compelling dharma talk, Rob Burbea draws striking parallels between the Buddha's fundamental teaching on individual suffering (dukkha) and our current ecological predicament. He argues that just as personal dukkha arises from the illusion of a separate self, our environmental crisis stems from humanity's collective sense of separation from the natural world. The talk explores how the Buddhist understanding of non-self and interdependence offers profound wisdom for addressing climate change and environmental destruction.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that overcoming our sense of alienation from the Earth requires the same spiritual awakening that resolves individual suffering - recognizing our fundamental interconnectedness with all life. He discusses how industrial growth society represents a collective attempt to fill an existential void, much like individuals seeking external solutions to internal spiritual poverty. Drawing on Zen master Dōgen's teachings about "forgetting the self" and realizing oneness with all phenomena, he presents a vision of ecological awakening rooted in Buddhist wisdom.
>
> The talk concludes with practical reflections on cultivating what might be called the "new bodhisattva" - practitioners who integrate deep spiritual practice with engaged environmental action. This synthesis of inner transformation and outer service offers a powerful framework for responding to our planetary crisis with both wisdom and compassion.

The question that really comes to my mind is simply: why do we think that the Buddha can help us understand our ecological crisis, given that he lived in a very different time and place long ago, far away in Iron Age India? He didn't really know anything about the kind of global warming that we're experiencing. He didn't know anything about melting glaciers, melting Arctic seas, melting tundra. For that matter, he didn't know anything about carbon dioxide and its role in heating up the atmosphere, or methane gas doing the same sort of thing. So why do we look to the Buddha for help in this particular situation?

There are a number of answers that can be given, but I'm going to focus just on one of them, because there's one thing that really leaps out for me from the tradition. It's the quite extraordinary parallel that I see—precise and profound parallels between what the Buddha taught about our personal predicament, our usual individual problem of dukkha and how to solve it, and our collective civilizational situation right now with regard to the biosphere.

What I'm pointing at is this: I think that what the Buddha had to say about our problem and what we need to do about it is really very much the same problem that we face collectively in relationship to the biosphere. I'd like to spend the few minutes that I have exploring that a little bit.

In particular, I'm going to give you one particular way of articulating what I think the Buddha was focusing on. I want to emphasize the connection between dukkha—suffering in the broad sense—and our sense of separate self. For me, this is actually the most important teaching of the Buddha: that he sees that the normal sense of separate self, the feeling that I'm inside and the rest of you are outside, that we're separate from each other, is one of the primary sources of our dukkha. It's not just that it's a delusion, but that it's a delusion that causes us to suffer.

In more contemporary language, we can say that the sense of self is a psychological construct. From this perspective, we can see that the Buddhist path is about deconstructing and reconstructing the sense of self. Moreover, because this sense of self is a construct, because it's not actually real, because it's inherently ungrounded, this sense of self that we normally have—feeling separate from others—is inherently uncomfortable, inherently insecure. Or, as I sometimes like to say, this sense of self is haunted or shadowed by a sense of lack.

That's how we normally become aware of it. It's the feeling that I think we all have. We know that we have it ourselves, but we're not aware that everyone else feels the same thing. This feeling that we all have that something is wrong with me. Something is missing. Something isn't quite right. It's one of the great secrets of life, I think, that we all feel this, but we think it's our own problem. We're not aware that everyone else feels much the same thing.

Where it gets tricky is that we misunderstand the problem. We don't realize where it comes from, this inherently insecure self. We're conditioned by our society, and so we think we know what we lack. We learn pretty quickly from our society: we don't have enough money, or we don't have enough consumer toys, or we're not famous enough, or we don't have a partner, or our partner isn't good enough, whatever. We end up always looking out here, trying to hold on to something that we hope will fill up this sense of emptiness, this sense of lack at our core.

Of course, one of the essential Buddhist teachings is that there's really nothing there that we can hold on to. Everything is insubstantial. Since the fundamental problem is really inside us, it means that anything we might be able to obtain out here is not going to satisfy us. It's a symptom. If you understand your fundamental problem is that you don't have enough money, you're never going to have enough money, because that's a real misunderstanding of what the root issue is.

We can appreciate the Buddhist path from this perspective. Here I'm speaking out of my Zen experience. The Buddhist path is about learning to overcome this sense of separation. In Zen we talk about letting go of the sense of self or forgetting the sense of self. The Japanese Zen master Dogen said that to study Buddhism is to study yourself. To study yourself is to forget yourself. And to forget yourself is to realize your intimacy, your oneness with all things.

He also described his own experience after his awakening when he said he came to realize that his mind wasn't something in here, that his mind was nothing other than rivers and mountains and the great white earth, the sun and the moon and the stars. In other words, realizing that I'm not in here—I'm one of the ways in which all of this, all of you, all of us come together through all the causes and conditions. Overcoming the sense of separation, overcoming the feeling that there's a me inside.

And I think we can see how this empowers what is sometimes called the bodhisattva path. Nisargadatta summarized this beautifully when he said, "When I look inside and see that I am nothing, that's wisdom. When I look outside and see that I'm everything, that's love. Between these two, my life turns." Wisdom and compassion—the two pillars of the Dharma.

As we begin to wake up and realize that we're not separate from each other, we're not separate from the world, then we also begin to act in a way that responds to that understanding. We begin to realize that I can't separate my own well-being from yours. And we learn to live in a way that acknowledges and embraces this truth and works for the well-being of everyone.

Everything I've just said on the individual level also applies collectively. This is exactly the same situation we're in now in relationship to the earth. Except it's not the issue of an individual construction, but rather we have together as a species developed this sense of separation, this sense of alienation from the rest of the earth.

Collectively we feel separate. We feel that the earth is something we can exploit and use and abuse in whatever way to satisfy our own needs and wants. But we don't feel a sense of responsibility or obligation because it's just there. It's not us. It's like a convenience store for us to draw from.

The other side of that is a collective sense of alienation that I think we as a civilization have. We're not sure what it means to be human. We're not sure what it means for us as a society, what we should value, where we should be going.

The comparable problem that occurs individually also manifests collectively. We look out and try to grab something that we can hold on to, some security. The collective version has become our industrial growth society, this preoccupation with never-ending technological development, increasing industrial economic growth. These things in themselves could be very valuable as means—they give us the ability to do things. But what's really happened, because we don't know what else to value, because we don't know where else to go, we've become stuck on the means. We have made the means into the end.

So technological development in itself, economic development in itself, becomes the whole meaning and the goal of our collective life. And yet we can sense that there's something really inadequate about that.

The parallel holds. We're still preoccupied with trying to secure and control ourselves. What we really need to do from this perspective is to begin to wake up, to begin to overcome this sense of separation that we feel between ourselves and the rest of the world.

Just as I, as an individual, if I start to wake up and realize that my well-being isn't separate from your well-being, and if I'm concerned to follow a kind of bodhisattva path—so that I want to live in a way that asks not what's in it for me, but what can I do to make this situation better—the same thing is true collectively.

It's become clear that at this point, we as a species need to wake up. The ecological crisis is also a spiritual crisis. The Earth is really calling upon all of us to wake up or get out of the way. And what that wake-up involves is realizing that we cannot separate our own well-being from the well-being of the whole.

To wake up means to experience our non-duality with the earth—not only our source, not just our home, but our mother, a mother from whom we never really cut the umbilical cord. As we begin to wake up to this, we realize again that we can't separate our own well-being from its well-being.

This is the kind of understanding that we're reaching toward—realizing that the meaning of human life, especially at this particular point in history, is acknowledging and living in a way that sees our task in life as the well-being of the whole earth. This is the answer to this larger question: What is the meaning of human life? The meaning of human life is to realize the whole earth is our body and that we have this bodhisattva responsibility to work for its well-being.

If we do that, then the process of healing that will occur will also transform us as much as the planet.

I've given you a lot of concepts in a very quick way. I want to finish with a few lines by Rumi, who described this so well in a poem he wrote called "The Worms Waking": "This is how a human being can change..."

There's a worm addicted to eating grape leaves. Suddenly, he wakes up—call it grace, whatever—something wakes him, and now he's no longer a worm. He's the entire vineyard and the orchard too, the fruit, the trunks, a growing wisdom and joy that doesn't need to devour.

He doesn't become the vineyard. He realizes that he's always been the vineyard.

And that's our task. We don't need to become part of the earth, but to realize that we've never been apart from it.

David and I are teaching a retreat in the upper area now, and it's wonderful to come down, even though normally this time is nap time. But as David said, it's a time to wake up.

This sense of parallels between the individual and collective predicament that David was speaking about is in some ways a new way of seeing, but it's also been known for a long time. This is from Shantideva's eighth-century text, Guide to the Bodhisattva's Way of Life: "This entire world is disturbed by insanity due to the exertions of those who are confused about themselves."

This entire world is disturbed by insanity due to the exertions of those who are confused about themselves. It points to the predicament, but I think David's talk and this passage from Shantideva also point toward how we move, how we begin and continue acting.

I know we've already started with James's presentation, really bringing the focus onto action. Later this afternoon, the panelists will be particularly concrete about specific actions that help us respond to climate issues. What I want to focus on in this short time is how we can approach this work.

I think it's helpful in terms of acting to see that something new is being asked of us—to respond to these crises with a deep connection of inner work and inner inquiry with outer response. We may be imagining a kind of being, if we want to call it the new bodhisattva, that hasn't really been in our world in a very full way.

What I want to point to is this vision of training and action, and really the importance of connecting the inner and outer aspects. I believe that without inner resources we won't be able to respond adequately. Without the resources of awareness and kindness and joy and equanimity and wisdom, we'll burn out, we'll get discouraged, we'll succumb to negative emotions. We need these inner practices, I think in part due to the largeness of the problems.

And yet if our spirituality doesn't go outward, in a way we may be only embracing privilege as much of the world burns. These are challenging imperatives for all of us to look at. It takes a lot of looking into how we use our energy, what's important, whether we feel called to this vision.

I think also of something Bill McKibben said in relation to climate change. I want to read a passage from something he wrote, which I think is very supportive of the notion that we need to help train and ourselves become these new bodhisattvas—these new beings dedicated to inner awakening and responding to the needs of the world at the same time.

He says: "If those of us who are trying really hard are still fully enmeshed in the fossil fuel system"—as most of us are; how many came by carpool? Good, very good. How many came by bicycle? How many walked? Very good. You know where I'm going with that one—"it makes even clearer that what needs to change are not individuals, but precisely that system. We simply can't move fast enough one by one to make any real difference in how the atmosphere comes out.

"Here's the math, obviously imprecise. Maybe 10% of the population cares enough to make strenuous efforts to change. Maybe they reduce their emissions by 15% if they do all they can in their homes and offices and so forth. And then, well, nothing much shifts. The trajectory of our climate horror stays about the same.

"But if 10% of the people, once they've changed the light bulbs, work all out to change the system—that's enough. That's more than enough. It would be enough to match the power of the fossil fuel industry, enough to convince our legislatures to put a price on carbon."

And talking with James, he said there's been some other studies which show that if only 7.5% of the population is really active and engaged, that becomes a critical mass. What I'm suggesting is that part of that 7.5%, and a very important part of that 7.5%, will be what we might call new bodhisattvas—those who are trained and skilled in the inner work and are also responding outwardly. We will connect with people from other spiritual traditions, with secular activists, with ordinary people, but there's something very important to contribute from those who can have that combination of inner and outer training.

I mentioned the bodhisattva, so I want to say a word about this ideal. Traditionally, the bodhisattva is the one who comes to awakening but is dedicated to helping others—not necessarily, in the Asian context, by addressing the structural problems of society, but perhaps more through kindness, through helping, through the large heart. That's why I speak of a kind of new bodhisattva.

Many of you know from the Zen tradition those beautiful lines: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them. Delusions are endless, I vow to overcome them. The Buddha way is unsurpassable, I vow to master it." What does that look like in the contemporary world?

The training for the contemporary bodhisattva involves, first of all, many of the inner practices that we're very familiar with. The bodhisattva needs to be able to work with the mind and the heart and the body, and be able to track when difficult thoughts or negative thoughts arise. When fear arises, they are someone who knows fear. When anger arises, they know anger—what it is, where it comes from. They can have empathy, but can also respond skillfully.

Through our mindfulness practice, through our wisdom training, through our development of the heart in loving-kindness, compassion, joy, and forgiveness, we learn how to respond to fear, how to respond to crisis. We become people who bring calm to a difficult or dangerous situation. The bodhisattva, through having done the inner work, has the equanimity to stay balanced when others are unbalanced. The bodhisattva is not afraid of suffering and is not afraid of pain because they have had training in how to be with what's difficult. Of course this is ongoing—I'm not saying that after this training all fear is gone. But can you see how this is exactly what's needed for our times? To have people who really have those capacities.

The bodhisattva also knows how to respond skillfully. There are what we might call intermediate trainings that the bodhisattva develops. The bodhisattva has skillful means and knows about skillful speech, has trained in wise speech, and knows how to speak in difficult situations without making things worse, without being reactive. The bodhisattva is very well trained in knowing how to work with conflict. The bodhisattva has been through several diversity trainings and knows how to be with a range of people, perhaps having spent time in a range of communities.

The bodhisattva has trained in—and not just trained but had a lot of fun—loving the earth more. There are whole series of ways to be, ways to train, ways to learn to connect more deeply with the earth on all sorts of levels: through our gardens, through really knowing the earth better, being immersed in it. Much of the energy to respond comes from cultivating love for the earth. That's where a lot of the energy comes from. We get training in community and community action. We get training in all sorts of other approaches that help us to act skillfully in various areas.

The bodhisattva, I think, also acts where there's a particular calling and vocation. I'm reminded of a very beautiful, powerful, and simple analysis of what's needed for transformation from Joanna Macy. She says that the Great Turning has three aspects.

The first is holding actions to prevent further damage. This is very crucial—the province of traditional activism. It's very necessary for many of us to act in that way at certain times, and for all of us sometimes.

The second is to analyze our institutions and develop alternative institutions that are sustainable. This is crucial. This isn't just about protest, right? A true transformation...

requires vision, requires other ways of doing things, and many of us are already exploring this in terms of alternative agriculture, economics, medicine, law, education, and so forth.

And the third aspect of this great transformation is to shift consciousness—to be able to help others come to a different understanding, very much following what David was saying. So this may be to train us to have a different relationship to our body if we're yoga teachers or Qigong teachers or nurses or doctors. It may be to help people in meditation, to see things differently.

All three of those are necessary. And what I particularly got out of her understanding is it's not like we all have to do the same thing, but we have to go where we're called. We have to go where the gifts are, where the calling is, where the energy is. And it might be in one of those three areas primarily. But the important thing is to connect all three together.

So I might be a yoga teacher teaching a different way of being with the body, but I want to stay connected with those who are helping to prevent further damage. And I might, a certain percentage of my time, be an activist. Maybe most of my time I teach a different relation to the body.

And I think there's that calling which we have to have, very much like that beautiful statement—kind of paradoxical—from Howard Thurman, the African-American theologian, who said, in response to a young man... This was a man who had been a lifelong activist, started the first interracial church in the San Francisco Bay Area. And a young man asked him, "What should I do with my life?"

You might imagine he would say, "Well, we really need people at the church," or "Here's the movement now." And he said, paradoxically, "Don't ask what the world needs. Rather, ask what makes you come alive, because what the world needs is people who have come alive."

And so I'll leave us with that and invite us to look for and demand training to connect our inner work and our outer response, because that's what the world needs and it also makes us come alive.

Thank you.

And we wanted to leave a little bit of time for any questions or responses. We understand there hasn't always been so much time so far during the day. I noticed there was one question in the back, one gentleman there, or comment.

"I just noticed how difficult it is sometimes to speak what we're trying to say, and how often we have duality in our language and we articulate a relationship with the earth when really we are the earth."

Thank you for that. Actually, especially difficult for a philosopher like me, which is why I wanted to end with that poem, because it's the poets, it's the artists, it's the musicians who do a lot better real articulation of that than somebody like myself. So use language differently. People say, "How do we relate to nature?" Say... It's here.

Other observations, reflections, questions? Could be from something earlier in the day that hasn't had time or space yet. Please, Susan.

"The name of the Rumi poem, was it 'The Worm is Waiting'?"

No. The title I have, and I'm not sure it's his original title, is "The Worm Awakes."

"The Worm Awakes. Thank you so much."

You're welcome.

In the far back, to my left at the back.

"Thank you for your talks. And one thing that has occurred over the years is that I often felt that now I've got it, and if I can just explain it to the other people, you know, in a good way, they'll get it and go with me, whether it's the women's movement or whatever it is, you know, you get an understanding. Nothing could be further from the truth. And very often the frustration... So I think in these efforts, you have to be resilient and have to be able to take failure again and again and again and keep on."

Great. Thank you. And remember the 7.5% understanding, because we don't need to reach everyone. At a certain point, it becomes contagious.

"So this is a share from something that happened earlier where I don't remember who was talking about holding hands. And it makes us stronger. And there's a beautiful song in Spanish called 'La Cancion es Urgente'—The Song is Urgent. And one of the things, and I sing, so I love that song. And it says... No, just one line, and it says, so it's urgent, it's 'la cancion es urgente, es un rio creciendo, una flecha en el aire, es amor combatiendo,' and there's a part that says..."

"Que si vamos cantando, no podrán detenernos" - if we're singing together, they cannot stop us.

This beautiful line captures something essential about the power of collective practice, of sangha, of coming together in dharma. When we join our voices - whether in literal song or in the song of our shared commitment to awakening - we create something unstoppable, something that transcends our individual limitations.

The urgency of the song reflects the urgency of our practice. In a world filled with suffering, with division, with forces that would separate us from our deepest wisdom and from each other, there is indeed something urgent about coming together. There is something urgent about remembering that we are not alone in this journey toward freedom.

When we practice together, when we hold hands as this community has been exploring, when we allow our individual streams of mindfulness to merge into a river of collective awareness, we discover a strength that no external force can diminish. This is not mere sentiment - it is a profound spiritual truth that communities of practice have known for millennia.

The dharma itself is urgent in this way. It calls us not just to individual liberation, but to the recognition that our freedom is intimately connected with the freedom of all beings. When we sing together - when we practice together, sit together, walk together in mindfulness - we embody this interconnection. We become living proof that separation is an illusion, that love truly is combating the forces of division and despair.

This is the gift of sangha, the third jewel of our refuge. In coming together, in sharing our practice and our commitment, we discover that the path to awakening is not a solitary journey but a collective song - urgent, unstoppable, and filled with the power of love in action.

CHAPTER 271

Buddhist Perspective on Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 1h07

> This comprehensive talk bridges contemporary climate science with Buddhist ethical teachings, offering a unique perspective on humanity's relationship with the natural world. Beginning with findings from the IPCC report and regional climate assessments for both the northeastern United States and Nepal, the talk establishes the scientific reality of anthropogenic climate change before exploring its deeper spiritual and ethical dimensions.
>
> Drawing on the Āṭānāṭika Sutta (AN 3.70) and its teaching on the relationship between human righteousness and environmental harmony, the talk examines how Buddhist ethics directly address our ecological crisis. The principle of ahiṃsā (non-harm) embodied in the first precept extends beyond human relationships to encompass all breathing beings—from the smallest insects to the fish in acidifying oceans. The Karaṇīyamettā Sutta's universal loving-kindness toward 'all beings without exception' takes on new urgency when species face extinction from human-caused climate change.
>
> The talk identifies greed (lobha) as the root cause of our ecological predicament, manifesting through consumer culture and economic systems that prioritize exploitation over harmony. Peter Harvey's scholarship on Buddhist ethics frames the ideal human-nature relationship as 'harmonious cooperation' rather than domination—a perspective shared with Native American traditions. Practical solutions emerge from mindfulness practice itself: the gradual simplification of lifestyle, reduced consumption, and the cultivation of contentment. The teaching concludes with the Saṃyutta Nikāya's praise for those who plant groves and establish parks, and His Holiness the Dalai Lama's call for universal responsibility toward future generations.

The topic of our Dharma talk this late afternoon is the Buddhist perspective on climate change. You might, at least some of you, wonder what this has to do with your mindfulness retreat. Well, let's wait and see whether there is any connection or not, and whether what we're doing here has anything to do with the climate.

The structure for today's Dharma talk will be as follows. First, we shall focus on observed changes in the global climate system. Then we will take our exploration a little bit closer to where we are here right now, namely to the northeast of North America. After that, we shall also take a closer look at somewhere quite different, quite far from here—namely Nepal—and how climate change has affected that country and the indicators for climate change there.

Having done all of this, we shall take a closer look at some of the causes of climate change and then go on to discuss or highlight the more Buddhist perspective on climate change. Part of that will be an exploration of whether we have a responsibility or not. Is there an individual as well as a universal responsibility, or is this certainly something that just doesn't concern us?

Within this last year, two major reports were released. One, if I remember correctly, was in September of last year: the summary for policymakers as issued by the IPCC, which stands for the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change. That summary is available on the internet and elsewhere and provides very interesting reading on the topic. We will not have time to go into all those many details—there are plenty of facts and figures—but we'll keep it to the key findings of the IPCC: key findings with regard to the atmosphere, with regard to the oceans of the globe, the cryosphere (which concerns the ice masses), and the main finding with regard to sea level. Carbon and other biogeochemical cycles is another area, and certainly we shall also mention the detection and attribution of climate change. To whom can climate change be attributed?

This is the most recent report, and please do know that hundreds if not thousands of scientists in the field were involved in preparing it. The report says clearly: warming of the climate system is unequivocal, and since the 1950s many of the observed changes are unprecedented over decades to even millennia. The atmosphere and ocean have warmed, the amounts of snow and ice have diminished, sea level has risen, and the concentrations of greenhouse gases have increased. That's the overall summary concerning the major aspects of our globe. Although, unfortunately—and some of you might have noticed this already—this summary is not talking about the impact on, or considering, wildlife and the impact on species.

The more specific summary for the atmosphere is given as follows: each of the last three decades has been successively warmer at the Earth's surface than any preceding decade since 1850. In the Northern Hemisphere, 1983 to 2012 was likely the warmest thirty-year period of the last 1,400 years. This statement was given with medium confidence.

When it comes to the specific conclusion for the oceans, the statement is as follows: ocean warming dominates the increase in energy stored in the climate system, accounting for more than 90% of energy accumulated between 1971 and 2010. There's high confidence for this finding. It is virtually certain, the scientists say, that the upper ocean —extending from the surface all the way to 700 meters below—warmed from 1971 until 2010, and it likely warmed between the 1870s and 1971.

The cryosphere concerns itself with ice sheets. The statement of the scientists here is the following: over the last two decades, the Greenland and Antarctic ice sheets have been losing mass, glaciers have continued to shrink almost worldwide, and Arctic sea ice and Northern Hemisphere spring snow cover have continued to decrease in extent. There's high confidence for this finding. Each of the findings is attributed with a certain level of confidence—sometimes extremely high confidence, sometimes high confidence, and certainly sometimes less certain confidence.

As for sea level: the rate of sea level rise since the mid-nineteenth century has been larger than the mean rate during the previous two millennia. There's high confidence for this statement. Over the period 1901 until 2010, global sea level rose by 0.19 meters —almost twenty centimeters. This, we will soon see, has an impact on certain populations, namely coastal populations. People living in coastal areas are likely to get wet feet, and maybe more than this.

The main finding with regard to carbon and other biogeochemical cycles is stated in the following words: the atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide, methane, and nitrous oxide have increased to levels unprecedented in at least the last 800,000 years. Carbon dioxide concentrations have increased by 40% since pre-industrial times, primarily from fossil fuel emissions and secondarily from net land use change emissions. The ocean has absorbed about 30% of the emitted anthropogenic carbon dioxide, causing ocean acidification.

Before this IPCC report was published, there was a heated debate in the scientific community as to whether climate change is happening at all—maybe it's just imagination—and secondly, what to attribute this climate change to, with some stating that it had nothing to do with human activities. The most recent IPCC report from 2013 came up with a really clear statement.

It says, under the heading of detection and attribution of climate change: human influence has been detected in warming of the atmosphere and the ocean, in changes in the global water cycle, in reductions in snow and ice, in global mean sea level rise, and in changes in some climate extremes. This evidence for human influence has grown since the earlier assessment report—number four, which if I'm not mistaken was from 2007. Earlier on, the level of confidence wasn't that great yet. However, with the 2013 report there was hardly any room left for doubt. The report states that it is extremely likely—which means 95 to 100 percent likely—that human influence has been the dominant cause of the observed warming since the mid-20th century.

Now, all of us happen to be humans, which certainly means this concerns us greatly.

A number of countries, when addressing climate change issues, initiated what are called climate change assessments. What these assessments do is look at the respective country, observe changes within that country, and then make predictions of what might happen next. Not long ago, the U.S. National Climate Assessment was published, and for this report too, many hundreds of scientists were involved in putting it together. The United States National Climate Assessment was ordered by the government itself.

This national climate assessment is interesting because it clearly states findings not only for the country as a whole, but also for various geographic regions—one of them being the Northeast, another the Northwest, then the Southwest, and so on. Since we're here in Barre, Massachusetts, as part of the Northeast, let us, just for the sake of general knowledge, take a closer look at what this climate assessment finds with regard to the impact of climate change.

The report states: Heat waves, coastal flooding, and river flooding will pose a growing challenge to the region's environmental, social, and economic systems. This will increase the vulnerability of the region's residents, especially its most disadvantaged populations. Infrastructure will be increasingly compromised by climate-related hazards—infrastructure such as roads, bridges, buildings, airports, and seaports—including impacts from sea level rise, coastal flooding, and intense precipitation events. Agriculture, fisheries, and ecosystems will be increasingly compromised over the next century by climate change impacts. Farmers can explore new crop options, but these adaptations are not cost- or risk-free. Moreover, adaptive capacity, which varies throughout the region, could be overwhelmed by changing climate. While a majority of states and a rapidly growing number of municipalities have begun to incorporate the risk of climate change into their planning activities, implementation of adaptation measures is still at early stages.

Now, in the case of Nepal—a small landlocked country in Asia, placed right between two superpowers, namely China to the north and India to the south—even though it is contributing less than 0.01 percent of global carbon emissions, there is little that Nepal can do to decrease greenhouse gases. What has been noticed over the years in Nepal is a decreasing amount of snow on Mount Everest caused by rising temperatures. Nepal's glaciers—and Nepal covers a substantial part of the Himalayas, especially that part where eight of the highest peaks are located—have retreated by 21 percent over the past 30 years, and more reduction is expected in the near future.

Now this itself has some serious consequences, namely that the number of glacial lakes at high altitude is increasing—between 20 and 26 in Nepal—and if they burst, there will be major flooding in the mountain areas. The glacial melt is increasing as temperatures rise and will lead to increased summer flows in some river systems for a few decades, followed by a reduction in flows as the glaciers disappear. Scientists say the effects of climate change could be devastating, as the Himalayas provide food and energy for approximately 1.3 billion people living in downstream river basins.

It is this last aspect that is being increasingly highlighted by scientists, for instance, scientists from ICIMOD—the International Centre for Integrated Mountain Development, a regional scientific institute. What is happening is that black carbon is being pushed towards the Himalayas. There are well-known channels for this black carbon, which is emitted by millions and millions of households cooking with solid fuel such as firewood. The black carbon haze, or so-called atmospheric brown cloud, is also owing to millions of vehicles, many of them not properly maintained. Furthermore, thousands of brick kilns contribute to the black carbon pollution, as well as a number of heavy industries.

All of that atmospheric brown cloud—a brown haze—gets moved towards the Himalayas and has a major impact on air quality. More than this: black carbon has a tendency to absorb sunlight and warm up the atmosphere. When layers of the atmosphere in which the black carbon is predominant come in contact with the snow and glaciers, it leads to increased melting. Plus, when black carbon particles settle on the glaciers, the color black absorbs the sun's rays, and that too contributes to a warming and melting of the glaciers.

Within the next couple of decades, scientists expect an increase in meltwater from the glaciers. However, once the glaciers have greatly receded, there will be no more water supply for the major rivers in the northern part of the Indian subcontinent.

So a greatly decreased inflow of water for the Ganges River, for the Brahmaputra, for the Indus-Sutlej River, for the Salween, and other major rivers. When those major rivers in their respective river basins carry less water, there will be less water available for agriculture, and this will have an impact on the population. Obviously, it will. And then there can be even further consequences in terms of food security and beyond. So there are some really major consequences to be expected from climate change.

Now, are those changes always the same in every country, in every place? They're not. There are huge differences between the impacts of climate change here in the northeast of the United States and the impact of climate change on the southwest of this country. And again, the impact on a country like Nepal is certainly quite different.

Various causes have been mentioned for climate change. Natural causes, for instance, such as changes in the Earth's orbit and the Earth moving closer to the Sun, changes in solar activity, and volcanic eruptions. And then as another major source, the IPCC has concluded that there is human activity—anthropogenic cause. These have greatly contributed to the changes in Earth's climate.

Now, many of these major changes have occurred since the industrial era began. And the industrial era began with which invention? The steam engine—there you go. The invention of the steam engine, the combustion engine. At the time, it was heralded as a big innovation, and it has brought many changes, much more power, also much more comfort. But in the long run, the side effects of this invention have been disastrous.

Among the things that have greatly contributed to climate change, we have the greenhouse gases. Among those, carbon dioxide being the first one, methane the next one, nitrous oxide yet another one. Water vapor has also been mentioned. And the sources of carbon dioxide emissions include fossil fuel burning, cement manufacturing, and land use changes—by which is meant turning, let's say, an area covered by a dense tropical forest into an agricultural area, burning down parts of the tropical forest and then starting agriculture.

This much in terms of observed changes and the major sources that have caused climate change. Now let us take a look at the Buddhist perspective on climate change. Let us start with some very fundamental aspects, namely humanity's relationship to nature, or humanity's place in nature. You will surely know that there are certain religious systems that have proposed humans' role with regard to nature to be what? Domination. There you go—domination of nature, conquering nature.

Now, the Buddhist perspective, or let's take the Native American Indian perspective on this. Would Native Americans share this idea of conquering nature, domination of nature? Not at all. Well, with certain of the Buddhist teachings, it's about the same thing.

Peter Harvey, a professor of Buddhism originally from the UK, has stated the following in his book An Introduction to Buddhist Ethics, a book that I can highly recommend. Given all that has been said so far in his chapter on our relationship to nature, he says, "It is clear that the Buddhist ideal for humanity's relationship with animals, plants, and the landscape is one of"—and please note—"harmonious cooperation. The Buddha's teachings emphasizes a disciplining and prudent overcoming of the negativities within the conditioned nature of the human heart."

What do we do here during this retreat? We meditate and we try to overcome those negativities within the human heart.

"Such an approach goes hand in hand with a friendly attitude to the environment," Harvey continues. This can be seen in Zen scholar D.T. Suzuki's statement about making a good friend of a climbed mountain rather than conquering it. So our role as humans is not to conquer and subjugate the planet Earth but rather to live in harmony with it.

Now, an aspect that hardly gets highlighted in this discussion of climate change and the impact of humans on the environment is the ethical aspect of our actions. Our actions will have direct impact on the environment. If we as an individual, or as part of a corporation, or as a local society—if our carbon footprint is really high, well then there will clearly be an impact on the atmosphere and with this on the environment.

This, however, the Buddha says, is not the only thing to consider. There is the so-called Ādamika Sutta from the Aṅgūtrāṇikāya, namely volume two, section seventy-four to seventy-six, and that discourse is structured in a very simple way. It says if the king of a country is unrighteous, if the ruler or governor of a country is unrighteous, then the vassals of that country will also become unrighteous. When the vassals of that country are unrighteous, then the town and country folks will also become unrighteous.

And then it goes on like this. Because human beings become unrighteous, the sun and moon will be off course. And then the constellations and stars will be off course. Day and night will be off course. Winds will be off course. And even the deities will become upset. And when the deities, the discourse says, become upset, the rains will not be regular anymore. This certainly has an impact on the crops, of course. With little rain falling there would be poor crops, and certainly the human beings who have to make do with such poor crops will end up being weak and short-lived.

Then the discourse goes on. That Ādamika Sutta goes on to state just the opposite. If the ruler of a country is righteous, then the vassals and Brahmins of that country become righteous. If they are righteous, then the town and country folks will also become righteous. And then the same sequence again. At the end we will have crops that are abundant, and the people will be strong, healthy, and enjoy a long life.

So what we have here is an ethical consideration, an ethical consideration in the context of our environment. Hardly anyone is considering this these days.

Now, there is, as Peter Harvey has stated, the pan-Indian value of ahimsa, or non-injury, which then corresponds to the first of the five precepts which exhorts us to abstain from the onslaught on living beings—literally, breathing beings.

This first precept usually is understood as being limited just to fellow human beings, that we don't torment them, that we don't take their lives. But in the context of our climate change topic it becomes obvious that this precept takes on a new dimension. To abstain from onslaught on living beings includes even the tiny ants and insects of whatever form. It includes certainly the fish in the oceans and lakes. It includes the birds in the sky.

Now, if because of our way of living on this planet, certainly causing much carbon dioxide emissions—if because of this the CO2 concentrations in the atmosphere go really high, and that then leads to a warming of the global climate, and that then has an impact on many species, causing certain regions to become so hot that certain species just can't survive anymore—then what? Are we observing that first precept or not? Not. So collectively we are at fault.

The non-harming of animals could be understood out of this first precept, but could also be understood coming from a different point of view. Namely, if millions of species get harmed or become extinct because of climate change and because of our human anthropogenic activities, then we will pile a huge amount of unwholesome karmic results onto our own heads—and that's collectively speaking.

So ideally, we do not want to intentionally harm living beings. The Buddha is very clear about this, as is nicely expressed in the Dhammapada, verse 131, when he came across a group of children that were molesting a snake with sticks. The Buddha speaks to them: "Whoever, seeking his or her own happiness, harms with the rod or a stick pleasure-loving beings, gets no happiness hereafter." In other words, there will be unwholesome karmic results, and those will then contribute to our unhappiness.

Now, in certain passages, the first precept is formulated in a very beautiful way. Namely, it says one avoids killing of living beings and abstains from it, without stick or sword, conscientious, full of sympathy, desirous of the welfare of all living beings. "Full of sympathy" sometimes also gets translated as "with a trembling of the heart." One feels, one empathizes with some living being that is under attack.

Out of the four divine abodes—namely mettā, karuṇā, sympathetic joy (muditā), and equanimity (upekkhā)—out of those, mettā and karuṇā, loving-kindness and compassion, play a major role when it comes to our relationship to the environment, to nature. As Peter Harvey states, as all sentient beings like happiness and dislike pain, however much their specific desires and sensitivities vary, the Karaṇīyamettā Sutta, the discourse on loving-kindness, speaks of radiating loving-kindness to all types of beings—not only to our pet dog or pet cat or white mouse or whatever it might be.

"Whatever living beings there be," the Sutta Nipāta says in verses 146-147, and this really goes to the heart, "whatever living beings there be, feeble or strong, tall, stout, or medium, short, small, or large, without exception, seen or unseen, those dwelling far or near, those who are born or those who are to be born—may all beings be happy."

So there's an equal regard, a positive regard, towards all living beings.

Some researchers, Buddhist scholars among them, have pointed out that our current economic system is also at fault, or is at the root of this global eco-crisis, and that indeed seems to be the case. Our current global economic system is based on greed, and the greed leads to consumption. Marketing is artificially creating an increase of consumption by creating artificial needs. We think we need certain things when maybe we don't really need them.

Does genuine happiness and well-being truly arise when we go to a big shopping center and pile fifty items into our shopping cart, pay for all of this, and then take it back home? Does this really make us truly happy? No, not really. True happiness is more likely to be found in a place like this, when engaging in mindfulness practice.

Buddhist studies scholars have proposed that the root cause of our ecological crisis, as mentioned, lies in our greed. We would be well advised to reduce that greed as much as we can. Especially when we meditate, we realize for ourselves over years that gradually we manage to get by on less and less. Usually there is a simplification of lifestyle, which means we need less, and with this there is less need to purchase goods, less need to exploit nature, and less need for unnecessary manufacturing.

Researchers in the field of climate change have proposed some obvious solutions. They are calling for more research on the topic, and each and every country has to do that. In the case of Nepal, the research is still at the infant stage, even though the country is facing major climate change impacts. The second solution that has been proposed is creating awareness for climate change issues—and this is where we can come in. Thirdly, reduction of carbon emissions and other greenhouse gases, an area where we can also contribute. And fourth, preparedness for extreme climate conditions.

From a worldly point of view of what could be done as an individual contribution to addressing climate change, the website of the United States Environmental Protection Agency contains wonderful information—proposals for what one could do at home, at school, in the office, and on the road. I don't have time to go into all those suggestions, but they are really good and worth looking up and considering.

From the point of view of the Buddhist teachings, a number of principles apply. First of all, we have both a personal and a collective or universal responsibility towards the environment. This arises out of the first precept of not injuring living beings, and also out of compassion, namely karuṇā, or concern, which is a related term dayā, and sympathy, anukampā in Pali.

Dhammapada verse 129 has the following to say: "All tremble at violence, all fear death. Comparing oneself with others, one should neither kill nor cause to kill." So it is not just our fellow human beings who fear death, but the ant that is crawling across your path, or perhaps some spider in your room that prefers to live and not to get squashed.

Did the Buddha encourage animal sacrifices? Not at all. He followed through with the intuitive wisdom he gained, and that meant a clear no to animal sacrifices, which were common at his time and unfortunately are still common on the Indian subcontinent. It is said that the Buddha strongly recommended performing different kinds of sacrifices, namely by making offerings of vegetables, of fruit, milk, lighting a candle, or lighting some incense sticks.

Now, why do you think the second precept of avoiding stealing could be important in the context of our topic? The first precept is evident, but what about the second one? Someone said, "We're stealing the future of our children." That's a really good point. Yes, that's it. And in a book I found the following statement in this regard: we have a responsibility not to rob the planet of its trees, water, fresh air, and minerals in whatever form this might take place. Some big corporations feel they have a right to exploit planet Earth in every possible way and to rob the planet of its resources.

If you contrast this with the attitude of the Native American Indians towards nature, do you see any difference there? There is a huge difference—a tremendous respect for nature. Not even moving, or when moving, let us say, a stone or rock, then later putting it back where it originally was. And taking from nature only what is absolutely necessary, and not more.

In terms of cause and effect, action, and karmic results, the third volume of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, section 369 to 371, states the case of a big fruit tree with several branches, and each branch was yielding bountiful fruits—enough for the entire country. Yet one day an ignorant man came along and helped himself to the fruits of that tree as much as he could eat, and then went on to chop down that branch. The tree spirit that was inhabiting the tree was very upset and decided, "What is this? This I will stop," and made it so that the tree would not bear fruit anymore. Then the king of that kingdom, Koravya, complained to the king Sakka, saying that previously the tree was bearing lots of fruit, but now no more. "Please change this." And so Sakka then had an impact, speaking to that tree spirit. Part of the story was that eventually even a strong wind came and uprooted the fruit tree, and so the tree spirit was strongly affected by the karmic results of its deed.

In contrast to this, we have a discourse given in the first volume of the Saṃyutta Nikāya, section 33, entitled "Planters of Groves," and there it says: "For whom does merit always increase, both by day and by night? Who are the people going to heaven, established in Dhamma and endowed with virtue?" The answer is given: "Those who set up a park or a grove, the people who construct a bridge, a place to drink, and a well, those who give a residence—for them, merit always increases, both by day and by night."

Those are the people going to heaven, established in Dhamma and endowed with virtue.

So planting trees, setting up a park or a grove, is clearly mentioned here as a wholesome deed.

The Jataka, in its section 32, speaks of a person who, resting in the shade of a big tree, having rested there before moving on, shows his gratitude to this tree by chopping it down. This is clearly denounced as someone who is an evil and false friend, someone who doesn't know gratitude—first enjoying the shade of that tree, enjoying perhaps even the fruits of that tree, and then before continuing the journey, breaking branches, if not even chopping down the entire tree. So that's another reference.

Now, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, in an article published in a book entitled Moral Ground, states the following: "Universal responsibility to take action to protect the future of a planet in peril for the survival of humankind. The key thing is the sense of universal responsibility. That is the real source of strength, the real source of happiness. If our generation exploits everything available—the trees, the water, and the minerals—without any care for the coming generation or the future, then we are at fault, aren't we?"

And that's it.

So allow me to conclude today's Dhamma talk on the Buddhist perspective on climate change by wishing: May we be fully aware of our individual as well as collective or universal responsibility towards nature, towards the environment. And may our mindfulness practice here at the Forest Refuge help to purify the mind of negativities—of greed, of hatred, of delusion—as much as possible. And then may this lead to the arising of much loving-kindness, much compassion, much karuṇā, and of much contentment and understanding. In this way, may we contribute to a proper addressing of climate change, be it in a small or larger way during our very existence, and thus may future generations benefit from it.

CHAPTER 272

The Anatomy of Ignorance 2 - The Social Roots of Ignorance and Climate Disruption

Rob Burbea · 1h03

> In this second talk of his series on the anatomy of ignorance, Rob Burbea focuses on social conditioning as a form of ignorance that prevents clear seeing of systemic issues like climate disruption. Drawing on recent UN climate reports, he examines three types of denial - intellectual, emotional, and environmental tokenism - that keep us from responding adequately to the climate crisis. Burbea connects Buddhist understanding of ignorance (avijja) with social conditioning around race, gender, nationality, and economic systems that blind us to interconnected realities. He outlines three levels of response: individual actions like energy reduction, community initiatives like carpooling, and collective mobilization for systemic change. Throughout, he emphasizes how dharma practitioners have unique resources - mindfulness, compassion, equanimity - essential for sustained climate action. The talk integrates practical solutions with spiritual practice, showing how working through personal and social ignorance connects to the universal ignorance addressed in traditional Buddhist teachings.

I want to continue this week with the theme that was developed initially last week, which is the theme that I'm calling the Anatomy of Ignorance. Last week we looked at an overview of that theme in terms of three main forms of ignorance: what I'm calling more personal ignorance, ignorance on a psychological level; social ignorance; and then what I was calling more universal ignorance, which is typically pointed to by spiritual traditions.

We looked, especially I think in the discussion time, at the very interesting way that framing essentially the problem of human life as ignorance, as opposed to framing it in terms of good versus evil, which is what so many cultures have done, is both hopeful but also very sobering. It gives some advantages from the model of seeing the roots of human suffering, problems, conflict, and so forth as the fight between good and evil. The fight versus good and evil also makes for better movies, I think. Ignorance is much less cinematic than the fight between good and evil.

I also pointed to the way that we have, in this culture, somewhat of a schizophrenia around that. At times we seem to really emphasize that ignorance is the problem and we can learn, and in a sense it's more hopeful. It also can really be connected with a certain amount of compassion, because we can have compassion when conditioning and ignorance are the root of unskillful behavior. When the problem is simply that people are bad or evil, we tend to want to destroy them, or punish them at least, or lock them away forever. I mentioned how there is that conflict within our culture. We even can see it very dramatically in the whole history of the so-called criminal justice system, in which at times prisons have been understood as ways for people to learn, to reform. We have the idea of reformatory, penitentiary, as opposed to penal institutions, which are more about punishment. And there's been conflict there. You can see that conflict in many parts of culture.

From the Buddhist tradition, the emphasis is clearly that ignorance is the issue, that there's a kind of deep unknowing that we have, which results in unskillful behavior, which is connected with suffering. And in our practice we have a major tool for investigating that ignorance.

I also mentioned how ignorance is sometimes challenging to investigate. We sometimes talk about the roots of suffering being greed, hatred, and delusion or ignorance, or greed, aversion, and delusion or ignorance. Greed and aversion are very evident experientially. We're often clear when we're greedy or when we're very aversive. It's something that we can know—oh my God, I was really just caught in that, not wanting that to happen or aversive towards that person or that situation. As we practice meditation, as we develop in mindfulness, as we develop in wisdom, often the greed and the aversion or the compulsive wanting and the aversion become clearer. And ignorance is harder to find.

We sometimes, by investigating greed and aversion, open up to places where we were, as it were, on automatic. But some of the deeper roots of our ignorance are harder to access. And that's why I think it can be very valuable to focus on how do we actually understand and how do we actually transform ignorance.

So the framing that I gave last time, which is on Dharmaseed, was to identify these three types of ignorance. The first being the more personal ignorance, often identified very skillfully by psychological traditions, which talk about our unconscious dimensions or look to places where we were stuck in our upbringing or didn't get optimal nourishment or care, or there was some kind of trauma or difficulty. A lot of Western psychology is quite skillful for identifying where developmentally we get stuck, or where we develop certain, what's sometimes called neuroses, or patterns of confused reactive behavior.

When we asked for hands last time, most of us had explored—it's in the culture very much to explore that and to discover some of the places where one is less conscious or unconscious on a personal level, in large part related to one's personal history and one's basic patterns. Many or most of us have explored that, at least some, and have probably worked through a lot of very old and sometimes chronic patterns. That was the first kind of ignorance, which I'm going to be particularly focusing on, I believe, next week, because my intention was to give the overview last time, and then in three successive meetings, focus on each of these three forms of ignorance.

The second, which I'll be looking at especially today, could be called the social aspect of ignorance, or the aspect where there is social conditioning that leads us to not see clearly. This would take shape probably in a number of ways. One of the most evident is the confusion and the conditioning that we have around being a member of a certain group. We find tremendous confusion and significant suffering around race, gender, age, sexual orientation, nationality, religion. We probably could go on with a number of others.

Many people have looked at some aspects of that conditioning. Many women and some men have looked at gender conditioning with a lot of depth in a way to identify it clearly and resist it. There's been tremendous movement in that way in the last 50 years, maybe longer time. A certain amount of attention has also gone into looking at how race influences our consciousness, and it really is so pervasive how we think in those ways. That, I think, is less investigated generally, even if some of the grosser manifestations of conditioning around race that manifest in discrimination and so forth, some of those have been ended.

There also are all these other areas. And there are also all sorts of social ideologies that we take in just from being a member of society. When we look back to another culture, when we look back to a culture 100 years ago in the US, or we maybe look to a foreign culture, we can often see, oh yeah, they really have that conditioning. Of course, we don't see our own very well, right?

We don't see our own, but we can point to different aspects of ignorance. It can manifest as certain ideologies—like the idea that if only we work hard, everyone will succeed. This notion carries a measure of truth, but it also neglects many of the pervasive systemic influences around all those dimensions I just identified. Then we criticize people for not succeeding because "everyone, if one works hard, can succeed." This represents an aspect of social conditioning that blinds us.

Typically, in a culture so informed by individualism, we don't see the larger systems. We focus so intensely on the individual, and this becomes a kind of ignorance—we simply don't see certain things. I'll explore this dimension more fully later.

The third kind of ignorance is what I'm calling universal ignorance. I'll examine this in focused detail, probably in three weeks, but this represents a form of ignorance that Buddhist tradition identifies—and we can see it recognized in many spiritual traditions—as the root problem.

This kind of ignorance is described in various ways. Sometimes it's framed as not truly understanding the Four Noble Truths. Another way of expressing this is that we don't really understand the sources of suffering and the sources of happiness. We look for happiness in all the wrong places, we look for love in all the wrong places. We particularly seek happiness by grasping onto experiences, people, things, careers, objects.

This is the core teaching, as we know. The deepest freedom and the deepest happiness come more from letting go and opening up to our deep nature, which as long as we're grasping, we will never see. We will never know ourselves deeply. The meditative practices and teachings associated with them are ways to address this more universal ignorance.

It's really a way that we become caught in a self-centered way of seeing, which tends to view ourselves and the world as permanent and tries to find happiness in grasping after things. It doesn't see our depth, our potential. Spiritual practice is designed to let us see through that ignorance and open up to our depths. That's why we're here. That's what draws us here. That's why Spirit Rock exists. That's right at the center of the tradition.

Last time I discussed how simply laying out these three forms of ignorance can be very sobering. There's a lot of work to do. Hopefully we've signed up for that, but it's a lot—not just one form of ignorance, but three. Some of them we don't know quite how to transform. We don't yet know so well how to address social ignorance. There's still much to be learned there. And transforming psychologically-based ignorance can be expensive at times.

So how do we approach this? It's very sobering, all this ignorance to work through.

But as I've mentioned, there's hope in identifying ignorance as the problem in all these approaches. There are ways we can actually act both in an inner way and in a more outer way to respond and transform the ignorance. Ultimately, this represents a hopeful vision of human life.

When we work with this model of ignorance as the root problem, we probably alternate between feeling "my god, this is a lot" and actually experiencing the excitement of learning, the excitement of moving and growing. How many of you can identify some area of personal ignorance that you were stuck in five or ten years ago that you are now free of? Go back twenty years.

In all these aspects of ignorance—psychological, social, and universal—there are numerous ways to transform our blindness. Today, I want to explore how we understand ignorance and how we transform that ignorance in relationship to this Earth Care Week. I want to particularly examine climate issues—a huge issue where ignorance takes many forms, yet remains workable.

I'm going to take us through this investigation, hoping we can encounter both the sobering aspect of ignorance and the hopeful perspective of working with it. I'm pleased to be conducting this exploration with you, knowing that something very much like this is happening in hundreds of similar communities this week, that many people are examining these same concerns and issues, hopefully to catalyze larger engagement.

Because it's not an exaggeration to say that the fate of the planet rests on precisely this kind of awakening.

I would say that without question, the science is clear and sobering. Let me examine this from three perspectives: first, the realities of what is sometimes called climate change, though I believe it's more accurately termed climate disruption. Change suggests something neutral, but what we're witnessing is the disruption and breakdown of established patterns.

Second, I want to explore how we can understand social ignorance as part of the root cause of this crisis. And third, I'll discuss how we might transform that ignorance into understanding and action—individually, as a community, and collectively.

Ultimately, I'm offering a positive vision of how to respond. In the long run, I believe that people with dharma practice, who understand inner transformation—particularly the personal and universal aspects we discussed—have a special role to play. Connecting these three types of transformation of ignorance is essential to address the depth of our current crisis.

Our inner practice trains us to study difficult emotions, to understand the roots of personal suffering, and to work skillfully with reactivity. We learn to be present with fear, despair, and anger while developing equanimity, balance, and mindfulness. These capacities are essential for the long haul, and those of us cultivating them have something vital to offer. We can connect contemplative practice with meaningful action and response.

So I hope this exploration will be both sobering and hopeful, maintaining a balance between these two necessary perspectives.

Interestingly, as I give this talk today, I notice the huge traffic jams that delayed many of us getting here—itself quite significant. And as many of you know, this past Monday, the UN climate panel released its report. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the IPCC, assembled approximately 1,500 of the world's foremost climate scientists. While their report contained little that was entirely new, it powerfully affirmed their earlier findings: all concerning trends have continued, they are serious, and if not stopped, they will lead to unprecedented suffering.

As the co-chair stated: "Our assessment of the science finds that the atmosphere and ocean have warmed, the amount of snow and ice has diminished, the global mean sea level has risen, and concentrations of greenhouse gases have increased." The report continues: "Human influence has been detected in warming of the atmosphere and the ocean, changes in the global water cycle, reductions of snow and ice, sea level rise, and changes in some climate extremes. It is extremely likely that human influence has been the dominant cause of the observed warming since the mid-twentieth century."

What was particularly significant in this report was the scientists' conclusion that if the temperature rise exceeds two degrees Celsius, catastrophic consequences will unfold. We have already warmed by nearly one degree, with many changes already in motion and more already determined by past emissions.

The scientists established that no more than one trillion metric tons of additional carbon can be burned. This connects to Bill McKibben's influential Rolling Stone analysis from a year ago, where he calculated that to stay within the two-degree limit, we can burn no more than 565 gigatons of fossil fuels. Yet the current business plans of major fossil fuel companies project extracting approximately 3,000 gigatons—five times the amount that would trigger catastrophic consequences.

In other words, the existing business models of major fossil fuel companies, if pursued, will result in climate catastrophe.

The scientists warn that exceeding the two-degree limit will bring "irreversible and potentially catastrophic climatic changes," with the poor and those in developing countries bearing the greatest burden. We see here interlocking systems—political, economic, and ecological.

This is indeed the sobering side of our investigation. Without decisive action, the two-degree limit will certainly be exceeded within decades. One study suggests that 2015 must mark the peak of global emissions, with sharp reductions beginning immediately thereafter.

As we know all too well, political leaders have accomplished little meaningful action thus far.

Very, very meager, even though there have been some pledges. Recently, Obama gave a speech in June, and he said that he wanted to reduce America's greenhouse gas emissions by 17% from 2006 levels by 2020. Well, it's a move in the right direction. Most of the people I've read said it needs to be closer to 80%. But there we are.

So, okay, that's a brief version of the realities. Now, how do we understand our relationship to those realities? I think it's really important for all of us—I certainly include myself—to look at this in terms of the model of ignorance, in terms of certain kinds of ignorance that we simply carry within us. Because if we're really wanting to respond to this, we have to examine our own ignorance and work through it in order to be part of a response.

So let me say a little bit about the dimension of ignorance, how this manifests, and then what seems to be required or what kind of responses are possible, because they are all very, very possible.

When we look to ignorance, I think there are different aspects here. On one level, probably everything that I just mentioned we know in some way, right? How many of us felt rather familiar with the details of what I said? Maybe there were a few things here and there that were new or didn't quite track, but the basics we know, right?

And so what constitutes our ignorance? It's some way that we don't take that in. There's some way that we don't take that in, that somehow—and again, I speak for myself as well—we go about our daily activities knowing that, but not quite knowing that. There's some way that we, and it's partly because we don't know what to do, or we don't have a sense of how we can respond, and we continue with our daily activities.

I think we're kind of vaguely aware of some of the realities: that this country consumes 25% of the world's resources with 5% of the population, or that the household average use of carbon emissions is probably three times greater in this country than in Sweden—which probably has a higher standard of living because they have enacted certain measures—and double what the household amount of carbon emissions is for Germany. We may not know those details. We may not know that each of us has about 50 times more carbon emissions than a person in Bangladesh. We may not know those kind of details, and we can be confused about this.

So there are certain kinds of denial that we seem to have. And again, I totally include myself here. We're trying to find our way together. In a sense, we are like children in a burning house. I think we know that, and there's a sense in which we are not facing the realities collectively as a society. We are not looking at these realities. Somehow most of our lives are—we are for the most part proceeding with business as usual while knowing that that's not going to work. That's unsustainable. That the current way of life is unsustainable.

So there's a kind of denial that we have just to stay sane. We segment that knowledge. It doesn't enter the entirety of our lives. There's a psychologist named Margaret Klein who's done really quite skillful study of denial in relation to climate change. She says there are three main forms of denial.

One of them is intellectual denial, which I think probably we are not engaged in. We probably know what's happening. There are people who've engaged in intellectual denial, and they've had a tremendous impact. And it's been heavily funded, as we know, by the fossil fuel industries and by a number of wealthy people like the Koch brothers. We know that that has happened and has tremendously impacted public discourse, starting in the 90s particularly, in very negative ways. This kind of intellectual denial has happened. And even though something like 97, 98, 99 percent of scientists have a clear consensus, they have found scientists who are willing to—I presume—get paid to say that, to give a scientific voice on behalf of denying these realities.

There's also a kind of emotional denial, which is probably closer to home, that to really take this in is not easy. We don't even necessarily have venues for that. I've been influenced a lot by working with Joanna Macy, and her work is really about creating venues where we can take in the emotional reality of these facts, of these studies, and so forth. And I think if we really take those in—even if you right now just feel what's there for you—and if we were to do this more fully, we would actually maybe have a whole session where we would work on what are the emotions connected with this. And when I've done day longs on this theme, we have that as a big component, really wanting to look.

So if you look in there right now, if you just see what is the—after hearing that statement of the facts, most facts and trends—if you go inside for a while, what is there?

What emotions or what inner states are there? Maybe you could just name them in a word or two.

"Stunned." "Shock, fear, despair." "Denial." "Sadness." "Overwhelm."

If we don't have ways of working with these emotions—and while our practice gives us tools, we can't necessarily access them individually—that's why work like Joanna Macy's becomes so important. How many of you know of Joanna Macy's work? It's very beautiful work in which people function in groups and find ways to access the emotions we've just named. Somehow opening up to those feelings in a group setting can free up energy, allowing us to process those emotions rather than remain trapped by them.

I've seen this transformation very dramatically myself. When I was first training with her—this was quite a while ago, 1990 or '91—we had the training the weekend of the first Gulf War, actually right after it started. I'd been active with Buddhist Peace Fellowship, attending countless meetings in the six months before that war, trying to help inform people. Yet when the bombs started dropping, I was in shock and incapable of acting. I was somewhat overwhelmed, just numb.

We did that training that weekend—sustained work for a whole weekend going into what people were feeling, offering rituals and practices. I encountered what I found there: anger, sadness, numbness, shock. I could work with it, could have it be heard by others, and came out the other end freed for action, freed for response.

We can't do this fully today, but I want to name that this is a significant piece. Perhaps part of my role would be to create venues where we do this work, because I think it's really necessary. If we don't process these emotions, we stay trapped in what was described—the overwhelm, the shock, the denial. But these feelings are workable. They're not simply the necessary emotional correlates of these realities; they're more like initial reactions that can be transformed.

Maybe we could use a session to explore this if you'd like, or perhaps I would offer that separately. But I want to acknowledge that this emotional processing is essential. We can do some of this individually in our practices by calling forth those emotions in small ways and being with them. In my experience, though, it helps tremendously to do this collectively—to be recognized, to know that these are normal patterns, not reasons to blame ourselves.

This emotional denial is pervasive, and it's based on these overwhelming feelings. Somehow that has to be worked through, because emotional denial often locks us into confusion and inaction when we don't work through it.

