NOTABLE DHAMMA TEACHERS

Notable Dhamma Teachers — Rob Burbea

Profound explorations of emptiness, imagination, and the nature of perception

Rob Burbea

SOURCED FROM DHARMASEED.ORG

Contents

PATH OF THE IMAGINAL (LONGER COURSE)

Energy, Image, Emotion (Part 1)	1h03	13
Energy Body: Instructions (1)	1h34	32
Imaginal Practice: Doorways and Directions (Part 2)	1h02	52
Imaginal Practice: Doorways and Directions (Part 1)	59 min	69
A Little Exercise for the Imagination	31 min	84
Energy Body: Instructions (2)	46 min	91
Energy, Image, Emotion (Part 2)	32 min	105
What is an 'Image'? (Part 2)	1h01	115
What is an 'Image'? (Part 1)	1h18	132
Soulmaking (Part 2)	1h13	153
Soulmaking (Part 1)	1h15	174
Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (2)	1h15	195
Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (1)	41 min	216
The Love and Demands of the Imaginal (Part 2)	1h05	227
The Love and Demands of the Imaginal (Part 1)	1h02	244
Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (3)	1h09	260
A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 3)	1h35	280
A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoesis (Part 2)	46 min	305
A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoesis (Part 1)	54 min	318
Theophany and Cosmopoiesis: Instructions	1h19	332
A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 5)	1h27	353
A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 4)	1h24	375

AN ECOLOGY OF LOVE

An Ecology of Love (Part 4)	1h04	396
An Ecology of Love (Part 3)	35 min	415
An Ecology of Love (Part 2)	57 min	424
An Ecology of Love (Part 1 - Introduction)	51 min	439

RE-ENCHANTING THE COSMOS: THE POETRY OF PERCEPTION

Mindfulness and Myth	1h19	452
Beyond the Search for Freedom	1h01	472
The Nature of Enchantment	52 min	488
The Art of Perception	1h34	503
Energy and Transubstantiation: The Alchemy of the Body (Q & A)	43 min	527
On Orientations in Practice (Live and Shortened version)	48 min	540
"I Sing The Body Electric": On Orientations in Practice	1h08	552
Healing the Imagination (Q & A)	40 min	571
The Movement of Devotion (Live and Shortened Version)	42 min	582
The Movement of Devotion (Part 2)	40 min	595
The Movement of Devotion (Part 1)	53 min	606
Matter, Bodies, Worlds (Part 2)	1h14	621
Matter, Bodies, Worlds (Part 1)	1h02	641
Neither 'Is' nor 'Is Not': Of Emptiness and the Imaginal (Q & A)	32 min	657
Hearing All Sounds as Mantra: A Jewel-like World	57 min	667
Creating the Path (Q & A)	43 min	678
From Inertia, Towards the Solutio (A Fragment)	7 min	690
The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 3)	45 min	693
The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 2)	1h13	705
The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 1)	53 min	725
The Imaginal and the Middle Way (Q & A)	51 min	739
Sensing Divinity	51 min	754
This Fire, This Longing (Q & A)	47 min	766
Tending the Flame	18 min	778

EROS UNFETTERED - OPENING THE DHARMA OF DESIRE

The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 1)	1h18	784
The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 2)	1h14	805
The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 3)	1h06	827
Dilemmas and Delineations: How Did We Get Here?! (Part 1)	1h17	844
Dilemmas and Delineations: How Did We Get Here?! (Part 2)	42 min	864
Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 3)	1h19	876
Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 4)	37 min	897
Dilemmas and Delineations: How did we get here?! (Part 5)	1h02	907
Eros Unfettered (Part 1)	1h36	925
Eros Unfettered (Part 2)	1h21	948
Eros Unfettered (Part 3)	59 min	969
Eros Unfettered (Part 4)	37 min	984
Eros Unfettered (Part 5 - Otherness and the Art of Disappearing)	1h12	994
Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 1)	1h06	1011
Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 2)	44 min	1028
Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 3)	53 min	1041
Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 4)	1h18	1057
Wisdom, Art, Balance (Part 5)	25 min	1078
Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 1)	1h01	1086
Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 2)	48 min	1103
Logos in the Garden of Souls (Part 3)	1h18	1117
Doubt and Discernment (Part 1)	1h19	1135
Doubt and Discernment (Part 2)	1h19	1156
The Holy Life (Part 1)	59 min	1177
The Holy Life (Part 2)	1h28	1192
'The Holy Life' (Part 3)	1h19	1215
In Love with the Way: Images of Path and of Self	1h34	1235
The World and More: Immanence, Tantra, and Transcendence (Part 1)	1h28	1258

The World and More: Immanence, Tantra, and Transcendence (Part 2)	1h15	1281
Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 1)	1h33	1299
Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 2)	1h09	1323
Refractions: Of Body, Sensuality, and Sexuality (Part 3)	1h13	1341
Eros and the Brahmavihāras	1h13	1360
Opening The Dharma of Desire (Part 1)	1h08	1379
Opening The Dharma of Desire (Part 2)	1h19	1398
From Mindfulness to Divinity: Towards the Tracing of a Phenomenology of Soul (Part 1)	1h51	1417
From Mindfulness to Divinity: Towards the Tracing of a Phenomenology of Soul (Part 2)	1h41	1445

OF HERMITS AND LOVERS: THE ALCHEMY OF DESIRE

The Problem of Desire	58 min	1469
Eros and Equanimity in the Movements of Soul	1h29	1484
Faith in Soulmaking (Q & A)	30 min	1508
Clinging, Craving, Eros (Q & A)	43 min	1517
Instructions: Letting Go	27 min	1528
Opening to Desire and the Imaginal (Q & A)	40 min	1536
Instructions: Opening to the Current of Desire	30 min	1546
Visions of the Beyond	1h43	1556
Energy Body and Image (Q & A)	45 min	1582
Awakening and Soulmaking (Q & A)	38 min	1593
On Blessed Ground: Fantasies of the Self on the Path	32 min	1604
Beauty and the Buddha	1h32	1613
Modes of Soulmaking (Q & A)	36 min	1637
Longing, Vulnerability, Anteros	26 min	1646
Shaping Vessels	13 min	1653

THE MIRRORED GATES

Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 1)	53 min	1658
Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 2)	48 min	1671
Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 3)	56 min	1684
Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 4)	1h22	1699
Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 5)	1h22	1719
Aspects of the Imaginal (Part 6)	1h30	1740
Sensing with Soul (Part 1)	1h27	1762
Sensing with Soul (Part 2)	48 min	1783
Sensing with Soul (Part 3)	28 min	1795
Sensing with Soul (Part 4)	1h14	1803
Sensing with Soul (Part 5)	1h13	1822
Sensing with Soul (Part 6)	1h05	1841
Sensing with Soul (Part 7)	50 min	1857
Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 1)	1h44	1870
Dukkha and Soul-making (Part 2)	44 min	1898
Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 3)	1h44	1910
Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 4 - 'Mastering the Fire')	1h39	1935
Dukkha and Soul-making (Part 5)	56 min	1958
Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 6)	1h33	1971
Dukkha and Soulmaking (Part 7)	1h34	1993
Dukkha and Soul-Making (Part 8)	1h21	2016
What is Awakening? (Part 1)	1h12	2035
What is Awakening? (Part 2)	1h15	2052
What is Awakening? (Part 3)	59 min	2071
What is Awakening? (Part 4)	1h37	2087
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 1)	1h30	2110
Between Icon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 2)	1h38	2131
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 3)	57 min	2154
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 4 - The Three Characteristics)	1h03	2169

Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 5 - Bodhi-citta)	1h00	2185
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 8 - Talking with Trees)	1h55	2200
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 7 - The Scripture of Body and Earth)	1h29	2224
Between Ikon and Eidos: Image & Hermeneutics in Meditation (Part 6 - Amitābha Buddha)	1h23	2247

TENDING THE HOLY FIRE

Elements of the Imaginal (1 - 2)	36 min	2268
Body and Soul (Q & A)	32 min	2278
Trusting in Soulmaking (Q & A)	34 min	2288
To Sense with Soul	12 min	2297
A Temenos Exercise (in fours)	1h04	2302
Transformation in Soul (Q & A)	36 min	2310
Soulful Movement and Elements of the Imaginal (6-10)	43 min	2321
Elements of the Imaginal (15 - 18)	31 min	2333
Soulmaking Rivers (Q & A)	51 min	2341
A Temenos Exercise (in threes)	1h23	2355
Destiny, Autonomy, Love, and Soul (Q & A)	39 min	2363
Discernment in Soulmaking (Q & A)	57 min	2374
The Rhythms of Soulmaking and Elements of the Imaginal (23 - 28)	40 min	2388
Nothing Happens By Itself	8 min	2398

FOUNDATIONS OF A SOULMAKING DHARMA

Opening Talk ('To Kiss a Falcon')	27 min	2401
Growing the Energy Body (Q & A)	35 min	2409
The Energy Body (A Little Bit of What, Why, and How)	49 min	2418
Trust, Ethics, Image (Q & A)	34 min	2432
Voice, Movement, and the Possibilities of Soul (1)	1h10	2442

Heart Art and an Introduction to Image	56 min	2457
Towards the Imaginal	1h02	2474
Sensitivity, Receptivity, and Respect in Soul Work (Q & A)	1h05	2492
Voice, Movement, and the Possibilities of Soul (2)	53 min	2508
Sailing the Oceans of Soul (Q & A)	33 min	2518
Wisdom and Desire	52 min	2529
Soul Making Dharma (Q & A)	41 min	2544
Sharing Soul Sense (A Temenos Exercise)	1h15	2557
The Spreading of Five Wings	14 min	2567
Of Hunger and Humility	16 min	2572

ROOTS INTO THE GROUND OF SOUL

This Retreat	1h02	2577
A Rite of Angels	1h04	2587
The Imaginal-Energy Body (Q & A)	1h17	2596
Dukkha and Emotions in Soulmaking Practice	59 min	2617
On Practising with Images (Q & A)	1h10	2632
Eros and Desire (Q & A)	1h09	2650
Image, Ethics, and Awakening (Q & A)	1h32	2666
Closing Comments From Rob - Soulmaking and Saṅgha	18 min	2691

FOUR CIRCLES, FOUR PARABLES OF STONE AND LIGHT

The Way of Image	1h33	2696
The Crucible	2h03	2720
Opening the Sense of the Energy Body	1h17	2749
Heat and the Material	1h58	2766
Until All is Liquid: Emptiness and Sensing with Soul	1h41	2795
Daimon, Refracted	2h08	2819
Dimensionality, Humility, Duty, and Love	1h43	2849
The Invitation of Otherness (Autonomy, Eros, and Intentionality)	1h32	2874

Logoi and Leanings	1h45	2895
Soulmaking Dyad Practice	2h39	2920
The Phoenix of Metaphysics (Part 1)	2h30	2957
The Phoenix of Metaphysics (Part 2)	2h15	2993
Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 1)	2h24	3025
Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 2)	1h17	3062
Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 3)	1h34	3081
Sīla and Soul (Part 1)	1h46	3101
Sīla and Soul (Part 2)	2h53	3126
Sīla and Soul (Part 3)	1h50	3167
Sīla and Soul (Part 4)	1h14	3194
Sīla and Soul (Part 5)	2h06	3214
Sīla and Soul (Part 6)	1h08	3242
Sīla and Soul (Part 7)	1h20	3260
Sīla and Soul (Part 8)	1h54	3277
Sīla and Soul (Part 9)	1h10	3304

PRACTISING THE JHĀNAS

Orienting to This Jhāna Retreat	1h29	3320
An Introduction to the Jhānas	1h10	3344
A Hidden Treasure: The Relationship with the Hindrances	1h03	3364
Focusing on One Point (Intensity, Directionality, Subtlety) (Instructions)	29 min	3384
Q & A	12 min	3393
Attitude, Effort, Achievement, and View	1h10	3398
Mettā Practice, and a few things about Pīti (Instructions)	26 min	3419
Developing Pīti, Developing Focus, Developing Wellbeing	1h28	3428
Insight Ways of Looking, Other Energy Body Possibilities, and Summarized Instructions	49 min	3453
Q & A	20 min	3467
The First Jhāna, and Playing and Working in (and out of) any Jhāna	1h30	3474

Q & A	1h22	3501
Q & A, and Short Talk	1h10	3526
The Second Jhāna	1h31	3547
Q & A	1h28	3572
The Third Jhāna	1h22	3597
Q & A, and Short Talk	1h44	3619
Q & A	1h30	3647
The Fourth Jhāna	1h31	3671
Q & A	1h15	3696
Jhānas and Insight	1h36	3718
The Fifth Jhāna (The Realm of Infinite Space)	1h34	3746
The Sixth Jhāna (The Realm of Infinite Consciousness)	1h19	3772
The Seventh Jhāna (The Realm of Nothingness)	1h26	3793
The Eighth Jhāna (The Realm of Neither Perception Nor Non-Perception)	1h09	3818
The End of Time (The Cessation of Perception and Feeling)	1h43	3837
Playing in the In-Betweens	1h04	3866
Going Forwards	49 min	3884

IN PSYCHE'S ORCHARD

Emptiness and Ways of Looking	2h09	3896
The Ontology of the Soul, and the Soul of Ontology	2h09	3930
Pain, as Void and as Sacrament	2h34	3963
The Image of Ethics (Part 1)	2h12	4003
The Image of Ethics (Part 2)	2h05	4034
The Image of Ethics (Part 3)	2h22	4064
The Image of Ethics (Part 4)	1h52	4097
The Image of Ethics (Part 5)	2h11	4123
The Image of Ethics (Part 6 - An Inconclusive Conclusion, or A Prolegomenon)	58 min	4153
Practising with Death and Dying	2h35	4171

VAJRA MUSIC

Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 1)	1h42	4208
Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 2)	1h50	4236
Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 3)	1h21	4263
Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 4)	1h59	4282
Preliminaries, Regarding Voice, Movement, and Gesture (Part 5)	12 min	4312
Perfection and Christ's Blessing	4 min	4315

STANDALONE TALKS

Follow Your Heartbreak	38 min	4317
(On Climate Change) Earth's Crisis - On the Edge of the Roof	26 min	4328
All In This Together	57 min	4332
Learning from Climate Change	42 min	4346
The Broader Context of Mindfulness	57 min	4357
The Meditator as Revolutionary	1h09	4372
The Brahmavihāras and the Climate Challenge	52 min	4393
400 and Rising	42 min	4408
The Necessity of Fantasy	1h08	4420
Planet Earth as Divine Messenger	52 min	4441
Practicing in Times of Big Changes	35 min	4452
The Dhamma of Global Climate Change	59 min	4461
Earth As Witness: International Dharma Teachers' Statement on Climate Change	1h04	4476
Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point	35 min	4493
Appropriate Response at the Tipping Point: Concern for the Planet as Dharma Practice	35 min	4503
Seeing the System You Are Part Of	45 min	4514
Karma and Sīla as Gaia Practices	40 min	4527
Stewardship and Intention as Gaia Practices	39 min	4539
Practice & Climate Change	49 min	4550
Responses to Climate Change: Awareness, Action and Celebration	53 min	4563

From Me to We: Five Dharma Principles That Could Save the World	53 min	4578
Connecting Inner and Outer Responses to Climate Change	37 min	4593
Active Hope	49 min	4603
Reflections on the Day	26 min	4613
Loving the Earth: Awareness, Action and Celebration	53 min	4620
Compassion As We Take Action	53 min	4635
How To Be an Earthling	26 min	4650
Today's Climate Reality	27 min	4657
Right Action on Climate	49 min	4665
Wise Action for the Earth	34 min	4679
Buddhist Perspective on Climate Change	1h07	4690
The Anatomy of Ignorance 2 - The Social Roots of Ignorance and Climate Disruption	1h03	4702
Dharma Practice and the Climate Crisis	1h01	4718
The Four Noble Truths of Responding to Climate Change	1h06	4735
The Eco-Crisis as a Spiritual Crisis	54 min	4753
Healing Ecology - A Buddhist Perspective on the Eco Crisis	1h36	4768
Climate Change, Capitalism, and Buddhadharma	57 min	4791
For The Sake of Life on Earth, part 1	41 min	4803
For the Sake of Life on Earth, Part 2	42 min	4812
Mindfulness and Climate Action	1h13	4821
Mindfulness and Climate Action: 1	1h13	4842
Mindfulness and Climate Action: 2	1h09	4863
Mindfulness and Climate Action: 3	1h08	4882
Mindfulness and Climate Action: Part 4	1h05	4899
Mindfulness and Climate Action: 5	1h08	4915

CHAPTER 1

Energy, Image, Emotion (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h03

> In this foundational talk from his Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea examines the crucial nexus of energy, emotion, image, and view in contemplative practice. He begins by reviewing the three modes of mindfulness of the body, particularly emphasizing the cultivation of sensitivity to the energy body as both a resource for samādhi and an instrument for working with emotions and images.
>
> Burbea outlines two primary practice intentions: the samādhi direction of cultivating well-being and pleasantness in the energy body, and the direct attention to emotions as they manifest energetically without trying to change them. He provides detailed guidance for working with difficult emotions through steady, sensitive attention along the body's midline, emphasizing the importance of bringing more energy to mindfulness than to the emotion itself.
>
> The talk includes practical instructions for handling hindrances like restlessness and dullness, and introduces the powerful role of helpful images—both deliberately invoked and spontaneously arising—in transforming emotional difficulties. Through vivid examples, including personal accounts from retreat participants, Burbea demonstrates how imaginal figures can provide healing through love, presence, and energetic transformation. He concludes by highlighting the crucial element of 'otherness' in imaginal practice, noting how the sense that images are 'not-me' gives them their vitality and transformative power.

On other retreats and occasions, I've talked extensively about working with emotions skillfully, exploring different possibilities for meditators to engage well with their emotional life—both the lovely, beautiful, positive emotions and the more difficult ones. This seems to me a really important part of our practice in general.

Tonight I want to talk about emotions just enough, and in the context of imaginal practice, as it interfaces with our explorations for this retreat. Particularly, I want to go into the interface, the nexus of emotion, energy, and image. I want to explore this relationship between emotion, energy, image, and also view, because that's always an inescapable factor—so the nexus really of energy, emotion, image, and view.

Before we do that, because it's relevant, just a little recap from earlier. We said that there are three modes of mindfulness of the body. We're particularly interested on this retreat in developing sensitivity to what I call the third mode: the energy body. Really developing over time, gradually, the sensitivity to the energy body.

Some people—I have a close friend who knows much more about anatomy than I do—when sensitive to their energy body and the way emotions and energies are manifesting and reflected there, always tie it in with precise anatomy. "Oh, my ovaries feel this," or "my epiglottis," or whatever. I myself don't know very much about anatomy at all, but I want to say don't worry about that. It's really not necessary. It's fine if you do, but it's not necessary for what we're doing on this retreat.

So we can give attention to a quality of energy somewhere in the energy body or the breath, the feeling of the breath, energy somewhere in the energy body, or an emotion manifesting. And we're not sure: is that around my mouth or is that my chest or my throat? Sometimes things get a little amorphous and blurred, and it doesn't matter. So it's not necessary to tie it in, to correlate it with actual anatomy. A lot of the time the energy body is quite an amorphous field filled with awareness. That could be just a space—as we said, just a sort of space a little bit around the body and including that whole space—or it could have more contours similar to the physical body.

This energy body is an experience. It's not something to believe. It's not a hypothesis. We're just talking about an experience and talking about a kind of experience, a texture of experience, a way of paying attention. And we're talking about it with the term "energy body."

Why would we do that? Partly because it's a way into this quality of samadhi that we want to cultivate as a journey in our practice—just developing more and more this spectrum, this range of possibilities for the ways that the being can feel, the mind and the body, the energy body. Cultivating the well-being, the harmonization, the energy, the restfulness there, the brightness, the alignment of the energies. Because that forms a huge resource that becomes a huge wellspring for us, not just for our practice in all kinds of ways, but for our whole life. So that's one reason for developing the sensitivity of the energy body.

The second reason, as I've alluded to, is that in developing sensitivity to the energy body, we develop naturally, we increase our sensitivity with respect to our emotions and also with respect to imaginal practice and the images that come. So the energy body forms an instrument. It becomes quite a subtle instrument and powerful instrument for working with emotions and for sensitivity and navigating through images and with images, navigating the practice.

These are some of the reasons why we want to develop this sensitivity to energy body. But notice something, because implied there is that we're not always trying, or we're not trying always to be in the samadhi mode of tending to a sort of pleasantness and openness of energy. We're not aiming to always be in some state of pleasant well-being, open, harmonized energy. First, I think that's probably relatively impossible. And second, for something to be a resource, for the samadhi and the well-being of that to be a resource—a deep, powerful, potent resource in our life—it's not that it needs to be there all the time. Absolutely not. It needs to be there often enough. Often enough that we can have access to it, dip in and out of it. Not always. It's quite different. And "often enough" will form a resource and create a very deep and nourishing resource for us in our lives. Out of that, freedom comes, and the ability to let go of what we need to let go of in life much more easily, along with many other benefits and gifts of that resource.

So in terms of practice, we have different intentions or intended directions at different times. Sometimes we're cultivating the samadhi or working gently, playfully at tending to this well-being and the pleasantness or comfort of the energy body. And other times we're doing something different. And it's conscious, and we're moving flexibly between those different intentions at different times.

We also mentioned that at times—or rather often—the awareness will shrink. So we're working with this middle size of attention, this sort of body size, a little bit bigger than the body, and it will shrink many, many times, the awareness. It will shrink when we're beset or troubled by an afflictive emotion. It will shrink when there is pain or discomfort somewhere in the body. It will shrink when we are distracted by something, caught in thought, when the mind is caught in thought. All of those—afflictive emotion, pain and discomfort, being caught in thought—all of those involve clinging or craving or aversion to a significant enough degree, relatively gross actually on the scale of things.

And that goes with the shrinking of the attention. Sometimes the awareness just shrinks out of habit. It's habitual, unfortunately, for us to have a more contracted attention. But we can change that habit through practice and have available to us different sizes of attention, like different gears in a car, which we can use at different times. They're available for us, accessible for us as part of the resource of a meditatively trained mind and heart.

We will see that the awareness shrinks many times, and we want to recognize when it has. What does that feel like? Recognize it shrank, and over and over just stretch it again, expand it again to just a little bit bigger than the body, the physical body, then filling that space with this bright sensitivity as we talked about.

Regarding the direction, the intended direction of samatha—this was very creative of samadhi—it's very creative, very playful. Really anything goes that helps you get in touch with that energy body and just helps to shape it or open it up to something that feels comfortable, easeful, nice, relatively pleasant, maybe quite pleasant. Anything goes.

We talk about just hanging out with the more open space of the energy body. Sometimes just that, you start to realize, oh, in a very subtle way, it's actually quite pleasant. I hadn't even noticed that before. But through the style of attention and the openness, it's like, "Oh, there's some vaguely pleasant energy in that that I can tune into and just hang out in."

There are different ways of working with the breath as we went through: either tuning in to the expansion and contraction of the whole energy body space, or the sense of energization, relaxation with the in and the out breath, or imagining the breath centered and expanding from some center in the body—the heart center, throat center, head center, belly center. Could be anywhere actually. Imagining that but then really feeling the energetic quality of that and the effect of that on the energy body space.

Or imagining the breath coming in and out of certain centers—again could be anywhere: top of the head, down in the belly, perineum. If you're standing up, you can breathe up through the feet into the whole body. With that, experimenting with what kind of breath—how does this breath want to be when it's coming in and out there or when it's centered there? So imagining, but really feeling as well the energetic sense.

There's also the possibility of not necessarily using the breath, or maybe combining it with the breath, but using the imagination a little more actively. For instance, imagining certain lines of energy, perhaps up the body, up the body and out the legs, and these straight lines of energy perhaps extending further down or up. That can be very, very helpful—quite subtle, but very helpful.

Or imagining a cloud of light, the body as a cloud of light energy, or actually a contoured body of light. Then there's all the possibilities of playing with metta that we talked about, and many, many possibilities. Anything goes, but the intention for the samatha, the directionality, is really to gently cultivate, gently tend to a sense of well-being of the energy body. And eventually seeing if that sense of well-being can actually spread and permeate, as the awareness does, the whole space.

We also mentioned that sometimes there's going to be not so much a sense of well-being, but rather there's going to be pain and discomfort in the body. Then we ran through certain possibilities. Let's recap.

The awareness shrinks when there's pain and discomfort in the body—very naturally. So just opening it out can help. Just open out that shrunken awareness. Stretch it again over the whole space. Very helpful.

We can gently direct attention, or rather center the awareness more where there's an okayness somewhere, where there's some degree of comfort, rather than getting dragged into the pain or the discomfort. The attention is often dragged in or away in distraction. What if we just put it somewhere, rest it somewhere where it feels relatively okay?

We can imagine the breath or the breath energy moving freely, unobstructedly through that place of pain, discomfort, blocked energy, or whatever. We can imagine breath or the energy coming in and out of the area of pain or discomfort—also very helpful.

We can imagine the metta originating from the very center of the area of discomfort. Very counterintuitive, but sometimes very helpful. All the metta flowing into that point. We can also imagine a light, a bright light centered at the discomfort and the pain and include the whole body. So the light is radiating through the body from that point and the whole body again is in the awareness.

We can bring a kind of light and steady attention to the discomfort, to the pain, wherever it is, within the whole body awareness, within a sort of background awareness of the whole body. Bring a light, steady attention to the discomfort and really allow it to be uncomfortable. Fully allow. The emphasis is all on the allowing. Moment to moment, allowing it to be what it is. It's this moment of unpleasantness. Then another—really opening, really welcoming the unpleasantness. A very, very skillful way of attending.

We can also use the imagination to put the discomfort in the body in connection with some sense of comfort or well-being or pleasure. For instance, we might have an area that feels uncomfortable. But we can tap in and realize the rest of the body, or around that, actually feels quite nice. There's quite a sense of softness or warmth or well-being or openness. And we can surround that discomfort with something more comfortable, almost like holding it or cradling it.

What's important here is the connection—that what is uncomfortable is placed in connection with something that's comfortable, with something that's warm and soft and has more well-being in it.

And perhaps that more comfortable energy, the softer, warmer energies can sort of lap against like gentle waves, perhaps in a lake, lapping against a jagged rock and just lapping and lapping. Perhaps that's the breath. And the breath can feel at times itself quite soft or gentle or soothing or pleasant or healing. And that energy quality of the breath perhaps is like gentle waves lapping against what's uncomfortable.

Sometimes we can even just imagine that there's a sort of channel between an area of discomfort and an area where it's more comfortable and more okay. So for example, I think I mentioned this morning, we could feel tight and uncomfortable in the throat, but the belly feels relatively okay. Well, just imagine that there's a channel connecting those two areas. Just don't do anything else, but just imagine that they're connected with a channel. And that's all. And just see what happens. We're putting something that's difficult in contact with something that's healing. You could view it that way.

Or, again, similar to what we said before, the pleasantness, the comfort, what is relatively okay or warm or soft can kind of wave through what's uncomfortable. But again, always the playfulness, always the experimenting. There's so many possibilities here and possibilities for creativity and playfulness.

And if there's pleasantness somewhere, if there's a sense of well-being that doesn't disappear after a second or two or is really around for some minutes, then can we focus on that, really include it, give it some attention, perhaps enter into it even with the attention, probe it with the attention, really finding the pleasure there and the enjoyment. Or can we open up to it? It's like opening the whole body to this pleasant energy. Or dissolve in it somehow, or dissolve it through the body. But really we're relishing and enjoying, and the emphasis is on allowing oneself, and really the encouragement is to allow oneself to enjoy what feels good in the energy body.

Even if it's unremarkable, even if it's subtly pleasant and doesn't seem much of a big deal. If it's more steady for some minutes, we really want to include that enjoyment and actually kind of prioritize it.

And in relation to all this, in relation to this direction, this intended direction of the samādhi, of the cultivating of the well-being in the energy body, attending to the well-being. We don't have to necessarily make it some ego thing where we're measuring how well am I doing at this thing called samādhi? Am I succeeding? Am I a great meditator or not? We don't have to kind of create an inner critic around all this. It all depends on the attitude.

You know, if you were feeling maybe not so well one day, and I think, oh, I've got backache or whatever, and I need to rest, I'm really tired, and maybe you arrange a bunch of pillows and cushions on a sofa or on your bed, and just arranging them just right so you feel comfortable, so it's restful, so it's easeful. It's unlikely that your inner critic or ego is going to make a big deal out of that. It's just a gesture of kindness. It's just arranging things, playing with the movement of pillows. That doesn't quite work. Let's move it down. Ah, that's better. It's just that movement of kindness or a similar situation.

You're feeling tired or a lot of tension or whatever, and you decide to run a bath and put all your oils or whatever you like in the bath. Similarly, it's not a big thing for the ego to get involved with. We don't tend to measure ourselves. It's purely kindness. What do I like? Oh, a little bit warmer? Okay, let's see what we can do there. A little bit more of this oil or whatever it is, you know. So it's really a movement of kindness and we can be quite creative with it and that way quite playful and kind and that way it's subverting or diverting from the whole involvement with the inner critic and the ego measurement.

So in terms of practice possibilities let's delineate a couple of things. First there is this intention of samādhi we've talked about—this intention for a direction towards cultivating a sense, tending to a sense and nourishing a sense of well-being just as much as possible in the energy body. So we're attending to the energy body and using the images, for instance, or the breath or whatever, to try very gently, playfully to create and allow a kind of opening of pleasure there. And that can increase and we're nourishing that. And that's the direction of what we call samādhi.

And part of that, sometimes, there will be difficulties that come up, energetic difficulties, emotional difficulties, within the direction of the samādhi intention, then we're responding to those difficulties, but trying to sort of smooth them out so that they become more okay, so that what's unpleasant starts to dissolve a little bit and transform into something more pleasant or more okay and comfortable. So that is this first direction or intended direction that we call samādhi, all of that.

Now let's introduce another possibility, a second possibility, which is just an attention to the emotions in the energy body as they manifest, as they express or are reflected in the energy body, whether they're difficult emotions or not difficult emotions, pleasant or unpleasant. But the intent is just the attention to the emotions in the energy body without the intention to move it towards what's pleasant, to tend towards the sense of well-being and...

comfort, ease, pleasure, and so forth.

Now this attention to the emotions in the energy body, as I mentioned earlier, is part of developing our emotional awareness in our practice and in our life. It's also part of learning to work skillfully with our emotions—with our emotional life and its richness and range.

If we place this in a bigger context, a bigger picture with respect to our emotional life, we might ask: what are we trying to do as practitioners with our emotions? Where are we going with our emotional life as practitioners?

I would say we could delineate at least five aspects—there are probably more, but let's say five for now.

The first is that we want to be able to feel our emotions, to be sensitive to our emotions, including all the nuances—both the more beautiful ones and the more difficult ones. We want to be alive and in touch with the richness and range and depth of our heart, with the subtleties of our emotional heart. This sensitivity, this ability to feel, is an important aspect of practice.

The second aspect is that we want to be able to handle, to have the capacity to tolerate, to be with, to be okay with what goes on and comes through our heart and our emotionality. This means both what is difficult—we want to be able to handle what is difficult—and also what is positive or beautiful. Sometimes intense joy is actually quite difficult for people to handle; we're not used to it in this culture. So can I handle what comes through? Do I know how to handle it? Can I develop my capacity?

In our current times, I feel there are dimensions to this capacity that extend beyond the personal. Can I handle what is, so to speak, purely my personal emotional life—what's going on for me personally? But globally, we are facing such a constellation of crises—environmentally, with climate change, resource depletion, failing economic structures, and all kinds of challenges. If we're called to hold emotions that may be much larger, or rather, if developing our capacity to handle what may at times be more intense emotions can hopefully serve the planet—because if I cannot hold those kinds of emotions in the face of the increasing crises we face as a species, then I cannot offer much. I will run away, hide my head in the sand, distract myself, or something else.

The third aspect in this big picture regarding emotions is that we are in the business, as practitioners, of cultivating beautiful qualities of heart—positive emotions like joy and compassion and love and equanimity and appreciation and gratitude, generosity, and all these beautiful qualities of heart, as the Buddha might say. This is part of the trajectory, part of the path.

Complementary to this, we're also in the business of learning to let go of emotions that are not that useful, that are not really fruitful for us—emotions that don't lead us where we want to go. This is not the same as letting go of what is unpleasant, because sometimes what's difficult to bear, what feels a little unpleasant, may be fruitful if we can find the right relationship with it. So it's not just differentiating between pleasant and unpleasant, choosing the pleasant over the unpleasant. It's really discerning what's fruitful—what, as the Buddha might say, leads onwards towards the goal—and what's not. We learn over time to defuse, like a bomb-defusal expert, what's not useful, while encouraging and cultivating what is nourishing and helpful to the being.

The fourth aspect regarding our emotions is that sensitivity to emotions forms part of imaginal practice, and actually part of all meditation. This sensitivity is particularly important when it comes to deepening certain directions in meditations.

The fifth aspect or dimension of what we want to develop with emotions is understanding. This has a couple of aspects to it. I want to understand my personal patterns, my personal habits emotionally. What are the kinds of emotions that I keep constructing, fabricating? How do I tend to react to certain situations or perceptions? How does that arise? There's a lot to explore there, but I want to understand my patterns and habits.

More broadly, I want to understand what we could call the dependent arising of emotions, including view. We'll talk more about this—how emotions arise dependent on all kinds of conditions. I want to understand what it is, apart from just my personal patterns and habits, that gives rise to an emotion. What is an emotion dependent on? Because partly it's dependent on conception and assumption and view and relationship, perhaps involving aversion or clinging. All of that is part of it.

That's the big picture we're really talking about. Here on this retreat, we're approaching emotions via the energy body, focusing on this particular gateway. This is what I want to talk about tonight.

and tomorrow. So there's the samadhi intention, the direction, the intended direction of samadhi, or there's the intention of just paying attention to the emotions as they manifest in the energy body—simply hanging out and paying attention to that ebb and flow, that swelling and decreasing, the coming and going.

This kind of attention to emotions in the energy body often needs to be quite sensitive. We're talking about quite delicate attention—not always, but often. It's asking for a refined quality of awareness. It's also asking us to sustain our attention, at least the way I'm presenting it—sustaining attention on the emotion and the feeling of that, the energy of that in the energy body.

What I'm describing now in this mode of practice, this intended direction, includes quite a range. It encompasses difficult emotions, as we've discussed, and also the positive or beautiful, the pleasant emotions. The whole range becomes something we want to include in what we're paying attention to.

This also includes the more subtle emotions—subtle negative emotions. For example, boredom is not usually a big, strong emotion. It's quite subtle, but that's part of what I want to give attention to: that emotion, those more subtle difficult emotions, and how they manifest in the energy body. And also the more delicate or subtle positive emotions. Sometimes a sense of sacredness, for example, can be really quite subtle. Or a sense of prayerfulness can be a really delicate emotion. We want to include that as well.

So not just the extremes. We're becoming more sensitive with practice to the range of our emotional life.

I want to emphasize on this retreat paying attention to the midline—the central line of the body, somewhere from below the genitals, actually the perineum, all the way up, often up the front of the body. This is where many emotions often—though not always, absolutely not always—express themselves energetically. Later we can expand this understanding, but often much of the emotional action in terms of what's expressed in the energy body happens along this midline, somewhere from the perineum up to the head, even the top of the head.

A gentle, sustained attention to that midline and what's happening there energetically will reveal how our emotions are often expressed along that line. So that's a good place to start sustaining your attention in this mode of practice. As I said, it doesn't have to correlate precisely—we don't need to know the exact anatomical point. Sometimes in meditation everything becomes a little vague, and it doesn't matter where it actually is anatomically or physically. For our purposes right now, it doesn't matter.

So regarding any difficult emotion or energy—this could be a sense of pressure somewhere, perhaps along that middle line, or a heaviness, or a sense of contraction or tightness somewhere. As I mentioned, it could be the throat or the heart or the belly. It could also be just a strange sense that this area of energy feels kind of foggy, or this area of energy feels subtly like a swarm of bees in a way that's unpleasant. It can manifest as all kinds of things.

With any difficulty, what do we want to do? Let's be clear. We want to attend to that, keep the attention as much as we can in this mode of practice steadily focused on that feeling, on that energy, wherever it is. If attention drifts, just come back to that. So here's this pressure in my chest, or around there on the midline, and we're attending to it steadily.

Then we ask: can I find the right quality of attention? Sometimes we can actually laser-beam the sensations of pressure and really look at it with quite a lot of intensity. And sometimes what's asked for, as I said, is much more delicate attention—much more like holding those sensations delicately, lightly in the attention. But the attention remains steady, and there's sensitivity to discern what kind of attention is needed. That's one aspect.

A second aspect, simultaneously, is making sure that there's more energy in the mindfulness than there is in the emotion. Because if there's more energy in the emotion than in the awareness, than in the mindfulness, then we're sunk. We're overwhelmed by the emotion. So somehow we want to bring a sense of presence to bear. We energize the attention, the mindfulness, so that there's more energy in that than in the emotion. Just that balance.

That the mindfulness is, if you like, stronger than the emotion—this alone is really helpful and really healing. It's something to check, because sometimes people are mindful, or think they're being mindful, but there's not enough energy in the mindfulness. They're actually sinking into an emotion, which isn't really that helpful. So that's a second aspect.

The third aspect, which we've already mentioned, is that the body space, the energy body, may at times contain a sense of resource in it. And that body space can be around what feels difficult emotionally or energetically. Again, it may lap up against what's difficult in the ways we talked about—surrounding it, bathing it, or holding it. This actually is an aspect of kindness: this holding or embracing or connecting of what's difficult with what's more healing and more lovely.

There is often the possibility of some energetic resource in the larger body space that we can use as a context and put into contact with what's difficult. So that's another aspect.

The fourth aspect is this allowing that I mentioned before. If I'm paying attention to what's difficult somewhere in the energy body on that midline, what's really significant and helpful is this attitude, this energetic stance in the attention of allowing. Moment to moment, how fully can this sensation—which is going to be unpleasant—how fully can it be allowed? The doors of the awareness are opening to it, welcoming it even. This happens moment to moment and is really, really helpful.

If you listen carefully to all that, it's quite different than just "sort of being with it"—that vague sense of being with my emotions, sort of accepting that I kind of feel crappy right now or that I'm miserable. This approach is actually much more specific. There's steadiness involved, there's sensitivity, and there are certain qualities that are brought to bear and, as much as possible, infusing the awareness.

This is what matters: the quality of the attention. The kind and quality of attention is what matters in relationship to emotional difficulty. That's one of the things that really matters. The qualities within the attention will either help or actually worsen what's going on. If there's a little bit of judgment or a little bit of aversion or pushing away—just energetically, even without the mind thinking that—it's going to have an effect, almost certainly an unhelpful one.

But if there's warmth and gentleness and allowing—a more deliberate and intense kind of allowing, not just this vague sort of acceptance—this is really what matters: the steadiness, the sensitivity, the quality of attention, the qualities in the attention, the kind of attention.

We could actually extrapolate a larger point from this and say that mindfulness in general includes a kind of question, a sort of subliminal question at times: Is this helpful? We tend to think of mindfulness as one word, but actually we can have many different flavors of mindfulness. So really what we're asking is: Is this right now, this way of attending, these qualities of mindfulness that are being brought to bear in relationship to this difficulty—is this helpful?

It's a question, because sometimes it's not. And something needs a little bit of reshaping or tweaking or changing. So there's a kind of question being asked with mindfulness. This goes for whatever we're attending to, but we can play with it. We can play with the kind of attention, the qualities in the attention, and so on.

All of that implies that the relationship with—in this case, an emotional difficulty, an emotion somewhere in the body—the relationship with it and the view of it (which I'll come back to much more later) are crucially important. That's what makes the difference. We could even say that the relationship with what's going on in terms of an emotion, the relationship with the emotion itself, and the view of the emotion itself are actually included in what we mean by emotion. These things—emotion, relationship with emotion, view of emotion—make one package, one gestalt.

Still with difficulties and working with difficulties that come up emotionally, we can include hindrances in what we work with. I'm talking especially about the hindrances of restlessness and dullness. Both dullness and drowsiness and restlessness are really helped by opening the space of the awareness. The awareness will shrink when there's a hindrance, and just opening it up wider again can be really helpful, just that alone.

Sometimes even the vast space—that third size of attention we talked about—opening up the space really large, looking at the sky or having a sense of the whole space of the room you're in, taking that in, imagining a space, can be really, really helpful. Both restlessness and dullness include this contraction of the attention, contraction of the awareness. So being aware of space, opening up a wider or much wider awareness, can be really helpful.

With restlessness, sometimes attention to the out-breath is really helpful because there's this organic kind of relaxation happening with the out-breath. Just attending to that quality of relaxation can soothe and calm restlessness. Conversely, when there's dullness and drowsiness, attention to the energizing quality of the in-breath can be really helpful, as can breathing a little longer to energize. If there's dullness and drowsiness, sometimes imagining a bright light—perhaps in the middle of your head, perhaps in your heart center—surrounding and permeating the whole body, and just staying with that bright white or golden light can be really helpful.

There are a lot of instructions here. As I mentioned, I'll repeat some of these things tomorrow morning to recapitulate. But let's add a piece here because we're on an imaginal practice retreat. Deliberately calling and engaging with an image that's helpful when there's a difficult emotion going on can be really helpful.

For example, when some afflictive emotion arises, just bring the image of whoever feels helpful—Kuan Yin or Avalokiteshvara or Tara, or maybe a teacher who you feel really embodies a lot of love or support for you. Deliberately bring that image into the awareness and sustain it. Again, put yourself in contact with that beneficent, benevolent image, and put also the pain, the emotional pain in the body, in the energy body, in relationship to that image. Maybe there's a kind of light being beamed towards you, towards the pain—all kinds of possibilities. But really deliberately invoke and engage with and stay with, sustaining, a helpful image.

Sometimes what can happen when there's a difficult emotion is that an image arises spontaneously and ends up being very helpful. This can be very significant for our purposes and can be surprisingly helpful. It's interesting to explore a little bit how these images—whether they're deliberate or spontaneous—help when there's a difficult emotion.

One of the ways they help, perhaps what some people would think would be the most obvious, is that there can be love from the image. Sometimes it's not a classical imaginal figure of love—not Jesus or Kuan Yin or something like that, but some other image that we don't tend to understand in that way.

immediately associate with love, but yet there is love from that image that we feel imbuing us, imbuing the body, touching the emotional pain, somehow healing us. And this love has a very gradual effect and can address, heal, dissolve the emotional difficulty. That's very, very possible and very healing.

And yet, sometimes what happens is an image appears and it has an immediate effect. It's sudden. And what's happening there is the healing effect or the dissolving of the difficult emotion is not coming because of love. Something else is going on. And this is very, very interesting in terms of imaginal practice.

There are all kinds of examples one can give. Actually, to give one example of a spontaneous image, I'm going to read you a letter that some months ago was written to me—a note really, a long note from someone who was on a personal retreat here. And I'm going to read the whole letter just because almost every word is relevant to everything that we're talking about through the course of this retreat.

"Hi Rob. I wouldn't normally write such a long note, but I'm not sure I could share this new image in an interview and still look you in the eye."

So even that's relevant because sometimes images like this, we feel, oh, this is so weird. Well, I'll explain what she's going to say. And we feel this is so weird and I just want to normalize it partly and normalize also the sense of reticence there.

"I have been noticing at points when I'm walking through the house and even in the garden, a sensation of being kissed hard on the mouth. Seemed a bit strange, but I didn't really think any more about it. Then yesterday, after you said that the samadhi practice has a different intention of following and building pleasure in the body, as we've talked about today and yesterday, I decided to do a few sets to see what happened. I was doing all the normal breathing with the body when I had the sensation of being licked from the hara, the lower belly center, all the way up the front of the body. To say that my entire body split in half with pleasure would be a huge understatement. My body started to shake. I sat for an hour and a half and there were many images of skin on skin but not a full image"—by which she means either full body or full visual image, I suspect.

"Since then, I've had the same visits of this intense sexual body energy on three other sits. Last night for an hour and a half, at four o'clock in the morning for another hour, and just now. On this last sit, the image seemed to coalesce. I was having some very intense back pain and was working with the allowing practice, but didn't seem to have the strength to welcome it, at which point a woman started to kiss the area of pain like it was a mouth, and any pain in my body seemed to give her and me ecstatic pleasure. There are visual elements of this image, but it is largely kinesthetic, and it feels like the body in these encounters becomes a sexual organ, the whole thing, and the image is wrapped up in the breath energy that rubs against the body.

"So many of the images you describe in your talks are functioning in a healing capacity. I definitely feel intensely nourished by this energy, but wondered if there was quite a large danger of becoming attached to this in a negative way."

So part of my response to her in a note was that, no, there isn't really a danger and she should keep opening to it and enjoying it. Well, there's not much of a danger, put it that way.

She goes on: "I just want to make it clear that this wasn't a head fantasy. It is completely in the body. Is it okay to keep working with it? And if so, are there dangers or directions you wouldn't go in? If you are busy at the moment, feel free to respond to this at a later time in an email. It definitely isn't distressing me, but since I've never had an experience like this, I'm having trouble integrating it."

But really the integration that she felt she was having trouble with was really just having permission, recognizing that it wasn't crazy, and having permission to open to it, to allow it, to call on it more deliberately at times. And naturally integrated into the body and the experience, the energy body, and the samadhi, the sense of harmonization, alignment, energization, pleasure—in this case quite strong pleasure—arose naturally and organically from the image. And this kind of thing is a lot less rare than many people might expect.

A different example: another person who has a chronic liver condition, ailment, inflammation of the liver. And so we're sitting again on a retreat one day in meditation, and there was this pain in the liver area, and the image of a lion. Now, this image of a lion was an image that she'd had before quite a few times, so this imaginal figure was quite a friend to her. And this lion came—usually it had a lot of power to it, as lions sometimes do—and started to lick her liver, to lick that area of the body with a lot of tenderness, but it was also, in her words, there was something awesome and majestic about this image. This huge lion licking her liver.

And this went on, she said, in the meditation. She was just with this for twenty minutes and it felt incredibly healing. And as that went on, the whole energy body began to align and open. And again, the well-being started to open, the samadhi started to open, the harmonization of the energy body came more and more. So what started with quite a difficult—in this case not so much an emotion, but a physical affliction—through the image was transformed gradually, gradually, through the love and through the tangibility, energetic tangibility of the image, transformed and samadhi came out of that.

Sometimes the love that comes through an image may feel bigger than the body, bigger than our body. It's as if an imaginal figure or some image creates or opens up a huge space of love, bigger than the body. And then we can literally allow ourselves to feel in love, literally in love, in a space of love. And perhaps then open to that space or feel the whole body, the whole energy body bathed in that love.

that love.

So images can transform emotions that are occurring, can transform the energy, and this happens a lot. And it can also arise when there's no difficulty. Those examples are when people were struggling with this or that, but also when there's no difficulty.

Some time ago I was teaching a weekend retreat—actually, samadhi was the theme—and people were working with the breath and the energy body that we were talking about. A person reported to me that she was really enjoying it, was feeling very calm. She said it was a delicious sense of divinity permeating the energy body and the whole space through the practice. She was just with that.

And then, actually, it felt like this feeling, this delicious sense of divinity, in her words, became personified in the figure of Ramana Maharshi, a great Indian sage and saint from the twentieth century. I think he died in the fifties. For her, she had a very strong heart connection with this teacher. So this delicious sense of divinity became personified as an image of Ramana Maharshi, and the top of her head felt like it opened. The figure of Ramana descended and was absorbed into her body, into her being through the top of the head. With that came a great raising of the energy levels.

So he, so to speak, entered into the body and the being, and much more energy became available. But interestingly, the energy felt, she said, quite "lumpy" was the word she used. It was actually a bit uncomfortable. So there was a big quantum leap in the energy levels, but it didn't feel that comfortable. It was still kind of lumpy throughout the energy body.

So I said, "Okay, let's see if we can smooth this energy out and just work with imagining the flows of the energies. Don't jump to conclusions that it's a bad thing or that I'm going to be stuck here or something like that." She said then the awareness—she just allowed her awareness to drop to her belly and really allow the different energies to flow, very gently working at smoothing them out. Very, very skillful working in practice there.

So regarding difficult energy in the energy body, we have some options. And again, options is a key word. We are complex, and we're encouraging flexibility, not just one way of doing things. So one option is, as we mentioned, to gently emphasize or place the attention, sit the awareness more where there is the comfort, the sense of comfort and pleasure, if that's available.

Another option, though, is to deliberately bring to mind and engage with a helpful image. And one can also do that deliberately when there is no difficulty. So the woman whose letter I read you—now that's become part of her practice and it's a way in for her to samadhi and to the energy opening that way. And other people say a teacher that they have a connection to also seems to come as a presence imaginatively and perhaps fill their body, and it helps everything to open and energize and calm and feel good, or just comes nearby or something like that, and there's a kind of resonance.

So even when there's no difficulty or strong sense of difficulty, we can deliberately use a helpful image as part of what helps. But certainly when there is a difficulty, we can deliberately engage a helpful imaginal figure.

Okay, so that's the second possibility. The third possibility with difficult energy, difficult emotion, is to focus on or to work with the difficulty of the emotion as we explained earlier—just now—in the different ways.

Now, doing that may be—as I attend, as I take care of the quality of the attention and the steadiness and the sensitivity and the ways of paying attention—it may be that the difficulty dissolves gradually as I pay attention in these skillful ways. And it may be that it gets less and it becomes really quite subtle. So maybe it's still there, but it's really, really quite subtle.

Now, one option is to actually stay with it as it gets more and more subtle. And it might be—this is really, really good practice—keep the steadiness, the sensitivity, the qualities of the attention, and let the whole difficulty become more and more subtle as an experience. And stay, track it with that subtlety, stay there. And sometimes it gets more and more subtle and it actually becomes pleasant. So funnily enough, that can also be a way into samadhi. Then that pleasantness can spread. Very interesting.

And it's certainly okay if it doesn't disappear, the difficulty, or if it doesn't become pleasant. No problem. We're just focusing on it and working with it in these more skillful ways. That's the third option.

And sometimes, especially when the focus on the difficulty and the emotional energy that feels difficult is a little lighter—it's not so intense, it's just kind of letting it be there, we're in touch with it, we're not so much focusing in on it—sometimes, just being with it in that way, an image constellates out of the difficulty, you could say, the emotional difficulty. And the difficulty subsides when the image comes, or the energy is transformed, perhaps the energy in the energy body is opened or it aligns or harmonizes, or we just have more energy. I'm going to talk more about all these possibilities tomorrow. Or the emotion is transformed—very, very possible.

So I remember one time I was—actually, there was something going on in terms of wider dharma politics. I'd just read an email and felt a bit frustrated with this sort of wider political situation in a certain sangha. Something was going on with someone. And I was with that feeling of frustration, but something felt a little bit—I felt a little bit stuck in relationship to it, or the energies, let's say, were stuck. The energies were stuck. And there wasn't a lot of clarity as to what to do or what to respond. So the whole energy body felt a bit stuck. The emotion was frustration. It wasn't very clear.

Even the energy itself was not very clear. And it definitely wasn't pleasant. It was subtly unpleasant. As I was with this, just gently, without so much focusing in on it, just kind of holding it and aware of it, an image suddenly coalesced.

It was liquid, some kind of liquid being poured in through the crown, through the top of my head. What was quite interesting was that I found myself asking, "What color does that liquid want to be?" But there wasn't a right color. The color of the liquid wasn't a significant aspect of the image. I'm mentioning this because it relates to some things we're going to explore another day.

This liquid was being poured into my energy body in the imagination, just by itself. It arose spontaneously. And as it was poured in, clarity came and strength came regarding, if you like, my sense of what's my duty here in relation to this situation that I had felt frustrated by. What am I asked to perhaps continue expressing, or not be daunted because my expression doesn't seem understood or accepted or whatever?

So there was clarity that came as strength. And this feeling pervaded the whole body. The liquid pervaded the whole body in the image, and a sense of strength came out. Energetically, strength, fortitude, resolve. I felt much, much better. It's quite a subtle example, but quite telling in a lot of ways.

One thing I want to mention is something we've returned to before, but I'll mention it now about that image: it wasn't clear who was pouring this liquid in. It wasn't me pouring liquid into the top of my head. And it wasn't, so to speak, in dharma language, just pouring or just being poured. There was some sense of an other, and actually a somehow divine other in some vague way. Some vague sense of an other, a somehow divine other was pouring this liquid into me and down into me.

I want to make a general point that I will return to: With imaginal practice, the sense of otherness, the otherness of the imaginal figure, is quite key. It's a key ingredient, this sense of otherness, that in other words, it's not me. This otherness gives vitality to images. It gives a sense of depth to images and potency, power—a sense of otherness. And something we'll come back to.

CHAPTER 2

Energy Body: Instructions (1)

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this opening instructional talk from the Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea establishes the foundation for working with what he calls the "energy body" - a mode of mindfulness that goes beyond simple sensation awareness or materiality contemplation. Drawing from the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's teachings on mindfulness of body, he delineates three approaches: mindfulness of sensations, mindfulness of materiality, and this third way of sensing the body's energetic dimension.
>
> Burbea guides practitioners through extensive experiential instructions for developing samādhi - not mere concentration, but a whole-body awareness suffused with well-being, comfort, and harmonized energy. The guided meditation explores various techniques: breathing from different body centers (heart, solar plexus, hara), imagining lines of energy, visualizing the body as light, and working skillfully with physical discomfort. He emphasizes the phenomenological reality of this approach - it's not a belief system but a learnable way of sensing that becomes a crucial resource for emotional awareness and imaginal practice.
>
> This sensitivity to the energy body serves multiple purposes: cultivating samādhi as a deepening resource for practice and daily life, developing awareness of how emotions reflect energetically, and establishing the somatic foundation necessary for imaginal work. Without this embodied awareness, spiritual practice risks becoming mere daydreaming rather than transformative soul-making work.

Good morning everyone.

Just a general word about the instructions on this retreat before we get into them. There's a lot of material in the instructions. Part of the reason for that is because people are different. People need different things, and different ways of working work for different people, better or worse, or at different times. So I want to be quite generous in what we're putting out so that hopefully everyone can find ways of working that work for them, that are useful.

The material is not only quite extensive, it's also quite different. Some of you, at least, will be encountering the kinds of material that we're working through for the first time or are quite new to it. Just the fact of it being new and unfamiliar also makes it seem like quite a lot. So please don't get overwhelmed with the instructions as we go through. I'll be repeating quite a lot, putting material out and recapitulating it at some point, perhaps the next day or later on. Do ask questions and do take notes, as I mentioned last night, if you like to. There are also the recordings, so you can listen again in due time and glean more as time goes by.

I mentioned last night that we're going to start with and really establish as a basis for the work that we're doing what I'm calling practicing with the energy body. So let's talk a little bit about mindfulness of the body, which the Buddha emphasized, to set this up and put it in context.

We could delineate three modes of mindfulness of the body—three kinds or types of mindfulness of the body. They're actually not really separate, but let's separate them now just to try and make something clear about the direction we want to go in.

The first is what we might call mindfulness of sensations. This is, in the insight meditation tradition, by far the most common when people talk about mindfulness of the body and also in the mindfulness movement. For example, if you take your hand right now and gently reach down to the floor by your side and just press gently—just touch and then press gently into the floor at your side—bringing your mindfulness, bringing the attention to the sensations that this gives rise to in the hand. What does that feel like right now in terms of the sensations of warmth or coolness or pressure? Notice how if you slightly move your hand around or at least move at the wrist while keeping the hand in place, there's a shifting texture, almost kaleidoscopic shifting of the sensations in the hand, through the fingers, in the palm. This is very simple and what most people can very easily relate to or have a lot of experience with—mindfulness of sensations.

Or, for example, if you're familiar with the raisin exercise, you put that raisin in your mouth or some other food in your mouth, and the sensations of taste, but also of texture in the mouth, touch—we can bring mindfulness to those sensations. Or washing your hands, the hands under a running tap of cold water or hot water—what does that feel like? The coldness, the heat of the water, the liquidity, the wetness, the sensations there. You're walking barefoot in your bedroom and you stub your toe against the foot of the bed. Again, mindfulness can come to those sensations, that throbbing, that pulsing, those unpleasant sensations. So most people are very familiar with that first type, mindfulness of sensations.

The second type or mode of mindfulness of body we could talk about is mindfulness of the materiality of the body. For example, I mentioned this yesterday as well. In the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddha talks about contemplating one's death or actually the decomposition of the body at death, this body or other bodies. Also in the Satipaṭṭhāna

Sutta, the Mindfulness Sutta, the Buddha talks about contemplating one's body parts. So again, this is to do with materiality. It's contemplating the hair on the head, the hair on the body, the teeth, the bones, the liver, the blood, the spleen, the bile, all the different body parts, the muscles, the tissues, the fat that make up the body. So contemplating the materiality of the body in terms of its parts.

And again also in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta the Buddha talks about contemplating the materiality of the body in terms of what was then known as the four elements: earth, air, fire and water and their presence in the body, throughout the body—the element of liquidity, the element of solidity.

Now these are in the second mode of mindfulness of the materiality of the body. This is actually a contemplation if we think about it. It's different from the contemplation of the mindfulness of sensations, the first mode. It's a contemplation. It actually includes the imagination and conceptions of the body. So it's less, if you like, direct in some ways than the mindfulness of sensations mode. It's a contemplation that includes the imagination and conceptions of the body.

And those conceptions might include conceptions such as "unclean." So the body parts in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta are generally—most people interpret what the Buddha means there as contemplation of what's unclean in the body. And this serves the function of reducing clinging and attachment and also lust. Clinging and attachment to the body and also lust in terms of other bodies.

So this kind—the second mode of mindfulness of the body, materiality—will include conception of the body. Sometimes it's the conception of something unclean or not unclean, but it could also be the conception of beautiful and holy. That would be quite a different spin on it than what you're generally used to in the Theravadan tradition, the Pali canon.

With regard to the four elements—the earth, air, fire, water—again, what's the sort of tone and direction and conception of that? I know someone who every morning gets up and, as part of her practice—it's almost a quasi-shamanic practice—goes outside and bows to the four elements present in nature, throughout nature, throughout the natural world and also in one's body. There's a sense in that practice of reverence, of holiness for these four elements.

But one can also spin or direct that practice in a very neutral way. It's just a kind of deconstruction of the body into its elemental parts, much as we might these days deconstruct—instead of talking about four elements, more modern science would talk about molecules or atoms, and that would be a similar sort of scientific materialist deconstruction. It's more neutral, and again, it's designed to let go of attachment and identification with the body.

So there's the mode of mindfulness of the body of sensations, the mode of mindfulness of the body regarding materiality, the material body. And then the third one is what we're going to focus most on in this retreat, and that's the mindfulness of the body —the mode of mindfulness of the body, the mindfulness of what I'm going to call the energy body, the space of the energy of the body.

Now, to some of you, that will sound very abstract and a bit like some kind of hypothetical thing that you're being asked to believe in or some kind of new age concept. But actually, I really do not mean it in that way. What I'm talking about is just a way of sensing, a way of sensing body and body space that we can shift in and out of, but that with practice can become very, very familiar to us. This way of sensing this energy body —very accessible and actually very normal.

So philosophically, we're talking about a phenomenological reality, if you like. This is actually a way of experiencing the body. It's actually how we experience if we don't necessarily layer too much on in terms of concepts. It's a style of attention, that's all, that reveals, opens the experience up in a certain way. So rather than a whole big construct and hypothetical sort of new agey thing, it's not that.

Actually, if we just think about this for a second, the mode of mindfulness of the body in terms of materiality actually needs, for example, years of high school biology to know all the body parts and all this. And it's quite culturally determined as a view. So for instance, whether we tend to see matter and materiality in terms of the four elements, as they did in the time of the Buddha, or whether we see matter and materiality in terms of molecules and atoms, etc., as we do culturally in our time and age—which is just something that we've received from the culture, from our education.

So that—not to say it's wrong or right, it's important, it certainly has its truth—but the point is that it's actually informed by conceptuality, this contemplation of materiality. So when I talk about this third mode of mindfulness of the body, the mindfulness of the energy body, I'm really talking about experience, not talking about some elaborate sort of religious belief or something like that at all.

When I talk about the body, the energy body, I really mean the whole space, actually a little bit bigger than the physical body. When I say the whole body, the whole body space—I'm going to use this over and over and over in this retreat—I really mean, as I said, a little bit bigger than the body. If for instance you're sitting on a chair, it would include even the space underneath your bottom, beneath the bottom of the chair, between the ground and the floor and the bottom of the chair.

So it's almost like an oval or an ellipse or something, or an egg shape. It doesn't necessarily have fixed borders. It can be quite amorphous or nebulous in terms of where it ends. But the experience then is this region, this area of what we could call—let's call it energy. That's the name I'm giving to it. But what I really mean is the tone of that space, the tone of the whole body space, the vibration, the feel, the texture of it, if you like.

As I mentioned last night, this is something we're going to emphasize and keep as a basis for the work of this retreat throughout the retreat. So we're going to really emphasize it at the start and then we're going to keep it as a thread and a foundation for all the other work that we do—this sensitivity to the whole body space, its energy, its vibration, its feel, its texture, its tone.

Now, why? Why place so much emphasis on this energy body experience and the sensitivity to the whole body energy? Well, there are a few reasons.

The first is that we can practice relating to this energy body in a certain way, which I'll explain and go through today, to cultivate what we call samādhi. S-A-M-A-D-H-I is a Pali and Sanskrit word, samādhi. Now, oftentimes that word gets translated as concentration. But I don't really want to use that English word. I want to keep it in the Pali or Sanskrit—samādhi. And what I really mean is not simply a focusing of the mind, a steadiness of the attention, a concentration on some small point or something. What I really mean is an awareness, a sensitivity to this whole body space, a little bit bigger than the whole body.

When the samādhi is developing and cultivating, there's a whole range of experience of the way that energy body feels. Well-being starts to permeate to different degrees—maybe not that remarkable, to different degrees—it permeates that energy body space. Restfulness permeates it. This is an aspect of samādhi, but also energization. So it feels like a very restful kind of space, but it's also energized and bright. The energies may feel sometimes soothing and healing and harmonized.

So the whole body is involved. There's some degree of comfort or well-being or pleasure even. Why is that important? Because not only is that a lovely space to inhabit, it's also very good for the mind.

This samadhi, to whatever degree—and there's really an almost infinitely deep potential there—forms a resource, a deepening resource for the whole being. To cultivate that samadhi, to have that direction in practice at times, that intention to develop this well-being, this sphere of harmonized, comfortable, perhaps even pleasant energy that is bright, awake, energized, yet restful—this is a really important resource for the whole being. So that's one reason why we're going to emphasize it. And that resource pays off in all kinds of ways in one's practice and in one's life.

The second reason is that we want to develop a general deepening sensitivity to the energy body and the feel of the energy body, so that this kind of experience—of an energy body, of the energy of the body in that space—becomes more and more familiar to us. We're developing our sensitivity to it and its experience, its changing experience. Why? Because that sensitivity to the energy body will form another kind of resource for us. It allows us one very helpful way to be aware of our emotions, because they reflect in the energy body, and also ways of working with difficult energies or difficult emotions through the energy body. So the sensitivity is important in itself because it brings awareness, which is very important, and it also enables us to work skillfully with all emotions, but especially the more difficult ones.

The gradually developing sensitivity to the energy body, which we can cultivate in practice, is very important as a basis and a kind of mainstay, a thread in regards to imaginal work, imaginal practice—as I'll explain all these different parts as we go through the retreat. It turns out that sensitivity to the energy body allows us to pick up on the resonances of different images and how they resonate in the being, both emotionally and energetically. This allows us to navigate with images, navigate the practice in different directions, and also discern which images are helpful for us, helpful for the being, for what I'm going to call soul-making.

Sensitivity to the energy body as we practice imaginal work also keeps us connected. There's always a kind of mindfulness of the body involved in imaginal practice. Without that, it's daydreaming. What's characteristic of daydreaming is I'm not in touch with my body—I don't feel the body and the energy body. So the sensitivity to the energy body also allows a greater degree of sensitivity in general with regard to images. And again, that differentiates imaginal practice from just daydreaming.

Today we're going to focus on samadhi, on this aspect, this deepening resource in terms of shaping the energy body. Now we could easily spend a very long retreat just on that—it's a huge thread of our path. I would say almost infinitely developable, so it could be a very long retreat. But this is the primary focus for today's practice. And again, if you're listening and doing this at home and have longer, you may want to spend longer developing the samadhi. We'll keep coming back to it.

So again, what does this word mean? Samadhi doesn't just mean focusing the attention or steadiness of attention or concentrating on one point somewhere. A steadiness of attention, a focusing of the attention is one element of what I'm calling samadhi, but it's just one element. What's more characteristic or more important in the samadhi, or as important, is this whole body awareness, this space. So awareness is permeating this energy body space. And there's some degree—to some depth, with a lot of range here—some degree of comfort or well-being or pleasure even in that space. The mind wants to fill that space because it feels relatively comfortable. There's well-being, there's pleasure there sometimes. And the energies in that space feel harmonized and bright and energized and restful.

This is not an on-off thing—I have samadhi or I don't have it, I'm in it or I'm out of it. It's more a spectrum, a range of deepening possibility that shares those characteristics for much of that range.

So can we practice tending to, just gently shaping and caring for and nourishing the body energies, the feeling of the body energies, and tending to a sense of well-being? What is it in our way of practicing—which I'll explain soon—that will tend to and nourish and support a sense of well-being through the body or somewhere in the body, a sense of energy, a sense of pleasure even? And can we tend to that in practice? This is the intention of samadhi practice: to tend to this well-being, this more open energy, the pleasantness. Can we do that tending? Can we take care of that and have that direction of intentionality without grasping, without getting tight?

One of the things that really helps us not get tight is to approach this with genuine playfulness. We're playing with this experience of the energy body, exploring the energies in a way that can be deeply creative. There's no right or wrong way of doing it—you can experiment freely. This playfulness and experimentation opens up countless possibilities, helping to lighten the whole endeavor and keep it alive rather than falling into that constricted success-failure mentality. This playful quality itself becomes one of our supports.

I think what would be most helpful now is to do a guided meditation together. I'll take us through some of the possibilities for tending to and being aware of the energy body, exploring different ways of caring for these energies as I've mentioned.

Take a few moments to settle into your meditation posture. We can discuss posture more later if anyone needs guidance, but what's essential now is that you feel relatively comfortable. The body should be upright without being rigid—balanced and simultaneously open. We're establishing an ideal balance of the whole being, mind and body together, through the posture itself.

The posture both reflects and expresses this beautiful balance: uprightness, wakefulness, brightness, while at the same time manifesting openness, softness, receptivity. This ideal balance of heart and mind finds expression through the body, and we simply set things up this way from the beginning.

You might want to very gently roll the pelvis forward and allow the rib cage to lift up and out—but nothing forced here. It's quite subtle, just opening up the posture, bringing in a touch of uprightness while remaining completely relaxed, soft, nothing tight or rigid.

Now take a moment to engage the first mode of mindfulness of the body. Feel into your hands and the sensations there right now—the flickering, dancing quality of sensations, perhaps warmth in certain areas or coolness. Notice how they feel if they're touching each other or resting on your legs. Can you sense any tingling in the fingers or palms?

Staying with this first mode of mindfulness, tune into the sensations where your body meets the cushion, chair, or bench. How does that contact feel? Perhaps warm or cool, pressure, hardness—simply notice these basic sensations of contact.

And your legs, feet, whatever is connecting with the floor right now—what are those simple sensations of contact there? Can you feel that?

You might scan through the body now, beginning with the face and head. Notice any tension, any holding or tightness. With the mind, simply relax. See if you can soften as much as possible—perhaps around the eyes or mouth, any holding in the jaw. Just feel it and relax.

Move to the throat and neck. Again, tune into the sensations and release, letting go, letting be. It doesn't matter whether all the tension dissolves—just this movement of relaxing.

The shoulders—feel if there's any tension or holding and let them drop toward the floor. The arms, upper back, sensing into the sensations. If there's tightness or holding, just relax. The upper chest, and the belly—sensing in, tuning in to whatever sensations are there, and if you feel tension, simply relaxing as much as you can.

Now, is it possible to open up the awareness so that it stretches to fill a region or space that's just a little bit bigger than the whole physical body? The awareness is expanding now, not focusing on one particular point here or there in the body, but expanding to fill a space larger than the physical form.

Within that expanded awareness, perhaps you can sense the tone of the body's uprightness—a very subtle feeling that pervades the entire space, this quality of uprightness.

The awareness will keep shrinking over and over again. I'll talk about this more later. It will keep contracting, so simply notice when it shrinks and gently stretch it back out. Some people find it helpful to imagine filling a balloon, expanding it, filling it with air, filling it with awareness. You're stretching the awareness and then permeating that whole space with this quality of mindful presence.

With sensitivity. This will happen many times. The awareness will shrink. Just open it up again. Stretch it out again and fill it with awareness. Fill it with bright mindfulness. Presence. Sensitivity.

How does it feel? How does that whole space, the energy body, feel? The tone of it. The vibration of it, in it. The feel, the energy, the texture.

So is it possible for the awareness, for the delicate attention to pervade that whole space, the whole body a little bit bigger than the body? It may feel body-shaped, it may feel more amorphous or more kind of oval, egg-shaped, ellipse, circular. Pervading that whole space with a kind of sensitivity to the way it feels, the texture, the vibration, the energetic quality of it. Bright mindfulness, sensitivity, alive awareness filling that space, sensing the whole space, open to the whole space.

Sometimes the feeling is really quite subtle. In fact it's often really quite subtle, so just very delicate with the attention, not forcing anything, just being present throughout the space of the body, sensitive to that whole feeling of energy there.

For some people, it helps to imagine or feel that the awareness is actually centered somewhere in the body, perhaps at the heart center, in the center of the chest, the upper chest. And from there, the awareness expands and fills, or that's the center of this space of awareness and this space of energy. It could be a little lower in the solar plexus. Some people like to feel or are helped by feeling the awareness centered there and then permeating the whole space. Or perhaps down in the hara, the tan tien, a few finger widths below the belly button. Some people find that a helpful place to feel the awareness center.

So what's helpful for you now? Is it possible to stay with this whole body, this whole space awareness of the energy body and just stay open? Keep stretching it when it shrinks—it will shrink many times—and just keep opening it up again, stretching it out to cover that space, staying with that and then beginning to become aware of the breath within that space.

So how does it feel with the breath, the in and the out breath? How does that ripple through the whole space? How does the breath, the in breath, the out breath, feel? How does it affect the energy of the whole space of the energy body?

It can be really, really helpful to gently lengthen the breath, both the in and the out breath. Slow, comfortable, long breaths. As long and as slow as is comfortable. You don't need to move a lot of air, necessarily. So a very gentle breath, but slow and long and smooth. Not forcing, just encouraging the breath to open up, keeping this whole energy body in awareness, this whole space sensitive to the way the breath feels, ripples, affects the whole space. Long, slow, smooth, in and out breath, whole body awareness, whole space, filling the energy body with the energy of the breath, filling it with awareness, filling that space with bright awareness.

Some people notice with the in-breath that the whole body, the whole energy body expands a little. They can feel it expanding, the whole body. In a very subtle way, perhaps, the whole body is kind of expanding, the whole energy body. And with the out-breath, there's a kind of opposite movement, a kind of collapse or contraction, if you like. And one can just remain sensitive to the whole space, the whole energy body, and feeling this expansion and contraction with the in and the out breath. And how does that feel? Really alive and sensitive to that. Keeping the breath long and slow and smooth and comfortable as much as you can without forcing. And aware, sensitive, filling that whole space with bright, present sensitivity.

So tuning into that expansion and contraction, that feeling in the whole space may be very helpful for some people. Or as well, some people might also notice that with the in-breath, there's a feeling of energization. The whole body space feels energized with the in-breath. And how does that feel? Can we tune into that feeling in the whole body? Notice, become sensitive to what that feels like, this energization of the whole space with the in-breath. And with the out-breath, a kind of organic, natural relaxation that happens just by itself with the out-breath. How does that feel? Sensitive to that energization, relaxation, letting go, tuning into these qualities in the whole space with the breath.

It could be the expansion and contraction, could be the energization, the relaxation, could be a mixture of the two. Filling the body, filling that space with awareness, stretching it every time the awareness shrinks.

Now for some people, or sometimes, it can be helpful to feel or imagine—imagine even and then feel—the breath as if it's originating, for example, in the heart center. So that there is a point in the center of the chest—doesn't matter exactly where it is—and the breath expands from there outwards and fills the whole body and then just retracts a little bit back to that.

So instead of a sense of the breath coming in and out of the body, it's as if the breath is centered in the body at a certain center, for example, the heart center. And that's expanding. The energy expands with that. Perhaps the awareness is centered there as well and contracts and expands, and one's feeling that, sensitive to that rippling through and affecting the whole body, the whole space.

It doesn't matter at all if you feel you're just imagining that. If you're imagining it, we want to feel it too. So you can use your imagination, but see if you can really get a felt sense, a kinesthetic sense of that breath energy and how it affects the energy of the whole body.

Now you may feel, if the breath is centered like that, that it no longer wants to be very long, or it may want to stay very long. Just see if you can get a sense—what kind of breath, long or short or smooth or very subtle? How does it want to be breathed? What kind of breath wants to occur when I feel it centered there at the heart center, having the breath center at the heart center and expanding from there?

So be playful. See if you can sense what breath feels the best, feels the most comfortable, the most enjoyable even.

Maybe you want to experiment with the breath energy being centered in the solar plexus, just a little bit lower in the center of the body. And again, sensitive to the whole space, the whole energy body. What kind of breath expands from the solar plexus, fills the whole space with its energy, and then draws back there, collapses down there again? What kind of breath? How long, how short, how smooth, how coarse or subtle? Feeling the whole body, the whole energy, the whole space.

I'm just moving quite quickly just to give you an idea of the possibilities. Is it possible to feel the breath originating within the lower belly center, the hara, the tan tien, down a few finger widths below the navel? Just feel that as the center of the breath energy expanding from there to fill the whole space and then collapsing again. What kind of breath feels the best there? How does it feel to imagine and conceive of the breath being centered there?

Or how about trying in the center of the head, that that becomes the center of the breath? And we're still filling the whole body space with this awareness and sensitivity to the feeling, the energy, the tone of it. Just noticing—how does it feel if the center of the head is actually the center of the breath? The breath expands from there through the whole space of the body. What kind of breath? How should the breath be? Might the breath be so that it feels most comfortable, most enjoyable even, when it's centered there?

How about let's try something else, just to give you an idea, a sense of things you can play with. How would it be to imagine the breath coming in and out from the heart center? Again, sensitive to the whole space, sensitive to the whole energy body, but the breath is coming in and out through the heart center and the center of the chest. And then how does it move? How does it feel? How does its energy expand or affect the whole energy space, the whole energy body? And what kind of breath feels good, feels comfortable or right or even enjoyable there? In and out. Imagining it, but feeling what it feels like to imagine it that way. Sensitive to the whole body.

Play with all kinds of points in the body this way. For example, how would it feel to imagine the breath energy entering the body at the base of the spine, right down there in the lower back? Again, feeling how that breath energy, imagined that way, coming in and out there, affects the whole body space, the whole energy. Feeling what kind of breath feels good and helpful there.

Or how about imagining the breath coming in the top of the head, the crown center at the top of the head? Just imagining that breath energy entering and going out there, but then feeling what that feels like. What that feels like in the whole space, the whole energy body space. Sensitive. Sensitive. Alert to the whole tone, texture, vibration of the whole space.

And what kind of breath feels best there. So be light, be playful with this. Let the whole body be involved.

Now let's try something else, still keeping this whole body awareness, the sensitivity to the whole energy body experience. Let go right now—keeping that wider awareness—but let go of the breath or any attention to the breath, any deliberate attention to the breath. Just let the breath be. Don't focus on it or make it prominent in the attention. Let go of the breath.

Still with this whole energy body, let's play with the imagination a little bit with regards to the energy body. So is it possible within this sensitivity to the whole space of the energy body to imagine a line of energy from deep down in almost the perineum or right down in the lower belly, all the way up the center of the body, a straight line up the center of the body and perhaps from there, from the perineum or the lower belly all the way up to the crown of the head?

And perhaps even out beyond the top of the head, beyond the crown and even lower than the perineum. So does it want to extend in either or both directions, or does it want to just stay in a certain space? Imagine that line of energy. Maybe you see it visually. Maybe it's a certain color, perhaps white or gold. Maybe it's more kinesthetic. You're just imagining a line of energy.

How does that feel? So there's that line there that we're imagining and we're noticing how that presence of that image, whether it's visual, kinesthetic or whatever, how that affects the tone, the feeling, the energy of the whole space.

And then keeping that wider awareness as always, stretching it out when you need to, keeping that vertical line there of energy, can we add two more lines from that point down in the perineum or right in the lower belly, a line from that point where it meets the vertical line that we've just described, a line going out, radiating out through each leg? So you now have three lines meeting at a point in the lower belly or the perineum.

And these lines that go through the legs, they don't need to necessarily bend at the knee if your knees are bent right now. They might want to extend more in a straight line, again, beyond the edges of the physical body. How does that feel, those three lines of energy imagined? How does it affect the feeling of the whole space?

Sometimes, for some people, imagining or feeling certain flows of energy in or out of those lines—for example, in through the legs and out through the vertical one, through the top of the head or the other way around or out through all of them—that can be helpful or feel as it just arises by itself. How does it feel? What's helpful with this imagination?

Maybe you want to stay with that and that feels helpful and supportive to the whole energy, or maybe you can also try again—sensitive to the whole space, it's more open stretched awareness over the whole energy body, the whole space—and actually imagining that that whole space is a cloud of light, a cloud of energy that's luminous, perhaps white or golden or golden white light. The whole energy body is really a cloud of light. And how does that feel? How does that feel in the whole space? So this cloud is by nature quite amorphous.

Or we could try a third thing and imagine a body of light—that your body, your energy body, is a body of light, of light energy. So this time, it actually has contours similar to your physical body. And what color does this body of light want to be? Imagining it, but feeling what it feels like to imagine the body this way. A body of light, perhaps again white or golden, perhaps blue, perhaps red, but it's the feeling of the energy, it's the feeling of the space that's important, that's significant. Is it possible to imagine a body of light and to feel what that feels like throughout the body, throughout the energy space?

So these are some of the possibilities we move through very quickly, throwing out different possibilities for you to play with, for you to try. Right now, just staying with this whole body, whole energy body awareness, sensitivity, just return to whichever felt the easiest or the best for you. Perhaps it was just being with the space of the energy body and sensitive to that. Perhaps it was with the breath in a certain way of relating to the breath or feeling the breath or the breath centered in a certain place or in and out a certain place. Or perhaps it wasn't with the breath and it was just more with the images of energy, lines of energy or a cloud of light or this body of light.

Just for a few minutes right now, go back to whichever attracts you the most, whichever felt easiest or best for you. Whatever it is, the awareness is stretched through to permeate, to pervade the whole space, really inhabiting that whole space with bright sensitivity, a live awareness.

And then whatever you've been playing with, see if you can just go back for a few moments to just the awareness pervading that space, just inhabiting, filling that whole space, the energy body, with this bright, luminous sensitivity to the energy, the feeling, the texture, the tone, the vibration of that space.

And when you're ready, slowly opening your eyes, seeing if you can stay in contact with the experience of the body of that space just as much as possible.

Just to be very clear, what we just went through in the guided meditation was really some options, a few of the options that it's possible to play with. It's not that one would go through all that in that order in a meditation, or even all of that in any order. All of what we did is really a survey, if you like, a taster of possibilities. But I hope it's clear that the breath may or may not be involved.

As I mentioned, you might also bring loving-kindness practice into this work for those familiar with it. While we don't have time to explore metta in depth on this retreat, if you already know the practice, you can beautifully integrate it with the energy body meditation. Begin by feeling into that whole energy space, really establishing sensitivity to the entire field. Then perhaps the metta becomes a kinesthetic imagination - sensing that energy radiating outward as kindness, as well-wishing and healing energy, or wrapping yourself in that cloud of benevolent energy.

You might imagine it as light - again, really feeling it as energy rather than just visualizing. You may choose to use the traditional phrases or not, but the essential point is integrating the loving-kindness into the felt sense of the energy body itself.

Similarly, you might work with visualizations - Quan Yin, Tara, Jesus, whoever resonates with you. But what remains primary, absolutely primary, is to feel the energy body, the energy space, maintaining that sensitivity to the whole body as the Buddha describes.

When working with imagination - those lines of energy we explored - they might want to extend much, much further than the physical boundaries. Out through the top of the head, perhaps extending quite high, and downward, deep down through the perineum or feet if you're standing, reaching far into the earth below. Really remain open and playful, discovering what works for you.

Sometimes it feels wonderful for people to imagine the lines of energy extending out the crown at the top of the head and then curving back in a great arc, forming a large circle with a generous circumference. This energetic circle curves back to enter at the base of the body - the perineum, or the feet if standing. This creates a complete energetic circuit in the imagination.

But remember - it's not merely visual imagination. When playing with these images, I really want to feel how they feel energetically. Perhaps I imagine fire moving through the central line of the body, out through the crown and back down in that great arc. The key is always the felt sense, the actual energetic experience rather than just the mental picture.

And that might be helpful. So if it's helpful, go for it. But feel into all this, play with it, and see what feels helpful.

Sometimes you can turn things completely around. Usually we feel and sense consciousness facing forward because the eyes face forward, and we're accustomed to that. But actually in meditation you can play with the whole feeling of facing out of one's back—the entire back of the body. Feel the energy body turned around that way, whether with the breath, breathing in and out through the back, or with a center in the back, or without the breath at all.

You can really be very playful. It's not always predictable what will feel good at any time, what will feel helpful. But always there's this sensitivity and tuning, this awareness sensitizing to the texture of the energy body space. Sometimes we won't have a word for that texture—"I don't know, it feels like this." It doesn't matter. The labeling is not important. What's important is feeling that whole space. And if there's something enjoyable in feeling that, then enjoy it if possible.

Now, of course, sometimes in meditation—probably everyone knows this—it's definitely not enjoyable. There's discomfort of some kind in the body, or pain. Very, very common. So there are a few things I want to say about that—six things, in fact, that you can go through as a kind of list when there's discomfort or pain with this kind of meditation.

The first thing is that when there is discomfort or pain, the awareness will shrink. This is a very normal part of what goes on. So the awareness shrinks when there's discomfort, and you really just need to notice that's happening. Open it out, widen it, stretch it like that balloon stretching so it's really the whole body. This in itself will help, and sometimes that's all that needs to happen. You keep the awareness wider, it shrinks again, you keep it wider. Sometimes that's all that's needed, but sometimes we need more. Anyway, opening out the awareness is number one.

Number two: sometimes we have discomfort or pain in one area of the body and we get kind of sucked into that. The attention gets drawn there and we fail to notice, we neglect to notice, that some other area of the body may feel relatively okay, relatively comfortable, sometimes even pleasant. What can be very helpful in this kind of samadhi meditation—still tending to the energy and well-being in the body—is staying a little more with the area that does feel okay. So for example, maybe something in my heart center or around my throat feels tight and uncomfortable, but I notice that down in the belly actually feels quite okay. I relax and find that it feels quite warm and comfortable. So staying with the good instead of getting so sucked into where it feels difficult. That's number two, and it can be very helpful. Without fighting, just gently resisting the dragging of attention toward what's difficult, just gently trying to keep it more centered in what feels more okay.

The third option would be to imagine the breath or breath energy or just energy moving through the area of discomfort or pain in the body. For example, I might have pain in my knee when I'm sitting, and I just imagine that the breath energy moves through that place, down through the length of the leg, through the knee. Or I might be contracted in the throat again, and I imagine the energy flowing freely, unobstructed, through that area—perhaps even out the top of the head, or the other way, down through the top of the head, through that constriction in the throat. Imagine the breath energy moving that way, or just energy, these lines of energy. This can be really helpful—imagining the breath or breath energy or energy flowing through the area of discomfort.

A fourth possibility is imagining the breath energy or just energy moving in and out of that area of discomfort. So again, if there's tightness in the throat, discomfort there, something contracted painfully, just imagine the breath energy coming in at the throat. You might say, "Well, how does it get in?" A bit like in the guided meditation—well, it's okay, don't worry about the anatomy of this. It's just coming in and out, the energy, the breath energy at the throat where it feels contracted. This can sometimes be very, very helpful.

Or if you're doing the metta practice, you can actually—and this may seem counter-intuitive—station the center, the origin, the source of the metta right there where it feels contracted. So this tightness in the throat, imagine that this is actually where you're radiating the metta from. It's radiating outward from there. Or again, you could do it the other way around and imagine the metta radiating toward that point of discomfort.

The fifth possibility would be to imagine a white or golden-white or golden light, like a ball of light centered at the center of the discomfort or pain and radiating its light through the whole body. So again, you're aware of the whole body, not letting that awareness shrink—or when it does, opening out again. And then just with the imagination, imagine a ball of light centered where it's difficult.

And see how that feels. It's radiating through the whole body. You're feeling the whole energy body, the space, and feel how that feels.

Now, if none of those work—opening the awareness, staying where it's a little easier, imagining the energy move through that place of discomfort, or imagining the breath energy come in and out there, or metta radiating from it, or a light centered there in the middle of the discomfort and aware of the whole body—if none of that works, you can actually just bring a very light, steady attention on that area of difficulty in the body.

So just holding it in the attention as steadily as you can, but with a real lightness to the attention. And then, as you do that, really allowing—so really as fully as possible—allowing the feelings there, the feeling of discomfort, the unpleasantness, just to be what it is from moment to moment. Again and again, holding it in the attention lightly, steadily, and just allowing it, this moment, this moment—just let it do its thing. Really, really emphasizing the allowing as fully as possible. One hundred percent opening the doors to this moment, to moment opening the doors, allowing, welcoming the actual sensations, the difficult sensations. And that can be very, very helpful. We'll revisit that probably tomorrow.

And again, actually not just discomfort and pain, but also emotions and mind states—both lovely ones, pleasant and positive emotions and mind states, and also more difficult ones, negative ones, afflictive ones, hindrances. All this affects the energy body. This is part of what we want to investigate. I'm going to get into this more tomorrow. But it's something we really want to give attention to, notice, and also learn to work with, and I'll come back to that.

So there's discomfort or pain and what to do with that. And then there's also quite the possibility, as many of you will know, that this energy body can feel quite a lot of pleasantness, or even just a little bit of pleasantness at different times. So this is something—if that's the case, there's a feeling of well-being or comfort or ease or pleasantness somewhere in the whole body or just one region—we really want to include it. It may not be remarkable. It may be quite a subtle sense of well-being or comfort, not ecstatic, but it can be the whole range, in fact. But even if it's not remarkable, we want to include it in the awareness and actually become a little bit intimate with it.

Now this is especially the case if that pleasantness or well-being is not just in flashes. If it's just in flashes, like a flash of pleasantness or well-being, you just have to kind of open to it and let it wave through. But if it's a bit more steady, like it's around for some minutes that there's this comfort or well-being somewhere or pleasantness, then actually we can begin—in the whole body space, still keeping that larger space—we can actually begin to focus on the feeling of the pleasant energy itself, wherever it is, and kind of nuzzle the attention into it. The attention, really get inside that pleasantness, trying to enjoy it.

Open to it. So one modality might be to penetrate it with the attention; another modality might be to open the being to it, open the body to that pleasantness. So we're not just talking about focusing the mind if we say focus on the pleasant energy—we're also talking about opening the body to it, dissolving the body in it sometimes. As a sense of like dissolving that into the body, or dissolving the body into the pleasantness, sometimes dissolving the mind into—all these are possible, but ways of being intimate and really getting into the pleasantness if it's there, or any pleasantness if it's there and it's a bit more steady for some minutes. And the key thing there is really to just enjoy.

So for some of you, that will be a very new instruction—the permission and the encouragement even to enjoy well-being when it's more than momentary. To really incorporate it, literally incorporate it. Open to it, feel it, enjoy it, relish it. Very important.

Okay, one last thing, just again by way of setting this in a larger context. I suppose we could talk about three sizes of attention that we can employ at any time. We can employ —the mind has this capacity to sort of set its aperture like a camera lens or something. So we can certainly employ at times as human beings a very narrow attention. And many of you will be familiar with concentrating on the breath, say at the tip of the nose or the upper lip or just inside the nose. It's a very small point and we narrow the focus, the attention down there, and we pay attention to that. Or some point in the abdomen where we can feel the rising and falling of the abdomen. It's a narrow, spatially narrow focus of the attention. Or when you sweep the attention through the body, for instance, if you know the Goenka practice, the attention is moving, but it's moving in a narrow way. In other words, a narrow focus of attention is mobile through the body. It's still narrow. Or like when we began the guided meditation, I said pay attention to your hands and the tingling in your hands or the sensations in your hands. It's quite a narrow area of attention. So that's one modality, one size of attention that we can employ in practice at times. Very helpful.

A second is this bigger attention. The whole body, and as I said, even a bit bigger than the whole physical body. And that's what I call the energy body. We're really sensitive to the tone, the feeling, the texture in that. Of course, I could be sensitive to that in terms of the sensations as well. But we're emphasizing that size and also a kind of sensitivity in there that's more about energy. But that size, that sort of medium size—this whole body and a bit bigger—is the second one.

And the third one is very, very big, vast attention, a vast awareness, like the sky or the size of space. Sometimes it can feel infinite, just huge. And with practice, that's something that one can get very skilled at as well. And also with practice, one can get very skilled at just moving between these sizes of attention, these modes of attention, the apertures, and very skilled in all of them. They each give something different. They're each helpful in different ways.

On this retreat, we're mostly practicing that middle one—the whole body and a bit bigger, that size. That's the size of attention that we're mostly employing for this retreat.

Again, awareness will tend to shrink from that size, from that medium size. It will tend to contract because of certain conditions. When there's an afflictive emotion—fear, ill will, or sometimes even sadness, though that's a more complicated emotion—these afflictive emotions have in common that they shrink the awareness. The awareness contracts with those kinds of emotions.

Awareness will also tend to shrink, as I mentioned earlier, when there's pain or discomfort physically. That will also result in a contracted awareness. It will also shrink whenever the mind is distracted or caught up in thought or thinking. Have a look at what's become of the awareness—it's shrunken when that happens.

More generally, awareness shrinks from that slightly larger middle size of whole body and a bit bigger whenever there's any clinging or craving—any significant clinging or craving of a certain degree. It will shrink the awareness. They go together.

And lastly, we might say that awareness will tend to shrink just out of habit. For most of us, we need to train and develop a habit of slightly larger attention as we develop the practice. So we have a habit of the attention, the awareness, being slightly shrunk or quite contracted, in fact. That's very, very normal. Through practice, we can change that.

The important point here is that it will shrink again and again. As I'm practicing, I need to notice that it shrunk many, many times and expand it, stretch it out again to the whole body and a little bit bigger than the physical body—over and over. Notice, expand, over and over. Really, really helpful.

So today we're going to emphasize this samadhi, this quality of tending playfully, creatively, lightly to the energy body and whatever sense of well-being, of comfort, of ease, of pleasure even is possible there. Lots of options are possible for working with that, things you can play with. That's really the movement, the intention, the direction of samadhi: we're tending playfully, creatively, experimentally to the energy body and how it feels, helping it move in the direction of more and more well-being and enjoying that when it feels relatively good.

That's the focus for today. Again, if you're listening to this course at home and want to stretch it out longer, take longer with this part if you wish. Take a few days at least. We'll be emphasizing it throughout the retreat, so we will never lose this aspect of samadhi that we keep coming back to.

One last thing—I want to re-emphasize what I said last night to encourage you to slow down and let your movement of the physical body be gentle. The way you walk, the way you go up and down stairs, the way you close and open doors and handle things—let that be gentle and a little bit slower. Not to repress anything, not because we're interested in microscopic analysis of sensations there, but because that slowness and gentleness really helps develop and allows a kind of sensitivity and awareness of the whole body, but particularly of the energy body—this quality that we want to cultivate sensitivity to.

CHAPTER 3

Imaginal Practice: Doorways and Directions (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> In this second part of his introduction to imaginal practice, Rob Burbea delves deeper into the conceptual frameworks that give direction and depth to working with images in spiritual practice. He emphasizes that what makes imaginal practice most significant is not the images themselves, but the underlying philosophical and psychological frameworks we bring to support this work.
>
> Burbea outlines three key aspects of what he calls 'more radical conceptual frameworks': expanding our notion of self beyond conventional psychological and Dharma views through understanding emptiness; recognizing that fantasy, image, and mythos already permeate our lives and our understanding of Dharma itself; and exploring 'cosmopoiesis' - using imagination to open up our very perception of the cosmos we inhabit.
>
> Central to this approach is developing sensitivity to what he calls the 'energy body' and cultivating 'soulfulness' - an appreciation for meaningfulness, resonance, and depth. Burbea suggests this work can re-enchant our perception of self, others, and world, potentially opening space for experiencing divinity through the particular and personal rather than just the universal. He frames this not as abandoning Dharma, but as expanding our understanding of what Dharma practice can encompass, viewing traditional teachings like the Four Noble Truths as keys for investigating the malleability of perception itself.

Recapping very briefly some of what we've talked about so far: I mentioned the remarkable range of directions, flavors, and conceptual frameworks that support the use of imagination in Dharma practice, other traditions, and psychotherapeutic approaches. Given this range, when one practices with images and explores even a little, one comes to see that what's most interesting and significant about imaginal practice is actually the conceptual framework we bring to bear—the framework we create to support imaginal practice. This is what directs it in one direction or another, what opens it up, what gives it depth and amplifies it. So it's actually the conceptual framework, rather than the images themselves, that proves most interesting and significant.

There's a range of conceptual frameworks available, and I want to emphasize that it's up to you how much of this material you take, where you land with conceptual frameworks. It's really up to you how much and how you use images in your practice. Having said that, I also shared some of my deeper aims for this retreat, wanting to be open about that.

We talked briefly about the cultural history that, over millennia, has given rise to the dominant view in our culture—the view that most people share about reality and, by extension, about imagination and images, what place they have and what place they don't have. Some of this may sound academic, but it's important because those events, those decisions, these debates that happened filter down and become the common view over time. That's what we inherit, what we walk around in, what saturates and permeates our consciousness. It's quite difficult to move out of that, to even realize the force it has and the limitations it places on consciousness, on experience, and on our sense of existence.

Some are not okay with that dominant view. They feel its limitations, or they intuit or consciously recognize the limitations and the fact that it's not necessarily a final truth. They recognize the possibility, feel a calling, perhaps recognize the necessity of opening something up further with regard to imagination and its use—because of what it does with regard to the sense of self and the range of self-experience, the range of self-view and self-sense, and how much that's perhaps needed in these times. Also because of what it opens up in the range of experience and the range of what we sense as beautiful and holy. That whole range of what we regard as beautiful, holy, divine—sometimes people feel this already wanting to expand. They feel that expansion, that calling, that necessity.

With all that, what I'm perhaps most interested in, even above and beyond the use of imagination, is: can we expand our felt sense, our felt perception of the range of sacredness, of what is sacred to us? Can our felt sense of the sacred expand beyond either not existing at all, or beyond a quite narrow limitation somehow given to us by the culture? And through that, with that, is there a possibility for us to re-enchant the cosmos? The cosmos we've inherited from modernist thinking is a very flat cosmos of materiality. Is there a place for the skillful use of imagination that actually opens up something, deepens something, enriches something in our very sense of existence and the world, the cosmos that we live in?

I want to say more now about some of what we'll be exploring in terms of directions in this retreat, and also the kind of conceptions that run alongside the practice, supporting practice. Some of what I'm going to talk about tonight probably won't make complete sense—that's okay. We're throwing it out there as a signpost of where we're going, and also to plant a seed. You might think, "Oh yes, that's a piece I want to understand." So if you get to the end of the retreat and listen to this introductory talk again, you'll say, "Oh yes, that piece and that piece."

Given this cultural history and what is really the dominant view in our society regarding imagination, we're attempting to revalidate—to give validity and importance again to imagination, or certain kinds of imagination, certain kinds of use of imagination. We want to open space and place for imagination that's actually wider and probably more far-reaching than some of the ways it's used in typical psychotherapeutic approaches these days. To open space, place, respect, and validity for that which is wider and more far-reaching than it has so far.

We want to actually reintroduce or revalidate the idea of some uses of imagination as ways of knowing. This is something quite subtle and profound. We tend to think: when I have knowledge of something, I know I'm looking at a table. How do I know that's true? Well, I can kick it. I can ask a hundred other people. If ninety-nine people agree it's a table, that's good enough. Then I know something—I know something that's real. Perhaps I can measure it. Such factors give us a sense of knowing. But what about imagination?

That's not a way of knowing. But what is it? This question we referred to before—epistemology, how do we know anything? What is knowledge? What does knowing mean? That needs to be opened up for us. It's quite subtle and quite profound.

So is there a kind of knowing that's different than the commonly agreed upon meaning and range of what knowing is? If something is just me that sees this image, can I open up my idea of what knowing means to give more respect to imagination in some cases, in some usages, so it forms an avenue as a way of knowing?

To do that, to open up that space and place for some uses of imagination as a way of knowing, we need to map out and differentiate all the different kinds of image that arise—the aspects of imagination, the levels of imagination, the directions, all of that. What is, for example, just the flotsam and jetsam of the mind? What is just daydreaming? What is memory and the coloring of memory through image and fantasy? What is what's called ESP, extrasensory perception? What's archetypal image? What is the whole range that falls into mystical experiences that are possible in terms of perception of self, other, world? And what is this opening—Corbin uses this phrase, the mundus imaginalis in Latin, which literally means the world of the imagination? We can say the imaginal realm, the realm of the imaginal.

So differentiating, mapping out all that and all the nuances, all the subtleties of all that. To do that, to open up space and validity for imagination as a way of knowing, and to place all that in a larger coordinated philosophy and psychology that does explore this question of reality and opens up the exploration of reality—is it just yes or no, it is real or it's not real? Are there more subtle shades philosophically, ways we can open up that whole question of what's called ontology, the study of what's real? And as I said as well, the study of epistemology. All this needs opening up, to place it in that philosophy which includes ontology, epistemology, cosmology—the sense of the cosmos. That would be a huge task, absolutely huge task to revalidate it, to bring it in as a way of knowing, to give it respect, to map it out, to differentiate, to coordinate a much larger, more open philosophy.

So I actually don't know anyone after the scientific revolution who has even attempted to do that. I mean, it could be I just don't know them. I'm not aware. There have been certain people like Goethe, the poet, the German poet, and Coleridge, also a poet. Jung, of course. Owen Barfield, the English philosopher of the twentieth century. Apparently Rudolf Steiner—I don't know any of his works, I'm not sure, I heard indirectly. Ed Casey, the philosopher, American philosopher. Richard Tarnas, a little bit, sort of cultural philosopher. All these, in their way, have added a little to this quest.

And in Tibet, Mipham Rinpoche, a great, great sage of the Nyingma tradition in Tibet, I think in 1908 or 1912 or something like that—very beautiful and sophisticated philosophy bringing emptiness and Tantra together and the whole question of reality and levels of reality. I'm not sure how much by that time the sort of scientific revolution had reached Tibet or how much that was integrated in his thought.

There have been people who have done this, and I wonder now, and I wonder for this course and this retreat—can we add a little? That means you and me in our explorations and discussions. Perhaps we can add even a little bit, if that's not too grandiose an idea, to this movement and expansion and opening and exploration. You and I, together, talking, sharing our experiences. Is it possible that we can add to this opening movement?

Now, one thing that's perhaps necessary, or at least what is possible, is that we can elbow more room, more space, and more respect for skillful and nuanced, sophisticated use of the imagination, so that it's less immediately dismissed, so that at least there's a larger willingness to admit that maybe imagination is important for us. Maybe that it needs including in our psychology, in our sense and view of what the self is and our self as an experience, in our philosophy, in our worldview, in our whole idea about so-called reality.

So elbowing a little more room to include that and, as I said, to give it some respect as a way or really ways of knowing—different forms of imagination as ways of knowing, involved as particular ways of knowing.

One way we can do that is by actually turning around and exposing, questioning, critiquing the assumptions of the dominant culture, what I call the modernist metaphysics, that are, as I said, usually often hidden, not even fully conscious, and very rarely questioned. We can expose, question, and critique those assumptions that run almost in our blood, in the blood of our minds these days.

We can do that without reverting to a kind of simplistic primitivism, trying to go back to the Stone Age sort of thinking or some other culture from centuries and millennia ago, without reverting also to a kind of naive religious fundamentalism or naive New Age fundamentalism.

I've myself spoken and written just a little bit about this in different places with respect to nature, with respect to the self, with respect to the Dharma and other things, coming at it from different directions—either through Dharma understandings of emptiness, deep Dharma understandings of emptiness, or through more recent openings in Western philosophy, post-modernism, post-structuralism, that sort of stuff, even some of the openings from modern physics of the last hundred years or so. All of which I and I know other people find fascinating, really fascinating to explore, and actually it's very important, very important to bring a more sophisticated philosophy in, I feel.

And what's interesting to me, what's very interesting to me, is some people need that to kind of legitimize for themselves imaginal practice, to open the doors for them. They need this kind of elbowing of space, creating more space philosophically.

And some people don't need it at all. They're not even particularly interested in it. This itself is quite fascinating—why some people require this kind of philosophical foundation while others don't.

On this retreat, I'm actually not going to delve too deeply into all that philosophical territory. What I want to emphasize is practice—really getting into the actual work, certainly with some conceptual framework, but not so much a critique of dominant views as an opening up of other possibilities conceptually. I want to really emphasize the practice and see what that opens for us in terms of our experience, and then in terms of our understanding.

So regarding practice and what we'll be doing, I want to make clear what this is not. This is not Gestalt psychology, psychosynthesis, focusing, drama therapy, psychodrama, art therapy, voice dialogue work, or chöd—if you know that Tibetan practice. You may feel, and indeed there are some common aspects in terms of techniques with those modalities and ways of working.

But what I'm emphasizing here is differentiated primarily from those approaches by a different kind of conceptual framework—regarding images and imagination, regarding the self (including emptiness), and regarding cosmology: our sense of how we're looking at and conceiving and perceiving the world, the cosmos itself.

So while there might be some aspects in common, this work is actually differentiated significantly by the different conceptual framework underlying it.

As I mentioned before, I'm interested in the more usual conceptual frameworks regarding images and all those healing modalities I mentioned earlier. But I'm also, if you like, more interested in what we could call more radical conceptual frameworks.

Let me highlight three areas of this right now.

The first concerns the self. We touched on this earlier, but what would it be to really include a thorough sense of the emptiness of self? And then, within that or with that, to really expand the sense of self—not in some kind of expanding oneness, but in plurality. To expand the range of self, not to integrate what we see in imaginal characters or subordinate them to some central sense of self, but actually to expand radically, together with a view of emptiness. And to turn something around in our relationship to imaginal figures—what are sometimes called daimons—and our relationship with them, and the sense sometimes of what they're asking of us.

Instead of these figures serving the self and serving the so-called growth of the self or the journey of the self to awakening or enlightenment or full potential—all very valid—what is it to turn that around in terms of the direction of service?

The second aspect, which I've mentioned before, is the realization—the dawning—that fantasy, image, mythos is already permeating our lives. It's already functioning, already there. And this is not a bad thing. The word "fantasy" has very bad press, certainly in the Dharma world for the most part. But what is it to realize that it's already operating, already there in our lives, and that this is not problematic? We just need to recognize it.

And it's already operating in relation to our sense and conception and vision and very feeling of what the Dharma is for us. When we realize this pervasion of fantasy, image, mythos in our lives—that it also pervades our sense of the Dharma—this does something to our very sense of the Dharma eventually. It puts it on different ground. What then does the Dharma become? Is there another way of conceiving the Dharma given that realization?

The third aspect involves what I call cosmopoiesis—C-O-S-M-O-P-O-E-S-I-S. I'm going to talk much more about this as the retreat unfolds. But this really has to do with using the imagination to open up the very sense and perception of the world we live in, including the material world—very much including matter itself. Through imagination we realize that in a way—poiesis means creating, like poetry, like making poetry—there's an art to that perception and a malleability to the perception of the cosmos.

All three of these—regarding the self, regarding the pervasion of fantasy and what it means for the Dharma, and regarding this cosmopoiesis, this sense of the cosmos—all of this includes the importance and nourishment of a sense of soulfulness. That's another concept I'm going to explain more fully as we go. But I'm talking about meaningfulness, resonance, depth. These qualities are part of soulfulness for us.

We can also speak of soul-making. Again, I'll return to this in much more detail. This is very much part of the conceptual framework I want to emphasize over these days. This taking care of the soul through feeding and nourishing, giving attention to a sense of soulfulness—this soul-making—either will open up the sense of imagination as a way of knowing, or it already requires a kind of entering into a trust of the imagination as a way of knowing. These two aspects are intimately related to each other.

Let me briefly fill out what we're exploring here. One aspect of the conceptual framework I want to open is our understanding of the self. Is it possible, through the use of imagination in different ways, to expand both the notion and the sense—the actual lived experience—of self and other? When I say self, I don't mean just myself, but the selves of others as well. We're expanding the entire notion and sense of self and other.

Through this expansion, we come to feel and know the self as more than merely a result of neurological or genetic causes or accidents. It's perfectly fine to view the self that way—it's one mode of viewing, one mode of seeing the self. But is it possible to expand the whole notion of self way beyond that? Beyond seeing the self as simply a result of past conditioning in terms of family, culture, education, and so forth. Beyond too the view of self that is quite popular in the Dharma these days—that the self is just a process, that all there is is process.

Certainly beyond all that, but beyond too any kind of concretized or tight identification of the self with anything—any image or self-view or belief. Can we, through the use of imagination, expand the very sense, the very notion and view of self and other beyond all these limitations? We can include all that at times, certainly, but we're moving toward something radically beyond all that.

Part of what helps is a Dharma understanding that the self—this self, other selves—is empty, totally and thoroughly empty. This means much more in Dharma language than to say that the self is a process of the aggregates in time, a process of psychophysical constituents. To say that it's empty totally is to say something much more thorough and profound than that.

Realizing too that because the self is thoroughly empty, the perception of the self and the sense of the self is malleable. It's something that we can shape through and with the imagination. It's thoroughly empty, deeply empty, and it's malleable, this sense.

But going beyond even this—is it possible to expand the notion of the self, the sense of the self, way beyond the typical humanistic notions of self and personhood? As I mentioned, in Western culture, modern Western culture, and also in Dharma culture, there's a kind of poverty we have regarding notions and attitudes to personality and personhood. It's quite strange and in some ways self-contradictory. There's a kind of flatness there. We flatten personality a little bit, and in a way we flatten the possibilities for a sense of meaningfulness regarding the self and regarding the selves of others.

One of the ways of really opening that up in beautiful directions is through the imagination. Through this, what's quite interesting is that there can be a place again—we open up the possibility for re-including perhaps even a sense of divinity. That's another word I'm going to explore and expand on more as the retreat goes on. But is there a place for divinity in the self, through the self—this self and the selves of others? Can I open up that experience?

The kind of divinity I'm talking about right now is divinity in and through the personality. This is different because it's particular. It's particular to this being or that being, or the face that this being or that being is showing right now through my perception, through my imagination. It's particular. It's different from a kind of divinity that is simply homogenous, like "all is one"—everyone is part of the same oneness, the same one divine substance or whatever you want to call it that pervades the universe. That's beautiful, but I'm talking about something different now. It's not just universal; it's very particular and personal as well.

Again, we're going to get much more into this. But with that, there is also, as I mentioned before, a possibility for the whole sense of what is divine or holy to be stretched, to expand, so that we can allow a wider range. We can actually see and feel and sense a wider range of what is included in what divinity looks like and how it expresses. There are other gods, if you like—if we put it that way—apart from the ones that we are educated to see as divine, as holy, as sacred.

All of this is part of the second aspect of the more radical conceptual framework I mentioned before—part of a sense of expansion of the Dharma and our sense of what the Dharma is. This is quite interesting, even the word "expansion" itself.

How am I going to relate to this? Are we stretching and expanding the Dharma? Is that what we're doing here? Is that what the movement's going on? Are we fudging it and kind of saying, well, this is what the Buddha said anyway, this is what he meant. I'm not expanding anything, I'm just being historically accurate. Are we radically undermining the Dharma, perhaps? Are we regrounding it? So how even are we imagining that we're conceiving the relation of all this to the Dharma? Again, something I'll come back to later on in the retreat. These are big, delicate and subtle, complex as well, streams of what we want to get into.

Included in that, in terms of opening up of the Dharma and extending our sense of the Dharma, is that we're also extending or altering, for some people, our conception of the Four Noble Truths. What's so central to Dharma practice is teaching of suffering and ending, or at least reducing suffering. And instead using that teaching around suffering, instead of as a sort of teaching that in shorthand says something like, try and live a life of non-clinging. Instead of that, we want to include something, a different conception of what the Four Noble Truths are, rather seeing them as keys, or rather that teaching itself as a key that we can use to examine perception, meaning examine appearances, examine experiences, and see how that opens up.

It invites a way of exploring perception which reveals the emptiness of perception, the emptiness of appearance, the malleability of appearances and experiences. And through that, we're widening the range of possible ways of looking, widening the range of ways that we can perceive and experience and therefore live. So we're not locked into a Dharma view or attitude or attempt to live seeing everything as a process or trying to be in the now or just be mindful or something as if that's kind of the Dharma way or that everything's impermanent, which seems so obvious. And trying not to cling. Trying even to see everything as one. It's quite popular.

So we're widening the whole range of perception and possibility of perception, possibility of experience, through an investigation of perception. And that's a different way of understanding what the Four Noble Truths are.

Again, we'll return to this, and something else we'll return to too, I'll mention it now, is regarding this sense of the cosmos or experience of the cosmos, is it possible that that expands, that our sense of the world we live in expands, and instead of being just a world of flat materiality, devoid of meaning, devoid of deeper echoes and what I would call a vertical dimension. That's another theme I'm going to come back to, another concept I'm going to come back to, that the sense of the cosmos, if you like, is enriched and a vertical dimension is allowed through the imagination, through the conceptual framework, because the typical modernist view is a flat, one-dimensional, material cosmos. We'll come back to that.

So there's a few things here, just to summarize. We're recognizing that image, fantasy, mythos permeates our lives. This is key. We recognize that we see, we experience a lot of the time through image, through fantasy, through mythos. We think also through image, through fantasy, through mythos, and we love through image, fantasy, mythos. So we see, think, and love through image already, through imagination already, recognizing that. That's huge.

And this beginning to recognize, too, an aspect of our experience, a dimension of our experience, which I'm going to call the soulfulness, this aspect of meaningfulness, of depth, of resonance, of kinds of beauty, and much more, and really beginning to include that, to take care of it, to nourish the soulfulness. And through that is a kind of extension of the range of how we see the self. An extension of the range of what we consider beautiful, what we feel beautiful, what we feel is meaningful. Giving place to more and more.

And also this idea of giving back a validity to the imagination or certain uses of the imagination as ways of knowing, everything that's involved in that. And through that to re-enchant the perception of the self, of other, of cosmos, to perhaps open up a sense of or an allowing for a sense of divinity there. And what I'm going to call the vertical dimension. So expanding the range of the sacred. And through all this, perhaps, probably opening up and maybe even changing the relationship with what we consider dharma.

So I'm not, as I mentioned, talking about chöd on this retreat. I'm not actually teaching tantra in the way that it's usually thought of, though there is much overlap in the kind of things that we'll be talking about. And I will talk about tantra a little bit and the connections, etc., a little bit.

But given what I've said so far, it's really asking, we're really asking for open-mindedness in the way that you approach this material and also in the way we listen. And listening is quite an interesting avenue of experience. Sometimes we listen and we listen to something and say, oh, I already know this. It's the same as something I already know. And we kind of put it neatly in a box of something where oh yes it's psychosynthesis, oh yes he's talking about focusing. So oftentimes we listen for the similarities and we kind of shrink something that's maybe quite new or different and shrink it into a box that we already know. We actually miss what's new and different and potentially stretching or challenging. So is it possible, as you're listening over the days, to listen in fact deliberately for the differences.

Listen for what's new and what's different from what you already know, and the boxes that you might already have regarding imagination. We tend to listen in a way that affirms what we already know, rather than challenges us or opens up our frameworks. So open-mindedness and openness of listening is probably really necessary on this retreat.

I'd like to say a little bit more about this in regards to the Dharma and how we conceive of and relate to it. It would be very understandable if someone listening has a kind of loose conception of the Dharma—maybe I haven't really articulated it clearly. A loose conception of the Dharma might involve something like this: The Dharma says, try to always be present, because this is it. This life is it. This moment is it. There's nothing else. This is what's real, and we don't want to miss it. So you want to be present to it.

In addition, this popular conception might say: try not to cling. Try to let go, because everything's impermanent—which seems obvious. You can't hold on to it. And it might also add: try to be kind. That might be too simplistic—perhaps a little unkind putting it that way—but that's kind of the conception we might have of the Dharma. Try to always be present because this is it, try not to cling, try to let go because everything is impermanent, try to be kind, try to be nice.

Some people might have a conception of the Dharma that's a little more influenced by streams such as the Advaita tradition. The kind of goal—if you like; I might not use the language of goal—is to somehow always be in a sense that all is one. Everything is one. Or to always be in a kind of sense of no-self. There's no self. The self is not arising or is non-existent. These are two quite common, very loose conceptions of what Dharma is that are quite popular these days.

But what if we contrast that with a different conception that I would like to introduce and fill out a little bit? Those injunctions or perceptions—to see everything as all-is-one, or to see and feel there's no self, to be present, to not cling—all these are rather modes. They're modes of perception, what I call ways of looking, temporary options. In other words, one can go in and out. There's great flexibility of perception, of the way of looking.

So I can go into this way of looking and see all-is-one, can go into that and see different ways that the self is empty, can go into non-clinging in different ways. They're all modes of perception—modes, temporary options of ways of looking. There's flexibility there.

What Dharma is, is the practice of this flexibility: practicing a range, a whole range of types of awareness, sensitivity—modes of awareness or sensitivity, different modes of awareness, modes of sensitivity, again, what I call ways of looking. The multiplicity of perception, a really large range of perception and experience, is available to us as human beings that we can actually sense. It's not an intellectual concept. We can actually perceive very differently at different times. And that's what we're practicing through all these Dharma tools and Dharma notions.

Related to that, there are different types and modes—different degrees of non-clinging. There are different ways of non-clinging, different degrees of that. We can let go of clinging just a little bit, or deeper, deeper, deeper, deeper levels. These modes and degrees of non-clinging overlap with the greater range of practice—the flexibility of ways of looking, of modes of awareness, sensitivity.

Through all that, through the practice of all that and developing all that, the perceptual possibilities are opened. We really start to see: how I look, the way I look, conditions what I perceive. The range of perception opens up. We understand perception is empty. We understand the emptiness of all appearances through that. This brings the deepest freedom. To the degree that we see, that comes the deepest freedom in life.

But also what comes from that is further opening up. Through seeing the emptiness, we actually open up further. Through doing these practices, we open up further our sense of the range of perceptual possibilities.

The flexibility of perception is also open. Perception of the self, perception of the other, perception of world and cosmos. So there's freedom coming out of all this, and there's also this opening and flexibility, malleability of the perceptual possibilities. And that, in a way—I mean, there are definitely limits—but in a way, it's infinite. There's an infinite range, an infinite multiplicity possible for us.

So when we say "let go of clinging" or "don't cling" or this or that, it's not—in this way of living, in this way of conceiving the Dharma—it's not that we're trying to move through our life without clinging. It's rather that letting go of clinging is part of a range, or different ways of letting go of clinging are part of a range of ways of looking. Quite a subtly different but hugely different conception.

Because there's this flexibility, there's this malleability and multiplicity of the range of perception and the range of ways of looking—modes of awareness, if you like, modes of sensitivity—that we can practice and develop and open up. That means that Dharma, as practice, is not just one track, is not just one thing. Don't cling or be present or this or that. It's not simple in that way. It's rich and complex and various.

In addition to all that, as I mentioned before, we begin to recognize the necessity of fantasy, the inevitability of fantasy, and the primacy of fantasy—how much fantasy, imagination, mythos is woven into our perceiving and conceiving of the self, of our psychology and that of others, of life, of beauty, and also of the Dharma, as I said, which includes notions of awakening and also includes the notion of the Buddha and the historical Buddha.

Now, in more recent Western philosophy, this also has a parallel in philosophy and then in more recent approaches to history as well. It's called the turn towards hermeneutics in philosophy and later in history. So really this understanding that we're always bringing, if you like, interpretations, biases, ways of looking, fantasies, into our perception of history. So it's not saying we can make anything up about the Buddha, or historically, but it is saying there is no true, objectively existing single story of the Buddha, history of the Buddha.

So we start to realize that it's imbued—our vision of the Buddha, our history of the Buddha is imbued by fantasy. And so is our vision and our sense of the Dharma and of awakening and all this stuff. And maybe in all this, for some people, they say, "I'm going beyond the Dharma now." Some people say, "I've gone beyond the Dharma."

That's the question. Is it? Is it not? How is that for you? Is it okay? What does it mean? Have we gone beyond Buddhism? How am I going to relate to that? Big, big, big questions and important ones. And not necessarily easy.

Okay, so just a few practical things. We have five or six days here together, so really all we can do is open some doors and point in some directions, give pointers and tips for practice. Some of you will want to explore these directions and these pointers much more. Some of you will really want to take this further. And of course you could, if you're listening to this later or on recording, you can take much longer to go through this material, much, much longer. Really take your time and develop it. We're cramming, if you like, quite a lot of material in a short time.

But related to that, it's also really important to realize that we have a retreat of a certain amount of days, and it can be very easy to judge the retreat in terms of what experiences arise in this period of time. But this is not a good way, not a sensible, insightful way of orienting to a retreat. It's not so much the experiences that are important. I mean, they are important, but they're not really what's crucial.

What I hope you can prioritize is understanding, developing, making your own ways of working. So really taking ways of working and conceptual frameworks and supports from the retreat. So that's really what we should regard as our aim—a sort of digestion of ways of working, a developing of skill in terms of meditative ways of working and also the concepts that support them. And that should be the aim rather than aiming for any experience.

And that's true for any retreat. Absolutely, I would say that on any retreat—the regular Insight retreat or whatever, Metta retreat, etc. But particularly here, because if I can learn the tools and learn my way around—learn the ropes, as they say—if I can learn that in terms of practice and get a sense of how the conceptual frameworks might support me in the directions I want to go, then that can stay with me.

The experiences don't necessarily stay with us—the highs of the experiences don't necessarily remain. So we really want to keep thinking about what we want to take from here, what we want to digest and integrate.

I was wondering about offering this retreat, and some of you may be listening as we go through the material and wonder: is this very advanced? The truth is, I don't know. I'm not sure. My experience is that for some people, it might be that certain other elements need to be in place before they can work well with the imaginal practices, and for some people, not. So it seems quite individual. Really the answer to the question "Is it advanced?" I would say, so far, not necessarily. It depends.

I am wondering more generally these days about a kind of curriculum—what would be the tools and meditative skills that need to be developed to really give a person the best platform for their practice to move and keep expanding, to open up into more and more adventure and possibility? That's something I'm thinking about, but I don't know if this material is necessarily advanced.

It's an interesting thing too, because a typical insight retreat would say, on the first morning: "Okay, now concentrate on your breath, and if your mind wanders, come back to being with your breath." Something like that. In a way, if we hear something like that, it sounds very simple. It sounds like that's probably the simplest possible instruction you could give—just what does it feel like when you breathe, and when the mind wanders, come back to those sensations.

So it sounds like the simplest instruction. It's certainly the most familiar for most people in the wider culture these days, and it's very easy to understand. It's also easy to understand the why of that instruction. Why would you do that? Because almost no one anymore in our culture, whether they meditate or not, needs convincing that focus is a good thing—the ability to focus the mind and keep it focused. Almost no one needs convincing that calm at times is a good thing. And almost no one needs convincing that it's important to be present. There's a lot of emphasis now in the popular culture about being present with the moment and all that. So it's very familiar, that kind of instruction. It's very simple and seems easy to understand, easy to understand why we would even give it.

But actually, as a teacher, I have to tell you—if you don't realize it already—that for most people it's really not easy to do. To be with the breath, to concentrate on the breath, is actually something most people really struggle with, despite that seemingly simple instruction. And we don't often elaborate much on it in many retreats because we move on to other material about being more with the general experience very quickly. So a person kind of concludes, if they stay meditating, "I'm crap at that. I'm pretty useless. My concentration is rubbish." I don't know how many people have told me that in the past. They sort of accept it and say, "That's okay, you know, whatever."

Whereas unfamiliar structures that we might be going through on this retreat—unfamiliar practices—they may be harder to grasp and even understand why we're doing them at first, but they may not necessarily be harder to do. So we'll find out. But don't automatically assume that they are harder just because another kind of instruction sounds simpler or more familiar, or because it's easier to make sense of given the prevalent frameworks and conceptions that we bring to practice.

So over the days—another practical thing—we'll be unfolding different teachings and instructions. And like I said regarding this introductory talk, I'm going to mention things and then return to elaborate them in fuller detail. There's quite a lot of material, but we'll keep cycling around certain themes, many of which I've actually mentioned already in this talk, although I realize not enough for you to fully understand just from this talk alone. But there will be this kind of elaborating, returning to elaborate a bit more, et cetera, of certain key themes and directions.

In the first few days, we're going to almost solely explore and develop practices in relation to what I call the energy body. I'll explain that tomorrow morning. But we're also going to keep that as a practice—this sensitivity to the energy body—throughout the retreat. So the first few days we'll focus almost exclusively on it, and I'll explain why. There are very good reasons. But it's going to be something that's actually going to form the basis of the whole retreat.

So again, if you're listening to this on recording and you want to go through this material at home, I really, really encourage you to linger even longer developing your practice with regard to the energy body and the different ways that we're going to talk about it. Let that really be the basis for the imaginal practices as we introduce them. I will keep emphasizing that as we go through the retreat.

You may want to get or keep a notebook, certainly for the teachings. There will be many teachings, and much of this material will be quite new for most of you, including the practice instructions and practice tips. It can be helpful to jot them down so you have them available to refer back to, if you like to do that sort of thing. Then also, working with images—some people find it really helpful and quite interesting to keep a notebook of the imaginal work they're doing: the different images that arise, the themes that recur. This can be a very beautiful thing to do. So it's up to you, but some people will want to keep a record of the different threads of what's unfolding.

One very practical matter before we end. I want to encourage you to slow down if you're here on retreat for these days—an encouragement to slow down as you're walking around the house. Slow down at least a little bit, if not quite a lot, and see if you can be more gentle in your movement. First, there's no reason to go fast when you're on retreat. We're not really in a hurry here.

But why am I emphasizing this? It's certainly not to dampen your spirit or your vivaciousness or your energy—absolutely not. And it's not for the same reason as in some retreats, such as Mahasi-style retreats or others, where they would say slow down because they want to put the sensations of the body under closer scrutiny, a kind of microscopic analysis as it moves. We're not slowing down for that reason.

On this retreat, we're interested in a different kind of precision of attention. It's not a microscopic analysis of sensations. I'll explain this more tomorrow. But we're interested in a different kind of subtlety of attention, a different kind of precision. Going a little more slowly, moving a little more gently in the way you open and close doors, handle plates, whatever it is—this allows and supports the kind of quality of awareness and sensitivity to the energy body that I'm going to introduce tomorrow.

So as you go through the retreat, just being a little more slow, a little more gentle in your movements will really support that kind of sensitivity to the whole body, and particularly to the feeling of energy in the body—what I call the energy body. This, as I mentioned, will be a very important thread throughout the retreat. It's actually an important basis for everything we're going to do in many different ways.

A skill with the energy body, an awareness and sensitivity to the energy body, as I'll explain, can become over time a profound resource to us as human beings in many different ways, and in regard to many different practices and directions of practice. So as much as you can, I really encourage you to slow down and be gentle, because it's truly going to support the investigations, explorations, and practice we'll be doing over the course of the retreat.

CHAPTER 4

Imaginal Practice: Doorways and Directions (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this opening talk of his course on imaginal practice, Rob Burbea maps the vast landscape of imagination and its applications, from practical planning to spiritual transformation. He examines how imagination is used across traditions - from the death contemplations in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta (MN 10) to Tibetan tantric visualizations - while addressing cultural prejudices against imaginal work inherited from centuries of Western rationalism.
>
> Burbea distinguishes between conventional uses of imagination (developing qualities, concentration practice, psychotherapy) and what he calls more "radical" approaches that can revolutionize one's sense of existence itself. He explores common objections to imaginal practice - fears of madness, conflicts with materialist worldviews, going beyond suffering-focused dharma, and discomfort with non-traditional imagery - while explaining why others are drawn to this work.
>
> Central to his teaching is the recognition that conceptual frameworks around images matter more than the images themselves, and that imaginal practice can open doorways to re-enchanting our sense of self, world, and cosmos. This foundational talk sets the stage for exploring how working with images can transform not just meditation practice, but our entire understanding of what dharma practice can encompass.

Welcome everybody, welcome to this retreat and to this course on imaginal practice.

I think tonight, by way of introduction, I'd like to start by talking a little about imagination and particularly trying to open up some space—if that is needed—in our minds, in our hearts, and our collective psyche really, in relationship to imaginal practice. I also want to talk about the kinds of doorways and directions that exist within imaginal practice.

If we consider for a moment the range of ways that people practice with imagination, or the range of uses to which imagination is put—and particularly the kinds of directions, the kinds of conceptions that form around imagination and imaginal practice, and the kinds of flavors that practice can have—directions, conceptions, and flavors—we can see quite a range here.

The imagination can be used for planning, for creative planning, for visioning in the sense of creative visioning. For example, people talk about visioning a different future for society, for civilization, for humankind in regards to the challenges of climate change or environmental degradation and destruction. People speak about needing a new narrative, a new story there. This is a use of the imagination as visioning or inspiration.

For example, at Gaia House, we have periodically Gaia House visioning meetings. Where do we want this organization to be in five, ten, twenty years' time? What are the directions we want to move in? What would we like to see happening? It's a use of imagination in a very instrumental, practical way, really.

Then there might be, for example, the use of imagination to develop certain skills or to rehearse—in sports, to imagine a certain shot or a certain movement or situation in a game, or perhaps in music, a certain passage at the keyboard if you're a piano player, on the instrument, whatever it is. Imagining mentally can actually develop the motor skills—interestingly enough, they've found—to increase one's skill and one's performance.

Then there's a whole range of the use of imagination for self-improvement in different ways, for the cultivation of qualities or attitudes—qualities and attitudes that might be deemed helpful, necessary, worthwhile. And here the range is huge.

For example, in the Satipatthana Sutta, the Buddha's basic discourse on mindfulness, one of the longest subsections is in the mindfulness of the body section, and it regards the contemplation of death. Part of that is going to what was then open cemetery grounds and contemplating corpses in different stages of decay. But the Buddha also says, well, if that's not possible, you can do it in your imagination.

What's the purpose? What's the conceptual framework that's holding that? Well, the intention behind it is for dispassion—dispassion regarding this body and to a certain extent regarding this life—and also a sense of urgency. So urgency with regard to practice, with regard to awakening and the path, and dispassion with regard to other aspects of life, and in relation to the body, etc. That's generally in the Pali Canon their reason for doing that imagination around one's death.

Here, it's interesting to note in that practice, the imagination is regarded—the images used are used in the service of realizing a concrete fact: the material decay of the body, the impermanence of the body. So that's an interesting limitation on the use of the imagination, an interesting direction. It's in the service of a concrete fact, and particularly material decay and the impermanence of the body.

Also in the Pali Canon, the Buddha, in a few different places, advises—particularly if you're beset by the hindrances or feeling a lack of inspiration or faith—he says, think about me, bring me to mind. It's called recollection of the Buddha, practice of recollection of the Buddha. And this is said to bring inspiration and bring also a sense of faith and sense of urgency, sense of possibility in oneself, in the path, in practice.

Also within the Dharma—different Dharma traditions and other spiritual traditions—there is the use of the imagination in the service of cultivating qualities like metta, loving-kindness and compassion. For example, imagining the bodhisattva of compassion, Avalokiteshvara or Kuan Yin, or imagining the Buddha, or if you're in a different tradition, imagining Jesus or Mary. And through the image, constellating, if you like, channeling perhaps these qualities of love and compassion—that helps our love and compassion increase in our hearts, helps our hearts grow into, expand into those qualities. And in some cases, also there will be a growth, a support of aspiration: What do I want to move towards in my life? What do I want my heart to open to and towards? An increase in aspiration, an increase also in faith for some.

Very similarly, or extending from those kinds of practices, is a whole vast range of tantric practices regarding the imagination—tantric visualization practices, particularly practices involving tantric deities, yidams they're called in Tibetan Buddhism. And this actually is quite interesting because by now, as it's moving into Western culture and becoming a bit more popularized and lots of people are doing these kinds of practices, the range of conceptions that underpin tantric practice is huge. It's really quite varied. We'll go into that perhaps more later on in the retreat.

But again, a person might be viewing the use of imagination or practicing with images in order to develop their own strength, a quality like that—my strength, my ability to be strong in life, courageous, bold, upright, set boundaries, etc. So sometimes borrowing from tantric practice, for example, the more wrathful deities—fierce, demon-looking creatures—and imagining, visualizing them in practice, in order to develop these qualities for the self and the self's unfolding path.

Even—I heard someone told me—John Kabat-Zinn in teaching mindfulness suggested on occasion to imagine oneself as a mountain or just to imagine a mountain for the purpose of bringing in or allowing in or imbuing the moment with a sense of unshakability. Unshakability of being, of perhaps equanimity, also a sense of groundedness.

So again, it's the use of the imagination in order to develop or bring in certain qualities that are helpful for the self.

And then there's a whole range of possibility—very wide these days—of certain more recent psychological and psychotherapeutic uses of imagination: Gestalt psychology and other psychotherapy and other forms. So for instance, the inner critic or the superego—beginning to imagine them and dialogue with them, perhaps put them in another chair and enact them and move between the self and the inner critic, or a figure from a dream.

But often in these kinds of psychotherapeutic approaches, all these figures—whether it's the inner critic or a figure from the dream—they're all regarded as somehow belonging to the self. They belong to me. They are parts of me somehow. And in some way I want to integrate them into me to make myself more of a whole human being, a more balanced human being. I don't want them being stronger than me somehow, more powerful. I want, in a way, to tame them, to subordinate them to some kind of more perhaps rational or at least sensible sort of executive decision-making self.

And there's a kind of unitive view there, that all these disparate figures—crazy as they might seem, uncompromising as they might seem at first, or unusual, whatever—they're all brought in to be made part of a kind of unity, a wholeness of self. And that's often the vision or the conceptual framework or the directionality of that kind of psychotherapeutic work.

And in many traditions, something as simple as looking at a candle and then shutting one's eyes and meditating, focusing on the inner image, the remembered visual image of that candle is used purely as a concentration practice. Again, it's quite a narrow directionality and conceptual framework. There's no significance given to that object—could be anything. A candle, a stone, it doesn't really matter. There's no significance at all to the imagined object. It's just an exercise that's useful for developing focus of mind, steadiness of mind.

Actually, on this retreat, starting tomorrow, we'll talk about using the imagination to develop what I call samadhi—and I'll explain how I'm going to use that word as more than concentration. I'll explain that tomorrow. But we can use images to work with opening up the energies of the body and what I'll call the energy body, which I'll also explain, to bring a sense of resource, of harmonization, of energization, of openness, of well-being into the being. So we'll explore and explain all that.

So all these, and actually many more that I want to go into in quite a lot of detail, are possible in terms of the ways, the directions we can go in with the imaginal practice and the ways we can think about them—the conceptual frameworks we can put them in.

And of course, there's the possibility as human beings just to be lost in daydreaming, to be lost in worrying about the future and rehashing the past in what we call papañca in the Dharma tradition—just the mind spinning, perhaps with images and fantasies, but not really very helpful in any way at all.

So all that and much more is possible in terms of directions, doorways, and conceptions of imaginal work and use of images for us as human beings.

And when we get into this, and probably as we practice more with work with images and practice with them, we start to realize, I think—especially if there's an open-mindedness—that actually it begins to occur to us that the most interesting aspect of working with images and imaginal practice is not in fact the images themselves. They can be—and we'll go into this—they can be really far out or don't seem particularly interesting at first sight. But it's actually not the images themselves that are the most interesting aspect.

The most interesting aspect is rather our relationship to those images, and particularly the conceptual frameworks that we bring to bear around the images that support those images or send them in certain directions—the conceptual frameworks that we create. If you like, that aspect ends up being the most significant but also the most interesting.

Now, when we talk about that, and as I've kind of alluded to before, many conceptual frameworks are possible in terms of images and imaginal practice. Many directions are possible. For me, almost all of them are interesting and they're all okay with me. So I really want to emphasize that. All of that's okay. Well, most of them are okay in terms of how you're going to use images, how you decide to use images.

If I'm honest, I say the agenda I have for this retreat—and I do have an agenda—part of my agenda is really to support you in your practice with images and open possibilities for you. So that's my agenda, and that's partly up to you, where you want to go with it. So there is my agenda, but there's also—and you'll pick this up, I might as well flag it right now and admit it right now—I have this agenda of supporting and opening what's your desire and your inclination with regard to images.

But you'll pick up that I also have a leaning, personally, and I'm not going to hide that. I have a leaning to what we might say are more radical conceptions regarding imagination and images. I'll explain more what I mean by that, but the kind of conceptual framework around images that is most interesting to me and that I probably lean to more right now, or that range, is rarer. It has a rarer appeal, I feel, it seems to me, as I look around me and listen to people. Not that many people are interested in it, but you'll pick up that that's my leaning.

You'll see what's involved, because I'm going to unfold that quite a lot over the days. I'll explain, as I said, more what I mean by what's included in that radical conceptual framework.

But in part, part of it includes being open to the range of the kind of images that may come up or that we might entertain or work with. So, to put it a little simplistically, I am very interested and I would like to open the doorway to the whole range—in terms of the kinds of images, both the kind of gentle, sort of white light, angelic kind of diaphanous images that might appear to us full of obvious love and gentleness and kindness, and all the way to including what might seem at first darker or weirder or might seem to some sensibilities or preconceptions a little bit more disturbing, perhaps.

So I really want to open up that range and make it all really okay, really trustworthy. And I mean more than that in terms of the conceptual frame, and I'll explain more as we go.

But that's tricky, then, because I'm in the teacher role here, and so I'm asking you, if this is possible—trust what you want, how you want to orient in terms of imaginal practice, which might change for you over time.

But please trust your sense of your purpose with all this—with images, imagination, imaginal practice. It might be for some that even at the end of this retreat, after exploring all this material, you take away very little. Maybe you take away just an occasional technique using images in your dharma practice. That's all it ever becomes for you—something you use occasionally to spice things up when practice feels a little flat. That's completely fine and entirely up to you.

Or it might be that what you come to—and some of you may already be there—is something far more expansive: a total explosion, a complete revolution in your way of seeing and conceiving of practice, of dharma itself, and what that means to you. A revolutionary shift in how you see and conceive the self, existence, and the world. This isn't merely a shift but a profound, far-reaching transformation of understanding.

So we could ask: imagination and images in the service of what? In the service of self-development? Fine. In the service of standard dharma practice? Fine. In the service of something even bigger than that? That's the question. What is imaginal practice in the service of? What are images in the service of? Or rather, what am I making imaginal practice and images in the service of? What am I allowing images and imaginal practice to be in the service of? That's up to you.

I'll be honest about one of my deeper aims in offering this retreat and course. I'm deeply interested in the possibility of opening up a different sense of existence. I feel and know this is possible through imaginal practice—as it is through other means, but particularly through certain approaches to imaginal practice. The whole sense of existence, of self and others and this very world we live in, can become quite different in a beautiful, lovely, and profound way.

Wrapped up in this transformation are not just the perceptions that become available—the perceptions of self, other, and world—but also new conceptions of existence and new conceptions of dharma itself. So part of my deeper aim is opening up the sense of existence in these ways, along with the conceptions of existence and dharma.

Part of my reason for saying this is that it implies something that may sound strange: having or getting visual images in one's practice is not really that important. We're actually introducing something else—a different sense of existence, a different conception of existence, of dharma, of practice, of the world opening up. This may affect how you approach the practice. Don't grasp after images or wonder why you're not getting them. Hold a different aim in mind at a deeper level.

Related to this, it's worth noting that in my experience, both personally and in working with individuals in imaginal practice, the whole practice evolves in many ways as one works with images more. Like many practices, it evolves toward greater subtlety, becoming subtler and subtler in numerous ways.

Often at first, imaginal practice—certainly in my experience—was quite clumsy and gross. There might be a tendency for many people to identify too tightly or closely with an image or imaginal figure. Or for a while, to feel like there are no images, that nothing is arising. One's view of what should be happening becomes too constricted. I'll explore this more later.

But whether the practice feels clumsy and gross, or whether there seem to be few images arising, either way, what can happen over time is that more subtle sensibilities begin to open. This is actually what interests me most: the support, opening, and growth of a more subtle sensibility regarding existence, regarding the world—one that is more imaginally imbued, more infused with mythos and fantasy. I'll explain what this means as we continue.

Some people are drawn to this course because they already have many dreams—vivid, intense dreams every night. Or they have images that come to them in meditation or at other times, and they feel they want a way of working with this material. They intuit that fruitfulness is possible with these images, and they sense they need a framework for conceiving of those dreams and images. This would be tremendously helpful, especially since our culture at present is quite impoverished in terms of frameworks for working with and regarding images.

The history of cultural attitudes toward images is quite fascinating. There has been, historically, considerable denigration of the imagination—both philosophically and psychologically in Western culture—over centuries, perhaps millennia. In a book called Invisible Guests, psychologist Mary Watkins discusses this cultural suspicion. It stems partly from the view of scientific reductionism and partly from the medical model of psychology and psychotherapy that became firmly established in the mid-19th century and onwards.

But interesting, actually, today, by way of aside, the secular mindfulness schools are also kind of rooted—not completely, but a large part of their rooting is in a kind of medical model. That's where they come from. That's what they're rooted to. That gives them certain attitudes, presumptions, and allegiances, if you like.

Historically, in the nineteenth century, there was a sort of—psychologists, and then the wider culture, would look back on people like Socrates, who spoke with his daemon, his D-A-I-M-O-N, his guiding counselor, if you like. People like Socrates, people like Swedenborg, people like St. Catherine of Siena or Dante, other great artists—many, many people.

Retrospectively, none of these people held to a medical model of psychology. None of these people had any allegiance to scientific reductionism. Yet retrospectively, nineteenth-century psychology and that whole medical basis and attitude regarded them as kind of crazy—maybe high-functioning, but kind of crazy—because of their relationship with imaginal figures.

And even, amazingly enough, Descartes, who of course was one of the hinge pins of the scientific revolution—actually I didn't know this until recently—had a being that followed him down streets urging him not to abandon his search for truth. Some kind of imaginal character followed him and kept pushing him not to abandon his search for truth. So even that would have been regarded as crazy and is regarded as crazy, despite everything else these people were able to do and give birth to in their lives.

So perhaps there is a place for artists, perhaps in some other places and dimensions of our existence, but it's pretty limited. The whole attitude in modern culture towards the imagination is not really to explore it very widely, unless it's for a very limited purpose—like you want to make a crazy movie or something, or you're a novelist.

Instead, what comes into the whole sensibility and way of seeing the world is a kind of literalism. There's just an absence of other dimensions. Everything is just what it seems to be.

You see also, more specifically, in the more common psychological assumptions as we moved into the twentieth century—still talking about the history of cultural attitudes in the West regarding images—so the psychoanalyst W. R. D. Fairbairn, who died in about 1964, I think. There, to sum it up too briefly, the attitude was: if there is inadequate parenting, the young child will seek to withdraw or escape in an unhealthy way from external reality, which he or she should be confronting, dealing with, opening to, relating to. External reality—that's the primary thing. That's what's most important. You should be doing that at the exclusion of any attending to internal fantasy, private presences, or figures.

So when there's inadequate parenting, there's a withdrawal in this view from external reality and an increase in this sort of internal private fantasy figures, and that's regarded as pathologically unhealthy for the infant and, because of that, into adult life—something very unhelpful.

Then just a little bit later, the psychoanalyst D. W. Winnicott, who died in 1971, allowed a little more room for the imagination through his work with play and work with children. He had the idea of a transitional object. So for example, the teddy bear for the child is regarded as a transitional object. It's not regarded by the very young child as totally created by the self and controlled by the self, but neither is it totally something separate and discovered. It's in between those two modes of being—completely subjective, creative and created and controlled, and completely discovered and separate from the self.

And Winnicott said, this is okay. This is even important, but it's transitional. It's a transitional phase. We want to move beyond it. Proper growth, proper psychological maturity means moving beyond and eventually leaving behind these kind of imaginal figures.

But even way before this, before the twentieth century, before the nineteenth century, James Hillman chronicles some of this in some of his writings. Even the Council of Nicaea—the church Council of Nicaea in 787 AD—there was already a doctrinal move in the church, very significant, very far-reaching, to depreciate the images and the significance and status of images.

Then, less than a hundred years later, in the Council of Constantinople, the doctrinal move to regard the soul as being purely the rational spirit—so less the realm of images. That realm of images, the soul as a realm of images—and we'll talk a lot about this over the days—that whole understanding or dimension of soul was either cut off or regarded extremely suspiciously or belittled.

And again, as the so-called Western Enlightenment, the scientific revolution of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries began and gained more momentum over the coming years, there was the emphasis and elevation of reason and reasoning and empiricism and materialism, really, and measurement over such qualities and capacities as the imagination. So that was, again, a very important move in the cultural development, if you like, in our cultural history that we've inherited.

But again, Henri Corbin, a great champion of the imaginal and a scholar of certain forms of Islamic mysticism in the twentieth century—I think he died in the seventies—points even further back than the Enlightenment and the scientific revolution to the twelfth century, when philosophically there was a debate between the school of Aristotle and the school of Averroes. Aristotle triumphed and became more influential, and this was a move away from what was the more dominant Platonism. Again, with that comes—laid the seeds for empiricism and a denigration of the imagination, the place of images.

Why am I saying all this? Because it's our cultural heritage. It's the air we breathe. Or more than that, it's the water we swim in, like a fish swims in water and doesn't—well, who knows what fish think—but doesn't even realize. We don't even realize. This is the dominant view that we imbibe and that we think through and see through. We see everything by means of this view regarding images and imagination.

So all of these aspects of the cultural history—just highlighting a few points there—all of these and more give rise to or set in place, often quite rigidly, a whole set of attitudes and a whole set of beliefs, in fact, regarding the imagination, regarding the self, regarding psychology.

Beliefs are interesting because most of the beliefs we have encrust and encase and enclose the views that we have, and oftentimes we're not even fully conscious of what our beliefs are about self and selves and psychology and images and reality and all of that.

We can even believe that we have no beliefs, or that because we are practicing mindfulness, we have transcended beliefs entirely. "I've gone beyond beliefs," we might think. But no—look a little closer. There's a lot more going on in terms of unexamined, unconscious beliefs.

All of these cultural and historical events, movements, and developments create and set in place a kind of enclosing space—even a weight—of attitudes and beliefs that inform our practices. They shape what we practice and what we don't practice, how we practice and how we don't practice. This, to me, is very important to realize and then to investigate.

It's been interesting for me in recent years, teaching imaginal practice and finding ways to work with people around this dimension of dharma. I've noticed there are four main reasons—four common objections—that some have to imaginal practice, or what we might call imaginal dharma.

The first is the fear that surely it will make you crazy. "You start entertaining all these images and fantasies, you lose touch with reality, it fragments the self—you'll go crazy." This is quite a common concern I encounter.

The second reason relates to what I've been discussing: the dominant cultural view regarding what is real is immensely influential and usually unquestioned. This is simply what we absorb from culture, what we learn in school. Most people don't have adequate philosophical tools to really explore and question these assumptions. We just absorb them from the culture.

This is why I speak of a metaphysics being provided—usually unconscious, usually unquestioned. What do I mean by metaphysics? Traditionally, in philosophy, it involves three areas: ontology, which investigates what is real and classifies what is real and what is not real; epistemology, which examines how we know anything, how we gain knowledge, what knowledge we can trust (for example, imagination is deemed untrustworthy, but if we can measure something, or kick it, or others agree on it—if it's not merely subjective—then this is knowledge we can trust); and cosmology, which asks about the structure of this world, this cosmos we inhabit.

These three areas form a kind of metaphysics that we simply absorb from the dominant culture, usually unconsciously and unquestioningly. This affects all kinds of things in our lives and hugely impacts our practice. It profoundly shapes how we think of, regard, relate to, and conceive of images and imaginal practice.

The third reason some might object to imaginal practice is that when we really open to this dimension, we sometimes sense it may invite us to go beyond the whole paradigm of ending suffering or reducing suffering—which is central to the Dharma as most people conceive it. The Four Noble Truths are all about suffering and its cessation. Yet practicing with images, we start to sense different inclinations becoming available, different directions, a different range beyond just that. This may not sit comfortably with some people, though I'll speak more about this.

The fourth reason involves the content of the images themselves. The images that arise, or that people hear about in teachings or from others sharing their experience, don't fit into their usually unconscious fantasy or mythos of what Dharma should look like. The stranger images, the more erotic images, the weirder or so-called darker images—these don't match the fantasy flavor of Dharma they've entertained, and this feels disturbing. Something is pushing against familiar limits.

Related to this is when images feel foreign, outside the range of fantasy, image, mythos, or archetype that a person favors or feels comfortable with. There's also often an operating assumption that the self-image should be quite singular rather than plural. When a multiplicity of self-images arises—when multiple images in the psyche are given equal validity, equal beauty and significance—this opens the whole sense of self away from singularity into plurality. For some people, this too feels unsettling.

However, some people are not comfortable with the dominant cultural view. They're not okay with all of that, and they find themselves drawn to imaginal practice—drawn, in fact, for many reasons.

It might be, for example, that they are attracted to or they already sense other dimensions of self. They sense themselves or their being or their psyche in this more pluralized way—and not in a way that's necessarily crazy. This multiplicity might feel attractive, ring true as deeper, more interesting in the sense of the self. And so that quality is opened through imaginal practice.

Something feels bigger and more wide-ranging than the typical humanistic way we tend to regard the self these days in our culture. Perhaps a person resonates with, finds meaningful, intuitively recognizes a kind of truth to a more archetypal notion of the self—the self, our human self, as if you like, channel of some other... it's hard to put into words... some angelic or archetypal being. And what kind of reality does that have? We'll get to talk about all this. Someone senses that in and through their life, actually senses it, feels their life that way, or intuits it already, perceives self that way. Sometimes that is the case, and that makes imaginal practice very attractive.

And for some people, imaginal practice legitimizes, it finds a place, it re-sanctifies certain aspects of being that can very easily be sidelined or dismissed or denigrated or looked down on. Eros and the erotic. More wrathful energies. Divine madness. A trickster-ish quality—not so straightforward and simple. All these are dimensions, if you like, of being. They are archetypal faces. They are aspects of self, and a person might feel that they have been squeezed out or unlegitimized, their holiness not seen. So this also makes imaginal practice very attractive to many people.

In relation to that, it's quite interesting now because I would say that our modern sense of self—well, long before the 21st century even, but our modern sense of self—it seems to me, as I read the Pali Canon, obviously talking with so many people, our modern sense of self is not the sense of self, the experience of self and the whole notion of self and personality that existed at the time of the Buddha and the Pali Canon.