The third kind of denial comes in the form of what Joanna called environmental tokenism—where we do something small and think, "Oh, there, I've dealt with the big issue." I drive an electric car. Of course, not to denigrate that action, but the problem lies in thinking that by doing that, one has fully responded to the situation. These small actions are very important, but they're not the complete response.

Then there are the personal levels of denial, and beyond that, various collective ideologies which remain strong—ideologies related to the assumptions of an ongoing consumer culture in which we can keep consuming, keep using resources, believing there are no limits. These assumptions are still very much with us. The sense of individualism makes us either not look at the larger picture or feel incapable of dealing with the larger situation. I could go on about the assumptions that, to some significant extent, influence us from our larger systems.

So how to respond? We've gone to the sobering dimension. Anyone feeling sobered? Sobered and perhaps shocked a little if we've truly gone into that reality.

I want to distinguish between three kinds of responses: individual, community responses, and collective responses. I think all three are necessary.

But individual responses are very important. Even though I was using the electric car example to illustrate how limited such responses can be if that's all there is, all sorts of individual responses remain a key part of our overall response.

There is a tremendous amount one can do, ranging from staying well-informed to conducting an energy audit on one's home—to the extent that this is within one's control—to examining transportation patterns, living more simply, and taking responsibility for one's actions. Perhaps most importantly, we can work on connecting more deeply with the Earth.

We held Earth Day here on April 20th last spring, and one statement that most impacted me was that the real basis for action that will truly protect the Earth is love of the Earth. This love naturally arises from being more immersed with the Earth itself. So cultivating this connection can be a vital part of our response—really feeling more connected with the Earth so that this love leads us to want to act.

There are countless ways we can respond individually, and many wonderful resources are available. One book I've found helpful is called The Low-Carbon Diet, which provides a step-by-step approach to cutting your personal carbon emissions in half or less. It's not particularly difficult—there are numerous choices one can make, various actions one can take.

We can also respond at the community level, through our institutions. To the extent that we participate in institutions, we can exercise whatever influence we have. Here again, as with individual responses, we often have considerable power to make a difference. We can work with local institutions to encourage them to implement the equivalent of the individual responses I've been describing. We can examine our transportation systems.

One area I've become particularly conscious of is Spirit Rock's own carbon footprint. While we don't have a complete analysis yet, I've been influenced by attending meetings of the Berkeley Climate Action Coalition. Berkeley has a plan, approved by voters in 2006, to reduce emissions by 80% by 2050 and 20% by 2020. These targets were modest and informed by the science available at the time, which has since evolved. Still, Berkeley has been doing a good job of meeting these goals. When you account for the growth that has occurred, Berkeley is actually reducing its emissions by one-third. Some UN representatives have pointed to it as a model for much of North America.

In Berkeley's analysis, the breakdown of carbon emissions was revealing: 28% from households, 26% from businesses, and 46% from transportation. Transportation represents the largest category. When I've tried to examine Spirit Rock as carefully as possible—and the community is doing wonderful things, with new building plans that are very green indeed—transportation emerges as the most challenging issue.

This leads me to wonder: what would it take to organize carpooling for the Wednesday class? How do we at Spirit Rock reduce our carbon footprint? How do we address transportation? I think carpooling confronts American individualism directly, doesn't it? It points to the fact that the changes necessary will require us to transform our way of living. This reality isn't publicized much, but I believe that in significant ways, we'll need to live more simply and more cooperatively.

Carpooling represents one important example. How many people would be willing to carpool if we could design a good system for it? I see almost everyone raising their hands, which is very encouraging. We'll need to act on that enthusiasm.

Let me turn finally to collective responses, where I'll be briefer. One of the remarkable discoveries in reading climate change literature is that practical solutions to fully address the situation already exist. Many of you may know this—there are people and institutions that have worked out exactly what we need to do.

One of the clearest analyses I've encountered comes from Lester Brown and the Worldwatch Institute. You can find this on the web—the websites and books are listed in my resource list at the back of the room. Here you'll find a very clear plan for reducing greenhouse emissions by 2020. It's not rocket science.

From a technical standpoint, the solutions aren't complex at all. The challenge lies entirely in the political realm. Lester Brown's comprehensive plan outlines several key areas: increased energy efficiency and conservation, a fundamental shift from fossil fuels to renewable energy, population stabilization, poverty eradication, ecological restoration, and ensuring food security for all. What he emphasizes, however, is that achieving these goals requires a massive mobilization of people who truly understand the urgency of our situation.

This is where the real work lies. We can make all the wonderful changes we want individually and collectively within our institutions, but without broader engagement, little will fundamentally shift. Bill McKibben, co-founder of 350.org and a longtime leading voice in climate activism, offers a striking perspective on this challenge. He points out that while 10 to 15 percent of the population is highly attuned to these issues, even if all of them perfectly align their personal actions—completely reducing energy consumption, embracing carpooling, and supporting institutions that express these values—the overall impact remains minimal.

But here's the crucial insight: if those same 10 to 15 percent truly become active on these issues and commit a significant portion of their lives to responding in whatever way calls to them, everything changes. This is a profound shift in understanding. The power lies not merely in personal lifestyle changes, but in dedicated engagement and action.

The study of social movements confirms this pattern repeatedly. The American Revolution succeeded with only 3 percent of the population being highly active. Other transformative movements, like the civil rights movement, achieved massive change with perhaps 5 to 7 percent deeply committed. When 10 percent of any population commits to making an issue central to their lives, systemic transformation becomes inevitable.

So the question becomes deeply personal: Are you part of that 10 or 15 percent? Do you feel called to be part of that committed minority? And if so, what concrete actions will you take? Part of the answer involves connecting with organizations already doing meaningful work in this arena.

Joanna Macy offers valuable guidance here through her concept of "the great turning." She identifies three essential forms of action that create systems-level change, and it's important to understand that engagement can happen at any of these levels. The first is preventing further damage—the traditional domain of activists. This might mean taking concrete action to halt further extraction of fossil fuels from the earth. The Keystone Pipeline represents one of the most dramatic contemporary examples of this kind of work. If you want to witness the stakes visually, I recommend seeking out Jennifer Berezan's powerful song and accompanying footage from her flight over the tar sands with Joanna Macy. The YouTube video provides a sobering view of what we're confronting.

The second form of action involves transforming core institutions, and this can manifest in countless ways across medicine, education, and other vital sectors. Imagine what could happen if our educational system truly taught sustainability as a fundamental principle. This could become someone's passionate calling—we don't all need to be on the front lines in identical ways.

The third area is consciousness transformation. What's being asked of us isn't that everyone abandon their current path to become frontline activists, though certain moments may call for exactly that level of response. Lester Brown suggests that one likely scenario for genuine transformation would require a World War II-style, post-Pearl Harbor mobilization of our entire society. That level of collective commitment would certainly create the change we need, though we remain far from such unified purpose.

The alternative model involves gradual transformation through grassroots education and action. This third level of consciousness shifting asks each of us to discern deeply: Where am I called to contribute?

This requires a fundamental shift in our economic thinking. The question you raise about energy companies being bound by their current business models points to one of the deepest challenges we face. These companies have massive investments in existing fossil fuel infrastructure and reserves. Their shareholders expect returns on these investments, creating what economists call "stranded assets" if we transition too quickly to renewables.

But here's where I think our practice offers something essential. We understand impermanence. We know that clinging to outdated models—whether personal habits or business strategies—ultimately creates suffering. The companies that can release their attachment to fossil fuels and embrace the inevitable transition will likely thrive. Those that cling too tightly may find themselves obsolete.

There's also the deeper question of what we mean by prosperity and success. Our current economic model assumes infinite growth on a finite planet, which is simply impossible. Buddhist economics, as E.F. Schumacher called it, offers a different vision—one focused on well-being rather than endless accumulation.

The transition won't be easy, and it will require what economists call "creative destruction"—the painful but necessary process of old systems giving way to new ones. This is where the second quote I shared becomes relevant: "Liberation from ignorance is as painful as being born."

We're being asked to birth a new economic reality, and like all births, it involves both pain and incredible possibility. The question is whether we can stay present with that discomfort long enough to allow something genuinely new to emerge.

What the energy companies need—what we all need—is the courage to let go of what we think we know about how things must work and open to what might be possible.

And on a personal note, I want to create a consulting practice where I not only go through that transformation and shift you were talking about myself, but bring it to other people—mindfulness and things like that. Bring that out into the communities, like business communities.

Yes, how to bring both this understanding and then also bring these capacities and tools—mindfulness, compassion. Because as I said, I think that combination is extremely important. And so to be motivated to bring that combination into one's work is beautiful. That's what I'm really hoping to invoke.

What Bill McKibben is doing with 350.org is he is going to college campuses all over the country with the message that we have to take the same approach with fossil fuel companies as we did with South Africa. And that is divestment from stock and financial support for the fossil fuel companies, because they're determined to extract every last thing out of the environment. One very concrete way to try to alleviate that is—you know how Marin County is probably one of the richest counties in the state—imagine that many people may have mutual funds and equities. They may look at a mutual fund and realize, wow, I've got BP stock or Exxon and didn't even know it, and start putting pressure on them, as they're doing with universities, to divest from these stocks the way it was with South Africa. And that worked.

So really pointing to one strategy, which is based on seeing how the business plans of many or most fossil fuel companies are in conflict with not going beyond this two degrees Celsius rise, as we presently understand their plans. And so one of the responses would be, in terms of Joanna Macy's model, stopping further damage from happening would be to call for divestment from the stocks of these companies. And that's happening on hundreds of college campuses and can be done also with every institution. This would be part of the response, right? Because if all that's in there, as they calculate and research, if it comes out, it's game over. That's the end of it.

I think people just aren't willing to face it, because the economic impact—it's hard stuff.

Yes, so let me just repeat the comment for others listening: the analysis is that if those fossil fuels come out of the ground and are used, we go beyond the limits. And yet it comes up against these very powerful companies and comes up against really a lot of the economic rules of the game.

Maybe let other people speak who haven't yet.

I live and teach in Central Valley, which is also called the Valley of the Poor. It has one of the highest poverty rates. And I've been talking a lot about these issues in my classes, and I have a very difficult time sustaining myself—creating this us versus them, or getting out of that us versus them mentality. There's a lot of judgment involved that I'm personally trying to overcome in my life. I don't know quite where I'm going with this, but I guess that's why I'm here.

And I see a lot of the people around me—they do not have the problem that people in Mill Valley have, that they have the resources where they can divest. Rather, they are tied to the system where they have to work in the food industry, which is petrochemical. They have to work in the oil fields to feed their families. I'm not sure what I'm saying. I guess I'm saying—and I see this as a very—how do I reach people when I'm saying, this creates more problems the way we are. We are in this system. But there are livelihoods, and even just enough. I mean, I'm not talking about investing in the market. I'm talking about getting basic food on the table. Does that make sense?

Yes, so the comment raises a few different concerns. One is just about how to communicate these kinds of issues and these kinds of concerns in different settings, particularly in a setting where people are poor or working-class, less well-off maybe than in general than Marin County, and their work is fully, as it were, enmeshed in systems which are based on using petrochemicals, such as different kinds of agriculture and so forth.

And so I would identify at least two core issues there. One is something we're actually talking about quite a bit in some of our teacher discussions—just about how do we talk about this? For some people, coming to Spirit Rock or coming to a center is an attempt to find refuge from the world. And then if a teacher or someone else brings up a crisis, some people would feel, that wasn't the contract that I'm here for. I know that's not what you're saying. I was just connecting it to other issues.

And so how do we talk about this in a dharma setting? How do we talk about it with other people whose livelihood is dependent on the ongoing functioning of a system, and for whom a radical change could be very disorienting and there's not a clear sense of where to go? I think these are multiple issues—it's a large set of issues.

I think approaching the people who actually have power—as human beings and in time, in some way, they are going to realize that they're not immune from the effects of what's going to happen. And their children and grandchildren are not immune. Everyone's going to suffer if this goes on.

Right, exactly. The crucial point is that those who hold power must, if they truly look deeply, recognize they are caught in profound inner conflict. Their own actions are creating an unstable and often frightening world for their children and grandchildren. Have they genuinely examined this contradiction?

This could be a point of access—a way to reach them. When people are trapped in patterns that will ultimately undermine the wellbeing of their own families, there's a fundamental contradiction at work, a significant delusion that binds them.

This inner conflict, this cognitive dissonance between their actions and their love for their families, might be where genuine dialogue can begin. It's through this recognition of their own suffering, their own entrapment in systems that harm even those they love most, that awakening becomes possible.

The path forward requires both wisdom and compassion—wisdom to see clearly the interconnectedness of all our actions, and compassion for everyone caught in these cycles of harm, including those who seem to hold the power but are themselves imprisoned by the very systems they perpetuate.

Perhaps this is where the Dharma offers its deepest gift: the recognition that liberation is possible for all beings, and that our individual awakening is inseparable from the healing of our world.

CHAPTER 273

Dharma Practice and the Climate Crisis

Rob Burbea · 1h01

> In this Earth Day-inspired dharma talk, Rob Burbea addresses a dilemma many practitioners face: how to balance the compelling pull of deep spiritual practice with the urgent need to respond to climate change. Drawing from his recent four-week retreat experience, he explores whether these two paths are truly contradictory or can be integrated in a meaningful way.
>
> Burbea examines how core Buddhist principles—including dāna (generosity), karuṇā (compassion), and the understanding of interdependence—naturally call us to engage with the world's suffering. He references the examples of engaged contemplatives like Thích Nhất Hạnh, Thomas Merton, and Buddhadāsa, who found ways to combine deep practice with social engagement. The talk explores Joanna Macy's framework of "the great turning" and its three approaches: holding actions, shifting institutions, and transforming consciousness.
>
> The second half addresses how traditional activism often lacks the spiritual resources necessary for sustainable engagement, leading to burnout, self-righteousness, and infighting. Burbea argues that both inner development and outer engagement need each other—spiritual practice without engagement risks becoming privileged escapism, while activism without spiritual grounding tends toward reactivity and unsustainability. He concludes with practical reflections on finding one's own way to respond, honoring both the urgency of climate action and the wisdom of staying centered in love and awareness.

Last week I talked about being on retreat for four weeks and the beauty and the glories of going deeper into silence, exploring the nature of mind and heart and body, and some of my reflections and intentions coming out of that. This morning I want to talk about a theme that in a way seems to belong to another world from being on retreat. I'm inspired by Earth Day, and I want to talk about the relation of our dharma practice to responding to climate change and climate disruption. But I want to do this quite personally and in a way that I hope is not didactic or preachy, either to myself or to anyone else.

I'm doing this partly because I'm inspired for the Saturday event that I'm joining in with others. But I want to frame it initially as something like a dilemma, which I think many of us probably feel. I want to do this rather personally with myself.

On one hand, the practice of meditation is so compelling. For me, being on retreat for those four weeks—and I've probably collectively in my life been on retreat seven or eight years, maybe more, so I clearly value it, which is an understatement—there's something very precious about the experience of sustained meditation. Of course, we all experience this when we practice regularly in a way that's not as intensive, but still to practice for half an hour, to come to Spirit Rock, to be with the land.

The time on retreat, I talked about the beauty of living simply, of not having input, of being away from emails, of being just with the natural beauty. I talked about the qualities of renewal, of deeper insights. From a certain perspective, you could make the case that what else is there really to do in this life other than to develop wisdom and love and really to focus on it? Really to do that and to touch more deeply.

I talked about how I was deeply motivated to have my own daily life express a little more fully those qualities of simplicity and awareness and beauty and slowing down. Daily life for many of us, but maybe not for all of us, is fast moving, and it's often hard to remember our priorities.

When I came back—I've been back about two weeks—I noticed that I've really implemented a number of small ways to have more awareness in daily life. Some of it's just doing small practices. I stop. I'm not so busy. One of the secrets is that a lot of meditation teachers get very busy. True confession. We get busy. Scheduling retreats is really, really hard, knowing what to do. Sometimes we just think, "Oh my God, did I really schedule that? Three things in a row? Oh my God." My friend and colleague Gil Fronsdale once said, "Too much dharma is not dharma." Very interesting. So we get busy too. We do more retreats, and we have a perk that when we're teaching we get to meditate a lot, which is very nice in that way.

But I found that in really giving more attention to awareness in daily life, you know what I did less of? I didn't read the newspaper as much. I didn't listen to the radio, actually, almost at all in the last two weeks. I mean, I looked a little bit, I knew more or less the headlines, but I didn't do so much. I usually, in the past, most days, listened quite a bit to Democracy Now. Some of you listen to that program? Very wonderful. A little more focused on the problems than the solutions, but that's okay. I found myself not doing that so much. I wasn't intending not to do it in the future, but it just was to have that space to bring in these changes. It took something like that.

So, very compelling. Dharma could seem like this is what I want to do. Forget about the world, right? Or just be a little bit in the world. It's a very compelling vision. I feel deeply drawn to have more awareness in daily life and to develop more wisdom and love.

And then...

There's the question of responding to climate change. It could be other issues—violence, racism, whatever it might be. But in a way, we could say that responding to climate change may be the defining issue of the current generation. We could really say that.

I've personally also been deeply drawn to understand and help be part of the response to that issue. In the past, I've done several workshops on that theme with colleagues. One colleague, Sarah Shedler, worked with Friends of the Earth on climate issues, and we did a day-long workshop together. It's been a consistent theme.

I've been attending the meetings of the Berkeley Climate Action Coalition, which is quite inspiring. It's really open to anyone. The United Nations said that the Berkeley Climate Plan may be a model for all of North America. There is a very clear plan which is being acted on to cut greenhouse gas emissions by 33% by 2020 and 80% by 2050. So beautiful plan.

And we could see that this is so compelling. This is the future of the earth. There's a very clear scientific consensus—we might say 97% of climate scientists agree—that we have major problems, that there have been significant shifts already.

There was an article that maybe some of you read by Bill McKibben a few months ago. I think it was in August in Rolling Stone. It's become a famous article. He was clearer than usual, saying that in June in the United States, there were 3,215 records for cities for highest temperature in a month. You could go on like that, assemble the facts, but it's very clear that things are actually happening more quickly than scientists thought. It's dire, and it's more dire in some places than others. It's actually most dire, as we know, in countries that have not caused the problem.

There's this pressing need to radically shift behavior. Some scientists say we need to cut greenhouse gas emissions by as much as 80% by 2020. That's quite hard to imagine happening. But yet on the bright side, the solutions are actually very, very clear. It doesn't take much thinking to know what to do.

There are some excellent books out there. Some of you may know Lester Brown's work. He has a very clear model for how to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 80% by 2020. He says it would cost 200 billion a year, which is way less than the defense budgets of so many countries. So it's very possible, and he has a clear analysis of increasing energy efficiency and conservation in a number of ways.

A key to it is taxing carbon emissions—most people say that—and shifting from fossil fuels to renewable energy. There are all sorts of actions that come under these categories: stabilizing the population, eradicating poverty. Poverty, as social scientists tell us, is one of the major reasons for population increase and thus greater resource use. Restoring the earth and feeding people in a different way.

So it's completely doable. How to resolve the problem is completely doable. Intelligent people have thought about it, know what to do, and yet governments aren't acting—or they're acting minimally, or they're acting more in some countries than in others. Our country is not acting much. Some cities are acting, like Berkeley and others.

We have this challenging situation where it's really the fate of the earth. If the warming continues unabated, it will be horrifying for future generations in a number of ways. If it isn't changed, there will be resource wars, there will be probably millions and maybe even billions of refugees.

We know... I think those scenarios—we probably live with them in an unconscious way inside, so we know that.

Bill McKibben says if 10% of us are deeply passionate about this and change our lifestyles and have fuel-efficient cars and act impeccably with recycling, not much will change. But if 10 or 15% of us are active, along with the good lifestyle, and actually act to shift the systems, he says everything will change.

So it's kind of a call. Do you want to be part of the 10 or 15% who help shift the world to a sustainable course?

So again, very compelling. Incredibly compelling. What—who wants to meditate all the time when the world's at stake, right?

So do you see the dilemma? If you just came in, I presented the dilemma. On the one hand, the spiritual life and just seeking personal peace and just getting one's life somewhat together. It's such an important pursuit, right? We heard there are challenges. We have personal challenges. Our family members have challenges just to be helpful, to have more love, more wisdom. Sometimes they say that's a full-time pursuit, right?

And then, on the other hand, the world's in great need.

So what do we do? How do you work with that dilemma? Do you choose one way or do you choose the other way?

And so the answer is what? The answer is do both. Do both and connect them. And I'll say more about that because I don't at all mean that everyone needs to be an activist. And I'll get to that. So I just wanted to say that initially.

But how to respond to that kind of dilemma of the power of inner transformation and bringing that out into one's life on the one hand, and then the really dire need for caring people to be part of a deep response right now. How do you work with that? And I think, I mean, I'm sure each of us at times grapples with that. It's really very, very urgent.

And I thought of Thich Nhat Hanh, the Vietnamese teacher who was in Vietnam as a monk, being in the monasteries with the traditional training at the time of deep social need—war and civil war in Vietnam. And this is what he said. This is the, as it were, the both-and response.

He said, "When I was in Vietnam, so many of our villages were being bombed. Along with my monastic brothers and sisters, I had to decide what to do. Should we continue to practice in our monasteries, or should we leave the meditation halls in order to help the people who were suffering under the bombs? After careful reflection, we decided to do both—to go out and help people and to do so in mindfulness. We called it engaged Buddhism. Mindfulness must be engaged. Once there is seeing, there must be acting. We must be aware of the real problems of the world. Then with mindfulness, we will know what to do and what not to do to be of help."

And we can see that in the lives of other deep contemplatives, that they came to something like that approach. And they did it in their own ways. Some of you know the life of Thomas Merton, who was a lifelong contemplative in a monastery in Kentucky at the Abbey of Gethsemane. And he had been an activist before he became a monk. Some of you know—you've read The Seven Storey Mountain. And he kept that consciousness even when he was in the monastery, even when he was a hermit. And some of you may know that a lot of the Catholic activists used to visit him. The Berrigans, people used to write to him. And he, in some ways, even though he stayed in the monastery, he stayed connected. So he did it in his own way. It wasn't like he had to do it in someone else's way.

He brought this consciousness into his writing, exploring moral responsibility and larger social issues as a monk living his final years as a hermit in the forest. Buddhadasa, the great Thai teacher, followed a very similar path in Thailand. People would come to visit him, and he wrote extensively about connecting the Dhamma to social concerns. He was someone who maintained a lifelong meditation practice even in situations of urgency, and he found his own ways to honor both contemplative depth and engaged response.

I think of Dorothy Day, whose story follows a remarkably similar pattern. A person called to religious faith who found ways to combine spiritual practice with social action. Or Aung San Suu Kyi of Burma. There are these luminous figures—perhaps someone like Gandhi as well—who discovered ways to do both. I think much of this comes down to recognizing where one's gifts lie and finding authentic ways to help.

I think often of Joanna Macy's work—she'll be one of the teachers present on Saturday. She teaches about what she calls "the great turning," essentially the transition to a sustainable world. It's a beautiful vision, a compelling picture of what that transformation might look like.

She describes three main ways that the great turning occurs, and I invite you to listen for where you feel drawn. Some people, she says, must engage in what she calls "holding actions" to prevent further damage. This is traditionally the province of activism—stopping additional harm from occurring. Some people are called to this essential work.

Others are called to help shift basic institutions toward greater sustainability, toward ways of operating that embody more dharma. These are people working in the helping professions who bring different perspectives to their work, those shifting children's education to include more teaching about sustainability, those transforming the medical profession, creating farmers' markets, developing community agriculture. All of these institutional shifts represent profoundly significant work.

So where are we called? The third pathway involves shifting consciousness itself. This transformation happens through developing different approaches to parenting, to education. It might mean teaching yoga while exploring the parallels between earth and body. It could involve teaching meditation to cultivate greater sensitivity not only to ourselves but to the earth. All of these practices form part of this essential work, because what truly needs to shift is an entire way of being—a complete transformation in how we exist on this earth.

What I want to explore further is how dharma practice necessarily engages with this transformation, and how those seeking to create change need dharma practice. Without this integration, there tend to be significant distortions. This is what I want to examine for the remainder of our time together.

We want to discover our own gifts. I often share that beautiful quotation from Howard Thurman, which feels particularly relevant here: "Don't ask what the world needs. Ask what makes you come alive, because what the world needs is those who have come alive."

Where are my gifts? Where am I called in ways that connect with this vast need for transformation and that also connect with dharma practice? Sometimes we must listen deeply to discern what that calling might be.

I want to acknowledge, from personal experience, that there are natural cycles to this work. Sometimes we're drawn more inward, sometimes more outward.

There are cycles where I've chosen not to engage with social issues for two or three years, focusing primarily on the inner work. At other times, I've felt called to bring this practice outward into the world more actively. We also experience developmental cycles where we're genuinely called to focus on our own personal healing, to cultivate a little more peace, or to work through something specific—and these periods need to be honored.

This is really about respecting where we are in our own journeys while asking ourselves: Am I called to help in some way? I'm posing this question for myself as well, because I'm definitely more engaged with the meditative aspects these days than the response side, even though teaching can be part of that outward expression. So I'm genuinely asking myself these same questions. These are inquiries for all of us.

For the remainder of our time together, I want to make two key points. First, that dharma practice needs engagement to be mature and complete. Second, that these two aspects—inner development and outer engagement—desperately need each other. People who want to help shift the world need spiritual practice, for without it their efforts tend to become distorted. Similarly, our spiritual practice, without some sense of how we engage with larger issues, may also become distorted.

I also want to return to some core principles, because I believe responses develop beautifully from our foundational practices of kindness, generosity, compassion, interdependence, wisdom, and so forth.

But there's a real danger that our meditation practice will become limited and privileged. When I was in Thailand and attended meetings of the International Network of Engaged Buddhists, many of the Thai leaders in that movement expressed concern about the future of Buddhist practice in the United States and the West generally. They feared it would become a form of middle-class escape from the world's problems—a luxury practice for those seeking a little more peace in a difficult world, available only to the already privileged.

Cultural critic Slavoj Žižek from former Yugoslavia has made some provocative observations along these lines. He's become something of an iconoclastic philosopher whose talks resemble rock concerts, complete with Yugoslav accent. He makes strong statements, including this one about Western Buddhism: he fears it's becoming "the hegemonic ideology of global capitalism" because "its meditative stance is arguably the most efficient way for us to fully participate in capitalist dynamics while retaining the appearance of mental sanity."

According to Žižek, "Western Buddhism enables you to fully participate in the frantic pace of the capitalist game while sustaining the perception that you are not really in it, that you are well aware of how worthless this spectacle is, and that what really matters to you is the peace of the inner self to which you know you can always withdraw."

I don't necessarily agree with this assessment, but it's a pointed critique that raises important questions about how we use our practice and how we relate to the world's needs.

I think a more constructive approach is recognizing that the core principles of our practice naturally call us, as we deepen, to respond to others and help them. This is what we've explored extensively as the path of the bodhisattva—one who works for personal well-being while also helping others come to greater freedom.

There's a beautiful passage from poet Gary Snyder, who lives near Nevada City in California, that captures this integration: "Historically, Buddhist philosophers have failed to analyze out the degree to which ignorance and suffering are caused or encouraged by social factors, considering fear and desire to be givens of the human condition. Institutional Buddhism has been conspicuously ready to accept or ignore the inequalities and tyrannies of whatever political system it found itself under."

He continues: "The mercy of the West has been social revolution. The mercy of the East has been individual insight into the basic self void. We need both. They are both contained in the traditional three aspects of the Dharma path: wisdom, meditation, and ethics or morality."

Snyder defines these beautifully: "Wisdom is intuitive knowledge of the mind of love and clarity that lies beneath one's own ego-driven anxieties and aggressions. Meditation is going into this mind to see this for yourself over and over again until it becomes the mind you live in—until love and wisdom become the mind you live in. Ethics or morality is bringing it back out in the way you live through personal example and responsible action, ultimately towards the true community or sangha of all beings."

He wrote this in 1961—quite a prescient statement about the both-and approach we need.

Reflecting on how our core principles call us to respond, I see that this integration could easily become a much longer exploration...

For example, I was talking this morning over breakfast with Steve Armstrong, who's teaching the retreat up above, and we were talking about generosity. Generosity is dana, the first of the paramis, the first of the virtues we develop traditionally. This is really about giving—ultimately, it's about giving one's life. But it's also about asking, how much is enough? What can I offer?

I think this connects with the ethical precept of not taking that which is not given. Are we taking what actually belongs to future generations? Are we acting in a way that impacts them? If we want to be generous to future generations and give them the same kinds of opportunities we have, we would want to make sure that their lives have the right conditions to prosper. That comes out of a sense of generosity. It can come out of a sense of interdependence—that we are connected, that we are responsible.

The core ethical idea is that my actions matter, that there is karma, that my actions have impact. When we are collectively using resources in a way that has negative impact on future generations, we want to know that. If we want to live ethically, we want to know that. We want to be caring. We want to live according to the precepts of not taking that which is not given. We want to be generous—not just to future generations, but to people in other countries.

We know that people in the U.S. consume 25% of the resources of the world, and we have about 5% of the population. I also saw that each U.S. citizen, on average, is responsible for 55,000 pounds of carbon emissions a year through our ordinary activities. In Germany, it's 27,000, and in Sweden it's 15,000—because they do things differently and probably have a more abundant lifestyle than we do in terms of the average level.

If we are collectively acting in ways that impact the future, isn't that something to consider in terms of our core principles of compassion, of generosity, of interdependence, of being aware of things, of wanting to respond to the suffering of others? If our actions collectively in the West have caused climate issues, which are more acutely felt probably in Asia and Africa right now than in the U.S.—although more recently in the U.S.—isn't there an imperative for us collectively to respond, to change?

Part of our dharma practice is having a sense of the causes and conditions. How does this arise? What's the relationship between my actions and other things happening? We want to know that. We want to be more attuned to it. We want to act—again, the core principle of our ethics is non-harming. We do not want our lives to harm others. It's an aspiration. And so any of these principles, if we go into them more deeply, are a basis for wanting to have some energy to collectively shift.

There are many ways that we can personally shift. On Saturday, I'm going to particularly reflect on how Spirit Rock might become more aligned with this. I think the primary hard issue is transportation. So would the Wednesday morning group be willing to do more carpooling? Some of it comes down to this. Would you be willing to do more carpooling to help reduce the carbon footprint of Spirit Rock? Because ultimately something like that's collectively going to be necessary.

At certain times in our history, there was collective mobilization towards a great cause. World War II was like that after Pearl Harbor. An entire country totally mobilized. People shifted their lives. They did things. People grew victory gardens. Women went to work. Industries shifted to help the larger cause, and something like that may be necessary now. How to be part of that, how to do that—these are the questions we face.

So I think that all of our core Dharma principles, and also very significantly the meditative training that helps us to be aware of what's there in our minds and when there's reactivity, and when there is also to see more deeply into our conditioning—some of the conditioning may be, if there are aspects of privilege, more subtle, or to see how much am I attached to certain levels of comfort. I saw that a lot when I traveled in Asia, and particularly the former Soviet Union, which is actually way harder than Asia. I've talked about that—the lack of Western toilet paper. Big issue! But again, I don't think it's about deprivation, but it's just about what are we called to do? What are we called to do?

And the other side of that is, I think, that the current models of how change comes about, particularly traditional models, current models of activism, are woefully inadequate. I don't think they're going to work. The model of confrontational activism, of blaming and judging, demonizing the enemy—it tends to alienate quite a large part of the population. So I think a whole new model of how change occurs has to come into being.

What are some of the problems with this traditional model of activism, which, of course, has its merits? I'm not demonizing it or wanting to dump on it. But let me name a few ways. These are probably very familiar.

It can be incredibly self-righteous, as if everyone's not part of the problem. There can be attachment to views, possibly. It goes along with the self-righteousness—attachment to views. There can be lack of skill with difficult emotions, being caught up in anger, for example, not working skillfully with anger. Having anger fuel a movement has its limits. It can be demonization of the enemy, lack of creating what Dr. King called the beloved community. There can be, because people aren't also taking care of themselves, burnout. People often don't take care of themselves and even think that taking care of oneself is wrong. Perhaps you've met people like that.

I remember when I was in college and I was an activist and I had friends who thought it was a waste of time to go to a movie. Things get a little extreme in college sometimes, but who felt guilty doing that. And I've talked with present-day people who work—sometimes there's a certain culture of that in some circles. Burnout happens. Often people get burned out by being with difficulty or not having the success they want, and they start blaming.

When I went in 2005 to a conference on spiritual activism, I asked people what they mostly needed to learn, and they said, "We need to work with anger. We so often turn on each other." Infighting among activist groups is a huge issue, big problem.

So think about this: attachment to views, lack of skill with difficult emotions, demonization of others, blaming, judging, lack of taking care of oneself, difficulty of being with difficult situations. Where are they going to learn these things, how to do them better? In the home initially, but basically in exactly what we're doing here. Isn't that interesting? I just named those—that's the list of topics we talked about. Working skillfully with difficult emotions, not being attached to views, being mindful of our own reactivity, looking into our conditioning, taking care of oneself, having compassion for self as well as others.

So that's very significant for me. I think that there has to be this marriage, or it's not going to work. And it really is actually sowing the seeds of a culture where we connect inner and outer together. For me, there's a very inspiring vision of these coming together which I want to be part of and I want to help come into being.

So let me just finish by summarizing a little bit. I think that there's a danger that spiritual practice, when it's not connected in some ways to the urgent needs of the world, can become distorted. Again, allowing for the cycles of being—times when we really need to focus primarily in an inner way. And that can be several years. That's been that way for me. So it can be distorted.

There's also the danger that we don't recognize the world is actually within us—that we take in the world and carry it inside ourselves.

For those who feel called to work directly in the world, there's a profound need to develop spiritual resources. Without the inner foundations of compassion, equanimity, balance, and the ability to see and work skillfully with our reactive mind, the overwhelming nature of global challenges becomes unbearable. People simply won't be able to sustain their efforts without these spiritual underpinnings.

This points to a very natural and beautiful connection between inner work and outer engagement. This is a large vision—one that might guide us for the next fifty, seventy, or one hundred years.

Personally, I believe it comes down to looking deeply within and asking: Where am I called? You wouldn't be here tonight unless you were called to deepen in love, wisdom, and compassion. Many of us are already acting in the world in various ways, but the question remains: How do we work with this calling authentically? Where do we fit within Joanna Macy's three dimensions of engaged response?

This means we must find our own way, our own voice. Our engagement might be directly on the front lines, or perhaps in quieter ways—cultivating community gardens, supporting educational systems for children, or countless other forms of service. The key is discerning where we're genuinely called: helping to prevent further damage, working to shift institutions, or focusing on changing consciousness in ourselves and others.

I want to end with a short poem by Deena Metzger that I love, though I'll have to recite it from memory:

The world is on fire.
We are in danger.
There is no time not to love.
There is no time to rush.

I may not have it exactly right, but the essence captures something essential: there is genuine urgency, and yet it's possible to stay rooted in the present moment, to avoid rushing frantically or having our heads on fire. We can remain centered in love, awareness, and wisdom even as we engage with the world's pain. This is her way of holding both the urgency and the peace.

Let me invite us to sit quietly for a few moments before we continue.

Thank you for your generous attention. I know that sometimes when we come to dharma talks, we're seeking peaceful reflection, and suddenly—oh my goodness—here comes the world again! I'm aware of this tension, and it really does embody the dilemma I've been exploring tonight. So thank you for your patience and willingness to engage with these questions.

Any reflections or thoughts you'd like to share?

"I was wondering what organizations you'd recommend for people wanting to get involved?"

The beautiful thing about climate action is that we can respond meaningfully at every level. We can make significant impact right in our own households, and then expand to city-wide initiatives. Berkeley, for example, has developed a remarkable Climate Action Plan that's both comprehensive and precise. They've clearly analyzed where greenhouse gas emissions originate—transportation, housing, and waste being the three primary areas—and created specific pathways for reduction.

There's tremendous potential for household-level action. I brought along this wonderful book called Low Carbon Diet—it's a thirty-day program designed to help you "lose 5,000 pounds." That's 5,000 pounds of carbon emissions, which is significant when you consider that the average American household produces 55,000 pounds annually. The book offers simple, practical steps that anyone can follow.

Organizations like the Ecology Center here in Berkeley provide excellent support for this kind of household-level engagement, offering resources and community for people wanting to reduce their environmental impact in concrete, manageable ways.

Then there's the community level, city level. You can be part of a city that adopts a plan very much like Berkeley's. It's a beautiful plan that's out there on the web, and many Bay Area communities are already implementing similar initiatives. Marin has adopted this approach, and Spirit Rock has embraced green energy. We know that all of the electricity and resources we use here come from the Marine Energy Authority. While there are some challenges with it, it's essentially a sustainable model of energy use.

Cities can accomplish meaningful change, and at the national and international levels, the work becomes more complex. I like to think that ultimately, the personal and community or citywide levels become the foundation for these larger transformations. They go hand in hand - it's not an either-or proposition.

I have a handout I'd be happy to share with you, which I prepared for a workshop some time ago. It lists numerous organizations doing excellent work. I particularly appreciate Bill McKibben's work with 350.org. Lester Brown, connected with the World Watch Institute in Washington, D.C., has written books that lay out complete solutions. It's not hard to imagine, and it's all doable. The challenging part is getting there.

This is the truly promising aspect of our situation. The solutions are achievable - it's more a matter of political will and being willing to act in ways that challenge the power of energy companies. There's a political dimension here, as energy companies are closely aligned with politicians. This creates a challenging dynamic.

Organizations like 350.org, Greenpeace, and Al Gore's climate leader training program are doing exceptional work. Gore's training happens once or twice yearly and is making a real impact. This Saturday, nine organizations will be present, offering comprehensive resources.

From Buddhist perspectives, there's wonderful work being done. A few years ago, my friend David Loy co-edited "Buddhist Responses to the Climate Emergency," which I believe is available in the bookstore. It provides an excellent summary and includes many meaningful statements. There's also a valuable resource called the Forum on Religion and Ecology, which shares relevant information and focuses on the intersection between spirituality and ecological responses, particularly climate change.

In the Bay Area, there's an organization called Green Sangha that undertakes various projects, including offering household audits.

Someone asked about handling conflicting data and views within the movement. For example, one school of thought advocates that a vegan diet will save the most carbon, while the Organic Consumers Association suggests that pasturing animals as our ancestors did is actually more effective. How do we work with these differences among people moving in the same direction?

First, we want to apply our practice of working skillfully with views - to not be attached to our positions. So all those people should come on Wednesday morning! But seriously, there are numerous intersections here, and I've facilitated several retreats specifically for activists.

And we should do more of that maybe here. Because a certain number of people really love that. It's a relief to really not be so caught in views and anger and so forth. So that's the first point.

But I think that my sense of it, without knowing a lot of it in detail, is that the area of disagreement in the big picture is relatively minor. On those issues.

Well, it's just an example. I just wondered if there were an established process or practice, or people who really made it their work to sort out conflicting approaches or enable people to hold the possibility of different truths.

I think that's important, because the big causes of greenhouse gases are other than the ones you've mentioned. And I hope that there can be—I think people have to be trained in not being attached to views. And then of course, people can do research on those issues to help clarify. But I think there are different views on that particular issue, as there would be on quite a few. But I think the larger agreements are the important ones. That would be my perspective on that.

I belong to the Marine Green Sangha, and I really enjoy it. And then we also have some very interesting guest speakers that come every week and speak. So if you're looking for something like that, it's on Sunday morning from 10 to 1, the second Sunday of the month.

Yes, I think feeling connected on these issues is important. You know, it could be in one's block or neighborhood or something. I mean, there's a lot of creativity demanded, and leadership as well. Because it's—I don't know about you, but many of us are very busy, right? And it's like, "Oh my God, climate change as well as my..." It's a little bit like the mentality—remember that t-shirt that had a cartoon of a woman saying, during the anti-nuclear war movement, "There goes my career."

I think we have to be very humble about our inner contradictions.

Can you say just a few words about how to not be discouraged? That's a great question.

Well, for one thing, I think generally it's like a lot of our practice. The core structure of practice in general is being willing to look at difficult stuff and then also spending a certain amount of time in beautiful states. If we only worked with our own suffering, we get burned out—in meditation as well as in other areas.

When I work with people on transforming the judgmental mind, which is hard stuff personally, it's very clear that there's a balance between going into the judgmental mind, which tends to be painful and difficult. When you go deeper, you get into hard stuff—sometimes old patterns that come out of difficult childhood material and so forth. It's important to do that, but it's also important to really touch base with loving kindness, with beautiful states, to feel one's own beauty—especially if self-judgment's the issue—to really be away from the judgmental mind and touch the beauty and touch the wonderful qualities.

And I think this is interesting in terms of how change occurs. Does change occur more by defeating the bad stuff or the hard stuff, or does it happen more by touching the good stuff and connecting with that more and more? A lot of times, I think historically, when you look at it, it's more the latter. I think personally it's often more the latter.

Once, Heather Sundberg and I were talking at a seven-day retreat on transforming the judgmental mind, and we asked, "Have you transformed your judgmental mind more by actually going into it, hanging out with it, doing the hard work, or just actually shifting more to more beautiful states of confidence and beauty and wisdom and love?" And we had to say, well, maybe the latter actually. The first—you have to be willing to do that. It's important. You can't run from that.

And so I think, for me, that suggests a model. And that's part of what's missing in traditional activism. It's almost entirely focused on, "Here are the problems." Here are the problems. And it's natural, if you just focus on the problems and haven't found so many recent successes, it's very easy to get discouraged.

So I think focusing on the positive is essential. This is what Gandhi understood deeply. Yes, there was the campaign to oust the British, but something that's not often well known is that he had what he called the constructive program, which was about truly transforming India in a particular way. This is where the focus was on village agriculture, economics—this is where he had the weaving and spinning wheels. That was very much a central focus.

Generally speaking, I would focus on the positive and be careful about dwelling too much on the negative. Watch your mind. Watch your mind telling negative stories. Watch other people telling negative stories that impact you.

Ultimately, my own confidence comes from my faith in the human spirit and from what I know directly, personally, experientially—which is that love and wisdom are deeper than suffering. That's the root faith that would keep me going through almost anything, because I know that. That's a fruit of practice: to know that more and more, to know that no matter what anyone tells you, no matter what your experience is, no matter what difficulties arise, this is deeper. This is deeper. And of course, as one rests in that more and more, it becomes increasingly unshakable. We call that equanimity.

So personally, explore your own depths more and more until you know your own depths in a way that gives you a clear sense of what are the roots of suffering and confusion—which are part of the crisis, part of the roots of this global crisis. What are the roots of that in our own minds? How do we understand that? And is there something deeper than that? I think we get a clear answer that there is something deeper. And so we have to know that. We have to study all of this.

How does suffering occur? We have to understand. We have to look out at the world and have dharma eyes. That's why I say look out at the world and see it through the eyes of your own practice. That becomes like a protection—a protection against discouragement. And then you have to work with it, work with people like Joanna Macy and all these beautiful practices to work with that issue in particular.

So again, thank you for your patience. I realize this is challenging material at times, sometimes troubling and upsetting. But I think we have a commitment with practice to look at reality, as skillfully as we can, and to respond.

So thank you again. And may our time together be of benefit to others.

CHAPTER 274

The Four Noble Truths of Responding to Climate Change

Rob Burbea · 1h06

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea frames our response to climate change through the Buddha's core teaching of the Four Noble Truths, offering both sobering scientific reality and hopeful spiritual guidance. Drawing on the traditional physician model that inspired the Buddha's framework—identifying the problem, its causes, the possibility of healing, and the path forward—Burbea presents climate change as humanity's greatest collective challenge requiring both outer action and inner transformation.
>
> The first two truths examine the 'bad news': the reality of accelerating climate disruption and its roots in both systemic causes (fossil fuel dependency, consumerist culture, economic inequality) and the classical Buddhist poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion manifesting collectively. The third and fourth truths offer the 'good news': the genuine possibility of transformation to a sustainable, just world, and the specific practices—personal, community, and political—needed to realize this vision.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that our meditation practice provides essential resources for this work: the capacity to be present with difficult emotions like climate grief, to act from compassion rather than reactivity, and to maintain hope amid uncertainty. He encourages practitioners to see climate action as ethical practice (sīla), noting Thich Nhat Hanh's expanded interpretation of the first precept to include protecting 'people, animals, plants, and minerals.' This talk integrates Buddhist wisdom with practical guidance, offering both spiritual framework and concrete steps for engaging this defining challenge of our time.

This morning I want to continue the exploration of ethical practice. We began that last time with looking more generally at the place of ethics in our practice. We took the ethical precepts last time together. And for those here for the first time, all of the sessions here are recorded and are available on the website dharmaseed.org.

So we explored in some depth this sense of living ethically. It really is about how do we live with integrity, particularly with the challenges of life, the difficulties—individual, relational, in our communities, in our world. How do we live a life of integrity?

Lines from the Buddha from close to 2600 years ago: "One who is virtuous and wise shines forth like a blazing fire." And there can really be tremendous inspiration. Last time, I particularly encouraged us to not take the ethical dimension of our lives for granted. Sometimes we think, "I'm basically, as my sister says, a good human being, good person. And I don't hurt others too much. And I don't lie and steal too much. And basically, okay, you know, I'm here for meditation. I'm here for peace and bliss."

And those are wonderful intentions, but last time I tried to suggest that the ethical dimension of our lives actually is one where there can be very deep practice. It's a challenging form. Traditionally, there was this close relationship between ethical practice, our meditation, and our cultivation of wisdom. Those are traditionally the three areas of training. And last time in particular, I tried to point to the ways that ethical practice really is important in all the parts of our lives and not just, as we often think, in my personal interactions, my face-to-face behavior.

And I suggested that some of the ethical forms of practice at certain times in history actually involve our relationship to larger collective issues. We could imagine, you know, maybe being in the South in the 1940s or 50s, the ethical issue of racism and injustice might be very central for anyone living in that time. And we could look at other ways that the large-scale ethical issues really are very central. And I think that's true in our time.

But even in the time of the Buddha, the understanding of ethical practice, as I emphasized quite a bit last time, has a larger dimension than the face-to-face behavior and really has to do with how we relate to all around us and how we relate to others' behavior that might be harmful. From the Buddha also, "Non-harming is the distinguishing mark of Dhamma," or the path—to live a life of non-harming. And as I mentioned last time, he also understood that as not letting others harm. So it wasn't just what I do, but it's also what happens in my community and in my world.

An updated version of this from the Vietnamese teacher Thich Nhat Hanh: "Aware of the suffering caused by the destruction of life, I vow to cultivate compassion and learn ways to protect the lives of people, animals, plants, and minerals." This is Thich Nhat Hanh's restatement of the first ethical precept, that of non-harming. He goes on, "I'm determined not to kill, not to let others kill, and not to condone any act of killing in the world, in my thinking and in my way of life."

And so today, I want to particularly connect this with our relation to the earth—to, again, this large issue that is right there for all of us, which is how do we relate to the growing destruction of the world's ecosystems, and particularly related to climate change. I thought I'd read first some of the statement which I got from the Spirit Rock website about Earth Care Week: "Earth Care Week is an opportunity to come together with our Sangha to both celebrate the natural world and address the major environmental issues of our time, including climate change."

And so, this morning, I want to talk about that ethical response and particularly focus on the issue of climate change, which I've talked about from time to time over the last few years. And I want to frame it in terms of the core teaching of the Four Noble Truths. So we could call this talk the Four Noble Truths of Responding to Climate Change. And it gives a valuable framework.

The Four Noble Truths, probably most or all of you know, is perhaps the core teaching of the Buddha. He identified what he took to be four truths. The truth that there is suffering. The truth that there is a cause of suffering. The truth that there is a way out of suffering, and the fourth truth that there is a path to transform suffering. We could say that the first two truths are about the nature and roots of suffering, and the third and fourth are about the nature and roots of freedom. This is a core teaching.

Interestingly, the original model of the Four Noble Truths, as far as I know from my study, actually was modeled after the typical kind of physician model for diagnosis in ancient India, which is very commonsensical. It's: what's the problem? What's the cause of the problem? What's the solution? And how do we get to the solution?

It's a very simple way to see the Four Noble Truths. Many people have applied this framework to various issues in this way. Ajahn Buddhadasa and a number of teachers in Southeast Asia have sometimes taken the Four Noble Truths into broader frameworks.

So I want to talk about the Four Noble Truths of climate change. I have a PowerPoint presentation for this—this is one of my early PowerPoint presentation dharma talks.

This is an overview of the Four Noble Truths of Responding to Climate Change. I want to express gratitude to three people who have deeply influenced this presentation. One is Bob Doppelt, who has been a key figure in bringing together dharma teachers around the issue of climate change, based in Oregon. He was very kind to let me use some of his slides, and I've taken many of them. Some I've modified slightly, but much of this material comes from Bob.

I've also benefited from Bhikkhu Bodhi, who has his own version of the Four Noble Truths related to climate change, which I've learned from tremendously. My approach is somewhat different, but his insights have been invaluable.

I also want to thank Sarah Shadler, who I worked with for several years and who now lives in Massachusetts. She worked for many years with Friends of the Earth in San Francisco. About four years ago, we offered a full day in Santa Cruz devoted to practice and climate change, and I have benefited from her insights and some of the material we developed together.

We start with the first two truths, which I could call the bad news. This is the most serious issue facing us—possibly a 3.5 Celsius temperature rise by 2035—and it will increase all other problems. There is a huge gap, as most of us know, between the scientific reality and the political response. Everyone is being and will be affected. We all will be dealing with this for the rest of our lives, and humans will deal with this for the next few hundred years.

The good news—these are the third and fourth noble truths. In our practice we often face the bad news first and then get to the good news. There is cause for optimism. There is a great opportunity for transformation—economically, ecologically, socially, and spiritually—toward a sustainable and just world. There's tremendous potential, and many people are connecting the dots.

Secondly, we actually have the knowledge, skills, and technology to reduce warming to manageable levels. People know what to do. It's not technically difficult at all, though it would require great mobilization. The challenge is political and social, not technical.

Third, tremendous progress is underway. Rapid positive changes could occur with the right efforts.

Let me take us through the four noble truths individually, and then we'll have time for discussion.

The first noble truth calls us to look honestly at the nature of the problem. In our practice, the first noble truth invites us to look carefully at the nature of suffering as it appears in our individual experience, our relational experience, and in the world.

In the Buddha's teaching, it wasn't just about examining the different truths, but there were tasks connected with each truth. The Buddha said that the truth of suffering needs to be understood—embraced or entered into. This is not easy to do. We don't look at suffering from a distance; we enter into it.

Here, the realities of climate change must be understood. Some of this will be familiar, but for some of you, much of this may be new territory.

So first, let us examine the basic physics of climate change. This is the well-known greenhouse effect: incoming solar radiation strikes the Earth, and infrared radiation radiates outward from the Earth's surface. When greenhouse gases—particularly increased CO2 in the environment—are present, this outgoing radiation is absorbed. It's as simple as that. The infrared radiation becomes trapped in the Earth's atmosphere and reflects back to Earth, and the process accelerates. More radiation is trapped in our environment, and the Earth grows warmer. It's as simple as that—not particularly profound physics.

For the last 10,000 years, the Earth's temperature has remained relatively stable. This stability has allowed civilization to develop. You can see this temperature stability since the last ice age. While there is much detail in the scientific data, the basic picture shows relative stability for the last 10,000 years—which is changing now. We are altering a 10,000-year pattern.

We know that global temperature correlates with CO2 levels. When there is more CO2, temperatures rise. The data shows parts per million of CO2 and how it has accelerated tremendously in the last fifty years after relative stability. We are familiar with these numbers—350 parts per million, 400 parts per million. Today we are over 400 and rising rapidly. This represents the highest concentration of carbon in three million years, and it has happened extraordinarily quickly.

We have seen a large increase since World War II—a total increase of close to one degree Celsius so far, with most of it occurring in the last two decades. Emissions have risen 61% since around 1990. The evidence appears consistently in our headlines: 2007 was the second warmest year, 2008 the eighth warmest, 2010 tied for warmest on record, and 2012 became the warmest year in U.S. history. Things are changing rapidly, and they are moving in one direction.

Here we see Arctic sea ice change between 1979 and 2007—roughly 39% less ice in the Arctic by 2007. This represents a total area five times the size of the United Kingdom lost in terms of ice. Again, this is not attributable to the sun or other non-human factors. Virtually all scientists agree this results from human activity.

The data comparing observed changes in surface temperature with the sun's energy output shows solar energy remaining fairly constant while temperatures have not remained constant at all.

There exists virtual consensus about virtually everything I have mentioned so far. Some say 95%, some say 97% of active climate scientists agree on all of this.

Where is this leading? We have almost a one-degree Celsius rise, and the target aimed for by various international climate organizations is not to exceed two degrees Celsius. But two degrees Celsius—the political figure around which there is agreement—remains very dangerous. There have already been major impacts with less than one degree. The political agreement people are aiming for is actually quite dangerous. One degree would be safest, but is now impossible. 1.5 degrees may be the best target to aim for, as many suggest.

The impacts at two degrees Celsius affect all aspects of our life: water, ecosystems, food, coastlines, health, and other systems. Profound effects occur even approaching two degrees. We can see this vulnerability already—while we cannot know with certainty about the drought in California, we know we are extremely vulnerable to droughts. There is profound vulnerability around water and different effects on ecosystems. The global food supply is extraordinarily vulnerable, and there are numerous health issues as well.

There are also significant justice issues. We know the effects of climate change are not borne equally. Generally speaking, the people and places that caused the problem experience far less impact than others in the world. Climate change has much greater impact on what we call the global South, creating major issues of justice and equity that have become an increasing concern.

Consider deaths attributed to climate change—the red areas on the map show the most impact, which falls mostly in Africa. There is also a disproportionate effect of climate change on women. Oxfam reports that 85% of those who die from climate change-related disasters are women, who generally have fewer resources, less mobility, and less ability to cope with famine, flood, drought, and other challenges.

The climate data reveals a stark reality about limiting warming to two degrees Celsius—it's extremely challenging. The crucial factor is cumulative emissions rather than emission rates, since CO2 lingers in our atmosphere for over a century. For a reasonable chance of success, the United States must achieve extraordinary reductions: 40% by next year, 70% by 2020, and over 90% by 2030, sustaining these cuts for several decades. Yet global emissions continue rising rather than falling.

This leads me, along with many others, to conclude that only mass mobilization offers a path toward meaningful solutions.

Some might wonder whether we could simply adapt to greater warming. But consider where we're headed without intervention—perhaps four degrees Celsius of warming. Scientists describe this scenario as "hell on earth," marking the end of stable civilization. We would experience the highest temperatures in 30 million years, sea level rises inundating coastal cities like San Francisco, drought affecting 40% of inhabited land, half of all known species extinct, widespread and novel illnesses, hundreds of millions of climate refugees, and resource wars.

Current projections show us on track for six degrees of warming under business-as-usual scenarios—a path leading beyond even this hellish description.

Perhaps we should pause here to breathe with all of this information. It's overwhelming. As we examine the causes of climate change, I invite you to draw upon the resources of the Fourth Noble Truth—the path itself. Our meditative practices offer skillful means for working with the distress that arises from truly seeing our situation.

How many of you notice some form of distress in your body or heart right now? Let's acknowledge what's present. I'll share a technique from Joanna Macy's work, which provides crucial tools for engaging with such distress. In one of her exercises, people express what they're experiencing, and we respond together with "we hear you," because isolation intensifies suffering.

Would anyone like to share what you're experiencing, perhaps in a single sentence?

"My heart hurts."

We hear you.

"I regret that I didn't do anything sooner."

We hear you.

"Fear of being a victim."

We hear you.

"Fear for my children and grandchildren."

We hear you.

"I feel some terror and also a frozen quality. Shock, maybe."

We hear you.

Practices for working with distress, fear, numbness—these form part of our essential toolkit. Those who understand how to engage with these emotions have vital roles to play. The meditative practices we cultivate prove absolutely crucial. This points us toward the Fourth Noble Truth.

Now let's take a briefer look at the Second Noble Truth—the causes of climate change. This exploration will be relatively concise, offering my particular perspective, though many would share these observations. We'll examine both outer causes of climate change and what we might call inner causes—our attitudes and behaviors.

Several aspects comprise the Second Noble Truth in relation to climate change—these collective causes of climate-related suffering.

First is the long-scale process we might call the objectification and desacralization of the natural world. This worldview permitted people to see the Earth as merely stuff existing for our purposes—a complex development that formed part of the causal chain, treating the world as essentially dead matter simply there for our use.

Second is our dependency on fossil fuels, interlinked with the powerful influence of fossil fuel corporations. We must state this bluntly: the long-term economic plans of these corporations are fundamentally incompatible with civilization's survival.

This stark reality was powerfully illustrated in an article by Bill McKibben published in Rolling Stone about two years ago, where he demonstrated that the long-term economic plans of fossil fuel corporations are fundamentally based on extracting and burning resources that, if used, would take us far beyond critical tipping points. That's precisely what I mean when I say their plans are incompatible with civilization's survival.

We also see the perpetuation of a consumerist, individualist culture with extremely high fossil fuel consumption, including the intensive consumption of meat, which requires enormous energy to convert grains into animal protein. These are further collective causes embedded in what we might call "business as usual" – the free market or neoliberal economic system with its familiar characteristics: financial deregulation, free trade agreements, privatization, the decline of public services, lowering of corporate taxes, and cuts in public spending. All of this operates on the principle of short-term profits rather than long-term economic stability, ecological sustainability, and economic justice.

This entire system of business as usual is intimately connected with climate change, alongside the domination of political systems and mass media by corporations invested in maintaining this status quo. We also see a profound lack of climate justice in relation to indigenous peoples, communities of color in the developed world, and the global South. As I mentioned earlier, those who suffer most from climate change didn't cause the problem, while those who caused it are impacted far less.

Then we encounter what we might call the inner causes of suffering related to climate change. Here we can return to the traditional Buddhist analysis of the roots of suffering: greed, hatred, and delusion, which manifest clearly in our current crisis.

We observe pervasive greed – evident in businesses, corporations, and financial institutions, but also, to some extent, in all of us through our attachment to certain comfort levels. One of the most challenging aspects of examining climate change causes is recognizing our universal implication. This isn't simply about "them" – while some bear greater responsibility than others, we are all implicated to some degree.

There's also what we can identify as self-centeredness, privilege, and arrogance operating at individual, national, social, racial, and cultural levels. Many countries and peoples live in self-centered, privileged bubbles, unaware of others' suffering, which prevents the natural empathy and compassion that would arise if we truly understood the scope of pain being experienced. From my perspective, and certainly from the Buddhist tradition, I deeply believe in the fundamental goodness of people and the inherent goodness of our hearts. However, when we lack accurate information, those good hearts remain untouched. When we live in bubbles, unaware of suffering, transformation cannot occur.

There's also widespread fear and anxiety among much of the population – certainly in the United States – among poor, working, and middle classes over economic security, housing, terrorism, and countless other concerns. Additionally, we see considerable ignorance and denial, which we could categorize under several headings: apathy, distraction, preoccupation with whatever captures our attention – even something as innocent as the Giants making it to the championship series.

I couldn't help but notice, after the climate march in Washington, when I compared the inches of coverage in the San Francisco Chronicle devoted to the climate march versus the 49ers game that same Sunday, the ratio was approximately 40 to 1 in favor of sports coverage. While this is complex, the reality of distraction is undeniable.

We also encounter skepticism and outright denial, with a substantial percentage of people still believing that global warming simply isn't happening. Denial remains a tremendously powerful force. In a way, I suspect that what I've shared about what's actually occurring isn't entirely new information for most of you, yet somehow we don't act on it. We continue to live – myself included, despite my intentions – in a kind of bubble. Denial is a crucial aspect of this entire situation, but it's something that can be worked with and penetrated.

Now we arrive at solutions. Much climate change work unfortunately ends with the first two noble truths, which I find decidedly unuplifting. Here we want to engage with the third and fourth truths, which truly examine possibilities.

The third noble truth reveals the possibility of a sustainable, more just, wise, and compassionate world if the roots of climate change suffering are genuinely addressed and transformed. This directly follows the third noble truth in traditional practice, which affirms that deep peace and freedom are possible. Accessing that profound peace and freedom is, I believe, crucial for addressing climate change, because we need extraordinarily powerful spiritual resources to remain present with this situation. The spiritual practices of all traditions will play a vital role in this work.

It's essential to maintain a vision recognizing that this represents humanity's greatest challenge. We need to reduce emissions by 70% by 2020 – some experts suggest this means 8 to 10% annually in the West. Yet this is achievable. We can accomplish this by making substantial cuts in energy use and emissions through various means.

For example, many of you probably know that Germany has transformed its energy landscape over the past decade, moving from 6% renewable electricity to 25% renewables. The United States remains at only 4%. During certain periods, Germany has achieved remarkable feats—in some months drawing 74% of their electricity from renewable sources. Such rapid transformation demonstrates what becomes possible when there is collective will and vision.

This reveals the second crucial point: we can increase clean renewable energy very quickly when we commit to doing so. Germany has proven this path forward. We can also dramatically expand sequestration—the capturing of carbon in plants, forests, and agricultural systems, and possibly through what's called geoengineering, though this remains controversial. These approaches, combined with building our capacity for resilience, form the vision of where we need to go.

In terms of our path of practice, we must somehow increase wise view, compassion, and skillful action faster than the increase in dukkha. As I've mentioned, we possess the knowledge, skills, and technologies to make this transformation work. There is genuine reason for hope in this vision.

Applying these practices and moving toward these technologies will bring tremendous benefits as we learn to live in an ecological way, creating pathways to a truly sustainable world. The critical threshold remains 1.5 degrees. Large-scale changes could occur rapidly if enough people shift their perspective, particularly if widely promoted cultural narratives increase dissonance with current practices, and if we can demonstrate greater efficacy and benefits.

Here at Spirit Rock, for instance, our building plans include making the center completely self-sufficient in terms of energy. Imagine if all new construction followed such principles. As I've mentioned, this is already happening in various countries.

There's also tremendous potential to move toward a more just world. Because business as usual proves incompatible with addressing climate change, we have an unprecedented opportunity to transition to a different, more equitable economic system. This would require a significant movement, but we could actually develop an economic system based on local, just, and sustainable approaches to economics.

This transformation fundamentally involves shifting toward more local power and reducing the dominance of international corporations. We can see this happening already—many municipalities are reclaiming their energy systems and demanding clean energy. This is occurring throughout the United States and extensively across Europe. Most cities in Germany now operate their own local energy grids. In Berkeley, where I work with the Berkeley Climate Action Coalition, people are actively researching these possibilities. Similar initiatives have already begun in Marin County over recent years. We're witnessing a fundamental transformation in how we generate and distribute energy, and there's much reason for hope.

Now, are you ready for the Fourth Noble Truth? The Fourth Noble Truth addresses the path of transformation itself. I've organized this into three levels: personal and individual changes, community and local changes, and national and international steps we can take.

On the personal level, the meditative tools we cultivate remain absolutely crucial for the long term. The ability to remain present with difficult situations, to meet conflicts with compassion, wisdom, and skillfulness—this capacity becomes essential for sustained engagement.

What steps can we take personally? First, we can develop deeper understanding. We can study the problem and its roots more thoroughly. We can grasp the necessity of moving toward a vision of a sustainable and more just world, and truly commit to following that vision. We can cultivate our sense of the interdependence between our individual actions and what unfolds in the world. This cultivation of wisdom and understanding stands at the very center of our practice.

This perspective comes from a statement issued by an international group of Dharma teachers that I participated in creating, released at the beginning of this year.

From this point forward in history, we must all acknowledge not only the external causes of climate change, but also the internal mental drivers as well and their consequences. To be wise, we must also individually and as a society adopt the firm intention to do whatever is necessary, no matter what the cost, to reduce the climate crisis to manageable levels and over time stabilize the climate.

Part of wise understanding is clarity of intention. Then there's the ethical training, in particular where our ethical commitment is to respond to harm, to do less harm ourselves and to respond to harm and suffering in the world, to have that come out of compassion. Again, from the dharma teachers' statement: we need to make a firm moral commitment to adopt ways of living that protect the environment and help restore the Earth's ecosystem and living organisms. There are all sorts of personal actions—that's why I gave the handout that has numerous ways that one can, in one's own household with one's own consumption, make changes.

There's also the training in meditation. Remember, the traditional trainings are in wisdom and understanding first, in ethics, and in meditation. The training in meditation is something that we can actually offer those in the larger movement to address climate change, because the qualities or the capacities of mindfulness, equanimity, patience, working with difficult emotions, are all invaluable. They're particularly capacities that we've all cultivated, and so there's a very important role in sharing those. We know that without training in those areas, it's very difficult. There's a crucial role there and we can do that both individually and also through these wonderful group forums for working with challenges that Joanna Macy and others have developed.

One of the best books to read, if you want to read one book, is called Active Hope by Joanna Macy and Chris Johnstone. It's in the bookstore: "How to Face the Mess We're In Without Going Crazy." Very beautiful book. And Joanna is 85 now. Study with her. Go work with her. Soon. Right away. She's wonderful. She sometimes teaches at Spirit Rock.

What can we do on a local basis? There are all sorts of things we can do with the local sangha. I think the large-scale changes, in a way, are the most difficult. The political, the working on the level of the larger economy—those are harder. There's tremendous impact possible at the personal and local level that everyone can do. That actually can happen often very quickly. That doesn't solve the problem fully, but it goes hand in hand with the others, with the larger scale issues.

So there are all sorts of things we can do: have study groups that are local, be in local organizations, work with our local governments. I'm very pleased to go to the Berkeley meetings and there are people—the mayor has come, there are people from the city of Berkeley government who go to all the meetings. It's right there. If you want to look, there's a website for the Berkeley Climate Action Coalition that I think the UN said if every city in the world, in the country, did this, it'd be tremendously helpful. So there are options locally, in one's community, with one's family, and so forth.

This is from the dharma teachers' statement: "Buddhists can join with others in their sanghas, and our sanghas can join hands and hearts with other religious and spiritual traditions, as well as secular movements. In this way, we will support each other as we make the necessary shifts in perspectives, lifestyles, and economic and institutional systems. History shows that with concerted, unified collective effort, changes that at one time seemed impossible have time and time again come to pass."

That's very helpful. That's part of the vision. We know that at one time the Soviet Union was thought to be continuing for another hundred years. It fell very quickly. South Africa, apartheid—there are a lot of examples of that. Things can happen very, very quickly.

So all sorts of local and community things: having workshops, sharing your knowledge, working in all sorts of areas—community, agriculture, all sorts of things are called for. I think probably there are places for all of our gifts. It's not like everyone has to do everything, but we just see where we can help and see what could be helpful.

One statement that I appreciated a lot was from Bill McKibben, who's one of the main leaders in climate work, as most of you know, and he said that if 15% of the population get it totally together with recycling and their own personal energy use, nothing will change. But if those same 15% become active, everything will change. And some people think it's even less.

I've heard figures suggesting that the American Revolution occurred with just 3.5% of people being very active. There have been studies connected with Stanford indicating that if 7% of the population really gets mobilized, major change can occur. So the question becomes: will I be part of that 7%?

And it doesn't necessarily take a lot of time. I found it helpful to quantify it and ask: do I have two to four hours a week to devote to this? If 7% of the population committed two to four hours a week, I think it will happen. That's not so much, right? Maybe it means going to one less movie. Does that make it easier? You can still go to movies.

The national and international level, as I mentioned, is the hardest. But that's where this larger mobilization is necessary. So it could mean coordinating with different groups, connecting with local groups that are working on climate change. There's special value for interfaith groups. There was a lot that happened in New York with interfaith groups on September 22nd.

There are all sorts of possibilities for taking firm stands in relationship to investments in fossil fuel companies. There's a term—divest and reinvest—which has to do with where do I put my money? There's a lot that can be done there. Where's my money? Where's my institution's money? Where's Spirit Rock's money? Where is my college's money? I think there was a turning point where people saw that the economic plans of the fossil fuel corporations are incompatible with resolving these issues. It's really as simple as that. And so those approaches are very effective.

One could work politically for certain candidates, help change the story, work on education, work on different ways of understanding, and so forth. Again, from a technical point of view, the changes that are necessary are not hard. What's necessary is having enough people who are willing to respond, be verbal, get out there, and commit to that change—to make what actually could happen tomorrow, if there was political will, happen.

Countries can turn around. One of the people who writes a lot about this, Lester Brown, who has very clear solutions right there in books, says there are different scenarios. One of them is to have something like a sense of what this country did after Pearl Harbor—total mobilization where everyone felt important to be involved. And things did change. Things happened. All sorts of things happened. That may be what's necessary.

So the question is: what's one's part in this?

I'll finish with three quotations from Buddhist teachers. This is from Bhikkhu Bodhi, who has been very active and wonderful to be a colleague with on the climate group. He says: "If we let our hearts be stirred by compassion, we will see that we have no choice but to act to solve climate change and to act in ways that will truly make a difference and determine our future destiny."

Secondly, from Joanna Macy, this is from the book Active Hope: "What's catching on is commitment to act for the sake of life on earth, as well as the vision, courage, and solidarity to do so."

And lastly, from the Dalai Lama. Many of you know Heather Sundberg, who just came back from India a few days ago, and she had two opportunities to study with the Dalai Lama. She said she would be with him and just be crying, but he brought together this deep inner development with the deep commitment to the world. And this is how I'll end.

Then we can have some questions. We can keep recording with the questions.

So the Dalai Lama: "This small blue planet is our only home. If we do not respect it, the entire planet and billions and billions of species will be affected. This is a question of life, a question of survival for the entire planet. We need full cooperation based on a clear realization that we are all one. Each and every individual's future depends on the entire humanity, especially right now."

So we have some time for any reflections or observations or questions. And we'll use the microphone. Thank you for your attention.

I appreciate it. Maybe many of you already know there's an excellent group called 350.org in Marin. They need more people. And elect Larry Bragman—he's all about this. One of the handouts lists many groups, websites, and talks connecting with our meditation practice, and you can find this resource list on the Spirit Rock website under my name on the teacher page. If you want to share it with others, they can download it there.

"Hi, I'd like to inform the Sangha that today at the San Rafael Theater there's a movie at 2:30 called Racing to Zero. It's about what San Francisco has accomplished with recycling and composting."

This area can actually serve as a model. As Germany models many approaches for the world, we too can be a model. Things travel east—the wind blows east. We know all sorts of cultural changes have already begun in California. Why not this one?

"Hi, I'm Mary. I want to encourage all of you to investigate the National Citizens Climate Lobby, citizensclimatelobby.org. We are a vast, rapidly growing national organization of citizen volunteers teaching ourselves how to lobby and develop relationships with our members of Congress in every congressional district in the country. Those of us in the Bay Area are somewhat lucky—we live in this embarrassment of riches, so we're preaching to the choir when we approach our own congressional representatives. But what we're actively doing in all the Bay Area chapters is developing chapters of the Citizens Climate Lobby in conservative Republican districts in the Central Valley, because this isn't a partisan issue, as we all know. Our belief is that as citizen activists, we can transform political leadership. We will make it happen. For example, every member of Congress assumes that for every letter they receive in their office, there are 10,000 people in their district who share that same belief. So we believe it's a truly transformative way for active, regular citizens like us to meet in Washington with every member of Congress every year and develop these kinds of relationships at that level. So it involves both our own personal transformation—I'd never lobbied in Congress until this year—and a political one as well. I encourage you to check out CCL."

I'll add that this theme is very dear to Sylvia's heart. Some of her first teaching at Spirit Rock was developing a series called "Citizenship as Spiritual Practice." Anyone attend that? It was some time ago, but she says that's really how she was raised.

Other questions or comments? We could also stay with the experiential level if you'd like—just what one's feelings are.

"Though I live in Tiburon at this moment, I'm from Louisiana. My family's all there, and I'm moving back to Louisiana, where oil is king. Most politicians are in the pockets of big oil companies. People barely recycle, much less compost. There is some solar there, but it's few and far between. So I guess, first of all, maybe I'm asking for some love and light coming my way so that my beliefs, which are very strong in this area, don't lead me to feel disgust. I'd rather feel compassion for people who live either in ignorance or greed. There's a lot of both. I know there must be pockets of people who feel very differently. If anybody knows of any of those pockets, please let me know. Or maybe through the national organization, there's some way that I can connect?"

"What part of Louisiana will you be in?"

"We'll be moving to New Orleans."

There are some very good people there—very good people in New Orleans and around Tulane, I believe, as well. I think a key thing is to stay connected. You can stay connected to people in the Bay Area, so you don't feel isolated. Joanna Macy has a wonderful phrase. She says it's really necessary in difficult times to have "rough weather networks." It's a beautiful term. To really stay connected—and that can be inspiring.

Know that this work is long term, though denial can evaporate surprisingly quickly when the moment is right. There are many people, particularly those affected by Katrina, who have witnessed these forces up close and been deeply educated by the experience. Much of what I discussed regarding economics rings true in what happened there—it was connected to climate change, but also very much related to the decline in public infrastructure. In many ways, it was more a political and social disaster than a natural one.

The main thing is to stay connected. There will be plenty of people to connect with. And continue your metta practice for difficult people—this is something we uniquely bring to these challenges. It's possible to be firm and oppose certain policies, even institutions, while maintaining care and compassion without demonizing. This becomes especially valuable when things intensify and the tendency to polarize grows strong.

We explored this in our July and August sessions on working with difficult circumstances, including examining our tendencies to polarize. I remember once joining a retreat at Los Alamos National Laboratory where we met with nuclear scientists developing weapons. We tried to encounter them as human beings in an empathic way. Not everyone in our group could do that, but it was profoundly instructive.

This becomes part of our practice: To what extent are we writing people off, polarizing, judging, or demonizing while still being firm in our stance? We have models for this—in Buddhist tradition and figures like Dr. King.

[A brief discussion about local political candidates ensues, followed by disagreement among participants]

How do we hold this kind of disagreement with our practice? These challenges, while real, will likely be much less difficult than future ones we'll face. When people hold different views while seemingly working toward the same ends, how do we work with that? This is precisely what our practice can offer.

It's not easy. We're always getting lost and finding ourselves again. But there's a particularly rich set of resources available when we look to what I was calling the fourth noble truth—the path. These tremendous inner resources and understanding need continuous development so we can work skillfully with such moments.

As a teacher, I don't make political endorsements. The question becomes: How can we discuss these matters as a community? This itself becomes wonderful practice. The key is remaining empathic, understanding where people come from at their best, and connecting there.

Even with those who might head fossil fuel corporations—and this is what I discovered working with nuclear scientists—there's often some kernel of genuinely good intention we can connect with. This represents extremely advanced practice, but the principle remains: watch the tendency in difficult times to be reactive, to blame, to judge.

And yet, how do we still act in a strong and firm way? I think that may be the koan of our times. That's a way to say it—it's kind of the question of our times. How do we do that so that we don't lose our humanity in trying to save humanity? So that's really the koan, the challenge.

So let's end by inviting ourselves to see what is the intention that's there for you. What one intention do you have at the end of this morning session? It might not even be related to the talk. Maybe something was sparked that's important for you. What's your intention?

So I'll finish with the dedication of merit, a traditional practice. The Dalai Lama says, "We need full cooperation based on the clear realization that we are all one." May our time together be of benefit to everyone, including ourselves.

CHAPTER 275

The Eco-Crisis as a Spiritual Crisis

Rob Burbea · 54 min

> In this Earth Day dharma talk, Rob Burbea presents a profound analysis of how our ecological crisis mirrors the individual spiritual predicament that Buddhism addresses. Using the metaphor of two icebergs, he explores what lies beneath the surface of both climate change and contemporary Buddhist practice.
>
> Burbea argues that just as individual suffering (dukkha) stems from the constructed sense of a separate self that feels fundamentally lacking, our civilization's destructive relationship with the biosphere arises from a collective sense of separation from nature. This separation drives our obsession with endless technological and economic growth—a collective version of trying to fill the unfillable void through external acquisition.
>
> Drawing on Zen teachings and the realization that the sense of self is a construct that can be deconstructed, Burbea suggests that awakening involves recognizing our fundamental non-separation—both individually and collectively. Just as we cannot 'return to nature' because we have never left it, the path forward requires waking up to our inherent interconnectedness rather than trying to escape or merely cope with our predicament. This understanding reveals the ecological crisis not merely as a technological or political challenge, but as a spiritual crisis requiring both personal and collective transformation.

Today is Earth Day at Spirit Rock, and the theme of my presentation is our ecological situation, which explains that postcard on the bulletin board. Did you have a chance to look at it? If you haven't seen it before, I think it's quite striking. It's like a bit of a wake-up call.

How many of us realized how little water there is? That's all the water in that little bubble—salt water, ocean water, fresh water, glaciers, groundwater, so little. We tend to be misled, I think. We look out at the ocean, which covers well over 70% of the Earth's surface, but we miss the fact that the average depth is less than a mile and a half. In relationship to the Earth, which is 8,000 miles in diameter, it's very, very thin. So we really don't have that much water, and yet all of life is so dependent on it.

The same thing applies to the air. We're inside the air, and so we have the sense of air as kind of endless, boundless, infinite. Yet when we see those videos of astronauts taking off from space, we realize just how thin that layer of atmosphere is around the Earth. Where I live in Boulder, Colorado, we can feel it too. We're only a mile high, but it's thinner there. You go up to Estes Park or Rocky Mountain National Park, you can tell the difference. There's really so little air there. So little water, just reminding us how fragile the earth is.

The theme of Buddhism and our ecological situation obviously suggests questions like: What can Buddhist teachings teach? How can they help us understand our ecological predicament and how to respond to it adequately? That's certainly one of the main things we want to talk about, but not the only thing. I also want to turn that around in line with Buddhism's emphasis on mutual causality. I'm not only interested in what Buddhism has to say about our ecological situation; I'm also interested in what our ecological situation has to say about Buddhism. What does it imply about the way that we understand and practice Buddhism?

The way I'd like to do that is to begin by telling you a story of two icebergs. With apologies to Bradley, who heard it all before last Sunday, these icebergs don't have anything to do with the fact that glaciers are melting and calving off. For me, the icebergs are a metaphor. With an iceberg, only about one-fifth actually sticks above the surface of the water. Four-fifths is submerged. So we see what's here, but it's easy to miss or ignore how much is down below. I think this is a very good metaphor for looking at our ecological situation—the first iceberg.

At the very tip of the iceberg, of course, is the challenge of climate change, global warming, whatever phrase we want to use. As we're all aware, we are changing the atmosphere of the planet. We're warming it with pretty serious consequences. Climate change, global warming—those are unfortunately sort of neutral terms, aren't they? Almost euphemisms. A lot of people would like a little more warmth. Better terms might be something like climate breakdown or climate emergency, to really give us a sense of what this implies.

We're naturally focused on this because it's happening so quickly. I don't know how many of you read the recent IPCC report. Once again, things are happening more quickly, more urgently than the scientists themselves predicted. The amount of time that we have to really address this seriously is shrinking.

I'm not going to spend our time talking about that, but rather making the pretty obvious point—which I think we all know, but we need to put it in context—that the ecological crisis is not just climate breakdown or climate emergency. That's a very important part of it, which is implicated in a lot of other things, but the ecological crisis is much bigger than that.

When we think about the oceans, for example, we can see how increased carbon in the atmosphere is affecting coral reefs—the acidification, the warming, the reefs get bleached. This is pretty scary when we remember that about 80% of all ocean species are living in coral areas. But climate change doesn't explain, for example, the fact that virtually all the ocean's fisheries are pretty well fished out. This is why those of us who eat fish are eating a lot more farmed fish—salmon and tilapia and things like that—just because there's less in the oceans and what is being caught is smaller and smaller.

Or consider the oceans' incredible pools that have collected of garbage, especially plastic. We have these whole areas of human-made sargasso seas—not of seaweed or something, but of plastic—which fish and other birds and other species sometimes eat to their detriment.

So that's one good example. An even better example—perhaps "better" isn't the right word—but something that stands out even more for me is the fact that we are now in the midst of the sixth great extinction event in Earth's history.

By extinction event, I mean a period when most of the species on Earth disappear. There have been five previous extinction events. The last one may have been 65 million years ago when the dinosaurs disappeared. What's special about the one we are experiencing right now is that it's happening more quickly than any of the others, apparently. And it's the only one caused by a particular species—one particular species. That is to say, us, of course.

The Harvard biologist E.O. Wilson has estimated that by the end of the century, as many as half—half—of all the plant and animal species on earth could either be extinct or so weakened that they will disappear soon thereafter. That's within the lifetime of our children and grandchildren. Truly something almost incomprehensible.

No one really knows how many species there are—maybe between three and five million, something like that. Most of them haven't been identified and named. But they are disappearing, hundreds or thousands every day, according to the scientists, because of what we're doing to the planet, particularly to the habitat of so many of these species.

As I was rummaging through my notes, I found this poem that really brings it down for me. You know, "extinction event"—okay, it's a concept. But actually bringing it down to the feeling level is this poem by Sam Hamill called "The Book of Endings." Have any of you heard it? I've adapted it slightly. I want to read most of it with slight changes because it really touches on this point so clearly—just how quickly it's happening and what it means.

So here it is, "The Book of Endings":

Sometime while you listen to this poem, a species will disappear. A species as vast as your life and the lives of all your ancestors will no longer exist. A species that's found its own ways of eating, of moving, of hiding from predators. A species that meets itself and makes love in the bark of a tree, or on the leaves of the canopy, or in the humid dirt.

And it's come with us for millions of years. For millions of years, it's watched the night and day follow each other. It's breathed with the frogs. It's wrapped the stars around it like a blanket.

At the beginning of this poem, there may have been three or four of that species left. But now there's only one. And if you hear this poem again, it will be another species, another story of four billion years telling itself for the last time.

Wherever life began, it was all of us there, as it is now, in this unknown last one. It's bored into wood. It's carried water in its back. It's drunk the dew from its back in the desert. It's fed its young with strips of leaves, built homes out of bark. It's caged the sky into a song. It's spoken in ways no human has heard.

It has emerald wings. It has sapphire wings. It has wings of night.

You will never see it. It's already gone.

So the ecological crisis isn't simply climate change. There's a lot more going on. And that's what brings me to what's below the surface. The fact is, when we look at the totality of our effects on the earth, we can't really just pick out something like changing our energy sources. We really have to acknowledge that the fundamental issue is something about the way our civilization is working.

We have an industrial growth society that is really at the heart of it. That's the nature of our industrial growth society. That is to say, it keeps growing, it keeps needing to extract more resources from the earth at great cost, and it keeps spewing more and more pollutants and waste out into the water, the air, the land. Fundamentally, it's this whole basic orientation, along with increasing population, that's really the fundamental cause.

I spoke yesterday about corporate capitalism, but it's not just capitalism.

Capitalism is just one form of this industrial growth society. During the time of the Soviet Union and in pre-capitalist China, they were doing the same sort of thing, with the same emphasis on growth. I'll have more to say about that later, but that's the fundamental point I think we need to realize: we're not going to really resolve the ecological crisis without looking very deeply into the whole orientation of our society. Again, something I think that we all, for the most part, know, but I just want to remind us of that in terms of this iceberg. And I'll have more to say about this industrial growth society a bit later.

So that's the first iceberg. What do you think the second iceberg is? The second iceberg is Buddhism.

At the top, in relation to what we're talking about—and there's no moral implications here, but the top, the visible part—I would include socially engaged Buddhism, such as we're concerned about here in our retreat. I think it's worth mentioning that in certain ways, it is itself in crisis. A number of socially engaged organizations have disappeared or are having a lot of trouble. Buddhist Peace Fellowship, that both Donald and I have been associated with, is now beginning to sort of resuscitate, but it basically collapsed for the most part in terms of members and financial support. Zen Peacemakers, Bernie Glassman's organization, basically had to sell off their places, and it's just down to Bernie himself. Network of Engaged Buddhism in England, founded in part by my friend Ken Jones, has pretty well collapsed. Socially engaged Buddhism institutions and organizations are not in very good condition.

I want to contrast that with the success of the mindfulness movement, which in the last couple of years has literally exploded in terms of its visibility, its impact, and the fact that so many—literally millions of people now—are doing mindfulness and benefiting from it.

I mentioned in the discussion period of my first talk the distinction we might make between service and activism. In a way, I think BPF was a victim of its own success in the sense that social engagement in terms of service—helping homeless people, prison work, hospitals and hospices—is generally accepted as an important part of the Buddhist path for many people. But when we look at activism, that is to say, challenging structures of oppression, it becomes a lot more complicated. As I quoted David Chernikoff saying, in his experience, a lot of Buddhists, maybe most Buddhists, are conflict avoidant. We don't want to go there. We find that uncomfortable. We find it easier to turn to our practice.

In a way, I think this points to something distinctive about Buddhism. We Buddhists have our own way of addressing and resolving the ecological crisis. When we think about the ecological crisis, what happens? Anxiety comes up about the future, about what's happening, certain types of thoughts and fears and so forth. And we have a way to deal with those. We meditate. We meditate and we've learned to let the anxiety go. The problem disappears, right? We've learned how to do that.

That is a kind of response to the ecological crisis and other social engagement issues. In terms of our own connection to them, that is a way to deal with them. But of course, it's not a way that's actually addressing them. It's dealing with them subjectively.

So I see this as the top part above the surface. In particular, I'm concerned about some aspects of how mindfulness is being promoted from a socially engaged perspective. I'm reminded of something that this influential European philosopher named Slavoj Žižek said. He's very well known, quite a character, quite a performer. For some reason he's become interested in Buddhism. What he says about it sometimes suggests he doesn't know that much about it, but he's a very acute observer of the cultural scene.

And what he's concluded is that Buddhism is the perfect ideology for twenty-first century consumer capitalism. Because it helps us deal with the stresses, the anxieties of daily life, our jobs, and so forth. So we can have a very intense, difficult job. It's very hard to keep everything together—job, family, and so on. But if we can meditate, if we can be mindful, it helps us find a way to cope with all that. And that's what he's referring to—that mindfulness, as he sees it, is becoming this grand coping mechanism that helps us cope with our lives, helps us fit into society better.

This brings me to the bigger part of the iceberg, the part that's below the surface, which is what we need to look to if we want to understand the role of social engagement in Buddhism now. What do I mean by this?

I think that this kind of uncertainty about social engagement, about the role of mindfulness in society, points to a deep-seated ambiguity within the Buddhist tradition itself—in particular, about the nature of awakening or enlightenment. I think there's a kind of uncertainty there that we're experiencing now, and it's an uncertainty that really does need to be clarified if we're going to move forward.

What do I mean by this ambiguity? If you go back to the Pali Canon and to the earliest texts we have of what the Buddha has to say about awakening—there's a lot of text, so it's not always easy to put together—but it's very clear the way the tradition, the Theravada tradition, developed. Nirvana ultimately is about not being reborn. To be born is to suffer in this world of samsara, this world of suffering, craving, delusion. And the ideal is not to be reborn at all. That's the ultimate goal.

In other words, the idea is not to fix up this world, but to check out of it, to escape it. In which case, maybe we don't need to worry too much about what's going on here, because the idea is to get away from it. And if we label it samsara, then the implication is we shouldn't waste our time trying to fix it up.

In contrast to that, in contemporary—especially Western—Buddhism, we can see another stream that doesn't see the role of the Buddhist path as escaping this world, but rather sees it much more involved with changing our minds so that we harmonize better, so that we fit in. So the jagged parts of our mind, our afflictive emotions and ways of thinking that cause a lot of suffering for us—if we can get a handle on them, then we can fit into society better and we can play our roles better.

But in that case, too, it's not about changing society, is it? It's about fitting into society. In other words, neither of these ways of understanding awakening really helps us focus on transforming the world. The one wants to escape this world, the other wants to accept and fit into it. And the question is: Which of those should we understand as the goal of the Buddhist path, or is there, in fact, another version?

And that's what I really want to point to. That's what I did point to very briefly in my first talk on Friday. You remember I said a little bit at the very end about sense of self as a construct, haunted by sense of lack and so forth. This is a third understanding of the Buddhist path, which to me personally makes the most sense. And it also fits into the task of socially engaged Buddhism best.

That is to say, the challenge of awakening is to realize that the world as we normally experience it, including ourselves as we normally experience ourselves, is a construct. It's a psychological, social construct—a construct that can be deconstructed and reconstructed, which, as I understand it, is what the Buddhist path is all about. And when we are meditating, for example, we are deconstructing, or rather letting the self be deconstructed.

So what I'd like to do in the rest of the time here today is go back to that fundamental understanding, say a little bit more, try to flesh out this basic understanding of how I understand what the Buddhist path is doing, and then relate it to the larger kind of social transformation or social reconstruction that's necessary. Because I think you can see how these two fit together. If the Buddhist path traditionally is about personal deconstruction and reconstruction—experiencing the world and ourselves differently—there's also the possibility, in fact the necessity, to do that socially. We can see more clearly how the personal transformation and the social transformation end up being two sides of the same thing.

Are you with me so far? Does this make sense?

So let me say a little bit more first about our individual situation. And then on the basis of that, I want to point out what I think are some really extraordinary parallels—precise and profound parallels—between this individual predicament, such as Buddhism is talking about, traditionally talking about, and our collective predicament today in relationship to the biosphere. Because I think they're the same predicament. The one is the microcosm of the macrocosm. If we really understand this way of articulating what Buddhism is about, then we can see that the ecological crisis is just a larger version of the same thing.

So let me start by saying a little bit more about this individual predicament. As you may remember, the basic claim is that the sense of self—that is to say, the feeling that there's a me inside and somehow I'm inside and the rest of the world, including you, outside, that there's a kind of boundary between inside and outside—that this sense of separation is a delusion.

That this is the fundamental construct—not only the fundamental construct, but at the heart of our dukkha, our suffering. In a way, it's a kind of necessary construct as we grow up. I'm not saying we don't need a sense of self. The problem arises insofar as the sense of self really feels separate from others.

The way I understand it is to say that this is at the heart of our dukkha: the feeling that there's a me inside and the rest of the world is outside. And the reason that's dukkha is that this constructed sense of self—this supposed me inside—in an important sense, is a delusion. It doesn't have any reality of its own. It's a construct made of mostly habitual ways of thinking, feeling, acting, reacting, remembering, planning, intending. In other words, processes. It's the way these processes work together. But there's no hard core of self inside them. There's no thing inside. There's no pure consciousness or something that's real in there.

And that points to the real dukkha involved: not having any reality, this sense of self is inherently uncomfortable because it's inherently ungrounded, insecure. I know this is a bit of a stretch. The way I tend to understand this is to say that we normally experience this fundamental dukkha as a sense of lack—the feeling that something is wrong with me, something's missing, something isn't quite right.

All of us have this sense of lack. We tend to think it's our own problem. We don't realize that everyone has it to some extent. It becomes especially acute in adolescents when they're losing the identity that the family provided and constructing their own identity. They're very vulnerable to the opinions of friends. This construction of identity is a response, a way of coping with this. But it doesn't really resolve the fundamental issue. The sense of self is haunted or shadowed by the sense of lack.

Where the real problem occurs is the way this gets inverted. The problem isn't that there's a sense of lack—if we know where it really comes from, then we know how to deal with it. The problem is we're conditioned by society to understand the lack as something out here. What do I lack? We learn pretty quickly growing up in this society that what I lack is I don't have enough money, or I don't have enough consumer goods, or I'm not famous enough, or I don't have a partner, or my partner isn't good enough, and so forth. We're encouraged to look out here and to find something out here.

The tragedy is that since this looking outward is a symptom of the basic problem, nothing we can ever get out here can ever really resolve the fundamental problem, which is an internal one. If it's money that we want, if it's money that we think is going to resolve our sense of lack, we can never have enough money. Because you can get a lot of money, but you're still going to have your sense of lack. And that's true whether it's money or fame or any particular consumer goods.

What Buddhism does in this context is offer us the path to actually resolve the sense of lack. Here's where I fall back upon my own Zen training and my own Zen way of articulating it. In the Zen tradition, we talk a lot about forgetting the sense of self, letting go of the self. The great Japanese Zen master Dogen said: "To study Buddhism is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to realize your intimacy with all things."

In the process of focusing on our meditation practice, whatever it may be—as my Zen master Yamada Koen said, "Zen practice is forgetting oneself in the act of uniting with something," uniting with whatever it is your meditation is focused on. That moment of forgetting oneself and realizing that I'm not in here—rather than being something inside here that's looking out at the world—I'm simply one of the many countless ways in which all of this is coming together right here and now. That's what Zen describes as kensho or awakening. It's not inside separate from outside.

The great Japanese Zen master Dogen also described his own experience when he said: "I came to realize clearly that mind is nothing other than rivers and mountains and the great wide earth, the sun and the moon and the stars." Mind isn't somehow in here separate from the world. All this, all of you, are my mind. And of course, that's equally true for each and every one of us. In the Zen tradition, the emphasis is that each of us has exactly the same nature as the Buddha.

It's just that the Buddha realizes it clearly and lives in a way that accords with that realization.

All this was summarized much better than I can by a Vedantan teacher named Nisargadatta, who said: "When I look inside and see that I am nothing, that's wisdom. When I look outside and see that I am everything, that's love. Between these two, my life turns."

When I look inside and see that I'm nothing—wisdom. When I look outside and see that I am everyone—that's love. The two pillars of Buddhism: wisdom and compassion.

I think this also points to the whole idea of the bodhisattva path. Realizing that we're not separate from others calls for this kind of reorientation, so that instead of asking, "What's in this situation for me?" we turn it around and ask, "What can I do to make this situation better? How can I respond to it?" That is one way of encapsulating what the Buddhist path is about.

What I want to do now is point to the quite striking parallels between this articulation I've just given you and our collective situation in relationship to the biosphere. In this case, the self doesn't refer to the individual anymore, or to the kinds of selves I was talking about yesterday—men, women, American, Chinese, whatever. Here, the collective self is humanity as a whole, or if you like, human civilization.

This too is a construct, isn't it? It's our collective social construct. Just as the sense of self is a kind of psychological construct, we can say human civilization is our collective construct with the same sense of separation, the same sense that we, as people, are separate from the earth. We still have this same sense of what we could call alienation.

Now, I think it's important to see that human beings didn't always have this sense of separation. If you go back to the earliest cultures—before the Greeks—you remember I referred in my first talk to the Greek idea that we can change the way we organize things if we don't like it. We can change our social structure, our political and economic systems if we want.

Prior to the Greeks, people basically didn't realize that. For the most part, people accepted their social structure, usually very hierarchical. They accepted that as just the way they accepted everything else. It was considered natural. That's just the way things were. So if you're an Egyptian living in Egypt, the guy at the top of the social pyramid—the pharaoh—he's not just a political ruler, he's a religious one. That's all part of the way the cosmos is organized. The social structure is part of the eco-structure. It's just the way things are.

And there's a sense of being embedded. If you live in that society, you have a kind of social security in the sense that you know why you're there. You know what your role is when you're born and grow up. You know what your job is. And interestingly, for many of those cultures, human beings and human society had an important role to play in keeping the cosmos working.

A good example is the Aztecs. We know they had this practice of dragging large numbers of war captives to the top of their pyramids and cutting out their hearts with an obsidian knife and offering them to the sun god. Why did they do that? Because they felt they actually needed to do that to keep the sun god on his course. That's a rather extreme example, but it's very common that people in those cultures knew why they were there. They had a role to play—even if we think it's very deluded—they nonetheless had a role to play in the cosmos, which we do not. We lack that kind of social security.

That's the important point I want to stress. You see, what's happened in the modern world—and it really comes out of this Greek realization—is that we realize our social structure is something we're free to change if we want. But the other side of that freedom is a kind of anxiety that we don't really know what it's all about. We don't know why we're here. We don't know what kind of society we should have. We don't know what role we have to play in the larger order.

In fact, science seems to tell us that we don't have any role to play. It's just a matter of amusing ourselves or enjoying ourselves as much as we can, if we can, as long as we can while we're here. Human beings have no special meaning on the face of the planet.

Can you see the parallels with the anxiety, the individual anxiety here? Feeling separate, there's a kind of insecurity. I want to say that not only is there a sense of lack at the core of each of us individually, there also seems to be a kind of collective sense of anxiety or lack. We don't really know what it's all about.

And here's where it gets really interesting. How do we respond to this? What's our way of dealing with this? Well, remember first of all what we do on the individual level. We misunderstand the source of the problem and we try to secure and ground ourselves by grabbing onto things out here—money, fame, whatever. And as Buddhism emphasizes, everything's impermanent, everything's insubstantial. There's nothing we can secure ourselves with out here.

What's the comparable response of our civilization as a whole to this fundamental anxiety? I think the answer is pretty clear once we ask the question in that form. I think it's our preoccupation—or even you might say our obsession—with never-ending technological and economic development. We have become obsessed, you could say even sort of demonically obsessed, with more and more. More technological growth. To what end? More and more economic growth. To what end?

Well, again, we can't imagine what the end would be. We can't imagine a point where we have enough technology and we just say, "That's all we want." Or we have enough economic growth and we say, "Okay, no more." We really can't conceive of that, which makes me wonder: Is it that we're trying to get somewhere, or is it rather that we're kind of running away from something inside? To use the phrase that I think I used yesterday, why is more always better if it can never be enough?

So I think that we, as a civilization as a whole, are trapped in a kind of response which I identified earlier as industrial growth society—that our whole way of living on this earth is to understand that what it's all about is more and more technology, more and more growth. And somehow, because we don't know what else to do, it's like technology and economic growth and resources can be really valuable. But the trap is because we don't know what other ends are of value, we have become stuck in the means. It's like we've made the means into the ends. And because the means don't work very well as ends, we can never have enough. We're kind of trapped in this spiral and we don't know how to get out of it.

And yet this, more than anything else, seems to be what is destroying the planet. Because, of course, the biosphere is limited. The planet has very limited possibilities for growth, and yet we seem to be trapped into a system that has to keep growing—as I said earlier—if it's not going to collapse. And inevitably, sooner or later—and I think it's now—we're going to reach the point where this project of never-ending growth is going to run up against the boundaries of the biosphere. And that's exactly what's happened right now. That is the source, or that's another way of describing, the ecological crisis.

I hope you can see the parallels. One more parallel, actually two more. Just as we can't get rid of the self, according to Buddhism, because there never has been a self—we can wake up and realize that the self was a construct to begin with—likewise, we can't return to nature. That's not the solution here. We can't return to nature because we've never left it.

Really. We have the illusion of separation, but in fact we've never been apart from it. We're very good at creating environments like this one, a very fine hall, where everything we look at sort of reflects our activity, our manufacture. And yet if you think about it just a little bit, you can see that everything here is natural. It's just been—the form has been transformed in some way. Where does my paper come from? Where do the light bulbs come from? Where does the carpet come from? Where do the walls come from? We can see they're all derived from the natural world. All we have done is organize them in a certain kind of way.

And this is even more true, or we can see it more obviously, I think, with our bodies. Have we ever separated from the natural world? Maybe astronauts for very, very brief periods. But basically, of course, it's the nature of our bodies that they are microcosms of the larger macrocosm.

So our breathing—our breathing in of oxygen and out of carbon dioxide—is connected with what the plants are doing. The water and the food that circulates in us and passes through us, that's all part of the greater circulation that forms the biosphere. So our bodies have never been separate from the natural world. We're just very good at creating the illusion of that separation.

And then, of course, things break down when, for example, we don't know how to deal with the massive amounts of waste that are produced by our bodies and by our society as a whole. So it's not a matter of returning to nature. It's waking up to the fact that we've never been apart from nature.

And that really seems to me the heart of the challenge that we face today. Here I'm reminded of another poem—actually two poems. The first is a very short one by Rumi, which again I think expresses very well the individual transformation that this path is about. It's a poem called "The Worm's Waking."

This is how a human being can change. There's a worm that's addicted to eating grape leaves. Suddenly, he wakes up. Call it grace, whatever, something wakes him. And now he's no longer a worm. He's the entire vineyard. And the orchard, too. The fruit, the trunks, a growing wisdom and joy that doesn't need to devour.

What's he pointing to there? It's not that the worm becomes the vineyard. He's always been the vineyard. He just realizes that he's not separate, that he's one of the things that the whole vineyard is doing.

And the second poem, I think, articulates really beautifully this experience of realizing that we're not separate from the natural world. It's from a poem by David Whyte called "Everything is Waiting for You." And I'm just going to read part of it:

"Your great mistake is to act the drama as if you were alone. To feel abandoned is to deny the intimacy of your surroundings. Surely even you at times have felt the grand array, the swelling presence and the chorus crowding out your solo voice.

You must note the way the soap dish enables you. Or the window latch grants you freedom. Alertness is the hidden discipline of familiarity. Put down the weight of your aloneness and ease into the conversation. The kettle is singing even as it pours you a drink. The cooking pots have left their arrogant aloofness and seen the good in you at last. All the birds and creatures of the world are unutterably themselves. Everything is waiting for you."

Everything is waiting for us. This sense of separation that we have, both individually feeling sort of trapped inside this anxious, alienated, lonely sense of self, and this sense of separation that we as a species feel, collectively separated from this bountiful earth—both of those senses of separation are delusions.

And what seems clear at this particular point in history is that we not only need to address the individual delusion, such as Buddhism has traditionally emphasized—this path to overcome my individual sense of separateness. But it's also, I mean, I think this is the meaning of the ecological crisis. It's like the earth is challenging us to grow up or get out of the way.

The fact that when China produces coal smoke, it doesn't just stay over China, but circulates around the world—it's reminding us that everyone and everything is interconnected and that we have to be able to find a way of living together that acknowledges that.

In other words, it really does seem that just as I concluded yesterday—you remember the parallels between our individual three poisons, greed, ill-will, delusion, and the collective institutionalized version: institutionalized greed as our economic system, institutionalized ill-will as our militarism, institutionalized delusion as education and media.

And I concluded by saying that if it's true they are institutionalized versions of the three poisons, then we really need to look upon them as part of a spiritual crisis—our collective spiritual crisis. This isn't something separate from our spiritual lives, but rather a larger version of the same spiritual problem.

When I think of our ecological situation in this same light, when I appreciate the parallels I've tried to briefly draw out between our individual sense of separation—how we misunderstand, how we respond in ways that just make things worse, how we need to wake up and realize our non-duality and live according to that—when I see the parallels between this individual predicament and our collective sense of separation, with the anxiety and alienation that accompanies it, the way we respond with our preoccupation with industrial growth, more and more technology, more and more economic expansion—if we really see these parallels, then I think we have to acknowledge that the ecological crisis is not just a technological or economic or political or social challenge. It's also fundamentally a spiritual challenge.

This is the macro challenge. If our individual predicament is the microcosm version of our larger collective ecological predicament, then the ecological crisis itself is simply a larger version of the same spiritual crisis. And just as a spiritual path such as Buddhism shows us how to wake up from our individual predicament, we need to understand that our ecological crisis too requires this same kind of awakening—but on a collective scale.

This brings us back to what we keep returning to, what we keep saying again and again: ultimately we cannot separate the two. We cannot separate personal inner transformation from the larger social and ecological transformation. They are inextricably linked. That's the profound challenge we are faced with—recognizing that the path of individual awakening and the path of collective awakening are not two separate journeys, but one seamless movement toward wholeness.

This is our calling: to see that healing the delusion of separation within ourselves and healing the delusion of separation that underlies our ecological crisis are the same work. The dharma invites us into this larger understanding, where personal liberation and planetary healing are revealed as two faces of the same truth.

CHAPTER 276

Healing Ecology - A Buddhist Perspective on the Eco Crisis

Rob Burbea · 1h36

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea draws striking parallels between the Buddhist understanding of individual suffering and our collective ecological predicament. He argues that just as our personal sense of separation creates dukkha and compulsive behaviors, human civilization's constructed sense of separation from the natural world has led to our current environmental crisis. Drawing on core Buddhist concepts of anattā (non-self) and pratītyasamutpāda (dependent origination), Burbea suggests that both individual and collective awakening involve seeing through the illusion of separation. He explores how our obsession with endless growth and technological control mirrors individual attempts to secure a non-existent separate self. The talk weaves together evolutionary cosmology with Buddhist wisdom, proposing that human consciousness represents the universe becoming aware of itself. Burbea challenges us to consider whether humanity can become the "collective bodhisattva of the biosphere," finding meaning through healing our relationship with the Earth. This integration of Buddhist philosophy with ecological consciousness offers a spiritual framework for understanding and responding to climate change, suggesting that environmental healing requires the same fundamental insight that Buddhism offers for personal liberation.

I'd like to begin this evening with a word of appreciation, not only on my behalf, but on behalf of all of us who have been able to gather together in these almost ideal conditions. We have had a wonderful opportunity here—this kind of retreat, this kind of opportunity to reflect on our own practice and the wider implications of Buddhist teachings. I am grateful, and I know I'm not the only one grateful, for all the people at Gaia House who have made this possible. We know that many people have worked very hard in all kinds of ways to create this environment and to sustain it.

The topic for this evening is Buddhism and Ecology. The question is whether Buddhism really has something special to offer us that can help us understand and respond to the ecological crisis at this very special time in history when we seem to be doing so much to damage the biosphere.

It's not at all clear that religion is what's called for here. We have scientists who tell us about what's happening. We have technologists who devise new technologies that we need to adapt to the crisis. We have politicians who, at least should be, changing the social structure to adapt to our new situation. So what's the role of something like Buddhism here? Essentially an Iron Age religion, right?

The Buddha lived in a very different time and place—India, at least 2400 years ago. Like his compatriots, he didn't know anything about climate change, global warming, melting glaciers, rising sea levels, carbon dioxide levels in the atmosphere, or methane deposits. For that matter, they didn't know anything about carbon or oxygen or calcium or any of the periodic table of elements. They didn't know about the genetic structure of life or the cellular structure of life—so many other things that we today take for granted and that are essential to our understanding of what's happening right now to the biosphere. So we can certainly wonder whether Buddhism might have something really valuable to contribute.

Of course, Buddhism is not just one religion. When you really look closely at it, Buddhism is a big tent that includes many different types of Buddhism. Within all of these types—Pali Buddhism, Theravada Buddhism, Tibetan Buddhism, Zen Buddhism, and so forth—you would expect to find some things that would have something to say about our situation.

There is one story that especially speaks to me. It has to do with the Buddha's relationship to trees. According to the Pali Canon, or the story of the Buddha's life—which we know is largely myth—the Buddha was born under trees when his mother went into labor prematurely as she was traveling. After he left home on his spiritual quest, the Buddha studied, practiced, and did ascetic practices under trees. Later he meditated under trees. Supposedly he had his great awakening under a Bodhi tree. Thereafter he often lived, taught, and slept under trees. And again, if we can accept the traditional story, he died between two trees.

In particular, there's a story in the Vinaya about a tree spirit who appeared to the Buddha in one of his dreams and complained that one of the bhikkhu monks had cut down its tree in order to make a hut, and now the tree spirit had nowhere to live. I don't know what to think about the tree spirit, but interestingly, the next morning, the Buddha called the Sangha together and made a new rule. He said bhikkhus and bhikkhunis are not allowed to cut down trees. Not only that, they're not allowed even to hack off branches of living trees or even pluck a green leaf from a tree.

That's a nice story. It gives me a good feeling, but I admit it doesn't take us very far when it comes to understanding and addressing the climate crisis. So we can still wonder, where does Buddhism fit in here?

What I want to suggest to you is that there is, in fact, a precise and profound parallel between what Buddhism says about our individual predicament—in the way that we've been talking about it this week—and our collective predicament in relationship to the biosphere. Yesterday I talked quite a bit about collective selves. I mentioned, for example, that David Loy isn't only David Loy; he's a man, not a woman. I'm American, not British, and so forth.

In this case, the interesting collective self is the largest possible one, you might say. It's the human species. It's human civilization in relationship to the rest of the biosphere. The question is, how can we understand that duality? How can we understand that relationship?

What I want to suggest to you is that the ecological crisis is every bit as much a spiritual crisis as it is a technological or economic or political one.

And of course many people refer to this and say this, but I'd like to try to put a little bit more flesh on this claim and go into it in some detail.

Does this mean, therefore, that there might also be some parallel between the two solutions? Does the Buddhist solution to our individual predicament, therefore, imply something important about the collective solution? Well, I'll try to say something about that toward the end of the talk.

Now I'm going to ask Jenny to pass out a handout. There are two sides to it, so you can do me a favor by folding it so that you only see the left-hand side for now. Let's just look at the left-hand side.

If you look at those six points, I think you'll see that basically that's what I've been trying to talk about this week. Just looking at the left-hand side for the moment, let's go through it quickly, and I think you'll see that this is really what we've certainly been spending our time on—the claim that we can understand anatta today in more contemporary terms, that our sense of self is a psychological and social construct.

The problem with the construct is that it involves a sense of separation. The construction of a sense of self that's separate and inside is also the construction of that which is outside, an objective external world. This involves anxiety because this supposed self inside can never secure itself because there's nothing there, really. Because it has no reality separate from the whole. It's simply, as I've been saying, one of the ways in which the whole comes together.

And anxiety, therefore, that includes—and maybe I haven't said very much about this—confusion, naturally, about who I am and what my life is about as a separate person.

We talked about two nights ago some of the ways in which we try to ground ourselves in response to this anxiety of separation. Ways that often make things worse. So I talked a little bit about money, fame, romantic love. We could have said as much about the desire for power. The irony so often is that by trying to secure myself in this way, I so often make things worse because the things I do, the kind of manipulations I might have to play, deceiving people, or at least using them as means to the ends, has the long-term effect, of course, of increasing the sense of separation, alienation.

In response, Buddhism doesn't say that we have to get rid of the self. That's not possible, because there never was a self. But we can wake up—that is to say, we can see through the delusion of a separate self. And this awakening in Buddhism liberates us and empowers us. And I think one of the things it naturally does, because it radically reduces our own self-preoccupation, our own narcissism, because we know that we're not separate from other people, then naturally there's a lot of different ways we can respond. But it's going to be a way that wants to help other people. We can find various ways to do that according to our own temperament and our situation, but in general it's going to be something along that line.

So that's basically what we've spent enough—or maybe too much—time talking about on that left side.

What I think is extraordinary is that this Buddhist account of our individual predicament corresponds so precisely to our collective ecological predicament, which is on the right side, and now we can open it up.

If this parallel is true, then the following must also be true. Human civilization is also a construct, just like the personal sense of self. It's the construct that's led to a collective sense of separation or alienation from the natural world, in this case—an alienation that causes collective anxiety, an anxiety that includes uncertainty about the role of humanity. What does it mean to be a human being? What's the meaning of civilization? Where are we going? Do we have a goal? Is there a meaning to it? I mean, Christians a thousand years ago thought so. What do we think now?

In response, we try to ground ourselves in ways that make our situation worse. Just as if we become preoccupied, say, with money, that can often make our situation worse by aggravating the alienation. So I think that we respond in ways that aggravate our alienation, our collective alienation from the earth.

The solution is not to return to nature. We can't return to nature for the simple reason that we've never left it.

Just as we cannot rid ourselves of the self because there has never been a self, we do need to awaken and realize our non-duality with the biosphere and what that implies. This realization can collectively free and empower us to heal the biosphere. It can resolve our collective existential or spiritual problem about what it means to be human.

With us, the biosphere becomes self-conscious. Our role today has to be to heal it—to heal the biosphere and to heal that sense of bifurcation between us and the biosphere.

Let me set the stage with two favorite quotations. The first is from Thich Nhat Hanh: "We are here to overcome the illusion of our separateness." The second comes from the great 13th century Japanese Zen master Dogen: "I came to realize clearly that mind is no other than mountains and rivers and the great wide earth, the sun and the moon and the stars."

The first claim—that human civilization is something constructed by us—is both the most obvious and yet the most significant. We're familiar with revolutions, reform movements, legislatures that can pass laws. If we're not happy with the kind of society we have, we have governments that can reconstruct it.

Nevertheless, this claim that human civilization is a social construct is not something that most ancient societies would have understood. In the West, we owe this insight to classical Greece, which as far as I know was the first civilization to distinguish between what they called phusis and nomos—phusis being the natural world with all its patterns, and nomos being human convention or social convention, including the nature of human society.

The Greeks realized this distinction and proceeded to reform their society. We trace Greece as one of the roots of Western evolution because they had this insight and started the process of self-transformation that we have continued. The Greeks realized that unlike the natural world, whatever is social convention can be reconstructed. In that way we can attempt to determine our own destiny.

Think of Plato's Republic—a complex blueprint for a new society. We're familiar with such blueprints today and take them for granted, but Plato was doing something truly radical. The Republic was revolutionary for its time.

Today it's difficult for us to understand that traditional societies didn't realize this distinction between nature and society. Without our sense of historical development, they lacked our sense that future possibilities might be quite different from the present. Most ancient societies accepted their own social conventions as inevitable, just as natural as their ecosystems.

Rulers might be overthrown, but the new ruler would take his natural place at the top of the social pyramid, which was also a religious pyramid. Kings usually had special roles in relating to the gods, the transcendent powers that supervised the created world. Often human beings had crucial roles in keeping the cosmos functioning.

Consider the Aztecs and their massive human sacrifices, tearing hearts from victims to offer to the sun god. Why? This was necessary to keep the sun on its course through the heavens. Without human participation, chaos would ensue. The Mesopotamians believed humans had been created by the gods as slaves to serve them, to provide what the gods needed—that was our function within the cosmos.

For these societies, the distinctions we take for granted between the natural world, the social order, and religion didn't exist. Understanding one's society as natural justified social arrangements we today wouldn't tolerate. None of us would want to live in an Aztec or ancient Mesopotamian society.

But there was nevertheless a significant advantage they had over us—a psychological benefit. People in such cultures shared and took for granted a collective sense of meaning, the meaning of their lives in the cosmos, that we today do not have, that we've lost.

For them, it's not only that their society and religion are woven into the very fabric of existence—the meaning of their lives is embedded in the cosmos itself and revealed through their spiritual understanding. For them, of course, this isn't conceived as "a religion" but simply as an explanation, an account of the way things truly are.

For us, in contrast—and this is the crucial point—the meaning of our lives and the purpose of our societies has become something we must determine for ourselves in a universe whose meaning, if any, is no longer evident. Even if we choose to be religious, we must choose among countless different possibilities, which tends to diminish the natural security and comfort that comes from growing up within a tradition and simply accepting it as truth.

So although we enjoy many freedoms that such ancient societies didn't provide—freedoms we certainly wouldn't want to surrender—one of the profound costs of our liberation is that we have lost their kind of social security. That is to say, we've lost the basic psychological comfort that comes from knowing our place and role not only in society but in the cosmos itself.

In other words, part of the rich cultural legacy of the Greeks, for better and worse, has been an increasing anxiety about who we are and what it means to be human. This is what accompanies the freedom to reconstruct our societies. This is what comes with recognizing the distinction between the natural world and social convention. Yes, we're free to change things, but then they're no longer natural in that fundamental way.