So you read the Pali Canon, there's almost no reference to anyone suffering with inner critic, which is epidemic in our culture, so huge in relation to the kind of self we feel we have. I don't see anyone who suffers from feeling like they're not expressing themselves, or even regards self-expression as something important. Or anyone who talks about something being repressed in themselves or their self-expression. No one relates the pain of, for example, not feeling seen deeply or met deeply or heard deeply. These are very modern experiences—notions, experiences, feelings, sensibilities. No one complained, it seems to me back then, about their self-expression being blocked.

So it seems to me that we need something more in our notion of the self for the modern West. In the modern West, I think there's quite a lot of confusion around the self, which is a whole interesting thing in itself. We live in a culture where the self is very emphasized and highlighted and sort of celebrated, and has a kind of triumph. There's an elevation of the self. But at the same time, we really poo-poo ego and point at that very quickly—especially in spiritual circles—and are very quick to regard this or that as a manifestation of ego. So we have a confused relationship with the self and its importance, what it actually is, how we experience it, how we relate to it.

But even more than that, the modern West has a kind of poor or thin, relatively poor, relatively thin, uninteresting psychology around personhood—not really honoring of personhood as fully, as extensively as might be possible. We seem a bit confused about all this.

And with personhood, somehow we sense palpably the beauty of a person, and yet intellectually we're supposed somehow to regard their personhood, a person's personhood, as having its roots in nature and biology and neurology or genetics, and/or in nurture—the so-called nature-nurture debate—in the environment, in environmental causes and conditions. So the roots are, if you like, pretty thin for this personhood which we somehow also, many of us, feel to be so beautiful, so important, such a lovely dimension of existence, of being alive.

There is also in that this whole sense of the singularity of self that we're sort of accustomed to conceiving of—a singular self, versus a more multiple self, although in some situations that is acknowledged. And this is one of the things that I want to open up on this retreat: a wider, more pluralized sense of self, as I said earlier.

Now this is not just the same as some of the ways some people talk of anattā, this teaching of not-self of the Buddha. We're not just wanting to say, "Oh yes, I have many characters in me," and then sort of just let them be, or not empower them. We want actually—or I want to emphasize this—in some of what I want to present over the coming days, the possibility of empowering those characters, that multiplicity, of bringing them to life, vivifying them, giving them more life, of viewing them differently.

So sometimes this multiplicity is acknowledged, but sometimes it's just on the road to sort of disempowering these different characters, if you like, that make us up, if you want to put it that way. But I'm interested in something different.

Sometimes it's recognized. So, for example, F. Scott Fitzgerald, the novelist, wrote, "There never was a good biography of a good novelist. There couldn't be. He's too many people if he's any good." So it's recognized that there's that plurality. But I want to go even beyond just the recognition of it.

For some people, exploring imaginal practice even briefly, they begin to sense quite quickly how it frees up the sense of self in relation to what I was describing. A flexibility comes into the self-view. Quite a few people have said to me they experience a sense of liberation through playing with imaginal practice. In a way, one is playing and practicing with a flexibility of self-view and world-view. In imaginal practice, one explores that flexibility of views of self and world in different ways.

For some people, it unfolds in reverse. As their practice matures and they begin to have broader and deeper insights into emptiness—and for some, through engagement with modern philosophy and postmodernism—doors open for them in their practice and in their life that re-validate or make valid the imagination, the exploration of imaginal images.

Some people are drawn to imaginal practice and begin to realize, simply by paying attention more sensitively and intently—more discerningly—to their experience and psychological processes, that fantasy and image already imbue our life. They permeate even what we regard as the Dharma itself—our path, our practice, everything that involves. Some people recognize this already, and that realization invites them through a doorway in certain directions related to exploring images.

Then there are those who already have a sense of existence, a sense of the world and cosmos that is not confined by the dominant cultural view of what I call modernism. Or they're drawn to opening that up—opening up a different sense of existence, of the world, of the cosmos. This is the thrust of tantric practice: to open up that different sense of world, cosmos, and existence.

In the Jewish tradition, modern scholarly writings speak of the midrashic condition. Midrash in Jewish tradition represents their interpretations of biblical passages. What's fascinating is that there's never a single right view and wrong view. There's always this infinity of interpretations, an infinity of openings possible for any piece of text. Some modern scholars have described the midrashic condition—this way of being that sees not just the Bible, but also self, other, world, and cosmos as open, infinitely open to an infinite range of interpretability.

Through this approach—whether through tantra, this midrashic condition, or what we're doing—there can be something I feel is so important, so beautiful: a re-enchanting of the cosmos. This is something perhaps that the world and human civilization at present desperately needs—a re-enchanting of the cosmos, an opening of our sense of what is sacred.

Some people are drawn to imaginal practice because they sense this possibility—perhaps clearly, perhaps just vaguely or intuitively—through imaginal practice.

CHAPTER 5

A Little Exercise for the Imagination

Rob Burbea · 31 min

> In this guided exercise from his Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea leads practitioners through a series of imagination practices designed to explore and develop imaginal sensitivity. Beginning with simple objects like peaches and apples, the exercise progresses through familiar places (childhood homes, bedrooms), beloved people, natural settings (beaches, autumn forests), and music. Throughout, Burbea emphasizes maintaining awareness of the energy body while exploring how images arise through different sense doors - visual, auditory, tactile, or olfactory.
>
> The teacher clarifies that imaginal practice is not primarily about vivid sensual details, but rather about developing sensitivity to the emotional resonances, energetic qualities, and meaningful 'vibes' that accompany images. He addresses common concerns about not being 'visual,' explaining that imagination works differently for different people and can be cultivated through practice. This foundational exercise introduces key principles of imaginal practice: that images need not be visual, that imaginal sensitivity can be trained, and that the emotional and energetic dimensions of images are often more significant than their sensual clarity.
>
> This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners a practical entry point into imaginal work, demonstrating how ordinary imagination can become a doorway to deeper dharma practice when approached with mindful sensitivity to the energy body and emotional resonances.

Let's do a little exercise together now. If you want to come into your meditation postures, establish yourself, take a few moments to establish the posture. Upright, comfortable, awake and alert, yet relaxed and open. Receptive.

Just settling into the body, connecting with how the body feels right now. Spreading the awareness throughout the whole body, the energy body, sensitive to the whole energy body. Just abiding there, inhabiting that space of the energy body with awareness for a moment or two.

Let's see if you can, as we've mentioned briefly, stay in touch with that sense of the energy body. It's never something you really lose as we do this exercise. So there's the awareness, the sensitivity to how the energy body feels as we play a little bit with this little exercise.

With that sensitivity as the basis, as something, a touchstone if you like, is it possible to imagine, to conjure in the imagination, to allow into the imagination a peach—a juicy, ripe peach right there, right in front of your nose, right under your nose? Can you feel its texture in the imagination, the sort of furry texture under your fingertips that peaches have? Maybe you can see it—colors of reds and oranges, yellows? Maybe not. Maybe you can smell this peach, that particular aroma that peaches have. This might be very subtle in the imagination.

What if you bite into that peach now and it's particularly juicy? Maybe the juices dribble down your chin from the corners of your mouth. Can you taste it?

So it might be that some sense door aspect of the imagination was easier there for you than others. That would be very normal.

What about an apple? Should we try an apple? So similarly, maybe it's a Granny Smith apple, you know, those dark green apples. And again, it's right there. Can you feel it in your hand, the hardness of it? Can you smell it, that particular smell that apples have, those kind of apples? The smell of freshness. Different kind of texture under the fingertips. Smooth.

What if you bite into that? Can you hear the crunch biting into this green apple? And the taste then in the mouth, that particularly tart taste, almost sour some of them, the apples.

Play with this very, very lightly. See what works for you.

How about a rose? If I say, can we bring a rose, the image of a rose, what happens? Is that a visual image for you? Or do you smell it? Can you get a sense, a flavor of the fragrance of this rose? Can you feel its delicate petals between your fingers? Smooth, or maybe slightly dragging on the fingertips. Maybe you can sense it somehow. Somehow you get a sense of this rose. Maybe somehow you sense, what color is it? What color is this rose? It may not be that you see that color, but somehow you sense it.

Remember to keep some of the awareness with the energy body, with the whole energy body, and just playing with the sense or senses plural of this rose. And you can let that go.

How about trying to enter in the imagination the image of your bedroom at home where you live? Your bedroom. And again, perhaps you can see it. Perhaps you have some other sense of it. What is the feel, the vibe, if you like, the feeling right now of your bedroom for you that you get in relationship to that image of your bedroom? It might be a whole combination. It might be quite a rich vibe feeling. It might be quite subtle. It might be peaceful or restful, or it's a mess, or all kinds of things. And just, maybe you can even look around the bedroom.

Maybe you get more of a sense of what's in it—the different furniture and other things. This image, in whatever way it's coming, of your bedroom, and also the sensitivity to the energy body, and also the awareness of the feeling, the vibe that your bedroom has right now for you in the image. The vibe that's with the image, maybe.

Now again, staying with the energy body here and now, the feeling of energy, that whole space that we've been talking about. And opening your eyes. We're still doing the exercise. So opening your eyes and just looking around the room—this room here and now that you're in. So not your bedroom, this room that we're in right now. And just glancing around, getting a sense of the whole room. Maybe it's a room you know very well. Maybe it's less familiar to you, but just getting a sense of it.

And then again, closing the eyes and seeing if in the imagination this room can be alive to you—the image of this room that we're in right here, right now. Staying with the energy body, seeing what comes in terms of the image or with the image of this room. What kind of feeling does it have or feelings? What's the vibe or the complex of vibes with this room?

Beauty, perhaps. Dread for some people. Sanctity, safety, love. Purity, devotion—can be many things, or not much at all. But just notice if there is a feeling or a vibe that goes with the image of this room right now. And aware of the energy body as you sit here with that image of the room. Of course that may well include the presences of others right here, right now—the images of the presences of others.

Now how about, let's move on from that—how about trying the house or apartment, a house or apartment of your childhood, somewhere where you grew up or spent a portion of your growing up years. Is it possible to let that come as an image, this house or apartment from years ago perhaps?

Maybe you can sense it from the outside. Maybe you can enter into that house or that apartment in the imagination and explore. Enter the rooms. Again, it may not be visual—it may be some other sense. It might be a smell. It might have certain sounds associated with this house, this apartment. Perhaps some of the furniture or carpets—there's a certain texture even in the body.

And see if you can include an awareness again of the feeling, the vibe, or the emotional resonances that come up with this image of the house or different rooms in the house as you're exploring it, in the apartment.

Okay, so it doesn't matter whether you got all the way through the house, if it was a big house, or you really slowed down. It doesn't matter. It's just playing a little bit, an exercise to illustrate something.

Now let's move on. And is it possible to allow into the imagination, or bring into the imagination, conjure the image or the sense of someone you love? Friend, family member, lover, teacher, student—someone you love.

And again, it may be a visual image. It may be you see them very, very clearly. Maybe you see them vaguely in the eyes of the imagination. It may be more you just have a sense of them—their particular personhood, their presence that's particular to that person, something recognizably them, a feel, a vibe, but somehow someone you love and their presence in the imagination.

Again, staying in touch with the energy body, feeling how that feels as you dwell with and lightly focus on, holding the attention, this image of someone you love. Maybe you can feel the love and the particular qualities or kind of love you have for this person. You feel your enjoyment of them, your delight in their being.

You can gently let them go—the image of them go—if you like, and see: is it possible to imagine yourself at the seaside? Maybe not one of those crowded tourist beaches, but a more solitary beach. Perhaps there's one or two others there. Perhaps this person you love is there with you. Perhaps you're there alone.

Can you hear the surf crashing? Is it crashing waves, or is it gentle lapping waves? Maybe you can hear seagulls. Maybe you can feel sand underneath your bare feet? Is it sandy beach, or is it pebbles or rocks? Is it hot? You smell the sea air.

And when we say something like "smell the sea air," it's partly sensual, it's partly also the whole vibe of that and the whole resonances that that might have for you—the smell of sea air right by the water.

Is it possible to imagine yourself walking along the water's edge? Perhaps running or even dancing by the ocean there, by the water's edge on this deserted beach. A lot of energy, vitality, a lot of vital chi, energy.

Perhaps you can feel that. It's almost as if you feel the movement of the imaginal body there dancing. Feel that somehow at the same time as this physical body is sitting here still—sensitive to the energy body—we can feel this other movement, this other body, the imaginal body dancing, leaping, perhaps turning.

Just connecting with that imaginal environment, that imaginal scene, in whatever ways work for you. Letting yourself be playful, seeing if you can come into close contact with that.

Or how about a different scene? Entering some woods or forest on an autumn day, late autumn, and the forest floor is covered with leaves, with autumn leaves. Can you hear them perhaps crunching underfoot, or is it soggy, damp?

Can you get a sense of the vivid autumnal colors of the trees, the remaining leaves on the trees? Can you get a sense of the air? Sometimes those autumn days are bright and crisp, clear. Sometimes they have more of this foggy quality. Damp.

Maybe you can touch the trunk of a tree, feel its bark, the texture of the bark on the palm of your hand, on your fingertips—the solidity, perhaps even the beauty, the venerability of this tree.

So again, we're open, we're including the sense of the emotional vibes and the resonances. It's part of the image.

And one last one. How about a piece of music or a passage even—just a passage of music that you love, that you know very well, that's familiar to you? Maybe you can hear it really clearly. Maybe you just have a sense of it. Maybe you hear some parts of it, or it's just the quality of it, the vibration.

Somehow you can perhaps imagine or let play in the imagination this piece of music. Again, as you're listening to that, letting that play in the imagination, still sensitive to the whole energy body and the energetic and emotional resonances of that piece of music for you right now.

So maybe it brings energy, expands. Maybe it's exuberant. Maybe it's more melancholy, gentle. How does it affect the energy body? What are the emotional resonances there? It doesn't matter if you don't have words for these things, labels.

Okay, and when you're ready, just opening your eyes slowly.

So we're actually a little unsure whether to do this exercise at all—a little ambivalent about that—in case it gave the wrong idea of what we're doing and where we're going with this whole imaginal practice, or where I was most interested in going. But there is a reason for doing it.

So many people say to me, "Oh, I don't get images. I don't know what you're talking about. I've heard about people—I don't have that. I never see anything." But I hope from this little exercise, just playing a little bit, you can realize that when I use the word "image," first of all, I'm not talking about anything necessarily visual. It may be visual, it may include the visual, but it's not necessarily that.

Some people are very visual, some people are not visual. Someone else is very aural—their ear imagination is very developed—and some people are less so. There's individual styles of sensitivity to the image, to images, and one person may have different senses that are alive for them, and each image might be predominantly this one or that one. So there's a great range here.

The second reason for doing something like this is actually to realize that in some ways we can train the imagination. In many ways we've been trained out of the imagination. But doing this sort of thing, playing with it a little bit—I would rather work with images that are more meaningful for you than some of these might have been, like an apple or whatever—but one can actually train with images.

The more one puts oneself in contact with images and tunes to them and focuses on them and stays sensitive, the more that sensitivity develops. The imaginal sensitivity develops. We become sensitive to images. It's something we can practice. Through that, images can become for us generally more vivid, and we can feel that they become—we become more connected to—we feel more connected and the whole thing is more alive like that, more vivid.

But really, and why I was ambivalent about this exercise, is I don't want to give the impression that imaginal practice—and I'm going to emphasize this again as we go through—I didn't want to give the impression that imaginal practice is primarily about the sensual details of the image. They may be very strong, they may not be very strong. In a way, it's not so important.

So whether I can really taste the tartness of that apple—it may be significant, but it may not be that important at all. The sensual aspect of the images, the sensual details of the images, are not always that important.

We will be more interested on this retreat, and in the kind of directions we want to go, with more of what I call the vibe or the resonances—emotionally, energetically, in terms of meaningfulness—than the sensual details, which may or may not be vivid and clear and very detailed.

But the vibes, the resonances—this is something that we want to develop our sensitivity to and get more and more sensitive, more and more exquisitely tuned to. They may be clearer than the more visual details or sensual details of the image.

Still, this may give you a sense of what's possible.

It's really—I'll talk about this again, but I'm just wanting to give a sense of what's possible. And especially if you feel, "Oh, I can't relate to this at all because I don't have images," please don't let that discourage you. The invitation here is much broader and more inclusive than it might initially appear.

What we're exploring together is a vast territory of inner experience, one that extends far beyond the visual realm. Some of you may find that your imaginal capacity expresses itself through other doorways—perhaps through feeling-tones, or energetic sensations, or a quality of knowing that has its own intelligence and wisdom. The key is remaining open to however this faculty wants to manifest in your unique system.

Remember, we're not trying to force anything or create experiences that aren't naturally arising. Instead, we're cultivating a receptive awareness, a kind of listening that allows us to notice and appreciate whatever subtle movements of consciousness are already present. This is a practice of deep intimacy with our own being, honoring the particular ways our inner landscape wants to reveal itself.

As we continue this exploration together, let yourself be curious rather than concerned about whether you're doing it "right." There is no single right way. There is only your way, your particular doorway into this rich dimension of practice. Trust that whatever is arising—or not arising—is perfect material for our investigation.

CHAPTER 6

Energy Body: Instructions (2)

Rob Burbea · 46 min

> In this second instructional talk on energy body practice, Rob Burbea deepens the exploration of working with emotions through direct awareness of the energy body, particularly along the body's central axis or midline. He presents two complementary practices: cultivating samādhi through attention to well-being in the energy body, and developing emotional awareness by attending sensitively to whatever arises in the energy field without trying to change it.
>
> Burbea explains how energy body sensitivity forms the foundation for all meditation practices—from mettā to emptiness practices to imaginal work. He emphasizes that emotions comprise both mental states and energy body states, and explores the full spectrum from intense feelings to subtle energetic qualities. The teaching includes practical guidance on the quality of attention needed: directing, energizing, and tuning awareness appropriately.
>
> The instructor outlines four key aspects of working skillfully with emotions in practice: cultivating beautiful heart qualities while releasing unhelpful emotional habits, developing sensitivity to the full range of emotional experience including subtle states, learning to handle intense emotions with presence and skill, and understanding how emotions arise through dependent origination. Central to healing difficult emotions is bringing the beautiful into contact with what is challenging, using well-being as a resource to hold difficulties with tenderness rather than aversion.

I already mentioned that this work with the energy body—practicing directly with the energy body, developing the sensitivity and skill there in different ways, generally giving it attention—will really form a thread through the whole course here, because it forms a basis for a lot of what we're doing.

So it's going to stay with us through the week: the development of the practice with regard to the energy body and the skill with regard to the energy body. And actually, hopefully that skill and development of skill with the energy body can continue to develop through our life, because sensitivity and skill with regard to the energy body will offer all kinds of tools, all kinds of support in our life, in our general awareness and sensitivity, and very much in our practice—in our life of practice in many different ways as we go on and develop and deepen and widen our practice.

You know, we've talked about samadhi and the resource that samadhi is for the mind, for the body, for the whole being—a resource in terms of practice, but also a resource in terms of life and ability to let go. In a way, you could say what samadhi is, or a large portion of the spectrum of samadhi states as they go deeper, are really states of the energy body. There are openings and energizations and particular ways the energy body feels and the mind feels within that in harmony with the energy body. And so using the energy body to start with as a way in to develop samadhi and develop the resource of samadhi is, if you like, approaching it more directly. It's one way of approaching it, developing the samadhi.

Working with the energy body—really part of the purpose of that is for the sake of cultivating samadhi, developing that resource, that deep well of well-being within us that can then be accessible to us in our life at times and for our practice.

We also mentioned how capacity and skill developed with the energy body will also enable us in different ways to work with difficult emotions and how necessary and helpful that is in our lives as human beings but also in our practice. Very important skill for a human being to develop, or skills—range of skills for a human being to develop.

In fact, giving attention to the energy body and developing that sensitivity gives us emotional and energetic sensitivity for all practice. So I would actually ground almost all meditation practices in a sensitivity and an awareness of the whole energy body and really include that as something that's basic and fundamental to how we might approach any practice, all practices.

So for example, with metta or loving-kindness practice, there's a way of doing that that I would encourage—when I teach metta—to really have the sense of the whole energy body as a basis, as the kind of foundation for the metta practice. And in emptiness practices, again, the sensitivity, the awareness of the energy body and the inclusion of the feeling of the whole energy body is really helpful, indispensable for navigating within certain emptiness practices, most emptiness practices and other insight practices. So helpful.

And the same is true, as we mentioned, with imaginal practices, to pick up on the subtle resonances, the nuances of images and imaginal figures in imaginal practice, and to navigate between images and have a sense of where to move, how to move—really helped by staying in contact with the energy body and being sensitive there. And again, it keeps mindfulness around with regard to imaginal practice, keeps it grounded in the bodily sense.

And as the days go by and we start talking much more and predominantly about imaginal practice, just to point out now that really on this retreat I'm going to be encouraging very much a moving back and forth between practices focused primarily on the energy body—for example, samadhi, as we've already talked about, and a second practice around emotional awareness with the energy body that I want to talk about today—moving back and forth between those practices directly with the energy body on one hand, and more direct imaginal practice on the other hand.

So back and forth, and even that imaginal practice is always tied in with the energy body. So no one is probably going to sit or probably should sit and just be focusing on images all day. I'll say more about this later on in the retreat. But there's really what I want to encourage: back and forth. Focusing on the energy body, either for cultivating the samadhi or for the emotional awareness I'll talk about now, and between that and imaginal practice still sensitive to the energy body.

So that, in fact, in terms of time, you will probably spend, or I hope you will spend more time directly with the energy body than with imaginal practices. Again, I'll talk more about this, about the balance and the fluidity of balance there. But all this, again, is just a way of saying how fundamental and important and central it is, the practice with the energy body. So I'll keep referring to it. I'll keep adding little bits to our work within developing that. And do ask about it, please, and different aspects of practicing with the energy body.

So this morning what I want to really talk about mostly is emotional awareness via the energy body.

What do we mean by emotion? Well, actually emotion is one of these inexhaustibly deep subjects. Let's just say for now that what we mean by an emotion is a state of the mind, a state of the awareness, and a state of the energy body, both. So an emotion includes both the mental, if you like, and the state of consciousness, but also the state of the energy body. And that together, those two—the mind and the body, the energy body—make up, or rather form two aspects of what's included in any emotion, or most emotions.

And within what we mean by emotion, what I mean by emotion for our purposes now is certainly the beautiful, lovely, so-called positive emotions that probably feel quite pleasant, and also the more difficult or afflictive or negative emotions. So I really mean all of that when I use the word emotion, and I mean both the quite obvious emotions that may be quite intense in the experience, and also the more subtle range of emotions.

So something like boredom or peacefulness, peace, is quite a subtle emotion most of the time, unless it's a really profound peace. These are more subtle manifestations of emotion. I really want to include them. And sometimes there's just a sense of not much is happening emotionally. So I want to include that, that sense of not much. Feel okay. Feel pretty peaceful. So intense and subtle.

All of this for our purposes in practice. All that is important. The whole range we want to include in our explorations in practice.

And just to recap what I said last night about putting this work with emotions, meditative work with emotions, in a much bigger picture in terms of what are we trying to do as practitioners with our emotions? What are our aims regarding our emotions, or at least some of our aims, principal aims, as practitioners?

And we said that this included the cultivation—the gradual cultivation—of the beautiful qualities of the heart that the Buddha emphasized so much: love and generosity and compassion and equanimity and more. These positive, beneficial qualities of heart undergo a gradual cultivation over time. It's probably not steady, but gradual, let's say, cultivation of those qualities.

Conversely, over time there's a gradual letting go of the habits of creating negative emotions—difficult emotions, emotions that are really not that supportive, that do not serve us. So we have the cultivation of the beautiful and the helpful, and the gradual letting go of what is not so helpful, or the letting go of the habit of creating what is not so helpful.

How does that letting go happen? It happens through the cultivation of the positive, in a way. It happens also through understanding what's going on—how we create what's positive and also how we create what's negative, how that is fabricated. So understanding plays a big part in dissolving these habits, and also learning how to dissolve a negative emotion in practice, how it might be helped to unfabricate, to take away some of what's locking it into place. All that's part of the big trajectory regarding emotions.

Secondly, there's the increasing capacity to actually be in contact with what's happening in our heart, in our emotional life—to feel our emotions as they pass through. We want gradually to develop more and more sensitivity to our emotions and the emotional life and the whole richness and spectrum and depth of that, including subtle emotions. So much about deepening practice is actually about deepening in subtlety. So really developing that sensitivity over the whole range, including the subtle.

Then also, we mentioned a third aspect: learning to handle our emotional life, to handle what passes through when it's quite intense. Or sometimes when it's not—to be present when it's more subtle and it doesn't seem like much is going on. Certainly to handle the more afflictive emotions, the more difficult emotions, but also the positive emotions that sometimes can be very intense—joy or love, and so forth. A person is very often not used to feeling such intensity that's pushing out, expanding the range of the heart. So learning gradually to handle what comes through, what comes up emotionally—meaning to be able to hold it well, to tolerate, but also to hold it in a helpful way. To hold what's happening emotionally in our heart in a helpful way. That's part of handling.

But also part of handling is knowing that in the way I'm handling, for instance, this difficult emotion or this afflictive emotion, the way that I'm handling it actually helps to ease it. If it's an emotion that doesn't serve, it helps to ease it on its way to dissolution or helps to dissolve it. So that's also part of handling. Handling is not just putting up with—or sometimes it is tolerating.

This development of the sensitivity, including to the subtle range regarding our emotions, and this learning how to handle, how to hold and tolerate—those two aspects are very much a part of imaginal practice, very much part of all imaginal practice.

Then a fourth aspect of the big picture, the big journey or trajectory regarding our emotions in our lifetime of practice: through all of these different aspects that we've just mentioned, we really want to, over time, see and understand, witness the dependent arising of emotions. How are they fabricated? Dependent on what? These are not just personal factors. They're more—if you like—impersonal, or just ways that consciousness works, ways that perception and the mind, if you like, the heart work. So really understanding that dependent arising regarding emotions. And there's a lot involved there. I'm not going into that so much on this retreat, but really understanding that dependent arising regarding emotions.

Through all of these aspects, in terms of the big picture, we could say that through all of that we have more and more available to us for our practice and for our life. We have available to us more the instrument of our heart—this delicate, incredibly beautiful, sensitive instrument, this amazing instrument that is our heart and its capacity to feel and its subtlety and its nuance and its range and its extraordinary power and beauty. So we really want in our lives and our practice to have that instrument available and know how to read it, how to play it.

So we have the samadhi practice, which we talked about, and the intention of the direction to tend to that wellbeing and cultivate that in the energy body. And now today—and I mentioned some of this last night—but now today we want to add a second practice, a second direction of intention. And that is really an attention to any emotion, or any experience which may not be an emotional thing, pleasant or unpleasant, that manifests in the energy body.

We said that a lot of the action will happen on the midline, this sort of vertical axis. It could be right on the surface there, like almost on the skin, so to speak, or inside—it doesn't matter, could be either. The attention to what goes on there along that midline does not have to be correlated to some bit of the anatomy. Oh, that's in my small intestine, whatever it is. We don't have to do that necessarily. It's just: I feel this there. And what does it feel like?

So whatever sensations or occurrence of an emotion or an energy somewhere on that midline becomes the foreground—a steadiness of attention. That's the foreground of what we're paying attention to in this practice, the second practice. And the whole body, the whole space of the energy body forms the background. So there's a foreground of attention and a background of attention. The foreground is this—for example, this tightness in my heart right now.

And I'm really tuning into that with this steadiness of attention. But in the background, I'm still aware of the whole energy body space.

So what do we want to do with that? Anything that arises—an emotion or not an emotion, pleasant or unpleasant—in this practice, I can decide to turn towards it and give it, as much as I can, a steady attention. Keep the attention lightly focused on what's going on there, on either the whole midline, or usually it's more some portion of the midline, some area around maybe the throat or in the middle of the head or something. Give it that steadiness of attention.

Light holding the attention on it, and then giving some awareness to the quality of attention. So it's not just that it's trying to be steady and when it goes off into distraction I move the mind back, but also: does the attention need or want to be quite delicate with this emotion or energy that I'm paying attention to on the midline? Does the attention need to have a kind of holding quality to it, as if it's holding lightly this emotion, perhaps this sadness, or these moments of sadness, these sensations of sadness along the midline, perhaps around the throat or the mouth or the heart center?

And there's a sense of, rather than boring into them with a laser beam—which sometimes is really appropriate and helpful—maybe this emotion or this quality along the midline needs a much more light holding, as if the attention is like cupping the hands and letting the energy or the sensations or the feeling of the emotion just rest very lightly and be supported very lightly in the cupped hands, metaphorically, of the attention.

So the kind of attention, as well as trying to keep it steady relatively...

And then also we mentioned last night in this practice, we want to really check that the attention has enough energy in it. There's enough of a sort of vitality to the presence. I'm really there, not sort of half there. So sometimes we need to just check: does it need a bit more energy? Do I need to kind of show up with a bit more brightness to this paying attention to this emotion or this feeling, this energetic sensation along the midline?

So we want, as I mentioned last night, we want the energy of the mindfulness to be always greater than the energy of the emotion in this kind of work. Because if it's the other way around, if the emotion—especially if it's a difficult emotion—if the difficult emotion has more energy than the awareness and the attention, we're actually overwhelmed. We'll get overwhelmed and we sink in that emotion. That's not helpful.

So in the second practice, you can deliberately kind of shift gears and bring the attention to the midline and maybe something's going on there and you just stay steady with that, delicate, holding it with energized attention. Or sometimes you go to the midline and there's nothing happening. So nothing's happening there. I don't particularly feel anything. What is it to stay with that emotion of nothing happening or the energy feeling along the midline of nothing happening and just stay very light, very steady with the attention on not much happening?

Or something was happening, but as you pay attention to it, it gets more subtle, and maybe it seems like, oh, it's dissolving a little bit. And what happens if I just stay? I don't say, oh, forget it now, I'll go back—I mean, I could go back to the samatha practice or something else. But another option with this second practice is just to stay as whatever is present and manifesting in the midline there just gets more subtle and I stay with the subtlety and I let the attention get correspondingly subtle. Very, very helpful.

Now as we develop the skill with the samatha and the skill with the body space energy and the energy body, that can become over time—it becomes something more that we can call on as a resource. So we feel this bubble, this balloon of the whole body energy. It feels quite nice or relatively peaceful or warm or... there's some degree of comfort there. And over time this increases as something we have access to and also something that becomes a deeper and deeper resource. The well-being there gets richer and deeper and it's something that we can really use as a resource at the same time as we're paying attention to what is difficult.

As we mentioned, we can sometimes put that resource or feel that resource around the difficulty. This well-being kind of cushions or embraces or laps up against what's difficult—this sadness, this grief, this tightness or pressure or hurt or whatever it is. So the access to the resource is not either-or. It's almost like you have both at the same time. And the resource, the well-being, can be like a kindness around or a holding around what's difficult.

Very, very skillful as one develops the capacity to bring the lovely and the positive, if you like, the beautiful in contact with what is difficult. Because it's this contact of the beautiful and the helpful with what is difficult, that is what is healing. It's the contact of the two. That is what is healing with regards to difficult emotions.

So can there be a tenderness around? Can I allow or somehow very gently encourage a tenderness, a kindness, a holding around what is difficult emotionally, perhaps on the midline?

And a part of all this is also checking the mental view, checking what the mind is doing in terms of how it's regarding this difficulty, what's its attitude and assumptions. So maybe I'm blaming myself: I shouldn't be feeling this. If I was a better meditator, I wouldn't be feeling this, or it's wrong in some way. It shouldn't be like this. I shouldn't be feeling this. So very easily the mind gets into or locked into certain assumptions. Sometimes they're just under the radar. We don't actually realize that we're judging ourselves for having it or deeming this emotion or this manifestation of difficult energy. We're deeming it wrong.

The mind is passing judgment. Sometimes it's very subtle, just under the radar. So to check for that, sometimes what you can do is actually play with switching that for a moment. Just decide to see this that's happening now—that feels difficult—as perfect. It's perfect. It's just as it should be. You're playing with switching the view for a moment and see what that does.

Actually, we should point out that for imaginal practice, we really want the whole of the emotional range. We want the whole spectrum—including what is difficult at times, what is very lovely, what is quite subtle. All that range of emotion will be fertile ground. It's all fertile terrain when we come to imaginal practice.

So any idea that "I shouldn't be feeling this," or "this is a wrong emotion," or "that's too weird as an emotion"—whatever it is, blaming ourselves—that's utterly misplaced when it comes to imaginal practice. The whole range of emotion is fertile ground for imaginal practice.

Now remember, again I'm going to say this so many times, that awareness contracts when there's a difficulty—either physically, emotionally, or energetically. The awareness will shrink. It shrinks basically when there's aversion or grasping, as there will be when there's difficulty.

So notice that and then stretch the awareness, expand it again. Inflate that balloon, if you like, or fill the sail of awareness. Stretch it over the whole body—whole body awareness, even a little bit bigger. Really inhabit and fill that space with awareness again, over and over. Keep checking because it will keep shrinking. See that it's shrunk and open, expand it again. This is so important.

Certain states—for instance, drowsiness, dullness, restlessness, or fear—are very much helped by opening to a much wider space, a vast space of awareness. This might come from being outside and actually doing some walking meditation or standing meditation, taking in the space and including that in the awareness, taking in the sky. Or in the meditation hall or in a room, just take in the space of the room, or imagine a space. Some people with more practice are actually able to allow the awareness to expand in different ways—very, very large. Any way of doing that can be very helpful with certain emotions.

In terms of working with the difficult, we also talked about working with the imagination of the breath energy, or just energy moving, or imagining lights. That's also available.

But with this second practice of actually attending to emotion directly in the energy body—mostly on that midline, let's say for now—attending directly to what's difficult there, or rather, particularly in relation to what's difficult there... Remember, we can just pay attention even when it's not difficult and simply station the awareness there. But in regard to difficult emotions in the energy body, the key element—the key element in what's helpful there—is a lessening of aversion, grasping, and clinging. This is the factor that's so central. That's the thing that makes the most difference.

One of the aspects we talked about is that you can really get into this in quite a focused way by practicing allowing, opening, welcoming as fully as possible. So this is really a practice. It's not just an idea or "I'm trying to allow it." We're making a practice of allowing as fully as possible, welcoming this emotion, this heavy energy, this pressure in the chest or whatever it is—the sensations there.

What do I mean? I mean getting intimate first with what it actually feels like. What does it actually feel like—that pressure, that heaviness, that tightness, whatever it is? Then opening the doors of awareness to welcome that. Let those sensations be there as fully as possible.

Almost all the emphasis in this practice of allowing is really on the allowing itself, on opening over and over, moment to moment, welcoming the sensations. So it's not just a thought—"Oh, I accept this" or "I'm trying to accept this." We're not talking about something too gross or unenergized like that, or too vague. We're really talking about a quite fundamental movement of the energetic relationship with the sensations in the moment.

Something's actually shifting and changing in my energetic relationship to these sensations. There's an opening. And then I'm repeating that change of the energetic relationship over and over. There it is for a moment—I'm opening. Again, intimate opening. Again, intimate opening. Repeating this change in relationship. This is what I call the practice of allowing.

If you like, it's a subset of this second practice. It's a certain strand of the second practice of attending to the energetics of the midline without trying to steer it towards the well-being of samādhi. This is the second practice. Within that, there's the possibility of really emphasizing the allowing, as I just described.

Now that allowing—accepting or welcoming—is not a way of living. We really should bring a little discernment and intelligence here. We would not try to live that way. It's not a way of living.

It's a way of practicing. And even within that, there's degrees of allowing. This is really important in navigating practice.

If I get very, very good at this moment-to-moment allowing—this really opening of allowing as fully as possible—and the allowing goes very, very deep and very full, what I will notice over time, as my skill at doing that develops, is that what I allow deeply, very deeply, when there's a deep allowing, that fades. It actually begins to dissolve or fade if it's a difficult emotion. All the sensations disappear, and it takes me actually deeper and deeper into states of emptiness, if we use that phrase.

So if I really develop the allowing deeply, when it's a deep degree of allowing, what I'm allowing fades. I'm not going to get too much into that right now—that belongs to a different retreat, that whole conversation. But that's important to realize.

Or, in practice, if I'm allowing but less intensely—I'm still allowing this thing, but I'm not emphasizing the allowing in such a subtle and deep and thorough way, moment to moment—then, as we mentioned last night, it may be that just allowing this difficulty to be there more generally, more lightly in the allowing, an image may spontaneously arise out of that emotion or with that emotion, from that state.

So when there's less allowing, if you like, or less of a full throttle allowing, then it might be that a spontaneous image arises. And then that's one of the ways of entering into imaginal practice—when there's a difficult emotion arising, and just relating to it in a certain way allows images to arise spontaneously.

But we also talked about, and now I want to add to the instructions, that we can deliberately bring up, invoke, and then dwell with, focus on, and resonate with—meditate on—the image of a loving figure. That's a very important part of imaginal practice.

That could be a deity—Christ, or Tara, or other tantric deity, or something else. It could be someone you know, a dear friend, or a lover, or a teacher that you have a very helpful, deep relationship with, and that there's a lot of love there. It could be a mythic personage, a mythic figure that embodies this love somehow for you. It could be a previous image that you've had—maybe you've worked a little bit with images already and this particular imaginal figure that you know from before, you can call on and feel their love and stay there resonating with that love and receiving their love. Or it could be a dream figure. Sometimes we have a dream and someone in a dream, something about them really touches us or we feel love coming from them, something very healing. And especially if the dream is recent, one may recall that figure and use it as a deliberate imaginal figure, deliberately recalled and practiced with.

One of the things that's possible is this imaginal figure that you deliberately invoked and deliberately staying steady with in meditation is loving you. They are loving you somehow. And it could be through their gaze—as you're holding this image, you're seeing and feeling how they are gazing at you, how they are beholding you, how they look at you. Or they may be touching you. They're loving you through touch, through the way they touch you, or through their energy. They're just emanating or radiating a certain energy or light or something, and they're loving you in that, through that.

Or it could be not so much they're loving you, but they're loving the hurt or the discomfort that you're feeling. So this pain, this grief that I'm feeling, that is being held as much as I am being held and loved. So they may be loving you, they may be loving the hurt or the discomfort itself, perhaps holding it or surrounding it somehow, embracing it or beaming a light or energy on it or stroking this hurt or licking it or kissing it, bathing it. Many, many possibilities. See what feels like it's right and helpful. So that's a possibility too.

Actually, I just want to mention one thing about attention in general in regards to both working with the energy body and the samadhi or this attention to emotions or working with images. We could—and again, it's slightly artificial, but it can be helpful—differentiate three aspects of attention or three capacities of attention that we can be aware of and check.

One is the directing of attention. This is the first aspect. So we direct the attention to an object, to a sound, or an image, or a sight, or a sensation in the body, or a sense door, just sounds in general, or whatever. So this is one aspect of attention—the directing of attention. Where am I directing it and do I want to hold it a little bit with something so that I know that when it's gone off, I bring it back to directing again? That's one aspect.

The second aspect, which we mentioned already, is the energizing of attention, the brightening, the bringing more intensity into the sense of presence. So that's an important aspect of attention. What is it to know how to energize the attention, to be more fully present, more alive? There's more vitality and energy, brightness and intensity in the presence, in the attention. That would be a second aspect.

And the third aspect is what I would call the tuning of the attention. So these three aspects are not really separate.

They certainly influence each other and blend into each other, but it's worth differentiating them.

The tuning of the attention. With the energy body and the energy space, we can realize: I can tune to this particular quality, let's say, of softness in the energy body, or this particular frequency of energy. There's a frequency of a kind of happiness, and that's a certain quality, and I can tune to that. So it's like tuning a radio receiver to a certain frequency.

Particularly with regards to samadhi, this can be really helpful, because what I tune to, it tends to amplify that frequency. So I want to really get into this softness, or this sense of warmth, attuned to that quality of frequency of warmth within the energy body.

But when we're doing the second practice of attention to the emotions—whether they're pleasant or unpleasant, without so much wanting to direct them towards the well-being and the pleasantness of samadhi—then there's also a sense of tuning to this particular emotion. As I said, some of the emotions are quite subtle. Or there's a mix of emotions and I can tune to one of them in particular if I want to.

So this tuning to the quality or frequency of energy or emotion or of image—because again, we might be working with an image and you start to notice that an image is quite a complex thing. It's beautiful in that way. It's so rich, so multidimensional. And so either what is it to tune to the totality of an image and its qualities or the sense of it, the characteristics of it, or to tune to a particular quality of the image? So particularly, for example, the love of Quan Yin or Jesus' love and compassion.

Tuning the attention in these different ways is a very important aspect. So directing, energizing, and tuning—three aspects of attention. Sometimes it's good to differentiate, especially this last one, tuning. Very, very important, both for the samadhi practice, the emotional awareness practice that we're emphasizing today, and as we unfold more and more of the imaginal practice. It's a very important aspect of that. But actually they're all important: directing, energizing, and tuning.

Just to be clear, today we have two principal practices. First, we have the samadhi and the intention of that direction to cultivate, to tend to the comfort or well-being in the energy body, playing with it in different ways. So that continues, and included in that is working with the difficulties that arise—hindrances and stuck energy and emotional difficulties—but with the light intention, the playful intention of easing those difficulties, dissolving them so they move towards more well-being. So that's one practice.

And then we can move today between that practice and the second practice of just stationing the attention, just staying slightly steady, sensitive on that midline as foreground with the whole body as background, sensitive to the emotions—the whole wide range of emotions, not necessarily intense—but just stationing the attention sensitively on the midline or some area of the midline where some emotion or energy is happening, with the whole body in the background.

And as we do that, as I mentioned, sometimes just doing that—if I find the right kind of attention—sometimes what will happen is what's happening, what is going on emotionally will calm. Gradually it will calm, it will become more subtle, may become more beautiful. And one option is actually to stay and let it grow more subtle and let the attention become, grow more subtle so that we are also developing the sensitivity.

Sometimes what you'll find is it actually goes into a state that's more like a samadhi state, where there's a kind of well-being that comes out of that. So these practices of the samadhi and this attention to the emotions in the energy body, they also fluidly move between each other. And you can very consciously shift gears at times, very consciously, deliberately shift gears between these two practices, despite their being fluidly related.

And as we mentioned, just beginning to include—although this is a bit more a secondary intention right now, or optional, less important right now; we'll include it more and more—is that sometimes, either working with the samadhi, or with a difficult emotion or energy that comes up, an image may constellate out of that. And occasionally you can even ask for an image to constellate.

Let's say this for now—obviously we're going to talk much more about it: if an image comes out of a difficulty or when there's actually no difficulty and it feels all very good, if an image comes, then notice the effects. This is really important: notice the effects of that image on the energy body. So this image comes and how does it affect and make the energy body feel? And how does it affect the emotion? It might be that something lovely comes in the energy body, or the emotion. Then we can open to that and enjoy that.

There's lots to say about navigating between these practices. We'll say more about that later.

So for now, two principal practices: the samadhi, and secondly, the just delicate, sensitive attention to the emotional manifestation in the energy body along the midline. And then if it arises occasionally, you can feel free to go with the images, but really notice their effects on the energy body and the emotion.

CHAPTER 7

Energy, Image, Emotion (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 32 min

> In this profound exploration of imaginal practice, Rob Burbea examines the intricate relationship between energy, image, and emotion in meditation and daily life. He reveals how difficult emotions often trap psychic and subtle physical energy in unhelpful vortices, creating states of depression or agitation. Through imaginal practice, images can arise that create channels for this trapped energy to flow harmoniously, transforming afflictive emotions into creative energy.
>
> Burbea makes important distinctions between anger and ill will, showing how anger without ill will can actually expand the energy body and awareness when properly recognized and allowed. He explores how images hold multiple shades of emotion simultaneously and possess a richness that transcends simple emotional states, including qualities of duty, meaningfulness, and beauty. Drawing on examples from John Coltrane's intense musical expression, he demonstrates how our emotional and imaginal ranges can be unnecessarily limited by conventional views.
>
> The teaching emphasizes that in imaginal practice, the relationship is primarily with the imaginal figure itself rather than external objects of emotion, and that images can provide a sense of rightness and even holiness to what we're experiencing. Burbea challenges common assumptions about the primacy of emotion over image, suggesting these phenomena dependently co-arise and influence each other. He frames this work within a broader understanding of Dharma as the practice of flexibility with ways of looking, ultimately revealing the emptiness of all perceptions and opening infinite possibilities for experience.

Let's explore this whole thing about difficult emotions a little bit more—difficult emotion and the nexus with energy and image.

Difficult emotion has energy in it, but the energy is caught in a vortex, an unhelpful vortex. If that difficult emotion can give rise to an image or an image can constellate there in that or through that, then sometimes what happens is the image functions in a way that the energy that's caught up in the unhelpful vortex in the difficult emotion, the energy harmonizes. It's somehow allowed to flow. In this example, actually in all the examples, it's allowed to flow or it's channeled. The image creates a channel for the energy.

Afflictive or difficult emotions hold and trap energy. There's a lot of energy in them, but it's trapped, it's in the vortex, in some kind of vortex. And that energy—I mean psychic energy. By the way, when I use the word psychic on this retreat, I don't mean extrasensory perception, ESP and all that. I mean of the psyche. So energy of the psyche, psychic. Psychic energy is trapped by the afflictive emotion, in the afflictive emotion, and also the subtle physical energy of the energy body.

Anger is quite interesting, just by way of example. Anger has a lot of energy in it. And let's make a differentiation right away. Anger and ill will, if I just use these words in two different ways. So anger is not necessarily the same as ill will. Ill will means the will, the wanting, the wishing for harm or suffering to befall another. I want them to suffer, I want them to hurt, I want them to be in pain or be humiliated or this or that. That's what I would call ill will. Anger often does include ill will, but it doesn't need to. It's something that can actually be freed from ill will, and I'm going to explain this a little more in a minute.

But anger has a lot of energy in it. And sometimes what happens is a person actually feels quite low energy or a bit depressed or down. And actually what's going on there sometimes is that anger is there, wrapped up or sort of down in the being. Not ill will, but anger. And it's blocking the energy. It's there and it needs recognizing and allowing. And what's happening is somehow a person is not allowing themselves to see that anger and feel it and not allowing the flow of that anger. And that's keeping the whole being in a kind of low energy depressed state.

When the anger is connected with, recognized and allowed as energy, then the energy body can actually expand. Instead of being contracted and down, it can actually expand, become big or even very big and the awareness expand with it. Maybe there will be an image with that. For example, it could be an image of a wrathful deity or a demon or something. Maybe it's without image. But that anger in the energy body is then, when it's felt and allowed and open to and allowed to open the energy body, it is at that point not an afflictive emotion anymore. It's more like creative energy. It's something we can do something with, use to fuel a skillful response.

That state of being low energy or slightly depressed or dull, for some people, it actually becomes kind of a default groove, much as for other people, it's a state of more agitation that becomes a default groove, the habit of the energy system of the psyche of the being. Sometimes a person doesn't even realize that we're in a groove here. They become used to it over time, sometimes over years. They've got nothing much to compare it to. They don't feel depressed. It's just a normal kind of literally depression of the energy. And sometimes, as I said, what's going on there is something, for instance, anger or libido or eros or some kind of psychic energy is not recognized, not felt and contacted and allowed to flow. And then the whole being is in this kind of low energy state where actually there's a lot of energy potentially available. So a person thinks they have this kind of personality, whatever, and something else a little bit different is going on.

If an image constellates from the emotion, that image may be a very high energy image that correlates with, that reflects the energy in the anger. So, for example, an image of a warrior or some other obviously energetic image. But it might arise from the feeling of anger, the energy of anger, or actually from feeling into the low energy contracted state. I'm with this, and then it doesn't feel like there's energy at all, and suddenly this warrior image or this high energy image comes. Interesting.

But if we go into this nexus of emotion, energy, and image a little bit more, I want to point out something important: images hold many shades of emotion. They are actually, if you like, more complex than a single emotion. One image can hold at the same time different qualities, even seemingly contradictory emotions or different shades. It's quite a complex, rich phenomenon, an image. There's a lot of information in it—though I don't know if that's the best word.

So images hold quite a lot by way of emotion and shades of emotion. But an image also holds more than this, and I'll talk more about this as we go on in the retreat. It can hold, for example, a sense of duty. When that liquid was poured in the earlier example, what came with that was a sense of duty and the energy for that duty. So it's more than just emotion. There's some other meaningfulness and beauty and depth that can be tied up—that is usually tied up—in an image.

So there are many shades of emotion, perhaps, not just one emotion, and actually more than just emotion. There is the aspect of soulfulness, which is more than emotion. It's more than heartfulness. This includes, as well as emotion, the psychic resonances, the meaningfulness, the depth, the sense of depth, different kinds of beauty. All of this is one way of saying that an image is, if you like, a richer, more multi-dimensional, more complex and multi-aspected phenomenon than an emotion. Image is very rich.

Now I mentioned in the introductory talk that part of what we are interested in is expanding our range—psychologically for ourselves, but also expanding our emotional range and our range of images that are meaningful and beautiful to us. It's expanding the range of emotion and image. This is, for me, an important aspect of imaginal practice.

It's interesting as an example of where we can get quite limited in our vision, if you like, in our conception regarding emotion and image. John Coltrane, the great jazz saxophone player in the 1950s and 1960s—in his late period it was, I mean all his life it was very high energy, intense music, but in his very last period before he died it was ultra-intense. The jazz world probably hadn't quite experienced anything like that before. It was really, really intense music.

He was friends by that point with the Indian sitar player Ravi Shankar, and they would meet and listen to each other's music and study a little bit. I think John Coltrane was more studying some Indian music. But Ravi Shankar said to him at one point, "I'm disturbed by this, what I hear in your playing—all the anger. It disturbs me."

And John Coltrane was quite visible in his response: "I'm not angry." It wasn't that John Coltrane was out of touch with his anger. It was just that this intensity, that shrieking through the saxophone, the screaming, the roaring—it was not anger in that sense. It wasn't ill will. It wasn't what Ravi Shankar thought it was.

So Ravi Shankar's emotional view or vision of emotional range was much smaller, and his image of what's beautiful and what's possible and what's okay—or even holy—was smaller in this case than John Coltrane's.

There's a distinction here, and it's important to make. Usually with anger, when we feel angry, there are two aspects. We're lost in the object—all the attention is on who or what we're angry at, judging this person or hating them. And we're not so aware of ourselves and our energy. Secondly, usually, unfortunately, when there's anger, there's ill will. We wish in some way harm or that this person suffers in some way.

But in imaginal practice, there can be a kind of anger, a kind of rage even, but one notices with imaginal practice that there isn't the same concern with the object or whoever I'm angry at. So there can be a warrior image, a raging warrior fighting, but the enemy is not even seen in the image. It's not even so important. There is no ill will, so to speak. The attention, the relationship with the image, is more on the imaginal figure itself—entering into that warrior image, for example—not so much with who I want to suffer and who I want to kill.

I don't know what would be a better word here, because I'm not talking about identifying with that or literalizing a warrior image or being tightly identified with that. But there's a kind of entering into those qualities, and that imaginal figure—in this case the warrior—is what one tunes into, not so much the object of the anger or the enemies.

There's a second aspect here in relation to all this, which is alluded to in that example with John Coltrane and Ravi Shankar. There can be a sense with an image that it gives a rightness, it gives a place, and even a kind of holiness—a kind of divinity or archetypal necessity, we could say—to what one is going through, to the image and the way the image then shapes what one is going through.

This is different than an ego justification. Usually when I'm angry I feel I'm completely right and this person is wrong, and the ego just finds ways of wanting to justify itself and its stance and its actions or its obnoxiousness or whatever. This is different. This is more subtle. Through an image that's alive and soulful and meaningful, meaningfulness and place are given to something that we're going through emotionally.

So a person might feel, perhaps in a certain community or group, some alienation or isolation because of some difference or something. And out of that there may be some loneliness, and that's the emotion.

And feeling into that, perhaps a different image arises—maybe a wanderer, a solitary wanderer. This wanderer in the image is alone, perhaps even carries a degree of loneliness, but somehow the emotion is transformed or shaded, given a whole other level of depth and meaningfulness through the image. It's no longer just dukkha, just simple suffering and alienation. It's given something—it's given a kind of beauty.

In the words of James Hillman, "a pain has found its God"—has found its archetype. Through the image, we discover its true place psychically, and it's given this depth and meaningfulness.

Or again, in that image of liquid being poured through the crown of my head—that did not lead to a simple letting go of the situation, a dropping of my view. What came instead was a kind of poise, a firmness, a resolve, an increase in energy, without taking away the difficulty of the situation and its pain. It wasn't just "let go, drop it, be peaceful." Something else entirely.

So we've explored how we can direct our intention toward samadhi, and through that sometimes what's difficult energetically or emotionally dissolves or gradually transforms into the pleasant. That's one possibility.

We can also focus skillfully on the emotions themselves, working with how they reflect in the energy body. Sometimes this can gradually dissolve what is difficult, what's stuck or painful in the midline of the energy body. Sometimes, as I mentioned, emotions become more subtle before they dissolve. Sometimes the emotion remains, perhaps growing subtler, but a sweetness begins to pervade around it—the sweetness of connection, the sweetness of that pain being truly held. This is a very important possibility to recognize.

And sometimes being with an emotion more loosely gives rise to an image spontaneously. We can also deliberately bring a helpful image in relation to a difficulty. Whether spontaneous or deliberate, this image can dissolve the difficulty, transforming what's challenging in the emotions or energy body.

This opens an interesting area for inquiry: our reactions to these transformations might reveal attitudes and assumptions we hold regarding emotions and our emotional life. When I practice and an emotion dissolves, or slowly transforms and becomes sweeter or turns pleasant, or when an image arises and difficulty becomes lovely, I might think, "Oh, that can't be right" or "That's wrong." What's happening there?

Or perhaps I have the opposite attitude—I'm trying to meditate, trying to cultivate samadhi, and this emotion feels like a nuisance. These reactions to transformations reveal much about our attitudes toward emotions. Do we see emotions as nuisances standing in the way, mere papañca? Or do we assume, at the other extreme, that emotions are somehow sacrosanct—primary aspects of being that hold an essential truth we must always respect and never try to change?

As we meditate in different ways and witness different unfoldings of experience, noticing our reactions to these unfoldings can teach us much about our attitudes and assumptions. We can also observe what we're willing to try and what we instinctively avoid in practice. We can become attached to certain views regarding emotion and energy.

We might also be attached to always needing to know why a difficult emotion is present. I feel sad and want to understand why. Sometimes this is helpful and the cause is clear. But sometimes we simply don't know why the sadness or other emotion is there—it's not obvious. Sometimes sadness arises from being physically low in energy or something out of balance in the physical energy. Sometimes it's even possible that we're picking up another's sadness. It's not mine, yet I'm searching for its cause in my psychology, my experience, my past.

William Blake said that emotions are "divine influxes." This offers quite a different perspective. Sometimes something else flows through us—not so much about another person, but something from another level of being, an influx manifesting as emotion.

Sometimes we become attached to knowing why, always seeking reasons or demanding memories when afflictive emotions arise. When grief or fear can't be connected to something present, we search for a memory. While this can be very helpful at times and sometimes leads to important discoveries, it can also reveal that we're creating stories. To always seek reasons or demand memories places too much pressure on our emotional and energetic life, betraying certain limiting assumptions about how our inner world operates.

So with, again, around the nexus of emotion, energy, and image—a yogi on retreat, this was quite a while ago, reported a dream to me. I can't remember if the dream was from ages before, but it was quite a comic dream. It was a row of naked men standing in a line in the dream, masturbating at the same time and then ejaculating simultaneously. And there was something quite comical about that.

But afterwards she was talking about it and she said, "Oh, it's just life energy." And I said, "Oh, hold on, hold on, hold on. If you just say that, then actually what's happening—you just say, 'Oh, that's just life energy, it's just an expression of life energy, that image'—what's happening is that in that kind of interpretation, it's too broad. We're losing a lot of the subtlety, a lot of the particularities of that image," which was—it's sexual, it's male, there's something comic about it. It's very, very particular. Even more particular than whatever words we might put on it, like "sexual" or "male" or this or that. There's something utterly irreducible about an image.

So in terms of reducing an image to energy—in this case just a vague energy—be careful of that, because we lose a lot of the subtlety and distinction that images contain so naturally.

Sometimes we feel, in our practice or just in our life, there is an emotion, a strong emotion, and then out of that emotion comes an image, as I mentioned before. I might even use the language that the emotion constellates the image. And we tend to think, again, or a person can think, that the emotion is what's primary. But it doesn't actually necessarily imply that the emotion is what's primary and the image is what's secondary—what comes out of the emotion as an expression of it or just a re-presentation of that emotion. Not necessarily.

It's not necessarily the case that the emotion causes the image or constellates the image, even though I might use that language sometimes, or that the psychic energy causes the image. It may be that an emotional upset indicates that an image is operating in the psyche, but we're not yet conscious of it. And the energy of the image is trapped in this vortex because it's not conscious. So the energy is coming from the image—a different way around. Instead of emotion being primary, we could see that image is primary. Instead of energy being primary, we could see the image is primary. Maybe that image is primary and what gives rise to emotion and energy.

So in relation to these three—energy, emotion, image—what's the truth? Which is the cause there? What's the truth? Which is the one that's primary? Well, actually, like so many of these things, they all influence each other. They all, in dharma language, dependently co-arise, or we could say they influence each other. They have an effect on each other. In some ways, we could say they're not really that separate.

And to bring in this other piece that I mentioned at the start of this talk: the views that we have are also part of all that. So the views that I have of this image, the relationship with it, the views that I have of emotion, of energy, of the image, affect what happens. Now this is true generally for our perceptions and our experience, but in this case even more particularly. The view of which of these is primary—whether it's energy, emotion, or image, how I'm conceiving of that in the moment—affects how things unfold. The view that I have of what is primary affects how things unfold. And I can experiment and see that for myself in practice. It's very interesting.

And as I realize that, it opens up a possibility. Can I play with different views? And can I play with different views of what is primary here? And this becomes part of navigating imaginal practice. We'll talk about this more later.

And really, a big part of what we're doing, as I'll come back to in later talks, is we're playing with the conception, the view, that image is primary, that fantasy and mythos are primary. We're playing with that view and seeing what that does.

And just to finish, to put that again in a larger context, which I mentioned yesterday: the larger context is a vision of the dharma, an understanding of the dharma as exactly that—as playing with views, with ways of looking. That's what the dharma is. That's what practice is. We're practicing, through lots of different practices, we're practicing a flexibility of view and of ways of looking. And through that, it's opening the range of our experience and our perception. Those two words I'm using as synonyms—experience and perception, appearance—these all mean the same thing.

Through practicing flexibility and moving between different views and ways of looking, I see that it opens up the range of experience. And I see, "Ah, this way of looking, things appear that way. This other way of looking, they appear a different way." So meditation itself is the practice of different ways of looking. And seeing how appearances, experience, perception changes with different ways of looking.

Through that, I understand the emptiness of any perception. It's not really like this. It looks like that. It seems like that. It appears like that. The perception, the experience is like this because I'm looking in this way. And understanding the emptiness of that thing, of things, of perceptions, of experiences, allows even more flexibility, allows me to practice even more flexibility with ways of looking, because things are empty, because perceptions are empty.

So this flexibility is both the path and a part of the goal. This is already something I said last night, but just to end, it's so important.

We can conceive the Dharma in different ways, and we're free to do that. For much of it, there's not really a right or wrong. It's hard to prove it. So very common nowadays may be that we conceive—that we've kind of heard over and over and formed a conception of the Dharma very loosely—that it's: Try to always be present because this is it. This is life. This is what we're with—this breeze on the cheek, this raisin in the mouth, this footstep, whatever. Try to always be present. You don't want to miss this reality of this moment. This is all there is, this sense experience. And as well as that, try not to cling, try to let go, because everything's impermanent, everything's flowing and changing. So try not to cling and try to let go. And then try to be kind.

Those three aspects might be our sort of loose conception of the Dharma. Or we might have a different conception, as mentioned, that's more influenced by streams like the Advaita tradition, where the goal is always to be in a sense of oneness—all is one—or there is no self, no self is occurring.

Or, as I said, what I would say, what I want to encourage more vision on this retreat is that these—all of those, being present, being in a sense of oneness, the perception of oneness—all of these are modes. They're modes of awareness, modes of sensitivity. They're ways of looking. They're temporary options. And we have a flexibility to move between them and many, many more than that.

Dharma, as I said, is the practice of this flexibility of modes of awareness, of modes of sensitivity, of ways of looking. So that a multiplicity, a range of perception, of experience is available to us as a sense, not as an intellectual idea. We actually sense all the different possibilities for us. We see them, we witness them, we experience them.

Included in this range of these modes of ways of sensitivity, of awareness, this range of ways of looking—included in that, as part of that range, as a subset, if you like—are types and modes and degrees of less clinging. So less clinging in this way or that way, to this degree, to that degree, very deeply. That's included in that.

All this together opens up the possibilities of perception, the perceptual possibilities, and all of it shows us the emptiness of what we perceive, the emptiness of things, selves and things. That brings more and more freedom to the degree that we understand that emptiness in the heart, in the being. It opens up, it allows us even more flexibility with the perceptual possibilities—the way we perceive the self, the way we perceive others, the way we perceive things and the world and the cosmos. In a way, there's a kind of infinite range to that.

So this whole central teaching of the Buddha of not clinging—of clinging being a cause of suffering and being central in the Four Noble Truths—it's not so much that that's a way of living, trying to live without clinging, but non-clinging, what it really offers us is a range of ways of looking. There are lots of different ways of not clinging. Lots of different modes of that.

In the range of ways of looking, it includes going with the flow, being present, resting in awareness, if you know people that talk about that. Many, many more, many ways of looking.

So here on this retreat, we're also practicing this flexibility, this malleability, this multiplicity and extension of the range of ways of looking, modes of awareness, not just one approach, one track. And part of that—part of that included in that flexibility, as I said—is playing with the very view and the conception regarding images. That's a central thread or possibility of a way of looking and what forms ways of looking in imaginal practice.

CHAPTER 8

What is an 'Image'? (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h01

> In this second part of his exploration of imaginal practice, Rob Burbea delves deeper into what constitutes an 'image' in the context of spiritual development. He examines how images function as archetypal figures that are irreducible, complex, and alive with autonomy, possessing a vertical dimension that connects the human with the divine. Burbea discusses how we both create and are created by these images, drawing parallels with Jewish mystical traditions and the Lurianic Kabbalah's understanding of humanity's role in creating new vessels for divinity.
>
> The talk explores how images can manifest as myths (such as Christ, Horus, Eros and Psyche, or Persephone), memories transformed into timeless encounters, or even people we meet who become theophanic - appearances of the divine. Burbea distinguishes imaginal engagement from papañca (proliferative thinking), emphasizing how images require a relationship that honors their mystery and unfathomability rather than reducing them to literal interpretations.
>
> A key insight presented is that image, fantasy, and mythos are woven into sense perception itself, not added afterwards. This challenges bare attention practices that attempt to 'shave off' these imaginal levels, suggesting instead that recognizing and skillfully empowering our imaginal relationship with perception enables profound soul-making. The practice involves entertaining flexible conceptual frameworks that neither dismiss images as meaningless nor literalize them concretely, but hold them in a playful, sophisticated philosophical middle way.

So I want to continue in this attempt to fill out and elaborate a little what I mostly mean on this retreat. I want to talk about image, fantasy, mythos, and give more—hopefully a fuller sense of the direction and the inclination, the attitude, the orientation involved in the use of that word, those words, and also what's included in the scope of the meaning of those words for the most part.

Just to recap briefly, we said that an image, in the sense that we're using that word, doesn't have to be visual at all. It may or may not be. It could come through any sense in an imaginal sense, or not so much tied to any sense at all, but still operating potently, powerfully, deeply in the psyche as a symbol, as an image with a lot of resonance.

There may or may not be dialogue involved, and that can happen in different forms. The ways that we communicate or are communicated with, the ways that we interact with an image, the ways that we know an image—there's a wide range of possibility there, and it may not be verbal. Other ways of interacting may be more appropriate.

We also said that in the sense that we're using, what's absolutely characteristic of an image is the sense of soulfulness that comes with it, that it bears. With that, it's not so much about understanding, about taking it concretely, literally. It's more—we're talking more about, if you like, poetic images that are not reducible so much. They have a certain mystery and ambiguity to them, an inexhaustibility to them.

We also differentiated a little between so-called narrative images and what I'm calling iconic or poetic images, which are not so temporal. We pointed out that images don't necessarily need to come in meditation—they can come outside, and they may be kind of more ethereal in their substance or more solid seeming in their substance. All this is fine.

Many images are, in fact, one-offs, but they may be connected to other images, so it's the same sort of constellation appearing in slightly different forms. Some are just one-offs, but generally speaking, images often need repeating to slowly absorb and, with small movements, cumulative movements, allow a different sensibility and an opening of the conceiving really of self, of life, of world and of practice.

And then we talked a little bit about images sometimes having a kind of archetypal dimension to them and seeming to have that whole richness, and other times not. And sometimes when they don't, it's still very beautiful, very healing, very powerful and important. But on this retreat, as I said, the inclination, what I'm trying to set up is a bit more interest, a bit more leaning towards the more iconic, poetic, archetypal images that are pregnant with soulfulness—or in our relationship to them we create and allow the soulfulness, this soul making. I'm going to talk a lot more about what I mean by soulfulness and soul making.

So just to continue then: this word archetype, I will use it of course now and then, but in a way I prefer really the meaning of archetypal as an adjective—an archetypal image. But even that word really, I may not use it that much, we'll see, but really what it sums up is, and what's meant by that, is a pointing to and inclining towards a sense of view and attitude to images that has to do with a way of seeing them, a way of conceiving of them, and a way of valuing of them.

So it's less a category. Rather than a universal category, it's something very individual. An archetypal image, in that sense—and it's just an adjective there—is individual. It's not the warrior archetype. It's this warrior that I see, that I'm interacting with in this image, or this wanderer rather than the wanderer, or whatever it is.

But really what's summed up in that word archetypal, if I do end up using it a lot on this retreat, is really this collection of qualities and aspects and dimensions and values. So it is individual and it is irreducible. We cannot reduce this archetype to something else, some smaller unit or component. And it is not in itself a small unit and component that we can then separate from other ones.

Sometimes, especially in some streams of the Dharma, people really like those kind of explanations of things that chop everything up into simple units and compounds. It can be really helpful, so there's the aggregates and there's the process of dependent origination in time and these units and moments happening, and it's all fine, but it's limited to an extent. And as I will actually point out, it's a particular kind of way of understanding things, trying to analyze things that way.

But in this collection, if you like, of aspects or qualities that we're really pointing to when we talk about the kind of images that we're interested in on this retreat is this irreducibility and this inability to be fully explained, to be fully interpreted. Actually, that word explain is explain—to make plain, to make flat, to flatten out. We're not interested in flattening out these images, rather the opposite.

They are—we feel them to be, when they're alive, these kinds of images—complex. They are complex. There's something elusive about them, E-L-U-S-I-V-E, in the sense I cannot quite fully grasp them or fathom them, fathom them and their meaning fully. They're in a sense unfathomable, just like a person is in many ways complex, elusive, unfathomable, or an animal.

And just like a person or animal, these images are alive. This is the kind of view of images, the relationship with images that we're wanting to encourage, or that one senses in certain images. Unfathomability, elusiveness, complexity, aliveness—they're alive in some way and they have some kind of autonomy. They have a certain kind of autonomy. They're not just part of me that I can control. Not that simple. They have some certain kind of autonomy.

And we could say we sense that they're real in some way, but their kind of reality is not the same as the solidity of this chair or whatever. It's real in some kind of different way, but not unreal. So we're being a little more sophisticated and more nuanced in our whole conception of reality.

And hopefully we'll come back to this more and more as we go through the retreat.

In some way we sense or entertain the idea, the vision, that these images we're calling archetypal as a shorthand have some kind of reality—in some way they are real. We sense that they are deeply important. Even if we can't quite put our finger on why or how exactly they're deeply important, they feel deeply important.

In a way, we could say the image itself involves our entertaining a view about the image. And this is for some people a bit of a stretch, but it involves our entertaining a view, and included in that view is a view of the self and of the cosmos. Wrapped up in this sense of the image is the entertaining of a conceptual view, which could be quite vague—it probably is quite vague—regarding the self and regarding the cosmos.

It's, if you like, a richer, more multidimensional view than the view of, say, modern scientific reductionism, for example, or what they call physicalism, which is a very flat, one-dimensional view. It's a view that tries to explain the movement and behavior of matter in space and time dependent on physicality—other matter in space and time and the way it interacts. It's quite one-dimensional.

Or maybe we add another dimension and view things—as we tend to do in the modern worldview or cosmological view—as only personal or only social. So this image, or my being, my life, is viewed in purely humanistic terms or purely social terms, or purely as a result of the past or the result of matter. All this is what I'm calling flat, one-dimensional.

Rather than that, or rather including that but opening up further, with this sense of images is what I want to call a vertical dimension. There is the sensing, or we could say the giving—both the giving to the image a sense of a vertical dimension. I'm going to come back to this hopefully later on.

So what do I mean, just for now? I mean there is a sense, or I'm entertaining the view, that this image, or my person, my personhood, or my life, the threads of my life, the soul events of my life—we're entertaining the view of vertical dimension, which means something like that this image, my person, my life and its soul events are mirroring or echoing archetypal figures, if you like, or we could even say divine figures. They are in some way rooted in archetypal figures or rooted in the divine, so that there's a kind of vertical spectrum. We can talk about different places on that vertical spectrum—the more archetypal or divine, the more so-called human and material.

We'll elaborate on this later, but that can be a sense within or with an image. One has that sense of something shining through or having its origins or roots in something else, some other dimensionality, if you like, so that it's echoing, mirroring, or rooted or originating in that. It's as if the image and the experience of the image, or my being, my personhood, my life unfolding and its trajectories and events and all that in my personality, is existing, if you like, on different levels at once that are mirroring each other, echoing each other.

Saying all that, and as I said, I'm aware that something like that might, for some people, feel like really a stretch. I'm going to come back to this, but really to emphasize—and for me this is important—that if we speak of gods, I realize I am creating these gods. That's not usually how we think about gods, is it? I am creating these gods. The psyche is creating these gods.

This is interesting philosophically because most people will be either in the view that either something is real—and by real they mean objectively existing, independent of the mind, independent of the psyche, if you like, independent of the way of looking—either it's real that way, in that objective, independent way, or we create them. And yet, is there another way of understanding? I'm saying emptiness really helps, and other philosophical openings are possible. Primarily, it's really the understanding of emptiness as I would understand it in its depths—to really understand it's not this either-or. We can, so to speak, acknowledge and recognize that this is fabrication. We are creating these gods, and it doesn't mean they are unreal.

In the Jewish mystical tradition, in a famous and very revered text—a huge text called the Zohar—somewhere in there it says, "God"—remember this is an ancient monotheistic religion—but it says somewhere in there in the mystical text, "God is mystically dependent on humanity's liturgical praise and acts." So somehow humanity's praise, humanity's prayerfulness and reverence and devotion, and also the action of humanity, somehow creates God.

Very easily, some people will hear that and reduce it to a metaphor. A bit like when some people talk about brahmavihāras, which sometimes is translated as divine abodes. "Oh, that's what 'God' means—that we create it that way by being..." It only refers to a kind of—it's just another way of saying that's really good to be that way. Can I hear something like that—"God is mystically dependent on humanity's liturgical praise and acts"—without reducing it to a metaphor and kind of disempowering it?

There's a kind of razor's edge of view here between concretized belief and dismissal.

If I share something—actually, some years ago when I was thinking about it, several people had asked me repeatedly, "Will you write a book about emptiness?" And I kept saying no. For some reason I began to somehow more seriously entertain the idea, but I knew it was going to be a huge amount of work, and I had also felt in some ways that I had put a lot of that out in talks, and I had moved on in terms of what I was researching and exploring and excited about and wanted to share and express.

A friend and I—he was actually a dharma teacher—were talking about this, and we had been talking about imaginal practice. He said, in regard to the book and my unsureness, "Well, do the gods want it?"

Do the gods want it?

And the answer was, I don't know. I don't know whether they want it. I don't have any sense. I felt very ambivalent. I didn't know.

And somehow—well, this could be a very long story. I'll cut it short. I began writing. I began working on it and was absolutely right. It was very difficult in a lot of ways, very challenging, not just because of the size of the task, but because I had so much else on in terms of work. And also, as I said, because for me, in a way, I felt like there were other things that I wanted to share and explore and express and research.

But in the writing of it, then feeling the challenges, the different challenges involved, I decided actually to relate to those challenges as practice—but not through emptiness practice, through imaginal practice. And so feeling into the whole process of writing and the challenges more imaginally, and taking that to the cushion and working with imaginal practice in meditation.

And somehow out of that came a sense of images in relationship to the book, a whole range of images. Very lovely, very moving. And it's almost like the work and the attitude and the experience birthed these gods. And then these gods fed back into supporting and encouraging and pushing, in some cases, the process of writing.

So what came first there? There was a kind of recognition that these gods had a powerful effect on me and, if you like, guided and encouraged and supported and cajoled and pushed and prodded, recognizing that—yes, and I create them.

So this has a mirror, as I said, in some traditions, and one is the Jewish mystical tradition. In another stream of that tradition called the Lurianic Kabbalah after Isaac Luria, a sixteenth-century mystic in Palestine, he had elaborated a system—it's not entirely his, but metaphorically in terms of cosmology and creation, it's not really a temporal scheme at all—that the original vessels that were created to embody and contain and radiate the aspects of God, of the divine, were created but were actually not able to withstand the intensity of the influx of divine light. And so they shattered under the force of divine light coming into them. And they shattered into shards that were then scattered in the universe.

And part of, if you like, the task of consciousness, of humanity, is to recognize these shards that contain divinity and, so to speak, raise them up back to a kind of divinity. But in doing that, create new vessels. So not reconstruct the original vessels, but actually create new vessels—new, if you like, containers or aspects or faces of the divine. So this is what humanity does.

So humanity, through our acts, our doings—more importantly, even than that, through our perception and interpretation of self, other, texts, tradition, world—through acts and perceptions and interpretations of humanity, we are actually creating new vessels, if you like, creating new faces of God or new gods, new archetypes.

So there's this recognition there that through action and through—again, everything hinging on perception—through perception, interpretation and ways of looking, that humanity is in some sense creating the divine and the faces of the divine, or we could say the gods.

So if you know a little bit about philosophy, that's a different conception than the more Platonic idea of archetypes or ideas, where they tend to be quite fixed. There's no changing of them. And yet it's not a kind of postmodern nihilism—just if we create things, everything's just meaningless and has no value whatsoever.

So as I said, there's some kind of razor's edge here, which if I can hold that line and balance there between this idea of either they're real or we create them—actually what's a razor's edge, what's a very thin line, opens up huge, huge expanses.

So I am not the same as my gods and my demons, my daimons. They're not the same. Rather, they depend on each other. The self, my life and my gods, my daimons, these figures that come to me—they give life to each other, they shape each other, they're dependent on each other.

We could then say the image is never separate from the way of looking at it. It's never separate from the mind state, from the reaction to the image, the relationship with it, the conceptual framework that's being entertained in relationship to it. Or in Dharma language, the image, this imaginal figure, this god or archetypal image, whatever I want to call it, this daimon, is always dependently arising with the way of looking, with the mind state, with the reaction, with the relationship, with the conceptual framework.

Or to say that in yet another way, it's not yet an image in the sense that I mean that word—it's not yet an image until the relationship with it comes alive in certain ways. So this character that I have in a dream or this image that comes to me in meditation is not yet an image in the way that I mean it until the relationship with it is alive in certain ways. And I may or may not be aware of having that kind of relationship with it. That's also really interesting.

So for a lot of people, moving in life and actually entertaining very, very vaguely certain ideas and relationships to something in life—a perception or a situation or their self or something—not quite aware of what the relationship with it is, what the conceptual framework really is, not aware that it's imaged.

So, again, another way of saying this is that we're playing with conceptual frameworks—and emphasis on the word playing because this razor's edge is a very playful point of balance. It's not rigid and concretized. There's a lot of fluidity, flexibility, lightness, ease to enter in and out of different conceptual frameworks.

I think I've mentioned in several other talks that our word "idea"—I-D-E-A—comes from the Greek word eidos, E-I-D-O-S, which implies not just idea, but also what we look at things through—the way we see. So we look at things through, we look at this image or I look at the situation in my life or I look at my journey through life or I look at myself or the self of another through the conceptual framework, through the eidos.

With enough flexibility or deep understanding of emptiness or philosophical skill, if you like, we can be free to play with different conceptual frameworks. In this case, we're playing with a conceptual framework of: what if we do not dismiss this image as just the result of random neurological firing? What if we don't dismiss the image? What if we don't literalize it?

The opening of the conceptual framework is: rather than close it down by dismissing it or by literalizing it—let's say if I keep having this image of a solitary wanderer, it means, "Oh, you should go traveling. You should maybe take a walking holiday. Go hiking in the mountains or something"—not necessarily literalizing it. We're playing with the idea of not literalizing it, not dismissing it, not interpreting it rigidly or narrowly as a sign: "It means this. It represents that."

So we're playing with what happens when I don't dismiss it, when I don't literalize it, when I don't interpret it rigidly as a sign. And then also playing with the idea, the conceptual framework, if you like: what if I entertain the idea that the image is primary?

In other words, this image is not necessarily reflecting or expressing my history. Maybe I see a sad child, the image of a sad child, or a child alone, and I don't immediately assume, "Oh, it must be referring to my childhood in some aspect that I either already know or that I didn't realize—that there was some sadness there or some loneliness there." It might be, but what if I don't just jump into that view, which would be that the history is primary, the memory is primary, the material reality is primary, and the image is reflecting that or reflecting some psychological wound or something. What if I play with the idea—turn that around, as we were talking yesterday evening—and say, play with the idea that the image is primary, that it's archetypal in all the ways that I unfolded what's contained in that sort of shorthand word. That it's primary, that it's archetypal.

I play with trusting these images. Trusting them, trusting their intention and their nature, if you like. And part of that trusting is including in my conceptual framework a different or a more open idea in relationship to causality and what's called telos. I'll explain what that means.

Both when I'm viewing an image, but also with more and more imaginal practice, this also relates to how I'm viewing my life. So regarding images or regarding my life, myself—we can see very easily, everyone would agree, the past gives rise to the present. The past causes the present. That's one idea about causality and very important. We have to see that. Of course, the present is dependent on the past. A Dharma practitioner needs to be on the journey of exploring dependent arising and fabrication, which I've talked about a lot in other places and written about.

So not just that the past causes the present, but the present causes the present. This way of looking, this relationship, this reaction in the present causes—it shapes the present, fabricates the present, and I absolutely need to understand that. Not just the past, but the present also creates the present.

And then thirdly, there's this idea—there's a Greek word, telos, T-E-L-O-S, aim or goal or end, if you like—that in some strange way, the future, we could say, causes the present. That there's something that moves towards some—let's use the word fulfillment—but some end, some goal, some fruition.

So that the past causes the present. Yes, of course, obvious. The present causes the present. We really need to understand that. And we're entertaining the idea that in some way images may have something to do, imaginal figures may have something to do with or may contain within them some kind of telos. They're showing us something or pulling us towards or inviting us towards something—goading us sometimes towards something of what we are growing towards, if you like, what we are moving towards, our trajectory.

In a way, they're a little bit—Corbin talks about the angel out ahead. James Hillman talks about grappling with the angels of one's destiny and how in the psychotherapeutic or psychoanalytic process—we could say also just in terms of Dharma practice—a certain amount of practice and certain amount of suffering and neurosis is dealt with, gone, seen through, learned how to dissolve, etcetera. And then maybe there's a whole other level of this grappling with the angels of one's destiny. It's not something I necessarily just want to dissolve or get rid of or, "Oh, that's dukkha, so I'll neutralize it and come to some kind of more simple, equanimous place."

So that's involved in our playing, in the conceptual framework that we're playing with—this idea or this at least admitting or sensing the possibility of something telistic here, if that's the word, something of telos, something of where we are drawn, pulled to.

And as I mentioned earlier, there's otherness—this sense or regard of an imaginal figure as somehow other. This otherness is a necessary facet of the image.

Remember what I described of the liquid being poured into my head, and there's a sense I couldn't see who was doing it or sense who it was, but it was somehow other, and that was significant, what gave it power.

Just as with emotions and our emotional life—and again, this is something really important. If you haven't seen this already in your practice or explored this, I would really recommend. We see with emotions how much the conception of emotions, emotional life, emotional goals or directions—how much that whole conceptual framework around emotions affects the unfolding of emotions and what even comes up emotionally.

So just as that is the case with our emotional life, which we can explore and find out for ourselves whether that's true with emotions—it takes a certain amount of courage, willingness, open-mindedness—just as the case with emotions, the same is true with what presents itself as image, and how an image that arises unfolds.

So the view that we have, the conceptual framework, we could say it stimulates, it inspires, it condones certain images, it accommodates and supports certain images, or not. Always, always, always the conceptual framework is an immensely significant factor.

A few more things. When we're still talking about what's included in this, when we say image, it may be that an image is an actual myth. In other words, it's not just something arising just for us, but it may be, for example, the myth of Christ and that whole—for me, I wasn't raised in that tradition. There's a real depth and freshness and beauty for me and moves me immensely. I never felt oppressed by it or bored by it because maybe I didn't grow up with it, I don't know. But that's, if you like, a myth—all that with the crucifixion and the resurrection and the betrayal and the mercy, the beauty of all that.

So it could be that that myth or aspects of that myth are what we're meditating on. Or from another tradition, the myth of Horus, the falcon god, son of Isis in Egyptian mythology—I find a very, very beautiful myth. They are very complex, rich. Or from the classical Greek tradition, perhaps Eros, the myth of Eros and Psyche, the love affair of Eros and Psyche, or the myth of Persephone, who was raped by Hades, the god of the underworld, and dragged down to the underworld. And then her mother, Demeter, was tormentedly searching for her, searching, searching, going through all kinds of suffering. It's a long story, but in the end, Persephone lives half or some portion of the year in the underworld as queen of the underworld and wife of Hades and some other portion of the year in this world.

So really the point is an image for us may be an actual myth. It may be something that we really feel when we hear that story and feel into it. We really feel a lot of resonance and depth and it moves us and it's alive for us.

Actually, in those four images, four myths I just mentioned—Christ, Horus, Eros and Psyche, and the myth of Persephone—one thing that's striking to me is how we can have a sense of understanding those myths. I understand sort of the allegory there or what's being communicated to a certain extent. And yet they always retain, and maybe this is characteristic of images and myths that survive and survive with potency for the psyche, this mixture of "I can understand"—and also in different ways. There's not just a mono-understanding that's possible. They're interpretable in lots of different ways, applicable to our lives in lots of different ways.

But at the same time that there can be sense of understanding or understandings, they always retain a kind of unfathomability. There's always this mystery. I cannot quite get to the bottom of everything that this myth or this image is pregnant with. So that's one thing to notice about those.

The other thing is the mixture within that myth of redemption, if you like, and suffering—in the Christ myth, in the Horus myth, if you know it. Beautiful. In the myth of Eros and Psyche and in the myth of Persephone, they're not so simple in terms of the relationship with suffering and freedom from suffering. I'm just saying that because that's so central in Buddha Dharma, this question of suffering and ending suffering—it's something I'm going to come back to. But often myths are not quite so simple in regard to suffering.

That's actually a very complex question. Historically, some of you will know, some people come down on one side of that question: never let go of the suffering. The suffering is always given a place. And some people, for example James Hillman, and some people will come down on the other side that through skillful imaginal work suffering is completely transcended—for example, someone like Corbin, Henri Corbin. So I want to come back to that, it's a very important question.

But an image for us may be an actual myth, that's completely fine. It may be also that a memory from our life can become an image for us. So again, what do I mean by image? It's not just, "Oh, I remember that because I can remember that that's what happened. I remember that event in my memory, and therefore it's an image because it's a visual image in my mind." No, I mean an image in the full sense that I'm talking about tonight—imbued with all that meaningfulness and depth and resonance and timelessness and everything that we've alluded to.

So any memory—sometimes, for example, it could be an erotic encounter, something in lovemaking and just some moment in that becomes or comes, stays with us in a kind of timeless way. It's almost like it's transported or removed from the flow of time and exists for us, pregnant and beautiful and deep and mysterious as a kind of timeless image. That memory of something that happened in my life becomes infused with soul, or is infused with soul, soulfulness, soul-making, and becomes image for us.

Now, of course, memory is picked up and imbued with energy and significance when we're in the throes or the vortex of papañca, this kind of crazy ego proliferation mind that most human beings know very well. There's also characteristic there—often or can be—a memory is picked up. There's a lot of energy and significance attached to this memory, but there's a difference there. This is really important.

In papañca, everything is so damn literal. It just means what we think it means, and it's shrunken and small and concretized and literal. There's no soulfulness in it. There's no depth and resonance and beauty. The ego is very identified, taken very literally, and so it's all wrapped up in ego identity. It's very, if you like, lacking in other-dimensionality—in this depth and resonances, timelessness, cosmology. And of course, in papañca, there's contraction, generally speaking. There's not an opening out of the psyche or the energy body. The energy body is contracted, the psyche is actually contracted. It's very different than when memory becomes image. When a memory becomes papañca, quite a different experience.

So it could be a myth, could be a memory. It's also important to point out that images can appear in stages or develop in stages. This is actually quite common. Maybe over one meditation session, you get a little bit and then a bit more is added and then a bit more, or over several sessions, or sometimes over really, really long periods of time—sometimes even decades, amazingly. So it doesn't necessarily all come at once. There can be a sort of stage-like process sometimes there.

Images can also, so to speak, cross-pollinate. In other words, we might, for example, read something or hear someone else's image or see something or someone or read a myth or hear a myth, and the image contained in what we see, read, or hear plants a seed, if you like, or becomes a seed. Maybe that becomes or joins an image that we already had, or gives rise—as a seed gives rise—to an image for us, becomes an image for us, or joins another image that we already had and makes a kind of combination. These things are fertile and there's a possibility of cross-pollination. That's not wrong at all.

So an image can also be a person I know, as I've alluded to. It can be people we know or people we just meet. This could be someone alive or someone dead. It could be someone famous or not. Could be a teacher, as I said. Again, we might know them or just know about them, so to speak.

Where there is love and beauty and meaningfulness in a relationship, whether we know this person directly or we know about them or we just met them, where there is love and beauty and meaningfulness and a sense of depth and resonance, then that relationship is infused with image, fantasy, mythos. So that's just another way of saying the same thing, or recognizing: if this person, there's a lot of love and there's a sense of real beauty and meaningfulness here for me in depth, then that's another way of saying, look, at that time, an image is alive and working in my perception of this person. And there's no problem with that. The relationship is infused with that and it's beautiful and necessary.

And as I said, sometimes it can be someone we just meet or just see on a film or something. One student was telling me they were actually quite down for a short period. And then they heard a woman speak—she was an activist. And they heard her give a lecture. I think it was even on the Internet, on YouTube or something. I can't remember. And the depression lifted immediately. Why? Partly because this activist was talking, the woman was talking, and her presence and her delivery and something coming through—she was seen as image, and it triggered the soulfulness and the aliveness of the soulfulness. It triggered a fantasy in the person listening. And where there is aliveness and soulfulness like that,

That kind of depression lifts. We come alive again.

From all of this, it becomes clear that we shouldn't assume images exist somehow a priori, locked away somewhere in the psyche as if it were closed. Rather, the psyche will take anything from our life, from our experience, and make it archetypal if it can, if it needs to. Rather than images being stored somewhere and then simply arising, there's a process actively imbuing perception. This is more what I tend to mean when I use the word fantasy—it's imbuing perception and the sense of life itself.

Through this process, others can become for us what I call theophany—T-H-E-O-P-H-A-N-Y—which means something like an appearance of the divine. Other beings, whether they are teachers, lovers, friends, people we know or strangers, can through skillful imaginal work become what I hesitate to call—because it carries too many new age connotations—channels or faces of the divine. Henri Corbin speaks beautifully about the angelic function of beings.

In such relationships, there's tremendous richness, depth, resonance, beauty, and meaningfulness. Something is ignited, sparked in the soul, in the psyche, often through eros as well. They become for us somehow divine, a face or showing of the divine, somehow angelic. This ties directly into what I mentioned earlier about the vertical dimension.

We perceive that person materially and obviously human, a result of their past conditioning. Yet simultaneously, without discounting this human dimension, we sense other planes—or more accurately, other levels of perception. Everything, as I've said, hinges on perception. We become able to perceive other levels of their being that are more divinely rooted, reflecting, echoing, or mirroring the divine. It's coming through this being—their expression, their body, their speech perhaps, their love.

Now, we know this is a perception, and as dharma practitioners, we should know that all perception is empty and fabricated. So there's something philosophically sophisticated happening here. It's a perception, it's empty, it's fabricated, and yet it has tremendous power. We're not saying this means it's not real at all.

This relates very much to tantra practice as it's practiced in the Tibetan tradition—practicing seeing this place or that person or one's own person as a Buddha, as a deity. The emphasis is on practice: one is practicing seeing in a certain way. This is actually how Buddhas see in that tradition. One practices seeing this or that or all things as divine. I'll return to this interface with tantra, the connections and differences, hopefully later.

Through all this work with theophany and levels of perception, with the vertical dimension, life changes. Life itself, experience itself, one's own narrative, this moment of experience comes to be seen as image. What does it mean to see life as image? To see it through that lens, to sense it through that lens with a different sensibility?

This could be one's personal life—seeing one's narrative, one's personality, what one is called to express, the events of one's life, all as image. Something that could seem very mundane might suddenly be revealed this way. I remember studying one day, reading different texts, then going to practice—this was some years ago—looking for images, but then realizing that the image actually alive right now was this day itself, or the portion spent at my desk with these texts.

The whole activity—trying to make connections, trying to open up horizons and paradigms, trying to absorb and learn from others, from beautiful minds and hearts that I respect, being connected with the tradition that way—that itself was image. It was somehow sensed as image and infused with divinity. Me, the activity of studying, the tradition, the connection, the effort to open up ideas and push horizons, the whole room I was in—all of it was imbued with this sense of theophany. The whole thing was itself imaged, including my life and all of that.

So it can happen this way. Something very mundane gets imbued with a different sense, connecting with other levels. It could be one's personal life, as I've described, or it could be something more universal or cosmological, which we'll explore more later.

As in tantric practice, we can see this space right now as a Buddha realm, as a mandala, as a divine palace—feeling it, sensing it that way.

It has another dimensionality to it. There are all kinds of possibilities there. We'll come back to this. But the point is, eventually life can be seen as image more and more, or in and out of that perspective. And that could be just in relation to one's personal life, or more in relation to life in the sense of universal life around one and this world, or a mixture of the two.

But again, in that second one, in the sense of what happens to my view and my sense of this world around me right now, this moment around me right now in this hall—it's not necessary that an image in that respect is coming as a visual object, but it's how this here is seen. The way of looking at it renders it or sees pregnant within it already myth-os, fantasy, sees it, feels it, senses it as image with everything that that means—not some other thing appearing spontaneously out of the psyche or deliberately, but this moment now seen as image, felt as image.

This is important in all kinds of ways. One of them is just a recognition as an insight here. We need to recognize, and with practice, it's possible: image, fantasy, mythos is actually in sense data. It's woven into perception. A lot of the time, maybe not always, but in the senses that I'm using, a lot of the time, it's woven into the sense data. It's not so much added later on.

I'm going to fill this out later on. I'll just mention it now. In another talk, I'll fill it out, but I'll just put it there as I see. When we talk about mindfulness, but especially when we talk about things like bare attention—just feeling the breeze on the cheek, just the raisin taste in the mouth, etc.—the intention there for that kind of practice of bare attention, of what's often communicated as simple mindfulness, the intention there is a sort of shaving off down to something that's supposedly bare, but there's a shaving off of these other levels of image, fantasy, mythos.

So there is, within that kind of stance of practice, a shaving off—that's a good way of putting it—of the imaginal levels, the fantasy, the mythos that can imbue sense data. The idea is: can I be with just the sense data itself in its bare form? That's a very, very valid practice to a certain extent. But it's a different gear than what often happens in life, especially when there's love or when we have a sense of meaningfulness, of depth, of beauty, or certain kinds of soul beauty, let's say. It's a different gear to be in bare attention.

Then other practices—like, for example, the range of emptiness practices or when there's samatha, when samadhi is deepening, or other dharma practices—we could say they fabricate even less than so-called bare attention, than mindfulness practice. So that's a different gear as well. Not only is it not fabricating this soulful aspect of image, fantasy, mythos; it's not even fabricating other aspects of experience. These practices—emptiness practice, samadhi practice, metta practice—as they get going and deepen, they fabricate even less than so-called bare attention practices. There's a whole spectrum of less and less fabrication there.

But if we're not practicing bare attention, if we're not practicing emptiness and samadhi, or any times we're not practicing bare attention or emptiness or samadhi, etc., there will tend to be something wrapped up in our perceiving. And a lot of that time it is what I'm calling image, fantasy, mythos.

So there's something about recognizing that that constitutes a really important insight. I recognize it—oh, this is something I need to acknowledge and understand and feel into and see its effects. I recognize it; that's an insight. And then I can also empower it at times and empower that kind of imbuing or involvement or relationship with perception so that there is this soul-making, this soulfulness—and I'm going to fill out what that means.

For the sake of soulfulness, for the sake of soul-making, we can actually empower that understanding and that involvement with perception. Empowering things in that way or allowing that to have its power—that partly hinges on our playing with and entertaining views and conceptual frameworks, on lightly entertaining views and conceptual frameworks regarding images and what we perceive, as I've tried to explain a little bit.

So again, this willingness to play and entertain certain conceptual frameworks, views, to stretch things, open them out, not just immediately dismiss, etc., as I've explained—that gives power to something which enables the soulfulness to go deeper and the soul-making to happen in a very beautiful and fertile way. It hinges partly on this playing with the conceptual frameworks. Really important—I'm saying that over and over.

CHAPTER 9

What is an 'Image'? (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h18

> In this foundational talk from the Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea carefully defines what he means by 'image,' 'fantasy,' and 'mythos' in contemplative practice. He explores how images transcend visual perception, encompassing auditory, bodily, and even non-sensory experiences that carry profound meaningfulness. Drawing on examples from meditation practice, Burbea distinguishes between narrative images (sequential, causal) and iconic/poetic images (timeless, archetypal), emphasizing how the latter cultivate soulfulness through resonance, beauty, and depth rather than literal interpretation.
>
> Burbea references various Buddhist practices including the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta's body contemplations and mettā meditation, showing how imagination serves different purposes across traditions. He introduces James Hillman's understanding of archetypal images as 'universal, transhistorical, basically profound, generative, highly intentional, and necessary,' while emphasizing that we both sense and give archetypal value to images. This sophisticated approach recognizes images as empty of inherent existence yet profoundly meaningful for soul-making practice.
>
> The talk establishes crucial foundations for imaginal practice, emphasizing soulfulness over dramatic content, mystery over complete understanding, and the transformative power of dwelling with images that open dimensions beyond the purely personal or historical.

I'd like to talk about what we really mean—at least what I mean—when I use words like image, fantasy, mythos. What's included in that meaning, what an image is, and particularly the kinds of direction, inclination, or way of relating that I'm most interested in exploring. I want to begin to fill that out and shape it a little.

In the opening talk, I enumerated a list of relatively familiar uses of the imagination in life and practice that many of you will be familiar with or at least have heard of. There's really a range in how imagination gets used in different instances or by different people in certain practices.

Just to reiterate briefly, there is the whole use of imagination for visioning—whether it's visioning the future of a retreat center like Gaia House and where it wants to be in twenty years' time, or visioning a zero-carbon future for society. There's the use of the imagination in the contemplation of death and the contemplation of the body parts that the Buddha teaches in the mindfulness discourse, the Satipatthana Sutta. There's the use of imagination taking any object that may not have any significance at all—like a candle or a stone or anything else—and looking at it and then visualizing it internally just for the purposes of quieting the mind, gathering the focus for developing concentration.

Then there's the use of the imagination in practices like metta or compassion, where we imagine in some way the so-called benefactor or friend or neutral person. We imagine this person as the image of them, and it's really just an aid—the imagination there is just an aid to cultivating this quality in our heart, so that it's got an object and we can direct the metta. That way our heart's quality of metta is cultivated, is nourished through that practice using the imagination.

There's also the use of an image of, say, Kuan Yin or Jesus or Mary or Tara—could be anything, some kind of figure or deity. What's happening there, or a big part of what's happening, is we hold that image in the imagination and it starts to resonate with the qualities of compassion, let's say if it's Kuan Yin or Jesus. In that way, those qualities—those same qualities that that deity or figure embodies, manifests, expresses—get empowered in our heart. So oftentimes the imagination is used for that purpose in that direction.

Then there are instances in the Pali Canon where the Buddha recommends a practice called recollection of the Buddha, which again involves imagination. That can bring inspiration when there's lack of inspiration or energy when there's lack of energy. So it's serving that purpose.

Some of you will be familiar with using an image or a memory to trigger feelings of well-being, feelings of joy or happiness even, or energy in the body. People often use that as a little trick when they're doing samadhi practice, and it's completely fine. The image then can be let go of in those instances once the feeling of well-being, rapture, or happiness is established a little bit—that becomes the focus. So the image is just a stepping stone to something else.

There's also a possibility of using the imagination to come into dialogue with, for example, the inner critic, the superego, some critical inner character—letting it constellate as an image, as an imaginal figure. This can be very fruitful to work with that kind of oppressive inner psychic structure.

Just as an aside—I've mentioned this in other talks and retreats—we tend to think that dialoguing with images and having relationships with imaginal figures will make us crazy. Psychologists who actually investigate this stuff find it's the opposite. They find people who suffer, say, from schizophrenia or psychotic delusions tend to have vague imaginal presences which they don't actually relate to, and rather they turn away from. Similarly with the inner critic—oftentimes we're turning away from the inner critic rather than turning towards it and establishing, entering into relationship.

The craziness, if we can even use that word, or the mental disturbance comes more from not being in relationship, from turning away from relationship, from the vagueness, the lack of sensitivity and feeling out of the relationship. The healing comes through actually turning towards and relating and entering into relationship with an imaginal figure.

Then there are other psychotherapeutically functioning images of all kinds that might help support one's personal growth and personal healing—for example, in Gestalt psychology or psychosynthesis and other modern psychotherapeutic traditions. And then there's a whole realm of extrasensory perception and so forth.

All of that is very fine, and in a way we're open to all of that here—you're using all of that as much or as little as you like.

We made the point as well in the opening talk, just to repeat it again, that always in any of those cases—in each and any of those cases—there's always a conception, a way of conceiving of the images that's involved. So for example, with the candle, as I said, it's just insignificant what it actually is, for the most part, or stone or whatever. In the visioning of Gaia House's future, we're talking about something very practical—that's part of the conception. Or in contemplating death, we're talking about this material decay, and so on.

There's a great range in the conceiving of images, and there's always conceiving involved. Always included in that conceiving is the direction and purpose and the particular kinds of use of the image. So that's a general fundamental point that's really important to realize.

Again, we make the point that we are free to conceive and use images however we want, really. Certainly on this retreat, I'm open to most things. But we have freedom there.

Now, what I really want to expand on and fill out for us is: what do we mean on this retreat? What do I mean when I use words like image, fantasy, mythos? What do I include in the meaning of those words when I use them, or predominantly when I use them? Because, to be honest, like many words, I will use them sloppily at times and more precisely at others. But this is really what I mean, mostly.

So what I include in that meaning, and also the particular inclination that I'm most interested in developing—this is what I'm really interested in, in relationship.

There are quite a few aspects here. Let's just start.

If you recall the imagination exercise we did briefly this afternoon, I hope that one of the conclusions you realized from that was that an image, as I might use that word, is not necessarily visual. This is absolutely fundamental.

It's not necessarily visual. It may be, and that's fine, but it may not be. So it may be aural. It may be that the image is predominantly or includes something that we hear. We hear a voice in the inner ear, so to speak, in the imagination. And we perhaps even dialogue, so it's maybe entirely aural or partly aural, auditory.

Some people, many people in fact, as the meditation deepens for them, as the mind becomes a bit more still, they start to hear a kind of high-pitched, buzzing sound. This has different names in different traditions. Some people call it the nāda sound, which nāda just means sound in Sanskrit, so it's a sound sound, the nāda sound. People give it no significance at all or give it great cosmic spiritual significance or something in between. Some people are irritated by it; some people love it. You can use it in different ways, but one of the ways which is possible is actually to, when this sound arises—or if it arises, it doesn't arise for everyone—one option is actually to deliberately hear it as, for example, the compassion of the cosmic Buddhas and bodhisattvas.

This is someone who was practicing loving-kindness and compassion, someone for whom that sort of language and that sort of conception or image, they were very comfortable with that. And then this sound was arising. I suggested, well, you could hear this sound, which as it goes on feels like it's actually permeating—doesn't actually feel like it's originating in the head. The sense of it is that it permeates the air, the atmosphere, the space. And so in that case there's a deliberately incorporating that sound and deliberately hearing it as the compassion, the pervasive cosmic compassion of the Buddhas and the cosmic bodhisattvas. So the sound itself becomes an image. It was just a sound before and we were hearing it this way or that way or irritating or not interested or whatever, but potentially we can have a different relationship with it where it becomes an image in the sense that I mean it, because it becomes imbued with meaning and depth and resonance.

So the sound, a pure sound if you like, or just a simple sound, becomes an image of that pervasive compassion. So it doesn't have to be visual. It could be aural predominantly or partly.

It could also be mostly in the body. The image is not visual, not aural, but mostly in the body. Now sometimes we're putting a lot of emphasis on the energy body, and sometimes that energy body can feel, for example, that it fills with energy, fills with power. A feeling, an energetic feeling of power comes into the energy body. And then an image from that body sense can come, but it's more a body sense image—for example, of a powerful animal or a wrathful deity or a demonic figure from some kind of cosmology or something that might not be seen. It's more felt. The body actually feels its way into the inside of that powerful animal or deity.

So I remember some time ago, I was actually doing walking meditation on the lawn, and a series of images where this tiger appeared. Now it was partly visual in this case, but predominantly it had a very different dominant sense to it. This tiger was by its nature a very sensuous creature. It had a very direct, sensuous relationship with its own body. And I sort of entered into that tiger and its bodily experience. Rather than the vision being the primary modality there, the body was the primary sense modality.

This tiger was very sensuous, very much enjoying its body, its heaviness, its strength, its slowness, its power. There was pleasure in that, in the sense of its body, even the way it rested on the thick trunk of a tree was oozing this enjoyment of the sensuousness of its body. I was really entering into that, and it wasn't really strong or vivid as an image, but I stayed with it and it developed gradually over time.

Then actually—it's interesting that I did because it had two other chapters to it—one was it started to eat my intestines and devour my entrails, which felt incredibly healing. So there was a kind of—instead of me being identified with the tiger, it then approached me and ate my intestines, which was wonderful and very healing feeling. And then later, which I won't really go into now but may come back to, it's as if that quality of physical sensuousness then started to inform and imbue my perception of nature in a very particular way. So I don't mean the sense of the breeze on the cheek or the step of the bare feet on the grass or whatever. I actually mean sensuous in a more erotic sense. But we'll come back to that perhaps later.

The point is really that the image was predominantly a body sense of sensuality, and also that it developed.

Sometimes an image is not even any kind of sense object of any of the five senses at all. This is quite interesting and perhaps quite common. So it doesn't have to be sight, sound, smell, taste, touch necessarily.

I had a dream some time ago. In the last portion of this dream, I was playing a grand piano outside somewhere in a war-torn country. And there was a big wall. The piano was next to the wall, twenty, twenty-five feet high. And I could tell that the wall was about to be bombed by an aircraft—drop a bomb or missiles at it or something. But I was playing this music, and there was this feeling, despite the impending bombing, that it's really okay because of the music. And there was this absolutely beautiful music. I don't know what it was. I'd never heard it before.

The psyche is so creative from its depths to conjure the most extraordinary beauty. And this music was filling the space—beautiful, beautiful music. It's okay that the wall will be bombed and maybe I will even die there because there was music. And somehow this music, in a strange sort of dreamlike fashion, had a physical directionality to it, like a kind of jagged arrow in the direction I was supposed to follow anyway, the physical direction. And being bombed or being burned or even dying, it was okay. And then the words came in the dream: because it's the music that matters.

And that really touched me. It's the music that matters, matters more than anything else.

So I took that image, and I worked with it in the meditation in the morning. It's not really a visual image. It wasn't really—it sort of peeled itself away, the image. It's the music that matters. That phrase became kind of pregnant with meaning and depth and resonances, peeled itself away from the visual images of the dream, peeled itself also away from the music, the specific music of the dream, the auditory. So it was not a visual image, it was not even a particularly aural image at that point, but more going into this sense of music, music mattering, and something about that.

What is it? What was music? Hard to put your finger on or totally describe in words. It's a symbol, an image, and a lot to do with beauty. The symbol here of music that came alive and had so much depth had to do with beauty, had to do with a sense almost of life as music, and a sense of, with it, a devotional sense of aligning, devoting, letting go into that, devoting my life to that—life as beauty, as music, this mystery, that being the important thing.

The devotion to that, the loving that, the expressing that, also communicating that to others—this music. I don't mean just literal music. I mean this music and everything that that means symbolically: beauty and more. It's impossible to fully express, but prioritizing that, aligning with it, devoting to it, letting go into it, communicating, expressing it.

That was so beautiful and rich and pregnant and deep as an image that did not really belong to any of the five senses. It was a symbol that was very alive, very, very, very meaningful and soulful.

But all of this is really to make the point for imaginal practice that when images come, we need to notice what is the primary or the dominant sense avenue of this image for me, and actually to trust that. So if it feels like it's primarily auditory or through the body or whatever, however I know or perceive that image, I trust that. I trust the primary. I notice and I trust the primary or the dominant sense avenue.

And again, perhaps it was clear from the little exercise we did this afternoon, it's not necessary for the sensual detail of the sensory detail of the image to be that clear. And maybe that's important in some instances, but the kind of pixel resolution or whatever it's called on computer screens—that's actually not that important often. Often, sometimes it is, but usually it's not.

And sometimes it's not even necessary that it's a clear, defined object. The image sense is very, very potent and very deep and meaningful without actually crystallizing or constellating as a clear object. This is the image. I see that image as an object or I hear it as a sound object or whatever. So really, as I said, what I want to include in the word image is something broader than certainly just a visual object.

And then secondly, it's not necessary, as again, probably clear from many of the examples, it's not necessary that we dialogue with images. So sometimes some people are familiar with work in therapy, etc., where you dialogue with images. It's not necessary at all. I mean, it may—an image may involve or invite dialogue. And that's interesting.

Sometimes that dialogue seems to happen at a sort of normal pace that one would normally dialogue with someone. Sometimes it happens even slow enough that a person can even write the dialogue down as it's happening. So it may involve dialogue. It may be in that kind of way. Sometimes it involves dialogue, I find, and other people find. Sometimes it involves dialogue, but it's a sort of intuited dialogue. You couldn't possibly write it down that fast, and you couldn't possibly even speak that fast. It's just we intuit what this imaginal figure is saying to us in our response, etc.

So it may involve dialogue, or it may not. An image may not. It does not have to. Are you assuming, perhaps, that it's better if it does? So that's an interesting assumption: I assume that it's better if I can dialogue with this image. And maybe I even assume that the longer the dialogue, the better. Or better even if the image just gives a monologue to me, just imparts its wisdom as a sort of very wise speech, and I absorb that and listen.

So maybe all these things are possible, but we must be careful of our assumptions around that, or at least notice what assumptions we're carrying. Ibn Arabi, the great Islamic mystic, sage, and scholar from the 12th century, spoke specifically about the kind of images that interested him. He said they do not answer in articulated speech, because then their discourse would be other than their essence, other than their person. No—their apparition, their coming, is identical to their discourse. It is their discourse itself, and the discourse is their visible presence.

Here Ibn Arabi emphasizes the visible, though we don't have to limit ourselves to that. His point is that dialogue actually shouldn't be there, because the image itself is what needs to be expressed. The image doesn't come to express something extra—it is the expression. So we can remain broader in our approach: sometimes there's dialogue, sometimes there isn't. It doesn't have to be verbal, and it can happen in different ways.

It's really important to understand—and I hope the examples make this clear—that other ways of interacting, apart from verbal dialogue, may be more appropriate than conversation. Instead of talking or listening to an image, it may be that the flow of love, or even the flow of eros, some kind of sexual interaction or connection with the image, is much more appropriate than verbal dialogue. We need to expand our sense of what is included in imaginal work.

One quality that's really key for me when I use these words—image, fantasy, mythos—is soulfulness. The image has or feeds or nourishes within us a quality of soulfulness. I'm going to devote a whole talk to what I mean by that and its importance, but for now, let's say soulfulness means resonances—the energetic, emotional, psychological resonances of that image in our being. The image is pregnant with these resonances. It's full of meaningfulness, pregnant with meaningfulness—and I use that word deliberately, in contradistinction to simply "meaning."

I don't mean the image means X or means Y. I mean it's full of meaningfulness—a sense of meaningfulness that I can't quite box in or explain or get to the bottom of. This meaningfulness carries multiple resonances. We're touched. There's a sense of beauty, which is also part of soulfulness. There's depth, enchantment. All this is characteristic of soulfulness, which itself is characteristic of images in the way I want to use that word—image, mythos, fantasy.

Understanding, then—feeling like I fully understand this image—is not necessary. Sometimes a person doesn't feel like they understand at all, yet something is touched, deeply touched. There's a deep sense of beauty or enchantment or meaningfulness even without understanding. The resonances are there, the soulfulness is there.

Also, an image is not understood concretely, in the sense that I mean image. We're not taking them concretely. I once was talking many years ago to a woman who was actually an evangelical Christian, but very lovely. We were talking, and she mentioned that she had seen God's cloak, his majestic cloak, in her prayers the day before. But there was something in the way she was talking about it that made me feel she was taking this really concretely—that actually, somewhere, there was a God and he had this cloak and it was exactly as she had seen it. There was some sense that she wasn't quite understanding that this is imaginal reality, and that's different than concrete reality.

So in my use of the word image, I don't mean that they be taken concretely or literally. An image of a warrior, which has been very common for me, or an image of a wanderer, a solitary wanderer—again, very common in the past—doesn't literally translate. I would never join the army. I haven't hit anyone since early childhood. That's not somewhere I go. The image is not literal instruction to become a warrior or to go wandering or traveling. It's not a literal image.

Images, in the sense I'm using that word, are metaphorical, but more than what the word metaphor has come to mean for us—because that word has shrunken a little. I mean it even bigger than what metaphor usually means. We don't decipher images. An image is not a cipher to be deciphered, to be explained, reduced to "it means this."

Rather, that's what it represents. Something here moves more akin to poetic image, and I don't think the most powerful poetic images are images to be deciphered—puzzles where we exclaim, "Ah, I figured it out, this code!" That represents a poor poetic image. Such images lack depth, pregnancy, and the inexhaustible quality that makes them truly alive.

Poetry that genuinely touches us, that stays with us and remains powerful in its effects, lives within the psyche. It stays alive partly because it resists reduction—because we don't reduce it to "it means this" or "it represents that." There's a beautiful poem I love by Rumi that begins: "Come to the orchard in spring. There is light and wine and sweethearts in the pomegranate flowers."

For me, at least in the way I relate to that line of poetry—and this subjectivity is important because working with images is deeply personal—the orchard, the light, the wine, the pomegranates, the flowers are not signs for spiritual facts. They don't function as a code where the light represents this, the wine represents bliss, and the pomegranate flowers represent some aspect of the divine. They're not signs for spiritual facts, nor are they merely material. In the way I relate to these words, Rumi certainly isn't pointing to just a material level of appreciation for nature.

There's something more there that remains endlessly pregnant in that line of poetry. Something touches deeply in those images, resonates, and sets up multiple resonances. An image that's alive in this way, a poetic image that's alive for us, influences our perspectives and the way we encounter both material and spiritual things. The images influence our perspective on both the material and spiritual realms, but they don't necessarily represent other things or entities.

There's something about poetic images—which is really what I mean when I use the words image, mythos, or fantasy—that has a poetic quality: they remain open. They are ambiguous. We cannot figure them out completely. This proves crucial because the mystery of the image, its sense of not being completely decipherable, keeps it alive for us. It stays alive, works in the psyche, and maintains its resonance with vital energy.

The mystery of the poetic image, of the imaginal practice image, is part of what sustains its life. It remains alive also because of the fundamental importance of images for the psyche. The psyche needs images—this is vital for psychological well-being and part of what keeps images alive.

When I use the term "poetic image," this may or may not prove helpful, since poetry today encompasses such broad range and scope. Different poets and poetry readers relate very differently to what they consider good or bad, what they seek in a poem, what poetry attempts to accomplish, or what poetry should be. Depending on your preferences, this may or may not illuminate what I'm getting at.

A poet like Philip Larkin approaches poetry, image, and seemingly life itself very differently than poets like T.S. Eliot, Pablo Neruda, or George Seferis. There's quite a range. But I hope you can sense something of what I mean by the poetic image, the poetic nature of image.

We can also speak of poetic truth. When Mary Oliver writes something like "my love for that poet is like a garden in my heart"—I can't remember the exact line—no one actually looks for soil and flowers in her heart. There's a poetic truth there that we recognize and resonate with, that moves us, even as we don't mistake it for something concretely real.

This soulfulness is centrally characteristic and fundamental to how I use the words image, mythos, and fantasy—this poetic nature of images that is metaphorical rather than literal, not concrete, ambiguous. Jung wrote that "genuine symbols"—he uses the word symbol here, but in this instance he means the same thing as image—"genuine images, genuine symbols, are ambiguous, full of half-glimpsed meanings, and in the last resort, inexhaustible."

That's exactly the characteristic I'm pointing toward. We can make another distinction along these lines...

Some images or fantasies are what we could call narrative in distinct contradistinction to these more poetic images or what I would call iconic images. So there are narrative images and iconic poetic images.

An iconic poetic image is not so much about the sequential unfolding of events—this happened, then that narrative unfolded in time. Sometimes an image comes and it just stays as it is, and there's a resonating with that. It doesn't really go anywhere; it doesn't evolve in time very much at all. Or if it does, it's not so much in its temporal evolution that there's a kind of causal implication: this happened, and therefore that happened; or because this happened, that happened; this happened first, and because of that, that happened. There's not this causal implication in the narrative.

This non-sequentiality, this non-narrative, non-causally implicating quality in time is characteristic of more iconic poetic images. There's a kind of timelessness to them.

Usually we tend to read or view our own life in terms of causal implications. I'll get back to this later in the retreat, but with a different sensibility regarding images and their more timeless, atemporal, eternal qualities, this can also begin to come into the way we read and view and see our life as image as well—not just in the usual narrative sense and usual causally implicating sense.

So iconic poetic images have this timeless quality to them, in contrast to narrative images. And there's something in these images that's bigger than just the purely personal or the purely historical. They're not necessarily historical at all. Sometimes we may feel like the history of our life is mirroring the images rather than the other way around—the image mirroring the history. Again, this kind of shift, this 180-degree turn in the way we're seeing life in images, is part of the fruit, part of the beautiful, mysterious fruit that can come from imaginal practice as I'm wanting to incline it.

With these iconic, poetic kinds of images, there's this timelessness, this quality that's very personal but more than the personal, more than the historical, not necessarily historical. And there's a depth to them, and they feel fertile, and they seem to have a kind of intentionality. There's something they want. This is something I'm going to come back to in a whole separate talk. And there's a feeling of necessity—some necessity. This image, I may not understand it at all, but it feels necessary somehow. It feels right.

Not to make narrative images wrong and poetic images right, but we are leaning toward the more iconic poetic style rather than narrative. Actually, it's a spectrum—more or less narrative or non-narrative. There's a spectrum there.

Part of what this implies is that images we have in imaginal practice may not necessarily be very eventful or dramatic. As I said, sometimes not much happens at all, and one's just with a certain image, resonating with that and the sense of the beauty and complexity of that, the richness of it for the soul.

When I first started exploring imaginal practice some years ago, for I don't know how long, the images were incredibly eventful. This happened, and then we moved here, and then this wizard appeared, and then we slayed a dragon—rich in some ways. But as things evolved, actually a lot less eventful and yet much richer. A lot less dramatic in some ways for some of the images, but more soulful.

And with that too, an image doesn't have to be really far out—like, wow, that's amazing, wow, that's so strange. I remember some years ago practicing imaginal practice when a very striking image came. It was a sort of empty courtyard, a square courtyard of a monastery, a large courtyard empty except for four black-robed figures with their black monastic robes and black hoods over their heads so you couldn't see their faces. They were pallbearers carrying on a stretcher between them—these four monks carrying on a stretcher between them an open coffin. In the coffin was a dead baby, and from this dead baby's head a tree was growing.

If you describe it, it's like, wow, that's an intense image. And it had a certain intensity to it, I suppose. You would say, oh, it looks like a Tarkovsky film or something. But in a way, it didn't really have much resonance in my soul. Maybe in the future it will come back again or something. But it was a kind of far-out image without really much soulfulness to it.

Compare that with an image I had much more recently. Just on the theme of trees, it was a low-branched, black bark tree, not very tall but quite wide, the height of a person, completely leafless and pitch black, as if it had been burnt or charred—but I don't think it had. And although it has no leaves and looks black and leafless, there's nothing actually wrong with it, was the sense.

And sometimes that did actually grow from my prone body, my body lying down, sometimes from the body of a close friend, and sometimes from neither, just in the ground. And I was saying, "I don't understand this at all," but somehow it was making me extraordinarily happy. There was a lot of joy from this tree, or in relationship to this tree. And it's just there. I and others in the image visited it just to be around this tree. It was like a pilgrimage. We tended to the tree and watered it, but actually it didn't even need watering—it was part of our devotion.

So less striking as an image than that dead body, dead baby with the tree growing out of its head, but the second image was much more, felt richer for the soul. Maybe an image is far out and has a striking narrative structure to it, but there's not much soulfulness coming out of it. That's not really necessarily what we're interested in. The far outness can be far out, or it cannot be far out. It can be narrative or not, but it's really the quality of soulfulness I'm going to emphasize in other talks. That's what we're after.

I remember a lovely image from a couple of years ago in meditation—this very silent white horse gently approached me. It moves its head the way horses do. It wants to get my attention, but not for its sake. It wants to get my attention for my sake somehow. And it wants me to go with it. It wants to carry me. It wants for me to be carried and to travel with it somehow, somewhere.

There's such a sense of profound beauty somehow in this image, and of intimacy. There's real love there. Such exquisite, tender, compassionate love, actually both ways—from the horse to me and from me to the horse. Tenderness and peace suffuse my being from this love and from that relating. And somehow this horse was supporting in some very subtle way. I got a sense of support. It was giving me a certain kind of strength, I couldn't even quite say what.

But it was clear this horse doesn't represent this or that, although it did seem to have certain qualities. It was imbued with certain qualities. It seemed to embody, for example, a certain kind of bravery, this horse. Very humble and not in your face, and also doggedness, persistence. It was not flashy, though I was aware, I had the intuition, that this horse was capable of great speed, great power, and very powerful sexuality as well. But the bravery had nothing to do with gaining glory or anything like that in the human sense.

And then at one point he became a magical flying horse and took me on his back and was flying, and I stretched my arms out wide. It was like a crucifix pose almost, and very, very open. Flying through vast space, everything became translucent. That's a bit more far out, that bit. But there's such beauty and depth and soulfulness just in that initial part of the image. Those kinds of qualities are really what I'm wanting to emphasize.

So again, it doesn't really represent anything, but it's in the relating, the love. That's what felt important there. It's not an allegory, it's not reducible to some simple meaning or definable as this or that. It's the presence of that image, the character, the quality, the intimacy, the contact and the love. And also the interest. This horse was somehow interested in me, this beautiful silent white horse, and I was interested in it. And it's those qualities in the relating that make for the soulfulness.

There's narrative versus iconic or poetic images, and that's an important distinction or spectrum. There's also another spectrum that's significant—we're open to the whole range of it—and that is what we might call the spectrum of substantiality of an image. Some images appear very insubstantial. They're almost like made of light, the characters. They're very, not even airy, just energetic or light bodies or luminous, very ethereal. And some other images have a much more earthy, solid sense to them.

And it's those qualities in the relating that make for the soulfulness.

So there's narrative versus iconic or poetic images, and that's an important distinction or spectrum. There's also another spectrum that's significant, but we're open to the whole range of it, and that is what we might call the spectrum of substantiality of an image.

Some images appear very insubstantial. They're almost like made of light, the characters. They're very ethereal—not even airy, just energetic or light bodies, luminous and very insubstantial. Other images have a much more earthy, solid sense to them. All of that is available to us and all of it is good. But just to notice where an image is on that spectrum—we may come back to that aspect.

It's good to point out here that most images need repeating. Occasionally there's an image that really has a big impact, but it's just a one-off. One student told me there was actually an image of me. I was already alive for her as an image for a while, but then there was a particular image of me approaching her. In this image, my head was exploding, and through the explosion of my head, it was actually really transformative in terms of the freedom and the sense of liberation that came with that and stayed for quite a while—stayed at a certain level in her being after that.

But mostly, images need repeating. They're not just one-offs. We come back to them, we resonate with them, we stew with them, we invite them back. What's happening here is small movements, cumulative movements through practicing with an image. Gradually a different sensibility happens, not just through one image, but through whatever images come up. Through repeating and repeating, gradually a different sensibility emerges.

As I alluded to in the opening talk, gradually a different conception as well as sensibility develops—a sensibility and conception of practice, of self, of life, of the world. Somehow through this repeating and stewing and resonating and dwelling with and feeling and being sensitive to, a different sensibility and a different conception of practice, self, life and world unfolds.

There's a question here, and that's really, to me, what's the most important thing: allowing or opening to this different sensibility and these different possibilities of conceiving and perceiving self, life, world, and Dharma.

Wrapped up in that are questions about pacing—whether we just have this image and then move to another one. Usually, as I said, we want to dwell, we really want to dwell with an image when it's there and really focus on it. We're not just drifting with images and daydreaming. We focus with an image, but there's also a question of going back to an image, like coming back to a piece of music that you love and dwelling in the whole vibe and all the resonances that music brings for you.

We don't just—this is something Thomas Moore said, and we'll come back to it—we don't just listen to a piece of music and say, "I've listened to that before, I don't need to listen to it again." If you love it, you want to listen to it again. You want to be in that atmosphere of that music and what it evokes and what it brings up and what it does—the magic of the music, the magic of the image.

So most images need repeating. It's also important to point out that images don't only arise in meditation—they don't necessarily arise in meditation. Images can arise actually anywhere at any time, and that's different from having a hallucination. I hope that's clear. A hallucination means I can't actually tell what's what—what's an image and what's concrete solid reality. We're not talking about hallucination, but it's quite possible that images arise not only in meditation but anywhere at any time.

One person was telling me that they were actually listening to a public lecture in a hall. She found this lecture rather stupid and a little bit offensive, in fact, what the person was saying. Yet it seemed to her that all the people around her—and in fact, she was correct in this assumption—most of the people around her seemed to think it was absolutely brilliant and wise. So she was in this situation where she felt that it was quite stupid and a bit offensive and differing from the opinion of those around her.

Then an image that had arisen for her before of a phoenix—a very powerful, beautiful bird that had multiple resonances and came in different situations—suddenly this phoenix came as she was listening to this lecture, and it filled the room. Enormous size it was, this huge phoenix filling this large hall, magnificent, she said, and completely untroubled by the stupidity of what she was hearing—these are her words. She said this phoenix was so magnificent, it didn't condescend to scrap with such folly. She said this phoenix shattered the hall with its sheer beauty.

This was very, very vividly, intensely, powerfully present as she was sitting there listening with her eyes open—so silent this phoenix, majestic, noble, immovable and dignified. Not in silent meditation with the eyes closed. Actually, that's an image I'm going to return to for another reason later on in the retreat. But the point here is that images don't necessarily arise only in meditation. They can arise anytime.

Let's make another distinction—an image, a little more subtle now, a little more involved. An image may or may not have what we might call archetypal or mythic dimensions to it. This is a little bit more involved. What do we mean here? You get more archetypal, mythic kind of images, if you like, or that have that quality, that dimensionality, that aspect, that depth to them, and ones that are not.

As an example of a non-archetypal image that was still incredibly potent and incredibly healing, I'll tell you a story that someone related to me. By the way, with all these sharings of other people's images, I always ask the person if they're okay with their image or their story being shared—I would never just go ahead and share something without asking.

This was in an interview some years ago at Gaia House. The person was on a long personal retreat, work retreat and personal retreat mixture. Something happened in relation to the work, I think—I can't even quite remember what it was. But something happened, and it triggered for her feelings of guilt. She noticed, she could see, she recognized a pattern of a tendency to feel guilty in situations. Something would go wrong, and she would feel guilty.

Then she recounted to me—very moving in an interview—she recounted to me that many years ago, many years before this, she got pregnant by her husband, but she didn't tell him immediately because he had been diagnosed as being infertile, unable to father children.

She found herself pregnant by her husband but chose not to tell him immediately, knowing he had been diagnosed as infertile. This diagnosis had painfully ended his previous marriage, and she wanted to be sensitive about it. She also didn't want to raise his hopes only to disappoint him if the pregnancy miscarried, as she wasn't yet ten or twelve weeks along.

Then one morning, as they lay in bed, she wanted to make love, and they did. This made him a little late leaving the house. As he prepared to go, she wanted to tell him, "Drive carefully because we need you"—meaning herself and the baby in her womb. But she didn't speak those words.

He had a habit of driving fast anyway, and being later than usual that morning, he drove too fast. He got into an accident. The police and witnesses later said it was his fault—he was driving too fast. He was killed.

This student was absolutely heartbroken and felt unable to mother the child on her own. She decided to have an abortion. That decision, along with the feeling that she had delayed him and failed to say "drive carefully," brought painful guilt that remained with her for years.

Then one day in meditation—she was doing predominantly metta practice at that point—she spoke to the baby, the one that was aborted. She told the baby she was sorry and hoped it would find a loving mother and father. She explained that she had wanted to spare it the pain of not having a father, which was how she herself had grown up after her father died when she was just two.

In the image, the child responded to her with great love, telling her that while it felt sad about what happened, it was okay and at peace. This was profoundly significant for her.

Later, in a different session perhaps the next day or a few days later, she thought to herself, "What if I had spoken those words out loud to my husband?" Spontaneously in the image, he turned back and came to her, and they had an intimate, deep conversation.

Later still, the image of him arose spontaneously—joyously, happily getting into his, in her words, "fizzy cabriolet sports car." She was trying to do metta practice and attempted to return to the metta phrases, but then decided to give attention and sensitivity to that image of her husband getting into the car and having their conversation. This was incredibly helpful and healing—very, very profoundly healing.

What is happening in an image like that? She was under no illusion that her husband and baby were alive. She certainly wasn't avoiding feelings—there had been plenty of grief, and she was comfortable with the grief. Yet somehow, this reimagining that occurred semi-spontaneously was mysteriously and deeply healing.

This is a beautiful and important example of what I would call a non-archetypal kind of image. Sometimes there are images that are somewhat ambiguous. For example, with the subtle body, the energy body, there may be an image of that body being on fire, of fire shooting from various energy centers or from the hands, or the image of the body roaring. In itself, that's not necessarily archetypal, but it could easily move toward archetypal images—fire and roaring and great power. It could shift in that direction very easily.

Other images—for instance, that solitary wanderer or the warrior image I've alluded to on different occasions—people often say these are archetypal images. There's an archetypal image of the wanderer or the warrior. But what does that word really mean when we use it?

I want to explore this a little. Jung, who originated the psychological usage of this term, wrote: "Archetypes are typical forms of behavior which naturally present themselves as ideas and images. By way of these effects, we discover that they have an organizing influence on the contents of consciousness."

The word archetype comes from the Greek, meaning something like "first molded" or "original"—like when you make a lithograph print or some kind of print in art. It's the first form, and then there are copies of that original.

So literally it means something like that.

But what's characteristic of the way Jung means it, uses that word, is that rather than being itself an image, an archetype is not an image in his usage. It's rather what shapes images and shapes ideas. It's a shaper of images and a shaper, a former of images and ideas, rather than itself being a specific shape or form. And what that means is that an archetype, in his usage, archetypes are actually not directly knowable. You never actually encounter an archetype. It's just the sort of, as he puts it, the organizing structure to shape this or that image or this or that behavior or this or that perspective or idea. So that's one aspect, at least of Jung's meaning of archetypes.

And another aspect is also to realize that archetypes interpenetrate. They're actually not separable. So this is also very, very important. And again, quoting Jung, he wrote: "The fact is that the single archetypes are not isolated from each other in the unconscious." Actually, we're going to steer away from using that word unconscious because I think it takes things in a certain direction. It has too much baggage for us and I want to not use it and allow things to open up in a different way.

But he writes anyway: "The fact is that the single archetypes are not isolated from each other, but are in a state of contamination of the most complete mutual interpenetration and interfusion." So they interpenetrate, they mix—you don't get one pure archetype.

Now, sometimes what's very common for people is a tendency to want a kind of neat classification, actually of all kinds of things: Dharma concepts, "this means that," and "what does this exact term mean when the Buddha uses it this way," and the links of dependent origination, but also in regard to archetypes. So the tendency to really want to define things very neatly and separate everything. Maybe that tendency itself is kind of archetypal. As Jung says, archetypes shape ideas, perspectives. So that wanting a neat classification, taxonomy of things is also potentially an archetype. I think it's very, very common, but it's a little bit mistaken somehow because they're always interacting, interpenetrating, mixing these archetypes.

But let's make a distinction. So for Jung, an archetype is something that's first. It's kind of primordial. It has its roots in the dawning of humanity and pre-consciousness evolving into consciousness. And it's dawning in our biological evolution and all that, partly. There's something first or primordial in time about it.

So compare that meaning with James Hillman's sort of twist on the term, if you like, or evolution of the term. And here it's more that we sort of decide to view an image, if you like. "Decide" is maybe too strong a word, but we orient towards an image and view it as archetypal. So there's an adjective rather than archetype. We view an image as archetypal. And this is saying something more about the image, about its value, rather than its origins, if you like, in misty time or something like that. So we view an image as archetypal.

Listen to this phrase. James Hillman writes: "Any image termed archetypal is immediately valued as universal, transhistorical, basically profound, generative, highly intentional, and necessary." I'll read that again—it's quite a dense sentence. Any image termed archetypal is immediately valued—so it's about value, and "immediate" means without anything coming between—immediately valued in the actual sense of the image itself, immediately valued as universal. It's what I said before: it's beyond purely personal. It doesn't just apply to me. It's transhistorical. It's beyond time. It doesn't have its roots in history. It doesn't correlate necessarily to coming from something historical in my personal history or otherwise.

Basically profound. We're giving it some kind of sense of it's fundamental in the psyche and deep—its roots are deep, basically profound. Generative means that it generates, as I said. It generates ideas, perspectives, emotions, other images, attitudes, all that. It's generative of all kinds of things. It's highly intentional. This is what I alluded to earlier. It wants something. It has a direction for us. And it's necessary, he says. There's this sense of necessity to the image when it has this archetypal sense to it.

In other words, or elaborating on that a little bit, it's the relationship with the image, the love from and to and in the whole image that's part of its archetypal nature.

There's a sense of blessing that comes often with images we see as archetypal. Some kind of blessedness or blessing with them, to them. They seem to make a demand of us, and I'm going to talk much more about that aspect of demand. And they seem to open us up. Archetypal implies something's opening us up to, we could say, other dimensions of our being, beyond just the ones that we're usually conscious of. There's something giving us, opening us up to a sense of our own depth, or let's put it better—the depth of the psyche.

Wrapped up in this meaning of archetypal as an adjective is what I alluded to earlier. It's when we see something in life or an event in life or a thread in our life or an image, and we see that experience as archetypal. In a way we're placing it in a kind of cosmology with regard to—let's use the word gods, but I want to explain more what I mean by that, both cosmology and gods and what that might mean. But there's a sense of another dimension or depth to it, and we're placing it in a larger cosmology of significance, of meaningfulness, of beauty, of place. It has place and depth in that place.

Now, this might sound perplexing at this point. I'm hopefully going to talk more about it on this retreat, but there's something in that that's very alive. It's not abstract and it's not clunky. We'll come back to it later. It's not some kind of abstract philosophical idea. It's a sense as well.

That's certainly not something we can prove. In fact, none of this is stuff we can prove. It would be impossible to prove that. Impossible to prove that the image actually makes demands of me of some kind that I'll go into more. Impossible certainly to prove this other cosmology involving what we could label in quotation marks almost "gods." But we sense somehow this archetypal value, these qualities imbuing certain images, and that makes them archetypal. So we sense this as part of the soulfulness, part of the texture of the image. Not so much the sensual texture, but the meaningfulness, soul texture of the image. We sense an image's archetypal value.

But, and I really want to emphasize this, we're also recognizing that we are giving it that archetypal value. So there's no truth claim here. To me, this is quite a sophisticated philosophical point. I can sense an image's archetypal value, and I will in all these different ways that I've just elaborated, but I'm also recognizing in a way that I'm giving it that value. That archetypal value of an image, that archetypal quality or characteristics of relating to it, the psyche's relationship to it.

So all this implies that the view, the way of relating, the way of looking at an image is actually included in what we mean by the word image. You understand? Image actually includes, in the way that I mean the word image, a certain way of relating to it that gives it this archetypal value and then senses that archetypal value in it. But I recognize, oh, I'm giving it that. The mind is giving it that. You understand? It's not inherently, independently existing. It's still empty. It's still dependent arising. But in the word image, I'm including in that a certain way of relating, a way of looking, a certain view of it. And that's included in the very concept image, in the very idea of the image.

So when we talk about archetypes, the point of that word or archetypal, the point of that word and the value of it is not in categorizing—oh, it's this archetype or that archetype or analyzing which archetype is this coming from. It's more emphasizing a way of looking or ways of looking that give value, certainly, or find or sense, discover vitality, an aliveness to the image and what it does for us, that give and discover meaningfulness. And again, that doesn't mean meaning. Meaningfulness, vitality, depth, divinity, if we dare use that word, and I'll expand on what we possibly mean by that later on. Vitality, meaning, depth, divinity—in short, ways of looking that are soul-making. I'll explain what I mean by that tomorrow, hopefully. I want to fill that word out.

So that's the point and the value of using words like archetypal. It's pointing to ways of looking, relationships that open up another depth and richness and dimension for the soul, for the psyche.

So with all of that, we are open to all of this. But for the purposes of this retreat, what I want to emphasize more, what we're more interested in is the more iconic, poetic end of things—those kind of images that are like icons or more poetic as opposed to narrative, and more archetypal in the way that I just outlined, that have more soulfulness to them.

And that's partly why I was ambivalent about the exercise earlier in the afternoon. While it may be a good exercise for some people, much of what emerged probably didn't carry much soulfulness within it.

What we're more interested in cultivating are iconic images—poetic, archetypal, soulful images that carry that deeper resonance and meaning.

So let's pause here for a while, otherwise it becomes too much to take in all at once. We'll continue exploring these themes in a little while, allowing what we've touched upon to settle and find its place within our understanding.

CHAPTER 10

Soulmaking (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this profound exploration of soulmaking and its relationship to traditional Dharma practice, Rob Burbea examines how we might understand Buddhist teachings through the lens of cultivating soulfulness rather than solely focusing on ending dukkha. He presents three broad approaches to practice: bare attention (which fabricates relatively less), deep unfabricating practices like samādhi and emptiness work, and skillful fabrication including imaginal practice.
>
> Burbea discusses how fantasy, image, and mythos inevitably permeate our understanding of core Buddhist concepts - our vision of awakening, the Buddha, and the Four Noble Truths themselves. He suggests grounding Dharma practice in the recognition that imagination is fundamental, proposing that all self-images are empty and therefore we can playfully engage with multiple self-images without clinging to any as ultimately true.
>
> The talk explores how eros (desire for deeper connection) works with psyche and logos (conceptual frameworks) to mutually fertilize each other in the process of soulmaking. When we love something deeply, eros seeks to penetrate further into the image of the beloved, expanding and enriching our perception. This process requires flexible conceptual frameworks that can accommodate deeper dimensions of experience. Burbea emphasizes that this approach to practice is open-ended, potentially leading to profound freedom while honoring the soul's need for meaning, depth, and sacred dimension in life.

When hearing these ideas about soul and soulfulness and soul-making, it would be very understandable if a person wonders, "Is that the Dharma? Is that Dharma?" Very understandable.

We've said a little bit so far in different talks about the possible ways of conceiving of Dharma that might open up a space for images and fantasy and this whole imaginal practice. I want to say a little bit more about the whole relationship of Dharma, ways of conceiving the Dharma in ourselves in relation to that, and the relationship of that with images, or imaginal practice, and soul, soulfulness. So that whole network of relationships and possibilities—really, possibilities of conceiving relationship there.

Earlier I was emphasizing one very fertile, very fruitful way of conceiving of Dharma and Dharma practice: as practicing, developing skill in a whole range of ways of looking and developing flexibility of ways of looking, ways of relating, ways of conceiving. In doing so—traditionally, at least how I would like to think of Dharma practice traditionally, the tradition of Dharma practice—in practicing a range of ways of looking, one sees that certain ways of looking fabricate less. They fabricate certainly less papañca, they fabricate less dukkha, less suffering, they fabricate less sense of self, and they fabricate less perception. That means less actual appearance, less experience. I'm using those words synonymously: perception, experience, appearance.

One begins to get the sense of what is it in reality—the way of looking at any time, what factors within the way of looking tend to fabricate more self, more dukkha, more experience, and what fabricates less. One goes on this journey of understanding, understanding fabrication, which means understanding dependent arising very deeply. All of that brings an understanding of emptiness—not to stay in any state, not to stay in any one way of looking either, but through the flexibility and the movement that opens up of the perception, the changes in perception that are facilitated by the changes in the way of looking, one understands emptiness more and more deeply.

That might be a traditional way of understanding, or a way of understanding traditional Dharma. There's this range, this flexibility of ways of looking and the developing of the skill with that whole range of ways of looking.

We also delineated within that range three broad camps or directions of practice. One is actually quite a thin avenue—this idea of bare attention, which is a bit of a misnomer and a little bit misleading. Sometimes people think, when I'm practicing mindfulness, when I'm practicing this bare attention, this simple attention, and I'm being with things as they are—to misuse a phrase of the Buddha—when I'm doing that, then there is no fabrication. No fabrication is occurring at that point. I'm seeing in an unfabricated way. I'm experiencing what is unfabricated.

To my way of thinking, that's definitely not the case. It's a real misunderstanding of what's happening there. It's a misunderstanding that will also lock down what's possible for us, both in terms of understanding and in terms of the range of experience. Rather, can we see this mode of bare attention or mode of simple mindfulness as one mode of practicing, one way of looking which fabricates relatively less—a little less than our normal modes of ways of looking as we move in the world every day if the mind is not trained? Bare attention is a sort of a degree, a slight decrease in how much fabrication there is in terms of self and perceptions. There is still some self being fabricated with bare attention. There's still some, definitely quite a lot of, fabrication of perception. There are still conceptions wrapped up in there.

So that would be one camp or avenue within this range of ways of looking that make up the Dharma.

Second, we said, is a whole slew of practices, a whole range of practices that actually fabricate a lot less than so-called bare attention. Deep emptiness practices, deep samadhi, deep mettā practices, all kinds of things will actually not construct—or deconstruct or dissolve—the sense of self. In that moment, in the moment of engaging certain ways of looking, the sense of self, the perception, the appearances themselves begin to desubstantiate, become less and less substantial and dissolve to different degrees, all the way down to total non-appearance of any experience, any sense of self, of subject, of consciousness, of knowing, of space, of time. There's a whole range there. That would be a second avenue—everything that's included, all the practices that are included in that fabricating, unfabricating really quite deeply.

A third group or avenue is fabricating—actually engaging in skillful fabrication of self and of perception. This third avenue opens the door, unlike the other two, unlike the bare attention, the unfabricating. Actually, this third avenue of practice—deliberate, skillful fabrication, creative, if you like—gives permission and gives space and potential for the use of images and imaginal practice and fantasy.

So the bare attention as a modicum of less fabrication, the deeper less fabricating or non-fabricating, unfabricating, and the skillful use of fabrication. In a way, any Dharma practice that we do can be placed in one of those three baskets. Why not have the whole range? We should have the whole range. There's something important and beautiful in having that whole range.

We said all that, and we've also mentioned that with that, running through all that, or alongside all that, is the recognition that we also bring fantasy to our perception and sense of what the Dharma is, what awakening is, who the Buddha was. So there is fantasy, mythos, image imbuing our conceptions and perceptions of all that—of Dharma, of awakening, of Buddha, of path. That's not a bad thing. That's part of skillful fabricating, in fact. One mode of skillful fabricating.

But given all that, then we can revisit, open up a little bit more, the possibilities for relationship of Dharma conception, conception of Dharma, and imaginal practice.

Because, for instance, regarding images of the self—or self-images, if you like—the very emptiness of the self, the thorough, absolute emptiness of any self-image, means that no self-image, no self-concept or conception of what the self is, will be true ultimately speaking. All of them are empty. And that thorough emptiness of the self allows us, in fact, to play with self-images, with different self-images, without believing any of them.

Rather than saying, "No, personality is empty, but the self really is a process," and then having a kind of implicit belief that that process is some kind of real thing—I've talked and written about this elsewhere; I don't want to go too much into it—but that then curtails the possibilities a little bit.

Or often one might come across teachings or believe that we always think of the self as some kind of puffed-up ego thing. Ego is equated with self in a negative way—some kind of big pride or grandiosity. And so we want to cut that, in that view. We want to cut that. Or we have a view: "Well, now I have an unhealthy self-image, and through practice, I want to replace that unhealthy self-image with a healthy self-image. And then once I've done that, then I can see that actually there's no self." So there's this sort of "unhealthy to healthy to no self" progression.

There are different models. One will come across different interpretations of what the Dharma is saying in relation to self. I would, as I said, rather open things up even more. All self-views are empty. None of them will be ultimately true. And that absolute thoroughness of the emptiness of the self allows us to play with infinite possibilities of self-view, with a multiplicity of self-images. And the key word is "play" there, and "multiplicity"—playing with that multiplicity through imaginal practice.

And even the idea or the sense that we can sometimes have with imaginal figures—that they have a certain kind of reality, they do exist in some kind of way; it's a different way than concrete reality, but they exist in some way and they shape our character in this life, or our essence in some way, that they flow through us and they shape what we express in life—even that kind of view has a place. It's okay, because even these imaginal figures—sometimes the word there is daemon, d-a-e-m-o-n—they are empty too. So knowing they're empty, I can entertain this sense and this idea.

Sometimes, again, in Dharma you would come across something that says the self—the nature of the self—is that it's the result of all past causes and conditions and ideas and events that I've come across. And all that connects together; that web connects together and gives rise to the self. And other than the self as a sort of confluence of past causes and conditions, the self doesn't exist. That is the true self.

And that's—in this view—that would be what dependent arising means and what it means to say the self is a dependent arising. It's dependent on past causes and conditions coming together and creating the self, which apart from that has no existence. That's given often as a meaning of what dependent arising means, and what it means to say the self is empty.

And so then, from that point of view, the idea of these imaginal figures existing somehow in some different mode of existing, or kind of reality—different ontological status, if you like—and shaping our life and coming through in our expression, that wouldn't fit, because it doesn't fit this model of the self. It's just the confluence of past causes and conditions. If there are these eternal figures or timeless figures, that doesn't fit that.

But that view of the self—as just the past causes and conditions, and that's what it means to say the self is a dependent arising and empty—that's too narrow, I would say. A full Dharma understanding of what emptiness means goes way, way beyond that. That's one sort of direction into emptiness, to a certain level. Full understanding of emptiness goes way, way wider, multidirectional. We can see the emptiness of something from many different directions and much deeper than that.

So these imaginal figures—they may exist in some way, may shape my character and be expressed through me in my life. They flow through me in some way, or I channel them. They are empty also, just because they don't exist in time. Like anything, all things are empty because time is empty and everything needs time to exist in. So it's not only that things are empty because they're past causes and conditions. They can be empty in lots of different ways.

And all this—the thorough understanding of emptiness—what I'm really trying to say is: the more thorough and the deeper our understanding of emptiness, the more it can open out permission and range in terms of imaginal practice, and also conception. Because we know, "Hey, I can conceive that, because it's empty in another way. It's more fundamentally empty." So there's lots of space here in relation to self, imaginal practice in relation to self, and how it might fit with a broader Dharma conception.

But how about with regard to the whole question of ending suffering, or at least decreasing suffering, and the whole Four Noble Truths, which really are a way of saying there is suffering, and we're in the business of ending it or decreasing it? How about this whole idea of soul and imaginal practice in the service of soul? How does that, or what are the ways that might interface with this whole, very central conception in the Dharma—direction in the Dharma—of decreasing suffering, freeing from suffering?

Many people would wisely say that is what Dharma is: the Four Noble Truths in a nutshell, and we're in the business of ending, or at least decreasing, suffering. So how do images relate to all that? Well, it depends on how we use the images and how we conceive of the images. And there are options here.

So for example, here is some dukkha—some disease, suffering, or pain. One might let that dukkha constellate as an image, then work with the image of this dukkha, whatever it is—the image of heartache, loneliness, grief, or whatever arises. One can relate to that by holding and loving that image. This would be incorporating imaginal practice in a way that serves the direction of decreasing suffering and the Four Noble Truths.

Or quite simply, one might have an image of what is positive and beautiful—for example, Kuan Yin or a bodhisattva of compassion, or simply an image of loving light. Through practicing with that image, there is cultivation of the beautiful and positive. Just that by itself would fit nicely within the classical program of the Four Noble Truths.

Again, we might place that image of love or beauty—that beautiful quality of heart—in contact with the dukkha, or bring that image through imagination into contact with the image of the dukkha. So there is the image of Kuan Yin contacting, embracing, shining upon, holding the image of the dukkha. All this is skillful use of imaginal practice that fits easily within the directionality and conception of lessening suffering found in the Four Noble Truths.

If, however, we bring in this conception of nourishing and deepening and enriching and firing up and supporting and opening soulfulness as a goal—if that becomes the thrust and direction of imaginal practice—then the relationship with ending dukkha becomes more complex.

In nourishing a direction of increased soulfulness in relation to a situation, experience, or image, we may not end the dukkha there. This loneliness, when we relate to it with a sense of caring for the soul and soulfulness and soul-making, may not completely end the dukkha. It may end some of the dukkha or dissolve some of it, but may not completely dissolve the dukkha of that loneliness.

Or this endless longing, this yearning or eros that might burn a little—what I've spoken about as pothos, the infinite longings—may not end. In caring for the soulfulness, I may not dissolve that endless longing that's part of it, or the image of loneliness. I may open up to it in a different way. I may give it place, as we've discussed. It finds a place. It finds its God, so to speak. But it may not end.

Maybe even some imaginal figures, as we've alluded to, may place demands on us. Those demands on the being are of different kinds and are not without a certain burden.

So what does the soul want? It's a different question than simply ending dukkha. What does the soul want? Well, it wants soulfulness. Souls want soulfulness. Souls want soul-making. And that includes fantasy, image, mythos—central to soul-making, to soulfulness. They don't necessarily want to end dukkha. That might be included, or a certain level of that might be included, but these can be different things in relation to any situation, experience, or image.

Even more complicated is when we put all this in terms of long-term goals—when we have this long-term aspiration of nourishing, deepening, opening, firing, enriching, supporting soulfulness. What's the relationship between that and ending dukkha or decreasing suffering? What's the relationship of that as a goal, as a direction, as an aspiration and movement, with the whole idea and fantasy of the Dharma? Complex. Complex and not necessarily easy to inquire into.

Let's go into this slowly. If at times soulfulness is my priority—rather than my priority being letting go or non-clinging or non-attachment or cultivating the positive or seeing that it's not-self or seeing the emptiness of this or that—if at times, rather than all those more traditional dharma intentions in approaching experience, soulfulness becomes my priority, then we can equate that with a kind of recognition.

There's already recognition that image and fantasy are present, and we're already honoring our need for them by making soulfulness a priority and understanding and working with that. But as we practice that way, with that recognition and making soulfulness a priority at times, it will have many openings and consequences.

Let me list perhaps five of them and explore them. As I recognize the presence of image and fantasy and honor my need for that—honor the need for soulfulness—as I do that more and more through practice and get a feel for it, it changes my vision. Literally it changes my ways of looking and perceiving things. And I begin to recognize what we've alluded to quite a few times already.

I begin to recognize the fantasies in everything that I care about. Everything that's meaningful to me, I recognize, is shot through with fantasy, with image, with mythos. It's imbuing everything that I love.

Including—I begin to recognize the fantasies that imbue my whole sense of the Dharma and my whole vision and conception of what awakening is, who the Buddha was, and my entire idea of ending dukkha or decreasing dukkha.

You can see, for instance, just historically, how the vision of all that varies dramatically. If we compare three streams of dharma—the more Vajrayana, tantric tradition has a very different fantasy and conceptual framework of what those things mean: ending dukkha, awakening, the Buddha. Compare that with more classical Theravadin teachings of ending rebirth and their view of the historical Buddha. And compare that with some of the more modern interpretations of Dharma—what I call more existentialist approaches. Again, the fantasy of ending dukkha, the fantasy of the self on the path, is completely different because the existential view says we can only end dukkha to a certain degree, doesn't embrace the whole rebirth framework, and so on. Three different streams with very different fantasies and conceptual frameworks operating.

I've talked about this in other talks and retreats, so I won't go into it again. None of that is bad. The only problem would be if I don't recognize that fantasy is running through all this. Really, really important.

Once I recognize that and truly begin to admit it and open to it—instead of either pretending it's not happening or admitting it but not recognizing how deeply and fully it imbues things and what the implications are—then actually it puts the Dharma on a different ground. We have a different grounding for Dharma, and it's grounded more in imagination and fantasy. Interesting. That's quite radical, I think.

What does it mean to have as our sense of the ground of the Dharma that it is already imaginal? And then this whole question arises: Why is it so important when we hear some teaching, or this person's teaching, or that teaching, and we read something, and ask, "Yes, but is that Buddhism?"

When we realize that the Dharma is grounded in imagination anyway—and as I'll point out later, also metaphysical assumptions—it's grounded very differently in that recognition. Fantasies are operating around dharma, around awakening, and also metaphysical assumptions.

Now, we could also point historically to how different Japanese or Chinese Buddhism is from Indian Buddhism. It's completely different. I'm not even sure the Buddha would recognize it as Buddhism. So there are historical, cultural changes which we can deconstruct and point to, asking, "Well, is that Buddhism?" That's a different approach. It's important, but it's a different track.

Already in the West, in terms of what we add conceptually and what we let go of in the cultural mindview—there are those kinds of historical changes. But I want to say something a little bit different. It has more to do with this recognition of fantasy at the basis of the grounding of what the dharma is, and also the metaphysical assumptions. The key word there is assumptions that we cannot get away from. If you pursue philosophical questions deeper and deeper and deeper, you get to fundamental questions about how we know anything, how we can trust what we know, about what's real. And somewhere we have to assume something. I can't get beyond having to make assumptions philosophically. And that's metaphysics, whether I like it or not.

So there's this strange reconfiguring, this tectonic shift—a grounding in the recognition that imagination is the ground of the Dharma, and metaphysical assumptions also.

Then we can start to ask: What is going on psychologically for a person when they're getting agitated about who or what the historical Buddha actually was and whether this or that is Buddhist? What's going on psychologically? What kind of fantasies are operating for that person around the Buddha historically, around Buddhism, around Dharma, around self? Something's going on in the psyche in relationship to all that.

And it hasn't quite recognized the grounding. It hasn't recognized that actually we can ground the whole thing in image. It hasn't realized that anyway there are metaphysical assumptions operating in any framing of the Dharma, of the path, of the goal, awakening—all the rest of it.

So there's this different ground, this recognition of fantasy, and that brings a different ground for the Dharma in the imagination.

And then another question emerges from pursuing soulfulness as a priority at times. It starts to open up other questions, and we start to realize: What is my fantasy? What fantasies are operating in this very question of how we conceive soulfulness and its relationship to the Dharma? And that includes the fantasy of the self.

So this whole question we're talking about right now—one could, and people do, very much try to say, "This is my interpretation of the Dharma, and this new concept probably comes from something Western in psychotherapy or something about childhood experiences," and they try to make a point that it's already within the Dharma historically. Or they say it's a more materialistic view, and again try to spin the history of the Dharma to claim, "This is what the Buddha was really trying to say historically." And so they place the whole thing in a...

I'm framing it as this is within the Dharma. And the self then is just kind of championing, rescuing the Buddha's original message, perhaps. And so one could try, I could try, if I was so inclined, to put all this talk of soulfulness in and try and present it as a more traditional dharma package that was already there, that I'm just kind of amplifying a little bit.

Or we could say, you could, I could say, this soulfulness, what we're really doing is expanding the dharma. We inherited this much dharma, this range, and now we're expanding it as is our right culturally. You and I talking about this business about soul and soulfulness and soul making are actually stretching what the dharma means. And that would be a fantasy. And then the fantasy of the self there is as a stretcher, as an expander.

Or another possibility is we're breaking out of the Dharma. That could be a fantasy of what we're doing with this talk of soulfulness and soul and soul-making. And then the fantasy of the self within that is as some kind of exploder of limits, exploder of tradition—an iconoclastic self, etc.

Different styles of fantasy of how we're conceiving the whole relationship of soulfulness with the Dharma, and wrapped up in that, as always, is a fantasy of self. But with any fantasy of a tradition or a trajectory or a path, it has to be engaging and enchanting to me.

So even if I try and put this—let's say I choose the fantasy of it's within the Dharma. It's already there. It was already there. I'm just highlighting it. Whatever fantasy I have of the Dharma there and of the self, that has to be engaging and enchanting to me. So do you understand? It's like the whole fantasy of this work and the conceptual work itself and also the fantasy of the Dharma. What is the conception? What is the framework of the Dharma that I'm engaging in? Is it engaging to me? Am I engaged by it? Is it enchanting to me?

Because I could go further and say: Is my fantasy of the Dharma big enough for the soul? Or will the soul outgrow the conceptual box and the fantasy box of the Dharma that I have right now? This is an important question.

So when I take soulfulness and this sensitivity to soulfulness and the desire to nourish it and support and, as I say, enrich and deepen and open, expand it and grow it, care for it—when that becomes, if you like, at least at times, the principal navigator, that sets us on an open-ended journey. It has no limits. Soulfulness, the increase in soulfulness, the deepening, the enriching of soulfulness is open-ended and without limit. And in part, that's because the psyche's desire for soul-making will keep opening and deepening the range of perception. I'm going to come back to this.

So when we take soulfulness as, if you like, the most important thing, and we navigate that way at those times, the psyche's desire for soul-making will open and deepen and expand the range of perception of self, of other, and world. And that expanding of the range of perception is part of soulfulness. And that's part of what makes this navigation by soulfulness, by sensitivity to soulfulness, open-ended.

The pace at which that deepening and expanding of the range of perception happens—the range of appearance and experience—the pace at which that happens is quite individual. I think it depends, if you like, on how much fire, so to speak, a person has, how fiery their soul is, how much eros runs through their soul and drives their soul. Some people are really quite fiery and quite quick. There's a lot of eros there. I'm going to come back to this soon. And so this opening of the perception of self, other, world, etc., this opening of more and more soulfulness, and this movement of soul-making that opens up that range happens quite quickly. They burn through quite quickly into new territory.

In other people it's very, very slow. In other people it barely seems to move much at all.

So when we take soulfulness as a navigator, we're in a way saying yes to the psyche's desire for soul-making. I'm going to come back to this. And that keeps opening a range of perception—perception, perception, experience—the range of experience of self, other, world, and that happens at different paces for different people.

But the question: is my Dharma framework that I'm operating in, is my fantasy or vision, if you like, my mythos of the Dharma, is it big enough? Or will the self outgrow it if I let soulfulness be what steers me, or the beacon, if you like, the pole star I'm moving towards, the direction I'm moving in?

So there's the recognition of the place of image and fantasy and the honoring of our need for image, fantasy, and soulfulness, and that expands into this recognition that that's everywhere—image, fantasy, mythos are imbuing whatever I care about—and then recognizing that actually through that, we can put the Dharma on a different ground, on imaginal ground.

And then there's the question, what is the fantasy of how I'm conceiving of the relationship between soulfulness and dharma and the self within that? And then there's the question: is my fantasy and my conception of the dharma big enough, or will the self outgrow it?

In all of this—I mentioned this before but I'll say it again—there can be a very different relationship to the teaching of the Four Noble Truths and clinging. Very often people hear that clinging causes suffering and if you don't cling then you will suffer less or won't suffer at all. And they try to make this non-clinging or lessening of clinging a way of life. They try to live that way, and very soon they're going to run into problems there. It becomes—sounds a little unkind—it becomes a little bit silly. It's impossible. It will not fit our life and it certainly will not fit our soul. To try to move through the world that way is a little bit unwise. It won't help the soulfulness. It's not very skillful.

Versus actually regarding this whole teaching about clinging and letting go of clinging and the whole, if you like, shorthand version of the Four Noble Truths—there is suffering, it's caused by clinging, I can release that clinging and have freedom from suffering or some degree of freedom from suffering—that's a shorthand version of Four Noble Truths. It's almost like a lens, a way of approaching things. Using that as a key.

So that shorthand version of the Four Noble Truths and the teaching about clinging and ways of clinging less, using that as a key that opens up the whole realm of perception. And that's related to this whole idea about fabrication, because it's clinging more centrally than anything else, and clinging in the wide range of what that means, that actually fabricates self and dukkha and perception of appearances.

So I start playing with this business of clinging and letting go of clinging and this framework or lens of the Four Noble Truths. And lo and behold, it functions like a key that opens up not just freedom at different times, but a whole deeper understanding of the fabrication of perception, the emptiness of all things through that. Rather than letting go of clinging as a way of life—a lot of people try and get into that, even unconsciously as a mode—rather using it as a way of practicing this decrease in clinging in different ways to different degrees and seeing that it functions as a key that opens understanding and opens perception.

One way or another, through emptiness practice, through imaginal practice or whatever, we begin to see that Dharma concepts—clinging and Four Noble Truths and this and that—they're not realities. They are not realities. Dharma concepts are not pointing to real things. They are ways of looking. A Dharma concept functions best when it is a way of looking. There's a range of ways of looking, not a single way of looking, but Dharma concepts offer—they each offer slightly different lenses, and even those lenses have ranges in them.

So Dharma concepts are not realities, they're ways of looking that bring freedom. And also, that bring freedom both in the future but also in the moment. Dharma concepts are ways of looking that bring freedom, but also that liberate other ways of looking, or that liberate our ability and our flexibility to look in different ways. So we pick up Dharma concepts, not as realities, but as tools, as lenses, as ways of looking. They bring freedom in the moment. We can see that and feel that. And through all that, it actually liberates more ways of looking. In other words, it opens up the perception. Dharma concepts bring a sense of freedom from dukkha, but they also open the perception. And this is crucial.

And that's a very different way of understanding the Dharma, what we're trying to do, what the central thrust and movement of the Dharma is. And as I said, I would feel it's more fertile in terms of what it then offers in relationship to imaginal practice and by allowing place and space for imaginal practice.

And so in relation to this, all this is still talking about the relationship of these ideas of soul and soulfulness and soul-making with the whole idea of ending or at least decreasing dukkha. So we have to have a slightly different way of conceiving of the Dharma than what may be normal to allow this kind of fertility.

Now, I would say that we can orient—one can orient this navigation of practice and practices taking soulfulness as our caring for soulfulness and soul making as what's helping to navigate us. We can orient that in a way definitely that eventually brings more and more really lovely sense of lightness into the whole sense of existence. More and more a sense of the transparency of things, the diaphanous nature of things, the beauty, different kinds of beauty, as I said, depth, sacredness.

We can orient this care for the soul, this care for soulfulness and soul-making, so that it does liberate in these ways and bring a freeing up and an opening of the range of perception. In a way, perception gets healed of its limitations, often limitations that we don't even realize because we're just so used to them and everyone in the culture seems to agree on them.

So one of the freedoms here is this freeing up of the range of perception, the healing of perception, and also in ways that we wouldn't get without taking our navigation through the care of the soul and the soulfulness and the soul-making. Because, for instance, just seeing in terms of just purely in terms of emptiness, the emptiness of all things or the oneness of all things or this and that.

It will give a universal sense—everything is empty or everything is one or whatever it is—but it loses the personal dimension. I'm going to come back to that hopefully in other talks.

So this healing of perception, this opening of the range of perception through imaginal practice and through caring for the soul and taking that as a principle navigator, allows the perception to open up in ways that beautifully bring together or include both the personal dimensions, the dimension of personhood and the universal, and have both together or can lean on one or the other.

So we can take soulfulness as what guides us and the care for soulfulness and soul-making as what guides us in practice. And eventually there will be a lot less dukkha, or we can steer it in that direction. But on the way, it may include the dukkha of certain images and certain fantasies. And we're just conceiving it in a slightly different way. We're saying soulfulness is important, is the primary thing, rather than ending dukkha is the primary thing, which would be a classically dharmic way of seeing things—always ending dukkha is what's most important, decreasing dukkha.

So the goal and the orientation may be conceived differently, but certainly it's possible to steer through the care of the soul and using that as the navigator principle into a lot of freedom, a lot of lightness and transparency, beauty, sacredness, freeing up of the perception in really broad and beautiful ways.

So we might ask, too, given all of this, everything we've said so far about soul and soulfulness and soul-making, let's move on and state that part of soul-making is in relationship to conceptual frameworks. Part of soul-making involves conceptualizing concepts. And we've said this before, but again, to stress it.

The question becomes: what conceptual framework, what conceptions, what eidos—to use that Greek word again—what ideas and ways of looking nurture, deepen, open, ignite, enrich and support and nourish soulfulness? What conceptual frameworks aid the soulfulness? So that becomes a question that is part of practice. Just as in a more traditional Dharma understanding, the question would be: what conceptual frameworks help us to decrease or end dukkha?

So again, I mentioned in other talks, all philosophical systems, if we're talking now about conceptual frameworks, all philosophical systems run into problems of one kind or another at some point, and they all will rest on assumptions. Eventually, we come to a place where we just are making assumptions. We dig deeper and deeper and deeper and go, and we realize, oh, the system of philosophy rests on an assumption.

So one of the conceptual frameworks that really supports a sense of soul and soulfulness and soul-making is this idea which we've touched on already: that image, mythos, fantasy is primary. It's fundamental and primary. That is not something that we could ever prove, I don't think. It's impossible to prove it. I'm not even interested in proving it. I don't feel I need to prove it because there's no truth claim there.

If we turn the whole question around philosophically, what we can prove, and what I spent a little time doing, is actually proving perhaps the mistakes or exposing some of the assumptions or critiquing, say, the dominant views of the culture or any views that claim some kind of reality or truth. One can actually prove that any system or philosophy, even if it's dressed up as not a system, that claims some kind of reality or truth, one can critique it from a number of different directions. Oftentimes, especially nowadays, and even some presentations of modern Dharma will say, "I'm not interested in truth, truth is an oppressive notion," etc., etc., but still contain within them implicitly some notion of what's true and what's false, and lean towards often what's quite a limited version of what's true, while verbally rejecting the whole notion of truth and saying I'm not interested in that.

So one could philosophically, as I said, critique quite strongly dominant views that claim a certain reality or truth, usually implicitly, or dismiss imagination or images, imaginal practice, and this talk of soul as metaphysics. As I've said elsewhere, there's always a hidden metaphysics in those kind of notions. Always a hidden ontology, assumption about what's real, always a hidden epistemology, always a hidden cosmology.

So what if we really open up to that, recognize it, all that, and then just see what if we entertain this conceptual framework and see what happens? And by entertain, I don't just mean think it, I mean actually see through it, view through it. I'm talking about practice here in a way that affects perception. Practice is not practice as far as I'm concerned unless it affects perception. So a meditator is someone who plays with different ways of looking, relationships, conceptions, in ways that affect perception.

So we say, what if this conceptual frame, what if this one, and we sort of put it in and take it for a ride and see what happens. So philosophies and conceptual frameworks become more like doors—opportunities. That word actually is oportas, like portal or port. It's a bit related to the word for door, our word for door.

So rather than getting stuck in truth claims, we're actually very, very light and flexible and agile with conceptual frameworks, using them as doors opportunistically, as opportunities for what can come, what can grow and open up through this door. We enter through this door and a world opens up.

So in terms of we're asking now, what is it that supports and nourishes soulfulness? And one answer to that is the conceptual frameworks that we're entertaining and the relationship with conceptual frameworks.

And another aspect of what supports soulfulness is love. Love and desire and eros. And this is huge. I want to just say a little bit now. I've said before: where there is love, there image or fantasy or mythos is operating. So if a person feels like, "I'm not sure, where is the image in my life?"

Where is the fantasy? Look where there is love. Where there is love, there is image and fantasy or mythos. Or we could turn that around and say fantasy and image are part of loving deeply. They're necessary in loving deeply, especially when we're talking about personal love. Fantasy and image are beautiful, necessary parts of loving deeply.

But we could say a little more. We could say also that, or just state as axiomatic, eros is also part of soul-making. Eros is part of soul-making.

Now, what do I mean by eros? This is quite tricky. Again, I'd partly like to say eros is undefinable, and I think that's actually very wise. I'm not sure if we'll get to it this retreat, how much we can fit this in, but perhaps at another time in the future. There's something about that that's really valuable—to hold eros as an undefinable, very expanding idea.

But certainly by eros, when I use that word, or even erotic, I don't just mean the sexual. It includes the sexual, but not just that. Let's say for now, as a sort of springboard definition, loose definition, that eros is the desire for more connection. You can see how that could obviously include the sexual, but let's say for now, as a springboard definition of eros, it's the desire for more connection with another, with ourselves even, with something in the world, with whatever.

Now, this desire for more connection operates in relationship to anything we love or anything where there is soulfulness. And it desires, so to speak, to penetrate further the image, the desire to penetrate further what we love. I'm using deliberately sexual language, erotic language. The desire of eros is to penetrate further. It wants more connection. It wants to penetrate further, or you could say, in a more feminine mode, it wants to open more. Open more to what we love, or open up what we love even more.

So it wants to penetrate further into what we love for more connection. It wants to open up what we love. It wants to expand it. It wants to inseminate the image of the beloved. So the desire of eros is to inseminate the image of the beloved.

For example, one of the musicians I really, really love is Keith Jarrett. Some of you may know him. He's actually done a huge, broad range of work. I'm not crazy about all of it, but a lot of it I really love. And I love him. And I'm, again, like Eric Dolphy, so thankful for him. But in my image of him, and so in the love and in the image of him, that image, at this point, includes a kind of vague sense of, let's say, what or who he channels. And again, not using that word in too concrete or literal or tight a way as sometimes in the New Age does. But there's some vague sense there of what or who he channels through his music and through his dedication to music.

So in my image of him, he is more than human. The image makes him more than human in some way. You understand? The image of Keith Jarrett is inseminated through the eros to open up, to expand, in this case, in this way. It's not just, I'm interested in more of his music, and I want to hear this, and I want to hear that. But it's actually what he is. The image of him gains depth. He's no longer just a human being. He is that, of course, just a human musician. There's something else with it, but it's vague. And I'm not taking it completely literally.

So this opening up of the image and the fantasy of someone or something that we love, that there is this eros connection with, opens up the perspective, enriches the perspective, and that in itself is an increase in the soulfulness, a nourishing, a deepening of the soulfulness. They're almost like one and the same thing.

There is a nourishing and a supporting and an opening and enrichening of the resonances and the range and the depth of the sense of sacredness. So all this goes together.

Now, in other words, my sense of Keith Jarrett as something coming through is something very sacred. There's a real sense of holiness there. In other words, or with that, if we're now with Greek words mythos and eros and psyche and so on, let's use another word, logos, which I'm going to use as conceptual framework. That also opens up.

In other words, I don't just think of him as a biological machine with amazing neural networks that can do all this incredible improvising and incredible dexterity of the hands, and ears trained in this way and that way. Yes, yes, all that. But wrapped up in the logos, wrapped up in the conceptual framework, wrapped up in the image of him, the eros, the love, expands more and more so that he becomes in the image more than human. And in the image it makes necessary then, I have to make room with the logos, with the conceptual framework, for a different dimension of sacredness beyond the human.

What I'm really trying to say is the eros and the psyche and the soulfulness and the logos, the conceptual framework, they end up fertilizing each other. The eros opens up the image, enriches the image, penetrates, it wants to penetrate further, it needs a space to penetrate into, so it has to impregnate the image of what we love, inseminate it, open it, expand it. And in doing that, it gives it other dimensions. That's part of expanding it. And those other dimensions, the mind, the conceptual framework needs to expand to accommodate and support those other dimensions that we sense in the image.

So the soulfulness, the sacredness, the conceptual framework, the image, the eros, these are all feeding each other. Because when there's more of a sense of depth now, let's say in this image sense of Keith Jarrett, then I love him more because I'm loving more than just the human and all his human challenges and the dedication. I'm loving even more than that. I'm including that, but even more. So there's more eros and more fertility of the soulfulness of the conceptual framework, the way these things grow together.

So images, fantasies, mythoi, they need to and they will contact life. We've talked a little bit about that. We'll talk more about that. And in so doing, they bring healing of different kinds. And they also deliteralize life. So life is just this, just that. This is my story, as we alluded to earlier. The whole, if you like, imbuing of life with images and recognition that image and fantasy operate, it deliteralizes life. Soul-making comes into life and into experience and into the sense of self and other life, coloring life, ensouling life.

Objects, things, experiences are enriched, given depth, another dimension, if you like, if we use that word again without being too tight around it. And they expand the perception so the perception then is different of things because they have this other soul dimension to them. So through the love and because there's a different sense of things, a different perception of things, they're more in-souled, we love them more. The love is deeper. And that love, as I said, that eros wants to, it will by itself, expand further. It wants to penetrate further into this image, open this image up even more into greater depth.

So there is this mutual opening, a mutual inseminating of the eros, of the psyche and soulfulness, and of the logos, of the conceptual framework. Granting and giving soul to the world and souling. What is it to sense the world with soul? And this is actually open-ended. This mutual opening, this mutual insemination of eros, psyche or soul, and logos. Potentially open-ended.

What is it, though, we could ask, and we should ask, what is it that helps to open the soul in this way, the psyche in this way, the soulfulness, and what is it correspondingly that blocks the opening of the soul and the psyche, the soulfulness?

Well, very often what happens is we're stuck and clinging to one view, either one image, or more often we're not seeing something as an image, and we're literalizing it. This is reality. This self-image is true. That image of the other, we don't recognize its image. We're stuck in one view, not recognizing its image. And this whole fertility that's granted by the conceptual framework being open and having room for image and the growth of that, the mutual fertility of Psyche, Eros and Logos is blocked, is stuck.

Sometimes it's that, that we're clinging too tightly to one view. Or we don't see image as image, it's too literal and then the whole thing just grinds to a halt because it's too concrete. Sometimes what we need is to bring in or allow or hear from someone else a different way of storying something in our life.

where actually the soul and this fertilization process has gotten stuck and contracted, rigidified. You need to let in another image or see it through the lens of another image—this experience, or this image itself, or this history of mine. And that brings more freedom. It frees things up and also allows the soulfulness to grow. The soulfulness is nourished.

I remember—some of you will have heard me tell that story of the retreatant where I offered the image at some point when we were talking of the sacred prostitute in relation to her past and things that had happened and paths she had gone down when she was much younger. She was stuck in a certain way of looking, a certain view, clinging to a certain view of that past and of herself in that past that was bound up in shame and literalism. And by just suggesting another, actually just bringing another image into the field as we were talking, a lot of freeing up happened and a re-souling, if you like, happened of the whole story. The shame dissolved.

So sometimes we're stuck in one image, taking it as real, and we need to bring in or have access to some other image, a multiplicity that opens things up.

Or, as I said, it might be that the conceptual framework, the logos, is too rigid. So this is our box of what reality is, or what the Dharma is, or whatever it is. And the box is too tight. It does not allow a deepening or opening of the perception. So I cannot see Keith Jarrett that way because I don't believe that. I just believe in human beings and neurological wiring, which because of neuroplasticity can be trained quite extraordinarily so. The logos has its limits and will not allow this deepening and opening and expanding of the perception of the image. And because of that, the eros cannot increase because it has only so much area to move into. This expanding of the image that's allowed with a wider conceptual framework or a looser flexibility with conceptual framework doesn't support the deeper movement and growing of love and the movement of the eros. There's a kind of infertility there because of the rigidity and the tightness and the smallness of the conceptual framework, the logos.

Again, just to point out, with the logos, with the conceptual framework, that is an aspect of soul that's involved. Where there is fantasy and love, logos is always involved. Conceptual framework is always involved.

For example, we might have a fantasy of practice, and we might love mindfulness. But wrapped up in that is actually a love of certain ideas wrapped up in the mindfulness itself. My idea of mindfulness, my logos of mindfulness, fantasy of mindfulness—they're all wrapped up together implicitly and explicitly.

So in my love of mindfulness, and my fantasy of practice, are wrapped up potentially ideas about simplicity—the beauty of simplicity. That's an idea. The idea that mindfulness is something simple. Or the idea that when I'm mindful, I'm being with what actually is. Now that's a huge idea that's dressed up as a non-idea, as an absence of idea. "No, no, no, I'm just being non-conceptual, I'm just being simple by being with what actually is." It's an idea, and I'm in love with that idea as part of my love of mindfulness. There's a lot involved in that idea, and it's dressed up, as I said, as a non-idea, as an absence of ideation.

Or maybe wrapped up in my love of mindfulness is the whole love of being versus doing. I love to be. I love to just be and drop doing. A lot of ideas wrapped up. I'm in love with that idea, and that idea itself has a lot of ideas within it.

Or it might be the kind of mindfulness that's really into this microscopic attention to appearances and penetrating them or perceiving them down to their elemental nature—moments of this or that or whatever. And again, wrapped up in my love of practicing mindfulness that way is also that idea of scrutinizing and dissecting things to their elemental nature, to their real nature.

So conceptual frameworks, logos, ideas are involved where there's fantasy and love, just to point that out. This eros, psyche, logos—they're completely interwoven. You could say they're actually aspects of each other, of soul.

And again, to stress that when we cling to a certain logos or a certain conceptual framework, it will limit or prevent the opening of perception. Because it only has a certain range, it cannot entertain and give ground and support to a perception that does not make sense within that conceptual framework. So it limits and prevents the opening of perception, the opening of experiences.

The question is individually: how quick does the fire of eros burn and penetrate and open so that it needs a new logos and also new images or deeper or more fertile? How quick does that burn in us? It's very individual.

But all this—I'm saying it because it's all related to the relationship of soulfulness and Dharma and ways of conceiving Dharma. All this is related, wrapped up in there.

In a way, we could say exploring this very question of the relationship of soulfulness and Dharma is potentially itself also soul-making. It brings into the very exploration the ideas of soul and soul-making and conceptual frameworks, different ways of understanding the Dharma and eros—all that together in relationships. And it can be itself something that is soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

It's very individual.

But all this, I'm saying it because it's all related—the relationship of soulfulness and Dharma and ways of conceiving Dharma. All this is related, it's wrapped up in there.

So, in a way, we could say exploring this very question of the relationship of soulfulness and Dharma is potentially itself also soul-making. But it brings into the very exploration the ideas of soul and soul-making and conceptual frameworks, different ways of understanding the Dharma and Eros and all that together in relationships. And it can be itself something that is soul-making.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 11

Soulmaking (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this opening talk on soulmaking, Rob Burbea introduces a profound framework for understanding how certain ways of looking can nourish what he calls 'soulfulness' - the richness of meaningfulness, emotional resonance, beauty, and depth that gives life its sacred dimension. He distinguishes soulmaking from papañca (mental proliferation) and hallucination, emphasizing that soulmaking occurs in conscious relationship with images and experiences, not in the images themselves.
>
> Burbea presents Dharma practice as the cultivation of many varied ways of looking, spanning three broad possibilities: bare attention, practices that decrease fabrication (leading toward emptiness), and skillful fabrication that can include imaginal work. He argues that while bare attention has value, we cannot live entirely in that mode - we need conceptual frameworks and what he calls 'fantasies' (in the beautiful sense) that engage and enchant us.
>
> Drawing on diverse wisdom traditions including Kabbalah, Mahayana Buddhism, and depth psychology, Burbea explores how understanding emptiness can actually free us to engage more creatively with fabrication and imagination. He introduces key concepts like seeing 'image as image' and maintaining flexibility around conceptual frameworks, while addressing common concerns about reality and delusion that arise around imaginal practice.

We've been using words like soul and soulfulness, and so let's take some time in this talk and the next few talks to explore what those words might mean for us, what they might mean for our practice and for our way of conceiving the relationship between those kinds of concepts and the Dharma. Let's open this up for exploration.

Probably most people, when they hear the word soul, tend to immediately conceive some kind of entity—the soul, a soul, some kind of thing which may not be material, but some kind of entity. Of course some people, especially some Buddhists, would immediately protest, saying it's not okay to believe in such an entity.

If we just slow down a little bit, even if one was using the word soul as indicating some kind of entity, there would still be, I would hope, the understanding that that entity is empty—empty of inherent existence. Knowing that, it's then okay to talk in those terms and to use the concept or the experience of that entity, just as Buddhists talk in the language of self and feel the self and conceive of the self, knowing either through experience or through doctrine that it's empty of inherent existence. But this doesn't stop us talking about it and relating to it and even having practices that are framed in terms of the self.

Just as we talk about and practice and think of and receive teachings about things like the five aggregates—body, feeling, perception, mental formations, and consciousness—these too are empty. They do not really exist. They are entities that are empty, and we talk about them, we practice with them, we practice ways of looking that see them and regard them in certain ways. The processes that the aggregates are fundamental to, those processes are not real. The elements of the processes, the aggregates, the psychophysical constituents are entities, and the processes are, I suppose, a kind of entity in some sense—empty, empty, empty entities.

This is really important: not to jump on words like soul, because if one uses it with the flavor of an entity at times, that entity is always understood to be empty, just as self is understood to be empty. We use that word just as we use aggregates and all the rest of it.

But actually, I would like to more often use a word such as soulfulness rather than soul, to take it away from that problematic notion of an entity. Although, as I just said, I don't have a problem with that, I'd rather use a word like soulfulness and also soul-making, which is a word that came from the poet John Keats, I think, originally. Soul-making—you'll notice it's a verb. We make soul, one can make soul, or soul is made, so to speak: soul-making.

What does that mean, or what does it mean that soulfulness is made? What we're really talking about—what I want to emphasize here by shifting the inclination and at times the vocabulary—is ways of looking. That means ways of relating, ways of conceiving, and also ways of acting in the world. Let's call all of that ways of looking, relating, conceiving, acting—ways of looking that nourish, sustain, increase a sense of soulfulness.

So that's what we might say soul-making is: the increase, the growth and the fertilization and the nourishment and the support of soulfulness.

And what do we mean by soulfulness? What do I mean by soulfulness? I mean that richness of resonance in the psyche that involves meaningfulness—as I said, that's not the same as meaning. A pregnancy of meaningfulness, the emotional resonances that are often so subtle and so nuanced, not always, and often beautiful—these kinds of resonances of meaningfulness, emotional resonances of the heart, the heart resonating. This is part of soulfulness.

But also ideas—the resonances of ideas that are resonating. This resonating or quivering with or triggered by or opened by or associated with whatever is feeding that sense of soulfulness for us. Remember, this word idea is related to the Greek word eidos, and also includes how we conceive and how we see things—eidos, how we look. So that also is wrapped up in the whole rich, fertile complex of what soulfulness is: resonances with ideas, and also informing and shaping and directing and giving depth to the way we look and see and conceive. All this is wrapped up in it. In fact, depth as a whole is characteristic of soulfulness, I would say.

Beauty also is very wrapped up in or characteristic of soulfulness. As we said before, the range of beauty grows. So the heart, the being, the psyche, the eyes, the sensibility expand their range of beauty as the soulfulness grows, with the soulfulness. Beauty is a dimension, an aspect of soulfulness, of soul and soul-making.

And with all this, importance—a sense of something being important—is also central to a sense of soulfulness. So much so that we could say that what is soul-making, or when there's a sense of soulfulness, there is at those times a certain relationship with death, in the sense that what is soul-making gives us a sense of deep importance, almost of this thing that in some way echoes beyond, casts its image beyond my mortal span into death. We see life specie aeternitatis—in other words, from the perspective of eternity, beyond our death. When things are deeply soulful, they have that kind of resonance beyond our life, and they frame, they form, they shape and deepen our relationship with death and with our own death—and not in terms of belief. I'll come back to this.

Soulfulness or soul-making also has to do with seeing images, seeing or sensing images, but also with seeing life or seeing this or that experience or event or myself or my trajectory in life, my unfolding as image. So this seeing as image is also a very central characteristic of soul-making.

Love also—we've touched on this and we'll return to this—different kinds of love are very much part of soul-making and give soulfulness different flavors with each kind of love.

And again, necessity—that's something we'll return to—a sense of the necessity of this experience, this unfolding, this image, whatever it is. When it has that characteristic, that feel, that sense of necessity, there's soulfulness.

So all of that, and more probably, is what I'm trying to get at when I use that word soulfulness. And we're either nourishing it or not. It's either being made, that soulfulness, soul-making supported, or less so.

Now we could say, and actually it would be very wise to say, soul is undefinable. It's one of those what sometimes people call root metaphors, and as such, it's undefinable. There will be wisdom in keeping a sense of flexibility and plasticity and range in how we use that word. I think that's very wise and helpful. And so, just saying it's undefinable.

And at the same time, we could say for our purposes that soul is those ways of looking, those ways of relating and conceiving and acting that, as I said, nourish, fertilize, deepen, enrich, and support a sense of soulfulness, a palpable sense of soulfulness. So we can say soul is undefined, and we can also define soul as, rather than as an entity, as a whole range of ways of looking that feeds soulfulness. Now that definition may sound circular, but in a way it doesn't matter. It's leading us somewhere, potentially.

As an example of a non-soulful imagining or image, someone told me ages ago—actually another teacher—they were on a meditation retreat at the retreat center where they worked and had a senior position. They were meditating in a room on their own, and the heating pipes were making the noises that heating pipes do. They were meditating and hearing the sound of the pipes, and then began to hear voices from the sounds of the heating pipes. They heard those voices and started to listen closer and thought they heard another teacher and a friend discussing some problem with the retreat center. As if in secret, he thought in that moment that he could hear their voices in another room being carried to him through the heating pipes. And even at one point they said, "Well, don't tell him"—the meditator, the other teacher—as if they were trying to keep it secret.

Now, actually, that's more an instance of probably something like hallucination and delusion. It often comes when the concentration is too narrow, too tight, with too much energy. And it's what we call a kind of yogi mind manifestation. There is, in that kind of imagining, no soulfulness. There is no recognition, "Oh, this is an image." It's totally concretized. He thought he was listening to an actual fact, an actual situation, a concrete situation that was happening in real time in another room. There's nothing poetic there. So a very, very different thing there. There was no soulfulness in that sense.

Now, we all know maybe that kind of thing, certainly, but we also all know papañca, this Pali word, this kind of craziness of the mind, ego proliferation, the spinning of the mind, like a dog that's got a bone or chasing its own tail, just spinning and creating a mess of suffering and self-building. So all human beings know that to some degree or other. And we can certainly say that is different than soul-making. We really want to get the sense these are two different things. Soul-making and papañca are different, even though papañca might involve imagination and fantasy.

In papañca, some of the differences between papañca and soul-making include the fact that in papañca, it's usually about ego reactivity as the dominant thing. The ego is very tight and caught up in its reactivities. So if it involves someone else, we're trying to get one up on this person or get some kind of revenge or something. It's so narrow in the vortex there. The self-view when there is papañca is completely literal. I just believe what I am thinking or how I am viewing the self. I believe that is the truth about myself in that moment. And if it's that I'm an idiot or I'm a failure or I'm ugly or whatever it is, a useless meditator, that's what I believe in. That self-view is also very, very central in what's going on in papañca. It all revolves around self-view.

Papañca, in contrast with soul-making, where the self-view is not literal. It's not to do with ego reactivity so much at all. There's not the centrality of the self and the self-view. Self-view is not being grasped at. There is not a preoccupation with self-view that characterizes papañca. All that's much, much looser and more spacious and more kind of see-through in soul-making.

In papañca we do not see, "This is image, this is fantasy." There's not that recognition. There is not in papañca a kind of diaphanous quality either to what is seen or the self or the image of the self. No light shines through that. There's no sense of something coming through that's perhaps divine or of another dimension, of depth. There's not much beauty in papañca. We're just in this vortex, tightly spinning and contracted, as opposed to the openness and the harmonization of energies and the sense of meaningfulness that characterizes soul-making. There's quite a difference between soul-making use of images versus papañca or hallucinations or delusions.

Now, I've said this before, but it's so important I want to emphasize it again. Soul-making happens or exists in relationship with images or experiences. Soul-making is in the relationship, or in the conscious working with images and experiences, and that relationship, that conscious working, includes the conceptual framework. So soul-making is in the relationship, is in the conscious working with an image or an experience or images or experiences—not in the images or the fantasies alone. So that's, again, helpful to have it as a verb, soul-making.

It's in the working with rather than it existing inherently, independently in this image. This distinction is really important.

Now, we could just leave it at that. But we could go a step further—though in a way, this becomes a tangent that I'll return to in later talks, I hope.

We could say that soul is that which views in ways that increase soulfulness, that feed and nourish and deepen soulfulness. Soul is that entity—if you want to use that term loosely—that views through ways of looking which nourish, increase, and deepen soulfulness.

Compare this kind of definition with the Kabbalistic tradition of Jewish mysticism, where the soul, the human soul and mind, are regarded as fundamentally not separate from the divine. There's that entity that's not separate from the divine and divine perception. Therefore, because of this non-separateness, the human soul and mind and psyche is authorized—because it's not separate from the divine—and facilitated in its interpretations, both of holy texts and of life and the world and others and self. This openness of interpretation that we discussed before, this infinite interpretive possibility, becomes available precisely because the mind, the soul, is not separate from the divine. It gives the human range of interpretation authority and facility. It's actually helped because of having its roots in the divine.

Soul, in this definition, is that which views in ways that increase soulfulness. These kinds of interpretations, these ways of looking at texts or tradition or life or self or the world, are building soulfulness.

In the Buddha's tradition, there's the teaching of Buddha nature in the Mahayana and Vajrayana traditions. This teaching gets interpreted in different ways and directions. Some people interpret it as simply saying that the mind is impermanent, there's nothing permanent there, and there's no fixed essence to it—in which case it's infinitely shapeable. So we have Buddha potential because there's nothing fixed in the mind and it's all impermanent, allowing it to change and be shaped eventually into Buddha consciousness.

Other times Buddha nature is seen more as a primordial wisdom awareness that already exists within us but is covered up. Similar to the Kabbalistic interpretation, this primordial wisdom awareness already sees things as divine and empty simultaneously. It sees self and other and beings and this world and materiality and the whole cosmos as divine manifestations—empty divine manifestations—without concretizing them or giving them independent existence.

This is what Buddhas know. This is how Buddhas see in the Vajrayana tradition. And this seeing, this primordial wisdom awareness, exists within us, within everybody, within every sentient creature, but it's covered over.

In that context, tantric practice is actually—or a large part of tantric practice is—skillfully mimicking this vision of a Buddha, this ultimate primordial wisdom awareness. One "fakes it till you make it." You practice seeing in that way, seeing how a Buddha sees, seeing empty divinity everywhere and in everything.

Again, relating it back—it's not exactly the same, but soul, Buddha nature, is that which views in ways that nourish, deepen, enrich, heighten, and support soulfulness.

Or in a more modern context of some modern psychotherapies—Jungian and post-Jungian—we say the mind or the psyche is imbued with archetypes and gods. They're part of the deep essence, if you like, or fabric of the mind. The mind or psyche is rooted in the archetypes and the gods in that way. These archetypes then allow us to see through their lenses, or to be possessed by different archetypes, different gods, and they see in ways that again increase, fertilize, nourish, enrich, deepen, heighten, and support soulfulness.

There are quite a few different traditions that in some way echo each other here by saying something like: soul is that which views in ways that increase soulfulness.

But if that's too much—and we will return to those kinds of ideas later in the retreat, I hope—if that's too much, let's just say what I said before: soul-making is in relationship with images and experiences, not in the images and fantasies alone. It's in relationship with the conscious working with, which includes the conceptual frameworks. It's the conscious working with, the relationship with images and experiences. It's in that relating. That's why we use it as a verb.

Now let's go into this a little more. I've said, and I really want to make this fundamental to the whole structure supporting this entire investigation: What is Dharma practice? Or how can we see Dharma practice in a way that ends up being most fertile, that opens up the most possibility?

I would say: Dharma practice is the practice of many and varied ways of looking. And again, that phrase "ways of looking" includes conceptual framework and relationship, and ways of acting. Dharma practice is the practice of a whole range—the development of skill and flexibility and facility and range—of ways of looking.

It seems to me that any conception of the Dharma that doesn't open up to a range, that wants to either explicitly or implicitly make Dharma a practice of just this way of looking or just this way of conceiving, when it wants to shrink it down like that away from opening up this range and flexibility of many ways of looking—anything that tends towards singularity, implicitly or explicitly—will quite quickly run into either philosophical problems or dead ends, ethical problems or dead ends, or dead ends in practice and perception. That's a whole other subject.

But let's say this: Dharma practice is the practice of many different ways of looking and the development of that skill and range and facility.

Now, within that range of ways of looking, we could delineate three broad possibilities, or three camps if you like.

The first is actually the one that most people are most familiar with—what's come to be called "bare attention." It's not a phrase the Buddha ever used, but this kind of simple mindfulness, what's come to be regarded that way, forms one strand.

Actually, in a way, it's a misnomer. It's a helpful tool to think about bare attention—that we can actually be with things directly, barely, in that kind of stripped way, as if that were really possible. But it's not, because that kind of looking still includes all kinds of assumptions and conceptions wrapped up in perceiving, in a mode of perceiving, a way of looking that seems very bare compared to our usual perception and ways of looking, but it's actually not bare. Nevertheless, it's a valid and helpful way of practicing.

So one possibility is bare attention—one avenue or camp, if you like.

The second broad possibility encompasses a whole range of practices that fabricate much less than bare attention fabricates. When we're in the mode of bare attention or simple mindfulness, we really can have the sense as practitioners: "Oh, I'm not fabricating so much right now. There is not so much being fabricated in terms of papañca and story and concepts." So there's a degree of less fabrication in the mode of bare attention.

But there are a whole range of practices in this second broad range of possibility that fabricate much, much less than bare attention. Much less. As the samādhi deepens, as the mettā deepens, or compassion practices—and certainly emptiness practices—we go way, way deeper in terms of fabricating less perception, so that the whole fabric of perception begins to deconstruct. Things start to become much less substantial—this is a spectrum here—much less substantial, and then they start not appearing, this or that element of perception, of sensation, just not appearing, all the way down to the total non-appearance of any perception, any sensation, any appearance or experience at all.

So there's a range of decreasing fabrication that one can—again, if one's practicing in the right way and thinking of practice the right way—develop that journey into less and less fabrication. There's a whole range of practices there. So that would be the second camp.

And then the third possibility is skillful fabrication. We can fabricate self and other, and the perception of self and other as this or that, the whole world around us and objects and all that, and fabricate in different ways and lots of different colors, if you like, to that fabrication and directions within that.

So there's bare attention, decreasing fabrication, and fabrication—three broad possibilities that span and break up or make up that range of ways of looking. Lots and lots of modes in there, except for bare attention, which is a more singular type of practice.

We cannot live in bare attention. You can try, but we cannot live in bare attention. We cannot live a life without fantasy—and I'm using that word in its beautiful sense on this retreat mostly. We cannot live without fantasy and without a kind of cosmology, if you like, a sense of what this cosmos is in which we seem to be existing. Fantasy and cosmology give structure, direction, and meaningfulness to self and the world, the cosmos.

So we can have periods when we're in the mode of bare attention—that's possible, that avenue—but I cannot live my life that way.

There are all kinds of very important aspects to that statement and implications of it, places where such an idea that we even could live that way comes from. For example, in the scientific revolution of the 16th and 17th centuries—this gradual change in human conception of the world that took place, centered in Europe—came the elevation and gradual dominance of the idea of being able to know reality in an objective way, removing the subject and the influence of the subject from the perception of reality and the world and materiality, or even other humans or society, and knowing them objectively if we take ourselves and our distortions out of the picture. With that came the elevation and dominance of measurement as the dominant paradigm and way of knowing.

Many of you will know, of course, this idea of objectivity and the absolute possibility of measurement grew and grew and got more and more entrenched, but then actually came back around on itself and began cracking its own structure with modern physics about 100 years ago—relativity, and particularly quantum mechanics. The whole idea of being able to be absolutely objective sort of cracked.

But anyway, with the scientific revolution there was—to borrow a phrase from Richard Tarnas—a sense of "ontological diminution" brought about in the wider consciousness, the collective psyche. What he really means is the sense that certain aspects of human experience became less real or were seen to be less real. There was ontological diminution of things like emotion or consciousness, aesthetics, the aesthetic aspect, the emotional aspect of human experience. These sort of became second-class or second-tier aspects of reality. They were seen as less real. The ethical dimension, the imaginative, the intentional dimension.

Now this is actually crucial, because these aspects—the emotional, the aesthetic, the ethical, the imaginative, the intentional—these are actually, if you like, the most human aspects of our experience. More recently, some psychologists think you can measure emotion by brain response or skin galvanic response or whatever it is. We can get people to fill out questionnaires and then rate their answers on a scale of 1 to 10, and therefore it's brought in again. But it's pretty weak that way in terms of the richness that's available to us.

So those aspects that in a way make us most human—though they are so central and so rich to our experience of being human—were actually slowly relativized and seen as less real than materiality and things that we could measure, things that were more so-called objective. And with that, what happened to the sense of meaningfulness in life and meaningfulness in the cosmos? It also got radically undermined with all that.

This cultural paradigm and dominant worldview that we've absorbed has profound implications for how we live and what we need as human beings. We require conceptual frameworks and fantasies that engage us and enchant us—frameworks that are soul-making. This soul-making is not optional; it's what the soul, the psyche, the human being fundamentally needs.

Recently, I've found myself navigating frequent hospital visits, tests, and conversations with doctors about results while facing the possibility of death in the not-too-distant future. These experiences have offered interesting reflections on what is and isn't soul-making within our modern medical system. While hospitals today offer extraordinary capabilities and possibilities for human healing, when viewed through the lens of soulfulness, they present a fascinating study in contrasts.

Soul and death share a special relationship—they go together. The sense of soul, life, and death is central to our human experience. Yet entering the modern Western medical system, wonderful as it is, one encounters primarily conversations about statistics, survival rates, biology, and matter. The human organism becomes treated essentially as a machine whose functioning we want to maintain and optimize, minimizing damage where possible.

This approach is valuable and important, but what happens to soul when this becomes the only conversation? What happens to soulfulness when these discussions about machine function, survival statistics, risk factors, and biological facts consume all the time and space? Walking through hospital corridors—again, these are wonderful environments designed for biological functionality—one notices how lacking they are in attention to soulfulness as a key element. There might be a small chapel tucked away somewhere, but otherwise, the design serves the biological machine.

If one were to raise this concern with hospital administrators, they might assume we're talking about addressing different beliefs people hold about what happens after death, since patients may die in the hospital or face mortality. But I'm not speaking about belief systems. I'm talking about perception, experience, and appearance here and now—of self, other, and world. Wrapped up in this is a sense of death, but not beliefs about what does or doesn't happen afterward. I'm speaking of perception, experience, and ways of looking that are soul-making in this very moment.

The challenge is complex, and I don't claim to have ready answers. Several centuries ago, when everyone shared Christian faith, or earlier when all were Catholic, there was common ground. Today, the range of what gives rise to soulfulness is enormous. What would need to be present in a hospital to offer soul-making possibilities varies tremendously from person to person. For some, it might be religious context; for others, simply precious time with family, where close human relationships become what is soulful.

This is merely an observation—I don't have a clear solution. But what strikes me is how, as a culture, we seem lost. We've misplaced any sense of direction for finding soulfulness again, for revivifying and re-engaging it, for rediscovering the threads that nourish soul-making. Culturally, we hardly know where to look. I wouldn't even know where to begin.

This loss of soulfulness impacts us in countless directions, and it can infiltrate our spiritual practice as well. Many of my friends and I, whose practice spans decades, recognize it's possible to attempt living in constant mindfulness, trying to dwell in bare attention. This approach receives enormous emphasis and gets presented as an ideal: "This is what I'm trying to do—live in bare attention."

When one truly loves mindfulness and practice and pursues this path wholeheartedly, certain aliveness does emerge. There will be radiance entering one's sense of things and some decrease in suffering. But I know from experience, and many have shared with me, that after genuinely attempting this approach, something troubling can arise. As someone told me recently, "I feel neutered"—this after years of practicing mindfulness with complete dedication. Another close friend described feeling like something in her soul was dying, even as other dimensions felt vibrantly alive.

A dimension, a very important dimension, the soul dimension, was being killed or neglected. All kinds of implications and problems, limitations can come out of that.

So I can try to live in bare attention, try to make my whole life a practice of mindfulness and bare attention, but the soul-making will actually come then around practice itself—around the whole notion of the path, the whole fantasy or idea of who the Buddha was and what he is or was. It will come around all that, around the tradition and around the self as the person walking the path or in the lineage of this tradition.

So I can try to be mindful as much of the time as possible, and yet still the soul-making will come in because it's what the soul does. And it will come in around practice. If my practice is just mindfulness and this kind of shaving off of soulfulness—because that's what bare attention does, just as when there's less fabrication, in those moments there will be less soul-making. It's only in the fabrication of those three broad possibilities that there's the possibility of soul-making, really.

But if we're practicing just mindfulness, then the soul-making comes around practice—around path, Buddha, tradition, self, etc.—as fantasy, as mythos. So even in the time of the Buddha, in the Pali Canon, out of their meditation, the monks and the nuns would have had this whole fantasy, mythos, conceptual framework of awakening as the end of rebirth, and so forth. And that was the trajectory, the journey, the Noble Path that they were on. This whole fantasy and mythos about the Buddha and the fortune of living in the time of the Buddha as this sort of once-in-an-aeon manifestation, in Theravada Buddhism.

And it still enters—the soul-making still enters in relation to practice and Dharma around practice if the practice is very narrow and the practice itself is not so soul-making. It will come around it. And that is not a problem. It's more just something to really recognize and observe and know this is happening. It's not a problem. It's not that we engage in soul-making when we can't handle reality, that we conjure fantasies and mythoi and images when we can't cope. It's not like that. It's simply how the psyche works, how the soul works—through image, through fantasy, through mythos. It creates souls. There's soul-making. There is the nourishing of soulfulness.

You can see this in all kinds of things. For example, food. In relationship to food, what are the fantasies that get woven into relationship with food? Really interesting. Cooking shows seem so popular these days on television. And sometimes I find even some meditators spending an evening reading cookbooks. It's not because they have to cook the next day. They're just interested in these cookbooks and fantastic pictures and such sensuality in the pictures. What's the fantasy? This is not a criticism, but what kind of fantasies get wrapped up in food?

Sometimes it's the fantasy of nature, connection with nature. Sometimes it's richness or the good life. And that's wrapped up in the fantasy that's keeping us—if one is into this, I'm not, but if one is into watching cooking shows—that's maybe one of the fantasies.

You will find plenty of hardcore Buddhist practitioners—and I've been in this camp myself—of just regarding food as fuel. Then that becomes a fantasy. It looks like it's not a fantasy. It looks like it's shaved off: I let go of all fantasy and papañca around food. It's just fuel. But wrapped up with seeing food as just fuel is a renunciate fantasy, and people can fall in love with renunciation and the path of renunciation—the simplicity of it, the surrender of it, the stripping bare of it. And again, that may be tied in with the whole conceptual framework of the Four Noble Truths as transcending clinging, or letting go of clinging.

So this fantasy and conceptual framework gets wrapped up in the idea or the viewing of food as fuel. Or the whole thing that's brought to food might be about mindfulness—and you get this a lot in retreat centers. And then the fantasy, the mindfulness fantasy in relation to food, is about tasting the moment, perhaps, or tasting life, literally tasting life. But also its broader meaning of tasting. Or it might be—and for so many people, their sense of mindfulness and presence, their fantasy that's woven into mindfulness, their practice of mindfulness and presence—has to do with nature: nature and their love of nature and what nature is and interconnectedness, and all that is all wrapped up in there as well.

Or again, if mindfulness is the main thing in relation to food—mindfulness of taste, mindfulness of greed—it's plugged into a more renunciate fantasy and a more renunciate framework that has to do with transcending clinging, transcending this world and attachment to materiality, attachment to sense pleasure, perhaps even attachment to manifestation, not being reborn again.

Or there could be a food fantasy—this would probably be a lot more conscious and deliberate in a lot of cases—as food as the nectar of the gods. Or a slightly darker image: the blood or the body of the gods. And we can actually practice that as an image, as a fantasy in relation to food.

But it will come in. One way or another, in relation to something like food, there's going to often—when it's alive for us, when we're interested and there's connection there—the fantasy comes in.

A fantasy comes in. Which one is it? So this fantasy, the mythoi, images—the psyche and the soul need that. They need soul-making, and they do it through image, mythos, fantasies.

Wrapped up in all this, and we've touched on this before, is the whole question about reality. Is this a delusion? Is it going away from reality and not being connected with reality? All that philosophical objection that comes up for people. But understanding emptiness can be really helpful here—deep understanding of emptiness.

This journey into really practicing ways that decrease fabrication in the moment, so there's a dissolution, a loss of substantiality, and then a dissolution of all appearances. That whole spectrum, journeying on that spectrum and then coming up and realizing what that more and less fabrication is dependent on, how things get fabricated. You understand all these appearances are empty.

I'm not trying to live in a state of non-fabrication—I could not anyway—or a state of less fabrication. But going up and down that spectrum of fabrication, understanding it, I understand the emptiness of all appearances. And that frees fabrication. It frees me to fabricate. It gives license and permission and beauty to the play and the playing with fabrication, to soul-making.

So it frees up fabrication, including the imagination. Because very often someone would say, "Soul-making, fantasy—that's fabrication," with the sense that it's just not true, it's not real, it's a lie, it's fabrication. But once I understand emptiness deeply enough through practice, I really understand all experiences are fabricated, all appearances are fabricated—there are none that are not. And that frees up this whole investigation into soul and image and imaginations and fantasy.

That's not quite that simple. It's not that all appearances are fabricated in the same way or have the same kind of conventional reality, but it can go a long way to freeing up the permission and the avenues to explore, fabricating in different ways, including the whole range with image.

Now I'd like to add to our meaning of soul-making, or maybe say it's characteristic of it. This realization, knowing that this is image, this is fantasy. So there's an awareness, knowing image as image. I want to say that's part—I don't think it's what everyone includes in their definition of soul-making, but let's include it in ours. There's a recognition that this is image, this is fantasy, and knowing image as image.

And even more than that, there's a flexibility around conceptual frameworks and views. We're not landing on one and reifying it, saying, "This is the truth, this way of seeing things, this way of seeing images, this way of seeing life, this is real." So included in what I want to call soul-making is this flexibility and skill and being able to move between different views. That's a really helpful, desired attribute, capacity, skill.

Now that flexibility in regard to conceptual frameworks might come through emptiness practice itself as it goes deeper and deeper. It might come through imaginal practice too, interestingly, or both—emptiness and imaginal practice. It might also come for some people through more modern philosophical investigations: postmodernism, poststructuralism, and that sort of thing. But it can come in different ways or a combination. And some people are already just able to do that. They're very loose and flexible in how they hold conceptual frameworks, very able to move in and out of different ones, even if they seem contradictory.

And it might be—I often wonder—it might be that some people may never be able to do that. They will never, for whatever reasons, be able to have that flexibility of conceptual frameworks. And their whole way of looking is just regarding things as concrete: it either is or it isn't, it's either this or it's that. It may be that some people just don't have, will never be able to stretch and open that way. Just as it says in the Mahayana tradition, some people will never be able to understand emptiness deeply, and so one should be careful who one teaches it to. It may be the same around all this. I'm not sure.

But if we take this as part of what we mean here for our purposes—this flexibility and ability to move between different conceptual frameworks and to entertain them without locking down on this or that as true or the only truth or reality—if we include that, then part of what we're entertaining in terms of soulfulness, in terms of what is soul-making, part of the conceptual frameworks that we're entertaining that give rise to and support and nourish soulfulness, is the idea, the eidos that we're entertaining of the necessity of this image that is meaningful to me, that's resonant for me. That sense of the necessity of this image, entertaining the idea of the necessity of this image—that's part of soulfulness, it's part of the soulfulness there.

And again, to repeat what we've already said: I can sense that necessity, but I'm also acknowledging that it's given to the image through my way of looking, through my way of conceiving. So certainly I have that experience of it being sensed as necessary, but I know also that it's given. And necessity doesn't imply, "Oh, this image is necessary, therefore it's the only image or the only fantasy for me."

It doesn't imply a kind of singularity.

So with respect to the self and soul-making, there is really also the idea, the eidos, of opening up a sense of a multiplicity of fantasies, of mythoi, of imaginal figures and characters. That multiplicity is very much an aspect of soul-making and soulfulness and soul. And also the idea, the eidos, of a certain autonomy that these imaginal figures, these archetypes, these gods have—that's also very much a part, an aspect, a necessary ingredient of soul-making.

So we are not regarding them as factors or essential qualities of the self or the psyche or whatever. An imaginal figure is a person, in some sense, equal to the self. It's not a constituent of the self. It's not a part of the self to be somehow integrated into this chief executive self that will then make decisions and balance everything and navigate successfully through life in a balanced way or whatever.

And awakening then is not so much a process of, say, collecting the whole set of these constituent sort of figures or qualities or whatever and having them together, the full set, in a balanced way without any conflict between different characters, figures or aspects or qualities. We can open up the sense of awakening to even include the possibility that sometimes these figures make impossible and unreasonable demands of us and our lives. I'm going to come back to that whole question.

But that's a very different image of awakening, not as necessarily balanced in the way that we might think, not as completely lacking in contradiction or conflict, not as devoid of unreasonable and impossible demands on the self, coming from, let's say, the depths of the soul, the wider psyche, these imaginal figures.

So all this means that perhaps there are multiple styles, if you like, of awakening, or directions of awakening. I've talked about this in other talks, so I won't say too much. But the views open, the view opens in relation to all that, perhaps.

And then also, we're entertaining the idea—an idea entertained that's really helpful and really opens up the sense of soul-making and soulfulness—that the human being is in the psyche or in the soul, rather than the other way around. The soul or the psyche is something in the human being. So that's quite radical. Esse in anima, Jung wrote in Latin—esse in anima, to be in the soul. The human is in the psyche, the soul. The soul is something much bigger, if you like, than the human and the human's life. We are in that rather than that is in us. And all of this has implications in relation to the images and working with images and the imaginal figures that come.

So when we see these imaginal figures and the plurality of them, the multiplicity of them, we can see, yes, not self. They are not self. This is not self, this image. But it's a different sense. It's beyond just viewing them as anattā, as not self, in a sort of more classical Buddhist sense, as a way of letting go. I see that's not self, that's not self, this is not self, that's not self. It's a way of deep letting go, this anattā practice, anattā view, way of looking—a way of letting go.

In this way of seeing this image and that image, and that all the multiple images are not self, it's a way of letting go of clinging, but it's empowering and vivifying, giving life to those imaginal figures as well, through all these other ways of fantasizing with the images and the conceptual frameworks around.

And again, in regards to the whole question of necessity: Who wants to come through? Which image wants to come? Which imaginal figure wants to come through? Who is it that acts or feels or sees this way? This is also a question, a dimension, a question that comes out of seeing the necessity of these images.

When we personify, when we let things take form as persons or imaginal figures, there is a disidentification with that to a certain extent. But the who—who wants to come through, who sees this way, who feels this way, who acts this way—that's a different kind of who than you get in, say, the Advaita tradition when they say, "Who is asking this question? Who is wanting to be enlightened?" There, the thrust of that turning the question back to the asker is that there is no answer, or nobody really is wanting that, or oneness is wanting that, or whatever. Here is very much more not this dissolution into universality, no one, or oneness, or whatever it is, but actually letting form as an imaginal figure, a person with all that depth and complexity and richness, knowing also it's empty. So the who goes in a different direction.

And with all this, with this seeing "this is not self," but we're empowering, we're not then claiming this image as a part of the self, as I said, or claiming this image to be in service of the self. Now, we could relate that way. We can regard imaginal figures and try to see them as somehow serving us, helping me with this, helping me with that, making me become more whole, more balanced, more this, more that, more successful, grow on my path, etc. It's possible. But to me, a more interesting way is not regarding them that way.

In terms of regarding them that way, there's a short passage in the Iliad, in Homer's Iliad, where it says the muses met Thamyrus the Thracian—he was a musician. And he boasted that he would win in a singing match with the muses themselves. This angered them. The muses were divinity's daughters of Zeus. This angered them.

This boast—that he was a better musician than them and would win such a contest—angered the muses deeply. They struck him blind. But here is the passage that particularly strikes me: they robbed him of the divine gift of song and caused him to forget his harping. They robbed him of the divine gift of song.

There is a profound view embodied in this passage. The gifts of the soul do not belong to the self. Or in dharmic terms, they don't belong to anyone—here they are regarded as divine gifts. They come from the daimon, they come from the divine, from the archetype, if you like. They are not in service to us. We may be in service to them.

This represents a complete reversal, a 180-degree spin on how we may be tempted to view these things. We want and need soul-making—the psyche needs that. You could say the soul needs soul-making.

James Hillman wrote somewhere, reflecting on psychotherapy and the years of therapeutic work that preceded him, that perhaps what people were coming for was not just to be loved or cured, but to be told into a soul story. Not just to be loved or cured, but to be told into a soul story.

This soul story is another term for what I'm calling fantasy or mythos. A soul story is not so much my story—my human story arising from my personal life—but rather a story that we are in. We are lived by the story.

What does this mean? We are lived by the story. Again, this is a 180-degree flip in how we view our lives. We are lived by a story. This doesn't necessarily mean a classically mythic story—Greek or Buddhist or otherwise—but rather this mythic storying of life. What would it mean for us to view our lives this way?

And not in a clunky, rigid manner. Everything becomes liquid—to use that archetypal metaphor again. We're entertaining a mythic storying of life, but without rigidity, without viewing it in a clunky way, seeing it all as liquid. It becomes poetic, subtle. We know image as image.

James Hillman says, "To be in mythos is to be inescapably linked to divine powers, archetypes, and moreover to be in mimesis with them"—to mimic them, that is. To be in mythos is to be inescapably linked to divine powers and moreover to be in mimesis with them.

Some people hear the word "divine" and wonder what on earth it means. It can make us nervous depending on our background and inclinations. But there's an idea from Neoplatonism—from thinkers like Proclus—called epistrophē, a Greek word meaning reversion, reverting to the archetype, the primal form. This connects to what we discussed earlier about archetypes.

Our life, or rather the way we see our life, involves seeing it in relationship to these archetypes, these gods. This concept also appears in Corbin's writings on the mysticism of Ibn Arabi, where it's called ta'wīl in Arabic. Epistrophē, ta'wīl—this echoing, this seeing in relation to, this mirroring of God or the image, and the life mirroring the God, the archetype, or a manifestation, an appearance of God, angel, archetype, daimon.

Is it possible to open up and give life to these ancient ideas—centuries old—but approach them now with a much more sophisticated understanding of what life is, what the word "real" might mean? Can we approach them with a more open and sophisticated understanding rather than either a naive one or what has become the modernist notion of reality?

Can the Buddhist teaching of emptiness help us here? I think it can. What would it be to entertain words like "divine" or "God," knowing that they are empty, fully empty?

God is fully empty. So hopefully we're going to come back more to this. But in working with the images, we can actually sense something other, something beyond, if you like. Sometimes that's in the sense of timelessness of an image, the eternality, the non-temporality of an image. We actually sense that, again, like a poetic image.

And that sense of timelessness, of something beyond, of otherness, that helps the image gather potency, be powerful, be deep for us, gives it a sense of significance, gives it a sense of something more than the human. So we can sense all that without needing to contract around a kind of naive belief in the reality of some concrete God figure or something like that, or a concrete view of an angel or something like that.

Maybe God is not separate from my life and the way I view my life, the way I view my duty, my journey, my acts. There are all kinds of possibilities here, but we need to open out and be a little more sophisticated with our notions of reality, our philosophical notions of reality.

When we talk about story, we're talking about fiction. A story is a fiction, generally speaking. And this is crucial in relation to all this, because a fiction, a story, is actually a shapeable thing. My story, the story of my life, is not a fixed, concrete thing, once and for all written down. It's shapeable. The past is shapeable. We can shape different stories, if you like, out of the same material of our lives, and different soul-making. We can make different soul-making stories.

A story is a fiction. A story is also not, therefore, something posited as real. It's not a rational explanation. I overheard someone the other day making a joke about—what was it that they were saying? Of course, saying it's God's will would be equally of equal explanatory power. They were making a joke because they didn't really mean that. They were dismissing the whole idea of God's will. But the idea of God's will at its best is not a rational explanation. This happened because it's God's will—oh that, thank you, that answers my questions. No. It opens up a different dimension of relationship with the event that's happening, with the journey that one's on, with this thing that one's looking at.

The story there, the fantasy, the image is not functioning—it's not even intended to function—as a rational explanation. It's intended to open the soul-making in relationship with. Big difference, subtle difference, but big.

Story, in this sense, fantasy, gives life. It is soul-making. Actually, again, James Hillman points out that story is the only mode of accounting or telling about that does not posit itself as real, true, factual, revealed—that is, literal.

In all this, in the soul-making, or rather with soul-making through images, myth or fantasy—whether it's an image that appears to us or whether it's seeing our life as image, myth, fantasy—something is healing here. Something is healed in this way of looking, these ways of looking. Something is loosened. Aspects are loosened. There's a letting go, a loosening of self-fixation.

In a way, we no longer see ourselves when we see in terms of soul-making as so isolated, because we're connected through this epistrophe that is echoing and mirroring and rootedness in the angelic or the divine, if you like. There is this reintroduction and reconnection with what I was calling the vertical dimension that hopefully I can say a bit more about as the retreat goes on. Therefore, we're not isolated and two-dimensional, one-dimensional.

In all of this, when we use words like soul-making and think more about that, or regard things in that way, conceive of things in that way, soul-making, that takes the focus and the question away from, "Is this true or real?" The question becomes, "What is soul-making? How do I recognize that?" Well, it feels a certain way, opens up a certain way in the psyche, in the consciousness. It takes the question away from this oftentimes too narrow, too unsophisticated philosophical regard of truth and reality, and takes the question into what is soul-making, what nourishes, deepens, enriches, vivifies, gives depth to, gives range to soulfulness.

So it's a different way of relating. It's a reorienting both to image and fantasy and to existence, self, world, other, etc.

CHAPTER 12

Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (2)

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this comprehensive teaching on imaginal practice, Rob Burbea distinguishes between mindful engagement with images and mere daydreaming or fantasy. He presents a detailed seven-point framework for working with images in meditation, emphasizing that imaginal practice requires the same steady attention as mindfulness of breathing or mettā practice.
>
> Burbea explores how to sense images through various modalities (visual, auditory, kinesthetic, intuitive), how to let images fill out naturally, and how to attune to the specific character and qualities that matter most in each image. He pays particular attention to emotional and energy body resonances, describing seven ways the energy body signals when an image is 'right' for soul-making: vertical alignment, expansion, softening, energization, increased well-being, harmonization, and the emergence of a contoured energy body.
>
> The teaching emphasizes trusting the energy body's wisdom over mental judgments about what constitutes a 'proper' image. Burbea also addresses the importance of asking 'What do you want?' of imaginal figures—shifting from ego-centered demands to honoring the image's own intentionality. Through personal examples including encounters with angelic figures and deceased jazz musician Eric Dolphy, he demonstrates how images can reveal different perspectives and invite us into various qualities of love and gratitude. The practice ultimately aims at soul-making through respectful, sensitive relationship with autonomous imaginal beings.

I hope that it's obvious that in imaginal practice we're really talking about mindfulness of images—bringing mindfulness to bear on images and everything associated with those images or other certain aspects of experience associated with them.

We're not talking about daydreaming, about being lost in fantasy, about not being present. So I hope that's obvious, but sometimes I find that it isn't obvious to some people. Partly that's just because, as I mentioned in the opening talk, this culture is so used to regarding images a certain way. And also sometimes some people are very used to having quite a narrow range of view of what meditation is and what practice is, what it means to be present. So hopefully it's obvious—we're really talking about mindfulness of images or mindfulness with images.

So that means we want to explore now what's included, incorporated into that mindfulness in imaginal practice. What we're talking about is steadily attending to an image, holding an image in attention rather than flitting from one image to another the way the mind does and the attention does when we are lost in daydreaming and not really present. So as much as possible, just as with the breath or something like that, we're steadily attending to, holding in the attention, an image. And when the mind gets distracted, we notice that just as with other practices, and we return to the image. Gently—you don't have to force this, don't have to get too tight, just as with working skillfully with the breath or the metta practice.

As we are holding an image and attending to it in this more steady way, it might want to evolve. The image might morph or change its form, or something else might be added to the image—some other character or something like that. So we let it evolve if it wants. But the attention is really on this image, which either stays relatively the same or evolves in some way or other.

With all this, there's a lot of mindfulness. Actually, it's asking quite a lot of our mindfulness. There's mindfulness of the body, and particularly, as we said, of the energy body—we've really put a lot of emphasis on that. There's mindfulness of the image. And there's mindfulness that it is an image—knowing image as image, as I keep emphasizing. The mindfulness of body, of the image, knowing that it is an image.

There's mindfulness of our reactions and our responses and what happens, so to speak, in response to this image or with this image. So the thoughts that arise in response or reaction to the image, the views of the image, or in response to the image—sometimes they'll be very explicit. We notice that the mind is thinking or viewing in a certain way, and oftentimes it's more implicit. Even this awareness of the implicit view of the image and what the image is or what it might mean or what it's worth—all this, even that is included in our mindfulness. It's a mindfulness of view in relation to the image.

Noticing the associations we might have with something in our life or events or trajectories or meaningfulnesses in our life. Really, a sensitivity is required here with the mindfulness—sensitivity to the resonances of energy, of emotion, to the qualities involved in the image and attending to it, opening and tuning to those qualities perhaps, to those energies, to those emotions, sensitive to the vedanā, the pleasantness or unpleasantness, or neither pleasantness nor unpleasantness—so-called neutrality. So we're aware of all this, sensitive to all that. How is the self-sense in relation to this image? Or how is the self-sense right now while I'm attending to this image? All this is part of the mindfulness and part of the sensitivity.

So it's very different than daydreaming or being lost. We could say we're attending, we're tuning, and we're opening to the imaginal through the mindfulness. Attending, tuning, and opening.

So let's break that down a little bit more and elaborate a little bit more. Here's another list—a seven-point list—just to give you a sense. Some of it's very intuitive and obvious anyway, and some of it may not be. But to give you, to fill out the sense of what's really involved in this practice in terms of nuts and bolts.

So the first one is—and we've touched on this before—how do I sense the image right now? In other words, like we said, what is the primary sense modality? Not to elevate necessarily the visual sense. It could be auditory, the aural. It could be the body sense, more kinesthetic. It could be even taste. So plenty of times something as strange as taste is a kind of knowing through the taste, or an imaginal taste, pregnant with all kinds of resonances.

So how do we sense the image? This is part of the attending, part of recognizing. How do we sense this image? And as I mentioned in one of the talks, maybe it's a more intuitive sense. It's not really one of the five inner senses or the inner correspondences of sight, sounds, smell, taste, touch.

Maybe it's more intuitive, not so much of the five senses. So it's really important to be flexible here, rather than getting stuck in one modality, one sense modality. How do we sense the image? And then trust that. Tune to whichever way of sensing the image—whichever sense or without the senses—is the most helpful to tune into with regard to this particular image that's going on right now. So that's the first on this list.

The second is, again, a bit of a question you can lightly ask: Does the image want to fill out at all? For instance, here's an imaginal figure right now coming to me. Where is this imaginal figure? What are the surroundings like? What's the imaginal territory, so to speak, that they are arising in? Are there any other imaginal figures around, or are they alone?

Really, sometimes the image wants to fill out a little bit, and sometimes not so much. But just lightly asking the question, giving it a chance to fill out, asking certain questions about territory and whether there are others there.

And the third instruction, really, or aspect or dimension of attending, tuning, opening is: Is it possible to get, so to speak, a sense of this imaginal figure or imaginal object? A sense of its character, their character.

So, for example, I remember—I don't know when it was, maybe almost two years ago—it was, I think, a spring day, and I was invited to Totnes to meet two people, two women I didn't know at all, to do an interview. I actually didn't want to go, to be honest. I was too busy. I felt too busy, and I didn't want to go. But I went anyway, and we did some filming of each other, sort of a two-way interview, outside by the river. It was absolutely delightful. There was something about the interaction that was really a lot of fun and very lovely and very inspiring as well, listening to this woman speak. And also when I spoke, I felt a lot of inspiration flowing through.

Then the next day—and that sense of inspiration carried on—the next day in the morning meditation, the same scene arose in the imagination: the scene outside by the river, sitting on the bench with these two women, and even the other people around. The same scene arose, all the sunlight and the loveliness there. But in the background of the imaginal scene came, very spontaneously, the presence of a sort of angelic figure who had a body of golden white light. He had a masculine kind of presence, but his features were not clear, not at all visually clear.

What was clear was the particular quality of flavor or resonance of his presence—somehow very clear and very defined, very, very particular, even though visually it wasn't that clear. And that quality of presence, or the flavor of his presence... it may be very hard to put into words. I would struggle. There was something about joy very much, and about love that was there. But even the quality of love was not obvious. It wasn't the first thing or aspect that one was struck by. But there was something all-encompassing and delightful and bright in there.

Somehow the presence of this angelic figure in the imaginal sort of memory afterwards—this spontaneous image that came—somehow his presence was very connected to and in a way responsible for what I said or the spirit that seemed to imbue how I responded to the questions that were being asked of me. And at the same time, this angelic figure was also pervading the two women who were with us during these interviews, pervading our delight and pervading the enjoyment of each other, and even the scene itself. So his presence was pervading the grass, the bench, the trees, the river, the sunlight. It wasn't separate from all that.

In the sense of the image, as I dwelt with it more and more, everything became luminous. That pervasion of this beautiful light and joy and love pervaded the whole scene. And there was a kind of transubstantiation—if we borrow that word from the Catholic tradition—transubstantiation of all the elements of the scene, all the material and psychic elements of the scene. It's different than a transfiguration, where something changes what it is or changes its shape. Everything retained its same form, but its substance was different. The whole world and the beings that were there.

In the imaginal practice, I noticed a little bit of a tendency to want—oh, let's talk to him, let's learn something from him. But I could sense, oh, that's not quite right. Just focusing on this figure and his presence and the pervasion and the resonances there, that felt really right somehow, really wonderful and joyful and beautiful.

So with this third aspect of what we can check out with images, there's sensing into the character of the figure, the resonances of that figure and the character of the figure. And especially if there's any complexity of character...

So, for example, in this one, with the example I just gave, the love was there, but it wasn't the most obvious thing. But when you noticed it, then you realize, oh, there's a profound and pervasive love here. It wasn't obvious at first. Sometimes you might get images where the imaginal figure actually seems quite crusty and kind of not very loving at all. One might think even the opposite. But there's a complexity of character to many imaginal figures. So one might see, for example, that here's a kind of crustiness, but underneath, or with that, or looking more closely, there's great love. Great love is there, but it's not obvious.

So with all this, another aspect of that is really the instruction to be sensitive to the nuances of character of an image—not, as we mentioned before, just, "Oh, that's the wonder archetype," and just stick a label on and kind of lose the sensitivity, lose the attention and the curiosity and the openness to the more subtle manifestations of character and resonance. So really, really encouraging the sensitivity.

And this third dimension of the practice, we could actually broaden it to say not just what is the sense of this character, but let's broaden that to, again, ask lightly a question in the imaginal practice: What is the specificity that is important in this image or to this image? What is the specificity that is important in this image? In other words, what is it that I want to be really tuning into here that's important about the image and important to really tune into that specific aspect with a lot of attention and differentiation and nuance and detail?

Different images have different aspects of them that are what is most important, if you like. For example, once, actually quite a few times, sometimes I might be meditating, for example, and there's a sense—if you like, an imaginal sense—that comes of the birdsong that I can hear. Perhaps I'm outside or perhaps I can hear it through the window. And the birdsong is heard through the imaginal lens, imagined as sacred text. The birdsong in this moment that I'm perceiving is perceived as somehow as a sacred text.

Now, partly saying that, I'm aware, I'm thinking, what do you mean by that? And that's what I want to explain—that the vagueness in some ways is part of it. Now, I may well have read something about sacred texts or something in this tradition or that tradition beforehand, and so there's a kind of suggestibility there of the psyche that's open to certain suggestions that then have fruition in images. No problem at all. No problem whatsoever. If that's the case and you recognize that's probably the case and then think, "Oh, but that's probably because I read this thing or I heard so-and-so say something," no problem. Again, the psyche is creative. It's how it works, how it takes in something from its environment and then creates something or allows an imaginal sense of something.

So there was a recognition that was possibly connected to things I had read in the not-too-distant past. And there was a sense of samadhi with it. But more important, there was a depth and a beauty to this sense, listening to the birdsong and the whole bodily sense, and a sort of inexhaustible depth and beauty to this particular imaginal window or imaginally mediated hearing opening to the birdsong as sacred text.

What was very specific, and this is what I want to get at—what was the specificity that was important in this image? One aspect of that was very specific resonances emotionally to that whole sense of the birdsong as sacred text. And more important, it was a very specific way of seeing, of knowing the world. The world that opened up at that point, the world outside my window, the world that I was in had very particular kind of resonances and feeling tone and sort of sense of its depth, particular kinds of that and its beauty.

Now, I may not have, certainly may not have been able to articulate that. It would be very, very difficult to put that into words. But it was really those aspects—the world quality, the resonances, the kind of beauty, the kind of depth—they were very, very specific and precise and beautiful, difficult as they were to describe.

Other aspects of the image, or that whole opening, were really—it did not seem important that they were specifically tuned into. Those specifics were not so important. So, for example, the exact relationship of this birdsong and the text. What do you mean, certain pitches or sounds? No, it didn't matter exactly. The relation of the birdsong and the text and the body and the energy body and nature itself, the exact relationships there were not important. Probably, in fact almost certainly, they wouldn't have made sense in a tight rational framework. And in a way, they were not clear, they were not defined, they were more vague.

Was this text a Sanskrit text or a Pali text or an Aramaic text or a Hebrew text? It didn't matter. It was something, and I'll return to this later, something actually needed to be a little vague and open and not so defined in this image. And other aspects, their specificity was very important. The tradition—what tradition are we talking about in this sacred text belonging to what tradition? It was not important. It did not matter.

So the question here, gently, is to tune into, see if you can get a feel with any image:

Again, what is the specificity that is important in this image, whatever it is? This forms the third question—the third thread or aspect of instruction. We're exploring the sense of this figure or imaginal object, its character, and the particular specificity that matters most in this image.

The fourth aspect—our fourth encouragement within this mindfulness of image—concerns the emotional resonances and resonances in the energy body that an image sets up or evokes. There's quite a lot to say about this dimension of practice.

We could describe two extremes regarding these energetic and emotional resonances. At one extreme, it's possible to exclusively tune into and focus on the sense data of an image—really examining the particularities, the specific fine details of a visual image, concentrating purely on the sensual aspects and trying to achieve maximum clarity and precision. However, here on this retreat, we are not pursuing that extreme. This approach, while valid, is not what I wish to emphasize.

We are always connecting with the emotional resonances and the energy body resonances. There's never an exclusive tuning into the sensual detail of an image at the exclusion of awareness of emotional sensitivity and energetic body resonances.

The other extreme might involve focusing exclusively on the emotion or energy that arises with an image. Perhaps an image brings tremendous love or joy, or creates a certain quality of softening in the energy body. One could choose to tune increasingly into that emotion or energy in the energy body, giving exclusive attention to the emotion as emotion or the energy as energy, while letting the image recede.

This approach will take us deeper in the samadhi direction. The samadhi will constellate more and more, creating the quietening of the emotional body that we discussed in earlier instructions. This extreme is certainly an option on this retreat—it's a choice, a kind of leaning or steering where we recognize something happening and consciously move toward the emotion or energy exclusively as we let the image fade.

Most often, though, we'll practice something in between: focusing on the image while remaining aware of the emotional resonances and energy resonances in the energy body. This ongoing sensitivity to emotional and energetic resonances is crucial in imaginal practice because it helps us navigate.

This sensitivity helps us recognize when an image is "right"—right in the sense that it nourishes, deepens, opens, and supports soulfulness and soul-making. I'll speak much more fully about what I mean by soulfulness and soul-making, but within the framework I wish to support, this constitutes the rightness of an image. One of the primary ways we recognize that an image is right and moving in that direction is through its effects on the energy body. The energy body tells us: this image is helpful for soul-making; there's something important here for the psyche.

Several effects signal that an image is right. These are not separate possibilities but interconnected qualities. The first is a kind of alignment of the vertical axis of energy through the body, through the energy body. There's a sense of the energy coming into vertical alignment within the energy body. This can be very subtle, but it's a signal that we're on the right track—the energy body is telling us we're moving in the right direction with whatever image is arising.

When this alignment of the vertical axis becomes very strong, it tends toward the emotions of reverence, devotion, and prayerfulness. These qualities are intimately connected to this energetic alignment.

When it's very strong, those emotions are often not far away at all.

But this felt alignment of the vertical axis in the energy body is one of the cues and clues, if you like, that we're on the right track. A second is just the sense that the energy body kind of opens and expands a little bit. That sense of the expansion of energy, the widening of energy, is also very characteristic as a cue and clue that we're on the right track.

Third can be a kind of softening of the energy body. I don't certainly just mean a relaxing of the physical musculature—that may happen, but again, I'm really talking about energy body rather more than anatomical body. The texture, if you like, or the tone of that energy body can soften to one degree or another. It doesn't mean a slumping—there's still the uprightness there—but the softness, the texture feels like it's got more softness in it. Something softens. This can be very, very subtle or stronger, but it can be very, very subtle.

Fourth is, generally speaking, the energizing of the energy body. When an image is, again, so to speak, right for the psyche, for the soul, the energy body will feel energized very often. Now that energization can be, again, very, very subtle or very, very strong. There's a whole range there of possibility. It's not that one is better or worse, or that stronger is better. It's just a range there. But energization is often a key aspect of what happens in the energy body when an image is important.

With the energization, this energization can bring or reflect a feeling of power, vitality, force into the whole being, into the energy body, but into the whole psyche as well. It brings or reflects a feeling of power, of vitality, of force. That may fill the energy body, and that whole movement may—it doesn't have to, but it may—fill the whole energy body. It may wave through. It may sometimes erupt very suddenly in the energy body and through even into the physical body so that sometimes the head moves or moves back, tilting upwards, a shudder moves through the body. Sometimes the mouth opens by itself spontaneously and it's almost as if a silent roar comes out at times.

These kinds of things are absolutely not necessary. So again, don't regard them as super advanced or better practice. I'm just mentioning them so that one is not freaked out or alarmed or disturbed by their occurrence. They're absolutely not necessary, though. Just to say that one of the aspects that can happen is energization. Sometimes it's strong and sometimes that waves or erupts through the physical body to the extent that for a moment or two it affects the physical body in different ways. But it's absolutely not necessary that that happens. So it may or may not. Neither better nor worse. But the fourth possibility to look out for is this energizing—to notice and to feel.

The fifth—these are all, as I said, not totally separate; they're related, but it's worth differentiating them—the fifth is that there's some degree of increase in the sense of well-being in the energy body or even bliss. Again, this can be very, very strong or really quite subtle, not that remarkable, but there is some degree of an increase in well-being and bliss that's often characteristic of an image being right or soulful. So it could be very, very subtle.

But what we're doing here is really trusting the energy body rather than the mind's initial mental reaction or view or thought that might be actually a little bit too tight about what's a right image or wrong image, or what kind of image I need, or what's okay and what's not okay and what's weird and what's not. We're actually trusting more the energy body and the manifestations in the energy body, the cues and the clues there. We're trusting that for the navigation more than the mind and its views, which are often just received and habituated from different cultures that we move in.

The sixth is a possibility through the energy body, something to look out for, notice and feel—a kind of harmonization and homogenization of the whole energy field, the whole energy space of the energy body. Harmonization—it feels more harmonized and it feels more homogenized. So the energy feels like it's spread more evenly through the energy body, oftentimes, or can do. But that also includes a homogenization of the awareness through the space of the energy body.

In other words, so often—perhaps it's our culture, perhaps it's just normal—it's very common to feel like the awareness is somehow in the head, looking at the body, or sometimes that they're even separate. There's this sort of awareness located here, and the body is more than that somehow. But one thing that's characteristic here, a possibility, is this harmonization, homogenization of the energy, but also of the awareness through the space of the energy body. So that generally speaking, the body and the awareness are less fragmented, and also the connection between them feels less disjointed, less fragmented.

And a seventh possibility that I think is maybe more common for some people or some people with certain backgrounds in practice is that the contoured energy body can be felt. So remember we talked briefly about that earlier in the retreat. It's not so much this amorphous space right now, but one might also feel and sometimes even see or feel an energy body, separate in space, distinct in space from the physical location of one sitting on the cushion or the chair meditating. And that contoured energy body, this body of light or energy, is felt—actually felt, not just seen, this is important—felt as perhaps dancing or flying or somersaulting with or in response to this image that is occurring. So this image, this imaginal figure is opening up so much energy and such a powerful response that the energy body itself is felt to be moving in space.

Okay, and a sixth possibility that I think is perhaps more common for some people, particularly those with certain backgrounds in practice, is that the contoured energy body can be felt.

Remember we talked briefly about this earlier in the retreat. It's not so much this amorphous space right now, but one might also feel and sometimes even see or sense an energy body, separate in space, distinct in space from the physical location of one sitting on the cushion or chair meditating. And that contoured energy body—this body of light or energy—is felt, actually felt, not just seen (this is important), felt as perhaps dancing or flying or somersaulting with or in response to the image that is occurring.

So this image, this imaginal figure is opening up so much energy and such inspiration of emotion that we become aware of the contoured energy body, and it's felt—as I said, it's dancing, flying, somersaulting, or manifesting all kinds of possibilities—in a distinct location from the location of the physical body. Separate from the physical body, but absolutely crucial: it's felt, it's felt, it's felt.

Sometimes, either hearing about that or experiencing something like that, people get a little nervous and think, "Well, am I disconnecting? Am I disconnected from my body? Am I ungrounded?" And they get a little suspicious or nervous even. But no, it's absolutely not disconnected, that kind of experience. It's not ungrounded as long as we feel it. So it's feeling two energy bodies at once, or a mixture. There's this one sitting here, and in this energy body I somehow feel this contoured energy body, as I said, flying or turning somersaults or dancing or whatever it is. It's not ungrounded, it's not disconnected as long as it's felt.

So there are seven possible manifestations to look out for, without needing to make a big deal of any of them or judging, "Oh, this is good and that's bad, that's better, that's worse"—any of that. Just things to look out for.

With any of these possibilities may come—or rather, often implicit in them—the sense that the energy body at that time has within it very specific qualities of emotion or energy. If we want to say frequencies, frequencies of energy (if we use that term), these are present within the energy body. I may not have a word—again, I may not have a word—for this particular quality of energy or this particular frequency, but any of these seven possibilities I just went through can sometimes imply that, or it's noticeable.

And then it's really important to notice: what is... can I really feel, can I really taste this very specific quality or frequency of energies, or mix of qualities or energies? Really make sure we notice, really taste and feel, open to it perhaps, let it pervade the whole space perhaps. Bathe in it, focus on it, enjoy it as we mentioned before.

So attuning to those energetic qualities, lingering in them, dwelling with them, entering into them, opening to them—all that. To the degree that we lean into that lingering and dwelling and entering into them, to the degree that we lean that way and incline that way, will, as we've already mentioned, allow us to enter more and more into samādhi.

So you can see there's a kind of very fluid navigation here in terms of image and energy and where we incline the whole consciousness and energy at any time. But what's absolutely crucial to the navigation is the noticing of what's happening in the energy body. And then we can decide where we incline and sort of glide with the consciousness and the whole energy body.

There's one thing I should maybe also mention right now. Generally speaking, all this is much, much easier in a meditative posture, as we emphasized at the beginning with the uprightness and the awakeness manifesting in the physical body, with the openness and receptivity and softness there. And so the meditative posture really allows both the sensitivity of mindfulness to the images, but especially even more the sensitivity of mindfulness in relationship to the energy body and working with the energy body. So generally that's a really good idea in the kind of work that we're doing and emphasizing on this course.

But sometimes one will find, occasionally one finds that posture is not right for this image. So not too long ago, someone was telling me they were working with an image—actually it was an image that had been around quite a lot—of a bird that this image had opened up for them. And there was a lot of beauty and preciousness associated with this beautiful image of a bird. And there were the corresponding meaningfulnesses in life that were very important in terms of openness and sensitivity and beauty and lots of other things.

And then something happened actually in life, and then that was mirrored in the image, and this bird was then perceived as having a broken wing and as dying from this injury. So I was talking with this person in an interview about this and pointing out this timeless quality of images. I said, "This bird is going to die, it will die." And we put that into, very normally and very understandably, a temporal context. "It's not dead now, but it's dying, and then it will die, and then it will be dead, and then what? I'll be without this bird, or this will have disappeared, or whatever it is."

But actually, there's a timeless quality to images that we can tune into—I might say more about this later on. So in a way, the bird is dying rather than "it will die at some point." It's always timelessly in the state that it's in now, wounded with a broken wing. That's not going anywhere as a narrative. So that helped enormously. It's almost like feeling into that image at another level, outside of time—and this is really, really crucial.

The person was working with the image, and after we had that conversation, then in the meditation they noticed, "Actually, it's working a little bit, but there's something wrong here." And they were playing with different postures. And then they actually found when they went to their room and lay down on their bed and curled around—curled their body lying down around this bird, this wounded bird—they said, "That's the perfect posture for the image right there."

Actually, just to continue a little bit because there are some other important learnings here. So not only was it the case that in this instance the meditative posture was not quite right (this is rare), but also then they noticed that they're lying, their body curled around this wounded bird with the broken wing. And then they noticed, as they were meditating in that way, bringing all the sensitivity, they noticed that they were scared to look into the bird's eyes, into this little bird's eyes, scared to see the suffering that they anticipated seeing there.

But she brought herself to look into the bird's eyes and then, very surprised, saw the love that was there in the bird's eyes.

These bird's eyes were radiating love—wide open, the love was wide and steady. This was very surprising, given her fear of actually doing that and what she anticipated seeing.

This points to something important about the autonomy that images have. They are autonomous—they're not just necessary parts of us, nor do we control them as much as we might think. So many times we're surprised by these imaginal figures. It doesn't mean they're completely independent of us—remember, they're not independent of the way of looking—but they have a certain autonomy.

The main point there was about posture. Usually the meditative posture is the best, but we want to be sensitive and open-minded there.

Those were all possible cues and clues, signals that we're on the right track—that this image is right, despite how weird it might seem. They come through the energy body, through manifestations in the energy body. Now, I'm aware that this might reflect my bias or inclination, because my modality is more kinesthetic than visual. So I'm certainly open to other cues or signals that a person might receive. Sometimes people get a light that appears, telling them they're on the right track with an image. There are many possibilities, but this inclusion of the energy body as a thread and basis allows so much other possibility in meditation. If that can be incorporated, it's really important and helpful. There might be other cues in other sensory domains as well for different people.

So there's the inclusion of energetic resonances in the energy body, and also in this fourth aspect of mindfulness, the inclusion of emotional resonances. As we've said, an image may often—not always, but often—contain within it, be pregnant with, or reflect multiple emotions. It's not just one emotion, but quite subtle shades or many aspects emotionally going on at once. Images are often quite condensed, rich, multidimensional in many respects—even multidimensionally and multi-aspected emotionally.

In the mindfulness, one is aware of the emotional resonances, which might be plural and have very subtle shades of the image or with the image. With this richness, again to reiterate, it may not be necessary to spend hours with an image, or certainly not necessary to go on some journey through imaginal space or territories. It may be that a brief image in one location, meditatively, is very rich. It might take one a long time to articulate all that richness, all that multidimensionality and the resonances emotionally, energetically, and all that. It may take a long time to articulate that verbally, even if one were able to, even from a brief image that's rich in that way.

That's the fourth aspect of mindfulness here: the sensitivity and awareness of, and also navigating possibilities regarding, the emotional resonances and energy body resonances.

Then a fifth aspect of what's included in the mindfulness relates to thoughts, reactions, and views. We've talked a little about this, but let me spell it out in more detail. Careful—it depends on the conceptual framework, but for our purposes, or for what I regard as the most interesting direction here—careful of the temptation to seek advice from an image. We think, "Oh great, then this person can tell me what to do in my life." I'm going to return to this point, but notice if the orientation or stance to an image is, "Ah, here's my fairy godmother, or here's the wise old sage who's going to tell me what to do in this situation in my life."

For our purposes, generally speaking, we're more interested in the resonances. That's much more interesting than getting advice and using it for the sake of the ego and the ego's journey.

Also notice and take a little care—just notice if there's a tendency to want to reduce this image in your view. The conceptual frame might be implicit, not obvious, but notice the tendency to reduce it to "it's just a result of my history, what happened to me in childhood or something else from the past." It's not that this is wrong at all. Sometimes, of course, an image does come from that—it's very related to that. All these things—our history, the image, and our unfolding—mirror each other in a more complex way than simple causality would allow us to conceive. But just notice if there's a tendency in the view to reduce it to just something, a result of history.

Or to view it purely literally: "Oh, it means this, or it means exactly what it looks like. This wanderer means go wandering." Or to reduce it in the sense that "it represents metta, or it represents my strength" or some other psychological concept or force. We're boxing it in, shrinking all the complexity and multidimensionality that's in an image, shrinking it into some concept, whether it's a dharma concept or psychological concept or whatever. Notice if that tendency arises and just take a little care with that. Again, it's not wrong—it's just that it might not be that interesting in terms of what then unfolds.

Similarly, regarding thoughts, reactions, and views, take care that we're not harboring a view that the more outlandish the image, the better—the more far out. Some of these things can sound really amazing when we relate them to others or to ourselves, but that's not necessarily important.

What's much more important is the relationship with the image. Everything hinges on the relationship. The relationship is what matters more than anything else. That includes the sensitivity to the resonances we've spoken about—in emotion, in the energy body, and in the psychic resonances, the soul resonances, the resonances for the soul in terms of meaningfulness. That's what matters—the relationship with the image, not actually what the image is itself.

When working with images in meditation, it's perfectly acceptable for some light reflection to emerge around the conceptuality of what an image is, or around the framework itself. Sometimes a bit of intellectual conceiving, some reflection or gentle chewing over of ideas naturally arises. While we often hear in meditation that thinking is terrible or that we must get away from the intellect entirely, this isn't necessarily the case here.

Certainly we don't want to be merely thinking—that's not the point at all. But at times, this shifting of conceptual framework happens through some light thought, or thoughts simply arise in relationship to our whole way of conceiving. This can be genuinely fruitful. So don't automatically slam the door shut on this process. Again, it's part of learning to navigate. You can sometimes allow that element in, and sometimes have less of it.

As we mentioned before, notice if the mental reaction tends to assign an image or imaginal figure to a particular character type, making a kind of stereotype out of it. "Oh, that's the warrior," or whatever it might be. This approach will kill the aliveness of the image entirely. What we truly want is to let this image, to allow it, to give it enough respect that it can really be alive. It's not just an instance of a category. It's not something to be labeled, causing us to lose our sensitivity and relationship to it.

In a way, this points to the importance of keeping our practice playful and responsive. This quality is crucial in meditation generally, but perhaps even more so in imaginal practice. I might offer lists of seven things to try, or mention other elements to look out for—one, two, three, four, five, whatever it might be. Fine, that's all useful. But fundamentally, these are just pointers. It's much better if you can really allow yourself to improvise with all this.

Rather than regarding the practice as formulaic, learn to be playful, to be responsive, to try different things. You may discover—and I hope you do—ways of working that I haven't suggested, that you haven't heard me describe, or that perhaps I haven't even encountered myself. That would be wonderful.

Regarding this fifth aspect of mindfulness about thoughts, reactions, and views, let me reiterate: the conceptual framework, the view, the way of looking always makes a difference to what occurs, what's allowed to occur, and how it unfolds. There's tremendous power contained in the conceptual framework, the view, the way of looking. This really makes a profound difference.

The sixth aspect of mindfulness, or possible thread here—something I'll speak much more about, perhaps tomorrow—involves asking the image: What do you want? In other words, what does this imaginal figure want?

This may not necessarily be a literal question. You don't actually have to speak these words aloud. Rather, it's about cultivating a particular attitude and orientation in relationship with the image. It's about turning around from "What can this image give me? What can I get from it? What can it do for me?" and reversing that stance entirely. I'll speak much more about this as we continue.

What do you want? Since this may not be literal, there may not be a verbal answer or anything of that nature. It's more about approaching the image and being open to sensing, perhaps, or intuiting some kind of intentionality behind this image—perhaps even a demand, something it wants, a meaningfulness that's wrapped up as part of the deeper meaningfulness contained within the image.

Of course, implied in having this kind of stance in relation to the image—asking it what it wants and honoring that response—is a quality of trust. Again, I'll speak more about this, but it implies that I trust in that moment. I'm entering into, encouraging, or adopting an attitude of trust in relation to this image. I trust it and I trust its intentionality and what it wants.

I'm trusting that it's benign, even though it might appear as some crazy warrior raging and bellowing fire, or something else entirely—perhaps a strangely erotic image or whatever it might be. I'm trusting it, and I'm trusting that it's benign, or better yet, benevolent. There's a beautiful etymology to benevolence: it wants what is good. Like well-wishing, it wants... These images are benevolent. Can I actually play with an attitude of trusting them?

This trust helps me turn the stance around and ask: What do you want?

What this imaginal figure wants may simply be to be seen, to be known, to be witnessed. It may just want to be acknowledged, to be honored, to be given a place, to be respected and, yes, honored. Perhaps even more than this—maybe it wants its holiness and its sacredness to be seen, or even its necessity to be acknowledged. There can be all kinds of subtle aspects to what it wants. Or it may be something more than that, or something different entirely.

Maybe this imaginal figure wants to be expressed in some way in one's life. It wants that your life expresses this imaginal figure in some way. Now again, this doesn't necessarily—in fact, usually won't be—literal or concrete. Something can be expressed without anyone else having any sense of it sometimes, or without it having a literal correspondence with the image, and can be expressed without that being visible to anyone else or tangible to anyone else.

Sometimes, in fact quite often—and this is important—an imaginal figure that comes to us has a different perspective than the ego or than our normal perspective, either on ourselves or on things or the world or a situation or others. So they embody and express and have a different perspective than normal. This is actually the important aspect of the image, and this is what it's wanting to show us or wanting to initiate us into.

Obvious examples would be Quan Yin or Avalokiteshvara as the bodhisattva of compassion, who has a different perspective than the ego's normal perspective. It's a non-ego perspective of universal compassion, universal love. It's seeing through different eyes, and it wants us to know that and honor it and recognize it and wants us to enter into that, perhaps. So those would be more obvious manifestations of different perspectives. But there may be, for us, less obvious ones.

I've talked about my interest in opening the range of what is our usual emotional range, opening the range of our usual psychological range, opening the range of the self and its self-expression. Because images are different, are autonomous, we cannot just regard them as self. Opening to their different perspective, recognizing, honoring, getting a sense of the different perspective that any image might have also opens our range beyond the more tightly circumscribed usual range that we might have.

Again, in this very subtle questioning or stance—what do you want?—it may be that it's really about love, that the image is wanting to express or manifest or enter into or allow love in all kinds of different ways. It's more about the love, and we sense that's what it's wanting, with many different possibilities here.

It could be, for example, that we enter into an image and interact with the image—that that's what it wants. How? We can interact in all kinds of ways. It's not necessarily that dialogue is the appropriate way or the best way to interact with a particular image. And if it's more interaction that has to do with love, and if love is the sense that this is really the most important aspect going on, then again, we want the sensitivity to the particular quality or kind of love. Because love has tremendous range—there are many different kinds of love and qualities of love. So what is the particular quality of the love that seems so central in this image and with this imaginal figure? It may be universal metta or compassion, but it may not be that. It may be much more personal and particular. There are all kinds of possibilities.

I remember not too long ago, I was doing walking meditation on the lawn here. I heard the bird song, beautiful bird song around me as I was walking outside. The bird song reminded me of one of my favorite jazz musicians, Eric Dolphy. He was active in the late fifties and early sixties before he died in 1964—a beautiful musician, quite associated with the avant-garde at that time. He played alto sax and bass clarinet and flute, really stretching the limits of jazz and the jazz vocabulary. Beautiful spirit, quite out there in his explorations and what was coming through him.

Hearing the bird song reminded me of Eric Dolphy. He used to take his flute to the oceanside in California and sit on the rocks and play with the birds. Different birds would be there near the ocean, singing, and he was such a virtuoso on the flute and improvising. He would mimic and play back and forth with the birds, and they would gather around him—a beautiful image in itself.

So I hear the bird song, I'm doing the walking, I hear the bird song and suddenly remember this story about Eric Dolphy playing with the birds. Then suddenly, very suddenly, I spontaneously imagine—it just comes as an image—that he's visiting from death. He's just visiting for a short time. We talk and I update him. This is not really happening in real time with a sort of concretized dialogue, but it's what's implicit. I update him a little because he played with John Coltrane and with another bass player, Charlie Mingus, in another band. I tell him a little—because they both died after him,

John Coltrane not too long later—and I update him on that and how and when they died, and also on what people said about him, about Eric Dolphy, and how highly he is regarded, especially by so many musicians, by so many people. I think he wasn't really aware of that—he was a very humble person. So wanting to tell him that, wanting to communicate that to him.

At some point, perhaps I get the sense that our time is drawing to an end, that there's just a brief window and that he has to go back to the realm of death. I find myself just blurting out silently, asking, "Play something, will you play something?" I was moved to tears by this request of mine that just bubbles up and emerges—with it, the sense of the preciousness of his music, the beauty of it, and the preciousness of his playing. "Just play something, will you?"

To me, this was an interesting image.

The image revealed itself to be fundamentally about loving him. The love flowing from me to him was what felt most important, most central to this encounter. There was even a quality of wanting to care for him, to tend to him physically in the here and now.

What had actually happened in 1964 was that he was touring in Germany, working as a musician. He was diabetic, and his blood sugar or insulin levels went dangerously wrong. From what I heard, when the ambulance came, because he was African-American and a jazz musician, they simply assumed he was overdosed on heroin and left him, saying, "Oh, he'll get over it." They didn't recognize that he was diabetic, and he went into a coma and died. I don't know how much of that story is exactly true, but certainly his condition wasn't properly recognized, and he died.

Partly because of this, the image carried this deep impulse in me to want to take care of him, as if he could have another life, another chance. Part of me wanted to tell him to wear a medical bracelet that said "diabetic" in different languages, in German. This sense of wanting to protect him, to care for him, was so central to the image—this loving him, and this immensely deep gratitude to him, for him, for what came through him, for that manifestation.

At one point, the love flowed the other way as well. He reached out in the image and touched my heart center with his hand, very gently placing his palm there. There was something about this gesture that reminded me of something Christ-like, or some kind of Near or Middle Eastern mystical blessing. The gesture was full of love and gentleness—really like a blessing. He was blessing me. Really, really beautiful and touching.

As this image unfolded—all of this happening in just a few minutes—occasionally I would get an impulse to ask him for advice. Perhaps advice for the past when I used to be a jazz musician, when someone like him, a complete master, could have helped me or at least sympathized with my passionate struggling to gain mastery. Or advice about creative work now, whatever.

But immediately when that attitude arose, I sensed that this wasn't the point of the image. It felt not right. That wouldn't be the proper steering, the right orientation—to ask for advice or whatever. The whole feel of it, when that impulse arose, the orientation of getting something from him, somehow felt off. Something was stuck or not quite alive. And that indicated to me very quickly: that's not right.

The simpler orientation—and to the mind perhaps more puzzling—of just loving him, just letting the gratitude flow forth, the flow going from me to him, that felt really, really right. There was something right about that, beautiful and right. What was really central in that image was the love, and particularly my loving him and my gratitude. Very beautiful and soul-making, if we use that word again.

So this sixth thread is about the stance, the attitude and relationship with the image: what do you want?

The seventh aspect or possibility in this mindful work with images involves what we could delineate as three possibilities in terms of stance with regard to the imaginal figure.

It can be that you, in the meditation, are beholding this figure or this angel. You're seeing or gazing at this figure and just feeling the resonances as you do that, stewing with that, cooking with that a little bit.

Or another possibility is that you enter into this figure or angel or daemon or whatever we want to call it, and actually feel them from the inside, as if you identify with them. I hope I can find another word at some point because I don't mean the ego identifying in a tight way—I mean entering into, let's say.

There are actually some tricks, a few little techniques you can use. Sometimes this just happens naturally. Sometimes we simply intend it to happen. But gazing into their eyes sometimes helps in order to enter in. Sometimes imagining your energy body mimicking the movement in the body of the imaginal figure—so if they're dancing in a certain way, for instance, you imagine dancing or feel how it feels for them to dance in that way. Feel that in the energy body. This helps us enter.

And then curiously—I have no idea why this works—giving attention to the small of their back, attending to that and feeling the small of their back, entering into that in the imagination, also allows us to enter into them sometimes.

So there's the "I behold the angel, the daemon, the imaginal figure"—I look and gaze at them with the resonances. Or "I enter into them," into their body, into their experience, seeing through their eyes. Or I attend more to this feeling of being seen by this angel, by this imaginal figure or daemon. I really notice: oh, they are looking at me, they are gazing at me in a certain way. I'm seen by them, and I tune into how are they seeing me? How are they looking at me?

So that's a third possibility, and it could be a combination of all of these.

These are just some pointers that could be helpful—some of them indispensable, some of them just possibilities that are helpful within imaginal practice.

CHAPTER 13

Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (1)

Rob Burbea · 41 min

In this foundational teaching from his Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea offers detailed instructions for imaginal meditation practice. He distinguishes between meditative approaches that emphasize subtlety and energy body awareness versus psychological methods that make images concrete through artistic expression or embodiment exercises.

Burbea presents seven practical methods for receiving and working with images: developing samādhi and well-being in the energy body; emptiness practices that render perception insubstantial; working with emotional upset to let feelings constellate as images; deliberately invoking specific figures like deities or meaningful persons; entering imaginal spaces through visualization; transforming daydreams into meditation; and perceiving the world itself as image. He emphasizes the alchemical principle that 'everything must become liquid' - meaning both insubstantial and non-literalized - for fertile imaginal work.

Throughout, Burbea stresses patience, sensitivity to the energy body, and trust in the intelligence (telos) operating through images. He notes that practitioners will likely spend more time cultivating samādhi than working directly with images, and that even brief encounters with images can be profoundly meaningful. This teaching provides essential groundwork for understanding how contemplative practice can open into the imaginal realm while maintaining meditative depth and sophistication.

Good morning, everyone.

To start getting into the specifics—the nuts and bolts around imaginal practice and instructions about meditative practice with images—I want to first place this in context and make a couple more general points.

As we've discussed, there are so many possibilities regarding imaginal practice in terms of approaches, attitudes, inclinations, directions, and theories that support or help direct practice and set it in different frameworks—some slightly different, others very different.

Many modern psychotherapies and psychologies that include images in their approaches often suggest or hold to the view that it's important to make the images concrete, to actualize them or make something solid out of them. For instance, this might involve painting, sculpture, sand play, psychodrama, or mime. In gestalt psychology, practitioners sometimes set up different chairs in a room, with the individual moving between these chairs, embodying an imaginal figure or dream figure in each chair, speaking as if from that embodied imaginal figure, then dialoguing between different imaginal figures or between the ego and the imaginal figure. In these approaches, it's often postulated that by doing this, the work with images moves into greater depth—it goes deeper, is given more power, becomes more powerful, and has greater effects on the whole being, on the psyche.

Here on this retreat, this isn't quite what we're doing. I'm more interested in the meditative work with images, and particularly—as I've said and will say again and again—the tuning to the energy body and the resonances and effects on the energy body. The inclusion of the energy body, awareness and sensitivity, is very much a thread and basis of the imaginal practice.

Why? Partly because we're limited in time, partly because this more meditative approach and sensitivity to the energy body reflects my particular training and what I've spent most time developing. But I also sometimes wonder whether making images concrete through sand play or moving between chairs and having spoken dialogues, while sometimes allowing images to have more effect, sometimes actually circumscribes and limits their effect in different ways.

The advantage of more meditatively focused work, especially sensitivity to the energy body, is that it allows a degree of subtlety and nuance of awareness, work, and navigation that isn't really possible outside of meditation. This concretizing—and I wish I had a better word, since I sometimes use that term to mean taking images too literally—may keep things at a more gross level and keep the whole imaginal practice and involved awarenesses at a grosser level than what may be allowed through meditative exploration with the subtle body, with the energy body.

Having said that, I want to reiterate that images, as we're discussing them, generally won't be separate from our life, separate from our acts and what we embody in the world, the way we move and speak, what happens in life, and also not separate from our perceptions. There isn't really a division here.

Something like ritual—that whole huge area of beautiful potential—we won't really explore on this retreat, unfortunately. It's also something where I don't consider myself an expert. But ritual would be an example of perhaps the possibility of embodiment, a making concrete in a positive sense, an acting out and transformation of perception that's somewhere between the more meditative and the more gross, or rather includes both. There are lots of possibilities. We're leaning toward the more subtle end of the spectrum in terms of awarenesses and navigation.

Secondly, and I mentioned this briefly but want to reiterate: on this course, mostly you will spend more time in your meditations with the energy body—whether in the groove of cultivating samadhi and developing well-being through the energy body, or in the groove of subtle attention to emotional manifestations in the energy body, just the energy manifestations. Generally speaking, you'll spend more time working directly with and focused on the energy body than with images, in terms of actual minutes.

Sometimes with images, even two minutes meditatively with an image can be extremely fruitful. It doesn't always need to be a long forty-five-minute stretch with an image. Sometimes that's helpful, but sometimes two minutes contains so much in terms of what it gives the being, how it transforms things, what's possible there, its richness.

Of course, there are exceptions. Sometimes a person practicing metta or compassion and using an image such as Kuan Yin or Jesus as their principal method for developing and cultivating that particular brahmavihara may require more steady bathing. Or for someone where an image of Kuan Yin or some compassion-imbued imaginal figure arises more spontaneously, this may require sustained attention. But it's very grounded, as all these images are, in the energy body, as I'll discuss more.

Generally speaking, there will be more time spent working with the energy body than with the images on this retreat. One moves back and forth, and I'll explain more about that. And of course, as always, there are exceptions.

Let me say something about possibilities for eliciting images or receiving images. I want to run through seven possibilities that can be employed to contact images.

The first we've talked about extensively, placing much emphasis on this track of intention, of the direction of samadhi, of cultivating well-being in the energy body and that spreading and harmonizing to whatever degree, with the mind pervading that space of the energy body, filling it out and hanging out, marinating in the well-being. Much of samadhi practice involves this marinating—filling out and really being there, very alive, soaking it up, the mind and body soaking up whatever degree of well-being is there more steadily, learning how to play with the images.

Within this, we can delineate two possibilities for eliciting images. One is that either deliberately or spontaneously, images can be deliberately invoked or created, or may just arise in relation to the energy body itself. We've discussed many examples: lines of energy, breath energy in certain ways, clouds of light, fire, and many more possibilities.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 2/5). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

But deliberately or spontaneously, images are created or conjured, if you like, or may arise themselves in relation to the energy body itself.

In addition to this, samadhi itself is also quite fruitful territory—a realm or range of experience for the arising of other images of a much wider scope than just the energy body itself. As you move in and out of some depth of samadhi—whatever that range may be, and as I said, it's an infinite range—going in and emerging a little after a while, emerging from whatever depth of samadhi just slightly, perhaps relaxing the intensity of attention... In some cases this can be helpful: emerging a little from this kind of marination in that space of well-being, relaxing the intensity very slightly, and also relaxing the exclusive focus on the energy and texture.

That exclusive focus is really what makes it more of a samadhi state. By relaxing that exclusivity—so we're very much in touch with the energy and texture of the energy body, but we're not solely paying attention to that—this slightly emerging state is generally one of consciousness with more softness, more diffused in terms of perception and quality and feel. And this is very fertile soil for images to arise.

I can't remember if I've mentioned this on retreat already, but some of you have heard me refer to a maxim from the alchemical tradition in the West. I've forgotten who wrote it, but it says: "Do not proceed with your alchemical operation—do not proceed until everything has become liquid."

How can we translate this to the alchemy of imaginal practice? What does this mean—liquid, everything becoming liquid? In the way I would interpret this, liquid does not mean flow. We tend to think liquid flow has something to do with impermanence, being in touch with the process or flow of phenomena. No, that's not really what's meant here.

The liquidity has to do with insubstantiality—liquidity as opposed to solidity. Do not proceed until there's a sense of insubstantiality to things. States of samadhi, whatever their range, or deep metta—these are states where the perception, on emerging a little or in the state itself, is of less substantiality, less density, less solidity. This is part of what "everything has become liquid" means. Where the perception of things—body, world—is less substantial, it's more fertile for images.

But the second aspect of this liquidity is not just insubstantiality, but the sense of not quite being real or literalized. Sometimes the perception of world and self and body, but particularly images in this case, comes with the knowing that this is not something to be literalized. We know it doesn't exist independently of mind and the way of looking. It's empty, as we've said several times.

So there's insubstantiality to things, and we know that things—particularly images—are not to be taken with the same kind of reality as tables and chairs and physical bodies. We're not literalizing an image; we recognize it as image, not independent of mind. This sense of insubstantiality combined with this attitude or view makes up this "everything becomes liquid."

This attitude that doesn't literalize or solidify images, that realizes they're not independent of mind and recognizes the insubstantiality of things—this comes out of and is implied in emptiness practices. I know I keep referring to emptiness on this retreat, but we don't actually have time to go deeply into emptiness.

Let me just say this: if you're familiar with different emptiness practices, you'll recognize that both this sense of insubstantiality and the attitude or understanding imbuing perception—that this is not independent of mind, not taking it literally, not giving it that kind of concretizing reality—these factors are always present in emptiness practices.

And like so many things, there's a range of degrees. What is the degree of insubstantiality in viewing perception? What is the depth and comprehensiveness of that deeper view and attitude that realizes everything has become liquid? This liquidity can extend to the world itself becoming liquid in this sense—not so concretized in understanding and perception as we usually hold it in our culture and in the human mind naturally.

There's a range of degrees of depth in emptiness practice and samadhi, of how much everything becomes liquid. The more familiar you are with emptiness practices, the more you understand and develop skill with them—all the way down to really knowing that time past, time future, and time present are thoroughly empty, that space is empty, that self and all things are empty—everything, if you like, is liquid.

These emptiness practices themselves, again emerging a little from their depth, render everything insubstantial. That view of emptiness, of liquidity, is really there. And this is a very fertile space or range of consciousness for images to arise.

With a lot of practice in emptiness and samadhi, there can be very fluid movement between these practices and imaginal practices. And particularly with extensive emptiness practice, sometimes we can...

if you like, decide to go deeper into the imaginal realm, just by invoking some emptiness practice, engaging some emptiness practice or invoking the felt insight there, the memory of the insight or the memory of that depth of emptiness, to let go in that moment of the perception of substantiality, particularly with regard to the body.

So with a lot of emptiness practice, one simply leans into letting go of the perception of substantiality, and that can take us deeper into the imaginal realm—more vividly, more alive, more stable. This comes as a fruit of, in most cases, quite a lot of emptiness practice. And then, as I said, one can play with a kind of fluid movement between different realms. It's very possible—simply a result of learning the right practices, taking the time to develop them, and cultivating skill in this way.

So that's the second pathway. There's the samādhi, then the emptiness practices.

The third possibility for eliciting or receiving images emerges when we're emotionally upset. When there's some kind of emotional disturbance present for us, it becomes possible to actually feel that emotional upset and, if you like, let it constellate an image. We allow the very emotion to take form, to constellate an image.

Now, it's not necessary that the emotion we're feeling be even clear or definable. We may not have a label for it. It might feel quite vague—completely okay. Not important. Or it might be very clear, with a definite word for it. It doesn't matter. Sometimes an image constellates or emerges from what we've alluded to before—a more nebulous, low-energy or contracted state. Strangely, this can also be fertile ground for images.

Something is, if you like, tied up in there, binding the energy in this contraction, and it's waiting to be discovered. That state of low energy or contraction may not be about anything in particular. We're not necessarily sad about this or depressed about that. It may not feel to be about anything specific. It doesn't need to be.

Or again, we might feel, for instance, beset by the inner critic, harangued and harassed by the inner critic, experiencing emotional upset around that. It might be that we let or even encourage that inner critic to take form as an image, to constellate as an image, and perhaps engage in dialogue with that image of the inner critic.

So these territories of the psyche where we're actually quite upset about something emotionally are themselves very fertile ground.

There's an important factor here that has to do with—again we've touched on this and I want to say more about it later—the importance of trusting the intelligence of the image. Perhaps even in the critic there's some kind of intelligence operating. But in images that come from other kinds of upset, there may be some kind of intelligence that the image carries and expresses—some kind of soul intelligence. We use the word telos as well—where is this pulling me, directing me, showing me the way to? That may not be clear, but there's something about trusting that this telos is operating in and through and with the image. An intelligence, a soul intelligence, a psychic intelligence is operating in and through and with the image.

This remains true even though it might seem that what's going on for us is egoic, or this image appears to be what we would tend to think of as not very noble—egoic, maybe what Buddhists would call a defilement, or something that looks strangely anti-social in its behavior within the image. Something so crucial about this: it might not fit my picture. I'm going to come back to this. It might not fit my picture in terms of the smaller frames that the mind has arrived at for deciding what's good and bad. We'll return to that.

But it's interesting here, because we have on one side, so to speak, these states of samādhi and that whole range, and states that come through emptiness practices—what we might call "states of emptiness"—on one side being quite fertile territory. Sometimes it doesn't have to be deep samādhi or really profound emptiness practices, but that whole range. And on the other side, we could say there's the whole territory of upset, feeling emotionally upset.

These two ends of the spectrum are quite fertile. Sometimes what's a little more challenging in terms of images arising—where it seems harder for images to constellate, a little less fertile—is that mid-range between the two, between these more lovely deep states of samādhi or emptiness or mettā going deep on one hand, and on the other hand, the more upset states. Sometimes the mid-range is a little more difficult in terms of spontaneous images arising.

But that's three pathways so far: the samādhi in both ways we've discussed, the emptiness practices if you're familiar with them, and thirdly, the emotions themselves when they are quite strong and perhaps there's some upset.

A fourth pathway is simply choosing an image or opening that doorway deliberately. As we've said, but just to spell it out clearly: it could be a deity, perhaps a tantric deity or Jesus or whatever, that one deliberately imagines, conjures, and then meditates on. It could be a previous image that has come spontaneously that we want to deliberately revisit, deliberately dwell with and meditate on again. It could be a dream figure or a fragment of a dream that has made quite an impression on the psyche—perhaps from the night before or even long ago—and we deliberately recall, summon up that dream figure and meditate on it as an imaginal figure.

It could be a memory that, through the way we relate to it and meditate on it, we turn into an image. And it could be a person we're meditating on—someone we know or don't know, alive or dead—where again, the way we're relating to them, the way we're meditating on them, deliberately bringing them to mind, deliberately imagining them, we're making an image out of that, or letting them become an image for the psyche.

So as I say, it could be Jesus, could be Quan Yin, could be someone like John Coltrane, who comes to me quite often. Could be Nelson Mandela, could be the beautiful Etty Hillesum, who left diaries from Nazi-occupied Holland during the Second World War and was murdered at Auschwitz. Beautiful chronicles—I know I've felt very moved reading and rereading, going back so often to her diaries.

Reading her words, one feels she is a friend—alive for me in the psyche, close, as if I had known her personally. She has become a person for me through her imaginal figure.

When we engage in deliberate imagining, in the deliberate constellating of an imaginal figure, the question of intention naturally arises—as we have touched upon several times. Why am I doing this? Is it for the cultivation of metta? Is it to seek advice from this person about a particular choice? Or is it simply because there is such profound soul resonance that we want to be with this image and discover what unfolds? There is a whole range of reasons we might engage in such practice, and this connects to our broader conceptual framework—something we have discussed and will return to again.

In terms of practice, there is the possibility of deliberately imagining and then staying with that image. This constitutes our fourth approach.

The fifth possibility involves using imagination to enter or go to a certain place where one receives images. This might mean going down a stairwell and through a door at its base into some kind of basement. This approach works powerfully for many people, though some find it uncomfortable. It could be a monastery cell—that contained space of intense practice, like an alchemical vessel for transformation. Sometimes entering such a space in the imagination becomes a place for receiving all kinds of images.

It might be a clearing in a forest, where one emerges from dense woodland into an open space, and in that clearing, perhaps other figures emerge from the forest to meet you. Maybe it's a beach—a much more open space under vast sky. It could even be an open-air corridor that one walks down, with other corridors joining at right angles, and perhaps from these side passages imaginal figures appear as you walk the central path.

The possibilities are infinite. Sometimes people cross a bridge into the realm of the imaginal.

Here I would offer not so much a caution as a differentiation, along with a stated inclination. There is a difference between entering an imaginal realm and then, within that realm, going on a shamanic journey that involves moving across great expanses of territory and meeting different figures at various points. Such an approach involves a narrative journey that tends toward the narrative image simply by virtue of moving through time over extended periods or across vast spaces.

The potential downside is that this can sometimes solidify—or has the danger of solidifying—the ego that is making the journey, the self that is undertaking this shamanic voyage. It becomes the journey of the self, versus actually being in a much smaller, contained space—a room, a clearing in a forest—with an image, and simply staying there with that image in that smaller space.

There is often less narrative structure in this approach, which allows the image to be more iconic, more poetic. There is more potential for relativizing or equalizing the relationship between self and imaginal figure. It is not so much the self's journey.

So that is the fifth approach: imaginatively entering a place of receiving images.

The sixth one—and this might sound surprising—is actually catching yourself daydreaming in meditation or at another time. Daydreaming has a way into meditative practice, paradoxically. You find yourself daydreaming, and then you notice that at a certain point in the daydream, the resonances become more pregnant, more soulful, much more meaningful than a usual daydream—which is often quite contracted, disconnected, or lacking in meaning and soulfulness.

You might be daydreaming even while sitting in meditation, and then realize that this has a different quality—there is real meaningfulness and soulfulness here. You can feel the energy opened, the energy body opened. Rather than simply cutting it off, you bring a different quality of attention to what is happening right there in that daydream, and stay with it. We transform a daydream into a meditation.

I will say more about this later, but it is indeed a possibility. I would not recommend it as your primary way of working, but rather as something to recognize opportunistically. Sometimes this will happen, and we realize that something quite important is occurring, even though for the past several minutes it was just daydreaming without any meaningfulness. Somehow a corner has been turned in the daydream, and now something is coming through it that is quite soulful and important. It feels different, and we notice the resonance and stay with that.

That would be the sixth approach.

Lastly, I want to reiterate something we mentioned—because the seventh possibility is actually to open your eyes in meditation. As I am using the word "image" on this retreat, as I said last night, the image can be the world itself, or rather, it comes wrapped up in the very sense perception of the world. It is not so much that an image is present as some inner, separate visual object—or even any kind of separate sense object—but rather something inseparable from the world we are perceiving right now.

So opening the eyes and actually seeing the world as image, imbued with everything that word means as I discussed the other night—this may or may not lead to an inner, separate imaginal object. It may do that, and that is fine if it does. But it may not. It may simply be staying with that sense of perception, the sense of the world as image. Either way is perfectly valid.

Both of them are good. So really, as I said, in a way this seventh possibility becomes one of the most important openings and dimensions of imaginal practice. Whether it leads to a separate inner image or whether it doesn't, both are good.

So that's seven possibilities there.

One last thing, more generally, and again to reiterate: probably most people on this course will be spending more time with the samadhi, with the energy body, cultivating that, attending to either developing the well-being or just tuning to what's going on in the emotional and energetic manifestation in the energy body. There'll be more time doing that.

But also, with imaginal practice, there's this sense of waiting for images to arise, and it's just really important to be patient. Once you do this a little bit, you realize that actually images can arise really suddenly in any moment. So it may seem like nothing's happening, nothing's happening, or nothing's coming if I'm waiting for some kind of image—and then it suddenly arises. Or something arises. Or it might seem like nothing is staying. There's little flotsam and jetsam in the mind. None of it really seems right or important. And then something comes, you know.

So really what I'm saying is to be patient. You're spending more time with the samadhi and the energy body and that kind of attunement anyway. But within that, within the context of imaginal practice, be patient.

And again, just a few minutes with an image—two, three minutes—can be very rich and very fruitful, and it will feel like you actually don't need or even want too much more because there's so much to resonate with and so many echoes left over from this image that you don't necessarily want this two-hour imaginal thing going on necessarily.

Again, the images may, as we said last night, come outside of the formal meditation—sitting in the lounge or the library or standing on the lawn or having a cup of tea or whatever. Just recognize and know that they can come at any time and in any place, whether that's formal or informal meditation.

And then the last thing for now, I think, is just to also sometimes not get so locked into this idea of an image as an object—as some kind of separate, discrete object. Rather, we can practice by recognizing and noticing and beginning to be interested in, even inquire a little bit or feel into: Where is image, mythos, fantasy alive for me in my life? In what dimension, in what realm of experience and perception?

And in that sense, the image is not necessarily an object—not some kind of separate object that we then perceive. So it's recognizing: in my love for this person, in my different kind of love for that person, different image, different fantasy, different mythos alive there, and entering into that, feeling that, recognizing it, and sensitizing oneself to it.

Or in my relationship to Dharma and practice, and the self on that journey, and in relationship to that tradition, and the Buddha, and whatever it is. Or a particular place. All kinds of possibilities there.

And again, this is the more deeper and subtler end of imaginal practice. And I think, in many ways, one of the more important aspects of it.

Okay, let's stop there for now. I'm going to add a little bit more later on—quite a bit more actually in terms of practice. Let's stop there for now.

CHAPTER 14

The Love and Demands of the Imaginal (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h05

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea continues examining Henri Corbin's revolutionary perspective: "not your individuation, but the angel's individuation is your task." Drawing from Hasidic and Kabbalistic traditions, Burbea outlines a twofold spiritual movement - first, dissolution in the mystical nothingness (ayin) that parallels the Buddha's teaching of the unfabricated (asaṅkhata) described in the Udāna (8.1), and second, drawing down divine influx to spiritualize perception.
>
> Burbea demonstrates how this transcendent unfabricated - beyond subject, object, space and time - appears across mystical traditions from Plotinus's "One" to the Buddha's "consciousness without attribute." He then explores Vajrayāna Buddhism's Buddha-nature as primordial wisdom awareness that sees all appearances as empty divinities, paralleling tantric practice's skillful mimicry of enlightened perception.
>
> The talk reveals how emptiness understanding enables perception's malleability, allowing imaginal practice to serve not personal healing but divine completion - what Kabbalah calls tikkun ha-olam (healing the world). Burbea frames three general demands of imaginal practice: opening consciousness to the imaginal realm beyond narrow materialism, embracing multiplicity of images rather than singular mythologies, and recognizing that image, fantasy and mythos already saturate all meaningful experience. This radical reframing positions our entire spiritual journey as service to something infinitely greater than individual liberation.

At the end of the first part of this talk, I quoted Henri Corbin when he wrote, "Not your individuation, but the angel's individuation. The individuation of the angel is your task."

We were presenting that as a radical possibility—a way of looking at imaginal figures, a way of relating to and conceiving them—a sort of reversal of perhaps what might be tempting to many of the usual ways of seeing, relating to, and conceiving of imaginal figures and their relationship with the self.

Of course, Henri Corbin was, as I think I mentioned one time, writing about actually just certain streams of the Islamic mystical tradition—people like Ibn Arabi and Avicenna and Suhrawardi. And so that phrase of Corbin really has its home or originates from those streams, certain streams, very much a minority within the Islamic mystical tradition, or the range of that. And so that is from a more—or has its context in those traditions.

And we can actually fill out a little bit and elaborate a bit more about that and then see how it might parallel with some more dharmic traditions and Buddhist traditions.

So that perspective on the angel, on the daemon, on the imaginal figure—we can fill that out a little bit and put it into a larger context, actually, from looking briefly at the Hasidic traditions. In the streams of the Hasidic tradition, the Kabbalistic tradition in Jewish mysticism, we see something there that's filled out as a kind of philosophy and practice that gives more flesh around this phrase of Corbin's.

So there they talk about, or it is taught, the encouragement and injunction of the practitioner to practice a twofold movement in relation to the divine.

The first aspect of this twofold movement is a movement towards dissolving the being, dissolving the self, dissolving the consciousness actually in the Godhead—transcending the world of self and other and the world of appearances, in fact transcending and dissolving it in the Godhead. And that Godhead, that essence of God, if you like, in this tradition is also ayin. Ayin is a Hebrew word. It means nothing or nothingness. A-Y-I-N.

So there's this movement of dissolution of self, being, world in the essence of God, which is nothingness—very much a transcendent dissolution there of the world, of appearances, and everything that goes with that.

Now, I'm going to make some parallels here with dharma teachings, classical Buddhist teachings, and right there, as I'll explain shortly, is a very classic teaching of the Buddha about cessation of consciousness in what he would call the unfabricated. So that first of the twofold movement in the Hasidic teachings has really a clear parallel in Pali Canon Buddhism and the Buddha's teaching of the deathless and the unfabricated. I'll come back to that.

So this first movement of transcending and dissolving in the mystical nothingness, the pregnant mystical nothingness of the Godhead. But the second of the twofold movement is in a way a kind of opposite movement, a movement in the opposite direction. So this was regarded as a dissolution or transcending upwards into the Godhead of the being. And then secondly, a drawing down of the divine influx from God in order to spiritualize the material world. I think those words are from either Sanford Drob or Rachel Elior, who wrote about these teachings in the Hasidic tradition—to draw down the divine influx in order to spiritualize the material world.

In other words, there isn't just the dissolution in the transcendent mystical nothingness, just the sort of disappearance of form into the absolute, but there's the drawing down from God into the world and into, as I explained, actually the perception of the world, of the divine influx to spiritualize the material world. That's using a certain way of putting it.

But included in that second aspect of the twofold movement is the idea and the fantasy of our, if you like, completing God. So that our drawing down of the divine influx is part of what, if you like, completes God or actualizes God or, in a manner of speaking, creates God. So this is a very sophisticated philosophy, if you like, that's bold enough to admit that the human being creates God in a sense.

So there's quite a lot I want to pull apart here and elaborate on and fill out, but just to draw attention to one aspect, because what's possible then with such a framework—such a conceptual framework—is the view then of practice and imaginal practice and the whole journey of practice and of life as being for God rather than for the self.

So it's possible to approach and conceive of one's practice and imaginal practice and one's whole journey as being not for the self—the completion, the actualization of the self, the individuation of the self and all that—but for God. Again, quite a radical shift in view. In other words, we are drawing down this divine influx, if we use those words, for God's sake, for the completion, actualization, creation of God.

Now, I know for some of you, just the word God doesn't compute, or even one has an aversion to it. Is it possible to actually entertain such a radical view, hold it lightly, and as I said, still potently in this kind of middle way understanding? Can I hold such a view without believing in God—the existence or the non-existence of God?

So this whole area about the divine and God—the first thing most often people jump to is, does God exist or does God not exist? And they quibble and quarrel over such notions. But actually, is it possible either to just put aside such questions and inquiries of the existence or non-existence, and just enter into holding lightly this way of seeing and way of relating? Or actually to have more sophistication, more cunning, if you like, philosophically, to see beyond such simplistic notions of existing and non-existing?

So can I have a potent sense of God, view of God, if I feel like I'm playing with this? I'm playing with it—it's light and I see it's—I'm not getting sucked into having to believe or not the existence of something, and I can—that can create a kind of platform where I can go even further and turn around the whole purpose of my practice, not for me but for God.

So I don't have to believe in existence or non-existence, and nor do I have to have a clear concept of what the divine is. Interesting that these kinds of views are entertainable without believing so rigidly in things like existence or non-existence—not a question of belief, or a question of having a clear concept of what divinity means and what God is. This is something I'm going to come back to later, but there's a possibility there of a radical shift in view.

So let's fill this out a little bit more. This ayin that we mentioned—this nothingness or nothing in Kabbalistic and Hasidic traditions—has its parallels, as I mentioned briefly, very clearly in what the Buddha talked about in the Pali Canon: the unfabricated (asankhata), the deathless, the unborn—something he usually put in negative terms, beyond anything that can be conceptualized, beyond any attributes and any qualities, something that was utterly transcendent, without qualities, without attributes.

I could give many examples from the Pali Canon where he speaks in that way. For example, from Udana 8.1: "There is that sphere where there is neither earth, nor water, nor fire, nor wind"—in other words, no materiality. "Neither sphere of infinite space, nor sphere of infinite consciousness, nor sphere of nothingness, nor sphere of neither perception nor non-perception." It's beyond even the more mystical realms of perception. "Neither this world nor the next world, neither sun nor moon. And there, I say, there is no coming and no going, no staying, no passing away, and no arising. It is without foundation, non-continuing, and objectless."

So he talks about practicing and developing skill in practice. The Buddha in the Pali Canon, as I would read it, speaks of eventually developing that skill in practice to a point where it culminates and one is actually able to enter into or open up to a cessation of perception—not just cessation of appearances and things, but cessation of perception of any kind of forming of anything: any subject, any object, any time, any space. No appearances whatsoever.

The Buddha talks about cessation of perception, the cessation of consciousness, the cessation of mind. And that doesn't mean just the cessation of thinking—it means the cessation of all subtle conceptualities of space, of time, of thing, of subject, of object. Even in the most subtle way: cessation of all appearances, as that description in the Udana and many other descriptions in the Pali Canon point to.

Sometimes he talks about cessation in very negative terms: not this, not that, this isn't there, that's not there. Occasionally he puts it in the positive—this unfabricated, this transcendent unfabricated, the parallel of what we're calling ayin. Ayin, meaning "nothing" in Hebrew, is also a negation, a negative way of expressing this essence of the ultimate.

Sometimes the Buddha puts it in the positive. For example, he talks about "consciousness without attribute." There is a sense that there is some kind of consciousness there—consciousness without attribute, without object, without end, and luminous all around. "Here water, earth, fire and air have no footing. Here long and short, subtle and gross, pleasant and unpleasant, and nama-rupa"—which means all the factors of mind and conceiving and perception—"are all destroyed." It's a transcending and going beyond all those appearances and materiality and measurement and perception and appearance.

"With the cessation of the six sense consciousnesses of smelling, tasting, touching, seeing, hearing, and thinking—with the cessation of the sixth sense consciousness, here all is destroyed." All these other perceptions are destroyed, and it's just this consciousness without attributes.

Sometimes this unfabricated is given a positive description by the Buddha, as much as possible. Most often it's given this negative language—what in the Christian mystical tradition is called the via negativa: not this, not that, beyond, beyond, beyond, the unborn, the deathless.

And occasionally the Buddha says something quite striking. Neither putting it in the negative nor the positive, he simply says: "Where all phenomena are removed, all ways of speaking are removed as well." When all appearances fade—phenomena means "appearance," actually, from the Greek—where all phenomena are removed, all ways of speaking are removed as well. In other words, there's nothing that you can really say about this transcendent unfabricated, this deathless, this unborn. It's utterly beyond words and concepts in the usual sense, which tend to base themselves on subject, object, thing, perception, space, time. The whole fabric of conceptuality is based on that, and this is beyond all that—not just beyond thinking, but beyond perception, beyond consciousness in the usual sense.

We can know this. We can know this transcendent unfabricated through practice. It's a matter of practicing in the right way. It's a matter of knowing how to move deeper into this unfabricating—how can I practice in a certain way so that the mind does not just keep fabricating appearances, self and world, the world of things and the world of space and time?

Through emptiness practices, there is a deeper and deeper unfabricating of the world of appearances. One can develop that. It's just a matter of finding that thread, those threads, and following them, developing them in practice. And we can taste this unfabricated, we can open to it. A whole different sense of existence comes out of that—of life and death, of being. It is available to us if we practice in a way that leads in that direction.

But this transcendent, unfabricated, this deathless or unborn—as the Buddha called it—has parallels in all the great mystical traditions that point to this same dimension. In Neoplatonism, they speak of "the One" in very similar terms: beyond attribute, beyond space, beyond time, transcendent. The parallels are striking.

Plotinus, the father of Neoplatonism, articulated this with remarkable precision. Neoplatonism was probably one of the most influential mystical philosophies that ever existed. It grew out of the classical Greek era and pervaded Western thought in countless ways, shaping so much of Western mystical practice, religious thinking, and entire domains of Western sensibility. Plotinus declared: "Even being cannot be there." Even being cannot exist in this unfabricated, transcendent One. It is beyond being and non-being.

This teaching echoes powerfully in the Pali Canon, where Sariputta explains to another monk that this cessation of consciousness, this total unfabricating of perception, transcends all categories. You cannot say there is something there. You cannot say there is nothing there. You cannot say there is both something and nothing there. You cannot say there is neither something nor nothing there. Plotinus points to something beyond even the most basic, subtle, non-verbal conceptuality of existence and being.

In Gnostic teaching—another stream within the Western spiritual tradition—we find similar expressions regarding this transcendent aspect of the divine: "Nor is he something that exists that one could know. But he is something else that is better, whom one cannot know. He has non-being existence." Notice how language struggles here to articulate what can be tasted and known through practice, yet cannot be conveyed through conventional perception bounded by space, time, and the usual framework of subject and object. It is not even oneness—not a sense of everything being one—but something beyond that.

The fourteenth-century Jewish Kabbalist David Ben Abraham Halavaan expressed this beautifully: "This nothingness, this 'I am,' is more existent than all the being in the world." This statement parallels very strongly how I read the Buddha's teaching of the unfabricated and the deathless.

When we learn to practice in this way, we begin by undoing grosser fabrication. Take papañca, for instance—this proliferative, ego-driven mental elaboration that creates so much suffering. Through mindfulness and skillful practice, we learn to untie this knot.

We realize: "Oh, that whole perception I was experiencing in that state of mind—that's fabrication." This recognition of gross-level fabrication becomes obvious in hindsight. We see how constructed and fabricated our entire way of perceiving ourselves, others, and situations really was, and we learn how to undo it.

But this is just the beginning. Following this thread deeper through practice, we ask: Can I unfabricate further? Can there be even less fabrication? What else is fabricated in this world of appearances? We learn how the world of appearances—self, other, and world—are fabricated, and how to unfabricate them by removing different kinds of clinging and developing skill in this process.

Eventually, layer by layer, we see: this is fabricated, and that's fabricated too—even what seemed so basic and real. Even more fundamental levels reveal themselves as fabricated. Through this understanding, we can go all the way to the unfabricated. Not to live there permanently, because that's impossible—it's a realm of non-manifestation, non-appearance—but by moving in that direction in practice, we understand that all appearances are fabricated: space as perception, time, self, other, world, solidity—all fabrication.

Reaching toward the unfabricated, we understand the relative reality of everything else. We can speak meaningfully of what is less fabricated versus more fabricated, what is more real versus less real. This is why David Ben Abraham's words ring true: this nothingness, this unfabricated, "is more existent than all the being in the world." It is more real because it is unfabricated.

These parallels appear clearly throughout the great mystical traditions—this first aspect of the twofold movement I'm presenting. In Hasidism, it's the transcending, the dissolution in the Godhead. In Christian mysticism, it's the essence of the Godhead in mystical nothingness. All point toward this same transcendent, unfabricated dimension.

What about the second aspect, this drawing down of the divine influx and this idea or fantasy of completing and creating God? Here, we may need to look to Vajrayana Buddhism for a more fully fleshed out understanding, where the ultimate is not regarded as purely transcendent, unfabricated, without appearances, qualities, or attributes.

In Vajrayana Buddhism, the ultimate—while people use different vocabularies—is Buddha nature in some schools. This Buddha nature is replete with qualities, full of beautiful qualities, not devoid of manifestation, appearance, or expression. This Vajrayana ultimate is a primordial wisdom awareness that is empty, yet ultimate because it represents how a Buddha sees—the wisdom awareness of a Buddha that is primordial and cosmic in nature.

We possess this Buddha nature within us, or it forms part of the deep fabric of our being, though it may be covered over. It too is understood to be empty, yet impossible to completely comprehend or fit into neat concepts. We can say it is a kind of awareness—a seeing and knowing that perceives everything as empty, but not merely empty. It also sees all things as divine.

This awareness sees all things, including oneself, others, objects, the world, and the cosmos as divine, as deities. Yet this awareness is not separate from what is seen. It encompasses both the subjective aspect—the awareness itself—and the objects that are seen, the divinities that are manifested. It is both the seeing and the seen: the seeing of everything and everyone, including oneself, as empty divinity, and the objects being seen. The awareness remains inseparable from the divinities and objects seen and manifested.

Tantric practice is regarded as a skillful mimicry of this Buddha mind, this primordial wisdom awareness. It involves entering into or supporting, for a period of time, that view which sees everything as empty divinity—where both the awareness and what is seen, the world and beings, are perceived as empty and divine.

The second Dalai Lama, in his mystical verses, describes the experience of the practitioner: "The world is seen as the mystical mandala and all living beings as tantric deities. Everything that one eats and drinks becomes transformed into blissful ambrosia. All of one's activities become spiritual, regardless of how they conventionally appear. And every sound that one makes becomes part of a great Vajrasana."

This tantric practice rests entirely on an understanding of emptiness. This wisdom awareness is empty. Everything perceived—all material objects, space, and time—are understood to be empty. The deities perceived in practice are also regarded as empty emanations of this primordial wisdom awareness, which is itself emptiness. The whole framework depends on understanding emptiness, not a concretized or reified view.

Often people discuss tantra or believe they're practicing it without having developed the view of emptiness sufficiently. True practice involves emptiness meditation—developing skill with emptiness meditation deeper, wider, and more fully. The understanding arising from emptiness meditations and the developing skills allow tantric practice to unfold more completely, enabling the ways of looking that constitute tantric practice to be explored and experienced as palpable perceptions.

Through understanding emptiness and developing skill in emptiness practice, the world of perception—self, other, and things—becomes much more malleable. Understanding it as empty, not independent of our way of looking, allows us to play with perspective. The world of self, other, and appearances becomes malleable and can be seen as divine, as those beautiful verses from the second Dalai Lama describe.

For most people, the more skill and understanding of the thorough emptiness of everything one develops, the more perception becomes flexible. It becomes a natural outflow of that understanding to see the world—things, self, other, bodies, and cosmos—as divine.

This too has parallels in Western mystical traditions. The Dov Ber, the Maggid of Meserach, a great Jewish mystic of the eighteenth century, said: "First, each thing must arrive at the level of ayin, the level of mystical nothingness, this unfabricated transcendent. Only then can it become something else."

In other words, when I see its emptiness, its equivalence with nothingness, its non-separation from the unfabricated, then it can become something else. Knowing its emptiness, perception becomes malleable, and it can become divine in perception.

One of his disciples said: "When one attains the level of gazing at ayin, gazing at this mystical, unfabricated nothing, the essence of the Godhead, one's citta is annihilated." The translation I have speaks of intellect being annihilated, but let's use the word citta. In that moment of seeing the unfabricated, of knowing it and dissolving in it...

The mind is annihilated, he says—the intellect, the mind, the citta is annihilated. But that doesn't mean just a quietening of thinking. It means, as I said before, the whole of conventional cognition. Any perception, any appearance, any typical consciousness—even beyond all the jhānas, all the eight jhānas—all that's annihilated. All the subtle conceptuality, non-verbal, non-thinking, all the conceptuality that goes on as part of what fabricates perception and appearance, all of that is quietened.

Buddhist practice, through the skill in unfabricating, is a bit like that game Kerplunk, or I've forgotten the other names of it, where you have those sticks or a house of cards. Instead of pulling out one card and hoping that the house of cards remains, you're actually pulling out this and that stick or card, and then at some point the whole thing collapses, the whole edifice of appearances collapses, and there is a transcending of the whole world of appearances.

So the Magi's disciple: when one attains the level of gazing at Ayin, one's citta is annihilated. One's whole cognition and perception and conceptuality, even the subtle, is annihilated. Afterwards, when one returns to the citta, to the whole realm of perception, of conception, mind, and the perception that comes out of subtle conceptuality, afterwards, when one returns to the citta, it is filled with divine emanation.

So again, this mirrors what should be the platform and the support of tantric practice—that there's this deep understanding of fabrication and emptiness, and one, if you like, plunges into that emptying. And then on emerging, the mind is flooded, if you like, with this knowing of the emptiness of all things. There's a malleability, and it's possible to see everything as divine. Actually, that will be the natural outflow of that.

So this, again, in Buddhist practice—this developing skill in unfabricating and understanding the implications—it's not just about the experience of this unfabricated, it's about understanding what that implies about the fabrication of appearances, or in other Buddhist language, the dependent arising of appearances, understanding that they're empty. And that opens up a door, if you like, or a realm of the malleability of perception, of appearance, the possibility of a range of appearances, and the ability for a sense of the divine to be part of perception in all kinds of ways.

In the more theistic framework of the Abrahamic religions, God is regarded as infinite. And so because God is infinite, his aspects are infinite—they're inexhaustible. So not just transcendent—actually the aspects, the manifestations, the expressions, the faces of God are infinite, inexhaustible. But all this, when we frame it this way, all this has to do with perception. Perception, perception. Everything hinges on perception.