The loss or reduction of faith in God has left us rudderless, both collectively and individually. Thanks to our modern technologies, it seems we can do almost anything we want to do. Yet paradoxically, the more we become capable of doing, the less we seem to know what we should do, what we want to do, what our role actually is. What sort of world do we want to live in? What kind of society do we want to have? If we can't depend on God or God-like rulers to tell us, we're thrown back entirely on ourselves. And this lack of grounding greater than ourselves becomes another profound source of dukkha, collectively as well as individually.

To sum up: our modern sense of separation from the natural world has become an ongoing source of alienation and frustration because we no longer know who we are, what the meaning of our lives is, or what purpose human civilization might serve.

Now, what has been our response to this collective predicament? Let's first remember how we respond to the individual, personal predicament. I try to make my anxious sense of self more real, more comfortable, often by becoming attached or preoccupied with things in the outside world—money, for instance. But no matter how much I may acquire, I never seem to have enough because it doesn't address that basic anxiety. Money isn't the real issue when the problem is a fundamental sense of lack stemming from the inherent insecurity of the constructed sense of self.

Believing that something outside myself is the solution to my sense of lack—this is the fundamental delusion, leading to solutions that actually reinforce the basic problem: the sense of separation.

But here's the crucial question: Is there a collective parallel to these personal, individual compulsions? I think as soon as we ask the question this way, the answer becomes apparent. It's our obsession with never-ending progress and growth.

What motivates our attitude toward economic and technological development? When will our gross national product be large enough? When will we collectively consume enough? When will we have all the technology we need? These are strange questions because we cannot conceive of an endpoint. This suggests that perhaps we're not trying to reach somewhere, but rather running away from something.

Why is more always better if it can never be enough?

My point is that technology and economic growth in themselves cannot resolve the basic human problem of what it means to be human. More resources may be excellent means to accomplish something, but they cannot answer the problem as ends in themselves.

They're not good as ends in themselves. But since we're not sure how else to solve the problem, in effect, they have become a collective substitute—you could say forms of secular salvation that we seek but never quite attain. The means have become de facto ends.

Does that make any sense? Because we don't know what to value, we're preoccupied. Since we don't really know where we should go in our secular society, or what we should value, we have become demonically obsessed, I would say, with ever-increasing power and control.

Please notice the parallel with our individual predicament. Lacking the security that comes from knowing our place and role in the cosmos, we have been trying, vainly, unsuccessfully, to create our own security, collectively, as well as individually. Modern technology, in particular, has become our collective attempt to fully control the conditions of our existence on this planet. You could say, in effect, we've been trying to remold the earth so that it's completely adapted to our purposes, until everything becomes subject to our will, a kind of resource—resources meaning something we can use.

This is despite the fact, or maybe because of the fact, that we don't know what those purposes should be. Ironically, if predictably, this hasn't provided the sense of security and meaning that we seek. In the modern world, we've become more anxious, more confused, not less.

Now, if these parallels are valid, if they're an accurate description of our collective situation, I think we can see that something like the ecological crisis is going to be inevitable. Sooner or later, and it seems to be now, we're going to bump up against the limits of this compulsive project of endless growth and never enough control. And if our increasing reliance on technology as the solution to these problems is actually a symptom of the larger problem, that seems to imply that the ecological crisis requires something more than just a technological response.

That's not to say that technological responses aren't necessary. We know we need, for example, more efficient fuel cells. But the problem is that increasing dependence on ever more sophisticated technologies, ever more powerful technologies, can still aggravate further our sense of separation and alienation from the natural world. Whereas it seems to me that any successful solution has to involve recognizing that we're an integral part of the natural world. That also means embracing our responsibility for the welfare of the whole natural world, the biosphere, because ultimately its well-being cannot be differentiated from our own well-being. The rest of the biosphere is our body —and I mean that literally. It's not just a metaphor.

Remember Thich Nhat Hanh's cloud in the piece of paper? Well, the rainforest is in our bloodstream. Understood properly then, humanity taking care of the earth's rainforest is like me taking care of my own leg.

So what does this mean? Does it mean returning to nature? That would be like getting rid of the self—something neither possible nor desirable. We can't return to nature. Why? Because we have never left it.

We are very good at creating environments for ourselves, like this one, where we see our own image reflected back on us. We're here in this beautiful room, very well done in many ways, and we don't think about the forests or the oceans or what's going on elsewhere. But you don't have to think very hard to realize that everything here in this room, including our own bodies, is not just derived from nature, but is a way of nature taking form. The wood, obviously from trees. The carpet, maybe from wool. Many things are from oil, plastics, metal ore from the earth. Everything here is nature—just nature reformed, nature restructured. It's not as though we've created a world separate from nature.

The environment isn't merely an environment. That is to say, it's not merely the place where we happen to be located. The biosphere is the ground from which and within which we arise.

So the earth isn't only our home, it's our mother. And you could say, in this case, the relationship is even closer because we can never really cut the umbilical cord. We don't cut the umbilical cord. People have fantasies about terraforming Mars or something, but basically, as long as we're on this planet, as long as we're part of this biosphere, think of the air, the water, the food that circulates through us. We take it in our mouths, it's digested, it comes out the other end. That circulation is part of the great circulation of the natural world. It's not separate from that. It's just one microcosm of the macrocosm.

We've never been separate from the natural world. It's just that we've had the illusion that we can somehow sustain ourselves, just as we can have the illusion on the individual level that I have a separate self inside.

So according to this understanding, the problem that we have is not our technologies that are destroying the earth. Rather, I think it's the obsessive ways that we have been motivated to exploit the earth. It's not just the technologies themselves, it's our attitude toward the earth. Without these motivations, I think it would be possible to evaluate and use our technologies in a more beneficial sense because we could really discriminate more clearly between the ecological solutions that they can actually contribute to as well as the problems that they have created.

Recently, one example is nuclear power. It's interesting that in response to the disaster in Japan, we've had a big propaganda campaign on the part of nuclear power companies who were gearing up to get going full blast again. People had forgotten Chernobyl. And I feel almost sorry for them. Just when they're starting to get developed, this thing happens. And so a lot of people are spending a lot of time and money to persuade us that what happened in Japan can't really happen here in Europe or in the U.S. because our reactors are different.

The irony, by the way, is that when I was in Japan for twenty years, there was a nuclear movement that was arguing how crazy nuclear power was in a country like Japan with so many earthquakes. And the argument was always, "Oh, don't worry, what happened in Chernobyl could never happen here because we have different types of nuclear power plants."

Personally, I understand that I can see the attraction of nuclear power. If you need large amounts of power and oil and gas because of carbon and coal are very bad, I can see the tendency to want to move to nuclear. But I'm still struck by what I think it was Amory Lovins said: using nuclear power to create electricity is like using a chainsaw to cut butter.

And I still notice that the people who argue for nuclear power, the argument is almost always, "Well, it's better than coal." But I haven't seen anyone really come up with the answer to the fact that it creates waste products. I mean, even if nothing goes wrong, even if there is no disaster—and there are always disasters. I used to have a book, a Greenpeace book, that listed every nuclear accident. And there were hundreds of pages in it. Each page had several incidents. There's always things going wrong. We're human, right? They're going to go wrong.

But even if they go right, what you end up with a nuclear power plant is tons and tons and tons of radioactive material that's radioactive for many, many thousands of years. And I'm just astonished that we don't seem so concerned about that. Most of our CEOs can't think any further than the next quarterly report, or our presidents can't think of anything further than the next election, and we're willing to create these incredibly toxic, dangerous radioactive materials that are going to be dangerous to all living systems for tens of thousands of years and we don't seem to be bothered by that.

I can understand the argument if you need lots of energy: maybe nuclear is the best way to go in the minds of some people because it's better than the carbon fuels. But I'd like to suggest a different solution. The problem is that we keep assuming the necessity for continuous economic and technological expansion—that we're thinking, "Okay, we have this much energy that we're using and we need more and more energy because we're making more and more stuff. And how are we going to find a way to make all that energy if we don't have fossil fuels?"

But if we didn't assume that kind of economy that has to grow if it's not to collapse—if we had a different kind of economic system that was more steady state and more frugal—then maybe we wouldn't need such a huge source of energy. Maybe one of the things that we would be able to do is reduce our energy needs.

In other words, what I'm suggesting is that we reverse our way of thinking. And I want to offer a very simple, if not easy, solution to our energy problems. Instead of asking the question, "How can we get all the energy we need?" I propose that we turn it around and determine how much energy we can get from renewable resources like fuel cells, solar, wind, and so forth. And then on the basis of that—on the basis of the energy that's available—we consider restructuring our societies.

I mean, it seems to me sooner or later that's what we're going to end up doing anyway, whether by choice or not. Doesn't that seem commonsensical? I have to stress it's simple but not easy because it requires pretty basic changes in governance and so forth, but I expect it's going to be necessary.

Are you with me so far? Am I persuading you about the parallels?

There's still one big question left, and that's what I want to finish talking about: how does this kind of approach resolve that basic anxiety I was discussing at the beginning? Remember the Aztecs—they were part of the world, and the meaning of their lives was naturally structured into the cosmos. We're not going to be able to return to that even if we wanted to. So how do we resolve the basic anxiety that haunts us now, where we have to create our own meaning? We have to find our own meaning in a world where God has died, in a secular world.

Like it or not, our individual and collective self-consciousness today, our historical development, distances us from those ancient worldviews and the kind of natural meaning of life they provided. We wouldn't want to return to those even if we could. But the question is, what other kinds of alternatives are available for us?

I think this is really to ask: what kind of collective parallel might correspond to the individual awakening that Buddhism promotes? Thich Nhat Hanh has said, "The Buddha attained individual awakening. Now we need a collective enlightenment to stop the course of destruction." But what can that mean?

I want to conclude with a few reflections on this, and I wonder if the important issue here is evolution—how we understand evolution. It's very interesting. Lots of religions have problems with evolution because they have their own creation myths. But Buddhism has no problem whatsoever. In fact, the whole concept of evolution fits perfectly with basic Buddhist ideas about impermanence, interdependence, lack of substantial identity, and constant transformation.

It seems to me that if religions are to remain relevant today, they need to stop denying or ignoring or minimizing evolution and turn it around. I think we need a religion that makes the evolutionary process central to its teachings. What religion adds is the question about the meaning of that process, which scientists sometimes think they answer themselves, but I think that's a big delusion. They can tell us what's happening, but they don't really understand the meaning of it.

According to Brian Swimme, a cosmologist, the greatest scientific discovery of all time is that if you leave hydrogen gas alone for about fourteen billion years, plus or minus a few hundred thousand, it turns into "giraffes, rose bushes, and humans."

Is that also one of the most important spiritual discoveries of all time?

It seems to me fourteen billion years is actually a very short period of time to evolve from hydrogen gas—thinking about the Big Bang, first plasma, then hydrogen. Fourteen billion years from the Big Bang to create a Buddha, a Jesus, an Einstein, a Gandhi—that's remarkably short. I know my sixty-three years have gone very quickly.

Unless, of course, hydrogen gas is actually something a little different than the reductionistic way it's usually understood. And that's the issue here.

What we normally think of as evolution—genetic evolution, biological evolution—is only one part of a triple evolution. I suggest we need to look at the whole arc and see all three evolutions as part of one big evolutionary developmental curve.

Well, at the time of the Big Bang, what do you have? You have plasma and then you have basically hydrogen. That's the first element that's formed. But then how do you get all the other elements that we know about? They have to develop, they have to evolve in a sense. And where do they develop? In the cores of stars.

What happens is that after a long time, the cloud of hydrogen gathers and then it condenses. When it reaches a certain density, nuclear fusion begins. In the very core of the stars, hydrogen starts to fuse into heavier elements. You start getting helium, and the process continues from there. That's where the heavier elements are created. So that's the first evolutionary process.

I remember reading somewhere—I think it was Carl Sagan's Cosmos—that a normal star can only fuse elements up to gold. Gold is too difficult. In order for gold and the higher elements to be fused and created, you need supernovas that are so big and so powerful that they can create all the higher elements. But then these stars have to explode and scatter all these heavier elements around, right? So that's the first stage of evolution.

Then over time—and this is a wonderful story, I think. It's incredible. Think about it. And it's our story. We're talking about our bodies here. After time, you get these secondary solar systems forming. Now you not only have hydrogen, but on Earth, you've got all these heavier elements. And it just so happens they're the elements that we need for life, or at least life learns to depend on the ones that are here. You get calcium, CO_2—carbon, oxygen—and so forth.

Because you have all these higher elements, heavier elements, you have the possibility of life and self-replicating life, where some of these elements somehow work together. You get amino acids and DNA, and you actually have something that can replicate itself. Then you get this incredible story—we all know the Darwinian story about the evolution of life on earth. But even that is only the secondary evolution.

We cannot minimize the third evolution, which is what? Cultural evolution, of course. There's still a big development—although comparatively fast now—between the first human beings, wherever you want to draw that line, and Einstein. You're not going to have an Einstein unless you've got the evolution of an incredibly sophisticated culture, civilization, which is what we have, which is what we're part of, which is what created all of us, as well as Einstein.

These are nested. If you think about these three developmental processes, the first one creates the conditions necessary for the second one, and the second one creates the conditions necessary for the third one. Human beings, our species depends on many other species still.

Here's the question: How are we to understand this whole sweep of 14 billion years? What's going on here? Is there a meaning to it? Theists, a lot of people who believe in God, they say that there's a being outside these processes that's directing it. In contrast, you'll find a lot of scientists who say this is basically a kind of haphazard, accidental process, including the evolution of life due to random DNA mutations.

The question is, is there a third alternative here? According to the evolutionary biologist Theodore Dobzhansky, evolution is neither random nor determined, but creative. That's his word: creative. Creative of what? Well, obviously, in one sense, the tendency toward increasing complexity is hard to overlook, and also the fact that this increasing complexity seems to be associated with some kind of greater awareness. From a Buddhist perspective, this opens up very interesting possibilities.

Here's the important question, I think: Can we understand this groping self-organization of the universe, this whole sweep, as the universe struggling to become more self-aware, or groping in its own way toward awareness? Is my desire to awaken—remembering that the word Buddha means "the awakened"—is my desire to awaken supposedly the desire of this separate sense of self that doesn't really exist?

Is my desire to awaken from the other side the urge of the cosmos to become aware of itself—in me, as me? Is this the answer to that old question: if there is no self, who becomes awakened?

Please put this in the context of what we were saying yesterday about Indra's net and the piece of paper. Everything comes together in a certain way to create the piece of paper and us. Brian Swimme and Thomas Berry wrote a wonderful book in this direction called The Universe Story, which I recommend highly. They make this kind of claim: "The mind that searches for contact with the Milky Way is the very mind of the Milky Way galaxy itself in search of its own inner depths."

What does this imply, for example, about Walt Whitman admiring a beautiful sunset? "Walt Whitman is a space the Milky Way fashioned to feel its own grandeur." Isn't that beautiful?

Think about our eye. Think about the evolution of the eye. Isn't the eye something that the whole biosphere has evolved in order to see itself, rather than thinking of me as something behind the eye looking out at the world? What different perspective do we have on the eye if we think of it just like Thich Nhat Hanh's piece of paper?

Is this how Buddhist enlightenment can be understood today? What did Shakyamuni Buddha realize when he looked up? According to one Mahayana tradition, he had his enlightenment when he looked up from his meditations and saw the morning star, Venus, shining brightly in the sky. And then he said something like, "I now realize that all beings have the Buddha nature."

But there's another phrase that sometimes is said—and I think I've mentioned this already—that when the Buddha became enlightened, the whole universe became enlightened. All of us became enlightened. And how did Dogen describe his own awakening? "I came to realize clearly that mind is no other than mountains and rivers and the great wide earth, the sun and the moon and the stars."

But there's a problem. As we know, here we go back to the problem. Every species can be looked upon as a kind of experiment of the biosphere. And scientists tell us, biologists, that less than one percent of all the species that have ever evolved on Earth still exist. Over ninety-nine percent have evolved and then disappeared.

What's special about our species is that our supersized cortex enables us to become co-creators. And here I'm thinking about that famous phrase from the Bible where we're told that humans are created in the image of God. What does it mean to be created in the image of God? Does that mean God has two eyes and one nose? Or is it the case that somehow... I think God is this kind of creative principle, this self-organizing creating principle. And what's unique about human beings is that with us, new types of creativity become possible.

If God wanted to create a symphony, he needs us. He's got to work through us, right? And there are a lot of things he's got to do—or it's got to do, or she's got to do—to create a symphony. Think about it. But there's a new kind of creativity that's become possible. With human evolution, with cultural evolution, the creative possibilities explode exponentially. We not only have symphonies, we have incredible things. With us, new types of species become possible that we co-create. Again, made in the image of God.

Knives—there wouldn't be any knives without us. Cities. Poetry. And world wars. Cathedrals and concentration camps. Symphonies, as I said, and nuclear bombs.

As some of these examples suggest, there does seem to be a problem with our hyper-rational cortex. Nietzsche has his Zarathustra saying that "man is a rope across an abyss"—I think we can put that in gender-neutral language.

The human species is a rope across an abyss. The implication I derive from this is that we're a transitional species, that there's something incomplete about us. Must we evolve further in order to survive at all?

There's a book by Michael Dowd called Thank God for Evolution—I love the title, and it's a pretty good book too. In it, he describes our collective problem as "systemic sin"—that's the Christian word. He writes: "The fundamental immaturity of the human species at this time is that our systems of governance and economics not only permit but actually encourage subsets of the whole to benefit at the expense of the whole." Our systems encourage subsets of the whole—he gives the example of individuals and corporations—to benefit at the expense of the whole.

Is that where we're stuck? Because those subsets think of themselves as separate from the whole? Again, we come back to this sense of separation that's so problematical. Again, we bump into the delusion of separate selves that pursue their own self-interest at the cost of the greater whole that they're actually part of.

So what I'm suggesting is perhaps figures like the Buddha and Gandhi—maybe we can look upon them as prototypes, harbingers of the way in which our species needs to develop. What do you think? If that's true, then the kind of cultural evolution or evolutionary development that's most necessary now involves spiritual practices that address this fiction of a separate self, that help us overcome the fiction of a separate self whose well-being is separate from other people.

I'm really struck by this realization in recent years—how plastic the brain is, how it changes, how when we are meditating, the brain is changing. The brain is restructuring, rewiring itself. I'm just amazed by that, and I almost can't help thinking of it as like a fourth kind of evolutionary process. At this point in our cultural evolution, we have reached the point where we realize that in order to survive, we don't just need genetic DNA mutations of a certain sort, but we can contribute to the process by doing nothing—getting out of the way, as it were—and this whole transformation, this evolutionary development continues when we are on our cushion. That's the way it seems to me.

Perhaps our basic problem isn't self-love, but a real deep misunderstanding of what the self really is. I think it's becoming very clear that without the compassion that arises when we realize our non-duality—that is to say, empathy not only with other human beings, but with the whole of the biosphere—it's becoming more and more likely that civilization as we know it is not going to survive the next few centuries. Nor would it deserve to.

And I think it remains to be seen whether the Homo sapiens species experiment will be a successful vehicle for this evolutionary process. Maybe it won't. Maybe we'll be like the other 99% who have their day and then disappear. But it would be kind of a shame. I mean, it seems like there's that possibility, and it depends on us.

But then I always remember that in one way it's really strange to think of ourselves, as we always do, as separate from the natural world. We are literally an experiment of the biosphere. So if the experiment goes wrong, it's the biosphere that tried something that didn't work. But it does feel as if we're being told now: grow up or get out of the way. That's the feeling I have, and not only me.

To conclude: Does all this give us a different perspective on our collective relationship with the biosphere? Is the eco-crisis a spiritual challenge that calls upon us to realize our non-duality with the earth? It's very interesting at this particular point in history—remember from the first night, the coming together of these two worldviews, the Buddhist emphasis on personal transformation and the Western one on social transformation, the new possibilities that happen when they come together. It's very interesting that this occurs at a time of urgent change. And I think it's more than eco-crisis—it's social and economic crisis as well. Very interesting. Is it just a coincidence?

So what I'm doing to conclude: I think all this suggests a final parallel between the individual and the collective. The question is, will our species become the collective bodhisattva of the biosphere? Isn't humanity challenged today to discover the meaning and the role it seeks in what I think is going to have to be the ongoing long-term task of repairing the rupture between us and Mother Earth? In other words, repairing what we've done to the biosphere. It seems to me that's going to be—isn't that the meaning that's given to us at this point in history? Of what it means for us collectively.

And that process, that healing—one suspects will therefore transform us as a civilization as much as the rest of the biosphere. What do you think?

Well, I realize I forgot one beautiful quote from Thomas Berry, who has been one of the major figures in this whole evolutionary perspective. We might summarize our present human situation by the simple statement: in the twentieth century, the glory of the human has become the desolation of the earth. And now, the desolation of the earth is becoming the destiny of the human.

Ouch.

A participant asked: "You wrote about thinking of awareness as bound and unbound. Would you say now, regarding this subject, that actually this unbound awareness you're speaking about is exactly the key to realizing this connection? The natural way of..."

That's a fascinating question. The issue of awareness is quite complicated, and that way of expressing it is complex in itself. I haven't usually developed it in relationship to this ecological perspective.

The article starts with some quotations, including a very famous line from the Diamond Sutra that's sometimes translated as: "Let your mind arise without fixing it anywhere." It points to the tendency of awareness to stick to things. I think we can understand this in the context of what I was saying earlier—we're always looking for security. Our awareness is constantly seeking security, trying to secure the sense of self. It's the very nature of awareness that it's looking for something to grasp onto.

And yet that's the problem. Awareness isn't aware that in and of itself it doesn't need to do that. The liberation of awareness is the realization that the mind doesn't need to stick anywhere.

This goes back to the Heart Sutra's famous teaching: "Form is emptiness, emptiness is form." For a long time I puzzled over that, looking for the emptiness inside that takes form as things. But of course, the real emptiness is the emptiness of our own minds—the nature of our own awareness, our own consciousness. It has no qualities in and of itself, and that's why it can become anything. That's why it can take any form.

Whether I can relate that to evolution right now, I'll have to think more about that, to be honest. It's a very intriguing question. Did you have some connection in mind?

The participant responded: "I think I can put it like this—by not letting our awareness be unbound, we actually hinder evolution in the sense you were talking about. We are always in the way of evolution by creating a self which is not there."

Yes, awareness gets stuck. For example, I was suggesting that in meditation there's a kind of transformation going on in the brain—and we know this is physically true. This happens because awareness isn't sticking to something. There's an open quality to it, and then transformation occurs naturally. That makes a lot of sense.

Another participant raised the challenging issue of population: "David Attenborough said at a conference last year that the actual problem is not climate change—the problem is population growth. From an ecological perspective, this makes sense, but when people are already struggling to respond to climate change, and you introduce a subject like population growth—how do you even begin to discuss something like that? Unless you get to a crisis point where you really have to limit population, people are not going to want to respond."

Exactly. What politician is going to run on the platform of restricting population? That may be the toughest challenge of all in a democratic society. And yet, obviously, there are too many people.

The unconscious presents another fascinating dimension. I read Guy Claxton's The Wayward Mind, which explores how we might understand this realm beneath consciousness. For some, like Freud, the unconscious becomes a repository of troublesome impulses. Jung saw it more positively—as something archetypal, even religious in nature, containing far more wisdom than what operates at the conscious level.

Buddhism also has a concept of the unconscious in the Yogacara school, which describes different levels of awareness. It speaks of the alaya-vijnana, the seed repository consciousness, where the karmic seeds—the habitualized patterns of thinking and acting from our past—are somehow stored. Though in this Buddhist understanding, these seeds are generally viewed as problematic. The goal is to "roast the seeds," to eliminate these conditioning patterns that perpetuate suffering.

In terms of practice, if we're working to get the ego-self out of the way, then we're allowing something deeper to manifest. The sixth patriarch expressed this beautifully when he said he had nothing to teach—no doctrine to transmit. He simply recognized where people were stuck, where their minds had become caught, and offered whatever might help them let go. It wasn't about giving them something new, but removing obstacles so their true nature could manifest.

This connects to something profound about our cosmic story. When we hear about how we're literally made of stardust—how the atoms in our bodies were forged in the hearts of ancient stars—it fills us with awe. John Seed, working with Joanna Macy, tells the story from the Big Bang onward as our creation myth. But we don't usually recognize it as myth; we present it as science. Yet traditional societies understand that creation stories serve essential psychological and spiritual functions.

If we could embrace this cosmic narrative as our creation myth, we might better envision where the story goes next. This beautifully parallels the Buddhist understanding of overcoming separation. When Thich Nhat Hanh speaks of the piece of paper containing clouds and rain and sun, or when we contemplate Indra's net of infinite interconnection, these aren't vague concepts. We can see how evolution demonstrates this interdependence—how everything truly inter-is with everything else.

It's a magnificent story. Yet as long as we maintain this sense of separate self, somehow apart from the web of life, we tend to distort this understanding. We can't quite rest comfortably in it.

There's something strangely comforting in recognizing that every atom in our bodies will be recycled through cosmic processes. Yet there's also a tragic dimension we shouldn't ignore. The Beethoven symphonies will be lost. Our individual consciousness, our unique way of experiencing the world—these too will pass away.

Buddhism helps us transcend attachment to these losses, but we needn't deny their poignancy. David Loy will die. The people I love will be lost. This tragic element remains real and shouldn't be dismissed as we explore these deeper truths.

Regarding population control—this raises such intense feelings, and I understand the anger it can provoke. It's often presented as a red herring that distracts from more fundamental issues. History shows us repeatedly—from the Irish famine to crises in India—that the problem isn't typically too many people. The problem is how resources are controlled and distributed under systems like capitalism. When we focus solely on population, we risk overlooking these deeper structural inequities that create scarcity amid abundance.

This dialogue continues today. What concerns me deeply is that environmental catastrophe could become a dangerous red herring, because as you've just articulated, the logical conclusion of certain population arguments can lead toward authoritarianism—and that's truly perilous territory.

This is precisely why I felt compelled to speak. It's a crucial consideration that the reality of these massive catastrophes we face could result in total annihilation, or perhaps the emergence of something entirely new. But in that very process, we could easily find ourselves capitulating to some of the authoritarian tendencies we discussed yesterday. I believe this represents one of our greatest challenges—one that anyone considering themselves an environmentalist must seriously grapple with.

Thank you for raising that point. Sheila, did you want to respond?

Could I offer just one brief thought first? I find this a very important argument, and I actually find myself agreeing with both perspectives. I completely agree that population arguments are so often used to rationalize the present inequities. Those who already possess great wealth and power invoke population as the real problem, diverting attention from the profound maldistribution of resources in our civilization. I accept that critique entirely.

Nonetheless, I also believe that six billion human beings on this biosphere represents an enormous load with vast consequences for all other ecosystems. My conversations with biologists suggest this is genuinely problematic. We can sustain this population, but not without consuming so much of the earth's resources that it creates serious problems for countless other species.

So while I share your main concern, I still suspect we face genuine overpopulation. I also admit I have no clear solution to this dilemma—at least not in the short term. There are various approaches to population issues: educating women, for instance, typically leads to lower birth rates. That seems like a constructive path. But my sense remains that population represents a very serious and growing challenge, without dismissing your concern that it's so easily weaponized as a red herring to distract from the widening gap between rich and poor.

Sheila?

You present a very grim picture, notwithstanding your inspiring portrayal of evolution's different stages. Though I'm not sure it's quite that grim, actually. I'm experiencing something of a déjà vu at this moment. I feel as though I'm in a Catholic church in the late sixties, at one of those missions where a visiting priest arrives to tell you how sinful you are, how dire the situation is, how you better watch out. I was a teenager then and felt frightened. I'm not frightened now, but I wonder...

If we truly believe—and we do, as you say—that we are part of nature, then we are. Our awareness of this connection is another matter entirely, but the fundamental unity remains. This implies something hugely powerful. And I believe this awareness is dawning in people. I spoke recently about the banking crisis in Ireland and how there's a genuine feeling throughout the country that, as one academic put it, everything is now out on the table. There's nothing left to hide.

Even Americans who claim not to believe in climate change actually do understand what's happening to the planet. They're not in denial—they're lying for political reasons. Eventually they'll have to stop lying. They do believe it.

So I simply don't see things as quite so grim. We haven't reached the end yet. We don't know what power we collectively possess to unleash positive change. I don't want it to be that grim, and I genuinely don't believe it is. Things may be factually and statistically dire, but I don't necessarily think the outcome will be as bleak as you paint it.

When you say things aren't that grim, do you mean the situation climate scientists describe—the carbon levels and their consequences? That's as grim as they say it is.

But you think because of our response and the fact that...

I think our response is more than what is being portrayed. Our response is manifold and varied throughout the world in all sorts of different ways, both large and small. Things are happening in response.

Yes, I think they are responding, and I think they are too. Whether they're enough, I don't know, but they are happening.

Someone in the back raised a point about being proven right or wrong in ten years time, noting that much damage has already happened to the ecology. But it's not a question of proving anything in that sense. I could spend a week quantifying the response that's been happening around the world in all sorts of ways. The situation is as grim as it is, yes. But I'm saying that we are responding. The world is responding. Not adequately enough, perhaps, but I don't think it's as grim as it's being painted.

Another question came up about people's belief or disbelief in climate change - watching someone shift from a consensus view during election periods. I'm not denying climate change; I'm simply saying that our view of what's happening doesn't have to be as grim. And yes, it doesn't take much energy to stop people believing something.

But let's consider this: if that thesis about our predicament is correct, the only way we can move forward is to look at what we can actually grow with the resources we currently have - our natural resources. If that thesis is correct, we've actually got an answer in one of the Buddha's teachings that shows how we can reframe this situation.

His famous teaching to Angulimala. Can you recall it? Angulimala had killed ninety-nine people when he encountered the Buddha. He started running after the Buddha, but the Buddha was simply walking. However hard Angulimala ran, he couldn't catch up - the Buddha just walked. Finally Angulimala called out, "You stop too!" And the Buddha replied, "I have stopped. You stop too." Through this, Angulimala gained insight.

If we reframe that teaching into a wider context, if Buddhists are going to adopt this perspective, we could say simply: "You stop."

Speaking of reframing, what Buddhism says about śūnyatā, emptiness, is understood and presented in different ways across Buddhist traditions. Nāgārjuna, for example, understands it as shorthand for the absence of being, the absence of svabhāva or self-being in things. It's a way to deny that things have any inherent self-existence.

But can we understand śūnyatā, this emptiness, more dynamically? Could it be another way to understand that fundamental creative principle we've been discussing?

Is that the fundamental principle of... Is that the emptiness that's always taking form, taking new forms, transforming? Not taking new form out of nothing. It's dependent on the previous evolutionary possibilities that are available there. But it's not bound. It's always creative. It's always taking new form.

Looking at the time and the fact that we're limited now, the question I'd like to leave you with is this: going back to your point about mind bound and unbound, this fundamental creative principle that Dobzhansky talks about and the nature of our own minds—as in the Diamond Sutra, "let your mind arise without fixing it anywhere," because your mind in and of itself has no qualities, it can take any form—is it the same thing? Is that the creative principle?

Is it the same creative principle that existed at the time of the Big Bang and the kind of transformations that took place with the Big Bang, and then all the evolutionary developments I was talking about? Is that the same creative principle that is the very nature of our own minds?

CHAPTER 277

Climate Change, Capitalism, and Buddhadharma

Rob Burbea · 57 min

> In this compelling dharma talk, Rob Burbea draws profound connections between ancient Buddhist wisdom and our contemporary climate emergency. He explores the Buddha's teaching on mamatta (mine-ness) and the illusion of ownership, referencing the Aggañña Sutta (DN 27) - the Buddha's creation story that traces human suffering back to the establishment of private property. Burbea examines how the fundamental Buddhist understanding of anattā (not-self) naturally extends to questioning our attachment to ownership and possession.
>
> The talk weaves together insights from early Buddhist texts with urgent contemporary issues, including the UN climate conferences, corporate influence on environmental policy, and the growing wealth inequality between nations. Burbea demonstrates how the Buddha's vision of the Saṅgha as a community without private property offers a radical alternative to current economic systems that prioritize profit over planetary wellbeing.
>
> This dharma talk challenges practitioners to consider how Buddhist principles of interdependence (paṭiccasamuppāda) and compassion for all beings can inform our response to the climate crisis. Burbea encourages engaged Buddhist practice that moves beyond individual liberation to collective action for the welfare of all life on Earth.

Good evening. I am so glad to have a chance to be with you tonight. It's been quite a while since I've been here, and it's always a treat. I feel honored and glad to be in your presence.

I want to start by thinking about the title I've given tonight's talk, which describes what I'm prepared to discuss: Climate Change, Capitalism, and the Buddha Dharma. So you're forewarned.

Right as we sit here, there has been an epochal event happening all week in Warsaw—the 19th Conference of Parties on Climate Change, with 198 countries coming together to see what agreements can be reached and enforced to slow down the accelerating growth of greenhouse gas emissions. This comes right on the heels of the latest report from the UN's IPCC, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, which shows the increasingly serious situation we're in. The dates are getting closer by which it will be out of control, and we'll be lucky if we can keep emissions to not much over 400 parts per million and keep the temperature from exceeding 2 degrees Celsius or 3.6 Fahrenheit.

Today, hundreds of people walked out of the meeting. These were representatives from civil society—Oxfam, Greenpeace, Friends of the Earth, ActionAid, International Trade Union Confederation, 350.org—and the pictures show many young people among them. Why did they walk out? Because of the corporate presence. At the very same time, there is a big coal conference—the coal industry meeting—in Warsaw. The presence of corporations and what they're handing out to delegates is more obvious than ever before.

This may be connected to another report released today showing that the industrialized nations of the North have failed to deliver on their promise to provide 500 billion dollars each year to help developing countries reduce their emissions and adapt to climate change impacts. The whole sense of justice around who's causing climate change versus who's suffering from it is so heartbreaking and ironic. Those whose emissions continue to be generated, who are fearful and reluctant to set enforceable limits, are not suffering nearly as much as those in the global south. We've just seen, right on the eve of this meeting, what happened and continues to happen in the Philippines.

Even if these nations do deliver what they've promised for helping developing countries deal with climate change, it turns out to be only one-fifth—20 percent—of the subsidies they pay to fossil fuel companies. This reveals the grip that transnational fossil fuel companies have on the carbon-emitting nations.

There was a fascinating article in AdBusters the other day by Richard Smith titled "Sleepwalking to Extinction: Capitalism and the Destruction of Life on Earth." He points out that we can't make any real dent in emissions given the obstruction and power of oil, gas, and coal companies—with new coal plants opening every week in China. He ends with a sobering observation: "These giant corporations are wiping out life on earth in the course of a routine business day."

Looking at this political economy, I wonder what the Buddha would say about it. He didn't talk about capitalism, but he did talk about private property. Capitalism is built on the principle of private property—the principle that certain humans can own the earth for the purpose of exploiting it for profit.

I invite you to reflect on what we can find in the Buddha's teachings that speaks to this. My scholarship in Buddhism draws from the early Pali Canon, where our insight meditation practice originates. You know how important the notion of there not being a separate permanent self is in Buddhist teachings—this is called the anatta doctrine. When you really look at it, the Buddha didn't say there wasn't a self. He simply said he wasn't sure there was one, that you couldn't find one, that he'd never seen or experienced one. Within vipassana practice itself, within insight meditation...

It is such an exquisite part of the practice itself that as you attend to what is happening in your experience, moment by moment, second by second, you see a stream of psychophysical events happening. There are thoughts and there are sensations and there are memories. But as you become more and more aware, you can slow down enough to see this stream of consciousness. Nowhere there can you seem to locate a personal self, an abiding self, the one who is experiencing it. You can see experience, but not an I or a self who is doing the experiencing. You can see the stream of these events, thoughts, feelings, but you can't see anybody sort of on the banks of the stream watching it.

So I find that as a practice, vipassana is very linked to this notion of anatta, and liberating—truly liberating. In my own practice, in my own life story, the liberation that comes from understanding that there is not a permanent self. There's not a permanent Joanna that I have to fix or improve or mortify or punish or save or enlighten, or anything. It's because it's just a stream of experience, and what I choose and what I experience shapes that. Certainly, Joanna exists, but she's changing.

The Buddha Dharma, the teachings of the Buddha, are so exquisitely revealing to help us see how in that changing we can grow in our capacity to understand, in our capacity to respond to need, in our capacity for clear comprehension, in our capacity to feel loving-kindness. All of these can grow because these are factors that we can encourage in our stream of being.

But you know what? Even before the Buddha talks about there being no permanent separate self, he talks about mamata, which means "mine-ness." He says, "Watch out." Even before he says watch out for thinking you have a permanent self, he says watch out for the thought or feeling that something can be mine, that something can be yours. That notion of possession, that you can own something, he says produces great suffering and is an illusion, even more than thinking of the self.

And so when he called together his group of wonderful disciples and co-journeyers on the path, all those who gathered around him during his forty years of teaching, and he created a community—a model community that he called the Sangha—you can see that he put that notion to work because there's no private property in the Sangha. And there was equality in the Sangha. It was open to everybody. And it was self-governing.

Its decisions were to be taken in what they call in concert, in consortium—everybody sat together to make the choices, to decide where they were going to settle, to decide how they were going to keep their precepts. It was self-governance.

This has been fascinating to me over the years in my own reading of the early teachings. What I want to focus on though, I want to go back to this private property with a story that he told, which illustrates in a humorous way—because it was slightly humorous as he told it. It was a kind of tongue-in-cheek Genesis story. If you're looking for a story of how things began, how the world started in Buddhism, you'll find this. It was called the Aggañña Sutta, and it was in the Dīgha Nikāya.

And I'm going to tell it to you. I brought the scriptures here, and like many stories, it's extremely tedious to read, so I will not try to read it to you. I think that is largely because these were committed to memory. You know that these discourses of the Lord Buddha were remembered for three centuries before they were written down. And so to keep the mnemonics, to help people learn them by heart from generation to generation, there was a lot of repetition, a little bit like nursery rhymes. There's "The House That Jack Built"—you repeat, repeat, repeat in order to bring in new elements. But if you sit down for a quick read in our cultural tempo, it's challenging.

So I'm going to tell it to you. And if you want to look at it later, I have the scriptures right here so that you can see I'm not kidding.

Now, I said it was humorous, tongue in cheek, because the Buddha in his teachings said that there are certain things that you can't know and that are pointless to discuss because they're outside our experience. One is whether there's a God or not. Another is whether there's life after death, whether an enlightened arhat gets reborn. He said you can't tell that from your experience. It was very empirical. And another one—he says you can't talk seriously or debate about the beginning of things because it's not in an empirically verifiable way of understanding.

So the fact that he would begin to talk about "once upon a time there was nothing at all" and then a world came into being—you could know that he was having a twinkle in his eye.

The very reason he told this story was because there was a conversation going on between some Brahmin monks, bhikkhus in his sangha among his followers, who were from the Brahmin caste. The Brahmin caste was the most pure, highest caste in Indian society. As you know, there were the Brahmins and the Kshatriyas, and then the Vaishyas and Shudras—these castes were clearly considered one superior and purer than the other.

The fact that the Buddha opened his sangha to people from all castes, even to outcaste people, even to runaway soldiers and runaway slaves, made people quite offended. Some of his followers from the Brahmin caste said, "When we go back to our families and hear what's said about us, people are reviling us and casting dirt and dust upon us and saying terrible things about us because we have joined your sangha which allows people in that are from menial backgrounds—dark-skinned people too, because the Brahmins have paler complexion—and we associate with people who are water carriers, leather workers, escaped slaves."

In Indian lore at that time, the castes were understood from the sacred texts of the Vedanta of Hinduism to have come from the different parts of the body of the great divine being, the Mahapurusha, from whom the world was made. From the head came the Brahmins, from the arms came the warrior class, the Kshatriyas, from the loins came the tradespeople, from the feet came the workers of the soil. This was like our notion of divine right—an organization of society that was divinely and permanently put in place from the beginning of time.

Well, Gautama the Buddha didn't buy into this. There were many things about the Vedantic Hinduism of his time that he didn't accept. And so when they said, "But they tell us that the Brahmins came from the head," he replied, "You want to know about the beginning of things? I'll tell you a story about the beginning of things."

The people who knew him and his teachings well knew that he was joking because he had made it clear that you can't know the beginning of things.

Now, having taken too long telling you that, I will proceed to tell you the story.

At the beginning of things, he said, all was just dark and undifferentiated. All the beings were luminous and floating around, weightless and indistinguishable, totally the same one to the other. They were little bits of light wafting about over a dark and undifferentiated expanse.

Then, gradually, a kind of scum appeared on the waters below them—like a skin coming over milk as you heat it. The beings got curious about it. They looked at this substance, and it began to glow a little bit. They reached down and tasted it. It was delicious. "Oh," they said, "what a wonderful savor it has"—like honey.

It was so good that more and more of them began to taste it. The more they took of it, the more they wanted it. As they ate more of it, things began to differentiate. The surface below them began to be more earth-like and solid. They began to look more differentiated themselves. They began to lose their luminosity as heavenly objects appeared—a moon and sun and stars.

The more they ate, the more they began to look different from each other. Then they began to notice each other and compare: "She looks better than her. I look better than her." Discrimination arose from this comparing.

That reminds me of my friend Wes Nisker, who told me something that helped me so much. He said, "On the way to becoming a Buddha, according to the scriptures, one of the last imperfections that clings to the end is comparing mind—the temptation to make comparisons, which always can get you into trouble, especially when it's reflecting on yourself."

Well, as this comparing arose, the delicious substance they were eating disappeared. They bemoaned it: "Oh, the savor of it! Oh, wasn't it delicious? But where did it go?" All of this is in the sutta, if you think I'm making this up.

It's all there in the text—how they would cry out, "Ah, the savor of it!"

And so then something else appeared. As the land grew more solid, mushroom-like growths sprouted from it. These intrigued the beings, who were all looking quite different now, and they began eating these mushrooms. They were so good—just out of this world delicious. And so they continued eating, and then...

As they did, they became so differentiated. Some were quite gorgeous, some were rather homely. They had grown so different that there were males and females. When that happened—whoa! Lust arose, you know, and you know what early Buddhism thinks about that.

So pretty soon, those delicious mushrooms went away. What came after that were vines and creepers. The land was getting solid now, so green things were growing. But they were equally delicious when the beings ate of them. The beings were getting heavier with all this eating, walking around, and as they became all the more discriminating of each other—passing judgments on each other, forming cliques and developing clubbiness among themselves—when that happened, all those vines and creeping greenery went right away.

But now in its place, after a while, rice grew. Now you have real land, real soil, and delicious rice growing. This rice grew without any husk or chaff, so you didn't have to work to eat it. What you harvested grew right back again—what you took in the morning would grow right up again by afternoon and evening. So it was all you wanted, forever and ever.

You'd think that would be a pretty perfect situation. But then what happened was that one being—they said a rather lazy one—thought, "Oh, you know, I don't want to have to get up and go out to gather rice for every meal. Why don't I just take enough for two meals—my breakfast and my supper? I'll just take it all at once, and then I won't have to get up again to gather rice for supper."

And so that idea began to spread. Others thought, "Well, that's clever," and they began to harvest rice for two days at a time, then more and more people for four days at a time.

When that happened—when hoarding began—the whole situation changed. The rice didn't grow back. It stood as stubble. They had to wait and grow it themselves by the sweat of their brow. They had to winnow it, and it had husks that they had to remove. This meant there was scarcity.

So at this point, something very determinative happened. They said, "Well, I may not have enough, so I am going to build a wall. I'm going to fence this off. This is mine." And people began to build fences and walls to delineate their property.

When they did that, the next step followed—and the Buddha laid it out clearly. One person went over the wall and took some of his neighbor's rice. When he was told not to do that, he said, "I didn't do it. It wasn't me, it was him." And when they told both of them, "Don't do it again," they went over anyway.

So finally, thieving arose, lying arose, scolding arose, admonishments arose, and then violence—beating people up so they wouldn't take rice from the neighboring plot. And this, said the Buddha, all arose because they thought they could own their plot. It came with private property—theft, violence, lying, stealing, admonishment, and scolding.

So then the beings gathered and said, "We need to elect one among us to give punishment when needed and admonishment when needed to keep order." They chose someone they called the maha samatha—the great elected one. Everyone could vote, and this person would maintain order. In this way, the Buddha explained, organized society came into being.

He proceeded to show how this led to a division of labor that characterized what came to be called castes. But he emphasized that caste did not arise from divine decree or from some great sacred body. It emerged from the activity between people according to the dharma of paticcasamuppada—dependent co-arising, the central teaching of interdependence that lies at the heart of Buddha's doctrine.

What captivated my attention when I first read this forty years ago, and strikes me powerfully now as I share it with you, is this question: what spiritual teacher has actually traced human social suffering back to private property in this way?

I tell you this because we find ourselves in a desperate situation—all life on earth hangs in the balance. Those reading the latest IPCC reports from the UN, the most recent scientific assessments, are genuinely terrified. The outlook appears very bleak. If we cannot forge enforceable agreements, this effort will fail just as Copenhagen did, just as Doha did last year. But now we're failing at a point where we may be hitting the skids.

The young people and civil society representatives who walked out of the great stadium in Warsaw today, where the climate talks are meeting—their departure speaks volumes. When we try to stop the greenhouse gas emissions belching forth in such accelerating quantities, with fossil fuel companies still clinging to their subsidies and their private holdings, we face a profound challenge.

As Richard Smith writes in his powerful piece on Common Dreams, we are being asked to face our mortality as a species. We're asked to confront the demise of our brother and sister species, and of our planet as a home for conscious life. And we're asked to examine our habits of thinking we can own things—it comes right back to that fundamental delusion.

If we think this is too basic, too much to ask of us, perhaps we're at a time when there's simply too much at stake. There's growing conversation about gift economy, wonderful creative thinking around sacred economics. At the urban farm where I spend much of my time in East Oakland, teaching and offering workshops, they operate largely on gift economy principles. People are beginning to see that we can reinvent what it means to relate to each other as human beings.

May we have the moral imagination and love for life to begin to reinvent together.

My chime just rang, indicating an opening for the next ten minutes for any comments you might want to make or questions.

"So what happened at the conference when people walked out?"

"What happened at the conference today when people walked out?"

We'll find out. That happened today.

"Did they call off the session or did it just keep going?"

Well, it was not the official government delegates, but what we call civil society—the non-governmental organizations, the likes of us working for the planet—that walked out. There are some pictures of it. So that'll be very interesting. But it shows how desperate, yet maybe determined and fierce people are becoming. Maybe it's time for this kind of action.

"Do you have any suggestions for how to talk to people about this overwhelming crisis without making people shut down, run away, or unfriend me on Facebook?"

I think we can assume that there's caring, because even though what's hard is that in our country—not nearly as much in Europe—the mass media carries very little about it. There was none of this in the New York Times today. When I looked through all the main features of the New York Times online, today and every day this week, there was nothing listed. Now, it might have been on a back page, but I was just looking at their main features online.

People are not going to be persuaded by an argument we make. If people think we're trying to persuade them, resistance immediately rises—this is my experience. But there are two strategies that I find create openings.

The first is to simply state how you feel: "You know, I've just been reading about what's going on, or I've been hearing about this, and I'm worried sick. How do you deal with this? These reports make me sad." That's a feeling. Nobody can contradict you. That's a fact—I'm feeling worried, I'm thinking about my grandchildren. And then that might be enough.

Or you could say, "How is it with you? How do you handle it?" With genuine curiosity. People can smell a mile away if you're trying to change them, don't you think?

"I'm wondering if you have any recommendations about local groups or organizations that we could join to do some of this work."

Well, I'd like to draw from suggestions here too. I've been very impressed by 350.org. And I know that some of the churches are getting involved—there's a whole series coming up at the Presbyterian Church in Marin. So there's more and more happening.

There's an appeal coming from Vipassana movement practitioners the world over, starting in England, asking teachers to give teachings on climate change. In response, you can go to a website like One Earth Sangha—One Earth Sangha. That's a great source of guidance.

All right, come on—what about locally? Who knows? Come on.

"Do you really not know?"

This is wonderful! You have found out you don't know. What a great place to start. Then you don't want to stay in ignorance.

So you go out and find. How about for investing? What kind of investment can you make for your retirement fund that doesn't contribute to harm? There are options that exist, though they require effort. Socially responsible investing has various organizations and investment companies focused on ethical choices. You can simply search for "socially responsible investing."

I have a nest egg, and I have people help invest it for me. I simply tell them: no nuclear, no fossil fuel, no investments that cause harm. You need to be explicit about your values. And there's divestment—joining programs to get organizations, universities, and colleges involved, working as alumni to pressure for divestment from fossil fuel companies. Students are doing this, and alumni can participate too.

I think it's important to recognize the difficulty of the international community coming to any agreement, period. When you look at the World Trade Organization and the failure of the Doha rounds, the rise of protectionism in the last decade, it's very difficult to imagine countries that couldn't even agree on farm subsidies and basic everyday issues coming to agreement about climate change. For countries producing greenhouse gases to take responsibility and for affected countries to be compensated seems nearly impossible given how the international system works. It's incredibly complicated, and it may be an illusion to expect meaningful agreements from such bodies.

The other thing to recognize is the power of multinational corporations. They are incredibly powerful—more powerful than states. I think the only way to begin having traction is to build civil society from the ground up.

One concrete suggestion is mass gathering in Washington—bringing numbers bigger than anything we've seen so far. We've got to stop the subsidies. We can sit and moan, or we can show up. This requires being ready to bring your life to a screaming halt in other respects, to prioritize this action.

There are success stories around the world in the carbon credit movement. Indigenous societies have completely rejected carbon credit deals with multinational corporations. We're seeing native indigenous communities who may not be highly educated or wealthy, but they understand what this is about. They act with incredible force against multinational corporations. There's success happening right now in the Amazon, in Latin America, just from grassroots organizing by indigenous people. Of course, multinational corporations, working through the governments of those countries, are putting up a big fight. But there are success stories we can learn from.

There are efforts to counter programs like REDD, where carbon credits are used problematically. There's pressure on Governor Brown to stop using that approach in California. There's much that can be done.

I'm struck by what you're saying about grassroots action because it's really difficult. There's overwhelming evidence of climate change's devastating effects—Hurricane Sandy, the tornadoes that swept through the Midwest with incredible destruction, the devastation in the Philippines. It has to start at the grassroots level.

I imagine those families who experienced tornadoes in the Midwest, who lived through that destruction, will eventually stand up and say "this is enough." They don't have any choice but to make the connection because the devastation keeps coming, episode after episode. Maybe I'm being idealistic, but I sense some sort of uprising coming—not just in Washington D.C., but in the communities devastated by climate change effects. I don't know enough about what's happening in local communities, but I think that's where real change will happen.

We've reached our closing time, and that's a good note to end on. I've become very interested in the experience and concept of peer support in social change. This crisis is too big, too scary, too immense for the response needed to be faced alone. If I try to look at it by myself, it's far too overwhelming.

But just with one other person or a small group to sit down together and say, let's find right here in the East Bay where we see work on climate that speaks to our heart and mind. You look here, I'll look there, and then we report back together to see what seems big enough in scope that it's not just some futile effort.

So I'd like to close with remembering that the Buddha said when we go forth, we go forth together. We go forth for the welfare of all beings, for the happiness of all beings—and that includes the future ones as well. And he said you do it as a sangha.

Maybe this sangha—you decide to have a group that will meet and report back. Why not? Why not put a paper out at the table and say, who wants to meet so we can report back in two weeks after Thanksgiving with ideas of what we at this sangha can do? Even if there are two people, go ahead. But maybe there'll be more.

So now, as the time for our closing comes, let us share the merit of this. Because everything that has come up indicates our sense of belonging to this sacred living planet. Everything that we have questioned betrays our caring for life, our feelings of responsibility for it. So this has been a beautiful moment for us, and we take the merit of that and share it with all beings.

May all beings be happy.
May all beings be safe.
May all beings find ways to serve life and each other.
May all beings be free.

CHAPTER 278

For The Sake of Life on Earth, part 1

Rob Burbea · 41 min

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea weaves together Buddhist wisdom and ecological consciousness, exploring how practitioners can respond to the overwhelming challenges facing our planet. Drawing from the ancient Tibetan Buddhist tradition, Burbea shares the 12-century-old Shambhala warrior prophecy from the Kālacakra Tantra, which speaks of a dark time when "barbaric powers" possess weapons of devastation, and how spiritual warriors emerge to dismantle these threats through two essential tools: compassion (karuṇā) and insight into radical interdependence (pratītyasamutpāda).
>
> The talk addresses the Buddhist understanding that our global crises—from nuclear weapons to environmental destruction—are "mano-maya" (mind-made) and therefore can be unmade by transformed consciousness. Burbea emphasizes that true spiritual practice requires the courage to "not be afraid of the suffering of your world," embodying the bodhisattva ideal of boundless compassion. Through personal accounts of witnessing environmental devastation in Alberta's tar sands, he demonstrates how practitioners can maintain both clear seeing of destruction and deep gratitude for the opportunity to serve.
>
> This teaching offers a compelling integration of traditional dharma with contemporary activism, showing how Buddhist practice naturally leads to engagement with social and ecological healing. Burbea's approach honors both the darkness of our current moment and the transformative potential within each practitioner to become agents of positive change.

One of the amazing teachings of gratitude is that it does not depend—your experiencing it does not depend—on external circumstances. I used to think that I had to approve of the way things were set up if I was to feel thankful. That it was like counting the blessings. But what we experienced then in that singing was something deeper than that, wasn't it? It had something to do with belonging.

Belonging. It has something to do with the mystery that has called us into being that is still there at the heart of everything—that we will never, ever be separated from. So in whatever the situation, when you're faced with a seemingly overwhelming task, when you're faced with needing to repair something that's broken, gratitude can well up then too. The capacity for that is in us. It comes with life.

Last month I had an amazing week at a dismantled nuclear bomb factory. It's outside Boulder, Colorado. It's called Rocky Flats. It's where the plutonium pits were made. In every warhead in the U.S. arsenal, there's that plutonium pit or trigger that was made at Rocky Flats. There are 20,000 nuclear bombs now, many of them still targeted.

We did this work with a group of people of all ages who want to stop the Department of Energy from turning this area, which is laced with plutonium from 37 years of making the triggers with very sloppy management by Rockwell International—illegal burnings and the whole mess. You know that developing nuclear weapons and nuclear power doesn't make you the neatest person in the world.

What grew up in the work was—it's still staggering to me—the sense of gratitude of this little band of a couple dozen nuclear guardians. A huge job, because they want to stop the Department of Energy from turning it into a recreational area where children will play. And that's planned, actually, for all the weapon sites—Hanford, Savannah River—when they're dismantled, because that will show the world that it's been an okay operation.

At any rate, a huge job. And what came through that was almost intoxicating to me: the sense of, "Oh, good, we have something really big to work on." And there was a sense of summoning up of the blood and an electricity in the air, a kind of "Oh, my life has tremendous meaning. How good it is—I'm so glad I was born to be here, faced with this, with all my senses and my brain and my good friends." And that sense of linking arms and being glad for each other—it just made your heart sing.

So things don't have to be just perfect for you to feel gratitude. And I felt that when I received this week a message from one of them, a young man named Seth. He was writing to the others and said, "Dear friends, dear brother, sister guardians..." He was announcing the next meeting, and there are several strands of what they're doing. But then, in a postscript, he said, "And in parting, let me say, rest and be kind to yourselves. Feel within you the great winds of time. Feel how deeply rooted you are in the earth. Feel the immensities of the seas that are within you and outside you."

And he said, "Whether we go forth to perish or to flourish, we are inextricably intertwined in the living body of earth."

That just blew me away. And it wasn't saying, "Oh, woe is us, faced with this terrible... we're the worst people who ever lived, we humans, and oh, this is so terrible." Instead, he turned, being able to see fully the danger, and said, "Ah, this is our work. And we are part of this world and it's in us. Whether we perish or flourish, we go forth inextricably intertwined."

So I think of that as we move into this next station of the spiral of the Work That Reconnects, which is: feeling grounded now—grounded and gladdened with our gratitude for the gift of life—we use our capacity. We use our attention. We use our breathing lungs and beating heart. We use the rhythm of life within us. We use all that we are to see what is happening to and in our world and to our brother-sister beings.

Because our world cannot heal unless we see it. This world cannot repair itself and cannot self-heal if we pull down the shutters and close the curtains and say, "I won't think about that, it's too depressing." But strengthened by the gratitude, we even feel gratitude that we're here now. Isn't that so?

So with them, as with you, I shared the Shambhala warrior prophecy. And I'm going to share it now. Many of you have heard it from me because it's kind of my marching orders.

And it comes from the Tibetan Buddhist tradition. I heard it from people who are very close to me, and my life has been greatly shaped and influenced by being part of a Tibetan refugee community in northwest India. I've been linked with it since the mid-1960s when my family and I were there in India with the American Peace Corps. I got to know them then. They had recently come into exile from Tibet, fleeing the Chinese occupation.

But it wasn't until over fifteen years later, when I was back on a visit in the early 80s, that I was visiting the community. They're partly lay people—about three hundred lay people, one hundred monks and lamas. So they were talking about this prophecy. They said, "You know, it seems to be coming true in our time, in our generation, even though it's so very ancient."

And I said, "Well, what's it about?"

And they said, "It's about a very dark time, very great danger."

Well, you see, I'm kind of apocalyptic by nature. And I said, "Oh." The Cold War had begun in earnest by then.

So I heard three different versions of it. And the one that locked in, the one that I'm going to share with you, is from my friend Dugu Chögyel Rinpoche.

Wait—just a minute. You will hear reference to the Shambhala warrior. And you will know, you will recognize, that this is a metaphor for the bodhisattva, the hero in the Buddhist tradition. The one with the boundless heart.