As I've said several times on this retreat, one possibility is actually relating to the whole teaching of the Four Noble Truths and this teaching of clinging as a key element to unlock, if you like, the secrets and the doors of perception and appearance, and recognize emptiness, and then see what's now possible. Now that I know that everything is empty, or to the degree that I see that everything is empty, what does it free up in terms of perception?

And of course, practically speaking, the advantage of putting all this—whether it's tantric practice or imaginal practice or these practices from the Jewish mystical tradition or the Islamic tradition, whatever—the advantage of framing it in terms of emptiness, or seeing image as image, whatever language one uses, is that one can play with perception this way, play with this perception of divinity. And even the divinity coming through one, through one's personhood—not just that one's fabric is the same stuff as everyone else's fabric and everything else's fabric in the great oneness of things, not just that kind of divinity. I'll say more about this tomorrow, hopefully.

But the ability to perceive that divinity, knowing it's all empty, knowing self and other and all things are empty, and this appearance too, this divinity too, is empty—it's understood. And that way there's much less danger of what Jung would call inflation, or the ego getting grandiose ideas, puffing itself up and all that.

To return to the Jewish mystical tradition, the Kabbalistic tradition, particularly the Lurianic Kabbalah of Isaac Luria and what came out of that—they have this beautiful concept, Tikkun HaOlam, which translates to something like healing of the world. And the movement, the encouragement, the injunction as part of practice to heal the world—what does that mean? Dana and loving-kindness and all that, of course, part of that. What does it mean, the healing of the world, the healing of our planet, the care for the other species, the care for the fate of this world? But even wider than that, what does it mean to heal the world, heal the cosmos? It's a beautiful, rich, deep, fertile concept that's there in the Lurianic Kabbalah and elsewhere in Jewish mysticism.

But this movement of Tikkun HaOlam, of healing the world, is actually regarded in the Lurianic Kabbalah as part of God. It's an aspect of God. It's a human movement, but it's part of God. It's part of the Ein Sof, which means literally "without end"—the endless, the infinite. So the Tikkun HaOlam, the human healing of the world, is part of God, of the infinity of God.

And as I mentioned in another talk, part of this Tikkun HaOlam, part of the healing of the world, happens through, in the Jewish mystical tradition, particularly the Lurianic Kabbalah and others, through the interpretation of, in that case, the holy texts of the Bible and the Zohar and other holy texts. In other words, the healing, the Tikkun HaOlam, which is part of God, happens through the interpretation of what is holy, but also the interpretation of the world, the reading, if you like, of the text of the world, if we use postmodern language. And that human interpretation is part of this movement of God. Why? Because God and the soul and the human are not separate.

In the same way that Buddha-nature as that empty primordial wisdom awareness is not separate from us—it's, so to speak, in us, part of the fabric of our being. We are not separate from our Buddha-nature. So that when we interpret—if you interpret a sacred text that way, we interpret, so to speak, the world that way—that's actually God. It's part of the movement of God, so to speak seeing through your eyes.

But more than seeing through your eyes, shaping perception. Seeing in a certain way. Not just seeing in general—we could say that—but seeing in certain ways through one's eyes. Seeing this or that, that way or this way. Seeing imaginally.

For Corbin, he conceived of the faculty of the imagination. The imaginal is not just a human faculty, but actually in some ways continuous with, if you like, God's imagination, God's creativity. So images in the sense that we've been using that word—images are regarded as influxes, as part of the divine influx. They're not just me and my imagination. There's something divine, as I said, they have their roots in some way in the divine, or they mirror or echo divinity.

And so this word interpretation, we really stretch it to mean, to stretch it to become perception. As I say, everything hinges on perception.

So this drawing down of the divine happens—that I mentioned is the second aspect of this Hasidic teaching of the twofold movement. One is the transcendence and the other is the drawing down of the divine in order to spiritualize the material world. That happens certainly through acts and through what we do in the world—the generosity and the kindness and what we manifest—but it also happens through interpretation, in other words, through perception.

How do I perceive this world? My perceiving of it in this way or that way, my perceiving of this as holy, my seeing this person as a theophany, as a face of God or an angel. My seeing of the world and the sacredness of it and its non-separateness from God and its particular manifestation as a particular aspect of God. So not losing the particular there. These ways of perceiving are part of the divine drawing down, drawing down of the divine.

And that includes the imagination, as Corbin was saying. The fantasies and the images, when they're alive for us in this soulful way, is also this—we could see it as a drawing down of the divine, as part of it, through the imagination.

So this range of perception is part of this drawing down of the divine, because in this other language God is infinite and the aspects of God are infinite and inexhaustible. The range of perception can open up infinitely—our perception—and that's part of the expanding of God. So this tikkun olam, healing of the world, is also, in a way, the completion of God, the filling out of God, the actualization of God through our acts, and more importantly, through our perceptions and through the marrying—or, what word would I say there—like the flowing together, the imbuing of the perception with the imagination. The imagination coming into like water, mixing with water. Imagination and perception.

And this opening out is part of the divine drawing down. It's part of the healing, the completion, the actualization of God. Do you understand? We could say the healing of the world—tikkun olam—is actually the healing of God, if we use that language.

But again, I want to put this in this more radical view. There's a lot of pieces to this. I appreciate that. It might be difficult to follow all the threads and how they fit together. But coming back to something I said earlier, when I see things this way, then the whole practice with images and imaginal practice and my whole practice, my whole life even, can be seen as for God. It's for the sake of God, not for the sake of myself. Because this expansion of the perception is part of the drawing down of the divine. And it's also part of the tantric seeing. So it's for the sake of this, if you like, the primordial wisdom or the tantric deities, the deities that are perceived in that way, the divinities.

There's something, as I said, radical in the shift. I'm seeing all this, I'm conceiving of it, I'm sensing it as for God's sake, not for the sake of self, my journey, etc.

And when one begins to open to this kind of way of conceiving, if it attracts one, if one is attracted by it, one also then begins to realize that with regard to the demand of imaginal figures or the sense of the demands they make on us, we could say that God or the gods or however we're going to put it, they're always going to be bigger than me because they're infinite and they're bigger than my life's possibilities. So there's a kind of infinitude here.

Again, I talked in other talks and other retreats about this pothos, this aspect of eros, this kind of infinite longing. There's always more. There's always something on the horizon or beyond the horizon that one is moving towards. So this way of conceiving in relation to imaginal figures also incorporates that or opens to that sense. So I might feel this or that demand from images and I realize I cannot possibly manifest all this in my life. There's too many.

God is always bigger than my life and its possibilities. The gods are always bigger because they are infinite, and that is good. For in a way, what it also means is that there is no end to soulmaking. There is no end to this eros and psyche opening each other and deepening each other.

So the imaginal sense expands, the sense of the divine expands, and there is more love and more. And that love, that eros, expands the psyche further and the logos with it. And that process doesn't end—this expansion and penetrating deeper, this opening and growth, this insemination, this fertilization of eros, psyche, and logos. There is no end to that, no end to soulmaking.

So if with an imaginal figure, or an angel, or daemon, or however we're going to talk about it, or with the sense of God or gods—whatever words we use—we're entertaining this sense of telos, this sense of the God or the angel or the daemon drawing me toward something, there, as Corbin talks about, is the angel out ahead. But it's open-ended. That angel is always out ahead. I never really, if you like, merge with it or finish it. It is always out ahead.

I remember when I was very young and learning to swim in the sea in Italy, and my father would stand—I don't know, five yards away—and face me and say, "Come, swim toward me." And I would start paddling as best I could. And I was sure he was moving backwards, imperceptibly stepping backwards to get me to keep swimming. And I would protest that: "You're moving backwards!" He said, "No, no, no, I'm not." I think he was. But that's the angel out ahead. It's not a static figure that we at some point reach. There's this open-endedness to the telos. There's a direction. There's a drawing toward, a beckoning toward, a glimpse of something we're moving toward. The telos—this end, this Greek word for end or goal—is open-ended. The soulmaking never ends because the psyche, the image, keeps expanding, getting deeper, getting richer, getting broader. And the eros, the movement toward that, grows with that.

This telos is part of where we're headed, or the sense of goal, of end there. It's part of the meaningfulness in all this. Part of the meaningfulness. Nietzsche, I think it's in Twilight of the Idols, says or writes at one point: "If we possess our why in life, we can put up with almost any how." No matter how difficult or challenging something is for us in our lives—whatever it is, in any realm of being—if we have a why, if we possess our why in life, as he says... if our why is serving something greater, if our why, in Corbin's words, is the individuation of the angel, if this path and this practice and my life is for God and not myself, then that's a big why. It's a big part of the telos and the meaningfulness. And then all kinds of things are possible. We can put up with almost any how, he says, Nietzsche.

To come back to what I threw out earlier: What does healing mean then? When we open up the framework this way—and I realize, I hope this makes sense, I realize it's quite perhaps difficult to understand, especially if you're new to all this and talking about emptiness and things—but what then, if we open up this kind of conceptual framework as a loose conceptual framework, not a belief, not a rigidity, but a loose conceptual framework to be entertained... what then does healing mean?

Who's getting healed here? Is it me? Is it the angel? Is it the soul? Is it God? Is it the healing of perception and cosmology? Healing them from being conceived of as individual and inflexible. Healing them by allowing a flexibility into perception, an opening of perception, a flexibility into cosmology, an opening of that. Rather than this rigid narrowness of "this is true." This what I perceive is true. This one, not that one. Not anything else.

Who is getting healed here? What does healing mean? Me, the angel, soul, God, perception, cosmology—all of those? Are they even separate?

Are they even separate?

Just to finish, we can feel, in relation to demands and the demands that we sometimes sense or feel from an imaginal figure—from an angel or daemon—we can feel a kind of individual demand particular to that daemon. It's quite unique. But in a way, coming out of all this, we could also highlight or draw attention to three more general demands that emerge from imaginal practice. They're connected, they're not really separate, but let's just highlight them.

One is actually the demand to open the psyche to the imaginal realm, to open consciousness to that realm—the realm of the imaginal—and to value it. The more we practice with images, the more we sense that there's that kind of demand to open consciousness to that realm and to value it. Wrapped up in that is a demand to open up consciousness and our sense of value beyond a sort of narrow singularity of view, of conceptual framework, of logos.

Through practicing with the imaginal in the ways we've been discussing, there's a kind of invitation to move beyond any view—but especially the dominant cultural view nowadays, which is a sort of simplistic materialism, a flattening of everything. Everything is just matter. Consciousness emerges as an epiphenomenon of matter. Leave matter alone long enough, and it will eventually form primeval swamp soups, and out of that life will come, and out of that life consciousness will come. There's nothing but materialism—there's nothing but matter. Everything can be reduced to the movements of matter in space and time. That's what neuroscience attempts to do—explaining everything about our human existence through the assumption that everything can be explained in purely neurological terms, neuroscientific terms, as just the movement of matter. We can just find the right neural networks, discover what gets fired, and that will explain everything. Everything can be reduced to that, and through that to just matter.

I'll say more about this tomorrow. It's very potent as a view, and wonderful things have come out of that. But first, it's limited and limiting. Second, for now, it's a singularity of view. And it's that singularity of view that's problematic—the singularity of conceptual framework. Something problematic there.

So again, drawing on the Kabbalistic tradition where many streams—not all, but many—point to the infinitely interpretable nature of teachings and sacred texts. They don't mean one thing. They're infinitely interpretable, as we've said a few times. But also the world and everything in the world is infinitely interpretable. There's a stretching rather than just a singularity of conceptual framework and perception—an opening to different possibilities of conceptual frameworks, not regarding any of them as simply the truth. With that comes the opening of perception, the range of perception, the malleability of perception, the availability of different ways of perceiving.

Zen teacher Joan Halifax wrote a book on shamanism many years ago. I'm quoting Robert Avens now, writing about Joan Halifax's work. In shamanistic rituals, the neophyte—the novice—becomes a soft man being, a kind of androgyne, neither male nor female, whose essential mission is to be an intermediary between the cosmological planes of earth and sky. Can you see how that parallels what we're talking about? This essential mission to be an intermediary between cosmological planes involves the shaman in the constant practice of transformation, as if moving from one point of view to another provides the experimental ground of understanding, of wisdom, of true perspective.

That's what I want to highlight—this moving from one point of view to another, from one way of looking, from one conceptual framework, one perception. Moving from one point of view to another provides the experimental, the practical ground of understanding, of wisdom, of true perspective. That's part of the demand, the general invitation of imaginal practice.

A second demand, very related and not separate from the first, is the invitation to open to the multiplicity of images and mythoi and fantasy—rather than being locked into one. How easily, as human beings, without even realizing it, we buy into one fantasy or one image or one myth without seeing that we don't have to be locked into it. Being locked into it and taking it literally creates all kinds of problems. There's no freedom there.

In classical mythology, Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Maenads—wild disciples of Dionysus—for his sole worship of Apollo. Because he worshipped just one god, one archetype, one image, they tore him to pieces. You can see the fragmentation there, the tearing apart.

Jung was fond of saying that gods have become diseases. When we don't open to the range and multiplicity of gods or archetypes or myths or fantasies or images—whether in terms of the self or awakening or anything else—that limits us. Particularly regarding the self, the gods we have neglected, the archetypes we have neglected to honor, to recognize, to give place to, will manifest as some kind of psychological disease, or sometimes organic disease. Maybe it's not just individuals—maybe traditions can also suffer from this shrinking of archetypal range within them, this shrinking of the sense of what is divine, and how that limits and causes problems.

So the opening to multiplicity of image—that's also one of the general demands or invitations of imaginal practice.

Thirdly, again connected, and I have mentioned this before, is the invitation or encouragement that comes out of imaginal practice to begin to realize, to recognize, to acknowledge that image, fantasy, mythos saturate life already. Our life is saturated by image, fantasy, mythos. Wherever there's love, wherever there's meaningfulness, wherever there's that richness and sense of soulfulness—there, there is image, fantasy, mythos. It saturates life.

We could go further and say that not realizing this is a kind of ignorance. If I don't realize the presence already of image, fantasy, and mythos in my life, there's a kind of ignorance there.

When I begin to realize this—that image, fantasy, and mythos are already woven into how I see the Dharma itself, how I relate to awakening—then my entire conception of ignorance must expand. Since awakening means the end of ignorance, this understanding needs to broaden to encompass this recognition: that image, fantasy, and mythos saturate everything, including my ideas of Dharma, of myself, of awakening itself.

I've explored this elsewhere and won't elaborate extensively now, but this realization offers us—or perhaps imposes upon us—a fundamentally different ground for our being. We discover that we are, in essence, grounded in imagination, grounded in mythos. When we truly realize or feel this, our entire life rests upon different foundations. The Dharma itself rests upon different foundations when we come to this recognition.

These, then, are some of the broader demands or invitations that emerge through imaginal practice—not merely techniques or methods, but fundamental shifts in how we understand the very nature of our existence and spiritual path.

CHAPTER 15

The Love and Demands of the Imaginal (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> In this opening talk from his Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea distinguishes between images and mere metaphors, emphasizing that true imaginal figures possess autonomy, aliveness, and the capacity to communicate love and demands to practitioners. Drawing on personal accounts from retreat participants, he illustrates how imaginal encounters can facilitate healing - from childhood trauma to spiritual development - while cautioning against reducing images to simple psychological projections. Burbea explores the complex territory where practitioners sense demands from imaginal figures, examining when these serve genuine spiritual growth versus ego desires. He addresses the delicate balance of seeing 'image as image' while honoring their apparent autonomy and reality, touching on how this work relates to addiction, pathology, and archetypal necessity. The talk emphasizes the middle way of understanding images as both dependently arisen and meaningfully real, neither dismissing them as 'just imagination' nor literalizing them fundamentally. Burbea introduces the radical possibility that our task may be serving the individuation of imaginal figures rather than our own ego development, pointing toward a view where humans become 'doors for what wants to come through.'

Hopefully it should be very clear by now that when we use a word like "image," I'm indicating something much more in scope than what might be indicated by a word like "metaphor." An image in the way that I'm using it is much more than a metaphor, at least the way we tend to use the word metaphor nowadays.

Looking up the word "metaphor" in my dictionary, it gives an example: "he is a lion in battle." But that kind of expression is not really an image so much as—you might as well say, "he's very ferocious when it comes to fighting." You could simply replace it with an adjective such as "ferocious." It's not an image in the way that I mostly want to indicate and open up the meaning of that word.

In the metaphor as used that way, there isn't the sense of aliveness that this image, this imaginal figure, has—some kind of life and autonomy of its own, some kind of reality, importance, depth and richness of its own being. There isn't what it fertilizes in the psyche in terms of meaningfulness, the love that can pass between the self and the imaginal figure, the sense of necessity and the demands that imaginal figures can seem to bring to us or offer to us. None of that is really there in a metaphor in the way that we usually use the word. So an image is much, much more than a metaphor.

Going into this a little further, what I want to explore and open out a bit more are these aspects of the imaginal: the aspects of love and necessity and demand from imaginal figures, the way they might love us, the way they might place demands on us or seem to. We use those words—love, necessity, demand—and we sense them as we're working with images in imaginal practice, on or off the cushion. We sense a demand, sense their love, sense the necessity of this imaginal figure or image.

We sense it, and as I've already said, we also acknowledge and recognize that it's sensed and it's given this sense. We give, through our way of looking, through the conceptual framework, we give the sense of demand to the image that we then feel from the image. In other words, the conceptual framework and the way of looking constellate the sense of the demand, of the love, of the necessity. We sense it and we know that it's given by the way of looking. It's never independent of the way of looking, of the conceptual framework. So we understand: yes, dependent arising; yes, empty.

But there's power there in that balance of understanding. We're not saying, "Ah, it's not real because I'm just making it up." Nor are we losing sight of the fact that it's a dependent arising, dependent on the mind, conceptual framework, way of looking. Right there in that middle way, there's a lot of power and aliveness without the concreteness and the literalizing and the tightening around fundamentalist beliefs around all this.

Again, I would say it's impossible to prove. How would you even begin to prove that this imaginal figure is, so to speak, really placing a demand on me or really loves me? We're not in the realm of the provable. We're not relating to this in terms of its reality status in the way that we would relate to a scientific reality. We're not approaching it in terms of propositions that are provable or not by experiment.

So the kind of truth, the kind of reality these images have are not scientific-style truths, scientific-style realities—at least classical science, pre-quantum. They're not even quantum-style truths or realities. It's more like art. The whole thing is more like art. We're not in the realm of the provable. We're entertaining conceptual frameworks and seeing what effects, what opens, what is given birth to, what is fertilized. Which direction do things go when I entertain this conceptual framework and entertain the idea of love and demand from imaginal figures?

As I said before, we can entertain different conceptual frameworks. We could entertain the idea, hold the conceptual framework in regard to an image, that this image represents this or that quality or aspect of being that is not yet available to myself—something that I haven't yet developed in myself or grown into. This quality, this psychological quality, will be helpful to me and balancing for me, balance out other qualities that are available to me or maybe are too strong. In a way, the image represents something that is for the growth of the self, the psychological or spiritual growth of the self. In that sense, they can be integrated.

Many contemporary psychologists would approach imaginal work with the imagination with that kind of conception. And it's really okay and fine. If that's what you feel comfortable with, go for it. But as I've also pointed out many times, there will be limits to that kind of view. It's a limited and limiting view if we only conceive of images that way. Certainly sometimes that's a perfectly helpful and appropriate way, but there are also other possibilities which to me are more radical and more interesting. So yes, fine to look at it that way, but it's not the only way. To regard things only that way would be limited and limiting.

Sometimes a spontaneous image arises for a person with loving demands, and those loving demands are clearly healing for the human self. There are so many examples I could share of that. The demand from the image is something that's clearly in the service of the human self and its growth.

Someone on retreat, quite a while ago now, a few years, was sharing something of their history and then what happened in their meditation. When they were a little girl in the early 1950s, they had a serious accident. They were in hospital for some weeks, strapped down immobile on the hospital bed. In the early fifties, the way the medical system worked, if a child was in hospital they would not let the parents visit. The parents were not allowed to visit her. She was very young, in hospital, strapped down, immobile on the bed.

Decades later, decades later in meditation here, she heard a voice, so to speak...

She was told to stand up from the meditation and then lie down. So she did that. And then the image or the sense—it was a more kinesthetic sense rather than visual—the sense of someone untying, loosening and cutting her restraints, the restraints that were strapping her down on the bed. And it was both gentle, this undoing, and also forceful at times. Sometimes it was gentle, sometimes it was forceful. But there was a great sense of release in that, the release from being strapped down.

Very, very powerful. And then afterwards, sitting outside the meditation hall, sitting looking at the trees and the grass, there were tears. The healing was really flowing in her being, and tears were there. And an image of a baby held, protected, loved, peaceful, in a peaceful holding, totally content. And she stayed with that and the beauty of that image. She could actually feel and taste a drop of breast milk on her lips. So sweet, she said, so beautiful.

So here's an image very much related to a memory. And the demand—stand up, lie down—and then this undoing, very much on the dimension, if you like, of the human self and the healing of the human self of past wounding trauma.

To give another example, someone was relating to me that they were a long-term student of Thich Nhat Hanh and had exposure to him through film and meeting him and his teachings over the years, and felt the image of him and the felt sense of him. "I could feel it in my body," she said. But really, what was specific about this image, in this case of Thich Nhat Hanh, was the sense of his inner authority. That inner authority that he had in his being, coming out of his devotion and alignment—continual devotion and alignment over the years to what was important to him, what was deeply most important to him.

And that sense of his inner authority in the image, through the image, helped her to connect to hers. And with that was this sense of a loving demand, a sense of Thich Nhat Hanh expecting her—that was her word—expecting her to step into that authority for herself. The authority, if you like, over her mind and the authority over what is being chosen, what she chose to cultivate in the present moment: awakefulness, care, loving-kindness, aliveness. So this benign authority was constellated in the image of Thich Nhat Hanh with this loving demand from his image. And she felt that aspect, that loving demand work on her. It was doing something in her being and very, very helpful on her path.

So certainly sometimes the loving demands come from the images and they're operating very much for the growth of the human, if you like. But as I said, we need to be a bit careful here. Sometimes what happens is the ego, if we use that word, wants to make a demand of the image. So the demand is from me to the image.

Someone was sharing of this image of a tramp, and they could see that they weren't a tramp in their life at all, but they could see there was something of that outcast and the loneliness and the isolation and the being shut out and the being impoverished and the being looked down on and the disdain that they constellated as this image. And they could also see somehow the mirroring in their life of that.

The impulse—very understandable—of this man in relation to this image, who hadn't done a lot of imaginal work, was actually, "Oh, well, let's invite that tramp into the..." There was an image: he's looking through a window onto a family gathering and it's all cozy and warm with the fire there. And he's outside looking in, something he's shut out of. Very understandable that the inclination was, "Let's let him in there, or let's give him a friend, or let's give him better clothes or something, bring him in from the cold."

Maybe that's important in a way, that movement, the movement of the demand from the self to the image at times. But yet, as he was telling me about this image, I was also struck by the fact that in the image of Christ, Christ is also something of a destitute, a wanderer, an outcast. There's something about the holiness of the image itself. Somehow in this tramp, maybe if I look deeper, I see Christ. And it doesn't need to suddenly then become shiny and radiant and clean—all the dirt off his clothes and his face. It's something in the complexity. The poor one, the outcast, the one looked down on, is the Christ, is the Holy One.

Very easily that's hard for the ego to understand. It's hard for the usual self to understand, especially when it's connected or one feels the pain of the mirroring of this image in one's life, and so I want things to be different. It's complex.

But really what I'm saying is, it's tricky here to be sensitive to what are the demands of the image and what are they serving? And if I make demands on the image, what is that serving and who is that serving and who is it healing? I don't think there's a right and a wrong here. And certainly talking with this person, I was very tentative. I didn't know; I was just voicing something really.

So yes, sometimes be careful of the demand from the self to the image. But it's tricky. And sometimes what happens is a person is in the image that's happening, that is going on, is themselves.

One sees oneself as an image or in an imaginal interaction in a constellation, but one has entered it so fully that one has actually become part of the image. The self-sense has become an imaginal self differently. And then the demand from that imaginal self is maybe not so much the usual self-ego demand.

As an example, someone was telling me not too long ago they were on a retreat where the teacher was leading a compassion guided meditation, offering as a possibility that one could use a figure like Avalokiteshvara or Quan Yin or Jesus and see them, imagine them as the source of the compassion. The teacher said at one point in this guided meditation, "If it feels okay, put this person, this deity or human person that's the source of the compassion, put them behind you in space so that they are radiating to you from behind. They're radiating that compassion to you from the direction behind."

For this person sharing with me, that image of Avalokiteshvara or Jesus behind soon became her lover. It was the image of her lover behind her. And then a lot of eros, an erotic charge, came into the whole image. And then her lover was entering her sexually. And then it took on a whole other level—then the lover was removing her skin. She said, like unzipping her skin and peeling her skin off and plunging his hands into her blood and her flesh and pulling her heart out and putting it in his mouth. She said this felt incredibly blissful, not grotesque or scary, but very, very blissful.

In that case she had become image herself, had entered into the image fully. So she said to her lover in the image, "Take me apart, take me apart," in this kind of physical erotic loving way. And the lover took out one of her eyes and then the other and placed them in his mouth. She was feeling that she was being emptied in this way. The lover was emptying her in this way—very blissful, very erotic. And that was happening from behind.

In front of her was the image of her brother and his suffering, and what she called his density—density of being in his suffering—in comparison with the bliss and the emptiness that she was feeling through this erotic compassion that was coming through. That bliss and emptiness came into contact with the suffering of her brother in the image, like a healing contact of compassion, as we've talked about. It's the contact, the putting in connection of the healing qualities with the suffering.

But there wasn't much conscious will going on. It was almost like this was just happening—this movement from behind with the eros suffusing the compassion and the emptying out and the bliss, and all that was coming into contact with the person suffering as a stream of compassion with a particular flavor.

There's a lot there actually in that image, and I hope in the not too distant future to talk much more about eros in relation to the imaginal. But really the point was that although sometimes we need to be careful of the demands of the self towards an image—if we still want to retain the soulfulness aspect, the soul-making aspect, as opposed to prioritizing the self-growth aspect—sometimes we need to be careful about the demands of the self to the image. But sometimes what happens is one sees oneself as image, or one is so much in the image that one can trust the demands and say, "Take me apart." That was the demand of the self: "Take me apart" to this lover and the eros of the situation, the holy fleshiness of the situation, erotic dismembering and emptying. One could, in that case, trust that demand of the self, because the self was so much part of the fabric of the image. It wasn't the usual self-stance.

Sometimes we feel or sense a demand from an image, from an imaginal figure, and it can feel like it's stretching us to accept that demand, to bow to it, to take it on. It feels like it stretches us. There's some kind of trial there. It involves maybe a trial, and there's the discomfort of being stretched and the trial of that.

Maybe the image and the imaginal figure, what's implicit there and the demand—or where they take us, or just being in contact with them—they take us beyond the circumference of the world that we know and the social scene that we know, or the dharma scene that we know, or the culture or community. Beyond that community's ideas and range of acceptable behavior and whole worldview. We might move on. The image is showing us something, pulling us towards something, and we're moving out, breaking through the circumference, the limits of that worldview and that culture and that community, moving on.

And so there might be, if that's the case—as it is in some cases—a kind of loneliness on the human or social level that comes out of the demand, or taking on or accepting the demand of an image.

Sometimes it's the opposite. It might be that actually something in this image is calling us in to more relationship where we actually feel like that would be too much work or too much hassle, or "I don't really feel inclined to enter deeper into the community that way and take up a certain position in the community of responsibility or centrality or something." But there's a demand, generally speaking, and it can be that it feels quite a stretch. Something in us is being stretched, again, beyond the usual range of the self or the ego, if we use those words.

And again, to really make this clear, a demand like that, or any demand, is not inherent in the image, really. We are choosing a conceptual framework when we talk about demands this way. We're choosing a conceptual framework that nourishes, deepens, enriches, widens, supports soulfulness, soul-making, and the beauty and the meaningfulness and all of that. So that's really what we're doing. It's not inherent, this demand. We're choosing a conceptual framework that incorporates that—a conceptual framework that supports the soul-making, that nourishes the soul-making, and a conceptual framework where images and archetypes are somehow bigger than the self.

Rather than being contained within the self, as I said before, they're bigger than the self. There's something in some way eternal, or better to say timeless, about them—about these imaginal figures. Something in some way autonomous about them. Something in some way, in some particular way, real. They have a kind of reality and a kind of divinity.

So in a way these are all loaded words, loaded concepts. But we are adopting consciously a conceptual framework that entertains lightly those kinds of views. And that with all that, they have demands. That's part of the conceptual view that we're entertaining. And that the self serves them, rather than the other way around—that these imaginal figures, or archetypal figures, or daimons, are in the service of the self.

This is tricky in many ways. And again, to point out that entertaining or allowing a notion of demand from the imaginal figure, it needs this view of liquidity, this alchemical maxim of "do not proceed until everything has turned to liquid." That needs to be there—in the sense that we see that way, we see the liquidity, the emptiness, in other words, the insubstantiality of this in order to have the right relationship with this notion of demand as part of our conceptual framework. So it's not literal and the ego is not getting too stuck on this and relating to it too literally.

I keep using this word, tricky. I think there's a real subtle middle way here, as I said.

Someone was telling me, this is again some years ago, a woman was sharing in an interview about her past lovers and things and a sense of resentment at not being met by lovers equally. And I was like, in what way have you felt not met equally? And she explained a bit about that. She also shared that from quite an early age in her life, she was aware that she was very attractive to many men. And also that she had a sort of intuitive wisdom, a deep sensitivity in the areas of the erotic and the romantic. She was in her element in that and deeply attractive to many men.

And so it's almost like, as we were talking, it's almost like she was sort of an embodiment of Aphrodite, the goddess of love and the erotic. And almost that she was, as this figure within her, this goddess, if you like, that was coming through—let's call her Aphrodite—it wanted her beauty and her sensitivity and intuitive wisdom in regards to love and eros and sensuality to be seen, to be recognized, and even a little bit to be worshipped.

Now, how close that is to a kind of ego wanting those things—ego wanting to be seen and to be regarded as beautiful and to be even worshipped—and we think, what an ego trip. Maybe some of that gets mixed into this kind of thing at times, but maybe something else is coming through at times that is in the nature of the divinity that was coming through or the imaginal figure that was coming through. And I'll return to this later.

The part of that is it's not an ego thing when that's wanting to be recognized. It's like if you say God wants to be recognized, the soul wants to be seen, something of holiness here wants to be seen. And that's different than a purely ego wanting or craving. This is very, very tricky. And sometimes you get these things mixed—perhaps more often than we might think. We tend to dismiss something as ego. No—have a closer look, sense more deeply, more soulfully into what's going on.

So all this brings up the question: what is healing? When we talk about healing in all these different ways, what do we mean? What does that word mean? Or who is healed? What is healed? What is freed? Who is being freed and healed? The ego or something else? I'm going to return to this actually. Just put that question out now. What do we mean by healing? Who is being healed? What is being healed? What is being freed?

Sometimes with the demand that we feel from an image, that we sense from the image, it's actually often quite subtle.

It might be—and I've mentioned this before—that the demand is simply to behold the imaginal figure, to witness it. There's nothing else required other than to stay with it, to look at it, to sense it, to feel into it. And in doing just that, in that simple act of beholding, the soulfulness is nurtured and enriched and deepened and expanded. The psyche expands because the soulfulness expands, and the range of image expands. With that, the love of this image—the eros—is expanded. And the conceptual framework is also expanded, as we discussed earlier.

So with all that libido—and I mean this in the sense of the whole psychic energy available in the system, not merely sexual energy—the libido also grows. Just from beholding and witnessing an image, seeing its beauty and feeling our love for it, sensing its holiness and meaningfulness and soulfulness, something is fertilizing the psyche, the eros and the logos. All of that gets expanded.

This is usually a very gradual movement. The sense of sacredness and meaningfulness gradually expands, deepens, and enriches. I'll return to this soon in another talk, but partly through engaging in imaginal practice meditatively, something starts gradually expanding. The sense of sacredness begins spilling over into life. Life becomes multi-leveled. We start feeling and sensing life, perceiving it as richer, more sacred and meaningful everywhere—multidimensional. It's a gradual movement.

So the demand that seems to accompany an image can often be very subtle, yet it's powerful in its gradual effect. Just beholding, just witnessing.

Sometimes the love and demand from an image is not obvious—it's much more implicit, if you like. I remember some time ago, a year and a half perhaps, I had mostly finished writing my book on emptiness. After the huge amount of work that involved, I had sent the manuscript to the publisher and received the proofs back. They were so full of mistakes they had made, formatting errors, and so forth.

In meditation, I was curious to explore the whole relationship with writing the book from the perspective of imaginal practice rather than just emptiness practice, which I already knew quite well. In meditation, I encountered this figure who had come relatively often during the course of writing the book—a master sculptor in a sort of underground cave, a master sculptor and his apprentice. I tended in the image to be more in the position of the apprentice to this master sculptor.

The master communicates in some way—it wasn't quite a verbal dialogue, but he communicates: "One has to finish it. Nearly there." He's talking about the sculpture, but this is a very clear example of how it's mirroring something in my life, the writing of the book. "One has to finish it. Nearly there."

This master sculptor is basically a perfectionist, and he has to be. That is his moral code, the ethos of masters and apprentices like these. He pushes the apprentice to the limit. He's quite stern and not a pushover. He sets tasks and limits and is very firm about it. That's the moral code—the moral code of perfectionism as well. There's a lot of power in that, in a good way. There's a lot of energy in that.

He's communicating, if you like: "You do it right. You do it as perfectly as possible and to the highest standard possible. That's just what we do. That's how we do things."

There's a big rock that's either to be carved or he's half-carving it into a sculpture—he's sort of partway through it. It's a big rock, and he touches it and brushes the carving dust from it with his fingers. Sometimes it feels like that rock is my body. Somehow, through this relationship, he is carving me and carving my body.

In this case, as I mentioned, this was one of those images where there seemed to be a very clear parallel between what was happening in life and the image itself. I found myself asking, in a non-verbal way, about time and rushing—having so much other work and commitments, wanting to move on to other explorations. His response was clear: "It doesn't matter as long as it's done well. It doesn't matter how long it takes. It doesn't matter how you feel about it."

So there was a clear demand present. The love that was there remained much more implicit—not obvious. Even as I relate this, I'm aware that it doesn't sound like there's much love there, but there truly was a profound love present. It's just not the obvious kind of love, and it wasn't being stated explicitly. This master loves his apprentice and cares for him, truly sculpting and shaping him through love. It's simply a particular quality or character of love—one that has its own unique mode of expression, implicit within the image rather than obvious.

Another imaginal figure who visits me relatively often is John Coltrane—clearly a historical figure and someone I love deeply. He comes to me sometimes when I'm meditating, curiously always sitting in the same place in my room, just in front and a little to the left, facing me on a ledge. Sometimes, in terms of work or creative output or various endeavors, he offers gentle but firm encouragement. There's something about his very physical presence—this heavy-set, strong African-American figure—and something about his resolution and commitment to his path, the force that came through him, everything that cost him, and his steadiness with that over the years. He had a short life, actually, dying at forty.

There's something in him that communicates with kindness, encouraging me gently yet firmly. Here the love was obvious, while the demand remained more implicit—coming through this gentler, encouraging mode, yet actually uncompromising. You don't simply give in or stop just because something is difficult or challenging, or because people don't understand. He faced similar struggles as his music became more avant-garde and people couldn't understand it.

Sometimes the love is not so obvious—it remains implicit—while the demand appears obvious. Sometimes the demand is more implicit, less obvious, while the love seems more apparent. And sometimes the demand that an image conveys to us feels strong and clear, but isn't necessarily practically obvious in terms of what it means, what it implies, or what it's actually asking of us.

Remember the image I shared some days ago of the person listening to the public lecture, feeling that what was being said was quite stupid and offensive, yet sensing that most others in the room thought it brilliant? Then suddenly this magnificent phoenix appeared, filling the room with its nobility. She shared more specifically about the demand, which I'd like to share with you. These are essentially her words:

"The bird showing up that way could easily sound like a revenge fantasy of sorts, and there certainly was raging going on. But when I feel into it, it's as if the phoenix isn't really concerned about engaging in dialogue with stupidity at all." In other words, it doesn't want revenge or to make anyone look foolish publicly. "It's not even carefree. It's just that by its very presence, it's seeing through and manifesting a different stance than what was being broadcast publicly by the speaker. It's manifesting a different stance and changing everything just by being there."

Then comes this profound part about the demand: "It feels like it's asking me to behold it, to bear witness to the beauty—or not only bear witness. It feels like it wants the beauty to be burnt into and carried by my heart." Somehow it's asking her to witness it, and in that witnessing, it wants the beauty to be seared into and carried by her heart.

"There's a very profound sense of being asked to serve, and I'm not sure what that means," she continued. Again, sometimes the demand feels strong but isn't entirely clear. "And to exercise discernment. The demand is to exercise discernment. And it's asking me to be bold."

All these demands—implicit yet strongly communicated, very touching and integral to the beauty itself—remain somewhat unclear in terms of where they apply, what they mean, or how their broader rippling effects might manifest in life.

It's not practically clear. And then...

As I said, sometimes the demand is just to behold, just to honor and see, if you like, the divinity of something or the beauty of something—to honor that which we're witnessing. Somehow in my life I'm honoring this imaginal figure and everything that they communicate and bear and are and express.

Sometimes it might be that we are called to act in life, in our life, or choose or tread a certain path. Sometimes it actually does have physical bearing or bears fruit in some physical manifestation, physical form or other, or physical expression. Sometimes it's just honoring something in the soul, so to speak. That's the demand. And sometimes we're actually needing to manifest and express something.

It's, again, tricky. It's sometimes difficult to discern or feel into what's being demanded here. And if it's an acting and a choosing in life, then what is the exact expression? As we said, we really need to be careful with the kind of literal, concretized mimicking of what the image is. So if it's asking for something to be acted on or chosen in my life—I need to make a certain choice to manifest something—what is that?

Some images seem to want that and some images don't seem to need that. It's on another level of just the honoring. But if it's the acting, if it needs a physical manifestation somehow, then what? And what about the ethics involved?

Again, this is—I keep using this word tricky. This is complex, rich territory to explore, not an easy, simple discernment and exploration. Sometimes we might be tempted to say: Let's put the ethics primary. Let's put the ethics very clear as a sort of boundary and framework and basis, and let's make those primary, not the images primary. And then we feel that's safer.

There is, and there may be, a real wisdom in adopting that kind of stance or that kind of position. But even that, I think, we can sometimes be a little naive or at least unaware how much our ethical responses or thoughts—our absence or lack of ethical responses in life—is shaped by fantasy and mythos.

I remember some years ago giving a talk about this, the necessity of fantasy, actually trying to point out that, if you like, it's the mythos, the fantasy that shapes the ethos, the ethics. So it's really changed now, but some years ago one could have looked at the Dharma scene—or it's changing, let's say—one could have looked at the Dharma scene and seen: Why is there so little response to the global environmental catastrophes and the problem of climate change? Why is there so little Dharma response to that? Or so little even acknowledgment that that needs to get included in what we mean by Dharma practice and ethics? Why is it that so few Dharma people are speaking up and taking a stand and being bold with that?

That's a very complex question. There's lots involved there. And as I said, it's definitely changing in the years since then. But one of the reasons maybe is because of the domination of fantasies, if you like, that are more in line with the figures of equanimity and non-action, not getting involved, not getting... The revolutionary is not such a myth or fantasy or imaginal figure in the range of myths that are present in the Dharma, that fertilize the Dharma. And because of that, it limits the range of responses or the range of even what's included.

So this is interesting, you know, the whole relationship between, let's say, mythos and ethos, imaginal figures and fantasies and ethics. You know, what happens with terrorists? You could say, well, they really have all this imaginal stuff going and a sense of demand and duty and all that. The problem there is they're not understanding it as image. They're not seeing image as image. So jihad, holy war, is a completely literalized concept, not actually seeing it as a poetic image but something that one actually acts on in a totally literal way. That's a fundamentalist belief going on there in regard to images—completely unaware of the soul element of this, if you like, and seeing image as image.

So what happens if we trust this view, this seeing image as image? And so we use the energy body as a navigator, as I've explained. So there's a lot here—we're touching on what we touched on before, about trust and navigating all this and learning to trust. And as I said, so often scary images turn out to be real treasures.

That black devil man was around for decades. It's still around. He has become much less scary because the practitioner—she's no longer scared of him. She's kind of learned to trust him. But he hasn't, through that, become some kind of simple, desexualized nice guy. He's still the black devil man, but he's an ally—something deeply important and trustable there. Or the black hag figure that I shared the other day from someone else.

She retains that black hag character, but she's no longer scary. So they're not what they seem at first, these images. And again, the way of looking affects how they unfold and how they shape themselves. Always, always that dependent arising, dependent on the mind and the way of looking.

So seeing image as image, knowing image as image, and, if you like, entertaining this assumption of their benevolence—very crucial, these aspects of the way of looking. They really are very helpful in allowing the image to grow and fulfill its potential, you could say. Seeing the image as image and the assumptions of benevolence are part of the fabrication, the shaping of the image there, just like we pointed out in the nightmare.

And then there's also this sense of trusting the archetypal necessity in the image, this treasure image. Perhaps entrusting an archetypal necessity eventually. At the center of pathological behavior, at the core of it, might be something archetypal. Perhaps addiction or some kind of other inclination. Sometimes in something like that, it's actually—we could say in the terms of classical mythology—it's Dionysus sometimes, the wild god of wine and ecstasy.

And Dionysus has certain demands. What are the demands? And do they need acting on? And what happens when I see image as image? And what happens when I feel it more in the body? And what needs acting on? And what can just be honored?

But sometimes in that sort of thing, it's too simple to say that's always it. I'm not saying that's always at the core of, say, alcoholic addiction. I don't mean to imply that at all. But sometimes there's something like that—some other god, if you like, or archetypal necessity at the center of something that looks just a mess of pathology. Something else is going on there. There are other demands that are not being seen in the right way and honored.

What happens if that's the case and if a person feels into that and feels into it with everything that we've been talking about with imaginal practice—all the richness and the nuance and the sensitivity of practicing with that and the conceptual framework, seeing image as image and using the energy body and trusting it and recognizing an archetypal necessity? Just that view, what might that do in relation to the pathological behavior or the addiction or whatever?

Some of you will know that one of the things that keeps addictions spinning, keeps the loop of addiction spinning, one ingredient there is shame. It's part of the vicious cycle. So typically an addict will engage in their addiction, whatever, and then afterwards feel shame. And that shame actually is very difficult to bear and propels another cycle of addictive behavior. It's almost like what they call acting out, because the shame is very hard to tolerate. And one gets caught in the self-fulfilling sort of prophecy about how useless one is or what a bad person one is. Addiction behavior leads to shame. Shame leads to more addiction behavior. Just looping like that.

But if sometimes a person can recognize the beauty, the unusual beauty, the unusual treasure, the unusual archetypal necessity or God at the center of that pathology and the demands of that God and honor what that is, who that is, then that dissolves a lot of the shame because what was seen as shameful has actually now become to be seen as divine—completely different. And then that causes a different, it opens a different, the possibility of a different way of relating with the whole addictive pattern and everything that's included there. The shame is gone and the shame as what propels this vicious cycle might be dissolved a little bit and replaced with something much more deeply, deeply respectful. And that might have a big effect in terms of the suffering there.

So these may be, for a lot of people, unusual kind of views—this trusting, this deeply trusting the treasure that an image is, even if it looks weird or pathological or dark or whatever it is, or even trusting the archetypal necessity running through what looks a mess or fucked up or whatever in our life.

Sometimes artists sense this easier or can sense this kind of what's operating in their psyche or in the psyche, can sense that easier sometimes than other people. Picasso said at one point, "Painting is stronger than I am, it does what it wants with me." There's a sense—and if you also read some of the writings, not the poems, but of T.S. Eliot or Rilke or other poets—there's really the sense of something bigger making a demand on the being. And the way that is not always necessarily so easy, but it feels important.

So again, to say again, these things, these imaginal figures, they have a certain autonomy, but autonomy—and so the autonomy to be able to make a demand—but that is not quite the same as saying they're completely independent, right?

So that black devil man we were just talking about—we've seen instances, I've shared, where an image surprises one. I could never have thought of that. And so there's an indication of the image's autonomy there. But for example, that black devil man came again in an image and had his back to this meditator. And then he turned around towards her and in her imagination she took one step towards him—this is more recently, years after the more difficult relationships with him—and took a step, took one step towards him. And him, she did in her imagination, but he kept her away with the palm of his hand and an outstretched arm on her sternum, very firm: keep your distance.

And this was very perplexing to her. It was something that he suddenly did. And she realized, he's really not in my control. He's not wholly in my control. There's an autonomy here.

But autonomy doesn't, as I said, necessarily mean independence—independence from the mind or the way of looking. Nothing is independent of the mind and the way of looking. That gesture of his was also contingent on her gesture of stepping towards him. So there's autonomy, but that's not the same as being independent and having an independent existence, independent of the view that's entertained or of the actions of the self in relation to the image.

But this sense we have of imaginal figures and the conceptual framework there—very potentially powerful, very radical.

So a retreatant said to me a little while ago, "We are doors," she said. "We are doors for what wants to come through." Again, it's a way of looking, a conceptual framework that's being entertained in saying that. I'm realizing that. And in that conceptual framework, the human self is somehow less than or within the imaginal figure. The imaginal figure is somehow more. We are just the door for what wants to come through.

Even more radically put, Henri Corbin used to say, "It's not your individuation that is your task, it's the angel's individuation that is your task." Not your individuation, but the angel's individuation is your task. Individuation was a word he borrowed from Jung, meaning growing into the fullness of your particular unique personality and that self-growth implied there. So not your growth, your path, your individuation, but the angel's. That's your task.

So again, there's a shift in view here. We're entertaining a view of the psyche, a view of psychology, a view of the self, a view of the soul, a view of images, and also of divinity and what is of value. All that is wrapped up in that sentence: Not your individuation, but the angel's individuation is your task. There's this kind of reversal of the usual way of seeing existence and what the self is and what these imaginal figures are.

CHAPTER 16

Opening, Tuning, and Relating to the Imaginal: Instructions (3)

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this third instructional talk on imaginal practice, Rob Burbea provides essential clarifications on technique and relationship. He explores walking meditation as a posture for both samādhi cultivation and imaginal work, emphasizing tuning into the energy body's well-being while in movement. The core teaching focuses on shifting our relational stance with imaginal figures—asking 'what do you want?' rather than 'what can you give me?' This reorientation opens possibilities for healing, love, and soul-making through how images see us and act toward us.
>
> Burbea addresses common doubts that arise in practice, particularly the concern about 'making things up.' He emphasizes using soulfulness as the primary navigator rather than worrying about authenticity. The talk explores the subtle relationship between images and life—how our existence can mirror archetypal dimensions rather than images simply reflecting personal psychology. He discusses the 'octave' or register of images (their degree of substantiality) and their portable nature, showing how imaginal figures can be transported into daily interactions. Throughout, Burbea maintains that soul-making and the cultivation of soulfulness remain the deepest objectives, transcending any self-help orientation toward a more devotional relationship with the imaginal realm.

I just want to clarify a couple of things about the instructions and then move on.

First, regarding walking meditation. It's important to understand that walking is a posture, just like sitting is a posture, or standing or lying down is a posture. It's not in itself a meditation. We can do most meditations in the walking posture, practice most meditations in the walking posture. So it's just a posture which can be used to take the meditation in any direction we want.

In the context of imaginal practice and this course, we could divide the walking into two possibilities. On the one hand, we can do walking meditation with the intention of samadhi—cultivating that well-being, that harmonization, ease in the energy body and sensitivity to the energy body. On the other hand, we can also walk doing the imaginal practice, so the imaginal practice taking place in the walking posture.

With the samadhi in the walking posture—some of you will be familiar with this already, some of you really won't—you can start by standing. Same as when we're sitting, expand the awareness, feel the whole energy body, tune into that. If there is some well-being or pleasantness or nice energy somewhere, just stay with that. Tune to it, open to it, feel it. In all the ways that we've discussed, you're welcome to use images if they help open that, or a bit of breath work, or whatever it is, or just tuning to the energy body—everything that we talked about.

When that feels a little bit established, that nice energy or well-being or pleasantness, just linger with it and then begin to walk. But instead of paying attention to the soles of your feet or the sensations of moving the legs throughout the legs, or walking in a much wider space that includes the sky—instead of those options, we're actually walking in the sort of bubble or space of the energy body, tuned to the feeling, the texture, the vibration, the tone of that whole space, just as if you were sitting, but now one is walking. Tune to that, particularly if there's a sense of some degree of well-being or comfort or ease or even pleasure there. That's what we're paying attention to.

Same thing walking between two points, stopping at any time you want in the middle of the path, stopping for as long as you want at the end, just having that as a priority—that nourishing of the well-being in the energy body and the sensitivity to the energy body. You might need to walk a little faster to help you tune in that way, or a little slower, or a lot slower. You might need to stop a lot. It doesn't matter. You're really just taking the same practice, the same samadhi direction of practice, and applying it in a different posture. As always, being responsive, being playful, being creative, and seeing what helps.

So that would be the samadhi practice when we're walking, with the energy body when we're walking. And then it's quite possible to do imaginal practice when you're walking.

In classical metta practice, when I would give walking instructions, you can imagine the person that you're giving metta to at the end of your walking path, so that you're walking towards them, radiating metta towards them in a very lovely way. Then you reach them at the end, and they magically appear at the other end, and then you turn around and do the same thing—walk towards this person that you're radiating well-wishing towards. Or you can imagine them walking by your side, and both of you are perhaps in a bubble of well-wishing, of metta, of light, whatever, healing. Many possibilities there.

Those kinds of possibilities are possible doing walking meditation with more open imaginal practice. But actually, you will find as you play with this, there are all kinds of possibilities and ways that the surroundings can be taken in, which we'll come back to. Many, many possibilities—more than one might think before one actually gets into the walking posture with imaginal practice and plays with it a little bit.

Just as with the walking samadhi practice, you can stop at any time, you can stop for as long as you want, stand if that's helpful at any point, and vary the pace or find the pace for any session that feels most conducive to working with that image. So again, very playful, very responsive practice.

So that was the first thing I wanted to clarify.

The second thing: I feel like I probably expressed something in an unhelpful way about how long we spend with images. I said two minutes is loads. What I really meant to say, what I should have said, was two minutes may be enough. It's very possible to spend a whole session with an image, or a really long time—an hour or something like that with one image—and it's maybe evolving slowly or going through different phases or something.

The key point really is not this amount of time or that amount of time. It's just: Is it still helpful? So if I'm spending a long time with an image, does it still feel full of resonances for the soul? Is there still the soulfulness there through that? And of course, the mind wanders, you bring it back, the soulfulness might dim and then come back a little bit. But it's not so much a time guideline—as always, it's tuning into what's happening, sensitive to what's happening, just sensitive to whether the soulfulness is there and whether it feels helpful. You can spend as long or as short as feels helpful and soulful.

We began to get into a little more detail in the instructions the other day—different aspects and dimensions of the ways we can interact with images, the ways we relate to images and imaginal figures. We brought up the possibility of a shift in attitude: asking, usually implicitly, not necessarily a literal question, but asking, "What do you want?" of the imaginal figure. Not "What can you give me?" but "What do you want?" So turning things around in the relationship. Not necessarily an actual question—well, it could be—but more a sense, sensing and intuiting. It's really a shift in attitude with the imaginal figure.

So I just want to restate that again and say a little bit more about that as we go on through the retreat. What do you want?

And perhaps what this imaginal figure, what this daemon wants is to be expressed in some way, probably in my life. So maybe that's what it wants, but again, not so literally. Its expression may not just be a concrete, literalized mimicry of what the image is.

And it may be that what the imaginal field wants is just to be seen. It actually is not asking for any expression or doing something different. It just wants to be seen, to be acknowledged and to be honored. And the key word there is the honoring. There's a sense this is something that needs honoring. And we get the sense that's what it wants.

And maybe what it wants is really to look at you in a certain way. What's really important with some imaginal figures or instances with imaginal figures is how they see you, how this image sees me, how it looks at me, this imaginal figure or animal or whatever it is. How they respond and act towards me—that's actually what's important.

Because one of the possibilities within that of how they see me and how they act towards me, there are many, many ways in which healing can happen at many different levels. I could give so many examples of this, the healing possibilities, the different healing possibilities of working with images.

I think I already talked about the retreatant who was meditating and had the liver condition and was in some pain and low energy with her liver condition. Then this magnificent lion came towards her that she was already familiar with from before and started licking her liver. The healing that came out of that and how that moved then into the samādhi as the energy body changed over twenty minutes or so.

And then recently someone was sharing how they were beginning in their life to dare to look more closely at a really quite painful aspect of their relationship with their father when they were much younger, and how there was really some sexual inappropriateness there from the father. All the pain that that brought up and the confusion and the difficulty there—opening to that, daring to open to that, and the courage that that took. Another image that she'd had before quite regularly, this phoenix that I mentioned before and will mention again in another context as well—this phoenix came. This huge, beautiful, immensely strong but very compassionate phoenix bird came and enfolded her completely in its huge wings.

It was actually behind her and brought its wings to cover her whole body, particularly her breasts, and so much healing in that. And interesting to me that even in the gesture—we talked about this—in the gesture of doing something very healing, very protective in the unfolding of the wings of this phoenix, the image itself and that gesture had a kind of eroticism to it, the way it covered her breasts. And so in a way, there was a healing of the erotics there as well. It was erotic, but it had so much love and healing with it that it actually healed something, or began to heal something around the sexuality.

There are so many possibilities. I remember certainly more than a year ago a beautiful image that really touched me. I'll say a little bit about it just because there are a few other aspects that are instructive.

I was feeling not well physically, a stomach ache. Suddenly, in the meditation, this huge Godzilla-like creature appeared, seeming to be made of metal parts, with red blazing eyes and raging. But then very suddenly that also collapsed or shattered or exploded and morphed into this giant anthropomorphic figure, so this giant human-like figure, but it seemed also to be made of metal. Then very quickly that collapsed, shattered, and shrunk into a fox which at first seemed like it was made of metal but then shrugged off the metal exterior to become more fleshy and furry and natural—a fox animal.

This fox is a fugitive. He travels alone and he avoids contact. He hides. I feel myself into his body at times. I feel what it feels like to be him. And I get a sense of him both from within and also looking at him. And I sense his wisdom. There's something about this fox—he's very wise and he knows things. He knows esoteric things and philosophical things. But he's very tentative about who he comes close to, who he lets himself come close to.

There's something—he will only let himself come close if he senses that you really want to learn. And there's something about this fox that's so beautiful. I bow to him imaginatively in the meditation. My heart feels drawn to bow and to make añjali with my hands in that gesture of bowing. There's a real sense of reverence and softness, and I feel tearful in the meditation as I'm doing this.

And I get a sense of him and I see him on his travels, and he will come, this fox, to a circle of people around a fire, for instance, and give of his wisdom. He's open to doing that, but otherwise he avoids, he hides, he is furtive and fugitive. And it might even be that someone is trying to catch him or destroy him.

So I'm getting the sense of this fox and the beauty of it and the reverence in the relationship there. And then he stands on my stomach, and I'm still in the sitting posture in the meditation, my physical body, but imaginarily I lie down. His paws bear the touch of his wanderings, and the paws press in onto my belly at certain points, as if they're almost acupressure points in my stomach and in my back for healing. And it feels very, very healing. There's something—again, I feel the energy harmonize and heal. It feels very lovely there.

So there are lots of dimensions to that kind of image. In this example, like a lot of healing can go on there in images.

Many different dimensions unfold within imaginal practice. And also, as we mentioned already, love emerges as a central element. In the relationship with the imaginal figure, particularly how they look at me or how I look at them, love may be the most important thing.

I think I told the image of the white horse and the beautiful love between us, really. And then that image of the jazz musician Eric Dolphy as I was doing the walking meditation. The whole thing there really seemed about my gratitude and my love. A little bit about his blessing me, but really it was about my love and my gratitude. And how so much that love is part of the soul-making.

And again, to quote that beautiful poem of Mary Oliver's from her collection West Wind, it's a prose poem actually about Percy Bysshe Shelley, the poet who drowned very young. She says, she's writing about him, "I love this poet, which means nothing here or there, but it's like a garden in my heart."

So the love that we have for these imaginal figures, or that they have for us, it means nothing to anyone, perhaps. My love of Eric Dolphy, you might say, who cares? But something, it does something. It's a garden in my heart. In other words, it's fertile in my heart and in my soul. It is soul-making, the love there. That figure and the love in relationship to it is soul-making.

And as we said, when I talked about another musician, Keith Jarrett, that love itself, the eros there, wants to penetrate further and open up the image of the beloved so that it does open the image and give other dimensions and range to the image and more of a sense of sacredness. And that opening of the range and opening of the sense of sacredness opens and fertilizes not just the image, but also fertilizes—then it asks for an expansion of the conceptual framework to include those other dimensions. And then the eros may love more, and so on. So there's a real fertilizing process going on through the love and through the eros.

And again, I've said this before, it's so important. When the love is there in the image, either way or both ways—from me towards the image, from the image towards me—we're really interested in the particular quality of that love. So love has such a range of possibilities for us as human beings. There's so many flavors and styles and dimensions and qualities to the different kinds of love that are possible for us.

So it's not always just simple universal metta or just compassion. It may be. But they may be, as for instance in this image of Eric Dolphy and the love there, very, very particular quality. So really to tune in and notice the particular quality of love that's present with any imaginal interaction.

All this about the healing and the love is part of this question: how am I drawn or asked to interact with this image? Sometimes we feel almost pulled or led in or invited into a certain mode of interacting. It may be a verbal dialogue, it may be something else entirely, maybe more sexual interaction—there is a lovemaking, you know. There's all kinds of possibilities, all kinds.

But this whole—when we say, as I said in the earlier instructions, to include an awareness of the thoughts that come up in relation to this image and the conceptual frameworks that are operating. And then we add this dimension of a kind of attitude or stance in relationship to the image of what do you want. So all of these things, these aspects of the relationship with the image, they bring up the question or they imply the question of the relationship, the exact relationship: what is the relationship between this image and my life?

And this is an interesting question, to say the least. It's potentially quite tricky, but it's interesting. It's not something we want to think too much about or kind of interpret—you know, think and form an interpretation. It's more something we'll kind of get glimpses of or feeling for, intuitive awareness of that a relationship is there and what is the relationship or how are things mirroring.

So sometimes an image will give advice, sometimes, to a person about their life. So I actually remember quite some years ago now, an image—actually, the image is not that important. There were black and white figures and a sort of ritual thing going on with these figures. And this is years ago before I had done that much imaginal practice. And I remember at some point being drawn to ask these sort of priest-like figures if I should go ahead and write this book about emptiness that people had been asking me to write, a few people. And the answer was clearly yes, that even if it didn't have much—wasn't popular or didn't sell very well—it would still be a worthwhile thing.

But that kind of thing, I think, is quite rare, where an image actually gives advice. And not only is it rare, I think, again, my leaning, or my favorite leaning, as is obvious by now on this retreat, is that it would be more interesting, rather than getting advice, the soul-making and the soulfulness is the emphasis. And that makes it more interesting, the whole relationship with the image, the whole imaginal practice, rather than me just seeking out these images to get advice about what I should do.

This can become too much, possibly can become too much of an ego thing, trying to be successful at this and that, whatever. More interesting, more radical, will be just to prioritize the soul-making, and the soul-making also with respect to the relationship of the image and my life. And what helps that to be soul-making, to have this soul-making stance or support the soul-making there?

It's this sense of life and images mirroring each other, but particularly my life mirroring these images and these imaginal figures, or echoing these imaginal figures. My life, myself, my journey, the soul events of my life, having their origins and their roots in some way in these imaginal figures, in these archetypal dimensions, these more divine dimensions of being, if you like. And that kind of loose conceptual framework, that kind of attitude, is much more supportive and opening for the soul-making and the soulfulness.

Clearly, anyone playing with imaginal practice even a little bit will notice that images reflect life at times, or something happens in one's life, or some thread in one's life, and it's expressed in the images. That's obvious; one can see that. But more interesting to me is this other direction of flow—causality may be too strong a word—where images find their expression in life. Life, as I said, mirroring or echoing or having its origins or roots in the imaginal figures. This to me is more interesting, more radical, and more conducive and supportive of soul-making.

So yes, life leads to images, but more interesting is when images have their fruits in life or are expressed in my life. Actually, even if it seems clear that it's an event in life or a feeling in life that has given rise to this image, the image then, practiced in the right way, becomes—or at least leads to—a way of looking at life, a certain relationship. Even when it seems obvious that the image was spawned or had its roots, was born out of some event in my life and mirrors that, relating to it as image then shapes and constellates a rich and potentially soul-making way of looking and relating to that part of life, my whole life, or that event, or that aspect of myself.

So the image, in the way that we're talking about it, turns into something that is always soul-making, whatever its origins seem to be. Very simply, the question always is: does it enhance the soulfulness? Does it nourish and deepen and widen and ignite and enrich soulfulness, the sense of soulfulness? Is there soul-making here? Not so much what the origins are. I can see it either way. But if it does seem to come out of life—the image mirrors life rather than the other way around, which would be the more unusual way of looking at it—if the image does seem to come out of life, then picking it up in the right way, practicing it in the right way, does it bring soulfulness? Does it enhance the soulfulness? Does it nourish that soulfulness?

Sometimes the soulfulness with respect to an image is very much helped by the awareness of a kind of loose connection with life or mirroring of my life—that my life mirrors the image or the other way around. Sometimes it's really helped by this awareness in the meditative consciousness, being aware of the connections. It makes it more soulful, more poignant sometimes. And sometimes not, actually. And we don't need to look for it.

This is a curious thing. Most images perhaps really have a connection with life. We see our life mirroring these images or vice versa. And there's a lot of soul-making in that connection or in the awareness of that connection—a lot of emotional resonances, ideational resonances, soul resonances. And sometimes not, and we don't need to look for it.

As an example of one that isn't, I remember a year and a half or so ago, suddenly in meditation there was a pond or lake in moonlight, a very tranquil, almost otherworldly scene, very beautiful. Out of the trees and the foliage right by the shore of this lake stepped a white unicorn suddenly, standing there by this very still moonlit lake in the moonlight at the shore.

There was a deep sense of silence to this unicorn, a very beautiful creature. And again, there was love from him or her—I actually couldn't tell the gender—love from the unicorn to me and also from me to this unicorn. And again, a sense of devotion. I'm not even quite sure what exactly I was devoted to. It brought a stillness into my whole being. This unicorn was solitary, a solitary creature, very unafraid. There was no danger here, very still. But the whole image really seemed to be in another world, a world somehow unconnected with the ups and downs and the vicissitudes of this world and this life—something very unperturbed and unconcerned, very touching, and yet there was nothing about this that had any relationship with the events of this life, really.

So sometimes many images do have that relationship with life, or our life mirrors an image, and sometimes not. We want to be sensitive to that in the practice.

When there is a mirroring or echoing of our life, we want to make sure we have a non-literalistic understanding of that relationship. So if there's this soldier or warrior image, I know it doesn't mean to join the army or harm anyone in any way. Or the wanderer image—I know it doesn't mean that. We've been into this.

Another example: I remember quite some time ago, an image of a painter's studio, an artist's studio. It seemed to have a lot of potency to it, this image, but I was trying to understand it a little too literalistically at first in the meditation. Then I began to be with it in a couple of different sessions, and I realized it was really about the space. There was a connection in terms of my sense of my work and the importance of creative output and being creative, which is something that feels very important to me—letting that flow and producing creatively, which is also something that feels deep in my soul, very important.

But not to take it literally—to become a painter, I'm far from that or hiring a place—but it was about the space, about the enclosing walls protecting this space and this space of creativity and all the attitudes of the artist that go with that, and all the sacred space of the artist. Not wanting to translate that too literally, it wasn't that I needed to go and find some place like that, which I don't have and I didn't do that. But it can be there as an image and fertile and fertilizing as an image in the psyche—the space, the artist's studio. So there's a relationship there, but it does not have to be literalistic or concretely acted out usually.

Now, you've noticed, I know for sure, that as one is practicing with images, all kinds of doubts can come up, just like when one is practicing any other meditation. Doubt is a hindrance, one of the five hindrances classically, and can come up, and there can be confusion or sometimes even paralysis with regards to the practice. So very often, the question is operating there, and often consciously but sometimes unconsciously: "Am I doing this right?" And the fear of doing it wrong. So that question is there and it's dominating and it's pressuring things—getting it right or getting it wrong and the fear there.

Rather than that, what I really so much want to emphasize is an attitude of experimentation and playfulness. So letting go of right and wrong and just playing and having fun and daring to experiment, and asking instead: "Does this feel helpful?" That's a very different question—"Am I doing this right or am I doing it wrong?" versus "Does this, what I'm doing right now, how I'm relating to this image, how I'm holding the attention, what I'm paying attention to—does it feel helpful?" And now we're adding: "Does it feel soulful? Is there soulfulness coming out of this?"

So these questions are much more useful questions and much more fertile questions. They open the avenues rather than locking them down.

And again, a person might have a doubt: "Am I making this up?" Especially with imaginal practice, it happens all the time—"Am I making this up?" So this is really important, and different people who work with images in psychotherapy or other modalities have different opinions on this. I would like to say that actually it's okay if an idea comes into the mind in imaginal practice, or an impulse to make something happen with an image, or to introduce some other element or some other figure into an image, or change it even perhaps at times.

Not a problem if I'm making it up. Always—and this is a rule of thumb now, let's make it into a guiding rule—always the question is: "Does this feel like it's nourishing and opening and deepening and enriching the soulfulness right now?" So the soulfulness becomes the indicator, as I said, the navigator of our practice in the moment. Not so much "it's always wrong to make things up" or "I should always make things..." That doesn't matter. We don't need to get snagged with that question, "Oh, that's the ego doing that." Just use the fruit, the result in the moment, how it feels, and use the soulfulness as an indicator, as a navigator that we're on the right track.

So there's a responsiveness there. If it feels soulful and I've made this thing happen in the image—no problem, it feels soulful. If I haven't and it doesn't, it's tuning into that, the soulfulness aspect and the resonances there, and letting that guide us, trusting that.

So again, with the doubt, some person might say they're with an image and "this is too weird" or "this is too dark" or whatever this image, and the mind comes in with its views. And we talked about this in the opening talk—its limited range of what's okay or what kind of images are acceptable, or what's emotionally okay in the range, or in terms of the self-view. "This is too weird." So often a person will think that in imaginal practice. Or "too dark."

Or conversely, actually, a person says, "This isn't weird enough. This should be weirder. I've heard all these stories. People say this and that happens, or Rob said this," you know, whatever. Or generally speaking, meditating and the thought or the inclination: "Something else should be happening." So this is very, very common. But again, could we rather be more responsive and let other factors, other aspects of what's going on be our guides—namely the energy body and the way that responds when an image is right and soulful, as I outlined the other day in the instructions, and all the different cues and clues we can pick up on in the energy body.

And the sense of soulfulness and the resonances and the beauty and the depth and the meaningfulness and all that that we outlined. So letting the energy body and the sense of soulfulness guide us rather than the mind's often too tight or locked-in views.

And the energy body and the sense of soulfulness, what's going on there, might be quite subtle, might not be that far out or dramatic, those effects there. But we can really use them as indicators, as part of the whole sensitivity of developing the sensitivity of the instruments.

And again, in terms of doubts, for instance, "Well, I don't have images, or I don't get very many images," or whatever. But remember, we've been through this, so this is repetition at this point, but remember, an image is not necessarily visual, and there's a whole range of possibilities there in terms of the sense modalities operating.

This "I don't have images," which I've heard a few times from people over the years—again, to repeat: the views that we have, meaning the conceptual frameworks that we entertain or that we're holding, will allow or support more or less images depending on what the conceptual framework is. So some conceptual frameworks just won't allow and support a fertile enough soil in the psyche for images to arise, because wrapped up in the view and the conceptual framework is a dismissal or denigration, ontologically or otherwise, of images.

And so that's very connected just with attitudes in general. Images are daydreams, they're papañca, they're worthless. It's not being mindful. When there's an image or a fantasy, that's not being in touch with reality—all these kinds of attitudes and views are really, really prevalent, as we said in the opening talk. And they will have an effect on what then arises in the psyche. They will constrain the possibility of images arising.

And of course, especially if you come through the insight meditation tradition, as I do, one has practiced—I had practiced for years diligently discarding images when they came up for the most part and returning to the breath or returning to so-called bare attention or whatever, with all the attitudes implied in that being reinforced. And as a practice, just reinforcing this discarding and returning to something that seemed or was deemed to be more, quote, "real."

And so the attitudes, the views, and the practice over years will, as I said, constrain and decrease the flow of images and the arising and availability of images. So just to be aware of that, if it still feels like, "Well, I really don't have images in that sense," we have trained ourselves out of that through practice and view. But we can open that door again. We can train the imagination, if you like, and train the sensitivity and the opening and the tuning to the imaginal through practice and through opening up the view, as we've talked about.

But in terms of how much people actually have arising for them images in the sense of imaginal objects or figures, whatever sense modality that's coming in—that's not the deepest objective, as I would see it, of the retreat. The thing that I'm most interested in is opening up and sensitizing to a whole different way of sensing life, opening up the perception of this here and now, of life, of self, of other, of world. That to me is the objective that I'm most deeply interested in for all this. And so whether or not I have lots of actual imaginal objects, imaginal figures arising is secondary. It may be that that's part of my trajectory. It may be that's not so much part of my trajectory. But there's another objective that's more important, I would say.

And again, just saying more about the whole question about doubt and navigating all this: So often with imaginal practice, an image that is initially scary arises and becomes, over time—sometimes very quickly, and sometimes really over quite a while, months or even years, in some cases years, but usually because before they've been introduced to all the things that we're talking about—becomes a helpful image. What started scary or was initially felt to be a scary image becomes helpful.

A person was telling me some time ago about what she called "the black hag"—this old woman dressed in black, sort of witch-like, and seemed very dark, the black clothes, and the ugly old woman features, and kind of had this aura of what seemed to be wickedness. But actually, no. This image, with spending more time trusting a little bit, became a really, really helpful figure, deeply fertile in the psyche and the soul and deeply wise as well. The style of love and admonition, if you like, from the black hag was not cute and cuddly and soft. She retained her kind of character, but there was absolute love in it and lots of trust. So it's again a certain particular quality or flavor of the love that flowed through there. But nothing scary in that, nothing harmful in that, just that the mind immediately picked up on it in a certain way and assumed that this was scary.

So often what seems scary at first actually turns out to be something very helpful. And this is important. Can we trust the benevolence of these imaginal figures? Or is it possible even to play with trusting, just enter into trusting for a period, a portion of a meditation, maybe just a few minutes? Can I play with even imagining that they are benevolent, trusting that there's something there? Because that trust becomes a significant factor in the whole mix of imaginal practice. The trust itself will affect the way of looking. In the moment that there's trust, we're looking and relating differently. In the moment when there isn't trust, we're looking and relating differently than that. And the way of looking always affects the images, just like any other perception—the way of looking always affects, always makes a difference.

So you can see this in nightmares, for instance. I don't know if ever in a nightmare, perhaps you're chased by a monster in a nightmare, and something changes in the way that you see the monster, and there's a little bit more of a kinder view of the monster. And guess what? The monster changes in the nightmare. The more fear I have of the monster, the less trust, the more I run away from it, the more oppressive and scary looking it becomes, the more it feels dangerous. And when that fear subsides for whatever reason, if you've ever experienced this in a nightmare, the whole monster as an apparition changes as well. So the image is affected by the way of looking, and we can sometimes play with the trust, trusting there's a treasure there, trusting there's something beautiful and right and necessary there. So we can—again, this is part of the eidos, the idea that we entertain—trusting it, trusting that there's a treasure there, even if it looks at first a little bit scary. This is an important point.

And eventually, through practice with images and the kind of conceptual frameworks that we're talking about, eventually this might actually mature, this attitude and this vision of images. It might even mature to a place where we trust the archetypal necessity even at the center of reality, so-called pathological behavior or behavior that is quite painful in our lives—maybe even addiction or addictive inclinations or pathological inclinations. It can even mature to a place where we trust that even somewhere in the middle of that, there's an archetypal necessity. So this is tricky, and it's a fine line here, so I need to see in that case image as image.

What happens often—it might be that what's happening there is that image that's operating archetypally in this addiction or whatever it is, is seen not as image, is taken too concretely. So if I do identify or get in touch with an archetypal necessity at the center of this pathological behavior or whatever it is, I really need to see image as image. But one gets a sense that in some of the kind of real knots of our life or places where there is addiction or this or that and there's suffering and pathological behavior, it's not—something else can be at the center there, at the root there.

Sometimes people, we can be a little oversimplistic in our psychology and say, "Always it's because what one is seeking is love, and one is going about it the wrong way. Everyone wants love and people look for it in mistaken places. And that's what's driving addiction and that's what drives this dukkha-making behavior or whatever it is or this inclination." Or we tend to, again, be too simple psychologically and say it's always down to the seeking of pleasure and the seeking to run away from unpleasant feelings. And that's what's driving the addiction. It's an escape mechanism.

I mean, that may be going on, but it may not be the whole of what's driving this thing or at the center of it. So I feel sometimes we want to have very simple psychologies and apply them universally. Everyone wants love, and that's what's driving it. They're just seeking love in this mistaken way, or seeking happiness, or seeking pleasure, or fleeing unpleasant emotions. Maybe, maybe for sure, but maybe there's more—richer and deeper archetypal necessities which need a different relationship. They need honoring, but also seeing their image. We could say much more about this, though I won't elaborate further now.

Sometimes, still on the subject of doubt and trust, we encounter an image that seems weird or insignificant. We can't really see the point of it. But over time, it may gradually come to feel more significant and affect our lives long-term—this image that at first did not seem very meaningful. Perhaps something is coming through this image, or our ability to receive what wants to come through—one's daemon—is emerging slowly, gradually, in ways not immediately obvious.

There's an open question in imaginal practice regarding what we might call pacing with images. I've touched on this before, but want to repeat it because it's quite important. I learned this from Thomas Moore, the contemporary psychologist. He talked about listening to music. When we really love a piece of music, we listen to it again and again. No one says, "Oh, I've heard that piece once—I wouldn't listen to it again." If you love it, you want to hear it repeatedly.

This contrasts with, say, a book or dharma talk that explains things in rational terms and takes you there. Once I've understood it, I don't need to hear it again. An image is more like beloved music than information or instruction.

Sometimes with dharma talks I've given, people tell me they've listened over and over. Most often this happens because they're packed with information and explanation that requires multiple listenings to absorb. But occasionally someone says, "There's that little story or image you related"—they're talking about perhaps a ten-second fragment—"and I just loop it round and round. I don't know what it is about that, but I keep listening to that tiny section."

What they're doing is that stretch has become alive for them as an image. Just as someone who truly loves music will listen to the same passage again—sometimes the same piece repeatedly—there's something that's become soulfully fertile, not just informationally fertile.

Similarly with images: Do I want to move on to the next image, or recall one deliberately and marinate with it again? Tune to it again, linger with it, just as we would with music—be in that soul space, that soul world of the image, tuning and marinating in its energies, emotions, soulfulness, and resonances.

So it's an open question: when to bring back an image and be with it more—maybe it evolves, maybe not, it doesn't need to—and when to move on and be more open. I don't think there's right or wrong here. I'm simply flagging this as an element of our pacing.

Sometimes we deliberately bring a helpful image to mind, but it doesn't stay as that image. It fertilizes and spawns other images that seem unconnected. Someone told me they were struggling with a complex life situation—sitting in meditation, feeling weighed down by this intricate knot they couldn't see a way forward with, feeling beaten down by it all.

They deliberately brought to mind their niece and nephew, whom they absolutely delighted in and loved deeply. That image didn't stay. Love arose—they felt the love and delight for the children. Then suddenly the image changed, becoming a woman dancing—powerful in her body, poised and confident, dancing with great energy and passion and bravura and skill.

Tuning to this image of the dancer, which seemed to have nothing directly related to their situation or to the niece and nephew, the whole situation they were facing began to feel different. Through the image of this dancer, they gained not only space but a different perspective on what was unfolding.

The poet W.B. Yeats wrote about "the images that yet fresh images beget." Sometimes there's an image that gives birth to, or catalyzes, another image that can be deeply helpful.

Someone a while ago talked to me about imaginal practice, really picking up on this idea that we can relate to images as part of a self-help tool, journey, practice or path—which is fine, completely fine. But they asked, "How can I steer it beyond that sort of self-help attitude and relationship?" I want to say a bit about that here, because what we're really talking about this morning is more about interacting with images, relating to them and navigating with images.

How do we go beyond the self-help relationship? Well, it's really playing with this idea of perhaps serving—playing with the idea of serving this angel or this daemon or this imaginal figure. In the meditation, playing with that as an idea that I'm serving it rather than it serving me. And that's very improvised. One wants to tune in to what that feels like. It may involve even a devotional sense. There's no right or wrong way of doing that. We really can improvise with that.

Related to that are all the conceptual ideas we've talked about that support or nourish that soulfulness and soul-making. So it's all of that included. But really, it's taking the time as well with those images that feel deep, that feel important, that we have the sense with them that my life is mirroring them somehow. Those are the images that will really, along with the right attitude towards them—playing with their attitude and this idea of serving—will really turn around into this other more radical relationship.

So serving the angel, the daemon, my life mirroring it, but again, not literal. It's not necessarily so concretized or literalized. That would make me quite nervous, I think, that kind of too tight and too literalized attitude. We're talking again about poetic images, a poetic sensibility, which can be yet very, very powerful without being literal.

And at times, I've mentioned this sense that we can have of the kind of non-temporal dimension of images, the timelessness, or the eternality that images seem to have. That's part of their poetic nature, it's part of their iconic nature, and part of what gives them this power—that they somehow exist beyond time. Tuning into that can be really, really helpful in this sense of opening up a more radical relationship with them.

Again, just to touch on something I think I threw out earlier, just to restate it and amplify just a tiny bit. I talked about the octave of an image, or the register of an image, if we use words from musical metaphors. What do I mean by that? I mean the degree of solidity or substantiality that the image seems to have.

So for example, one might have an erotic image, and it looks like and maybe feels like—it feels very solid, earthy, fleshy. Maybe it's got a more raunchy kind of erotic character or feel to the whole thing. That's one end of the spectrum of this register of pictures, that's one octave. Or one might have, in terms of events that take place or characters in the image, something very similar, but the whole thing appears more etheric, more insubstantial. One could say it's happening at a higher pitch. It might be very erotic without being so obviously sexual, for instance.

There's not a right or wrong here. That's really, really important. It's not like higher is better. I mean, I think some people might say that. Some people might say lower is better in terms of this register of the images, of the solidity or substantiality of the image.

What you'll notice—definitely, again, you can't get away from this dependent arising—so that dependent on the mind state is the sense of the perception of substantiality of the image. In other words, when we're in a very, very insubstantial state, a state that's perceiving a lot of insubstantiality in the body and in everything else—when perhaps deep emptiness or deep samadhi, those kind of states, deep metta—that mind state will tend to constellate images, or the images that are constellated within that mind state, within that state of consciousness, will tend to be insubstantial. It's dependent arising, dependent on the mind state, the state of consciousness.

And it's malleable. You'll find that you can actually transpose an image to another register, another octave—the same image at another octave, or similar enough, or it changes a bit at another octave. So yes, it's dependent on the mind state, and yes, it's malleable.

And, if it's not too much contradiction, one can also sense at times that this particular image—this is the octave that it belongs in. It belongs in the more earthy, substantial, solid range, or it belongs in this more higher, etheric range. That's part of the tuning and the sensitivity—actually feeling what feels right, without making that too heavy a word.

Certainly with an image, certainly with the image or the sense of the self and the body, that can also have this range of register, of octaves. And also—and very importantly, we're going to get more into this—of the surroundings, of the world, can be very solid and very insubstantial. So I'm just pointing that out and seeing if you can notice and learn and play and tune and become sensitive there.

Okay, last thing. All images—probably most images—are portable, so to speak. We can transport them to other situations, other postures, other interactions in the day.

A person, this is really quite a while ago, was telling me how they were beginning to really enjoy playing with bringing in, incorporating the image of Kuan Yin into their meditations, and particularly into the way they were doing metta and compassion meditations. And this sense of Kuan Yin as a living deity, a living imaginal figure, also had a complexity of character. She had different flavors. Sometimes she was very playful. Sometimes she was very tender. Sometimes she was like a kind of pixie.

There was a whole range there of different flavors to her, and therefore to the expression itself in practice, to her personality, to the kind of love that came out at different times in these different flavors.

And so he was enjoying all that and imagining her at times—this is where the portability comes in—actually imagining her in others. So looking at his friend or talking with a work colleague and actually imagining that Kuan Yin was in that person or expressing through that person, that person was Kuan Yin. And depending on the flavor of Kuan Yin that was manifesting at that time, a particular personality or expression, the quality of love, he would feel devoted to them more generally, but also in different ways, depending on the flavor. The relationship changed anyway, just by seeing them as Kuan Yin, feeling and imagining and sensing them as Kuan Yin. And then within that, there was also quite a range of how that felt.

This is very similar if you know about Mother Teresa and her practice working with the poorest of the poor and people suffering from leprosy and all kinds of other injuries and sicknesses. Her practice was basically to see everyone as Christ. So she sees the person, and at the same time she sees Christ within them. And that was her main practice, in fact, and that was what enabled her to do the amazing work that she did.

An image that comes up a lot for me in all kinds of different ways is the image of the jazz musician. I actually was a jazz musician years ago, and the image can come up many different ways. And again, it's something that's portable sometimes, but its portability is quite subtle. One might think with the mind, "Oh, jazz musician, that means improvising. So it just means improvise through the day in your work and in your interactions without having a sort of plan of what to do." But it does mean that this image can be translated in that way, but also in a lot more subtle ways, which maybe on this retreat I'll go into as an example.

The way these images can spill over can be... there's a real range there. There's a whole variety and it can be very, very subtle. So I'm not even sure I could properly articulate the way the jazz musician image then might come in when I'm talking to someone or listening to them. It's not just about improvisation. It's really quite subtle in terms of the whole sensibility of self and other and situation.

So, self-image, other image, self-fantasy, other fantasy, and they are portable. And then we also talked about fantasy of the Dharma. And are we aware of what the fantasy is? That's an optional question—strand if you like. You can investigate that if you want or ponder it or reflect on it or tune into it: what is the fantasy of the Dharma that you've been entertaining?

But basically to say again: where there is love, where there is a sense of meaningfulness, of beauty, of depth, there you will find fantasy, image, mythos operating. Where there is love, meaningfulness, beauty, depth, soulfulness—there, there is a fantasy and image operating. Question is: what is it?

So we can begin to look at this and begin to make it portable—the image, the fantasies of self, the image, the fantasies of other—play with them, and also of the world and the cosmos. And so I'm going to say more about this as we go on: the image, imaginal practice in relationship to the world.

But you might notice already that images you're working with begin to spread out and sort of suffuse or transform a little bit or transubstantiate, but they spread out to the wider world, the surroundings, the environment, and even the sense of the whole cosmos. So just to say for now, it's really okay if that happens. It's part of the portability. It's part of the work with images. I would expect it to happen. Let it happen. Play with it a little bit, sensitize a little bit, and hopefully we're going to elaborate more about that in the next few days.

Okay, that's enough for now.

CHAPTER 17

A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h35

In this third installment of his exploration of sacred cosmos, Rob Burbea delves into various ways of understanding and experiencing divinity within Buddhist practice. He examines four primary modes of divine experience: the transcendent unfabricated reality beyond all appearances, universal impersonal manifestations like cosmic love or awareness, and particular personal theophanies through imaginal figures and beings. Drawing on insights from emptiness teachings, fabrication practices, and the realization that perception is constructed through ways of looking, Burbea shows how different degrees of clinging and delusion create varying levels of fabricated appearance.

The talk weaves together Buddhist teachings on the unfabricated with concepts from Tibetan Tantra, Kabbalah, and Neoplatonism, exploring how the mind's participation in divine awareness allows for both transcendent realization and meaningful engagement with sacred images. Burbea emphasizes that all divine experiences, whether transcendent or immanent, are empty of inherent existence while remaining valid and transformative. He addresses common resistances to theistic language and offers conceptual frameworks that support both rigorous emptiness understanding and rich imaginal practice, showing how meaningfulness and soul-making require adequate philosophical scaffolding to flourish.

So I want to explore what might be meant by words like God, gods, divine, etc. that I've been using throughout this retreat. I want to explore how we can relate to these words and ideas—how we might make such conceptions useful, fertile, enriching, and opening for us.

I'm very aware that for many people, hearing or encountering these words brings reactions—sometimes very strong reactions, including negative, constricting, blocking, and aversive responses. Some people simply get nervous around such language. These are loaded words for many, and we tend to bring considerable baggage to these concepts and ideas. Much of this comes from our personal and cultural history, perhaps our upbringing and early experiences. For some, this includes significant woundedness from certain religious contexts, education, or upbringing that involved unhelpful ideas.

I'm aware of all this, but perhaps even more importantly, I'm aware of how easy it is to bring assumptions, preconceptions, and quite simplistic, unhelpful notions to these words. When we hear them, we immediately think we know what is meant, barriers arise, and something constricts. People argue, and this is rampant in our culture right now—this so-called atheist versus religious debate. The whole discourse takes place on a literalized, simplistic level, with crude notions battering against each other. People might entertain the idea of an old man with a beard on a cloud, judging, as if that really exists, or debate the creator of the universe and such things.

So while I'm aware of all the history and the possibility of woundedness we might carry, it's really these assumptions, preconceptions, and notions that I want to open up and hopefully render useful and creative in these talks.

For some people, the word "divine" works better than "God." In Tibetan Tantra, they use the word yidam for the deity, the Tantric deity. They speak extensively about seeing appearances as divine, knowing appearances and sensing appearances as divine. This is standard Tibetan Tantric language. They discuss the primordial Buddha, primordial Buddhas, cosmic Buddhas—all of this.

So again, the question: How can we open up these words, these concepts and ideas, so they become what we might call eidos—what we look through? How can we relate to such ideas so they become useful and fertile? Is that even possible?

I want to try—emphasis on try—exploring, describing, and elaborating on some possible conceptions and experiences of the divine, divinity, etc., that we might have in practice and in life. These relate mostly to what we've been discussing. There are many possibilities here, both for conceptual frameworks and for experiences.

This is something I really want to emphasize and probably return to later: the infinite range and plurality of possibilities for both experiences of the divine and conceptions of the divine. I'm obviously only going to discuss some of these, and some of the ones I'll explore can actually mix and infuse each other.

Obviously, being constrained for time, I'll need to be brief while trying to explain these ideas and ways of experiencing as clearly as possible. Some of what we're discussing now—the ideas and experiences—really depend on understanding, a deep understanding of emptiness. Some experiences will also depend on deep meditative experiences of emptiness in practice.

For those not yet familiar with that territory, this might be quite challenging, though it might not be. I wouldn't assume either way.

As an aside, I've been thinking quite a lot about what a good idea it might be to approach Dharma teaching and insight meditation instruction more in terms of a curriculum. This could make so much more possible. It's like: "Okay, now you've understood this, now you've developed these skills in practice. You're able to experience this, you're able to open that way, you're able to have this or that kind of mystical experience, or this or that sense of well-being or dissolution of dukkha. Now—now can we build on that? Now that you have that understanding, can we deepen it? Can we open a further door? We've opened these doors before—can we open other doors?"

Without a curriculum, what often happens is that teachings at the same basic level get repeated, and it becomes difficult to move forward without people feeling lost or uncomfortable, or judging themselves. The fault isn't so much in the person or the teacher or teaching method—it's in the lack of curriculum and the absence of an established foundation, both in understanding and meditative skill, that would allow further deepening and building. Without this, the whole range of teaching becomes quite constricted.

So hang in there if these concepts feel difficult. It may take several listenings, and some of this may become clearer as your understanding of emptiness and your practice with emptiness deepens.

By the way—and this is something I will emphasize again and again—when I talk about God, the divine, or gods, always, always, always that God, a god, the divine, etc. is empty. It has no inherent existence. I am not postulating anything having any kind of inherent or independent existence. Sometimes this is hard for people to understand, and they assume that using such words means one is postulating inherent existence. But I am not.

We could ask, why bother? Especially if some of this is going to be complicated, perhaps difficult to understand, and somewhat elaborate sounding. Why bother discussing these concepts and conceptual frameworks?

Well, for a couple of reasons at least. One concerns both soul and soulfulness. There are aspects of soul that love ideas, that love conceptual frameworks—it's part of the play of the soul. It feels almost like a necessity for understanding some aspect of the soul, for its life, vitality, and vivification.

Secondly, soul and soulfulness and soulmaking need a conceptual framework—conceptual frameworks that allow for soulfulness and soulmaking, that enrich and nourish it, that are actually wide enough to give it space to grow. The ideas, the conceptual frameworks, the logos we are entertaining need to have enough space so that soulfulness can grow. They also need to allow experiences—that's part of soulfulness. Conceptual frameworks need to be wide enough to allow a range of experiences.

This is so crucial. Too often people live and practice while harboring conceptual frameworks that are uninvestigated, unarticulated, unconscious—and this perpetuates a very narrow range of experience, both in life and in meditation. The conceptual framework can function, and we want it to function, like a fertile womb—a space that is actually fertile where things can grow and expand. Importantly, the conceptual framework itself can also grow, expand, and stretch.

Soulfulness and soulmaking need conceptual frameworks that support them. We could express this with Greek terms: psyche needs logos. Psyche needs logos or logoi that support it, enrich it, deepen it, allow it. If the logos—the conceptual framework—is too narrow, then the possibilities for soul and soulfulness and soulmaking are narrowed, constricted. It's no longer fertile. There isn't the possibility of deepening, enriching, widening, stretching the vistas of experience and of psyche.

For example, the assumption or idea that images appearing to one are simply the result of random neuronal firings in the brain—that kind of conceptual notion is probably not very fertile to soulfulness and soulmaking. There are many other ways of explaining things that seem so attractive as truths, especially in modernist culture, that actually kill, stifle, and constrict soulfulness and soulmaking.

Let me begin by dividing up four possibilities—many of these overlap and can infuse each other and mix, but let's delineate at least four possibilities for experiences of the divine that are possible for us.

The first I've mentioned several times already on this retreat and elsewhere: it's possible for a person—much more possible for a meditator—to know, to realize, to experience, to open to... the language of how to put it breaks down, but to know, realize, experience, open to what is unfabricated—the unfabricated, where there is not the fabrication.

Usually through meditation, there is the cessation of the fabrication of any sense or perception of any object whatsoever—anything or object whatsoever, or any oneness or totality of objects. No fabrication of perception of object, no fabrication of perception of any kind of subject, even the most subtle subject of just a bare moment of consciousness or a vast awareness embracing all things. No fabrication of the perception of objects or subjects or time—not the past, not the future, not the present. All those most fundamental structures of experience—subject, object, time, space—all this not being fabricated.

What is left then, so to speak, is the unfabricated. It's not just a blank unconsciousness, like being in a coma. It's the unfabricated.

We've talked about other ways of putting this. We discussed Avicenna in the Islamic tradition, speaking of the darkness that reigns forever. We talked about the Jewish mystics' Ayin, which translates as nothing. We talked about the Neoplatonist One. All these are actually pointing to the same thing, articulating the same transcendent experience, transcendent opening, unfabricated transcendent reality—if you like—in different language, struggling to find words there.

It's there definitely in the Christian mysticism of Meister Eckhart and St. John of the Cross. Twentieth-century theologians and philosophers—for example, Franz Rosenzweig—speak of the God that is before all relation, whether to the world or to himself, the seed point of the actuality of God. He draws on the philosopher Schelling's notion of a dark ground. Different ways of talking about it.

In Buddhadharma, the Buddha describes it in different ways, uses different language. Perhaps the clearest is the unfabricated. And it's a way of conceiving the whole process that moves toward that—learning, as I said, through developing the art of meditation and learning how to fabricate less perception, less appearance, less experience.

Just gradually, gradually—starting at the probably for most people, starting at the levels of horrendous and painful solidification of self and other, an issue that happens in papañca—and just learning, oh, through letting go of clinging, identification, certain gross clinging to conceptions, that can fade away. It cannot be fabricated in a certain moment. And say, oh, that's interesting.

Let's take this and develop the skill, basically, of learning to let go of clinging, and I'm using that word in the broadest possible sense, to include identification and subtle concepts. Learning to let go of clinging more and more deeply, and at more and more deep and subtle levels. Not forever, but in a moment, as a practice of meditation, in different ways, and as I do that, I see the world of appearance of self, objects, and eventually time and space and all that gets fabricated less and less.

Developing that skill, developing that art in lots of different and beautiful ways, I go deeper in this journey of learning to fabricate less. And eventually there's—whatever we call this—realization, experience, opening to the unfabricated.

So this is realizable, experienceable, if we use those words. They're not even quite the right words. We can open to that, we can know that if we know how, if we develop the know-how to fabricate less in any moment. Not to live in a kind of unfabricated, which is impossible anyway, but learning as what meditation is, or part of what meditation is, as we talked about on other talks, learning to fabricate less.

Now this unfabricated, and again I mentioned this before, the Buddha said—it's so transcendent and transcendent of concepts also that the Buddha describes it in three ways. Often he just says, you can't say anything about it. It's so transcendent. Where all phenomena cease, all ways of speaking, all manner of speaking ceases. He says, I think in the Suttanipāta.

Other times, and probably most often, he talks about it as so common in these mystical traditions that reach this level, talk about it in terms of negation. It's not this, it's not that. There is the absence of this, the absence of space, the absence of time, the absence of thing. And so it's sort of what corresponds to the via negativa in Christian mystical teaching. It's not this, not that, neti neti, if you know, from the Vedanta teachings.

And then the third way sometimes the Buddha talks about it is in a sort of positive affirmation as a kind of consciousness, different than our usual consciousness. Transcendent and without object and without support and not of time. Consciousness without attribute, without feature, as the Buddha describes.

Now why am I wanting to call that divine? Well, almost like I say, well, if that's not divine, I don't know what is—utterly transcendent, utterly beyond time, timeless, and therefore deathless. So that's a word the Buddha uses at times, deathless, the deathless.

And in many senses, there's this knowing that one has really a profound, profound and utterly transformative knowing of what is divine. People talk about in the theological traditions, the Godhead, God in himself herself. And this is possible for an insight meditator to know, as I said, just knowing how to go about it, go on that journey.

So there's the experience of that in a way that's utterly transcendent, that totally beyond any appearance whatsoever of any subject at all, any object, any time, et cetera. And then there's also the possibility, either before one has fully opened to that, but more often afterwards, of this unfabricated, this deathless, if you like, I say shining through appearances, shining through the appearances of this world in different ways. This sense of a timeless dimension to things, a sense of this transcendent, unfabricated, deathless, if you like, dimension, if you want to call it. The Buddha sometimes uses that word.

We could say shining through appearances and transforming the sense of this world, the sense of life and death and self and other and all of it. So, so precious. Utterly, utterly precious for a human being to know that and to taste that and to open to that.

So that's the second possibility. There's a sort of pure, transcendent, unfabricated, no appearances whatsoever, utterly beyond all experiences of subject, object, and time. And then there's the way that can actually—the authentic experience of that can kind of shine through the appearances of this world in different ways.

Thirdly, oftentimes what I hear from people, less so recently, but used to be quite a lot in other circles, is people use the language of the deathless quite a lot. Or someone might say, describing their meditation, I'm resting in the unconditioned. All I do is rest in the unfabricated, et cetera. That kind of language.

But really, what they're talking about is some other state. It's a state, an opening, a perception, a meditative perception that is, if you like, a lot less fabricated as perceptions go than normal, everyday, conventional perception that most people have most of the time. But it's less fabricated than that, but it's not yet completely unfabricated. So it's not really the authentic unfabricated or deathless. And there's many, many possibilities. There's way too many to describe now, many possibilities.

All of them are beautifully lovely. Again, some may involve the senses being completely closed in some kind of jhanic way, transcendent of the senses. And some of them —or even the very same states—have versions where the senses are more open. There's this experience, feeling, or perception of that dimension, that particular less fabricated dimension, shining through appearances. And as I said, there are many such dimensions.

Very common in our circles and related spiritual circles—not just Buddhist—would be the experience of one love, one kind of cosmic love or cosmic compassion pervading the universe, woven into the fabric of existence. When people do a metta retreat or practice metta and compassion over some weeks, this will eventually open organically, without my even suggesting it. In a way, I'm often waiting for that to happen—not as the be-all and end-all, but as one opening, one perception that is so beautiful, enriching, supportive, and helpful.

At that point, those people often start using theistic language. There's a flavor, a scent of divinity that permeates that love. That love pervading and surrounding, while holding everything, has the flavor, the taste of divinity—even if the person has never used such words before, never had that kind of experience, never had that upbringing.

Another one, probably even more common in insight meditation circles, is similar, but what pervades the universe or all appearances is awareness. This can come in many different flavors—I don't have time on this retreat to differentiate between them. But there's a kind of oneness of all things in one awareness. Sometimes people call it one mind, big mind, cosmic consciousness, or sixth jhana—different variations of the sixth jhana. There are many possibilities here. The divinity is in the awareness, this awareness that is universal—not just mine, not just in here in my body or brain looking out at the world, but everywhere. All things, if you like, are that awareness or express that awareness.

Or it can be just one physical substance or one energy. One person senses the oneness of all things in terms of matter, physicality, substance. Also very beautiful—a kind of holiness, a cosmic oneness that can be an experience of the divine.

All of these are beautiful. But none of what I've just described are quite the authentic unfabricated, because they still involve time, they still involve a sense of the present moment and a perception of space, and there's still a very subtle sense of subject and object. Still, there can be a sense, an experience, and also a conception of divinity.

There's also a whole range of levels of experience of divine oneness that come from recognizing that everything shares in the nature of emptiness, in being empty. That understanding of emptiness can be at many different levels and bring with it different corresponding levels of a sense of oneness.

So there's the transcendent experience—if we can even use that word "experience"—of the divine beyond appearances. And then there are different ways we can experience the divine through or in the appearances of the world, the appearances of others. Different ways that sense of the divine can shine through.

These can be split into two camps. There's a universal way—the divine shines through universally, and usually impersonally. For example, when the unfabricated shines through, it's universal, shining through everything, and impersonal. It may be easier to see in some situations than others—often in nature—but one gets the sense we're talking about something universal and impersonal here. In many of those other states—one cosmic love or compassion pervading the universe, one awareness of which everything is the play, everything having the substance of awareness—these openings are also universal and impersonal.

But there's a fourth possibility, which we're leaning towards more in this retreat and emphasizing: the sense of divinity shining through a person or thing as a particular theophany, a particular face of divinity or of a particular divinity. It may be an imaginal figure, or a person or thing seen as image, seen through the lens experientially of mythos, of fantasy. But not universal—particular. And not impersonal, but personal, involving personhood.

This is what I would like to hopefully unpack a little, to explore what conceptual frameworks we might offer as support. Is it possible to open and provide conceptual frameworks for a notion of divinity that can include, allow, support, and nourish a wide variety of experiences of the divine—not just of a transcendent divine or of a universal impersonal divine, but of particular theophanies? Whether they're imaginal figures or the imaginal in and through persons and things.

So my life, my personhood, your life, your personhood, or someone else's, as seen as, experienced as, sensed as, and conceived of as the expression, the manifestation, or appearing as the manifestation of the divine—of particular, unique faces of divinity. Is that possible? This is really what I would like to explore.

Just to say, as we go into this, it seems important to me—interesting certainly, but also important—in trying to offer or explore various conceptual frameworks that might support and deepen and have a place for this idea of divinity, these experiences of divinity, to tie it together with an understanding of emptiness. As I said before, to put everything, the whole Dharma, on a basis of emptiness thoroughly.

So how, for instance, does the exploration of fabrication—seeing what's fabricated, seeing how perception is fabricated and the total way it's fabricated, exploring less fabrication until one opens to the unfabricated—how does that kind of teaching, that way into understanding emptiness, tie together with some of these other ideas and conceptions? How does it tie together with the imaginal? And how does that experience of divinity as the unfabricated tie in, or relate to, other experiences of divinity?

So some of that is tied together, and the relation is actually very simple. It's really just a conception of the dharma, as we've alluded to briefly, and in a lot of detail elsewhere. The conception of the dharma is this exploration of fabrication, and different perceptions, if you like, are experienced, perceived, appear, depending on how much fabrication there is.

So an experience of cosmic love, so to speak, is an experience of much less fabrication than your everyday experience where that's not present and things and others seem very separate and very solid. So there is, if you like, a spectrum of fabrication that we can explore, and different experiences of the divine take their place on that spectrum of fabrication. And so the relationship is actually relatively simple once you get into exploring that.

The cosmic consciousness is a relatively unfabricated experience compared to everyday experience. An experience of a lot of papañcha, a lot of hindrances, a lot of self-building and other-building and issue-building is an experience of more fabrication and almost certainly less sense of divinity there. So some of the relationship is quite simple, fits quite easily—I've mapped a lot of that out before.

But in relation to the imaginal and the idea of theophany, this imaginal figure or that person that I love as theophany, and the particularities and the personhood there, the relationship is not so simple. So in exploring some of this and elaborating on and opening it out a little bit, I'm going to draw on different conceptual frameworks. Some are ones that I worked out for myself, and others originate in other traditions.

Remember when you're listening to this that no conceptual framework can claim ultimate or complete validity or truth. It cannot claim to be the total truth or to be a true explanation of everything. Any conceptual framework—there'll be some place where it either falls down or contradicts itself or inevitably, with any conceptual system, relies on some kind of assumption that's ultimately unprovable.

So rather than searching or trying to concoct some kind of complete or final system, metaphysical system or whatever, rather than that—and that's something I would actually be very much aware of if someone is claiming that or putting that forward, a system of ultimately true explanations, finally true explanations. Rather than that, and rather than seeking a conceptual framework that then is provable, I'm interested in the idea of conceptual frameworks as doorways, portals. The conceptual frameworks themselves are scaffoldings or structures that support our inquiry, our investigation, the fertilization and opening of our experience, of our practice, of our meditation. They nourish and support psyche and the meditative adventure and all of that.

So in what follows, I'm going to try to tie together a few different conceptual frameworks, but it's up to you. There's no obligation here to take any package, and certainly I'm not presenting some polished, complete product at all. You'll quickly realize that. You may gravitate towards one of these frameworks. You may tie them together in the way that I do, or I'm trying to at least, or in your own way. Or you may have some other conceptual framework that you draw on to support the validity of and fertilize imaginal practice, the sense of the divine through imaginal practice.

Let's start with what we've already talked about—this notion of fabrication of perception and the learning, the possibility to learn the skill, the art in meditation of unfabricating to different degrees, of fabricating less perception. And eventually to open to, realize, experience, so to say, the unfabricated, what is unfabricated, this transcendent dimension, if you like, beyond any subject, any object, any sense of time, including the present moment.

So how does this unfabricating work? Earlier I said it's dependent on clinging, but we could also say it's dependent on delusion. In other words, to the degree that there is delusion operating in the mind at any moment, to that degree will there be the fabrication of perception. Perception is built up, solidified, made more separate, made more intense, to the degree of delusion.

Now delusion goes with clinging and craving, as the Buddha pointed out, but delusion really is, if you like, the most important supporting condition for the fabrication of perception and appearance. That's why it's first in the twelve links of dependent arising that the Buddha outlines.

So when we look with delusion, when there's delusion in the citta, in the mind, in the heart, it fabricates more perception. Now, the state of papañcha is full of delusion, isn't it? And that's why there's more fabrication there—more fabrication of self, more fabrication of issue, more fabrication of other, story. That whole structure is the fabrication of perception.

As there's less delusion, less belief in an inherently existing self, less delusion, less belief in any of the subtle concepts that operate in the citta usually—including belief in time and space and awareness of something, there are all kinds of possibilities—and there's less clinging, so the structure of appearances, the fabrication of appearances, begins to fade. They begin to be fabricated less and less to the degree that the delusion is not there. Or we could say to the degree that insight is there, there's less delusion. Insight and delusion are inversely proportional. So less insight, more delusion, more appearances. More insight, less delusion—in other words, less appearances.

Until eventually we see that in any moment that delusion is really drained from the citta, at that moment there will be this complete unfabricating of perception, of appearance, of experience. And one opens to, if you like, the unfabricated. And we see the world of the fabricated is built on delusion, we could say. The house builder that the Buddha talks about is built on delusion. So on his awakening he said, "Ah, I've understood, and there's not the delusion anymore, house builder—you've been seen."

And so in that sense, the unfabricated takes ontological precedence over the fabricated.

It seems more real because the fabricated appears as the result of delusion. There's also a felt sense, and very much a perception, that holiness resides much more fully in the unfabricated than in the fabricated.

So actually, through this very deep experience we're discussing, a duality is created between the unfabricated and the fabricated. One seems holy, so to speak, while the other appears merely as a product—or primarily the product—of delusion. Fabricated through delusion, dependent on delusion, as the Buddha might say.

But the journey—the meditative journey into emptiness, the understanding and insight in these terms—doesn't stop there, hopefully. We begin to actually question, to see deeper into the whole notion of fabrication, into the structure of the teaching of fabrication itself. We actually see that because time is empty, because what is fabricated is empty, fabrication itself is empty too.

And this is one way of dissolving the whole duality, collapsing the entire duality between the unfabricated and the fabricated. Then there is not this sense that the unfabricated is holy and the fabricated is not holy. Everything can be seen as holy and divine—both so-called unfabricated and so-called fabricated. The duality dissolves. It takes the understanding and the meditative seeing and the being in the world to a whole other level.

In that seeing, everything is equally holy, equally divine. There's actually a possibility of seeing it all as universally divine, or of picking up this sense of divinity through the personhood and the particular that we were discussing.

So when, for instance, one employs a meditative way of looking for a time in practice, or one sees in practice—deliberately practices a way of looking that delicately, skillfully holds the understanding: this awareness right now, this moment of awareness, this mind right now, is not self. Not me, not mine, as the Buddha says. One holds that in awareness.

And one sees also that this awareness, this mind, in the same moment—it's not self, and it's also not separate from the appearances that are its objects. The subject and object, the mind and the objects of appearance, are not separate.

And one also, in the same moment, holds lightly, skillfully, in the view, in the way of looking, that this awareness, this mind, is empty in itself—perhaps, for instance, because it's beyond time in the sense that time is empty. Anything that exists must exist in time, and time is empty, therefore this awareness is empty.

When, through practice—a very, very deep practice I'm speaking of—one holds these insights very lightly, delicately, like an art, and looks and meditates on the present moment: this awareness, not self; this awareness, not separate from appearances; this awareness is, in a sense, beyond time, is empty, and the time that it exists in is empty.

Then that awareness at that time, because it has a lot of insight in it and very little delusion, is really cutting, dissolving delusion at a very fundamental level. Seeing that objects are empty—and we can include that objects are empty and the subject is empty. Then there will be an unfabricating to quite a deep degree.

And the awareness, if we still talk in terms of awareness, moves towards something completely—or to a large degree—towards this consciousness without attribute that the Buddha sometimes uses as a phrase to describe the unfabricated. It unfabricates. There's an unfabricated awareness or consciousness there, very different from our usual consciousness, and not the kind of vast awareness that I mentioned at other times.

But one possibility of holding all that insight, for a meditator who has really practiced and developed gradually this art of unfabricating, is that it unfabricates and opens, if you like, to this unfabricated awareness.

Another possibility, though, and even more artful, is that one can actually play with and modulate the degree of the fading and unfabricating of experience. It's as if you're taking your foot just lightly off the pedal, so that you're holding all this understanding of emptiness very, very lightly in the mind. It's not a great deal of thinking, but that insight is there. It's imbuing the awareness. And yet you're not letting it completely fade because you're not leaning on the insight too heavily. So it's a very light touch.

And so appearances are around, but they're imbued with the whole sense—subject, object, awareness, appearances—imbued with the deep understanding of the emptiness of all of it. Radical, deep, total emptiness.

And it's possible then to play, because appearances are still around, with tantric practice, which essentially is a mimicking of a Buddha's—I'm going to use the word gnosis, just as a translation of the Tibetan word yeshe—particularly so that we don't get confused with words like insight or awareness or wisdom. Using all these words, sometimes the vocabulary gets so confused, with people using different words or not realizing there's a difference. But the practice of tantra is this mimicking of a Buddha's gnosis, a Buddha's ultimate—let's call it wisdom awareness, as another translation of the word gnosis. And that's one way of understanding what tantra is.

In this sense, the word ultimate actually means ultimate because it's what a Buddha has, like a fully awakened being. So we've touched on this before, that in the Vajrayana, in the tantric teachings, the word ultimate is used in different ways. Sometimes it's used to refer to emptiness; sometimes ultimate means what a Buddha enjoys or what is characteristic of a Buddha. And again, there's all kinds of confusion and slipperiness with vocabulary.

So sometimes in tantric teachings, in Vajrayana teachings—now I'm going to draw particularly on someone like Mipham from the Nyingma tradition; he died in 1912, I think. A brilliant, brilliant teacher and scholar from the Tibetan tradition, from the Nyingma Tibetan tradition. He would use the same words like emptiness or suchness or ultimate in different ways at different times. But in their deepest meaning, when he used them in their deepest meaning, they all kind of refer to the same thing. And another word is Buddha nature. It's this ultimate gnosis of a Buddha. It's a Buddha's perspective.

So this Buddha nature, this ultimate, actually in his way of presenting what Buddha nature means, includes both the subjective and the objective aspects of this Buddha mind, this Buddha gnosis, this ultimate Buddha consciousness. Both the subjective—and that subjective is this yeshe, this gnosis, this awareness that is empty and that knows emptiness.

Sometimes people use the word—this is an aside now—sometimes people use the word pure awareness, but awareness always has some degree of insight or delusion in it. And it always has, it's always mixed with other inclinations, some degree of clinging, and so on, some degree of conceiving.

But this idea of the yeshas, the gnosis, the Buddha gnosis, is an empty awareness. It has no inherent existence. But it's a gnosis, it's an awareness that knows the emptiness of everything, including itself—space, time, all objects, all subjects, everything. That's what yeshas is from the subjective aspect.

And the subjective aspect of the Buddha nature perceives the objective aspect of the Buddha nature, which is a world of divine appearances. Not just universally, like all imbued with divinity in a kind of universal way, but also particulars—particular deities, particular manifestations, and particular deities manifesting through particular objects or places or beings in the conventional sense.

So all of that together—the subjective aspect, the yeshas, the wisdom awareness, the empty awareness that knows the emptiness of all things, and the objective aspect, the perceptions of the divinity and the particular divinity of divine appearances—all that is Buddha nature in, say, Mipham's framework. And all of it is the ultimate.

Now, not to confuse things, but there is a parallel here between some of what we've just been talking about and also the teachings of Isaac Luria, who was, I think, a sixteenth-century Kabbalist living in Safed in Palestine. And he elaborated a kind of mythic metaphor, if you like, for the aspects of the divine, for the nature of the divine.

And in that aspect—this is not to be taken literally, certainly, and also not to be taken temporally—but in that sense, then, the Godhead, the innermost transcendent aspect of God, the light of God, if you like, the wisdom, the yeshas, the gnosis, if we translate between systems, or this unfabricated awareness, exists, so to speak. And then within that light of God's wisdom, there's a withdrawing from a certain, if you like, region. Again, this is mythic. It's not literal. It's not even temporal. There's a certain withdrawing of God's own light from a portion of that light, so to speak. And that withdrawing creates a space in which the creation of the world happens.

So you can actually see—I don't know if you can hear in that—that withdrawing is called tzimtzum in Hebrew. And actually here in that, something akin to the teachings of fabrication and unfabrication, if we translate creation as the dependent origination of appearances, then you could hear it or read it as: there is this unfabricated awareness when there's insight and wisdom there to a total degree. If I, so to speak, withdraw some of that insight, or, as I said, don't lean on it so much, or if I allow it to be not so complete, then appearances can be fabricated. It allows fabrication.

There are real parallels I find interesting between that and the teaching of the dependent origination of appearances, once one has understood that teaching at a deep enough level and can hear in a different way these other—which to us sound very strange—theistic systems, often depending on your background.

And then the question would be: why would God withdraw some of the light of that insight? And there are different answers there in this mythic system. Partly because God's nature is infinite. And being infinite, God includes not just the transcendent aspect that's beyond appearances, beyond form, beyond manifestation, but also includes the whole realm of manifestation—indeed all manifestation—because God is infinite in nature, ain sof, without end in the Hebrew. That's one example.

Another part of the answer, which in a way is also very beautiful, is because of God's desire. You may have heard this: God desired to know himself, to know herself through appearance, through manifestation. And so there's this desire to not remain completely transcendent, unfabricated, without form, without manifestation, without all of that. And again, not to stretch it too much, but we can see the desire there and the relation between how clinging and craving work to fabricate appearance in the Wheel of Dependent Origination.

But Isaac Luria goes even further, because all this—that kind of mythic metaphor, structure, conceptual structure of the nature of God, all that, this idea of God withdrawing from a portion of his divine light, withdrawing, creating a region of less light—that whole idea is from the perspective of the human only. From God's perspective, there is no withdrawing of light. There is no tzimtzum.

So again, if you can feel into this a little bit and actually see, oh, that's similar to this, or has parallels with this further stage of the teaching about fabrication—actually understanding both fabrication and unfabrication are empty, that there is no duality there. So the teaching of fabrication and unfabricating is all, from a certain perspective at another level—it's all samata, it's all equality. It's all empty. There is no duality there. So it's a teaching from a certain level of perspective, whereas this is all from the perspective of the human only. It's not God's perspective. It's not an ultimate truth.

Now when I practice and get a sense, if I develop the art of my practice, of my meditative practice and my skill with emptiness and playing with fabrication and appearance and unfabricating, when I do that and develop that, then I can ask at a certain point, at any point perhaps: whose mind is this? Whose awareness is this? Whose wisdom is this? Because I can see it is not self. It's not my awareness. There's a real developed perception possible.

This awareness is not self. It's a really important practice to cultivate. But at the same time, it's not separate from appearances. And if I'm practicing in a certain way, it's not separate from the divine appearances that I sense. And I sense too, whose mind, I ask you, whose mind is this? Because it's not self, it's not separate from appearances or divine appearances, it's beyond time, it's empty. Whose mind is that?

I cannot, I'll get the sense in asking that as a meditative question that both conceptually and experientially, we could say, I see my mind, this mind, so-called my mind, is not separate from this Buddha nature. It is not separate from the cosmic Buddha or the ultimate, as Mipham described it, is not separate from this ultimate mind or God, the mind, the awareness of God or the divine. So not just conceptually, but experientially, I can open up that sense.

And why is that important? First of all, it's a very beautiful, very freeing experience of the divine, but it gives a sense of my being, my citta, participating in the divine at the deepest level. And this is actually a hinge point, this idea of participation in the divine is a hinge point in terms of trying to create or offer conceptual frameworks that support a sense of divinity. Divinity comes in there are many, many possible flavours of participation.

The other day my friend took me to a beautiful stretch of the river, of the river Dart. I'd never been there before. And there was a bend in the river and there was no one there. We were there alone. It was a cold day, beautiful day, beautiful autumn day. And there was a steep cliffside on the other side of the river and trees, wooded and really, really gorgeous. And the colours of autumn and the leaves falling on the water.

And I was sitting there, opening to the whole scene and taking it in and the beauty of it. And into my mind suddenly came a line or a fragment even from Thomas Merton. "Day unto day uttereth speech" was what I remembered. I can't even remember if that's the right thing or if it's half a sentence or what the context was. I think it's the beginning of a passage of writing. Day unto day uttereth speech, whether he's quoting someone else or what, I don't know. I wasn't even sure if I was remembering it right, but day unto day uttereth speech. I had no idea what it meant, or what he meant by it, or what the original thing meant, but it was something that ignited something in me, in my heart and mind and soul and in the perception as I was looking at the river and the autumn scene and the beauty there.

And I didn't quite know what it meant. But that poetic phrase came into the perception and shaped and opened the perception in a certain way. It's actually quite difficult to describe.

So here I am sitting by the river, a beautiful spot and everything that's there. As always, there's many ways of looking. It's only a lack of meditative skill or, as I said, conceptual frameworks that are too constraining, whether we realize it or not, that actually limit our ways of looking.

So very possible in that situation to see that scene only sensually, in the sense of, wow, pretty colors of autumn, yellow and red and gold, and how they reflect in the water. And one is just really, if you like, responding or tuning in at the level of purely sensual pleasure, if such a thing exists, or pretty colours there, is one way of looking.

Or, of course, it being autumn, one could be filled with a sense of impermanence and reflect on impermanence, the leaves falling onto the river and swept gently along by the current and that could be what one is sort of tuning into and what colours and shapes the perception.

Or a different variation of the whole process of nature moving, the river flowing, the decay, the growth and then the decay and the whole cycle that the process one could tune into that, that would be a way of seeing, a way of looking, supported by the conceptual framework of process, et cetera.

But what was there for me was somehow triggered by this day unto day utterance speech, this fragment of writings, poetic, these poetic words whose meaning I couldn't really say. There was really a beautiful and very difficult to describe sense of participation, a kind of cosmology, or cosmopoiesis, actually, if we use the word, was there, was opened for me.

In other words, the whole cosmos, including myself, and the whole scene there, and the whole of nature, was seen in a particular way, was felt in a particular way that involved participation and particularly the echoes of that, of those words, somehow as if the trees were speaking, or the cosmos was speaking, maybe that's a better way of putting it, the cosmos was speaking, but obviously using the word speaking poetically. So there was this poetic sense of speech, the cosmos as divine speech, and of my being participating in that.

I could describe more, but it's actually not that important. Part of what I want to draw attention to is, one may say, a person might say, I sensed or I felt I sense, I feel, I am participating in something larger than us. In other words, the kinds of sense of participation we can have in terms of the way we sense the cosmos are varied.

So many people might say, I sense, feel, and I'm participating in something larger than us. But what was characteristic about this sense was that it did not only refer to the fact that I was aware of or thinking of a vast web or a vast net of physical objects or more dynamically physical events or processes in which I participate, my body breathing back and forth, the autumn air, etc., my even slight sweat coming from my body or how...

into the air, or how this body arose out of the earth and the elements—that kind of level is a horizontal level of participation there.

So that kind of participation, which sometimes people sense or want to emphasize, is what I would call participation at a horizontal level, at the level of physicality. But here, the sense of participation also involved other levels—other than the physical, physical material in the ways that we usually construe physicality and materiality in modernist culture. I don't know—spiritual, soulful, mental, divine really, and divine in both a transcendent and an immanent aspect.

So part of what was mixed in there was the sense of the unfabricated shining through, but it was only part of it. There was a kind of vague cosmopoiesis. I'll come back to this word "vague" because it's actually important to realize that a lot of the experiences we have that are tied into conceptual frameworks are quite vague, and that does not matter. I'll return to that.

But there was a kind of—if you like—vague, poetic sense of the cosmos, very much involving this multi-leveled participation, a participation at levels that were beyond the physical, that involved my mind, my awareness, the roots of that, and the sense of the root of that in the unfabricated, if you like, and so forth.

Now, I know many people, or some people would say—just as a philosophical point—I know many people say, "Well, you can't prove that that's there, these other levels." And that's absolutely right, and I alluded to this before. We're talking here about realms of experience or dimensions of experience, and conceptual frames. They're not in the realm of verifiability as it is scientifically defined. So we're not actually in the business of proving, and nor are we in the realm of what's provable, verifiable according to the paradigms as defined by science. But so what? So what?

We're talking about experience, perception—deep, life-changing, important, these kinds of things that matter to us deeply. And so what if it's not in the realm of the provable or the scientifically verifiable?

I wonder sometimes whether that kind of perception—I know I only described it vaguely—but I wonder whether that kind of perception, that sense of participation at other levels, the sense of a kind of vague cosmopoiesis or cosmopoetics that involves that kind of thing that I described—whether that's... I wonder whether it's not available to most people. I wonder if it's gone out of fashion in some ways, meaning that it's not really supported as a perception for people these days because people don't read so much about that sort of thing or don't talk about it or hear about it.

And because of that, it's not supported as an actual experience that can open. Or I wonder whether people do actually experience that, but are kind of clumsy in trying to communicate it or express it, or limited because they don't have the conceptual frameworks or the vocabulary, or a little lazy or shy.

So I wonder, actually, about all this stuff—in the imaginal and the cosmopoiesis, this stuff—whether it's more prevalent than one might assume, or whether there's reasons why it's not prevalent. Because it's actually not supported because of not being talked about, not being shared, not being given conceptual structures that support it.

So what I was describing by the river, in a way, as I said, mixes—mixes a sense of the unfabricated shining through and also a kind of cosmopoiesis or theophany, the divine speaking through nature that was more than what we usually mean when we sort of think of poetic metaphors. It wasn't that I heard any words, it wasn't that literal, but it was something that was palpable, that made a very deep impression, more than just a way of speaking about something. But this was a mixture of the unfabricated shining through and a kind of cosmopoetic theophany there.

As I said, there are—we could say—three possibilities of the divine appearing through appearance, of the unfabricated shining through in the authentic unfabricated. There's the sort of universal awareness or universal love, other kinds of more common senses of the divine in a universal and impersonal way shining through. And then there's a third possibility or range of possibilities that involve the imaginal and theophany and cosmopoetics—meaning, the divine coming through particularly, in particular ways, particular appearances through the particularities of a person, their personhood, and so forth. And the particular face of the divine in that way.

And again, just as a philosophical point, a person may say, "Well, yes, okay, you had such an experience or this or many of the other experiences that I describe that people have had or I share with you. And it's supposed to say, well, but it may be that it turns out not to be true or it's not true." This is, again, such an idea. I wonder whether it falls into kind of a tight and narrow and not fully opened up conception of truth—that either it is or it isn't true. It's a way of regarding truth and reality that's very understandable given how we've been taught to conceive and think of things.

But maybe it doesn't have to be in that tight camp of either is true or is not true. As I said several times in this retreat, the whole notion of reality and truth needs opening out, kind of filling out the range. We need to be a little more sophisticated with what we're talking about.

And here, in these kinds of experiences, as I said, we're concerned with perception—meaning experience—and also meaningfulness. And it's important to realize that this is what matters to us as human beings. Perception and experience of course matter. Our experience matters to us. And meaningfulness matters to us as human beings. And they matter to us deeply, deeply.

So it's not so much, "Can I prove this or that?" but experience matters. The range and the kinds of experience and the depth of experience and our sense and taste of meaningfulness and the depth of meaningfulness. We need to realize this is what matters to us.

And these are constructed—perception, experience, appearance. These are constructed and fabricated, inevitably so, and subjectivity, my subjectivity is involved. So right there, there's an opening up of the whole sort of tight way of regarding truth, because we're dealing with perception and meaningfulness there, and we're acknowledging that they're constructed, inevitably they involve the subject. We're not simply talking about something that's independently, objectively real. Meaningfulness—meaning and meaninglessness can never be purely objective, can never be. Actually, neither can perception, and so forth.

So perception and certainly meaningfulness are participatory, constructed and fabricated through the way of looking, through the conception.

This insight is shared by postmodern understandings. Many people have written about this. I feel sometimes that postmodern writers, or writers about postmodern traditions—if you can even call it tradition, or that direction, that thrust—are in a way limited through not having meditative experience. The participation they're talking about, the construction of perspective they're pointing out, is usually to do with texts and words and quite gross levels of perceptions.

Even people like Heidegger and others—all these people really lacked a depth of meditation that would have enabled them to enter deeply into the subtleties of what's involved in participating in experience and constructing and fabricating all the subtle conceptuality that's involved. They're way more subtle than language or words or thought, as they so often pointed to.

When one has that degree of understanding and learns actually to move between multiple perspectives, realizing none are true, it's quite different from just an intellectual, philosophical understanding of, say, post-structuralism or post-modernism that just deconstructs this or that perspective or understanding or piece of writing or philosophy and pulls it down or points out how it's constructed at a certain level.

Oftentimes what happens then is it just veers towards a kind of nihilism, as if recognizing that all perspectives are not true—constructed—but there isn't then enough meditative skill, because one hasn't developed that meditation, to actually then realize: oh, these are all constructed, actually constructed on a much more subtle and deep level, all these perspectives. I can actually realize that and then enter into multiple perspectives.

Rather than just deconstructing and being left with a kind of cold, barren nihilism or an intellectual game that leads nowhere, I can actually enter into different perspectives. We talked about so much on this retreat and play with that meditatively—moving between different perspectives, different ways of looking, opening up different senses of the cosmos, different soul worlds, different ways of seeing, engaging cosmopoiesis. All of it without clinging to it as real, as ultimately real, as true in that kind of tight way.

But it gives me real, practical, lived fluidity and this increased range in which I can experience beauty of the different perspectives. Doors open, worlds open. Rather than the kind of nihilism and barrenness that might come out of a purely intellectual postmodernism, I'm really interested in opening up the realm of experience, perception that's possible for us as human beings.

But also, rather than that kind of result of nihilism, I'm interested in keeping meaningfulness alive, in keeping the possibilities for meaningfulness alive, keeping them as viable options for us at times. I'm interested in conceptual structures and practices that support a deep and rich and enriching sense of meaningfulness in our lives. Not to cling to a sense of meaningfulness out of some kind of fear of our real existential situation. Not to cling to it at all. It's an option. At times there are different kinds of sense of meaningfulness. We can have a sense of that deep meaningfulness to our lives. And at times it's not there and it's not needed.

When, for instance, there's the perception of the unfabricated shining through everything, that's beyond meaningfulness. And it's an experience of the divine, but in a way it dissolves any sense of or need for meaningfulness at that time. And yet there are other dimensions of the being, the soul, the psyche that need meaningfulness, of which meaningfulness is actually an integral part.

So I'm interested in that—not to cling to it all the time, cling to a certain idea or cling to a certain experience of meaningfulness, but to have it as a viable option, something we move in and out of in rich and wide and deep ways, alive ways, so that this is open.

Of course we can deconstruct meaningfulness—we can do it in many ways—but not only do that. And if I talk about meaningfulness, I'm going to come back to this in relation to all this question of the divine. But meaningfulness, we can realize, has no inherent existence. It's not independent of the subject, of my mind, of the concept. Of course not.

But again, we fall so easily into this polarized or dualistic thinking. Either it's real in some kind of purely objective way, in the way I understand objects as being different, separate from the subject, from me and my consciousness. Either it's real in that way—the meaningfulness of my life, or this aspect of meaningfulness—or I am just making it up, and therefore it's unreal in the way that I narrowly conceive of real. You can see all this is so easy for us to assume. Either the cosmos or life or my life is meaningful in a real way, which somehow means independently objective way, or I'm making it up. It's either one or the other.

But can I see? Actually, no. It has no inherent existence. It's not independent of the consciousness, and yet it still has validity because I'm not falling into that separation of subject and object, subject and world, cosmos—that whole conceptual framework, ideology, lack of understanding.

So I'm really interested in this dimension of meaningfulness, or these experiences of meaningfulness in our lives. And that comes—I'll revisit this later—but that comes through the personal divine rather than the universal divine or the impersonal divine. So it's through the experience of images as we have been talking about them, with this sense of being rooted in archetypes and daimons and other levels that want something from me in my life. This meaningfulness is through those kind of experiences of the divine—they're in images and in seeing my life or my person or another person's life, another person's personhood as reflecting or rooted in or mirroring, originated in archetypes, daimons, some other level that's retaining of the personal and the particular.

So I'm going to revisit that, but all that's implied—part of what's implied there is then how to tie this understanding of emptiness and the unfabricated with this sense of the more personal divine, because that's where the experience of meaningfulness is possible.

So we still have to tie them together, or rather we're interested in tying them together. For someone like Henri Corbin, he was working, if you like, from really a kind of Platonic or neo-Platonic sort of conceptual structural philosophy, or variations on that. I'm not going to go into details of that and describe that—we don't have time. But he was working in that kind of framework.

In that kind of framework, there is, or that kind of theology, if you like, this ultimate reality which is very akin, as we said, to the unfabricated, the neo-Platonic one. In Latin, sometimes they call it the deitas absconditas, the hidden god. It's inaccessible to the senses or to any manifestation in form or image—a hidden god or godhead beyond, if you like, human accessibility.

When there is that as a sort of theological construct, then the human being needs angels to span the sort of chasm, the abyss, between the godhead and the human. They are, if you like, images of God, as we talked about, theophanies. For Corbin, he actually held that it was impossible to have an experience of this deus absconditus, and he held any such experience to be a sort of self-delusion, if I read him right. But then again, he almost certainly was never given the kind of or taught the kind of meditative tools and arts that I've been describing in terms of unfabricating that would actually help him to move towards that and have that kind of experience.

But in that system there's a kind of transcendent God and then one needs the images to be the theophanies, to have the experience of God, because I cannot have an experience of this inaccessible, transcendent God in that kind of thinking. So in that system, the angels are—I mean, it's quite an elaborate system—but they are tied together, but there's a kind of, they span this chasm, if you like, the imaginal figures.

But he also, I'll stay with Corbin for a minute, he also, for him, would hold the human imagination as, and would regard it as distinct from the divine imagination, but actually kind of continuous with it. In other words, we're back to what I was describing earlier, this realization that we can have, this perspective that we can have in a very palpable way. Yes, it's a concept, but it's also a kind of experience, if you like, that comes out of that concept and out of the meditative play and meditative seeing, that my mind, my awareness, that includes my imagination, is not separate from God's imagination, God's mind.

And especially when we tend towards gnosis, when there's a lot of emptiness and the malleability in the seeing, when there's very little clinging, when there's a lot of insight around, we're playing in that kind of tantric way, then we really sense then, or can sense, that the imagination is not separate from God's imagination, so to speak. God's imagination is manifesting through my imagination. My imagination is a manifestation of God's imagination.

So, and even for Corbin, there's a kind of theological structure there. As I said, I'm actually quoting someone called Thomas Cheetham who writes a lot about Corbin. He said, "The human imagination for Corbin is distinct from but continuous with the divine imagination." You can see how that parallels very much what I was talking about earlier. Whose mind is this? Being that it's not-self, it's not separate from divine appearances, it's beyond time and it's empty. I can sense, I can conceive it as not separate, this mind, this awareness, this imagination is not separate from God, God's mind, from the ultimate mind, from the Buddha nature, etc.

And then this experience that we—I would say is inevitable for someone practicing, doing imaginal practice after a while and practicing deeply with imaginations—you have a sense of, yes, creating an image, but also discovering an image. So creating maybe a soul world or a cosmopoetic cosmos, a sense of the cosmos or this image or whatever that comes, but also discovering it. So yes, it's my mind creating it. I can have that sense of it and I can acknowledge that. We've touched on this a little bit before. But I also have the sense of somehow it has some kind of autonomous existence. You could say, because it's in the mind of God, it's in the divine mind, it's part of the Buddha nature, the potential of the Buddha nature.

Let's stop there and pick up a little further later on.

CHAPTER 18

A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoesis (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 46 min

In this second part of his exploration of sacred universe concepts, Rob Burbea addresses common philosophical objections to imaginal practice, particularly around questions of fabrication and reality. Drawing on Henri Corbin's work on theophanic vision and the mundus imaginalis, he examines how deep insight into the fabricated nature of all perception—central to Buddhist emptiness teachings—actually opens rather than closes possibilities for imaginal work. Burbea discusses how practices of 'unfabricating' perception through samādhi, mettā, and emptiness meditation naturally give rise to experiences of cosmopoesis and divine perception. He explores the mutual relationship between these practices, showing how each supports and deepens the others. The talk concludes with an examination of the Sanskrit roots of 'tantra' and 'mantra,' revealing their connection to the themes of manifestation, sacrifice, and perceiving the world as sacred. Burbea situates imaginal practice within the broader context of tantric approaches, including Dzogchen, while acknowledging that terms like 'divine' can provoke strong reactions in contemporary practitioners.

So again, the whole question of assumptions and views about reality—what is real and what isn't real, ontology if you like is the fancy word for that—is very much part of the context of imaginal practice. The conceptual framework shapes how we'll hear some of these teachings and the confidence with which we'll be able to play and experiment.

I mentioned this much earlier, but it's worth saying again: people are very different with this in regard to imaginal practice. Some people don't seem to need much exploration of philosophy and questions of reality or opening up. They can just plunge into imaginal practice and play to their heart's content without needing any of that. Some people are even aversive to any philosophical discussion or exploration or opening up or questioning—they don't like the conceptuality of that.

Other people need a certain amount, which varies very much from person to person, to legitimize or give a basis or framework, a supporting framework for practice of the imaginal. Some people just need a little bit. A friend was telling me the other day that she just had a conversation with someone at a party, and this person just needed a little something that legitimized certain explorations with the imagination for them. Oftentimes that is the case. And other people need quite a lot.

There will be some people—many people probably—who are so entrenched or indoctrinated, if you like, with the dominant cultural modernist paradigms and views and assumptions that it really either takes an awful lot of time and pondering of the conceptual frameworks and philosophy underpinning the assumptions to liberate enough space and justification for imaginal practice and views, or it's actually impossible. So that's just interesting, especially as a teacher, to note.

I'll just share that for me, I'm actually really interested in these questions of ontology. Not that I think one can ever figure out the truth, but I'm still interested in conceptual frameworks and possible conceptual frameworks. In other words, conceptual frameworks can be things of beauty, and they are structures, avenues that open poetic possibilities and beautiful possibilities for the heart and the soul and experience. So I'm very interested in that, and if you like, a dimension or an aspect of the soul loves ideas and loves concepts.

It's just that I don't personally, for all the reasons I've said, believe that one will come to a conceptual system or framework that is the truth or the answer. And that frees up the whole investigation. You actually enter into it playing with it the way one might play with images or any other practice.

So there's a lot of range here too around the whole ways of relating to these questions of reality and ontology in regard to the imaginal, imaginal figures, imaginal worlds, et cetera, and all that. And oftentimes, as I said, some people—many people—will object. They're attracted perhaps, or not attracted, and something objects. And those objections, philosophically, if you like, are usually fairly predictable, understandably so, given the culture.

They say, "Well, that's fabrication. Aren't you fabricating that image or that perception of the world or that kind of perception of the cosmos or experience of the cosmos? And it's fabricated." Now, of course, the other unspoken side of that sentence, or that objection, is the assumption that there is something that is not fabricated. There's a perception that we can have of the world or of self or something that is real, objectively real and not fabricated.

The person voicing that objection has not understood, has not seen through practice, through deep insight into emptiness, the fabric, the extent of fabrication. All perception is fabricated. All experience, all appearance is fabricated. Without wanting to say—really without saying—that all fabrication is the same, so to fabricate an image is the same as fabricating a perception of this chair that I'm sitting on. Without saying that, there's something that the insight, the deep, thorough, total insight into the fabrication of perception, and then the emptiness of fabrication too—there's something that that level and that thoroughness of insight does that opens up and dissolves this objection: "Isn't that a fabrication?" about that image or that way of fantasying something in one's life or self or other or world, etc.

So that objection, "It's a fabrication, isn't that a fabrication?" almost always betrays an assumption of some kind of reality that we can experience—the thing or this or that object or self or experience, a perception that's not fabricated. Not enough exploration of emptiness there.

Or one might say, "Well, these images, imaginal figures, they're not real because they're not material. I cannot touch it or kick it or whatever it is." But again, a little more probing into this shows a lot of problems. One thing that occurs to me right now is that we've talked a lot about how images can affect the energy body. So there is, if you like, a kind of sensation in regards to images. The more you go into the matter of practice, the more you notice actually how strong this can be at times, and how vivid and how precise and particular some of this can be.

But perhaps even more significantly, we might just ask this person who's objecting this way, we might ask them in response: What is matter? What do you think matter is? This may be something we'll come back to, because if you take the route of modern physics, actually, you go deeper and deeper into this question. What is matter? Well, it's made of atoms.

Well, what are atoms? They're made of protons and electrons and neutrons. Well, what's an electron? As you go deeper and deeper into it, it becomes actually very hard to say what matter is and whether matter exists or doesn't exist in the way that we tend to think of what it means to exist—to be something independently in a certain place at a certain time and everything I said before.

When we go into an electron, many of us will say, what's an electron? Well, it's an equation, really. And that equation is an equation of probability of manifesting in certain ways depending on how one is looking at it. What is matter? I say the real is material. I respond, what is matter? What do you mean by matter? And those equations exist in other dimensions than three dimensions—they exist in thirteen dimensions or something more. Actually, they exist in a number of dimensions depending on how many electrons we're talking about.

Or philosophically, if one takes what's called a phenomenological view—as an attempt to approach philosophy through just what we experience—we say, well, I experience resistance, or coolness, or heat, or hardness, or softness, and that's what I'm calling matter. But that's actually a different thing. Then we're back to the realm of perception and fabrication of perception.

So this idea that only the real is what's material is very understandable, but probe a little deeper. What do we mean by material? What is material? What is matter? We can approach that in different ways—physics, philosophy, dharma practice. It dissolves, if you like, hardened notions, ossified notions of what matter is when we explore, when we question deeply through one of those avenues.

Then a person might say, well, what's real is what's shared. So if I get one hundred people in a room and let's say at least ninety-seven of them agree on what is there, what they experience, what they see—everyone sees the table or whatever it is—then we can say the table is real. So reality is given by what is shared, and the other two or three people are just a bit bonkers or weird or whatever.

Again, so saturated and habituated are we to that kind of assumption that we don't often really question it. There are a few things to say here. One is just to point out that many images are shared, of course. Culturally, for example, one just needs to think of the image of Jesus or the Buddha in Buddhist cultures or our culture nowadays. So many images are shared. And of course there are many secular images—it doesn't have to be spiritual or religious—many secular fantasies of existence, of the world, of society, of self, other, as we touched on briefly.

There's also—to allude to this, though it's not the subject of this retreat and we really have to wait for another retreat—but it's very interesting... That's an understatement, but a whole direction opens up when two or more people engage in imaginal practice together. As a kind of relational meditation in the field together, including lots of aspects and dimensions of their experience, meditating together, talking with each other, experiencing, communicating together in the realm of the imaginal, there are ways that images are shared in that way. And actually in all kinds of ways through that. That's really a whole other retreat.

But in a way, more importantly to this objection—the real is what's shared—is just posing a counter question: can something have a kind of reality? Because a lot of the problem here is in that word reality. Can it have a kind of reality, or a kind of validity, if you like, when it is not shared? Can something not be shared and have a kind of reality, a kind of validity? Why not?

This is very important. When Corbin and Walter Wink and William Blake say the imaginal is more real—whatever words they used to say that—more real than the physical, when they say that, they're not implying that if you do imaginal practice right, if ten people do imaginal practice right, they'll all experience the same thing. There's a kind of non-individual shared reality that exists in the object. It's objective, independent of the individual. I don't think that that's being implied at all. Or if it is, I'd like to question that.

And when someone—I don't know who used the term—speaks of the discipline of the imagination or disciplined imagination, again in contrast to the imaginary or just what we call being lost in papañca or just daydreaming and that sort of thing, again it's not that if one practices with the imaginal, different people will see the same image and experience the same thing.

I think, or I would like to hope that the phrase "disciplined imagination"—wherever it was coined, whether by Hillman or Corbin or another—truly refers to what we explored earlier in this retreat: the delicacy and nuance of mindfulness that one brings to imaginal practice. It speaks to the sensitivity to resonances, the tuning of attention and energy, the careful noticing and encouraging of what nourishes, deepens, opens, ignites, and broadens the sense of soulfulness. All of this constitutes the disciplined imagination. It does not mean that such practice will result in experiences or images that are somehow universal or non-individual.

This distinction is crucial. Robert Avens, quoting Henri Corbin, writes about theophanic vision—meaning a vision where something else shines through the image, figure, or imaginal seeing. Perhaps it's another person, oneself, or the world itself, but there's a sense that something divine is showing through, coming through that particular face of the divine. We might call it seeing this or that as angel, if you will.

Corbin wrote that "the theophanic vision is essentially an event of the soul, taking place in the soul and for the soul." Notice here that Corbin's language and conception tends toward using "soul" as a kind of entity. We touched on this in our discussion about soul-making. This usage is perfectly fine—that's his style of language. For myself, I tend toward the language of soul-making, moving away from entities, though entities work as long as we understand they don't possess inherent existence.

Corbin continues: "As such, its reality is individuated for and with each soul. What the soul really sees, it is in each case alone in seeing." In other words, the reality of soul is not consensual, not shared, not socially agreed upon—it's individual. He adds: "The field of its vision, its horizon is in every case defined by the capacity, the dimension of its own being."

I want to share another brief passage, but must preface it by noting that Corbin's system, conceptual framework, and vocabulary differ significantly from ours. He draws from monotheistic traditions—particularly Islamic mysticism within the broader Abrahamic context—and Platonic philosophy. It's quite a different system with different vocabulary and conceptual framework, though beautiful and elaborate. Rather than attempting to outline all of this now, I'm taking the liberty of translating it somewhat for our purposes here, adapting his vocabulary and concepts to ones we've discussed more thoroughly.

Avens writes: "Soul-making creates imaginal figures, but their reality is neither hallucinatory nor illusory. They are neither objectively nor subjectively real, but belong to the intermediary and mediating realm of the mundus imaginalis"—Latin for the world of imagination, the imaginal world. "They are God, or gods, seen in such a form as an individual person is able to grasp." These imaginal figures created by the soul are perceptions that constitute reality for the soul, despite—or precisely because of—their individual nature.

Note in both passages what I want to emphasize: these visions are individual but dependent on the soul. We've emphasized this repeatedly throughout our exploration—they depend on the soul, or the citta, the mind-heart, the way of looking, the mind-state, the inclination, the assumption, all of that in the present moment. Dependent on all of this, the image arises. We never part from this understanding of dependent arising.

Swedenborg wrote that in heaven—we might say in this imaginal world, this mundus imaginalis—"the form of your world is what you are." William Blake offered a beautiful phrase: "As a man is, so he sees." I'd like to add three words to that ending, because one might easily think, "Well, I don't see angels, I don't see beauty, therefore I'm not spiritual or pure enough." But I would amend Blake's words: "As a man is, so he sees at that moment."

At this moment, when the citta is colored in this particular way, when this conception operates subtly or more consciously, as a person is, so they see. Again, we understand this as fabricated, as dependent arising, as empty—like all perception, it arises dependently.

"As a man is, so he sees"—we can take this as a statement about being in the world and seeing the world. I see the world, the self, others in ways dependent on how I am in that moment. Dependent on the state of mind, the inclination, the conception, the way of looking, I see that way, I sense that way, I perceive that way.

That's a fundamental Dharma concept.

But it applies too to the realm of the imaginal. So we have to acknowledge that with conventional reality, with material things, fabrication and dependent arising are part of the perception of everything. Everything—all perception—is dependent arising that way. But we're emphasizing it as well in terms of the reality of the imaginal world.

So again, it's not an objective reality. It's not independent of the individual consciousness, the mind and heart that are seeing that way. And yes, there are differences between what appears purely to the imagination versus something that's perceived as material and shared with others in conventional perception. Sometimes conventional perception is imbued with mythos and fantasy, and sometimes much less so when we're practicing bare attention, as we discussed before.

There are differences in the kinds of fabrication that are operating there, and as I said, I'm not sure how to fit all that together into a grand, overarching conceptual framework. So acknowledging those differences, but there's something fundamental to all reality, which is: as a man is, so he sees. As the consciousness is, as the mind is, so we see at any moment. All perception—dependent arising, fabricated, empty.

And as I mentioned briefly before, it's this exploration and understanding of fabrication—part of which is the exploration of unfabricating, of learning to fabricate less and less perception through different practices, and eventually, hopefully, to open to the unfabricated where one is not fabricating any perception at all. The exploration and the deep insight, reflecting on that and understanding that, opens possibilities and doors in terms of experience, in terms of the range of perception, in terms of understanding, and what's possible in terms of conceptual frames. It's massive.

So putting that as the basis and central axis for what the whole of the Dharma is liberates a lot of possibilities for imaginal work for many people.

Listen to this. In relation to this whole avenue and basis of understanding fabrication—understanding fabrication through learning to unfabricate, then realizing that this thing, either that perception or sense of self or whatever, was fabricated. When I looked in this way, therefore I realized it's a fabrication, going deeper and deeper into that until one reaches the unfabricated.

In a very different tradition, Avicenna was a renowned Islamic philosopher, mystic, also a doctor, a very important pioneer of medical understanding, and just a general polymath, genius person who lived in the late tenth and early eleventh centuries. In relation to this exploration of unfabricating and learning about fabrication, in relation to that and the imaginal, listen:

"She who confronts the darkness that reigns forever"—this darkness that reigns forever has nothing to do with moral darkness or evil or anything like that. The darkness that reigns forever is, in Dharma language, the unfabricated, the unconditioned, what the Buddha sometimes referred to as the deathless or the asaṅkhatadhamma, the unfabricated. This transcending of any perception, darkness because there is no perceiving there, that reigns forever because it's beyond time.

"She who confronts this unfabricated, the darkness that reigns forever, and does not hesitate to plunge into it for fear of difficulties, will come to a vast space, boundless and filled with light. The first thing she sees is a living spring whose waters spread like a river over this interworld, the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal. Whoever bathes in that spring becomes so light that she can walk upon water, can climb the highest peak without weariness."

Corbin writes about this passage from Avicenna: "Once the soul has emerged from darkness, once it has risen from the abyss of unconsciousness"—again, by the abyss of unconsciousness, he means exactly what the Buddha would call cessation of consciousness, cessation of perception and feeling, if you know the Dharma lingo from dependent origination. So this opening to the unfabricated, this non-fabricating of perception.

"Once the soul has emerged from that darkness, from that abyss of unconsciousness"—and he writes—"this changing the appearance of things, walking on water, climbing Mount Qaf," which is a mythic mountain in that Islamic spiritual tradition, "all these are psychic events whose scene and action are set in neither the sensible nor the intelligible worlds"—that's kind of jargon for some Platonic philosophy; we don't need to go into that, but let's just say the world of the material senses or of abstract ideas—"not set there, but in the intermediate world of the imaginal, the ʿālam al-mithāl in Arabic, as it is called, or the world of symbol." We translate: the world of image and typification, he writes. "This is the place of all spiritual recitals."

Now, there's a lot of jargon here. By "spiritual recital," he means spiritual, or so to speak, imaginal encounters with imaginal figures, etc. And this world, he continues, "is intermediary between the intelligible and the sensible. It is the world in which spirits are corporealized, given body—spirits are given body—and bodies spiritualized."

Okay, so there's a lot of stuff in there, as I said, about his system that's different in vocabulary. I don't want to go into that. The real point is the interesting parallel between what Avicenna describes and the siddhis, the supernormal powers described by the Buddha in the Pali Canon and other Buddhist traditions: that someone who is able either to enter very deep samādhi, very deep jhānas, or more commonly, very deep experiences of emptiness, or the unfabricated—this darkness that reigns forever that's plunged into—then for them the world of perception becomes malleable.

And I don't know the answer to how much—I've heard Tibetan teachers, actually been sitting in the room where they talk about people walking through walls, etc.—or is it just imaginal? An imaginal world opens up with great malleability there and great possibility for walking on water and the rest of it.

So I just want to make that parallel really. The central thing is this exploration of fabrication through learning to fabricate less and less, which exposes the fabricated nature of all perception, emptiness of all perception.

And going deeper into that opens up the malleability of perception and the world of the imaginal. We also see, again, the parallels between that phrase from alchemy which we've mentioned several times: "do not proceed until all has become liquid." In Avicenna's teaching there is this spring, the immersion in the spring, in the liquid, and through that everything becomes light—as in not heavy, not solid—the malleability of perception there.

So I'm pointing out some parallels across what on the face of it seem like very different traditions, the Buddhist and the Islamic mysticism. But this is for many people a real key to the imaginal—not for everyone, but for many people it's a real key to opening up the possibilities of magical practice.

Most emptiness practices are practices of unfabricating. I've said this quite a few times now: learning to fabricate less, and in doing so, in engaging emptiness practices, the sense of the solidity or fixedness or givenness of things is lightened as things become liquid, perception becomes malleable. Now, it also does that, as I'm repeating now from the beginning of the retreat, as samadhi deepens. There's a sense, too, of the body and the world of perception becoming less solid, more malleable, also through metta practice.

A lot of dharma practices will share this liquefying aspect, this making less solid of the world of perception, this unfabricating aspect. It's what they do. Imaginal practice also has this effect. So someone might not have done any emptiness practice or any of those other dharma practices and actually just engage in imaginal practice that renders the sense of the self and the world less solid, more malleable. And so actually gives rise to an understanding of emptiness and an experience of emptiness, of this fabricated nature of perception through imaginal practice.

Then both through deep emptiness practice or through metta practice or through imaginal practice, very commonly there arises organically a sense of perceiving the world as divine or perceiving other, or this or that, as angel, as theophany. A sense of cosmopoiesis opens organically by itself as one practices imaginal practice or emptiness practice deeper and deeper.

I wrote about this in the book that I wrote—as the emptiness practice gets really, really deep and starts even spinning back on itself, so to speak, to question even the reality of the notion of fabrication, saying even fabrication is empty, we can start organically, naturally—many people—to start perceiving the world as Buddha realm, if you like, to use certain language from Tibetan tantra. The world opens to cosmopoiesis. The divine world can be perceived. Or we can deliberately incline the perception that way through all these practices.

All these practices, in fact, are mutually contingent. So imaginal practice and emptiness practice and samatha and metta—they all feed each other. Emptiness practices will lead to samatha, to metta, and to the opening of the imaginal and the perception of a divine world. The deliberate perception of divine world will bring metta effortlessly and samadhi and will help us see emptiness and open the imaginal for us.

All of it—metta practice. That's why we did many years ago at Gaia House this retreat. I think we did it three years in a row, a long retreat: "Loving-kindness and Compassion as a Path to Awakening," meaning very specifically that as one deepens into metta and compassion, one can actually start directing that metta and compassion towards phenomena and beginning to see then how phenomena fade and how thus they are fabricated, and actually using the metta and the compassion practice to understand the deep emptiness of perception, the fabricated nature of perception.

But when we practice metta, it will give rise to samadhi. It will give rise to metta, obviously. It will give rise to samadhi. It will give rise to understanding of emptiness. The world, for people who do long metta retreats, begins to be perceived more and more at times—in and out—as divine in all kinds of different ways. Cosmopoiesis is functioning there just through dedicated metta practice over time.

So all these practices are actually, if you like, mutually feeding, mutually—yeah, they feed each other, they nourish each other, they open each other and deepen each other.

All this talk of the imaginal and the malleability of the perception of self, other, world—it's all, as I've mentioned briefly and as many of you will realize, very much related to the teachings of Tantra, Buddhist Tantra, which essentially is a whole realm of teachings based on the understanding of emptiness, absolutely having as a basis the understanding of emptiness. Then based on that understanding of the emptiness of all things, practicing the perception, seeing, the sensing of everything as divine—self, other, world as divine—and incorporating into that, including into that, the practice, the use of the imaginal. So obviously there's a lot of connection here.

The word Tantra is quite interesting. It's worth—I just want to open something up a little bit here. That word Tantra is a Sanskrit word, and the suffix, the last part, tra—tantra—when you have that as a suffix in Sanskrit, it indicates the root, the first part of the word, the tan. It indicates the root as the means of the action, or the instrument of the action that the root means.

For another example, the root in Sanskrit, pat, P-A-T, is "to fly." That's what it means, to fly. So when you put tra on the end, you get patra—the means of flying, the means of flying—which becomes wing. So patra is wing in Sanskrit.

So when we come to tantra, it means the tra of tan, the means of tan, of "to tan." So what does the word tan mean in Sanskrit? It means a whole bunch of things. Listen—I'm not going to spell all this out. Listen carefully. You might have to re-listen here. Listen carefully and ponder.

Ponder these different meanings of the word tan. So the tantra as the means of all this, in relation to everything that we've talked about on this retreat—about archetypes and soul-making and the imaginal and everything we've covered. I'm not going to spell it all out; I'm just going to go through a list. But see if you can hear each one related to or in the field of or brought alive by everything that we've discussed.

So tantra as a practice, imaginal practice, this seeing of, this perceiving of all things as divine through the imaginal, through the malleability of perception. Tan means—tantra means—the means of, the practice of. Tan means to extend, to spread, to weave, to accomplish. So what's being accomplished? Who or for the sake of what is something being accomplished?

It means to perform as well—like to perform a ceremony, for instance. It also means to compose, for instance, like a literary work or a work of art, to assist. Going back to that—when we're talking about daemons and what wants to come through—who or what is being assisted?

It means also to resound, which we could also say to re-sound. So something that has an existence at another level is being re-sounded through my perception, my seeing it, my experiencing it as image here. To resound, to re-sound, to roar, to emboss. To em-boss means to engrave a pattern of something in or on something else. Again, there's a pattern of something which is coming to me as image, and I might see another as image, as angel. Again, I'm not going to spell all these out.

It also means to prepare a way for, to prepare a path for, an opening for. Again, for what? For me? For gods? For archetypes? For the daemon? For what wants to come through? Tan also means to direct towards. It also means to manifest. Can you hear the resonances of everything that we've been talking about in some of these translations of what tantra might mean? To display. Again, to sacrifice is another meaning. And sacrifice is from the Latin—sacra facere—to make holy. Can you hear the resonance of all this?

In Tibetan usage and the late Indian Buddhism, Mahayana, one usage of the word mantra was actually synonymous with the word tantra. So you talk about the path of tantra, and one might just say the path of mantra. They use them completely interchangeably. And so, same deal—mantra in Sanskrit: tra is the means or the instrument, the practice of man.

And man as a root in Sanskrit, mantra. Again, listen, allowing everything we've talked about to resonate, to echo in these root meanings, the meanings of the root of what tantra, mantra can mean. To believe—man can mean to believe, to imagine, to suppose, to conjecture. And there's that idea of the flexibility of conceptual frameworks, to regard anyone or anything as. So this idea of the fantasies, the mythoi that pervade our perception and our being in the world.

It can mean—man can mean—to think oneself or be thought to be, to appear as, to be of an opinion, to be of a certain opinion. Again, this flexibility of conceptual frames, of views, of perspectives. But also the views, the perspectives, the ideas of different archetypes. We talked about this at a certain point—that each archetype has its own ideational inclination or structures or perspectives.

Man can also be to set the heart and mind on something. It can also mean, very beautifully, to honor or esteem. So again, to enter into a view that honors or esteems—and through what? It can also mean simply to perceive, and that has everything to do with what we're talking about. It can mean to offer or present. So what is being presented in this world to the world of perception? What is being offered through my life or through the life of another as I see it or through the perception of this thing or the world? World as offering.

There's all kinds of... Those root words translated—I'm not just playing a language game here—are pregnant with so much beauty and so much richness of meaning and possibility to explore.

So some of you will know, when we talk about tantra or the path of tantra, the path of mantra, that includes Dzogchen. So some of you will be a little bit or very familiar with Dzogchen teachings. And sometimes it's interesting—Dzogchen is quite popular now in the West. But it is a tantric path. So it's actually, in the context, Dzogchen is tantra, but this doesn't get emphasized that much because there's so much emphasis on nature of mind and instructions and teachings about nature of mind. But Dzogchen is within a context. Teachings on the nature of mind are only a part of Dzogchen.

And that's within a context of this perception or seeing of appearances as divine—that's the context for those narrower teachings about nature of mind, the cutting through instructions and all that. These exist within a much bigger context that has to do with what tantra essentially is: this practice of perceiving all things as divine, of seeing all appearances as divine.

That's the context, and that's the context of the teaching of nature of mind. The purpose of the teachings of nature of mind—because they bring a very deep freedom, of course—but also because they liberate, as I said, tying back to what we were exploring much earlier, they liberate ways of looking, perceptions of that divinity of all things. And again, divinity here is not just a universal divinity—because everything shares in the nature of mind or everything is awareness or whatever, so everything is divine in the same way.

It's quite personal, if you like. There is personhood in this, in that divinity. The universe expresses, if you like, the different persons of divinity.

Now, I'm aware that I'm using this word quite a lot—divine and God and this or that—and I know it makes many people very nervous. Other people just put up walls to it, and all kinds of reactions can arise. So I want to explore that a little bit in the next talk. What do we mean anyway? How can we conceive of this word that to some is very comfortable and to others is very alien and very off-putting?

So I want to explore that in the next talk.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 19

A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoesis (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 54 min

> In this opening talk of the final series from his Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea examines the cultural context in which contemporary dharma practice unfolds. He critiques the modernist conception of personhood as a 'bounded, unique, integrated motivational and cognitive universe' and its strange marriage with popular dharma views like 'self as process' or 'interconnectedness as ultimate truth.' Burbea argues that both Western materialism and conventional dharma approaches share a problematic reificationist basis—assuming something is ultimately real, whether matter, 'this moment,' or 'bare attention.'
>
> Drawing parallels between quantum physics and Buddha's teachings on anattā, he proposes a radical alternative: placing the entire dharma on a non-realist foundation of total emptiness. This means recognizing that even our deepest concepts of time, space, and awareness are empty of inherent existence. Unlike partial emptiness teachings that still reify processes or interconnection, this approach understands all experience as co-created through the fabrication of perception.
>
> Burbea suggests this non-realist framework opens possibilities for 'cosmopoesis'—the creative perception of sacred, magical universes—and allows for seeing persons as theophanies or divine expressions. He challenges practitioners to move beyond the constraints of assuming any ultimate reality, whether materialist or spiritual, toward a more radical freedom that honours the fabricated nature of all perception while opening new dimensions of beauty and meaning.

In these final talks of our retreat, I want to draw together the threads we've been exploring in practice and discussion, while also elaborating and filling out some of the themes and ideas we've encountered. In this elaboration, I hope to take these concepts further and open doors for the mind—doors to new views and expanded possibilities for practice and experiential exploration.

When we open doors, we often find that passing through brings not only answers but also more questions, providing structure while simultaneously revealing new territories. Some of what I'll be discussing may seem to create more loose ends or to build certain structures while leaving ideas and possibilities incomplete. This may indeed be the case, which means there will need to be another retreat, another course—hopefully.

Over these next three talks, some ideas will be familiar while others less so. Please hang in there if some concepts sound difficult or hard to understand. In the third talk especially, I'll provide examples that should help clarify things, perhaps through repeated listening and concrete illustrations.

Remember how we began this retreat by examining the cultural and historical context in which all our discussions of imaginal practice are landing. We explored particularly the unquestioned assumptions, views, and sense of personhood—both our own and others'—that provide the backdrop for these teachings. These ideas meet views and assumptions we've absorbed from our culture, usually unquestioningly, until they become our reality, shaping how we view and sense everything: personhood, the world, the cosmos, and imagination itself.

Let me revisit and expand on what I call the modernist conception of personhood. The anthropologist Clifford Geertz, in his book From the Native's Point of View, offers this illuminating comparison between Western and indigenous conceptions:

"The Western conception of the person as a bounded, unique, more or less integrated motivational and cognitive universe, a dynamic center of awareness, emotion, judgment and action organized into a distinctive whole and set contrastively both against other such wholes and against a social and natural background is, however incorrigible it may seem to us, a rather peculiar idea within the context of the world's cultures."

We often take this view for granted, assuming it reflects reality rather than recognizing it as a momentary, transitional phase in the history of a particular culture—a way certain human beings have viewed and sensed personhood during a specific period.

Alongside this intuitive cultural view, Dharma practitioners in the modern West encounter other perspectives that make strange marriages with our inherited assumptions. Popular among these is the view that the self is a process—that there is no self, only an unfolding of aggregates, psychophysical constituents moving through time like some computer readout or machine-like progression of physical processes, feelings, perceptions, mental formations, and moments of consciousness. Everything else is dismissed as illusion; what's real is this atomized temporal process.

Another common view presents interconnectedness as ultimate truth—the lens through which we should understand selfhood. What typically happens for modern Dharma practitioners is an understandable attempt to cling to one of these philosophical views, perhaps having glimpsed it perceptually in practice, then trying to hold onto that glimpse. This creates a strange marriage between Geertz's bounded, integrated self and either the atomized process view or the interconnectedness perspective. These views either mesh together awkwardly or battle each other, with different ones dominating at different times, while we cling to particular views or experiences, trying to perpetuate certain insights.

It's worth noting that in the Buddha's teaching of anatta and the emptiness of self, all self-views without exception are regarded as empty, not ultimately true. The Buddha wasn't saying the self is an atomized process or a field of interconnection or any other particular view. Rather, no self-view whatsoever constitutes ultimate truth.

When we truly realize this and take it as an avenue of practice, a remarkable door opens: we become free to use, step into, and put on all kinds of self-views like garments and lenses, while maintaining the knowledge that whatever way we're viewing self and person is not real, not the truth. Because all views are equally untrue, we're liberated to employ any of them skillfully.

But the particular popular ones nowadays—I mean, I could list a whole bunch, but let's just say there's the atomized process or this view of interconnectedness. And interconnectedness may be something I'll come back to later. This is a kind of aside for now—I don't want to lose track of the main point.

But interconnectedness is an interesting teaching when we poke at it a little bit more. It's interesting what is meant and implied and not implied in the teachings of interconnectedness. So usually—I hope I'll return to this later in subsequent talks—we imply something of the physical processes or events that make up my body, and even my brain, my organism, and that of others are connected over space and time. This physical event here, this physical process here, is interconnected with others, or actually all physical processes over space and over time.

Or mental ideas, for example—I hear a teaching or I read a book or some idea in the culture or something like that—are also interconnected, connected over space and over time. So there is, if you like, the teaching of interconnectedness is what I would call horizontal. Physical processes and events are connected with other physical processes and events. Mental events, if you like, are connected or influence other mental events.

At the same level of being, the same dimension of being, there's a horizontal interconnectedness. Though we, of course, admit that the physical state of things affects the mental, and the mental affects the physical, essentially it's a teaching that does not draw attention to or admit or emphasize an interconnectedness between dimensions of being, or invite the idea that there are other dimensions of being apart from the physical. So it's a horizontal teaching rather than vertical. That's an aside for now. I'm just throwing that out as a seed.

The main point here is, again, what is the context of these ideas that we're talking about? This is the modernist context of the modernist person, as Gertz described, or mixed strangely—a strange marriage with a sort of clinging to certain dharma views and holding onto them as philosophies: the atomized process or interconnectedness. And also the context of what is the modernist view or assumption or sense of reality of what the cosmos is.

And that cosmos being essentially physical matter—atoms moving, bumping into each other in kind of meaningless movement and interaction of matter over vast stretches of space and time, which over vast stretches of time now give rise to consciousness in some way that scientists haven't figured out yet. And so there is a kind of level, two different levels—consciousness and matter—but that consciousness is an emergent property of the physical, of matter. And so that's the modernist view of the cosmos.

Not everyone believes that, and we may battle that in some ways. But what that then means in terms of the context of my personhood, of our personhood, the context of my life and the trajectory of my life and what gives meaning to my person and my life, the context of my dharma practice, my view of dharma, my spiritual practice—all of that takes place, if you like, within a context of what we could call a philosophy of materialism, that matter is the primary reality.

A better word is physicalism—and don't confuse materialism as in the chasing of expensive cars and iPhones and all that kind of stuff with this philosophy of materialism. The physical matter is the primary and the only reality, and everything else emerges out of that, and if it's not material, it's illusory. Or if it doesn't have its roots in matter, it's illusory.

So what this means is that the context of everything that I do—my person, my life, my practice, all that, and whatever meaning I chase—is within this essentially physical universe. Everything's taking place within physicalism.

And it's so easy not to realize that these views and assumptions about personhood or what a person is and what the cosmos is are perspectives. They are perspectives. What I would call ways of looking. They are not complete truths. Absolutely not. They originated, some of them at least, as kind of working guidelines for the scientific revolution. And somehow they became absorbed into the culture and the mindset of the culture as if they were proven and complete truths. Very interesting—not proven and not complete truths.

And similarly with those dharma views of the process or interconnectedness or whatever, vast awareness, whatever it is. So these are perspectives, and this is really, really important to emphasize this and to realize this. Absolutely crucial—everything hinges on this: realizing what is a perspective and what is not a truth, a complete truth.

And then the question with perspectives or ways of looking, what I call ways of looking, is: what does this perspective, what does this way of looking bring? What does it open and what does it close? What does it unfold? What are the effects of looking through this way of looking, this perspective, this lens? And what are the effects of looking through another way of looking, another perspective? This is the golden question, if you like, for me—the golden dharma question.

So what do these perspectives bring and what do others bring? Rather than "this is the truth." And in the context of the teachings of this retreat, what does soul need? What kind of perspectives, what kind of views, what kind of conceptual frameworks does soul and soulfulness need? Because that is a deeply important question.

question for the being, for our being.

So there are these contexts that we live and move in, and where we try to arrange and follow the pathway of our life and practice—contexts of views, assumptions about personhood, cosmos, and imagination.

Then we have something like the notion of self-expression: to express myself. How important this has become in modern culture for us! It's something that, as I alluded to earlier, wasn't really an issue at all in other cultures or in the Buddha's time. Self-expression is alive for us; it's something important. We might not speak in those terms, or we might feel very inhibited when it comes to that and want to shove it away as a concept because it's so painful for us, not even realizing that we're doing so.

But in the context of some of these views of personhood or cosmos—for instance, if I'm clinging to a view that the atomized process is really the reality—then self-expression becomes a ridiculous notion. Any emphasis on it is simply absurd. Who cares? It's just an atomized process; it might as well be a machine.

Or in the context of this modernist cosmos, an essentially meaningless universe, self-expression becomes—again, maybe not ridiculous, but there's a disjunction there. Self-expression is often where a sense of meaningfulness comes into our life, where we generate meaningfulness. But it's divorced from the larger context, or there's a disjunction, because all this is taking place within this vast universe of essentially meaningless matter. And somewhere we've been told that this is reality.

So anything to do with self-expression is dwarfed by that. But also, anything to do with our meaningfulness or sense of meaningfulness does not derive in any objective way from the universe. It has no place in the universe. It's alien in the universe—dwarfed and alien, facing a void of meaninglessness. I tend to think it's self-generated, therefore kind of illusory, because this self, despite the interconnectedness at the level of physicality and perhaps ideas, is essentially a strange, alien, minuscule entity in a vast universe of essential meaninglessness. And that is the real reality, the objective reality.

So these views do something quite potent to notions of self-expression or meaningfulness.

In relation to how we think about and view self-expression or personhood, these contexts—philosophical contexts, often unexplored, often unquestioned, often half-conscious—constrain how we think about and view personhood and self-expression.

So that, for example, what we've been talking about as one possibility of seeing a person—my person or another person—as a theophany, as an image or vision or portal expression or face of the divine, as a being, an angel expressing the divine, through which the divine shows itself in a certain form, diaphanous to, translucent to the divine, to what wants to come through.

We talked about this: that the desire is not so much in me—what wants to come through me. It's something I'm not separate from, this divine that wants to come through, this angel that wants to come through, and what it wants. But it's also more than me somehow, other than me—both.

And this divine, this divinity or angel that wants to come through, is in a particular form, particular to a particular personhood. So it's a different concept. I'll elaborate on this later. It's a different conception of the divine than simply that the divine is shining through everything because it shines through everything universally because all is one. Or it shines through everything that has awareness, or whatever, because awareness is what's divine, and therefore anything that has awareness.

This is a different vision or sense of the person and personhood.

Because of the cultural context, the philosophical context—and often we don't really think of any of this as philosophy—there is a constraining, a constricting of the range of possible ways of seeing and sensing the person. And I'm interested in widening that with a range of possible ways of seeing, of viewing, of sensing personhood—mine and others. What is it, for instance, to see and to sense the other vividly in a beautiful and rich and deep way—the other as self as a portal for soul, for something much bigger, for soul worlds, for the divine?

Now, as I've said before, very much fundamental to these contexts of views and assumptions in which we move and conceive, and in which the teachings land, is the whole question of reality and what is real. We've touched on this; there are different aspects.

But in relation to, for example, imagination—this view of physicalism, that the physical is the only thing that's real—among other aspects which I've talked about before and will come back to, this means that we tend to view, or the culture tends to view, imagination as unreal. We say "imaginary" with a kind of derogatory sense to it for the most part. We've touched on this. I'm reviewing.

And that was one of the main reasons why Henri Corbin coined the term "imaginal" rather than "imaginary"—to escape or set aside the derogatory views and assumptions that imagination has in the culture. I'm talking about a different way of approaching the imagination, a different way of relating to the imaginary which becomes something valuable and has a certain reality to it.

So for people like Henri Corbin, for William Blake, for Walter Wink—a Christian theologian with a quite sophisticated philosophical background and understanding—for Buddhist Tantra, and I'm thinking particularly of the very beautiful worked-out systems of Tantra that you get in some of the streams in Tibet, I'm thinking particularly of Longchenpa and Mipham in the Nyingma tradition. For these people, the imaginal is actually more real than matter.

So there's a turning upside down of the usual cultural view that we now inhabit. Now, the question of what matter is is something I'm going to touch on a little bit later.

But the view is that the imaginal actually has, in a way, more reality than matter. Someone I don't know too much about—Swedenborg, a mystic and visionary in the Christian tradition from a couple of centuries ago—exemplified this perspective. A writer named Slešlam Miloš, writing about Swedenborg and the way he held the reality of the imaginal, observes:

"Swedenborg's detailed descriptions from his imaginal practice of beautiful gardens, their trees and their flowers in heaven, of slums, dirt, and ruins in hell do not mean that he believed they existed other than in imagination." So he understood this imaginal world—what he called heaven and hell within a Christian theological and conceptual framework—as existing in imagination. But Miloš continues: "But imagination is the most real existence."

Yes, it's imagination, but the way Swedenborg viewed that kind of imaginative experience gave it a completely different ontological validity. It's the most real existence. For Swedenborg and for William Blake, this other world, this world of the imaginative, is more real than any physical place. There's quite a different view operating here.

When we come to all this and try to understand how these things fit together—we think we understand matter and the experience of conventional reality: this is a table, that's a chair, and so forth, and then there's the imaginal, psychic phenomena and all that—how does it all fit together? What kind of conceptual framework will present to us or outline the truth of what is real here? What is the reality of all this and the reality status of all this?

The easy and unexplored option is simply to follow without too much questioning what's given to us culturally. But when we start exploring, start questioning and probing these things through practice, through experimentation, through dialogue and philosophy in our experience, we realize it's not that simple.

As I said, I don't pretend to have the answer, and I don't think anyone's really worked it out, as far as I can tell. What you get nowadays is people approaching this in three broad ways.

One is this sort of going along with the assumptions of modernist culture and dismissing the imaginal as just imaginary and a waste of time. Reality becomes—even if people dismiss using words like truth and reality—actually a default assumption about what's real operating in their philosophy.

More sophisticated, some philosophers and people nowadays would admit that contrary to the modernist assumption—which is that there is a view or a way of looking that reveals reality, whether it's scientific materialism or, translated to the modern dharma world, mindfulness or bare attention reveals reality—contrary to this singularity of view that's often explicit or hidden in someone's philosophy or approach or dharma teaching, there's a more sophisticated philosophical approach that's quite popular.

This is the postmodern realization, acknowledging that any individual perspective will be incapable of capturing the truth of things or the reality of the way things are. Therefore, there's the necessity of multiple perspectives, just by virtue of a difference in the level at which reality exists.

One analogy I got from Sanford Drob, a philosopher who writes particularly about post-modernism and the influence of Hegel and other ideas, but also on Jewish Kabbalah in the contemporary context. He has this analogy of the way maps of the globe work to try to represent in two dimensions something that actually exists in three dimensions.

There's something called the Mercator projection. When you're making a map of the world in two dimensions, it will necessarily be distorted. There are also political ramifications of this, but it makes certain countries look much bigger than they are, and other countries or continents look much smaller than they are. Then there are other systems—I think one's called Gall-Peters—other systems of translating the three-dimensional to the two-dimensional map, which make different countries look bigger and smaller. Suddenly you see that Africa is enormous, or India is really quite large, while countries like certain European nations are actually tiny.

But there's the acknowledgment that neither is really an accurate definition or description or translation of reality necessarily. The reality being in three dimensions, we necessarily acknowledge that there are some distortions when we try to translate that, represent that three-dimensional reality in two dimensions.

That's a physical analogy of our existential and philosophical situation. The assumption there, implied in all that, is that there is some kind of objective reality to the way things are, to the universe, to things. It is there, but it's certainly not obvious, and it's not really translatable or expressible to human consciousness, to the human mind. But the assumption is it does exist objectively, sort of independent of the human mind. It's just that it's not articulatable at our level.

This kind of thinking has parallels. Some of you may have heard of a physicist named David Bohm, who had some dialogues with Krishnamurti. He was not so keen on some of the implications of quantum physics, which seemed to be implying to many people this sort of non-objective status of reality, of things, of atoms—that an electron or whatever it is, a particle, does not exist in any way independent of our observing of it.

It doesn't exist as a thing in a place at a certain time with a certain energy, with a certain speed or mass. All of that is very much contingent, very much dependent on the way of looking, in a way that has profound parallels with emptiness teachings.

Some people, including Einstein, were deeply uncomfortable with the implications of these discoveries made in the early part of the twentieth century and what they seemed to suggest. David Bohm wrote a book called Wholeness and the Implicit Order, attempting to work out a system of physics which, similar to what Job was saying about the masses, gives an objective reality at a certain level while recognizing that what we then perceive has all these strange features that quantum mechanics describes—but that this isn't actually the reality. In other words, there is this objective independent reality, but it simply cannot be translated or made visible to us, so it gives rise to these strange effects when translated to our level of experience, perception and understanding.

What's interesting about quantum mechanics and its philosophical implications is that most physicists simply ignore the philosophical questions it raises. Very few actually pursue them, and of those who do, some, like David Bohm, are drawn to the project of finding an objective reality. Of course they are—that's what drew them to physics in the first place: the idea that there is a reality one can discover and capture in certain formulations, equations, or conceptions. The whole beauty, romance, and attraction of physics for physicists is to discover what that objective reality is. That's the entire scientific project.

So much of the quantum revolution can be philosophically challenging to the very foundations of the scientific revolution and the assumptions that became embedded after it. But this represents one more sophisticated philosophical approach: assuming there is an objective reality that's simply not capturable or translatable—like the necessary distortions when translating from three dimensions to two.

Now compare this second possibility—assuming there's an objective reality that's difficult or impossible to fully comprehend—with a non-realist, non-reificationist conceptual framework. What do I mean by that?

We humans have a tendency, a deep-seated tendency—and I would say this is what the Buddha is pointing to very fundamentally in his teachings—we have a strong inclination and attachment to assume an objective reality to things: selves, objects, world, time. What would it be to approach this question of reality with a non-realist conceptual framework as the basis for our whole way of approaching things, including the Dharma? We don't reify anything as ultimately real or "this is the way things really are"—any conceptual framework.

What would it be, or is it possible, to put the Dharma thoroughly on a non-reifying basis of emptiness? This, to me, is so important. It opens so many doors. I can't emphasize it enough—how fundamental and fundamentally different that would be. Can we do that? Can we realize the Dharma, shape and conceive of the Dharma, absolutely, thoroughly, completely on a non-reifying basis of emptiness?

That means emptiness, this understanding of a non-realist perspective, actually becomes the total fundamental of everything in the Dharma. The whole Dharma is on that basis. I think that's actually quite rare in the Dharma world.

Everyone who's been around the Dharma for a while would agree with the word "emptiness"—yes, of course, śūnyatā, emptiness. But the meaning is very, very different. There's a whole range of what people actually mean when they use the word empty or emptiness. What I mean, and what I would like to place as the basis, the foundation for the whole understanding and practice of Dharma, is not the sense that emptiness means things or selves are just a process in time of smaller units—moments, aggregates, or whatever. And not just the teaching of interconnectedness or certain other teachings. I'm talking about something much more radical than any of that. Much deeper and much more total.

Because in that process view, for example, the elements of the process are still given a certain reality. I'm talking about something utterly total. Everything, without question, is empty. Even the deepest, most ingrained concepts of space, time, awareness—all of that is empty, thoroughly.

What often happens in the Dharma is people say, "Yes, yes, of course, emptiness. Of course things are empty, of course this or that is empty." But then it's almost like it becomes something that's easily forgotten about in practice. It's like, "Yes, yes, of course," and then one engages practices or views that ignore or don't incorporate the understanding of emptiness. So the whole idea of bare attention, or when we bring into practice the question, "Is this moment enough?"

All of that rhetoric, all of those teachings—while helpful at a certain level—actually reinforce this reification, this making real of something. They serve as possibilities, particularly for beginners, because they seem basic. One can think, "I can get my head around that. Being present in this moment sounds so simple, so attractive in its simplicity, so basic. That's good. It seems as if I'm meeting reality on an undistorted level."

But that apparent basicness very quickly becomes a basis—a foundation for the whole of the Dharma, the entire worldview, everything else. The unquestioned assumption of the reality of this moment, the unquestioned assumptions about bare attention meeting some basic experience—these take root. They create, they fabricate experience in line with that assumption. So it seems that way and perpetuates an experience of this or that, of this moment or this bare attention, as reality.

Then I'm left thinking I just need to align with reality or this moment. I need to be with what is. I need to accept reality, open to what is, love what is—however we put it. Lovely, beautiful, very helpful, but only to a certain level. Quite limited.

The basis there is a realist one, not a non-realist one. The foundation of that kind of dharma is not in emptiness, even though a person might say, "Yes, yes, of course everything's empty." Or they might agree with emptiness but mean something different by it. They think, "That's real. Other things are empty. This moment, this bare attention, this process is real. I can be with that." That becomes the basis—the realist basis rather than a non-realist one.

A non-realist basis is much more radical. Hard to see, hard to understand, as the Buddha said—discernible only by the wise.

So what about, instead of a philosophy that assumes objective reality, instead of spiritual teachings that basically have a foundation in reificationism of some kind or another—what about a basis for the Dharma in exploration? The exploration through practice and through reflection, but mostly through practice—an exploration and understanding of the fabrication of perception.

What about that as a basis, as a summary of what the Dharma really is, how it works, how it all fits together? An exploration through practice, an understanding, a deepening insight into the fabrication of perception, of appearance, experience—using those three words interchangeably. And then eventually, as that deepens, the understanding that fabrication too, as an understanding, as a concept, is also emptied.

What about that as a nutshell explanation of what the Dharma is and as a basis for it? That gives a very different sense of everything—of what the universe is, the world, what experience is—and also a very different sense of what the Dharma is.

Some people might hear this and say, "Well, questioning reality in that way sounds abstract and intellectual." That's unfortunate because it really is not abstract. That might be a reaction, but we're talking about practice here—something very possible, very engaged, direct and palpable in its effects.

Or a person might hear this teaching about fabrication and say, not quite understanding, "Oh, so you just fabricate something, you make up something so that you feel better." But in that kind of response—which sounds like a question but is really a statement or judgment—it's betraying a reificationism. "You're making up something else. There is a reality; you're making up something different." It betrays what the Buddha would call delusional reificationism.

So rather than this reifying basis and understanding about "what is" or "this moment," what about a discovery, an opening through practice and insight that this moment is co-created with me, with the sense of self—even the most subtle sense of self, just the barest sense of consciousness or vast awareness? This moment is co-created with any sense of self, co-created with the way of looking, with the state and inclination and assumptions and conceptions of the citta. It's mutually dependent, mutually contingent and not separate from that.

All of it—the way of looking, the self, the subject and object—are mutually dependent and not separate. And then this moment becomes something thoroughly empty, along with the self, along with the way of looking and consciousness and all of it. Thoroughly empty, magical.

When we assume that this so-called bare experience we might have through mindfulness practice is real—when I assume that even tacitly, even without realizing I'm assuming it, unconsciously—it constrains. That assumption constrains the ways of looking that are possible for me, the kinds of views, the kinds of lenses through which I can look at experience. There's a constriction of possibilities, of range, through the assumption of reality.

Because the ways of looking are constrained that way, then the experience, the range of experience, of perception, of what actually appears in terms of experiences of self, of other, experiences of the world, of time, of space, of things like desire and eros, of cosmos—

All of that gets constricted—the range of perception, of experience I can have of all of that.

And as one gets deeper into the teachings of emptiness and realizes, actually, it's a constriction too in the conceptual frameworks. Because I'm assuming what's real. Tied up in that is a whole conceptual framework. Again, I might not even realize it. I might not even be able to articulate it. I might not even have thought about it ever. I might be unconscious. But there's a conceptual framework operating.

That assumption of reality constrains not only my experience—my ways of looking therefore my experience—but also my conceptual frameworks that I can entertain, move between. It constrains my hermeneutics, if you like—it's a fancy word for me, meaning my ways of interpreting experience, interpreting cosmos and the world that I'm in. Reading, if you like, this field of experience.

And all of that constrains the freedoms that are possible for me and constrains the creativity of existence. Constrains, too, the sense of beauty that's possible and the sense of the range of beauty. Remember we were talking about this before—the range of beauty that's possible for me as a human being. What kinds of beauty can the soul open to and know and taste and wonder at?

So deep, radical, total emptiness—that realization, that level of insight—actually allows so much more. As that insight deepens, it allows so much more. It allows, for example, cosmopoiesis, this word that I used the other day, this opening of the possibilities of seeing, of sensing, of really inhabiting a different cosmos, feeling oneself in, perceiving a magical cosmos, a divine cosmos, a cosmos like this or that, the range of, if you like, poetic possibility—cosmopoiesis, the idea of creating different cosmological poems, poems of the cosmos.

It opens possibilities through insight, through deep, radical, total insight into emptiness.

CHAPTER 20

Theophany and Cosmopoiesis: Instructions

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this profound teaching from the Path of the Imaginal course, Rob Burbea introduces the practices of theophany and cosmopoiesis - advanced imaginal techniques that reveal the sacred dimension of perception. Building on foundational imaginal practice, he explores how sustaining attention on images with sensitivity to their resonance affects three key areas: the emotional field, the energy body, and our perception of self, other, and world.
>
> Burbea delineates three major avenues of dharma practice: bare attention, practices that unfabricate perception (leading toward the unconditioned), and skillful fabrication through imagination. He emphasizes how the third path - including imaginal and tantric practices - can nourish the soul and open the range of perception. Central to this teaching is theophany: the appearance or shining-through of the divine in images, and cosmopoiesis: the artistic creation of sacred cosmos through transformed perception.
>
> Through detailed instructions and vivid examples - from hearing birdsong as divine speech to experiencing lovers as angelic theophanies - Burbea demonstrates how practitioners can recognize, tune into, and sustain theophanic perception. He shows how this sacred seeing can spread from individual images to transform our entire sense of inhabiting a holy cosmos, while maintaining the understanding that this sacredness arises dependently with our way of looking, neither purely subjective nor objectively existing.

I want to begin by summarizing very briefly some of what we've emphasized in imaginal practice, and then open a door from that foundation, building on it to elaborate some possibilities that emerge in a particular direction.

We've said and emphasized that when we sustain attention meditatively on an image—sensitive to the resonance and all the richness we've been discussing—we will notice effects with that image, from that image, on three primary dimensions: the emotional field and emotions; the energetic field and energy body; and the perception and sense of self, other, things, and world.

These three dimensions are not separate, but it's helpful to delineate them for clarity. As we've noted, when we focus on the energy body and tune to perhaps pleasant energy there—a sense of well-being, comfort, or ease—this can lead the energy body and consciousness into the whole range of states of samadhi by tuning to what is pleasant in the energy body.

Similarly, if in the emotions there's a pleasant emotion—happiness, peace, or joy—focusing on that pleasant emotion can also lead into deeper samadhi, and the whole being coalesces and harmonizes in that state of samadhi, an emotional-energetic state.

If what's happening emotionally and energetically is unpleasant and difficult, then focusing on either dimension—if we bring the right qualities into that focusing, into that attention—may calm the emotions and calm the energy body.

Regarding the third aspect of effects we notice—the sense of self and perception of self, other, and things—this may include an awareness of resonances, a mirroring or echoing of the image and imaginal figure in one's personal life. We've given many examples: wrathful deity, warrior, wonder, and so forth. These are usually not to be taken literally, but there's this echoing in personal life.

We've talked about daimons, and there is a sense of this echoing, this mirroring, the recognition of which brings soulfulness into the sense of my life and journey and the events in my life. It adds soulfulness, or rather, I come to resonate more fully with the soulfulness that's already there; I nourish the soulfulness. The sense of archetypal necessity and destiny, or telos, are all part of this in terms of one's personal life.

But within this third field of effects—the resonances of images on perception and sense of self, other, things, and world—we may also notice that there's a sense of holiness, sacredness, or even divinity in the image. What do we actually mean by those words: sacred, holy, divine? Perhaps we'll return to that question. For now, I'll let these words resonate without defining them too precisely. But this quality may be part of what we sense and perceive in the image.

This sense of holiness or divinity in the image is something we can tune into and use in different ways. This is a massive subject, so I'm going to highlight just a few possibilities and directions.

One possibility is to allow that sense of holiness or divinity in the image to spread to the surroundings, thereby allowing what I call cosmopoiesis. I invented this word, though I'm not fond of its sound and haven't found a better alternative. Let me explain what this word points toward.

Cosmopoiesis: "cosmo" refers to cosmos—a word like "world" or "universe" but with more implication of the order or structure of the universe. We speak of cosmology in the West: what is the nature and origin of the universe? The "poesis" part refers to artistic creation—like making poetry, the poet creating poems. So cosmopoiesis suggests the cosmos as poem that we write as meditators, the meditator as artist creating a palpable vision, an experience of cosmos. Like an artist, we become able to create different cosmoses.

This points to the creative aspect of meditation, the malleability of perception that, with enough understanding and skill, helps us enter into or inhabit different cosmoses. It's like art, as I've explained at other times. This is indeed a huge subject, easily warranting a long retreat of its own.

Let's begin exploring this door. The sense of divinity or holiness in the image can spread to the surroundings, the environment, the world we're in around us as we practice. Through this spreading, we feel that we are inhabiting a different world. There's a creation of cosmos through perception, through the way of looking in the moment.

Sometimes this spreading happens by itself—the sense from the image, the divinity, the holiness, the sacredness simply spreads naturally. Sometimes it's already spread within the image itself, or the image is already mixed with perception. In other words, it's not separate.

It's not an image that's separate to the perception of the world in the moment.

So this is one possibility. Related to that, or if you like, a part of that, is just the—again, here's another word we've used already—the theophanic sense in the image, the image as theophany. Theophany: theo meaning divine or God, theophany. Phanic is a word that means something like showing through or shining through or appearance of. So it's an appearance of a face of the divine, or the divine shows through or shines through it.

And so sometimes we have a sense of an image. It could be a separate image, separate from the perception where I have my eyes shut and this imaginal figure comes, or it could be that the perception of the world is appearing to us as a theophany in different ways. So these two words are very related—cosmopoiesis or theophany—but it could be that an imaginal figure appears to us as a divine being.

Let's say there's that theophanic sense of the image. The image is a theophany. And so, for example, Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion, or Tara, or Christ, or whatever. And then we can use that image, that imaginal figure, with all the theophany that it's imbued with, and use it, as we've said, for cultivating different brahmaviharas—metta or compassion or joy or whatever.

But this figure may also not be a classical divine figure. It may be just some other human being or a teacher or a lover or a friend. Many possibilities, but they can become for us a theophany. This figure, this imaginal figure or this person that I know or know of becomes for us, through the imagination, through imaginal practice, a theophany. And then we can use this theophanic sense or the cosmopoiesis, the sense of cosmopoiesis, in different ways.

Now when we do that, when that is one of the effects that happens in the perception of the sense of self, other things, world, we never lose touch in practice with the feeling of the emotional field and the sensitivity to that or the energy body. So that's just reiterating something we've emphasized all through the retreat.

But it's this certain openings in the third field of effects—the perception and the sense of self, other things in the world, and particularly the sense of holiness or divinity, and within that the theophanic sense of the image, the image as theophany, or this wider cosmopoiesis or both—that I want to explore a little bit and practice, and look at some practice possibilities there.

So again, setting that in a context of wider dharma understanding—and again, this is something we've touched on before—it's so important to, I think, have a dharma view, a view, a wider view of understanding dharma practice that supports opening rather than closes things down and keeps them boxed in.

So putting all this in a wider dharma context, we said there are, broadly speaking, three kind of avenues of practice that we can explore as practitioners, we have available to us and we can develop all of them.

And the first might be what often gets called bare attention practice, or a simple mindfulness—the sort of presence or mindfulness of presence to what is real. There's usually an assumption that what we're present to then is real. And there's the simple attention, for instance, to the sensual detail of the moment—this taste, this touch, and how it, quote, actually feels—or the presence to the moment, etc. And most people are, in the insight meditation tradition, very familiar with that bare attention or simple mindfulness. So that would be one mode, if you like, one gear of practicing, one way of looking.

And then there's a second kind of camp, if you like, or collection, which involves a lot of practices rather than one simple practice, that have in common that they undo fabrication, they unfabricate the perception, the appearances of self, other, world, to a much greater extent than simple bare attention or mindfulness practice, so-called.

So all the range of emptiness practices and samadhi practices and metta when it goes deeply, all these practices and all those avenues fabricate less perception, they fabricate less experience and appearance of self, other things, dukkha, etc. So that's a whole, as I said, avenue within which there's a range of practices, the second camp of fabricating less, much less than regular perception, much less than simple mindfulness or bare attention.

Actually, most traditional Theravadan practices in the Dharma have that quality in common, that they fabricate less to different degrees, and in a way you can understand the thrust, the movement, of traditional Theravadan practices, for the most part, most of them actually are moving in the direction of the unfabricated.

So all these different practices, even mindfulness or the samadhi or the metta or looking at impermanence or whatever it is, seeing things as not-self, they have this characteristic to them that they unfabricate. They tend, as modes of looking, ways of looking, they fabricate less to different degrees and fabricate less and less until eventually one develops that skill to fabricate nothing at all. Nothing at all is being fabricated and there's the opening to the unfabricated as we talked about a little bit the other day.

So that's the second group of practice, the second range is this learning how to fabricate less, a little bit more and really radically less.

And then the third group of practices would include, what could we say, skillful fabrication. So one is actually deliberately engaged in fabrication, knowing that there is fabrication going on, but in the service of something. And it's skillful rather than unconscious or problematic.

That camp, this third camp of the practices of fabrication, very much using the imagination, imaginal practice or tantric practice, practices that fabricate the appearance, the perception of self, other, world in different ways.

So there's, first is bare attention or simple mindfulness. The second is practices that actually fabricate much less and tend towards a dissolution, a disappearing of appearances, a non-fabrication of appearances. They tend towards emptying out of self and of appearance. And the third group of practices actually fabricates skillfully in different ways, in different directions, if you like, and particularly we're interested in using the imagination, incorporating imaginative practice as being part of that, the skillful range of fabrication of the perceptions of self, other, and world.

Now, of those three camps, if you like, or directions, not everyone, but eventually I would say most people, if they're practicing a lot and diligently and widely and deeply and reflecting on all these things, and if they really get into all this stuff, most people will eventually, I think, come to a position or understanding where they actually see the second and the third of those directions as more important than the first.

So more important than this kind of elevation of the idea of presence or simple mindfulness or bare attention and the whole technology of stress reduction that's involved in that—important as it is and valuable and necessary as it is as an aspect, a platform, as part of our path, a stepping stone—most people will come to regard the movement, the whole direction and movement of learning to fabricate much less and opening to that dissolution and that emptying, that non-fabricating, the unfabricated, and also the skillful fabricating, the beautiful fabricating, using the imagination, tantric practices and all that kind of thing, of the perception of self, other, world. Most people regard them as much more important and fruitful and richer directions in practice than the first ones—bare attention, simple mindfulness, or so-called presence.

Because especially with the last one, the skillful fabrication, it feeds the soul. It gives the soul, if we use that language again, what it wants. It's something that directly nourishes, deepens, opens, heightens, and sparks the soulfulness. Not that the others can't, but there's more range to that and more depth to the soulfulness in that third camp.

And very much it serves what we're talking about, this opening of the range of perception. We learn to fabricate skillfully through different ways of looking and see how the perceptions open and shift and change. This is really moving in that direction of serving this opening of the range of perception, which I've stressed several times on this retreat, in a way that may be one of the most important things and one of the most central ingredients of a different way of understanding what Dharma is and what practice is and the whole movement of the Dharma.

The second avenue, this unfabricating, is also in the service of eventually—not only of opening to this unfabricated and the mystical transcendent beauty of knowing that what is deathless, as I talked about in another talk the other day—not only that, but also through that, through deepening in that way and then emerging out of that depth of non-fabrication, then also understanding emptiness through that and giving us more license, more permission, also more skill and ability to shape perception, to enjoy the malleability of perception and to open up the range of perceptions.

So this again, everything hinging around perception and with that needing a wider view of the Dharma or a different view of the Dharma than may be common or familiar to many people. But needing a wider view of the Dharma, a conceptual framework of the Dharma that can actually hold all that, accommodate it, wherein all this makes sense. And it's a slightly different conception of what the direction and the aspiration of the whole of Dharma practice is.

When we make that delineation between these three avenues, it immediately, as far as practice is concerned, brings up the question: well, what is it that takes a practitioner in any moment in one direction or another? And as a practitioner, how can I steer and navigate and move between these different modes, these different avenues or directions?

Most people, as I said, will be already quite familiar with that practice of bare attention or simple mindfulness or presence or whatever we want to call it. But it's worth knowing too, in trying to understand better this whole question of navigation and steering and moving between these practices, it's worth knowing too also that clinging—even unconsciously—to a concept of actuality, that when I'm mindful or when I'm practicing bare attention this is the actuality of things, this is things as they are, to misappropriate a phrase of the Buddha, actually subtly or rather implicitly clinging to that concept that when I'm mindful I'm with the actuality of things, that will actually lock this avenue of bare attention, so-called, in place. It will keep it in place as a perception, as a way of looking.

Because I believe this is reality. And in a way, just that subtle belief practicing bare attention—it doesn't even need to be a conscious thought—locks the perception in place and the way of looking in place and then the appearance in place. So it actually cannot evolve too much or change or develop too much.

I'm throwing this out as an aside, but it will be worth, if you want to explore this kind of thing: what's the difference if I'm practicing just simple mindfulness, so-called, and I have a subtle view that I'm being with what is real—say materiality or this or that—and just shifting that view, same practice, but just shifting the view to seeing this is appearance. This is an appearance and that's what I'm giving mindfulness to. There's a difference between appearance and appearance assumed to be reality or physical reality or materiality.

These are subtle views woven into the mindfulness, subtle conceptual views, usually unconscious, woven into the mindfulness. We can make them conscious and then play with practicing with this subtle view, and with this subtle view, and see what happens, how they change the experience, because it will.

But if I have, as I said, if I'm clinging unconsciously, usually, to a concept of this is the actuality that I'm being mindful of, that will prevent the experience deepening and opening, and will limit it in a way, and will also limit the understanding of deeper emptiness.

But most people are familiar already with that simple mode of bare attention or mindfulness, whatever we call it. The second avenue or group of practices, the ones that tend to fabricate much less and with that whole range of less and less fabrication—emptiness practices, samadhi practices, mettā practices, compassion practices, those kind of things—it's really just a matter of learning those practices and developing one's skill with them. It's just a matter of finding the right ways to practice and developing them and then sustaining them as ways of looking.

So I need to learn this particular emptiness practice, let's say, regarding things as anattā, as not-self, all phenomena that arise. I slowly, gradually learn, develop the skill to regard them as anattā, as an example, as not-self. And then I sustain that way of looking, moment to moment, as a deliberate practice. A lot of skill, a lot of subtlety involved in developing that as a practice—a tremendously powerful and beautiful practice. But doing that and sustaining that way of looking will, as an example, will tend to fabricate less and less self and perception of things and world and phenomena.

So steering that way is a matter of just having, understanding what one's doing in those particular practices, developing them and just sustaining them as a way of looking.

In the third camp, the avenue that actually engages and sustains this skillful fabrication of self, other, world and the perception of self, other, world, we need to recognize when that is present for us, when there is, if you like, to use a Buddhist word, a skillful perception of self, other, world—a different perception that's actually there. Recognize when it's there and tune to it.

So this is recognizing, for example, holiness or divinity, recognizing the theophany, recognizing that there's a cosmopoiesis there. So recognizing that quality, recognizing that perception and tuning to that and actually sustaining a focus on that, on that perception, on that way of looking. So whatever it is that one's doing, whatever it is that the mind and the heart are doing to look that way, that needs to be recognized and sustained gently.

But often what actually happens in this avenue is that something sparks, or triggers a different way of looking—a way of looking of seeing the world through the imagination and then seeing self, other, world, seeing, perceiving them as theophany or with this wider cosmopoetic sense imbuing the perception. Something sparks that and something in us, a sense to that mode of being, that way of looking by picking up that spark and tuning into that perception.

So one could definitely engage, say, a tantric practice deliberately to see one's food as divine nectar, as I mentioned at one point, deliberately trying to taste it that way and see it that way and smell it that way. I'm very clear what I'm trying to do, and I'm sustaining that as a gentle way of looking as much as I can.

Or it might happen more spontaneously. Something sparks in the mind or triggers—perhaps a poetic idea, a line of poetry, a fragment of music, an image, or someone we remember or think of or see who is alive for us as an image in the sense that I'm using the word. Any of these can function as a spark, a trigger, and become a kind of portal to this different perception, this more holy or divine perception and sense of self, other, world. There's something that's sparking this cosmopoiesis, sparking a theophanic sense. The possibilities here are truly endless.

But what's characteristic to any cosmopoiesis, or practice of cosmopoiesis, is that it includes the surroundings. I'm not just dwelling, focusing on just this imaginal figure divorced from the surroundings around me. Whether deliberately or spontaneously, the surroundings get included—where I'm practicing, if I'm outside or in the meditation hall, whatever the sights, the sounds, the appearance of the world around me as I'm practicing. This may mean the eyes are open, but they can also be closed, and one is still including a sense of the surroundings, an awareness of the surroundings.

The cosmopoiesis can be fed or triggered or born from an emptiness practice. States of samadhi naturally bring with them what I call after-effects on perception—they naturally bring cosmopoiesis. Emptiness practice, metta, compassion, or samadhi naturally alter the perception of the world, and through that we can actually understand more about emptiness and fabrication of perception. Kinds of cosmopoiesis can come through all kinds of practices, all kinds of states. The possibilities are infinite—the range is infinite.

So it could come from emptiness practices or samadhi or metta or compassion. It could come from some poetic image or idea that we are practicing with and resonating with. As I said, we notice the sense of holiness or divinity within that image, with that image, and we tune to that and let that spread. It becomes a kind of tantric practice where one can, for instance, see one's surroundings, sense one's surroundings, feel them as a Buddha realm, or sense them as theophany.

I'll share an example by reading you an email that a student sent me, because it highlights some of the possibilities here and some of the possible directions. She was talking about emptiness practices that she was exploring with some friends as a group, working through different emptiness practices together. Then she says, "I have been working with the imaginal quite a bit since we last spoke at Gaia House. The naughty child image has not returned, nor the indulgent aunt. But the sexual image is morphing and changing and feeding me more and more as I experiment with receiving it more fully."

This is actually the same person you may remember from early on in the retreat when I mentioned her experience of feeling like someone was kissing her as she walked through the corridor, which opened up samadhi when she began exploring it in practice. Sometimes the images that have their roots in or obvious correlation with our biographical history and childhood—like the naughty child or the indulgent aunt—are really important for us. But it's often the other images that seem to have less obvious biographical correlation or roots in our personal history that actually may last longer and be more fertile, seem to go deeper. It's almost like they come from a different dimension.

She continues: "The eros is less hard now but still very powerful. I've observed that it seems to come when the samadhi is deepening. Occasionally it comes when I call it, like it is rescuing me when I feel overwhelmed by heaviness or pressure in the body." This is very much what we've talked about—using images in relationship for the sake of samadhi, helping to shape and develop what's happening in the energy body.

"It usually begins with that sensation of being kissed, and it took quite a while for me to allow myself to be kissed and to enjoy it, which feels unbelievably nourishing. Each time this image comes, or occasionally when I bring it up myself, I learn more. One part of the image involves the being that is kissing me, joining me in meditation, fusing or melting into my body. I can feel changes in the body's texture and there is a sense of succumbing to one with greater experience."

This joining, being joined in the meditation, fusing with or melting into the body of some imaginal other—whether the teacher or some divine personage—and that affecting the whole sense of the experience, is so common.

But it's really her next paragraph that I want to draw attention to for our purposes today. She continues: "During my meditation last night, I was imagining everything was made up of silence and holiness. Another favorite practice at the moment."

Let me say something about this. There are practices I would put in the group of emptiness practices, where one listens to silence—listens to the silence in the mind, the silence between thoughts, the silence that pervades thoughts and pervades the body sensations, the silence that is around sounds. Even as one deepens this practice, there's the silence that seems to pervade sounds as well as thoughts. Attuning, listening to silence—this is a whole practice in itself, a very beautiful practice that deepens and deepens. That silence becomes deeper and richer and more mystically pregnant with a sense of holiness.

Very, very beautiful practice in itself.

And she puts, "I was imagining everything was made up of silence." What will happen if you do that practice of listening to silence and you develop it? One will actually have the perception of everything being made up of silence and holiness. It will come very organically, naturally out of that practice deepening. She's using the word "imagining." So one can have a little taste of that and kind of trigger it through the imagination, which may be what she's referring to.

Then she continues, "I was really feeling the spaciousness of looking in this way and everything was very soft. And then the sexual image came and also feeling behind the eyes of tears at several points. The emotion in the tears was of being moved and of touching something sacred." There's not tears of sadness or grief—something like that. It's of being moved. There's a difference. Touching something sacred. "This fusing of the sexual with the sacred is new. Usually I work with them both, but separately."

So that was her report. And it sounds like, from that email—I didn't get the chance to talk with her after this, unfortunately—but it sounds like there's the possibility from this place of the sexual and the sacred fusing in her experience. There's the possibility very much like a threshold for that to evolve so that this erotic image that she's been working with so skillfully and developing can actually expand to a wider sense of, a wider perception of sacredness in the world, and maybe also eros in the world.

This is a whole huge subject. And that would be different than just the perception of silence as holiness that she was alluding to before and I described. Here it's through an image, and particularly an erotic image, and that opening up, actually widening into a cosmopoiesis, where it starts to imbue the whole perception of the world as sacred, in a very particular way. This is such a huge subject, that one in itself, but that would be one possibility.

And just to offer a few more possibilities, give you a sense of the range of what's possible here, or the beginnings of what's possible at least. So some people practice mantra meditation, the repeating inwardly of certain holy syllables or mantras or phrases. And so here, perhaps practicing at first, hearing the mantra internally as a theophany. So the mantra itself, hearing it internally, but hearing it as, if you like, divine speech or the cosmic primordial sound or whatever.

So implicit in hearing it as a theophany inside, internally, so to speak—implicit in that is there's usually a conceptual framework of what is sacred, but it's usually vague. This is something I will return to later. So implicit in the practice, hearing internally as theophany is a vague conceptual framework of the sacredness of it. Practicing hearing the mantra that way internally with this sense of sacredness of theophany and then letting it spread—and again it might spread naturally but letting it spread so it feels like it's not just coming from within but it's pervading the world, pervading the air, pervading the cosmos, pervading nature. And then one has a kind of cosmopoiesis where the mantra is, again, imbuing the whole world, the whole cosmos.

Sometimes, amazingly, and we've touched on this before, even something that happens in meditation that is a distraction can end up sort of taking a turn. In a way, we can notice something in a distracted thought, for example, that it has a theophanic sense within it. We notice that, oh, I thought I was distracted, but actually it's got another quality to it. When I notice it, I pay attention to it in a different way. So even within distractions, sometimes we can notice a gold, a treasure there. In this case, particularly what I want to emphasize is the theophanic sense, the expression of divinity, if you like, in the very distracted thought or idea or whatever. And that's something then we can notice, tune to, and allow and open to.

So an example of this—it's maybe for some people a strange example, but because I was a jazz musician for some years and I used to play jazz electric guitar—so we're working so much at that in the past, sometimes I mean happened a lot in the past when I was actually a musician, that one often has, it's as if a part of the mind is just improvising music all the time and improvising these melodies and jazz lines, if you like. And because one knows the guitar, one's actually seeing, if you like, the image of the guitar and where the fingers would go, and it all just is happening kind of spontaneously by itself in the mind. And sometimes it's very creative, sometimes it's just a sort of thing that's going on.

And so I was meditating, and I noticed that that was going on. And I couldn't—it felt a little sticky as a distraction. It's like, oh, I let go of it, but it still was there. I let go of it, it still was there. And then I was noticing, oh, I can actually hear those musical lines being improvised. I can actually hear it right now in a certain way, or play with hearing it a certain way, as if that music that the mind was creating, the mind was hearing inside—you can hear it as mirroring or as an analogue of the endlessly creative musical cosmos.

So there's a whole kind of world of idea, quite vague, wrapped up in that way of hearing. The vague idea of somehow the essence of the cosmos is somehow or at some level a kind of music. And the vague idea that the different human musical laws, those different systems and different cultures, those laws of music somehow mirror the cosmic or divine laws. This is all very vague and subtle ideation.

So I know there are those ideas out there in the world. In the meditation it felt really not like a rigid or a clunky idea.

There was something very subtle about this hearing and this loose, vague ideation that was also very subtle. It was quite fluid and not some clunky metaphysical system.

What I'm talking about here is the shift in the hearing of what was initially a distraction in the meditation opened a really subtle meditative sense. Part of what was involved with that was a kind of relaxing of the mind's clinging or aversion to or narrow focus on the music that was in the mind. And the attention suffusing a little wider, including the energy body, as we said, and—I keep stressing—including this sense and attuning to the sense of the wider cosmic theophany that was with this hearing of this music in this subtle way. And also the attention was with the very subtle and vague idea of this music of the cosmos and the way that human music echoes or mirrors or expresses the divine and the cosmos.

I may come back to this image later, because in different ways it might illustrate something. But that would be, maybe for some people, a quite strange example of a way that actually can pick up on something, even in a distraction, and tune to the sense of the theophany there, and the implicit cosmopoiesis that can sometimes open up with that. Actually what was distraction becomes a very beautiful, subtle meditation that one then sustains the attention on, and very, very fruitful in that respect, very beautiful.

It's possible that a person whom we see imaginally can become for us a theophany, a face of the divine. They become, if you like, an angel. Corbin talks about the angelic function of beings. So this is very possible, especially when there's eros. I don't just mean sexual attraction—I include that, but I mean more. Especially when there's eros in the relating to and way of seeing that person, and especially where there's imaginal practice and imagination imbuing that perception, and the logos, the conceptual framework supports it—very possible for a person that we love to become for us a theophany, an angel, to fulfill a kind of angelic function for our soul, for the psyche. And then there's a seeing of divinity in that person.

But this is a different kind of sensing of divinity. It's a different mode than, say, seeing all beings as one or partaking of the oneness of things, whether that oneness is the mystical silence or oneness of cosmic love or the oneness of awareness or whatever it is. Different kinds of oneness share in that they erase or dissolve the particularity of the personhood, the unique personhood. That kind of sense of a divine oneness that includes all beings—that's absolutely wonderful and it will come out of standard metta practice if you do it long enough in certain ways, it will come out of different ways of practicing with awareness and with silence as we've talked about.

But right now I'm after something different: a way of sensing divinity, sensing another person as theophany, as angel, but in a way that includes or retains their personhood, their particularities and their uniqueness. Even though each person might appear to us as not just one kind of theophany, but multiple. So one person, when the imaginal practice is really rich in regard to a person that we love, and when there's eros there, and when there's the conceptual framework opening and supporting it—one person can be different angels to us. They appear as different theophanies. And all of them retain their personhood, their particular uniqueness. It's not this dissolution into oneness.

But then that particular theophany can spread to the world as well. That's actually a huge subject and interesting—again, something that one could easily spend a long retreat on or write a book on. I'll just mention it now as a possibility.

Some of the possibilities can actually be very, very simple. A retreatant a while ago shared that he was enjoying reading a little poetry on his retreat and was reading a Hafiz poem. I can't remember the exact line from the poem that triggered it, but it was something about Hafiz saying all things are gifts from the divine or gifts of the divine or the beloved, using the word beloved as a synonym for the divine. Note also again that when there's the word beloved, there's the inclusion of the erotic component in regard to the divine. Calling the divine the beloved introduces, allows, supports the eros in relation to the sense of the divine.

This poem says all things are gifts from the beloved, the divine. And that line touched his heart and opened his heart. It became, if you like, a poetic eidos, a poetic idea which became a poetic way of looking. That's what we're in the business of here—we're in the business of cultivating these different ways of looking.

So the heart was touched, was opened, and the idea there—all things are gifts from the Beloved, from the Divine—entered and transformed the way of looking, so that things were actually perceived that way. It wasn't just a cute line of poetry; actually it became a meditation, became a perception. He was seeing and sensing things that way. And then we were talking about gently encouraging a sustaining of that way of looking, so the heart connected and perhaps just dropping in like a whisper now and then the memory of that line of poetry, and letting it transform the way of looking and sustaining that way of looking, just very gently, very lightly, without clinging too tightly to it.

Doing that, joy came—in this case, joy came, rapture came, physical bliss, definitely a sense of beauty and depth in the sense of the things of the world. There was cosmopoiesis happening. He was at that point experiencing, inhabiting a different cosmos than the regular one that he felt he inhabited. So that would be a very simple way of triggering, if you like, or encouraging this kind of cosmopoetic perception.

Or it might be that organically one is practicing meditation and some kind of poetic idea that has a cosmopoiesis implicit in it just arises spontaneously in one's mind. I remember some months ago doing standing meditation outside in the early morning sun beneath the beautiful trees we have here at Gaia House, and really opening to the sense of the surroundings and everything. And this phrase came to me: I am prayer.

What does that mean? "I am prayer." It came out of the sensibility in the moment, and it also fed a sense of self in the moment. I am prayer. So it's a very—what am I? I am prayer. What does that mean? I don't know. It's a poetic idea. I mean, it has all kinds of resonances. I could probably say a lot about it.

That phrase definitely didn't mean "I am prayer" as in supplication, as in asking God for this or that favor and sorting this or that out in my life. Prayer as something much deeper, much wider and mysterious in the range of its meanings. Prayer as praise, rather than supplication or asking for wishes to be fulfilled—my wishes to be fulfilled. Even wider than praise.

I cannot get to the bottom of what that means—prayer—and certainly not to the bottom of what it means to entertain the idea, the poetic idea, "I am prayer." And letting that be there in the consciousness and letting it have its effect, the effects of this poetic idea on the perception, on the way of looking and the beauty and the depth that that opens up, opened up.

And that opened up a sense actually of the cosmos and the earth, the very earth and the trees and the ground and the sunlight as prayer. Not just "I am prayer," but all this is prayer somehow. What does it mean? I don't know. I don't have to figure out what it means. I have to open to that cosmopoiesis.

Another possibility would be to practice, say, with breath meditation and practice feeling or conceiving or imagining the breath as the breath of God or a god or a goddess. So what is this breath that comes in and out—either in the anatomical way of air or the whole energy breath that we were talking about earlier, at the beginning of the retreat? What would it be to play with conceiving of that, imagining it, feeling it as the breath of God or the breath of the goddess?

Or perhaps, what is it to breathe with the beloved? To breathe with the beloved. So breathing together. And who is that beloved? It's an imaginal figure. It may be a lover in one's human life. It may be some other figure that there is this deep love for. It may be the divine in some face, some form. And again, if there's eros there, it's really okay. It might be a very erotic motion, in some sense, and way of relating to breathe with the beloved in the imagination.

Maybe with that there's a real sense of blessedness that comes. Probably because it involves the breath and that kind of opening, it's probable that that kind of imaginal work—feeling, conceiving of the breath that way—probably will invite the possibility of being breathed by the beloved, or breathing with, a kind of opening, abandoning, all of which are, if you like, aspects of the energy body, but also aspects of the whole being, the emotionality, the whole psyche, the whole consciousness.

So we can gently introduce some imaginal idea or concept or just the image there and play with, kind of navigate, ride it. What does it feel like it wants to open and do in the energy body, in the emotion, but also in the perception?

Another example: one might hear, for instance, the birdsong or the wind or some other element of sound in the natural world or around us. Hear that as mantra. So that is the mantra. And what does mantra mean? Well, it could be divine speech. It could be sacred vocalization. It might have some other meaning.

So there's no real formula for any of this. It's very improvised. What kind of way of conceiving—very loosely, usually very vague or quite vague—way of hearing birdsong and wind gives it or imbues it with that sense of holiness? So we're just gently supporting, inclining the attention and also the way of looking, the way of relating, the way of conceiving, so that it opens up this cosmopoiesis.

Or what would it be to hear the birdsong, hear the wind as love, as metta, as the compassion of the bodhisattvas, compassion of the cosmic Buddha, the compassion of the cosmic Christ?

Or here, the birdsong, the wind, or whatever it is, as the devas, the angelic beings, praising, singing joy. And these angelic beings, they're imaginal figures. I may not see them. Their being and what they actually are, what they constitute, that may remain quite vague to me—no problem. The specificity that's important there is the shift in perception, the hearing in a certain way. It may not be the actual imaginal figure that gets clear—this angelic being or deva or whatever. You understand?

So either spontaneously these things arise, these shifts, but it's possible that the self, ourselves, or the human beings around us, or the animals, or the birds, or the surroundings—the trees, the grass, the land, the light, the nature—actually even with practice, or when it goes very deep, even the plastic artifacts that may be around us, man-made artifacts, plastic things that may seem to conventional perception very unholy, even those things, this sense of theophany, they can become theophany too, or part of a wider cosmopoiesis.

But it's possible that all this—self, humans, nature, surroundings or specific trees, for instance, specific animals or whatever—can be perceived, seen, sensed as, if you like, angelic. And again, keeping that word quite open, not really filling out what it means. Maybe later we'll do that, fill it out a bit more. But maybe just to say now, it means that they are not just one-dimensional material. There's a verticality being introduced into the other dimensions, if you like, into the cosmology.

So, it's interesting... One could, I suppose, with a lot of practice, actually do a little exercise and practice sustaining different ways of looking at, say, self and other. So just in terms of human beings, what is it to see someone, one's own self or another, as a biological machine—and their consciousness, my consciousness, as just what they call an epiphenomenon, something that arises just out of the right combination of matter over time, consciousness emerges? That's quite a popular view these days, if you like. Sometimes it's a consciously articulated view, sometimes it's a subliminal view. Now, that itself could be seen as amazing. There's a wonder in that, just that possible in that view. Or it could be more, if you like, a bit nihilistic.

Compare that, or add to that—sometimes Joanna Macy talks about deep time, this sense of this biological machine evolving over all this time and eons, not eons, but billions of years, in fact, the evolution of life on Earth and how we share roots. Our biology shares roots. And in a way, what we are now is connected through all that time, with everything that we have evolved through. And for some, there's a kind of holiness, there's a kind of holiness in that way of looking, introducing that idea of deep time.

Or what would it be to look at the self or the other and see in terms of the classical Buddhist elements, either the four elements—earth, air, fire, water—or six elements, those four plus adding space and consciousness? And as I said near the beginning of the retreat, this, as a way of looking, actually is not one way of looking because in itself it can be directed, as all of these, it can be directed with different flavorings.

So one can look at oneself or another in those terms. It's purely a kind of deconstructive way of looking. It's taking apart, seeing there isn't much self there, and a way of letting go of clinging to a person or to their body or lust or whatever. Or one may look at, in terms of these four or six elements, and see the interconnectedness of this person, this self, or that person with nature and with each other. These elements flow porously between person, self, and world.

Or again, same concept but given a different spin. One actually sees through a lens that feels the holiness of the elements. There are quite different ways of looking within that.

Or with the aggregates, the five aggregates that Buddhism sets up as ways of looking—body, vedanā, perception, mental formations and consciousness. Again, that can be taken in, or rather using that as a conceptual framework—it's not one way of looking, actually several different ways of looking depending on how one's flavoring it. Again, it can be directed or work as a kind of deconstructing of the self or the person so that we don't cling so much to the self or to other selves.

It can also be seen in terms of seeing again the interconnectedness of these aggregates. The aggregates that I have here are not really that different from the aggregates that you have there. Consciousness is consciousness. Body is body. Moments of vedanā, moments of vedanā—what's the difference? So as a way of breaking down the sense of separation, giving more of a sense of interconnectedness, that takes that conceptual framing of the elements and it creates a different way of looking than just a kind of deconstructive tool.

Or again, if you've done a lot of emptiness practices, what is it to see in terms of the aggregates, but know that those aggregates themselves are empty? They are fabrications. Or even further, to see them as divine. They are empty divine phenomena, if you like. The aggregates are empty and divine.

So these are all different ways of looking within a conceptual framework that allows actually within it slightly different conceptual frameworks that form ways of looking. But apart from that very last one, where there's a sort of awareness that aggregates themselves are empty or divine, or perhaps their elements as holy, this idea that we're talking about today of actually seeing self or seeing other as angel, as theophany, as an emanation of the divine—and everything that's implied there about perhaps a vertical dimension that we've mentioned, or the different levels of being—that would be different than seeing more in terms of interconnectedness or just the pure materiality of things. It's different.

But there are, with any way of looking, a kind of cosmopoiesis that's going on here. And involved in that way of looking, in any way of looking of these that I've delineated, is a conception, usually unconscious, of what matter is and what the cosmos is. I don't know if anyone would actually do that as an exercise. You could play with it, and there's no reason why not. But I'm really trying to point out there are different ways of conceiving, and some of them allow more of a sense of holiness and divinity, and that's different than purely interconnectedness—which is a more horizontal connection between things.

But basically, what we're doing, again, in practicing something like this, or opening to this cosmopoiesis, is we're playing with eidos. We're playing with the imagination and ideas, loosely, to create ways of looking. We're playing with ways of looking.

It's worth mentioning, as part of that, one will notice that the perception of the world through this, or of another, through these different lenses, or when one's playing with this kind of theophanic sense or cosmopoiesis, the perception will appear at different registers. We've talked about this before. So it might be, for instance, very ethereal. The whole world might seem very insubstantial and kind of luminous, or it might just look like it ordinarily looks—more solid. So just mentioning that is something to notice. And one can sometimes feel, oh yeah, it wants to be at this register. The perception wants to be at this register. So just allow it to be at that register.

When we talk about a more angelic or theophanic perception, it's not necessarily the case that that sees everything and perceives a more ethereal substance or perceives that higher register. It's not necessarily the case. But we're playing with ways of looking. We're playing with eidos.

And the sacredness here—we recognize this is not independent of the mind and the heart. The sacredness that we perceive and that we feel so deeply sometimes is not independent of the mind and the heart. The citta, the mind-heart, the conceptual framework, the way of looking, gives sacredness to the perception. It gives sacredness to appearances. It gives sacredness to things. It sacralizes things.

Now, if we say that, and if one hasn't perhaps explored emptiness enough, one immediately thinks, "Oh, so what that really implies is that they're not sacred, really." One tends to think that way, but no, it does not imply that. Because we are not buying into the sort of usual Cartesian split of mind and matter, subject and object. There's a different understanding underpinning all this. We understand that nothing, no thing has independent existence, has an existence independent of the way of looking. And that gives a different status to the perception of holiness. The holiness is not separate from the citta. But that doesn't mean that it's not real.

So there are parallels here with, when we're talking about the primordial wisdom awareness, the Buddha nature, and that awareness itself, that primordial wisdom awareness itself being something that's holy and empty, and also not separate from the divinity that it sees, the objects that it sees. So here too, the objects of awareness and the awareness and the sense of sacredness—none are separate. Objects, awareness, sacredness—not separate, and all of them are empty. And it's the understanding of emptiness that's part of what allows the sacredness and the validity of the sacredness.

So in practice, with this theophanic sense, or the sense of theophany in an image, or an image as theophany, or the theophany in the perception of the world, just to point out a few things regarding practice. A lot of this is actually intuitive, but it's good to spell it out as well in case we get a bit lost and just to be a bit clearer.

So in a way, what it rests on is an openness at least to that experience being a possibility for us and also an openness to the whole thing conceptually. To some degree of openness and receptivity to these kinds of experiences and these kinds of ideas may be necessary. And then, so that's one.

Second is the recognition of that theophanic sense in an image or in the perception of another or of the world. We need to recognize it when it's there.

And then that's second, and the third, we need to tune to it. So it's actually something like—this has to do, as I said, with what is the specificity that's important to any image. Remember when we talked about imaginal practice and instructions there. So we're tuning to the theophanic sense because that's something quite specific, has a certain flavor, a certain tone, a certain character or expression. It's a certain kind of—remember we talked about tuning being one of the aspects of attention. It's tuning to the theophanic sense, the theophany.

And that tuning to allows that sense, allows the theophany—the sense of the theophany, the flavor of it—to filter out, to stabilize. It also amplifies it within the larger perception, within the wider perception. It may still be quite subtle, but the tuning to it makes it stronger and stabilizes it.

And then in a way, fourth, we're assenting to this theophany, this theophanic sense. That doesn't necessarily mean I literally believe it concretely. I don't literally believe that birdsong is sacred text. I don't literally believe that my lover is God or whatever it is, in a very literal sense, in a literal, concrete sense of what God might be. But there's an assenting to something. There's an assenting to the view, the experience, and the idea within it.

And then focusing on that, and opening to this sense of theophany, focusing on the theophanic sense and the image, and opening to it and its resonances. Often, sometimes, letting it spread. Letting it spread to become a cosmopoiesis. Letting it spread to the sense of the world, the perception of one's surroundings and the cosmos. So one feels, one senses oneself in a different cosmos, if you like. Or rather, this cosmos transubstantiated.

And again, a literal believing of that is not necessary. We're not really talking about belief here. It's difficult for some people to understand that.

So an openness to the whole notion and the possibility of experience, a recognizing of the theophany, a tuning to it, an assenting to it, focusing on it, opening to it and its resonances, and then letting it spread, letting it spread. And when there's distraction, if there is distraction—which there usually will be—we can perhaps lightly remember the original image and again open to the theophany there and just do the same thing, do the same steps.

Maybe the original image disappears, and there's just the wider sense of theophany, the wider sense of cosmopoiesis, if it's coming originally from a sort of separate image. Or maybe the original image stays, and that stays at the same time that there's this wider cosmopoiesis, this wider theophanic sense.

Let's stop here for now, as I'm just really wanting to give examples of and point in the direction of what we're talking about here and give an idea of some of the possibilities. There's actually so many. Give an idea of some of the possibilities and we'll talk more about this whole area and direction later.

CHAPTER 21

A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 5)

Rob Burbea · 1h27

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines how concepts of divinity necessarily remain vague yet retain immense transformative power - much like our concepts of matter in modern physics. He emphasizes that 'divine' and 'sacred' are primarily matters of perception and sensibility that can be trained and developed through meditative practice. Drawing on personal examples ranging from Christian devotion to Jewish mystical feeling, Burbea illustrates how imaginal figures and experiences can profoundly affect our being without requiring literal belief.
>
> The talk focuses extensively on cosmopoiesis - the soul's tendency to perceive the entire cosmos as sacred and divine. Through detailed examples involving music, birdsong heard as cosmic music, and gardens transfigured into heavenly realms, he demonstrates how theophanic vision naturally spreads to encompass the whole world. Burbea shows how spontaneous words, memories, and sensations in meditation can serve as 'keys' that unlock mystical perception when approached with the right imaginal sensitivity.
>
> Central to this teaching is the recognition that meditation is fundamentally about training the flexibility of perception - opening the range of possible ways of seeing, feeling, and knowing self, others, and world. This multiplicity of vision serves the soul's need for poetry, enchantment, and what William Blake called freedom from 'single vision.' The imaginal divine offers infinite faces and expressions, supporting the psyche's natural movement toward expansion, beauty, and soulmaking through sacred perception of existence itself.

So re-emphasizing a few general points we've already mentioned, but taking them in a slightly different direction regarding conceptions of divinity in relation to the imaginary in particular.

One of the things I pointed out about concepts and conceiving is that it's always going on. By concepts, I don't just mean big conceptual structures and philosophies that need articulating and words. I also don't equate the word conceiving with thinking. By conceiving, I mean the whole spectrum, all the way from big, complicated conceptual structures like some of what we've been talking about, to include thinking, to include just the subtlest conceiving that's woven in with perception.

The idea sometimes of bare attention or non-conceptual awareness and this kind of thing is often quite uninvestigated. Those concepts are very attractive and sound very simple, but they betray a lack of fully exploring the nature of perception and of fabrication. Wherever there is perception—remember I'm using the word perception synonymously with experience and appearance—means whenever there's any experience at all, any appearances at all, there is subtle conceiving woven in with that. I don't mean we're walking around thinking or labelling everything all the time. It doesn't need to be verbal. But it's wrapped up in perception itself. Conception, perception, conceiving, perceiving are wrapped up together inseparably. No conceiving, no perceiving. And any perceiving involves some conceiving.

Another point I want to emphasize now has to do with vagueness of concepts. We might use words like sacred or not sacred or profane. Such words involve conceiving, of course they do. And usually they involve conceiving in a vague way. Or if it's not vague, it's at some level contradictory or circular or rests on assumptions.

So we might say a conception of sacred or divine. What does that actually mean? Even having gone through all this for hours now, it's like, well, still, what does it mean? It's hard, as I said, without being circular, to be really clear and defined and arrive at some kind of final, polished, demarcated definition or conception. The conception of divinity is vague to a certain extent, has a degree of nebulousness to it.

But here's what's important—so does the conception of matter. If I say to you the word matter or materiality, what does that mean? Just as one might ask hearing the word divine or God or gods, "What does it mean?", we can turn around and ask the same question about matter. We touched on this before. Through modern physics, what do you mean by an electron? What is it? What do we mean when we use that? And if I'm talking about experience, what do I mean? Solidity? A sense of solidity? What exactly do I mean? A perception? When we go into what does matter mean, what is matter, just as we might go into this question of divine, it ends up being really quite a vague concept. Mathematical equations, in the most abstract mathematical equations, might describe behavior of some matter under certain conditions when it's looked at in a certain way—actually describe probabilities of behavior.

Basically, we take for granted that our concept of matter, or we know what matter is, but actually, if we go into that, we see that it's really quite vague. We do have, of course, an experience of matter, even though if we poke our concept of matter, we quickly realize it's actually quite vague and not very deep at all, unless you've really studied a lot of physics or philosophy. But just as we have an experience of matter, undeniably, that we're familiar with, we can have experience of the divine, and the concept remains vague.

Implicit in all this is something I've said before. As well as involving conceiving concepts, divine or sacred or not sacred or matter—these are all perceptions. And this is the important thing. What we're talking about when we say sacred is a perception, or rather a sensibility, a way of looking. As such, the way of looking can be trained, developed, refined, enlarged, deepened, intensified, empowered. This actually is what should occupy us—this training of perception. And regarding conceiving, we want enough maneuverability and flexibility with the conceiving, and enough conceptions and conceptual structures to sanction a sacred cosmic oasis, a seeing of sacredness in the world.

So regarding perception, this is the important thing—the training of perception. We need enough conception to allow that to grow and to support it.

And we need to train the perceiving, the sensibility. That training of perceiving is what I would say, in a nutshell, meditative training is. Meditation is a training of the flexibility of perception.

In the training of perception there is an opening of the range. We've talked about that so much on this retreat, emphasizing that this is what we're wanting to do—open the range for the sake of soulfulness, for the sake of the beauty of that discovery, for the sake of freedom, for the sake of investigation. The conceptual frameworks need to support that opening of the range. And the opening of the range of experience and perception feeds back into the conceptual framework.

The range, by definition, is multiple. We can have so many different experiences of the divine, especially when we're talking about the imaginal divine. There is not one correct perception of God, so to speak, which we might tend to think. What's the right way that God is? What's the real way that God is? We can talk about one authentic experience, if that's even the right word, of the unfabricated, of the Godhead—the deitas absconditus, the hidden Godhead. But not of the faces, the expressions, the aspects of God, the dimensions of God, because in a way they're infinite. And it's about experience here, and there are infinite possibilities.

Sometimes in spiritual circles it's very easy for people to latch onto and cling to and chase one kind of experience: "Oh, that's it, that's it!" Or the teacher says, "There, that's it, you had it!" Or a person is aiming for or has a sense that there's one kind of ultimate experience of the divine: "I tasted it and now I've lost it."

Yes, perhaps there is singularity when we talk about the unfabricated, but not when we open it up into the realm of the imaginal and the fabricated.

Again, to quote the Kotzker Rebbe, but perhaps taking another spin on it: he said, "Where is God to be found?" And he answers, "In the place where he is given entry." You could read that as "Well, he's everywhere," but we don't see divinity everywhere. But it's also saying something about this infinite possibility of the expansion of the range of perception, of experience into all the different faces of the divine and sacredness, the sacred cosmic oasis.

We're talking here about emptiness, divine—again, imaginal divine. And the recognition that we're talking about perception; we're never talking about anything other than perception. Everything hinges on perception and the fabrication of perception, understanding that and training the flexibility, training the sensibilities, the range, opening the range. The conceptual frameworks support that. There's this reciprocal feeling, as we've emphasized many times.

The second thing I want to elaborate on is this: it's very possible for a conception of the divine, or an image of the divine, to have deeply powerful effect on the being, even when we don't believe—as I said—that this is real or true, and we concretize it and literalize it as a belief.

I remember decades ago, I think I was in my late twenties, living in the States. Quite unexpectedly—because I had not grown up at all in a Christian household or education—despite living in a culture where Christianity was present, though on the wane, in England, I'd never really understood the whole thing about Jesus and the cross and Christ. I was kind of sheltered from that in my upbringing.

Then quite unexpectedly, in my early twenties, I fell in love with Jesus. Very unexpectedly and very beautifully—the whole opening of the heart and the soul in devotion, touched so deeply. I began to enter into that and to explore it. I would go, sometimes more than once a week, to different churches in Boston where I was living. I would usually just visit these different churches, sit and stand at the back during the services, and I would be so moved—moved to tears, standing in the back.

Sometimes it was the old parson or priest, depending on the kind of church. Maybe some of these churches were really on the wane—three people there, all in their eighties or nineties. And I would stand at the back and just be sobbing, so moved by the hymns and by the mythos of Jesus and of Christ, the parables and stories and healing stories.

Talking to people and getting a little involved in that world in different ways, they would say, "Why don't you get baptized?" But I never felt I could, because actually I could not credo—non-credo. I could not say, "I believe this." And it was a barrier.

There was something operating through the mythos, but it was not about belief. And yet it was extremely powerful, deeply powerful—this sense that emerged, the mythos of the divine, of God, in this case through particular Christian mythos and Christ, deeply powerful and important without any clear theology. The belief wasn't there as a sort of literalized, concretized grasp of "I believe this to be true and real." The theology, the conceptual frame, was not clear, was vague. The mythos was alive, though, and this is important.

Somewhere along the line, books came out following scholars' research. The scholars of Christianity formulated this document called Q. Some of you will know this—Q, which they said, "Based on our scholastic and historical research, we can definitively say these statements Jesus actually said." Then there was a group of statements where it was probable or possible that he said them, and then statements where he definitely didn't say them.

Following this publishing of Q, there were several books. One that moved me a lot was Stephen Mitchell's book, I think called The Gospel According to Jesus, among others. But I also felt, personally, that there was this attempt to portray a historical Jesus—that this guy really lived. And oftentimes with a lot of the books that came out, there was something saying, "Basically, this guy actually lived, and he was another kind of radical, free, liberated being. In fact, he was a lot like Lao Tzu and a lot like various others—all these guys were kind of similar. And he lived with a great open heart."

I'm being a little flippant because it actually did move me.

But something in that way of casting the figure and the story of Jesus fell short for me somehow, in a soul sense. It was not that interesting or powerful for the soul. In other words, he's a liberated human being. He's a guy who's realized something and is then living from that realization, so he's not a god or the son of God. That kind of story presents him as like any other liberated human being, and in fact suggests that all liberated human beings are pretty similar.

That narrative, attractive as it was, fell short for me as a soul story. It was not that interesting and powerful, as I said. And note as well that it's presented as literal and concrete, or at least probable historical fact—this story itself of Jesus as purely human, a kind of liberated guy with a big heart, like a lot of other liberated people with big hearts, is not portrayed as imaginal. It's not conceived or admitted as imaginal.

So there was that kind of angle or fantasy floating around, not admitting itself as imaginal, sort of portraying itself as humanist, in a certain sense. And on the other hand, I was exposed to this dogmatic kind of Christology that originated, I think, with St. Paul. Pauline theology is this structure of the Son of God and the Trinity, and in its overwhelmingness and its complexity and its arcane structures, it was attractive to me in that it offers itself to the imagination. That kind of structure, that kind of verticality of dimensions, and the rich, complex, multilevel and textured movement of eros-psyche-logos can enter into that and relate to it and enrich it.

At the same time, that dogmatic Christian theology was unattractive to me, especially if I felt I needed to sign up to believing it and say a credo. But again, with that theology, it's presented—just as the humanist version is presented—as fact, as truth. This is a credo that this is true, this Trinity and all the rest of it, and not as imaginal.

Something was operating in me, very powerfully. I couldn't, or did not want to go to one side or the other really. And I could not articulate something back then that I can articulate now. Years later, what I realized—perhaps intuitively then, but could not articulate or realize fully consciously—is this: the Jesus that matters to the soul is not so much the Jesus of matter—the flesh and blood, so-called historical Jesus—but the imaginal Jesus or the imaginal Christ.

The Jesus that matters is not so much the Jesus of matter, the historical flesh and blood Jesus, but the imaginal Jesus, the imaginal Christ. Perhaps something in me realized that, but not quite fully consciously. So I just dwelt in this in-between world, and it was lovely and beautiful. But again, to say: we are interested in the imaginal divine. That's what we're talking about—the imaginal divine.

One last thing on this point, then we'll stop. I'll give you an example that also has to do with vagueness. I was sitting in meditation a little while ago, tuning into the felt center, the whole energy body, as we've been emphasizing on this retreat. There was a little bit of samādhi around, and then suddenly I heard quietly in the inner ear, so to speak, the word tzedakah.

Tzedakah is a word I knew from my childhood. It's a Hebrew word for charity—I think it means charity, or perhaps it can mean giving. Perhaps it's equivalent to the word dāna. But I heard that word tzedakah, just that word arising. And then, with that word, or sparked by that word, came the subtle image, sense, and idea—all wrapped into one—of my being. The sense of my being was completely wrapped up with the sense of the energy body at that time: the subtle image, sense, idea of my being as a gift from God.

That word, and then my immediate knowing of its translation, sparked a certain image-sense, a certain conception in the being. Very, very beautiful. Totally wrapped up with the energy body. My being as a gift from God. And then correspondingly came a sense of giving my being to God as a reciprocal gift. So there's receiving the gift of being and giving my being to God as a reciprocal gift. Very, very beautiful and very subtle. I lost it several times and then found it again.

Actually later, in a meditation the same day—I was on retreat at the time—this sense arose again but attached itself to a person. There's again the sense of the image spreading, but interestingly spreading from a more general sense of divinity to divinity through a person. Usually it's the other way around: we see a person in a certain theophanic way, and that begins to spread to the surroundings, the cosmophosis.

But just to say a few little things about that subtle imaginal sense or opening. I'm mentioning it because I want to draw out just a few points—some of them I mentioned before when we were giving instructions—and to highlight that this image didn't seem to involve any inner physical sense. Rather, it was just a sense in the other meaning of the word: an intuitive way of knowing. It was simply a sense of being as a gift from God and of giving one's being through God to God.

So it wasn't really a kinesthetic sense, though it involved the energy body. It certainly wasn't a particularly visual sense, although it did involve an awareness of the nature around me. And was it auditory? No, it wasn't an auditory sense. The word "sadaka" that I heard inwardly was more a trigger, something that ignited. Hearing that word spontaneously functioned as what we call a poetic spark.

Now, we've touched on this before, but just to spell it out in terms of instructions: when a spontaneous word arises in the mind during usual mindfulness meditation, I would simply recognize it, perhaps note it, then let go and return to the breath or whatever else. But here, in this practice—this kind of imaginal practice, or practicing of opening to at least the orientation, the potential of cosmopoiesis—some things that enter the mind can be taken up and function as keys. Keys that open the being and the perception and the conception in certain ways, that we can then tune to the mystical perception, the image, the mythos, the cosmopoiesis that emerges from that.

So it wasn't, as I said, particularly in any physical sense, nor was it only affective—only a heart thing. The heart was involved; there was a beautiful, subtle emotionality in the heart, but that wasn't the primary aspect either.

More important for our purposes right now is that as this sense opened, the sense of the divine was not located spatially, nor was it specifically defined. Again, we're really emphasizing this vagueness. What is this God or divinity that was so central and integral to this image, this sense, this conception? It was vague. There was not a worked-out, clear, demarcated philosophy or conception of God or divinity. Rather, it was open, amorphous, ambiguous.

Similarly, in practice, when I might use the word "angel," sense another as an angelic presence, or see them as angel—when they appear to me as theophany, as angel—what does that mean? What does this word "angel" mean? What exactly do I mean? What is an angel? We've been through all this elaborate conceptual structure, but still, I don't know. I can be affected beautifully and open in perception and conceiving by all that, but it remains an undefined meaning—not less powerful for being undefined or not clearly defined.

Perhaps it's characteristic of our personalities, maybe our time in history, I don't know, but we can tend to elevate specific, clear, or apparently clear, demarcated knowing of something that's defined, or at least definable. We tend to think this is better if it's clear, demarcated, and definable—preferably, or at least possibly, definable. We tend to elevate that. That's good, that's what we like, that's what we feel comfortable with usually.

But is there a necessary place for kinds of knowing that need to remain open and not very defined? In other words, sometimes we have experiences, and wrapped up in those experiences are conceivings where the knowing is much more open and amorphous and less defined—not clear and not demarcated.

Also, just in terms of that example, in the practice of it, the attention was not really focused on a particular object or particular sense. It was more global, rather general. The sense of divinity was everywhere—different than vast awareness that seems divine in this universal way. This image sense very much involved my personhood. The sense of God and the divine was not very particular, but it definitely involved my personhood, my life, my being. Not just universal—it involved me. There was a sense of self there, and God. The God was more vague but nonetheless powerful for that.

And if this isn't clear, we can tend so much in Buddhist circles to elevate experiences that are more dissolutions of self, or seeing the emptiness of self, experiences of no-self and all that. But knowing the emptiness of self thoroughly, we can then open the door for a whole other range and realm of dimensions of experience that do involve self—which is not taken literally and hardened into reality. This whole range of experiences that involve personhood and particularity is so important.

I'm now repeating what I said before, but despite not being focused on a particular object or particular sense—being global or general—the tuning in the meditation was very precise, very specific, even if it wasn't quite definable. As we talked about before, it was tuning to a particular wavelength or sensibility.

So we talked about this in the instructions, but the image here is more a kind of mystical perception—it's an intuition, a sense, more vague in terms of objects, but the precision in the meditative tuning and steadiness of the attention is on, if you like, this certain wavelength or this certain sense of things, sensibility.

Hopefully it might be helpful to perhaps give a few more examples of theophany and particularly of cosmopoiesis in imaginal practice to illustrate what I'm trying to get at and what I'm trying to open—a field, a door, a window, a portal that we can move through. A door, really, that we can move through, and a territory that can open up. So hopefully to illustrate and fill out a bit of what we've been talking about with a few more examples.

Actually, when it comes to theophany, and particularly when it comes to cosmopoiesis, one of the most potent and rich and fertile classes of examples of imaginal practice involves the erotic and eros—particularly pertaining to loving another and sexual feeling and eros in the bigger sense of the word towards another, whether that's a purely imaginal figure or someone we know seen through the lens of mythos, of image. There's something partly to do with what I talked about before, but something about the eros that potentizes and opens things up in the imaginal in a way that spills over.

So I could actually give many examples where the erotic aspect is actually foremost in relation to an imaginal figure or a figure seen through the imaginal lens, so to speak. But actually I'm not going to because it's such a huge subject in itself, and hopefully we'll be able to do that another time, another retreat or another place.

So I'll give some different examples. There's eros in all of these, but not in the narrower sexual, romantic way that we tend to think of when we hear that word "erotic." But eros pervades all of these anyway, as it does any deep work with the imaginal. It's part of the territory. It's what fertilizes it, as we talked about earlier.

Many of these examples involve music, and I've talked about music and musicians and given examples. So there's a connection between some of them. Rather than the erotic, there's a commonality of music here. It's not that significant—I'm just picking these out to give some examples of cosmopoiesis.

Some time ago, it was dusk time, the evening coming, at Gaia House, and the bird-song of the evening dusk, the birds singing as the evening draws in. Hearing that music as a cosmic music—the bird song echoes, expresses a kind of cosmic music, suggestive of other cosmic levels. Again, there's that vertical dimension implicit in the hearing, in the imaginal hearing. In the very sense, somehow again quite vague, but this sense of all that as music as cosmologically interwoven. Then that had a personal component for myself, remembering my life as a composer for some years, something I really gave myself to very fully, and feeling the soul function of the composer as kind of serving that connection between the cosmic music and what comes through on a human level—or rather seeing that there is a connection and wanting to serve that, and seeing that they ideally reflect each other.

A lot of that is actually quite subtle and hard to put into words. I gave that other image much earlier, the music that matters. It's the music that matters, but music in that sense was something more broad. Here it was still more broad than actual what we think of as music, but not as broad as it was in that other example.

And quite similar examples—actually, this is something I get quite a lot for myself, this particular sense of listening and sound and hearing it as sacred music. I was sitting, reading in the vegetable garden at Gaia House. It was a beautiful, sunny spring day. And I was sitting on the bench there, studying, reading. And I actually heard music—meaning I physically heard music. At a certain point I realized that it was the water pipe at the other end, perhaps fifty or a hundred yards away. At the other end, it was the tap—sort of old, probably fairly on its way out—of water that was running because it was into a hose watering the garden somewhere.

So this music that I heard was actually the sound of the water through the tap and the pipe at the other end of the garden. But it really sounded so beautiful, like some very complex and skillful and exotic kind of jazz through a reed or flute instrument, like improvised. It reminded me of a musician I love, Dewey Redman. He died some time ago, and he used to play an instrument called a musette, a fairly rare instrument that sounds like some kind of Asian reed instrument, and he was a master playing in very free and creative and subtle and complex ways.

So the sound that I was hearing from this tap was really compelling as music. It sounded so creative and fantastic—its sound, its structure, the kind of melodic fragments and so on. There were other sounds that seemed to accompany this. It went on for some minutes. And listening to that and opening to that and the delight in that and the beauty of it—through an actual sound, the sound of the tap—through that, then listening and opening in this way, the whole garden, the whole vegetable garden became sacred, became as if it had... it became a theophany. The garden itself, the sight of it, the whole surrounding of it became a theophany.

There was as if it was seeing it at a kind of more subtle level, seeing a more subtle dimension of the existence of the garden, of the being of the garden. And of course it was filled with light anyway because it was a sunny day, but this sense of other levels of creation, a sense of other worlds, other dimensions of this world present there. The sense too of this world—if we echo something Corbin said—this world as the imagination of God. That was all kind of implicit in this hearing, and then the whole sense is opening to this other garden, so to speak, in or behind or with or at a different level of the garden.

So there was not so much a transfiguring of the physical perception of the garden as we could say a transubstantiation. It appeared to be of a different substance at a different level. Really very beautiful, that kind of cosmopoiesis or opening perception of a different dimension.

There was a quality that was genuinely heavenly, or divine. When I use such words in this context - when something feels like heaven, when this garden feels perceived as a kind of heaven - I'm not speaking metaphorically. This isn't the casual "Oh, it's heavenly" or "It's simply divine" we might say about a beautiful sunset. There's truly a different sense here of a vertical dimension, interfused with the physical, perceivable in and through the physical.

Another quite similar example occurred during standing meditation outside near the large trees in our front garden as the morning sun was rising. Again, it was triggered by birdsong, though really the whole scene participated. Despite having my eyes mostly closed, there was an awareness of the nature surrounding me - I knew the scene, knew what it looked like - but it appeared very strongly as if that whole world, that entire scene with its birds and their song, was angelic. An angelic world.

These experiences are difficult to describe, but something about the whole thing - the nature there, the birdsong - was felt, was perceived as luminous, as diaphanous to something coming through it, transparent and translucent to divine light streaming through divinities. Sacredness pervaded everything, and there was a sense that everything was praising. Certainly I was praising all of that and the different dimensions present, but the world itself - the birds, the light, the trees - they were angels praising the divine. They were divine, faces of the divine, and they were engaged in praise.

Let me offer another example, one I want to elaborate upon partly for instructional purposes, to indicate how these experiences might actually evolve. Someone listening might think these things happen suddenly - which sometimes they do - but we've discussed how we can create conditions and relate to the flow of what arises in meditation with a different kind of responsiveness than we might bring to other practices.

I want to walk through this example to highlight the ways imaginal experience, or in this case cosmopoiesis, unfolds supported by and dependent upon our ways of responding and allowing what emerges, our ways of seeing what arises spontaneously in meditation.

I had been reading a book on Jewish mysticism earlier that day, or perhaps the day before, and this had triggered what I can only describe as a Jewish feeling. This isn't something that arises frequently for me, but it exists within my psyche. I was raised Orthodox Jewish, then left all that well behind - first as an atheist, then through my entry into Buddhism. Yet it remains alive in my psyche as soul-world, as soul-image, part of the entire history and ethos that constitutes a living imaginal landscape.

The point I want to emphasize is that I was conscious this feeling had been triggered by simply picking up and reading a book on Jewish mysticism. So someone might say, "Oh, dismiss that - it can't be authentic soul material because it was triggered by something external, something you read." Not so. There's no problem with such triggers.

This Jewish feeling was present, and I was simply aware of it, allowing and holding and feeling it within the meditation. As I did so, a point of white light appeared at my solar plexus - like a star in the night sky appearing at my solar plexus. Remaining aware of the whole energy body while focusing somewhat on that white light, some samādhi arose.

This samādhi energy spread through the body, and I felt my sense of both the physical body and energy body as a vessel waiting to be filled. The Jewish feeling continued pervading everything, along with a particular mythos alive within the umbrella of what Jewishness means to me - drawn from my past, from my reading, from soul fantasies.

Specifically, the idea of a tzaddik emerged. Tzaddik translates as "righteous person" - essentially the Jewish equivalent of a bodhisattva. Someone wise, incredibly compassionate, pure, saintly, utterly given to God. The resonances of this entire soul-image - what that word means for me, all the images that accrue to it, the fantasies and mythos - remained quite vague but very potent, extraordinarily fertile in my psyche.

With all of this present - allowing it, feeling it, aware of it as image, as mythos operating in the psyche at that moment, connected with the energy body in some degree of samādhi - the birdsong outside my window became beautiful to me, but beautiful in a specific way: like a sacred text.

I heard the birdsong as sacred text, a text that was inexhaustible - inexhaustibly deep, inexhaustible in its depth and beauty. This very notion of sacred text and its inexhaustibility in terms of depth of possible meanings, infinite interpretations - this too is a Jewish idea, or rather, an idea I encountered through my studies of Kabbalah, or more precisely, through reading about Kabbalah.

So this entire image-sense and the cosmopoiesis involved - the birdsong as sacred text - carried something not completely translatable, this text.

It's not even in a specific language. The details are not important in that sense. But there's, again, the precision of the tuning to the reverberations, the echoing, the feeling, the mythos there that's important.

This image or fantasy, this cosmopoetic sense of the birdsong as beautiful, sacred text, inexhaustible, came, if you like, on the back of all those other micro-stages of the meditation, and relating to them in a certain way. Had I shut down, or dismissed, or judged as unworthy, or just as a distraction, or papañca, some of those earlier stages—the Jewish feeling or the Tzaddik thing or whatever, body as vessel—maybe that sense of the sacred text, of the birdsong as sacred text, would not have arisen, would not have had the way, an opening would not have been made for it.

So again, in that sense, the image sense of the birdsong is not visual, but it's subtle and rich and pervasive. It was auditory. But on opening my eyes, then the world around me—and again, this is the spreading that we're talking about—the world around me took on this quality too. Here's an image, here's a theophanic image, and I'm focusing on that, and it has a certain boundary to it. In this case, the birdsong. But opening my eyes, often then the world around me and my body too seems to be sacred text, also seem to be sacred text.

So there's this spreading of the theophany to a more cosmopoetic sense of everything. The whole world and my body, too, seem to be sacred text.

Maybe a couple more examples. Some time—it was over a year ago—I had a day off and I spent it studying mostly in my room. I was reading different things. Again, I might have mentioned this one before, but then I meditated, and I was exploring imaginal practice deliberately, but no images arose. This is quite a while ago. I was looking for an image as something other than the world or my life, something that appeared to me in meditation like that. No images arose.

But then actually, the image or memory, if you like, of the day spent studying—so me sitting at the desk, studying, if you like, the sense of, in that, of pursuing what is meaningful to me, of trying to absorb, to learn, to open horizons and paradigms, to make connections. I mentioned this before. That was the image. That memory, that seeing of myself as me, as that memory was the image, infused with certain mythos and fantasy, but the image or symbol, if you like, was me studying with everything, all the richness imbued in that.

But that too had this sense of echoing higher levels. Again, this vertical dimension and this—the image of me studying felt like a theophany, felt like it was expressing a face of the divine in and through, in this case, the particularities of me, but also the particularities of a certain activity in life were expressing other levels. And the sense of theophany was through and in something very particular—certain activities of life and the self.

Now, I wonder—I don't know if I've mentioned this earlier in the retreat—but sometimes when we sense life, I wonder sometimes if we sense life more imaginally in that way. We have that sense of life as image, if you like, we have the sense of theophany and cosmopoiesis in life, then it may be that strange images don't need to arise so much. So that's a conjecture, a thought, something I wonder about sometimes.

It might be for some people that the literalization of life, really believing this or that so much, and the clinging that actually forces images, strange images on them in dreams and other places, you know, in meditation or whatever, or just wherever, because there's an over-literalization. When life is seen more imaginally, then the imaginal comes through and it's not squeezed out of life. There's a broader range for it to come through.

But again, in that image, there was a spreading in terms of the breadth of the image because the surroundings started to be included in the image. In that case, my room that I was sitting in, the whole world of that started—not just me, not just the activity, but the whole surrounding started to be filled with this sense of theophany, the sense of sacredness and the different levels present, if you like, in the world, in and through the world, the different dimensions of the world.

I'll leave out the other example I was going to give and just finish with one. It's actually, in a way, the most complex and perhaps for some, maybe the strangest. It may be quite hard to relate to. Again, it's musical, what has to do with music. So I'm aware it might sound quite strange for some, especially people who don't have a musical background. But I'm choosing it partly, again, to illustrate something about meditative process, about picking up on cues, relating to them in certain ways, working with difficulties, and how that opens theophanic sense, also in this case the cosmopoetic sense up in particular ways. Also, again, to illustrate when we use words like divine, God, etc., that it's really quite broad, infinite, in fact, the range of what might be meant there. It's not the narrow preconception that we might immediately assume when we hear those words, God or divine.

I had a teacher—I didn't have that much contact with him years ago at the conservatory. He was a jazz saxophone player, really, really amazing.

I loved his playing. I didn't have that much contact with him—just one or two classes over the years. On a whim, I googled him and found a short article explaining the basics of a certain musical concept for improvisation. It's quite technical and complex, having to do with advanced jazz improvisation.

Reading this article prompted my mind to improvise lines in moments when it wasn't busy, and even sometimes in meditation—musical improvisations informed by what I'd read, by this harmonic and melodic concept he was describing. My mind was doodling or daydreaming spontaneously music on the guitar, which was my instrument. In the imagination, quite a lot was just coming and coming. I could have stopped it, I suppose, but it was really quite persistent, and I was interested. There was something pushing that, if you like.

That night, or the night after, I dreamt of a jazz guitarist dressed in a colorful jester's shirt—big square patches of bright colors, smart but interesting, arty-looking, very striking without being overly flamboyant. He was playing a guitar solo on a stage, playing the most amazing, creative, original music—very strong, very striking, with this powerful, clear sound. I don't see an audience or anyone else in the band, but he's definitely on a stage performing.

In the morning, I felt something emotionally that visits me from time to time over the years since I gave up being a musician. It comes occasionally—a feeling of grief, of loss, of missing being a musician. Sometimes it's very specific: missing being a jazz musician, missing the trajectory of a jazz life. Sometimes it comes as just a whisper. Other times it comes and I get pulled into it a little bit, and it's difficult not to take it concretely and literally.

So it came that morning—quite strong, actually. Subtle, but quite persistent. It wouldn't go away; it was sticking a little bit. I didn't quite know how to handle it or approach it in practice. The question is always: what's needed? What will be helpful here?

Looking at it, exploring, investigating this constellation of emotion, I realized it's not all jazz I miss. It's something to do with those two images—the image triggered by what I'd found from my teacher and those doodle-daydream improvisations in my mind, and the image of the dream.

There's something about the loose, complex sophistication of the saxophonist's style—his sound and way of articulating, certain harmonic things that have to do with being on the edges, playing in and out of the boundaries of tonality, being liminal. That characterized all of it.

The dream image was more about a sense of almost otherworldly brilliance of intuitive or even channeled music—improvised music when it almost feels like it's from another world, as opposed to the more loosely intellectual, mathematical component of the saxophonist's approach, though that too is very fluid and edgy. So there were really two images there, and they were drawing me. They were so attractive in my soul.

Looking further, exploring more deeply, I realized that much of the pull, much of what was keeping this sadness, this grief, this sense of loss around, had to do with freedom of expression.

This is interesting because in sharing Dharma—in teaching or giving Dharma talks or writing about Dharma—I feel I have a responsibility to be as clear as I can. I aim mostly for clarity because I'm trying to instruct or teach or make things clear. That aiming at clarity, that didactic aim, means I am responsible to you as a listener, responsible to the students, responsible to the Dharma. All of that puts quite a lot of constraints on my freedom of expression.

There are also constraints I feel because of the whole Dharma ethos. There's a limit to how wild my expression can be, a limit to how much wildness can manifest or express when I'm giving a Dharma talk. It's actually very limited. What can happen in the Dharma Hall at Gaia House or another retreat center—the whole ethos is quite constrained in terms of freedom of expression, particularly in terms of wildness and intensity.

I think anyone who listens enough will recognize there's quite a lot of intensity in some Dharma talks and writings. But it's still constrained or held back or modulated for the sake of the listener and for respecting a certain restricted range of the ethos in the Dharma world.

The permission of the stage as a Dharma teacher—when I sit at the front and give a talk—is very different from the permission of a jazz musician on stage. Especially some of the jazz I was into was really very high intensity, wild, what they call "out there" and experimental. The permission of the stage is quite different. It has to do with freedom of expression, with intensity, with libido, with all these things.

So I was exploring and realizing what was involved in why these feelings of grief and loss were there. The mind—it's subtle, but it's not a huge, terrible emotion—was churning a little with this, throwing forward lots of jazz images and feeling this subtle pain.

The question became: how to deliteralize this? I'm taking these images too literally. Again, exploring and looking at the whole emotional constellation there, the constellation with the images...

And I realize at times coming in and out of all this, I feel a real gratitude for these images existing and also for the actual musicians I love. I've talked about this before and the music. Deep, deep, deep gratitude there in my soul, in my heart. And this turned out to be key, because then it turned into a kind of reverence, a devotion, a prayerfulness. And that felt lovely, felt beautiful. There's still a shade of pain, of grief in it.

But then I started reflecting. Actually, this is image. So jazz musicians that I knew personally, well, they were people, and people are not simple, and they're disappointing, and they're actually—the image that I have, say, of the teacher or the dream guitarist who's sort of reminded me of someone else—they don't actually exist in that way. In other words, the actual teacher is much more complex, more aspects of his being that I'm not too keen on, et cetera. So, oh, image, image. Don't get it too confused.

And somehow the reflections and the gratitude liberated just enough space around the images without rendering them less powerful. So all this is quite subtle. It's not that I'm in a great contraction or sobbing or anything like that. So we're talking about quite subtle things here and working quite subtly with them in different ways. And that's really what I want to illustrate in this long example.

So there was more space around those images, but without rendering them less powerful. And then, actually, this is one of the really interesting pieces, is that then they were able to be kind of absorbed. Those images, those two images of jazz and jazz musicians and jazz music and jazz life, et cetera, were somehow able to be absorbed because they were less constricted around, there was more space around, and they were able to be absorbed into the texture of my life, the image of my life as it is now, the actuality of my life now here as a Dharma teacher, et cetera, and doing what I do and all the different stuff that I do, which mostly is not music anymore.

So somehow it's like the ethos, the image of that, of jazz—it's actually hard to put that in a nutshell, what that actually means. I've talked about it before. It means more than improvising, just how you improvise Dharma talks or you improvise in interviews. It means much more than that. But the whole mythos of that was actually able to be translated, and not, again, not in totally delineated ways. There's still a lot of vagueness there. It was absorbed into the texture of the image and the actuality of my life, the way of feeling and sensing, seeing my life. So that was interesting.

But in terms of cosmopoiesis, this is the piece I wanted to emphasize. So I found all this interesting. So I go outside and I do some walking meditation. And I'm interested in this whole question of cosmopoiesis. And so I'm pleased to notice, when I do the walking meditation, that subtly these images, these jazz music images and jazz musician images that I described, they do spill over and spread into a cosmopoiesis, into a sense of the world around me and the nature and the walking and everything. And it's absolutely beautiful. It's absolutely delightful. And joy comes with it.

Again, hard to describe, but it's like the world is music somehow. And that was the sense of it, that at another level, if you like, at another level of the vertical spectrum of the imaginal, the world is music, its nature is music, its essence is music. So I know that we can hear that in different ways, and people talk about it in different ways. So certainly I can hear certain sounds as actual music, but it's more than that. Actually, all the senses were involved so that what I see and the forms that I see, the shapes, the colors, the sensations in my feet as I walk, the whole of nature and the whole structure of nature was music.

Very hard to explain here, and also hard to form a clear, defined sense of. It's quite subtle, yet very wonderful and very powerful. So again, there's the vagueness and the non-delineated and clear conceptual structure, yet still the depth and the potency of the opening. Really another dimension to existence.

And when I was tuning into that, but then the mind loses it, the perception loses it. That happened many times. But what I found was just remembering those two images of the jazz saxophonist, and that whole harmonic melodic approach that he described, just the image, very lightly, the image of that, and the image of the dream guitarist playing, and just remembering them, letting them be there very lightly for a second or two, and then they started again to act as triggers to infuse the perceptions of the world somehow and those images. Then those two images might linger there or one of them might linger very subtly in the background where the foreground attention is on the cosmopoetic sense, the world as music, or those initial images could disappear either way.

But either way, I stay tuned. I can stay tuned into the sense of nature as music and hold that, tune into that, hold that steady in the attention and open to that.

There are other parts to this I'll just mention briefly. So this is all over a period of a day in and out where I had quite a lot of free time to be practicing and pondering these things and working with them. Later, again in the afternoon, again the mind drifting repeatedly into this sort of imaginal doodling along the lines of this harmonic melodic approach on the imagined guitar in my imagination.

And within all this, I sense another image emerging—one much more personal. A being of white, of blue light: a puer. Puer means boy in Latin, and it carries rich associations within Jungian psychology. An eternally young figure—a young man, perhaps a teenager—but what puer really signifies in archetypal terms encompasses a whole confluence of qualities: enthusiasm and spirituality, vitality and eros, and much more.

This puer of blue light appears as an image, somehow mixed with me, or perhaps it is me at seventeen, discovering those harmonic melodic possibilities that weren't actually available at that age, exploring them, knowing how to develop and practice them. The excitement of that discovery, the endless puer enthusiasm—for enthusiasm comes from entheos, meaning the entering of the divine (theos) into being. What characterizes puer is precisely this kind of enthusiasm, this eagerness, this sense of infinite possibility.

In this image—partly radiant being of blue light, partly myself, partly me at seventeen, all fused together—there's the enthusiasm of discovery and creativity, of exploring this jazz world and developing new dimensions, sensing the infinity and open-endedness of possibilities. All of this forms a kind of gestalt, a constellation present as image, triggered by the same daydreaming and initial images.

With this comes tremendous bliss, much happiness in the energy body—sukha filling the energy body along with the sense of this blue light. One option certainly would have been to veer toward samadhi, focusing on the happiness in the energy body, letting it fill completely and absorbing into that. That would certainly have been possible at that point.

But there's this whole imaginal constellation moving from cosmopoetic sensing at one point into something more personal again, yet liberated from the contraction of tight identification with personal history—the literal "this happened and that happened" of one's actual life. Instead, there's a more imaginal sense of one's existence that transcends even time, because I'm certainly not seventeen anymore, and this didn't happen when I was that age. I wasn't into jazz then. But there it is: moving from the cosmopoetic to the imaginal personal in a liberated and liberating way.

Even later in the day, a sense of praise arose for the endless fountain, the cornucopia of music from the psyche—not just my psyche, but the psyche itself. The soul gives rise to music; humanity gives rise to music, endless in its possibilities, like a fountain from the deep soul, the deep mind. Praise for this human dimension, and also praise for that other dimension, that other level: the music that is the cosmos, the cosmos that is music. All the while knowing that this sense of world, of cosmos, and that perception is not separate from mind.

To conclude, when we speak of cosmopoiesis, we recognize—or rather, I'm stating as an axiom—that the soul wants poetry and enchantment. These are essential to soul-making and soulfulness. The soul wants to live, to know, to see, to experience poetically, wanting the enchantment of poetic existence.

In terms of cosmopoiesis, what we're really discussing is this sense of range. We're not asserting that the cosmos is definitively like this or that. We could take cosmology as defined by current science—and that's fine, actually very enchanting and beautiful to me as one vision, one knowing, one sensing of the cosmos. I love what modern physics and cosmology reveal, as much as I can understand it.

But something in the soul wants and needs an endlessness of creativity, a range of ways of feeling, sensing, knowing, seeing, living—sensing ourselves, others, and the world through cosmopoiesis. The psyche wants to expand; the imaginal world wants to expand. Eros wants to expand, with this movement of fertilizing, this expanding tendency of Eros, Psyche, and Logos together, fertilizing each other, the whole constellation growing, expanding, going deeper, opening other levels, other visions, other experiences.

Holding all this lightly, one wouldn't want to assert that this cosmos is real and that one is not, or vice versa. That would be falling into clinging too tightly and concretely to either view—scientific reductionist materialism versus some new-age perspective. This idea that the cosmos is music is a poetic idea, a poetic sense of the cosmos. It's not even metaphor in the way we commonly use that word, and certainly not literalism.

Because the soul, because Eros and Psyche want to see, feel, know, and live poetically, this movement of cosmopoiesis—this opening up of the range of perception of self, other, and particularly world—becomes necessary to the soul. Because Eros wants to expand psyche and soulfulness, and psyche wants to be expanded, soulfulness wants to deepen and be enriched and nourished. Soul-making needs to happen, and it's important for our soul that this soul-making occurs.

Soul needs images in all kinds of ways—a whole range, an infinity of images of life, of self, of others. It needs images that pertain to life, and it may well need images that seem to have nothing to do with life—what James Hillman calls the underworld, images away from life that seem to have no bearing yet are important for the soul. There are the many and plural images of life, and there are images away from life.

But soul also needs this sense of other dimensions, this vertical spectrum of the imaginal. This is what happens when soulfulness is enriched, when soul-making occurs: that vertical dimension opens, and there's also the spreading into the world in cosmic ways—the ensouling of the world.

So to repeat what we said earlier, soul needs multiple seeing. To quote William Blake again: "God help us, or God save us from single vision." We feel this as we live more deeply—we feel it as a necessity of the soul, as something that fertilizes our life, our soul, our experience, our sense of being. This multiplicity is what happens when there is such fertilization.

As I've emphasized many times, a great deal of what I'm emphasizing is this wanting to open doors, to expand the range. Through these examples and through these talks, through this retreat, I really want to give some possibility to open doors, to support possibilities, to suggest possibilities—but these are possibilities of perception, of experience, of sensibility, supported by the conceiving, supported by the practice.

So opening the range, as I said much earlier in the retreat—opening the range of perception, of experience, of sensibility. That's the thrust, the movement that is, I think, so important. Because in that opening up, that meditative journey of opening up the range of perception or vision, if you like, of experience, we are opening the soul, the psyche. And this opening of the soul is what the psyche wants and needs. It is soul-making, as we said.

We're also opening up the range of possibility of practice and of adventure. More fundamentally, we're opening up through that exploration the sense of existence itself—the range of the sense of existence, sense of being, of what we are, what the world is, what another is. Self, other, world—the whole sense of that, the whole experience of that has much more range. So we're not living in a world that's constrained, constricted.

And with all that, we're opening up, as I said much earlier in the retreat, the range of our sense of beauty, of deep beauty, the possibilities of beauty.

CHAPTER 22

A Sacred Universe: Insight, Theophany, Cosmopoiesis (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h24

In this dharma talk from the Path of the Imaginal series, Rob Burbea examines how we relate to concepts of the divine and their relationship to imaginal practice. He introduces the tentative concept of the 'vertical spectrum of the imaginal' - the sense that selves, things, and world have multiple dimensions beyond materiality, rooted in or expressing aspects of the divine through their particularities. Drawing on insights from the Lurianic Kabbalah regarding the 'breaking of the vessels' (shirat hakelim), Burbea emphasizes the dynamic, evolutionary nature of both conceptual frameworks and divine perception.

The talk explores how eros fertilizes imaginal figures, creating theophany - divine manifestation through particular forms - and how this perception can spread to encompass the entire world in cosmopoiesis. Burbea distinguishes this vertical dimension from the horizontal interconnectedness often taught in Buddhist practice, while relating it to the spectrum of fabrication in perception. He discusses how different conceptions of divinity affect our sense of meaningfulness, arguing that only through viewing ourselves and others as particular theophanies can we access the deep meaningfulness that nourishes the soul. Throughout, he emphasizes holding these concepts lightly, as tools for opening experience rather than fixed beliefs.

In speaking about concepts of the divine, of God, and how we might relate to that kind of concept, I think it's important to emphasize something about how we relate to talking and hearing about these concepts. In other words, how are we holding and conceiving of the whole relationship with concepts—with these concepts in particular?

My intention here is certainly not to build or outline some kind of rigid, complete, and final explanation of everything to do with the divine, some conceptual framework that's watertight and will last forever. Rather, I want to offer something in the way of conceptual structures, conceptual frameworks—logoi in the Greek—that can feed into, support, and open up our experience. Our meditative experience, our meditative exploration, and then meditative experience as exploration can, of course, feed back into the conceptual frameworks, offering something there as well.

So there's this mutual feeding, nourishing, supporting, shaping in ways that encourage, deepen, open, and enrich the soulfulness. I want to offer and build conceptual frameworks, to talk about possible conceptual frameworks and ways things might work conceptually that open up the whole field of exploration, inquiry, and experience—that do not close it down.

So it's important to acknowledge that in all this, maybe it doesn't fit together quite perfectly. It's a bit clunky at the edges. Maybe parts of a conceptual structure, or the whole thing or framework, is vague. That's especially possible and probable, in fact, here in this area when we're talking about the divine and God and those kinds of concepts and experiences, partly because of the nature of that material. The divine is almost by definition something that cannot be contained in concepts.

As a starting point, we're acknowledging the infinite nature of the divine. So whatever we say will not contain it. Whatever structure of concepts or ideation will not contain it, will not be enough. Paul Tillich, a very renowned theologian and philosopher of the 20th century, said, "Every understanding of spiritual things, Geistwissenschaft, every understanding of spiritual things is circular."

So there's a lot to acknowledge here if we're going to bring concepts in for the sake of opening and soulfulness, for the support of inquiry and investigation, for the adventure of meditation, of practice, the adventure of life really—in terms of opening the experience. If we're going to bring concepts in, we have to acknowledge something about circularity, about infinity, about the impossibility of containing and arriving at some neat, final conclusion, some complete structure that explains everything. And that is not a problem. That's not a problem. It's just something to acknowledge because it helps the experience and because it opens the soulfulness.

So there's a different relationship here with all this. If some of it doesn't fit together perfectly, part of that is simply due to my energy levels and the present situation and time constraints from various angles. But also, another dimension of this is that I feel very much like all this is a work in progress for me. I mentioned earlier a different style of teaching rather than sometimes when it's appropriate to sit at the front and give you a complete package—this is it, it's finished, it's all very neat and clear. That has its place. But then there's other styles of teaching, this more what I was calling hermetic in another retreat, this more open-ended teaching. This is, in a way, a collaboration of exploration between so-called teacher and so-called student.

So this is work in progress for me. Ideas, concepts, feeding into experience; experience shaping concepts. And there's no problem in that. There's something beautiful for me in that, in the openness of it, in the creativity, the creation, the adventure, the discovery of all that.

So there's a kind of dance, if you like, between concepts and experience, between conceiving conceptual frameworks and the opening of experience and new experience. They're mutually feeding, shaping, nourishing, deepening, opening each other. And that dance evolves—evolves over time, even for one person.

There are personality differences here, hugely, in relation to all this, in relation to how okay people are with conceptual structures not being taken too seriously, how okay they are with conceptual structures being quite loose, with them evolving, how okay they are with even thinking at all or entertaining consciously conceptual structures. Conceptual structures are always entertained unconsciously. So there are personality differences, but even over time for one person, there's evolution, there's ebb and flow.

So there will be times for some people on this kind of adventure and this kind of exploration where it's really okay that there's very little conceptual framework holding the exploration at a certain time. Other times we need a structure. It really helps support and guide and direct exploration. And yet, as I've mentioned in several talks elsewhere, there is this concept in the Lurianic Kabbalah—what they call the breaking of the vessels, shirat hakelim—that structures will break, all kinds of structures in our life, as they are filled, if you like, from that perspective, from the light of God, but really as we grow, as the psyche grows, as things expand and get fertilized.

Structures—social structures, ideational structures, relationship structures—they will break, they will shatter, the shattering of the vessels. So in terms of conceptual structures, yes, we need structures at certain points. We establish them, we build them carefully, and then they break. And then we form, or new ones are formed, different ones, and they evolve. There's a whole evolution to this.

To me, there's a beauty in that dance between conceptual frameworks and experience and the dynamic of that, the evolution of that.

We could say, "I don't want to dance. I don't want this dance between the conceptual and the experiential—this movement of evolving conceptual frameworks, this evolution of experience." Or perhaps we refuse to enter into that dance because we won't consciously entertain conceptual frameworks. We simply refuse. We don't want to dance.

Alternatively, what happens is we cling to one conceptual framework. Sometimes we don't even realize we're clinging—it operates unconsciously. Or consciously, we keep holding onto something static, trying to maintain it as a kind of rigid, literalized explanation of everything that remains fixed and unchanging.

I think it's crucial to understand something about the nature of perception and mind: there is always conceiving. Conceiving and perception, experience, shape and inform and structure each other. They influence each other inevitably. We cannot escape this.

The idea of non-conceptual experience has become very popular, but it's a myth in the worst sense—an illusion. We must understand that at the subtlest levels of perception, consciousness, experience, and mind, conceiving and perceiving are completely woven into each other. They inform, shape, and structure each other at all levels, from the subtlest to the grossest. It's important to recognize this fundamental truth.

As a person goes deeper into imaginal practice and more fully explores experiences of theophany and cosmopoiesis, one sense that can emerge—both as felt experience and as conceptual framework, the two going together as aspects of the same gestalt—is the sense of multiplicity of dimensions in the nature of any object.

A person, a thing, an imaginal figure—when we see imaginally, there's a sense we can develop through practice: whatever I'm looking at, this object, this person, this thing, this world, has multiple dimensions to it. Its nature is to have multiple dimensions.

I want to tentatively offer the label "the vertical spectrum of the imaginal." I'll explain later why that labeling is so tentative—I'm not particularly gifted at coining phrases and labels. But this vertical spectrum of the imaginal refers to this sense of the multiple dimensions that comprise an object or pertain to an object.

I'm saying something more specific here than simply noting it's possible to perceive selves, things, others, and world in different ways—which is certainly part of the teaching about fabrication and emptiness of perception.

This morning, there was an enormous hullabaloo outside the window—a racket of shouting, screaming, yelling, whooping, and arguing. I'm fairly certain it was a school hiking group stopping briefly outside. Right there, we can hear it through the lens of a certain social perspective about "kids today" and so forth—hearing it as a racket expressing inconsideration. Obviously wrapped up with that is some aversion, some reactivity.

We can also hear it in the mode of bare attention, where it's simply sound. And it's possible to hear it, as the Tantra teachings suggest, as mantra—as holy speech, as the sound of divinity. In meditation, we can hear it differently: not as racket, not even just as sound, but as expression of the divine, the sound of the divine, the music of the divine, the speech of the divine—holy speech.

What does that mean? It's vague. Do we need to elaborate? I'll return to this. I could say this is simply an example of the flexibility and malleability of perception—that it's possible to perceive things in different ways. But I want to say something more in relation to this vertical spectrum of the imaginal.

I look at my friend, someone I've known for a long time and love very much. I can see her as flesh and blood, aware of the physical processes that make up her body and the mental or biological processes in the brain. I can see her through her personal historical background—her upbringing, her woundedness, her trajectories of growth, where she gets stuck, her particular strengths, her characteristics. I can see her in the ordinary sense of self, this modernist sense of self we discussed in the other talk.

Yet as I'm looking at her, meditating imaginally on her presence before me or in my mind's eye, I can also see her, I also sense that she is, or that she expresses, the feminine aspect of God.

She is a face, she is a theophany. At a certain level of perception, level of imaginal perception, she appears to me as one of the feminine aspects of the divine. She appears to me as angel, as dakini or deva if you prefer the Buddhist words. There's a theophany there, and it's quite—it might be really quite particular or a little bit vague. It might even be that at the same time I am aware of the ordinary, modernist way of seeing her—of course I'm aware of that—and I'm aware of this other level. I may be aware of other levels too. I may also be aware of a kind of more universal expression of the divine coming through, but this particular one of the feminine aspect of the divine is very particular to her. It's in and through her personhood, her particularity, and it's expressing an aspect of the divine that has to do with the personhood of the divine or a personhood of the divine.

It might even be that I'm aware of several of these more personal and particular expressions, manifestations, or different levels at the same time as I look at her, as I meditate imaginatively on her, eyes open or eyes closed, looking at her. There can be a sense that there's a spectrum here. It's as if one could tune the attention to different levels. Maybe one stands out and calls for the attention, calls the attention to tune into it. Maybe there's a multiplicity and then one can deliberately tune the attention that way.

This sense can emerge for practitioners—it's both a sense, a perceptual sense, and a conception, so they're woven into each other. This conception may emerge quite loosely, and then, as I said, influence and support the perception, and so the soulfulness and the soul-making. Perception, experience, appearance will be influenced, supported, and will influence and support the conception. It's mutual. In all of that, there's a deepening and opening and enriching and nourishing of the soulfulness and the soul-making.

So this, what I'm wanting tentatively to call the vertical spectrum of the imaginal, is hard to define. A spectrum, if you like, of theophanies, a spectrum of faces of the divine. I really want to emphasize it's a spectrum of perception. Placing perception and the whole way of construing Dharma and imaginal practice and all that—perception is central. Whether it's non-imaginal or imaginal, placing perception and the fabrication of perception as almost the core concept, the central concept, the hinge concept, the basis concept on which everything is structured, built, rests.

So really emphasizing, if I talk about this vertical spectrum of the imaginal, we're really talking about a spectrum of perceptions, not separate from the citta, from the mind, the heart, the conceiving. But it's a sense, a spectrum of what we might call faces of the divine, and it comprises in this spectrum all kinds of manifestations or expressions of a sense of utter sacredness all the way down to non-sacredness.

More specifically, we could say that this sense of this vertical dimension of the imaginal is the sense and the conceiving that selves, things, and world have in and through their particularity—that's very important, in and through their particularity—the selves, things, and world have their roots in, they originate in, they mirror or reflect or they possess or are comprised of dimensions other than just the commonly agreed upon dimension of materiality or self as we tend to view it, conceive it, sense it in the paradigm of modernist culture.

So the sense—and let me say that again—this vertical dimension as a concept is the sense and the concept that selves, things, and world have in and through their particularities, through their personhood, if you like, they have their roots in, they originate in, they mirror or reflect, they possess or are comprised of dimensions other than just the commonly agreed upon dimension of materiality, or of, for instance, self as modern culture construes and views it.

Just to make one thing clear, it's not a spectrum of solidity versus ethereality, what we were talking about some days ago. It's not a spectrum of the octave or register, so to speak, of the image, like very refined and light compared to more bassy and solid.

That's not what we're talking about here. It's really that the imaginal sense is imbued with a sense of the sacred through the sense of comprising or expressing more than the modernist sense of ego, of self, of person, or just matter.

This "more," comprising more, expressing more, the multiplicity, the spectrum there of manifestations, of faces, of theophanies, if you like—this "more" is not horizontal only. So for example, we talked about the interconnectedness of physical objects, interconnectedness at a physical level. I can look at my friend and see her interconnected to us—we're breathing the same air if we're in the same room, we're built of the same stuff that emerged from the same supernova explosion, formed the earth and built of earth and air and fire and water if you use the Buddhist elements.

This interconnectedness at a physical level is also a kind of "more," because usually I see her contained just there. Her body stops at the edges of her skin. When I look through the lens of this interconnectedness at a physical level, there's more, but it's a "more" horizontal spreading, if you like, at the level of physicality.

Or the causes—if I think in terms of the causes and conditions, when we usually talk in those terms, the causes and conditions that give rise to this self, or this object, or this world or environment. Usually, again, that interconnectedness or that inclusion of the web, the net of causes and conditions, is also a "more." It's expanding the view from a tight, bounded object "more," but it's expanding it horizontally. It's talking about interconnectedness and feeding in and expanding the limits of this person or object or thing that I'm looking at, but it's all horizontal. It's all on the same level. What's feeding in there and what's being acknowledged as being "more" is on the same level. It's horizontal.

What I really want to emphasize is something that's not horizontal, something of, as I said, other dimensions, other levels, if you like, of being or existence, but again, really perception. Everything hinges on perception, that that is there, available in the perception.

So vertical spectrum of the imaginal—in a way, it's a sense, it's a perception. We get that sense. But as I said, it is by its nature a conceptual framework. It's a logos. So the sense of it, the perception of this, includes the logos, the conception of it. This is something I want to stress.

I do not have to believe this as something real, and you do not have to believe this as something real. There is no credo here you must sign up to. I'm going to return to this point, because it's so important.

That's one crucial aspect. And it might be that the whole conception of this vertical spectrum is relatively vague. For me, actually, I certainly don't believe it as some kind of literal, concretized, fixed reality that I'm assuming has inherent existence. It remains quite vague for me, but it can still be extremely powerful. I really want to emphasize this and return to it. It can still function so beautifully and potently in terms of soul-making, nourishing and opening soulfulness. You don't have to subscribe to any belief, and it might be relatively vague. It might not be. We'll return to those points because they're very crucial to emphasize.

So it is, to an extent, a sense, a perception. It is also a conceptual framework, a logos. But what's important then is that the conceptual framework, the logos, needs to be loose enough or big enough. My conceptual framework needs to be big enough to allow that kind of perception of this vertical spectrum, of this multiplicity, of these other levels shining through. It needs to be big enough to allow theophany and cosmic oasis.

If I view an image only in typical self-referential terms—there are many ways I could do that, but for instance, viewing this image as arising only because this happened to me when I was a child, or something like that—it's not to say it's not arising in part because of that, or that one couldn't view personal human history as part of the vertical spectrum. But if I only view it self-referentially in those terms, then that view is a shrunken and narrowed, constricted conceptual framework, logos, and it will prevent the sense of theophany. Do you understand?

Mostly this is unconscious. We hold onto views, conceptual frameworks that are quite narrow unconsciously, and there's not enough room to allow experience to open in different ways, as I've said many times now. That kind of viewing an image only self-referentially will prevent the sense of theophany, of vertical space, almost by definition, because theophany, by definition, is seeing an expression, a mirroring, an originating in the archetypal or the divine. I'm seeing this thing, this person, or myself, or this image as originating and expressing and mirroring the archetypal or the divine—an archetypal or the divine. In other words, by definition, it's not just self-referential, because if theophany evolves, other levels of the vertical spectrum come through, other levels are evident in an image.

Now, what also happens through this, as a person practices imaginal practice—we've touched on this already, but let me say it again—is that there is a tendency for the theophanic sense, for the image sense to spread. It becomes a sensibility. So this loose conceptual framework that's operating, the seeing of other levels, and the tuning to that becomes a sensibility and a mode of being. It becomes how we see. And then it spreads in different ways.

One of the ways it spreads is to embrace more objects rather than just the imaginal figure or this personal thing that I'm looking at. Now that might be purely internally—an imaginal world might open up. Or it might be that this world, the world of agreed upon conventional physical reality that we see, comes alive in a kind of cosmopoiesis, that it becomes a different kind of cosmos while still seeing perhaps the same things—the trees over there, my friend here, the sky, the grass, whatever it is, the river, the city. But the theophanic sense, the image sense that was perhaps focused on one figure, whether purely internally, purely imaginal, or through an object in the world like my friend, spreads to create a kind of world, a cosmic oasis.

And what we have there is the image of self and other and world co-created together. Actually, there's another factor there—eros. That's a whole other subject. But there's a co-creation in this spreading of self, other, world. The imaginal sense of all are co-created together, mutually dependent, mutually feeding.

The important point here is that there's often a spreading. This was talked about in the instructions the other day. There's a spreading of the sense of theophany, and there can be a cosmopoiesis.

Now someone might say—it's a fair enough thing to say—well isn't that just coloring the perception? You have this sense and then it's just spreading to color the perception of the world. And yes, it is a coloring of perception, but again, it's important to realize, to have enough depth of insight to realize that all perception, all perception is colored all the time, is fabricated. No perception is independent of the way of looking.

So how does this work? If we go into this a bit more, this idea of the vertical spectrum of the imaginal and this spreading—I've talked about this kind of mechanism before, though it's not quite the right word, but the way that it works. I felt like I didn't quite explain it very well previously, so I'm going to try again.

When there is eros in relation to an imaginal figure—that imaginal figure might be purely in the imagination with no reference to the world of physical objects, or it could be the way I'm seeing my friend through or as image, as we talked about—when there is eros with an imaginal figure, that eros, almost by definition, wants more. It's this desire for more, and particularly it wants more contact. It wants more to be in contact with, and it wants to fertilize. We could say that's what eros is, that's a definition of eros we could start from.

When that's there with an imaginal figure, there's this love, this desire for contact, for more contact, more to contact. But because of that desire, it impregnates and gives more life to the image, not just in terms of vividness and touching the heart, but also it expands the image, expands and enriches and deepens the fantasy, the mythos that's operating. So much so that it stretches it. And one way it stretches it is by creating other levels, creating eventually this sense of theophany—the sense that certain levels are divine, that the divine is speaking through, shining through in the particular.

Eros doesn't lose sight of the particular. It's often in spiritual approaches that eros wants to just dissolve in the beloved or achieve union or melt or whatever. Actually, in doing that, there is the dissolution of the eros too. So eros needs a particular, a particular person. It needs to see this and love it in and through its particularities and its personhood, and fill that out, make it more multidimensional, more complex. It's not just a movement towards this universal dissolution, union, whatever. That's valid too, but that actually dissolves the eros, and it actually also dissolves the psyche, the soulfulness there.

There's something—we'll come back to this more—this parallelism of two movements, the universal and the personal. Two tracks, very connected. We'll return to this.

But as I said, eros, in wanting more and wanting to contact more, wanting more contact, more to contact, it wants to fertilize and it opens up the levels in the particularity and through the particularity of this thing, this person, this world. It opens up a sense of theophany, of God shining through in different forms and different levels through that particularity and in that personhood. That perception of theophany and that multiple dimensionality implies or needs an increase of the conceptual framework, a stretching of the logos.

So as eros does this and opens up the soulfulness, the psyche, it also stretches the logos. That movement itself, the whole gestalt of that movement, the whole dynamic involves a stretching of the logos to incorporate that. So it stretches vertically, if we use that word tentatively, and it also spreads to the world, to the surroundings in cosmopoiesis—that spreading in cosmopoiesis to feel like we're inhabiting a different world, or we have a sense of the existence of other dimensions of being to this world.

This spreading is also part of eros opening psyche, eros opening the soulfulness, opening the image and the imaginal sense, fertilizing it, inseminating the image of the beloved. It's spreading to the world and also spreading vertically. This spreading to the world, this cosmopoiesis, is also part of eros desiring more connections, part of it creating or discovering—both creating and discovering—more of the beloved. This is what eros wants: I want to go deeper into you. I want to penetrate deeper, discover more of you, move inside you, know you, know the worlds that open up through you. This is what eros wants.

So this widening in terms of spilling over to include the world and the cosmos is part of the thrust, the movement of eros. All of it is the movement of eros wanting more, and the more implies, includes other dimensions—and this is where I want to emphasize it—other dimensions to the object, other dimensions, other levels of beauty and other levels of being in or through this object, person, this world, or nature.

What I'm calling a vertical spectrum of the imaginal, a vertical dimension of perception, is opened up, as well as the wider one that begins to include the surroundings, which you will have noticed in meditation already sometimes.

This vertical dimension, this vertical perception and conception—this sense, to loosely define it, that selves, things, and world have in and through their particularities, through their personhood, have their roots in, originate in, mirror, reflect, possess or are comprised of dimensions other than just the commonly agreed upon dimension of materiality or self as understood and viewed and sensed in modernist culture—this sense and conception of the vertical dimension is a manifestation or a way in which soul-making happens. It is psyche opening. That sense itself and that conception reflects and feeds an opening, an increase, a deepening, an enriching, a nourishing of soulfulness.

If we do not cling either concretely or literally to the whole idea of it, in some kind of new age way, or just cling too tightly to the whole thing. The part that we said in an earlier talk, part of the way I would like to define soul-making is to include this very light holding of concepts—not literal, not concretized, loose, not believed in, not regarded as being other than perception or something separate from the mind, not regarded as an ultimate truth in a sort of final sense.

But this sense of this vertical dimension, the perception of it, which includes the conception of it, you could say is ensouling the world. It's a way of seeing and conceiving that very potently opens the sense of soul in the world and the world being ensouled.

So we could say that psyche, soul through Eros's fertilization, through the sort of thrust of Eros there or the opening of Eros, it sees this way. Or rather, it wants to see this way. There's something in the soul that we could say wants to see this way when there's soul-making and the increase, the nourishment of soulfulness. Psyche will tend, the soul will tend through Eros's fertilization, as I've described, tried to describe. It will move towards seeing more this way.

We could say maybe the soul needs, soul needs this kind of multiple or multiple-leveled, multi-dimensional seeing and knowing and conceiving. William Blake wrote—I'm not sure which poem—"God save us from single vision." It's a prayer: God help us,

God save us from single vision. So there's something in us that as the soulfulness, the soul-making increases, it needs this sense of this multiple, multi-leveled nature of things, of perceptions. And that seeing that way actually reflects an opening of soul, opening of the psyche.

This whole movement dynamic of eros, psyche, and logos that I'm trying to describe—feeding and growing and fertilizing each other, creating space, opening, creating wombs for that fertilization, deepening and widening.

So I said earlier that the word vertical, or the whole vertical spectrum of the imaginal—it doesn't exactly roll off the tongue, it doesn't sound that poetic to me, but I can't think of anything right now. But the word vertical is a little problematic for a couple of reasons. One is that it tends to, or it may, imply a kind of hierarchy. There's up and down, and up is usually better than down in the way we tend to think.

Now, this idea of a vertical spectrum has a long history, or rather, ideas of vertical spectrum has a long history, especially in Western philosophy and spirituality. So there's some parallels with neoplatonist ideas of the great chain of being and that sort of thing, where actually the verticality does imply a hierarchy. One end is good and one... A synonym for the top end of the vertical spectrum in Neoplatonism is "the good," and the other end is not so good. It's less holy, it's furthest from God, and also less real.

So this good is also something called "the one," as I said in Neoplatonism, and there's a kind of ontological hierarchy implied, I think, as far as I can tell. So that that's real, that ultimate, unfabricated, is real, and everything else, sort of progressively, has less existence, less reality, so that matter, in some versions of Neoplatonism, if I'm understanding correctly, is actually regarded as illusory, or even, as I said, unholy.

And in a way, some approaches to Buddha Dharma might be similar. Even in the language, this is unfabricated. The other is fabrication. These other perceptions are more and more fabricated. They're fabrications. So there's a kind of reality imputed to the unfabricated and less reality to other perceptions. That may be an important stage, as I've outlined briefly here and in other places. A very important stage is a kind of way of thinking about things and conceiving of things as one deepens in meditation. It may be actually extremely important as something that unfolds. But to stop there is a problem because it creates a dualism.

So one thing about this vertical spectrum of the imaginal is actually not, I would say—let's not confound it with the spectrum of fabrication of perception. So as I said, in the teaching of the spectrum of fabrication of perception, there is the spectrum from unfabricated to fabricated, a little fabricated, more and more fabricated. And implied in that, and importantly implied in that, is the implication of what's real and what's illusory or empty, unreal.

But wrapped up in that is a dualism. And in a way I feel we need to be rescued at some point from that dualism. As I explained earlier and elsewhere in much more detail, we can actually see at some point in exploring this whole teaching of the spectrum of fabrication that fabrication too is empty. It's like a teaching that's a raft, the whole teaching about fabrication, and at a certain point we realize, oh, that's not a real thing. We recognize the emptiness of fabrication at a certain point, and that reveals, it collapses the duality, it reveals the holiness, if you like, of everything, rather than one transcendent, unfabricated, is holy, and the rest of the world, the fabricated, is less holy. Everything appears holy, everything appears magical. There's the collapse of the duality, any duality between unfabricated and fabricated.

We might also point out, actually, that in Buddha Dharma, when we use the word illusory eventually is another way of saying the same thing. Where usually that word illusory that people say this or that is illusory, it's in comparison in the back of their minds with something that is not illusory. But actually, what is it to recognize that if everything is, so to speak, illusory, actually saying everything is magical and holy? There's nothing that it's illusory in contradistinction to anything that's not illusory. All of it is opened up as magical and holy.

So... Maybe the word vertical could be replaced with the word multiple.

I'm not sure. Maybe the word "spectrum" also gives me pause, because spectrum implies a kind of ordering. Perhaps there is, in terms of experience, a kind of ordering here. So again, in terms of perception or the sense we have of divinity might be stronger at one end of this vertical spectrum in the imaginal than at the other end—progressively different. So that might be a way of conceiving it, though that's different from saying it is so, or this is the ultimate truth.

We might reflect just a little bit more on what the relationship is between the spectrum of fabrication of perception and this vertical spectrum of the imaginal. This is, I think, tricky—not to confound them. I don't think that would work. It's tempting to, but I don't think that would work.

We could say, perhaps—this is really a half-opening of an idea I'm putting out—perhaps they're in some way parallel, or two threads that perhaps intertwine along a spectrum, along a direction. The spectrum of fabrication of perception has at one end the unfabricated, and we could say that as an aspect of the divine, the transcendent, unfabricated, objectless, beyond time, beyond any appearances, beyond any sense of consciousness in the usual sense. So there's that aspect of God, the transcendent aspect of the Godhead, if you like.

As one fabricates a little bit more, coming down from that top end of the vertical spectrum, there is more universal and impersonal shining through of the sense of the divine through the world of objects and things. For example, universal love, cosmic love, the one awareness, the one mind, the big mind. These are points on a spectrum of fabrication coming down that reflect a certain amount of divinity. Then, fabricating more and more down the spectrum, it becomes just the normal, non-sacred perception of self and other and world.

At one end of the spectrum, it's completely transcendent—there's more oneness and less solidity toward that end. As you move down, there's more solidity, more separation, and less sense of sacredness, moving toward more normal perception.

On the other side, or the other thread that's entwined or parallel to that track of the spectrum of fabrication, is what we might call this vertical spectrum of the imaginal. We could say this has its one vertical end in the aspect of God that is more akin to what we were describing with Buddha nature—that incorporates both the ultimate gnosis of the Buddha, the Buddha nature, the wisdom awareness, and its objects. So it incorporates both objective and subjective aspects of the divine.

Within that, or coming out of that, is a spectrum of the imaginal and a spectrum of particular theophanies. So my friend as a particular aspect of the feminine aspect of God, a particular face of that, or other ones that are available there—again, down a spectrum. At the other end, converging with the sort of normal, non-sacred perception of self and world.

In a way, these two spectra have their bottom end converging in normal, non-sacred perception of self, other, world. Their top end converges in the divine, but different aspects. One aspect is the transcendent, unfabricated. One aspect is the non-transcendent, more ultimate of a Vajrayana conception, for example. That's maybe a start—I don't know. I'm just playing with some ideas there.

These two threads would be in a way parallel, or not be the same, but have aspects in common. One crucial thing to realize is they're both spectrums of perception. They're both perceptions. They're not separate from mind. Crucial. They are both empty. That's the second thing they have in common, related to the first—they are both empty. We're not talking about things that have any ultimate reality. Third, what they have in common is they converge in normal perception at one end, and at the other end they converge in the divine, but at different aspects of the divine—one as utterly transcendent, one as inclusive of appearances.

Right, I'm playing with ideas here that are, as you can hear, half-formed. But in terms of practice possibility, this is actually interesting, because implicit in all this is that we can play with moving up and down each of these spectra. For example, we can play deliberately seeing things as theophany—deliberately hearing those loud, raucous voices outside as mantra, or just tuning into that theophany when it appears. So we can play with the perception of theophany, moving up and down the vertical spectrum of the imaginal, or just responding to what emerges from that spectrum to us as perception.

And then we can also play with the spectrum of fabrication and unfabrication, as I've talked about extensively elsewhere. We can play with moving towards the unfabricated, then play with not letting it fade so much, mixing that with theophany. If perception fades too much, imaginal practice becomes impossible because imaginal practice involves form and particularities. All that fades when you get too near the unfabricated. But there's a play here, either separately or combined—all kinds of possibilities.

I don't pretend this is something that doesn't take probably quite a while to develop. All those possibilities require tremendous skill and art, but they're there for us. There's such breadth and depth and richness—probably infinitude—of possibility for the ways experience can open, for dimensions of experience.