All right, so these are pretty much his words:

"There comes a time—and we are living in this time—when great powers have arisen, barbaric powers. And although they waste their wealth in preparations to annihilate each other, they have much in common. Among the things they have in common are weapons of unfathomable devastation and death, and technologies that lay waste the world. And it is just at this moment, when all life hangs by the frailest of threads, that the kingdom of Shambhala emerges.

"Now you can't go there because it's not a place. It exists in the hearts and minds of the Shambhala warriors. And actually, you can't tell a Shambhala warrior by looking at her or him because they don't wear any uniforms, no insignia. They have no banners that they wave to identify whose side they're on. They have no barricades on which to climb to threaten the enemy, or behind which they can rest and regroup. Always they have only the terrain of the barbaric powers to move across.

"Now is the time," Chögyel Rinpoche said, "when great courage is required of the Shambhala warriors—moral courage and physical courage—because they are going to go into the centers of power of the barbaric powers to dismantle their weapons."

They're going to dismantle weapons in every sense of the word. They're going to go where the armaments are manufactured and deployed. They're going to go into the halls of power where the decisions are made.

And then he said, "Joanna, mark this. The Shambhala warriors know that these weapons can be dismantled. Why? Because they are mano-maya. That means mind-made. They are made by the human mind, so they can be unmade by the human mind."

Because the dangers that are facing us now are not brought upon us by some satanic extraterrestrial force, or some evil deity, or even some inexorable, inalterable, predestined fate. They arise from our choices. They arise from our relationships. They arise from our habits of mind and body and action. They are made by the human mind—they can be unmade by the human mind.

So he said, "Now is the time when the Shambhala warriors go into training."

You can imagine. How do they train? And he held up his hands...

the lamas in his community hold their ritual objects in the great lama dances of his people. And he said, "They train in the use of two weapons." That's actually the word he used—two weapons. And then I said, "What are they?" And he held up his hands. "One is compassion and the other is insight into the radical interdependence of all phenomena. And you need both," he said. "One is not enough."

You need the compassion because that provides the fuel, the motive force to get you out where you need to go to do what you need to do. And what it boils down to is this: to not be afraid of the suffering of your world. And when you're not afraid of the suffering of the world, then nothing can stop you. You can go where you need to go to do what you need to do.

He said, "By itself, it gets very hot. It can burn you out. So you need the other weapon, the other tool." And with that insight, understanding, wisdom into the inter-existence of all things, the radical, inextricable—just as Seth said in his little email this week—inextricably intertwined nature of all things, then you know that this is not a battle between the good guys and the bad guys. It's not about that. Because the line between good and evil goes through the landscape of every human heart.

And when you have that tool, that insight, you know that we are so interwoven in the web of life that even the smallest act with clear intention has repercussions through that web that you can barely begin to see, let alone measure. It makes all the difference. But he said, "By itself, that's a little abstract, a little cool. So you need the heat of compassion." And as he said that, I was thinking, oh, that's what I've been seeing. The monks with their flowing gesture, hand gestures, the mudras, as they chant. There, likely, is the dancing interplay between compassion and insight.

Well, that was it. That was the prophecy. I was so excited. I went racing down to the edge of the community where my family happened to be visiting at that time too. And it was the end of the afternoon and I burst in and I said, "Oh, you will never—you can't guess what I just heard from Juja Rinpoche." And I proceeded to tell my family the prophecy. And my son Jack was with us. And he listened and he said, "Well, didn't he tell you how it's going to turn out?"

That is so good that you laugh. And I did too, and I said, "Oh, if he had tried to tell me how it's going to turn out, I wouldn't have believed anything." So don't you believe people who tell you how it's going to turn out. It's the fact that we don't know—that is our awakening in this time. We can't wake up if we have it handed to us. No, it's too late, it's over, don't bother. Or it's a sure thing. No, no, it's that not knowing that calls us to be and understand what we need to be and understand at this time.

So I tell that now because as we address our pain for the world, as we address the woundedness we see around us, as we address the dishonored ocean—as the poet Denise Levertov talks about it, and boy is it dishonored now—as we look at the clear cuts, as we look at the homeless in the streets, as we hear of the fantastic hungers in the Horn of Africa, as we look at the hungers and statistics in our own country, as we look at the layer of smog over our cities, as we hear about the spasms of extinction of species, as we look at more and more foreclosures of homes and people falling through the safety net in a greed-devoured society, as we watch a climate system spiraling out in ever more fearsome oscillations of heat and flood...

As we allow ourselves to remember every minute of every day of these days, the war-making, the trillions that we're spending destroying the lands and the people in Libya, Iraq, Afghanistan, Pakistan with our drones. Oh, it's enough to break your heart. And your heart is breaking.

But then the heart that breaks open can hold the whole universe. It's beautiful. We discover the mystery and the wonder of our being able to suffer with our world, with our friends who are sick, with our friends who are jobless, with our own experiences of failure and fear. Oh, this is a dark time. And this is the time you have. In a way, perhaps you even chose it. Perhaps we asked for it.

But would you want this to happen to Earth and you not be on hand? Would you?

My grandfather did that once in a while. He'd yell. He was a preacher, and he would thump on the pulpit. But the thing is, he thumped not to tell people they were bad, but to tell people how much God loved them. "God loved you so much!" I certainly hope some of you are going to raise your voice. There's quite a bit to raise our voice about.

My sweet sister here and I were getting pretty hot under the collar about some of the devastation happening, and we couldn't think of anything worse than what was happening in Canada in the tar sands. So something possessed us to just decide to go up there and see it with our own eyes. We set up some gigs, took the money from our performance, and hired a plane. I kid you not. A little plane with five seats. Joanna was in the front with the pilot. And the stink. I was a little airsick—I didn't throw up, but that was my other great preoccupation: how horrible this was and whether I could keep my breakfast down.

"Well, you know, Joanna had come up to me when we were working up at Holy Names University a couple of years ago and said, 'I want to go to the tar sands.' And I knew immediately what that was because I'm from Alberta. How many of you have heard of the tar sands?"

The response showed many raised hands.

"It's really Canada's dirty secret. Being Canadian, we're very proud of the way we've managed the natural world—big extensive parklands. This really doesn't fit with the Canadian persona, this idea that one of probably the worst environmental disasters on the planet is happening in the northlands of Alberta and now moving east to Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

"Essentially, they're trying to get the last bits of oil from the earth. It's not like there's oil being drilled for. They have to use massive amounts of chemicals and remove entire ancient, pristine forests—hundreds and hundreds of acres completely demolished and removed from the surface of the land so they can go underneath and, through chemicals, leach out this tarry substance and then process it into something that gets shipped to the United States and turned into oil. It costs an enormous amount of water and energy to get the tar out of the ground.

"The land alone—when Joanna and I went up in that plane, I had some ideas. I'd seen pictures in National Geographic. We both had. But we flew for an hour in one direction and did not come to the end of it. It is simply—you look down and all you see is pools of toxic waste. They're called tailing ponds. And it's right adjacent to the great Athabasca River, so the river is being completely destroyed. There are all these native communities living downstream, and they're suffering hugely from the repercussions. There's a lot of denial about it in Canada and Alberta and around the world.

"To go with Joanna—when she asked me, I thought there's no person I'd rather go with to do something like that. It was absolutely profound and distressing to see. I've created a song about it and really sing it everywhere I go because it seems like such an important thing to be talking about."

One thing that amazed us was our constant state of complete distress and hysterical laughter because the situation was so absurd. It was like we were in a bardo of the absurd. In Fort McMurray—known locally as "Fort McMoney" because of all the wealth being generated from this destruction—corporations like Suncor from the United States and Europe have erected massive billboards proclaiming messages like "Suncor: Leaving the Land Better Than We Found It." They promote this fantasy that they'll plant trees and rebuild the landscape, while you're standing there looking at the devastation thinking, "What parallel universe are we in?"

I remember driving along those enormous lakes filled with toxic effluent—the lethal chemicals pumped from the extraction process that they simply don't know where else to put. Sometimes these waste ponds are contained by nothing more than earthen dams. This area sits directly on the flyway of ducks, geese, and other migratory birds. If they touch down on these poisonous waters, they can't get up again. The companies have tried various solutions—cannons to scare away the birds—but nothing works effectively.

The complexity of the situation became clear when we held events in Edmonton and Calgary and met people who actually worked in the tar sands. There are many jobs to be had. I remember during one event, a worker raised his hand to share his story. Many workers there are heavily drugged—crack is a massive problem because working in what can only be described as a hell zone, going in for days at a time, is unbearable without chemical escape.

The social infrastructure of the entire region has been destroyed. This isn't simply a matter of environmentalism versus a pristine economy—it's the complete unraveling of community life. There's no affordable housing because prices have skyrocketed. People who have lived there for generations can no longer afford to stay. Meanwhile, young men with suddenly massive incomes have no culture, nothing meaningful to do with their time or money. Prostitution, drug addiction, and crime rates have exploded through the roof.

This is the whole complex of interdependence made devastatingly clear.

The last thing I'll share before singing is a moment of profound recognition. We had rented a car to drive around, and I remember stopping to fill up with gas after our flyover. Standing at that pump, having just witnessed the source of that fuel, I felt the complete interconnection of cause and effect with piercing clarity. It was the most poignant moment of my life in terms of understanding how we're all part of this system and how the solution must come through all of us.

The area is so vast it can be seen from outer space. Most of this extracted tar is destined for the United States. So breathe with this. Breathe it through your heart.

Thank you, and thank each other.

I want to call your attention to something I feel strongly about, so I'm going to stand up. Please observe and notice how far the concerns you've just shared extend beyond your personal ego. Notice how what you've been experiencing and expressing reaches far beyond your individual needs and wants. Just notice this, because it reveals something vital about who and what you are.

It shows that you are capable of suffering with your world. To suffer with—this is the literal meaning of compassion. You are compassionate beings.

This recognition is crucial in modern American culture, which tends to reduce people's distress over social and ecological conditions to personal pathology. Again and again, this suffering is interpreted through the lens of individual biography—some hypersensitivity, childhood trauma, hormonal fluctuations, or other personal failing. As James Hillman pointed out in "100 Years of Psychotherapy and the World's Getting Worse," this reductionism serves to silence people.

While I owe a personal debt to psychotherapy, it's essential not to fall into this cultural trap. This is precisely how people get silenced. So recognize this truth: it takes courage to suffer with our world.

It takes courage not to be afraid of the suffering of the world. You're evincing a strength. And you are actually—that's the definition, is it not, of the bodhisattva, the one of the boundless heart. Hi, bodhisattvas.

So I would like to close this morning with a poem, and then we'll have some announcements from Sean before we go to lunch. This is a poem that has meant a great deal to me. It honors the great pain that we're in and the darkness that we're in, and also how it can transform us and take us into our true nature and our identity as life on earth.

So it's from Rilke's Sonnets to Orpheus—it's the last one:

Quiet friend who has come so far, feel how your breathing makes more space around you. Let this darkness be a bell tower and you the bell. And as you ring, what batters you becomes your strength.

Move back and forth into the change. What's it like, this intensity of pain? If the drink is bitter, turn yourself to wine.

In this uncontainable night, be the mystery at the crossroads of your senses, the meaning discovered there. And if the world has ceased to hear you, say to the silent earth: I flow. To the rushing water speak: I am.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 279

For the Sake of Life on Earth, Part 2

Rob Burbea · 42 min

> In this powerful dharma talk, Rob Burbea continues his exploration of "the work that reconnects," guiding practitioners through a transformative spiral journey from gratitude through honoring pain for the world, to seeing with new eyes, and finally going forth with renewed purpose. Drawing on the Buddha's core teaching of radical interdependence—the insight that we are not separate beings but are "made of relationships"—Burbea demonstrates how this fundamental Buddhist understanding offers profound medicine for our ecological crisis.
>
> Burbea weaves together indigenous wisdom, poetry by Rilke, and Buddhist teachings to show how our pain for the world is actually "the boundless heart of the bodhisattva" and proof of our interconnection. He guides participants through a sensory awareness practice outdoors, helping them experience their belonging to the "sacred living earth" as their larger body. The talk culminates with a call to embody our deepest longings for healing the world, challenging the comfortable "middle way" with the Buddha's truly radical teachings.
>
> This teaching offers practical guidance for environmental dharma practice, showing how Buddhist insights into non-self and interdependence provide both spiritual foundation and urgent motivation for engaged action in our time of ecological crisis.

I also would like to announce that I'll be available during the break this mid-afternoon—I'd be happy to sign books. At the end of the afternoon, I have to scoot out of here very fast to go to a birthday party. Good reason, isn't that a good reason?

So, my friends, we are coming around the spiral. We started in the East this morning, being grounded in gratitude. It's our birthright to be alive. Then we move into honoring our pain for the world. That part of it is absolutely essential. It's like the hinge of the work that reconnects.

We have to just know in our bodies that we won't be broken by the fear or grief that we carry for the world, that this is the most natural thing in the world. It's like we are a living cell inside the living body of earth. And if that larger body is being traumatized, it is only healthy and right for us to feel that too. Otherwise we're disconnected. So if you want to reconnect, if you want to make a difference in this world—and that is what your deepest desire is, isn't that so?

Having been honoring—and you could stay there all week, you realize that. My goodness, we have all sorts of ways we can cry and thump and scream and beat our chest, all kinds of things. But the main thing in this honoring our pain for the world is to simply not be afraid of it.

And you can never fully cathart it. You can't purge it out by all kinds of cathartic processes because then the very next minute there's something else that you're seeing, beholding, experiencing in our world. So you're never finished with the pain for the world. You're going to feel more tomorrow. But you won't be afraid of it. And you'll learn how to see what it really is, how it really is the boundless heart of the bodhisattva, how it really is a gift of this extended awareness.

And pretty soon you see that this, whether you're experiencing it as sorrow or as dread or as outrage—that's a big one for me—anger, confusion, doubt, etc., that these are not reducible to the self-interest of the little ego. They are grounded in your connectedness with the world.

So think of it as a two-sided coin: your pain for the world, whatever flavor it's coming in for you—despair or rage or sorrow—is simply one side of the coin, and the other side of the coin is your love for the world. And if you try to anesthetize yourself against one, the other gets numbed out too. Isn't that so?

Just don't try to carry it all by yourself. Because what's going on now is, I like the phrase of a teacher of mine, David Corton, great economist, he calls it the great unraveling. It's the unraveling under the pressure of the industrial growth society, which is constructed—it has to grow. That means it has to keep extracting resources out of the body of earth, turning them into goods, weapons, and waste, and then dumping them out on the earth.

It's been a good twenty years that we have known that we're taking the resources out of the earth faster than they can be renewed. And maybe we didn't get it in our minds, but we got it in our psyches. We got it in our sense of things. And that we are at the other end—and it's a pretty short little passage because of the built-in obsolescence. So we dump, and we are dumping things into the earth faster than they can be absorbed. And that's becoming clear to us. That both the source and the sink, we've gone far beyond already.

But we continue to treat the earth as a supply house and a sewer. And as long as we do hold that thought in our mind, we can do all the activism and all the organizing and it won't make any difference.

We have to change our view of the larger body of which we are a part. First of all, to see it as our larger body. And that this is not a supply house and a sewer. This is the sacred living earth—mother, father, lover. This is our larger body, and every society and every tradition worth its salt has always steered itself by prayers and thanksgiving and tending and stories that breed that understanding in us.

You're alive now at a wonderful time when you are going to be participating in our culture's getting back to that absolutely life-saving apprehension of what we are.

So guess what? We've come to the part in this spiral, which we call seeing with new eyes, where we enjoy training and experiencing the ways we can embody this understanding. And it takes some deconditioning. It's not enough for any of us to go to a lecture—whether it's Deepak Chopra or Fritjof Capra—and for them to say, "This is a living earth." You have to practice it. You have to know it. And that actually is not onerous. It's a joy, a continual joy. We're coming home.

So we're going to be going outside for a little deconditioning work. First I've got a couple of poems. I'm giving you poems because the song we had planned is waiting for somebody I'm dying to meet to come and sing with Jennifer. But we're cool. We're totally relaxed.

I remember the day in the 1950s when I was standing on a snowy day in a bookstore near the university. I saw this little cloth-bound book, Das Stundenbuch, the book of hours by Rainer Maria Rilke, and I opened it and saw the second poem.

Ich lebe mein Leben in wachsenden Ringen, die sich über die Dingen ziehen. Vielleicht werde ich letzten nicht vollbringen, aber versuchen werde ich ihn. Ich kreise um Gott, um den uralten Turm, und ich kreise Jahrtausende lang. Und ich weiß noch nicht, bin ich ein Falke? Ein Sturmer? Oder ein großer Gesang.

I live my life in widening circles that reach out across the world. I may not complete this last one, but I give myself to it. I've been circling around God, around the great mystery, the primordial tower for thousands of years. And I still don't know: Am I a falcon, a storm, or a great song?

Well, that just took the top right off my head. And all of a sudden I saw that I was not a spiritual failure. That the many connections I'd felt, the many voices I'd heard, the many teachings I'd received, the many times I'd flown with the birds—all of that was really important for this little Protestant girl.

It is our opportunity now in this hyper-individualized society—this hyper-individualism that serves late capitalism very well—to recognize that we consider ourselves to be separate, and that all we can be sure about is "this is me inside this bag of skin and I better take care of number one." I've got to make sure she's got enough of what she needs. I've got to push away what threatens. Maybe I better improve her, make her look pretty, and so on.

It is this concern with defending or improving or enhancing the separate self that is really a strong driving engine in the capitalist economy. It breeds dissatisfaction because you're never enough.

you can never satisfy that self. Because, as the Buddha pointed out, you can't satisfy something that doesn't really exist.

So we come then in this part of the spiral to the second weapon or tool of the Shambhala warrior—that insight into the radical interdependence of all things. This was the core teaching of Gautama the Buddha. And they say it was the core teaching of all the Buddhas because when people, as centuries passed, found that the Buddha's teachings and practices were so wonderful and so useful and so helpful, that they must have been part of the fabric of reality even before Gautama Siddhartha. And so they imagined that there were other Buddhas that appeared at other times. Why not? And this was something—this was the key teaching of all of them.

That we are not separate. That we are made of relationships. That we change from moment to moment because of that. That we grow strong through our regard and connections with others and with the web of life. Learning to see the world as exquisitely precious, like one's only child, like one's dearest partner and lover, like one's mother—like one's larger self.

And every spiritual tradition has wrestled with this question of what do you do with this first person singular? What do you do with this I? Always talking, always wanting, always insisting. What do you do? You can mortify it. You can punish it. You can work to improve it. You can sacrifice it. So in all the different spiritual currents and streams and rivers of spirituality there were these different ways of imagining how you could tame or get on top of or kill this sense of the separate ego, this self-interest and this pride.

But what's distinctive—what just blew me away about the Buddha's teaching—is he didn't say mortify it, sacrifice it, improve it, make it noble, make it gorgeous. He just said, see through it. It's just a convention. It doesn't really exist as a self-existent permanent being. So see through it, and then see what you're really, really a part of. And that you don't have to knock yourself out or make applications or submit your curriculum vitae: "I want to belong to Earth. Let's see, what do I deserve to do that? Well, let's see, I was a Girl Scout," or whatever. But that belonging comes with you—it is most deeply what you are.

Well, that saves us a lot of worry.

Let me read you a teaching by an Australian Aboriginal, because as Jennifer said, the Native peoples are so wise in indigenous people's wisdom on our relationship to our world. And I'll read you some lines by Big Bill Neji. He has recently died. He was an Aboriginal from the Kakadu area in northern Australia. And you may think it's written in his speech—I'm not making it up.

"Well, I'll tell you about this story, about a story where you feel laying down. Tree, grass, star. Because star and tree working with you. We got blood pressure, but same thing. You're working with you. Even nice windy blow, having a sleep because that spirit is with you.

Listen carefully to this because you can hear me. I'm telling you, Earth, just like mother or father or brother of you, that tree, same thing. Your body, my body, I suppose, I'm same as you, anyone, tree working while you're sleeping and dream.

This story, he can listen carefully. He can listen slow. If you're in city, well, I suppose lots of houses, you can't hardly look this star. But maybe be one night you look. Have a look, star, because that's the feeling. String, blood, through your body. That star, he working there, see?"

He's working there. I can see him. Some of them are so small you can hardly see them. Always at night, if you lie down and look carefully, he's working, you see? When you sleep, your blood is pumping. I love this tree because he loves me too. He's watching me, same as you. Tree, he's working with your body, my body. He's working with us. While you sleep, he's working. In daylight, when you're walking around, he's working too.

That tree, that grass—they're all like our father. This dirt, this earth—I sleep with this earth. Grass is just like your brother. In my blood, in my arm, this grass, this dirt exists for us because we'll be dead. We'll be going to this earth. This is the story now. This is the story now. This is the story now and always.

We are not separate from our world. We are birthed from our world. As that young man at Rocky Flats said—we are utterly... Oh, that was the line I couldn't remember. He said, "My brothers, we go forth to flourish or perish because we are utterly of this world and the world is utterly of us."

So we're going to go out and listen to our world. We're going to go out in pairs. Listen and feel and look, smell. You're going to go out two by two. Outside, you can put on your shoes or go barefoot, but we're going to be outside the whole time. Put on your shoes—I don't want you to be worried about what rattlesnakes you're going to step on.

The shorter one will close their eyes first. Once you're outside, you will have a period of ten minutes when you will be the guide or the guided one. The guided one keeps their eyes closed, and this is done in silence. Then we walk.

When you close the dominant sense, you know what happens. The sound, the smell, the texture, the air on your face—everything else kicks in. You feel like you're a virgin to this world, that you're just going out and feeling it as if for the first time. As the guide, I'll be sure that you're safe and guide you to a place where you can maybe touch something. I might put your hand there—oh, that's a living object. Or the trunk of a tree. Or the grass on the ground.

I might pick up something—there might be a dead leaf there and I might have you hear it crinkle. I might have you smell it. So it becomes a feast of the senses where you're experiencing your adherence in the living body of earth.

Every once in a while, maybe five or six times in your span of ten minutes of guiding, you will place your guided one in front of something that you'd like them to see and then say, "Open your eyes and look in the mirror, and you see yourself." That's what all the poets and mystics say—that you can learn to move in the world as if it were yourself, your larger body, as it is indeed. You're always home.

So once you get out there, I'll ring the bell. You can start right away, obviously, but I'll ring the bell after ten minutes or so, and what you do then is change roles.

We come now to the last station on the spiral of the work that reconnects. Having grounded and centered and opened ourselves in gratitude for life, for the chance to be alive in this amazing world—with being breathed by life, with senses that can apprehend and receive messages, able to listen, to see, to hear, to communicate, to touch, to plot and plan, to be alive—praise be. Hallelujah.

And then with that fullness inside us, we know that we're not just some living abstraction, but we're in a flesh and blood world where things are being torn and bruised and unraveled, where great things are being invented and created—art and music and new perceptions and new thoughts—and great unraveling at the same time. This is the world that we have chosen, or that has chosen us. We're here.

And so we are not going to be afraid of the suffering that comes along with that. We practice that too. We saw that the suffering reminds us—it's proof positive, each time we remember to think it, remember to see it that way—that we are connected. We are bodhisattvas. We are Shambhala warriors. Threads in a tapestry of life.

And life calls to us, always surprising. A year ago, Jennifer didn't know that she'd fall in love with the Yukon River and the Yukon River would love her back and give her this song. New stuff arising all the time.

So we see with new eyes. We throw open the windows and doors of our being. And there's so much to feed that in this time—the ancient currents of indigenous teachings, the science of our time. Systems theory has been particularly powerful for me. And oh, the Buddha Dharma.

So now we come to the going forth, and we allow some glee and appetite to arise in us. Wait till we get out there. Oh, what we're going to do.

We've got to remember certain things. Some of the good remembering comes in a poem I love—a good going forth poem, of course, from the Book of Hours. The poet imagines that God is talking, which is interesting because Rilke was not much of a theist. He was kind of turned off on Christianity. But the fact that he didn't like the theology to which he was subjected as a child—he didn't let that in any way close him off to the mystery and the beauty at the heart of life.

You must nourish that surprise you feel every morning as you wake up and look at the world as if you're looking into your lover's face.

Here's the poem. God speaks to each of us as he makes us, then walks with us silently out of the night. These are the words we dimly hear:

"You, sent out beyond your recall, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me.

"Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final.

"Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness.

"Give me your hand."

Let me share that again. "You, sent out beyond your recall." It's too late now. You're already on stage. You can't go back. You're here, here, here. You are of this world utterly. Too late to check out.

"You, sent out beyond your recall, go to the limits of your longing. Embody me. Flare up like flame and make big shadows I can move in. Let everything happen to you: beauty and terror. Just keep going. No feeling is final. Don't let yourself lose me. Nearby is the country they call life. You will know it by its seriousness. Give me your hand."

So remember that. Just keep going. You don't need to approve of everything that's happening. Just don't stop.

This was sent to me yesterday—a newspaper from a farmer's market co-op in Santa Barbara. An interviewer once suggested to César Chávez that he might be a fanatic. "I am," he responded. "Those are the only ones who get anything done."

The writer, who appears to be a teacher at UC Santa Barbara, continues: "I often recall this exchange when I hear talk of walking the middle road or the middle way for the sake of our suffering planet. It's as if the bold and tenacious approach is by nature too radical, misguidedly fanatic."

"Now it seems to me that we preach the middle way to let ourselves off the hook. We don't care to do the work of disenthralling ourselves from assumptions, of examining the worthiness of our jobs, of going with a lot less, of changing our day-to-day habits, of cheerfully tolerating a little discomfort. No, we don't want to do that. So we glibly invoke the middle path, good and proud of our own reasonableness. And we continue to live more or less like we always have and sleep at night, relatively untroubled. Meanwhile, the world of nature literally dissolves—dissolving, as they say, offstage, out of sight, almost as a rumor."

But whoever told us that the changes that are needed are supposed to be middling? If that sounds like an echo of the Buddha's middle way, it should be remembered that the Buddha's middle is modernity's extreme. After all, here was a man, and God bless him for it, who exhorted followers to cease travel during rainy season to avoid stepping on surfacing worms.

As many reading these words already know—and he probably would be amazed to know that I am reading it to such a distinguished collection of people—changing for the sake of our world is often difficult. It is anathema to the wallet and to the status quo. But as the many who are struggling to make these changes will surely attest, there is satisfaction in such sea changing and pleasure too: the satisfaction of entering through the narrow gate, the pleasure that can abound in the single gourd life.

"Angels began shining," Rumi sings, "when they achieved discipline." Get a load of that! You rarely hear the words angel and discipline in the same sentence, but let's put them there. Each one of us could use some discipline. That's how open systems self-organize—through constraints. Angels began shining when they achieved discipline.

"Life was hard," a Navajo elder once said, "but we lived it gloriously." Sacrifice, Gandhi teaches, is making sacred.

The aim of this is to summon up the blood and make you ready for extreme actions—to be ready to take your desires for the self-healing of our world seriously. Be ready to take your dreams for a just, sustainable society seriously. We can do it. Why do we want to settle for anything less? Do we dare to take our dreams and wishes seriously? It's hard to do without others, hard to do alone without linking arms with some others in your neighborhood, in your town, in your life.

CHAPTER 280

Mindfulness and Climate Action

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this powerful dharma conversation, three distinguished teachers - Tara Brach, Ruth King, and Jack Kornfield - explore how Buddhist practice can inform our response to climate change. The discussion begins with recognizing our fundamental interconnection and the ways that the illusion of separation fuels both environmental destruction and social injustice. Tara Brach draws on the Parsifal legend to illustrate how presence and genuine care can awaken us from the 'trance' of disconnection from the earth. Ruth King emphasizes the systemic patterns of exploitation affecting both marginalized communities and the planet, connecting climate justice with racial and social justice. Jack Kornfield offers the bodhisattva vision as a framework for sustained engagement, sharing inspiring examples of long-term commitment to healing. The teachers address practical questions about working with anger, balancing inner practice with outer activism, and finding hope amid overwhelming challenges. This conversation launches the Mindfulness and Climate Action series, creating sangha for dharma practitioners committed to earth care. Throughout, the discussion weaves together themes of dukkha, interdependence, compassion, and the bodhisattva path as foundations for authentic environmental response.

Greetings everyone.

My name is Tanisra and I welcome you to our conversation, Mindfulness in the Dharma and Climate Action. I'll be hosting this conversation today and through the coming months on behalf of One Earth Sangha, the Buddhist teachers for climate action and our sponsor, Maestro Conference. A really warm welcome to each and every one of you who have called in today to join this important conversation.

Before we begin, I'd like to acknowledge the tremendous work it has taken to reach this point for the team in the background, and also for each of you as you enter into the reality of what we're engaging—the tremendous challenge we're facing now to ensure a sustainable future for the generations that come after us.

Let me suggest that we begin by taking a deep breath and really feeling that breath in your body. Feel your body, feel the connection to the earth beneath you with your feet on the ground and the pressure of sitting on your seat. Just connect with that sensation. Take a deep breath and arrive here. Let's arrive here into our body, into this space, into our presence, and into this conversation together. And then breathe out, trusting the flow and the process that we're going to be engaging.

Today marks the start of Earth Care Week, and this is a wonderful way to begin. We have 1,500 people and more signed up for this conversation. There's been a huge response from the Dharma and mindfulness community, and we really appreciate that.

Just before we begin, I'm curious to know how many of you have been involved in the People's Climate March which just happened in New York and across the globe recently. If you were involved in that or aware of that, just press one on your dial pad so we can get a sense. That's fantastic. Thank you so much.

This was a huge event and I think what happened during that time is we became aware of ourselves as a global tribe—a huge collective of people gathered across all diversities, representing all kinds of concerns. I think this really marks a turning point in the climate movement. Our conversations together are to place our particular unique contribution as Dharma practitioners.

Let me briefly introduce our team that are providing backup for our talks. Lou Leonard is involved and co-founder of One Earth Sangha. Kristen Barco is also co-founder of One Earth Sangha, both resident in Washington, D.C., and Yong Oh, resident in Chattanooga, Tennessee, who's also been very involved in helping us with the IT.

Today, the theme of our discussion—and we're very grateful and appreciative to have three fantastic, accomplished and experienced Dharma teachers to help guide our conversation—is: what is the authentic attitude or understanding that moves us towards real and authentic transformation in our times? The presenters will reflect together on the qualities of heart and mind that enable us to face the suffering of the earth and how we can begin to respond wisely to this.

Our teachers leading our conversation this morning will begin with Tara Brach and then Ruth King and Jack Kornfield. Many of you, if not all of you, will be very familiar with them. You can also check their detailed biographies on the One Earth Sangha website.

I'm going to hand over to Lou Leonard from One Earth Sangha now to introduce himself. He's been supporting us with the science and will be engaging the conversation in that way. Lou, if you're there, please introduce yourself and then take us into the conversation with Tara who will be leading us into this focus.

Thank you, Tanisra. Hello, everyone. On behalf of Kristin Barker, the amazing co-founder of One Earth Sangha who I work with on this project, welcome to this first climate conversation.

One Earth Sangha is an online community of thousands of mindfulness practitioners and also a network of sanghas staying connected and learning from each other about the Dharma and climate change. We're so excited to kick off the series today and really grateful to all of you for sharing part of your Sundays with us over the next five weeks.

You all received a background paper last week created by Kuti Kanko, a senior scientist from Environmental Defense Fund and me. If you didn't get the paper, let us know and we'll send it to you. Don't think of this as an authoritative treatise. We couldn't do that in 10 pages, and that's not necessary for this class, but it's intended as a common starting point for all of us.

Rather than running through the 10 pages of the paper, because the science can be a barrier for some, I thought I'd offer my favorite 10 words that summarize where we are now on climate. Those are: things are getting worse and worse and better and better, faster and faster. Almost seems like a climate koan.

For example, on the one hand, the Arctic is collapsing before our eyes, and it's doing so at breathtaking speed. There's growing evidence that this warming of the Arctic is also causing larger impacts to our planet. It's causing the jet stream to wobble, which is helping to create things like the polar vortex, the California drought, and the path of storms like Sandy.

On the other hand, for the first six months of this year—the first six months of 2014—70% of new U.S. electric generation capacity came from wind and solar. Seventy percent. And just two weeks ago, China announced that it's developing a plan to cap its carbon pollution.

So if you read nothing else in the background paper, look at the graph on the bottom of page four. It shows that the key fork in the road for us on this challenge is still ahead, not behind. We don't know how this movie is going to turn out, and what we do matters.

In my day job, I lead the climate change program at World Wildlife Fund, and on many days, the enormousness of this challenge makes me feel small and inadequate. Most difficultly, it makes me feel alone a lot. But the best cure that I've found for managing these feelings is what we're doing today, and that's Sangha. So thank you so much for being here and helping to create this Sangha over the next five weeks.

We are going to have a Q&A period later in this call where you can virtually raise your hand, and you can also submit questions during the course of this conversation to questions@OneEarthSangha.org. This class is being recorded and will be available afterwards.

So without further ado, I'd like to welcome the first of our teachers, Tara Brach. Tara needs no introduction, or at least not one that I'm qualified to give. She's simply one of the wisest hearts of our time, and I'm grateful to say that she's also the leader of the Insight Meditation Community of Washington, where I practice here in Washington, D.C. Tara, we're so grateful to have you.

Thank you so much, Lou, and thank you for your powerful words. I'm just sitting here resonating with what you said about feeling alone and about Sangha, because everything that is better and better is coming out of some feeling of us all together, our connection, our consciousness.

So I'm inviting us to pause again and reflect. I gather in the last hour, instead of 1,500, we're more like 1,700 and counting. Just to feel yourself right here—feel your body, your aliveness, whatever state of heart is here right now. And to widen your attention to sense all of us here, that we really are creating a field of attention and a field of caring. Maybe just as many times as you can remember to pause and keep feeling into that, because that's where change arises from.

When we go to that basic inquiry about how this predicament unfolded—how our enlarged body, our living earth, came to be in such a state of dis-ease—most spiritual traditions will describe the suffering that comes from feeling separate, that it's the original suffering. There's a self in here and a world out there. Out of that separateness, there's a phrase I love: the primal mood of the separate self is fear. These energies of grasping and fear lead us to violating ourselves, each other, and this earth.

If something's out there—I think of the term "unreal other"—it becomes unreal. Another person or a racial group or a species or the natural world is other. And then we can violate it. It doesn't have the same heart or vulnerability or subjective reality that we have.

One of the frames that I find really useful from an evolutionary perspective is this sense that originally there's that fused, part-of-everything consciousness—the primordial mood. Then we emerge into our egoic state, which most of humanity is in, where there is a sense of unreal other. If we're honest with ourselves, a lot of moments of the day feel like that. We're waking up now, and this is the third stage in a simplistic way—emerging to this realization of interdependence, where we belong to the web. That's where the better and better is coming from. It's from that consciousness.

But humanity's been in this prolonged, arrested place of development in terms of egoic consciousness. Sometimes I think about the consciousness of manifest destiny. Most of you are familiar with this emergence in the 1800s—this sense of entitlement to vanquish and destroy anything indigenous, anything that's "unreal other." It's still operating. Manifest destiny is that consciousness where those in power believe they have the right or entitlement to dominate and oppress others of different races, sexual orientations, ethnicities. The devastation of our earth is no different. It's this egoic separation that thinks the earth is ours to plunder and violate.

Most of you listening probably share, like myself, a deep love and admiration for Joanna Macy, one of the pioneers in caring and acting on behalf of the earth. She says we've been treating earth as if it's a supply source and sewer—extracting resources, pouring waste into it over and over. We're now in what's described as the sixth great extinction, worse than when the dinosaurs disappeared. There's trauma to all systems. It's estimated that half of all plants and animals and bird species will die off before 2100, and 75% of mammals in the next 334 years.

I used to go frequently to the Museum of Natural History in New York when I was younger, and they have an amazing exhibit on climate change. One scientist writes that this should keep you awake at night. And so what most of us are wondering is: how come it doesn't? What stops us from recognizing what seems to be right in front of us?

If we look at it honestly in our own lives and those around us, we're preoccupied with what feels more personal and immediate. We get moved by what's emotional to us in a personal, egoic way. Anyone who's really hungry, anyone in the midst of war, struggling with poverty or their own health, anyone in a major relational crisis—what's immediate is going to distract from what's happening. And of course, for many of us who do sense what's happening, it's too upsetting to think about.

But I think one of the biggest things is the feeling—and Lou pointed to it—when we sense that we're alone, that there's nothing we can do to make a difference. I want to speak to that, because that's when we close down or cut off and stop listening and looking and attending. That's where the great suffering is. We become like lobsters in this heating pot where it's gradual.

We're not registering it day to day, the crisis.

I'm thinking of one of the phrases from Rumi that most has captured this predicament for me, which goes like this: "Sit, be still, and listen, for you are drunk, and we are at the edge of the roof."

This is what most spiritual traditions point to—that we're in some way drunk, in a trance, asleep. This is the arrested state in the egoic stage; we're not seeing. And so the deep inquiry is: what wakes us up?

One of the things I'd like to share with you is a legend from the Knights of the Round Table that has really impacted me. In this story, there's a knight seeking the Holy Grail. Parsifal, a young knight, stops in a kingdom that's been turned into a wasteland. People are wandering around as if it's business as usual—they're not really noticing. He goes to see the king in the castle, who is lying prone, mortally wounded.

Parsifal sees this and leaves. It's kind of like "it's not my business" or "what can I do?" and "it's rude to interfere." He's uncomfortable about the situation, so he just leaves.

Then he's confronted on the road by a witch named Kundry, who's enraged that he didn't bother to even reach out to the king. So he returns, more thoughtful, more present, and kneels by the king's bed. With real, deep kindness he says, "What ails thee?"

In that moment, the king's cheeks get their normal flush of color and he stands up. Outside, the kingdom awakens from the trance—there are flowers and grass, and everything's alive again.

This is a story of a wasteland, and we're a growing wasteland. There's a trance that we're in. The first step—and the reason I love this legend—is to just start right where we are and offer our presence so that we're paying attention. What's going on inside this heart and body? What's going on in my larger body, the earth? Sit, be still, and listen. Feel into what's happening.

Again, Joanna Macy says you don't have to be optimistic. She says trying to be hopeful can wear you out. Just be present.

What we find in starting where we are in that presence is that whatever we're really paying attention to, we fall in love with. For me, I go out every day. I spend a lot of time outside, and I pay attention to the trees and the river I live near, and I'm totally in love with it. When I'm in nature, it dissolves that sense of self and other.

And then if I see trash on the trail, it hurts—like it feels bad—and I pick it up. So there's this presence with this life, being in this world, in this living web, and then there's compassion for the devastation. We start attending to the clear-cutting, and it feels like our bodies are involved, because they are. Or the loss of the coral reefs, and the sea's dying, and it's us. Or the cruelty to animals that's due to human consuming. They're part of us. So we care, we respond.

I'm saying this as I begin to wrap up here because it feels to me that we'll only respond—people will only wake up and respond to the pain of this earth—if they're in love with this earth, in love with life. The choice to act has to come from the human heart, and that unleashes our intelligence so we can respond wisely because we love.

I heard that Ralph Waldo Emerson once asked what we would do if the stars only came out once every thousand years. Here's what he says: "No one would sleep that night, of course. The world would become religious overnight. We would be ecstatic, delirious, made rapturous by the glory of God."

Instead—and this is me speaking—the stars come out every night and we watch television.

I'm very struck by the fact that in the United States, we spend on average 90% of our time indoors. How do you fall in love with the earth? What's going to happen to our kids in terms of loving the earth? Americans spend 11 hours per day with digital media. How can we love the earth if we're online all the time?

D.H. Lawrence says—and this is 150 years ago—"We're bleeding at the roots because we are cut off from the earth and the sun and the stars."

So the response to this trance is to come into presence, to reconnect with our bodies, with this earth body, to get that we are this living earth, to really get that. Cosmologist Brian Swimme says four and a half billion years ago, the earth was a flaming molten ball of rock. And now it can sing opera. It can care. It can self-heal through these awakening hearts—those of us sitting right here.

We need to belong to our world, love our world, less in a cyber world, more real.

And the last thing, returning to what Lou shared about waking up from the unreal other and reconnecting—we must act collectively. We must do this together. It simply doesn't work to respond to the suffering of Earth as a separate self.

For myself, being involved with Teachers Collaborative, working locally with Lou and Kristen—it's just part of something larger. It's not a self acting. It's just belonging. It's wonderful to be reminded of that together, and I think this truth runs so deep.

Thank you.

"Thank you so much, Tara. That's a wonderful way to enter into our conversation. It's very, very beautiful. Thank you. So I'd like to invite Ruth. Thank you so much, Ruth, for joining us this morning, and I really look forward to your words as well."

Thank you, and welcome, everyone. It's exciting to be on this call with all of you, and it did my heart such wonders to see the march and witness the unifying power that emerges when we recognize a need and step into it. This is no small task at all.

I had to educate myself about climate change in order to step into a deeper understanding. I kept feeling the pull at my heart, but it was almost in conflict with so many other pulls in my life—family concerns, so many other systemic issues demanding attention, like family members in the prison system. So I educated myself by connecting with One Earth Sangha and really delving into Naomi Klein's book on the shock doctrine and her latest work. It proved deeply helpful.

One thing I realized is that climate disasters are teaching us about the illusion of boundaries. They're showing us our utter interdependence, our relatedness, our reliance on each other. I remember when AIDS was considered an African issue—now we understand how these elemental forces spread without regard for borders. We're looking at phenomena that won't be defined by territorial boundaries.

So the very notion of territory through climate change is calling us to examine the structures we've been conditioned within and to consider a realignment in this crucial area. Our life depends on this necessary attending.

As I educated myself around climate change alongside the other pulls of heart in our shared humanity, I recognized something profound: there's actually a template. There's a template of greed at the systemic level that we can begin to recognize—a constellation, almost a skeletal shape of exploitation and oppression with systemic qualities. We can't always see these patterns at the individual level. We have to step back and widen the lens beyond our special interest groups or silos to see the dynamic relationship—actually a power dynamic—that has been at play in our society.

It's like examining the relationship between capitalism and culture, looking at the dynamics between dominance and subordinate relationships at the systemic level. The planet Gaia, the great mother, has been and continues to be exploited just as poor people, First Nations and other indigenous cultures, people of color throughout the world have been for centuries. This is just to name a few.

So it's important to see that what's happening to the climate and our planet fits into this same template. Poor people and people of color are ongoingly, disproportionately, and systematically disenfranchised by these climate disasters throughout the world. The NAACP Climate Justice Initiative published statistics showing that 68% of African Americans live within thirty miles of a coal-fired power plant—the zone of maximum exposure to pollutants that cause an array of ailments from heart disease, which I experienced as a child, to birth defects. Communities of color breathe in nearly 40% more pollutants than white people, classically, in our country.

So choices are made about where and how things happen as we examine these systems. There are consequences to this kind of greed seeding that has occurred over time, and they're both gross and subtle in their expression. Some consequences we can see as separation in our humanness, in our relatedness—denial, hatred, rebellion, and wars. People of color, poor people, and the planet are all rebelling for balance.

I think this is a critical piece for us to examine—not just the special interest of climate change, though I believe it's crucial at this time, but to also see that it's actually a reflection of a dance that's been going on for some time. It's very difficult for me to see climate change without also seeing these other issues.

This is not a call to point out and create division—it's a call to recognize the divisions that already exist among us. This isn't about placing anger or pointing fingers, but about seeing clearly and being willing not to have our focus so narrow that we miss the larger patterns at work.

other people, other situations are left out. I'm mostly concerned with how our hearts are divided, and I think climate change is changing us, forcing us to see the delusion of the boundaries that we have.

Martin Luther King Jr. said it well from his letter from the Birmingham jail: "We're all caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly affects all indirectly."

And Shirley Chisholm—some of you may remember she was the first African-American congresswoman in 1968 and the first Black candidate for the U.S. presidency—she said that "service is the rent we pay for the privilege of living on this planet. It is the very purpose of life, not something you do in your spare time."

One of the beautiful things about what we can start to look at in terms of what we do next is to most fundamentally maintain our practice, which allows us to know deeply. The Buddha specialized in suffering and the end of suffering. We have many tools that can support our awareness and deepen our presence so that we can act wisely and respond well to what's happening in the world.

Comfort and discomfort can keep us apart or bring us together. I see climate change as a call to this coming together. Martin Luther King again reminds us that "power without love is reckless and abusive, and love without power is sentimental and anemic. Power at its best is love implementing the demands of justice, and justice at its best is power correcting everything that stands against love."

I'd just like to say that we are the environment, and what we do next is important for both presence and love. Thank you.

Thank you so much, Ruth. Very powerful words, and powerful to be reminded of Martin Luther King and his struggle—such a great example of the disproportionate impact on marginalized and oppressed communities historically through the arc of colonialism and the abuse of those peoples and the earth.

So Jack, welcome. Jack has been so amazing in contributing to the implanting of the Dharma in our Western world.

Thank you, Tanisha. I'm so moved and touched by the words of Ruth and Tara and all of you, and the spirit of so many on this call. It's as if our own children are sick and our grandchildren, and we're at the bedside of the earth as we talk about this kind of illness. We're gathered around and now coming together to say: What can we do? How can we respond?

What I'd like to speak on and add to the conversation is sustaining ourselves in this difficult time. It's an age-old question: Born into the human realm, how do we sustain our good heart even though there is dukkha?

The first noble truth of the Buddha: birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, sickness is dukkha, death is dukkha—whether you translate it as sorrow or suffering or insecurity, lamentation, pain, distress, despair—and we're feeling all that. This is the words of the Buddha: dukkha is distress and despair. Encounters with what is difficult and painful, which we're experiencing, is dukkha. Separation from what is dear, from the things we care about, is dukkha. Not getting what we want, not having it turn out the way we'd like—all the forms of clinging.

This is part of the human realm, the first noble truth, and it is staring us in the face with climate change, affecting our lives and the lives of beings all around us.

We might say, well, this is the first time that terrible suffering is human-caused, and the scale of it is something new and devastating. But even from ancient times, from the Buddha's time, there was much human-caused suffering: the continuing warfare between the Vajjians and the Kosalans and the Sakyans around the Buddha, life expectancy which was half of ours, illness and slavery. This is not a new story. Human beings can create heaven and tend one another and bring alive love and connectedness and care and wisdom and awaken—and human beings also can contribute to dukkha, to the suffering that's part of the human realm.

There's a giant vision offered of the role of the awakened heart and the awakened being, which we all are. "Nobly born," begin the texts. "Oh, you are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas. Remember who you really are." You think you were born into this body as a separate being, but from what Tara and Ruth are reminding us, when you begin to awaken, you awaken in the bodhisattva body—the body of awakening together with all beings—and realize: whether it's a year or a century or a hundred thousand mahakalpas, the bodhisattva has only one way, the way of connection and compassion and care for all beings.

What's beautiful about the vision of the bodhisattva...

is it doesn't exclude suffering, but instead the bodhisattva appears together with suffering and is committed in the midst of the difficulty to find in our hearts that wisdom and nobility and dignity that brings light and connectedness and care and the end of suffering to beings.

Not a small project. When you sit in a Zen dojo and begin Zen practice, you recite the four vows starting with "Sentient beings are numberless, boundless. I vow to save them all." Not a small thing. Even if you look in your own family, they don't necessarily want to be saved by you. People around you resist, and yet at the same time, this is a vow of the bodhisattva to tend to all beings.

When the Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning and recites the vows from Shantideva's bodhisattva vision: "May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be food for the hungry. May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge for those to cross the flood. May I be a lamp in the darkness. May I be a light of dharma and inspiration for beings. As long as earth and sky exist, as long as beings exist, may I be born and work together with them to bring liberation."

So we hear these bodhisattva vows, and we realize that these are the instructions for navigating difficult times. If you look at the life of the exemplars, like Mahatma Gandhi, who lived in a time of tremendous difficulty—of violence and colonial oppression and caste system—he took a day a week, no matter what was happening. While bringing down the British Empire, he said, "I'm sorry, I know there are hundreds of thousands of people out marching. This is my quiet day." Once a week, he would quiet his mind and listen in his heart to the action he could take that was most connected with all, from the most skillful, dharmic, awakened place that we can do together to bring us together and to manifest change.

As Martin Luther King did, or Aung San Suu Kyi, who I was fortunate enough to meet with in Burma earlier this year. She said, "They never really had me in prison. I was arrested for seventeen years, but I never hated them."

And so we tend our heart. And then as a bodhisattva, we set the compass of our heart with our vows of long-term dedication amidst joy and sorrow, amidst dukkha and sukha, amidst praise and blame and birth and death. The bodhisattva has only one way, the way of compassion and the way of envisioning the service and connection with all of life.

One of my favorite examples of this is the great Buddhist elder, Ariyaratne of Sri Lanka, who started the Sarvodaya movement to connect villages across the country—more than half the villages in the country—to dig wells and build schools and collaborate and make peace. Toward the end of the terrible Sri Lankan Civil War, he called all the members of Sarvodaya together to try to support the Norwegian peace plan. Six hundred and fifty thousand people gathered together at the ancient temple at Anuradhapura, and Ariyaratne stood up.

He said, "It's taken us five hundred years to get into this difficulty. And the Buddhist teachings have us look at the causes of things and not just the effects. So if we look, there are five hundred years of conflict between Buddhists and Muslims and Hindus and four hundred years of colonial oppression and two hundred years of economic disparity between the rich, wet parts of the island and the poor, dry parts. So what I have to offer you is the Sarvodaya five-hundred-year peace plan."

"If it's taken us five hundred years to get into this, here's the plan to get out: Five years of simply ceasefire and ten years of rebuilding roads and schools and twenty-five years of learning each other's languages and religions and fifty years of working on an economic program to right the economic injustice and having the poor parts and the rich parts collaborate for everyone's well-being. And after one hundred years, we'll have a grand council to see how we're doing and start all over again. And over five hundred years, I think we can turn Sri Lanka into the island of peace and mercy and awakening that she was meant to be."

When I heard these words, I almost wept. I got a chance to tell this story to the Dalai Lama, knowing he carries the sufferings of Tibet that has happened so much in the last fifty or sixty years, the weight of that in his heart and his shoulders. And he was grinning hearing this long-term vision.

Thomas Merton explains it this way. He says, "When you are doing the work"—he wrote to an activist—"do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all, if not, at times, bring about its opposite. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself."

And so there's a kind of courage in the bodhisattva and a vision that is vast, as vast as the earth and the sky, the galaxies that we are part of. As it says in the Bhagavad Gita, the secret is to act without attachment to the fruits of the actions, and for us to trust the seeds that we plant. It is given to each of us as part of, as cells in the awakening organism of the earth, to plant our seeds, to contribute our peace, no matter what is happening.

And as we plant the seeds and contribute our peace, as Henry David Thoreau says, "I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, but I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I am prepared to expect wonders."

And so we plant our seeds not out of bitterness and not out of fear or confusion, but out of a sense of rightness and truth, and then something else happens.

When my dear friend Wes Nisker, another dharma teacher, was interviewing Gary Snyder recently—Gary being one of the fathers of the American environmental movement for half a century, Pulitzer Prize-winning poet of "Earth House Hold"—he said, "Gary, you're eighty-four years old, you see the climate disruption, the oceans rising, the loss of species. What advice do you have for us at this time where there's so much despair and worry and fear?" And Gary looked back steadily and said, "Don't feel guilty. If you are going to save the earth, save it because you love it, not out of anger, not out of guilt, not out of fear."

All those are the source of what creates dukkha—greed and hatred and anger. If you save it, you must save it because you love it.

And it's the love that took those monks out of their forest monasteries to wrap their robes around the greatest trees in the forest and ordained them as the abbots to save that part of the forest from being cut down and logged. It was the love that allowed my teacher and friend, Mahagosananda, after the Cambodian genocide where all nineteen of his own family members were killed and his monastery burned, to walk for fifteen years through the killing fields and the war zones of Cambodia, step by step with hundreds of people behind him, leading them in the chant: "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed." He told them that to return to the earth, to your village and your community, you can't ride a bus, you can't go back in a truck. You have to walk step by step, and with each step, practice loving kindness and compassion, and bring that back alive on this earth.

This is our work as a bodhisattva. This is our time. Oh, nobly born, you were born for this. You were called to do this. And in doing this, you plant your seeds and you become part of the whole that is healing itself.

It's so wonderful to be reminded of the big vision and the inner orientation of setting our compass at the heart. As we've been speaking about the Bodhisattva way, these conversations will be leading into the creation of an eco-satsang training online, globally, across traditions. As things are moving fast on the ground, we'll be seeking feedback from all participants involved in this love of the earth, so that we can continue to apply everything that's been shared this morning more fully and bring it into action and response.

I feel my heart filling up listening to these words. I feel I've been nourished and calmed and yet also energized—a wonderful impact.

Now we're going to shift into hearing each other by moving into breakout groups. We have fifteen minutes for this guided reflection. In groups of four, you'll each have about three minutes to reflect from what you've heard and where you are: How is it for you as we wake up into the reality of climate change and all that's implied? What kinds of responses are you experiencing in terms of what you're thinking or maybe even things you're doing? It's not a long time, but in three minutes, much can happen for each of us. I encourage that as you listen, you're not responding to each other—you're simply listening. Then we'll take whatever comes from the breakout groups into more dialogue for the last part of our call together.

After the breakout groups, a question came in via email that I'd like to ask Tara. It's about a common area of concern: How do we actually deal with this feeling of righteous anger? Sometimes in Buddhism there's confusion around strong emotions in response to what's going on—outrage, anger. How best do we use that energy or be in relationship to it?

First, I'm really glad that question's out there because there's so much in spiritual worlds about how taboo anger is, and we are rigged to feel anger. It's natural. It's an intelligent response to harm and violence and dis-ease. So the bottom line is that this is a message, an intelligent message to respond to. When I think of tar sands or the cruelty of factory farms, there's an outrage that comes up in me.

The point isn't to get rid of that energy, but there's a shadow side: when there's a story wrapped around anger that there's a bad other involved—bad guys out there doing bad things—it perpetuates separation. The storyline actually will distance people. So the deal is we need to listen to the message and not get caught in the emotional trance of it.

And I want to give you one example of how we can do that, which I discovered for myself when we were about to go to war against Iraq. I was definitely feeling "bad other" - you know, they are the bad ones, they're the violators, those in the administration who wanted to create this ripple of violence.

I started doing this reflection when I'd read the newspaper and it would trigger these "bad other" feelings. I'd feel the anger and say, "Okay, let's get rid of the storyline - just feel the energy." I'd let the energy be as much as it was. Then I'd find that underneath it was fear. I'd let that be as much as it was - really this practice we do of presence and being with. And I'd find that under the fear, when I let it be big, was this grieving for all the loss. Then I'd let that be big, and under that was care.

When I could then move from that place of caring about people, caring about the suffering, there was a group interfaith protest, and we all got arrested. But the protest wasn't like a fist-waving angry protest. It was people with posters of Iraqi children and American children. One child at the process had a sign saying, "Don't bomb them, they're children over there and they hurt too."

My point is not to get lost in the storyline of bad other, but to really be with the energy and find the love underneath that cares about our world.

"Thank you. That is so helpful. That is fantastic. Thank you."

"Ruth, if I can just bring you another question that just came in via email. I think this is a very archetypal question, actually. It's about the split between secular activism - the activists who are out there - and those engaged in so-called spiritual quietism on the mat, doing the inner work and Dharma practice that's usually about personal transformation. How do we bring those together? In what way can they inform each other? What's your take on that?"

"Yeah, that's a great question as well. I've heard it termed as the line between the monastic and the marketplace. How do we bring our awareness to or balance these two apparently separate approaches? But what I've found is that they're not so separate, this idea of activism and quietism, if you will."

"I actually see that our activism is an extension of our practice. Those of us who have a practice are sitting with what Tara just offered around these intense emotions and the passions or the fire of the heart that gets lit up. We are challenged with how we express our passions in the world from a place of practice and presence."

"One thing to keep in mind in moving from our cushions out into the world is that we have a practice of doing no harm - that's square in our foreheads and in our minds. That's our mantra playing all the time: to do no harm, to be present, to do no harm."

"An example of this that was palpable for me was being in South Africa around the time Nelson Mandela was elected. I went around with a number of people and spoke with nonprofit organizations there. I was curious about how you did this without just being enraged all the time - how did you fight apartheid without being enraged all the time? The message I got from a number of people, maybe not all of them but most of them, was that the issue of apartheid was never about the person. It was about the system. It was a matter of seeing that it was a system that needed to be dismantled. It wasn't about hating the people."

"That really stuck with me - to be able to see what needs to happen, bring our quiet practice to a sense of equanimity and presence and clear seeing and groundedness, not the reactivity or the heat that sometimes we find in activism. It's really important. Growing up in the civil rights movement, I saw many people die on the vine from righteous rage and righteous indignation. What I've found is that it's really nice to bring your heart into activism and to see the humanness and the heart and love that is in all people, even the ones we have judgment about."

"That's wonderful, thank you so much. Again, such a brilliant insight to hear about Nelson Mandela. I remember him saying that to hate your enemies is like drinking poison, hoping it will kill them. It's poison. So again, this question of heart and how the Dharma can inform our response so well."

"I'd like to open up now. You've had some breakout groups and questions and dialogue coming. It would be lovely to hear from our participants. If you have anything you'd like to share or say or ask about, please press 1 on your keypad and Kristen will help navigate this next piece. We have about just over 15 minutes left of our time together today. So Kristen, over to you."

"Okay, great. Thanks, everybody. It's just so great to be with all of you. I'm so grateful to all the teachers and to be able to do this work as a sangha with you."