Now, when we conceive of an image-sense having its root in the divine, or having its root in a god or an archetype—using this particular language—we're saying this image-sense is mirroring, reflecting, originating in the divine or in a face of the divinity or an archetype. And this image-sense, in the largest sense, is asking me to honor that. Through the image, this root in the divine or the root archetype is being honored, replicated, expressed, manifested—whether through the image or through the image into my life.

It's through this that one of the ways a sense of sacredness comes—through this sense of another dimension, another level. It's a particular kind, or rather a particular directional range of sacredness: what I'm calling the vertical spectrum of the imaginal. It's not the only one, as we've talked about and made very clear, I hope. But particularly—and what I really want to emphasize—it's from there that a sense of meaningfulness for us is born or supported.

In relation to this having its root or origins in, or mirroring or expressing another level—the divine or archetypal—this has a great deal to do with meaningfulness. I'm going to return to this, but just to say I don't know if that's obvious to you. I'll come back to that.

When we talk about a root in a face of God, or a root in an archetype or a daemon, that root we're talking about—if we use that language—is not a static root. It's something I would like to conceive as much more dynamic. By dynamic, I don't just mean impermanent or changing. I mean particularly dynamic because of everything I said earlier about the way this works in terms of eros and fertilization, deepening and enriching the image. The image, the root, is not static. It's not reflecting something static. It's actually transformed, evolved, stretched, opened, made larger, deepened, made more multilevel through eros and fertilization.

Corbin talks about the angel out ahead—this figure, this angelic imaginal figure that I never quite reach, that always steps ahead, keeps moving ahead. I might catch up a little bit, but he or she moves out further. So the relationship is never one of union. It's one of direction and movement and connection, infusion—but not union. There's a dynamism here that has to do with the eros, the psyche, the logos, as I talked about.

And again, to emphasize so much: when we talk about root in the divine or this archetype or that daemon or this aspect of the divine, we're talking about something that's empty—absolutely empty, empty of inherent existence.

In that dynamism is also the whole idea I described briefly at several points from the Jewish mystical book, the Zohar: that we create God as much as God creates us. A radical idea in theological circles. Or in the Lurianic Kabbalah, this repeated dynamic of the shattering, the breaking of the vessels, of the structures. Here the vessel is not only conceptual frame—it's also an image itself. As I said, it gets stretched or broken, then structured differently again. And that breaking of the vessels also applies to God, or a god, or in a more monotheistic sense, divinity. Our notion and perception of God also breaks, shatters, gets structured differently, grows.

This dynamic itself—the repeated shattering of the vessels, building again, growing, stretching, shattering—that too is part of God. We're actually conceiving that as part of God rather than as some kind of fixed entity in some separate realm.

Again, some of you will recognize this really echoing a kind of post-structuralist or postmodern understanding: rather than assuming fixed, independently existing structures, actually incorporating very much, at a very basic level, this idea of not just fluidity, but a whole dynamic there, and non-independence of these structures, of whatever root an image is reflecting or expressing, or the divine root. We're not talking about fixed, independently existent structures.

And again, to point out the shortcomings and inadequacies of most postmodern philosophers: there isn't, with all that, any practice—any practice of meditation, and specifically meditation as the practice of a flexibility of perception, a practice of different ways of looking. It's not there. So everything stays at the level of language, word games, text. It's presupposed that that's the fundamental thing. It cannot go more subtly. And all it can do is deconstruct rather than actually move fluidly and creatively between perceptions, experiences, and therefore worlds that are recognized not to be ultimately true or fixed or independent.

So this sense or conception—sense slash conception—of things, selves, others, world, image having their roots in, echoing, mirroring other levels, divine levels, aspects—that brings a certain kind of sacredness. There are, as I said, all kinds of possible kinds of sacredness, but there's a whole subset of kinds of sacredness that come out of that kind of sense and conception. That's really what we're emphasizing here.

And that root, as I said, can be conceived in different ways. One way, if you want kind of Buddhist ways—some people will, some people won't—one way is possibly marrying it with the kind of notion of the ultimate in certain tantric teachings, the notion of Buddha nature, the gnosis or wisdom awareness of a Buddha, which also includes the objects that appear to it.

So the root is in both the subjective aspects and the objective aspects of the divinity. The roots of these images are there in, if you like, the mind of God, the divine, the ultimate mind, but also they are creations of that mind, of the appearances to that mind. So that's one way, perhaps, of moving the conception, if you like that.

Now I mentioned earlier that the ways of conceiving of divinity and also of images and that connection there bear a great deal on our sense of meaningfulness. So I want to flesh that out. It may be obvious to some of you already through practice or just from what I've said already, but it may not be. So I want to spell it out a little bit.

Earlier on the retreat, we pointed out a number of times that meaningfulness or sense of meaningfulness pertains to images or is characteristic of images in the sense that I'm using the word image, fantasy, mythos, and that sense of meaningfulness is part of what we were calling soul-making, soulfulness, and the nourishing of soulfulness.

So when we conceive of images in the ways that I've been leaning towards on this retreat—asking, granting a certain amount of autonomy to images, or admitting that they have a certain amount of autonomy, conceiving of them as having a certain amount of autonomy, as being in a way bigger than the human, knowing still that they are dependent arising, not separate from my mind, my perception, fabrication, etc. But when we grant them that greater being, if you like, a certain kind of autonomy, a certain kind of reality, and a sort of origin, or a mirroring of another level, a higher, more divine level, if you like, or levels of the divine, and then we turn that around in our relationship to images and ask, what is it that this imaginal figure wants? What do you want?

If you remember, we emphasize this so much, that this kind of way of conceiving of images and their divinity, if you like, their roots in divinity. This fills out, deepens, brings alive a sense of meaningfulness for us in particular ways that the soul needs more powerfully and more particularly than other ways of conceiving. It nourishes that sense of meaningfulness. It gives us a sense, for instance, of calling in life, of destiny, some road calling me, some pull towards something that I can't quite understand. I'm being pulled by something bigger than me. It puts the soul events of my life, gives them a meaningfulness, a movement that's imbued in meaningfulness that has a lot to do with personhood. My personhood and my life, your personhood, your life, expressing, manifesting on the track of a certain kind of deep and divine meaningfulness. Its origins are not completely in the me, so to speak.

So the soul needs this. Recognize again the circularity of some of these statements and arguments as Paul Tillich pointed out. Never mind. So what? It's part of the territory. And this is a whole big subject about meaningfulness. Meaningfulness is a whole big subject and sometimes people want to assert the fundamental, ultimately true meaninglessness of everything, as if that is true. They might shy away from words like truth and try not to use them, but underneath or woven into what's being said is that ultimately we live in a meaningless universe, and any meaning that we might generate is therefore essentially kidding oneself, not having the courage to face meaninglessness, the existential meaningless and the limits of our existential situation.

There actually—and I've pointed this out other times—there is a fantasy right there, the existentialist fantasy. The meaningfulness that comes into that fantasy is exactly in that, in the sort of casting oneself as being brave enough to face that reality of meaningless, to cope with it, to articulate it, to uncover it. Actually, as a soul story, a fantasy, there's a kind of dead end there for soulfulness. There's a limit. But limits are part of the attraction of that fantasy, the bravery of limits. It's all resting on an assumption of truth, even if that is not recognized or realized or admitted. There's a fantasy in there about what's true. And then the self and the world are cast in line with that fantasy.

So we can, again, just spelling this out with the different conceptions of divinity or cosmology. Again, to say, if I have a completely one-dimensional view of the cosmos—so this is in contradistinction, in contrast to the sense of a vertical dimension of many dimensions—if I have just a one-dimensional view of the cosmos, as we said, for example: Really, all there is that's real is matter. This teaching, this philosophy of physicalism, what's called physicalism or materialism in philosophical circles. And all there is that's real is matter, and everything emerges out of the interactions of matter. Matter is meaningless. The interactions of matter are meaningless. Consciousness and the complexity of our life, etc., and all what looks like tragedy and joy, etc., is just kind of basically based on or emergent from meaningless interactions of matter according to the laws of physics.

But that view, that kind of one-dimensional view of the cosmos, you can see how that erases the possibility of any deep sense of meaningfulness, certainly to the cosmos, but also then by extension, by implication or context, to our personhood and our lives and the images. It's all essentially just the meaningless movement of matter. And that's the only real reality. So as I said, the images that come might be just random neuronal firings.

Then there are some other views and perceptions of divinity. We talked about, for instance, a universal conception of divinity that's quite popular, a universal perception of divinity that's fairly easily accessible for most meditators - the kind of mystical perception of "all is one," and in different ways, maybe all is this vast cosmic universal love or compassion, or all is awareness, and so on.

Interestingly, here's a conception of divinity, but also that conception of divinity also kind of erases or leaves no room for a more personal meaningfulness. In its universality, it has no room for a more personal meaningfulness. That's not so obvious, but by personal meaningfulness, I really mean any meaningfulness connected with the particularities of the person - one's personhood, one's life trajectory, the soul events of one's life, or as I said, a sense of a calling or a sense of destiny in one's life.

Even to take another view of a mystical view or a view of divinity - a simple view of the emptiness of all things, or as we outlined, the view that understands everything is fabricated. If we just stop there, that also erases meaningfulness. And as we pointed out, without enough depth, if the view does just stop there, those kinds of conceptions - "everything is fabricated, there is the unfabricated" - that view may actually disparage the world, the cosmos, as fabricated, and then orient towards this transcendent unfabricated, erasing the world of phenomena, of perception, of manifestation.

And that fits into the classical Pali canon trajectory of ending rebirth. All this is fabricated. One does not want to be reborn into this world of fabrication. One wants to escape, dissolve, end rebirth and dissolve into the unfabricated. So there's a disparaging of the world of fabrication. That does something quite profound to a sense of meaningfulness.

So either in the universal views of "all is one," or "all is love," "all is awareness," or cosmic consciousness, or the view of the unfabricated being divine and the fabricated being the undivine - in all of those cases, meaningfulness only would lie in the movement towards ending rebirth, or unbinding in the unfabricated, or realizing universal love, or realizing oneness, or whatever. Meaningfulness can only then lie in those. If that's the only conception of the divine, that's the only conception of the cosmology there, then meaningfulness just lies in moving towards, trying to move towards perceiving that continuously - continuously perceiving oneness or cosmic love or whatever it is - and perhaps helping others get there.

So meaningfulness comes, yes, to help others get there. But the particularities of beings, of manifestation, of action, of expression, of love, as well as the particularities of personality, of character, they have no particular meaningfulness other than sharing in this universal oneness. Well, they're one like everything else is one, or this universal reality. Basically, it's the same as saying they have no particular meaningfulness. Meaningfulness does not reside in the particularities; it resides in the universality.

So when we think about different conceptions and practice options that we can explore, it's only in this kind of conception and viewing and practicing the view - as we're talking about viewing ourselves, our lives, viewing others and things, and the world as mirroring, echoing, rooted in some particular aspect or archetype of divinity. It's only in doing that, in other words, in perceiving selves, others, things, acts, speech, and all of that as particular theophanies, that we support meaningfulness in this particularly deep way that's connected with our personhood and the particularities of things.

It supports meaningfulness in the most soulful way, the most fully soulful way. It's a dimension of the possibility of meaningfulness. That kind of conception will support meaningfulness the most, will fertilize and root a sense of meaningfulness in deep soil, because the conception gives it that, and the view gives it that.

We've talked a lot now about conceptual frameworks regarding the divine. There's a lot there. I'm conscious of that. I'm conscious that it's complex, some of what was said, a lot of what was said, difficult to digest, difficult to understand, perhaps. So very conscious of that. And really, again, the encouragement to take it lightly, take these concepts lightly, take your relationship with these concepts and with playing with them lightly around the concepts of the divine and how that works in with images.

The Kotzke Rebbe, a Jewish mystic from the late 18th century who died in the mid-19th century - I think he's basically the rabbi from Kock, which I think is in modern Poland - he said, "Pfui!" - which I'm assuming is a Yiddish exclamation - "Pfui! I'm not interested in a god any Tom, Dick, or Harry can understand."

So take this lightly. It's okay, in a way, to be - there's something actually beautiful in grasping towards understanding, this movement of shattering conceptions, groping a little bit, putting things together, letting them grow, building them. That's part of the dance.

The Kotzke Rebbe, a Jewish mystic from the late eighteenth century who died in the mid-nineteenth century—essentially the rabbi from Kocka in what is now modern Poland—said, "Pfui!" (which I assume is a Yiddish exclamation), "I'm not interested in a god any Tom, Dick, or Harry can understand."

So take this lightly. It's okay, in a way, to be—there's something actually beautiful in grasping towards understanding this movement of shattering conceptions, groping a little bit, putting things together, letting them grow, building them. That was part of the dance.

Thank you for listening.

To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 23

An Ecology of Love (Part 4)

Rob Burbea · 1h04

In this fourth part of his series on an ecology of love, Rob Burbea examines how our views of self, understanding of Dharma, and perception of nature profoundly influence our environmental engagement. He contrasts metta (loving-kindness) with eros, showing how metta tends toward dissolution of self into universal love, while eros enriches and complicates self-view through imaginal dimensions.

Burbea critiques common Dharma interpretations that limit activism through narrow conceptions of the Four Noble Truths and non-clinging practices. He argues for a more radical understanding of emptiness that paradoxically allows playful engagement with archetypal images of self - including warrior, revolutionary, and troublemaker aspects often excluded from Buddhist identity. The talk traces how Western scientific materialism has flattened our perception of nature's sacred dimensions, making environmental crisis seem merely technical rather than spiritual.

Drawing on thinkers like Wendell Berry and Confucius, Burbea explores activism as preservation of noble qualities within oneself. He distinguishes between instrumental activism (focused on measurable outcomes) and imaginal activism (addressing soul-level needs), arguing both are necessary for the psychological complexity of climate change. The talk concludes with reflections on how love and sacredness mutually constitute each other in an ongoing ecology of perception, opening possibilities for deeper environmental engagement.

So as I keep saying, eros involves—and this is the fullness of the meaning of that word—eros involves psyche and logos. And in that infinite dance, there's an infinity of possibilities of view and perception and experience and kinds of love.

To point out a few things in the way that it involves psyche and logos and views: in the infinity of possibilities, it will always include a view of self. Or rather, included in that dynamic is always a view of self and of the other—whatever other is in this case, predominantly in this talk, the earth or nature. So always included in this co-fertilization of eros, psyche, and logos is a view of self and a view of other at any level of perception, at any stage to which it arrives and opens.

The view of self and the view of other—these will be important factors. As I said right at the beginning of the talk, views condition; dependent on views, doors open or close. Specifically in terms of action and how we behave, and the styles of engagement or activism—or not, whether we somehow don't engage, are not active, do not respond to the crises of the earth—wrapped up in all that is the view, not just of the other, of the earth, but the view of the self as well. They go together and they're part of the whole dynamic of eros, psyche, and logos.

So just to say a little regarding self-view in all this: it's going to be part of it. Listen to this from Wendell Berry. In regard to this whole dynamic and ecology of love with respect to activism, listen to this regarding the self-view involved in activism, self-views possibly involved in our activism or in our non-activism.

This is Wendell Berry, the poet: "A protest that endures, I think, is moved by a hope more modest than that of public success—namely, the hope of preserving qualities in one's heart that would be destroyed by acquiescence."

In a way, he's turning on its head how we sometimes think of activism. It's not so much about achieving this or that in the world, he's saying, but the hope of preserving qualities in one's heart that would be destroyed by acquiescence. Something is holy here in my heart, and I'm going to act and speak and stand up in a certain way because that is holy, and I cannot bear to think of those qualities being destroyed. There's beauty and divinity in those qualities in the self, in the heart. There's some orientation towards leaning, towards emphasizing the self, of the view of the self, and of what's in the self.

Confucius, obviously many centuries before, but in a way elaborating on something, pulling that out a bit more. This is what Confucius said or wrote: "You follow your conscience not in order to change the world, but in order to be a noble person. You are prepared to go against all norms, conventions, dictates and decrees, even to risk your life in order to remain true to yourself."

Beautiful, strong words. And again, not to change the world, this following of our conscience, but in order to be a noble person.

Now we can talk about self and all this—what both Wendell Berry and Confucius write—in terms of qualities of heart, in Wendell Berry's phrase, which would be a traditionally Dharma way of speaking about things, in terms of qualities of citta, qualities of heart. That's possible and helpful, definitely. But when we start talking about things like nobility—which, by the way, is also a word the Buddha emphasized a lot—nobility as a word, as a concept, already draws in, it can't help but draw in, image and fantasy. There's a kind of logos with nobility of what that means, but specifically what I want to say is image and fantasy of self.

What resonance do these words have in us? Nobility, or what Wendell Berry said, or Confucius—the resonances are caused by our soul aspects, soul resonances of the psyche through image and fantasy. The very idea of nobility gets seen through image and fantasy, and that colors the image and fantasy of the self.

This is something I've talked about in other talks. I actually don't want to dwell on it in this talk, but in other talks I talked about how very easily, without realizing it, the image or the fantasy or the archetype of the self gets limited in different ways and for different reasons, and sometimes limited through different cultures, whether that's Dharma culture or other culture. So that certain images of the self, if you like, are not allowed into the sense of the self, into the view of the self—the warrior, the revolutionary, rage as a force empowering the self, giving power to the self's actions. These are all put aside or ignored or somehow not okay. Many others we could mention as well.

Because what often has become dominant is an image or a fantasy or an archetype of the practitioner or the self or of the awakened person as equanimous, cooled—to borrow the Buddha's words, nibbāna is related to cooled—equanimous, cooled, not engaged. And there's an archetypal image operating that does not allow other archetypal images of the self and the practitioner and the person walking the path and the awakened person. There's a constraining on the image there.

Luc Jacquet is a filmmaker. He made, you may know, The March of the Penguins, which got an Oscar. And then, I haven't seen this film, but he recently made another film called Ice and Sky, and it's about climate change. This Luc Jacquet spoke in an interview of the moral compulsion he felt to address climate change caused by humans. To not do so, he said, would be criminal.

It was a strong word, criminal. He goes on: "I could make endless contemplative films about the beauty of nature, but it would not have been right to do so. We have to deal with this. It's our duty. It's like the war. You want a quiet life with your family, but you have to say, I cannot accept this. You have to get out of a comfortable area and into the political. You must participate in the society in which you live."

Again, strong words. But can you hear wrapped up in these words this sense of an imaginal fantasy sense of the self and, if you like, the duty of the self? That word "duty" is also a word that can be imbued with the imaginal. There's a self-view and archetype wrapped up in what he's saying, and then this sense of duty to that.

When we dare to experiment with and practice with and open up to different self-views and more archetypally imbued views of the self, play with all that and open it up and allow it and allow its force and its current into our life and into the way we sense ourselves, then we can feel, very often, a duty to these imaginal figures that come through. They demand something.

This is something I've talked about before, but just to mention it. It's interesting sometimes when there is a sense of duty to an archetypal image or an imaginal figure that has an archetypal quality to it for us—that can bring a lot of activation in the being.

Someone was telling me they were about to engage in an act of civil disobedience in relation to climate, and she was saying, "Gosh, the adrenaline beforehand, and the anxiety." She had just assumed, of course—very natural or normal, given the culture—assumed that the anxiety was in relation to the possible consequences: "I may go to jail, I may face all kinds of repercussions." And of course, some of it is to do with that.

But there's also another aspect that's more to do with the imaginal and the soul dimension of what's going on. When we feel a duty to an imaginal figure that has an archetypal value for us, when we allow that to fill the self and we feel a duty in our life to that image, the sense of that—because of the other-dimensionality of it and the hugeness of it and the divinity of it and the sense of the human being having to hold and carry and let that flow through—in itself causes a lot of adrenaline. There's tremendous energy and this sense of duty wrapped up in that. It's not just the adrenaline about the fear of possible consequences.

That was a little bit of an aside. The point is that self too—the sense of self, the view of self—is also given verticality through the imaginal and through fantasy. It's ensouled, if you like. And potentially, in this eros-psyche-logos dynamic that we're talking about, the view and the image of self is also endless in its potentiality. It can be forever opening. There's not a limit there to how we can see the self.

Some self-views I've already alluded to will block engagement. For example, the archetypal view of the equanimous one, the cool one who's not engaged that way. But also other ones, less obvious.

I know several people who, although they don't actually think at all—imagine that's part of the problem—are kind of enthused by or enthralled by or live their life by the archetypal image of what you might call the simple man, or the simple man of nature, or nature man, or something like that: living close to nature in the old ways and very simple and renunciate and in touch with those elements and seeing oneself in a certain way.

But often, at least in the couple of people I'm now thinking of, wrapped up in that image is actually the logos—the limited logos of physicalism, of this one-dimensionality. And somehow it doesn't translate in terms of engagement. With regard to the natural world, one person I think of engages a lot with some other issues, but not in relation to the natural world. Interesting.

So what one would think of as, "Well, that kind of person is obviously going to be an environmentalist and obviously going to be engaged in environmentalism"—actually, no, not necessarily. And it may be partly because wrapped up in that for them is this one-dimensional view of physicalism. Maybe.

So where there is metta, if we go back to this metta and eros, where there's metta, the views of the self tend towards dissolution—tends towards a sense, as the metta deepens, of dissolving the self in union, in oneness. It's the way the self-sense transforms as, or at the times of, strong metta and deep metta. The self-sense basically dissolves or dissolves in oneness, dissolves in the sense of universal love that we're talking about. There are other ways of it dissolving through other practices—dissolving awareness, all kinds of approaches.

But in other words, one way that the views of the self can be wrapped up in this sense of other dimensions is through a sense of dissolving of the self into some kind of oneness, a non-fabricating of the self-sense at any time.

Versus in the erotic kind of love, when there's eros, the archetypal views, the imaginal views, the fantasy of the self, get actually heightened.

So the view of self, again, is infused, impregnated with the imaginal, complicated, enriched with the imaginal. And the sense of other dimensions of the self, in this case, and the sacredness is heightened through the particular and through the personhood and the personal.

So one dissolves self, the way of metta, and the eros actually does not dissolve self—it complicates it, enriches it, and retains the particularity and the personhood. And the sacredness is through and in the particularity and the personhood, not the universality.

In regard to activism, there is also the involvement of the view of what Dharma is. The conceptual structure or limits or framework of what the Dharma is, and our imaginal sense, our fantasy of what the Dharma is—these two always go together. Logos and image, concept and fantasy concept. So our view of the Dharma also has a big impact on whether we engage, how we engage, what our activism looks like, or whether it exists at all.

One way is in relation to our belief of what the Dharma says about self, relating to what we just explored about self-view. Some people nowadays, in what has become quite popular, hold onto the view that the dharma teaching is always toward not-self, always in regard to there being no self, or that self is something to be let go of, not engaged. Or, for instance, that what the dharma teaches is that the self is just a process, and the more you can see self that way, the better—trying to see self that way as the dharma perspective to hold onto.

But actually, if we have an understanding of a much more radical level of the emptiness of the self, and of all things really—not just saying self is a process, but saying something much, much deeper than that in terms of what it means to say the self is empty, radically empty. Radical from the Latin word radix, to the root. There's no root to the self. It's completely and thoroughly, utterly empty. All the elements of it, all of it, all that process is empty. Process does not ultimately exist.

Knowing that fullness and radical depth of the emptiness of self actually allows us, seemingly paradoxically, to come back and play with all kinds of views, fantasies and images of self, knowing that they're empty. I can play with the image of the Dharma practitioner as revolutionary, as troublemaker, as warrior—all these other archetypal, imaginal senses or views that get shunted aside or disallowed often in certain Dharma spheres. So that's one way.

A second way that the view of the Dharma—the concept and image of the Dharma—can constrain activism is in regard to our conception of the Four Noble Truths: suffering, the cause for suffering, the possibility of ending suffering, and the path to the ending of that suffering.

There are two ways here in regard to the Four Noble Truths. The first is simpler, in a way, and it has to do with whether I view it purely individually and internally. Do I conceive the Four Noble Truths teaching as only applying to my personal suffering? Or do I allow it to include the suffering of other humans and animals and the suffering caused —second noble truth—by institutions and ideologies and systems, economic or otherwise political, and views that pervade our society and our culture that basically cause suffering? Am I allowing my idea of the Four Noble Truths, and thus of the Dharma, to actually open up to include all that?

I think slowly, and I hope increasingly, more so-called Buddhists are opening up that view. And for some people, it's a kind of no-brainer. How could you not? How can you exclude all that and talk about suffering and then not talk about these crazy tragedies of institutions and systems and ideologies that cause so much suffering that's so entrenched in our society? A lot of people have said it's ridiculous to conceive of a Dharma and the ethics of the Dharma that doesn't include all that.

I heard one teacher, when asked about this, say that climate change doesn't concern the Dharma at all—it's not involved. Someone might hear that and just say, "How completely ridiculous. You're making the Dharma irrelevant to modern life." But if there's this opening up of the range of what's included in the Four Noble Truths and what it applies to, then out of that there will be care for the earth, just because one is moving in a direction of minimizing suffering—wherever that suffering occurs and wherever that suffering has its origins, whether in my mind or in institutions or systems or ideologies, conceptions, assumptions, political systems, whatever. So that's one way the conception of the Four Noble Truths can limit or open.

Another way is deeper, in a way, because there's often what we might call a kind of cognitive dissonance in Dharma practitioners. Very, very common—I run into it all the time. It's almost like one hears the Four Noble Truths, one hears these teachings about letting go and non-clinging, and the centrality of letting go of clinging. In the Four Noble Truths, clinging causes suffering, letting go of clinging brings freedom—that's the nutshell version of the Four Noble Truths. The Four Noble Truths are central to what the Dharma is, especially in insight meditation circles.

And so a person actually, either consciously or kind of by default, is somehow engaged in trying to live a life of non-clinging. Trying to live a life of non-clinging becomes somehow an ideal. And of course, it's impossible. Even the idea—if you actually reflect on what that would look like or what that would mean—involves itself in all kinds of sillinesses and contradictions. It's just not possible.

If I really go into what that means and what it would look like, it's a bit of a ridiculous notion. And yet somehow it's held up, and then I fail, and yet somehow it doesn't get questioned as an ideal. Maybe a little bit, we play with words like clinging and craving, and sort of tease them both—craving's okay because it's momentary, but clinging is not, you know, and that kind of thing. But there's still something that doesn't really work and makes sense in that as a life, especially in a life if one wants to include eros, and one wants to include other aspects of life, relationship, and love of one's children, and love of nature and all. It just doesn't work as an ideology.

Implicit there in the understanding of the Four Noble Truths is this non-clinging, and there may be a goal—if one even talks about goals, and some people hate that word—but the goal is of less stress or less depression if you're in the kind of mindfulness modalities, and that's kind of the goal, although one's very careful with words like "goal." Or it might be that implicit in that understanding of Four Noble Truths is the kind of ideal of being present to life, being present to life—I'm going to give that all kinds of different language—but the whole thing there, the kind of aspiration of trying to live a life of non-clinging, of being present, or whatever it is.

All of that is taking place in a world of unquestioned reality. The world is just what it seems. We acknowledge, of course, that things are impermanent, that we may not like that. We acknowledge the interconnectedness and can kind of see that more. But basically, the world, in that kind of... the narrowness, really, of that conception, the world is... Practice is taking place with a backdrop or in the context of a world that's basically what it seems to be to the dominant worldview, the dominant modernist worldview, the Weltanschauung. Basically, it is that. Yes, impermanent. Yes, interconnected, etc. But basically, it's that.

So that's a very, very common way, or even if a person doesn't really think of Four Noble Truths and all that, it's somehow wrapped up in all that, is this kind of ideology, really, without maybe even a person thinking it's an ideology. It's a conception of what the Dharma is, what the Four Noble Truths is, and what they're for, and where they move to.

Now compare that with a different conception that really picks up this piece of non-clinging, or letting go of clinging, that's there implicit in the Four Noble Truths very strongly, very centrally. It picks it up and really starts practicing with, meditatively, in all kinds of ways, at all kinds of depths and subtleties and all kinds of directions, but to a lesser or greater degree at any moment in time, practices letting go of clinging to different degrees and at different depths and at different ranges of subtlety for a period of time and then letting clinging come back and just exploring this movement of more or less clinging into greater and greater depths of non-clinging, and greater and greater subtleties of what that even means to cling.

So the practice becomes a kind of meditative exploration of sliding up and down deliberately this spectrum, if you like, of how much clinging there is. I realize for some of you this is going to sound really, really strange, and I've filled this out elsewhere, so I'm not going to elaborate too much. But just to say, if one practices that way and views practice that way, then it opens a completely different door.

One starts to see that as one lets go of clinging, or in the moment when one meditatively lets go of clinging more and more deeply, the perception of things, self, other, world is fabricated less. To the degree that there's clinging in any moment of perception, there's more fabrication. To the degree that there's less clinging in any moment, there's less fabrication. So I see this relationship between clinging and the experience of self and things and objects and world.

And the exploration of letting go of clinging to different degrees at different times, not as something to hang on to—I'm not trying to continuously non-cling somehow in regard to everything. But this more meditative, nuanced, subtle and much deeper movement of exploration in the direction of non-clinging and more clinging and non-clinging and different kinds of less clinging, one sees the intimate connection, the dependent co-arising of perception and clinging. The fabrication of perception means the fabrication of experience and appearance with clinging.

One starts to see, oh, perception is fabricated, and oh, it's fabricated to a much greater, more pervasive and deeper extent than I thought. My sense of things, I begin to understand they are empty. I perceive them this way when I look in this way, when there's this kind of clinging. I perceive them that way when there's this very, very subtle kind of clinging. I perceive them this way when there's nothing left but just this subtlest clinging. What's the real way? They're empty. Things appear dependent on the way of looking, and central in that is dependent on the degree, if you like, and the kind of clinging that's there.

This way of understanding emptiness is actually just a kind of key to the exploration of the fabrication of perception, and from that, our sense and our understanding of what things are, self, other, world. And the sense of the world then begins to open. It's empty. World, nature, is empty of inherent existence. My perception, my sense of it depends, depends on clinging, depends on the way of looking, depends on how I'm looking. And it becomes more open because it's empty. It can be seen this way and that way. All kinds of possibilities of perceiving nature, perceiving world, open up for us through this practice and through actually the exploration of this sort of sliding scale of subtleties and depths of clinging in any moment.

So the whole thing is actually oriented in terms of understanding experience, understanding perception, and what that does is it opens up this understanding of emptiness, which opens up the very possibilities of perception of what self, other, and world or nature is, are. That becomes much more open, an open playing field, really.

So that's one consequence. The second consequence implicit in all that is clinging is not an enemy. It's actually possible at times. And of course, I mean, just think about it.

Just feel into your life. Of course you need to cling. One of my teachers used to say, "You know, you need to cling to ethics for a while, at least. You need to cling to certain levels of understanding in order to open to others. You need to cling to cultivating good qualities in order to give practice a possibility even of this kind of depth and power." All kinds of things you need to cling to, just within the Dharma. And then you think about other aspects of one's life.

So can we view the Dharma in a way that actually, strangely, opens up the validity and possibility and legitimacy of clinging at times? And also opens up a place for eros? Rather than the suspicion of eros and either denigration or just ignoring of the erotic and the sexual, actually has a place, has a place, because I'm approaching the Dharma, conceiving it in a very different way.

So in this way then, the Four Noble Truths and the teaching about letting go of clinging, the teaching about letting go of stress, is not so that we can be free—whatever that might mean—but so that we can see more. It's not so that we can be free; it's so that we can see more, sense more emptiness, know more emptiness of everything. We can see more levels in the perception, if you like, dimensions. We can see more sacredness. There is an openness and an opening of the perception through this way of approaching practice.

To me, there's a much greater freedom there, a whole other level of freedom. It's a much more open, a much richer way of viewing the Dharma.

But in a way, this talk today—I just mention these things—but this talk today is really focused on not so much the self-view, as I've talked about that, not so much the view of the Dharma, and the way the view of the self and the view of the Dharma are involved in all this business about eros and psyche and the dynamic there. But actually, primarily for today, is the view of another, or any other, and particularly of nature and earth, as we started off with.

So just to return a little bit to this—we've said already quite a lot about it—in the so-called Enlightenment in Western civilization. I mean, it was a gradual thing, you know, like these things are. Seventeenth century, sort of. And the scientific revolution, which happened at the same time—these things were interpenetrated. The scientific revolution, Enlightenment.

There was a philosopher or scientist or both, or writer, Francis Bacon, very influential in the scientific revolution. And that whole movement, that whole revolution that came with the scientific revolution and with the Enlightenment, brought about, as I alluded to earlier, this kind of one-dimensionality. It's like the shaving off of the sense of verticality, of multiplicity of dimensions in our perception, our sense, our view of things.

So this is—you cannot overestimate the significance and the consequences of this. All kinds of wonderful consequences and really helpful, of course. But like all things, bring with it a shadow, a blind spot, a constriction.

So the philosopher Owen Barfield has written about this quite a lot. And I think it's from an essay called "The Rediscovery of Meaning." But he talks about, he makes a distinction between scientific method, because that's what really started back then with Galileo and others. It's really an introduction of a kind of a way of observing nature.

So Owen Barfield points out, quoting him a little bit, that meticulously observing the facts of nature and systematically interpreting them in terms of physical cause and effect—so in other words, this one-dimensionality is only interpreting things in terms of physical cause and effect—that was introduced as a method, brilliant and revolutionary and important as it is, but it grew as a method and grew in a way that at some point, almost—well, in many cases unconsciously, but in other cases more deliberately—became a sort of entrenched belief and assumption, dominating the culture, pervasive in the culture, the belief and assumption of physicalism or materialism, using those words interchangeably, and sometimes was kind of enshrined as a philosophy with positivism, if you know a little bit about this.

So something that started as a method became a belief and assumption that actually that method of interpreting the facts of nature, purely interpreting them only in terms of physical cause and effect, was not only just a useful way of doing things, but actually the only possible one and the only legitimate one. So it became a belief and something of a sort of entrenched and often hidden dogma that pervades our culture and the culture and the view of modernism. It's an assumption shared by most people in the culture and it's become the dominant cultural view of matter and therefore of nature.

On top of all that, Barfield points out that people believe that that view itself is a scientifically established fact. In other words, the view that the only possible way of looking at things is the scientific one is itself scientifically proven. A, it's not, and B, just logically it's impossible. It's outside of the loop or the system of the relevant terms of the logic involved there.

Something has happened culturally. What started as a method became a predilection, an emphasis on that method, and then that became a view of what was legitimate, and that became entrenched as a belief, an assumption shared in the culture, and then it was even believed that that that was itself established by science somehow. And science being the only legitimate way of establishing anything.

And in and through all that, culturally then, has there been a dying away, a starving, if you like, of our ability to perceive, if you like, these other dimensions? Yes. So all that affects how we sense things, not just the ideas.

Now, I'm not talking about intellectuality, but about ideas—sorry, about the sense, the very experience of nature. Culturally, has it become rare? I don't know—this sense of the other dimensions of things, this sense that things are more than just matter.

So the other extreme, which I think we mentioned before, is a divinity, a sense of divinity that's cut off from materiality in the world—and perhaps that was dominant before the scientific revolution. Divinity is just something transcendent, and materiality is something separate. The world is separate from God. That would be another extreme view. There's a verticality there, but no connection between the dimensions of the vertical, on the vertical spectrum. And it's dualistic.

So one of the things about eros is that it connects horizontally. It connects me to this other that I love, that there's an erotic connection with. But it connects vertically as well. It connects the dimensions so there isn't this dualism or split or divinity cut off. It connects the dimensions through this eros-psyche-logos, because it's wrapped up in perception and ideation and the sense of things, infusing our very sense of things, our very image and perception of things. So it connects horizontally—eros helps to connect horizontally and also vertically, connects these dimensions of perception. And it does it, as we said, in and through the particulars.

So mettā also connects dimensions, but it does it through universality. And so it's infinite, if you like, in a different way. As I said, it tends to fabricate less, and through fabricating less, gradually, gradually, as you get deeper, there's a sense of this infinity of love. And then, as I said, some people are able to take that further, if they know how, if they're taught how, into the unfabricated. But there aren't the infinite varieties of perception possible that come through the erotic kind of love, the erotic strand of things with this mutual impregnation and insemination of the eros and psyche.

There's something else relevant here about Francis Bacon, the scientific revolution and all that. Francis Bacon wrote about knowledge. One of the things he wrote about was knowledge. And he made a very strong and actually extremely influential statement that became very influential and had significant consequences over the centuries.

Knowledge, in his exposition, knowledge was valued for its instrumentality. In other words, for its practicality in re-engineering nature and in giving humanity power over the elements of nature. So for him, if knowledge wasn't instrumental and practical in that sense of the way we can dominate and reconfigure nature and use it for our ends, it wasn't a worthwhile knowledge. It wasn't even knowledge at all in his book. So he wrote, knowledge without such practical applications is worthless or worth less.

And something else to point out here, because knowledge was also wrapped up with measurement. In other words, in his view, if you couldn't measure something, it wasn't really real. Only what was measurable was real. That was absolutely integral and fundamental to the ideology of the scientific revolution. Only what was measurable was real.

So that began very much to spread its influence in our very sense of what the cosmos and nature was made of. It's only made of stuff that's measurable. And anything you talk about that can't be measured cannot be real and cannot be really what the cosmos and nature and earth is made of. Massively influential. It sounds like intellectual ideas, but they so infuse our ways of thinking and our sense, our perception of things, of others, of nature, of the world, and a sense of what's real, pervading the culture.

Now, measurement and instrumentality are actually inevitably tied together. I don't know if that's obvious. But if you want to see, is this instrumental, can I be able to do something, I need to measure whether it's doing what it's doing and how much it's doing and what I want it to be doing. Measurement—and whether I do that with a slide rule or a microscope or some kind of calibrated measure where they just look at it and say, yeah, that looks pretty good, that one does better than this—measurement and instrumentality are inevitably tied together.

Now all this, I'm going on about it, not just because of the views that come of it, but also in relation to activism. So understandably and importantly, how often in relation to our activism we want to measure the effectiveness of our activism. And in other words, we want to measure its instrumentality. Is what I'm doing ultimately affecting, say, a government so that ultimately, for instance, the measurement of CO2 parts per million in the atmosphere is reduced or limited or stabilized? So we want to measure the effectiveness, the instrumentality of our activism, directly or indirectly. And of course that's so important and so needs to be there as an element of what's going on.

But can there be sometimes an over-emphasis on the instrumentality of our activism?

So of course these questions—what will be effective, what will affect a change in society, in politics, in the natural world? And how can I measure it? How do I measure whether what I'm doing as an activist is helping?—are really, really important.

But if I exclusively focus on instrumentality or overemphasize it, might that very overemphasis actually, strangely enough, reflect and be a symptom of the kind of one-dimensional view, the physicalism, the lack of other dimensionalities, the lack of verticality that's pervasive in the culture? That started with the scientific revolution and had such—as well as so much good that's come out of it—such dire consequences? And the lack also of soulfulness and eros that came, or that grew out of the kind of Western Enlightenment, the scientific revolution ideology when it became entrenched as a kind of limiting belief, dogma. And then the whole view of modernism that in so many ways constrains the possibilities for soulfulness and eros.

So sometimes, understandably, we can overemphasize or exclusively emphasize the instrumentality of our activism. Obviously, it's important. But again, asking, is it enough? Is it enough for the psyche? And is it enough for the whole complexity of the situation of climate change and environmental crisis? The multi-leveled nature of that complexity of those crises?

Looking more specifically at how this applies to activism itself—it's kind of obvious, but it's worth saying, I think. Human activity is part of ecology, but human activism is also, as a human activity, part of ecology. So for better or worse, human activity and activism are part of the ecology of the whole planet, of the Earth. You can't remove a study of human activism and activity from the study of ecology. It's all, of course, integral.

But the point I want to make within that is really about styles or thrusts or levels of activism. We can talk about the instrumental level, if you like, the practical or the effectual, and the emphasis on that as a kind of style or thrust or emphasis, a level of activism. We can also talk about what we might call the soulful or the spiritual or the imaginal, symbolic styles, thrusts, levels of activism.

And this is not either-or. There's an "and" here. I think it's really important to include both, or to allow within the spectrum and the range of activism more widely—whether it's you as an individual, me as an individual—but allow and recognize this: they both need to be included, that whole range needs to be included. They're not even actually totally separate; you can't really separate them.

We all have both of those levels of our being, if you like. Of course, we're concerned with practicalities and effects and instrumentality, but we also have a level of our being that is concerned with soul and with image and spirit.

Why do we have funeral services and memorials for people who die? Practically, I mean, you might say, well, it's hygienic—just stick them in the ground or burn them so it doesn't rot and smell and infect. Stick the body, do that to the body. That's purely instrumental. But something else—we need something else. Why bother to have a memorial service? Something the soul needs it. The funeral service. The soul needs the image and the fantasy. Something in us needs that level of engagement, of activity, in relation, in this case, to a death. It's not practical. It's for the soul.

Or, I heard this story about when the Titanic was sinking. I never saw that film, by the way—Leonardo DiCaprio and... I don't know who else, never saw it. But I heard that in reality what happened was the ship was sinking and there weren't enough lifeboats or enough space in the lifeboats for everyone. So certain people got into lifeboats and got away and a lot of people didn't. And those people who were left on the ship as it was sinking, knowing that they were going to die soon, knowing that the ship was going down, they began singing hymns, hymns to God.

And you think, well, what's the point? What does that do? It doesn't do anything.

It doesn't help the ship not sink. There's no practical efficacy. It's for the soul.

And this is a dimension that emerges when we consider climate change and the massive challenges and possible devastation we face as a species, when we witness the tragedy befalling other species on Earth and feel the horror and sadness that can arise. People often ask me, "What can I do?" Or they say, "I don't think we're going to turn this around." And that may be true.

In a way, holding and allowing that very real possibility—whatever that means, because it's not black and white, is it? It's not simply destruction or no destruction. There's already a certain amount of destruction. But holding that possibility of failure—if you like, failure of activism, of having gone beyond tipping points and edges, of the kind of collapses of ecosystems and civilizations that might ensue—holding that as a possibility, not saying it will happen or won't happen, but acknowledging it might happen.

And then what happens with that? Do I give up activism or regard it all as futile, or become bitter about the whole thing? Or like those people on the Titanic, is there a soul level that needs to be incorporated, brought in, included, activated, brought alive in relation to that side of the possibility of activism?

And of course, we need to ensoul the more hopeful and positive side as well, because we can make a difference, and we are making a difference. But between these two—the instrumental, the practical, the effectual, and the soulful, imaginal—different personalities seem to incline toward one or the other. It's interesting how I meet different people with these varying preferences.

Different situations or predicaments need an emphasis on one or the other, the instrumental or the soulful. I would say the totality and complexity of what climate change is, and the environmental crises, and the complexity of the underlying matrix of its causes and conditions—it demands of us both levels of activism. That would be my view.

I've said this before, but I'll say it again: I feel very strongly, and have for years now, that there's such complexity to the psychology involved in climate change—involved in people's reactions to climate change, their engagement or non-engagement, activism or non-activism, and what causes climate change or allows it in the first place. Such complexity of psychology underlies all that plurality. There's not one approach or one thing or one realization or one change that's going to address all the different kinds of psychology operating in different people, or that dominate in different people, or even the various psychological patterns that circulate within one person.

Recognizing this complexity of the psychology involved calls for different approaches, different directions of entry, different levels of conversation, and different tones as well. That's something I've been interested in doing in just a very small way over the years—approaching it each time from a different direction with a different flavor and tone and level and aspect to the whole conversation. Because the psychology is so complex, no one thing is going to convince everyone.

When we think about what makes climate change such a seemingly intractable issue for us as human beings—seemingly so unsexy and uncaptivating, so hard for most people to really get to grips with or address or engage with—partly it's because it's not acute. It's a chronic issue, a long-term issue with effects extending far beyond our lifetime. Human beings are generally better with acute things. We prefer acute things.

If you're a helper or carer, we prefer someone to have an acute illness. Chronic illness is difficult—difficult to sustain, certainly for the patient, but also for the carers or people around who care. It's difficult to sustain interest. Acute is dramatic; you can get in there and do your helping thing and feel good about it, and then it's over and you feel good about that. Chronic is hard to sustain. Ken Wilber, in his book Grace and Grit—I read it years ago—I think makes this point: it's hard for us to sustain interest in chronic illness unless it's ours. Even then, it's sometimes hard to relate to it.

So that's an aspect of the environmental crisis and climate change that makes it difficult to relate to, that makes the psychology difficult. Another aspect is that there's not the same gratification you might get in engaging or helping in other ways. Engaging in action around climate change—for the most part, you're not going to encounter lots of grateful faces after you've done your thing, and experience the gratification of that, because it's a long haul, and sometimes you're not even dealing with people so much. There isn't that gratification we get back from others' gratitude.

Or the gratification of, say, being with someone dying in a hospice—the sense of how beautiful that can be, how poignant, and in a strange way, gratifying. There's beauty in that letting go, in the death and the grace that can be there. There's a kind of gratification and beauty in that, and somehow even that's not present in relation to climate change and environmental degradation.

There is a place for bringing these things in and allowing them and finding them, but often they just can't be there by the nature of what we're dealing with and its trajectories in time and where it affects the earth and people.

The results, like the causes and conditions that give rise to climate change, are equally diffuse. Both the results of environmental crises and climate change themselves, and the results of our activism, are scattered and hard to grasp. It's difficult to see them clearly, to concretize and capture them. They're complex. You cannot think so simplistically in terms of monistic cause and monistic effect—this cause producing that effect.

Given all that and much more we could say about what's difficult and complex about something like climate change, how then can we proceed? Given those difficulties, those challenges, and the complexity, how can we open up the relationship and the view—the way we're seeing it all? Both the crisis itself and our activism—how can we open all that up, the relationship, the view, the way of seeing, in a way that will be helpful?

So this last point, to sum up in relation to this ecology of love, or perhaps just to leave you with some thoughts:

Do we love the earth? Do we love nature deeply? When we do, do we love it and nature deeply because we sense it as sacred? When there's a sense of sacredness, there is implicitly and automatically and organically a love, a deepening of the love. Do we love the earth and nature deeply because we sense it as sacred?

Or is it that in loving it—whether that's through mettā or through eros, but particularly now, emphasizing eros in this talk—that in loving it, we open up perception to what I'm calling other dimensions, this verticality, vertical dimensions, levels? Perception is opened up through the imaginal, through fantasy, through fabrication involving psyche and logos, as we said. This opens it up until eventually it is opened to a sense of the sacred, and then more and more to different kinds of sacred.

So do we love nature because we sense it as sacred, or in loving it does it become sacred? Do we discover its sacredness and give it its sacredness? Or both? Obviously, I would say both.

This is the ecology of love. This opening up of perception, of the levels of perception, the enrichment of the sense of what it is that we love, creates more love. And the love opens up the richness of perception. The mettā and the eros do that in different ways. They open up different dimensions in different ways from each other.

And then in turn, in this ecology of love, the different dimensions, the perception, the experience, the sense of the different dimensions—the different richnesses and levels of what it is that I love, in this case, the earth—those perceptions feed back to the mettā and the eros. When I see, experience this thing differently because of the mettā, it feeds the mettā. Or because of the eros, it feeds the eros. And so the whole thing can organically grow, as we've talked about.

So self, other, world, eros or love, sense of the sacred or sense of the profane—all of that is co-constellated, co-fabricated. And it can be skillfully fabricated, if we use Buddhist terminology. The ways we see and experience self, other, world, nature, love, sacredness—we can fabricate that in skillful ways, and there's no end to that. Deeper and deeper, more and more beautiful, more and more soul, soul-making, soul-enriching.

And knowing the emptiness of all things actually allows that more, allows that play with fabrication, legitimizes it, gives it room—part of the logos, the larger logos there that allows.

So then in all that, in the skillful fabrication, other dimensions of the object—in this case, of nature—come into perception. And that allows other dimensions to our love and therefore to the fruits of that love in action, in our action and engagement, the possibilities of engagement. Opening up, opening up.

So I'm really interested here in opening up possibilities—possibilities of perception, of experience, of knowing, possibilities of love, and possibilities of engagement. All of this is tied together.

What does it need for that not to get locked down, limited, constrained, fixated? What does it need so that it can keep growing into more and more beauty, more and more depth, more and more richness, more and more soulfulness, more and more love and action?

This is, for me, why all of this is important. Why all of this is important for the soul, and it's important for the earth.

CHAPTER 24

An Ecology of Love (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 35 min

In this third part of his exploration of love's ecology, Rob Burbea examines the dynamic relationship between eros, psyche, and logos in our perception of nature and others. He explains how eros, through its involvement with the imaginal faculty (psyche), discovers and creates deeper dimensions in its objects, leading to increasingly sacred and multidimensional experiences. This mutual enrichment requires an understanding of emptiness that allows us to hold both discovery and creation in our knowing.

Burbea addresses concerns about when eros becomes greed (lobha), explaining that this distortion occurs when psyche or logos becomes limited or fixated. Using examples like materialism's one-dimensional view of nature and the tendency to accumulate travel experiences, he shows how constrained conceptual frameworks force eros to seek "more" only at horizontal material levels, leading to exploitation and endless consumption.

The talk emphasizes that fullness of love requires not just heart (mettā) but also soul - involving both imaginal and conceptual faculties. When eros, psyche, and logos are allowed their natural movement and mutual fertilization, they open vertical dimensions of perception that satisfy eros's desire for "more" without material greed. This dynamic maintains the mystery and unfathomability necessary for love to continue deepening, whether toward persons, nature, or existence itself.

So again, in terms of this dynamic—this ecology of love—the eros, the erotic component in love, will tend to insist and push and open in a way that creates more, discovers more, or really both, in an object that it allows. In the case of nature, it will impregnate it, so to speak, through its involvement with psyche, giving imaginal levels to the perception of the object of nature, of another. It will fabricate more, give complexity and richness and depth and dimensionality to nature, in this case to the earth or some particular object there.

In that process, Eros is encountering, so to speak, a new object—a bigger object, a more interesting and richer, more juicy, complex, multidimensional object. It encounters a more multidimensional and rich and eventually divine, sacred sense of experience of nature, in this case of its other, and that excites Eros more. So there's this mutual enriching, mutual deepening, mutual expanding, and with that the logos too—the concept—has to expand as well.

Now, there are a couple of things to point out about this, perhaps addressing some objections.

First, the psyche, through Eros, is giving these other dimensions. We could realize that the psyche is giving these other dimensions to nature, to Earth, and it knows it. As I've said in other talks, seeing image as image, or realizing what is, this is poetic seeing, poetic sensibility, and poetic knowing.

That's why I use both words: the psyche and the perception, through Eros and this dynamic, both discover more in the object—other levels in the object—but they also create that. They discover and create. There's some way of understanding that incorporates both discovery and creation. It's both/and.

Somehow sitting on the cusp there, what allows us to sit on the cusp and include both in our sense of what knowledge is and what happens when we know and encounter something—when we experience anything, what happens in perception—is an understanding of emptiness. It's an understanding of emptiness that allows this "discover/create" experience, this incorporation of both.

I'm not talking here about a kind of New Age style of understanding where typically, or so it seems to me, there's just an assumption that what one perceives or conceives in terms of how I look at this plant is some kind of objective, independently existing reality where there isn't an awareness of fabrication, of fabricating in a certain way—the fabrication of perception that's always there. Or there isn't an awareness of choosing to see and to sense in a certain way. So it's not really talking about that New Age way, nor really talking about the modernist way of understanding what knowledge is and what perception is, where there's an assumption of an objective independent reality—just very different versions of what that is.

In and through everything I'm talking about, there is what I believe and conceive to be a more sophisticated philosophy—a philosophy of knowledge, of epistemology and ontology, what's real, and all that. Something more sophisticated in terms of depth of insight is going on. It's allowed from the Dharma direction through the deep understanding of emptiness.

So what opens here in terms of these other dimensions and the multiplicity of dimensions in our perception of nature, our sense of nature, is a valid way of knowing. We realize the psyche is somehow giving this to its object that it loves, to the sense of nature. But it's still a valid way of knowing. And it's valuable. And it gives value. But there's not a naive realism involved there in any direction. There's something quite sophisticated—a razor's edge between, a razor's edge of emptiness, really. And that allows, although a razor's edge is of course very thin, an enormity of view, an enormity of view.

So that's one thing that needs realizing.

A second thing: someone might be hearing all this, especially if you've been exposed to a lot of traditional Dharma teachings, and might get quite nervous hearing all this. The very word "eros" and its connotations of sexuality and desire and sensuality and all that, and its associations with these things—well, when is this eros business, and especially the more in eros, the pothos in eros, when does that not just become greed? And greed in traditional Dharma conception is just a kilesa. It's a defilement, it's a problem, it causes suffering for self and others.

So this is a really important question: What is it that sometimes constrains or subverts or distorts Eros so that it actually becomes greed, and the more in it—the wanting more, the pothos—just ends up being endless greed?

Well, there's a lot to say about this. One answer is: when the psyche or the imaginal or the logos or the conceptual framework—either one or both—are limited in some way, then this actually constrains and subverts the eros, and it will become greed.

One obvious example is if the logos—if the conceptual framework of nature—is just one of one-dimensional physicalism, that kind of view that's the dominant view of modernism: nothing but meaningless matter, atoms, building blocks, as we talked about before, randomly moving, and through that random movement, like some kind of machine, creates what it creates in terms of the diversities of nature. One-dimensional physicalism, that kind of view, is actually a limited logos.

And what happens then in relationship to nature? What happens is that the eros that's part of the psyche, that is an indispensable aspect of the psyche, becomes greed. Then you get the growth economy gone mad without realizing or wanting to acknowledge the finiteness of the Earth's resources, the finiteness of the biosphere, the finiteness of what we live in.

Back in the early 70s, I think in '72, there was a seminal paper by the Club of Rome called "Limits to Growth." It was actually just pointing out: hey, we live on a finite planet materially. There's a limit to what our atmosphere can handle. There's a limit to material resources that we can dig up out of the earth.

Really, really important to recognize that and to voice that. And when greed's gone mad, it doesn't want to see that. There's this insistence that the economy must grow—that there's only one way of thinking about economics, and that the economy needs to grow. Well, there are limits to growth. So that's really, really important.

But in a way, part of the problem with that, or a whole other level of the problem, is that because of the one-dimensionality of view and perception of what nature, earth, planet, we, and others are, there's nowhere for the eros and the psyche and the logos to expand. There's nowhere to get more, this wanting more. There's nowhere to get more other than at the horizontal level, because the horizontal level is all that exists. There is just the material.

So whether it's an individual wanting more—more cars, more houses, more this, more that, more plasma TVs, whatever it is—individual materialism in that sense of lifestyle, or social materialism, this expansion to get more, it can only go horizontal. It must expand because of the more in the eros. And it can only expand horizontally, with devastating consequences.

But if this whole dynamic of eros, psyche, logos is allowed—each aspect of that dynamic, the eros, the psyche, the logos, the erotic, the imaginal, and the conceptual—if those dimensions of our being in relation to nature, or in relation to anything, are allowed to grow, are not impeded, not hindered or constrained or locked down through some kind of clinging or fixedness of image or fixedness of view, then there can be a kind of infinite growth, an infinite growth getting more, discovering more, having more of what eros wants—an infinite growth in that sense, without the greed on the material level.

So there are limits on the material level, of course there are. But if the soul's way of knowing—if the facets of this dynamism of eros, psyche, logos, of the erotic, the imaginal, and the conceptual aspects of the soul—if the facets of the dynamism of the soul, facets of that dynamism of perception, of the soul's way of knowing, facets of that ecology of love, if they are allowed to expand unhindered, unimpeded by a kind of fixation in terms of view or image or idea, then eros can expand as it wants to, and thrust deeper as it wants to, and open more as it wants to, without demanding more, without its more being a demand on the material level, because it's able to get other kinds of more—more at other dimensions and levels of perception, and other levels of fulfillment, of beauty, of nourishment.

You understand?

Actually, maybe another example would help to make it clearer—this connection between limitations on view, idea, logos, sense, and also on psyche or image. The way limitations on view distort or deflect eros into greed.

Another example I'm thinking may be more helpful, probably because it's more tangible in one's own life, visible in one's own personal life, at least to some extent—maybe more fundamental. I'm not sure anyway. Another example is the way we can see this working: I'm thinking of the tendency we can get into as human beings sometimes, that can actually dominate our relationship to existence. The tendency to be driven to accumulate experiences, to collect experiences. People talk quite commonly about having a "bucket list"—a bucket list of things to do or experience before I die. That's quite a common notion that people have in their life, even from quite a young age.

Or more specifically with regard to earth and nature, and not necessarily in relation to dying, we can see sometimes people get into this tendency to want to fly all over the world. Every year or several times a year, flying here or there, going on holiday or calling it traveling, to see and experience this place or that place all around the world.

So what's going on with the eros there? Notice a few things here. Because, let's take that example of going on holiday to this place and that. The eros there actually includes, actually even emphasizes the sensual, what we might call the sensual. So typically a person wants to travel to this place, experience the cuisine there—exotic cuisine, despite the fact that you can get most of this stuff in Tesco these days, or your local corner store, if you still have a corner store. But there's this sensual element through the cuisine, through experiencing certain sights or colors of a sunset in this place, or the vistas—to experience this beach or swim in this place or that place, whatever. The dimension of the sensual is definitely included and even emphasized.

So it can seem, if we don't really probe deeply this whole question of eros and what it is and what it does, it can seem like that whole movement to want to do all that includes the erotic and is indicative of someone who has a kind of fuller eros in their life—not just sexual, but in terms of their relationship with sensuality.

But the eros, psyche, logos dynamic is often limited when there's that kind of propulsion, pull, drive to collect experiences. Particularly, the logos can be limited. As I said, oftentimes it's a one-dimensional view of earth, of nature, of materiality—also self, and we'll get to that. But the logos is limited. Often it's through a one-dimensional view. And so the more in the eros, the pothos in the eros, this wanting more, will just go out and out and out and turn into greed. I want more and more, and more and more can only go one place. Next year we'll go there. In the spring we'll go there.

You can see this pattern not just in relation to holidaying and traveling, but with food, consumption—truly with anything. This reveals something crucial about the nature of eros itself.

Notice something important here regarding eros, particularly in how psyche interacts with it. The usual assumption is that fantasy combined with eros spells trouble—a disastrous recipe leading inevitably to pornography and other distortions. We quickly conclude that eros is problematic, fantasy is problematic, and their combination even more so.

But in these examples we're exploring, what we're actually encountering is either an absence or, more precisely, a poverty of the imaginal—a psychic impoverishment in relationship to eros. When psyche encounters eros in this depleted state, there's no opening, no revealing, no discovery of other dimensions. The vertical dimension simply doesn't open. Things remain resolutely one-dimensional in our perception, our belief, our very sense of reality.

The sense of things fails to open through the imaginal, through psyche. Consequently, the pathos within eros continues wanting more, but it has only one direction available—horizontal accumulation. This impoverished relationship, this poverty of psyche in relation to eros, becomes deeply problematic. The issue isn't that imagination works with eros, but rather the quality of that relationship.

The real problem emerges when fantasy or image becomes locked onto and believed as literal—when we don't know image as image, don't see image as image. Related to this is our wholesale acceptance of the modernist ideal of non-fantasy in perception. We embrace a kind of realism that remains stubbornly one-dimensional. This dismissal of fantasy through rigid logos impoverishes the imaginal, cutting off the psychic influx and interaction with eros.

In all these ways, we see limitations, constrictions, and rigidities in logos, and corresponding restrictions in psyche. When both are constrained, eros inevitably gets deflected and distorted into what we might call greed—something ultimately unhelpful.

Let me draw out a third, quite subtle point about how eros operates here. Often when people speak today about reclaiming or rediscovering a sense of the sacred—particularly in relation to nature—there's an implicit assumption that perceiving nature as sacred naturally leads to respect, which then inhibits certain exploitative or commodifying behaviors. This inhibitive function of sacred perception is genuinely important, and I want to include it in understanding how eros works.

But there's something subtly different happening when we recognize that eros, allowed to flow freely through unrestricted psyche and logos, opens a natural dynamic for the soul. Rather than operating through inhibition born of respect, eros becomes naturally channeled to receive what it seeks in ways that are neither exploitative nor commodifying. The natural dynamic arising through the interplay of eros, psyche, and logos opens the sense of sacredness so that behavior transforms organically—not through any kind of inhibition, but because eros is allowed full expression while receiving what it desires through the very sense of sacredness itself.

When other levels of perception beyond the one-dimensional open through this co-feeding, co-constellating, co-deepening of eros, psyche, and logos, we discover dimensions that can have their own kind of infinitude. This opening moves through stages or ranges, then opens again and again because none of the three—eros, psyche, or logos—is being limited, constricted, fixed, or rigidified. When this endless movement of expansion is permitted, eros receives the "more" it seeks without exploiting earth, nature, or other in any of the ways I've described, without reducing them to commodities.

This principle applies to relationships with others, with earth and nature, with any sense of otherness. Eros finds its fulfillment in other ways, receiving other kinds of "more" than mere accumulation of experience at the horizontal level. Other dimensions of "more" become not just available but natural. We relate differently because we see differently.

Problems arise only when the co-involvement and co-fertilization of eros, psyche, and logos is blocked or restricted from any direction. When I spoke of the void in our understanding of sacredness and love, the consequences are absolutely devastating.

When any one or more of the erotic, imaginal, or conceptual facets of our being are constrained, limited, fixed, or locked down in relation to anything—whether a partner, spouse, nature, or any object of our attention—when they're not allowed their natural movement and growth and mutual fertilization and impregnation, what happens to our love?

In a relationship or marriage that endures over time, what happens to the love? What happens to our view, sense, and experience of that person or partner? This applies equally to our relationship with ourselves, for eros, psyche, and logos can become locked down or hindered in relation to our self-view. The same is true whether we're relating to the world, to nature, or even to the Dharma itself. What happens when these faculties get stuck, fixed, or hindered in relation to our view and sense of what the Dharma is, or what eros is, or what the soul and psyche are, or what conceptuality and its possibilities might be?

What happens to the love, to the very sense, experience, and view of whatever it is we actually care about? There can still be tremendous care—just as in a relationship where I care deeply about this person. Yet something has shifted over time. The eros has dissipated. Something has locked it down, stagnated it, or drained its life. Something in that fertile dynamic, that mutual involvement of eros, psyche, and logos and their capacity to impregnate each other and grow together—something has become stuck. This affects how I see my partner, how I see nature, how I see myself, how I see the Dharma. The care remains, but something has become limited. A level of vitality, enrichment, and growth has vanished from that relationship, from that perception, from that love.

If we dare speak of something as bold as the fullness of love—which is probably not even a possibility but rather a direction we move toward—we can point to several essential qualities. As I mentioned before, it needs not just feeling but action. The fullness of love must manifest in our behavior: what comes from our mouth, what the body does, our gestures, our acts of kindness.

The fullness of love needs not just metta but also eros. Both metta and eros—among other aspects of love we could explore—have a natural tendency toward horizontal spreading, toward fullness across the breadth of experience. Metta spreads by virtue of its very aspiration; its ideal image is universal, unconditional extension to everything and everyone. Eros also spreads through that mutual impregnation and growth of eros, psyche, and logos. There's a natural spilling over, an expansion into what I call cosmopoiesis. The enriched sense and view of whatever we love—a person, for instance—begins spreading outward organically. The psyche and imaginal faculty expand this view, the logos and conceptual framework broaden, the eros grows within that expansion, and this perception naturally spreads horizontally to our environment, to the world, to nature, to the cosmos itself.

The fullness of love, if we allow ourselves to dwell with that possibility, that direction—whether toward a person or toward nature—must involve the heart, of course. But it must also involve soul. By soul, I mean what I'm using interchangeably with psyche: the imaginal faculty and the logos, the conceptual framework, the conceiving of what it is that we love.

Fullness of love involves not just heart but soul as well—psyche, imagination, logos, the imaginal dimension, and the conception of what we love. Through the involvement of soul, the vertical dimension opens, along with the multiplicity of other dimensions of perception. This involvement of soul is part of the fullness of love, a necessary aspect alongside heart.

Metta and eros accomplish this opening in slightly different ways, moving in different directions. Metta opens the vertical dimensions in a more universal way. The divinity there is more universal, with a simplification of objects leading toward unity and oneness.

Whereas eros retains the particulars in its sense of the divine. It complicates, it fabricates, and it retains the particularities.

And again, if we stay with that fullness of love—the fullness of love related to what we just said and this whole dynamic or ecology of love—fullness of love needs a sense of mystery. The object, the thing, the person that I love, whether it's nature or whatever, it needs to retain a level of the mysterious, a level of unfathomability, of undefinability.

It's almost like that mystery, unfathomability, undefined quality is then space for eros to move into in this expansion—space for eros psyche-logos to move into. It has to be space, like a womb. It has to be space where something can grow, something can get fertilized. And that's also attractive. It gives the pothos in the eros something: "Oh, there's more here. I can probe deeper. I can penetrate deeper. I can open up to more."

Because eros needs to be able to penetrate and to open to more.

CHAPTER 25

An Ecology of Love (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 57 min

In this profound exploration of love's relationship to environmental engagement, Rob Burbea distinguishes between mettā and eros as complementary dimensions of an ecology of love. While mettā tends toward universality and simplification—potentially leading to a detached equanimity that may not inspire activism—eros operates through a dynamic of wanting ever-deeper connection. This erotic dimension involves the imagination (psyche) and conceptual understanding (logos) in an ongoing process of discovering or creating richer, more multidimensional perceptions of nature.

Burbea explains how eros 'complicates and fabricates' our perception of the natural world, opening vertical dimensions that reveal nature as more than merely material. Through subtle examples—from women harvesting in community to sensing the imaginal presence of ancient elephants in contemporary trees—he demonstrates how the imaginal infuses our environmental awareness. Unlike the horizontal interconnectedness often emphasized in engaged Buddhism, this erotic relationship with nature opens vertical dimensions where the material world becomes an expression of the sacred, potentially catalyzing deeper engagement with environmental crises.

Let's explore this more deeply.

As I mentioned, love, though undefinable as a concept, needs to include—or rather, does include—both metta and eros. Let's begin with metta.

I've spoken extensively about metta, and of course we discuss it frequently in the Dharma, so I don't want to dwell too much on this aspect. But let me share a few thoughts about the metta dimension of love.

A couple of obvious points first. Metta is not just a feeling—it's an intention. We intend to wish others well, rather than simply feeling a certain feeling toward someone. This is fundamental, though I've discussed this extensively elsewhere, as have many others.

The second obvious point is that metta needs action. Again, it's not merely a feeling. I may sit on my cushion with my heart feeling juicy, moved, and rich because of the feeling of metta and love—very radiant and expansive feelings—but it needs action. It must translate into our lives through acts of kindness, care, and compassion. This too is something those familiar with the Dharma will have heard before: it's not just a feeling, and it needs action. It's not merely a meditative experience.

The third obvious point is that metta tends to spread out, because what's included in the definition of metta is universality and unconditionality. It spreads out to all beings. When we follow the traditional approach to metta practice—moving through the categories of self, benefactor, friend, neutral person, difficult person, all beings—we're essentially spreading the metta out gradually until everyone, perhaps everything, is included. We're simply making it easier to reach that ideal of universality by breaking the practice into stages.

These are some obvious aspects of metta—important, really important—and they naturally tend to spread out and become universal.

Less obvious about metta, and probably not something one realizes unless one has done an extended metta retreat and learned to work quite skillfully with metta, is that metta tends toward a sense of oneness and equality—certainly of self and other, but actually of all things, of all others. Self, other, and world tend toward unity as you go deeper and deeper into metta, with increasing oneness and equality.

What metta is actually doing is fabricating less perception. This isn't obvious unless you've really engaged in extensive metta practice, learned to work with it skillfully, and come to understand something about meditation and the fabrication of perception. Deep metta practice, as it deepens, fabricates less and less. It tends toward an unfabricating of perception.

As this process unfolds meditatively—for a practitioner doing dedicated metta practice going deeper and deeper—the view or perception of self, other, world, nature, and so forth goes through a range that corresponds with the decreasing fabrication that comes organically from deepening metta practice.

This range is actually predictable, believe it or not. I can have someone on long-term retreat doing metta, learning to work with it well, and guarantee that at certain points in the process, particular perceptions and experiences will open up for them. Kinds of oneness will emerge.

First, the sense of "me" and "this other" begins to become one—the heart essences begin to fuse into one radiant heart. This is very typical. But even more significantly, and what I want to emphasize now, is that a wider perception of metta will open up at some point. This is all quite predictable. Everything is held in a kind of cosmic love and compassion—universal love and compassion. Everything is taking place within that.

And then, as this deepens further, all is love. The fabric of everything is metta, is compassion. These experiences are, as I said, predictable and common for people who engage in truly dedicated metta practice, going deeper and deeper.

Rarer is for someone to move even beyond this with metta practice, because you need to actually understand something and adjust the approach somewhat. But metta can indeed go beyond even this, into still less fabrication and toward the unfabricated. There's a movement here, a clear trajectory.

There's a range. And as it deepens, we could say there are certain typical pit stop areas, if you like, in the way that perception opens up—very beautiful, very touching, and very important to have those openings and mystical openings of perception.

But they're characterized by being universal and also predictable. As I said, there's a limited number of them that are characteristic on that range.

One of the things about all that—in that spectrum of deepening metta practice and the perceptions that arise from it—is that sometimes what I see is a person can go through all that, feel very touched by it all, deeply and profoundly touched, and yet no engagement or activism comes out of it for them. They don't become engaged Buddhists or really seem to engage much with the whole predicament of environmental crises and climate change.

So all this—everything is love, all universe, all the trees and the grass and the sky, it's all love, it's all one, no separation—somehow there's not the kind of care that comes out of that that results in activism and engagement. That's really interesting to me.

And again, I don't want to dwell too much on the metta aspect of things in this talk. But why is it sometimes not enough? A person's had these wonderful mystical openings, even getting established as something that's quite regular in their life, and yet somehow something's not coming out of it in relation to the crises that we face in the natural world. Why is that?

Actually, there's probably a lot involved there. But it may be—I just wonder—whether something, because we're talking about a sense of the infinite, this infinite love and the universality of it, it may be that the particular manifestations can be lost from the infinite without any diminishment. One feels then, in that view, in that mystical sense that opens up, that the particular manifestations—whether it's this person or that person, or even myself, or that forest, or whatever—the particular manifestations can be lost from the infinite without diminishing the infinite. That's characteristic of infinity: you can subtract things from infinity and you still get infinity.

Something in the infinity and the universality of the experience means that particular manifestations can be lost from the infinite without diminishing the infinite, so it's okay.

The whole thing, that whole movement, that spectrum of deepening metta, actually moves towards equanimity. Again, people don't always realize this, but deepening metta moves toward deep equanimity. And equanimity is characterized by coolness, by not being perturbed—it uses the word "the imperturbable"—not being disturbed by gain and loss and those kinds of things.

So there's something in this very beautiful mystical movement, this mystical opening of perception, that sometimes can have a cooling effect on activism and engagement. Not to say that that kind of opening of perception isn't beautiful and important for the being and the sense of existence—but sometimes it's not enough to support and stimulate engagement and activism in regards to the natural world.

Okay, so there's metta, and then just touching on that. But what I want to emphasize more in this talk is the eros strand or aspect of love.

So recall this definition that I was starting with, which may have sounded a little strange or unusual, a little un-erotic, actually. Eros is the desire to connect. Let's add one more piece to that definition, because as some ancient Greeks pointed out, always with eros there is pothos. That's another Greek word, p-o-t-h-o-s. And this pothos within the eros—what's characteristic of pothos is it always wants more, more, more. What's beyond? What's next?

So we can expand the definition of eros to the desire to connect more—the wanting, the urge, the intention to connect more.

Now this pothos aspect of eros, this wanting more connection, creates or instigates a dynamic. And this is what I really want to emphasize. It instigates a dynamic of the opening of the perception, of the view, of the erotic object, the other that I love or I'm attracted to—or in this case, nature. It instigates a dynamic of opening up our perception, our view, which again means idea and sense of nature, in a different way.

In other words, it will keep wanting to open up our perception, our sense, our view of nature in different ways. So it opens up and enriches the sense of the other that I feel this erotic charge with—the other there's this erotic connection with, in this case nature. It opens up and enriches the sense of nature, adds dimensions to it, deepens it, infuses it with image and fantasy.

This is what I want to call giving it a vertical sense. Other dimensions come into our sense, our perception, and our idea of the erotic object, of the other, of nature.

Because of this pothos within the eros, because of what eros involves, it starts involving more of the psyche and the imagination, and that changes the perception.

So when we define eros as—and when we see this is what's happening in an erotic relationship, when there is eros in relation to anything—it's this desire to connect more. Then the eros, we could say, if we flesh out what that means, because it wants to push through and beyond boundaries, manifests in a movement or a desire to penetrate more what it loves, its object. Eros desires, manifests as a movement, a desire to penetrate more—more deeply, more fully.

archetype-laden way, in a way that's more infused with archetypes. So the perception of nature, earth, the natural world begins to get infused with archetypal resonances, archetypal dimensions, archetypal senses.

And this can happen, as I said, at different rates for different people and in different ways. But when there's this erotic involvement with nature, with earth, these archetypal dimensions begin to come alive in the perception. So we might begin to perceive the earth as Mother, capital M, or as the Great Mother. Not just metaphorically - though it includes the metaphorical - but actually sensing, perceiving, feeling into that archetypal dimension of the feminine, of the maternal, of the nourishing, of the holding, of the containing.

Or we might begin to perceive certain places in nature as having what we might call genius loci, the spirit of place. There's something more there than just trees and rocks and soil. There's a presence, there's a being, there's a consciousness that seems to inhabit or be that place. And this isn't just projection in the usual psychological sense, though it involves the psyche. It's actually an opening of perception to dimensions that are there but that we normally don't perceive or conceive.

Or we might begin to sense nature as sacred in ways that go beyond just appreciation or environmental concern. Sacred meaning imbued with divinity, imbued with something holy, something that demands reverence not just because of its beauty or its ecological importance, but because of its intrinsic sacred nature, its inherent holiness.

The land itself, the rivers, the mountains, the forests begin to take on this quality of the sacred. They become ensouled, if you like. They become temples. They become manifestations of the divine. And this happens through this erotic engagement, this erotic opening, this allowing of eros to do its work of connecting more deeply, penetrating more fully, opening more completely.

Sometimes this archetypal infusion happens in more specific ways. A particular tree becomes the World Tree, the axis mundi connecting earth and heaven. A particular body of water becomes the cosmic waters, the primordial source. A cave becomes the womb of the earth, the place of death and rebirth. These aren't just poetic metaphors - though they include poetry - they're actual shifts in perception, actual openings of dimensionality.

And sometimes the archetypal opening happens in more personal ways too. The landscape begins to mirror and speak to the inner landscape of the soul. The seasons become not just climatic changes but profound teachings about the cycles of life and death, growth and decay, the eternal return. The weather becomes the moods and movements of some vast being of which we are a part.

All of this - and I'm just giving a few examples - all of this is what I mean by the vertical dimension opening up through eros. It's the infusion of the perception with dimensions that transcend what we normally think of as the purely physical, the purely material, the purely sensual, though it includes all of that.

a way that's more retaining of particulars, doesn't tend to dissolve particulars in a universal sense.

There's really a range, there's a spectrum of how much things dissolve in the universal and how much the particularity is retained in this opening up and adding of other dimensions to the perception.

So that's one range. Another range is just how obvious or subtle is the manifestation of this. Because some manifestations of this deepening and enriching and sort of complicating of what we love through the eros, some manifestations are so subtle that we may not recognize them. You may not recognize them in your own experience, or it kind of may get lost from what I'm saying. Sometimes it's so subtle. There's a range there from very obvious to very, very subtle.

Let's go into it a little bit. Maybe there's just a vague perception or intuition or sense. Now really that's a key word, sense. The word embodies or encapsulates a lot. So I'm not talking here about just ideas—ideas that are kind of just intellectual, divorced from experience. I'm talking about things opening up that are sensed, perceptions, palpable, and opening up as sense perceptions, in a way that affect us, that have an effect on our heart and on our life.

But maybe the kind of opening that happens is just kind of vague, a vague perception, sense, intuition, that nature or materiality is somehow more than just material in the modernist sense—little bits of atoms, meaningless and moving randomly, and just sort of solid little billiard balls, and that's all there is that's real. So maybe it's just a vague sense that natural materiality is more than just material in the modernist sense.

Maybe, as I described in relation to metta, there's a kind of universal sense of universal oneness of love or in love. Everything is in or is love. It can open up, as I've described. That can also happen in relation to awareness. Everything is in awareness or is awareness. These are very, very common openings for people who are dedicated to meditation.

Often with those kind of openings, with a person who, as I've described on the metta retreat, a person who has this cosmic love holding everything, often at that point, a person who has never, ever used languages or a theistic language of the divine or God will start using it. It just seems the most natural thing in the world and most obvious thing and it's almost like this is what we're talking about. So very, very common, even for a person who says never use that, shied away or not even liked much that kind of language or been suspicious of it. Very common at that point in the opening of the meditative perception experience—at that point that people often start talking theistically.

But it may be that nature and things, all things are imbued with—there's a sense of them being imbued with or reflecting or expressing the divine in other ways, not just this universal love or emptiness, in all kinds of other ways. So maybe, I mean again, an example, maybe even, for instance, for some perhaps theoretical physicists, the mathematical physical laws that govern matter, and particularly the elegance of these laws, the beauty, the mathematical beauty, their economy, their symmetry, this somehow—well, it actually is another level than the matter itself. The laws are not the matter, the laws are another level. That is another level, another dimension of the matter, if you like. And that, for some theoreticals, that is somehow, somehow an expression for them of the divine, of divinity.

Maybe, and often it's the case, that the divine, the sacred divinity, is there as a sense, as a perception, as an idea. It's very vague in the sense of not really even knowing what that means. There isn't a formed conceptual framework or definition for divinity or sacredness. Somehow there's a sense of the sacredness of earth, of nature, in this case. There's somehow the sense it's not just a kind of one-dimensional reality or existence. There's more dimensions to the sense and the perception. Somehow there's the sense that the kind of meaningless mechanisms of biology and chemistry aren't all there is to nature and to matter. They are not all that we can know and feel and sense. There's something—vague as it is and undefined as it is, a sense of divinity or sacredness—that's gone beyond the typical view of modernism in how it views matter and nature and the cosmos.

So what's characteristic here to all of this is these dimensions of existence, really dimensions of perception that open up. As I said, there's various, there's all kinds of possibilities, infinite really. Metta has the characteristic of opening up a certain series, kind of as a predictable and, in a way, limited number of a series, of a range of openings up of these dimensions of perception, of sacredness, of divinity.

But characteristic of a deepening erotic relationship with any other, whether it's a lover or a wife or nature or whatever it is, characteristic of a deepening erotic relationship is that it involves image and fantasy in the perception more and more. Eros and Psyche, if you like, and by Psyche I'm really emphasizing the imaginal dimension of our beings, the capacity to perceive imaginally. Eros and Psyche start to involve—again that word—to turn with, to turn around and mix with, start to involve and fertilize and impregnate and stretch and expand and nourish and enrich each other.

So the eros, this dynamic of eros, kind of starts to complicate the object that it loves. It's unlike metta, which tends to simplify. I erase all perception of differences between people like and dislike, and everything goes towards universality and simplicity and oneness. Metta tends to simplify and dissolve particularities, it tends to unfabricate, moves towards the unfabrication, the unfabricated towards unfabricating.

Eros, on the other hand, complicates and fabricates what it's connected to, its object. It tends to complicate and fabricate more in the perception of nature, and involved in that is more and more image and fantasy in the perceptions.

Now still, with the eros, it may still be vague. There may be a vague imaginal sense that can still be part of the eros as well, or what the eros opens up in the perception. Or it may be, to some degree or another, more specific.

This body, the body of myself or the body of another, is the Buddha. One may perceive that, one may train in that perception. Or sense, or train in the sense, the perception that all, everything—all the world, all of nature, the cosmos—is Buddha nature. It is Buddha nature. It's the expression, if you like, of the mandala of the dharmakaya, the primordial Buddha nature. So these are very classic tantric ways that the perception opens up and can be trained.

Or it may be that this body or the body of another is perceived, is sensed as angelic, as angel. As well as, or rather in and through the human. The angel comes through in and through the human. The angelic comes through in and through the personal, the human, the material. And using angel and angelic not just as a metaphor—"he's such an angel." I don't just mean a sort of stand-in word for something else. "Such a nice guy." More than metaphor. Something deep and profound and moving and other. Another dimension is infusing the perception, the sense, the idea, the knowing of this thing. And it's retaining the particulars of the human and the material and the manifestation, rather than dissolving them.

But it may be, or again, it may be similar to that, that this person or this thing, or even the whole of nature, or a specific tree or a river, is a specific theophany, a specific expression of God, a face of God, a showing or an appearance of the divine. That's what that word theophany means. There are all kinds of possibilities here.

Maybe, as I alluded to earlier, it's through a skillful use in meditation of the imaginal sexual erotic, through practicing that skillfully, that the divinity of another is sensed more and more deeply and richly and beautifully. And that divinity of the other that is perceived, that starts to spread. Spread to the environment, and to the cosmos, in fact, in a very specific way, as characteristic of what was infusing the sense of the divinity and characteristic of that other with which there was the erotic, imaginal, sexual meditative practice. And then there's perhaps a very specific, and to use a certain language, a very specific perception of the world soul pervading nature, pervading matter. All kinds of possibilities here. We could just go on endlessly, almost.

But what's characteristic here is the penetrating beyond a one-dimensional, the opening up beyond a one-dimensionality of perception, opening up of a multiplicity of dimensions, sensed or intuited, perceived, discovered or created in the perception of the other, the erotic other, or in this case, nature.

So on the one hand, with all of this, and what I'm talking about, these kind of openings, there's the opening up beyond one dimensionality, the opening up of other dimensions in the perception. On the other hand, those dimensions are not separate. So there is not, in this kind of opening, a separation of divinity and matter. Or there is not a denigration of matter in relation to something transcendent and divine. Because that would be another extreme. Either it's one-dimensional or there's this kind of divide between what's divine and what's just matter.

So characteristic of the kind of openings that I'm talking about and the kind of deepenings I'm talking about in the direction of the sacred sense through both matter, but particularly eros now, is this not one-dimensional opening up dimensions and not the separating of those dimensions. So in and through and with, infused.

In the Western alchemical tradition, they talk about the alchemical task being the spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit—the spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit. Now, of course, that was interpreted and explored and practiced in different ways. But what I want to say here is that spiritualization of matter and materialization of spirit is possible through perception, through opening our perception. And that's something we can practice. That is, in fact, what I would say practice is. Spiritualization of matter, materialization of spirit, that alchemical task is possible through perception, in and through perception, as a practice, as a training of perception.

And like I said earlier, some of the manifestations, this kind of opening of these dimensions in the perception and sense of nature are very, very subtle. So, for example, Rupert the garden coordinator was telling me a little while ago he needed to get some harvesting done very quickly for some reason in the garden at Gaia House. And so he put up a note and asked anyone who wanted to help for an afternoon. And it so happened that mostly who came were women. And he showed them what to do, and they were in silence because they were on retreat, and kneeling together and harvesting. I don't remember what they were harvesting.

And he was there with them, also harvesting, and then just looking around him and seeing these women kneeling on the earth and harvesting the fruits of the earth. And it's just so beautiful, something, in that sense, and how traditional—it's the tradition of actually women kneeling on the earth and harvesting, hands touching, knees touching the earth together and the community of that, the connection of that with the earth, the tradition through history into prehistory even of that.

So there's something very subtle here—there's actually an imaginal and fantasy dimension that was infusing his perception at that moment, giving it beauty. In this case, the beauty arose from the nature of humans and also from tradition. A sense of tradition is often part of the imaginal, as a side point. The imaginal infusion of perception often amplifies time. It can give a sense of eternality—it often does give a sense of eternality—but it also amplifies something about time and tradition and the place of the self now in time as part of a trajectory of tradition.

That's quite a subtle example of this kind of enriching, complicating, fabricating and adding of other dimensions to perception.

Another example: a friend told me—I had asked her the questions I asked you at the beginning, and she hummed and hawed, as I expect anyone would—then she related something she'd heard George Monbiot say in a talk. Something to do with the fact that elephants used to roam in this part of the world and then were made extinct and driven south. But elephants used to roam and be part of the dynamics and mechanisms of evolution of many things, particularly of certain trees and the way they were able to grow in certain ways in response to the evolutionary pressure of these elephants moving around, trampling around and eating what they like to eat. There was something he was explaining about what we see now in our environment—certain trees able to grow in certain ways that actually, surprisingly, is a result of elephants being around millennia ago.

Now, that explanation or anecdote or fact could be heard in a couple of ways. One could hear and appreciate—going back to the very beginning—the intricacies and complexities of the dynamics of evolution over vast timescales. Just like, wow, all that working together, all these different forces. But one can hear it and have a sense, an idea of that as something purely material. There's a kind of very complex machine of different evolutionary forces, biological forces going on—this complex machine where different parts impact different other parts, and out of that you get the evolution of this or that, the dying away of this or that, survival of the fittest and all that, and more complex ideas of evolution. But basically it's a mechanistic understanding—incredibly intricate and complicated, involving vast timescales and encompassing a lot, including the totality of ecosystems.

So one can hear it that way, purely material and mechanistic. Or one can hear it as imbued with image and fantasy. When I asked my friend about this, she answered that something in that relation about the elephants and the evolution of certain trees, when she heard it, invoked in her—made present in the here and now perception—an imaginal sense of nature. In her very sense and perception of nature here and now, as she was looking at the trees around her, it made present, invoked those elephants and their movement somehow. It was almost like they were very subtly at the back of the perception. They were infusing the perception. And particularly, as she said, a sense of wildness and majesty. Both wildness and majesty are imaginal words, fantasy words.

There's something in this where the biological had gotten amplified and enriched and extended itself into the imaginal and fantastical. The imaginal fantasy had infused this. So the whole thing, the scene as she looked around her, the trees around her in that moment, was alive in a different way than in a purely mechanistic way. It had a kind of multi-dimensionality rather than just a mechanistically biological way. It was subtle, very subtle. Subtle infusion, but strong nevertheless. Subtle, but strong.

Actually, that was the second time I asked her those difficult questions I posed to you at the beginning and probed a little into that with her. The first time, she gave a different answer. She said that what she had heard gave her a sense of the trees fighting back against the elephants—like they have characters, she said, and like they are warriors fighting back, and I too am a warrior fighting back. And so that sense of things was infusing her sense of nature and her whole relationship with nature: I am a warrior fighting for nature. This person is very engaged in environmental activism and dharma.

That's much less subtle than the first example. It's much more obvious that that is infused with image and fantasy. So it can be very subtle, relatively unsubtle, or very, very obvious.

One yogi who often looks after the plants at Guy House was saying to the garden coordinator, "Listen to this plant, listen to this plant." And he was touched and struck by her language and the way she was relating to the plant. It opened, again for him, this sense of another dimension of perception, another dimension of beauty. And this all has something to do with dimensions of beauty that are perceivable to us. But for him, her sharing with him that way of relating opened up this sense of the beauty of other dimensions of perception, other levels and dimensions other than purely a modernist idea of materiality.

So again, that's a more obvious example or instance of the kind of thing I'm talking about.

Eros involves or ignites image and fantasy in the perception, in the sense of the other that it loves, of its object—in this case, of nature. We could say it activates image fantasy, it activates the archetypal. And because of what we said—it always wants more, the pothos in the eros—when it attains a certain degree or level or kind of connection, it will enjoy that for a while, and then it will want more, more. And in this way it opens both the psyche and the sense of the object, and those two are not really separable.

So in this wanting more, eros opens both psyche and object more deeply. This is what eros does—it's simply its nature, or at least this is my understanding of how it operates. Eros functions this way if it is not hindered, either by clinging to a certain image or by attachment to a particular logos, a certain conceptual framework that prevents its natural expansion and penetration.

This is what eros does in relation to anything, including a lover, including the Dharma. If the Dharma is something we love, if we have an erotic relationship with the Dharma, it will do the same thing to our understanding, our conception, our image of what the Dharma is—it will keep opening it, expanding it.

Eros operates this way in relation to anything it has an erotic relationship with. It will even transform our very sense of what connection is and means. What does it mean to connect? Obviously we can connect sexually, physically, but through eros the dimensions of connection themselves are being opened. The meaning of the very word "connection" expands. What's involved in the very desire of eros starts to open up through its own dynamic.

Even the idea of eros itself gets opened up through the dynamic of eros, through this pothos within it. Any definition, even a definition of eros, is a boundary. A definition forms a limit. And because eros pushes through and expands, it will push through even that definition of itself, that boundary, that limit. It will expand or transcend that definition, reaching toward other levels of meaning, other possibilities. Hence eros is undefinable, because it is divine, or infinite in this sense. There is no end because of the pothos within it.

Eros, psyche, and logos mutually inform and influence each other. They grow together, they fertilize and inseminate and impregnate each other, if you like—ad infinitum, endlessly, or rather, with endless potential.

Where there is eros, it wants to connect more. In that wanting to connect more, it discovers or creates more of the object by fertilizing the psyche and the imaginal, and sense perception itself. Then I connect with and experience a larger, expanded object—an expanded other that I love, an expanded sense of earth and nature.

Because of that expanded sense, I might say, "Perhaps it has this divine quality." I sense intuitively this divine level. And then my logos must expand with that. If I simply dismiss it—"Oh, divine is silly, that's foolish. We know now because we're modernists that there's no such thing as the divine"—then my logos has no room for that expansion, and it hinders the whole movement.

But if there is either enough force in the eros, or if I'm not too rigid—either in the image or the logos—if I'm not clinging too tightly to a certain image or logos of nature, then the logos must expand as well.

In meeting this different object, encountering and discovering these richer dimensions of what I love—in this case earth, nature—in meeting that, there is more eros. There is more to be enthralled by, more to fall in love with and connect with. More desire of the eros is present.

And this increased desire pushes again, expands, penetrates further. Other dimensions open up—both breadth and vertical depth. The logos must expand again.

So there is this infinite possibility of mutual informing, influencing, enriching, complicating—of insemination, fertilization, impregnation, growing together, expansion. Nourishment. Enrichment is a good word. Richness and beauty, different kinds of beauty, are expanded.

There is a multidimensionality that comes into the sense of the other, in this case of nature—not just material in the modernist sense.

Buddhists often talk about interconnectedness.

There's a lot of talk and emphasis in engaged Buddhism about interconnectedness. But often the idea and sense of interconnectedness is actually not vertical - it's horizontal interconnectedness that's being talked about or put forward as a really important value. And it is important, obviously.

What's really being talked about with interconnectedness is a kind of material interflow of porousness - the air that moves in and out of my body, the food, the sense of porousness and non-separation, interconnectedness at a material level, and horizontal at one level.

We talk a lot, both in ecology and in Dharma, about origins and causes. But those origins and causes of nature - this tree or this ecosystem - are regarded horizontally. They're on the same level as they exist now. In other words, material entities in the past are thought to be the origins and causes of nature now, of this thing now, this ecosystem now. Origins and causes are always thought about in the past, typically, on the same level, on the horizontal level.

So this interconnectedness is both temporal over time, from the past to the present, and also spatial. I'm connected through air and food - trees breathe and all that. This temporal and spatial interconnectedness is horizontal. There's an absence of the vertical dimension from the conversation, at least, if not from the sense.

Consider something like Joanna Macy's beautiful teachings about deep time. Sometimes you just look at your hand and see how that's evolved from - I remember doing it, but I don't remember the specifics - was it fish fins or pterodactyl wings? The important point is that the connection through time and deep time, what she calls deep time, in other words very, very long time, or what could potentially be interpreted as very long time in a mechanism of evolution - that this hand is somehow connected with all those other material instantiations of biology.

That's one way of relating to and hearing that kind of teaching. But compare that with a sense of this material thing - whether it's my hand or a tree or nature or environment - as something that echoes. Rather than horizontally, what about saying it echoes or is an image of the divine? I see and perceive and sense echoes and images of the divine, or what I love, in this object, in nature. Nature as echo or image, expression of the divine.

That has a more vertical sense to it. The material reflects, as I said, or expresses divine dimensions. Some people might use the language of the source or the root. Being in divinity or in divinities or archetypes or divine images, the source of this nature, so to speak, is in the divine or in some divine image.

Now that use of the word "source" is not, absolutely not, A) an explanation, and B) temporal. When I say this tree or nature has its source in the divine, its roots in the divine, its feet in the divine, as some people say in some traditions, that's not an explanation. It's not something like we used to think - God created the earth at time zero. It's not temporal and it's not explanation.

Rather, it's a way of seeing. It's a poetic sense, a poetic sensibility. The more the eros is allowed to do its work and to have its dynamic, that way of sensing things, that way of looking at things, that poetic sensibility will open up. It will come from the eros and bring with it more and more soulfulness, infusing the psyche and infusing the sense of the object, the world, nature.

So infinite possibilities here - infinite possibilities of discovery and creation, both. It's open.

Sometimes the sense of horizontal interconnectedness, as much as Buddhists, and particularly engaged Buddhists, tend to emphasize it - sometimes people talk about that, have a sense of it a lot, and sometimes it's not enough. Either not enough for the psyche and the fullness and richness of what the psyche really wants, or not enough to support and stimulate or catalyze engagement.

CHAPTER 26

An Ecology of Love (Part 1 - Introduction)

Rob Burbea · 51 min

In this opening talk of his series "An Ecology of Love," Rob Burbea poses challenging questions about what we truly mean when we express love for nature and the Earth. He explores how our views (diṭṭhi) shape and constrain our capacity for love, distinguishing between mettā (loving-kindness) as universal well-wishing and eros as the desire to connect. Burbea examines the apparent absence of sacredness in contemporary environmental discourse, suggesting that climate change and ecological crises are fundamentally crises of values rooted in our perceptions and worldviews. He introduces the concept that all phenomena, including nature, are empty of independent existence and can be viewed in multiple ways through different practices of looking. This talk establishes the foundation for understanding how cultivating sacred perception of the natural world might transform both our love and our environmental engagement, arguing that we need not just rational solutions but a fundamental shift in how we perceive and feel about the cosmos.

I'd like to begin by asking you a couple of questions. I am well aware that these are not easy questions to answer, so it's perhaps a little unfair of me, perhaps a little naughty. But I'm asking them to probe into an aspect and dimension of our lives and also of our relationship with the world and with nature that often doesn't get probed into and opened up. Hopefully there's something in these questions, despite their difficulty, that can begin to probe and open up an inquiry and a conversation at a certain level and in certain directions.

So here are the questions. If, as I hope you do, you say or think or feel "I love the earth, I love nature"—if you say or feel or think that—what do you mean exactly? I love nature. I love the earth. You may not have articulated that, but if you feel that, what do you mean exactly? In other words, what is it that you love?

I don't mean give me a list of specific trees—"I love that big turkey oak at the front of Gaia House" or "I love this particular stretch of beach, this place, this whatever it is." I don't mean that. I mean, what is it about the earth or nature that you love? And what do you even mean when you say or feel or think "earth," "the earth," or "nature"?

I said these are not easy questions, kind of awkward and a little bit unfair. Very difficult to answer, very difficult to probe in that direction. What is it you love, and what do you mean, what do we mean when we say earth, nature? Just take a little time right now to see what comes for you with that, to probe a little. What do you mean?

It's not easy, these questions, but just see what comes up and how you would frame it, how you would articulate that for yourself. I'm actually extremely interested to hear everyone's answer, but obviously that's not possible, and for the sake of time I should have given you more time.

Let me add to those questions. Did beauty have something to do with your answer, with what you love? And if so, what exactly do you mean by beauty? Do you mean pretty sights, nice colors and arrangement of colors in a nice sunset or sunrise? Do you mean pleasant sounds, pleasant sweet melodies of birds, pleasant sense experiences? Is that what you mean by beauty?

Again, I'm not being very fair here, but I want to open something up through the questioning, so just bear with this. So is it pleasant sense experiences? Pretty sights, pretty sounds, and so on. Pretty touch of the breeze on the cheek or whatever. Nice fragrances of flowers.

Is it wonder? Is that part of what you know? Is there wonder at the biology of it all, the intricacy of the biology of nature, the diversity of that biology, the mechanisms of its evolution, the staggering complexity of that? Is there wonder at all of that? Is that part of what you love? Part of even what we mean by earth and nature?

Wonder also perhaps at the dynamics of either self-regulating ecosystems or evolving ecosystems. So wonder at that intricacy and the dynamics of that. Do you love and do you mean by nature, and wonder at, the fact of the interconnectedness of all these biological processes? The fact of the interconnectedness of all these biological processes—is that part of it?

Is it a love of the support that you recognize that the earth's biological processes, the biological processes of nature provide for you, for us? The sustenance, the matrix—from mater, mother—Mother Earth, the matrix of support provided by the total intricate net of biological processes.

Does your answer to these difficult questions involve amazement and wonder? I imagine it does. It may do. There's no right and wrong here. Again, just probing.

And if it includes an appreciation of the support that the earth's biological processes provide, does it also include an acknowledgment of the danger and potential harms of that very totality of biological processes, the power of nature in very different ways to harm and cause danger for us and for other beings?

Is it all of these?

These little half-answers I've given. So whatever it is you articulated in response to those difficult questions—what do you love? What is earth? What is nature?—I wonder if now you can step back from your articulation, from whatever you formulated as an answer, and kind of hear it, hear your own answer, but not so much from inside it, almost as if you're hearing it afresh and just sort of appraising that answer, if that's possible, to the extent that that's possible.

Because what I really want to ask in all this is: if you can hear that statement, so to speak, more from the outside, not being wrapped up in it, is there something missing from whatever you articulated, from the statement that you articulated to yourself about your love and about what nature is? Is there something missing? Has your answer captured completely what it is you love and what the earth and nature is? Or is there something missing from what you articulated?

You know, love always, and in many ways, involves view. And by view I mean an idea of something, an intellectual idea, whether it's conscious or not, articulated or not, verbal or not, and also the perception, the view, the way of looking, the sense of something. Love always involves view of what we love. In other words, when I love, I'm looking at something in a certain way, and when I look at something in a certain way, it's part of my love and it affects my love.

Love always involves view. This is a big part of what I want to talk about today. Always and in many ways. And we can view things in many ways. Other views are possible, other ways of looking are possible. So these questions I ask you have to do with love and to do with view, which always go together in complex ways, as I want to kind of elaborate on and expand.

But if I come back to this question, is there something missing from whatever you articulated in response to those kind of unfair questions about your love of the earth and love of nature? Was sacredness, a sense of sacredness, a part of what you articulated? The sacredness of the earth, the sacredness of nature. Was that a part of your articulation? Is that a part of what you love? Is that somehow an integral aspect of your love and of your sense of what nature is and what earth is?

Sacred is a difficult word these days, as I'm going to go into a little bit. But really, there are many, actually infinite possible kinds of experience of sacredness for us as human beings. Infinite. There's no end to the variety of the sense of sacredness, the perceptions of sacredness, the kinds of sacredness that we can feel and sense. So I certainly don't mean to prescribe any kind of particular sense of sacredness or idea of sacredness at all.

Sometimes the sense of sacredness is what would obviously be heard and appraised by someone else as sacred—perhaps nature as a face of the divine, an expression of the divine, something angelic, what's called a theophany, an appearance of the divine, a face of the divine, something as obvious as that. Maybe it really includes, for Dharma practice, a sense of the emptiness of nature. I'm going to come back to all this. Or maybe much less obvious than such sort of blatantly sacred kind of language.

So no prescription, but is sacredness a part of your love, a part of your sense and view of what earth and nature is? And then, if sacredness is part of it for you, do you voice it? Do you voice that sense of sacredness in your activism, in your engagement with environmental issues and engaged dharma? Do you voice it and how do you voice it? If you do, is the sacredness part of it, or is it there but it's somehow not something that comes out in your expression, in your voice? These are the kind of things I want to go into.

In modernist culture, if you like, the culture that we live in these days in the West, what I call the culture of modernism as the dominant view and way of understanding and thinking and feeling things—in modernist culture, this is dominated by what we could call secular humanism, or actually maybe more comprehensive, more accurate to say, it's increasingly dominated or characterized by a seeming abyss between secular humanism and narrow religious fundamentalism.

That's characteristic of modernist culture these days, and you need only read the news, the kind of debates that go on, or really don't go on, because there is an abyss there. Conversations are not being had across this kind of abyss between secular humanism and narrow religious fundamentalism, which sometimes have a lot more in common with each other as poles, polarities, than either end of that polarity would like to admit.

But in this culture, dominated by secular humanism, by this kind of abyss between secular humanism and narrow religious fundamentalism, there seems very little appeal in the discourse around climate change or environmental crises that we face, very little appeal in the discourse to a sense of nature and the cosmos as sacred. It seems to me. And even from religious institutions and traditions or spiritual institutions and traditions, very little, very cautious or minor in relation to other points. They might make points about political equality and caring for the poor, all of which is hugely important. But this aspect of sacredness seems shrunk or exiled from the discourse, cut out.

Is it taboo? Are we afraid that it will be mocked, dismissed, regarded as irrelevant? Do we regard it as irrelevant? Have we lost over the centuries the vocabulary of holiness, of sacredness, and of invoking that? Have we even lost—not everyone obviously, but as a culture, what's pervasive in the culture—have we lost even the perspective and the sense of sacredness? Has it gone from our view, from our sense of the world?

Historically, of course, there came at some point following the Enlightenment, the Western Enlightenment, and the gradual, slow separation of church and state. This was a very good thing, taking away power from sometimes corrupt institutions. The separation of church and state—a very helpful development that occurred in Western history. But with it also, perhaps, came a separation of not just the institutions of church and state, but a separation of the sense of sacredness from economic, political, and public discourse.

That's a huge generalization, I know. And in some areas of the West, that's definitely not the case. But as a generalization, the sense of sacredness, if it was there at all, if it was left at all, if it didn't dwindle and wasn't eroded completely, became something private and personal, separate from the public discourse on economics, politics, and civil life.

Just recently, Jeb Bush—younger brother of George W. and son of elder George, both ex-presidents, and I think governor of Florida who tends to run for the Republican presidential nomination—said, "I don't get my economic policy from my bishop, cardinal, or pope." He said this in response to comments by the Pope about the obligations of Catholics and politicians regarding the environment and climate. But there's this separation. He is a Catholic, yet even for him, there's a dividing of economics and politics from whatever he might consider or sense as sacred in his life.

In this eroding and denigrating, this exiling or dismissing of the sense of the sacred that has happened over centuries in the West, a void has been created. Where there was sacredness, there is now an absence. And of course, things either rush in or get thrust into that void to try and fill it.

One of those things is love—particularly romantic love. The rise in Western consciousness of the primacy and importance and kind of hype around romantic love has become a secular god for us over the last 150 years or so. Humans must love in one way or another. We must love. But what I partly want to explore today is how our love is constrained, constricted.

We talk a lot about love—we're somewhat obsessed by it, especially romantic love or family love and loving your children. But is our love and our very notion of love and the possibilities of our love constrained in different ways?

Even in relation to climate change, there is—starting in the last few years—this campaign asking people to express and share photos of what they love that is threatened by climate change and environmental degradation. There's something very lovely in that, because instead of just critiquing, instead of the rage and anger and negativity that can so much enter the discourse around climate change and environment, it's good to include and emphasize emotions, particularly the positive emotions of love.

But then you get people writing in saying, "I love chocolate." Chocolate is actually threatened by climate change because of what the cocoa plant needs to grow and the ecosystems it requires. "I love chocolate. I love chocolate. I love chocolate." What's happened here? I mean, I actually do like chocolate. But what's happened in this absence of the sacred, the hype of love, the movement of that into the discourse? There's still the absence, it seems to me, of the discourse of sacredness, of the view and sense of sacredness.

Even writers like George Monbiot, who I have huge appreciation for and whose work I very much enjoy, seem not to include that dimension—the sense of sacredness—in the discourse, in the conversation. I don't know if it's shyness, as I said, or a fear of judgment, or if it's just not there.

So partly what I want to do is open up this question of the sacred and the sense of the sacred, the perception and idea of the sacred. Is it possible to reintroduce it into the whole picture? And also, if it's already there for you...

What can be done to support the courage—and it does take courage—to invoke it and to voice it in one's activism, in what one expresses in the world to others in society about climate change and about the environmental crises that we face? To voice it as part of the whole way of seeing and sensing nature?

Because if our love—and that could be love for anything; we're talking about nature and earth now—if our love is constrained by our view, by certain ideas or conceptual frameworks or just the sense that we have of things, then that has consequences. It has all kinds of consequences. That constraining of love by view has consequences, will create absences or voids in our love and in our actions.

Particularly what I want to get into and explain as we go on is this: if love is constrained by view, then what I'm going to call the erotic element and the vertical element—I will explain these—will be missing from our love and our view. The erotic and the vertical dimensions will be missing from our love and from our sense of what we love, in this case earth, nature. And that has consequences. That will have consequences.

The novelist Jonathan Franzen, in a Guardian article I read earlier this year, wrote that climate change has achieved what none of the madnesses of the twentieth century could: the final defeat of human reason. He writes that "the great hope of the Western Enlightenment—the hope that human rationality would enable us to transcend our evolutionary limitations—has taken a beating from wars and genocides, but only now, on the problem of climate change, has it foundered altogether."

So we can hope to address environmental and climate change issues rationally and hope that we can be smart enough technologically to figure it out. But as he implies there, the limits of human rationality apply to something like this when it's applied alone. Do we not need to perceive and feel differently? Not just to think differently and figure something clever out in terms of solutions—of course that's important—but do we not need to perceive and feel differently? Perceive the world, earth, nature, self and others. Perceive and feel them differently, all of that.

Is there not a need for us to re-enchant the cosmos? The cosmos that has become, over the centuries, lost its enchantment for us. It's become dis-enchanted. We live in a flat cosmos, as I'll go into in more detail as we go on. Is there not a problem with our worldview, our Weltanschauung, our seeing of the world?

So in this talk, as I said, I want to talk about the interaction of love and view and how view might limit or open love and also vice versa. The interaction of love and view and what that does, either by limiting or opening.

The political aspects or dimensions of the conversation around climate and environment, the economic, the scientific aspect—of course, obviously important, crucially important. But really, in this talk, I want to address another level of the whole thing, come at things from another angle. What I see as an important piece of the whole, a necessary piece of the whole conversation, the whole opening up that needs to happen.

Because climate change and environmental crisis—they're not just crises of technology, crises of politics or capitalism or economic systems. Climate change and the environmental crises, multiple environmental crises we face, are crises of values. Crises of values.

And values are rooted in what? Where do we get values from? We have a crisis in our values. And values are rooted in what? Well, actually, that's a complex question, but part of what values are rooted in are views, beliefs, perceptions, sensibilities. Of course, values influence these things, so again, it's mutually feeding. And there may be, too, something about heart capacities and just what we're capable of letting ourselves value, for fear of the stretching of the heart that's involved there and the depth of grief and emotion that are involved.

But for now, what I really want to emphasize is the rooting of values, the conditioning of values by views, beliefs, perceptions, sensibilities.

Before I get into all this, just to say something or stress something about—to put this talk in a context and say a couple of things about that. Firstly, my agenda, if you like, or my intention for the talk is hopefully to open up a range of possibilities generally and in all directions. To sort of hopefully plant seeds, maybe just scatter seeds in terms of views, ideas, communications, the inflow and the outflow of activism, what flows into our activism and our engagement with these issues and what flows out of that. That's my agenda, is really to open that up more and more generally and in all directions.

So I'm interested in the plurality of ways of doing that. I'm not interested in just saying this is the one thing that's important at all. I'm very interested in different approaches, different directions and different tones too and different styles of communication. There is a place, I think, for criticism and stridency, even rage. There's a place for cool analysis and poetry and all of that. But within all that—so that's my agenda, opening that up in multiple directions, and this talk is part of that—but you have to find, as a listener, you have to find what you personally resonate with, and that's up to you. That's the scattering seeds—they grow where they will, and that's completely fine.

So that's what's important, is that you resonate with what resonates for you personally. Now you will hear that I have a leaning and a personal preference in all this, and particularly in what I'm talking about today. But that's not my agenda. I don't want to thrust that on anyone, and certainly not in any particular form. I could not—it would be futile of me to pretend that I don't have a leaning and a personal preference and to try and keep that out from the way I express things and what comes into the talk.

I can't help... I lean towards the mystical. I lean towards the sacred. I lean towards a sense of radical emptiness and what that opens up in the possibility of perception—the sacredness and the mystical sense of things that this brings. So that's my personal preference and leaning. I'm just freely admitting that. But it's different than my agenda. Hopefully, if you do hear that leaning and my personal preference, you won't confuse that with my agenda, which is actually just this opening up.

Because there's a second question or statement to the context here of a talk like this: What do you need in regard to your activism and your engagement? What does your heart and soul need?

It's interesting, knowing activists. Some long-term activists can get kind of hardened, embittered through the course of years of activism. Maybe what's needed is for them to reconnect with the heart—with their heart, with the love that was the origin of their activism. Some of them actually need not to reconnect, but to connect in the first place. They never... Somehow the heart was not something that was opened enough or received enough attention or healing in the first place. So that might be a need in the whole conversation around activism and engagement—what you need.

Some activists need what we could call emotional skills or the skills of working with, navigating the heart's responses to the tragedies that we face and the disasters that are unfolding—the pain and suffering of all that. The emotional skills, the meditative tools to work well with what that does in the heart and the heart's responses to all that. This includes learning skillful responses, how to address burnout in activism. That's part of it—both addressing it in the heart and mind and body, and also just practically in how one is approaching activism.

Some activists need courage. They need encouragement to communicate what they love, or they need to learn the skills to communicate love, so that the love they feel can pour through their communication, their activism.

There are many, many aspects of activism and places where we are at different times in terms of what we actually need. So again, this talk just fits into one... It's one piece in a much bigger pie, if you like. One slice of a pie, one level, as I said—one tack, one approach.

What I want to do is open up and explore our perception, our view, our sense of Earth, nature—and particularly nature, of the sacredness of that, or the possible view, sense, perception of the sacredness of earth and nature. And also open up and explore our ideas, views, perceptions, senses of what love is.

So what is involved in love? That word "involve"—related to "revolve" and "revolution" from Latin. Like what turns in the field of love? What are the elements that mix together and turn together and fertilize and interact within love? Within love, so to speak, that either grows that love or takes it in different directions or opens it in a certain way or colors it or limits it? What is involved in love?

That's part of the original difficult questions I asked you: What is it about nature that you love, and what do you mean by nature?

So exploring in this talk love of nature as a basis for our activism. We're talking about an ecology of love—love of nature as a basis for action and also as a basis for ecology, for understanding or our idea of what nature is. That the love of nature becomes part of the idea, must influence the idea of what nature is. So love of nature is a basis for activism and ecology, and also this exploring love and how it works. In other words, the psychological and spiritual ecology of love—the study of the dynamics of love, the inner and outer dynamics of love, mostly the inner today. Actually, both.

So in the title, "An Ecology of Love," you can hear there's a double meaning. Just to confess, I seem to like putting double or even triple meanings in titles to try and get the most meaning and most expression out of limited time, limited words.

Let's go into this.

This poor word "love"—four-letter word—has become so stretched and has been made to try and do so much work in so many different directions and dimensions, and more and more so in recent centuries. But let's just start with a statement and say love, the word "love," is undefinable. I mean, ultimately, it's undefinable. And admit that.

But nevertheless, although it's undefinable, we could just shrug and walk away from exploring it. It's still explorable, and there are still aspects or dynamics and dimensions of love, or ways of thinking about it and breaking it up that can still be very fruitful in our lives and our expressions—fruitful for the psyche, for the soul, for our being. So we can say many, many things despite the undefinability of love.

But right now, let's say a few things. Firstly, and especially for this talk, what I want to emphasize is when we say love, I want to include two aspects or currents or kinds of love.

One is metta. So many of you will know this Pali word, M-E-T-T-A. It's usually translated as loving-kindness. And...

Both metta and eros always involve a view—by which I mean an idea and sense, both conscious and unconscious, verbal and non-verbal, articulated or not—they always involve the view of both self and other. This view is intrinsic to metta and to eros, intrinsic to love, as I was saying earlier.

Now, one of the things that's absolutely crucial and vital to understand about views is that they're not fixed. They change. Our views change, and hopefully they do.

And more than that—they're fabricated. Views are fabricated. They're constructed. This doesn't mean they're false or that we should dismiss them. What it means is that they're malleable, they're workable. We can work with our views. We have some agency, some choice in our views of self and other.

This is enormously important to understand because it means that love—both metta and eros—can be cultivated, can be developed, can be refined. We're not stuck with whatever limited or constricted views we might have inherited or fallen into. We can expand them, deepen them, make them more beautiful.

The views we hold of ourselves and others directly shape the quality and possibility of our love. If I hold a very narrow, constricted view of who you are—seeing you only through the lens of your usefulness to me, or your appearance, or some single characteristic—then my love for you will be correspondingly narrow. But if I can expand my view, if I can see more of who you are in your fullness, in your mystery, in your infinite depths, then my love can expand accordingly.

This is true for metta and for eros both, though in different ways. With metta, as the view expands, the well-wishing can become more genuine, more heartfelt, less conditional. With eros, as the view expands, the desire to connect can become richer, more soulful, reaching toward ever greater intimacy with the full being of the other.

Our views can change. We need only look around and see how culturally views transform. Of course we can fix views, but looking around culturally, what I mean to say is views don't have to be fixed. They tend, at times, to get fixed, and they tend also to change. But culturally, if we look around us, views change. It's obvious—from culture to culture, from one society's period to another period in the same society.

So in relation to nature, the view of nature, the view of Earth, has changed, just culturally. This is from Adam Karn, also from a Guardian article. Over the course of millennia, he writes, "the way that people have imagined and perceived the natural world has changed repeatedly and often dramatically. The concept of 'nature' is subjective, dynamic, and culturally constrained"—because it's culturally conditioned, you could say.

The classic example is smallholder agriculture. What was once, many thousands of years ago, considered the height of mastery over nature is now an archetypal image of humans living in harmony with their environment. The view of nature changes culturally. It changes. Just to put a tag here on words in what he wrote—noticing "imagined" and "perceived," because that's a lot of what I want to go into. The imagination is part of perception, and also the use of the word "archetypal." I'm going to come back to these things.

So views are not necessarily fixed. They change through and in the culture. They have changed. Views of nature have changed many times, and they will again. They will again, culturally.

So they change culturally, but also as a Dharma practitioner, it's really important to recognize how views are dependent basically on facets of the citta, facets of the mind and the heart—dependent on the mind state, dependent on practicing different ways of looking, actually practicing a different view. And the sense that I have of something, whether it's the world, nature, the cosmos, the self, the other—that sense changes dependent on facets of the citta, dependent on different ways of looking. And that's something we can practice.

So in other words, the things that we perceive, including nature, including earth, are empty of any real independent way that they are. When you really go into this question of view, you realize it's not that things are a particular way, nature is a particular way. It's that all we have is views, and those views are dependent arisings. We can view in different ways, as I said before.

So all things, including nature, including earth, are empty—empty of any kind of real independent way they are, independent of the way that we look at them. And therefore, because they're empty, they can be viewed in different ways. And that's one way of understanding what practice is. It's not a very common way of understanding what meditative practice is and what the path is, but it's, I think, a very fruitful way of looking. Meditation, practice, the journey of awakening—it's practicing skill in different views and seeing what that does.

As we just said, the view of anything, in this case of nature or earth, view is a dependent arising—dependent on what's dominant in the culture, what we absorb from the culture, dependent also on the so-called inner mindset and factors of the mind and the heart and the way of looking. So view arises dependently and also is itself part of dependent origination. It conditions other things. Other things are dependent on view. In other words, it brings consequences. Any view that we have has certain consequences, and one of the consequences I mentioned before is its consequences on love. Views will affect love. They will cause love to deepen or grow in certain ways, or they will limit it, constrict it in certain ways.

So love and view have this mutual reciprocity, mutual informing, mutual influencing, mutual dependency—mutual dependency of love and view. Really, I hope you can hear that this is not abstract. I hope that as we go on in the talk, you can really understand how totally crucial this is and how totally I'm talking about experience and I'm talking about our life and what comes out of our life and how we sense our life.

CHAPTER 27

Mindfulness and Myth

Rob Burbea · 1h19

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the flexible spectrum between prioritizing beauty, sacredness, and soul-making versus personal healing and freedom from suffering. He critiques the prevalent realisms in contemporary Buddhist culture, from secular Buddhism's existential claims to the physicalist assumptions underlying modern mindfulness teachings.
>
> Burbea argues for a radical re-grounding of dharma practice based on deep emptiness understanding, where all perceptions and concepts - including dharma teachings themselves - are seen as fabricated ways of looking rather than ultimate truths. He challenges the notion that mindfulness reveals 'life as it presents itself,' demonstrating how such phrases carry hidden metaphysical assumptions about independent reality.
>
> This teaching serves as a foundation for re-enchanting practice, advocating for a non-realist approach that legitimizes imaginative and poetic sensibilities while maintaining rigorous philosophical inquiry. Burbea encourages practitioners to listen structurally for new ideas that don't fit existing conceptual boxes, opening possibilities for a more artistically creative and spiritually fertile approach to the path.

In case it wasn't obvious, I want to clarify something about what we were discussing earlier regarding what I was calling a spectrum of priorities in one's conception, attitude, orientation, and intention for the path—the aim and goal of practice. On one hand, this spectrum encompasses whether beauty and sacredness and soul-making are genuinely at the forefront, or on the other hand, whether the priority is freedom, healing, and so forth for the self.

Just to make clear something I was assuming: where a person is on that spectrum at any time will vary depending on all kinds of conditions. It's not a static thing. Sometimes, even if generally speaking the priority is opening and deepening and widening the sense of sacredness, there will of course arise moments and times and situations in our life where what we really need is some relief from suffering—some insight or approach or cultivation that opens up a situation from the contraction we've put around it. So it's flexible, it moves, not just in long periods over time, but even within a day, probably quite a few times.

Let me say a little more about these themes—the why themes, why offer a retreat like this, and the context and bases. As I said, these are interwoven themes. I want to preface all this with what you might call an admission. Someone or other said something like: all philosophies that anyone would state are actually confessions. They're personal confessions, and I certainly recognize that if I'm offering a set of teachings or an orientation or a larger conceptual framework, implicit in that is revealing my own orientation, inclination, where I've arrived at, but also my predisposition.

In terms of the context of these teachings and the emphases we'll be supporting in practice over the week, partly this retreat, these teachings, these ideas, these practices, are a response to the situation around us—not just the global environmental situation, but also the situation of ideas in the wider culture, and in Dharma culture, spiritual cultures, and psychological cultures.

It's partly a response to dominant paradigms that often go unquestioned, which is partly why they become what happens to a dominant paradigm. A paradigm might arise first, for example, with the Western Enlightenment and the scientific revolution as a question. But over time, that paradigm itself—all those perspectives and views and philosophies—becomes entrenched, dogmatized, unquestioned, second nature. So it's partly a response to what's become encrusted and solidified in the wider culture and also in spiritual cultures—what has become prevalent and goes often unquestioned and is simply taken as truth.

Within that there are different aspects, and one is that I turn and see realism everywhere—different kinds of realism everywhere, whether in terms of religious realism or naive religious fundamentalism, or secular realism, including the realism that is at the unavoidable basis of secular Buddhism, or the kind of realism that permeates most understanding of dependent origination in terms of process and real events, real aggregates, real moments happening in time—all the realisms that underpin and run through a lot of psychology nowadays, across the whole spectrum of psychology, whether cognitive behavioral or psychodynamic or whatever. It's rare for approaches, whether psychological or spiritual, to not be based on a kind of realism.

A lot of the work in psychology is wonderful, and there's a lot of work on ego psychology that's great, but there's a realism underlying that. It's quite different to have a non-realist basis—to have emptiness as something basic to the path, meaning an understanding of emptiness forming the basis of the path. And even more than that, to entertain this idea, this conception, that fantasy and image is primary. Included in fantasy and image are conceptual frameworks and ideas, and all of this is primary in constituting, fabricating, creating what we then experience and perceive and move in, rather than our experience being some kind of independently existing reality or the ideas we have being somehow real and true.

These non-realist ideas are really quite rare and radical in a world where realisms of different kinds are rampant. And even more, very often people might hear about a non-realist basis, but it's actually very hard to stay in it. So it's like, "Yes, that's right, great, okay, I get it." But so often then, whether we're talking in the realm of psychology or psychotherapy or dharma or other spiritualities, unwittingly there's a reintroduction of some kind of realism. Something or other gets reified, made real, assumed to be real, and often without even recognizing it. So even though there might be some enthusiasm for this idea of a non-realist, non-truth-claiming, truth-grasping basis for things, it's actually quite rare and difficult for a person to actually abide in that place deeply.

Picking up one area of all that, I find myself, along with others perhaps, responding to what someone coined the phrase "aggressive secularism." You see that in public figures like Richard Dawkins and others, but also within the Dharma there's a kind of aggressive secularism that comes from certain voices and positions within the Dharma. Because of the aggression there and the dominance of that force and the way it takes hold in people's consciousness and takes hold of people's consciousness, it seems to demand a response to balance it, to open things out.

That kind of aggressive secularism actually seems to me to be very much akin to—actually a form of—religious fundamentalism. Obviously, secularists and secular Buddhists conceive of themselves as completely opposite to religious fundamentalists, but there are ways in which sometimes these two positions are remarkably similar.

like camps, are really very similar.

So one is in relation to the word religious, and I've talked about this elsewhere, I'm not going to say too much about it now, but one of the things that's characteristic of, if you like, a religious outlook, a religious mindset and attitude, in contradistinction to, say, an artistic one or a scientific one, is that the authority is sought and placed and assumed to be in the past.

So, again, you see this in secular Buddhism with the sort of emphasis on the Pali canon teachings and a sort of claim of historical, you know, objective historical accuracy there. But in a way there's something religious about that backwards placing, or that placing of authority in the past, that assumption of authority in the past, as opposed to an opening out into the future that's characteristic of art and science in different ways.

But secondly, with regards to the word fundamentalism, there's a kind of fundament, a basis, a ground, again, in realism, in a notion of truth. And in secular outlooks or approaches, that truth that goes unquestioned forms a fundament and a fundamentalism—an unquestioned, unquestionable assumption or basis for everything. All the rest of the teachings are based on this assumption of truth. That's a kind of existentialist truth. This is our existential predicament. This is what it is. This is undeniable fact of the facts of our existence.

And wrapped up in that is usually what's called philosophical physicalism or materialism, the assumption that, as we've talked about before, matter is primary, matter is the only reality, things, consciousness, etc., human beings, apparent selves, emerge out of matter—out of the complex organization of matter over time and evolution. But essentially what's real is the physical as conceived according to classical mechanical science and Newtonian science, etc. These existential and physicalist truths form a fundamentalism. These are unquestioned. They are the bedrock of this.

And together with this backwards authority, this religious attitude, there is a kind of religious fundamentalism. And in some instances, it mirrors, replicates the kind of militant religious fundamentalism that we see around the world today. Because we actually hear this, or witness, a kind of wish to expel or stamp out views that don't fall into that mold—opposite views, opposite sensibilities. And to me, that's questionable. That's really not okay. What's going on there? That's very characteristic of notions of heresy and all kinds of abuse that we've seen in history taking place under the auspices and the aegis of religion, now taking place under the auspices of secularism.

So I would much prefer a plurality, a real range of attitudes and approaches and sensibilities, because there's a range in where human beings are, what they need. And there's a range in souls and what resonates and what is soul-making for different souls. And so for me, it's very important to keep that range and that plurality and resist any idea of stamping out this or that teaching or expelling it.

And I hate to have to share this with you, but if you know, if you're behind the scenes with the politics of retreat centers and that kind of thing, not just here, but around the world, there's probably more of this that goes on than you guys might be happy to hear about. So, you know, can there be, rather than that, a plurality and openness, recognizing the diversity and the diverse needs of souls and perspectives and sensibilities there?

So I also talked about realisms in psychology and psychotherapies and the assumptions there. I think we will, both Catherine and I, return to that whole area repeatedly as the retreat goes on because it asks of us all, I think, today, quite a lot of sensitivity and we want to present a kind of balanced view of all that. So we'll return to that, this whole question of realism in psychology later.

Again, part of this idea of these teachings or this thrust of teachings, this direction, this opening of these teachings is as a response, partly as a response to what we could call disenchantment. So the emphasis on re-enchantment is, if you like, in response to disenchantment.

Disenchantment itself is a word that means different things to different people. It's defined in different ways and there are different kinds of disenchantment. But one kind of disenchantment, I would argue, actually runs through the Pali Canon, because the Pali Canon actually presents a transcendent thrust in its teaching. The movement there is not to be reborn in this world, that's their final goal. There's a kind of, of course, turn away from sensuality with that, turn away from this world as anything that's really that deeply attractive or sacred.

Nowadays, a reading of the Pali Canon is really not very popular because the whole area of the transcendent, also because of secular takes, is out of bounds. So we're left with nothing but this world. So there is a kind of movement to somehow twist, if you like, the message of the Pali Canon into some kind of life affirming or world affirming or sensuality affirming teaching, which actually it's pretty hard to do if you're really openly reading the Pali Canon. It's hard to justify that kind of reading. But that's become, if you like, the prevalent reading in a lot of circles.

So there is a kind of strange tension between disenchantment of a certain kind and enchantment that runs through the Dharma. But even more than that, in the wider culture, which obviously knows nothing about the Pali Canon or is not really exposed to the Pali canon, there's a kind of disenchantment of modernism. Disenchantment was actually a phrase that was first used, I think, by Max Weber, the sociologist, a hundred years ago even, perhaps.

And what does that mean? What's the disenchantment? Partly it's this flatness—the assumption of a one-dimensional cosmos, purely matter, purely meaningless matter, random atoms ricocheting off each other, coming into combination through their physical forces and happening to build stuff for a time that can be quite complex and quite amazing, but then that just dissolves. Nothing but this flatness, this one-dimensionality.

There's a disenchanting that took place as that became the dominant way of not just conceiving but perceiving the world over some centuries after the Western Enlightenment and the Scientific Revolution, replacing the more sanctifying views of the cosmos that existed in the Middle Ages and other parts of the world. But there's also a kind of disenchantment that comes with secular humanism regarding what the human being is and what the human being isn't—we'll return to this later—and with scientific materialism.

There's a response to the disenchantment that is pervasive now. It's become so much the norm that most people wouldn't even recognize that they're living in a disenchanted universe because they have no recollection of an enchanted universe. But it's important to say that we're not anti-science here. I have a deep interest in science, especially physics and modern physics as much as I can understand it. There's a difference between being anti-science and what needs to get challenged, which is scientism—this creeping outward, overstepping of the boundaries of what science, or what people believe that science, can legitimately explain and take within its purview.

What started in the scientific revolution as really a mode of approaching, a way of thinking, a way of approaching experimental data and a sort of scientific method, slowly over time became an unquestioned truth that there is nothing more than what can be explained by scientific materialism. These became actual realities and truths that will eventually be able to encompass and explain the whole of existence, the whole of our experience. So it's this scientism that actually is part of a kind of disenchantment, although again we can call it a kind of cultural enchantment, of which scientism is one example.

The context of this retreat is partly in response to this creep of scientism. And in Dharma culture—though it's not really only Dharma culture, but wider than that in the culture of psychological growth and healing modalities, the medical model—mindfulness is often presented with what I would call an underlying metaphysics of disenchantment, an underlying metaphysics of non-enchantment in the way that we're using it. Either because it's presented more and more rarely these days in the sort of classical Pali canon thrust of disenchantment toward transcendence, or there's a kind of limited enchantment in the more popular versions of the way insight meditation or mindfulness is taught.

For example, what gets enchanted is the whole idea of the moment and living in the now, or nature to a certain extent. Within those enchantments, why they are limited is because they are often actually assuming a flat cosmos. There's also the assumption of realism wrapped up in that. So the moment is real, this experience is real, these atomic units of perception or consciousness or factors of mind are real, time is real. Also, the kind of physicalism that's the one-dimensionality of the view of nature. It's all based on a kind of flat cosmos assumed to be real, from a realist conceptual framework.

Part of the response and part of the contrast I want to draw out is what happens when we take emptiness as a radical basis for our path—an understanding of emptiness as a radical basis. This is so crucial and so seemingly hard for people to really grasp: what it really implies to do that, what's really involved in that, and why it's such a radically different basis and approach to the Dharma. Radical actually means, from the word radix, which means root. So the whole root, the whole basis is really different.

The idea of the possibility of placing ways of looking—the notion of different ways of looking and the different possible ways of looking, all the different possible ways of looking and the notion of the exploration of the fabrication of perception—these two interrelated notions, putting them really central, really integral to the whole unfolding of the path right from the beginning. And what is it then to have a non-realist assumption? We're not dealing with any concept that we have, any perception that we have, anything that we think we arrive at as real or truth.

Practice then becomes, in all that or with all that as a basis, the exercise of flexibly entertaining different ways of looking—a whole range of skillful ways of looking, which includes conceptual framing. So a conceptual framework or an idea is part of a way of looking, and some of these are very, very subtle, and some of them are broader, grander, more built up. But this whole flexibly entertaining and trying out different ways of looking is to see their effects on freedom, their effects on the heart, on the perception, on the sense of beauty, on sense of meaning, on soul-making. All of this we can experiment and play with because there is this flexibility. Because things are empty, we are free. All there is is ways of looking and we are free to engage different ways of looking.

So this whole idea of ways of looking, the fabrication of perception, forms both the starting working basis of a path and also the end. The deeper and deeper we go, you see, all we're left with is ways of looking. Ways of looking are empty too. But there's something that legitimizes it right from the beginning. And this, as I said, is radical and a big deal.

So all dharma concepts—whatever it is, aggregates or not-self or impermanence or whatever—none of them are truths or realities. There's no dharma concept that really is a truth in that sense or reality. But all of them, all dharma concepts, big ones and little ones, are ways of looking or concepts embedded in ways of looking that become available to us with skill and practice. We then engage them, but they're not truths.

So this is, as I said, a big deal. It's a radical re-grounding of what the path is and what it's based on and what it involves. And it has all kinds of massive implications in the way it opens up possibilities for practice and for understanding.

One of the reasons perhaps why it's difficult for many people nowadays in dharma circles and wider mindfulness circles to really recognize the significance, the radicality, or what a big deal this is—placing emptiness, placing ideas of ways of looking and fabrication in their fullness at the basis of the path, letting a path form around those conceptions—one of the reasons that's so difficult is because there's so much emphasis and rhetoric and assumption on a reality that can be arrived at through mindfulness, through bare attention, that permeates perhaps a lot, if not most, insight meditation teachings and approaches, and also, of course, mindfulness teachings and approaches.

And together with that, what makes it difficult is that the ideas of fabricating, of what is fabricated and seeing through the fabrication of certain ideas or states or thoughts, seeing them as fabrications—that idea is already there, as is the idea that comes up from time to time that we can look at things in different ways. There are different ways of looking at an experience or whatever it is that's happening.

But underneath all that, underneath those relatively limited teachings of fabrication and the acknowledgment of the possibility of different ways of looking, there's this idea that mindfulness or bare attention will reveal what is unfabricated—the experience in the moment revealed barely, nakedly, as it is.

The word unfabricated is often not used, but if it's used occasionally, it means something like this experience just as it is, or this bare actuality of the breeze on the cheek, or the thought as the thought, or whatever. So in that understanding, the whole teaching of fabrication of perception is grossly limited. And there's a limit on the exploration of just how much we can let go of fabrication and move to unfabricate perception more and more.

So underneath all these teachings about mindfulness, bare attention—typically the way insight meditation is taught—is some kind of assumption of a reality that we can meet, find out, that is life as it actually is, experience as it actually is. But there's not this understanding that there is no reality independent of the way of looking.

So yes, sure, we can look at things differently at different times to a certain extent. But underneath that, there's a reality. There's a way things really are, which we can look at a little bit differently. But the whole teaching of ways of looking has a very limited depth, because underneath the teaching or occasional mentioning of different ways of looking at things, there's an idea that there is an actual independent reality.

So what I would like to say is, contrary to that, all we have are ways of looking. They're empty too. There's no reality independent of the way of looking. There's no objective, inherently existent reality. And the scope for unfabricating perception, for moving up and down on the spectrum of fabricating and unfabricating, is complete. It goes into total cessation of any experience of subject, object, space, time, thing—all of that.

So there is not this assumption, this being held onto of reality or bare attention being able to expose, to reveal, to meet reality. Typically people hear these teachings about ways of looking and fabrication, and it just doesn't have the impact. It's like, "Yeah, so what?" It just goes in one ear and out the other or over the head, because being with reality or bare attention is held onto as really the main thing. So teachings about ways of looking or mentioning the flexibility of that is just heard as a sort of, "Yeah, okay, big deal"—a small occasional supplement.

As I said, what I would really want to give is a different ground to the dharma, a ground of groundlessness, a basis in emptiness, in this fullness of understanding and the comprehensiveness and thoroughness of the understanding of the ideas of ways of looking and fabrication. So there is nothing hiding in there about this bare actuality of the moment or meeting things as they are.

So quite apart from the fact that emptiness is sometimes scary to people, the prevalence and the ways these ideas have sedimented in dharma culture and in the consciousness of practitioners means that they're there and they're operating. And what is heard that might actually be deeper or wider or different than that actually tends not to get heard because it just bumps into those sedimented ideas. And as I said before, it's not easy to stay in that notion of non-realism.

What's quite popular these days is replacing the word "truth" in the Four Noble Truths with the word "tasks." And that's good in a way. It's kind of obvious that they're tasks. But still, what happens there is that at one level in recent years, people get very nervous with the word "truth."

And so they don't like it. They feel a bit oppressed by it. So there's a kind of small, superficial liberation in jettisoning that word "truth," and it feels good. But really, as I said before, what's happening? Okay, so one's not using the word truth, but still underpinning that, even if I've replaced it with another word... The shift is really nominal—literally, it's just in terms of a word that has shifted—because underpinning all that is a belief in so-called existential truths, the so-called truth of our existential situation, and usually a kind of unspoken, unarticulated philosophy—well, rather unthought about, unquestioned philosophy of physicalism involved in that. So the shift is purely superficial there, often.

So how do we even... you know, for some people, what enables this shift of basis to really having emptiness and deep understanding of emptiness and dependent origination as a basis of the path? I mean, curiously, the more one understands emptiness, the more it even makes sense to have emptiness as a basis. So much so that it's almost like one can't really take seriously an approach that claims some kind of realism or truth, explicitly or implicitly. So I'm just saying personally I can't really take anything seriously that doesn't—that is based on some kind of realism that's usually hidden there.

So for some people that approach, curiously, of putting emptiness at the fundament of path will actually come once they understand emptiness more deeply. For others it might come through certain more modern philosophers, and really probably starting with Nietzsche—a very, you know, amazingly insightful, radical thinker—and since then lots of other philosophers in the Western tradition who open up this whole question of truth, kind of deconstruct the assumptions of truth and reality that we've had. So it might be that that helps with people.

It might be for some, I mean, it actually comes through a deep understanding of modern physics. Or for others, it's just that they already are possessed of, or have available to them, if you like, what we might call a more artistic or poetic sensibility. And their personality is already, in contrast to some personalities that tend to see things and think of things in quite concrete, literal terms, some people are already, I would say, blessed with this kind of ability to not fixate consciously, or in a way that articulates, or in a more unconscious way, on reality. And so there's this kind of liberation that comes through an artistic sensibility.

So any of those—whether it's understanding emptiness deeply, or modern science, or modern Western philosophy or some aspects of modern Western philosophy, or this more poetic sensibility—these can liberate and make available for us a shift in the very basis and direction of what the path is. So it's not about truth or based on notions of truth, explicit or hidden, implicit, but it's really more an art. And from whatever direction one is liberated in that way, then we see, we feel that we are free to create. The whole thing becomes art, and I will come back and talk about that.

But the kind of realisms are so prevalent, sometimes they're hard to notice. They're actually, as I said, hidden a little bit. So much in the languaging of mindfulness or dharma... One person was talking about mindfulness as, I think, being with life as it presents itself, meeting life as it presents itself. And that kind of phrase, or that kind of summary of what mindfulness is, can sound very attractive. It also sounds completely innocuous and completely obvious to people who've been practicing mindfulness a little bit.

But what I want to say is, is it really? Is that really, A, what the Buddha meant, and B, more importantly, to my mind, is it really that innocuous? Or is there, again, a whole slew of assumptions—ontological assumptions, epistemological assumptions, all kinds of stuff—wrapped up in such an innocuous sounding phrase, such a simple and attractive sounding phrase?

Again, I've talked about a lot of this before, but what does "life" mean? Such a buzzword these days, life. What do you mean when you say life? What's wrapped up in that? It's, again, a word that can easily have included in it all kinds of things that are taken for granted about what's real. Again, our existential situation or the reality of matter, or the flatness, whatever. So "life as it presents itself"—yes, okay, what do you mean by life? What exactly do you mean by life? All kinds of things. I'm not going to labor that now.

But even the phrase "as it presents itself"—"as it presents itself" seems to suggest a kind of independence there, a non-recognition that what is presented in perception or to perception or as perception doesn't so much present itself independently. Perception is not a kind of passive receiving of some kind of representation of reality, or a reconstruction of some passive reconstruction, or sort of passive but faithful reconstruction of some kind of reality. We have to see that what arises as perception, what is presented, if you like, or feels as if it's presented to the mind, is not independent, is a dependent arising, dependent on the ways of looking.

And not understanding that, not including that as either an insight or a mode of working, means actually that we're missing what I would say is the main point of classical dharma, which exactly is understanding that—how perception is fabricated, as I said, dependent on the way of looking. Understanding the deep teaching of dependent arising and emptiness. "This is hard to understand, hard to see. I'm not even sure if I want to teach this," he said. This is the thrust, the main point of what I would call classical dharma.

meaning Dharma doesn't include the imaginal, and so forth.

So phrases like "life as it presents itself" tend to obscure the dependent arising—the arising of perceptions, appearances, and experiences dependent on the way of looking.

Here again, this importance to me, this real importance, this necessity of questioning what is wrapped up in the views operating in this or that position or statement. It's what I call, what I think the word means, critique, as I said in the opening talk. For instance, wrapped up in a phrase like "being present" or "meeting life as it presents itself."

Is there a kind of assumption of modernist physicalism—these random atoms or what matter really is—versus just the notion of appearance, which is a much more phenomenological notion that leaves much more open, much less assumed? We're dealing with appearance. We're not necessarily dealing with what we might think matter is according to a modernist, physicalist view. There's a huge difference in those assumptions, in what opens up by those assumptions, in what's allowed by those assumptions either way.

Sometimes, unfortunately quite often, people write to me or they say something about emptiness and they're relatively enthusiastic about it, and then they say something about how congruent that is with understandings of how the brain works. So this possibility, this understanding of fabrication of perception and the possibility of different ways of looking is reduced to a ground—and the ground is the brain, the ground is the neurophysiology and the different neuronal mechanisms and processes happening in the brain.

But again, we're back at physicalism. Emptiness does not stop, does not have a ground or propose a ground in the brain or in any kind of physicalist ground. So to somehow try and convert the teachings of emptiness and fabrication of perception into an equivalent that posits things in terms of explanations according to brain neurochemistry and neurophysiology and mechanisms is not, as far as I would say, a deep understanding of emptiness. It's leaving out a whole range of territory there.

But this physicalism, this tendency to do that kind of thing is endemic in our culture. We're saturated in it. The way we think and assume and perceive is saturated in that conception, that assumption. It's what sometimes modern philosophers call a sediment—it's sedimented in our view. So much so that we don't... it's become something that's just kind of solidified and hard to see, hard to question, hard to have a different assumption, hard to even see that it's operating sometimes.

As I said, different possibilities of understanding emptiness, more deeply probing, more deeply questioning with the emptiness practices, or modern physics and what quantum physics has to say about the reality of so-called atoms and electrons and those constituents, or modern Western philosophy questioning the whole ideas of physical-ism—whether it's in continental philosophy or Anglo-American traditions, from both sides of the Western philosophical tradition—that the whole notion of materialism and physicalism is really being, has been for quite a while, deconstructed, pulled apart.

So I would say, and I think this is extremely important: the brain and the mind and the processes of the mind are all empty. All of them are empty. The matter that makes up the brain and the neurons and the atoms and the subatomic particles—all empty. So emptiness really means a groundlessness. We are not positing or assuming a ground in notions of matter, atomic particles, subatomic particles, as something real.

Wrapped up in all this, or just another way of saying all this, is really about questioning. Really about questioning. And for me, that's so key, so much the lifeblood of practice, or one of the things that gives zest and vitality and thrust and openness to practice. Without a kind of radical questioning, our practice is actually quite narrow and quite circumscribed in the range that it can open to.

So very often, someone might hear about a retreat like this or these kinds of teachings. And of course, very often—and as I said, you'll even get it here—an enchantment is contrasted with the real. So it's not real. "Off with the fairies" or something like that. And what a person really wants is "my life, the reality of my life—I want meditation and mindfulness for my everyday life."

That idea of mindfulness and meditation for everyday life can be very attractive. And one wonders what's actually the attraction? Part of it goes back to this coping that people, understandably, are suffering and want to find ways to cope with what most often bothers them, which seems to be things at the level at which we're perceiving them. These are real, they're a problem—how do I deal with that?

But one wonders too whether the idea of mindfulness or meditation for everyday life... somehow encapsulated in the title and the thrust of the teachings, there's a belief in and actually a reaffirmation and a support for habitual perceptions and conceptions of what reality is. And this is much safer, if you like, because questioning deeply notions and perceptions of reality and habitual assumptions is basically upsetting. It's not necessarily peacemaking at first.

Challenging deeply such ingrained assumptions—such assumptions and perceptions and conceptions that everyone seems to agree on about what's real, what's called ontological assumptions, and what we can know, epistemological assumptions, cosmological assumptions about what the world is—this is not easy. So if you like, it's more attractive to hear teachings that seem to reaffirm what we already know, what we already take to be real.

And so there's this, both in Dharma culture and other spiritual cultures—if we even use the word spiritual, which of course some of them don't; it's more about personal growth or however it's phrased—and in the wider culture as well. That word "secular," one of its root meanings is "of this age."

Like, "of this age" is what secular means from the Latin. But to me, what "of this age" should mean is the questioning of what is now outmoded. That's what it means to be of this age—to be moving forward, not just receiving what's actually an old inheritance.

So the assumptions of classical mechanical science, whether one is drawing on them in one's exposition of secularism or teaching, or whether it's just through the neurophysiology, which seems very modern because it's current research, but it's still based on classical mechanical science—and the assumption that we can have objective, independent understanding of anything that's so much at the basis of the classical scientific method which started with the scientific revolution and the Western Enlightenment.

But actually, what is it to really question these old inheritances of ours—these philosophical, usually unspoken, or just tacitly assumed, tacitly born assumptions that we have, perceptions, conceptions? The questioning of them is what is current, not just the adoption of ideas that are actually hundreds of years old and have been surpassed in science, in philosophy, in dharma, in all kinds of things.

So the German philosopher Hans-Georg Gadamer voiced this recognition that the way we see, our perspectives, are partly the result of history, and we have to recognize that. We're not getting some objective take on anything, whether it's a text or our existential situation. Our views are products of history. We interpret—again, whether it's a text, the Pali Canon text or other Buddhist texts or other religious texts or our life—the hermeneutics of that, the interpretation of that is from a certain historical situation as a result of, conditioned by, and by all that, and also has a certain horizon that's historically conditioned and conditioned by all kinds of other factors.

But the possibilities for interpretation, the hermeneutic possibilities, these evolve. So it's also not just a result of history, but it's part of history, and the whole thing can be dynamic. Interpretation is not—we don't arrive at a truth of either "this is what the Buddha said, this is what he meant, and this is the truth, and anyone who doesn't agree with me is just simply wrong, just simply deluded, or whatever," or "I can extract this, or excise this, let's say, so-called Vedantic overlay, or whatever, or this corruption of the text, and arrive at the pristine actual truth, independent of anything else." This is not a very mature understanding of what actually goes on in looking at old texts or in looking at our existence, ourselves and our lives.

The interpretation, hermeneutics, becomes actually inexhaustible—so creative, open. These are some of the ideas that this philosopher Gadamer expounded and expanded upon, but many others in post-modern philosophy as well. And again, these kinds of questionings and seeing through the assumptions of classical mechanical science, of the assumption of being able to have objective, independent understanding and perception of anything—these also can be approached by emptiness, as we said.

Dharma understanding, if I go deeply enough, if I approach it in the right way—if I have to set up my whole investigation into emptiness in the right way, otherwise that too will just reach a wall, and I can't go any further.

So what is it—again I know I'm harping on about this, but what is it to really, really, not just normally, but really understand not to have notions of truth or reality, either explicitly or implicitly, girding our sense of existence, but also the path? What is it really to have to jettison that? And really, if you like, to have a ground of groundlessness, to have a non-realism as not just the basis, but permeating through the whole of the Dharma?

And with all this, as I said, in regard to the contemporary context of all this, of our teachings, of our culture—again, the importance of questioning, and what are the questions of our time? So it's easy to just receive old answers and act as if they're new, or assume that they're new. But actually, what are the questions of our time? What is it time to question? It's a big deal, as I said.

And again, related to all this—we're talking partly about why. Why offer such a retreat? Why is it important? I speak for myself, but I think I know from Catherine also that she has found this as well—since I've been talking about the imaginal, for instance, I've lost count of how many people have reported back to me that because of hearing these teachings, something was legitimized, that they were somehow given permission through hearing these teachings to play and to explore and to pick up concepts like divinity, God, angel, without rarifying them, that they were granted somehow permission.

And certain—to play, to explore—and certain concepts were, and perspectives were legitimized. The whole use of the imagination, words like soul, etc. So I rejoice. It really touches me when I hear that. I'm very glad that that kind of opening has happened.

And I have a question again in relation to that. Where did the pressure come from, the authority, the imprisonment come from in the first place? That it was not legitimate, that there wasn't that permission. Where did that authority and imprisonment come from? Who imprisoned you? How? Where do we give authority? Where do we give up our authority? To whom? How does that even happen? That somehow I can't entertain certain ideas which might be extremely fruitful, extremely nourishing and fertile for the soul and opening in all kinds of ways. Somehow something has gone on with authority or authority figures or something or other and I'm not allowed. They're out of bounds. They're taboo. What's gone on there? How has that gone on and why has it gone on?

So this, to me, is a real question. So partly I'm offering this retreat to give permission, to legitimize, to open up whole vistas and areas—vast territories for exploration, for play, for the fertility of the soul, for inclusion of aspects and dimensions of being that have somehow gotten amputated. Rendered out of bounds. No entry. Do not enter. Do not even think about using this.

There's a big desire in me to open up those territories because I see how important they are, how necessary they are. And there's a question in that.

So just a few brief things to finish—I said I would share some thoughts about relating to the retreat, relating to these ideas and teachings. How do we hear and how do we frame and hold these ideas and these teachings?

If I just share for myself, I notice that I feel quite sensitive and sometimes a bit reactive—I get a bit nervous when I hear certain ideas expressed in New Age language, where there seems to be too much realism, too much reification. It rubs me the wrong way. I can't take it seriously. Whether it's a more New Age idea or a more secular idea, something really reacts to that in me. I get a bit nervous when I'm listening. That's just me sharing what doesn't work for me when I'm listening.