As Tanissara mentioned, please press 1 if you have any questions. We'll take your question now. Josh, I see some hands raising. Let's go to Jeffrey first.

"Thank you. My question comes from the last person who spoke about how people in South Africa coped with apartheid by seeing it as the system. My concern is: how much progress can we really make working on climate change if we don't do something about the nature of our political system that supports it? The massive amounts of power and money in politics, the oil and gas industries, and the basic structure—as seen in the Citizens United ruling—of corporations having way too much power. I've decided myself to try to divide my time and work on both, but I'd be interested in what anybody else has to say about that."

That's a great question, Jeffrey. Jack, do you have a response?

"There are two parts to this question. The personal part is: which should we tend to? I think we each have particular gifts. Some might have the gift of being a political organizer. Some might have the gift of systemic and systematic thinking, where you can really tend to and put your heart into getting money out of politics or working to change the way corporate charters have created rampant, freewheeling exploitation. If you can do that, great. Others may be tying their robes around trees, or going to preschools and elementary and middle schools, educating the next generation so that they can act. I think the answer is all of the above—listening to your heart to see what you're particularly drawn to contribute, because we need all of those seeds.

"The underlying question—do we need to address the systemic nature? Absolutely. But there's an even deeper question you allude to: the world doesn't need more energy, more food, more things. It needs less greed, less hatred, less ignorance of the sense of separation, less delusion. Not only on the systemic level, but on the deepest Dharma level—a kind of education and awakening in ourselves, our community, and the community of humanity—that is the biggest systemic change of all. I see a lot of potential in the internet that's connecting us and in wild changes happening that may actually aid us in this process."

I'd like to embroider a little onto that. Through what's happening—as I mentioned, the ground is moving very fast under our feet as we awaken into our reality and as people mobilize and organize. By the end of these conversations and as we move forward together as a Dharma community, we'll be offering connections and networks we can align with: people of faith, people in activist communities, people on the front lines, organizations with good strategies. The main message is: we're not alone. We're doing this together.

Let's hear from Julia next. What's your question?

"I think Tanissara sort of touched on this just now. My question is: how can our sangha facilitate sharing good news about initiatives happening across the world, so we can gain some inspiration and heart that there is movement?"

That's wonderful. There are fantastic things happening. Let me see if Lou is still on the call to share some good news... While we find Lou, would one of the teachers like to respond? Any positive actions or movements you're seeing in response to our times?

Jack: "This isn't current climate news, but there's a really fine book called The Better Angels of Our Nature by Steven Pinker, a philosopher and anthropologist at Harvard. He charts several hundred years of human history and shows the gradual reduction in slavery—even though people are still enslaved—the better treatment of children, the gradual freedom for women, even though it's still difficult in parts of the world, the gradual reduction in warfare. If you need heart in the possibility of humans becoming more conscious, I really recommend this. It gives you the sense that you're part of this great movement of awakening that is actually happening."

I think also, as there's more sense of a big movement and shift happening to mobilize, we're going to see a lot of creative work emerging. Naomi Klein's latest book, This Changes Everything, is something we should all be reading—very realistic but with a positive perspective. The work of Bill McKibben and 350.org, Idle No More—which is a mobilization of First Nations peoples—these are movements that are very good to connect with.

So we have about ten minutes or so. Can we take another question?

Great. Let's go to Louise.

Well, that's interesting. My phone is starting to beep. But Mike, I had two suggestions in response to the last couple of questions. One is about systemic work—Joanna Macy also talks about another level, which is the consciousness behind the systems. So that's another level that we can work on in changing consciousness. That does translate into eventually changing systems. And then as far as good news...

We don't get to hear the good news from Louise. I'm sure we can all look around and see plenty of good news, but we didn't get to hear Louise's version.

All right, so it looks like we'll have time for one more. How about Stephanie?

Hi, can you hear me?

Yes, we can hear you. Go ahead.

Well, I had a really interesting experience a couple weeks ago. I live in Houston, which we call the Petro Metro. So it's really one of the big centers of the fossil fuel industry. A couple weeks ago, I went to a conference on climate and energy put on by a group called the Heritage Foundation, which you may be aware is a pretty conservative think tank that is certainly trying to bolster the case for continued fossil fuel use. One of the speakers there gave a presentation about his visit to the People's Climate March, and I'm trying to figure out how to say this exactly...

Just tell us what's the heart of it for you. What's the question that's deep in your heart?

When they were presenting, this man started off with a picture of Buddhists meditating before the march saying, "Oh my gosh, look at these crazy people." Of course, being a Buddhist, I took that pretty deeply and all these questions about anger arose for me. I think this may be something that will come up more and more—that people of different spiritual traditions may face some targeting, as has happened in the past. How can we work with this to make it a strength for this movement?

I think this is a really good question, and the wonderful thing to know is that we have time throughout this whole month to continue exploring and deepening into these kinds of questions that have been brought to us together.

I think that it's okay that we're targeted. As Martin Luther King spoke about, sometimes you actually need to bring out the toxins and bring out the poisons so that they can be addressed with compassion in a very direct way. There's some heart of justice that's there to be touched in every being, although in some of them it's still deeply covered over. So I'm not worried about that. I think that is actually part of the movement that eventually will bring us together.

That's brilliant. Thank you for that reminder.

So again, thank you so much, everyone. We're going to start the wrap-up now for the last few minutes of our call together. I can't tell you how much I appreciate—how much we all appreciate—your presence, giving your time. We know that those on the call and those who will be listening to the recordings represent just the tip of the iceberg of our deep sense of care and concern about the challenge we're in. But it's so helpful to know that we're here together, that we're on the same page and looking together at how to embody this bodhisattva energy and how to find the most authentic, realistic and powerful responses that we can.

So next Sunday, please do join us again at the same time. We're going to be hearing from Reverend Angel Kiyoda-Williams, Aya Anandabodhi Bakuni, and Susie Harrington—three wonderful practitioners and teachers. They have much to further our discussion, so please tune in to that.

As I mentioned, all of this is going to be feeding into the development of an Eco-Sattva training, which will be launched next year. I also want to say that One Earth Sangha is a new initiative. Everyone working on One Earth Sangha is offering their time on a volunteer basis. We'd like to embody and ground One Earth Sangha more deeply, and for that we do value support in all manner of ways—but also particularly any dana and financial offerings that can be given on the website will go directly to ensuring that this initiative actually becomes a movement in and of itself, one that can be a platform for all of us to orient toward and find our home within as we navigate the times ahead.

I'd also like to invite Josh to speak. Maestro Conference has been so generous in offering their platform freely as dana to host our call. Josh, do you have a few words to say about Maestro?

"Yes, thank you. My name is Joshua Edwards, and I'm with Maestro Conference. We're so honored and excited to support the Mindfulness and Climate Action Initiative with the technology you're using today. If you would like more information about Maestro Conference—either for hosting your own events or for information about our other upcoming world-changing conversations—please dial the number 1 on your telephone keypad now, or your Skype dial pad or computer keyboard. We'd love to send you more information about how you can turn presentations into conversations. We're so glad to be here with you all today. You can certainly stay on and continue to connect together in small groups after the formal part of the call is complete. Thank you."

Thanks, Josh. And just to mention, you can continue to email us at OneEarthSangha. We're going to be setting up a Facebook group where we can continue the conversation—you'll hear about that.

So, as in the Dharma, the way of the Dharma, this has been wonderful to draw this energy together. I'd like to invite Ruth, if you would—as we finish, as is in our tradition—to share the blessings and the good karma and the good energy and the prayerfulness from our gathering for the welfare of our earth and our planet. So please, Ruth, over to you to finish.

"Thank you so much. Thanks to all of the good hearts that are collected here. Let me invite you just to take a breath or two right here and now, and to feel the aliveness of our sharing together. To know that we are a sangha.

May we envision our service to life. May we tend to our hearts. May we set our compass to compassion, connection, and care. May we plant our seeds and contribute to peace. And may we be a part of the home—our earth—that is healing itself for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May our practice be of service to all beings in all directions without exception. Thank you."

Thank you, everyone, and stay well, go well until next week.

CHAPTER 281

Mindfulness and Climate Action: 1

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this opening conversation of a groundbreaking series, renowned Dharma teachers Tara Brach, Ruth King, and Jack Kornfield explore what authentic transformation looks like in our climate crisis era. Drawing from the Buddha's teaching on dukkha and the bodhisattva ideal, they examine how the illusion of separation—the "unreal other"—underlies both our climate emergency and historical patterns of oppression.
>
> Tara Brach reflects on the Parsifal legend and Rumi's words about being "drunk at the edge of the roof," calling us to move from unconscious consumption to presence with Earth's suffering. Ruth King connects climate justice to systemic oppression, noting how communities of color disproportionately bear environmental burdens, while emphasizing Martin Luther King Jr.'s insight that "power without love is reckless." Jack Kornfield offers the bodhisattva path as our compass, sharing stories from Gandhi, Mahāghoṣānanda, and Ari Ariyaratne's 500-year peace plan, reminding us that we plant seeds "not out of fear, but because we love."
>
> Together, they reveal how mindfulness practice—sitting still and listening—can awaken us from the trance of separation and guide us toward collective action rooted in interconnection and compassion. This conversation launches One Earth Sangha's initiative to create an online Eco-Sattva training, bringing Buddhist wisdom to our planetary crisis.

Greetings everyone. My name is Tanisra, and I welcome you to our conversation on Mindfulness, the Dharma, and Climate Action. I'll be hosting this conversation today and through the coming months on behalf of One Earth Sangha, Buddhist Teachers for Climate Action, and our sponsor, Maestro Conference. Again, a really warm welcome to each and every one of you who have called in today to join this important conversation we're having together.

Before we begin, I'd like to suggest—as it's taken quite a lot of work to get to this point for the team in the background, and also for each of you as you enter into the reality of what we're engaging, the tremendous challenge we're facing now to ensure a sustainable future for the generations that come after us—that we begin by just taking a deep breath and really feeling, as we take that breath, the breath in your body.

Feel your body. Feel the connection to the earth beneath you, with your feet on the ground and the pressure of sitting on your seat. Just connect with that sensation. Take a deep breath and arrive here. Let's arrive here into our body, into this space, into our presence, and into this conversation together. Then breathe out, trusting the flow and the process that we're going to be engaging.

Today marks the start of Earth Care Week, and this is a really great way to begin. We have fifteen hundred people and more signed up for this conversation. There's a huge response from the Dharma and mindfulness community, and we really appreciate that.

Just before we begin, I'm interested to know how many of you have been involved in the People's Climate March, which just happened in New York and across the globe in recent weeks, and all the events that were engaged with that. If you were involved in that or aware of that, just press one on your dial pad so we can get a sense. That's great. That's fantastic. Thank you so much.

This was a huge event, and I think what happened during that time is we became aware of ourselves as a global tribe—a huge collective of people gathered across all diversities, representing all kinds of concerns. I think this really marks a turning point in the climate movement. Our conversations that we'll be having together are to place our particular unique contribution as Dharma practitioners.

To continue, I'd like to first briefly introduce our team that's doing the backup for our talks. They will be speaking and helping out later in the call. Lou Leonard is involved and co-founder of One Earth Sangha. Kristin Barker is also co-founder of One Earth Sangha, both resident in Washington, D.C. And Yong Oh, resident in Chattanooga, Tennessee, has also been very involved in helping us with the IT.

Today, the theme of our discussion—we're very grateful and appreciative to have three fantastic, accomplished, and experienced Dharma teachers to help guide our conversation—is: What is the authentic attitude or understanding that moves us towards real and authentic transformation in our times? The presenters will reflect together on the qualities of heart and mind that enable us to face the suffering of the earth and how we can begin to respond wisely to this.

Our teachers leading our conversation this morning will begin with Tara Brach, then Ruth King and Jack Kornfield. Many of you, if not all of you, will be very familiar with them. You can also check the more detailed biographies on the One Earth Sangha website.

I'm going to hand over to Lou Leonard from One Earth Sangha now to introduce himself. He's been supporting us with the science and will be engaging the conversation in that way. Lou, please introduce yourself and then take us into the conversation with Tara, who will be leading us into this focus.

Thank you, Tanisra. Hello, everyone. On behalf of Kristin Barker, the amazing co-founder of One Earth Sangha, whom I work with on this project, welcome to this first climate conversation.

One Earth Sangha is an online community of thousands of mindfulness practitioners and also a network of sanghas staying connected and learning from each other about the Dharma and climate change. We're so excited to kick off the series today and really so grateful to all of you for sharing part of your Sundays with us over the next five weeks.

You all received a background paper last week created by Cuti Kanko, a senior scientist from Environmental Defense Fund, and me. If you didn't get the paper, let us know and we'll send it to you. Don't think of this as an authoritative treatise—we couldn't do that in ten pages, and that's not necessary for this class—but it's just intended as a common starting point for all of us.

I'm not going to run through the ten pages of the paper. Because the science can be a barrier for some, I thought I'd offer my favorite ten words that summarize where we are now on climate: Things are getting worse and worse and better and better, faster and faster. Almost seems like a climate koan.

For example, on the one hand, the Arctic is collapsing before our eyes, and it's doing so at breathtaking speed. There's growing evidence that this warming of the Arctic is also causing larger impacts to our planet. It's causing the jet stream to wobble, which is helping to create things like the polar vortex, the California drought, and the path of storms like Sandy.

On the other hand, for the first six months of this year—the first six months of 2014—70% of new U.S. electric generation capacity came from wind and solar. Seventy percent. And just two weeks ago, China announced that it's developing a plan to cap its carbon pollution.

So if you read nothing else in the background paper, look at the graph on the bottom of page four. It shows that the key fork in the road for us on this challenge is still ahead, not behind. We don't know how this movie is going to turn out, and what we do matters.

In my day job, I lead the climate change program at World Wildlife Fund, and on many days, the enormousness of this challenge makes me feel small and inadequate. Most difficultly, it makes me feel alone a lot. But the best cure that I've found for managing these feelings is what we're doing today, and that's Sangha. So thank you so much for being here and helping to create this Sangha over the next five weeks.

We are going to have a Q&A period later in this call where you can virtually raise your hand, and you can also submit questions during the course of this conversation to questions@OneEarthSangha.org. Also, just want to let you know that this class is going to be recorded and available afterwards.

So without further ado, I'd like to welcome the first of our teachers, Tara Brach. Tara needs no introduction, or at least not one that I'm qualified to give. She's simply one of the wisest hearts of our time, and I'm grateful to say that she's also the leader of the Insight Meditation Community of Washington, where I practice here in Washington, D.C. Tara, we're so grateful to have you.

Thank you so much, Lou, and thank you for your powerful words. I'm just sitting here resonating with what you said about feeling alone and about Sangha, because everything that is better and better is coming out of some feeling of us all together—our connection, our consciousness.

So I'm sensing in that spirit for us to pause again and reflect. I gather in the last hour, instead of 1,500, we're more like 1,700 and counting. And just to—as you feel yourself right here—just feel your body, your aliveness, whatever state of heart is here right now. And to widen your attention to sense all of us here, that we really are creating a field of attention and a field of caring. And maybe just as many times as you can remember to pause and keep feeling into that, because that's where change arises from.

When we go to that basic inquiry about how did it happen—what really, how did this predicament unfold? This enlarged body, our living earth, in such a state of dis-ease? Most spiritual traditions will describe the suffering that comes from feeling separate, that it's the original suffering—that there's a self in here and a world out there. And out of that separateness, there's a phrase I love: the primal mood of the separate self is fear. These energies of grasping and fear lead us to violating ourselves, each other, and this earth.

It's like if something's "out there"—I think of the term "unreal other"—it becomes unreal. Another person or a racial group or a species or the natural world is other, and then we can violate it. It doesn't have the same heart or vulnerability or subjective reality that we have.

So one of the frames that I find really useful from an evolutionary perspective is the sense that originally there's that fused, part-of-everything consciousness—the primordial mood. And then we emerge into our egoic state, which most of humanity is in, where there is a sense of unreal other. And if we're honest with ourselves, a lot of moments of the day, it feels like that.

And we're waking up—and this is the third, in a simplistic way—the third, emerging to this realization of interdependence, where we belong to the web. And that's where the "better and better" is coming from. It's from that consciousness.

But humanity's been in this prolonged, kind of arrested place of development in terms of egoic consciousness. And sometimes I think about the consciousness of manifest destiny. Most of you are familiar with, like in the 1800s, this emergence, this sense of entitlement to vanquish and to destroy anything indigenous—unreal others. And it's still operating. I mean, manifest destiny is like that consciousness that those who are in power have the right or entitlement to dominate and to oppress others of other races, of other sexual orientations, ethnicities. And the devastation of our earth is no different. It's this egoic separation that thinks the earth's ours to plunder and violate.

Most of you listening are probably like myself—have a deep love and admiration for Joanna Macy, who's one of the pioneers in caring and acting on behalf of the earth. She says we've been treating earth as if it's a supply source and sewer—extracting resources, pouring waste into it over and over.

And it's described now—again, many of you know this—that we're in the sixth great extinction, worse than when the dinosaurs all disappeared, that there's trauma to all systems. It's estimated that half of all plants and animals and bird species will die off before 2100, that 75% of mammals in the next 300 to 400 years.

I went a lot when I was younger to the Museum of Natural History in New York, and they have an amazing exhibit there on climate change. One scientist writes that this should keep you awake at night. And so what most of us are wondering is, how come it doesn't? What stops us from recognizing what seems to be right in front of us?

If we look at it and are really honest in our own lives and those around us, we're preoccupied with what feels more personal and immediate. We get moved by what's emotional to us in a personal, egoic way. And if we look around the world, anybody that's really hungry, anybody that's in the midst of war, struggling with poverty, with their own health, anybody that's in a major relational crisis—what's immediate is going to, in some way, distract from what's happening.

And then, of course, for many of us where we sense what's happening, it's too upsetting to think about. But I think one of the biggest things is the feeling—and Lou pointed to it—when we sense that we're alone, that there's nothing we can do to make a difference. And I want to speak to that, because that's when we, in some way, close down or cut off and stop listening and looking and attending. And that's where the great suffering is. It's like we become like lobsters in this heating pot where it's gradual.

We're not registering it day to day, the crisis. I'm thinking of one of the phrases from Rumi that has most captured this predicament for me, which goes like this: "Sit, be still, and listen, for you are drunk, and we are at the edge of the roof."

This is what most spiritual traditions point to—that we're in some way drunk, in a trance, asleep. This is what it means to be arrested in the egoic stage; we're not seeing. And so the deep inquiry becomes: what wakes us up?

One of the things I'd like to share with you is a legend from the Knights of the Round Table that has really impacted me. In this story, Parsifal, a young knight seeking the Holy Grail, stops in a kingdom that has been turned into a wasteland. People are wandering around as if it's business as usual—they're not really noticing what's happening. He goes to see the king in the castle and finds him lying prone, mortally wounded. Parsifal sees this and leaves. It's kind of like "it's not my business" or "what can I do?" and "it's rude to interfere." He's uncomfortable about the situation, so he just leaves.

Then he's confronted on the road by a witch named Kundry, who is enraged that he didn't even bother to reach out to the king. So he returns, more thoughtful, more present, and kneels by the king's bed. With real deep kindness he asks, "What ails thee?" In that moment, the king's cheeks get their normal flush of color and he stands up. Outside, the kingdom awakens from the trance—there are flowers and grass and everything is alive again.

This is a story of a wasteland, and we are becoming a growing wasteland. There's a trance that we're in. The first step—and the reason I love this legend—is to just start right where we are and offer our presence so that we're paying attention. What's going on inside this heart and body? What's going on in my larger body, the earth? Sit, be still, and listen. Feel into what's happening.

Again, Joanna Macy says you don't have to be optimistic. She says trying to be hopeful can wear you out. Just be present.

What we find in starting where we are, in that presence, is that whatever we're really paying attention to, we fall in love with. For me, I go out every day. I spend a lot of time outside, and I pay attention to the trees and the river I live near, and I'm totally in love with it. When I'm in nature, it dissolves that sense of self and other. And then if I see trash on the trail, it hurts—it feels bad—and I pick it up.

So there's this presence with this life, being in this world, in this living web, and then there's compassion for the devastation. We start attending to the clear-cutting, and it feels like our bodies are involved, because they are. Or the loss of the coral reefs, and the sea's dying, and it's us. Or the cruelty to animals that's due to human consuming—they're part of us. So we care, we respond.

I'm saying this as I begin to wrap up here because it feels to me that we'll only respond—people will only wake up and respond to the pain of this earth—if they're in love with this earth, in love with life. The choice to act has to come from the human heart, and that unleashes our intelligence so we can respond wisely because we love.

I heard that Ralph Waldo Emerson once asked what we would do if the stars only came out once every thousand years. Here's what he says: "No one would sleep that night, of course. The world would become religious overnight. We would be ecstatic, delirious, made rapturous by the glory of God." Instead—and this is me speaking—the stars come out every night and we watch television.

I'm very struck by the fact that in the United States, we spend on average 90% of our time indoors. How do you fall in love with the earth? What's going to happen to our kids in terms of loving the earth? Americans spend eleven hours per day with digital media. How can we love the earth if we're online all the time?

D.H. Lawrence says—and this was 150 years ago—"We're bleeding at the roots because we are cut off from the earth and the sun and the stars."

So the response to this trance is to come into presence, to reconnect with our bodies, with this earth body, to get that we are this living earth—to really get that. Cosmologist Brian Swimme says four and a half billion years ago, the earth was a flaming molten ball of rock. And now it can sing opera. It can care. It can self-heal through these awakening hearts, those of us sitting right here.

We need to belong to our world, love our world—less in a cyber world, more real.

And the last thing, returning to what Lou said about waking up out of the unreal other and being connected, is that we have to act collectively—we must do this together. It simply doesn't work to respond to the suffering of Earth as a separate self.

For myself, being involved with the Teachers Collaborative, being involved locally with Lou and Kristen, I experience this as part of something larger. It's not a self acting; it's just belonging. It's wonderful to be reminded of that together, and I think this is so true.

Thank you so much, Tara. That's a wonderful way to enter into our conversation—very, very beautiful.

So I'd like to invite Ruth. Thank you so much, Ruth, for joining us this morning. I really look forward to your words as well.

Thank you, and welcome everyone. It's exciting to be on this call with all of you, and it did my heart wonders to see the march and to witness the unifying power that can arise when we recognize a need and step into it. This is no small task at all.

I had to educate myself about climate change in order to step into a deeper understanding. I kept feeling the pull at my heart, but it was almost in conflict with so many other pulls that I find in my life—my family, so many other systemic pulls that can capture my attention, like family members who are in the prison system. So I educated myself by connecting with One Earth Sangha and really delving into Naomi Klein's book on the shock doctrine, as well as her latest work. This was truly helpful.

One of the things I realized is that climate disasters are teaching us about the illusion of boundaries. They're teaching us about our utter interdependence, our relatedness, and our reliance on each other. I remember when AIDS was considered an African issue, and then it spread because these things are elemental. We're looking at phenomena that will not be defined by territorial boundaries.

So the notion of territory, through climate change, is calling us to question and examine the structures we are conditioned within, and to look at a realignment in this vitally important area. Our life depends on this necessary attending.

As I educated myself around climate change while feeling the other pulls of heart in our shared humanity, I recognized that there's actually a template—a template of greed at the systemic level that we can begin to recognize. It's almost like a constellation, a skeletal shape of exploitation and oppression that has a systemic quality. We can't always see these things at the individual level, so we must step back and open the lens beyond our special interest groups or silos to see that there is a dynamic relationship—actually a power dynamic—at play that has been operating in our society.

This involves examining the relationship between capitalism and culture, and looking at the dynamics between dominance and subordinate relationships at the systemic level. The planet Gaia, the great mother, has been and continues to be exploited just as poor people, First Nations and other indigenous cultures, people of color throughout the world have been for centuries—to name just a few.

It's important to see that what's happening to the climate and our planet fits into this same template. Poor people and people of color are ongoingly, disproportionately, and systematically disenfranchised by these climate disasters throughout the world.

The NAACP Climate Justice Initiative published a statistic showing that 68% of African Americans live within 30 miles of a coal-fired power plant—the zone of maximum exposure to pollutants that cause an array of ailments from heart disease, which I had as a child, to birth defects. Communities of color breathe in nearly 40% more pollutants than white people in our country.

Choices are made about where and how things happen as we examine these systems. There are consequences to this kind of greed seeding that has occurred over time, and they're both gross and subtle in their expression. Some of these consequences we can see as separation in our humanness, in our relatedness—denial, hatred, rebellion, and wars. People of color, poor people, and the planet are all rebelling for balance.

I think this is a critical piece for us to examine—not just the particular concern of climate change, though I believe it's crucial at this time, but to also see that it's actually a reflection of a dance that's been going on for some time. It's very difficult for me to see climate change without also seeing these other issues.

This is not a call to point out and create division; it's a call to recognize the divisions that already exist among us. This is not about placing anger or pointing fingers, but about seeing clearly and being willing to not have our focus so narrow that we miss the larger patterns at work.

other people, other situations are left out.

I'm mostly concerned with how our hearts are divided, and I think climate change is changing us, forcing us to see the delusion of the boundaries we have created. Martin Luther King Jr. said it well from his letter from a Birmingham jail—words you all know: "We're all caught in an inescapable network of mutuality, tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly affects all indirectly."

And Shirley Chisholm—some of you may remember she was the first African-American congresswoman back in 1968 and the first black candidate for the U.S. presidency—she said that "service is the rent we pay for the privilege of living on this planet. It is the very purpose of life, not something you do in your spare time."

So one of the beautiful things about what we can start to look at in terms of what we do next is to most fundamentally maintain our practice, which allows us to know deeply. The Buddha specialized in suffering and the end of suffering. We have many tools that can support our awareness and deepen our presence so that we can act wisely and respond well to what's happening in the world.

Comfort and discomfort can keep us apart, or they can bring us together. I see climate change as a call to this coming together. Martin Luther King again reminds us that "power without love is reckless and abusive, and love without power is sentimental and anemic. Power at its best is love implementing the demands of justice, and justice at its best is power correcting everything that stands against love."

I'd just like to say that we are the environment, and what we do next is important for both presence and love.

Thank you so much, Ruth. Very powerful words, and powerful to be reminded of Martin Luther King and his struggle—such a great example of the disproportionate impact on marginalized and oppressed communities historically through the arc of colonialism and the abuse of those peoples and the earth.

So Jack, welcome. Jack has been so amazing and contributing to the implanting of the Dharma in our Western world.

Thank you, Tanisha. I'm so moved and touched by the words of Ruth and Tara and the rest of you, and the spirit of so many on this call. It's as if our own children are sick, and our grandchildren, and we're at the bedside of the earth as we talk about life in a kind of illness. We're gathered around and now coming together to say: What can we do? How can we respond?

What I'd like to speak on and add to the conversation is sustaining ourselves in this difficult time. It's an age-old question. Born into the human realm, how do we sustain our good heart even though there is dukkha?

The first noble truth of the Buddha: birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, sickness is dukkha, death is dukkha—whether you translate it as sorrow or suffering or insecurity. Lamentation, pain, distress, despair—we're feeling all that. These are the words of the Buddha. Dukkha is distress and despair. Encounters with what is difficult and painful, which we're experiencing, is dukkha. Separation from what is dear, from the things we care about, is dukkha. Not getting what we want, not having it turn out the way we'd like—all the forms of clinging.

This is part of the human realm, the first noble truth, and it is staring us in the face with climate change, affecting our lives and the lives of beings all around us. We might say this is the first time that terrible suffering is human-caused, and the scale of it is certainly something new and devastating. But even from ancient times, from the Buddha's time, there was much human-caused suffering: the continuing warfare between the Vajjians and the Kosalans and the Sakyans around the Buddha; life expectancy which was half of ours; the illness and slavery that existed then. This is not a new story.

Human beings can create heaven and tend one another, bringing alive love and connectedness and care and wisdom and awakening. Human beings also can contribute to dukkha, to the suffering that's part of the human realm. There's a giant vision offered of the role of the awakened heart and the awakened being, which we all are. "Nobly born," begin the texts. "You are the sons and daughters of the Buddhas. Remember who you really are."

You think you were born into this body as a separate being, and from what Tara and Ruth are reminding us, when you begin to awaken, you awaken in the bodhisattva body—the body of awakening together with all beings. You realize that whether it's a year or a century or a hundred thousand mahakalpas, the bodhisattva has only one way: the way of connection and compassion and care for all beings.

What's beautiful about the vision of the bodhisattva

is it doesn't exclude suffering, but instead the bodhisattva appears together with suffering and is committed in the midst of the difficulty to find in our hearts that wisdom and nobility and dignity that brings light and connectedness and care and the end of suffering to beings.

Not a small project. When you sit in a zendo and begin Zen practice, you recite the four vows starting with: "Sentient beings are numberless, boundless. I vow to save them all." Not a small thing. Even if you look in your own family, they don't necessarily want to be saved by you, much less the people around you. And yet at the same time, this is a vow of the bodhisattva—to tend to all beings.

Or when the Dalai Lama wakes up in the morning and recites the vows from Shantideva's bodhisattva vision: "May I be a resting place for the weary. May I be medicine for the sick. May I be food for the hungry. May I be a boat, a raft, a bridge for those to cross the flood. May I be a lamp in the darkness. May I be a light of Dharma and inspiration for beings. As long as earth and sky exist, as long as beings exist, may I be born and work together with them to bring liberation."

We hear these bodhisattva vows, and we realize that these are the instructions for navigating difficult times. If you look at the life of exemplars like Mahatma Gandhi, who lived in a time of tremendous difficulty—of violence and colonial oppression and the caste system—he took a day a week, no matter what was happening, bringing down the British Empire. He said, "I'm sorry, I know there's hundreds of thousands of people out marching. This is my quiet day." Once a week, he would quiet his mind and listen in his heart to the action he could take that was most connected with all—the most skillful, dharmic, awakened action they could take together to bring unity and to manifest change.

As Martin Luther King did, or Aung San Suu Kyi, who I was fortunate enough to meet with in Burma earlier this year. She said, "They never really had me in prison"—there she was, arrested for seventeen years because she never hated them. And so we tend our heart. And then as a bodhisattva, we set the compass of our heart with our vows of long-term dedication amidst joy and sorrow, amidst dukkha and sukha, amidst praise and blame and birth and death. The bodhisattva has only one way: the way of compassion and the way of envisioning service and connection with all of life.

One of my favorite examples of this is the great Buddhist elder, Ari Ariyaratne of Sri Lanka, who started the Sarvodaya movement to connect villages across the country—more than half the villages in the country—to dig wells and build schools and collaborate and make peace. Toward the end of the terrible Sri Lankan Civil War, he called all the members of Sarvodaya together to try to support the Norwegian peace plan. Six hundred and fifty thousand people gathered together at the ancient temple at Anuradhapura, and Ari stood up.

He said, "It's taken us five hundred years to get into this difficulty. The Buddhist teachings have us look at the causes of things and not just the effects. So if we look, there are five hundred years of conflict between Buddhists and Muslims and Hindus, and four hundred years of colonial oppression, and two hundred years of economic disparity between the rich, wet parts of the island and the poor, dry parts. So what I have to offer you is the Sarvodaya 500-year peace plan."

If it's taken us five hundred years to get into this, here's the plan to exit: Five years of simply ceasefire and ten years of rebuilding roads and schools and twenty-five years of learning each other's languages and religions, and fifty years of working on an economic program to right the economic injustice and having the poor parts and the rich parts collaborate for everyone's well-being. And after one hundred years, we'll have a grand council to see how we're doing and start all over again. And over five hundred years, I think we can turn Sri Lanka into the island of peace and mercy and awakening that she was meant to be.

I heard these words and I almost wept. In fact, I got a chance to tell this story to the Dalai Lama, knowing he carries the sufferings of Tibet—so much that's happened in the last fifty or sixty years, the weight of that in his heart and his shoulders. And he was grinning, hearing this long-term vision.

Thomas Merton explains it this way. He says, when you are doing the work—he wrote to an activist—do not depend on the hope of results. You may have to face the fact that your work will be apparently worthless and achieve no result at all, if not, at times, bring about its opposite. As you get used to this, you start more and more to concentrate not on the results, but on the value, the rightness, and the truth of the work itself.

And so there's a kind of courage in the bodhisattva and a vision that is vast—as vast as the earth and the sky and the galaxies that we are part of. As it says in the Bhagavad Gita, the secret is to act without attachment to the fruits of the actions, and for us to trust the seeds that we plant. Each of us is given, as cells in the awakening organism of the earth, the opportunity to plant our seeds, to contribute our peace, no matter what is happening.

And as we plant the seeds and contribute our peace, as Henry David Thoreau says, "I do not believe that a plant will spring up where no seed has been, but I have great faith in a seed. Convince me you have a seed there, and I am prepared to expect wonders."

And so we plant our seeds not out of bitterness and not out of fear or confusion, but out of a sense of rightness and truth. And then something else happens.

When my dear friend Wes Nisker, another dharma teacher, was interviewing Gary Snyder recently—Gary being one of the fathers of the American environmental movement for half a century, Pulitzer Prize-winning poet—he said, "Gary, you're eighty-four years old, you see the climate disruption, the oceans rising, the loss of species. What advice do you have for us at this time where there's so much despair and worry and fear?" And Gary looked back steadily and said, "Don't feel guilty. If you are going to save the earth, save it because you love it, not out of anger, not out of guilt, not out of fear."

All those are the source of what creates dukkha—greed and hatred and anger. If you save it, you must save it because you love it.

And it's the love that took those monks out of their forest monasteries to wrap their robes around the greatest trees in the forest and ordained them as the abbots to save that part of the forest from being cut down and logged. It was the love that allowed my teacher and friend, Mahagosananda, after the Cambodian genocide where all nineteen of his own family members were killed and his monastery burned, to walk for fifteen years through the killing fields and the war zones of Cambodia, step by step with hundreds of people behind him, leading them in the chant: "Hatred never ends by hatred, but by love alone is healed." He told them that to return to the earth, to your village and your community, you can't ride a bus, you can't go back in a truck—you have to walk step by step, and with each step, practice loving-kindness and compassion and bring that back alive on this earth.

There is no other way.

So this is our work as a bodhisattva. This is our time. Oh, nobly born, you were born for this. You were called to do this. And in doing this, you plant your seeds and you become part of the whole that is healing itself.

[The facilitator's voice returns, expressing gratitude for the profound teachings and announcing the transition to breakout groups for participants to share their reflections on waking up to climate change and their responses to it.]

How do we actually deal with this feeling of righteous anger? Sometimes in Buddhism there's confusion around whether you shouldn't feel angry, and there's uncertainty about how to be with strong emotions in response to what's going on—outrage, anger. How do we best use that energy or be in relationship with it?

I'm really glad that question's out there because there's so much messaging in spiritual worlds about how taboo anger is. But we are wired to feel anger. It's natural. It's an intelligent response to harm and violence and dis-ease. So the bottom line is that this is a message, an intelligent message to respond to. When I think of tar sands or the cruelty of factory farms, there's an outrage that comes up in me.

The point isn't to get rid of that energy, but there's a shadow side. When there's a story wrapped around anger—that there's a bad other involved, bad guys out there doing bad things—it perpetuates separation. The storyline actually will distance people. So the deal is we need to listen to the message and not get caught in the emotional trance of it.

When we were about to go to war against Iraq, I was definitely feeling "bad other"—you know, they are the bad ones, they're the violators, those in the administration that wanted to create this ripple of violence. I started doing this reflection when I'd read the newspaper and it would trigger my bad-other feelings. I'd feel the anger and say, "Okay, let's get rid of the storyline, just feel the energy." I'd let the energy be as much as it was.

Then I'd find that underneath it was fear. I'd let that be as much as it was—really, this practice we do of presence and being with. Under the fear was this grieving, and when I let it be big, it was grieving for all the loss. Then I'd let that be big, and under that was care.

So when I could move from that place of caring about people, caring about the suffering, there was an interfaith protest where we all got arrested. But the protest wasn't like a fist-waving angry protest. It was people with posters of Iraqi children and American children. One child at the protest had a sign saying, "Don't bomb them, they're children over there and they hurt too."

My point is not to get lost in the storyline of bad other, but to really be with the energy and find the love underneath that cares about our world.

Thank you. That is so helpful. That is fantastic. Thank you.

Ruth, if I can bring you another question that just came in via email—I think this is a very archetypal question, actually. It's about the split between secular activism, you know, the activists out there, and then those engaged in so-called spiritual quietism on the mat, doing the inner work and dharma practice that's usually about personal transformation. How do we bring those together? What way can they inform each other? What's your take on that?

That's a great question as well. I've heard it termed as the line between the monastic and the marketplace. How do we bring our awareness to or balance these two—what appears to be separate?

But what I've found is that they're not so separate, this idea of activism and quietism. I actually see that our activism is an extension of our practice. Those of us that have a practice are sitting with what Tara just offered around these intense emotions and the passions or the fire of the heart that gets lit up. We are challenged with how we express our passions in the world from a place of practice and presence.

One thing to keep in mind in moving from our cushions out into the world is that we have a practice of doing no harm—that that's square in our foreheads and in our mind. That's our mantra playing all the time: to do no harm, to be present, to do no harm.

An example that was real palpable for me was being in South Africa right around the time Nelson Mandela was elected. I went around and spoke with a number of non-profit organizations there. I was really curious about how did you do this without just being enraged all the time? How did you fight apartheid without being enraged all the time?

The message I got from a number of people—maybe not all of them, but most of them—was that the issue of apartheid was never about the person. It was about the system. It was a matter of seeing that it was a system that needed to be dismantled. It wasn't about hating the people. That really stuck with me—to be able to see what needs to happen, bring our quiet practice to a sense of equanimity and presence and clear seeing and groundedness, not the reactivity or the heat that sometimes we find in activism.

Growing up in the civil rights movement, I saw many people die on the vine from righteous rage and righteous indignation. What I've found is that it's really important to bring your heart into activism and to see the humanity and the heart and love that is in all people, even the ones that we have judgment about.

That's wonderful, thank you so much. And again, such a brilliant example to hear about Nelson Mandela. I remember him saying to wish to hate your enemies is like drinking poison, hoping it will kill them. It's poison. So it's this question of heart and how the dharma can inform our response so well.

I'd like to open up now. You've had some breakout groups and questions and dialogue coming. So it would be lovely to hear from our participants. If you have anything you'd like to share or say or ask about, please press 1 on your keypad and Kristen will help to negotiate this next piece. We have about just over 15 minutes left of our time together today. So Kristen, over to you.

Great, thanks everybody. It's just so great to be with all of you. I'm so grateful to all the teachers and to be able to do this work as a sangha with you.

As Tanissara said, please press 1 if you have any questions. We'll take your question now. I see some hands raising—this is wonderful. Let's go over to Jeffrey.

"Thank you. My question comes from the last person who spoke about how people in South Africa coped with apartheid by seeing it as the system. My concern is: how much progress can we really make working on climate change if we don't address the nature of our political system that supports it—the massive amounts of power and money in politics, the oil and gas industries, and the basic structure we see in rulings like Citizens United, where corporations have way too much power? I've decided to try dividing my time to work on both, but I'd be interested in what anyone else has to say about that."

This is a profound question with two dimensions. The personal part asks which should we tend to? I believe we each have particular gifts. Some might have the gift of being a political organizer. Some might excel at systemic and systematic thinking, putting their heart into getting money out of politics or working to change how corporate charters have created rampant, freewheeling exploitation. Others may tie their robes around trees or go to preschools, elementary schools, and middle schools, educating the next generation so they can act wisely. The answer is all of the above—listening to your heart to discern what you're particularly drawn to contribute, because we need all of those seeds.

Regarding the underlying question about addressing systemic change: absolutely. But there's an even deeper question you allude to—the world doesn't need more energy, more food, or more things. It needs less greed, less hatred, and less ignorance of the sense of separation, less delusion. Beyond the systemic level lies the deepest dharma level: a kind of education and awakening in ourselves, our community, and the community of humanity. This represents the biggest systemic change of all. I see tremendous potential in the internet connecting us and in the extraordinary changes happening that may actually aid us in this process.

The ground is moving very rapidly under our feet as we awaken into our reality and as people mobilize and organize. By the end of these conversations and as we move forward together as a dharma community, we'll be offering connections and networks we can align with—people of faith, activist communities, people on the front lines, organizations with skillful strategies. The main message is that we're not alone. We're doing this together.

Let's hear from Julia now. "I think Tanissara touched on this just now. My question is: how can our sangha facilitate sharing good news about initiatives happening across the world so we can gain inspiration and take heart that there is movement?"

There are indeed many extraordinary things happening. I want to mention a book that offers perspective on our capacity for positive change—not current climate news, but Steven Pinker's The Better Angels of Our Nature. This Harvard philosopher and anthropologist charts several hundred years of human history, showing the gradual reduction in slavery (though people are still enslaved), better treatment of children, gradual freedom for women (though conditions remain difficult in parts of the world), and gradual reduction in warfare. If you need encouragement about humans' capacity for greater consciousness, I highly recommend this book. It offers the sense that you're part of this great movement of awakening that is actually happening.

As this movement grows and mobilizes, we're witnessing tremendous creativity emerge. Naomi Klein's latest book, This Changes Everything, offers realistic yet positive perspectives we should all engage with. The work of Bill McKibben and 350.org, the Idle No More mobilization of First Nations peoples—these movements offer excellent opportunities for connection and collaboration.

So we have about ten minutes or so. Can we take another question? Let's go to Louise.

Well, that's interesting—my phone is starting to beep. But I had two suggestions in response to the last couple of questions. One is about systemic work—Joanna Macy also talks about another level, which is the consciousness behind the systems. So that's another level we can work on in changing consciousness. That does translate into eventually changing systems. And then as far as good news...

Sorry, I lost you there. We don't get to hear the good news. I'm sure we can all look around and see plenty of good news, but we didn't get to hear Louise's version.

All right, so it looks like we'll have time for one more. How about Stephanie?

Hi, can you hear me? Yes, we can hear you. Go ahead.

Well, I had a really interesting experience a couple weeks ago. I live in Houston, which we call the Petro Metro—one of the big centers of the fossil fuel industry. A couple weeks ago, I went to a conference on climate and energy put on by a group called the Heritage Foundation, which you may know is a pretty conservative think tank that's certainly trying to bolster the case for continued fossil fuel use. One of the speakers there gave a presentation about his visit to the People's Climate March.

Just tell us what's the heart of it for you. What's the question that's deep in your heart?

Well, when they were presenting, this man started off with a picture of Buddhists meditating before the march, saying, "Oh my gosh, look at these crazy people." Of course, being a Buddhist, I took that pretty deeply, and all these questions about anger are certainly arising for me. I think this may be something that will come up more and more—that people may be targeting groups as has happened in the past. How can we work with this to make it a strength for this movement?

I'm going to come in here because we have a few minutes left. This is a really good question, and the wonderful thing to know is that we have time throughout this whole month to continue exploring and deepening into these kinds of questions that have been brought forward together.

I think it's okay that we're targeted. As Martin Luther King spoke about, sometimes you actually need to bring out the toxins and bring out the poisons so that they can be addressed with compassion in a very direct way. There's some heart of justice that's there to be touched in every being, although in some it's still deeply covered over. So I'm not worried about that. I think that is actually part of the movement that eventually will bring us together.

That's brilliant. Thank you for that reminder.

So again, thank you so much, everyone. We're going to start the wrap-up now for the last few minutes of our call together. I can't tell you how much I appreciate—we all appreciate—your presence, giving your time. We know that those on the call and those who will be listening to the recordings—this is just the tip of the iceberg to our deep sense of care and concern and the challenge we're in. But it's so helpful to know that we're here together, on the same page, looking together at how to embody this bodhisattva energy and how to find the most authentic, realistic, and powerful responses that we can.

Next Sunday, please do join us again at the same time. We'll be hearing from Reverend Angel Kyodo Williams, Aya Anandabodhi, and Susie Harrington—three accomplished practitioners and teachers who have much to offer in furthering our discussion.

As I mentioned, all of this will be feeding into the development of an Eco-Sutta training, which will be launched next year. I also want to acknowledge that One Earth Sangha is a new initiative. Everyone working on One Earth Sangha is offering their time on a volunteer basis. We'd like to embody and ground One Earth Sangha more deeply, and for that we value support in all forms—particularly any dana and financial offerings that can be given through the website, which will go directly toward ensuring that this important initiative becomes a movement in itself, a platform for all of us to find our home within as we navigate the times ahead.

I'd also like to invite Josh to speak. Maestro Conference has been so generous in offering their platform freely as dana to host our call. Josh, would you share a few words about Maestro?

"Thank you. My name is Joshua Edwards, and I'm with Maestro Conference. We're honored and excited to support the Mindfulness and Climate Action Initiative with the technology you're using today. If you'd like more information about Maestro Conference—either for hosting your own events or learning about our other upcoming world-changing conversations—please dial the number 1 on your telephone keypad, Skype dial pad, or computer keyboard. We'd love to send you information about how you can be involved in turning presentations into conversations. We're so glad to be here with you all today. You can certainly stay on and continue to connect in small groups after the formal part of the call is complete."

Thank you, Josh. Just to mention, you can continue to email us at OneEarthSangha. We're setting up a Facebook group where we can continue the conversation—you'll hear about that soon.

As in the way of the Dharma, this has been wonderful to draw this energy together. I'd like to invite Ruth, if you would, to share the blessings as we finish. As is in our tradition, to share the good karma, the good energy, and the prayerfulness from our gathering for the welfare of our earth and our planet. Please, Ruth, over to you to close.

"Thank you so much. Thanks to all the good hearts collected here. Let me invite you to take a breath or two right here and now, and to feel the aliveness of our sharing together. Know that we are a sangha. May we envision our service to life. May we tend to our hearts. May we set our compass to compassion, connection, and care. May we plant our seeds and contribute to peace. May we be part of the healing of our home, our earth, for the benefit of all sentient beings. May our practice be of service to all beings in all directions without exception."

Thank you, everyone. Stay well, go well until next week.

CHAPTER 282

Mindfulness and Climate Action: 2

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this powerful dharma dialogue, three Buddhist teachers examine climate change through the lens of Buddhist teachings, revealing it as both an environmental and deeply spiritual crisis. Aya Anandabodhi Bhikkhuni emphasizes how the three poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion manifest in our ecological destruction, calling practitioners to move beyond denial and overwhelm into skillful action. She reminds us that we cannot achieve calm minds "in a room that is burning" - our practice must include responding to the climate emergency with wisdom and compassion.
>
> Reverend Angel Kyodo Williams provides a profound analysis of how hypercapitalism, colonialism, and systemic racism are root causes of climate change, showing how the same structures that marginalize communities of color also devastate the Earth. She calls for Buddhist communities to examine these interconnected systems of oppression and to reimagine sangha as a force for collective transformation rather than individual comfort.
>
> Susie Harrington speaks from her experience in the wilderness of southeastern Utah, where oil sands extraction threatens sacred lands. She emphasizes that spiritual practice requires "unbroken receptivity to truth" - even when that truth breaks our hearts. Drawing on Einstein's insight about expanding our circles of compassion, she shows how connection with nature and community action can transform overwhelm into compassionate response. The teachers address common resistances in dharma communities to discussing climate issues and offer practical guidance for engaging this crisis as essential dharma practice.

Welcome everyone, and welcome back to those who joined us last week, along with a very warm welcome to all of you joining us for the first time today.

My name is Tanisra, and I am the moderator and host for our conversation on Mindfulness, Dharma and Climate Action. We live in increasingly precarious times regarding the impact on the natural environment from our ways of living. It is clear that unless we radically change our relationship to Mother Earth, to each other, and to ourselves, we will jeopardize a sustainable world for future generations.

To explore these issues today, I'd like to welcome our teachers, for whom I'm very grateful. We have Aya Anandabodhi Bhikkhuni from Wales, who is a Theravada nun in the forest tradition for over twenty years, currently living in Placerville in Northern California near Sacramento. Reverend Angel Kyodo Williams is author of Radical Dharma: Talking Race, Love, and Liberation and founder of the Center for Transformative Change, based in Berkeley, California. And Susie Harrington, guiding teacher for Desert Dharma based in Moab, Utah.

Welcome to our teachers who will be reflecting on the global issue of climate change as it interacts with the deeper social causes and issues of justice. We look forward to exploring that together.

Before we move to our teachers, I'd also like to introduce our team: Kristin Barker, co-founder of One Earth Sangha and member of Washington DC Insight; Yong Oh, teacher at Chattanooga Insight in Tennessee; and Barry Bettman, who is representing and helping us host through Maestro Conference today. Thank you to all of our team working in the background.

I'd also like to welcome Lou Leonard, co-founder of One Earth Sangha and leader of the Climate Change Program at the World Wildlife Fund, who is supporting us with scientific input.

Before I hand over to Lou to introduce himself and welcome us, I'd like to encourage us as we arrive into this call together and engage this very intense issue to take a deep breath. As we take that breath, feel yourself coming into your body, into your seat, and into your presence, bringing attention to the sensation of your body, the feet touching the ground, and the pressure of sitting.

As we connect with that, we're connecting with this earth element. This body is part of the earth element and the element of breath and warmth in the body. Just taking a few deep breaths as we arrive here together.

Lou, if I could hand over to you, please, to introduce yourself and welcome us, then introduce Anandabodhi as our first speaker.

Thank you, Tanisra, and welcome, everyone. As Tanisra said, I'm helping support this conversation with some background on the science and policy of climate change. You will have all received a background paper that was prepared by Kriti Kanko, a scientist at the Environmental Defense Fund, and myself, describing some of the basics of the science. If you haven't received that, just let us know by sending an email, and we will get that out to you.

For this call, it's very appropriate that we should look at some of the equity and justice elements of the climate crisis, because those concepts are really at the heart of both the causes and harmful effects of climate change. There are a couple of elements of the science that are useful to have in mind as we enter this conversation. First, carbon dioxide, the most significant greenhouse gas, once deposited in our atmosphere, lasts for centuries. Second, unlike other forms of pollution, the effects of greenhouse gases are felt cumulatively over time. So the emissions that were deposited by burning coal, for instance, in the United States and Europe in the 1800s and the last century are contributing to the warming we're feeling today.

You could think of it like a bathtub where we're filling up with pollution, and so it moves out of the system much more slowly than when we put it in. Right now we are adding...

Lou, just to interrupt you here, you're breaking up quite a lot, so I'm wondering whether we should hand over to Aya Anandabodhi and then come back, because at the end of the teachers' presentations, you're going to speak to us more about the scientific import.

That sounds great. Thank you, Tanisra.

So, Aya Anandabodhi, I welcome you again and thank you so much for being here with us today. I'm really looking forward to sharing this presence and space with you and your words.

Thank you so much, Tanisra. I'm very grateful that this is happening and for all the organizers who've made these calls happen. When I came to America five years ago, I was sent to teach and I would speak about climate change and about our concerns. We were told, "We don't want you to talk about those things. We want you to talk about Dharma, about enlightenment, about inspiring aspects." And so we were quiet for some time. But once one is conscious of the severity and seriousness of the situation that we are all in, it's pretty impossible to stay quiet.

So I'm very heartened to see that now people are beginning to speak in the Dharma communities, are beginning to speak more openly and publicly about the realities of climate change and how we can meet that. I know for a long time people would find it overwhelming. "It's all just too much. I don't want to go there because it's too big. I don't know what to do." Or sometimes I've heard that Dharma teachers shouldn't speak about climate change because it's political.

So these are all reasons why for a long time, for many years, there has been silence or just quiet whispers here and there. I'm very grateful that this is being opened up now, because I feel it's vital that we bring this awareness of the reality of the context within which we are living into our practice and into our right action in the world.

I see the climate situation as, yes, political—there does need to be political change. And it is social, because it affects first of all people in more disadvantaged situations worldwide, and eventually all of us. People and animals and forests and land. Those who can't speak up for themselves are often the first affected. So it has massive repercussions.

And it is also an ethical issue. I feel as spiritual practitioners that we have an ethical requirement to open our minds and hearts to the situation that is going on and to really take in the enormity of it, the pain of it, the sorrow that comes with it, and to let that touch us and motivate us to respond in a skillful and active way.

I also feel that this dilemma we are all in is a deeply spiritual matter. As the Buddha points out so clearly, we are interconnected. We are interbeing. We are interconnected with everything on this earth, in this universe. The situation that we are now in—that Lou can speak about in more scientific detail later—is partly natural and to a large degree the making of our human greed, hatred, and delusion that has been running rife for so long. Because this is now so deeply ingrained on a corporate level and on a political level, it feels sometimes overwhelming. How can we ever do anything to change this? How can we meet this?

A number of people have written in questions expressing anger, feeling overwhelmed, and feeling frustrated that their communities, their sanghas don't speak about climate change, feeling isolated. I think it's very important to look at all of these questions.

We are in a situation where those who hold the greatest power are fully motivated by greed and are not at all aware or conscious of the consequences, even for their own families, let alone the rest of this planet Earth. And that can bring us feelings of hopelessness, of rage, of fear, of impotence.

I feel it's very important that we recognize that each of us is part of the creation of this situation. As long as we put everything out onto somebody else, we remain as victims and we remain impotent. But I think there's probably nobody on this call who hasn't driven in a car, hasn't ridden on a plane, hasn't used plastic. We're all part of this in our little ways, or maybe some bigger ways.

So first of all, just to acknowledge: we've all contributed to this. We're all part of the creation of this rather disastrous situation that we're in. And we can all do something to start to turn the tides. As long as we think it's got to be somebody else out there, we keep ourselves stuck, we keep the whole situation stuck, because the people who are creaming off the benefits—the short-term benefits—are not motivated to change.

We need to take on the truth of all having been part of this, feel the sorrow of that, and cultivate the wish to really be motivated to do something to turn our lives in the right direction.

It's inevitable that there will be fear, there will be anger. These emotions are energy. Fear is energy that's trapped. Anger is energy that's pushing against something else. But we can use this with mindfulness. We can use this energy as powerful energy for transformation, to be actively involved in whatever way each individual listening feels they can make a change.

It doesn't matter if we're young or old, able-bodied or disabled, highly intellectual or simple—it doesn't matter what our qualities are. We each have something to bring to this situation.

I want to mention that we often think of nature as being something outside of ourselves. We go into nature, but we are nature—we are part of nature. And nature is diverse, and it is responsive, and it is creative, and it is totally interconnected. Each of us is part of this. It's not that one of us has to change the world, but each of us has to find what our part is and do that.

Whether it's speaking out, whether it's going out on the streets to demonstrate, whether it's developing alternative energies, getting into politics—whatever it may be, you need to really connect with and look at how you can make a difference. And don't be afraid to speak up. If your sangha doesn't want to talk about climate change, don't be afraid to speak up.

Look into questions like: Why is there this inertia? Why is there this resistance? Because this is not other than our practice. This is the context within which our practice is happening. We're trying to meditate and develop a calm mind in a room that is burning.

We're not going to get very far if we don't first look at the situation and respond to that, using our wisdom and right action to address the circumstances we find ourselves in as best as we can.

I've also spoken to a number of people who have been involved in climate action for many years and are starting to feel hopeless—wondering if their efforts are going anywhere, questioning whether change is possible. I want to really encourage everyone: if those feelings arise, please don't be stopped by them. Don't believe in them. Because if we all give up, then of course it becomes hopeless. But we each have a possibility to influence.

Through calls like this, through talking in your communities, through bringing up these issues—not in a fundamentalist way or in a way that turns people off, but just bringing them into consciousness—the issues of climate change and the ways we can influence them, just by connecting with each other, we start to create a strong force.

Who knows where we are in the scheme of things? We don't know if we can make great changes and all will be well. We don't know if we are too late. We don't know whether there's just a little avenue within which we can squeeze through. We don't know, but we still have to respond with motivation to the reality of the situation.

Some people in the dharma community say, "Well, everything changes, all arises and passes away, so why get involved?" That's a little bit like having a mother or grandmother who's aging and saying, "Well, she's going to die anyway, so why bother?" But we don't say that. We say, "Oh, she's precious. She's given so much. We want to make sure she's cared for, that her years are comfortable, that she's respected and loved."

It's the same with our Mother Earth. If we just say, "Well, all arises and ceases," it's a heartless response. It doesn't bring in the compassion the Buddha so clearly lived and taught.

I really want to encourage everyone not to be bound by fears or doubts, and not to be trapped by anger, but to use the energy of fear and anger with awareness to motivate you—to focus that energy and move it into action. Get past the doubts and just respond. Do what you can. Speak out, act, do what you can.

"Beautiful words, Ayya Anandabodhi, and a beautiful reminder. As I listen, it really brings me into my body and into my heart. I can feel a sense of softening and opening and connection and tenderness, and that beautiful sense of our Mother Earth like a grandmother—all that she's given. Thank you so much for that nourishing support.

I'm so grateful that Reverend Angel Kyodo Williams is able to join us. Her work is so important and meaningful. I listened to Reverend Angel recently at a Shambhala Center after the People's Climate March in New York and was incredibly moved and motivated by her words. Reverend Angel, we're so grateful you can be with us today."

"Thank you. Really, as Ayya said, I'm deeply moved that this is happening. I think many of us have been in places and have had experiences such that we feel like it's long overdue. At the same time, all the people who have chosen to participate in this call, and particularly the organizers, are really at a turning point—an incredibly important turning point in what is a significant crisis facing all of us. So I'm really happy to be here.

I want to continue with what Ayya was speaking about so beautifully, particularly the aspect she referenced about the human contribution to climate change. As many people know, there's been a lot of discussion about how much of this is natural and how much is contributed by human beings. There was some degree of debate about that, but now clearly the science has come out from many different directions showing that overwhelmingly, the contribution is human. It's a human interference with natural patterns.