So if someone is talking that way, or I'm reading something in that vein, I have to work a little bit on how I'm listening so that I can actually take in what might be useful without getting tripped up by what makes me uneasy.

One thing here—and I've talked about this before, but it's so important that it's worth repeating—we have this emphasis on deep understanding of emptiness and dependent arising on one hand. All perception, all experience is empty. There's no ultimate truth in any of what I perceive, no ultimate truth in any conceptual framework. A real strong emphasis and basis in that.

And if you like, on the other hand, what appears to be in opposition to that is this willingness to entertain certain conceptual frameworks or what we might call metaphysics—sometimes quite Platonic in the sense of these hierarchies of existence or things that are given reality. So there seems to be a kind of opposition there.

In a way, this kind of work—imaginal work and re-enchanting in meditation—can seem like walking a razor's edge between these two extremes. There's what seems to be realist spiritual metaphysics on one hand, and radical emptiness and understanding of dependent origination on the other hand. So it can seem like one is walking a tightrope or razor's edge between those two.

But my experience is that the deeper I go into understanding emptiness, what looks like this tightrope balance—this narrow razor's edge, this precarious balancing where I have to keep in the middle to avoid falling off on either side—actually becomes something quite different. What seems like a very difficult, narrow place of walking or standing actually, with practice, isn't narrow at all. It's quite the opposite. It actually becomes a very wide and fertile field, allowing, legitimizing, inviting a kind of infinitude of exploration.

So practice becomes, in this holding together of the understandings of the emptiness of all things—radical, absolute emptiness of all things, complete, thorough emptiness—the holding of that with the willingness to enter into and entertain various conceptual frameworks, even metaphysical ones. With practice, the balance doesn't feel precarious at all or contrived, which from the outside, or maybe at first, it might seem to be.

Going back to this question—how will you hear these teachings? How will you frame and hold these ideas? As I said, I shared what makes me nervous sometimes. The encouragement is to take care, to find a relationship with these ideas, with the practices, with the teachings that works for you.

A second thing related to that has to do with listening in general, or reading. I know I've said this before, but again, it's so important. It seems to me that as human beings, we listen or read teachings almost from inside certain boxes, from certain conceptual structures that we've built up, that we understand or assume to be true or real. We listen to something new or read something new from the perspective of what we already know.

And sometimes in that, what happens is we just cut out and cut off and almost, in some instances, literally do not hear what is new, what doesn't fit into the boxes of our conceptual structures. This is maybe just part of the way the human mind works.

It's difficult sometimes because there are periods—maybe long periods in practice—where those boxes need to get consolidated, need to get built up. We need to hear just little bits that patch this and that and make the structure more firm. But there's a downside to all that, because sometimes we simply do not hear what is new, what doesn't fit in the box, what's different, what stretches and opens and sometimes breaks—even shatters—the box.

So is it possible, as we go through these teachings, or other teachings that you come across, or books that you read, to actually listen for the new, to read on the lookout for what actually doesn't fit in your box? This is difficult.

This is difficult. But just putting that recognition out there—the acknowledgment of the difficulty—while offering a gentle encouragement to listen in a different way than what is often habitual for us. Listening for what is new, for what doesn't fit into my box of what I already know. Again, it's more challenging. It's sometimes not so comfortable.

The second aspect of listening and reading concerns hearing the relevance of what's being said in any moment, the point that's being made. I mention this because of a couple of experiences I've had while teaching. Some years ago, I gave a talk where a large portion explored quantum physics and its relationship to emptiness, to understanding reality and perception, and what that meant for freedom. Afterwards, one listener somehow conveyed that he thought I had simply gone off about quantum physics because I was personally interested in it—that I had gotten lost in a tangent having nothing to do with anything, certainly not the Dharma. I was actually surprised because I had perhaps assumed too easily why it was relevant or what the connections were.

Another instance occurred while teaching emptiness on a long course. Going through and explaining these concepts about emptiness, I realized that for three or four people, it remained completely abstract because they couldn't see any connection between realizing the emptiness of things and a reduction in suffering or freedom from suffering. For some people, the whole thing seemed like abstract philosophy. "What does this have to do with suffering?" I realized I had to go back and actually connect things that, to me and to some others, seemed completely obvious. The relevance, the connection of ideas with freedom from suffering, needed to be made explicit.

So I suggest: what does it mean to listen for relevance? If something isn't clear, ask. Ask, "Why did you make that point? What exactly was the purpose?" Or "What was the point of that practice?" Do ask, because when we hear things and don't understand their relevance, their power to transform or open up possibilities is almost completely diminished. It dissolves right there.

Related to this, we can speak of what we might call listening and reading structurally. How often I hear from people that they listened to a Dharma talk from this teacher or that, and they say, "I took one thing"—then they share perhaps half a phrase from what the teacher said in an hour. It might be "turn towards what's difficult" or something similar. Which is wonderful—they received that and it was important—but it's almost like a myopic or over-microscopic focus on some small detail.

We need to listen for details, to read for details, of course we do. But sometimes what happens is that in doing so, we're not listening or reading for the big picture, for how things fit together. Usually when we're not really listening or reading to see how it all coheres—how the big picture forms, the larger conceptual structure—then what we find in our practice and in our lives, the way the Dharma develops for us, is actually limited. There's a kind of constraint on the movement that's possible and the opening that's possible.

I know this isn't always easy given the way different people's minds work, but just as a general encouragement—not just for this retreat, but more broadly in one's life—is it possible to gently cultivate what I'm calling a more structural kind of listening or reading? So that one really understands the relevance and how things fit together in the bigger picture.

These are just general points about relating to the teachings. We'll talk more about relating to the different practices probably tomorrow, but these apply more generally to the teachings themselves.

One last thing: teachings have to unfold in linear time and in chunks. We can't sit here and download it all in one second. And even if we could download it all at once, it would obviously be very long and everyone, including ourselves, would fall asleep or become exhausted. So teachings must be presented inevitably in chunks, in time.

But on this retreat in particular—and this applies to other retreats as well—sometimes those chunks are not really separate. We're going to explore, for instance, what it means to re-enchant the self and other, to re-enchant the world, to re-enchant time, in all these different areas of re-enchantment or re-enchanting the seeing, the hearing, the tasting, the touching of the six senses. But actually, all these areas of re-enchantment are not separate at all.

They're, if you like, mutually dependent. The enchantment is mutually dependent. They're, if you like, enchanted together. The self, the world, the senses, the perception, the ideation—all of it is actually enchanted together. But we have to split things up to talk about them.

So sometimes you'll be four or five days into a retreat and you'll get a piece of something and think, "Oh, I wish you'd said that at the beginning." Or a piece at the beginning doesn't make sense until later, doesn't quite fit until later. Just a recognition of that—it's a limitation of our existence in a way, of the way things arise for us and need to be separated.

Related to that, there's not really on this retreat so much of a linear movement where we start with this and, dependent on that, we will go to something more advanced. It's not really set up that way, unlike other retreats, with the exception—as we'll talk about tomorrow—of the energy body as that forming a working basis for our practice.

A lot of material to bear in mind and hopefully to open things up and make things fruitful and helpful for all of us.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 28

Beyond the Search for Freedom

Rob Burbea · 1h01

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea challenges conventional Buddhist orientations by questioning whether the primary aim of practice should be reducing dukkha or opening to beauty and sacredness. He explores the complex relationship between mental technologies like satipaṭṭhāna and the inhabiting of enchanting myths, using the example of Matthieu Ricard's exceptional happiness. Burbea examines how typical mindfulness teachings often function as mere coping mechanisms with so-called reality, rather than opening sensitivity to the sacred dimensions of existence.
>
> Drawing on insights about fabrication and dependent arising, he suggests that practice can extend far beyond stress reduction to reveal vastly different perceptions, including mystical awareness of oneness and the unfabricated. The talk addresses the tension between self-oriented healing and divine-oriented practice, exploring how prioritizing beauty and sacredness over personal comfort might transform our entire approach to the path. Burbea discusses the open-ended nature of soul-making and freedom, referencing Carl Jung's insights about the impossibility and necessity of boundless individuation. This teaching forms part of his "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" series, offering a radical reimagining of Buddhist practice that moves beyond conventional therapeutic models toward cosmopoiesis and the art of sacred perception.

So I said I would like to cover four areas in this introduction: what we are talking about when we talk about enchanting and re-enchanting, why it's important, the context and basis for giving these teachings, and also a little bit about how to relate to retreat, the practices, and the teachings. It's probably clear from what I said so far that these four are not actually separate—they're woven together.

But let's continue and perhaps open up a little more about the question of why this might be important, this re-enchantment, why offering these teachings might be important. This is also tied in very much with the whole context of these teachings and these ideas, and also the bases. So these two tie together.

Why is it important? Well, one aspect—and we're going to be saying more about many of these reasons as the retreat goes on—but one reason why all this is important is because of the environmental crises we face, because of the situation that humanity and other species now face globally on our planet. I'm not going to talk that much about that on this retreat because I've talked about it elsewhere several times in relation to the imaginal and enchantment, and also written about it. So I won't be talking that much about it on this retreat, but in a way it's implicit—I hope that that is a fundamental reason and a strand that runs through the whole of the teaching and what we're doing here.

But even that—it's only for some people that this re-enchantment of nature, of the cosmos, of the world, is actually necessary, or what will transform their relationship to the world, to nature, to the planet, to the earth, to other beings in a way that is more ecologically viable. The psychological and psycho-spiritual reasons behind the huge fix we're in as a species and the environmental crisis—there's too much complexity there. There are different reasons why people act or don't act, or are involved or engaged, or turn to or turn away from, or are interested or not interested. So to think that one thing is going to do the trick for the whole of humanity in terms of changing the relationship—I think that's naive.

But certainly for many people, the disenchantment that has come partly as a result of the Western Enlightenment, partly as a result of industrialization, consumerism, and all kinds of things that are so prevalent nowadays—for many people this re-enchanting is going to be pretty central. And for people who are already involved, activists who are already involved, another level of depth can be opened up there that gives support and strength and equanimity and forbearance in relation to their activism.

Like I said, I've talked about that all before and written about it, and I'm not going to dwell too much on it this retreat. What I want to open up instead, or as well as that, is the whole relationship of the movement of re-enchantment through image with the whole question of freedom—freedom from suffering and happiness. What is the relationship between re-enchantment and happiness, or easing suffering, or freedom from suffering?

This is actually a very complex question, which is why I want to go into it, and something we'll return to as the retreat goes on, opening up different aspects of it.

Some of you may have heard of Matthieu Ricard. He's a French-born monk in the Gelug Tibetan tradition, and he's written a number of books. But one of the reasons why he's well known is because some scientists found him and were doing brain scan readings of people's brain activity, relating that to happiness. Whatever their measures in the brain of happiness were, they found that most people—the hundreds or thousands of people they tested—were grouped within a certain range. And Matthieu Ricard was completely off the scale. He was like the happiest person that any of them had ever encountered, by far, in terms of what his brain waves were showing.

So I have a question—and it really is a question. Assuming we can trust all that measurement business, how come he's so happy? What's going on there? He's a Tibetan monk, quite busy doing stuff, writing and traveling. And if you know that tradition, it's not very meditatively intensive.

The question I have is: Is his extreme happiness, his unusual level of happiness, a result of what we could call mental technologies—of mindfulness, for example? Learning to see a thought as a thought and let go of it, of staying in contact, of being aware and keeping the attention on the nexus of vedanā and craving without, through the mindfulness, letting it go into the next stage of clinging and causing dukkha—is his happiness a result primarily of those kinds of mental technologies?

Or is it a result of the fact that in that tradition that he's in, he has somehow managed to really fully inhabit a myth, a fantasy of the bodhisattva—of being born through countless lives and dedicating those lives and one's whole existence to embodying his own enlightenment for the sake of other beings? He is, in other words, inhabiting a myth that is huge, enormous in its temporal and spatial scope, in its range, in what it means for the whole being, in its orientation, in its meaningfulness. And it's enchanting.

perhaps he has entered into a whole different way of seeing the cosmos. So the Tibetans basically inhabit a different cosmos than we do in the modern West. They live in a cosmos that is enchanted, that is sacred—a sacred cosmos. It's not this flat, materialist, meaningless, soulless cosmos that we typically live in in the modern West. It's pregnant with sanctity, with mystery, with depth.

So of these two factors—and I'm sure he practices some mental technologies of mindfulness and all that—of these two factors, the mental technologies or the inhabiting of an enchanting myth and the inhabiting of a sacred cosmos, which is more powerful for him? Which is more powerful in bringing happiness and freedom? I have a real question about that.

But pursuing this a little more, what we could call mental technologies—these are really important. Of course they are. I wouldn't teach meditation if I didn't think that. But the function of these mental technologies is often, probably mostly conceived nowadays in limited and limiting ways.

We can learn these technologies of mindfulness and seeing thoughts as thoughts, staying in contact, all that stuff. But what they really are, what they're really seen as—and this is explicitly or implicitly communicated—is that what we're really doing is coping with reality. We're meeting reality, or so-called reality, and coping with it through these mental technologies, learning skills to cope with the reality of our minds, our bodies, and our situation.

And even if those technologies and the teachings are extended to the three characteristics—the Buddhist three characteristics of dukkha, of unsatisfactoriness, of the impermanence of all things, and of the absence of a true self, of a real self—even if the teachings and technologies are extended to those three characteristics beyond just simple mindfulness, still, what's happening there is a kind of endless and repetitive coping with reality.

So the three characteristics are just really seen as existential truths. They're part of the reality we cope with, moment to moment, again and again, and that is the path. The path is just learning this endless, repetitive, so-called meeting with reality, which is really coping with reality.

But this reality—who we are, what our existential situation is—this is regarded as truth. Now philosophically nowadays it's become very unpopular to use words like truth, so people either within Buddhism, within secular Buddhism, or outside in some modern philosophies, try not to use the word truth or poo-poo it. But whether they use it or not, it's still implicit there. They take for granted that these are existential truths or realities. Sometimes modern philosophers use the word facticity—a very unusual word, but basically they don't want to use truth. So they use another word that hides the fact of what's being assumed to be true, unquestionably.

The function of these meditative technologies that we can learn can extend way beyond this kind of coping with reality. It can, and I would say I hope it does extend for us, into an opening, a deepening, an enriching of our sensitivity—the sensitivity of our being, of our seeing, of our knowing, of our dwelling in the world—so that the whole sense of sacredness opens up through that sensitivity. The sensitivity that we grow opens up, reveals for us in many different ways, the sense of sacredness in our lives.

The function of those technologies can extend into really seeing the possibilities of fabricating less perception. So still that teaching of fabrication is there, implicit, even if it doesn't use that language, in typical mindfulness teachings, typical insight meditation teachings. But oftentimes the depth of possibility or the range to which that extends—this possibility of learning to fabricate less perception at times, and what that then reveals, what that opens to us—that possibility is severely truncated. But actually we can extend it. It's enormous.

We can really see the centrality and the possibility of fabricating less perception, learning how to do that and what it implies and what it opens. Because it opens for us the possibility of vastly different perceptions. Whole mystical perceptions of existence open up that are essentially less fabricated. We talked about this with perceptions of different kinds of oneness. And ultimately with perception of the unfabricated, what is completely transcendent—beyond space, beyond time, beyond all notions of subject and object and conventional perception—that the Buddha pointed to repeatedly.

This journey into fabricating much less opens up when we don't constrain it by assumptions of the reality of what we're having to cope with. When we view the path as this exploration of fabricating less and less perception at times—can't live there—we also reveal the emptiness of all things, the emptiness of all perception, the dependent arising of all perceptions at a very deep level, at a deeper and deeper level. Massively significant.

And this in itself opens up for us, or through that, both as process and as result, our skill, the art of the flexibility of moving in and out of a whole range of ways of looking. And part of that, we develop the skill, the art of cosmopoiesis.

Cosmopoiesis as a way of looking—or as ways of looking, plural, as I said, they're infinite—becomes more and more available to us as we extend these techniques, as we don't limit them and the way we're conceiving of them and what they're for.

So tied in with all this is what is the point of practice? What is the point of the path? I don't just mean what's the point of this retreat. I mean the whole path, the whole Dharma. What's the point?

For me, if I'm just honest, for me this extension, expansion, deepening, opening of the sense of the sacredness of everything—everything—the opening of a sense of beauty, the extension of the sense of the beauty that goes with that, the opening of the range of soul-making and the sense of soulfulness, the expansion of possibilities for engaged, creative participation in perception, creative participation in our perception and sense of existence, self, other, world. And creative participation in our interpretation of existence, in the hermeneutical dimension and aspect of our being. How are we interpreting self, other, world, life, existence, being? And all the art that goes with all that that I've just talked about.

That to me, if I'm honest for myself, that's become the point of practice, and maybe it always was for me—I don't know—more primary than anything else. And with that, of course, the wonder, the awe that opens with all that, the deep bowing of the whole being, the sense of blessing, again profound and universal almost, that opens with all that.

This, for me—maybe it always was, but it certainly has become more and more the point of practice, if I just share for me the point of the path.

Happiness, or an increase in happiness, an increase in peace, an increase in or decrease in suffering—these are definitely results of this deeper, more widely conceived path. But in a way, maybe they're side effects.

So I want to tread carefully here, and I don't want to impose any view on anyone. I really have to say I respect anyone's choices around all this, for the most part. So you decide: what is the point of your practice? What is the point of your path?

And some, for a while at least—this is very, very common—some for a while at least, this decrease of suffering, increase of happiness, of well-being, it has to be, or it will be, the primary aim of the path. For a while at least for some, of course. And I respect that. I respect that even if it doesn't change.

But I have a question for you. What is your aim? What is your direction? How are you really holding your sense? How are you holding what is the point of the practice and the path for you?

So this is a real question, and actually I want to push it a little further with you. Because if you answer, as of course people will, it is the reduction of suffering—so I've talked about this in other talks, sometimes a lot of people, the ending of suffering just seems too much like a pipe dream. You say it's the—I'm not going to go into that now, but you say it's the reduction of suffering, at least it's the ease of suffering.

Again, I would, as I said, want to just push that a little further as a question. If that's what you answer, I would just say: is it really, really? Look again. Take your time with this. I don't mean right now in this moment. I mean in your life. Is it really that that's what you most want? It might be. Of course it might be.

Or is it somehow that we've just adopted an idea or a certain languaging or a certain framework from Buddhist teachings and talks and books, and we've just, in a way, kind of been indoctrinated by that? And in that, are we perhaps failing somehow—either because of a lack of confidence, a lack of inner authority, or just through habit, or through laziness, if that word even means anything, I'm not sure it does—but somehow we're failing to ask that question of ourselves more probingly, to ask ourselves: what do I really, really want in the core of my being? And even more: why? Why do I want what I really want? What do I really want and why?

So I really want to emphasize with this: it's your choice. Of course it's your choice. You're free to choose. I mean, actually, that freedom is constrained by conditioning and all kinds of things. But essentially, let's say, or as far as I'm concerned, I don't want to impose or bully anyone at all.

Your choice. But at least ask the question, you know, with some probing, with some force, with some openness—not constrained by what might actually be a strange kind of subtle indoctrination.

So there's a spectrum here where your answer might land. There's one end, and we could say, if you like, the more radical end, the more unusual end, certainly in today's context, would be: what if the path and the goal of the path, the aim, the orientation of the path, is not less suffering, but actually the goal, the aim, the path is an increase, a deepening, an opening, an enriching of the sense of the beauties—beauty is plural—and the sacrednesses, the senses of sacredness of existence. Self, other, world, events, facts, cosmos—all of that.

That would be replacing the goal of less suffering with the goal of the opening to beauty, the prioritizing of the beauty and the sense of sacredness. That would be quite a radical position, quite unusual, and one end of the spectrum. It's quite unusual for people to actually come out and say that or admit it to themselves. And maybe it's unusual as a position, I don't know. But there's a spectrum here, and your choice.

If one did move to or admit that one lived on that more radical end of the spectrum oriented toward beauty, then some of you listening to this might get a little nervous and just say, well, is that even Buddha Dharma? Is that Buddhism then, if that's the orientation? And then get very... yikes. What are we doing here? What's he teaching? Because the cardinal orientation in Buddhism is towards less suffering. It's how everything is framed.

I've talked about this before in other talks. I'm not going to dwell on it too much. Part of what I said in other talks was we have a fantasy always when anyone is involved in the path to the extent that they love it and it's part of their life. Whenever we love something there's a fantasy mixed with that loving. I've talked about this before.

So we can imagine, or rather we image and fantasy our relationship with, if you like, inhabiting this position of replacing the aim of less suffering with the increase of beauty. If we're doing that, we can fantasy it in different ways. We can see the self and the dharma and the whole project in different ways. It could be that we see ourselves going outside of the Dharma, could be that we see ourselves extending it, could be that we try and engage a kind of historical fantasy and find evidence for "actually the Buddha was always saying that."

So there are different ways we fantasy the self, the tradition, the Dharma, all of that, the goal, and so forth. Always fantasy is involved and there are different positions, different fantasies that we can take with that. I've talked about this before; I don't want to go into it now.

But I would repeat a question that I think I brought up in other talks on another retreat, which is, if this comes up for you—is that Buddhism? Is that what the Buddha taught? Is that the Dharma? Again, I would ask a question: why is that so important to you? Why anyway is that question so important? What's going on for you that this sort of allegiance to something called Buddhism—which clearly means very different things to different people, even here at Gaia House—what a range there is in the way that the teachers, even the core teachers, conceive of what is the Dharma, what it's for, what it does, the history, all of that.

Why is this allegiance to some kind of constructed notion... You have to admit that whatever we call Buddhism is constructed by us through our fantasy, through our selective emphasis on different aspects of the history or tradition, through our understanding as it's limited in the present. And so we construct this Buddhism and then we feel this allegiance to it. What's going on there? And how has that allegiance eclipsed what may be even at a deeper level that I haven't realized yet, more important to me? What's going on psychologically, spiritually, and so forth?

Certainly we're conditioned to approach practice and the path and our conceptions of it in certain ways and with certain assumptions. Even the Four Noble Truths—it's right there. It's core Buddhist teaching that talks about suffering, the end of suffering, the way to the end of suffering. So right there, this primacy of reducing suffering, at least, is given to us through core Buddhist teachings, the Four Noble Truths.

In the mindfulness world, it's very tied to a medical model. Stress reduction, pain relief, cognitive behavioral therapy for depression. These are the roots of the way mindfulness is taking... So the threads of the way mindfulness is taking root in the culture is on a medical model. And of course, a medical model has to do with getting rid of suffering. That's what medicine does, right? Gets rid of physical suffering.

So here I talk about how mindfulness is presented, thought about, and actually sold, if you like, through a medical model which has to do with less suffering. The huge projects that are happening in this country, in the States—the funding for those projects would never be available outside of a medical model. If I say to the government, "I want to increase the sense of beauty," competing with someone else who wants to reduce suffering, who's going to get the funding?

And not only that, there's the attraction of presenting the scientific paradigm of the medical model to most people in modern culture because, again, it fits the dominant mode of understanding that science is important, and so forth. But even more than that, you know, I was flicking through a sort of new age spiritual magazine, looking at blurbs for different retreats or ads for this or that, and actually various magazines, and almost everything—almost everything in the blurbs and ads for courses and retreats and practitioners—has to do with healing or flourishing, this word that's become very popular nowadays, human flourishing, or self-empowerment or deep rest. It's all, in other words, different ways of languaging or approaching this idea of reducing suffering, increasing happiness. The focus is not on this opening of beauty, making that primary—the opening of beauty and the senses of sacredness.

Notice too, by the way, how healing, flourishing, self-empowerment, deep rest—all of these, in a way, are products of or reactions to secular modernism. The whole way of thinking, human flourishing, self-empowerment—we're going to come back to this—they're products of a sense of self that is conceived within the paradigms and through the constraints and through the tunnel vision of secular modernism. We don't see it because we are not aware of the historical construction over hundreds of years of that kind of sense of self. But these kinds of thrusts of these retreats are also products of secular modernism or reactions, if you like, to modern lifestyle.

So if I'm honest, I really don't actually care that much if through practice you're a little less stressed at your computer keyboard at work or in the kitchen or whatever it is, or if in those activities you're more mindful. I can't say I passionately care about that. Or maybe I should say it differently. I do care about that, but mostly I care about it in proportion to the extent that stress and lack of mindfulness blocks and veils our deeper seeing, our deeper sensibilities, our possibilities to know and open to the senses of the sacred. Our possibility of knowing and opening to a sense of things and self and other and world as being more than this, and this meaning more than the flat secular modernist version or story of what things are and how reality is.

So I care about all this to the extent that stress and lack of mindfulness block and veil the depth that's possible to us, the sense of divinity in whatever ways that might come for us and open for us. These things block and veil seeing emptiness deeply, the possibility of opening to the unfabricated, the possibility of re-enchanting our existence and our cosmos. This is what I care about—I'm just being honest here.

Of course, if I'm sitting one-on-one with someone in an interview and what they care about is their stress at the keyboard, and that's what we're talking about, that's what I will, to the best of my ability, help them with—tools and approaches that can help with that kind of stress. But to be honest, it's not what I'm going to devote my work and energy and existence and thought to. But again, that's just a personal confession, if you like.

Going back to what's in the context of our spiritual culture and psychological culture, what I often feel is that if someone writes a book or is presenting something, and the language of that spirituality or psychology or psycho-spirituality seems to be seeing self and self-expression as theophanies, as faces of the divine, as expressions of the divine. Sometimes I get the sense as I read more, listen more, that actually it's not very full or deep, that truth, that transformation to really seeing self and self-expression as theophany or the divine. It's not that full or deep. There's not really a great shift from the kind of self-centeredness, literally a self-centered view.

So all of this—I might use that language, and often in the Jungian traditions and related traditions they use that language of the divine coming through in relation to the self and self-expression. But somehow there's something in it that just seems like, yeah, but not really. It's somehow still the self at the center that's being prioritized. Or there is a shift, but very quickly it slips back, just slips back to the self being primary and central, and the divinity, the orientation towards divinity rather than self, is secondary and kind of nominal.

Now all this is complicated. This is complicated and something we're going to return to—both Catherine and I talk about this a lot, hopefully on this retreat. So I want to really make clear that the self, self-views, and the personal relevance of whatever it is that we're dealing with—our dukkha, our difficulties, our stuckness, our challenges, this or that event in our life, these images and fantasies that come—the personal relevance of all that is vital and necessary to include. I'm not interested in dismissing the self and all the particularities and the personhood. We need, at least in the way that we are conceiving of re-enchantment and working with images, to include all that in our relationship with images and with our life, the image of our life, the images of our life and ourselves, in the views that we have about all that and in our explorations.

But there's something about the balance of the importance of self and divine in the governing concepts, in the concepts that govern our path. I hope this is making sense. It's like the background assumptions relative to images. What is the purpose? Am I doing this as a kind of self-growth, my process, healing myself, having less suffering? Valid and important as that is, but what is the relative balance of doing it for me or doing it, let's say, for God? All this practice, all this effort, all this inquiry, all the sessions in therapy or whatever it is—if really something inside shifts, this is for God. It's for the sake of God. It's for the sake of, if you like, God's fulfillment. We'll come back to these ideas. That's a pretty radical, and in our Western culture, very rare transformation of position of priority.

But there's a balance. Or rather, what I want to highlight is that there will be relative weights of self—what we could call self-orientation, or orientation based on self, or towards self-healing, self-growth and all that—and divine orientation. This comes in all kinds of ways, also in relation to the notions of causality. We'll come back to this, and we'll dwell on it now.

But depending on that balance between what we could call the intentions of self or self-orientation and divine orientations, our life and our practices will unfold somewhere on a spectrum of immature enchantment—what we're calling that immature enchantment on this retreat—and, if you like, mature, more fertile enchantment with greater soul-making possibility. So the more the orientation and the conception, the weight of priority is given over to the divine instead of the self, the more mature and fertile and soul-making is the enchantment that we're talking about.

As I said, all this is complex. It's not simple. Because a person might hear about this possible shift of view and intention to prioritize beauty and the sense of sacredness over less suffering and hear and say, "Yes, that's great, it sounds beautiful. After I've sorted myself out a bit, and there's less stress in my life, and I'm a bit more free." And there may be, of course, some real wisdom in that kind of response. It's like, "Yes, I'm really attracted to that, and I've got some work to do beforehand."

But as I said, this is complex. The relationships here between these two sort of thrusts are very intertwined and not simple. The relationship of self-view and freedom and the relationship of all that with the prioritizing of beauty and increasing the sense of sacredness is complex.

Now, it's true to say, I think, generally speaking, that the depth, the degree, the breadth, and the range of seeing beauty, sacredness, etc., generally, it's dependent on the degree, the depth of seeing emptiness and seeing the unfabricated. So to the degree that we understand and have realized and absorbed in the depth of seeing emptiness and less fabrication or even the unfabricated, to that degree our openness, our perception of beauty and sacredness is opened in all kinds of ways. That's the flip of saying what I said before in a way.

When—or in the moments, in the times when there is more stress, when we're more bound in self-concern and sort of imprisoned by certain self-views, imprisoned by self-views—in those moments, when that is strong, then generally speaking, there is less of a sense of depth. There is less of a possibility for transcendence, for perceptions that are transcendent, less of a sense of, or the availability of theophanies of beauties and sense of sacredness, generally speaking.

But still, it's complex because what is the effect of reversing priorities? If from the priority of self-growth and healing and more freedom and less suffering, from that constellation of priorities, if I reverse and I transfer it to my priority as deepening, extending, enriching the sense of beauty and sacredness of all things, of existence, what is the effect of actually reversing those priorities on the very sense of self, the inadequacies of self, and on freedom itself? Because that reversal itself, just the reversing of the priorities before anything else has been seen or opened to or insights had or whatever experiences, just the reversal itself may in itself be immensely healing and unburdening.

So this is, as I said, complex. The relationship here is complex. But the reversal itself can have an effect, an important effect.

And it's also possible that the self can, in its delusion, its habit of contracting and grasping, can easily grasp onto anything and twist it to its own purposes. So even if I do reverse the priorities, I can twist all that and the project of that into just being a reflection of my—or supposed reflection of my progress in doing that. How well am I doing at seeing beauty and seeing sacredness and all that? So a person might even hear about this shift of priorities and orientation and then maybe right away even, the response is, "But I can't do that. Others will be able to do that probably, but I'll fail at it." And the whole thing has become about self again. Self's just grasped hold of something, made it about self, not the divine. "I like the idea, but somehow I just turn it into self again."

So complex, not easy this question, but I want to open it up and just point out its complexity, because I think sometimes we're too quick and too simplistic in our approaching these questions. And, you know, the whole question of the order that I alluded to earlier—do I need to heal psychologically and get a bit freer in my life, a bit more well-being before I can approach all this imaginal stuff and enchantment? Good question, but not simple.

It seems to me that in the world that certainly I move in, the assumption is often, yes, that I need to do that before I can do this. I need to heal psychologically before I can entertain these far out teachings about enchantment and the imaginal. But again, sometimes it is, sometimes it's not, sometimes it's just not simple. Most of the time, the whole question is much more complex, and we bring to it a lot of assumptions that are conditioned by all kinds of things, but contemporary teachings and contemporary psychotherapies.

This is something we're both going to return to later on the retreat, so we'll talk more about this later, fill this out more. It's very important and integral to everything that we're talking about.

But I want to say, I want to point out that for some people—I don't know what proportion, but for some people—soul-making, soulfulness, beauty in all its range and surprising manifestations and the sense of sacredness and the sense of art, the art of all that, the art of perception, what we're talking about, the living as art—and I'm going to talk much more about that soon on this retreat—but all those things, soul-making, soulfulness, beauty, sense of sacredness, the art, these are necessities to their being. For some people, these are absolute necessities, more than a decrease in suffering.

For some people, these elements represent more than mere preferences—they are absolute necessities, more vital than a decrease in suffering or an increase in the peacefulness and comfort of their existence. For some people, art—and I mean that in the very broad sense I employ when speaking of beauty and sacredness—matters more than anything.

We could certainly argue that there are dimensions of soul that all human beings possess, dimensions that need nourishing. We could say that this soul-making, this soulfulness, the sense of beauty, the sense of sacredness, the engagement with the art of existence—of creative existence—is universal to all souls, representing aspects and dimensions of our being that require nourishment and space to grow.

But attractive as that might be as an idea, I don't want to foist that position, which is far more radical and rare than many people might be comfortable with, on everyone. Too many teachings, psychologies, and spiritualities—whether they use such terminology or not—try to present what they're offering as universally applicable to everyone. And if their approach doesn't apply to you, well, you must simply be deluded. I'm not interested in foisting any particular vision or orientation on anyone. I return to what I said earlier: all this is your choice—your choice of where you land or how you move along the spectrum, back and forth, or how it evolves for you over time. Your position regarding these orientations, these intentions, the balance, the weight—all of this remains yours to determine.

But what I do want to ensure is that those who are often not addressed—those people I just alluded to, for whom these aspects of beauty, the sense of sacredness, the soul-making and soulfulness represent actual necessity, for whom art is primary, for whom the art of existence is what matters most, or for whom art in existence matters more than anything else—I want to address and include these people who are often overlooked in spiritual and psychological courses, teachings, and books. I want to include them and ensure that in the range of teachings and emphasis, that radicality of orientation is addressed, because so often it's not.

All of this is complex, but to add one more piece—and we're still exploring the why and the context—all of this is wrapped up with a whole other dimension having to do with meaningfulness. The entire question of meaningfulness in our lives and the meaningfulness of our lives, our sense of individual meaningfulness, is interwoven with everything we've been discussing.

The sense of meaningfulness goes inherently with imaginal work, with fantasy, and with enchantment—particularly with enchantment, because meaningfulness is not merely individual or personal. Our sense of meaningfulness in our lives relates, yes, to individual orientations and movements through life, to aspirations and directions. But it's also related to the meaningfulness or not of the cosmos itself. Again, this is something we're going to return to later in the retreat: the self and meaningfulness, and how that's wrapped up in imaginal work and in the whole notion of enchantment.

This forms part of our fundamental inquiry: why are we practicing? What's the point of the path? Why is it important to offer these teachings? And there's also a relationship between meaningfulness and freedom—again, we'll return to this.

Just a couple of observations for now. When there's a sense of meaningfulness in life, it often involves a sense of duty—some kind of duty. I know I've talked about this before in other talks. Where an image is alive, where a fantasy is alive, when enchantment is alive, and when meaningfulness is alive and operative, wrapped up in that is not only a freedom that it opens, but also some kind of duty. I mention this now, but we'll return to it.

And one last thing for now: if we do, or to the extent that we do, aim at or orient toward opening up, enriching, deepening, widening the sense of beauty, the senses of sacredness, soul-making, meaningfulness—all these aspects and dimensions of being—to the extent that we orient and aim at those things, the path becomes open-ended.

What's the limit of beauty that we can feel and appreciate and be moved by? What's the limit to the sense of sacredness? There is no limit to soul-making. These things are open-ended. And so when we take them as central to the aim and orientation of the path, the path itself becomes open-ended.

Now actually—and I've said this somewhere before, I can't remember where—when we go really deeply and without simply unquestioningly accepting received tradition or dogma about what freedom from suffering is or where it's limited or what it means, when we actually begin in our thinking and in our path itself, in our lived and practiced path, to open out different kinds and dimensions of freedom, we start to discover that freedom is not one universal, monolithic thing. There are aspects, kinds, and dimensions of freedom, and these are discoverable, achievable. We can sometimes break out into whole areas of freedom—something shatters, and we find ourselves in an entirely other territory of openness, of freedom, that we hadn't even realized before was available, or that we were imprisoned and not free before.

So when we actually start to think about freedom in more probing ways and start to practice in certain ways, the whole question of freedom also becomes open-ended. Freedom is not a finishable project, really. And to me, that's beautiful. Rather than being depressing or a burden, it's actually beautiful. It's open-ended, and that's lovely. It's glorious.

But neither open-endedness is usual, whether it's the open-endedness of more and more, deeper and deeper, richer and richer, wider and wider beauty, sense of sacredness, soul-making, or whether it's the open-endedness of kinds and dimensions of freedom. Neither is the usual concept of the path—it's not usually conceived in that way. So again, this has to do with the context of these teachings and why they might be important.

Let me finish with a few quotes by Carl Jung in relation to this open-endedness that, to me, is very beautiful and very much inevitable when one starts questioning in certain ways and practicing in certain ways. Certainly, as I said, once one gets into the whole realm of the imaginal and the unavoidability of fantasy, and also the whole question and practices with enchantment.

There's something his long-term assistant, Aniela Jaffé, wrote, and then some quotes of Jung. She said: "The goal of individuation—the realization of the self—is never fully attained. Because it transcends consciousness, the archetype of the self can never be wholly apprehended. And because of its boundlessness, never completely lived in actual life."

This is really what I want to emphasize: because of its boundlessness, it can never be completely lived in actual life. Successful individuation, Jung says, is never total. Jung goes on to say: "But it is just the impossibility of this task that makes it so significant. A task that is possible—that is, solvable—never appeals to our superiority."

So there's something about... something in us that needs something open-ended. Something in us needs something impossible. We don't usually think this way. The ego—or the contracted self, without unpacking all these words right now—gets upset when something feels impossible. But something in us needs something impossible.

Another place Jung wrote: "The serious problems of life are never fully solved. If ever they should appear to be so, it is a sure sign that something has been lost. The meaning and purpose of a problem seem to lie not in its solution, but in our working at it incessantly. This alone preserves us from stultification and putrefaction."

So again, a different way of conceiving of the path, but one I think that when one enters more into the territory of imaginal work and this work of re-enchanting, and when one shifts the priorities—or to the extent that one does, or as I said, even when one really opens out the questions of freedom—this open-endedness, the beautiful open-endedness of the path becomes a fact that we start orienting to and opening ourselves to.

CHAPTER 29

The Nature of Enchantment

Rob Burbea · 52 min

> In this opening talk of the 'Re-enchanting the Cosmos' retreat, Rob Burbea introduces the foundational concepts of enchantment and re-enchantment. He distinguishes four types of enchantment: immature (characterized by clinging and contraction), cultural (such as blind faith in scientism), spiritual-universal (dissolving into impersonal love or awareness), and mature imaginal enchantment involving depth, dimensionality, and divinity while maintaining the wisdom of seeing image as image.
>
> Burbea critiques modernist, materialist worldviews that reduce everything to measurable matter, advocating instead for what he calls a 'poetic state' or poesis - a creative, artistic stance toward self, others, and cosmos. This approach assumes familiarity with emptiness practice, ways of looking, and fabrication of perception. Central to the teaching is developing subtlety and sensitivity of awareness to notice how perception affects the energy body and emotions.
>
> The talk emphasizes that re-enchantment involves inhabiting multidimensional perceptions that include a sense of divinity, while maintaining conceptual frameworks that are dynamic, elastic, and connected to phenomenological investigation rather than rigid truth-claims. This opens infinite possibilities for experiencing self, world, and divine through imaginal practice.

Welcome, everybody. Welcome to this retreat, to this course, whether you're here in the room tonight or listening at home, to the teachings, the offerings. A very warm welcome.

Both Catherine and I would like to speak a little to introduce the retreat, to get our bearings and get the ball rolling. So I'd just like to speak a little now and really to cover four areas, or to begin to go into four areas.

First, the what. What are we talking about when we talk about re-enchantment in the poetry of perception? What is meant by that? I'll say a little tonight about these four areas, and they are things that we'll come back to and fill out much more. So just touching on them tonight by way of introduction, but as the course goes on, we'll fill them out more.

So what do we mean by re-enchantment? What are we talking about? What are we pointing to? Secondly, why? Why is this important? Why offer a retreat like this? These kinds of practices, these kinds of teachings? Thirdly, just a little bit tonight about the context of the retreat, the context of these teachings, and also the bases. What forms the bases? What are the bases for these offerings, for these teachings? So what, why, contexts and bases, and lastly, a little about some pointers or maybe suggestions, offerings about how to relate to this retreat, how to relate to the practices and the teachings.

Like I said, we'll touch on this now, and these are themes that we'll return to, fill in, elaborate as the week goes by.

Just a reminder, or a statement at least, that the content of this retreat—both the themes and the practices and the orientations—in a way emerge for me organically out of, as an organic expression or extension really, of teachings that both Catherine and I separately have been giving in the last few years. If you like, some of it is an elaboration of that, a further exploration of those things. Some of it is slowing aspects of those previous teachings down and filling them out a little more.

As we hopefully have made clear, we're assuming a familiarity for you, on your part. This is what we asked for. And by familiarity, I mean an understanding, a conceptual understanding, but also a meditative facility—an ability, skill, art in the meditation. So assuming a familiarity with, certainly, all the usual insight meditation teachings that we're familiar with, that are very common these days, but also with teachings and practicings related to the imaginal, and also emptiness.

By emptiness I mean also quite a particular way of approaching it that has to do with the fundamentality of the concept of ways of looking—practicing different ways of looking on the one hand, and also the concept of fabrication and the fabrication of perception. So emptiness from that avenue, and going deeper and deeper into the richness and the fullness and the fruits of using those concepts of ways of looking and fabrication.

I'm assuming some understanding at least, and some measure of facility with that. The deeper that understanding and skill with emptiness in particular, the easier all this is. All this talk of imaginal and enchantment and cosmopoiesis that we'll be going into—it follows naturally and very organically and becomes, as I say, much more easy, much more obvious in a way, much more accessible, the deeper our understanding and practice with emptiness is.

So assuming some familiarity with the imaginal, with emptiness practice, but also some meditative skill working with one's emotional life, both difficult and lovely, some skill too with samādhi, samatha, the resource of well-being in the body and mind, and also with practices like mettā and loving-kindness. There's quite a lot we're assuming familiarity with.

All of these, especially the last three—the skill with the emotions, the samatha and the mettā—we're orienting around those practices, using the energy body as a kind of foundation, as a vehicle, if you like, for developing those skills and practices. So we're assuming all that.

I don't know how much the material in this retreat will make sense without that familiarity. It may to some people, but for others it really may not. Personally, I'm not going to repeat much of those kinds of teachings at all, because we've asked for those foundations to be there and that familiarity to be there. So on this retreat I won't be repeating much, except things or teachings or concepts or points that, in my experience teaching, actually tend not to land with people. People hear them or actually don't hear them. It just goes in one ear and out the other.

They don't seem to see the significance of them or how radical they are, how much they change the whole basis and the whole fabric, tenor, and orientation and possibilities of what's happening. So those things I might repeat later.

One example would be—and this is something we'll touch on as time goes by—what does it mean to have emptiness as a basis for the whole path? Not as a goal, not as some distant thing, certainly not as some option later, but some understanding, some deepening understanding of emptiness as the basis, putting the whole path and the whole conception of anything to do with the Dharma on the basis of this understanding of the flexibility and availability of ways of looking and the notion of fabrication of perception, those two interwoven concepts. Something that's so important, makes such a difference, and yet is extremely rare, and quite often people really don't hear that or understand yet the significance of it. It doesn't really land as a sort of root and fundamental concept, a ground for what we're doing.

But let's get into these four areas I wanted to talk about. So the first is the what. What are we talking about here when we talk about re-enchantment and all that?

I found an article in the Guardian newspaper a few months ago that might help us highlight some of what we're talking about and also make some differentiation. It's written by a guy called David Ferguson—I don't know who he is—but it was in the Guardian a few months ago. So I'm just going to read you some of that. It was an article about trees in cities.

He says: "Scientists say that when human beings see the color green and interact with nature, our bodies manifest chemical and psychological signs of reduced stress. One Texas company is trying to quantify, to calculate for cities, the dollar amounts that trees are worth in their combined capacities as air scrubbers, noise pollution reducers, neighborhood beautifiers, and natural stress relievers. Less cortisol, which is a stress hormone, is given off when you see green," said iTree founder David Nowak, who continues, "We want to develop an index of how much green you can see from any given point in a city, how your body reacts to it, and what the economic value is."

Then David Ferguson continues and points out how trees make the climate cooler in the city. They cool the city down. They absorb pollution, making it less polluted, so there are fewer respiratory problems for city dwellers, commuters, and so on.

But then he says: "All of that aside, and as well-intentioned as Nowak may be, there is something absolutely unquantifiable about the benefits of living near trees." And he continues: "I love to visit New York City and London and some other cities, but after about a week or so, all the noise and grimness and the grey concrete all start to get to me. I begin to ache to run loose in the woods like when I was a kid, in the long free hours between the end of school and dinner. Back then I learned to tell time by the angle of sunlight slanting through the pines. I can still smell rain twenty-four hours before it comes in the soil around their roots."

And he goes on: "Maybe it's that trees live longer than we do. Maybe it's that nothing ever seems to bother them enough to make them yank up their roots and leave. But even now, as an adult, there are times when my thinking gets too sped up and scrambled, and I need to wander into the woods behind my house, shimmy up a tree and sit in its branches. Up there, I can slow down my ricocheting mind, breathe in that sweet green smell, and just think long, slow thoughts."

And then he finishes: "I challenge all the legions of bean-counting accountants in the world to put a dollar value to that. I don't think you can."

So why am I picking this article to share? I really feel he makes some very necessary and good points, David Ferguson, and I don't want to take anything away from what he wrote. But I want to ask both what is hidden within what he's saying and what is missing. What is hidden within it and what is missing from what he wrote.

This is by way not of criticism, but critique. Critique means asking questions like that: what's hidden, what assumptions and orientations are hidden, and what is missing there. It's not about criticism; it's critique.

So first thing: notice for him and the way he talks—both David Nowak and David Ferguson—there's a kind of recourse to basically modernist values and cosmologies. The values that he presents and highlights, and also the cosmologies, the way of assuming or perceiving what the world is, are quite modernist. They're quite—we take them just completely for granted. They're part of our culture.

In terms of the values, there is an appeal in what he writes and the kind of sweetness of it.

There's an appeal to the idyllic memories of childhood and this need for and desire for less stress, for not working. There's a kind of idealization and nostalgia of childhood and of not having time pressure, and the whole orientation of slowing down one's thoughts that he talks about.

So these are very familiar. They sound so familiar, and maybe they're so appealing, just because we're saturated with those kinds of values in our society. They're very modernist values, if you like. They belong to our society at the moment.

But secondly, with the cosmologies, notice the absolute absence of what we might call any dimensionality or depth to the whole perception and conception of nature, of trees or cosmos. So in what David Ferguson writes about what's important to him, there's an appeal to what we could call the purely or the flatly sensual. Nowhere involved at all in what he says or even hinted at is any kind of sense of nature being anything more than material and pleasantly sensual or helpful.

This depth and dimensionality—and we're going to speak a lot, hopefully, about what this might mean for us—is just absent from the discourse of both Davids. When, on this retreat, we talk about re-enchantment, re-enchantment needs to have that aspect, needs to involve and invoke depth and dimensionality. And we'll talk, as I said, more about what that means. So any kind of re-enchantment without depth and dimension cannot really be very full or deep at all as far as what we're talking about is concerned.

Now following on from all that, notice the parallels. I'm not going to say much about this now, but just notice the parallels between what the iTree founder David Novak says, and also the kind of claims of unquantifiability that David Ferguson makes. Notice the parallels between all that and the way they speak and write with the dominant paradigms—what have become the dominant paradigms in a lot of meditation circles and mindfulness teachings. Health, less stress, slowing down thoughts. The idealization of simplicity, childhood simplicity, a kind of innocence. Notice the parallels. I'm not going to say more about that at this point.

And again, related to all this—something we'll return to periodically in the retreat—is what we could call the creep of, since the scientific revolution, the creep of what we might call scientism. Not science, but scientism.

What's that? Scientism is a kind of religion, really, including the belief that science can eventually, or will eventually, explain everything. Everything there is to know about life will be or can be eventually explained either already or eventually by science. And that science is the truest, best and most trustworthy explanation of anything. Also involved in this kind of religion of scientism is that science deals with what is ultimately true and deals in real entities, entities that are real.

Again, part of scientism is something very central about measurement and including the measurement of value. So actually, a lot of what David Ferguson claims is not quantifiable. I think some scientists say, actually, we can measure values now in different ways. But this measurement is very intrinsic to scientific belief—the importance of measurement, the necessity of measurement. The measurement and value then get put together so that something is actually only valued if it is measurable. And preferably, if it's physical, then it's taken as real. And preferably if it's physically measurable.

So scientists can measure values by giving people questionnaires about their values, about their feelings, about things. But much better from this point of view is if we can find neuronal changes to measure or biochemical measures to change—cortisol levels and all this. And those measurable benefits then constitute more scientific evidence. So all this and more is wrapped up in scientism, and the article, the debate in the article really highlights indirectly some of that coming through.

Lastly, just about this—she doesn't mention re-enchantment. It's not really a notion that's in the article, certainly not the word. But what would it be then to re-enchant the city? Do we need necessarily a sort of return to nature? Do we need to demolish or abolish cities? Or does the re-enchantment of the city come only by having more greenery and trees? Central to our theme: what might re-enchantment mean and involve?

When he points out in the article how he begins to feel a week or so after he's been in New York or London, he's actually expressing and sharing a kind of sensitivity of attention to his surroundings and to what he's perceiving. So this is actually quite central to the practices and the orientations that we're going to be developing. Because it's in developing a subtlety of awareness and attention, a sensitivity that's so much a part—a dimension, an aspect for me, if I think about it—of developing, growing, deepening in meditation practice.

I'll say this again later and re-emphasize it. Subtlety and sensitivity are almost more than anything—more than mindfulness or concentration or this or that or quietening the mind—subtlety and sensitivity are really core and integral to developing, growing and deepening a meditation practice.

So in relation to what he's talking about, can we notice more and more subtly the energetic, psychic and emotional effects in the moment of what we encounter in the world through the senses? And as always with these things, there's a spectrum of subtlety pertaining to what we can notice of the effects on us, on our being.

More or less gross, relatively obvious, or more subtle in terms of what we can feel and observe in the effects that are palpable on the emotions, on the energy body, etc.

For example, at the more gross end, what happens? How does it affect us—the emotions, the energy body, the being—when we see directly or in pictures vast swathes of land devastated and polluted by tar sands oil extraction? We feel the effect of that on the being. Or when we witness a great expanse of clear-cut forest, or just litter, everyday litter, whether it's in the city or in the countryside. Noticing these effects—some quite palpable, quite obvious.

Or when we are in a place of more pristine nature, or even a photograph of more pristine nature—whatever it is, grass, trees—there's a different effect on the being. The effect of, also the different effects of open spaces: desert or plains or whatever it is, mountains, and more closed spaces like woods.

And then more subtly—it's possible perhaps to notice the different effects on us of different materials. For example, in the city that we see or encounter. So encountering concrete versus stone versus steel, or plastic versus wood. This is happening all the time, of course, when we're moving around, the senses are open, but actually there are noticeably different effects in the heart, in the resonances, in the soul, in the energy body. And part of this subtlety, this sensitivity that we're developing, that can be developed, is to notice all that.

This is actually palpable, certainly on the gross levels, but also on a very, very subtle level. How the being is affected by what it perceives—it always is, and it has to be. But this opens up this possibility and recognition that how I'm affected also depends not just on the material of what I see, of the perception, but it actually depends on the way of looking, which opens up the door to the fact that re-enchanting the world is partly, maybe even mostly—I don't know—in the way of looking, in this flexibility of ways of looking, in the exercise of skill and the art and the poetry of ways of looking.

Let's explore some of this a bit more. When we use that word enchantment, you know, I'm aware—Catherine and I talked about it before the retreat—that word can have so many different meanings and implications for people, and people use it in different ways, etc. So we were talking before, and we thought, well, we can at least delineate four kinds of enchantment, at least for us right now. I'm sure there are more.

One we could call a kind of—for want of a better term, there probably is a better term—we could call immature enchantment. And that's when we're a little bit obsessed with something, but also with the self in relationship to that something. We can tell an immature enchantment with something or someone because the mind and the being contract around that thing or in reaction to that thing. There's clinging, a kind of gross level of clinging involved. Something closes in the psyche. You could say the psyche, the range of the psyche closes. Something is also reified, made real. Okay? There's a kind of realist belief wrapped up in there. And the self is more important than the divine. Again, this is something we're going to come back to. The self and the intentionality, the orientation of the whole enchantment—in the orientation and intentionality of the enchantment, the self actually has more importance and there's more focus on it than the divine. We'll fill that out. So that's the first kind of enchantment, immature enchantment.

Second kind we might call cultural enchantment. And this is, for instance, something like our enchantment with science and technology, which in themselves, of course, are extremely useful, but there's something in the way that we're a little bit blind, not just to the effects, but also to the assumptions that are operating there. We don't realize that we're trapped in certain views, certain quite narrow views. If you like, we're kind of captive, just as we are in an immature enchantment, we're kind of captive within an enchantment.

Then there are two kinds of what we could call very positive enchantments. One is, if you like, the enchantment—a kind of spiritual enchantment—but that has a universal or impersonal orientation or basis. So for example, someone doing mettā practice after a while and really deepening and opening, and they begin to experience a sense of cosmic love or cosmic compassion. It's a quality that's woven into the fabric and the space of the cosmos, of the universe. And there's a love of that. There's an enchantment with that perception. And also with the capability of opening to that perception. But that love is universal and impersonal.

And also in that, one's own personality, if you like, gets a little dissolved. As it goes deeper, we start to see, I am not separate from this love. I am this love. It imbues me. It's my fabric as much as everything else is. So everything—self, other, world, things, nature, all of it—their uniqueness in a way gets dissolved because their true nature in this perception is universal love and impersonal universal love.

The same thing could happen with awareness—a person doing different practices where awareness is kind of central. Then there's this beautiful opening, mystical, precious openings to a universal awareness, and people give it different names, and it comes in different flavors, etc.

But again, there's a dissolution into the impersonal. There's an enchantment with that. Beautiful, necessary, I think, on the path. Lovely, healing, all of that.

But then there's a fourth kind of enchantment, and this is the one that we're mostly emphasizing and focusing on in this retreat. This is the one that we want to nourish and stoke the fires of on this retreat, partly because it's less talked about, less encouraged.

And that is, again, for want of better words, a kind of mature enchantment that involves the imaginal. So it involves images and the use of the imagination, but also implicit in all that is the sense of what we are perceiving and what we are enchanted with—whether that's the whole of existence or some particular aspect of self or other or whatever—is not perceived and conceived as one-dimensional, as flat. There is a vertical dimensionality to it. There's a plurality of dimensions there, multidimensional. There are levels, if you like, to perceptions.

And wrapped up with that, there's a sense of divinity. Somehow there's a sense of the divinity of what we are enchanted with. I'm going to come back to this because I know it's a loaded concept for some people.

And then also there's a wisdom aspect to this that we have used this phrase before: see image as image. This is an image. And with everything that that means and that implies, we're not reifying, we're not lost in the image that way.

All these aspects are necessary: the imaginal, the non-flatness, the multidimensionality, the verticality, the divinity, and the wisdom that sees image as image. All that is necessary to this kind of enchantment that we're emphasizing on this retreat. It's mature, if you like, but involving the imaginal.

Actually, in experience, in practice, these four kinds, they arise in mixtures. So I might have a mature enchantment involving imaginal going on, but there's some, perhaps, immature enchantment wrapped up in that. I'm not quite free of the clinging or the contraction that goes with a certain amount of reification or belief or whatever, or it's wrapped up with cultural enchantment or with the more spiritual enchantment of universality, etc. So really, we could talk about a continuum of degrees of involvement of these different kinds of enchantment.

But all of them, or at least the last two—at least what we're calling the positive ones—they lead to, if you like, different kinds and directions of opening. And that's why I'm highlighting this, partly. Different kinds of opening to beauty, different kinds of beauty, different kinds of meaningfulness, different kinds of sense of sacredness, and different kinds and directions of soul-making. So the kind of enchantment leads and opens up in different directions.

And these lead to and bring with them different kinds of freedom. Different kinds of freedom. So freedom is not a simple sort of monolith. It's different kinds of freedom. And each kind of enchantment, direction of enchantment, brings different kinds of freedom and also different kinds of knowing are made available. Again, these are concepts we're going to come back to.

Just a brief example. Someone was asking me about my health situation right now—being very ill and the possibility of death, an early death and not too far away—and asked me about that because I'd said something or written something about how even that was perfect.

So this idea of perfection, as an illustration of what I was just talking about: something like that, a circumstance like that, can be felt and seen and perceived as perfect from one perspective, which is that all is one. All is one cosmic awareness or is one cosmic love or whatever. So even this illness and even this death, it is one.

There is, if you like, the spiritual perception there, which sees the universality. So everything, no matter whether it's good, bad, ugly, beautiful, it all has the one taste, the characteristic of this one. Its truer nature is this one, whatever the one is. And then you can have different kinds of one depending on your perception. So that's beautiful and so helpful as a perception that's available and cultivatable through practice. Mystical spiritual perceptions available through practice.

James Hillman talks about distinguishing spirit from soul. So I'm not too keen on that, making them separate things. But we could call that more spiritual perception, in contradistinction to what we might call a soul knowing, that has to do with amor fati—the love of one's fate or one's destiny—in and including all the particulars of the events that happen to me, the way they happen, all the particulars of my unique personhood, of my life.

So in this soul knowing, in this soul perception that opens up that's possible, there's a kind of—let's call it perception because—a recognition of, if you like, my soul's coherence with divinity, or rather with a divine intelligence, with the world soul, in and through the events and the particularities and the uniqueness of my personhood and my life.

So it's important to differentiate these kinds, but I don't want to separate them as Hillman tended to do—this spiritual and soul.

But this differentiation is important.

So again, just to recap what I said before about what's essential and integral to the kinds of enchantment that we want to feed on this retreat and explore together. There's this non-flatness to the perception, to the sense and the conception of things. The idea that's so prevalent in modernist conception and perception is that everything is just matter. Whatever arises emerges from the interaction and combination of atoms or whatever, and eventually gives rise to consciousness and human beings. But essentially, everything is just matter. That would be the typical modernist sense and conception of things.

What we want is not that kind of flatness, not that kind of unidimensionality where everything is matter, differing only in the hierarchy of complexity in the organization of that matter. We want something that is not flat, something that involves an unflattening. Wrapped up with this is some sense of divinity, some conception of divinity—even if that sense and conception is very vague, very nebulous in terms of what divinity means. But it has to be there, because in an imaginal-based enchantment, the imaginal—at least what I mean by imaginal—already needs to include a sense of depth and divinity to the images and the fantasies and to their origins. In other words, we somehow recognize or conceive of their origins. These images have their origins and roots in divinity.

But all this is not a matter of belief. We don't want you to believe anything. I don't want to sell this to you as a belief and certainly not as dogma. So what are we talking about when we talk about enchantment without belief?

We're talking about what we could call a poetic state—a state, a stance, an attitude of poiesis, which means creative making, artistic creation. It's an attitude of artistic creation with respect to the self, to others, to the cosmos, to the citta, the mind, the heart, the psyche, the soul, to being and existence itself.

This enchantment really means inhabiting a poetic state, a state and attitude of poiesis. It's dynamic, open, creative. We're not talking about something static, and we're not talking about something formulaic. There are no prescriptions here, apart from the most general ones we've discussed. It's more like an art, and that's something we'll return to—this idea of the art of it all.

That word cosmos is actually a Greek word, related to our word cosmetic, which indicates the original connotations of the word as opposed to universe. It has an aesthetic connotation, this word cosmos—originally having to do with ordering and forming and fashioning, with ornaments and decoration. In other words, it's creative, it's artistic, it has to do with beauty.

In our practice, what we're endeavoring to do is move in and out of this poetic state, whether deliberately or spontaneously. There's a movement in and out of this state of poiesis, or states of poiesis.

Now in relation to all that, doubt arises. Almost certainly for everyone, or most people at least, doubt arises regarding notions of reality, regarding the status and the trustworthiness of images, regarding the whole idea of having conceptual frameworks that are non-realist—that do not assume reality or truth about what they conceive or perceive. Doubts about employing ways of looking that are not scientifically endorsed, or even worse, ways of knowing that are not scientifically respectable at the moment.

So doubt around all these things—I would expect it to come up for you. Actually, I would say it's a good sign. It shows that the being is engaged with all this, with these ideas, with these practices. It shows that you're not just believing something in a naive way, or as is somewhat popular these days, trying to return to a kind of primitivism—as if the solution to all our crises now is to just have everyone go back to living in some prehistoric way.

That primitivism is not ours. After modernity, after the Western Enlightenment, after the scientific revolution, after this emphasis on—or belief in—being able to know objectively, where the known must be independent of the knower, after all that, and with our culture so saturated in all that, we can't just turn the clock back. Somehow we have to absorb all that and move beyond it, forwards. But doubt is going to be part of that process—not for everyone, but for many people. And that's fine and important.

Related to all this, something perhaps a little different from what many of us are used to in teachings is that much of the way we will use words could be said to be more poetic. Words like soul or divine or God or even enchantment—we're using them poetically, as a different way of using words. We're using them primarily to stimulate soul-making and stimulate cosmopoiesis, this creative transformation in the perception of the world. So we're using words to stimulate soul-making cosmopoiesis, not just for you, but also for us, for Catherine and myself.

We're not just using words in this clarificatory capacity. In this kind of teaching, we don't gain that much, really. In many cases, we don't gain anything from tight, neat definitions. Certain differentiations will be absolutely necessary, and we might at times say, "When I use that word, I definitely don't mean this, or I don't mean that," to steer us away from certain well-trodden and not-so-helpful paths in this context. Certainly we might make suggestions of what a word might open up in experience and concept. But this kind of teaching and this approach is not Abhidhamma, if you know those teachings.

Sometimes people get so pleased and self-congratulatory when they can define things very neatly and tightly, and there's a kind of illusion of understanding something. "Okay, I've put everything in a box," but how helpful is that? Occasionally it's helpful, and we think we've understood, and it's all very neat and great, but really, how often is that actually just an illusion that something has been understood and that something is helpful?

It's quite a rare wisdom in regard to practice to actually know, to have a nose for, to sense, to intuit what is actually helpful. In all this availability of teachings and information and concepts and practices, what is actually helpful? What is really important and what is very much secondary? And what leads where? This is quite a big thing, a huge chunk of wisdom, and it's actually quite a rare one.

So we're using words, as I said, poetically, to encourage certain kinds of opening. We're not basing it like Abhidhamma on a realist assumption: "This is this, and that's that, and that's really this, and that's really that." These things—we're not dealing in the realm of truth or reality, we're dealing in the realm of poetry.

Within that state of poiesis that we talked about, integral to that, unavoidably within that, we are entertaining and experimenting with ideas, conceptions, some of which are actually theologies. The conceptual framework, or the logos—I'll be using that word—the conceptual framework or logos that we entertain is dynamic, is elastic, it can stretch. Again, this is something we're not really used to in our way of approaching things, in our way of thinking.

Sometimes concepts will be making very fine discriminations, very subtle discriminations between different aspects or dimensions or directions. And sometimes the conceptual framework will be much more nebulous, much more cloudy and vague. Sometimes it will be very logical and sometimes much more poetic. Sometimes it will precisely circumscribe a certain area, and other times it will be much more open. It's almost like I can't really find the edge of this concept.

But always, always, always, the conceptual framework, the logos, needs to be and will be connected with experience and connected with what we might call phenomenological investigations—our investigations and experimenting with, our practicing with experience and different ways of looking. Always the ideas and the concepts are connected to that. We're not talking abstract philosophy, abstract meaning removed from experience, removed from the possibility of actual investigation. We're not talking about theoretics that's removed from that.

Sometimes when people have very tight conceptual frameworks that either explicitly or implicitly—even if they don't use the word "truth"—are claimed as truths, which is almost all conceptual frameworks that you'll find in the Dharma and philosophy, poke enough at that, whatever that conceptual framework is, and you will uncover contradictions or unjustified, unjustifiable assumptions.

So what happens when the whole way of holding ideas in relation to practice is looser, as I said, more elastic, and not so-called truth-based?

In all this, in this poiesis and the art of it all, there are infinite possibilities. There is not a limit on the possibilities of experience, of the kinds of cosmos that we live in, of the experience, the perception and the sense of self, of the divine, of other, of the world.

Sure, we might make suggestions, we will make suggestions for different ideas, but really the idea is not to follow that too rigidly. It's not prescriptive, as I said, it's not formulaic, except generally as before, that this kind of imaginal enchantment involves the imaginal, it's not flat, it's more than the usual modernist perception of things. It invokes and involves divinity—whatever that might mean, all the possibilities that might mean—and it also has the wisdom of seeing image as image.

But except for those generalities, there are infinite possibilities. Rather, within the circumscription of those generalities, there are infinite possibilities available to us as experience, as life-changing, being-opening experience.

I think it's from the Jewish Kabbalah—I'm not sure exactly who said it—but there's a dictum that says, "In the messianic aeon, when the Messiah comes, each and every person will have her own perception of God." Each and every person will have her own perception of God.

But implicit in that statement, and implicit even in the traditional Kabbalistic teachings, the messianic aeon is really, I feel, an opening, a shifting and opening of ways of looking. Shifting of the way of looking now, here. That is the messianic aeon. It's something that happens in the heart, in the consciousness, in the soul. And then each and every person will have our own perception of God.

I would actually make that plural: we have our own perceptions of God. There is this infinite possibility for all of us.

So here we have what is usually considered a traditional religion, with all its dogma and established structures, actually containing a level of teaching that is completely radical in its openness—very postmodern, if you will. Not at all dogmatic.

This speaks to something profound about the nature of authentic spiritual teaching. Beneath the surface forms and conventional presentations, the deepest wisdom traditions often carry seeds of the most revolutionary understanding. They point toward a reality that transcends their own apparent limitations, toward possibilities that their own institutional forms might seem to constrain.

In this recognition, we find not contradiction but completion—not the dissolution of tradition but its deepest fulfillment. The messianic consciousness is not something that arrives from outside to replace what came before, but something that blooms from within, revealing the infinite potential that was always present in the heart of authentic seeking.

This is the beautiful paradox of genuine spiritual inquiry: the more deeply we penetrate any authentic tradition, the more we discover its essential groundlessness, its fundamental openness, its invitation to direct and immediate knowing that belongs to no single path yet illuminates them all.

CHAPTER 30

The Art of Perception

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this profound exploration of perception as creative art, Rob Burbea examines how historical shifts in understanding imagination—from objective imaginal realms to modernist dismissal—have shaped our relationship with images and meaning. Drawing parallels between artistic creation and meditative perception, he presents the imaginal not as something objectively real or merely fictitious, but as a mode of attention and awareness that can re-enchant our experience.
>
> Burbea outlines seven essential aspects of authentic imaginal practice: soulfulness and soul-making, depth as dimensionality and inexhaustibility, otherness and autonomy of images, their divine dimensions, meaningfulness, seeing image as image, and beauty and sacredness. He emphasizes how understanding emptiness (śūnyatā) and dependent arising (pratītyasamutpāda) creates the philosophical ground for this 'art of perception'—allowing flexible engagement with ways of looking and conceptual frameworks without rigid belief.
>
> The talk addresses fundamental questions about knowledge, reality, and meaning, challenging both scientific materialism and literalistic interpretations of spiritual teachings. Through references to figures like Nietzsche, Blake, and contemporary philosophers, Burbea demonstrates how questioning our cultural assumptions about what constitutes 'reality' liberates possibilities for cosmopoiesis—the creative perception of self, world, and cosmos as works of art that are simultaneously created and discovered.

In the course of history, the predominant views or conceptions of the human imagination—the ways we regard and relate to the imaginal—have undergone tremendous shifts.

Historically, certainly three or four hundred years ago and extending back through time, many people held what was probably the dominant view that something like an imaginal realm possessed objective existence. There are still many people today who hold this view, though they represent a very small minority in relation to the dominant modern perspective. They maintain that the imaginal realm has objective existence—it is just as real, if you like, as this world of materiality that appears to most of us as the only world.

This imaginal realm, possessing objective existence and what some would say has more reality than this world of materiality, exists as a kind of matrix of meaning around our space and time dimensions. The world of space and time is enveloped by this imaginal realm, which generates or infuses meaning for us, direction for us, kinds of identity for us, images, and fantasies. In this way it influences us and influences history itself.

As I said, nowadays this is an extremely rare view. It's very tempting to think that now we're smart, so we don't believe such a silly view—we can see through that very easily as something that's obviously not true. But just a moment or two of honest reflection will reveal: am I really so smart to have this negative prejudice against the reality of the imaginal realm? Or is it just that I'm repeating, reiterating the modern view—a view in which I've been indoctrinated, which saturates my culture? I haven't figured this out for myself or proven it to myself or thought it through. I'm just a product of indoctrination, really. It's not that I'm so smart.

But there is this view, and there has been historically, in many different ways with different forms, articulations, and shades of emphasis—the objective existence of an imaginal realm, a realm of images that is accessible to human beings, and especially accessible when consciousness is purified or trained.

There's a theologian called Walter Wink who talks about this and wants to point out the modern prejudice we have and how rare that prejudice is in the course of human history. He takes something like the ascension of Christ or the resurrection of Christ and says that these were real events, facts, but they happened not in the realm of materiality—not an actual physical body going up to heaven or reappearing on earth—but in the imaginal realm, in the psychic realm.

Even more than that, these happenings in the imaginal realm changed God. So God, in this Christian mythic view, as incarnating as Christ, as incarnate, reappearing in the resurrection, and also ascending into heaven to join the Father—this ascending adds something to God. It adds a new dimension, a new aspect, a whole change to God.

We're dealing now not with archetypes that are fixed in the original meaning, but archetypes that are actually plastic, malleable—which to me is a more attractive idea. And yet, within that, as I've spoken about before in other places, there's also a kind of eternality. This ascension, this resurrection, is always happening. It's always happening and always available—not just, and not even primarily, as a matter of belief. So often that's the emphasis in modern Christianity, especially after Protestantism: it's a matter of belief, of faith. But it's actually always happening, always available, always accessible to us in the imaginal realm as image, with all the potency of that.

So historically, and even a little bit today, there are these ideas of the reality of the imaginal realm. But through history, things changed dramatically and radically, starting some would say in the twelfth century and certainly later, made more emphatic starting from the seventeenth century with the rise of what we could call modernism—this view that is so normal, so unquestioned, so habitual and pervasive in our modern Western society.

For example, there was the elevation of the whole idea of reasoning—that what we know as human beings, knowledge, comes from reasoning. And knowledge actually means something different than it used to mean, because it used to mean something more like union with what is known. That actually constituted knowledge: a union of the human being's mind and heart and soul with what is known, as opposed to knowledge as a result of reasoning and empirical deduction.

Related to that very much was the whole change in relationship with study and reading. Again, before the modern era, the whole idea of lectio divina, divine reading—studying something or reading something was a matter of sympathy. The being, the soul, and the body (because people used to read out loud) were animated by the breath. Anima also means soul, as well as life. So reading was to come into sympathy with what we are reading. Sympathy means sympathetic resonance—the whole being is resonating with what we're reading.

The Christian mystic Hugh of St. Victor called this kind of reading "an ontologically remedial technique"—strange words that might make us wonder what he's talking about. But the whole conception was very different. The human soul and the human intelligence were not separate from the divine soul, the world soul, and the divine intelligence. So reading, Hugh of St. Victor says, brings light that comes from study and brings a human being to a glow, because the intelligence that's reading is not different from the divine intelligence at the center of the being.

We're going to return to these ideas, I hope, later on the retreat.

More generally speaking, historically there was a shift towards respecting and emphasizing the teachings of Aristotle through a medieval teacher called Averroes, over the teachings of Plato and a medieval teacher called Avicenna. This moved away from the Neoplatonic teachings that were very pervasive in understanding the nature of God and how the divine permeated or informed all aspects of creation through a hierarchy of existence—a hierarchy of emanations from God.

This elevation of reasoning, this shift towards Aristotelianism away from the more mystical teachings of Plato—all of this is relevant to how we regard imaginal experiences. Reasoning becomes more trustworthy than imaginal experience. What constitutes knowledge is not something that comes through the imaginal. It's not a matter of sympathizing with a soul image. All of that, and all the implied concepts and metaphysics that might be either believed or entertained, is relevant to how we view imaginal experiences and how we hold them and how much we respect or value them.

So there is, historically, this view of the reality of the imaginal realm versus the more modern, dominant view that it's completely fictitious, rubbish, not real, does not constitute knowledge. And we now—especially the people who have shown up on this retreat—might flip-flop back and forth between those two positions. We might have doubt. We move in and out of entertaining certain conceptual frameworks. This is our experience.

Actually, it's not that cut and dry, certainly not historically. You get a figure like Plotinus, the father of Neoplatonism, who had a very sophisticated philosophy. I don't mean sophisticated in terms of complicated, but sophisticated in terms of insight that, to me, is similar to some interpretations of Buddhadharma, especially the teachings of emptiness as I would tend to frame them. There are similarities there.

Sometimes, and there's a flexibility in Plotinus's teachings, he would say only the transcendent, unfabricated is real. The imaginal realm, the world soul—all that is not real. At one extreme, there is only the real, the ultimately real, beyond anything you can say about it, beyond all experience. At other times, in this flexibility of his teaching and conception, there would be more the teaching that all appearances, all levels of being, dimensions of appearance and perception—all of that is divine, including the imaginal realm, including matter.

For me, and I think it's the platform we're offering most on this retreat, there's something about understanding emptiness—and more than that, putting a radical emptiness, full, thorough, deep, comprehensive, at the basis of the path. Really letting that bear its fruit in what unfolds in terms of experience, meditation, practice, what appears, conceptions. What this does for me—the deeper one's realization of emptiness, the more it allows and legitimizes this play, this playfulness with ways of looking and conceptual frameworks, an ability to play with them, to entertain ideas, even metaphysical ideas, without holding them as believing in them as true or "this is reality."

For many people, this permission is gained through emptiness, some degree of realizing emptiness of everything. For some it's through philosophy. For some it's through philosophy of science, especially as science has moved on in the last hundred years with quantum physics and relativity.

Niels Bohr, a Nobel Prize-winning physicist and one of the central father figures of quantum physics, held complementarity as very central to his philosophy. A statement is at the very same time both true and false. Or a statement that something is true means its opposite is also true. This became part of not only his life philosophy, but it emerged from deep questioning—mathematical questioning, but also philosophical questioning—that came out of that beautiful time at the beginning of the twentieth century. This idea in relationship to truth—that it's not quite as black and white or as neatly packageable or as single as the modernist view would have us believe.

Bohr also said regarding clarity that there's a complementarity between the clarity and the rightness of a statement. The complementarity is such that a statement which is too clear always contains something false. So the whole notion of truth, of knowledge, of what that is and what constitutes it has changed.

Through modern Western philosophy, this has all shifted. So whether it's through emptiness, whether it's through philosophy or modern science, or whether it's just through having an artistic sensibility, the poetic attitude that some people naturally have more than others—all of that allows us and opens up for us what I want to call the art of perception, the poetry of perception, and allows us to play with that.

All this is complex. In terms of conceptual frameworks, it's complex—reality, what is real, what is truth, how do we know anything, the epistemology, the ontology. I've talked about that in other talks, so I'm not going to go too much into that. But really to dwell on filling out what's involved in this art, in this poetry.

What I would like to emphasize more, again, is this seeing image as image—related to the emptiness understanding. We could also say seeing cosmopoiesis as cosmopoiesis, as poiesis—as art, poetry.

As making. As fabrication.

So central to our art, our poetry of perception, is seeing, recognizing, acknowledging, not forgetting: image is image.

Now, I'm certainly open to the idea—not only open, I feel very comfortable with the idea—of extrasensory perception and all that, in some instances when the mind's in certain conditions. But for this retreat, for these teachings, and for us mostly, most of the time, it will be much more helpful not to think in terms of ESP and ghosts and all that kind of stuff. Seeing image as image, seeing image as metaphor and cosmopoiesis as cosmopoiesis. We've filled out what that means, but we'll come back to it again. So important. So that's integral to our art.

Bonus of Ferrara, a fourteenth-century alchemist, had a phrase: solutio—that's a Latin word. Solutio is the root of alchemy. In other words, making solutions possible, turning what is solid, what is concretized, what is believed in a rigid way, in a fixed, solid, concretized way—making that solid into a solution, making it liquid. Seeing image as image, seeing cosmopoiesis as not fixed, not literal, not concretized in the perception and in the conception. And that's the root of alchemy.

We'll see how we do with time on this retreat, but alchemy is another word for this poetry of perception, very much. We're in the business, or in the art, of transforming—actually, rather, transubstantiating, more accurately—our notions and our perceptions, our sense, our very sense of matter, of the world, of the self. Of course there's a transformation as well of the self in that, and also of divinity. And this idea, going back to Walter Wink's thing, of changing God—that God is not a fixed being, divinity is not a fixed being. There's something very deep in this. I've talked about it in other talks and maybe will come back to that. But this is what we mean: this art is an alchemy. It's a transubstantiation through perceptions, a poetry of perception transforming all that.

So as well as all that—integral to this art of cosmopoiesis, of re-enchantment—we can list five other factors. Good to bear in mind, to kind of check on. Most of them we've touched before, but I'll just list them now. So seeing images as images is one, and then five more.

One is this whole idea, integral to the art of cosmopoiesis: the playing with ways of looking. It's a part of re-enchanting the world—this playing with ways of looking, the flexibility, the range, the way we're holding that.

And implicit in that is a second aspect: when we're playing with ways of looking, we're also playing with—and again, the lightness of that word "play," the openness of it, the adventure of it, the interest, the research, and also the seriousness—we're playing with and entertaining conceptions, ideas, even large conceptual frameworks. That's implicit in playing with ways of looking. So to recognize that and recognize it's integral to re-enchantment, it's integral to cosmopoiesis as we are using those words.

But third, this is not a purely mental thing. It involves the body. This is why I put the emphasis on the energy body and that kind of awareness. This art of re-enchantment, this art and poetry of perception, needs to be in touch with—we need to keep it in touch with—our body, our cultivating, developing, refining our body awareness and body sensitivity, and also our embodiment.

So we're talking about embodiment not only in the sense of being in touch with the body and the resonances in the energy body—the openings, the contractions, the feeling of that as we're working imaginatively—but also embodiment as action. So what the image, the actions, how I am and how I speak... even right now, talking right now, there's a fantasy of that for me, and also for you, especially if you're enjoying this and if you love it. There are fantasies involved in the action of listening, or in the action of speaking, in the action that we do in the world. And this art of perception spills over not only into the way we see our actions, but also in what we actually do, what it issues in, in terms of our duties, our sense of duty, our sense of commitment, direction. We're going to come back to this.

And of course, as part of this third aspect of the five, it involves the senses. The senses are, if you like, the arenas of meeting of body and of world and of mind—if we even consider those three things separate. But if we do, then the senses are really the arena, the fields, in which those three domains or aspects of existence meet: body, mind—mind, heart, citta, really, soul.

So of course when we say body, we're involving senses, and we're talking about re-enchanting the cosmos and cosmopoiesis and all that. Of course our senses are involved.

So: playing with ways of looking, entertaining conceptions and ideas, the involvement of the body integrally, but also the involvement of the heart and heartfulness. And how absolutely essential that is to this work. Sometimes the heart functions as a kind of key. If it's closed, nothing can really happen imaginally. And conversely, the imaginal and the re-enchantment and the cosmopoietic ways can open the heart in different ways.

But heart and heartfulness are integral to this art.

And as we said right at the beginning, so is the imagination—or more accurately, the imaginal. So these five are all included, need to be included, they're integral, and they're part of what we experiment with in this art.

The art of perception means experimenting, playing with ways of looking, with ideas, with body awareness, with embodiment in action, with how we relate to the senses. It means playing with the heart, encouraging the heart and playing with the imagination, experimenting with all of that. And this art reaches out, covers and extends to and involves all areas of our being. There's nothing, in a way, that's necessarily outside of it—nothing at all.

Self, other, world; the mind and the whole way we feel and conceive and experience the citta, the mind-heart, the soul; space even, the perception, the conception of space, of time—all these areas of being, these domains or aspects or dimensions of our existence: space, time, self, other, world, heart, mind, knowing what it is to know. Communication, hearing—whether it's others or nature or whatever—music, gesture, communication in gesture, posture, movement, language and speech as part of communication, eating, seeing, smelling—all the senses.

All of these are, if you like, playing fields for our research—playing fields in which we create (we acknowledge that) and in which we also discover. This create-discover dualism or apparent dualism is something we'll return to as well.

Within this art, and within that playing that includes all of what I've just talked about, there might be generalities. Going back to earlier in the retreat, there are generalities of what's involved—all these factors I'm just enumerating now—but there's no specific formulaic perception. You don't have to... every piece of music or every painting or sculpture or whatever is going to be different, unless I'm deliberately trying to copy something, which is not what we're emphasizing so much on this retreat. We might start that way in terms of suggestions, but in terms of actual perceptions, there's no specific formulaic approach.

If we consider this art of re-enchantment—if we actually pull out one aspect of all I've just been talking about and consider it a bit more—disenchantment in the modernist sense comes from a number of factors and historical reasons. Just to single out two right now: one is the rigidity and singularity of conception and view. This way of understanding things, this way of framing things, this conception is the truth; everything else is not. That's actually very characteristic of modernism, unlike what we might call postmodernism.

So that's something pervasive in the culture that's contributed to disenchantment, and we're not free to play. Playing is delegitimized. Playing with ways of looking and ideas and conceptions and metaphysics is all delegitimized.

But what I want to emphasize right now is also the devaluation in relationship to human imagination—the devaluation of the imaginal and the devaluation of its epistemological value, meaning its validity as a way of knowing. That we can actually know through imagination, through the imaginal—which today, for most people, sounds completely bizarre and even bonkers. I'm not saying it's simple as an idea, but something happened to devalue the imagination and the imaginal.

Again, I really want to spell this out to make it clear, because I have just come to realize that what might feel very clear and obvious to me actually takes time for people to digest as a set of ideas and approaches.

When we use the word imaginal, implied in that word—or what constitutes the imaginal, or imaginal practice—is not just that it involves the use of the imagination. That doesn't necessarily qualify something as imaginal.

So I'd like to go through a list of seven aspects of the imaginal as we're using that word—the authentic imaginal. These are connected, but to me it's worth repeating them, even though you will have heard them before.

The first one—not in any order, and as I said, they overlap and connect, some of them imply each other—is that the imaginal needs to involve and imply soulfulness and soul-making. Even some use of the imagination in regard to something that has mythic themes doesn't necessarily qualify as imaginal.

I saw on TV the other day an advertisement for a computer game—I can't remember what it was called, the kind you get on your phone or whatever. It involved kings and dragons and rescuing princesses and wars and all that kind of stuff. Just because the themes are typically mythic themes doesn't qualify them as imaginal themes, unless they're soul-making. Now, they could be soul-making at times for certain people. Oftentimes, watching people who are involved in that kind of thing, it doesn't seem to be soul-making.

But also, usually when people are playing those kinds of games, there's not mindfulness involved—mindfulness in relationship to images. There might be a keen awareness, especially if it's happening in real time and you've got to react and all that, but not mindfulness in the sense we're talking about: sensitivity to the emotions that are constituted, elicited in relationship to the images; the soul resonances, the soulfulness, what's happening in the energy body. All this is fundamental to what we might call imaginal practice and usually is not there in relation to that kind of game. It could be, but usually it's not.

So that's the first one: soulfulness and soul-making.

The second aspect—again, all related—is what we could call depth. I'm hesitant with that word a little bit, but let's call it depth, by which I mean two things. One is dimensionality. When it comes to images that are mixed with perceptions of materiality in the world—like the cosmopoiesis—the dimensionality, the depth means it's not just a kind of flatness, one-dimensionality of existence that the typical secular modernist view of scientific materialism would hold and assume about the nature of what is real. So there's a sense wrapped up in the imaginal of dimensionality that way.

But there's also a sense of depth as a kind of inexhaustibility, a mystery, an impossibility to fully understand the image. There's always more to this image than I can quite understand or capture or put into a box or convey.

When we encounter an image that we fully understand, or believe we fully understand—when we've placed it in a neat conceptual box, summarized it completely, explained it thoroughly in words that we can convey to another—something vital is lost. The very word "explain" reveals this flattening: to make plain, to reduce to a plane, P-L-A-N-E, removing the dimensionality, the inexhaustible depth, the essential beyondness.

When we flatten an image in this way, either exhausting what was never truly inexhaustible to begin with, or believing we've captured its fullness through explanation and categorization, the image inevitably loses its spontaneous arising. It becomes lifeless, stripped of vitality, and simply stops appearing for us. Either it has completed whatever limited work it was meant to do, or more accurately—and this touches the heart of dependent arising—because the image depends entirely on our relationship with it, on our conception of it, on the very image we hold of the image itself, our flattening destroys its nourishment.

Having truncated its inexhaustibility and limited its depth, we deprive the image of a fundamental dimension of vitality. Without this nourishment of mystery, of being somehow larger than our complete comprehension, the image dies for us.

This principle of inexhaustibility applies equally to ideas and concepts, particularly those intertwined with images—something worthy of deeper exploration in future retreats. When an idea or conceptual framework or metaphysic remains somehow bigger than our capacity to fully grasp it, when we cannot polish it off and contain it completely, when mystery persists at its edges, that idea becomes extraordinarily fertile. This connects directly to what I've explored elsewhere regarding the soul dynamic: the mutual expansion, insemination, nourishment, enrichment, and deepening of psyche, image, logos, and eros in their dance together.

The third aspect of the imaginal is the otherness and autonomy of the image. Here we encounter a sense or conception of the image as having roots that extend beyond our personal human history—at least as typically understood from a humanist perspective. This question of how personal history relates to the genesis of images is delicate and deserves careful consideration.

But what we're exploring is neither a reductionist explanation rooted solely in neurophysiology and brain networks, nor one limited to personal biographical material. Instead, we grant images a quality of otherness, of autonomy. We play with, entertain the possibility of their independent existence. Connected to this otherness is a sense of their divinity—that their roots, their origins, touch something divine. Whether we're engaging an image of the world in its cosmic vastness, an image of another person, of self, or purely intrapsychic imagery, there exists this dimension of divinity.

What "divinity" means here can remain beautifully vague, and that vagueness is not only acceptable but appropriate.

The fifth aspect is meaningfulness—the way imaginal images bring and convey deep meaningfulness to us. This overlaps naturally with soul-making, but meaningfulness differs from meaning in its inexhaustible richness. Rather than "it means X" or "it means Y," we encounter something fuller, more spacious.

This meaningfulness operates personally, impacting our lives, commitments, and direction. This doesn't necessarily translate into specific plans—traveling to particular places for predetermined periods. Meaningfulness and the sense of commitment and direction it brings can be far more open, non-specific, unplanned. Yet it touches what is most deeply important to us as human beings, carrying within it the aliveness and vitality of what truly matters.

The sixth aspect returns us to a central theme: image as image. Seeing image as image constitutes part of what makes something imaginal in our understanding. This includes recognizing that the conceptions and conceptual frameworks we entertain—whether explicitly articulated or merely implicit—related to the images we perceive and engage, we hold lightly. We don't grasp them as ultimate truths or believe in them as fixed realities.

The seventh aspect emerges from the confluence of all the preceding six: the imaginal reveals itself as a realm of beauty and sacredness. I use both words in their widest possible sense. The beauty may not be immediately apparent—in fact, it often isn't at first.

It might feel completely opposite. "This is a horrific image, it's disturbing, it's ugly." But something usually happens in this way of working with such images that we come to see their beauty, or they transform, or we come to expand our sense of beauty just as our senses of sacredness are expanded. So there's no prescription here, no narrow meaning of what beauty and sacredness mean, but the imaginal characteristic is beauty and sacredness.

When we talk about the kind of enchantment that we're emphasizing on this retreat—what we call tentatively mature, imaginatively based enchantment—it will involve all of this too, because it involves the imaginal. This is integral to this art of perception.

Within all this, going into what it means if we're really going to view this and engage in this as an art, first of all it involves a recognition that our lives and the perceptions of our lives already involve fantasy and image. They're already imbued and full of that, especially where we love, especially where there's meaningfulness for us. To not recognize that, I would say, is psychologically naive.

I want to read you a quote from Friedrich Nietzsche—really, it's his encouragement to engage in this art, in this kind of art. He says: "Ultimately man finds in things nothing but what he himself has imported into them." There's a strong statement of dependent arising, of fabrication understanding right there—so much ahead of his time, such a radical, deep, insightful thinker.

"Ultimately, man finds in things nothing but what he himself has imported into them. The finding is called science. The importing we call art, religion, love, pride."

So part of this art of perception is the idea that we're importing. We're realizing that. And it's also part of what we might call the spiritual, religion. It's also there when we love.

But then he goes on to say, and this is even more interesting, even more radical: "Even if this should be a piece of childishness, even if this importing should be a piece of childishness, one should carry on with both and be well disposed towards both." Both the finding and the importing, but also the importing that's coming from childishness—projection from childhood, we could say—and also other kinds of importing.

Continuing: "Some should find, others—we others—should import something."

This is interesting to me, his encouragement to engage in the importing, to engage in this kind of bringing something deliberately to perception, to play with it, to engage in the art of it, even when it is, in his words, childishness or based on pride. For example, when it involves what we call projections based on one's childhood experience and hurts and wounds.

This is strange. This is completely the opposite of what a lot of modern psychology would say. Even when it's based on childishness and pride, engage in the importing. Why? Partly because of the necessity—in a way, the fundamental necessity—of recognizing the more general and important principle of importing, that importing is going on. And that recognition might be possible even through childish projections and pride.

It's not restricted to that. It's not that those are the only times where we're importing. And it's not as if sometimes we import, and there's the possibility of not importing, of a bare attention, of this so-called being with things as they are—the phrase of the Buddha that's basically misinterpreted, I think—of receiving purely the facts of reality.

So recognize the fact of importing, and actually he's encouraging it. Quite a radical teaching.

Again, in the ideas that are underpinning and allowing and opening up this art for us, the art of perception, there's this recognition of the infinite possibilities of interpretation. I was listening to something by Glenn Mullen, another Buddhist teacher, and he was saying how his teacher had told him that many Buddhist teachers—classical Buddhist teachers like Nagarjuna and Asanga and Atisha—deliberately wrote in a style that would be open to multiple interpretations.

And why would you do that? Well, to encourage the creativity of the seeker, of the student. To encourage their exploration.

If you know a text like the Mūlamadhyamakakārikā, the Fundamental Verses on the Middle Way by Nagarjuna—an absolutely seminal, central text to all Mahayana Buddhism—consider how over the centuries, and still nowadays, contemporary Western teachers interpret not just certain passages from the book, but the whole project or the whole thrust of what Nagarjuna even means by emptiness. Such a range to the interpretations.

In Buddhist Tantra as well, there are certain Tantric texts, original Tantras, that have many commentaries written on them, and some of the commentators give four levels of meaning to every word, or every sentence. For example, the Tantric Chandrakīrti in his commentary on the Guhyasamāja enumerates all of them.

There's four levels of meaning in this text. Interesting also in Kabbalistic teachings, there's also four levels of meaning to every verse or word in the Bible. It's called pardes—an acronym for the four levels. Pardes also means, as Rachel said, paradise or garden. So the entering into this openness, this multiplicity of meaning and going into the meanings and making them lived and alive and soulful is entering the garden. But in both the Tantric commentaries and the Kabbalistic commentaries, all the meanings are valid. It's not one over the other. They're all valid.

The Bible, both the Old and New Testament, are much easier to read in these kinds of ways than, say, the Pali Canon, because the Bible is, to me, clearly written in a kind of mythical language. It's amenable to, it's open to that multiplicity of interpretation because it's imaginal. Again, it was only with the rise of Protestantism and the kind of lit-eralism and the wanting to reduce the Bible to one singular meaning—everything just means one thing and you're either right or wrong and it's all very literal. But the Pali Canon is a little trickier. It's very hard to take most of it in any kind of mythical way. Some, yes. But this multiplicity of interpretation, you also see it with Western philosophers. The diversions of opinion on what Kant really meant by something, or Hegel, or Nietzsche, or Heidegger, or Derrida—it's pretty clear that some of them are writing in an ambiguous style that's open to plurality, and they're even acknowledging that, for instance Derrida.

But for us, what all this means is this infinite possibility of interpretation. It legitimizes and grounds and opens up for us this poetic artistic attitude—not just in regard to texts and Buddhist texts or whatever texts, but also to existence. This poetic attitude to existence we're talking about—alchemy—is really what that involves. Poetry and art, the poetry and art of perception.

It's actually William Blake, who was both an artist and a poet, who somewhere wrote, "A double vision is always with me." Meaning, yes, of course, I can see the things that we all agree on now in our post-scientific revolution, Western Enlightenment agreement on things. Of course I can see that. That's one of my visions. But I have another vision, a double vision, a second vision that is always with me, and that's the imaginal vision. Because multiple vision is possible. It's interesting—it's an artist and a poet, someone not a mystic, but someone who had that sensibility, that kind of attitude, and broadened it to existence.

So yes, going right back to the beginning of the talk, there's the imaginal realm conceived of as something real, or at the other extreme, conceived of as completely nonreal, completely invalid, completely a waste of time. My tendency and encouragement is more to view the imagination, the imaginal realm, not so much as something that's real, but more as a mode of attention, a mode of awareness, a mode of being. This includes conceptual frameworks and ways of looking, playing with that, modes of conceiving, modes or ways of looking. And that opens up the imaginal realm. The imaginal realm is really a mode of being, a mode of attention, a mode of awareness, ways of looking and conceiving.

William Blake wrote something even more interesting, radical, if you like, or strange-sounding to modernist ears. He said, "Imagination is the savior. Imagination is the savior, or imagination is the Christ." What does that mean? What's he on about? Imagination is the savior. Imagination is the Christ. And even within that, what does he mean when he says Christ? Saving us from what? Imagination is saving us from what?

From the flatland. From single vision, what he calls Newton's sleep. From an absence of soul-making. And also from what Friedrich Nietzsche almost kept drawing attention to—the dead end of modernist nihilism. So it's through this art and through the imaginal that the dead end of modernist nihilism can be transcended, gone through and then gone beyond. The meaninglessness that pervades existence, the valuelessness that pervades existence, as Nietzsche pointed out. It needs an art to go beyond that and not get stuck in a modernist nihilism.

And there's more to this. Imagination is the savior, is the Christ.

So if we think about the ways that we can conceive of or view or relate to perception, perceptions. One is a very normal and, for us, obvious way that perceptions are received. They're received from the reality of the world. They reflect or represent that reality. This is a normal assumption, a normal mode of conceiving of perception as we move through the world. Maybe it's necessary at times. Of course, we relate to perception that way. It's part of how we move in the world. So perception as something received.

But secondly, it's possible to relate to perception—this is more subtle—perception as something gift or grace from the divine, from God. This is also received, but it has a whole other dimensionality to it. My perception, even the simplest perception, is a gift or a grace from the divine.

But because we investigate in meditation this flexibility of perception and we investigate the dependent arising of perception, the fabrication, dependent arising of perception, we can also come to see through all that, through playing with all that in practice, that perception can also be regarded in a third way as opportunity. Perception as opportunity.

Through perceiving this way, through this cosmopoiesis, through this image, through this fantasy of myself and other and what's happening, there is opportunity as related to the word door, porta—opportunity. Porta is door in Latin—opportunity. We can, through the image, all kinds of possibilities open for us. Open for consciousness, for the heart, for the being, for the life, for meaningfulness, for soul, all of that. So perception as opportunity, as door.

And didn't Jesus say, "I am the way"? So imagination, imaginal perception as doors, as opportunities. I am the way because I am a way, if you like. Opportunity.

And related to that, fourth way of conceiving or viewing perception is—what about this? Perception as redemptive work. Perception as redemptive work. And again, tying it back to Christ. Christ is the redeemer, right? If you know the lingo from Christianity. Perception as redemptive work.

So re-enchantment as redemptive work from the disenchantment that's so pervasive through the cosmopoiesis. We are redeeming something. We're healing something, but it's through perception. But also the emphasis on work. This is something that we can actively engage in, actively practice, actively play with, like art is work. We talk about works of art.

So Tantra can be viewed as redemptive work, redeeming the whole perception of self, other world, matter, all of that. And actually one way, for those of you who are a little bit familiar with Tantric teachings—and again I hope at some point in the future to talk more about this on another retreat—we can regard the imaginal realm as what's called the sambhogakaya. It's one of the Buddha bodies, the trikaya, the three bodies of the Buddha.

So there's the aspects, if you like, of Buddha nature, or dimensions of Buddha nature, and Buddha nature in the sense of a kind of divinity really, all-pervasive, ultimate mind that is not separate from the world, from matter, et cetera. So this realm of the imaginal, the imaginal realm is the sambhogakaya. It's one of the bodies, if you like. And again, notice the language, one of the bodies of the Buddha nature, of the divinity. And again, the Christ. So tying all this together, there's similarities there. Imagination is the Christ. Sambhogakaya is the realm of the imaginal, the realm of divine appearances, the appearances of tantric deities and mandalas and Buddha realms, et cetera. All that's sambhogakaya. And it's an aspect of Buddha nature as ultimate reality, as the divinity, divine consciousness, if you like, and that way that pervades the whole world.

More, still, about this art and the art of perception. Some of you will be artists or musicians or write poetry seriously, et cetera. And don't you recognize that when we make a piece of art or music or compose music or a poem, how in making it, it makes you, it shapes you. The work itself feeds back and influences and shapes, especially if one takes one's time and edits and revises and spends time with the work in the subtle shaping of it. We shape it, it shapes us.

Similar with the imaginal and the art of perception. We're acknowledging that we shape it—there's an art there—but it shapes us too. And what I mentioned earlier, there's a recognition that we both are creating. We create this work of art, but somehow we also discover it.

Again, sometimes you have this sense—I think as Michelangelo said—it's like I'm just chipping away at the marble to reveal the sculpture that's already underneath. That's how he thought of it. Sometimes there's a sense of like, I'm getting to something, I'm revealing, I'm uncovering something. We're discovering the piece of art that we're creating. And we recognize this both/and.

And perception and imaginal perception, we can view them the same. Tom Cheetham, I read a little passage by him where he says this word "invention"—so it's another word for creation, right, invention—comes from the Latin invenire, which literally means to come upon, in other words, to discover. So the original meaning of invention was discovery. It's only in the late sixteenth century with the rise of the whole modern sense and experience of self and subjectivity that the whole notion of, or the whole meaning of the word "invent" came to mean to make something up. It was flipped 180 degrees, what it actually means.

But as I said, all this—this create/discover, this shaping and being shaped—we recognize that in relation to images. We recognize also this slip historically, the movement away from discovering images in the imaginal realm as if they had some kind of objective reality towards they're just made up. It's just rubbish, isn't it? And with that, correspondingly, the devaluing of the imaginal as ways of knowing, devaluing of the imaginal epistemologically.

So art, this notion of art and our encouragement then through these practices—now it's like meditation, really what I would like, and I hope you can get this feeling on this retreat—is that it extends to life. This whole notion of art extends to life, to the ways we feel and see ourself, others, the whole of existence. So art as—you know, the usual way we think about art—then the art of meditation, and the art of playing with perception and meditation, then it actually just becomes life. The thing you have to sit in a certain posture and it's all very formal, you have to go on retreat for X amount of time, just becomes life. This is how we live in the art of perception or recognizing life existence as the art of perception.

There's another little quote from Nietzsche. He writes, "We should learn from artists while being wiser than they are in other matters. For with them, this subtle power"—the power of making things, of making beauty, of arranging things, of interpretation, of recognizing the work of art as both created and discovered, all that that's involved for artists—"for with them, this subtle power usually comes to an end where art ends and life begins. But we want to be the poets of our life, first of all, in the smallest, most everyday matters."

So these little moments, little shifts, small everyday matters. The imaginal comes and touches us on the arm. Something opens in the perception just for a moment or two. These are important moments. We can go with them, open them, nourish them, explore them, capitalize on them. And the encouragement to really do that deliberately so that this art of perception extends to the whole of our existence.

And if we regard and relate to the senses that we have and the views, the perceptions that we have of the self, of the other, of the cosmos—if we regard and relate to these as works of art, listen to the words there, works of art—then to me that implies that we can never reduce or fully comprehend self, other, world. Again we're back to this inexhaustibility. As works of art, they have an inexhaustibility. The very sense of them is something that has a beyondness to it. Can never fully reduce them or to some explanation fully comprehend them.

So part of the problem with scientism is that it tries to explain everything from a certain framework and point of view and assumption and reality base, from materialism and reductionism. But this simply will not do. It simply doesn't match or meet or extend really to what needs—to the beauty of things and the soul of things and the meaningfulness of things.

So to always explain things in terms of neurology or biology or evolutionary, you know, biological evolutionism or from the reductionisms of materiality—you know, analyzing a great painting in terms of the molecular structure of the paint and the canvas, it might be interesting to a certain extent. It might explain something. But the art—where's the art? It will explain nothing about the actual art, about meaning. It will explain nothing about the meaning or the meaningfulness that that painting has for us and how it moves us and what moves us in it and what's most important to us.

So the most important thing about this painting is what it does for the soul, so to speak. And a materialist explanation can do nothing to explain that. It almost does not go anywhere at all towards explaining that.

And I would also add to this that great art, if we can use such a word without sounding pompous, great art is never going to be fully understood. There's always something that's beyond even what the artist can sometimes get their heads around or intended. It's only kind of whatever the opposite of great art is—poor art—that can be kind of summed up and explained and fully understood. There's this inexhaustibility. To me good art repays...

what we bring to it in terms of our attention, it will repay us, it will nourish us, it will delight us and open to us and reveal more and more of itself. We will discover more and more dimensions to the degree and dependent on the energy and the quality of the attention we bring to it—the openness and the fullness of our receptivity, our sensitivity, the aliveness of the energy and attention that we bring to it. To that degree it keeps repaying us.

There's a fertility to really great pieces of art. They can be appreciated in different ways, approached from different angles. If you're doing something like Hamlet, how many different ways are there of interpreting that play? Or a Beethoven symphony—you can approach it this way, that way. There's this inexhaustible richness.

All this connects to the art of perception—what we perceive as self, other, world. There's this same inexhaustibility if we really regard them as works of art. But we recognize too, filling out the parallelism, the dependent arising of the art aspect itself. The beauty, the meaning and meaningfulness, the emotions that a work of art elicits for us—we recognize this dependent arising both in the realm of conventional art and in the realm of this art of perception.

So in conventional art, the beauty, the meaning, the meaningfulness, the emotions—all of that arises dependently from the confluence, the aliveness of the interaction between artist, art piece, audience, spectator, context. The information we have, others' views about this piece influence what happens for us. Others' views about art in general or about life in general, existential views—even the artist's own views affect how we view their art. Of course they do. Or generally other authorities, people whose views we give authority to, or just the authority of the dominant culture because it's pervasive and popular. All this mixes together in a dependent arising, and the things that are important to us in the art are recognized to be dependently arisen from all that.

All this too we recognize—it's the same for the imaginal, for cosmopoiesis, for enchantment. So many parallels with art.

And again, we can go even one step further. Sometimes there's a person working with the imaginal or these ideas of cosmopoiesis who thinks, "This is nuts. This is completely crazy." Or there's that doubt about reality and unsureness that we've touched on—very normal, very understandable, maybe an important part of this process nowadays.

But again, putting it into parallel with the artistic process or our relationship with art, you probably don't consider art that you love to be nuts. It's art. It's not nuts. It's not about reality in that literal sense, so doubt doesn't enter in that way.

Even more than that, we can be deeply moved by some piece of art, whatever medium it's in, and moved not just emotionally and not just in ways that we can understand or reductively explain—"Oh, it's a piece about impermanence, it's a poem about my childhood," or whatever. The ways that art moves us go beyond what we can understand about how it's moving us or what's being moved. There's an unfathomability, a complexity, a mystery in the very resonances for the soul, the emotions, the body, the perceptions. That unfathomability in the resonance is deeply important.

It's moving to us, has its effects, all of which function without any idea that this is reality. Because we know it's art, or it's a movie, or it's a novel, or whatever. Without any notion that this is reality, yet still it does something powerful to the soul. Same thing with images, same thing with seeing an image as an image, with cosmopoiesis. It's not hampered by qualms about reality.

And it doesn't need to be realist art or even related to anything recognizable. This art, this painting or music, doesn't have to have any relation to anything recognizable in my life or in anyone's life. An abstract painting—why is it that Rothko is so moving, so deeply moving to so many people and in so many different ways? Or Howard Hodgkin. Or music that has no words to it. I can't say it's about anything you could put into words. It's not translatable. It's not reducible.

Even more than this, in terms of this relationship with reality—when we relate to something as art, it liberates it from this kind of tight, literalistic relationship with reality. And so it can do its soul work for us. It can do its transformative work. It can open up something without this hampering by all these qualms regarding realism.

I think it was Oscar Wilde—I can't remember exactly, but I recognize this for myself. He said something like how much it broke his heart, as much as any person or any event involving an actual person in his life, what happened to someone in a novel by Balzac. And I recognize this too with certain characters in novels or certain historical figures that mean a lot to me—people I've never met and who are dead now and whom I'll never meet, but somehow I care for them, I love them. As Oscar Wilde said, I care for them and love them as much as real people. Think how strange that is.

Loving a character in a novel or a fictional character that's a product of art—loving and caring for them as much as we do for the so-called real people in our lives—would strike someone locked into certain mindfulness or insight meditation dogmas as rather mad. They might quickly want to interpret it: "Oh yes, it's because they represent a facet of your heart, like your compassion or whatever."

But even with the real people in our lives—the flesh and blood friends, relatives, family, loved ones, lovers—perhaps what we love about them is their divine dimensions. This is what moves us. This is what we care about. It's not taking away anything from the human; it's actually expanding what is involved in what the human being is, or how we see human beings—both as subject and object. When I love someone, it's because I am sensitive to, and resonating with, and moved by the divine dimensions of their being. That could involve the whole of their being, but it's a way of seeing.

Often people want to think that beliefs, and also the creation of beauty in one's life and aesthetics, are for the purpose of consolation. Because of our existential situation—maybe not being able to face up to that—people believe certain things, so the idea goes. Sometimes even the creation of beauty is to soften the brute horrors of existence, the facts of our existence.

But if we question that, and if we translate the idea of believing to this idea of the flexibility of a range of conceivings—of views, of ways of looking that we're entertaining and holding lightly and not as true—and if we're also holding this idea of the otherness and the autonomy of images, of an image that means its beauty is not just created but also discovered because there's this otherness, this autonomy...

These two ideas together: belief becomes flexible range of conceptions and ways of looking, and otherness grants that we discover beauty and not just create it for our own purposes. Then the whole idea of belief and beauty being for the purpose of consolation in our life—of reassurance—that crumbles a little bit. It opens up in a different direction.

Belief and beauty are—or if you like, conceptions entertained and beauty created and discovered—aspects of the creative act of perceiving and perception. And that means they're aspects of being, because our being is perception. That also includes, as I said, the beauty of embodied action, in creativity, in kindness, in ethics.

But beauty—creation of beauty, discovery of beauty—and also this playing with, you could say playing with beliefs, or playing with conceptions and views, ways of looking, they become fields of play, fields of opportunity: soul-making. That becomes the point rather than consolation—soul-making.

So just to finish: all of this—recognizing the fact of fantasy and image in our lives, in our perceptions, and also the understanding of emptiness—these things, these two recognitions, allow this art of perception. They open it up, they form its ground, they legitimize it.

It's very different from realist, concretizing views. The dominant view of secular modernity, the existentialist views that permeate a lot of our culture, a lot of philosophy, a lot of psychology, and more and more a lot of Dharma and secular Buddhism, really are formed on, take off from, have their basis in realist assumptions—oftentimes without completely being honest about it.

So for example, the now popular replacement of the word "truths" in the Four Noble Truths by "tasks"—as I said before, it seems like an important move, but still underpinning all that is a whole assumption about what is true and what is real materially and existentially, and what's not true and not real. And that's all functioning with all kinds of limiting effects, without being acknowledged as a perspective of reality.

It's questioning myths and assumptions that opens all this up. Questioning, questioning, questioning.

Again, I'll share a passage from Nietzsche, where he says: "What is familiar is what we are used to. What is familiar is what we are used to, and what we are used to is most difficult to know. That is, to see as a problem. That is, to see as strange and distant, outside us."

In other words, these ideas that imbue our culture—as I said before, we're indoctrinated by them. We just assume that they're true and we don't even realize that they're operating. It's very hard to realize what is actually operating for us as views. Some of them we never even articulate explicitly, or everyone agrees on them. We never question them. But this questioning—questioning the assumptions and the myths that run through our views and our sense of reality—this questioning is a massive part of what opens things up.

For instance, Charles Taylor, a contemporary philosopher—he's very old now, but wrote this massive tome called A Secular Age on secularism. He talks right at the beginning about what he calls "subtraction stories." It's the idea that our current view of things—the view of modernity or secularity—is really what we've done: shaken off or exposed as unreal all the superstitions. We've subtracted all the superstitions and all the nonsense and all the misapprehensions.

and rubbish that people before us used to believe. Now we are the ones—if not the generation, then the period in history following the scientific revolution and the Western Enlightenment—who see things nakedly and truly as they are, because we've subtracted all that other rubbish.

You see this as well in fantasies of secular Buddhism: subtracting all the spiritual, mystical, metaphysical gobbledygook and being left with the real thing. One of the things Charles Taylor points out over the length of more than one of his books is how this modernist, secularist view is just as constructed as any other view in history. It results from new inventions, new technologies, from certain shifts in self-view and other ideas from the history of ideas—all of that is constructed and conditioned. It's not a naked, objective, existential reality that we're dealing with.

The myth of subtraction stories, he points out—he says he's devoted to exposing the falsity of those kinds of stories, so popular, so easy to swallow, so seemingly convincing.

The philosopher Michel Foucault says something similar in quite strong language. Sometimes he talked about his work as a kind of archaeology—in other words, digging down into the historical roots of any particular philosophy or position or social structure or idea or convention. In that archaeology, he says, we will ask them—these ideas or philosophies, and in this case we're talking about questioning the assumptions and the myths that we just take for granted, that seem so much a part of what is real, what is generally unquestioned.

We will ask them, he says, where they come from. Some people say, "Well, it comes from the Pali Canon." But that too, as I've pointed out elsewhere, is a historical fantasy. There's a fantasy of the Buddha, there's a fantasy of origins, there's a fantasy wrapped up in that claim, the belief and assumptions that shape certain interpretations of texts or certain historical claims as being absolute, naked things—as it was intended to be.

But Foucault says we will ask them where they come from, toward what historical destination they are moving without being aware of it. In other words, these assumptions that we have, these views that we have—there's a lot of unawareness in them, to echo Nietzsche. Then he continues: what naivety blinds them to the condition that makes them possible? Again, echoing Charles Taylor: How did this thing even come about? Is it really a naked reality, or is it also conditioned, constructed through history?

And lastly, Foucault says, what metaphysical enclosure encloses their rudimentary positivism? In other words, this idea is so popular, so seemingly convincing and appealing—that we can really be just empirically with things as they are and strip away all this so-called metaphysics and gobbledygook. But actually there's metaphysics involved in that. I've talked about this in other talks. And as Foucault says, it's an enclosure. It limits and encloses what seems to be a radicalism—a rudimentary, basic positivism: "These are the facts. We're stripping everything down to facts." Are you really doing that? Or is there metaphysics and enclosure and all kinds of unquestioned assumptions wrapped up in that?

Fundamental questioning is so important for me, so important for a practitioner, so important for our culture nowadays, so important to liberate this art.

There's another quote I'd like to read from Northrop Frye. Essentially, what he's calling criticism—this kind of questioning, what I call critique at the beginning of the retreat—what criticism or critique can do, according to Northrop Frye, is awaken students to successive levels of awareness of the mythology that lies behind the ideology in which their society indoctrinates them. An awareness of the mythology that lies behind the ideology in which their society indoctrinates them.

It grants students—this questioning grants students—an emancipatory distance, a liberating distance from their own society, and gives them a vision of a higher human state. Ultimately this transforms their experience, he goes on, so that the poetic model becomes a model to live by in what he terms a charismatic mode. It's a Greek word, but he's really talking about this mode, this art of perception—being in the mode of being of the imaginal, the art of perception, the cosmopoiesis.

Myths become myths to live by, what he calls myths to live by, and metaphors become metaphors to live in, which not only work for us but constantly expand our horizons. And that relates to the soul-making and the expansion of eros-psyche-logos that I've talked about elsewhere. What he calls entering the world, through all this, of kerygma or transformative power—the soul-making, this re-enchantment.

But it's the questioning—questioning and the insight, whether it's philosophical insight, meditative insight into dependent arising and emptiness, psychological insight, recognizing how fantasy and image imbue our lives and our perceptions. All of that is the questioning and the insights that will liberate the possibility and the range of this art of perception. Liberate also the depths to which it can be soul-making for us, nourishing and re-enchanting.

So it liberates it. Questioning and insight liberate it. They also ground it. So important.

CHAPTER 31

Energy and Transubstantiation: The Alchemy of the Body (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 43 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea explores the nuanced practice of working with the energy body, addressing common challenges and experiences that arise in meditation. He clarifies the relationship between energy body awareness and various manifestations of pīti - the pleasant bodily experiences that arise from non-sensual origins during concentrated states. Students inquire about difficulties maintaining energy body awareness in challenging environments, the heavy helmet-like sensations that can arise in deeper concentration, and how to work skillfully with agitation and contraction.
>
> Burbea emphasizes that energy body practice is not about achieving particular pleasant experiences, but rather cultivating a specific way of attending to the bodily space. He offers practical guidance for working with both pleasant and difficult energetic states, including techniques for soothing agitation and expanding awareness space. The discussion also touches on the relationship between samādhi practice and imaginal work, exploring how concentrated states can support soul-making perception.
>
> The session concludes with reflections on enchantment and cosmopoiesis - how our ways of perceiving can 'sing into being' experiences of divinity and beauty that re-enchant our relationship with the cosmos. This represents a foundational exploration of how energy body sensitivity supports both meditative development and the cultivation of what Burbea calls 'soulful' perception.

We'll be recording these Q&As. If you don't feel comfortable with your question being recorded, just say so and Mark will turn off the machine. Generally speaking, your questions will be helpful for other people and for you later on, but if you prefer privacy, simply let us know.

Question: Individual vs. Universal Energy Body

John asks about the distinction between speaking of "the energy body" versus "my energy body" or "your energy body," wondering if this points to there being just one energy body.

At one level, yes, there is one, and there are many, and there is none—they're all true. The languaging of "the energy body" rather than "my energy body" is partly a habit of speech, but it's also intended to create a little less of the self's tight grip around the experience. When we say "my energy body," there's often more self-evaluation and identification involved. Using "the energy body" allows a little more looseness in the relationship of identification with the experience, creating more space rather than the contracted sense of "me and mine."

This isn't necessarily pointing toward the mystical experience of everything being one big energy body—which is a very fine and important perception—but that's not so much what we're aiming for right now. Such variations can open up quite spontaneously, even on retreat, but that's not our primary focus at this stage.

Question: Difficulty Accessing the Energy Body in Different Environments

Chrissy shares that she finds it easy to rest in the energy body when sitting in the meditation hall with the group, but struggles when outside, especially in windy conditions, or when lying down where she feels the pressure on her back. She notices that when something makes her bodily edges or skin stand out, or when stronger sensations take over her sensing capacity, she can't access the energy body.

This is a very interesting observation. Part of this could simply be familiarity. The usual way we're conditioned to pay attention to the body isn't through the energy body—it's through sensations, especially if you've practiced mindfulness and insight meditation. There's a natural propensity for awareness to default to sensations.

The more you touch base with the energy body, the more you want to make it easy for yourself at first. Don't struggle too much in difficult conditions. Instead, hang out where it's accessible, getting used to what I'm calling this sensibility—this particular tuning of awareness. It becomes increasingly second nature, like learning to ride a bike with all its gears. Eventually, you can shift fluidly between sensations, energy body, and other kinds of bodily awareness.

Rather than forcing it where it's difficult, look for in-between environments where it's easier. Let the capacity expand naturally to other regions.

Here are two possibilities to explore: First, try making the awareness space bigger. When we talk about energy body or energy space, we're referring to a space that's usually somewhat bigger than the physical body. Awareness can contract very small, so consciously expanding it might help.

I could pay attention to a minute area of attention in the tip of my finger, for instance, as you can, or I can go really huge. There's a whole spectrum of gradations of how big the awareness can be.

The energy body tends to be this kind of space, but it might serve to go really big for a while and just let everything be there. You'll get maybe a mix of the more usual kinds of sensations in awareness, but they're in a bigger space, so the mind is not sucked into them so much. Do you understand? It has more room, and you just stay—it'll shrink, that's fine—and you expand as big as you can. In that space, you've got sensations and things dancing around, and maybe you can have sensations and energy in that space, and then you can tune back in.

The converse possibility is maybe very gently to go into the center of the body. So if something's on your skin, just gently explore what's happening right at the core. Sometimes for some people what can be helpful is actually using the imagination a little bit. As I said, anything goes with the imagination. But one thing that's helpful when we're talking about the core is imagining a line of energy up the body. Let these sensations be—you don't have to fight these skin sensations—but just imagine that line. Maybe it's a certain color or whatever, but feel into how that vertical axis feels energetically in the middle of the body. Does that make sense?

If you just hold that—going in a little bit more with that imagination helping—then become aware of the whole space but with that central axis. That might help as well.

But generally I'd say don't worry about it too much. This thing, as I said this morning, grows more until it becomes just another dimension of life. It's just another way we can feel the body.

A student asks: "When I'm practicing and I become more concentrated, I get a sense of what I think you call pīti, and it feels like I'm wearing a helmet or a dress or something like that. It's not tingly or anything, but it feels heavy actually. It feels as though there really is physically something there. Is that the energy body? Because it doesn't go around very much—it stays mostly around the head. Is that what you call the energy body, or is that something different?"

The sensation is described as feeling like wearing a great big hat or helmet, with a quality of pressure that's mildly pleasant.

This word pīti is a term the Buddha used quite a lot when he talked about samādhi. I would define it basically as any pleasant experience in the bodily space that arises from a non-sensual origin. In other words, I'm meditating and it arises. It's not arising out of someone touching my skin or from a taste or something like that. All these definitions have edges to them.

This pīti arises and can take many, many different forms. What characterizes it is the non-sensuality of its origin and the pleasantness. It can be extremely intense—like blow the roof off the top of your head kind of thing—or really quite mild. But it's all pīti and it's all good.

So is that the energy body? What I want to emphasize—I think I said this morning as well—the energy body is not a certain kind of experience so much. There are a lot of different experiences that can come within what we might call the energy body. It's a way of attending to the space of the body. So pīti is a certain kind of energy.

There's a lot in your question, so let's take it apart a little bit. Someone wrote me a note this morning, and I was thinking maybe a good analogy is like harmonic overtones. When you hit a note on a musical instrument, it has multiple resonances of other notes that are sometimes less loud. Are you familiar with this?

We could say all of that is the energy body. Within that, we can tune to different wavelengths of experience, or in the analogy of sound, different tones. So pīti is one wavelength—or even there are many different kinds of pīti. They're different tones within this spectrum. In a way, they're all present at the same time. We just don't notice them, funnily enough. You could think of it like that.

Does that make sense in terms of what's the energy body and what's pīti? Just for that part of the question?

"It sounds as though you're saying that all of it is the energy body. It's just a different wavelength."

So when I wrap my knuckles on that and feel the sensation—slightly unpleasant, whatever—you could call that energy body, but actually it's more a certain frequency of sensation. Energy body is usually characterized by more subtlety of the wavelength.

Does this make sense to people? These words we use—gosh, when we get to words like soul and God, it's even more complex. What are we talking about here? But there's something—after a while you get a feel for this. We're really talking about a way of paying attention and a certain dimension of our experience as human beings that oftentimes goes unnoticed, either because of our meditative training or just because people in society don't tend to talk about it.

So the kind of pīti you're describing—which is one of many, many different kinds of pīti, many different kinds of pleasure that can come up—the energy body feels that way at a certain time. As you practice more, you realize, "Oh, that's just one type," and then there are others and loads of others.

In terms of it being up here, yeah, that's normal. What I might ask is: it sounds quite static from what you're describing. Does it have any movement in it?

"It is quite static."

I mean, I have experienced the other kinds of pīti, like tingling and showering and that kind of thing, but this feels very different.

"And it feels as though—I don't know whether this is my imagination or what—but it feels as though it almost has a sort of boundary, but it's very diffuse. Which is why I wonder whether that's more like an energy body experience."

I think it's all manifestations or experiences of energy body, everything you've described. Quite characteristic of this way of working with the energy body is a sense of some kind of boundary that is quite diffuse. I don't know where it is exactly—that's quite characteristic. But it doesn't have to be. There are lots of possibilities, but that's quite characteristic.

A rule of thumb is: if it's steady, this pleasantness, relatively steady, then your job at times—if you want to go more towards samādhi—is just to enjoy it. That's your priority. That's number one—like flashing neon: enjoy, enjoy, enjoy! And how do you do that? Well, there are lots of ways of doing that.

One is to find where it's strongest. Here's this experience that's sort of up here—maybe it's completely homogeneous over that area, maybe there's an area where it's strongest, maybe sort of around here. Just as you might pay attention to the breath at the nostrils, you dive in, you focus on where it's strongest, you just nuzzle into it and really, really find the pleasure there. That's one option.

Another option is to be a bit more open with it, as if you're just bathing in this and receiving it. The whole area that's being touched by that—enjoying it, just bathing in it like it's really—and you're opening, opening.

So one mode of attention is a bit more probing, a bit more narrowly focused, really always seeking the pleasure. It's very hedonistic. It's good. The other is more like you're sunbathing and just soaking up the sun.

Make sense?

"Isn't that going into more practicing with joy and sukha?"

What we don't know is—one possibility is that as you do that, there are actually a number of possibilities. One is it just stays the same and you just enjoy it. Another possibility is that just by doing that, it starts to spread and fill the whole body. Now if we're talking about samādhi, that's something you want to gently encourage.

You have a second option there, which is to actually imagine it spreading. It feels like it just stops here. Just imagine that it spreads. Or just like—I mean not with your hands, but with your mind—just spread it in the body. And that can be like it's quite viscous, or it's really quite insubstantial and you're just spreading it.

You're painting your body with this essence. Sometimes just enjoying it, opening to it, getting into it, it will spread naturally. And sometimes it won't spread—it just stays localized. Fine, just enjoy that. So the size of it may or may not change.

If we're working towards samadhi, if that's the orientation, that's the intention, that's the conscious intention at any time, then that's what we're gently wanting to encourage—full body immersion. As the Buddha says, suffusing and saturating the whole body.

Another possibility is that as you do this, the quality of the energy changes. So it might shift, as you mentioned, to joy, or it might transform into stillness or peacefulness, or the quality of heaviness might become very light. There are all kinds of possibilities.

Now we could map territories here, but I think for now we don't need to. What you want with this kind of practice is to become a connoisseur—you know, like wine tasters who can be very discerning. We become connoisseurs in the realm of pleasure in the body. Very subtle, very strong, different kinds, different qualities. We really get to know, get familiar with each kind. Then you can start to map them out and see how that fits onto the Buddha's map of the jhānas and all that.

Does that give you a sense of how to work with this?

_Practitioner_: Yeah, I think I'm just wondering whether I should practice with the jhānas...

Oh, sorry. What?

Practitioner: Staying steadily with samadhi, not intensifying the pleasure or the stillness.

Oh, thank you for raising that. We have options here. If I use the word samadhi, I really mean a big spectrum of what's possible, of which the jhānas—the really deep states—are just part of that spectrum.

What needs to be clear is: what am I actually trying to do in practice right now? That means in this stretch of this sitting or walking.

At some points my intention might be towards samadhi. In the very broad sense, what that means is just gently encouraging a sense of well-being in the energy body space and the mind getting into that and enjoying it. We could say that's my samadhi direction. I'm not forcing it, I'm not pushing it, I'm not demanding, but that encompasses a whole range—from just sitting and actually not feeling pleasant and working with easing the unpleasant, to very mildly pleasant (nothing to write home about), all the way through all eight jhānas.

But that's all samadhi. So that's totally fine. You're working this subtle plasticine of the energy body, and if it feels like "this is good, this is really good," great—enjoy! If it goes into a jhāna, fine. It's all samadhi.

At other times, the intention and orientation with regard to the energy body is: "No, I'm just abiding here watching the emotional resonances." And it might be grief, it might be sadness, it might be boredom, it might be just peaceful, it might be joy. But I'm abiding with the sensitivity to the emotional resonances in the energy body. And if it's difficult—what's happening emotionally in the energy world—then I'm trying to work with that skillfully. What's helpful here? What does it need? Some love, some softness, some space, some image?

That's the second option.

The third option is working with images, which we did a little bit today. But as I say, always on this retreat, including the sensitivity to—whatever I do with images, I'm always in contact with my energy body. I'm trying to include that in the awareness because that's how I notice what's helpful, what's not, what's soul-making, what's not. The resonances, as we use that word.

Does that make sense? So broadly speaking, three options. And what's important is just clarity about what's happening.

_Practitioner_: And can one work with the imaginal in the full range, all through the jhānas, or just with a milder sense of samadhi?

Yeah, so the textbooks say, you know, if you're in jhāna then nothing else is going on in terms of images. What you find with a lot of jhāna practice, and what I find with teaching, is there is the possibility to be in a jhāna... See, a jhāna isn't an on-off switch. It's not black and white. When you start to get into it, you start to realize it's a territory, and there's no exact demarcation point like some people would have you believe.

But what's possible—some people find it easier than others—is to actually be in a jhāna and work with something like an image as well, or even work with a kind of skillful and reflective process. There are all kinds of possibilities. So I wouldn't exclude it.

You'll have to find out what's possible for you. If you're just learning the jhanas, generally speaking, I would say it's better to keep them more pure at first and learn the really pure version—nothing else is going on but this joy or whatever it is. And then after a while, you can realize that actually more may be possible.

Maywa's asking about the meditation we did today with the imaginal figure of love. She discerns two kinds of unfolding that happen there. One is tuning into the particulars and the character of that person. The other is a kind of movement towards dissolving together into one another and something more universal. How would we describe what happens then?

"The personal dissolves," she says, "but then I remember Catherine talking about keeping the personal, so then I try to keep it sitting with me."

When it dissolves, there are many kinds of dissolving. Sometimes the figure is in the body, sometimes different variations occur. Let's say for now—and this is part of the reason why we did this on day one of this retreat—everything's good in the big picture of things, but I think on this retreat we're wanting to stay more with the character of the imaginal figure, like that sense of it.

What you might find is that it dissolves in a way where your person and their person just dissolves in a kind of oneness of something like love. That's a beautiful experience. It's not so much what we're interested in on this retreat. That's a more likely experience in the kinds of meditation that we might teach—metta or insight meditation.

There's another way of it dissolving, which is what I've been calling cosmopoiesis. What happens is: here I am with this character—and I'll say more about this tomorrow, but let's just say a little bit now. I'm tuned to their character. I feel their love. I'm taking that in. There are resonances. I see their beauty and I see also their divinity. What does that mean? I don't know. Let's just leave it open for now, in fact.

There is a sense that they're more than the usual way our culture tends to think about the human being, or if they're even a human form at all. There's a divinity here, and I'm seeing the beauty of that. Something in my soul is touched by that sense of divinity. They're not losing the human. It's almost like extending the range—if there's a human figure or an animal figure—extending the range of what's there.

And then sometimes what can happen is, in being with that and the soul being touched by that beauty, by that love, by that divinity, it's as if the character of that soul starts to spread. So it's not just universal love; it's their love with their character. And somehow the whole of nature or cosmos is imbued with that particular character of that being. Does that make sense?

So something's gone from a singular, particular imaginal figure to what I would call a particular cosmopoiesis that's characterized with the same personality. Here are the trees, the sky, the earth, and somehow it's that figure and their divinity and their love writ large, imbued into the fabric of the cosmos. Cosmopoiesis—enchanting the cosmos in a very particular way.

That's the distinction that I think we're trying to lean more toward—it's the rarer variety in the kind of circles we tend to move in. The other one of just universal love or universal awareness is more normal as practice deepens in insight meditation and metta and those kinds of things. But we'll touch base about that again tomorrow.

I really like what you just said, but it feels quite a long way away. It sounds very interesting, that idea. My experience with the love figure was that at the beginning a lot of grief came up with the particular person that I'd chosen, and so I chose somebody else. And then I found that kind of opening happening. I just wondered if that was...

Yeah, absolutely. And go with the simpler one. All this is flexible. You know this anyway when you do the metta categories—someone's your benefactor, then they look at you the wrong way one day for half a second and hey, down to division four, you know? So it's all... go with... This is part of what we talk about—the sensitivity to the energy, what it's like. Okay, an hour ago it was her or him or whatever, and now this is just too complex. Go with what actually opens in the moment and trust that. So it's not so fixed.

A lot of the questions are quite advanced, if you like. I just want to make sure—the nuts and bolts of the energy body—if there's anyone feeling like, "yikes," or... Yeah, Lauren?

This kind of leads on from Chris's question about being outside and getting a sense of energy. It's very similar to Rowan's experience as well—piti in the hands, dropping, spreading a sense of pleasure, and kind of feeling like it's a little bit outside of the boundary of the skin. Outside, noticing very much a sense of appreciation, which feels good—flowers, birds, everything. Just wondering where to take that. It's not much of a sense of any energy body, just maybe a lightness to the body. Just wondering what avenue to take with that.

Keep the appreciation going. Open up to look for sensations. Maybe use the imagination within the sense of the energy body.

Okay, so I think maybe this goes back to "no right and wrong." Today we said emphasize the energy body, but as the retreat goes on, we're going to open up more the possibility. You say, "Okay, there's not much of a sense of the piti, but the lightness is there. The body feels light." That's energy body. If we go back to the musical analogy, that's a certain wavelength. Great.

So one option you have is: okay, just be with the lightness. That's tuning into the energy body. And let that... the lightness may not be obviously pleasant at first. When I start to pay attention to it and let it fill, I start to see, "Oh, actually lightness—we like the body feeling, generally speaking. It's nice, it's a pleasant feeling." It's more subtly pleasant.

So one option you have is—we have to be careful here. Energy body is not a certain experience. So if I had this piti, now I'm trying to get that back because that's the energy body. No. The energy body is a way of paying attention. And so lightness is also fine. It's good. So that's one option.

The appreciation—you've got appreciation as well. It's a really, really important part. I think hopefully this will get clearer. Sometimes it's just appreciate and don't... it's just let the heart appreciate, let the being, the senses appreciate. You don't have to try and do anything with that.

But there is... there's a third option that we're going to emphasize a little more, which is... I can't remember whose question it was now. But in response to Miwa... so...

Appreciation, like everything else, comes with a whole scale to it. It can be mild appreciation, it can be something that touches us so deeply that the soul is moved. And I think what we want to say is when the soul is moved...

What's happening there? Now there's something occurring in the energy body, there's something happening in the heart. There's also something happening in the perception.

When I'm moved, when the soul is deeply touched, when there's what I call soul making, when there's soulfulness there, the perception of whether it's a tree or nature or another human being or some image—the perception has got more dimensionality to it.

This tree is a bunch of atoms, and I can appreciate that—wonderful! I can go to the molecular structure and photosynthesis—fantastic! Other more soul-making appreciations have other dimensions. It's not obvious because we don't talk about it in our culture. We don't have a language for it, and we want to emphasize a lot on this retreat.

It's not something separate from the tree or the materiality of the tree or the nature of the tree or the evolution of the tree. But in and through the appearance is something that we might call a divinity or other dimensions. That might come into your appreciation. Partly what we're interested in is opening the sensibility to that.

Because the way that we're talking about, the way that we're defining imaginal, the way that we're defining cosmic oasis, and the way that we're defining enchantment—we could define all those in different ways. As we're talking about, that's a key aspect. So it might be that you start to pick up on that more.

Is this making sense?

If that's there, then as the retreat goes on, that's the kind of thing where we're still in touch with the lightness in the body or how that feels, but, ooh, what is that? Can I see the beauty of the divinity, or the divinity of the beauty in what I'm appreciating? Could be purely intra-psychic image, could be something in nature, could be another person, could be a memory of a friend.

Does this make sense? So this is the kind of thing we're going to be talking about. Our culture doesn't have a language for this, unfortunately. But if that makes sense, then you've got different options.

"My energy body, my experience today—sun's been present but also for all sorts of reasons that I'm likely going to—there's quite a lot of agitation out there."

Absolutely. It's totally okay. I'm thankful someone actually says that because you're not going to be alone. So thank you. What's your name?

"Jen."

Look, when we talk about energy body, we're definitely not talking about just a pleasant experience. If anyone comes to me and says, "My energy body is always pleasant," I just say, "You're not paying attention. Pay attention." It contracts, it opens, it softens, it hardens, it gets pleasant, it gets unpleasant. Sometimes across quite a narrow spectrum, sometimes a really big spectrum. That's the deal.

Again, going back to what's the intention at any time in practice. When it's difficult, contracted or tight or agitated, as you say, the question is: What does it need right now? What does it need?

Agitation might need a kind of soothing. Maybe you can soothe in lots of different ways. I'm not forcing it to be different. I'm responding with care to something. That's really important. There's a caring response to how this feels.

Sometimes it's just in the kind of attention we pay attention with. So again, like we said with Chrissy, one option is just going to a much bigger space and letting the agitation kind of rumble around, but it's rumbling around in a much bigger space, and that can tend to help.

Sometimes it's about almost imagining an energy of warmth, for instance, around the agitation and something soothing. Now it could be a full-blown imaginal figure doing something with love, or it could just be kind of energetic imagining—if that makes sense—partly visual, but something soothing.

You can use your breath to soothe the agitation. So you can really play with it. Again, you're not forcing something, rejecting something to be different. You're caring, like you would if a baby's agitated.

I mean, sometimes, of course, parents in the midst of exhaustion do get frustrated—"Just stop crying!"—but that's life. Generally though, the instinct is to wonder, "Oh, what can I do to soothe this little one?" And there are countless possibilities.

Sometimes what's needed is recognizing that there's an emotion creating the disturbance in the energy body, and we want to tune more toward that emotional aspect. It becomes a question of what does this emotion need? So our attention isn't purely physical—it can be deeply emotional as well.

Just in terms of how we pay attention: when there's something difficult—agitation or contraction or grief or whatever—the normal human reaction includes some aversion to it. Rather than judging that aversion, one skillful option is to become more interested in the aversion itself rather than going straight to the underlying feeling. Can I relax around this resistance? Can I soften around that secondary layer? Sometimes dealing with our reactivity to the reactivity can be tremendously helpful.

And thank you for bringing this up, because it's crucial to understand—anyone paying attention will notice this is simply the nature of the beast. What we want is for our range to expand, to be okay with all of that—all the coming and going. We want to be skillful when experience is pleasant, skillful when it's difficult, and also skillful when it's neutral, because there's real art in recognizing that "nothing much is happening here" can actually open into something profound.

We should stop for tea, but let me address this beautiful question about re-enchantment. You're asking if it means putting song back into the cosmos, connecting it to cosmopoiesis—the making of worlds through something like music. There's another meaning of enchantment that involves being trapped, captivated in an unskillful way, losing our center to some compulsive idea or craving.

But there are different kinds of skillful enchantment, beautiful enchantment. It relates to the French enchanté—to spell, to magic. Re-enchanting the cosmos, "the poetry of perception"—which I think was this retreat's title—recognizes that we are the poets. We create poetry through our perceiving, through our sensing of the world.

The poet sings, and I mean this in the broadest sense. Through our ways of looking, we sing beings into existence. We chant into being something that re-enchants the world. It's a deliberate use of these words, recognizing that perception itself is fundamentally creative. Through understanding this, we can open up divinity and beauty.

Should we have just one minute of silence together before we end?

[One minute of silence]

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 32

On Orientations in Practice (Live and Shortened version)

Rob Burbea · 48 min

> In this dharma talk from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea presents a radical shift in meditation orientation, moving away from conventional emphasis on continuity of mindfulness toward flexible ways of looking. He introduces the energy body as a central practice tool—not merely mindfulness of physical sensations, but a subtle attunement to the vibrant field around and through the body.
>
> Burbea challenges several dominant assumptions in contemporary insight meditation: the priority of continuous mindfulness, atomistic attention to moment-by-moment processes, and realist approaches to experience. Instead, he advocates for deliberately moving in and out of different ways of looking as a path to understanding dependent arising and emptiness. This flexibility serves multiple purposes: developing samādhi through energy body harmonization, skillfully working with emotions as they manifest energetically, and using felt sense as a navigator for practice.
>
> The talk emphasizes precision through subtlety rather than microscopic awareness—discerning the effects of different ways of looking on emotions, energy body, freedom, and world perception. Burbea encourages creative experimentation with practice, using soul resonance and energy body feedback as guides rather than adhering to prescribed techniques. The ultimate aim is various forms of loosening that open practitioners to deeper experiences of beauty, sacredness, and the eternal through this more artistic, poetic approach to perception and practice.

Good morning everyone.

I want to talk a little bit about practice this morning. For now on the retreat, we want to be emphasizing the energy body. I'm not going to repeat much about the energy body because we've asked you to listen to all those talks explaining this material. I will mention that there will be a chance to ask questions about this later today, so if you feel unsure about certain experiences or how they fit together, we'll have that opportunity.

Let me say very briefly about the energy body: What are we talking about when we say energy body? It's a little bit different than the usual mindfulness of sensations that we're used to in the insight meditation tradition or in the mindfulness teachings. When I hit my knuckles on the wall and feel the sensations there, when I feel the coolness of the air on my skin, when I feel the sensations on the hands with water running from the tap—this is all what we're used to: mindfulness of sensations.

This overlaps with what we might call mindfulness of the energy body. They overlap, but I would say we're tuning with a different sensibility when we talk about energy body. It's a different kind of tuning, and that ability to tune that way grows with practice. At first, it's a strange thing—what are they on about? But as we do it more, it becomes just part of one's life, that kind of sensibility to the body.

We're really talking about this space, a little bit bigger than the physical body—that field, that field of vibration, of feeling, of texture, of energy. We're talking about a sensitivity to that, a tuning to that, to what's there. In some ways, we might say that when we use a word like "energy body," it's as much that we're talking about, or perhaps more that we're talking about, a kind of awareness, a kind of sensitivity, a sensibility. We're talking about a subtlety of attention, more than a particular experience.

We're talking about a kind of way of paying attention more than about the body per se, or a certain experience like "I remember when I had this flow of energy—that's what the energy body is." No, that's a certain experience. We're talking about paying attention in a different mode, a different way. It's a way of feeling the body, a way of attending or attuning to this field, this space here—the space of and the space around the body.

Why do we do this? There are a number of reasons. One of them is for the sake of what I would call samadhi—meaning the chance to energize the body and the mind, to nourish the body and the mind, to rest body and mind, to let that whole field here, this space here with the awareness, become bright and calm. That serves as a real resource in our lives. There's so much that we can benefit from learning to harmonize the energy body and dwell in that and let the awareness spread in that. The energy body is an integral factor of all samadhi—it's a way of approaching samadhi.

The second reason is it's really helpful in relation to our emotional life. What reverberates, what resonates in the body, in the energy body, expresses and reflects our emotions—some of the very subtle micro-nuances of our emotional life. To have some facility with that, to have a way of approaching it and holding it via the energy body, can be really skillful, really helpful when there's difficult emotion, but also when there's lovely emotion, and also surprisingly helpful when there's very subtle emotion, not really much going on.

The third reason for emphasizing the energy body is that it can serve as a kind of navigator, a kind of indicator of when we're on the right track. It serves to help guide us in practice. Whether that's imaginal practice in the sense of soul making, or an emptiness practice, or samadhi, or metta, or whatever—insight practices—there's a way it can really serve well to tell us, to give us a sense of when we're on track, when things feel in harmony. We're on the right track when something's opening, softening, loosening, energizing, whatever it is.

For all these reasons and more, when we come to talk about imaginal practice and cosmopoiesis and the kind of things that we're talking about, we can't do that all day. Imaginal practice all day is kind of too much for the psyche really. So we want to be going back and forth between practices. This is one of the things we really want to emphasize on this retreat: this flexibility. Flexibility between different approaches at different times, sensitive to what's helpful. But whatever we do, the energy body is going to be a part of it.

We're not going to lose connection with the energy body. That's the encouragement. So whatever direction or orientation at any time in practice, the energy body is an integral part of that and is involved. We're connected with that. We're sensitive to it.

I said today we'll unfold instructions as the week goes, but today really to have more emphasis on the energy body—on being aware of that, on playing with that, and dwelling with that, whether that's just collecting in the samadhi or just being sensitive to the emotions there, or whatever. A bit more emphasis on that, but even now, starting today, you can be fluid between these different practices.

So you can move between images and an image, resonate with the energy body and come back to the energy body, or from images to feeling the energy body and then go to the samadhi. Do you get a sense of how you can move between these? Or you might be dwelling with an emotional resonance in the energy body and then that gives rise to an image. So there is flexibility, but today a bit more emphasis on just dwelling with the energy body. But there's that fluidity.

And maybe you got the sense listening to those talks that anything goes. Anything goes here. The range of creativity and ways of working with the energy body—whatever works, it's fine. Even if you think, "This is the weirdest thing that I've ever experienced," if it's working, it's fine. So really, this encouragement on this retreat from both Catherine and me, to really be creative. Let yourself be creative.

But when we talk about energy body, we're really talking about a kinesthetic felt feeling of energy. So you might be working with a visual image or whatever, but it's always going to be coming back to this felt sense.

I'll talk at the end about walking in the energy body, but maybe just to say some general things about practice on this retreat. Let me say two things about teachings and listening.

It's interesting how we read and listen as human beings because often we read and listen from within a certain box of what we understand. And that's sometimes really necessary because we need to build these boxes, these containers of understanding and sort of let them grow, consolidate them. The downside of that sometimes is that we don't hear what's outside of our box. So we're hearing from a certain framework and we actually don't hear what's new. We sometimes literally don't hear it or we chop a bit off it or we convert it into something so it sounds like what's already in my box. "I'm not really hearing anything new here."

So this is tricky, it's a balance. We need to consolidate structures of understanding and at the same time we need to be aware of this human tendency not to hear the new, almost not to be challenged. Does that make sense?

Holding both those poles in mind, I wonder sometimes if it's possible to listen in general on this retreat—or reading a book or whatever it is, other retreats—and actually listen in a different way. I'm listening for what doesn't fit into my box. Listening to grow, listening to stretch, listening to challenge.

Second thing, related to that and related also to the sort of dichotomy there, is sometimes we listen or we read and we really focus in on one thing, one real small detail that seems to us to be helpful or that fits in our box and resonates. And this is really important. We're listening for that richness of detail.

For most people, for most of us, it's a little harder to listen or read what I would call structurally—listening for the wider relevance. How does this fit in to the bigger picture of what's being presented, or how does all this fit together? Oftentimes we don't really listen. We just hear this bit or that bit. We don't listen in a wider way. But there's something about listening and getting a bigger picture that will help the details and will help confidence in practice and growth in practice.

So again, it's not easy for most human beings. We don't have minds that work that way naturally. But if you can, and if you're not sure why on earth I'm going on about something... I remember a talk years ago, I was saying something about quantum mechanics and someone just said, "Oh, I just thought you got lost on a tangent." And it was very relevant for the whole point. But it was obvious to me what the relationship was—I should have made it clear.

So if you're not clear, ask. But there's something about listening structurally, listening for the greater relevance of what's being said, how it fits together.

Now I want to say something about the emphasis of practice in this retreat. This is general now. I'm not giving so much nuts and bolts instructions this morning because you should be familiar with that. So I'll say some things and hope you can remember this over the retreat, because what I'm talking about is also habits of orientation.

Generally, in the insight meditation culture and also in other spiritual traditions, there are certain attitudes or orientations or emphases, inclinations and assumptions that kind of get pretty entrenched for us, so much so that we often don't even realize that they're operating as a kind of bedrock of our practice. It's just how we think and what we do. And they become quite dominant in the culture and in our individual practices. They're very prevalent.

What Catherine and I would like to do is actually break that up a little bit, loosen these up.

One of them has to do with concentration, and I mean that in two modes. Especially if you're familiar with the insight meditation tradition, there's a lot of emphasis on continuity of mindfulness, right? Not here. I don't care about that. No, more than I don't care—I'd rather you weren't. And I'll explain what the alternative is.

Mindfulness becomes a way to live. If I could—we acknowledge that it's not possible—but if I could, it would be best if I was continually mindful. I would like to question that and disrupt that and replace it with a notion of flexibility of ways of looking. Deliberately moving in and out of, consciously in and out of, different ways of looking rather than trying to be mindful all the time. Trying to create mindfulness as a way of life as if it's an end in itself. We could say a lot about that. We may or may not come back to it on this retreat, but I don't want to dwell.

So rather than continuity—and we have to ask, why continuity? I'm not going to answer this, but why has this become so central and such an unquestioned assumption in the dharma? What's underneath that assumption? Actually, there's quite a lot underneath it. Maybe later.

The second aspect of concentration—first is continuity, second is not just the continuity of mindfulness but the continuity of focus. How many times as a teacher have I heard people really trying to just stay with one object, usually the breath, and sometimes decades of frustration at trying to do that. Now, I'm not saying that doesn't have its place, but so often it gets prioritized, this focusing, staying with one thing, keeping the attention steady.

When we use the word samadhi, we're talking more about this harmonization, well-being in the energy body, and less about focusing the mind and keeping it on one thing. Some of you can probably recognize, hearing this, how we become wedded to certain ideas.

So for this week at least, I'd like to shake a little bit of this up, loosen it.

The second thing is what we might call atomism, related to what we just talked about, but this kind of shrinking the mind to smallness, as if seeing small details, the moment-to-moment process, or how finally this or that sensation can be revealed to consciousness. Fine, it has its place, but it's also limited. It's not something on this retreat that we're particularly interested in, both in terms of attention and also in terms of understanding, as if the atomistic process is something real, that there really are moments, that there really are all that.

Third, we'll come back to this in the retreat, is a kind of realism or reificationism. Everything that we're doing is not based on reality claims or truth claims. Maybe this sounds abstract, but once you start questioning, one realizes just how much of most teachings and most practice orientations, most psychotherapies, is all based on some kind of reality claim. What is it to just take that away? What does that free up? What does that allow? Extremely radical.

Another one—we touched on it last night a little bit—is just the emphasis on solitude and self-sufficiency. If we can open that out, as Catherine mentioned last night. Yes, there is a place for solitude, but what is it to open up more to the togetherness and the relationships? Again, insight meditation, Theravada Buddhism has a lot of focus on solitude and self-sufficiency. And it can become, for us, "it would be better if I could be more self-sufficient and solitary."

And just generally, how much we absorb ideas from the cultures that we're in—the wider culture, but also the dharma culture—and we don't quite realize how much power they have. A tremendous amount of power. All kinds of ideas about where we're going, how we should be, "it would be better if this." So much power, and prison, really, from these kinds of things.

Part of what we're doing is wanting to question these kinds of things. None of them are bad, none of them are wrong, these things that I've mentioned. It's just they tend to get over-emphasized and dominant, even to the point of exclusion.

The opposite doesn't have a place, and in that, our practice becomes limited. As much as some of these ideas are helpful, they are also limiting.

Rather than being caught in these constraints, I want to offer something different: the idea of flexibility of ways of looking, deliberately moving in and out consciously of different modes of being, perception, ways of looking. Why do this? Because this is what reveals to us the dependent arising of things. This is what reveals to us the emptiness of things.