In terms of the social aspect, one of the things I think we're often not speaking of sufficiently is that not only is human contribution significantly impacting the environment and our habitat—our place to live in good connection with all other beings on the planet—but that our contribution, as Ayya said, we all have driven cars and used plastic bottles and those kinds of things. But at the root, the degree of overconsumption that humans have contributed on this planet has been a result of those poisons that afflict us: greed, hatred, and delusion.

I want to speak about them quickly in terms of looking at greed very specifically in the form and dominance of hypercapitalism that the West has contributed to, most specifically in the form of colonialism over the last 500 years that has continued to morph. I'm not saying we shouldn't trade among human beings, but rather this hypercapitalism that places arbitrary values on human beings and planetary resources is very much the greed that is at the root of this drive to overconsume—way beyond what is needed, way beyond what helps us thrive as human beings."

At its base, this hypercapitalist system contains a fundamental anger that places different peoples at different levels of society depending on what is perceived as their value. Are they contributors of labor? Are they to be bought and sold? As a result, we have developed a structure that elevates the white race over other races, then divides people along racial lines.

We are dealing with something that, for many people, is not an overtly racialized view in their daily lives—they are not walking around being consciously racist. Rather, we are all contributing to and participating in a structure where anger, racism, and separation are at the root, dividing people. When we are unable to look at this clearly and see it for what it is through the lens of our practice, we unwittingly contribute to this structure that keeps us divided. This system is designed to perpetuate institutions and structures of marginalization of some people, constant deprivation of access to resources for others, and the ordinary unconscious bias that pervades all our lives.

Finally, in the form of ignorance, all of this is only able to manifest because we are experiencing what I believe is an unprecedented, very deep disconnect from our planet and from other peoples. This disconnection results from these systems, these structures, these institutionalized and insidious forms of racism and superiority that are designed to keep us separated. They prevent us from questioning the kind of valuation of people and planet that enables our resources to be consumed in such a way that allows a very small group of people to maintain elite status at the cost of each of our own hearts, our own ability to truly meet one another heart to heart, mind to mind. We carry these seeds of bias, these seeds of discrimination, these seeds of confusion—ways of looking at each other with suspicion, all seeded there because of the greed and the inability of those operating from that place to see clearly, or perhaps their indifference to the degree they perpetuate suffering.

One of the things I feel most gratified about regarding the Buddhist community's engagement with these issues is that we have a set of teachings that provides us with lenses through which we can look. As I just spoke about the three poisons, those lenses are available to us, offering our larger sangha the opportunity not only to take up our individual practices and recognize our contributions to climate change and to a racialized system of superiority, but also to embrace a unique responsibility as a larger community.

We can begin to look at how we, as people practicing these teachings and truly bringing them to heart, seeking to embody them in our actual lives, can respond more collectively. We can have the kinds of conversations about the root issues that have contributed to climate change. Climate change is a manifestation—a tangible, increasingly palpable manifestation—of behaviors and a social ego construct that has been operating for hundreds of years.

What we're presented with at this time is not only an opportunity to look at climate change, which completely makes sense, but also, in concert with the nature of our practice, to choose to say: "This is the behavior I'm seeing. These are the outcomes I'm seeing. What is at the root? What is at the root?" We must get down to the root, however painful, disconcerting, or overwhelming it may be to be confronted with the ways we have not seen or been able to respond to these things before. This would be true for us as sanghas as well.

More importantly, I would say that what is required and most useful is that because we get to look at these things through a lens of shared teachings, we finally have the opportunity to truly utilize the notion of sangha in the way it was always meant to be used. Not merely as a group of people we do things with—which is often the case in many sanghas that function more like fellowship, particularly in the West—but to actually rethink and reimagine our utilization and relationship to sangha as a whole. A community of people we are in heart with, getting down to the root of things that impact us all, doing so in such a way that we support one another and pull back from the hyper-individualized ways we draw from Western society and its constructs.

"Thank you so much, Reverend Angel, for your words. I really feel there's so much work here, the invitation to go so much more deeply into the work, to look at the systemic level of the colonial mindset that we have somehow all been seeded within. It's like decolonizing our heart and mind so that we can come into this deeper relationship and out of the brutality of that colonized place—brutality against others, marginalized people of color, and ourselves, our own hearts and bodies and minds, and of course the earth. Thank you for this wonderful invitation into where we have to go, this deep heart of sangha, reclaiming and healing the soul of sangha, where there's a deeper web of life. Thank you so much for opening those doors for us and inviting us deeper into that piece of work.

Our last teacher this morning is a person of great warm heart who does wonderful work and feels so deeply with the wilderness, works in the wilderness, and teaches meditation and wilderness retreats. I'd like to warmly welcome Susie and invite you to contribute to our conversation."

"Thank you so much, Janice, and thank you, Aya, and Reverend, for what you have offered. As we all move into this, and as you were talking, Reverend, I was thinking of a friend of mine, Terry Tempest Williams, who lives in our community and has been speaking out for the earth for a long time. I remember her once saying that somebody told her, 'You are married to sorrow.' She replied, 'No, I just don't choose to look away. My curiosity is greater than my fear.'

I feel like that's what we're doing right now. We're saying we choose not to look away. I think that in itself is a huge shift. What we're doing is very much an extension of our practice because it's saying that we prefer and are willing to step into truth. That's what the Buddha was pointing to over and over again—it's the truth that will free us, not our wishes, not our ideas, not our isolation."

So I'm just so grateful to all of us stepping into that truth together. And one of the pieces that I want to bring in is the outsourcing, as Reverend Angel talked about—the outsourcing of the cost of our actions, how that's been displaced socially and how we've split ourselves into classes as a result. Another place that we've outsourced these costs is environmentally.

The extraction of the resources that we burn, creating climate change—these resources, as they've been extracted, as we all know, have impacted oceans, rivers, people, and animals all over the world. I'm very aware of this where I live in southeastern Utah. Roughly thirty-five percent of the land here is leased to the gas and oil industry and is potentially open to development, and much of it is being developed.

Even more concerning is what's happening about three hours north of where I live, on the border of our county. The first oil sands development in the U.S. just opened there, developed by a Canadian company that was also involved in the development in Alberta. If you don't know about oil sands, I really encourage you to inform yourself. You can search online for "Alberta oil sands" and add Joanna Macy's name—you'll find a YouTube video of a flyover. It reveals an incredibly devastating form of extraction. You're basically leaving behind a wasteland, a black, lifeless wasteland where nothing can grow. It has impacted the water in Alberta so severely that people downstream have been told not to drink it.

And now it's starting here, in a very remote, wild, beautiful place on the north edge of a county that has 10,000 people. The people here aren't going to be able to provide sufficient resistance to stop this—it's going to require a much greater level of awareness and activity. The impact will be on that land directly, but what they're expecting to extract twenty years from now—they hope to get forty to sixty million barrels a day. That is enough, in and of itself, to tip the climate over. It represents a huge amount of carbon dioxide being proposed for release into the air.

How we can respond and act to this—the XL pipeline that has been fairly effectively stopped at this point has shown that stopping infrastructure can have impact. It's so important that we move out of the idea that we can't have impact, because we are having impact. There are things that need to be responded to.

One of the things I'm so aware of in our spiritual practice, as I talk about these things and as we all share and step into this, is that we have the idea that we come to our spiritual practice for relief, for ease, for happiness. But as Aya Nandabodi said so clearly, it's like trying to have a calm mind in a room that is burning. What frees us, what we really need, is the truth. And that involves being willing to step in.

Yul Rinpoche speaks of "the unbroken receptivity to truth." Gloria Steinem says, "The truth will set you free, but first it will piss you off." I want to propose that the truth will set us free, but first it will break our hearts.

It's easy, as we feel into this and acknowledge where we are, to feel a personal sense of overwhelm. As I and Nandabodi spoke to this, I want to say more about it because I think it's the thing that holds us back, that locks us in place so that we don't move—and we're in a time when movement is so important. The overwhelm, when we see the depth and breadth of what's happening, is a movement towards collapse and separation. We so need to move instead towards connection.

When we believe in the illusion of self, when we don't see clearly in that way, the world becomes a cause, a separate thing. Instead, it's like tending to our own wounds and the wounds of those that we love who are right here. Einstein has this beautiful quote: "A human being is a part of the whole, called by us universe, a part limited in time and space. We experience ourselves, our thoughts and feelings as something separate from the rest, a kind of optical delusion of our consciousness. This delusion is really a prison for us, restricting us to personal desires and to affection for a few persons nearest us. Our path must be to free ourselves from this prison by expanding our circle of understanding and compassion to embrace all living creatures and the whole of nature and its beauty."

Our wise scientist ancestors are pointing so clearly to these expanding circles—our ability to see harm and our desire to not do harm that is so much bigger than our small self. As we can move into that and feel our connection, then the alternative to overwhelm is compassion. That is what allows us to move and not get collapsed and stuck.

One of the things that helps us so much, that I'm so grateful for, is being in nature, connecting to what's here. Tara last week spoke to that beautifully—taking time to connect and really being willing to value truth more than our comfort, letting go of the resistance and the denial and being willing to feel our emotions as Aya spoke to.

Joanna Macy speaks beautifully of this, of being willing to connect and to cry for our planet, to feel rage about it. She says, "It is a measure of your open heart. As your heart breaks open, there will be room for the world to heal." And that feels so true to me.

I know it's mattered deeply to me to allow my heart to break open again and again, to feel touched by what is happening. And that allows us to love in every moment. Everything that has ever changed in a wholesome way has to come from love.

From this compassion that moves us, what can we envision? How can we move? What becomes possible? One of the things that Reverend Angel spoke to so beautifully is that this is not just about addressing climate change—it's about transforming everything in a way that is so much more whole and real. Looking local, doing things that empower people rather than corporations, moving away from consumption, connecting with each other.

This is allowing us to move, encouraging us to move toward the good—the deepest good—rather than from some idea that we're being cut off or won't get what we want. That idea comes from a sense of greed, from losing touch with what is most important.

One of the things that moves us out of overwhelm is to do something—to acknowledge what you're already doing. It's really like our practice: we know what we know, you're doing what you're doing, and then we keep moving. We do more. Our love will always have more capacity. What else can you do? What's possible? Can you spend more time being creative with others, changing the system, changing your habits, sharing with others?

This whole movement feels to me like it's all about the precept of not doing harm. Locally here we have a soil called cryptobiotic soil that grows on the sand. It holds the sand together and serves as the starting point from which other plants grow. If you don't know about it at first, when you walk on it, it gives this crunching sound—kind of interesting. But once you learn about the harm your footsteps cause and the long-term effect on this crust, to step on it becomes painful.

I think we're in that phase of adjusting and understanding the impact of our steps, learning how to adjust how we walk and where we walk in order to be sensitive to all beings everywhere.

And we don't have to do this alone. We're part of a whole movement. We don't need to feel alone. I want to mention two resources: Carrie Nelson has been doing work with groups for a while to help people move in their communities. You can find her at placeforpeace.org. There's also a Sustainable World Sourcebook that you can find through Google—it's full of ideas for how you can work and do things in your community with other people.

It's going to be messy. We don't know how to do this. So we just have to start doing it.

Thank you, Ayaan and Abodi.

Before we move into breakout groups for discussion, I'd like to invite Lou back into the call. Lou, particularly regarding what Susie shared about the tar sands and what's happening there, do you have anything to contribute from your perspective?

Hi, Tanisara. Thank you. I'm worried that my connection might not be great, so perhaps I could share at the beginning of the full Q&A just to give us a better chance of being heard.

Your connection's good. Your connection's good now. Go for it.

Okay, just quickly—I think one of the important things to remember is that in order for us to stay below the temperature threshold that scientists tell us will bring the greatest danger, places where we're going to really start hitting tipping points, we have a limited budget: a limited amount of carbon dioxide and other gases that we can emit into the atmosphere.

The thing about tar sands is that it is such a carbon-intensive energy source, in addition to all the other horrible impacts to the earth and to the First Nations people in Alberta. It's very carbon-intensive, and it actually produces a fuel oil that is largely used by wealthier segments of the world's population, leaving us very little room in that budget for things like electricity and energy to cook—basic needs for all people.

Just to give you a couple of numbers: if the tar sands that are currently being extracted in Alberta were all to be extracted and burned, they would use up half of the remaining budget that we have in the atmosphere. That would leave us only about eight years of CO2 before we start hitting some of those very dangerous tipping points.

So thinking about those kinds of impacts from tar sands as well as other sources of energy—it's important to understand both the impact they have on the atmosphere and how they benefit the wealthier, more powerful segments of society versus the energy needs of the poor.

I'll stop there. Thank you.

Well, that's very clear. As I'm listening to you, it's really important for us to educate ourselves. One of the things we'll be moving to post our series of calls is an Ecosattva training session. As a mindfulness dharma Buddhist collective, we want to really get behind some of the actions happening and support our challenge to things like the tar sands and other issues that are going on. We want to translate our engagement into actual action and connect and join other groups.

So let's just leave it there for now. I think at this point in our call, we're going to move into breakout groups. I'm going to hand over to Kristen to guide us in that process.

The theme we're going to explore when we go into our groups for discussion—and Kristen will say a few words about that and encourage you to stay for this process. Of course, if you don't feel comfortable and would just like to meditate through the next ten or fifteen minutes while we go into discussion, that's quite fine too.

But if you join the breakout groups—and I encourage that—we're going to discuss together: Where are you in response to the teachers' input? What touches you and where do you feel moved to speak from?

So Kristen, if I can hand over to you to guide us into the next process, with Barry supporting that.

Thank you so much, Thanissara. Greetings, everyone. As the other co-founder of Dharma Sangha, I have to say it's such an honor and privilege to be with you on these calls. I'm especially excited that we can support the ability—as Susie was saying—to move into closer and closer connections, actually connecting with others on this call around the issues we've discussed so far.

So we're inviting you to share in these breakout groups—we'll make it all happen for you. What is arising for you? What is your response to the teachers' input so far? Was there anything in particular that touched you? Offer this sacred space for others to share and let that in. This, I think, we see as the cultivation of sangha. It's something that we feel is so vital.

Welcome back everyone. Thank you for taking that moment to either explore this internally or with other participants on this global call.

We're going to move into the Q&A session now. If you have a question you'd like to ask into the full field here, you can press the number 1 on your phone keypad or your Skype keypad or your MC Dialer keypad—again, not your keyboard.

I would just ask, with so many of us on the call, please keep that question brief. Don't feel too constrained, but just know that we'll try to get to as many people as possible, so keep it as brief as possible.

If you have a question, go ahead and press 1 on your phone keypad.

Welcome back everyone. Thank you for taking that moment to explore this internally or with other participants on this global call.

We're moving into the Q&A session now. If you have a question you'd like to ask into the full field here, you can press the number 1 on your phone keypad. With so many of us on the call, I ask that you keep your question brief—don't feel too constrained, but know that we'll try to get to as many people as possible.

Let's start with George. George, what is your question?

"I wasn't on the call last week, and I was wondering about an educational program mentioned in the email. Is there something beyond these series of calls? Are other materials being prepared?"

Tanisra, would you like to speak to that?

"Yes, we are launching a training called the Ecosat Training on April 22nd, Earth Day, next year. It will be a three-month program, and you'll hear more about it before this series concludes. If you're on our mailing list, you'll receive updates."

Thank you, George. Now let's go to Vanessa from Canada. Welcome, and what is your question?

"My question is about engagement. This call has focused on equity issues underlying climate change, and I think many of us have more power than we realize—socioeconomically or in our communities. Yet when climate change threatens people's fundamental sense of being in the world, it becomes very hard for them to face it and lean into the issue.

I do social advocacy work in healthcare, and I find resistance to addressing climate change openly because of the personal threat people feel to their life choices and way of being. In our very conservative political culture in Canada, I wonder how to engage people in conversation and action in ways that are non-threatening and help them manifest the power and influence they have for creating change and demanding political action."

Aya Anandabodhi, would you take this question?

"Thank you. This is something we all encounter, because acknowledging the reality of our situation is indeed a huge threat to our way of living. It can be a very slow process trying to convince people who aren't open. It may be more fruitful personally to involve yourself in larger social actions—like the People's Climate March on September 21st, or with international groups like 350.org who organize events.

Rather than trying to convince people, engage yourself in meaningful action and let that arise naturally in conversation as example. I've also found visual imagery quite helpful through social media. There's an artist named Chris Jordan from Seattle whose extraordinary photographs show the effects of our consumerism—particularly his work on albatrosses and plastic waste. When people see those images, something awakens. It's not about convincing someone, but simply showing them: this is actually what's happening. This is the result of our actions."

So that's what I would suggest. Does that help in any way?

Let's take one more question. Emily Shaw, what is your question?

"Hi, so I was wondering—my question was actually pretty similar to the last one, so you can choose someone else if you'd like to."

Since this is such a challenge for so many of us—working with environments that are not receptive—Reverend Angel, would you like to speak to that?

"Sure. Emily, would you like to say what your question is specifically?"

"I haven't been involved in climate action groups that I would like to be, and I'm a little bit afraid that it's going to be really intense. Maybe the culture of the group would be very pressuring for people who are just entering that space. I guess I'm curious about the really strong divide it feels like there is between activism and just regular people who don't even talk about these issues."

This is a good question for me. I'm involved and have been sitting on the board of a green organization for ten years now. I think there are many groups to choose from, and I'll say off the top that many environmental organizations have changed their tone over time. Much of the antagonism and intensity has actually shifted because all of us have seen that overwhelming people is not necessarily the best strategy. That conversation is happening very actively amongst climate groups. I sit with folks from thirty big green groups in the country, and we really see a big conversation shift about approach.

That said, like anything else—even like sangha—it is a kind of community you're going to belong to. Finding a good fit is what's important. There are many, many organizations doing work out there in ways that are actually really uplifting and effective. They're trying to approach the work in a way that includes the reality that all of us have to actually live here together, recognizing that merely an antagonistic way of being isn't going to be effective.

I would say find something close to your heart in terms of issues and start there. It's the easiest place to enter.

I'd also add to the list of resources a stunning site created by designer Maya Lin, who designed the Vietnam Memorial when she was twenty-one. It's called whatishappening.net. I encourage everyone, wherever you are in the world, to visit that site. It gives you a very interactive way to not only see what's happening in different places of the world, but also to make contributions of your own—to recognize losses you may have observed or actions your community may be taking.

The last thing I want to say is that in Buddhist communities, we're often very concerned about challenging people and finding ways to do things that are not threatening. But what we're up against is something that is fundamentally threatening—and that's actually what people are responding to. There is a fundamental threat to our lives on this planet, and that gets papered over by the threat to the lives we're living in this particular moment.

I would encourage us to be a little more willing to take risks, because we're close to an edge. We need to not be afraid of being risky about getting across to people—not in an aggressive way, but recognizing that being threatening in the sense that our practice is threatening to the ego and the way we've constructed ourselves. This issue is similarly like that, and that is part of the work.

If you're entering from your own heart into spaces of love, really recognizing how important it is that we find our way and begin to have these conversations—we are no longer in a place where we can afford not to have these conversations. Whatever the risk is, I think we need to take it.

That's wonderful. I couldn't agree more, Reverend. Thank you so much.

This brings us to the point of wrapping up our conversation today. I'd like to again thank everyone for your contribution—both our wonderful teachers and the team that enabled this conference, and each and every one of you as participants.

The conversation will continue with our presenters next week: Jamie Baraz, Catherine McGee, and Chris Cullen, each doing wonderful and profound work. Please join us next Sunday at the same time. I've already mentioned and will continue to mention that we'll be moving towards developing a course to launch next year on the platform from One Earth Sangha.

I'd also like to encourage you to check out the dana page on One Earth Sangha. You can go to oneearthsangha.org and choose "support our work" to make a contribution to help us maintain and continue this conversation, continue this work, and continue to grow One Earth Sangha.

I'd also like to invite Barry from our host, Maestro Conference, who's been doing wonderful work to really help this happen. Barry, could you say a little about Maestro as a platform for other organizations if they wish to use it or other conference calls?

"Sure, thanks Tanissara. Maestro Conference is an amazing engagement tool, as you got to experience today, with breakouts and polling. It makes for very robust engagement. If any of you would like to know more about Maestro Conference, you can press one on your keypads. Maestro Conference will send you a gentle email with information about the features and benefits. They also have a free trial if you're interested. Simply press 1 now on your keypad if you're interested and we'll get that information to you. Thank you, Tanissara. Back to you."

Thank you so much. I think just again to take a deep breath and really absorb everything that we've been with this hour and a half together. I'd like to help us with that by inviting Ariya and Nandabodhi to share the blessings in a prayerful way as we finish our call today.

Let's just take a moment to connect with this body, with our bodies sitting on the earth beneath us and the space above and around us. Feel the interconnection with everyone else here who's called in today and with all living beings on this planet Earth.

Just taking in the beauty of this Earth, the preciousness, the connection and relationship that we have with each other. Let that touch and fill our hearts. Recognize our incredible good fortune in coming across the Dharma in our lives, having a chance to practice.

Reconnecting with the heart, feeling the punya—the goodness, the good energy that comes through our awakening, our wholesome intentions, the actions that we do in the world for the benefit of others, for the benefit of all beings.

I'd like to invite you to share in all directions the good energy, the good intentions, for the benefit of all beings: those who are friendly, those who are indifferent, those who are hostile, those who are helping, those who are harming. May all receive the blessings of our practice, that they may realize the true nature of benefit in this world.

Thank you so much. Thank you again to everyone. I look forward to connecting with you next Sunday and to remind you that we have the Facebook group to continue the discussion. Thank you so much. Goodbye.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 283

Mindfulness and Climate Action: 3

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> In this third installment of the Mindfulness and Climate Action series, three experienced Dharma teachers examine how Buddhist practice can inform our response to the climate crisis. Catherine McGee opens by exploring "the meeting place of the silence of the sage and the passion of the activist," emphasizing our nature as open systems interconnected with all life. She draws on Right View from the Noble Eightfold Path to understand how wise intention leads to skillful action in the face of overwhelming climate data.
>
> Chris Cullen presents Joanna Macy's four-stage spiral of reconnection: coming from gratitude, honoring our pain for the world, seeing with new eyes, and going forth into action. He emphasizes how contemplative practices of mettā and mindfulness can transform our relationship to climate grief and despair, while practical steps like reducing carbon footprints and engaging in courageous conversations help build political momentum for systemic change.
>
> James Baraz focuses on maintaining inspiration through what he calls "sacred activism" - holding an inspiring vision while acknowledging suffering. Drawing on contemporary teachers like Bhikkhu Bodhi and Andrew Harvey, he frames the climate crisis as a "dark night of the species" that offers unprecedented opportunity for collective awakening. The session concludes with guided reflection on personal next steps, emphasizing how individual contemplative practice and community engagement can multiply our courage and effectiveness in responding to this urgent global challenge.

A very warm welcome to everyone. Welcome back to those who are following these calls and welcome to all of you who are joining us for the first time today. Just to let you know that we've had over 2,200 people sign up for this series and about 15 to 30% of you are on the calls. Some are calling in as a group and people are calling in from the US, from Canada, from the EU, New Zealand, Italy, Finland, Ireland, UK, India, South Africa, so it's a wonderful representation of us as a global community.

My name is Tanitha and I'm the host and moderator for our conversation Mindfulness, Dharma and Climate Action. It is our hope that these conversations here will encourage each of you to engage conversations on climate change in your own communities. But before we begin, I would like to also encourage your support for this series and for the ongoing work of Dharma and Climate Action through making a dana contribution. This will help us to continue our work and for that we need your support. You can do this through going on the One Earth Sangha website, going to support our work in the menu and finding the dana button. Thank you so much.

We are in increasingly precarious times in regard to the impact on the natural environment from our ways of living. It is clear that unless we radically change our relationship to Mother Earth, to each other and ourselves, we will jeopardize a sustainable world for future generations.

Today, to explore this issue, I welcome our three teachers and speakers. Catherine McGee from Devon in the UK is a teacher at Gaia House and a student of the Diamond Heart approach. She emphasizes embodiment and working with whatever hinders us from living our deepest knowing in the world through body, speech and mind in her teachings. Chris Cullen is a Dharma teacher and psychotherapist from the UK. Chris co-founded the UK-based Mindfulness in Schools project and is on the teaching team at the Oxford University Mindfulness Centre. Chris also teaches at Gaia House in the UK and offers mindfulness courses for members of Parliament and peers in the Houses of Parliament London. James Barras from Berkeley, California, is a founding teacher of Spirit Rock Meditation Centre. James has also initiated the very successful Community Dharma Leader Program and has been teaching the popular online course, Awakening Joy.

I also welcome our team, Barry Bettman from our host, Maestro Conference, Kristen Barker, co-founder of One Earth Sangha and White Awake, Yong Oh, teacher at Chattanooga Insight and Center for Mindful Living, Chattanooga, Tennessee, and Lou Leonard, co-founder of One Earth Sangha and leader of Climate Change Program at World Wildlife Fund and our science advisor for our series.

So before I hand you over to Lou, again, I welcome you and just invite you to take a deep breath, to really feel the breath in your body and then as you breathe out to relax into your body and to feel the sensation of sitting in your seat and on the earth, connecting with that sensation. And taking a deeper breath again, breathing in and feeling the air in our body, breathing out, relaxing and arriving into our presence, into our hearts, and into our bodies. Thank you.

Lou, please, if I can invite you to say a few words, then hand it over to our first teacher, Catherine.

Thank you, Tanisra, and hello, everyone. It's wonderful to be with you again today. I wanted to remind you all of the background paper that Priti Kenko and I have put together for the course. We've sent you all a link to it in emails, and if you'd like to access it directly from the website, you can do that at the One Earth Sangha website on the archive page where each of these talks are placed after we finish.

Also wanted to remind folks that if you have some questions that you would like to bring into the discussion, feel free to email those to questions at oneearthsangha.org. And again, as a reminder, we're recording this and the recording will be archived in the next day or so for those who aren't able to join in person or if you'd like to listen to it again.

So today we're going to, among other things, begin to explore a little bit of moving into action on climate change. The science research shows us that this can be one of the big obstacles for some as they begin to move into this space because climate change can feel so big and so impossible for individuals to have an impact on. And sometimes it even feels like no action is happening and certainly not enough. So I just want you to know that working on this every day, I feel those things too often in my own heart.

But I can tell you that there is a lot going on right now, activity-wise, on climate change. Just on Friday, as a sort of up-to-the-minute update, world governments agreed to take the last steps to set up the new Green Climate Fund, which will help support vulnerable communities and countries as they prepare for climate change. I expect to see a down payment of at least $10 billion U.S. dollars pledged next month to open up that Green Climate Fund and even see a pledge by the United States, which would be impressive.

But it's not just government action that matters. Individual action really matters a lot. We need to look no further than the People's Climate March from last month to show what kind of an impact we can have as individuals. And in the background paper, I just wanted to point out on pages five and six, you can see some examples of ways that you can get involved individually, and there's also a resource section at the end of the paper with more ideas.

And then, of course, what you're doing right now is actually one of the most important things you can do because helping to understand how our emotions and our hearts are affected by climate change is so critical to staying resilient and to help others do the same in the face of this crisis. Thank you for taking this action, this important brave step, and for your willingness to do more.

So I'm really grateful to be able to hand you over to Catherine McGee, who's really one of the biggest and wisest hearts exploring the space of the Dharma and climate change. Catherine, thank you for being with us.

Thank you. I'm just pausing to land and feel my legs, feel my heart and the excitable sensation that's arising in my arms as I come to share and explore with you all. I'd like to bring to the conversation a question that I've been pondering that is helping me go deeper with the question of how to come into action. And the question goes something like this: What is the meeting place of the silence of the sage and the passion of the activist?

Where do they meet? And where do they meet in me? My love for the silent depth that we're invited into in our practice, where we can know what it's like to not be blown around by what arises internally and externally. And how to hold that with my love of conditions, my love of life, my love of what can arise internally and externally.

The other way I'm holding these questions is how to hold the timeless refuge of the Dhamma—being invited into that timeless knowing—with a very real urgency in time.

When we come into action, whatever action we take, we know from the Eightfold Path and from our direct experience that action always comes from intention. And our intention always comes from our view—right view, wise view, or unwise view, as the case may be. That right view heads up the Eightfold Path.

One way I like to understand right view was taught to me by one of my teachers: you are, I am, right now, here and now in this place, an open system. You're not a closed system, you're an open system. Everything we do affects everything else. There is no sealed unit, no fixed entity that we can retreat into or push our way forward with. We are an open system.

Another way of seeing this is that we sit at the interface of inner conditions—our inner responses moment to moment to the world within us and around us. We sit at this interface of inner and outer, how the outer world meets the inner. This is the meeting place. This is the meeting place that I want to reflect on and look into more deeply right now, because that's where we always are.

Right now as I speak, if I take a breath, that's where I am. There are inner conditions arising. There's still some kind of excitement and nervousness and tenderness in my heart, meeting the knowledge that I'm sitting here with many people. I can't see them, but I'm sitting here with many Dharma friends who want to listen and look into these questions. As I say that, my heart softens. Some of the nervousness relaxes. This is where we always are, at this interface.

Can we learn how to rest at that interface? Because that's sacred. That is whole. It has a wholeness to it where I'm not fragmenting or pushing away parts of myself or parts of the world in order to stay comfortable or okay.

It's not always easy to be an open system. There's so much that can be coming up for us sometimes and so much coming toward us. So we have our practice for stabilizing and grounding, to not be blown around. But it's not easy. We're not a fixed entity, this open system. It's sensitive, it's responsive, it's easily impacted, and we deeply feel.

In whatever actions we come to take in our response to the climate crisis, for this to be truly sustaining and truly nourishing, we are invited to cultivate this deep intimacy with ourselves—because that's where we are—so that whatever action we take, we don't leave ourselves behind.

Let me take us into an example. A couple of weeks ago, I had the good fortune to speak on Skype with one of my Dharma teachers to discuss what we were doing in this mindfulness and climate work together. He's an older, wise, old tree of a man who has handled a lot internally and externally. I know he cares deeply about the planet, her beings, and this crisis that we're in together.

As we sat and breathed together, considering this topic, I brought to the table some of the information from Lou's sheets—the science information that he gave us. I brought it into the meeting and said, "Can I offer this?" He said, "Yes." I said, "We now know that to stay within two degrees Celsius of warming—to have a fair chance of staying within that, which will help us avoid more catastrophic runaway climate change—we can only burn 565 more gigatons of fuel to make that much CO2 in the atmosphere."

He paused and considered. I continued, "And the fossil fuel companies currently have 2,790 potentially burnable gigatons in reserves, in the knowable traditional reserves."

We breathed. I looked at him and saw his face. I thought, oh my goodness, I've delivered some bad news. I said, "How are you doing? How is that, to hear that?"

He said, "Catherine, that is truly bone jangling. That is truly bone jangling."

His bones were jangled. As I watched him, it looked as though a wind had just blown right through him. "Stirring stuff," he said. "This is stirring stuff indeed."

So how do we take that stirring stuff into our practice so that we can hold it within the sacred matrix and restore ourselves into the sacred matrix? Because as we handle what arises—and as I was with him I could feel my impatience and my sorrow and my pain—as I learned to handle that, my silence, my love of the silence helps me not be blown away by all that's arising.

And the passion, the bone jangling, the fire that also arises can help me be alive. That energy, when together with silence, can serve to light up and illuminate more truth, more ways to see the situation, more ways to understand skillful actions. This is the meeting place for me—this silence, this grounded, imperturbable silence, and that which is willing to be perturbed, willing to be altered by this information, willing to be woken up further into the sacred matrix of life.

I'm thinking of the bright lights of our history and the bright lights that are shining in all of you as we come into this together. I'm thinking of those beings who really exemplify this spiritual depth and this bright, alive passion for justice. An easy one my mind goes to is Nelson Mandela, who had that spiritual depth to hold complexity, ambiguity, uncertainty, discomfort, dis-ease. He could hold that, and yet that bright aliveness illuminated the territory for us. It's like a bright light in the world.

Having been with my teacher, I stood at my back door and I took this into my practice. As I handled my material—yes, there was my material, my stirred stuff—but also then my opening into more ease, less tightness. And then the thought arose: "But if I'm not tight, maybe I wouldn't act," as if trusting action would only come from tightening up.

I breathed and I softened. As I stayed close, this heart-mind, this chitta, this meeting place got wider and wider. I sensed, as all those little knots and pains unfolded, the energy didn't dissipate. I saw that this heart-mind was teeming with life—teeming with life that sometimes is encapsulated and hurting and in bondage, but also so much more than that. As I listened, I sensed this teeming life and I got the potentiality of us, this meeting place in coming into action.

This is sacred. This is the same nature, this heart-mind that I see out there. It's ever-receptive, restoring itself constantly and keeps revealing itself more and more the more I dare to live and breathe as an open system. This is where I want to meet you, and this is where, when I remember, this is where I meet myself. And I think as a sangha, this is where we can support each other in meeting each other. That our actions come from that—what flows out from that will be a reflection of that inner orientation.

So as urgent as our awakening is to a responsible and cooperative relationship with each other and the biosphere for the continuing of life, it's also essential if we are to remain human and let our human nature unfold its riches. So that's where I want to leave you as we move to Chris and move into action. Thank you so much.

"Thank you for your words, Catherine, so very beautiful and moving. I can feel them landing and the heart being opened and body softening into this incredible interface that we hold and can be with in such a sacred way. Chris, I'd like to welcome you. Chris is a very dear friend and I'm so grateful you can join us on the call. Please welcome you to share your considerations for us this morning."

"Thank you, Tanissara. And hello, everyone. It's really moving and inspiring to connect and be with you all in this conversation. I'd invite you and invite myself just again to reconnect with our contact with the ground, with the earth, with the body, with the breath, because it does seem as if reconnecting is what this is about.

The climate crisis has arisen as a result of us humans becoming tragically disconnected from ourselves and from each other and from the earth. As I'm becoming more mindful of my own patterns of connecting and disconnecting in relation to the climate crisis, I'm really appreciating the wisdom that's set out in a book called Active Hope by Joanna Macy and Chris Johnston. Many of you may know this or have read it. In a very clear and compassionate and inspiring way, they highlight the perennial spiral of four processes that are involved in the work of reconnecting."

And so I'd like to offer a few reflections on these themes.

The first is coming from gratitude. As we know from the story of the Buddha's awakening, his first practice after enlightenment was gazing at the Bodhi tree in gratitude and appreciation. What a profoundly resourcing, healing, and reconnecting practice this is—learning how to open our awareness and senses to receive with gratitude the presence, the gift of a tree, of a forest, of a city park, of a garden, even of a plant in our homes.

Of course, First Nation and indigenous peoples across the globe have always known this is not a luxury. Practices of thanksgiving and deep communion with nature are essential to bringing us back into right relationship with the larger life of which we're part. They build reverence. They bring healing. They open us to joy and to love.

Whether we're feeling numb and disconnected in relation to climate change, or on fire and in flow as activists, or burnt out in despair and fatigue, there's deep value in making a regular practice of mindful, grateful being in nature—centralizing thanksgiving in our lives as a key part of our response to climate change. Thanksgiving and gratitude support and nourish the heart. They remind us of our deep belonging, and they help develop our capacity to honor our pain for the world.

This brings us to the second theme in the spiral: opening to the personal and collective pain that we hold for what human beings have done and are doing to the biosphere. We can reflect on what relationship with this pain is showing up in our experience right now.

As we do this, we notice we have different relationships at different times. Sometimes I feel overwhelmed by anger, fear, or despair and need to practice reconnecting with a sense of resource that can support me—that can support us—in holding pain with mindfulness and compassion. I really appreciated Tara's words in the first of these conversations about dropping the storyline of the bad other and allowing, connecting, breathing with the raw energy that has within it the care and compassion that our hearts are born for.

I notice that my tendency is often to be in a state of disconnection where the daily demands of personal, work, and family life can keep me somewhat out of contact with the urgency of the climate crisis and with the searing social, racial, and ecological injustice and suffering taking place in frontline communities. This, I know, is the disconnection of privileged distance, because the place where I live happens not to have been badly affected by climate change so far.

There's a particular moral imperative for those of us in this position to lean in and educate ourselves by reading, watching, and learning. I appreciated Catherine's words about the importance of making this self-education a practice—to watch and read and learn and discover more about climate change and the suffering involved in it as a meditation, as conscious heart work. To really practice opening to this stirring material, because this is precisely the work we as human beings most need to practice: coming consciously into contact with the truth of climate change and its suffering, and allowing ourselves to be affected.

We need to learn the skills of this and pass them on to others. Research in the UK suggests that almost 80% of people accept the science of climate change, but only 14% act accordingly. There's talk about the need to move the unmoved—those who know the facts but are apparently not affected by them. It's been inspiring and challenging that some scientists have recently been acknowledging the role of spiritual tradition in doing this work. Perhaps there's an important role for the mindfulness movement as it spreads into wider society to play a part in this.

So we develop our capacity, learn how to resource ourselves, to turn toward and honor our pain—our individual and collective pain for the world. This opens us into the possibility of seeing with new eyes, a transformation of view. In the book, Joanna and Chris write about developing a wider sense of self, a different kind of power, a richer experience of community, and a larger view of time. I won't speak about each of these now, but I really encourage you to read this book and familiarize yourself with this material.

This practice of seeing with new eyes is really what we're doing when we practice mindfulness, when we practice dharma. There's this sense of dharma and mindfulness practice as consciously practicing ways of looking that lead our hearts toward greater freedom, connection, and compassion. There's subtle but significant contemplative work to do in becoming mindful of the ways of looking that disconnect us, that support the creation of self and other, whether in relation to other people or to the earth itself.

We can practice ways of looking that honor and open the deeper truths of our connection and interdependence. We can give time to this in our meditation practice—practicing widening our metta, our hearts, to include all creatures and the earth itself. Practicing holding the current climate emergency in a sense of vast time and noticing how this affects us. Practicing releasing the clinging to outcomes as we respond to climate change and trusting and feeling into the value, the rightness, the truth of the work itself, as Thomas Merton puts it.

This is a transformation of view that reconnects us and develops our capacity to respond to suffering in the world with greater wisdom and compassion. This brings us to the fourth of these perennial themes: going forth, reconnecting contemplative work with action in the world. James will say more about this in a moment.

But as Catherine has been reflecting, contemplation and activism need and support each other. Climate change is a challenge to bring them into conscious relationship, into what Andrew Harvey calls sacred activism—the activism of the bodhisattva path. As the saying goes, action absorbs anxiety. It builds confidence and connection. And wise action coming from love is contagious.

And so now, as we're having these conversations, perhaps this is a good time for each of us to review and reflect. What are my specific intentions in response to climate change? Are there particular connections or pledges that I feel called or inspired to make? Are there ways in which I could reduce the carbon footprint of the building I call home—perhaps by looking at better insulation, or even just small daily acts? As His Holiness the Dalai Lama says in his autobiography, just because switching off the lights when leaving a room seems inconsequential, it doesn't mean we shouldn't do it.

I've been reviewing my transport patterns, mindful of the fact that these are a huge source of CO2 emissions, especially flying. Are there ways in which we could make different choices about travel, both locally and further afield? What about our diet—what I eat and where it comes from—and our other patterns of consumption? The Buddha presented compassionate renunciation, voluntary simplicity in the service of compassion, as a path to joy and an expression of love.

As Tanissara said at the start of today's conversation, having courageous conversations—talking with people in our homes, our communities, our sanghas, our workplaces—these are one of the main ways in which we can help bring this conversation into wider society and not collude with the taboo of keeping quiet about climate change. And there is a growing wisdom about how to do this in ways that engage and connect rather than alienate. I appreciate the work of George Marshall and the Climate Outreach Information Network here in Oxford in the UK on this.

What the science seems to be suggesting, and both Lou and Catherine have referred to this, is that the biggest leverage we can have in helping to prevent runaway climate change is in helping to build political momentum locally, nationally and internationally to help keep fossil fuels in the ground. This points to the importance of encouraging our councils, our churches, our universities, our arts organizations and governments to divest and change their relationship with the fossil fuel industries, seeking to replace fossil fuels with more sustainable sources of power.

This is not about creating more us-and-them thinking. All of us in developed economies are involved in consuming fossil fuel products. But what this is pointing to is the sense that this is a systemic problem that we all need to take action on to help move us to more sustainable ways of living.

And so as we contemplate the dharma of climate change, as we absorb what it's teaching us, as we seek to respond with wisdom and compassion to its challenge, as we hear its call to reconnect with ourselves, each other, and with the earth, perhaps this perennial spiral of four themes can hold and illuminate the contemplative and active work in which we're engaged: coming from gratitude, honoring our pain for the world, seeing with new eyes in ways that transform our view, and going forth into action together, knowing that we do so in sangha and in solidarity with each other and with this beloved, precious earth.

James then joined the conversation, bringing his perspective on the crucial importance of holding an inspiring vision. "For me, if my inspiration is not there, then I feel discouraged and defeated," he shared. He spoke about seeing dharma practice as a way to acknowledge suffering and transform it through wisdom and love as a vehicle for awakening.

James recounted his own journey: "I've been teaching about happiness for some time and was enjoying seeing dharma as a path of happiness for many years. But then I was stopped dead in my tracks when I read Bill McKibben's book Earth about four years ago. I was well aware of climate change, but that was the first time that I really let it sink in. And it shook me, as everyone is shaken when they take in this information. It was hard for me to talk about joy for a while."

He described a necessary period of absorption: "I really had to let it absorb for about a year, a year and a half, to just feel all the pain and wonder, 'What can I do? What can we do?' And then I realized that this is my dharma practice. How can I take this on as my practice and not be overwhelmed with it?"

Drawing on the Buddha's teaching, James reminded us: "In one of the discourses, the Buddha says, 'Whatever one frequently thinks and ponders upon, that becomes the inclination of their mind.' As I was frequently thinking and pondering upon how there's no hope and we're doomed, it became more and more a discouraging way to hold this. I realized I need to hold an inspiring vision and to find my inspiration wherever I can, because otherwise we're subject to what neuroscientists talk about as confirmation bias—everything we see will confirm our belief. As I found my own inspiration, I found that I had more energy for addressing this problem, both intrapersonally and outwardly."

Bhikkhu Bodhi's beautiful essay, "A Challenge to Buddhists," where he says: "The special challenge facing Buddhism in our age is to stand up as an advocate for justice in the world, a voice of conscience. This, in my view, is a deeply moral challenge marking a watershed in the modern expression of Buddhism."

This felt like a calling—oh, this is what we're meant to do, and I want to be part of that.

I also found inspiration in Andrew Harvey's beautiful book "The Hope: A Guide to Sacred Activism." He talks about this dilemma we're all facing, that the world is facing, as a dark night of the species. Just as our own Dharma practice requires us—anyone who's done deep work knows—to often pass through a dark night of the soul, as it's sometimes called in Christian terms, where we face our deepest fears and somehow transform them, emerging on the other side into a great awakening.

If we can see that the world is going through this dark night of the species, then we recognize this as a tremendous opportunity. We are living in an unsustainable way, and something needs to change. As one friend puts it, we are in a race between fear and consciousness.

I loved what Lou said on our first call: that things are getting worse and worse and better and better and faster and faster. That perfectly articulates this challenge we're in. Going through this together represents an opportunity for a great awakening.

When I reflect on this, I also think about Arnold Toynbee's statement. The great historian said that looking back, he thought perhaps the most important development in the 20th century would be Buddhism coming to the West. That's amazing foresight, and it's possibly true—whether you call it Buddhism or the Dharma or consciousness—this seeing ourselves in the bigger picture of interconnectedness, understanding actions and consequences, understanding the possibility of a worldwide deepening of consciousness and caring. This is what we have to offer.

When I think about it in that way, it becomes exciting: we are conveyors of that attitude and principle. It's up to us to hold something in a positive, possible light.

Another person who has inspired me is Bob Oppelt, who works with the Obama administration and is a longtime Dharma practitioner. We had him speak to the International Vipassana Teachers Conference, and he was a key mentor in helping us create the Dharma Teachers' Climate Change Statement. At one point I said to him, "Bob, it's so wonderful that your Dharma practice and your sustainability work have come together. How synchronous, how fortuitous."

He looked at me and said, "James, the Dharma holds the key to this."

I realized: here's one of the leading sustainability experts saying the Dharma holds the key. What can we do to more and more articulate these teachings and have a voice for consciousness?

This encourages me, as does seeing how quickly things can change. We have no idea what's possible. I don't want to be naive and say everything's going to work out just fine—it's quite possible there isn't time to change direction enough to avoid deep suffering. But we don't know, and things change so quickly.

Think about same-sex marriage in the last ten years, how conventional wisdom has shifted. Or even climate change in the last decade, even the last two years. I recently saw that two Senate candidates who were climate deniers have now changed their platforms, realizing that position won't get them elected. That kind of shift in conventional wisdom changes who's in power, and once people see it's no longer acceptable to deny climate reality, things can change very quickly.

Or consider the divestment movement Chris mentioned—the Rockefellers and Stanford being part of this huge divestment wave. I've read that just a seven to ten percent shift in population thinking is what's needed to shift conventional wisdom generally. You don't have to change everybody—just work with those who are open to change. Most people, once they hear "this is how I'm supposed to think," will go along with that.

And as Catherine mentioned, Mandela talks about the multiplication of courage. When people gather together, they feed off each other's commitment. The whole becomes greater than the sum of its parts—when people unite, amazing things can happen.

When we come from love and connect with each other, we experience that multiplication of courage. Neuroscience shows that when you hold someone's hand, you have a higher threshold for pain. Amazing things become possible.

As Chris said, action absorbs anxiety. I think it's important for us to get clear on our next steps, because remarkable things can happen when we hold hands and join together in possibility. We inspire others and become agents of inspiration.

With that, I want to lead us in a reflection in a few moments, where we can hold that inspiring vision and see what our next steps might be.

I'll stop here to allow us to transform what can feel like overwhelm into recognizing the power and opportunity in this moment—the urgency, the power, and the possibility of moving together into action and response. I'll be guiding us into a reflective inquiry that we'll explore in our small breakout groups.

Thank you, Kirk. What I'm hearing is a deep concern about those forces and influences that seem to operate without the kind of consciousness or care that our planet desperately needs right now. And I think this touches on something really important - how do we as practitioners work with what feels like destructive elements that seem overwhelming in their scope and intent?

One of the things I've found helpful is to remember that even when we encounter what appears to be unconscious or harmful behavior, we're still working within the realm of human consciousness. And consciousness, by its very nature, has the capacity to wake up. Sometimes what looks like sociopathic behavior is actually deep suffering that has become so defended and armored that it can't feel the interconnection that we all share.

This doesn't mean we become naive or passive in the face of destructive forces. Rather, it invites us to bring both wisdom and compassion to our response. We can work to create systems and structures that don't reward harmful behavior, while also holding the possibility that even the most defended hearts can open.

I think James touched on this earlier when he spoke about the importance of not getting lost in overwhelm, but rather channeling our energy into skillful action. When we encounter these seemingly unconscious forces, our dharma practice invites us to respond from a place of clarity rather than reactivity - to meet unconsciousness with consciousness.

Barry or James, what comes up for you in response to Kirk's concern?

One was this idea of kind of a personal practice that would be helpful is around impermanence and death, and having some kind of regular contemplation around the fact that we're going to die, our earth is going to die, that nothing's permanent, and that that reflection kind of helps us cut through a lot of the stuff that we get into a lot of difficulty with, a lot of the desires and cravings that we get into that cause a lot of environmental damage.

And the other thing that came up for me was when I heard James talking about conventional wisdom, it reminded me of this quote from Gandhi about first they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you, then you win. And it feels like in many ways we're at that fighting stage right now where the powers that be are really pushing back against environmental awareness and climate action.

So I wonder if the teachers have any reflections on how we can skillfully engage when we're in that fighting stage, and also about this practice of impermanence as it relates to environmental action.

That's a beautiful question, John. Thank you. Let me offer a reflection on both of those elements you've raised.

On the contemplation of impermanence and death—this is indeed a profound practice that can radically shift our relationship to consumption and environmental harm. When we truly internalize the reality that this body will die, that this earth as we know it will transform, that all the things we cling to are temporary, it naturally creates a letting go. It helps us see through the illusion that accumulating more will somehow give us lasting security or happiness.

This contemplation isn't morbid—it's liberating. When we're not desperately trying to hold onto what's already slipping away, we can engage more freely and compassionately with what's actually here. We can make choices based on love rather than fear, on wisdom rather than craving.

Regarding the fighting stage that Gandhi described—yes, there's definitely a sense that we're in that phase where there's tremendous pushback against environmental consciousness. The question of how to engage skillfully when there's such resistance is crucial.

I think this is where the Middle Way becomes essential. We need the fierce compassion of a protector—someone willing to stand up for what's precious and vulnerable. But we also need to maintain our inner equilibrium so we don't get caught in reactivity that actually undermines our effectiveness.

This means practicing with our own anger and fear, using them as fuel for wise action rather than letting them burn us out or turn us into the very forces we're trying to counter. It means finding ways to stay connected to joy and beauty even while facing difficult truths about environmental destruction.

Thank you, John, for that wonderful reflection.

The one thing that gives me some sense of confidence—and I think Chris and James both addressed this, as has Tanissara—is knowing that my individual actions are not mine alone. My neighbors, people in my building, people in my sangha, people elsewhere are all doing the same thing, and those things all do have an impact.

That said, and I guess I'd mostly want to hear from Chris on this: it seems to me that if somehow our actions could reach and make one tectonic shift—reaching a Koch brother or the head of ExxonMobil or whoever—these people may be deluded, but they're not unintelligent. They know full well what the impacts of their actions are. If somehow a shift can be made on that level, then one of those shifts would have a massive impact throughout.

What we can do to make that happen is what's frustrating, because it's not easy to reach people like that. While James was talking about that 10% shift in the population, there's still this frustration of seeing the destruction these companies are doing and recognizing that if they would only shift, everything else would shift.

That's a really great question. Chris, we don't have a lot of time, but I'm wondering if you can reflect on what John is proposing.

I really appreciate what you're saying, John. It seems to me that these big institutions are also vulnerable. They're vulnerable to what people—they depend on us as consumers and on what we think of them. What we need is a growing mobilization of public opinion that starts to regard these big companies the way we've come to regard tobacco companies, where we see them very differently now from twenty years ago. If we can, through our conversations and our work, help each of us shift attitudes, then this is how we can engage and influence these big, seemingly impregnable organizations.

That's fantastic. Thank you so much. We're going to begin our wrap-up now.

Thank you, Krista, and thank you to our teachers. Just take a breath, because it's just so full and so rich, this conversation, and I'm so grateful. We're also grateful for all of you participating because we know that it represents others who are not actually online but will hear the conversation and are engaged.

Much gratitude to everyone. Before we finish, I'd like to mention that we do have the Facebook group that you can access through One Earth Sangha to continue the discussion. And Barry, if you would give us a minute about Maestro, which is our host for these conversations.

I'm the call driver for today. Maestro Conference provides leading industry teleconference features like being able to let people raise their hands and create breakout groups. If you would like information about Maestro Conference, simply press 1 on your telephone keypad. Maestro will send you information about the features and benefits of their service, including a free trial.

Thank you so much. I'd like to invite you all back to our fourth conversation, which will be next Sunday at the same time, when we host Chas DiCapua, Bonnie Duran, and Vinnie Ferraro. We'll continue on Facebook as well.

Catherine, please, can I invite you to finish us today with a sharing of blessings?

What a privilege to share the blessing here. I'm really letting myself feel it right now. If you will breathe, sense your feet on the ground. Take a breath through the heart-mind, this sensitivity, this intelligent, receptive, ever-regenerative quality.

In gratitude—really in gratitude for you all and all that you bring to the table here: your practice, your love of truth, your love of justice. To all the people who have been involved in setting this up, and all the different qualities you bring—we're all so different and with such different gifts and qualities that we bring to the table—in gratitude and in blessing.

May this blessing of being in sangha, of the awake and timeless refuge, be for the welfare of the many, for all beings: to the north, to the west, to the east, to the south, above and below, without exception—those that swim, those that crawl, those that fly, those that breathe, those that are human, all of us, wherever we are right now. May all beings receive the blessings of our good intention and our continuing work together. May all beings be free from suffering.

Thank you so much. It's beautiful. Again, thank you to everyone. Goodbye for now, and see you and listen to you and share together next Sunday.

And may this blessing of being in Sangha, of the awake and timeless refuge, may this be for the welfare of the many, for all beings—to the north, to the west, to the east, to the south, above and below, without exception. Those that swim, those that crawl, those that fly, those that breathe, those that are human—all of us, wherever we are right now.

May all beings receive the blessings of our good intention and our continuing work together. May all beings be free from suffering.

Thank you so much. It's beautiful.

And again, thank you to everyone. Goodbye for now, and see you and listen to you and share together next Sunday.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 284

Mindfulness and Climate Action: Part 4

Rob Burbea · 1h05

> In this fourth installment of a series on mindfulness and climate action, three dharma teachers offer profound perspectives on responding to our environmental crisis through Buddhist practice. Bonnie Duran frames climate change as an outcome of colonization, presenting mindfulness as "neurodecolonization" that counters the three root poisons (lobha, dosa, moha) manifesting in our economic and political systems. Drawing on indigenous wisdom traditions, she emphasizes how the Eightfold Path cultivates right view of our fundamental interconnectedness. Chas DiCaprio examines patriarchal paradigms that overvalue intellect while devaluing the body, women, and nature. He connects our disconnection from our "small body" to our abuse of the "big body" of Earth, referencing the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's emphasis on mindfulness of body as foundational practice. Vinnie Ferreira guides listeners into embodied presence, exploring how to transform paralysis into skillful action while remaining rooted in our deepest nature as "sprouted earthlings." The conversation weaves together themes of belonging, revolution, and the Buddha's teaching that spiritual friendship forms the foundation of the path. Through guided reflection and community dialogue, participants explore practical questions about balancing personal needs with planetary responsibility, finding strength through collective wisdom rather than individual effort.

Welcome to everyone to our call today. Welcome back and welcome to those joining us for the first time. My name is Tanisara and I am the host for our conversation, Mindfulness, Dharma and Climate Action.

I'd like to warmly welcome our teachers. First, Bonnie Duran is a Dharma teacher at Seattle Insight Meditation Society and helped to establish the People of Color and Ally Sanghas in Seattle and Albuquerque. Bonnie is involved in Native American spiritual practices, is an associate professor in the Schools of Social Work and Public Health at UW, and director of the Center for Indigenous Health Research. So a very heartfelt warm welcome to Bonnie.

Also joining us is Chas DiCaprio, who is resident teacher at Insight Meditation Society in Barre, Massachusetts. Chas trained in meditation, primarily in the Theravada school with Burmese masters and senior Vipassana teachers and monastics from the Thai forest tradition. Chas is interested in how the basic material of our everyday lives, including relationships, can be used as a vehicle for awakening.

And a very warm welcome to Vinnie Ferreira. Vinnie has studied with several renowned spiritual teachers, including Ajahn Sumedho and the Dalai Lama, as well as spending a year at San Francisco Zen Center Hospice Program sitting with the dying. Vinnie has taught meditation to incarcerated youth and adults and is currently head trainer of the Mind-Body Awareness Project. He also teaches at the Urban Dharma Center in San Francisco.

I'm so grateful that our teachers can join us today for our conversation. I also welcome back our team: Kristen Barker from One Earth Sangha, Yong Oh from Chattanooga Insight, and Barry Bettman from Maestro Conference.

Before we begin, I'd like to encourage the offering of dana—making a contribution to help support the cost of running this program and to further the work of One Earth Sangha. If you'd like to do that, please go to the One Earth Sangha website and make a contribution, which we so deeply appreciate.

Let's take a breath together and really feel ourselves in our bodies as we breathe deeply. Arriving into our presence, into our hearts, and into our seats here, feeling the sensation of sitting, connecting with that sensation, with the ground, with the earth elements, and with the feeling of the breath in the body.

This week, Lou, the co-founder of One Earth Sangha and science advisor for our conversation, is on retreat. So I'd like to address a question asked by several of you regarding advocating a plant-based diet.

There are several dimensions to this question. First, land use for animal agriculture is one of the leading causes of greenhouse gases heating our planet. Livestock production occupies about 30% of the land surface of the Earth and accounts for 18% of CO2, 37% of methane gases—which are 20 times more potent than CO2—and 65% of nitrous oxide, which is 300 times more potent than CO2. Altogether, 7 billion humans raise 70 billion farm animals.

The single largest contributor to environmental ills is caused by modern factory farming and animal agricultural processes, which lead to deforestation—for example, an acre of rainforest is decimated every second. This leads to water scarcity—it takes 600 gallons of water to produce one hamburger. It leads to destabilization of communities that are cleared off the land to make way for agricultural farming practices, which creates hunger as grains go to animal feed rather than directly to humans. It leads to the decimation of wildlife, oceans, and the loss of species and biodiversity of plants and insects. It is also the leading cause of water pollution—in California alone, 70 million animals produce as much untreated manure as 456 million people.

On a humane and compassionate level, and in accordance with our first precept to refrain from taking life, it is an act of ethics and compassion to be aware of the horrific practices now involved in the production of meat and animal-based products. Truly, if there is a hell on earth, it is factory farming and the shipment of animals destined for the slaughterhouse, where tremendous suffering and trauma is released and processed ultimately into our bodies and atmosphere, increasing violence and disease.

As we awaken, we become acutely aware of our interconnection with all beings, which means we become more sensitive to the suffering and rights of others, including the animal kingdom, and our need to act accordingly. It is in this regard that it's important we consider reducing our reliance on animal-based products.

Today, I am deeply grateful to have our wonderful teachers with us, focusing on this theme of connection and interconnection. It's with great pleasure that I welcome Bonnie to speak with us first.

Thank you, Tanisara, and everyone who's on the call. Thank you so much for this invitation to speak today.

As a person who works in Indian country—meaning in indigenous communities—and as a Buddhist, I think both perspectives can understand the truth of climate change as a natural outcome of colonization. I want to explore that a little on this call.

One way to think about the three root poisons of greed, hatred, and delusion that the Buddha and other teachers discuss so eloquently is as a process of colonization. They colonize our hearts and minds. Greed manifests as unending craving for anything that will be permanent and provide us some sense of contentment and well-being. Hatred and delusion manifest as conceit, where we have thoughts that we're better than or worse than or the same as others, and the sense of self forever has us creating an identity for ourselves. And delusion, which in my understanding is the root of all of these, is us not understanding our interconnectedness and experiencing ourselves as separate human beings.

And in my life, I have taken the Eightfold Path and mindfulness as the medicine for these afflictions. One of my colleagues in Indian country who teaches mindfulness, Dr. Michael Yellowbird, calls mindfulness "neurodecolonization."

Next week we'll have the benefit of listening to Dr. David Loy on this call. He has a wonderful conceptualization of the three root poisons on a grander scale—that the three root poisons colonize our economic system, our political and governance system, and our knowledge development system. And it's a dualistic error to think that we don't need to work on decolonizing these levels as well.

One way that delusion manifests in a larger context is not understanding that there are more than one way of knowing things. In Indian Country, we really do believe that going back to or including indigenous ecological knowledge is one way to think about a very important, cogent, and wisdom-informed approach to climate justice. Some ecological knowledge is very similar to Western linear conceptual science, but it's also very deeply rooted in what we understand to be intuitive awareness.

We all have two knowledge systems. We have a knowledge system of intuitive awareness that—the way I talk about it—mindfulness is the data gathering system for our knowledge system of intuitive awareness, seeing things very directly beyond concepts. And then, of course, we all have our Western linear conceptual way of looking at things, which is not inherently bad, it's just inherently limited.

Greed manifests in our larger social context through our economic system that promotes unchecked accumulation as an antidote to our suffering. I'm sure none of us have ever acquired anything that gave us a sense of contentment beyond never wanting anything again. In the larger social context, hatred manifests in our polarized political system where people just can't seem to get things done, at least in the United States right now. And hatred manifests in our war industrial complex as it applies to other countries and other people.

But in my view, the Buddha Dharma is the medicine for this suffering. Mindfulness is a form of neurodecolonization. We know that when we practice, we are uprooting our intentions for greedy intentions, our aversive intentions, and our deluded intentions, and trying to replace them with the truth of how things are. It really uproots our vipallasas.

I love this teaching of the Buddha—our distortions of perception, which arise as we understand ourselves as individual selves. Our distortions of thought that come from that, where we try to accumulate as much as we can in order to situate ourselves or to bring some level of satisfaction. And then a vipallasa or distortion of view—that deeply held belief that we have that we can exploit and consume without consequences to our environment.

For me, the Eightfold Path brings us into alignment with things as they really are. One of the deepest realizations that we all are opening to is how we're not separate people. And I think climate change has absolutely proven that to be true. The Eightfold Path and mindfulness promotes our understanding of right view—that we are all interconnected and that we all are going to share the same fate.

I want to talk briefly about one manifestation of this indigenous, intuitive way of knowing. The presidents of Bolivia and Ecuador, both indigenous states, have actually changed their constitution to give rights to Pachamama or to give rights to nature. In Bolivia, the constitution now reads that nature has a right to live and to exist, to continual vital cycles and processes free from human alteration. Their constitution states that nature has the right to pure water and clean air and the right to balance and the right not to be polluted. And nature has the right to have cellular structure not modified by genetic altering. I think that's one manifestation of indigenous knowledge or intuitive awareness that humans are not at the center of the life cycle, but definitely a part of a larger approach.

I want to end my brief talk here with a quote from John Mohawk, who was one of our spiritual and political leaders. He died in 2006, but what he says here really speaks to us as beings that are deeply interconnected.

John Mohawk says, "The culture that I come from saw the universe as the fountain of everything including consciousness. In our culture, we're scolded for being so arrogant to think that we're smart. An individual is not smart according to our culture. An individual is merely lucky to be a part of a system that has intelligence that happens to reside in them. In other words, be humble about this always. The real intelligence isn't the property of an individual. The real intelligence is the property of the universe itself."

Drawing on this universal intelligence, we come to understand our deep interconnectedness and we come to understand how colonization and climate change as an outcome of that continues to disproportionately affect people in resource-poor countries and indigenous communities. Turning back to incorporating indigenous knowledge and intuitive awareness in the Eightfold Path gives us a way out of the hopefully not inevitable outcome of our unfettered use of resources and exploitation of nature.

I think that intuitive awareness is where we come to see the reality of impermanence, of things changing all the time. The reason why no conditioned experience will give us ultimate satisfaction is because things are always changing. Intuitive awareness is where we see the truth of dukkha, the fundamental unsatisfactoriness of any conditioned experience. And it's where we open to and have deep realization of our interconnected existence—not as separate beings, but as all part of an ecosystem that thrives and lives together or dies together. That too is intuitive awareness.

The Buddha said, go live in the forest as a way to open to truth. And indigenous communities have been stewards of the forest for millennia.

I really feel this movement of humility. We need to be more humble, to move out of this linear paradigm of Western knowledge and take a humble journey into the wisdom that First Nations peoples, indigenous peoples, have held about the earth and reality for millennia.

So Chas, I'd like to welcome you from Insight Meditation Society, a very venerable institution supporting the practice of mindfulness, awareness and meditation for many years. Thank you for being with us today. Would you share your thoughts on this pressing issue of entering our times of climate emergency from the place of the Dharma?

Yes, thank you, Tanisha. I must say I was taking notes frantically trying to capture all the good points Bonnie was making. I'm also seeing on my screen all the people from around the world on this call, and that itself is wonderful. Even if nothing else happens with this call, the fact that we're doing this is a huge step in the right direction.

Before I begin, I want to clarify two things. First, I'll be talking about technology, and it might seem negative, but I'm not saying technology is all negative. We're on this call because of technology. Second, I'll be speaking about masculine and feminine energies, which don't equate to male and female. They're energies within the human psyche—very powerful ones that Jung helped us understand. Much can be understood when we place that lens onto what's happening.

A few years ago, information came to me that the institution with the largest endowment in the world—the largest pile of resources that people have given to it—is Harvard University. When I heard that, I thought it makes sense, actually, because often money is energy, and we place our energy where we think it's important. So it would make sense that an institution about intellectual knowledge would receive so much energy from so many people.

This reflects the society we live in, really the world we live in as it becomes more homogenized. The intellect and technology and the esteem given to them—it's not just that they exist, which is fine—but the esteem they're given, almost the bowing down to them, gets out of hand. It gets out of balance.

Many of you may have seen the movie Koyaanisqatsi, that beautiful film with no words, just pictures. As many know, that Hopi word means "life out of balance." We can see this happening—the bowing down to technology or science. The food pyramid gets reconstructed, scientists say "eat this," and everyone in advertising runs in that direction. Then the food pyramid changes, they say "eat this," and everyone runs in that direction again. There's this sense of giving our power over to what is based in science and technology.

I even see this with the exploding research in mindfulness. They're hooking up the brain, and I wonder, why don't they hook up the heart? Why don't they put electrodes on the heart and study the heart?

So you can almost see that bias towards the brain or towards the intellect, even showing up in our arena, in our Dharma arena in terms of the research.

All this has a root. As Bonnie mentioned, the colonization absolutely plays a role. But I want to take that root even a step further back and talk about patriarchy—this dominant energy or paradigm in our world that's been going on for thousands and thousands of years.

In patriarchy, which tends to be masculine energy dominated, the intellect is held in high esteem. In the paradigm of patriarchy, the intellect is probably most valued. And then, of course, there needs to be a shadow side to that. So in the paradigm of patriarchy, the body or that which is feminine tends to be devalued.

I could spend the rest of the call talking about examples of this, but just one interesting example, especially in terms of spirituality: In many religions or in many spiritual places in the world, certainly in the past and still present some, women were not allowed in the temple during that time of the month when they were bleeding—body being seen as somehow dirty and devalued.

This is powerful, deep, insidious messaging that we all inherit, whether we know it or like it. It's just something that we inherit.

So in this paradigm of patriarchy, because that which is of the intellect and that which is masculine is dominant and revered, it's going to get a lot of energy, a lot of resources. Again, think of Harvard University. And then, in order to be that unbalanced, if something's going to be revered, something's going to have to be put down. The feminine energies are going to be put down. And those manifest in the body—often feminine energy associated with women, but again, as I mentioned, it's not exclusive—but also in the natural world.

So I want to talk about the ways that in this patriarchal paradigm, we have devalued and therefore disconnected from the body, from women, and from the natural environment. Of course, you can see the connection between those three.

Often when I teach meditation, I have to spend quite a lot of time working with students to really get folks connected to their bodies—not just the idea of their body, but really settled back into and having a very intimate connection with the body. Because of the patriarchal environment, we've really become disconnected from our body. We spend so much time in thought, so much time in the intellect. And during those times, the somatic experience of the body is completely lost. It's not present. And so we become disconnected from the body.

Then we come into this weird relationship with the body, this thing that we've gotten disconnected with. On one hand, we either spend too much time kind of paying attention to it, almost revering it too much—you can see that in hyper getting in shape and working out and how one looks, that end of the spectrum. And on the other end of the spectrum is just the abuse of the body and not taking care of it.

I want to point out a correlation with the natural world. One of the points I want to make here is the connection between how we relate to our own bodies and how we relate to the natural world. So again, with the natural world, we may have this view of "oh it's so beautiful, it's so wonderful," and we want to make parks and national parks, and there's a part of us that knows just how exquisite it is. And yet, as with the body, we also abuse it. We heavily abuse it. So as goes the body, as goes the natural world. What we are disconnected from becomes much easier to harm.

If we are standing next to another human being and we are upset with them, it's much more difficult to be really mean to them than it is when we're in our car and someone cuts us off and there's space and steel and glass between them. The level of violence that can come out of us given that lack of connection—what we're not connected to becomes much easier to harm.

When I'm using body and nature as two different words, sometimes I like to say small body, big body. We become disconnected from body. And therefore, based on everything that Bonnie was talking about, based on what we know about greed, hatred, and delusion, those three defilements then run rampant based on that disconnection.

One of the reasons I said if nothing else happens with this call, it would be a good thing, is because part of addressing climate change is about us connecting, about us coming together. And just by being together in this call, on one level, we're in relationship.

But we have to start—all our dharma practice starts with ourselves. And then we take it into the wider world. So starting with ourselves and starting with connecting with our bodies is just so key.

In the Satipatthana Sutta, the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, the Buddha talks about mindfulness of body, which is the first foundation. And if you look at that sutta and the number of pages that it takes up, the section on the body takes up more space and the Buddha has more words to say about it than any of the other three foundations of mindfulness. So this connecting with the body, being mindful of it, is just totally essential. And it's a coming home that we really need to come back to.

If we can do that, or as we do that, it's a natural connection. It's not like we have to do anything. The more we are connected to body, the more we are connected to body—to small body, to big body.

That's beautiful. Chas, thank you so much. And thank you for bringing and weaving in from Bonnie her wisdom on this issue of the overarching connection with patriarchy and its impact so deeply for all of us—whatever gender or outside the gender binary—and bringing it back to a place where we can begin with our own bodies. Thank you so much.

Just taking a breath and receiving and drinking in those words from Chas that I personally feel very moved to hear and nourished by.

I'm also very glad that we have Vinny with us on our call today. Vinny is a very dear friend and practitioner who goes to the difficult places to practice and share the Dharma like a great Bodhisattva. So Vinny, thank you so much for being with us. We really welcome and appreciate you and invite you to share your thoughts.

Thank you so much. Thanks for the invitation and setting this whole thing up. It seems like a really necessary conversation, and so much has been offered already.

When I started thinking about this conversation and this theme of interdependence, I was brought back to the Buddha and what he talked about around spiritual friends—that they were the foundation of the spiritual path. He knew that our connection lies at the very core of the human psyche.

So what is this journey that Chas and Bonnie were both speaking about? This journey back to belonging, from this disembodiment to the truth of our interdependence. I experience it as slowly waking up out of a trance. How do we wake up to the truth that we're living in an interconnected field?

When we look at the response of the Earth to everything that's been happening, you could say it's a lawful response to the stress that we've put on this planet. But I want to bring it back down to a really personal level. How do we rest in this field of interconnectedness when ninety percent of our time is spent indoors? How can we love something that we're removed from or that we even ignore? This is this feeling of disembodiment—I'm not connected to me, so how can I be connected to you or anything else?

I like what Chas was saying about how the practice has been readying us for this conversation. We know how to do this. So how do we get back in touch with this belonging?

The first place I go personally in my practice is: how is this just some kind of funhouse of mirrors? How can I see this in myself, what Bonnie was talking about around greed, hatred, and delusion? How do I see these energies in me? How do I see myself as hooked on growth and progress—just one more workshop, just one more thing, and then I'll be okay? This need to improve and progress. How do we see that mirrored in the acceleration of culture, where everything needs to be better and faster and stronger?

It can be an overwhelming time for a lot of us, caught in our own survival beliefs that I'm not enough or I need more—this kind of addiction mentality. It's easy to be almost paralyzed into no response. I see that in myself. I know that I can get so busy setting up a good base camp that I never get around to climbing the mountain because I don't know where to begin. It all seems so big.

I know we all cherish this principle of non-harming, but how do we turn that into action? How do we move from belief to action? How do we discern the difference between the acceptance that we've been practicing and activism?

The words of E.B. White come to mind as he talks about: "I arise in the morning torn between a desire to save the world and a desire to savor it. This makes it hard to plan the day."

I think this is where I'd like to put our attention. Is there a place on this path for revolution? And was the Buddha really a revolutionary? What he laid out was really revolutionary at that time, for sure. Even 2,600 years later, it seems like it's a pretty revolutionary path, as we say, against the stream.

I want to read a little bit from a teacher that has taught many of us about reconnecting.

This makes it hard to plan the day. I think this is where I'd like to put our attention. Is there a place on this path for revolution? Was the Buddha really a revolutionary? What he laid out was truly revolutionary at that time, and even 2,600 years later, it seems like a pretty revolutionary path—as we say, against the stream.

I want to read a paragraph from a teacher who has taught many of us about reconnecting—Joanna Macy. She writes:

"When we include the natural world in our identity, we're brought into a much larger story of who we are and what we are. Recognizing ourselves as part of the living body of the earth opens us to a greater source of strength. The expression 'at your age' takes on a different meaning when we see ourselves as part of an amazing flow of life that started on this planet more than 3.5 billion years ago. We come from an unbroken lineage that has survived through five mass extinctions. People fear that if they let despair in, they'll be paralyzed because they're just one person. Paradoxically, by allowing ourselves to feel our pain for the world, we open ourselves up to the web of life and realize that we're not alone."

Knowing that the voice we most need to hear comes from within us, I want to invite everybody to sit back for a few minutes and go inside. I'll guide it a little. This is what we've been practicing—how to go inside and listen. This willingness to turn toward and to stay present.

We begin by feeling the sincerity of our intention and sensing the flavor of caring. How do we stay in the conversation if it feels overwhelming and difficult and uncomfortable—in this cloud of unknowing, this place of no answers? We're really sitting in the questions and connecting to this deepest, wisest part of you.

Connecting down into the body of the earth like the Buddha plunging his hand into the earth, we allow our awareness to descend. We're literally made up of earth—we're sprouted earthlings. John Seed writes, "I try to remember that it's not me trying to protect the rainforest. Rather, I am part of the rainforest protecting itself. I am the part of the rainforest recently emerged into human thinking."

So we connect to this deep intention to listen to whatever's alive. We share this connection to Mother Earth with all beings, all a part of her. When we reconnect to this greater intelligence than our own, we realize we have the ability to give voice to her struggles. We come home to our deepest nature because the enormity of the task forces us into a collective response.

Each of us is a community. Each one of our bodies is a community of seventy trillion cells that work together—talk about an ecosystem. In a millisecond, our body processes ten times more operations than there are stars in the universe. That's us. So we're already working together. Whether we know it or not, we can draw strength from this earth, from the planet, and from nature.

Buddhadāsa Bhikkhu puts it: "What we are doing with this practice is giving back to nature that which we mistakenly appropriated as our own."

We know we didn't make this journey alone. We're all standing on a lot of shoulders. It's just something to acknowledge.

I'll end with the words of Rumi: "We began as a mineral. We emerged into plant life and into the animal state, and then into being human. And always we have forgotten our former states, except in early spring when we slightly recall being green again. Humankind is being led along an evolving course through this migration of intelligences. And though we seem to be sleeping, there is an inner wakefulness that directs the dream and that will eventually startle us back to the truth of who we are."

Maybe finally just ending with a deep, low bow to whatever it is that you come into contact with when you go inside and listen. Inward and outward.

I appreciate your time and attention. Thank you.

"Thank you so much, Vinny. I think when I go inside right now, I feel like I want to cry. The combination—I feel like that through all of these calls after each teacher speaks."

Thank you so much for those beautiful words of gratitude, Alex. It really speaks to the power of sangha and how connection can transform our sense of isolation around these challenging times we're facing.

The poignancy of what you shared about feeling alone in this work, and then discovering that we're not alone at all—that there are people all over the world who share these same concerns, these same hopes, these same commitments to responding with love to what's happening on our planet. That's really the medicine that sangha offers us.

And I appreciate what you said about working with whatever material we have at hand. Whether it's the frustration, the anxiety, the anger, or even our attachments to particular outcomes—all of this becomes part of our practice, part of our path of awakening. We don't have to wait until we feel differently or until we've resolved all our inner conflicts before we can be of service. We can work with exactly what's present right now.

Let's continue with our sharing. Who else would like to offer something to our global circle? Remember, you can press one on your phone if you'd like to speak.

I think what's emerging so beautifully in this conversation is this recognition that none of us has to carry this alone. Whether we're in San Francisco or Norway or anywhere else in the world, we're part of something much larger than our individual efforts. And that belonging, that sense of being held by something greater, is itself a revolutionary act in a world that often feels fragmented and disconnected.

This is exactly what the Buddha was pointing to when he established the sangha as one of the three jewels. The community of practitioners, the web of relationships committed to awakening and service—this isn't just nice to have, it's essential. It's medicine for the isolation and despair that can arise when we face the magnitude of what needs healing in our world.

Well, I'll just say to you, Alex, thank you for contributing your energy. You're a part of this too, and your gift to others in being present for all of us. So, you know, right back at you.

How about Siobhan? Siobhan Quintero, you're on. We can hear you.

So I think this is for Vinnie or for Chaz. I know for myself, I'm in the midst of creating a business for myself. And I feel a lot of tension between building a business and trying to create a living. I feel stuck when I say successful and then feeling the tension with that in contrast or coupled with this bigger undertaking. It feels to me like the place to start is just to feel where I'm at, but I would really, really love to hear some thoughts from the teachers.

I'm happy to talk with you. I'd just like to understand the question a bit more. Can you say a bit more of exactly what you'd like to explore?

Sure, yeah. So this place of tension between personal advancement, so to speak—like making a living, trying to be successful beyond just paying bills—and also at the same time trying to... like I feel stuck. It's like, well, should I not be doing that because I should just be trying to dedicate all my time and attention to this crisis? And yet that's not realistic. I've got to pay bills. So if you could just speak to the struggle between personal accomplishment, achievement, need, and this greater reality that we seem to be in. Is that helpful?

Yeah, totally. That helps me understand the distinctions you're making here.

Yeah, I think we do have a personal responsibility to our own sustenance, you know. It's almost like when the Buddha was close to enlightenment, and Mara visits yet again saying, "Look, you're going to die, man. This is not going to help anybody. You can actually do some help if you just make this kind of agreement with me." And he comes poised as almost disguised as compassionate. So it's like, we do have to take care of ourselves in order to do any kind of good work. That was the truth of that message in that moment.

So I do believe in being able to sustain ourselves so we can actually stay in the exploration and continue to do our work in the world in whatever way that manifests, right? So what kind of work are you thinking about doing or what kind of work do you do?

Sure. I have what I'm trying to build as a high-end in-home professional pet sitting business. So it's, yeah, it's that part of personal advancement. And of course—well, I shouldn't say of course—for me, a bigger vision of it is wanting to do well financially so that I can give more time and energy and have more visibility in my community to really give to the causes that I care about a lot more and to speak to those causes. And yet I still wonder about my own greed and myself, my concern and the seduction of how I appear to others or... I don't know, I mean, there's just a lot wrapped up in it, I guess.

Yeah, yeah, I totally hear that. I mean, I talked a little bit about where this line lands in us between acceptance of what is and activism, right? So I think that kind of line runs through each one of us where it's like, okay, how do I most advance this conversation, not only within myself, but how am I part of a larger whole?

And I really do feel like we get our answers when we sit down and listen deeply to our own voice. That's what I wanted to contribute to the conversation after Bonnie and Chaz laid out the landscape so well. I felt like, okay, the only thing that's left for me is to try to bring people back to their bodies and see that these are really where our answers come from—the voice within.

So I think we're all in this balancing act of how much are we building the world and how much are we tending to this inner life. I don't know what to say beyond that. This balancing act is super normal for all of us. And it seems like if you keep connecting to this intention that you have—this beautiful intention to even speak up or be on this call or trying to balance these two energies—I feel like you're in good hands. Does that make sense, Siobhan?

That was perfect. That was great. Thank you.

Thank you.

Okay, well, thank you so much for the participation from everyone. We have to move into wrapping up our conversation today.

I want to extend my heartfelt gratitude to each of the teachers for their profound contributions today. I know that all the teachers who participate in our course spend considerable time in deep dialogue together, going deeply into their own practice and inner processes so that they can offer these illuminating glimpses of empowered and deeply embodied communication. I hope these exchanges will inspire us toward our own meaningful conversations and further inquiry and exploration. This isn't simply about receiving ready-made answers, but about each of us claiming our power to engage authentically and explore these vital territories ourselves.

Next week brings our final conversation in this series, and we're deeply excited to welcome Bhikkhu Bodhi, Ayya Santussika Bhikkhuni, Ayya Santacitta Bhikkhuni, and Dr. David Loy, who will guide us in bringing all of these teachings into concrete action. Please note that there's a time change occurring in the USA and perhaps other regions as well, so do check your local listings.

Beyond the conclusion of this series, Werner will be hosting ongoing gatherings, so this is not an ending but rather the beginning of our continued engagement together. Please join us next week for this culminating conversation.

To bring our beautiful and profound dialogue to a close, I invite Bonnie to share blessings with us all in a deeply prayerful way.

Coming back into our bodies, as Chaz and Vinny so beautifully outlined, let us rest in this present moment. The Mangala Sutta teaches us that regardless of how we experienced this hour and a half together, it is conducive of blessings. Let us gather all of these blessings—all the positive energies of practicing the Dharma together—and offer this merit to all our relatives in every direction.

May the positive energies of our practice be dedicated to the happiness, well-being, and awakening of all our relatives: the two-legged, the four-legged, all our winged relatives, the finned ones, and even the creepy crawlers. May they all benefit from our practice.

I offer special mention of all our animal relatives who suffer so tremendously. As Thanissara shared earlier, they are treated so despicably by various industries. May we open our hearts to their suffering and find ways to alleviate it.

We dedicate this merit to all our relatives, both close and distant, throwing no one out of our hearts—even those we might blame or find difficult. Understanding that the root of their greed, hatred, and delusion is our own greed, hatred, and delusion, we extend this dedication to them as well. May they open to the reality of things as they are.

Aho.

Let me also acknowledge Maestro Conference, which has generously supported our conversation today. Maestro Conference provides the advanced teleconference features that enable gatherings like ours. If you'd like to learn more about their services, simply press 1 on your telephone keypad, and they'll send you information about their features and benefits, including a free trial period.

And so we close with deep gratitude—to our teachers, to our team, and to each participant. May we carry everything we've listened to, everything we've sat with, everything we've practiced with today into our hearts, our bodies, our lives, and into the world around us for the benefit of all beings.

Thank you so very much. We'll see you next week.

CHAPTER 285

Mindfulness and Climate Action: 5

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> This concluding session of the Mindfulness, Dharma and Climate Action series addresses the crucial question: How do we transform contemplation into effective action? David Loy opens by challenging traditional Buddhist approaches that either seek transcendence from the world or merely psychological adjustment to it, proposing instead that awakening requires reconstructing our dualistic relationship with reality. He emphasizes the bodhisattva path as Buddhism's most vital contribution to climate work - the integration of wisdom practice with compassionate engagement in the world's suffering.
>
> Ayya Santussikā outlines practical steps for building a Buddhist climate movement, calling for organized resistance to corporate and governmental moral failures through coordinated action, divestment campaigns, and political engagement. She announces plans for a national Buddhist network to mobilize communities around climate legislation and local environmental justice issues. Ayya Santacitta reinforces this call to action, emphasizing that we are both the first generation experiencing climate change and the last able to address it meaningfully.
>
> The discussion weaves together the five precepts, particularly non-harming and not taking what isn't given, with contemporary climate ethics. Drawing on the Buddha's earth-touching mudrā and the fearlessness gesture, the teachers present climate action as authentic dharma practice rather than worldly distraction. This represents a powerful synthesis of contemplative depth with urgent environmental advocacy, offering both spiritual practitioners and climate activists a framework for sustained, joyful engagement with our planetary crisis.

Welcome everyone who has joined us for the call this morning. This is the last call for our series on Mindfulness, Dharma and Climate Action. It's the last call of the series but not the last way that we can gather around this really pressing subject.

I'm so glad you can join us today and I'm also very glad to welcome our teachers who will be presenting today. Unfortunately, Bhikkhu Bodhi messaged us this morning and said that he was so looking forward to joining us and giving some input, but unfortunately, due to health considerations, he's unable to join us. I really recommend that each of us explore the work that Bhikkhu Bodhi has done as a leader for all of us in climate action and bringing our attention to the emergency of our situation.

I'm very glad that we have David Loy and Aya Santajita and Aya Santusica joining us on the call to give some guidance and input, and also to our team, Lou and Kristen from One Earth Sangha, Yong and Barry. Without further ado, I would like to hand over to you Lou to begin our call. Our focus today is what can we actually do? How can we turn all of these conversations that we've had, all these considerations into action? So, Lou.

Thank you, Tanisra. Hello, everyone. Such a wonderful topic to wrap up this series on.

Climate change really is such a big problem that sometimes it feels that we can't make a difference. In fact, social scientists tell us that this sense of hopelessness is one of the top reasons why people don't act at all. But as our conversation last week reminded us, we aren't just our small selves in this. We're part of this larger body that's acting. And together we absolutely can make a difference in so many different ways on this issue.

I can tell you from where I sit, change is happening and we are making a difference. The background paper that we shared for this series includes on pages five and six and in the appendix some of the many ways that you can get involved, that people can get involved. I want to mention two quickly without judging them to be better than the others, but just as examples of the change that's happening and different ways to get involved.

The first is to really name a revolution that's happening right now in our electric power generating systems around the world. As you probably know, the generation of electric power is the number one producer of CO2 pollution in the world, but right now there's a revolution going on in that system and it's driven to a great degree by a revolution in solar power. As you might know, there's been a sixty percent reduction in the cost of solar panels over the last five years and a ninety-nine percent reduction in those costs since 1977.

What studies show is that if as few as five percent of households in many utility systems in, for example, North America and Europe were to switch to solar panels on their roofs, this would create a tipping point that could change our entire utility systems towards renewable energy. The background paper has more details about how going solar can be accomplished, especially with a focus on North America and Europe, but with resources for other areas, including ways that individuals can join together to make this change happen through bulk purchases of solar systems that can bring costs down even further, like going to Costco to buy solar panels with your neighbors.

So solar is a place where every individual action really adds up and it's a place where there are tipping points that are right around the corner.

The second area that I wanted to mention quickly is political action, which is absolutely critical and sometimes can be discouraging because our political systems don't always seem up to the challenge. But we can't ignore the opportunities that arise within those systems to make change around climate. The last month's People's Climate March began a road that leads to Paris in December of 2015, where countries will negotiate a new international climate agreement.

There's a key stop on that road to Paris that I want to make everyone aware of, and that is the deadline of next March, 2015, when countries have to put new national carbon pollution cuts on the table, all countries of the world, ahead of Paris. This is a key moment. No matter where you live right now, in your country, the government is developing a new national target for reducing climate pollution. So I encourage you to find out what that process is like in your country and make your voice heard.

In the U.S., you can add your name to a petition to President Obama to put a strong target on the table for the United States. You can call your members of Congress to say we want a strong outcome in Paris. But most of all, as you think about getting involved, find a way to do so that speaks most to you. By doing even a little, studies show that people gain confidence and they do more on this issue. Remember that you aren't alone. Whatever way you choose to contribute really does matter and is helping us get to the change that we need.

I'm really excited for the panel that we have today. I want to turn things over to David Loy to get us started.

Thank you, Lou, and thank you to Tanisra. I'm really very happy to be a part of this conversation. I really appreciate the invitation and the opportunity.

Listening to the conversations that have happened so far, a number of things have come to mind for me, and one of them in particular that I think I need to begin with is to look at the fact that I think one of the things we're called upon to do now is actually to reexamine our own tradition. What I mean by that is it's not only an issue of what Buddhism might be able to do to help us understand and respond to the climate crisis, but also I think the climate crisis also encourages us, in fact, challenges us to look at our own tradition and what it is within it, certain ambiguities there that I think sometimes haven't encouraged us to take this kind of step.

What am I getting at here?

I've been trying to discuss climate and ecological issues for a number of years, alongside broader social concerns. Frankly, until quite recently, there's been considerable frustration with the often indifferent and sometimes even resistant response within certain parts of the Buddhist community.

For example, about five and a half years ago, John Stanley and I co-edited a book called The Buddhist Response to the Climate Emergency, and frankly, the response was rather a thunder of silence. I've been struck by this. Why hasn't there been a more progressive response on the part of Buddhists generally?

Thinking about it, looking into it, I could see some ambiguity within the foundation of our tradition that I think we really need to address. When you look at some of the earlier Asian traditions with their emphasis upon transcending this world—understanding the goal of nirvana as not being reborn, for instance—insofar as that becomes the goal, it's sometimes understood as encouraging a kind of indifference to this world.

This world of samsara is sometimes devalued as the place of not only suffering but craving and delusion. Often the response of Buddhists has not been to want to engage with it but to try to transcend it, to try to escape it, to try to check out of it. That can be very problematical when we're in a situation such as we are now, where clearly we do need to engage.

I'm not so sure that this is the primary perspective we find in Western or Westernizing Buddhism. But there is a kind of opposite response that isn't always more helpful. As Buddhism has come to the West, there's been this really interesting and generally very fruitful interaction with Western psychology, especially psychotherapy. As I said, I think there are a lot of very wonderful, important things that have come out of that.

But one of the implications that has sometimes gone along with it is the sense that my problems are in my head—they have to do with my own mental and emotional life. If I simply work on that level, then the basic problems of my life will be solved. In other words, this too doesn't necessarily encourage engagement with society.

If the more traditional approach is to understand this world as samsara, something that you want to transcend, a more psychological approach can encourage us to see the solution as simply engaging with our own minds. As a result of that work, when everything will be okay, we will harmonize or fit into the world better. The danger is that both of those discourage the kind of engagement with the world that we really need now.

What I'm saying here is that I think we really need to clarify the nature of awakening and acknowledge that the fundamental issue isn't so much about escaping this world or fitting into it, but rather realizing how much our experience of the world is due to the way that we construct it—due to our delusions, due to our cravings. We have this particular dualistic understanding that makes us feel separate from the world. In a way, that's the challenge: we need to overcome this sense of separation.

Insofar as Buddhist practice can encourage us to simply try to transcend the world, it can actually encourage us to move in the wrong direction. If we realize that our own personal problem is this dualistic relationship with the world—the sense that I'm inside my head in some way and the rest of the world is out there—insofar as I need to deconstruct and reconstruct that way of experiencing the world, the same thing is true collectively. The same thing is true socially.

The dukkha that we're talking about with climate change and the ecological crisis generally—and indeed a number of social and economic problems—it's not just something individual. It's something that is institutionalized, and it requires us to clarify and develop the Buddhist tradition in this way in order to really successfully address those concerns.

So that's my first comment and concern: this need to clarify exactly what it is that we're doing when we're doing Buddhist practice. Are we trying to transcend the world? Are we trying to just fit into it? Or do we realize that we really need to reconstruct the way we experience it and experience ourselves?

Moving on from there, it seems to me that within the Buddhist tradition, we have an archetype that speaks exactly to that. In fact, sometimes I wonder if this might actually be the most important thing that Buddhism has to offer, to contribute to the kind of situation we are in now. Here I'm referring to something that Jack Kornfield mentioned in the first conversation, but I think we can say a bit more about it. I'm referring to the bodhisattva path.

If one looks at the history of the Buddhist tradition, the bodhisattva path has sometimes been understood in a kind of sectarian way as part of the Mahayana critique of Theravada. But I really think we need to rise above that and realize that it's rather providing us with a particular orientation that can really help us address the kinds of situations that we find ourselves in now ecologically.

What is so special about the bodhisattva, of course, is that he or she has a double practice. That is to say, they're not only continuing their own meditations or whatever their contemplative practices may be, but they're also out there engaged in the world.

Traditionally, this has often been understood as helping other people wake up. But I think we can see now how the situation we're in is really calling upon us to find ways to address the kind of problems that we're looking at here, especially climate change.

Just a moment ago I mentioned that this is a double path, but it really seems to me that it's not a double path. It's actually two sides of the same path.

In the vast landscape of awakening, we find that beginning to wake up—to let go of ourselves, as we say in Zen, to forget ourselves and open up to the realization that we are not separate from the world—does not automatically eliminate our basic self-centered tendencies. These patterns remain within us, requiring careful attention and skillful engagement.

This is precisely where bodhisattva activity becomes essential. If waking up means realizing our fundamental non-separation from others, then how do we learn to live in ways that actually embody this understanding? This is the heart of the bodhisattva path.

Nisargadatta expressed this beautifully when he said, "When I look inside and see that I am nothing, that's wisdom. When I look outside and see that I am everything, that's love. Between these two, my life turns." Here we find the two pillars of the Buddha's practice: wisdom and compassion. The compassion of the bodhisattva working in the world to create positive change is simply the actualization of the growing wisdom that we are not truly separate from it.

There is something particularly profound about the bodhisattva that deserves emphasis. In my Zen tradition, we recite daily the four Bodhisattva vows, the first being: "Sentient beings are numberless, I vow to save them all." This vow calls for liberation from dukkha for all beings—a project so vast that one could never expect to fulfill it completely. Yet this impossibility is precisely the point. The vow calls for a fundamental reorientation of our entire stance toward existence. Instead of asking, "What can I get from this situation?" we learn to ask, "What can I do to make this situation better?"

This reorientation becomes essential when facing the overwhelming magnitude of our current challenges and the strength of forces resisting necessary transformation. The bodhisattva, having taken such a vow, will not be overawed by the scale of the problem. The nature of the challenge calls us to do our very best without knowing whether our actions make any difference whatsoever—a profound test of faith and commitment.

What makes this possible is the bodhisattva's integrated practice. Through meditation, we touch that place of equanimity, or as we say in Zen, emptiness—the place where there is nothing to gain and nothing to lose. Even when bodhisattva activities bring incredible frustration, we can return to this place of equanimity and be recharged.

This combination seems crucial for our time. For activists, it offers protection from the burnout that comes from getting caught in anger and frustration when hoped-for results don't materialize as expected. The meditation practice provides a way to recharge our batteries. But it works both ways—the bodhisattva knows it is not enough to simply find stillness, equanimity, or emptiness and dwell there. We are called to emerge from that place and engage fully with the world of form, the world of dukkha, the world where suffering requires our active response.

As we pause here to reflect on this beautiful balance—Nisargadatta's wisdom of compassionate response in the world informed by deep wisdom, that unified place we reach through both inner reflection and outer action—we can appreciate how the bodhisattva template challenges us to rework and understand anew our relationship to Buddhism and the dharma.

Building upon these foundations, we must consider what concrete actions this bodhisattva presence can take in our world. We need to examine how we can build what might be called a Buddhist movement—not from a desire to gather for its own sake, but because our leadership has lost its moral compass.

At the corporate level, if executives and shareholders were truly committed to ethical conduct, they would never hide the harmful effects of their products. The tobacco industry wouldn't have spread disinformation about health impacts—they would have said, "We don't want to harm anyone," and removed dangerous products from shelves. This is the ethical stance our world desperately needs: business that refuses to engage in lying, stealing, or killing, but instead takes responsibility for actions that are wholesome and beneficial to the earth, the biosphere, and human populations.

The question becomes: who ensures that business acts ethically? Rather than speaking of corporations as though they were autonomous decision-making entities with inherent power, we must recognize the human responsibility within these structures.

It's the people who are running the corporations that make decisions and take action. I want to be clear about this—I think we need to remember that every decision we make creates karma. If we really understand karma and take that in, then we don't want to have any investments in fossil fuels. We don't want to be encouraging the use of fossil fuels. We want to try as quickly as we can to move away from them, even though we still have to use them at the moment because we don't have sufficient alternatives. We want to create those alternatives as rapidly as possible.

But really, what we all want is governments that protect the people rather than exploit the people—government that keeps business in check when they've lost their moral compass. But now it seems our government leadership has also lost its moral compass. So when that happens, any time throughout human history, the people need to get together and make their voices heard. We need to rise up. We need to talk about this openly and band together. When thousands of people, hundreds of thousands of people, millions of people come out and say we want to protect people, animals, life, the biosphere—we want ethical leadership—then people start to pay attention and things begin to change.

Right now, we're dealing with an enormous amount of unclear information. There was an elder woman the other day who said, "Well, our government's doing everything it can to prevent climate change." And of course, it's not—not at all. If we were doing everything we could, then there would be a ban on extreme extraction methods, there would be a ban on further fossil fuel exploration. There would be a high tax on carbon emissions. We wouldn't be worried about what the governments would come together and do in Paris in 2015. We would be sure that there would be a binding, effective treaty. But that's not the case, and that's why we have to get involved.

So one of the ways that we can get involved that I'm excited about and interested in is coming out of our experience in organizing for the People's Climate March. A number of us were involved in the People of Faith organizing for the People's Climate March. We had weekly conference calls on a national level about what we were doing in our local areas and what we were doing in each of our faith communities. It was inspiring to hear that there were forty mosques that were going to be represented at the People's Climate March, and it made me feel like, wow, the Buddhists—we really need to start to reach out to each other, get involved, make sure we get to the march and make our voices heard, our presence known, our wishes clear.

Those groups that were working during the People's Climate March are still continuing because we know there's still much more that we can do and need to do. One of the things that we're going to put into action soon—and we're beginning discussions about how to do it—is a Buddhist team on the national level that has periodic conversations, conference call conversations, where we check in and discuss what's happening in different areas. This can be done in the United States, but it can also be done anywhere. The same model. Have a national conversation among the Buddhists. It doesn't have to be limited to the Buddhists—anybody can hang out with us. But to really try to reach out to different Buddhist groups. There are many, many different Buddhist groups that have never connected to each other.

Right now we have a thriving group in the New York City area. People from different sanghas came together to work to host the People's Climate March, and they're continuing their work. So they're intending to have a representative call into this national team on a regular basis and report what they're doing locally. We want to have those same kinds of groups in Portland, Seattle, San Francisco Bay Area, Dallas, and anywhere else in the country and anywhere else in the world to talk about what it is that we're doing on our local levels and organize the local Buddhist sanghas.

This is really a powerful way to connect. It's a powerful way to inspire each other. It's an excellent way to share information and to be ready for mass mobilization when it's needed—like the People's Climate March, like what we want to do to really make sure that the climate treaty in Paris in 2015 is solid, effective, and more than sufficient to put a stall on climate change.

So the intention behind this gathering together and really making our best efforts in all different kinds of areas, depending on what is needed in various districts... For example, in California, there are efforts to try to convince Governor Jerry Brown to put a moratorium on fracking. There are efforts to resist the transportation of the tar sands oil into Richmond, California to be processed, and other like efforts—trying to get the University of California to divest from fossil fuels. All of these efforts can be joined by coming together as Buddhists and getting involved.

So if you're interested in participating in this, I would invite you to send me an email to santussika—that's S-A-N-T-U-S-S-I-K-A—at gmail.com. In the subject line, put "Buddhist action" and then we'll add you to a mailing list and get you involved. We can help each other with outreach, and we'll be connecting with the larger movement through the people of faith, connecting with what's happening with other faith-based groups and also with the general activists.

We still have a webpage on the People's Climate March hub, and we are now going to have a Buddhist page on the hub for Our Voices. This is an effort coming through Green Faith, which was organizing the people of faith for the People's Climate March.

Our Voices is an organizing group with the goal for millions of people of faith and moral belief to sign on and pray in their own tradition for the Paris 2015 UN Climate Summit to succeed where all past talks have failed. By signing on, we are expressing our love and concern for all our children, for vulnerable people, and our precious planet.

So this effort is focused on three things: spreading awareness of what spiritual groups are doing, helping spiritual groups with their own call to action and outreach, and organizing days of prayer and action. One that's coming up is a vigil on December 7th, using solar lamps instead of candles. That's called the Light for Lima. It'll be in the midst of the conference in Lima.

When many, many people take an action like this, then the people who are in those negotiations are encouraged, inspired, and pressured. That's what we need to really try to stand up to the pressure of the billions of dollars that are behind the industries that are furthering the destruction and leading us into disaster and catastrophe.

Abraham Lincoln, in his Gettysburg Address, talked about a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. But we don't have that anymore. We have a government of the billionaires, by the billionaires, and for the billionaires. This is what we need to stand up to. And we do that from a place of practice and depth and the bodhisattva vow. And we do it from a place of connection, connecting together. And it's joyful. It's a happy thing to do.

So I want to encourage everyone in America to get out and vote on Tuesday. Make sure we're voting for people who are going to really actually take action on climate. Put pressure on the ones who are on the fence. And put pressure on the ones who have denied it. I want to encourage everyone to participate in talking with everybody you know about getting involved. There's a great tool called the Pledge to Mobilize that you can look for at www.climatemobilization.com and see if that fits as a support for how to talk to each other.

We are the first generation to feel the effects of climate change, and we're the last generation that's going to be able to do anything about it. This is so imperative. We can bring all of our love and our joy. Coming together is a happy experience. And making a difference to do the right thing and encourage our brothers and sisters everywhere to do the right thing is the best we can do.

Thank you so much, Ayya. Beautiful. And I also just want to add that in the movement of the people of faith and our Buddhist engagement with that and contribution to that, we've also been hooking up with AVAS and 350.org and Idle No More, First Nation

Indigenous Movement, so that we can bring the faith voice to inform and connect with and collaborate with the activists on the front lines. So more about this later. As I said at the beginning of the call, this is an ongoing process of gathering our energy and forces together and our focus.

So thank you so much, Ayya Santussika, for such clarity. Ayya Santacita, who is also a dear friend and great practitioner over so many years, and also involved in the People's Climate March, People's Climate Train—this is a discussion we've been having together. So I'd also like to invite you to bring your words into this forum for us today. And thank you again, Ayya, so much for being with us today.

Thank you so much for the opportunity to speak today with all of you. I just want to invite us to just take a moment and connect with ourselves and also with how it feels when we hear all of this information coming to us from a Buddhist nun who is so very clearly outspoken about the fact that we need to act on what is happening.

We can no longer just be with our own experience and stop there. We really need to see what holds us back from wholeheartedly engaging in the conversation and wholeheartedly engaging in stepping out into the world and making a difference. However, wherever we are, we have to just start where we are. And if we are feeling a sense of threat, a sense of despair, a sense of confusion, resistance, not really wanting to step out, then we have to start with that.

But it's really important that we do start and that we see that the whole world is holding up a very big mirror for us, wanting to wake us up to the fact that the way we are living is no longer sustainable. Our worldview we have been living in for a long time now is clearly not working any longer. And our worldview, which is in many, many ways based on fossil fuels—we are dressing ourselves in fossil fuels, we are eating fossil fuels.

We are living inside of fossil fuels. We are transporting ourselves with fossil fuels. They are woven into all corners of our lives, everywhere we turn.

And yet we also know that if we want to stay within the so-called safe limit of two degrees of warming, we can burn only another 550 gigatons of fossil fuel. Our industries have identified about 2,800 gigatons of fossil fuel reserves—about five times as much as we can burn if we don't want to exceed those two degrees of warming.

The situation is very dire, and we need to organize ourselves to pressure our government officials to make clear limits, clear commitments, and strong decisions. We don't have much time left, and we have the opportunity to decide whether this passage into a new way of living will be difficult, very difficult, or impossible. We can no longer take this lightly because we have already gone much too far. We really need to wake up to the fact that if we don't take action, it will be impossible for civilization as we know it to continue. It simply will not be possible.

To take in that truth—all of the suffering and strife, the horror of imagining such a reality—is difficult. But I think it is necessary that we open our minds to the fact that if we do not act, this is what will happen, because it will not change by itself.

I like to think about contemplating the old age, sickness, and death of a worldview that no longer serves us and that truly needs to change. We need to speak about it. We need to demand action from our politicians and support those politicians who are willing to make change. We need to be very clear about this, and for that, we need to work together.

I feel very inspired by what Ayya Santacitta mentioned about this national network, where we can support each other, inform each other, and learn what we can do. Even right now, you might not know exactly what to do, but as soon as you step out and meet with others, you will hear what they are doing. You can join in and grow together.

In order to make this process possible, we need a framework of teaching, and the Buddha has left us with a very strong framework, starting with the five precepts, especially the first two. They are completely relevant to the question of climate change—it's all about harmlessness and not taking what is not given freely. This connects directly with how our systems are treating the planet. We are completely out of touch with what is needed. We are destroying our biosphere, and we have known this for quite some time.

It's heartening to hear that more and more people are willing to speak up about it. This call is such an encouragement—to see that Buddhists are stepping out and wanting to organize themselves to make their voices heard.

I also want to connect with what David said about transcendence being so long favored in the Buddhist world as the way to embody the Buddha's teaching. But I really think it's transcendence of the ego, not transcendence of the planet itself. We don't need to let go of our planet. We don't need to let go of the beautiful species living here with us. But we do need to let go of our egos—the ways we think we need to live, what we think we need to have, what we need to throw away. All of these things we must reconsider. Is this really true? Do we really need all of these things? Or is this just a worldview we can outgrow and must outgrow? Because the planet cannot support this worldview.

I felt very inspired by what Penny Opal Plant, one of the First Nation leaders, said: "We are the immune system of the planet. We have to speak out. We have to ring the alarm bells. We have to increase the numbers of those who want to act on behalf of our Mother Earth, who is sick right now."

If we all act together as the immune system, if we speak out, we need only be 7% to 10% of the population to establish this different worldview in the mainstream. We can do this. If we work together, if we establish systems of communication and mutual encouragement, then we will make a difference. We don't know what the result will be—we can't know that. But we can do our best and then let go. Not before we have done everything within our power to make a difference, but after we have truly tried.

There's a beautiful slogan that was heard often on the march: "The people united will never be defeated." It's about working with all those obstacles that prevent us from uniting and working together—both the internal and external obstacles. We have to attend to both.

And they are both of equal importance because we cannot be truly effective externally if internally we are completely caught up in our own reactivity and confusion. We also cannot wait forever to step out, to do something, to say something, and to act.

We must remember what the Buddha was doing on the night of his enlightenment. He was sitting under the Bodhi tree, and he was touching the earth. He was calling the earth to witness because we belong here. Simply because we are here, we have the authority to speak on behalf of the earth.

In order to do that skillfully, we can remember also the fearlessness mudra, which the Buddha used in his way of teaching people and encouraging them to have the courage to act on what they value, act on what they care for, what they want to protect. These two mudras can really help us stay on the path: touching the earth, and the fearlessness mudra.

Both of these mudras help me personally to stay present with my own experience and to have the courage to step out and say, "Yes, I want to practice. I want to be fully here and embody the truth for as long as I can." I want to end with this encouragement: connect with each other and live the Buddha's teaching fully. Thank you.

"Beautiful words. Thank you, Ayya."

While listening, I'm hearing the trajectory of today's call—from David's teaching helping us re-understand how we practice and bringing in bodhicitta, the bodhisattva paradigm, to Ayya Santacitta's clear call encouraging us to connect together, to become a strong force and engage on every level: engage politically, engage for systemic change. Ayya Santacitta is really bringing and empowering that vision for us.

As I'm listening, what's arising for me is this sense of the robe, of being in the robes. I'm sitting here at Aloka Vihara near Placerville, the new monastery for bhikkunis. I was at the bhikkuni ordination yesterday of Ayya Jayati Bhikkuni. The robes, the robed ones, are those who help guide us. To hear such clear guidance coming through from the ayyas—I feel very moved and very energized.

This brings to mind our call very early on when we were putting together our teachers' statement about climate change. Kumi Naidoo, the executive director of Greenpeace International, came from South Africa where he was in the anti-apartheid struggle. He reminded us that the people of faith and the voice of ethics brings such important energy to activism—it was that energy that helped topple the apartheid government, helped overcome segregation in the U.S. through the civil rights movement, and enabled Gandhi's satyagraha to overcome British colonial domination in India.

I think we have very important work to do. We have our map laid out, and now we should move into our breakout groups to allow space and time for your discussion and questions.

"Well, thank you, and hello everyone. We've heard wonderful wisdom from teachers on this and all our calls, and it's clear that wisdom lies not just with teachers but throughout the sangha. The breakout groups provide a lovely opportunity to hear and connect with others around the world, creating this connection of sangha in the midst of this incredible challenge. We consider this an important part of cultivating sangha. If you're not comfortable going into breakout groups, you might instead do your own meditation on what you've heard and where it's landing in your heart, mind, and body."

"Welcome back, everyone. We're all here together in one big sangha conversation. We'd like to hear from you now—any reflections from the breakout rooms, your meditation, or questions you might have. With so many of us on the call, please share from the heart and keep it relatively brief so we can hear from as many people as possible."

"Thank you so much. I was deeply impressed and moved by both David's talk and Ayya Santacitta's. David's talk was incredible in how it looked at our own tradition, going deep and showing how we can truly be bodhisattvas. And the dynamism of Ayya Santacitta's talk—all the options and possibilities she offered are incredible resources.

"Yet so many things she mentioned today, I had no way to capture that information. There was so much I'd really like to have—even her email address, the different organizations she mentioned like Our Voices, the Climate Change Mobilization. I'm sure I missed many that I would really like to connect with and be involved in.

"I'm a community dharma leader here in Tucson, Arizona, and I'm just starting my first experiment in classes on what I'm calling 'Climate Justice: How to Live Courageously in This World.' I want to bring this to as many people in my sangha as I can, and in that way keep touching other people. So how can I get that information?"

"I completely hear you, and thank you for your leadership and what you're stepping into where you are. It's beautiful."

And I'll say that we will share these resources with you. If you go to the Conversation Archives on the Wonder Sangha website, all the resources mentioned during these calls will be delineated there, including email addresses. We'll make sure that information is available to you.

Great. So let's go to Jeffrey. Jeffrey, what is your question and what would you like to offer?

Well, the main thing is that we are extremely excited and fulfilled by this series of five meetings, and we want more. We want to know what's next. We hope this isn't the end of what you're doing. This has been an amazing, enlightening experience and has left me feeling very hopeful. I don't feel hopeless now at all because of all the possibilities. It's more a question of where am I going to put my energy among all these incredible possibilities. So we appreciate the leadership you've provided and please continue.

What a wonderful segue. Actually, we are going to talk a little bit about that later in the call, but I will say that we hear you. We have heard from many that they have been really nourished by these conversations, and so we're not going to leave you out there by yourself. We're going to keep finding ways to connect, so we will be following up. I'll say a little bit more about that towards the end of the call.

Okay, Jeffrey?

I knew you would. That's great.

So I'm going to go to Anandabodi Bhikkhuni. You are on the public mic. Go ahead.

Hi, this is Aya Sudama. I'm on Aya Anandabodi's telephone, so it might be my pressing the button that you've seen there. Is that correct, Aya Anandabodi? Are you there?

She's not there, okay. So I just wanted to say—oh, I'm from Charlotte, North Carolina, but here in California with these friends at Aloka Vihara, listening in with much appreciation, much mudita, much admiration.

I want to say I grew up in a household led by an executive from Duke Power Company. I had no idea until recently that Duke Power is one of the worst polluters in the world. I read that 500 mountaintops have been decimated by Duke Power in its search for energy and coal, doing so much harm in this world. I had no idea, just no idea. I have felt very helpless. Especially as a bhikkhuni, a Buddhist nun—I'm a little tiny one all by myself. I just started a new little center in my hometown a year ago and feel sort of fragile and alone, not like I'm someone who could or should speak up. These things are bigger than me. Besides, a good Buddhist shouldn't get involved in these things—that's been my thought.

And I heard something in our conversation about transcending the ego, not the world. Just a light bulb went off. I feel like, oh, I can participate in this conversation.

I'm getting tears now. Just recently, I got the paperwork from my city, Charlotte, North Carolina, to start a neighborhood group. My neighborhood doesn't actively have a group. So I'm seeing possibilities. The wheels are turning as I've been listening. I'm very interested in this and will pursue it.

And I also registered to vote within about 48 hours, just in time to register. I'm going to vote for the first time in years. I'll get back to Charlotte just in time to do that. I was determined to vote in this election.

Thank you so much, John. It's so wonderful to hear from you and the group in Totnes. What a beautiful spot in the world—one of the places that started the transition town movement, which we should add to our list of resources.

We are getting very close to wrapping up our conversation, but Ayasudama and Geeta, John mentioned joy, which feels like such an essential thread running through everything we've shared today.

The question of how to find and sustain joy within Buddhist practice while facing something as overwhelming as climate change is profound. Without that positive, life-affirming energy, it becomes nearly impossible to keep going, to keep acting, to keep communicating about these urgent matters.

This speaks to something fundamental about the dharma path—that even in the face of suffering, even when we're looking directly at the most challenging aspects of our world, there's still space for joy. Not a superficial happiness that denies reality, but the deeper joy that comes from connection, from meaning, from taking right action together.

When we act from love rather than fear, when we connect with others who share our values and commitment, when we remember that our efforts are part of something much larger than ourselves—this is where joy naturally arises. It's the joy of the bodhisattva path, the joy of serving something greater than our small self.

And as we've heard today, this joy is contagious. When one person steps into inspired action, it moves others. When we gather in community—whether here on this call or in your sitting group in Totnes—we kindle and sustain each other's light.

Do you have a minute just to say something about joy in response to John's call and question?

I want to share with everyone that every time I've participated in climate action, knowing that the government recognizes we are here wanting this change—that we are putting our bodies on the line, putting our hearts on the line—it's been a joyful experience. I think this stems from the fact that everyone I've been in contact with, when we come out for actions whether it's the People's Climate March or other more local gatherings, people are coming from a place of love. They're coming from a place of really wanting to give something—this precious planet, this precious environment, this ability to live and to practice—to the generations to come. They genuinely want the frontline communities, the people who are struggling most, to be supported. It's inspiring to come together. There's tremendous joy involved in that.

Thank you so much, Geeta. Kristen, please tell us something about what you and Lou have in mind for carrying on.

It's so wonderful to be carrying this energy forward, and I can feel everyone wanting to bring that energy into what comes next. As co-founders of One Earth Sangha, I can speak for Lou and myself in saying that we sincerely thank each of you for joining these calls—whether this is your first call, your fifth, somewhere in between, or if you're just listening to the recordings afterwards. Your presence is deeply nourishing to all of us and to all who are coming together in service of the continuance of life.

We have heard from many of you that you have felt helped, encouraged, supported, and inspired by these calls and would like to retain that live connection in some way. We are exploring the possibility of monthly calls to keep our community connected and to share leadership around the globe, letting us offer into a collective space what we can do, very much as was mentioned by the teachers earlier. We will be emailing you with information as it becomes available. Stay tuned—we will continue.

Taking a final breath, Ayaz, would you please share the blessings and the good energy from our series as we conclude our conversation today?

Focus on your wish to make a difference. We're going to share a Buddhist blessing to keep us all connected and encouraged in this time of great challenge, as we step out and act for the benefit of all sentient beings.

May you have every good blessing
May all the Devas protect you
By the power of all the Buddhas
May you ever be well

May you have every good blessing
May all the Devas protect you
By the power of all the Dhamma
May you ever be well

May you have every good blessing
May all the Devas protect you
By the power of all the Sangha
May you ever be well

Thank you for those blessings. I feel them resonating out into the world around us. Again, my thanks to all for your participation. It's wonderful that we're going to carry on the conversation and come together to offer what we can into the suffering world and the climate emergency.

I'd like to thank each of you for your donations—they've been very supportive. Thank you to Maestro Conference for their amazing support, and to One Earth Sangha. Thank Kristen and Lou for initiating this great platform for us to find a home within. Thank you to our entire team, including Yong and Barry working behind the scenes.

We'll continue. Take care, and go well. Stay well.

Notable Dhamma Teachers

Notable Dhamma Teachers — Rob Burbea

Profound explorations of emptiness, imagination, and the nature of perception

285 talks · Rob Burbea

Transcriptions produced locally using Swiss low-carbon electricity.
Corrections and rewriting by cloud-hosted AI.

dharmaseed.org