If I'm just mindful, I will not know that. It will not come. I will not have that depth of insight. I need to move flexibly in and out. And I see—when I look this way, this is what the world looks like. This is what appears. When I look another way, that's what appears. Dependent arising. Emptiness.

What we want is to really develop this flexibility and this availability of different ways of looking. This, to me, is really what this retreat is about, but in general also what we're interested in developing. So sometimes, you know, in the week, it's really fine. It's okay to not practice—to have periods where there's some basic mindfulness, but you're actually not practicing. What's more important is the deliberate moving in and out at times and noticing what happens. And we'll talk more about this.

Sometimes people wonder about precision. Where's the precision if I'm not practicing in my usual way of close, mindful scrutiny to the details of my experience? What happens to precision in practice?

Precision is not in the microscopic consciousness or the microscopic understanding of things. What I'd like to say is the precision is more in a kind of subtlety and clarity of differentiation, discerning between different ways of looking. What exactly is involved in this way of looking that I'm engaging in right now? What exactly is involved? How is this way of looking—that I'm looking, that I'm sensing in, knowing in right now—how is it subtly different from one that sounds quite similar?

This is not easy—it's a different orientation of thinking about practice. What exactly are the effects in this moment of this way of looking? On my emotions, on the energy body, on my sense of freedom, on my sense of self, on my sense of another, on my perception of the world. This is where the precision is—noticing these subtleties. And why?

Why is it that when I look this way, I see like this? There's a lot of insight here—I'm talking about just a different way of approaching practice, a different core idea underneath practice.

So that's where the precision is, rather than in the microscopic detail or the microscopic concepts.

One of the things I would say we're interested in opening the door to is the possibility of subtlety—the possibility of a subtlety of awareness, a subtlety of sensibility. Now we're not making a hierarchy here. It's not like, "Okay, not focus but subtlety is what we're going for." Rather, we don't want to prevent subtlety. So we want to keep the door open to subtlety. And gross is good too. So it's not always about being subtle.

But there's something about deepening more generally in meditation—generally speaking, I would say deepening involves and to some degree corresponds to an increase in subtlety. Again, this is not something we usually think about. How long can I stay with the breath or whatever? I'm just introducing another domain or dimension of experience that we tend not to think about so much.

And again, the subtlety is not in the microscopicness of attention or "this moment" and how fast I can speed up a second or whatever. But when we use words like subtlety, it's really subtlety of the vibrations, for instance, in the energy body that we're aware of, or the tones—the emotional tones—or the wavelengths. We become more sensitive to more subtlety there, to the subtlety of resonances, the subtleties of emotional movements and states, shades of emotion, refinements of perception in general.

So this is actually, I would say, quite important to be able to open to gradually—gradually more and more over the months and years of practice.

I'm going to leave a bit out. I don't want to overload you. There'll be a chance for questions.

As we journey through this retreat together, you'll find there's going to be a wealth of practice suggestions, instructions, and explorations offered. The unfolding won't be particularly linear - apart from our initial emphasis on the energy body, this isn't structured as a progression where we master one level before advancing to the next. Sometimes you might find yourself on day five thinking, "I wish they'd mentioned that at the beginning," or conversely, feeling ready for something introduced earlier. This is simply the nature of how understanding must unfold in time.

Please don't feel overwhelmed by the abundance we're offering. Sessions are being recorded, so you can always return to what resonates. Take what feels alive for you and let the rest go. Don't worry if certain practices feel too complex or if you feel you've missed something important. In truth, everything we're exploring is interconnected and inseparable - we only separate it to communicate in chunks through time, since we can't download it all instantaneously. This is just how teachings must be shared, so I encourage you to remain flexible with this process.

What we're engaging in may differ from how many people typically approach practice - that familiar mode of simply being with the body, waiting receptively for whatever arises, then staying present with that experience as it comes and goes. This receptive, passive approach is certainly beautiful and valid, but I believe it becomes quite limiting if it's our only mode of practice.

Instead, we'll be offering many suggestions and practices that actually ask you to deliberately engage specific ways of looking, rather than just "hanging out and being with what is." We'll be moving in and out of these deliberate ways of seeing. This usually isn't our habit, particularly when we come to imaginal practice and what we might call practices of enchantment or cosmopoiesis. For many people, deliberately entering these cosmopoetic ways of looking represents unfamiliar territory.

While these images and cosmic ways of seeing can certainly arise spontaneously - and that's wonderful - we're also working with them deliberately. With everything we offer, you might try something and find it doesn't quite work, then refine your approach. Here's what's crucial: be careful to use your energy body and your sense of soulfulness as your compass. If a practice resonates something in your soul, even if it needs refinement, let that be your guide rather than mechanically persisting with something that doesn't stimulate genuine soul-making.

In classical Tantric teachings, you might receive a prescribed deity to work with, a specific image given to you. But our encouragement is different - pursue and stay with only those practices that truly resonate in and for your soul, even if the practice initially seemed contrived or externally suggested. What matters isn't the origin but the soul resonance and your sensitivity to recognizing it. When you feel that resonance, you're onto something precious.

Let this sense of soulfulness guide you completely. Without it, there's a real danger that any kind of practice - not just these approaches we're exploring - can become lifeless, soulless, ultimately pointless except perhaps as an exercise in concentration or visualization. Nothing deep or significant for the soul gets touched, stirred, moved in both senses of the word - brought alive, enriched, deepened.

This sense of soulfulness tells you when you've struck gold, when you've found treasure. The practice might still feel difficult or confusing, but there's gold present. You can sense it.

So throughout this retreat, I really encourage you to play with these practices, to experiment freely. Let yourself be creative. We'll be offering much, but think of it like stepping into a vast artist's studio where we've just opened all the doors. There are paints and canvases, materials for sculpture, video equipment - you can simply play. You can decide what calls to you, work systematically if you prefer, or stay with one approach. Can we bring this spirit of creative exploration to our practice?

But this raises a crucial question: What's the point? What is the actual point of practice? Sometimes, especially as long-term practitioners, we lose track of why we're doing this. Or perhaps our original motivation has hardened into something that part of us no longer truly believes in, something that's no longer alive for our soul. We might find ourselves borrowing Buddhist language or repeating concepts we've heard in countless talks and books, but we must ask: Is this truly my point? Is this the point for my soul? Or has my sense of purpose become half-dead?

This is profoundly human, this questioning of motivation and meaning. We'll likely revisit this throughout the retreat, but let me be clear about the point of all these practices we'll be offering.

It's certainly not to make you believe this or that, or to convert you to some new religion. Catherine and I aren't trying to convince you of particular beliefs about the self, about life, or about the world. Nor is the goal to achieve any specific perception - getting a vision of your body as red energy or any particular experience. Those might arise and be wonderful, but they're not the point.

Or perhaps some other perception altogether. But rather, through all these practices, through this exercising of the flexibility of ways of looking, through exploring an attitude, a relationship with practice that's more like art, more like poetry in relation to perception—through these things, loosening happens.

Actually many kinds of loosening happen. And that to me is a big point: many kinds of loosening. What are the different kinds of loosening that happen? This is of fundamental importance, these different kinds of loosening that occur.

But even more than that, a sense, a perception, a knowing comes through all these practices—something, if you like, maybe vague, maybe undefined, unarticulated, maybe with a lot of variation in your experience or others' experience because of the ways of looking—but a sense, a perception, an opening, a knowing, a deepening of the sense of beauty, of sacredness. This is more, if you like, the central point. Not a particular thing—it can happen in all kinds of ways.

And even more, a knowing of eternity. A knowing of the eternal, of the timeless. Many possibilities here. And these possibilities—they open, they deepen, they widen. They become more and more accessible in our lives, more and more available to the being, more and more frequent. So I would say at the bottom of it, that's the main point of all the practices.

So today this dwelling in, being with, emphasizing the abiding in the energy body as the primary thing—that would be the main emphasis today as much as possible. And within that there are different orientations.

So it can orient towards the cultivation of the harmony and the sense of harmonization, well-being in that field, and the mind dwelling in that and enjoying that and moving towards that, gently encouraging that—this is one orientation.

At other times it might be just sensitive to the energy body and maybe there's some difficulty there or emotional resonances. Maybe difficult, maybe lovely, maybe actually neither—just subtle. And there's a way of being with the energy body, just paying attention or working skillfully, gently, helpfully with whatever's going on emotionally as it's playing out in the energy body. And if images feel like they are coming, arising in relation to that, or they feel helpful in relation to that, let that come and go too.

Let yourself be flexible, but the energy body is always involved. We're not losing connection with that. We're not losing the sensitivity to that. Or rather we're encouraging the sensitivity to that as part of what's going on.

Opening, opening—there's such a tendency for the awareness to shrink, so just opening again. It's really about tuning, tuning the attention. Not so much in terms of location as in terms of wavelength or vibration, if you like, resonance in the space. Maybe at times about location, but it's more about the tuning, the kind of awareness.

What we're going to try on this retreat is to have an open schedule, just to see how that goes. Which means you can come and go in terms of this space here, the main hall, as you like. You can come and sit for three hours straight. You can come and sit for ten minutes, any time. And obviously just try and be relatively quiet. But basically it's an open space. So you find your rhythm with the sitting and the walking and the standing meditation and so forth. Is that clear enough?

Be careful if you prioritize sitting. You're not just sitting. Those of you who are sitting a lot—it may be that the action really, the fruit is in the walking or in the standing or whatever. So don't be so much about "I should be sitting." Just find what's really helpful for you.

But there's an open schedule; let's see how that goes.

With the walking meditation for today, can we do the walking meditation again emphasizing the energy body? So many of you are familiar with what does it feel like in the soles of the feet or in the legs, the mindfulness, the sensations. Let's do it differently and see: can I walk up and down on my walking path sensitive to this field, the energy body?

Or some of you may be walking and there's a sort of vast panoramic awareness of the whole space and the sky. All of these are wonderful.

I think for us today, let's see if we can do the walking and walk up and down with the sensitivity of the energy body. Just the same with the sitting.

As in all practice, you might need to experiment a little bit. What's helpful? Do I need to walk slower to allow that at this time? And maybe half an hour later it's faster? Or do I need to walk really fast? So play with, for instance, the pace of the walking that allows you to get the sensitivity to the energy body.

You can stop and stand at any point. So halfway through your walking path, you might stop and actually feel, "Oh, when I'm still now, actually this feels good and that's helpful, the energy body." Really explore the rhythm of the walking, the pace, and when you stop and stand. You might end up standing most of the walking period—no problem. Just really what's helping this awareness of the energy body.

Now there's formal walking, walking up and down between two points, which you're all very familiar with. And there's informal walking. I'm going to lunch, I'm going to a group or whatever it is, I'm going to get a cup of tea. See if you can take some of those opportunities too. Just what is it to walk from here to get my cup of tea and be in the energy body, or back to the hermitage wing or wherever you're staying, and actually just walk in the corridor in the energy body? Just for a little bit, play with this.

In general, probably for most people, as you're walking around the house, it's good to slow down. That will help this energy body awareness. Again, not because we're aiming for microscopic awareness and that we're going really slow, but just the slowness will help the energy body awareness for most people.

CHAPTER 33

"I Sing The Body Electric": On Orientations in Practice

Rob Burbea · 1h08

> In this opening talk from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea introduces the foundational practice of working with the energy body—a subtle awareness of the body's energetic field that serves as guidance for samādhi, emotional navigation, and insight practice. Drawing inspiration from Walt Whitman's phrase "I sing the body electric," Burbea explains how this sensitivity involves both discovering and creating our embodied experience through different ways of looking.
>
> The talk critiques five prevalent orientations in modern Dharma that constrain practice: concentration (as continuity and narrow focus), atomism (microscopic attention), reification (taking experiences as ultimately real), solitude (exclusively inward focus), and sanitization (conformity to conventional expression). These form the acronym CRASS or SCARS, highlighting how they can limit the subtlety and depth available in meditation.
>
> Burbea advocates instead for flexible exploration of different ways of looking, recognizing the dependent origination and emptiness of all perceptions. He emphasizes that deepening in meditation involves increasing subtlety of awareness rather than microscopic focus, and encourages practitioners to let soulfulness and resonance in the energy body guide their practice choices. The ultimate aim is not achieving particular perceptions but cultivating ongoing access to timelessness, beauty, and sacredness through this attitude of "poetry of perception."

At the beginning of the retreat, for the first couple of days at least, our encouragement is for all of us to really emphasize the awareness of practicing with what we've been calling the energy body. You are asked to review and become familiar with that whole area of practice before the retreat. So I'm not going to repeat instructions much about that at all, or address the actually infinite range of possibilities that are there with that and are available with working with the energy body. Hopefully we'll have some Q&As so people can ask, or in the groups or individual meetings, you can ask about working with that in terms of what comes up.

But just to say right now, very briefly, a few general things in a short summary around that. Just to remind you: the energy body, when we use that term, we're talking about mindfulness of the body, but it's a different kind of mindfulness than, say, the usual mindfulness of sensations that we're mostly accustomed to hearing about and practicing within the insight meditation world and the mindfulness world. The mindfulness of how it feels—what are the sensations with the hands under the running water of the tap, what are the sensations of the breeze on the cheek, or when I lift and move and place the foot and the foot touches the ground in walking meditation or whatever—this is the more usual presentation of mindfulness of sensations. Very important, very lovely area of practice, direction of practice.

And in a way, when we talk about energy body as a mode of mindfulness of the body, it overlaps with that mindfulness. It's not really something completely different. It overlaps, but really there's a different tuning, if you like. We're tuning a different sensibility than the usual mindfulness of sensations. It's more subtle in a way. Generally speaking, it's more subtle.

And this tuning of the sensibility grows. The sensitivity to that kind of awareness grows. The more we practice feeling the body and sensing the body as energy body, the easier it becomes, the more familiar it becomes, the more established it becomes. So it grows with practice, like many things.

What we're really talking about is a sensitivity to, a tuning to, if you like, the space or the field of the body—a little bit bigger than the body even—and the energy or the feeling or the vibration of that whole space, maybe certain energy centers or points within that space, but really the awareness of the tuning to, the sensitivity and sensibility towards and with that whole field of vibration, energy, feeling.

And why is that important, or why are we emphasizing that? Well, for a lot of different reasons. I tend to view it as something so useful for almost every domain of practice.

So for samadhi practice, where we can use the energy body and develop what I'm calling samadhi—this kind of energization of the energy body, of the mind as well—deep nourishment can come in. So using the energy body as something we tune into in an orientation of practice that's aimed at nourishment, energization, rest, brightness, calmness—and all this is a huge resource to mind and body. This practice of samadhi or working with the energy body in the direction of samadhi.

Another area where the energy body is really, really, really a helpful resource and really useful is in navigating and responding to and caring for our whole emotional life. So the energy body reflects and expresses what's going on with our emotions very, very subtly—even very subtle emotions. Emotions that probably we don't even have words for in the English language. Shades, subtle movements of opening or contraction or turning away or whatever it is. Different kinds of love, all kinds of things. And the sensitivity, the attunement to the energy body can be a really, really skillful way of working with the emotions. Really helpful in developing sensitivity and developing skillful responses to the vicissitudes of our emotional life.

Thirdly, the sensitivity and awareness to the energy body, the tuning to that, actually proves to be really helpful in guidance and navigation for whatever practices we're doing—whether it's imaginal practices and one can feel the resonances or a dimension of the soul resonances, of the soul-making and the soulfulness of what's happening in relation to an image, for example. One feels that partly in the energy body. It's a way of gauging whether one is on track, whether an image is going to be fruitful or fertile or soul-making or helpful for the soul.

And also in terms of emptiness practice or much more broadly insight practices. Again, are we on the right track? Well, the energy body will reflect it when there's the release and the relief that should come with insight. We feel that in the energy body, not just in the mind. The energy body will reflect it much more subtly, much more palpably than the mind, much more accurately than the mind.

So the freeing, the release of contraction that should come with any insight, small or large, in the moment—this is felt in the energy body and can tell us: I may not even quite understand what just happened or how I'm looking right now, what the insight was, but something, the energy body is telling me, whatever you're doing, there was an insight there, it was helpful. Or not. Or this is leading to more contraction, in which case, what's going on? What's coming in as a thought or an assumption or a view that's actually causing more contraction—if you like, the opposite of insight, in a way?

But also with metta and, as I said, samadhi and other practices, the sensitivity to the energy body will help us know when we're on track. Whatever little experiment or play or shift we're working with in practice—ah, yeah, that feels right. I can feel it in the energy body. And with metta, sometimes the feeling in the energy body itself can become metta or be interpreted as metta and then radiated outwards or bathed in or wrapped in or whatever. All kinds of possibilities, but really for any, as I said, any direction of practice, any kind of practice, the energy body, for me, can be really helpful to make central.

So helpful in so many ways. And so on this retreat, whatever we're doing, whatever you're doing at any time in meditation practice, can it be done in touch with, sensitive to, open to, aware of, attuned to the energy body?

Now, anyway, when we talk about working with the imaginal and cosmic oasis and things like that, we can't do that all day long, working with an image or with a cosmos. These things come and go.

Right now, at the beginning of the retreat, as I said, we want to have more emphasis on the energy body, perhaps more on cultivating samadhi or tuning to the emotional movements coming and going, ebbing and flowing—just at the beginning, a little more leaning that way. As the retreat goes on, as you get more skillful with all that, even off-retreat over months, there can be much more fluidity and flux in the emphasis between the different practices, between the intentions and orientations, whether toward samadhi, toward working with the emotions, toward feeling guidance, toward feeling the energy body in relation to an image or cosmopoiesis or whatever.

But all of them, as I said, include all these orientations, all these intentions for practice at any time, include, never lose touch with the energy body awareness.

This fluidity or flexibility of emphasis allows any of these practices to move via the energy body from one to another. So for example—and all this should be repeat for you if you listen to those other talks—one's working with an image, and as one's working with the image and noticing all kinds of things in terms of the soul-making and the energy body, one realizes, for example, often, that with this image, a harmonization has come into the energy body, an opening, a lightness, a beauty in the texture there of the space of the energy body.

And if one wants, one can then lean more the emphasis of the attention into that loveliness of the feeling in the energy body with the intention of entering into it, bathing in it, basking in it, wrapping oneself in it, enjoying it. And then the intention has moved from the imaginal work into more the intention of samadhi, of that as a resource, of staying in that. Really valid, really fine, very useful at times.

And of course, things can work the other way around, from samadhi to an image that comes out of samadhi or is made available because of the depth of the samadhi and the harmonization there. Or, for example, one's working with a certain emotion and again in touch with the energy body, and from that emotion—maybe it's a difficult emotion perhaps—and out of the vortex of energy there that's wrapped up in the emotion an image comes and then one works with the image and that feeds back into the emotion. Maybe it unlocks something, helps it, transforms it, all kinds of possibilities. Again, all this should be reviewed.

But this growing fluidity and flexibility to move between these different emphases in practice—and even now at the beginning of the retreat, many of you are familiar with these kinds of ways of working, or you might even find that this fluidity is available, even if a lot of this is relatively new. So some degree of fluidity between these emphases and orientations, intentions of practice is really valid. But at the beginning, let's a little bit more lean into really emphasizing staying close with the energy body, developing the samadhi, or the metta, or the sensitivity to the emotional flux there, and the attuning to the emotions.

But really, in a way with the energy body, especially in relation to samadhi, anything goes. It's very creative. So how we can play with the energy body and the image or images, potential images of the energy body, for instance, visual or with colors or lights or lines or other images that work into the energy body and give it harmony—as I said before—and a nice feeling. The possibilities are actually infinite. The potential for creativity is open and infinite.

But what's really important then, however way one is working, whichever way one is working from—say, for example, from an image or something visual—what we're prioritizing is the felt sense, the kinesthetic sense of that space, the texture, the feeling of it. So as far as the energy body is concerned, that's the primary thing—the feeling, the texture of that space.

In a way, we talk about this energy body, maybe it's for some people a slightly strange phrase or whatever, but in a way we could say that the energy body is as much or maybe even more about an awareness, a sensibility, a subtlety of attention than it is about the body per se. So when we talk about energy body, we're really talking about a way of paying attention, a sensibility, a subtlety of awareness to that space of the body, rather than something about the body per se, or rather than a certain experience of the body. So you feel a certain flow of energy or whatever. Energy body is, if you like, a way of feeling, a way of experiencing, a way of attending to and attuning to the space of and around the body.

Walt Whitman, I can't remember what poem it's from, whether it's "Leaves of Grass" or "Song of Myself," I can't remember, but he has a lovely line: "I sing the body electric, I sing the body electric."

And in a way, we can hear that line as "I sing of, I sing about the body electric, the energy body, the beauty that's there in this sensibility and feeling the body this way." The body alive as a field, if you like, of electricity, of harmony, of that kind of more subtle energy. And I sing also of the well-being that's available in that mode of paying attention to the body.

And some of you will know that well-being has a huge spectrum. It can be very subtle and unremarkable. And it can also be extremely intense or very blissful. All kinds of gradations and shades of well-being, of bliss, of pleasure, of comfort, really opening up the range of possible experiences of the body, this electric body, this energy body. So "I sing the body electric" means I sing about that, I sing of that energy body.

And in a way, you could also hear "I sing the body electric" another way. "I sing the body electric" means I, through my singing, through my enchanting—and the word enchant is, you know, enchanté, in French, enchant, to chant, to sing, actually. So through my enchanting, through my conjuring, if you like, to borrow a phrase from the Buddha, the conjuring of consciousness of perception, through the spell, the magic spell that I'm playing with in my awareness, through that I sing the body electric. Through my singing the body becomes electric, the body becomes this energy body, the experience of the body becomes that. So I sing that metaphorically. I sing that through the way that I'm paying attention, through the way that I'm conceiving of the body in the moment. I sing, I enchant, I cast a spell, and the sense and the image of the energy body comes into being. I sing it into being.

The emphasis here is on the sing, on the enchantment, not on the I. I sing the body electric.

This experience of an energy body, this kind of awareness, is something we create. We're fully acknowledging the dependent arising of this sense of the body, of the energy body, and the dependent arising of that perception and how it feels.

As you practice more with the energy body, you recognize and become skillful in noticing how when you look at it this way versus that way, when there's this quality with awareness as opposed to another quality, it changes the actual experience and perception of the energy body. The lightness, the contractedness, the flows, the openness—all of this changes in dependent arising with the ways you're looking at it. All of this becomes beautiful territory to explore, with so much potential for learning, play, and creativity.

Because of dependent arising, we acknowledge that this experience of the energy body is something created. It's created by and with the mind. Some systems of chakras have four chakras, some have seven, some have nine or more. Which is the truth? Well, the experience of the energy body is not separate from the mind. So you can experience four chakras, seven chakras, nine chakras. It's not different from the conception—subtle or gross—that's operating in the mind and the way of looking. The energy body itself is formed, fashioned, fabricated.

Yes, it's created and it's discovered. This raises the edge of what is created and discovered at the same time—both created and discovered. This is something we'll return to as a theme in this retreat. I'm just mentioning it now in relation to the energy body.

When you do walking meditation today, can you again emphasize the energy body? Just for now, for today—or if you're doing this course elsewhere, take your time with this, perhaps more than a day—can you walk, so to speak, in the energy body or in that awareness? Walk in this bubble or region or space that is this kind of sensitivity to the texture, the feeling, the vibration, the energy in that field.

How fast do you need to walk to allow that fullness of sensitivity, to tune in? Maybe you need to walk very slowly, maybe at normal pace, maybe actually quite fast helps. Perhaps this varies over the course of a walking session. Play with that. At times it will feel more helpful to just stop and stand, either at the end of the walking path or in the middle, because stopping and being still allows you to more fully inhabit and feel the energy body. Be sensitive to what's helpful moment to moment in terms of pace, stillness, movement, whatever.

There's the formal walking practice—can you do it in the energy body, sensitive to the energy body? And there's also informal walking around the house or going for a walk. This too, at times at least, experiment with what it is to just move around in informal movement throughout your day, but in the energy body, sensitive to that. Is that possible, walking down the corridor, whatever it is?

Most people, certainly if you're new or newer to energy body practice—which might be even months or a couple of years, still new perhaps—will be helped by slowing down. As you're walking around inside the house especially, slow down a little bit. The slowing down is not for the sake of microscopic attention—something I'll return to. You can divide the lifting, moving, and placing of your feet not just into three parts but into nine or more. This microscopic division of attention is not a priority or reason why we're slowing down. We're slowing down to allow that different sensitivity, that different kind of mindfulness of the body—this mindfulness of the energy body. We want to encourage this and give ourselves the best opportunity for it to establish itself and become more and more accessible.

Now I'd like to say some quite general things about practice. Because we're emphasizing the energy body and have given all those instructions in other retreats and talks, asking you to be familiar with them, I want to speak generally about practice now. The danger in saying these things at the beginning, and the danger of talking generally, is that these insights easily get forgotten. So if you're taking notes, remind yourself of them periodically.

What I want to talk about right now are five attitudes or orientations or inclinations or emphases or assumptions that are quite prevalent across much modern Dharma. They tend to dominate, underpin, and direct practice and thoughts about practice, constraining and limiting practice. They limit the range of unfolding experience that's possible and also limit the range and depth of insight available. On this retreat, with this way of practicing and conceiving of the Dharma that we're offering, we want to unseat them from their dominance, question them, and replace them with other priorities.

The first is concentration, which so often gets emphasized.

And in two aspects that I want to draw attention to. One is actually as continuity. The first way that concentration gets emphasized is continuity. So I'm not talking about jhanas or anything like that. I'm talking about even a continuity of mindfulness.

Actually, before I get into this, again, I hope you can hear this as a response to the context, to a leaning that to me has sometimes gotten too much or overemphasized and comes at a cost. Not that it's not important, but just leaning the other way to balance things out or open things out in ways that perhaps they don't open because of the habitual leaning.

So in our way of thinking about it, or going about practice, it's not the continuity of mindfulness or attention that liberates. Unlike, say, Mahasi-style practice or Goenka practice, where it really is the continuity that's emphasized—that's the golden key, as much as anything, or the idea is that's the golden key to liberation—instead, in our way of approaching things, it's rather the deliberate and flexible exploration of a range of ways of looking, noticing the different effects of each of these ways of looking on dukkha, on contraction, on self-sense, on perception. And with that, the question: what can we understand from seeing all this? When I look this way, this is the perception. When I look that way, that's the perception. So that deliberate flexibility of exploration—that is more important than continuity of mindfulness.

I might ask, why is it that continuity of mindfulness is regarded so often as so important? To me it's an interesting question. Either it's because mindfulness gets presented, whether it's in Insight Meditation circles or mindfulness teachings or whatever, mindfulness gets presented actually as a way to live—recognizing that it's actually impossible to sustain it, but still it's presented as an optimal. If you could live and be mindful all the time or as much of the time as possible, that is the way to live. So it's a way to live rather than a way of looking. There's a big difference there.

Or sometimes even mindfulness itself is taught as equivalent with awakening. A moment of mindfulness is a moment of enlightenment or something like that. Or, again, the emphasis on continuity is tied up with seeing anicca, seeing impermanence, more and more continuously and intensely, and seeing anicca as reality. This impermanence is the ultimate truth. And then the other two characteristics—anatta, no-self, and dukkha, unsatisfactoriness—they come from the perception of anicca. Things are unsatisfactory because they're impermanent, and there is anatta because things are impermanent. But this impermanence is taken as the reality, the primary reality. And there's a whole metaphysics of reality and a whole conception of what insight is that's tied in with and tied into this emphasis on continuity.

This is quite different from the approach of a flexibility of ways of looking.

So we're not emphasizing on this retreat, in this approach, concentration either as continuity, or in a second aspect, as a kind of prioritizing of focusing, of prioritizing of trying to keep the attention on one thing, whether that's the breath, or the body, or whatever it is.

Samadhi, in the way that I use the word, and I would say in the way that the Buddha used the word, is not actually that well translated by the word concentration, but more—what gives a better, fuller, to my mind, more attractive meaning, translation—is it's a well-being in the energy body and a harmonization of the energy body, which the mind then much more easily settles into and fills out. Yes, steadiness is part of that, but it's only a part of the picture.

So the first of these five is concentration in two aspects: continuity and this prioritizing of focusing, prioritizing of trying to keep the attention on one thing. These are so often emphasized, and we're saying, no, we're not going to emphasize them.

The second is something we could call atomism. So the first concentration, the second is atomism, by which I mean either aiming exclusively for a narrow focus, a narrow area of concentration—maybe the tip of the nose if you're staying with the breath or this moment of taste or this area of sensation in the body or whatever—a narrowness of the area of focus or concentration.

But more importantly, there's an atomism as a kind of prioritizing or elevating or an exclusivity of not just microscopic attention more generally, but also understanding of the view of reality. Again, wrapped up in that is an idea that true reality is atomic—moments of this, these small sensations put together in a process very, very fast, and that's a kind of ultimate reality.

So this kind of atomism, again, is something we want to, on this retreat—really we're not steering towards that at all. We have different priorities, different orientations, inclinations, and intentions.

So concentration in its two aspects and atomism, second one.

The third one we've touched on already: reification or realism. In contrast to what I was talking about—emptiness, ways of looking, fabrication of perception as a basis, as a basic understanding, present at even the most basic level of practice, even the most, right from the beginning. We can teach the Dharma and explain the Dharma in those terms of emptiness. It's not necessarily an advanced thing. But emptiness as present at the beginning and also as the goal of understanding, the goal of practice.

We've touched on this. I'm not going to go into it again. But this is a very different approach to Dharma through ways of looking and the idea of ways of looking and fabrication. And it can embrace, it can hold anything in the Dharma—any teaching, generosity, metta, whatever, ethics—it can all come actually under the umbrella, understanding the rubric of emptiness.

So concentration, atomism, reification or realism.

Fourth one is what I might call solitude or self-sufficiency. Again, there's a tendency in the Dharma to view solitary practice and self-sufficiency in one's process as somehow superior to relational practice. This perspective elevates the solo path above collaborative spiritual work, though we'll only touch lightly on relational practice during this retreat. It remains important to acknowledge this tendency.

By solitude, I also mean a predominantly inward-looking orientation. Insight meditation naturally tends toward silence—silent retreats, silent retreat centers. Eyes typically close during meditation. But more significantly, returning to the Pali Canon teachings, the Buddha speaks repeatedly about escape from the world. Nibbana represents an escape from the world, the unfabricated goal of practice. He uses this exact phrase, this word: escape.

The entire thrust, direction, and intentionality of Pali Canon Buddhism moves toward this escape from the world—to never be reborn again. Wrapped within this orientation lies a disenchantment with the world itself. The Buddha discusses kaya viveka and citta viveka—isolation or removal of the body from crowds, embracing solitariness, and withdrawal of the mind in various ways. This movement always tends away from engagement.

This stands in stark contrast to engaged practice—political, environmental engagement that I've explored in other talks. But it also contrasts with re-enchanting, which forms the very theme of this retreat: opening the eyes, opening our knowing to the world, sensing the cosmos as enchanted. Consider the classic Tantric teaching that sees the nature of all things as bliss, or the recognition of divine beauty everywhere, in all things, expanding through this cosmopoiesis. This path involves seeing or knowing all appearances as divine—to borrow another Tantric phrase—expanding, deepening, enriching, widening our senses of the sacred.

The fifth emphasis I call sanity, or perhaps more precisely, sanitization. This proves even more insidious—a narrow conformity, often unconscious, to conventionally prescribed modes of expression and views. We conform in how we express ourselves across different domains of being, and conform to certain prescribed views typically absorbed from the various cultures we inhabit.

This includes secularism—the sanitization and so-called sanity of secular culture. Most of us move within that dominant cultural framework. But it equally includes Dharma and Buddhist cultures. How often we witness conformity to uninvestigated, biased attempts at dispassion—a complex area requiring tremendous sensitivity, openness of questioning, and balanced approach.

Often there's this pervasive suspicion of desire, suspicion of passion, suspicion of eros that permeates Dharma culture, profoundly affecting how we practice and relate to life, ourselves, and others. All of this sanity, this sanitization, remains safe and secure. Yet sometimes it creates what we might call—staying with our S's—a soggy serenity that becomes the tenor, the ethos of practice and life, rather than fire.

These five emphases, attitudes, orientations, inclinations, and assumptions prove remarkably prevalent across modern insight meditation and other areas of spiritual practice. Can we orient differently? Can we assume differently? Can we cultivate different inclinations?

These five actually form an interesting pattern. If you wish to remember them, they create the anagram CRASS: Concentration, Reification, Atomism, Solitude, and Sanity. In many ways, when these five inclinations and assumptions dominate, practice becomes crass. It remains gross, unable to deepen into subtlety.

This dimension of subtlety calls for our return attention. I see it as absolutely central and vital to the possibilities of practice—subtlety of awareness, so integral to Dharma possibilities. For our purposes here, subtlety represents an element we seek to open and move into, this refined awareness that transforms everything.

Another anagram that we've come out of this to remember is SCARS, S-C-A-R-S, just rearranging the order there. I've heard from people that when these orientations are dominant, or they don't realize what it is that's made them feel this way, when these factors, these assumptions, these intentions and orientations are dominant too long, they can, in a way, scar our soul and scar our potential in various ways.

Maybe all this sounds quite polemical, and probably is. But just to qualify it a little, again, none of these attitudes is wrong. Absolutely, they're not wrong at all. It's just that they can easily become, and probably they have become in the dharma world, over-dominant and even exclusive. A person doesn't realize how practice has closed around these concepts, orientations, assumptions. And as I said, that will have all kinds of limiting effects in all kinds of directions in our practice, in our path, in our life.

So in contrast to all that, we're emphasizing the flexibility of ways of looking, moving in and out of different ways of looking. Through that flexibility, that moving in and out, we reveal, because of the effects on perception, dependent origination of things—dependent origination, fabrication of perception. And with that, or another way of saying that, is the emptiness of all things. So it reveals insight.

But we're also developing a flexibility in ways of looking and the availability of different beautiful, beauty-making, sacred-making, soul-making, skillful ways of looking. Through the moving in and out, we're developing the flexibility and availability as well as the insight into dependent origination.

Within that, as I said, it's not continuity. Sometimes one is fine just not deliberately practicing. There's maybe a minimal level of mindfulness and sensitivity to the body and what's going on around, etc. And that's fine. Right now one is not practicing. One's not striving for this continuity. That's fine as long as one plays enough in the course of the days and in one's life with this deliberate moving in and out of different ways of looking. Because it's that which, as I said, gives us the insight, the flexibility and the availability of different ways of looking, rather than just trying to be mindful as continuously as possible.

With all that, sometimes someone gets a bit confused and says, "Well, what about precision?" Because, for example, in Mahasi style practice or these other more atomistic practices, precision means a microscopic kind of attention. But for us, the precision is really in the subtlety and the clarity of differentiating or discerning between different ways of looking.

So what exactly is involved in this way of looking that's going on for me right now? What exactly constitutes that way of looking? What ideas, what images, what energetics, inclinations of mind, view—all that. There's a lot of subtlety and precision in understanding what exactly is involved in the way of looking right now. And what exactly are the effects of this way of looking right now? On the freedom, on the emotions, on the energy body, on the soul making, on the perceptions of self, of other, of world, et cetera. What exactly are the effects and why?

So the precision is in this area. How is this way of looking right now subtly different from one that a person might describe that sounds pretty similar or that is pretty similar? This one right now is subtly different. How is it different? So that's where the precision comes in. It's in the subtlety, the clarity of differentiation between different ways of looking, discerning and understanding what's involved.

To touch on this point about subtlety that I mentioned some minutes ago, I would say that deepening in meditation generally involves and generally corresponds to an increase of subtlety of the awareness and the attention. Deepening in meditation involves, generally, and corresponds to a greater degree of subtlety of awareness and attention.

So subtlety, in this way of thinking about it, does not—again, I've said this three or four times now—does not mean a microscopicness of points of attention, microscopic points of attention, in whatever sense door, or microscopicness of moments of attention. I can divide the second into however many moments. It doesn't mean that.

By increased subtlety, I mean increased sensitivity to more subtle vibrations, tones, wavelengths, resonances, emotional shades. And more subtle, more refined perceptions. This is what I mean by more subtle.

The movement, as I said, the movement of deepening practice, either in insight or in samādhi or in mettā, is actually into more and more refinement. So the jhānas, the eight jhānas, again, people don't really realize this—they think of it as increasing concentration or this and that—but actually they are increasingly refined perceptions. They're more and more subtle perceptions, what the Buddha calls perception attainments.

Similarly, as insight goes deeper and there's more and more letting go, there's less and less fabrication of perceptions, less and less solidity and coarseness and density to perception. So whether through the spectrum of the jhānas or through deepening insight, perception is fabricated less and so necessarily becomes more and more refined.

This refined attention needed to inhabit such subtle worlds becomes correspondingly delicate and nuanced. The movement into increasing subtlety is intrinsically woven into the fabric of deepening meditation—whether we follow the jhanic path, develop insight, or cultivate the heart qualities. This understanding proves particularly relevant to our work with images, soul-making, and the cultivation of cosmic resonance.

While some of these experiences can manifest as powerful eruptions—moments of profound beauty or overwhelming love—the deeper currents tend toward ever-greater refinement. Even qualities like metta and compassion, as they mature, reveal increasingly subtle textures and flavors. This is something we want to emphasize and cultivate deliberately.

Related to this understanding, we need to remain flexible about what takes priority in our meditation at any given moment. Even within a single sitting, our primary intention might shift appropriately. Let's say we've established a current of samatha practice—that lovely, harmonized field where the mind settles into the energized presence of the body. Within this overarching intention, our moment-to-moment priorities might vary skillfully.

Sometimes our priority becomes staying with the chosen object—the breath, the body's field of energy, or whatever we're working with. This represents the more familiar emphasis on sustained attention and focus. At other times, our priority shifts to tending the sense of well-being itself—gently encouraging and allowing the comfort and pleasure in the energy body to flourish and deepen. This constitutes quite a different orientation than mere focusing.

A third possibility involves tuning toward what feels more energetically subtle and refined within our field of experience. Through this attunement to subtlety—whether in the body space, the mental space, or our perceptions themselves—our attention naturally becomes more refined and delicate.

These three priorities—sustaining attention, cultivating well-being, and tuning toward subtlety—remain interconnected and mutually supportive rather than completely separate. Yet what happens for many practitioners is an overemphasis on the first priority: staying with the object, maintaining focus. The second and third priorities—tending to well-being and attuning to subtlety—get missed, overlooked, or insufficiently nourished.

This imbalance keeps the practice coarse and prevents natural deepening. Practitioners might sit breathing steadily, perhaps even achieving a sense of being "locked onto" the breath, yet nothing truly develops because everything remains at a gross level. They inadvertently block the movement into subtlety through their attitude, their priorities, or by maintaining the breath object itself in too coarse a form.

Most people carry too much emphasis on staying with the object and focusing. When they inevitably don't succeed perfectly, they become upset: "My concentration is terrible. I really need to work on my focus." The whole notion of meditative success becomes tied to how continuously one can maintain attention on a single object, leading to self-judgment and the neglect of those other essential priorities.

Consider the Buddha's instructions in the Anapanasati Sutta, his discourse on mindfulness of breathing. The very first two steps involve breathing long deliberately, then breathing short deliberately—like a skilled craftsperson who turns their wheel with conscious intention, knowing exactly what kind of turn they're making. The distinction here isn't primarily about breath length but about subtlety: shorter breaths tend to be more refined than longer ones. So we see a deliberate movement from the initial longer breath into the more subtle territory of the shorter breath.

The Anapanasati Sutta also includes what I've called the second priority—tending to well-being. The Buddha specifically mentions calming the bodily formations and attending to the pleasure and piti that arise as samadhi deepens. Right there in these fundamental instructions on mindfulness of breathing, we find guidance covering all these priorities and more. Yet so often they get overlooked in favor of simple focusing.

Let me offer some general guidance about the practices we'll explore during this retreat. We'll be presenting many suggestions, ideas, and instructions—perhaps more than you can actively hold simultaneously. You probably won't need to keep twenty pots bubbling on the stove at once, and it may not even be necessary to try everything we offer.

Some approaches will feel more workable than others; some may not seem to connect immediately. Don't become too concerned about this. Everything is being recorded, so you can revisit material later, try again what didn't seem to work initially, or pick up what you missed. Please don't get overwhelmed if it feels like too much or if something isn't clicking immediately.

If you find yourself distracted or daydreaming during instructions, obviously try to stay present and engaged—your aliveness, interest, and openness contribute to the collective field that supports everyone's practice. But don't get caught in overwhelm or self-judgment. The teachings will be there for you to return to when you're ready.

Another point worth addressing: there can be a lot—I've written about this and talked about it elsewhere—one common way of practicing insight meditation is simply being with experience. Whatever experience arises in the moment, one generally tries to just be with that or allow it. For some people, that's the entirety of their practice. That's what they do. That's what insight meditation is for them. And they feel very suspicious of deliberately trying to do anything, deliberately directing the attention or playing with the way of looking.

What I want to say is both are available. They're different modes of practicing. Just allowing—so-called "just being with experience"—I actually think that's a bit of a myth. There's no such thing. But let's say at least for a beginner, that's a fine thing, versus deliberately directing the way of looking. But they're just modes. And I would say they're both really important. We really miss a lot if we're never deliberate. We miss huge, huge potential in practice and what the Dharma can be.

One yogi wrote to me describing that for many years, her practice was more like this first approach—not deliberately really doing anything, just kind of letting what comes, come. She said, "For many years, my meditation practice resembled a chicken running over a minefield," which I thought was a great picture. This disaster and then that disaster, just trying to open to it all and be with it all because it all seems so real. Not realizing that I can change the ways of looking. And that actually, through playing with that, it changes what arises. That's not "not being with what's real" because I realize that there isn't—as I said before—any independent reality here.

So they're both modes. But in regard to imaginal practice and enchantment and cosmopoiesis, for most people nowadays, because of the disenchantment that's pervasive in modernist culture, in modernist Western culture, working with the imaginal, the enchanted perceptions, the cosmopoiesis, are not usually habitual. The mind doesn't tend to go there that much, tends rather to see according to the flatness and the one-dimensional. So we actually need to encourage them, which means being a bit more deliberate.

But you will find over the week, and as you practice more with these kinds of ways, that images, cosmopoiesis, cosmopoetic images—perceptions, if you like, or openings—will happen spontaneously, as I said, out of samadhi or out of being sensitive to an emotion in the energy body, giving birth to images. Both spontaneously and deliberately, images and cosmic voices can arise.

But what I really want to encourage is to return to what I started with: letting the sense of soulfulness and soul-making guide you. And part of that is the sensitivity to the energy body. Let that guide you.

So sometimes we try out something deliberately, some image or cosmopoiesis, either because it's a classical Tantra prescription, a classical Tantra meditation, or as a suggestion from one of us or from someone else, and we might deliberately try that out or deliberately return to it. But what I want to emphasize again is please pursue and stick with and try again only those images and cosmopoieses that have resonance for you in the soul. This is so important to recognize, to be sensitive to.

Even if some of them feel that they were initiated, or they seem to have been initiated in a kind of contrived way or an external way, what guides you is the sense of soulfulness and soul-making and the energy body. Let that guide you into what you return to and pursue and stick with and try again and work at.

Because if we don't use that soulfulness, then actually the practice—the practice that we're doing—will be kind of lifeless, soulless, pointless, really, except as exercises. An exercise in visualization or an exercise in concentration—how much can I stay focused? How long can I stay focused on a certain image? But nothing deep or significant for or in the soul is touched. Nothing is moved for or in the soul. I mean that word "moved" as in to be moving, to be touched, but also moved as in it starts to be dynamic, starts to form a dynamism in the soul. Nothing is vivified, brought alive. Nothing is really getting enriched or deepened.

But if there is, with a practice or a cosmic basis or a way of looking or an image, this sense of soulfulness, then we can be sure that all that is happening.

So really then, the encouragement was spontaneous, deliberate, lots of suggestions in everything that we're offering. Really the encouragement to play with it, to experiment, to let yourself be creative. It's like here is an artist's studio and we're just opening the door and it's got all these materials and all these different kinds of canvas and different kinds of things that you can make sculptures with and a whole bunch of different paints and watercolors and oils and all these materials and video stuff you can play with—in a way what we're doing is just opening the door to an artist's studio and you can come in and just play. Feel that way about it: playful, experimenting, creative.

Some people, their personality or their style of going about—whether it's this kind of thing or whether it's emptiness practice, whatever—is very systematic and sort of working through in order, kind of comprehensively. And that's fine. If that suits you, go for that if you want to. Or other people are more fluid and a bit more what looks like haphazard or whatever, intuitive. Let yourself work in the way that feels good for you and feels right for you.

So, for example, I think I mentioned in another talk, we're going to be working with re-enchantment, if you like, or exploring re-enchantment and cosmopoiesis through all six senses—sight, sound, taste, smell, touch, and mind. This doesn't mean—and this should be obvious by now—it doesn't mean mindfulness as bare attention to the experience in the six senses, to the sensations there. It doesn't mean arriving at those senses or exploring them with the typical modernist concepts of matter. We're opening them up in different ways.

Some people move through the six senses very comprehensively and thoroughly in order, separating them all out. Other people skip around a little bit more. Whatever works. Find the way of working that suits you, that serves you.

Last thing, for now. What is the point of all these practices? We'll be offering all these suggestions and guided meditations. This, to me, is quite important. The point is not to believe this or that about the self, about the world, about life. I've said that before. We're not trying to move you to a place where you believe X or Y about anything. Nor is the point actually trying to achieve any particular perception of a red etheric light body or a blue body or whatever. I don't see the point of all this as achieving any particular perception.

Rather, it's through all these practices, through the exercise of this flexibility in ways of looking—in and out and trying different things—and through the exploration of what we call the attitude of art or poetry in relation to perception, through the exploration of that attitude, through all of that, that a loosening happens. Or actually, rather, many loosenings happen. And this loosening is of fundamental importance, or these loosenings are of fundamental importance. Loosening, liberation, unfettering, being set free from all kinds of prisons.

But more even than that, through all this—through all the practice, through the exercise of flexibility and ways of looking, through this exploration of the attitude of art, if you like, in relation to perception, or poetry of perception—through all that, a sense, a perception, a knowing comes. However vague, however undefined, however unarticulated or seemingly unarticulatable, and however diverse the range appears to be of these experiences or senses or perceptions or knowings—they're plural—however diverse the range, however varied, through the flexibility we just alluded to.

But a sense, a perception, a knowing, or senses, perceptions, knowings come of eternity, we might say—of timelessness, as a better way of putting it—of beauty, different kinds and levels and ranges of beauty, and this opening up of the sense of sacredness.

This knowing, perception, sense of sacredness. And actually, we're talking about a plurality here, so it's not one sense. Even of timelessness, there are different perceptions of timelessness, of eternity, of beauty, of sacredness. And these perceptions, these knowings, these senses, they themselves open, they deepen, they widen. They become, through all these practices and these attitudes and this way of approaching things, more accessible in our life. They become more available to us. And they actually become more frequent. They become regular visitors, regular aspects of our existence.

And that—it's that—that is the main point of all this. That is the main point of all the practices. At least that's how I would see it. That's the main point.

CHAPTER 34

Healing the Imagination (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 40 min

> In this Q&A session from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea explores the practical dimensions of imaginal meditation and the role of the energy body as a compass for authentic practice. He addresses questions about following "what works" in meditation, distinguishing between mental concepts and energetic resonance when working with images that may appear dark or challenging versus those that seem conventionally positive.
>
> Burbea discusses the relationship between precision and flexibility in practice, offering guidance on working with rapidly shifting images and the importance of allowing enough stability for deep soul resonance to occur. He explores the integration of classical Buddhist approaches with tantric wisdom, addressing the complex relationship between purification practices (removing kilesas) and soul-making work that may include darker, more erotic dimensions of experience.
>
> The talk includes practical guidance on hand positions (mudras) and their energetic effects, and concludes with advice for a practitioner experiencing intense metta practice accompanied by purring sensations. Throughout, Burbea emphasizes the importance of honoring individual soul needs while maintaining ethical foundations, recognizing that different practitioners require different approaches at different times in their spiritual development.

So I can't see everyone's face just because of the light, but... anyone? Anything? Yeah, Alex.

I want to... it's been a long time since I've read Joseph Campbell so I can't remember exactly what he means by that. When Alexandra asks about what I mean when I say "follow what works"—are you asking me personally or just to elaborate on what I mean by that?

My guess is what Joseph Campbell means is more something like follow your passion in life, or follow what you really care about, or follow what brings you joy in a kind of larger trajectory in terms of work and where you are. That's my guess, remembering.

So I guess I mean that too, but usually when I say that, I imagine I'm talking mostly about meditation. It's more within the meditation itself.

Yes, I think the first answer is yes. There's this thing—one of the reasons for emphasizing the energy body is it can work as a kind of compass or barometer. So in whatever practice you're doing, let's say with imaginal practice, you might have an image come up that's dark and scary looking. Conventionally the mind goes, "Yikes, this is dark and scary and this can't be good."

But if I'm open enough and just notice—well, okay, the mind is saying that, but the energy body actually has come into some kind of alignment. It's come into some kind of openness, some kind of harmony, maybe more energy. So the energy body is telling me something different than the mind. The energy body is saying, "There's something here for me. It's a treasure." My small mind, usual habitual ways of thinking don't quite get it yet. I don't quite know what it is. It's opposite to how I usually think about what's helpful and what's not. But I would incline more to trusting the energy body there. If something's genuinely not helpful, it won't harmonize like that.

And it can be the opposite. Here's this nice frilly ballerina angel figure, and I think, "Oh, that should be really good for me because I really need that." And the energy body is just not responding—it's the mind thinking something.

So that's one example of following what works.

In other practices, like insight practices or mindfulness practice, let's say I'm just with this heartache or this pain in my knee or whatever, and I'm just trying to be with it or be mindful. Something sounds so simple. But actually I get a sense—I'm being with it and the thing is contracting more. I'm being with it and I feel more tight. And then we say, "Now I'm going deeper into it." Is that really the case? Or is it the fact that in my so-called simple mindfulness, there's something that's actually tightening the problem?

It's tricky because it can be both, but often it's the latter. It's like, what's present in my mindfulness at that moment, or what's missing in my mindfulness that would actually be helpful? How do I tell it's helpful? Something loosens.

In terms of insight practice or mindfulness practice, I often say there are two words: release and relief. But they're felt in the energy body. Sometimes it's mental, but sometimes you just feel relief. It can be really subtle. That's my compass—it's an energy body feeling.

Now, there can be bliss and peace and freedom and well-being and joy and all of that, but at the most basic subtle level, there's some kind of release or relief, and that's telling me—whether it's mindfulness or insight practice—that's telling me I'm on track. But it's through the energy body.

Does that make sense? Is that enough?

I'd say that, because sometimes we come to all this with quite fixed ideas of what we need, and I would trust that more. That's one of the reasons why I tend to offer the energy body and put quite a lot of emphasis on it—because it does so much, there's so much available through it.

That's exactly what works in the moment. Absolutely.

Going back to Joseph Campbell—that's one extreme, one of those long-term trajectories. "Am I going to do this or that? Am I going to work in Africa?" These are great, really important questions in life. But yes, you're taking him out of context, and that's fine. This question of following one's bliss can apply on all different timescales. Mostly I'm talking about in the moment.

Julia, your question the other day about finding an imaginal figure and then, when you came to sit down with it, it no longer worked—it's like, fine, switch. Other times you have to stay with something a bit more and really see if it isn't working. But it's really about being flexible in the moment. Not too much flipping and flopping, because you need to stay with something a little bit, but generally speaking, I'm responsive in the moment without preconception of what's working.

Andrea raises her hand

Andrea*: My question is around precision, because you used that word as opposed to mindfulness or concentration. My experience outside was similar to that man who asked a question the other day about taking in the tree, where there was appreciation. I'm noticing that something's harmonizing maybe in some respect, but the imagination flits, and what's meaningful changes from thing to thing to thing. There's a sense in me of something wrong with not being able to stay and resonate with each and every one of them.

There was a moment outside where all the rain fell all of a sudden, and there was a loveliness in just staying there for it. Then there was a sort of romance of being a woman standing outside in the rain, and then that changed to a fairy tale image of the sealskin, soulskin, and then later with walking. What I'm saying is, I don't feel that in that moment I can reach in, touch the energy body, sense the resonance. It seems like there's so much to do. What I did was just enjoy the movement of it and stay with that. I know it's early days here, but...

So the question is really: a lot of images are arising quite rapidly, seemingly flitting one to another, not lasting long enough to really tune into the energy body or tune into the image so much, but getting something from each, a beauty in each. What's right or wrong? How do I navigate that?

I tend to think with all this work that there isn't so much right and wrong, but you'll get different results depending on what you do. It may be that those images are actually related to each other. The first two you mentioned—it could be that here's the beauty of the rain in the landscape, the rain as object, and then what happened (I'm not saying this is what happened, but it could be) is that always when there's an image that's meaningful, the object is alive as image, and self is alive as image as well.

So it could be that a woman in the rain, with all the resonance of that, was just the subjective part of that same image. Do you understand? So it's not really flitting between different images—it's flitting maybe between different aspects of an image, which then you can kind of hold together or focus on one or the other. What looks like flitting might actually be different aspects of the same image.

That's one possibility. The second possibility is that yes, experientially, sometimes it does that for a while. It goes to this, or that, or the same image suddenly—I remember one where this character kept taking off clothes to reveal a different character underneath, like a Russian doll kind of thing. "When are you going to finally stop?" And it did, eventually. It settled down to one.

So sometimes it's just a matter of staying and waiting, and it will settle. Other times, maybe just pick one and stay with it. Actually try to stay steady with one and see what happens. Either it will feel like this really isn't right, or it will begin to morph and change and become workable.

But I think my tendency would be to advise integrating it into something that's more settled that you can then come into resonance with. Because what we want is for the whole being to be involved. Imaginal work means body, energy, soul resonances, awareness. If it's too flitting, it can't really come into resonance and do the soul work so much.

But that is... How is that not mindfulness, or how is that not focus?

So I'm not saying don't be mindful and don't be focused. I'm not wanting to say that at all. I'm really responding to context and what tends to get prioritized and sometimes overemphasized so that it excludes other possibilities. So if you hear me say something like that, it's really in response to that.

Catherine was using the word lingering. It's not lingering for the sake of – great, today I notched up two minutes, forty-five seconds, uninterrupted time with this object. It's not for the sake of that or because a still mind is better. The lingering is because we can come more into resonance and feel more and more can happen there.

So being steady with an image or relatively steady with an image or a vision is actually really helpful. In the larger picture of things, it tends to get a bit overemphasized, and so many people get so tight around it, and it becomes so painful, and it's a self-measurement thing about how well one, or badly, usually, one is doing. That's the sort of thing I just want to shake up a little bit.

Sometimes you'll get something that just doesn't seem to settle, and then there are different ways of responding to that.

You talked about mudras earlier, and we spoke a while back about an issue you were having. You told me you had been meditating with your hands up, and I said, "No, no, no, don't do that, hands down." I can't go into why now, but let's just say for now, hands down. So I'm wondering why...

What I see is sometimes people always meditating like that or mostly meditating like that. And what I would rather encourage is have some time not doing that. Even if you're doing just that, the opposite, the palm down, or all kinds of possibilities.

I had actually been meditating primarily like this – and then I switched to this, and that's when things started happening.

Did this come from a Zen tradition? It looked pretty Zen to me. This is a very open gesture, energetically. That's why I think it's working. And this – I can almost feel the pressure, and all the teaching that goes around it. Tightness, presence, brightness, alertness, discipline.

It's not like one's right and one's wrong. It's like everything we do has an effect. Going back to Alexandra's question – what is the effect? We're complex as human beings. We're rich at different stretches of time. Even sitting to sitting, we need different things or we'll respond to different things. So it might be that this becomes one among your repertoire. But it's just clear in the gesture – one's a lot more soft, a lot more open.

It's a bit like this can get a little... there's the possibility at times that this openness with the palms up gets a little flabby, flaccid sometimes. It's not that it will or it needs to, or that you shouldn't do that—it's just that's one of the ways it can go. Just as this position can get too tight and rigid and forced, that openness can get a little loose in a way that actually doesn't allow so much depth.

But really, the answer I would give is: play and experiment. There's much more than just those two options. It's quite a subtle thing, this whole matter with the hands. It's not like a huge difference, though between those two positions is quite extreme, so that could be a deal changer. But even going from this to just turning my hands palms down can make a big difference—it will. And as I said, it's amazing: here are the hands at the heart, and just shifting them slightly, or just a little bit higher, a little bit softer—it's different. It's really subtle, but it's different.

Not to make too big a deal out of this, but it's something we become more aware of. Mind affects body, body affects mind. And by body I mean physical, but also energy body—and then energy falls under perception and all of that.

Question from Participant

So with this kind of way of working with the imaginal—I find it very useful and it's very much like tantric practices—I have a couple of questions. One is about the relationship between soul and spirit, like when you go deeper into this kind of emptiness work and there's a kind of purity or transcendental quality sometimes. How do those two work together? And the second question is about kilesas—whether when you're working in this way, it means that it no longer has that soul resonance. Or is it that the whole traditional conception of being around at the time when the Buddha's teachings exist and awakening is possible—from what you've seen from all your students and everything you've been around—is that not so relevant anymore?

These are really important questions, and I'm really interested in them. I've talked a little about the interface with tantra in the past, and I hope to talk more about it in the future. But these are big, big questions, so let's see what we can say briefly.

Regarding the first one: kilesas refers to greed, hatred, and delusion—the three poisons in classic Buddhist language. These are the defilements that we get rid of in full awakening. The path involves dissolving these obstacles to awakening until, allegedly, they don't arise again for a fully enlightened person. This is all great and important and true.

Part of what we need to understand is that we can cut things at different levels—like chopping a tree at different heights. You can chop kilesas at different levels. The deepest level of cutting kilesas is actually seeing that the kilesa is empty. There is no one who has this greed, hatred, delusion. More than that, ultimately speaking, there is no greed, hatred, delusion.

This realization does several things. It undermines the whole mechanism of the kilesas generating. But it also frees you up in relation to how you're seeing them. Then the whole question becomes: now how am I going to live? How am I going to live in my actions? How am I going to live imaginatively, knowing that? That's complex.

As you say, most traditional tantric wisdom operates with quite a tight basis in the bodhisattva aspiration, in developing goodness and kindness, in commitments and vows of monastic orders and ethics. I think for most people, that foundation in goodness is important. Even today I was talking with someone about this—and I'll mention this maybe later in the retreat—but I think there's a danger of being too much toward the white and the sort of nice, pure white.

That will work for some people. In other words, what's alive... Souls are different, so to speak. Soul-making is different for different people at different times.

So I have a great resonance with purity and purity of heart. It's something that speaks to me so deeply. And I also recognize that I have a lot of darkness. And by darkness, I don't mean evil. I don't mean anything like that. I mean the dark gods, you know, and eros and things.

But it might be that someone—and this relates to your third question—the path of purity and the resonance with purity is soul-making for them. And the whole myth, even the classical Buddhist myth, is just what they need. Or it's what they need all their life, or it's what they need for a portion of their life. And at some point, maybe, it becomes no longer so potent, so deep, and so rich soul-making. What's missing? What's happening here?

I have to also say that when the Buddha was alive, they lived in a different cosmos. They did not live in a flat, scientific, materialist cosmos. The whole thing was ensouled anyway in ways that—I mean, don't get me started—but we approach the Buddhist myth in a much truncated form nowadays. And for some people, even that truncated form is alive for them as myth. It's soul-making. It fits very beautifully. And like I said, that might last a person's whole life, or it might just last a part of their life, or it might never really do it for them.

And some people need a path that allows and invites more of the erotic, more of a place for desire and the beauty of desire, more passion, more darkness, more eros. How that relates to ethics, you know, that's complicated. For me, ethics are very important, but they're also not simple. They're not simple from a soul point of view. They're also not just simple even from an ethical point of view.

One of the functions of Buddhist ethics is actually to simplify things. So in the original Buddhist teachings, the movement is out of the world, simplify, go both the path of mindfulness and the path of non-fabrication, of letting go of appearances and actually transcending appearances. You could say they're not soul-making. The path of deliberate fabrication, deliberately engaging in images, is more soul-making.

So you've got kind of three avenues, which ultimately we can be skillful in all of them: mindfulness or bare attention, deeper and deeper into non-fabricating, and then skillful playing with fabrication, which we'll be emphasizing on this retreat. Two of those cut soul-making because they cut imagery. You understand? They have their place. And for some people, even that whole thing is enough. They don't have a lot of need for imagery and eros. They're just a different soul. Other people, it's not going to fly. It might have its place, but it's not going to be the full picture.

So it's almost like, as I said this afternoon, souls are different, paths are different, we have different needs, and that changes over time. If I do have a lot of eros, if I do have a lot of image, if I do have a lot of passion, there's a huge gift in that, and there's a challenge in that. So with every gift, I'm given challenge. Do you understand?

I'm asked to integrate more. I'm asked to work with more. It's more complicated. It's richer. It's like, how does this fit with that? How do I get skill in this? And then there's this, and then there's this. In a way, it's easier to just not have any of that. And it's all kind of simple, and there isn't a lot of complexity. But the question is...

And this is more of a long-term trajectory as well. It's like, what's my soul and what are the needs of my soul? I think from teaching so much and hearing from so many people—someone said to me, what was the word she used?—"I feel neutered," or "something's amputated. I've been doing mindfulness, I've been doing..." For another person, it's not at all like that—it's enough for them. But this person said it's only when we raise it as something that they realize, oh, that's been missing. Or someone else saying to me how years of practice, actually trying to fit into a certain box without even realizing, and then feeling something's not right.

So there has to be a kind of honesty and a sensitivity in asking, but it is more to ask.

One very last thing. In terms of what you're referring to—something which maybe people don't understand, but Hillman talks about the dichotomy between soul and spirit. Soul being more this dark, labyrinthine, complicated, passionate, involved. Spirit being more spacious, transcendent, long views, peaceful, calm, equanimous, removed, detached.

Most spiritual teachings, classical Buddhism included, are more of the spirit. But I think there's a lot of skill in making that distinction. I also, more recently, would kind of call it all soul and not make that distinction. It's like, if we say our soul has different needs or different levels, so I love the transcendent. I have a pull there and I can't tell you how grateful I am that I devoted so many years towards that and to opening towards that. And it's not everything.

So there's that, if you like, level of soul and level of soul need, and there's other stuff that's not about that—more this darker stuff, or more towards fabrication. I'm more interested now in what way of holding all this actually just allows it to integrate without causing dichotomies or polarities or either-ors, and actually, again, recognizing that not everyone, but a lot of us are complicated beings.

I'm a complicated person, and it's like that complexity does not need to get ironed out. It needs to be respected and opened to and navigated and sensitized to, so that my makeup is bowed to rather than, let's blanch it all out and paint it like everyone else's—nice and white and square and clean and all that. So yeah, I'm more interested in ways of thinking that can actually accommodate all of it in a way of thinking that's useful.

That's the short answer.

Okay. So, Tam, you had a question. Do you want to? Well, we can take time. Some people will need to go, but I'm happy to... Unless you feel like it's a really long one or...

"I've been burning for like three years or something, so I'd really like to ask it."

"Hello Rob."

"Hello Tam."

"Hello. I'm a metta practitioner. That's what I do. I do walking metta and breathing body metta. Well, when I practice metta, I purr like a cat. And it goes vroom, vroom, vroom. And I can feel a sensation and I can kind of hear it. It's not me—I'm being purred. I can move it around."

"Is it nice?"

"And I can move it. Yeah. Good. Wonderful. And I can do all sorts of weird extraordinary things with it. And sometimes it's stronger than others, and as it goes away for a few minutes, then it feels particularly attached. Yesterday was the first time I found it quite boring. I can do it when I'm not meditating, if I choose to do it. Sometimes I can turn it on and off. I can bring it into my daily life. It's transforming how I'm being in the world. That's what it's doing. I need your help and your guidance because sometimes it's a bit too much to handle and it's a lot and I know that it's more than pīti—it has different qualities, different flavors..."

I've never really read the journals, don't really know much about this territory. I sat with Lily years ago, but I need your help. Sometimes it's overwhelming, sometimes it's boring. What's happening to me when I'm trying to work with this?

To me it sounds really good, actually quite wonderful. Let me offer you three possibilities, three ways of working with what you're describing.

The first is about managing the energetic intensity. If it feels too much energetically, use the imagination a little bit to let it out, like letting steam off. You mentioned it makes you stand up and grows around you—that's fine. Allow it to move how it wants to move, outside of the body, radiating towards other people. When it feels too overwhelming, we ease it by opening the channel so it flows out. This becomes really skillful—it's healing you on the way out as well, but it has more space rather than creating too much pressure inside. There's not enough space for the amount of energy and purring that's going on, so create more space.

The second thing—and you've already touched on this—sometimes it doesn't feel like "me." You said, "I'm being purred." Especially in the context of this retreat, that's exactly what you want to open to more. This has divine dimensions. If it gets boring, that divine quality might be what needs to come alive in how you're seeing it. You can play with that—does that make sense?

Even when it's not boring, I wonder whether this divine dimension, which has everything to do with this retreat, is what's already there. There isn't a prescription for this, but it's about allowing it to have its divine dimensions—plural. Something bigger than you is coming through, as you said. You are being purred, probably for all kinds of reasons. This is part of the imaginal sensibility—allowing that experience to have more than purely physiological or human resonances. I'm allowing myself to feel all the different kinds of divinity that are potentially wrapped up in that perception.

The third thing, which may or may not include the second, is sometimes you want to put the purring in contact with suffering. Cats purr, and sometimes when they sense that a person is unwell, they'll come sit on your belly and purr away. The purring, the healing energy, comes into contact with the pain—psychic pain, heart pain, whatever it is. You can deliberately bring these elements into contact.

So you might be purring and feeling good, and wonder why you'd want to bring up pain now. But it's about bringing it up just a little and letting the purring surround and lap against and hold just a small amount of pain so that those two come into contact. Or you might be in some pain and ask, can there be purring that comes to touch this? What's important is the contact between the purring and the pain, so they don't occupy different realms of our being without touching each other.

Sometimes that contact also happens within the contact of divinity, which casts a different light on everything. Catherine will be talking about this tonight—about dukkha, pain, and divinity, and how they meet.

Yes? So these are three possibilities for working with pain and pleasure, with dukkha and sukha, in our practice.

Does this approach feel workable for now?

The invitation is to explore these different ways of relating to our experience—allowing the purring and the pain to meet, to touch, to inform each other. Sometimes in this meeting, we discover something larger that holds both: that sense of the sacred, the divine quality that Catherine will be exploring tonight in her talk on dukkha and divinity.

These are not techniques to master, but rather gentle experiments in opening to the fullness of what we are. Each moment offers us a fresh opportunity to practice this kind of tender, aware engagement with whatever arises.

Thank you for your attention and your practice.

CHAPTER 35

The Movement of Devotion (Live and Shortened Version)

Rob Burbea · 42 min

> In this dharma talk from his "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" series, Rob Burbea presents a sophisticated exploration of devotional practice within imaginal meditation. Rather than emphasizing traditional concentration (samādhi) as a primary goal, Burbea advocates for cultivating different kinds of openness - of mind, view, perception, and heart - as pathways to what he terms "soul-making" practice.
>
> Burbea outlines four interconnected factors essential for accessing the imaginal realm: lessening fabrication through reduced clinging, synesthetic blending of the senses, cultivating heart attitudes of receptivity and humility, and skillful engagement with imaginal figures themselves. He emphasizes that devotion, surrender, and humility are not mere emotional states but practical prerequisites that allow imaginal figures to "come alive" with transformative power.
>
> The teaching includes practical guidance on working with eyes open or closed, relating to sound and environment as potentially sacred, and incorporating spontaneous body movements or mudrās into practice. Burbea draws connections to Tibetan Vajrayāna deity practices while maintaining his distinctive approach to imaginal work. Throughout, he emphasizes experimental discernment - learning what supports opening versus what contracts awareness. This talk offers both theoretical framework and embodied methods for practitioners interested in devotional and imaginal dimensions of the path.

Probably more than what we might say are typical or conventional approaches to practice and conceptions of the path and ways forward – more than the usual ways we might be familiar with – I think we feel that this kind of way of working and what we're opening up here, and the practices that we're involved in and what unfolds from that, unfolds more individually.

There's certainly general principles, and we draw attention to these, but there's something quite individual about what arises, what kinds of things arise, what order things unfold in, and also differences in people's propensities, what they've done, what their natural tendencies are in this or that direction. Sometimes someone needs to spend time developing this before that is available, or another person it's the other way around, or another person can move quickly through something that takes longer for someone else. All of this is just in the nature, I think, of the material that we're covering.

So again, in putting out these teachings, we're aware that it's a lot and some of it definitely – for everyone some of it will just be later: I don't quite understand, or sounds good, I get it but not right now, and some will feel very pertinent, and some will be stuff like I know that. There's quite a discernment, I think, and we could talk a lot about just discerning what to pick up, what to stay with, and what to just leave. This being recorded and so on, we're putting a lot out, and just to have that big picture sense.

With that, let me say a few things in that spirit. One thing I mentioned: we're not so much emphasizing or having the direction, the priority in this retreat of focusing or concentration, so-called, as a goal. It's not so much what this retreat is about and this way of unfolding is about. Rather, I would say openness is, or different kinds of openness is more what we'd like to emphasize and encourage and support. So openness of mind, openness of view, openness of perception, openness of heart as well.

Just to say a little bit about this. In this tradition, in our tradition, most of us are used to practicing with the eyes closed. There's an inward gaze and this can be really, really helpful. It's a little early on the retreat maybe, but what about actually, if you feel inclined, experimenting with eyes open or eyes closed? In other words, there's no hierarchy here, and as with everything else, we can experiment and find out actually what's helpful when. So you can start a sitting with the eyes open and then maybe close at a certain point, or maybe they're closed and they open again. Careful if that movement isn't a movement of restlessness, just like something needs to change because I'm a bit bored or fidgety or something. But really this question of like sensitive discernment: what actually helps? What helps? So experimentation.

When the eyes are open, we can still – many people will still be able to see purely intra-psychic images, if we use that language, intra-psychic as if the psyche is something separate. So even though the eyes are open, I can still be sensitive to and in touch with an internal image, but the eyes are open. And when the eyes are open too, there is the chance to perceive the world differently, perceive others, and what's around me in some kind of what we're calling cosmopoiesis. The eyes open may lend themselves more easily to that, and that's part of what we're wanting to explore.

So you might start sitting with the eyes open, actually notice that already there's something different in the way that I'm sensing what's around me, and then maybe dwell with that with the eyes open. Maybe then see, or can I actually have that with the eyes closed? The same sensibility, not necessarily directly visual, for instance. But similarly, with the eyes closed, we can still, as I said, have a sense of the, a different sense of the world around us. There can still be a cosmopoiesis with the eyes closed – comes through the other senses or the inner visual sense, et cetera.

Wrapped up in this, again, is this kind of experimenter's question: why does it – what makes this work or not work? If the eyes are open or eyes are closed, what makes it work sometimes and feel fruitful and other times not? To me these are really important questions for a practitioner to begin to ask these kind of questions, especially once you've done a bit of practice. It's like you want to be your own – you want to be the person finding out and researching and discovering. What happens is not just random. We're not just receiving stuff out of nowhere. Things work or don't work or unfold in certain directions for reasons that we can actually begin to understand and explore and play with.

But in relation to whether, for instance, the eyes are open or closed and whether that feels helpful or not, one of the things that makes a big difference is the relationship with what I'm seeing. Whether it's an internal image or hearing or seeing – seeing is a broad word for what I'm perceiving – but it's the relationship with the object. So if I'm reifying what I see and clinging to it as some kind of reality, or if I'm grasping in a gross way, I want that, or I really need to get rid of that – and this could be anything, something in the body, something, it could be a self-view, it could be a person – the reifying and the grasping will affect hugely what is available.

Another factor would be if I lose contact with my body space, the space of the energy, and I'm leaning out there and I lose touch and sensitivity here. So all those three things, even if that's subtle, that kind of leaning and grasping – what will happen? The imaginal realm will fade and the cosmopoiesis will fade. Something will dissolve of its potential and power.

But we can be, you know, experiment with being more open with the senses if it feels okay and see what happens. There's a lot of people in the hall and sometimes we're used to, you know, just everyone shut up so I can do my meditation and my concentration can get better. And it can be quite common to hear noises from other people as disturbances and distractions from my project of meditation, et cetera.

What's happened there? There's a pushing out, a trying to close in and a pushing out of the sensorium, of the sense realms, versus an inclusion, actually opening to include more. But more than that, there's a view. I'm viewing this person in a subtle way as a nuisance. Why don't they settle down?

Why can't they be quieter? Part of what we're interested in is playing with view.

So here's this human being who strikes me as clumsy and insensitive and too noisy, perhaps even just subtly. Can I play with the view? Here is an angel. Here is an angel. The sounds I am hearing are the sounds of an angel. I'm shifting the view deliberately.

I don't just mean angel as a metaphor—oh, they're so sweet. I mean it in more than a metaphor without a reification. Somewhere in between what that word metaphor has come to mean—a euphemism or whatever for just they're a sweet, nice person, really—somewhere in between that and this kind of solidification of the word angel.

And this shift of view is not the same as like, oh, I'm so judgmental. I should think this or I should be able to see that. We're really talking about the realm of experimentation here. Playing with views, this agility or flexibility with view. There's something you can try and see and see what happens. And this is the kind of thing that we're really emphasizing.

In the practice today then, we're allowing a little bit more flexibility between practices like we talked about and mentioned as a possibility yesterday, so energy body very much. Catherine was talking about how there are different frequencies of the experience of body. We can know the solidity, the earthiness, the soil as an important frequency. And then sometimes it's much lighter and more ethereal than that. All the spectrum is available, and ultimately where we're going with this—it's all divine. It all becomes divine.

But the energy body is connected with whether we're working with emotions, whether we're working with images, whether our direction is more in the way of samadhi. Today you can start to allow more of the imaginal in, if you feel like. And that could be very spontaneous, what arises in image, or it could be more deliberate—like following on from, for instance, Catherine's meditation yesterday with the imaginal figure of love or something that already works for you as an image and you draw it back deliberately.

But there can be a flexibility between these practices, the emotional awareness, the samadhi, and the imaginal—these directions, intentional directions. And always the sensitivity to the body and the sense of what's helpful, what's soul-making, is a central aspect, integral aspect.

Let me say a little bit more about this, particularly in relation to imaginal practice. A few months ago, I think it is now, Catherine told me she was having a conversation with a friend of hers who's a Jungian psychoanalyst. And he was talking about what they call active imagination in that tradition. So it's similar to—there's quite a lot of similarity between that and what we're doing, not completely. And he said to her, if I remember rightly, something like, "It's just a grace when that door opens, when you enter active imagination. There's nothing you can do to bring that on. It just comes."

I would say not necessarily at all. I mean, yes, it can come spontaneously, but there's this question: what is it that feeds? What is it that nourishes? What is it that opens certain doors? And what is it that closes certain doors?

So in the way that we're presenting the imaginal, we can deliberately practice opening to the imaginal, opening that door, crossing the threshold, if you like, into the imaginal realm. We can deliberately practice cosmopoiesis. And we're interested in what supports that.

So we're including both spontaneous and deliberate. And what is it that allows us to enter the territory of soul-making? What is it that helps shift the mode of being, the ways of looking, so that that opens up?

So I would say, in part of that, four factors or aspects that are actually interrelated and kind of mutually dependent. And the first is, if this sounds a little technical right now, it will make more sense as practice goes on and some of it will definitely make sense right now.

The first is a lessening of fabrication. The fabrication of perception is less in the moments when there is less creation of solidity and separateness and thingness to the things of perception—that's an important contributing factor to opening the door of the imaginal. And so that's one factor.

Now, how do we fabricate less? That's a whole thing, you know.

But basically, in a nutshell, it's when there's less clinging. When there's less clinging and craving, rejection, aversion, and so forth, there is less fabrication of self and perception. So all this practice has to do with—or an integral part of it is—the lessening of clinging, because that lessens fabrication, and that loosens things. We're in the realm of the loose and the alchemical solution.

So that's the first factor: lessening of fabrication.

The second is what I want to call, for want of a better word right now, synesthesia. Some of you will know this word. It's when people's senses get mixed—psychologists make it a clinically pathological condition, but I'm just talking about a mixing of the senses. Sometimes it feels like I see sounds, or I feel colors in the body, this kind of thing.

As fabrication gets less in practice, the six senses tend toward one sense. Some of you will be familiar with this. As the mind calms and gets deeper, what feel like six separate senses—sight, sound, smell, taste, touch, and mind—actually seem to coalesce. Everything is received, if you like, in the same sense field. But there's a continuum there to how separate the senses feel or how they join together. This happens as fabrication gets less anyway. As we let go of more clinging, the senses tend to go more toward oneness. Eventually we go beyond the senses—there's a dissolution, a non-appearance of all sensory perception. But basically there's a spectrum there.

Part of the opening of the imaginal realm is actually—not always, but sometimes—this mixing of the senses. There's more fluidity or blending of the senses that's quite characteristic.

That's the second factor.

The third has to do with the heart and the stance or position or posture of the heart. Receptivity, surrender, humility seem to me to be really important aspects—really necessary aspects for the heart to open this door of the imaginal realm. What is the posture, the attitude of the heart that makes a big difference? I'm going to come back to this in a moment.

The fourth factor is the imaginal itself and the way we're tuning and relating to the imaginal.

So these are all interdependent, but of those four, the first and the third are things we can actually do. We can actually learn with practice, with skill, to cling less so that there's less fabrication and the whole realm of perception gets less solid, more amorphous, more insubstantial, if you like. We learn to do that, and we learn to do it more easily as practice goes on.

And also the opening of the heart—this moving into an attitude of heart that is receptive and has humility in it. Sometimes it feels like, "God, that's such a stretch. I don't know. I'm just locked into this tightness of heart." But as practice goes on, we get better at just shifting to an attitude of humility. It's something that comes and becomes more easy with practice.

These movements—the things that we can do, the lessening of fabrication, this receptivity or humility of the heart—they're things we can actually do. And they allow the opening of the imaginal in ways that affect the soul more deeply, that actually really go deep and are more soul-making. They allow a degree of synesthesia, of this mixing.

As Catherine was saying this morning, it's like different ways of knowing. We tend to only know through the mind or thinking or information, or through "I see it" or "I hear it." But actually other modes of knowing that don't really fit so well into the usual way we think of how the senses work—other modes of knowing become available through all this. That's part of the cosmopoiesis, that's part of the re-enchantment of both what the human being is and what the world is.

So, for example, to just illustrate all this in relation to my illness right now over the last year, and the possibility of dying and all that—sometimes if I'm practicing and I'm using the imaginal in relation to that, and I want to experiment a little bit, what seems important to unlock something, or not to unlock so much as to bring it alive—maybe both, unlock and bring it alive—is the first thing: this humility.

I cannot cure myself. It's not in my power. Maybe the doctors can't. I don't know. But knowing that, or just that recognition—if there's a humility: It's not in my power. I cannot do this on my own. It may or may not happen.

From that humility then another step—if you like, maybe it's a short step—is from that humility, an openness and a surrender to something bigger than me. Let's call it God.

And put that, if you like, in inverted commas, to a God. Whatever language we want to use—something that is numinous, something other, larger than me.

This stance, this posture of the heart needs to happen first before any other. It opens the door to the imaginal. Or rather, as I said, it's what allows the imaginal to then come alive. So then this figure of divinity comes alive because the humility and the openness and the surrender of the heart allow it to come alive. Without that, it does not come alive. It can still be there as an image, but something's not penetrating so deep.

For example, some time ago I was working with this. This movement happened—the opening, the receptivity, the surrender to the divine. And I heard the birdsong outside, a beautiful birdsong. That birdsong was felt as blessing, felt with my whole soul. The birds were a blessing. Their song was a blessing, and in the blessing was a kind of healing.

The birdsong itself was felt in my body and through the listening, but also in the energy body, as if the birdsong, the sound, the fragments of melody were reweaving my energy body, restructuring. And it was all one—the body and the reweaving and the sound, heard, felt. The synesthesia was there. Through sound, in sound, the energy body was being rewoven. Very, very beautiful. There's a synesthesia between the sound and the body sense, with the sense of blessing, with the sense of the divine, with the sense of the humility, the surrender.

These are sometimes very little, very subtle movements. Sometimes they're a big step, but sometimes they're just subtle movements. Something just—oh yeah—and something is allowed.

Some of you will be familiar with different tantric practices, Vajrayana practices, where you have a sort of prescribed deity. It's Tara or this deity or that deity. It's called a yidam in the tradition. And again, for those of you familiar with this, I would say the devotion to this deity, the surrender, the openness, the humility are really vital and indispensable parts of that practice. They might need to be first—those things first.

In the Tibetan tradition, in the tantric tradition, they talk about preliminaries and prerequisites. It's working on the heart and the heart's relationship with all this—the heart's relationship with being on the path and divinity and all that. And then that allows an opening. So there's reason for all that in the Tibetan tradition.

But this heart surrender or devotion or openness, humility—again, felt in the energy body, brought alive as experience in the heart, in the energy body—can unlock or bring alive. It opens a door, if you like. Otherwise these things are just exercises in visualization or concentration. The heart and its attitude, its posture—the posture of the heart in any moment—is crucial to imaginal practice. Absolutely crucial.

There's quite a lot to say about working with imaginal figures and building on what we did yesterday. Just a reminder: the imaginal figure may feel like it has an ethereal body of light, or it may be very solid. It may be a human being. It may have a certain color, or it may be an animal. There's a real range there. It may be someone I know, maybe someone I don't know, maybe a historical figure. All kinds of possibilities. Maybe the features are clear of the image, maybe they're not. Maybe it's visual, maybe it's not.

But the character, the personality, the qualities of the presence of the imaginal figure—that's what we want to have clear. The visuals might not be clear, but it's the sense that this is a particular character. And I somehow feel that character.

So there's a place for this stance of the heart, and some of it at different times might involve supplication, asking. If this other is some kind of divine, then one kind of relationship with that is asking. That's how usually people think about prayer, which I'll speak about in a minute. It's asking for something. In my humility, I'm asking for something.

And there can also be this receiving, receiving of the love, for instance. Or just harmonizing. The being in gazing at the imaginal figure and being gazed at—there's a harmonizing of the qualities.

We are absorbing, if you like, almost by osmosis, just by being in contact with this imaginal figure, we're absorbing what it radiates—whether love or compassion or power or whatever quality emanates from it. So there's receiving and there's also a kind of harmonizing.

And then sometimes there can be a kind of union. One actually—I think Mayweather mentioned yesterday—there can actually be a union where me and the imaginal figure become one. There's a communion there, where I and this deity become one. Several people have already shared this kind of thing. It's just a very natural part of the way these practices can open up.

We don't need to make a hierarchy between all that: supplication, receiving, harmonizing, union. They're just different dimensions of experience that can open up.

Sometimes that union or that movement towards union can be erotic, can be sexual. And that's completely within what we would expect for these practices. We don't usually include that in practice, but yes—it's there. It's very normal. It doesn't need to happen, but it can be a very natural part of what happens here in working with these things.

I mentioned the word prayer, and I think for a lot of people—wherever they stand on religion or religions—they think of prayer as supplication, as asking. I'm asking God for a favor, help me out here. I want to say that's really fine as one dimension of what prayer can be. If that's part of it, what I would just say is like so much of this: it's about delicate balance and sensitivity.

Be careful when one is in a supplicatory relationship that it doesn't too much come out of or end up feeding actually a quite contracted sense of self—a smaller, harder sense of self that wants something and is kind of pushing for that. The actual supplication may sometimes contract and make hard the self. It doesn't have to. There's a subtle difference between that and what's a humble opening, opening out of the being to receive from something, someone that's bigger. There's a subtle difference there, but always it's like noticing what the effect is. Is it contracting more or is it opening or softening more?

When we use words like prayer, that's such a big word with such a range. So yes, there is prayer as supplication. There's prayer as praise. Prayer as blessing. And even what those words mean—what does blessing mean? We say, "may you be peaceful, may you this or that," and there's that level of blessing which is beautiful.

And there's also—it's almost like the word itself has no end to it in what it can open to and what it can mean—to bless and to feel blessing. It's almost like the word itself dissolves or goes into realms where it dissolves, and it's still palpable and powerful. Blessing. And prayer as blessing.

So all these dimensions are open. But all these things—prayerfulness, devotion, surrender, love, compassion—there's such a range of flavors and intensities that are available to us as human beings with all of that. Such a range.

You know, with compassion it can be very quivering in response, very tearful. We're really resonating with the suffering of whoever it is we're giving compassion to. That's one flavor of compassion. Other flavors of compassion are very soothing and they're much more buoyant or bright or quite spacious. There's all these different flavors and they're all good. They're all available to us.

And all these qualities—prayerfulness, compassion—they're always composites. They're mixtures. There's never one thing. So as practice grows, we can know and experience all these ranges and actually discern the differences and the qualities differently. We don't always need to insist on intensity.

of experience. Intensity is not always better or deeper necessarily. But intensity of experience of emotion can be something that we're more and more able to accommodate. We have more and more capacity for intense deep feelings. That grows. We can develop that slowly over time.

So again, openness, openness of mind here, trying to discern what's helpful.

Let me say one more thing about all this—it involves the body. We've been emphasizing that right from the beginning. And you get a sense of how much the heart and the mind, the citta, affect the body and how much the body affects the heart and the mind. So it's two ways.

Now some of you will notice, or in the course of practice whether it's today or on this retreat or another time, sometimes you're sitting with the energy body and especially when the energy body starts to feel quite nice or harmonized, when there's a bit more well-being, sometimes you get the sense that the energy body wants to move in certain ways or adopt a certain posture, or actually that it already is doing that. I'm sitting here still, the physical body's sitting here still, and inside the energy body is dancing. Or it's adopted a certain posture, or it's moving in a certain way, or wants to move in a certain way.

So this is different than restlessness. It's just fidgety or just a bit bored. Something is actually quite harmonized and the energy body is moving or wanting to move. So this is something—don't need to make it happen, it's not better or worse, it's just something that can happen. If it happens, it's something you can feel into. What does that feel like, this movement or this impulse to move?

And sometimes we can actually deliberately, actively explore the movement. So let the body do what it has the impulse to do. Actually enact it. So there might be spontaneous movements, or usually they tend to be quite slow with this, usually, but anything can happen. Or it might look a bit like Tai Chi or some kind of dancing or something. But actually it could be anything. Sometimes it's just in the hands.

If you know this word mudra, one of the meanings is hand posture. And again, it might happen spontaneously or you allow the body, the hands, to adopt a certain posture. Some people sit like this and that's a very open posture. There's all kinds of other things you can just feel into. You know, this is a mudra—this Anjali prayer. And there's subtle differences. Actually, that feels different emotionally and energetically to the hands being at the heart center, to being at the head center, or even at the mouth. Even just a little bit up and down, this with the hands forward feels different. It's very subtle how it affects the energy body and how it affects the heart.

But these are the sort of things, if you want to, you can let the body experiment with and feel. What is it to touch the earth, the mudra of the hand touching the earth? And what's alive for that imaginatively and in the soul, in the heart? It's a famous Buddha posture. I can't quite see from here—is he doing that? So there's a whole archetypal resonance of that. What is it to bow on the earth and let the forehead touch the earth? So how does it feel? How does it feel to let the body do some of this stuff? And how does it feel to just keep the physical body still and allow the imaginal energetic body to do it? There's two different avenues there.

Sometimes meditation feels stuck. And say, for instance, with this mudra, with the hand posture, it's quite interesting—sometimes just a little shift of the mudra, of the hand posture, and something unsticks. And because the citta and the body are that connected, sometimes just a shift of the body, even the hands into some different thing like that, and something unsticks. The emotional, the heart opens, the energy body opens, the perception opens, the possibilities open. Really quite subtle can be.

So you don't need to get sort of obsessed with all this or whatever, but if it's something that feels like it's fruitful to explore, let yourself explore it a little bit. There's quite some richness here. Sometimes very subtle changes can actually have a lot of effect.

Okay, so practice-wise, if you want to, you can include this today. And so in the walking meditation, again, energy body. And sometimes, as Catherine was saying this morning, it's just about solidity and the contact. But energy body.

And if you want, the walking meditation can start to include some of this more subtle exploration—how does the energy body want to move? Maybe it's not walking. Maybe I'm standing there and doing what looks like Tai Chi or some kind of dance, or I just want to adopt a particular posture and remain still. Again, it could be actual physical enactment that the body is doing, and it could be that I actually look stock still—the physical body appearing motionless—but inside there's this movement going on, or this certain posture. So let yourself explore if you want to. You can explore that at times, if it calls to you.

Everything affects everything else. Like I said, the energy body, the heart, the emotions, the physical body—it's all this mutually dependent web, this beautiful web. Everything touches and shapeshifts everything else.

When there's this energy body movement, either the inner imaginal movement or the actual movement, sometimes that in itself will open up, as I said, the perception. It will bring an image or it will open up a cosmopoiesis or a shift in way of looking. And sometimes it works the other way around. You're working with an image and it seems like because of this working with the image, or because of this cosmopoiesis, the body wants to adopt a certain posture or move, or the hands want to gesture in a particular way. So often the causality flows both ways. This causes that and that causes this.

What that means for practice is to notice, if you play with this material, and as you do—or as much as you do—can we notice the energy body, the emotion, the feeling and all that, but also what's happening in perception, in the sense of self, the sense of the world, the way of looking, the sense of the body, of other, of environment.

So the last thing—with all this, sometimes it's more helpful to enact things. For instance, prostrations or actual chanting, actual sounds, and it brings the being alive. It moves the energy and something comes alive and we get more sensitive. And sometimes the being wants not to do that. It's actually stock still and I'm just letting it—the bowing is happening. No one can see it, but inside I'm bowing.

Sometimes the being needs that kind of more subtle manifestation, and sometimes it needs the actual physical expression—no, actually bend the body and do that prostration, chant, vocalize. So again, this is part of this complexity and discernment in all this. When does one bring me alive and when, curiously, does one actually just shut me off and not bring the sensitivity? There's not a rule. It's not always one or the other.

Part of the play of all this is to be sensitive to these nuances. Do you get that? Good.

Let's have just a little bit of silence together.

Really, this encouragement—just take what's useful. If something just doesn't feel relevant right now, leave it. Just leave it.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 36

The Movement of Devotion (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 40 min

> In this second part of his exploration of devotional practice, Rob Burbea examines prayer beyond supplication—as praise, blessing, and prayerfulness that involves the imaginal and divine dimensions. He discusses how prayer can extend from blessing one aspect of experience to a cosmopoetic perception where all things are experienced as praising and blessing. The talk explores the intricate relationship between the physical body, energy body, and consciousness, showing how they mutually influence each other in meditation practice.
>
> Burbea provides practical guidance on working with the energy body, including how subtle shifts in posture and hand positions (mudras) can profoundly affect emotional states and meditative depth. He discusses the phenomenon of imaginal movement in meditation—where practitioners may feel the energy body moving or adopting postures while remaining physically still. The teacher emphasizes the importance of sensitivity and discernment in knowing when physical enactment versus imaginal movement serves the practice.
>
> The talk includes detailed exploration of various mudras, from the anjali (prayer position) to earth-touching gestures, and their effects on the psyche. Burbea addresses how these practices can help when energy or emotions feel stuck, explaining how subtilizing awareness can give it more energy than difficult emotions, allowing for greater spaciousness and healing. This dharma talk offers a nuanced approach to embodied spiritual practice that honors both subtlety and intensity.

Now, all this is related to prayer and prayerfulness. What does that mean? Often people, especially those who are suspicious of religion—or even some religious people—think of prayer as really asking for something. I'm asking God for a favor or to help me out in some situation: what we could call supplication. And that's fine, you know, that's a style or stance of prayer, and it really is fine.

But we need some care here, because supplication or asking an imaginal other—divinity or angel or whatever—for something can be a little too much on the reified, self-serving side of things, as we've talked about. But actually the very asking itself can come out of, and also support or bind in place, a sense of the self that's actually quite contracted and small and hard in the moment. In other words, the very asking itself—the way that we're asking, the relationship with that asking, the whole way that we're seeing it—is keeping a contracted, small, hard sense of self in place at that time.

That's different from a kind of humble opening out of the being to receive something bigger. It's the opposite of contracted, small, and hard. There's a softening and opening out of the being to this something, some other, some autonomous other that we sense is something bigger than us. So one is contracting and one is opening. One has humility and one has a kind of tight smallness to it.

Again, without making too many problems out of this, it's just the sort of thing we want to be interested in. Of course it's going to go one way or another at times. It's just recognizing these movements, discerning what's happening. Ah, okay, can I open it differently? Can I see it differently? Can I shift something?

Prayer or supplication is fine, but prayer doesn't necessarily mean supplication at all—or rather can mean a lot more than just asking. Prayer as praise of the divine or of the divinity of all things. Prayer as blessing—our blessing of someone or something, or our sense of receiving blessing from someone, from something, or from the divine in general, the universe, the cosmos.

Blessing can be something articulable, like "may you be well," or a specific wish. But in their depths, there are also dimensions of praise and blessing that it's almost impossible to put into words. We can't actually translate them into words. The words crumble or dissolve into something that's still very alive, very deep, still involving the divine, involving images wrapped up in it. It's not just a euphemism for "oh, it's pretty in the garden" or "isn't nature amazing." It actually involves a sense of divinity and the imaginal, but while I'm still using words like praise and blessing, and they're palpable, if someone said "what do you mean exactly," it would be hard to articulate. It's something beyond the verbal.

The experiences of this level of prayer—prayer as praise or blessing rather than as supplication—have a huge range, both in terms of how close they are to obvious praise or blessing or the more conventional meanings of those words, and also in their potential loci or reference or focuses: this thing or that thing or wider or this element of experience or whatever.

These experiences of prayer are always imaginal. They always involve the imaginal. They involve image and a sense of divinity, even if that sense and the images involved are subtle or even vague. But they can extend from being associated with one object to an all-inclusive, all-pervasive, cosmopoetic perception of praise, blessing, prayer.

It may start with one thing or one aspect of experience being perceived and felt in the soul and the heart as a blessing—perceived as a blessing or as emanating blessings. For instance, the materiality of the body. The materiality of one's body and its form.

Sometimes there's a shift in the psyche, in the consciousness, in the perception. We perceive this materiality, this form, as a mode of divine blessing. It is imminent, and as form, the materiality and the form is an emanation of a blessing—both a blessing from the divine and itself as blessing.

Not just because it's a miracle of biophysical evolutionary processes—which it is—but not just that. In this sense, in this mystical sense, in this sense of prayerfulness, there are intimations, senses, conceptions—often faint—of other dimensions, of divinity. So there is blessing there in the knowing of body in this way, and the felt experience of body in this way.

And then, as is so often the case, it can extend—a cosmopoiesis extends from one object or thing or person, perceived in this sense as a theophany. In this case, as praise, as blessing, it starts to extend to the materiality and the forms around us, around this body in this moment. There's a natural, organic extension into a wider cosmopoiesis.

So from this body as blessing, or this body as praising, there's an extension to matter—the matter that I perceive in this moment as blessing, as praise. And then also an extension from that, potentially, to the knowing. The knowing of the praise, the blessing, the knowing of the materiality. So knowing it as blessing, and the knowing too is blessing. The knowing too is a blessing.

You can see it starts with one thing, there's an extension—as I said, a natural organic extension. Not always, but often, with these processes, these mystical unfoldments, there's a natural organic extension, a wider cosmopoiesis. And it's possible at times, in practice, to sense all things—all things or beings or objects or elements or aspects of experience—to sense that they are all praising, they are all blessing. They are the praise and the blessing of the divine. They receive the praise and the blessing of the divine and they emanate the praise and blessing.

But always what's involved in this kind of cosmopoetic perception of the imaginal is that this praise and this blessing, if that's what we're talking about right now, is felt and known through the senses somehow. For example, in the realm of materiality, the sense of the warmth of the sun—you could say in a certain language the fire element—the sense of the warmth of the sun on the body is somehow praising, is somehow divine blessing, or the divine blessing existence. Or through the sensations of touch of the feet, legs, body with the earth on which I'm standing, the sense of connection, of rootedness there—this somehow is divine blessing. This experience of touch, these sensations of touch, are emanating blessing, are praising. Or through the sense of smell and fragrance—and not necessarily only pleasant sensations, pleasant smells or pleasant touches, whatever.

And certainly, as I've said in other talks, and I said earlier, these words praise and blessing are not euphemisms for just "oh, how pleasant, how aesthetically pleasing." They don't restrict themselves to the pleasant. There's involved in all this the potential for a kind of liberation from the whole duality of pleasant and unpleasant in experience, and the directives—the constraints and compulsions of consciousness, of experience—that come out of that duality. So we can perceive praise and blessing more and more widely.

But always, what's involved here is the imaginal, is the heart, the receptivity, the openness of heart. Conception is involved, even if subtly and vaguely, and the senses are involved. So it's felt and known somehow through the senses in ways that—we're really talking about ways of knowing, different ways of knowing that are not conventionally acknowledged or recognized.

The possibilities here for this level of prayer—prayer as praise, as blessing—there are manifold possibilities in all kinds of directions and multiple kinds of ranges involved. Possibilities are infinite, in fact. Infinite.

And similarly with all that, there are flavors and intensities of the feelings of prayerfulness, of devotion, of surrender, of love and compassion. All of these qualities, there's a huge range to them, both in their possible intensities and also the possible flavors that they have.

So, for example, compassion. Compassion can be very tearful, quivering with the resonance, with the suffering of whoever we're feeling compassion for. And it can also be very sweet and lovely and very buoyant, light, healing energy streaming forth, and there isn't so much of the tears. It feels very bright, very sustainable, very light. It can be in the middle, a mixture of those two. Compassion can be very spacious or really quite cool. And all of these are flavors of compassion. There's no hierarchy there. Again, they're just flavors that are available to us, and also intensities.

All of these qualities that I was mentioning before—prayerfulness, devotion, surrender, love, compassion, metta—they're actually composites. In other words, love or metta or compassion or prayerfulness is never just one thing. It's a mix of different elements.

This is not just an intellectual point at all. As practice grows and we develop our practice, we can absolutely—and it's there for us to know and to really experience—all the ranges of all these qualities and be able to discern these qualities and the flavors and the subtle differences and actually tune the mix. I want the compassion to be a little more buoyant right now, a little more light and less heavy and tearful. I want it to be more spacious, or whatever it is.

So we're really talking about what's possible in practice. What ranges can we traverse and what can we know and what can we sense and what can become really just part of our lives? I'm not even talking just about formal meditation practices—also in our lives, in our relationships, in the moments in the day.

So again, no hierarchy here. We're not insisting on intensity for prayerfulness or surrender or devotion. I mean, intensity is fine and great and can be wonderful, but it's not that it's always better or deeper or more helpful. Yes, in the course of practice, in the course of years of practice for most people, our capacity grows. We learn how to accommodate.

Our heart grows. Our psychic space expands to accommodate truly intense, profound emotions—whether difficult ones or the deeply beautiful ones. We learn to hold such forces of sacredness, praise, blessing, beauty, compassion, or love. We discover how to allow these experiences, how to create room for them without being overwhelmed. This capacity to hold intensity without it becoming problematic is part of deepening in practice.

So yes, there is a place for intensity and vastness. But echoing what I said earlier, the movement toward subtlety is equally important. Sometimes these qualities of prayerfulness, devotion, surrender, love, or compassion are far more subtle and less intense—and sometimes this subtlety is actually more helpful. The mind may want and be nourished by this gentleness. We want to allow this movement toward subtlety and fully experience it, not become hooked on intensity, afraid of it, or dismissive of the subtle.

Again, no hierarchy exists here. What this asks of us is open-mindedness, sensitive discernment, careful attunement, experimentation, and flexibility—but always with discernment, with tuning, and with genuine interest.

The heart and its central importance, along with those four interrelated aspects that open the door to imaginal practice and cosmic dimensions—these we've explored. But I want to draw out something implicit in all this: the relationship between body, energy body, and consciousness.

Let me say something about this, as it's crucial for practice. Our physical body, our sense of the energy body, and our state of consciousness—what's happening in the psyche and soul at any moment—are deeply interrelated. One affects the other in continuous mutual influence. Some of this interaction is obvious and gross; some extremely subtle. Here again we find this range from gross to subtle, and this interrelationship becomes an increasingly important thread to notice in practice.

Consider pīti in samādhi. Some of you know this well-being that wells up in or fills the body—this Pali term the Buddha used and emphasized in the progression of samādhi. When this pleasant factor is present, often the head naturally tilts slightly backward. This happens because the movement of pīti, especially initially, tends to flow upward through the body like a current or fountain of pleasant feeling. What's felt in the energy body can actually cause this physical tilting—sometimes a little, sometimes dramatically. Here we see consciousness gathered in joy affecting the energy body, which then affects the physical body.

Please don't make a big deal of this at all. I mention it simply in the spirit of experimenting with these interrelationships—not to achieve anything particular, but from curiosity about this connection and sensitivity to the energy body. Sometimes in practice, you might become aware of the energy body's uprightness. Notice this uprightness and allow it as if the energetic axis of the body were unfurling, reaching upward, straightening, filling out, extending slightly. I'm speaking of something very subtle—an inner, imaginal encouragement or allowing.

How does this feel when you do it? Let the physical body be straight and allow that energetic sense, the energy line running through the body's center, to straighten out. Notice how this feels in the whole energy body's space. Then observe what happens, very subtly, if you begin tilting the chin up so slightly that someone watching would not notice or would barely notice. I'm not suggesting jerking or yanking—not even significant movement. Just experiment.

Feel the whole energy body, sensitive to that entire space. Sense this line of energy up the body's center, perhaps extending below and above, and allow it to unfurl, straighten, extend. Then tilt the head back so subtly, so slightly. How does this feel? How does the energy body respond?

You may find that attending to the energy body or allowing it to open in certain ways—or even adjusting the physical body—actually encourages particular feelings. When certain feelings arise, they affect the body, and playing very subtly with the body affects the feeling. There's a genuine interrelationship here.

I offer this as example, but also because we're interested in noticing these dynamics. More generally—and this is what I want to emphasize—when we're aware of the energy body or dwelling in that awareness, especially when there's some well-being, pleasantness, or harmonization present (some degree of samādhi, though not only then), we may begin noticing something remarkable. At times—definitely not always, but at times—the energy body wants to move, or actually is moving imaginatively or energetically, while the physical body remains absolutely still.

Someone observing from outside sees nothing happening at all—you're sitting perfectly still in meditation. Yet inside, you feel the energy body wanting to make certain movements or actually making them. Inside, you might feel like you're dancing, or that your hands are in a particular posture, or that the body has adopted a certain position.

This is entirely different from restlessness—that "I want to move, I want to scratch, I want to shift, I want to open my eyes, I want to leave this meditation." I'm not speaking of the unsettled mind, boredom, or agitation.

This is actually something else entirely. It comes when we're really with the energy body. It tends to arise when we're genuinely present with the energy body and when something is opening and harmonizing in the citta, in the psyche, in the energy body.

So this can happen, and really the encouragement when that occurs is to let yourself feel into that, to actually allow it and sense this either imaginal movement or imaginal posture, or the impulse toward that imaginal posture. Really explore it. Let it be there and feel how it feels in the energy body.

Now, sometimes you might actually explore physical enactment or allowing the physical body to actually adopt a certain posture or move in a certain way. Usually, that would take the form of spontaneous movements. Usually, they will be quite slow. There's actually no fixed rule, but usually they'll look something like a kind of tai chi or spontaneous moving between yoga postures, or holding of this pose, or some kind of slow dancing or something. But actually anything's possible.

Maybe sometimes it's just in the hands. Just the hands feel like they want to move in a certain way or change into what's called a mudra, a hand posture. One of the meanings of mudra is a deliberate ritual hand posture in some traditions, especially in the Tibetan tradition, though actually quite a few traditions use them. You might have seen pictures of different mudras where the hands and fingers are arranged in different postures—there are many possibilities.

And again, you can allow that movement or the adoption of a certain hand posture, a certain mudra, and notice and feel it. Feel yourself actually doing that, but feel its effects in the energy body, feel its effects on the emotion, if there are any, or on the sense of soul-making or whatever. So you actually let your hands do that, let them adopt a certain posture, let them move a certain way, but you're really tuning to how it feels in the energy body, in the soul, in the emotions, and so forth. Or, again, you can just let it be an imaginal movement of the energy body, where the physical hands are absolutely still.

All this can be extremely subtle. And for example, with the hands, there's a lot of possibility for subtle and sensitive experimenting. Consider the Anjali, the bowing posture of the hands, or the prayer posture, or the posture of devotion with the palms and fingers pressed together—a very common gesture in Asian countries especially. How does that feel different?

Sometimes you can let yourself experiment, if it feels helpful, if it feels fruitful. Because sometimes this can be just a complete waste of time, or it's not really helpful, it's not really the thing that's most beneficial at that moment. But how is it different? It's very, very subtle. The hands in Anjali, pressed together palm to palm, fingers together, and placed at the heart center, or placed at the mouth, or even slightly higher than the heart center or the mouth, slightly lower—little increments can actually make quite a big difference in the rest of the feeling of the psyche and the energy body and the emotions.

What about the angle of the hands? If they're tilted forward or if they're straight up? If the fingers and palms are pressed flat together or if the fingers are interlaced? What about if the hands in this Anjali posture are touching the forehead? I mean actually touching as opposed to just nearby or not. How does it feel? Can you notice?

So if you're experimenting with this at times, there's an immense subtlety that's possible here. What is noticeable in the effects on the feeling of the emotions, the energy body, and so forth?

Consider the touching the earth mudra—the famous picture of the Buddha sitting with one hand touching the earth. And that can go in all kinds of directions. It's not formulaic, this, necessarily, or the way we're teaching it is not formulaic, as I said before. But touching the earth, and what does that do? Or the head pressed to the earth, bowing, and the head, the forehead touching the earth—all of this affects the emotions, affects the energy body.

Sometimes in meditation, we feel stuck—the energy's stuck, or the emotion's stuck, or the attitude's stuck. And just sometimes—I'm not saying this as a sort of fix-it formula, but sometimes, again, from the spirit of exploring all this—sometimes just a shift in the mudra, in the hand posture, just a subtle shift, maybe even in which fingertips are touching. Maybe the thumb and the second finger of each hand start to touch, or there's the Anjali prayer posture of the hands, and the first fingers bend to touch each other, fold inward to touch each other, and the thumbs come to rest on those two first fingers.

There are many, many, almost infinite possibilities, really, of different kinds of mudras. But just subtle shifts in the mudra can shift the direction of meditation. They can open the emotions, open the energy body, shift the view even, or shift the sense of possibility and what is actually possible, shift the attitude. And even very subtle changes, as I said, in the hand posture, in the mudra, can allow something to shift just a little bit and then something opens.

This is also helpful, again, if we're interested in why these things are beneficial—one of the things that's helpful here is just the very subtilizing and sensitizing of the awareness and the attention to try and pay attention to how these shifts in mudra affect the emotions.

Just that sensitizing and subtling actually energizes the awareness. It infuses more energy into awareness itself. And when awareness has more energy than whatever emotion we're stuck in—whether depression or irritation or anything else—it can handle that emotion more skillfully. When we're trapped in an emotion, there's a certain amount of energy locked within it. By sensitizing and subtilizing awareness, we give it more energy, more power.

When awareness possesses more energy than the emotion, then that emotion becomes much more manageable. Awareness can encompass it, accommodate it. The emotion no longer dominates. We're not sinking into it or being pulled around by it. Sometimes the emotion can soften and heal, becoming more subtle or simply changing its character. Regardless, it becomes less problematic because the energy of awareness is greater than the energy of the emotion, rather than the other way around. When the emotion's energy exceeds that of awareness, we're essentially drowning in that emotional state.

There are many possibilities to explore here. Take your time, don't become overwhelmed, experiment, be playful.

In walking meditation, we continue maintaining this connection to sensitivity, to mindfulness of the energy body. What we can add now, given everything we've discussed today, is the possibility of exploring movement and posture. You might stand still during walking meditation and explore hand postures, or remain in one place and dance a little rather than walking back and forth. It might involve feeling the energy body and sensing that it wants to move in certain ways—to dance—perhaps allowing just a part of the body to move and letting yourself follow that impulse.

This could manifest as actual physical embodiment, a physical enactment of those impulses toward movement, certain postures, dance, or whatever arises. Or it might remain as imaginal movement of the energy body. Outwardly you appear to be standing still or walking slowly, and you can feel both realities—your physical presence, of course, but also the energy body. And this energy body might be doing all manner of things: dancing, somersaults, floating in the air. What matters is maintaining awareness and staying in touch with the space of the energy body.

If you wish, you can move between classical walking meditation up and down with energy body awareness, or you can explore some of this movement—either in actual action or simply letting the energy body move while tuning into that feeling.

Whether the movement manifests in actual physical motion or remains imaginal within the energy body, such movement or posture can open up images, cosmophases, or ways of looking, as I mentioned earlier. Sometimes the process works in reverse—a certain way of looking, a particular cosmophasis, or a specific image will affect the energy body so that it wants to move, either actually or in imagination.

Again, there's mutual dependence here. But the encouragement for practice, as we play with this—if you choose to—is really to notice the energy body, the emotions, the feelings, and the shifts in perception. Notice how the sense of things changes, how our way of looking shifts. Observe perception, sense, and perspective regarding the body, the self, and the world—what's around you, your environment.

I realize this isn't typical for this kind of meditative culture. Such practices are quite normal in other spiritual traditions, but for some of you, allowing yourself to engage this way will involve navigating self-consciousness and similar concerns. Please have care with that too. But really notice this interplay between perception more widely and the energy body, flowing both ways.

And to reiterate what we've already implied: sometimes the actual movement of prostration, the actual shift in hand posture, the actual dancing or change in posture will shift things and bring something alive. The being comes into heightened sensitivity, openness, and soul-making. It's genuinely helpful to move. But sometimes it's not, though we might assume it should be. We might perform our ritual prostrations, yet what actually happens is the body acts while the soul turns off. This is fascinating. Why does this occur? How does it happen? Do we even notice it's happening?

Sometimes what's more helpful is the inner prostration, the inner attitude of bowing, the inner devotion, the inner sense of the energy body and surrender. At such times, the mind wants more subtlety. That becomes more beneficial. Awareness comes alive and sensitive not through physical enactment but through this inner movement.

At other times, aliveness, sensitivity, and soul-making arise through actual action. Even discerning between these possibilities asks quite a lot of us as practitioners—to notice what's happening, to recognize what will be helpful right now, and to remain truly open to both possibilities, both avenues.

There's much to play with here.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 37

The Movement of Devotion (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 53 min

In this opening talk on devotional practice, Rob Burbea examines how we can move flexibly between different orientations in meditation—samādhi cultivation, emotional sensitivity, and imaginal practice. He challenges common misconceptions about concentration as merely reducing thoughts, emphasizing instead the quality of our relationship with thinking and the importance of allowing subtlety of attention to emerge.

Burbea outlines four crucial factors that support deliberate engagement with imaginal practice and cosmopoiesis: decreased fabrication of perception, synesthesia (blending of the senses), an attitude of heart characterized by receptivity and humility, and tuning to imaginal perceptions. He explores how these elements work together to open the door to the imaginal realm, drawing parallels with tantric deity practices and discussing three gradations of practice—from invocation and supplication, through harmonizing with divine qualities, to complete fusion or union with the imaginal figure.

The talk emphasizes the vital role of devotion, surrender, and openness of heart in authentic imaginal practice, warning that without these qualities, such practices become mere visualization exercises. Through personal examples and practical guidance, Burbea demonstrates how these factors enable profound transformations of perception, leading to what he terms 'transubstantiation' of the cosmos through communion with imaginal figures.

We emphasized earlier how we are encouraging on this retreat the exploration of different orientations or directions in practice and how they can work together flexibly and synergistically, allowing us to move between them. Those practices include the orientation to samadhi - cultivating that harmonization, that sense of well-being in the energy body and mind, the awareness of filling that out and enjoying it, resting in that alive, bright field of different energy qualities.

We talked about developing sensitivity and skill in relation to the emotions in the moment, using the energy body for that work, with various possibilities there. And we're obviously discussing imaginal practice, again anchored in the energy body, and the expansion of that into cosmopoiesis. So let me say a bit more about these various practices and directions to fill that out further for your practice.

I want to start with something we touched on already. Oftentimes that word samadhi gets translated as concentration, and then carries so much baggage - so much pressure and heaviness and narrow-mindedness in various ways. So often a person practicing, sometimes for years, sits down with their primary objective being to try and have fewer thoughts. If they could ever have no thoughts, that would be fantastic. The whole objective, thrust, and direction - as well as measurement - of their meditation revolves around how much thought there is, with less being better. Unfortunately, this can very easily breed frustration and self-judgment.

If I think of meditation this way, even if I don't quite realize that's what I'm doing, if having fewer thoughts becomes the primary purpose or aim of my meditation and the measure by which I judge my practice, this is a mistake. Even when I'm doing samadhi practice - when that's my orientation and what I'm cultivating in the moment - if that's how I'm thinking about it, it's a mistake.

It's much more important to consider the relationship with thinking, the relationship with a thought in the moment, not the presence or absence of thought, or even how thick and dense thoughts are, how much of a mental thicket they create. What matters is the relationship with any thought that is present.

Is the awareness hooked onto a thought? Does it hook into it and then get dragged along? We're actually grasping at a thought. Even if it's a thought I don't like and want to get rid of, there's a kind of grasping. We become hooked and dragged. Is that what's happening? Is that the relationship? Or is there less hooking? A thought can arise and pass. This is a spectrum - how much hooking, how little hooking, how tight is the hooking? There are other aspects of the relationship with thought involving belief and what we believe about thoughts, but it's the relationship that's primary, not so much the presence or absence of thought.

Secondly, making the reduction of thinking or even the absence of thinking a kind of holy grail that we're chasing would be a mistake for several reasons. But there's a second reason I want to emphasize, which I mentioned already: we want to allow a subtlety of attention.

Now, we're not making a hierarchy here. It's not only about subtlety, and we're not trying to be subtle all the time. There's no hierarchy. But what we don't want to do is prevent subtlety of attention. Very often people practice in ways without realizing that actually prevent the awareness from becoming more subtle, so it just stays at one level. This can happen through the way they're breathing, or paying attention, or the direction they're trying to pursue, or how they're holding their effort - many factors. But very often people prevent a deepening in subtlety in the moment.

Now, by subtlety, remember, I don't mean a microscopic focus of awareness. I don't mean being able to see all the atoms and moments of sensation very quickly or finely. All that's okay and useful to a certain extent - to a limited extent. It has a downside in that it reinforces certain perceptions. If I emphasize it too much, if I have a way of thinking about practice and the path that emphasizes those kinds of perceptions too much, it will tend to reify those perceptions as reality - "this is the basic reality" - and also tend for the mind to keep seeing that way. We've touched on this.

So when I say subtlety on this retreat, what I really mean, as I said already, is subtler, more refined vibrations, energies, qualities, emotions, resonances becoming available to consciousness to notice, to feel, to discern between. A subtler attention is able to receive, perceive, and navigate all that.

When there is less thinking - at those times there is less thinking in meditation - there is the opportunity for an increase in subtlety. It's not a guarantee because I still have to tune to that subtlety, tune to what is more subtle, more refined. We talked about this a little bit.

But when there is less thinking, there's the opportunity for a deepening, an increase in the subtlety and refinement of attention, and then what can be perceived that is more subtle. So many of these things, the causality works both ways—there's a mutual dependency. When there is more subtlety, there tends to be less thinking. But that's a side benefit. The less thinking is a side benefit. Again, it's not the goal.

I would say, especially for this retreat and for many of the practices we're exploring—whether it's a samadhi retreat or a metta retreat or an emptiness or an imaginal retreat—it would be the subtlety that, as I said, we're wanting to allow. Without creating a hierarchy, we don't want to be doing something that prevents that. But we need, as I said, to tune, to incline to the subtlety sometimes of perceptions.

Be careful of the aim, because we don't want to replace subtlety as the goal. That's what I get frustrated about: "Oh, my mind is so unsubtle. I'm so gross. Why can't I...?" We don't want to cling too tightly to whatever aim we have, whatever direction we have in practice, and we must be careful of making too much of a hierarchy there, or any hierarchy, really. We don't want to do that. If we put it this way, we want to have access to subtlety, as well as the not-subtle, the gross, the obvious, and all that.

Now, as I've said before, concentration as focus is not our interest and goal on this retreat. It has its place to be able to keep the mind steady on something, to investigate it, to tune, and so forth. But it's not really the goal. What I'm more interested in is this kind of agility of the mind to switch ways of looking, even for a few moments sometimes. And trusting that and wanting that to become more accessible in one's life—in the busyness of one's life, in a working life, in a life with lots of demands, on the street, in the city.

So it's this agility, this flexibility, these ways of looking we talk so much about, rather than how much can I stick my mind to one object and keep it there with a minimum of thinking and movement. Yes, of course that has its place, but it tends to get way overemphasized as we've talked about.

And secondly, on this retreat, rather than focusing and closing down on something, in a way we could say openness is a big part of what we're interested in. There's a lot to say about that word and its relationship with samadhi. I just want to touch on a couple of things here.

We're interested in an openness of view, an openness of mind, an openness of perception—is my range of ways of looking open?—and also an openness of heart. This is something we'll come back to. The openness of heart is very important for what we're doing, and very important obviously in one's life and in practice in general.

We can also wear open eyes. Now we tend, in this tradition, for people to practice with the eyes closed. You sit down, you close your eyes. In other traditions, they keep them open. If you want, experiment with this on this retreat—eyes open, eyes closed.

You might start a practice with the eyes open, because it might be that there's some kind of cosmopoiesis there already. Already. And we don't notice it. We just shut the eyes. We don't notice that already the world or the people around me—look, I'm sensing them differently. I'm sensing them through the lens of some particular cosmopoetic lens. Then I open, I tune into that, I feel it, I enjoy it, I relate, come into a relationship with that and let that affect me. And then maybe I gradually close my eyes, see if I can take that in with my eyes closed, keep it going with my eyes closed. Or the other way around—I start with my eyes closed, something strong happens with an image or something like that, and then maybe I want to open my eyes and see what effect that has on my perception of the world, see if there's a cosmopoiesis spilling over from the image or the perception of the energy body. Or often, similarly, with emptiness practice—this is very important.

Here at the beginning of the retreat, we've got the open schedule, so people are coming and going, and it might be just too much at the beginning of a sitting to start with the eyes open if there's a lot of coming and going. But see what's helpful.

Be careful here of restlessness. You know, I'm opening eyes, I'm closing them, I'm opening them, and actually what's happening is it's just a movement of restlessness in the mind. So always the question: what's helpful? And the attitude, the stance of experimentation and really seeing what helps. If it's restlessness, it doesn't help to just act it out. It would be helpful to just choose one—eyes open or closed—and just stay with it for a while. Let things settle a while.

When the eyes are open, it's still possible to have what we might call purely intra-psychic images.

My eyes are open, I see the room, but in my mind's eye, so to speak, I'm seeing something else. If I say "intra-psychic," it seems to imply a rigid belief in a division between the psyche and the world, and in a way I'm really not implying that—but I can't think of a better word. Intra-psychic—you know what I mean—just within the mind.

So even though my eyes are open, it's still possible to have intra-psychic images. And with my eyes open, of course, it's possible to see and sense others and the world in some kind of cosmopoiesis or through some kind of cosmopoietic lens. And with closed eyes, just the same.

In other words, both avenues are open, whether the eyes are closed or not. With the eyes closed, of course, I can tune into an intra-psychic image, a purely intra-psychic image, but I can also sense the world around me. Maybe not visually, but I might have an inner visual sense of it, and I might be hearing and feeling in my body and smelling. And that sensing of the world may be a cosmopoietic sense, a cosmopoietic sensation, perception.

So eyes open, eyes closed—avenues are open here for what can happen in either way.

To really have an experimental approach to practice doesn't just mean flipping around between things. It means adding the question: what makes this or that work right now? Or what is preventing this or that from working? And this is a whole other level of question—actually understanding, if you like, the mechanisms of practice.

If my eyes are open and I'm trying to encourage a cosmopoetic perception that's not happening, do I understand why it's not happening? Sometimes it's not possible to understand these things, but oftentimes it is—oh, it's not happening because of this. Or if something is happening and it is working well, what are the factors that are actually supporting that in the moment?

So there's a kind of meditative research going on that's actually really important. The Buddha talks about this in the Pali Canon when he talks about hindrances and factors of enlightenment. He's also talking about a real active, engaged interest in the experimentation, discovering what feeds what—to use his words—and what starves what. The same thing with all these more extended practices. There's really this interest in the question: How come this works now? What's missing? What's needed? What helps?

One of the things that's significant in making an imaginal practice work, or working with a particular image at any moment, or with a particular cosmopoiesis, is the relationship with the object sensed. If, for example, my eyes are open and I'm trying to gently encourage this cosmopoiesis or allow what seems to be there, and I reify too much—either the object in any way, what I'm looking at or sensing, taking it as real, taking this perception as real—or if I'm grasping at it because it's so attractive or it's repulsive and there's too much gross grasping, pushing or trying to cling on, keep the experience or chase after it—this reification and gross grasping will tend to dissolve, destroy, inhibit the cosmopoiesis, destabilize it.

Or again, if I have my eyes open, looking at the world, sensing the world around me and trying to gently encourage a cosmopoiesis, and I lose contact with the energy body and lose the sensitivity with the energy body, again, it probably won't be helpful. If there's any kind of even subtle leaning towards whatever is, so to speak, out there—even subtle—that subtle leaning is a kind of grasping, and the imaginal realm will fade, the cosmopoiesis will fade because of these factors. It's a relationship with what's being perceived.

We're interested in openness, and another kind of openness has to do with the sounds that surround us in the course of the day in a meditation. The sounds of others, of humans—are they sounds or are they noises, which often has a more negative connotation? Are they seen as distractions from my meditation, my concentration? Again, something's shrunken in the whole view there. That whole view is quite tight, quite impoverished, actually.

In the course of what we're doing—and we'll talk about this more and more this week—I hear the noises of human beings around me or far away over the fields or in the street, and rather than try to exclude them to preserve my concentration, so one's in a battle with those sounds, is it possible to encourage this openness to include the sounds?

There are all kinds of ways of doing that, but on this retreat, where we're focusing more on this kind of imaginal-based re-enchantment, can I include them but actually shift the view of them to hear, sense these sounds differently? So these human noises are the sounds of angels, or the sound of the divine speech, of mantra. Can I actually shift that view and include them?

Maybe that becomes then the focus of the meditation—this shift in view, this enchanted view of these sounds and of these people, whoever they are. I don't even know who it is making these sounds. Seeing them, sensing them, playing with their conception and entertaining the idea that they are angels. What does that mean? I don't know. Does it matter? No. What matters is you can feel it come alive. You can feel it change the relationship. And that enchantment come in and that beauty and that sacredness and the openness and the softening.

So there are all kinds of possibilities here, and there are possibilities that don't have anything to do with the kind of enchantment we're talking about that are also very skillful. But there's something about the openness there—opening to include and opening the view, or rather shifting the view. More generally speaking, there's a kind of openness. As we've already emphasized just in this talk, we've taken this flexibility of practices and flexibility between practices.

The energy body is always the kind of touchpoint, the aspect of things, the dimension of our being that we don't want to really ever lose. We want to keep in touch with whatever practice we're doing. But we can move between just focusing on the emotions in different ways, working skillfully with the emotions—both the beautiful ones and the difficult ones, and even very subtle ones that are neither. We've talked about this in other talks that you've listened to already from the other retreats, but there are ways that just staying with the emotions, whatever's happening there, working skillfully with whatever's happening—gross, subtle, painful, difficult, whatever—can be really, really fruitful practice in itself. So that's one avenue, that's one kind of practice.

Imaginal practice, cosmopoietic practice, the direction of samadhi—all of that. We can move flexibly and sensitively and find out what's helpful at any time, moving between these practices. Sometimes one of them is just not a helpful thing to be trying to do. We're bashing our heads against a brick wall or getting too tight with it or something or other, and actually we need to shift to one of the others.

But at this point we can open up—at this point in the retreat we can open up a little bit to allow more images, and then move flexibly between practices, always noticing the energy body and sensitive to the resonances. If we are working with images, we stay sensitive to the soul-making, the qualities of soulfulness, emotion, and so forth, particularly in and through the energy body, but also really in the whole psyche.

So let me say a little bit about imaginal practice and cosmopoiesis. A friend of Catherine's, who's a Jungian analyst, was talking with Catherine, and he had said to her that what they call the practice of active imagination—which is somewhat similar to what I might call imaginal practice—he said, if I remember rightly, that it's just a grace. It's a grace when that happens. It happens spontaneously. In other words, there's nothing we can do to kind of make that happen, this kind of entering into the imaginal realm, if you like.

But this is something that I don't agree with, and I'd like to encourage a different attitude to that. Because sure, the images arise spontaneously and we enter the imaginal realm, so to speak, spontaneously. Cosmopoiesis can also arise spontaneously. But definitely also we can practice deliberately. We can engage imaginal practice deliberately and cosmopoietic practice deliberately. We can incline the psyche and the perception, the way of looking, and there's the possibility of finding attitudes and factors and things that we can do that actually support the opening of the door, let's say, to the imaginal realm and the crossing of that threshold into the territory of soul-making.

We can actually support a shift in the mode of being and a shift in the ways of looking to open into imaginal practice and cosmopoiesis. When I reflect on this and kind of notice carefully what's going on, I see that there are—we could talk about or highlight four aspects or four factors that support and enable this more deliberate opening of the door of the imaginal and the cosmopoiesis. They're not completely separate, as so often with these kind of things. They feed each other. They're mutually dependent. They're dependent arisings. But it's helpful, I think, to separate them and say a little bit about each.

So the first is fabricating less—a decrease in the moment, in other words, in that stretch of practice for some period, a decrease in the fabrication of perception in general. And that can come out of samadhi practice, which—the way I would think about it is almost by definition involves some degree of less fabrication. It's not the way most people think about samadhi practice, not the way most people think about practice, period. We've touched on this. But it could come through metta, it could come through emptiness, it could come through the imaginal, it could come—basically it comes from less clinging. I'm using clinging in a broad sense here. When there's less clinging, there will be less fabrication of perception in that moment.

And that movement into less fabrication kind of makes everything soluteo, liquid. It loosens everything. And that loosening allows a number of other factors. So some degree of less fabricating is a factor involved in and supporting this opening the door of the imaginal realm and cosmopoiesis—some degree. That's the first one.

The second one is what I would like to call very loosely synesthesia, which is a word that some of you may know. I don't mean literal clinical synesthesia. What it really means is a kind of mixing and blending of the senses so that it can sometimes seem like I see sounds or I hear a bodily sensation or feel that in the body. There's a mixing of all or some of the senses. Actually, as it gets deeper, all the six senses—mind, sight, smell, taste, touch and sound, body sense—all those six senses, they kind of gather more into one. So it's almost like to think is to feel the thought in the body somehow. To hear a sound is somehow to see. Six senses become one. You can't even separate between what one thinks and hears or sees or feels in the energy body field.

This is a continuum and gradually, this will happen anyway as fabrication gets less. Six senses that seem so separate, each with their own domains, sense fields, etc., gradually become more sort of one in the same sense field. And eventually, when there's really very little fabricating, the senses do not arise. Sensation does not arise. There is the unfabricating of vedanā, sensation, and perception.

But it also happens in imaginal practice, this synesthesia, a little bit, or a lot.

Okay, so first, lessening fabrication. Second, a degree of synesthesia, what we might call synesthesia. Third is a stance and posture, if you like, of the heart. So this is, again, involved in and supports. So it's a factor of, but it's also a contributing factor of imaginal practice and cosmopoiesis.

A posture, an attitude of the heart of, I would say, receptivity, but also some kind of humility and even surrender. I'm going to say more about this, but this heart aspect is very important. So heart is not soul. Soul, if you like, includes heart. That's what I'm saying here. Soul needs to include heart. But heart doesn't always mean soul or soul making.

Sometimes people ask themselves, what do I really want? What do I really want? And they come up with the answer, love or something. And they mean... what do you mean? Do you mean just a heart quality? Because we're not used to thinking in this way. We don't think, actually, what I also want is soul. When I say love, I probably don't just mean a heart quality. I mean a soul element of that love as well. I've talked about it elsewhere, so I'm not going to come back to it.

But a third factor here, a third aspect, is an attitude or a state or stance of the heart. And the fourth is imaginal perception itself and tuning to imaginal perceptions, which I've talked about on other talks, other retreats. These four aspects.

Now, of these four, the first and the third are things that we can do. We can actively trigger them, engage them, move in that direction. That might, for some of you, sound like too much of a pipe dream or something that's not accessible now. So let's say we can learn as we develop practice to do these, to fabricate less and less. We learn that skill, if you like, and similarly we learn how to open the heart in the moment, just shifting something so that the heart opens, so that there is humility, surrender, receptivity, openness, that posture of the heart.

And that those two movements of fabricating less and opening the heart in the moment become easier for us as we develop in practice. For some of you will know that, and for others it's something to realize, take it on faith or whatever, that that's the case. But these movements, fabricating less and opening the heart, if you like, in receptivity, in humility, we can do these.

And that doing of those two allows the opening of the imaginal, the fourth factor, in ways that affect the soul more deeply, that are more soul-making. In other words, if there's too rigid a fabrication being clung to and if the heart isn't open, the imaginal won't open so deeply and won't affect us so deeply.

But these two factors, the lessening fabrication and the opening of the heart, also will, especially the lessening fabrication, will allow some degree of synesthesia. And what I'm calling synesthesia is this mixing and inter-relating, almost like blending and communication of the senses, if you like. And that so-called synesthesia functions then, at that time, as a different mode of knowing.

In other words, the modes of knowing that we know are the six senses. We figure something out through thinking, or we intuit it, or whatever, or we see it, or we know it through hearing because we've heard it, whatever. But in a way, when there's a synesthesia, we can talk about a different mode of knowing.

So, just to give an example, you know, with being so ill and having, well, most of the...

I have this illness, I have cancer, and sometimes when I go to practice and sit, I begin with an attitude of humility. When my illness becomes part of my meditation theme—perhaps I'm not feeling well that day—I start with a felt, deep acknowledgment in the soul of humility, a stance of humility. I recognize that I cannot cure myself of cancer, and it's very possible the doctors can't either. There's a sense that I cannot do this on my own. It's not something within my power.

In that recognition, there's an acknowledgment of humility: I do not, I cannot do this alone. From that humility, a step further emerges—if I'm doing imaginal practice—an openness and surrender to what I'll call God. I'll put it in quotation marks if you prefer, because there is this seeing of image as image, this looseness and non-fixation, this non-reification of any idea of divinity that we're exploring throughout this retreat.

But out of the humility comes a further movement, a gesture of psychic attitude: openness and surrender to a god or angel or deity—something numinous and other, some imaginal figure. This needs to happen first, before that image or sense of that deity comes alive. This openness and surrender includes and involves a deep, deep acceptance of surrender to what will be, to their will, to use a certain language.

It's not a technique to try and fix or guarantee some kind of deal to get what I want. It's more about a profound opening of the entire being—heart and soul—to that deity and to the way it permeates my being and affects my life, the events of my life and my death. But again, the humility and then the openness and surrender to the figure need to come first. They give it aliveness. Not always, but often.

And then all kinds of things are possible. From that openness of the heart, that stance of the heart, when the imaginal has come alive, maybe the synesthesia comes. For example—and I could give many examples here—I hear the birdsong outside, and the heart, the soul hears it as blessing. Blessing the cosmos in all kinds of ways. We'll talk a lot, hopefully, on this retreat about what that word even means: blessing.

But an element of the blessing is that they are healing me. The birdsong has some kind of divine or angelic function as healing. It's as if the sound, the beautiful sound of the birdsong—I'm open to it and it somehow feels, with the synesthesia, that the fragments of melody are reweaving or restructuring through sound. They're restructuring my energy body.

So I'm hearing it, but I'm also feeling that. I'm feeling it as healing. I'm feeling some kind of re-sculpting or rewiring or reshaping, reweaving of this energy body, and opening to that—to the beauty of that and the blessing of that and the divinity of it and the preciousness of it. There's a kind of synesthesia then between the sound and the body sense. They almost feel the same thing. The sound is the reweaving of the energy body, something very beautiful. There are many examples one could give.

Similarly, some of you will be familiar with tantric practices in other traditions—working with the yidam, with the tantric deity, Tara or whoever you're practicing with. It's a similar thing. The devotion, the surrender, the openness, the humility are vital and indispensable aspects or factors in that practice if you're working with a tantric deity. Usually they need to be there first, these qualities of the heart. That's what I need to take care of first—not always, but often.

I need to actually feel them, feel what that feels like: the devotion, the openness, the surrender in the heart, in the energy body. And then a door opens. That's part of opening the door. In the Tibetan tradition they talk a lot about preliminaries or prerequisites. It's a similar thing here. We're talking about something in the heart that actually needs to open, soften, shift.

Without that, a door into the imaginal as something alive will not open. Without that genuine aliveness that comes from the heart opening, those kinds of practices just become exercises in visualization or concentration, focusing the mind on visual images. They become quite dry and barren and actually unproductive.

So the heart and its attitude or posture in the moment is crucial. In that moment, it's crucial, literally—it takes the practice this way or that way. Crucial from crux, cross. This applies equally to working with the imaginal figure of love we explored in our meditation the other day, or any imaginal figure that's loving you, from whom you're receiving love, any flavor of love there, any character of love.

Remember, the appearance of that imaginal figure may be very ethereal. It may have a body of light or a particular colored body—red or blue or whatever. Or it could be very human in its appearance. It could be animal, could be a deity. It could be very solid as opposed to a body of light. It could be someone I even know—a friend or lover—or someone I don't know, if it's human. Maybe the features in the image are clear, maybe they're more vague. But what's clear, and even if it's not, it could be not visual at all—remember, it could be just a sense. But what's clear is the character, the qualities of presence that this particular imaginal figure has.

Their being, their particularity, their personhood is sensed, even if the features are not clear visually. That's what characterizes imaginal practice—a sort of uniqueness of personhood, of character, if you like, in the image.

When these four aspects, four factors are there—the lessening fabrication, what I'm calling synesthesia, the attitude of heart, and the imaginal perception and tuning—if that's all there, then a lot is possible. All kinds of avenues of experience, directions, become possible in imaginal practice, cosmic oasis, tantric practice, whatever.

So in repeating a mantra, for example, or working with a tantric deity yoga, or any kind of imaginal figure as we've been talking about, or cosmic oasis practice, we could delineate three gradations. Cautious of this word hierarchy, let's discern three possibilities there.

First, there can be, in the mantra reciting or chanting, or in the tantric relationship with the imaginal figure of the tantric deity, a kind of invocation that is a supplication. As I'll talk about in a minute, what that means is asking, a kind of praying, an opening to the other, opening to this other who is, yes, larger than me, more powerful. There's a humility there. There's the beauty of that invocation, supplication, opening to what's larger.

Then as one stays with that, perhaps with that image, with that cosmic oasis even, or with the mantra—this is particularly the case with devotional yoga to an imaginal figure or a tantric deity—there can be a harmonizing of one's being in that moment with the qualities of the deity invoked. So for example, Avalokiteshvara—one harmonizes with the compassion that that imaginal figure embodies and emanates and radiates. Or just by holding them in one's imaginal gaze, one starts to harmonize one's energy body, one's emotional body starts to harmonize with those qualities. We absorb them through a harmony that comes about through the sustained imaginal perceiving and sensing.

Or it might be, if we talk in terms of traditional Buddhist tantric deities, Yamantaka has this sort of fearless power to destroy what must be destroyed, whether that's illusion or certain unhelpful structures or even death—the destruction of death through the knowing of the deathless, of the timeless. In meditating on Yamantaka, it's the fearlessness and the power and the creative destruction, if you like. These are the qualities that we harmonize with, and our being gathers and comes into relationship. It comes into relation with the deity and with those qualities and harmonizes with those qualities. So there's a kind of sympathetic resonance going on.

But even fuller or more complete or deeper than that, there is a real sense of fusion or union with or becoming the deity, the imaginal figure, so that we experience our body as divined. We look at others and look at the world through the eyes of that divinity, through the eyes of that imaginal other. We see and know and sense with their vision, with their perception, with their sensibility, and hear things as they hear. We feel and know as that deity.

And because the deity sees us, in a way lives in a different world—meaning they perceive a different world—through that, we actually transform the cosmos in doing so. It turns into a cosmic oasis and reinforces that cosmic oasis that may be already happening.

So the practices of imagining yourself as a deity ultimately involve more than just imagining that you have a red body or imagining that you're powerful or whatever. One actually feels that one becomes that deity. One enters into that deity's experience of body, of world, of matter, of time, of other, all of that.

So all of this is possible. You could say when these factors are there, all these doors are possible and in many different directions as well, not just levels but also directions. And it can happen in many different ways.

For example, when there are all these factors—these four factors happening—less fabrication, synesthesia, the heart stance, the open, humble, receptive heart, and the imaginal perception and tuning. And in all that is implicit that we're with the energy body and the whole space of the energy body that will, in becoming less fabricated as the first factor, the energy body may become lighter or more kind of liquid, if you like.

And sometimes in this imaginal practice, it can actually become one with, as I said, the deity or the qualities or the energy or the essence of that imaginal figure, or even one with the theophany of the cosmos around you, one with the cosmopoiesis. It's as if there's a communion—if we borrow that word—a communion, an influx of those energies and essences, so that actually the body and the being merge with that cosmopoiesis, very particularly, or with that imaginal figure.

Often this happens quite spontaneously when these four factors are present, when there's energy body awareness and one's opening and tuning to the imaginal. One of the things that can happen is this kind of communion or union. Sometimes it can happen very suddenly, in a flash. Something's transformed or opens out into this union in almost what feels like a split second. Other times it can happen much more gradually, one transitioning into this more merged state or state of communion with the cosmic theophany or the figure.

And as I said, in doing that—either becoming one with the imaginal figure or one with the cosmic theophany—there is this transubstantiation that happens through our perception. The world, the cosmos feels, is sensed to be different. We have an altered image of what is there.

I'm thinking actually now about Holy Communion or the Eucharist. In the Catholic churches and some of the other churches, this is regarded as a transubstantiation of matter. It becomes divine. This bread, this wine becomes divine. What we're saying, we're putting that in the realm of perception, but there is a Holy Communion with that imaginal figure and also with the cosmos made divine in the perception, just as in something like the Eucharist or other rituals. It's a transubstantiation through communion that's happening through imaginal practice when we take care of these aspects and factors that feed that practice. It's one of the possibilities that can open for us. Very beautiful.

Just to make clear, we don't have to grasp at any of these experiences that I'm talking about, or so-called stages or levels, or force them to happen. In a way, I'm just mapping territory. If we just practice and open, all kinds of wonderful things will happen. We don't need to grasp particularly at this or that, I don't think. Take care of the conditions and the path in its fullness, in its wideness, its breadth and its depths will open for us.

All kinds of surprises, I think, in imaginal practice. We don't really have to engineer this or that experience. Do this for a little while and you will be very surprised and very pleasantly surprised. It's not easy to predict exactly what will happen, but there are things we can delineate and point out as part of a map.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 38

Matter, Bodies, Worlds (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h14

> In this profound exploration of cosmology and perception, Rob Burbea examines the contrast between reductionist 'bottom-up' metaphysics dominant in scientific materialism and the 'top-down' metaphysics found in spiritual traditions. He distinguishes spiritual concepts of many worlds from modern physics' multiple universe theories, emphasizing the vertical dimensionality and interconnectedness in mystical cosmologies.
>
> Drawing from the Pali Canon, particularly the Sāmaññaphala Sutta, Burbea discusses the Buddha's teaching on the mind-made body (manomayakāya) and different levels of embodied experience available through meditation. He explores how traditional cosmologies speak of multiple worlds and corresponding levels of body - physical, ethereal, subtle - each with its own 'matter' and laws.
>
> The talk emphasizes phenomenological practice over speculative metaphysics. Burbea presents meditation as experimental research into fabrication and ways of looking, showing how different conceptions generate different perceptions of body, world, and time. He introduces the concept of 'alchemy' as transubstantiation through perception - the spiritualization of matter and materialization of spirit - available through any of the six senses. This includes experiencing density and solidity themselves as divine, not just ethereal luminosity. The teaching concludes with practical guidance on sacred space and the evolution from dualistic to non-dual perception.

Wrapped up in the typical modernist view of the world, of the cosmos, and serving as a basis of classical mechanistic science, are what we might call reductionist views of different kinds. I've touched on this before in different areas, in psychological theories and such, but right now what I want to emphasize is what I call bottom-up assumptions—assumptions that reality and the things of the world are created, if you like, from the bottom-up.

In other words, subatomic particles come together to make atoms, which come together to make molecules, which come together to make larger structures, which make the things, the perceivable things of our world. There's a bottom-up causality and also, more philosophically, a bottom-up notion of reality. In other words, the real things are these little billiard balls, subatomic particles, and then they build up. So it's a kind of reductionism to the smaller and the more elemental.

But one of the things I think is really important to realize in terms of maturity of insight is to recognize that to a certain extent, both in our personal experience and also in science and in the wider culture, the views and conceptions we have or with which we approach whatever it is—a scientific problem or experience, existence—actually in a way generate or give us, fabricate the experiences that it feels like we then discover, if we're not aware of it. This has very much to do with the whole idea of ways of looking and conceptions fabricating perception.

The same is also true about science. To a certain extent, materialistic, mechanistic science will find materialistic, mechanistic results. Through certain assumptions, what we seem to then discover objectively, independently, is just reflecting back our paradigm, our point of view, our assumptions. These reductionist views that I talked about, this bottom-up conception, are actually part of scientific materialism, which is part of secularism, the dominant view nowadays.

Why am I mentioning this? What I want to point out is that there's an alternative view, which is the more Neoplatonic view, or what used to be more popular historically in the West and also in the East—a kind of top-down metaphysics. In this top-down view, things, objects, whatever it is, have their origins higher, their roots higher in the divine. That then emanates down to create a lower stage, but the lower stage is somehow included in the upper stage. So it's a kind of top-down metaphysics, a top-down philosophy—the top being God or the divine, and then there are levels of world soul and all this. There are lots of versions of that, but there's a top-down metaphysics that we can compare and contrast with this bottom-up metaphysics that we have nowadays as the dominant view.

What I want to say is that I'm not interested in just replacing or substituting a top-down metaphysics for the bottom-up metaphysics—not just wanting to switch the belief 180 degrees, substituting one for the other. Rather, I'm interested in what happens if, in practice, we suspend the habitual indoctrinated beliefs and assumptions that are basically reductionistic. Can I actually just suspend that in my view as a practice? Actually just not buy into that right now in terms of my experience?

Within that, what I want to say is that both these views may have a certain validity to them, top-down and bottom-up. Both of them might be views to experiment with—in practice. Practice, again, as experiment, as research, as flexibility of ways of looking. What happens when I view through a lens that is informed by the conception of a top-down metaphysics? We're not used to that in this culture. And what happens when I view things through this bottom-up metaphysics? We can do this as an exercise, and on retreat we will do this as an exercise.

Within that experimenting, there's a curiosity. How then, through this lens, informed by this conception, does my experience arise or differ when there's this lens or that lens? Perception, the fabrication of perception. What are the effects on the soulfulness or the soul-making? And what are the relative strengths and weaknesses, not just as intellectual arguments, but also in experience, of these two views—top-down, bottom-up metaphysics?

For example, recognizing that with the bottom-up metaphysics, as it's usually conceived in a modernist version, there is this kind of flattening that occurs. Scientific materialism holds that everything is just this mechanical, meaningless matter—that's all that really exists. Everything is just that, therefore it's flat. When that is the perception, it's very hard to feel or have a basis for meaningfulness. So we recognize what the effects of different conceptions are and ways of looking.

Actually, in the Pali Canon, and certainly in Mahayana Buddhism it's emphasized even more, in Vajrayana Buddhism even more than that—in the Pali Canon, in Buddha Dharma, and in Islam, and in Kabbalistic teachings in Judaism, and other traditions—there are actually many worlds. So there's not just one world, and that world is just like this. Actually, there are many worlds. Oftentimes, there's a hierarchy involved in a lot of these cosmological systems, cosmologies. But the idea is that there are many worlds, and what matter is in these worlds and what the bodies are is different from world to world.

Each world has its own kind of matter or appearance of matter, its own appearance of body. Each world operates according to different laws—different physical laws, different psychological and spiritual laws.

Chaim Vital was a Jewish Kabbalist, a student of Isaac Luria, who writes of an infinity of coexisting worlds. He also writes—and I may return to this—that every soul has a root in each world. In a way, all these coexisting worlds and levels of existence contain roots for every one of us, every being, every soul. Therefore, we each have infinite roots. Here again we see this interplay, this codependent arising, this co-involvement of self and world.

As a clarifying footnote, particularly for those familiar with trends in modern physics over the last fifty years, I want to distinguish this idea of many worlds—infinite worlds that Chaim Vital and many others across spiritual traditions have written and spoken about over the centuries—from a theory still popular in modern physics called the many worlds interpretation or multiple universes theory.

According to this physics theory, there are uncountable, innumerable parallel, separate universes just like our own. Some are microscopically close to this universe we inhabit, some are slightly more different, and some quite divergent. In many of these universes, I am giving this same talk with something very slightly, microscopically different in the delivery. You are listening, but perhaps with something infinitesimally different in your listening or in the mental processes occurring as you listen.

Some universes will be more dissimilar, quite divergent. In some, you may have listened to a certain point, then grown fed up and decided to switch on the television, now happily watching The Simpsons. In many of these universes, I never made it to give this talk for whatever reason—perhaps I died long ago. Or you never made it to listen for whatever reason.

But right now, parallel to this universe we find ourselves in, are countless other universes differing either infinitesimally or quite widely from this one. This many worlds interpretation in modern physics differs from what Chaim Vital and others describe.

The spiritual, mystical cosmopoiesis of Chaim Vital and other traditions—Islamic, Christian, and many others—differs in two ways. First, it involves a kind of verticality. There's a dimensionality, a hierarchy implicit in these cosmic arrangements. These worlds are often presented as hierarchically structured.

I personally feel comfortable with this word "hierarchy," but teaching in our culture, I want to be cautious because it often brings assumptions, baggage, and dualisms. But in Chaim Vital's Kabbalistic tradition and others, there is this verticality, this cosmic hierarchy of worlds.

Second, these other worlds that Vital and others allude to are not separate from each other or from this here, this world and moment—at least as I conceive it. This dimensionality, this verticality, is not the same as separate universes trundling along and unfolding in parallel on divergent paths.

Worth dwelling on in this extended footnote: I wonder if this modern physics idea actually qualifies as a theory or is more conjecture within the scientific paradigm. As far as I understand, it's impossible to devise an experiment to discover if it's true. Because you can never find out if it's true, I'm not sure this constitutes what could be called a theory.

This conjecture differs anyway, with no notion of verticality and no separateness of worlds—two major differences. Historically, this idea arose in modern physics as an attempt to avoid or explain results discovered in subatomic physics experiments that seemed to show—according to the plain, obvious, rather radical but simplest reading—the dependence of the observed on the observation.

What is observed, the nature of what is observed, depends on the observation, on the way of looking. I look one way, I see a wave. The scientist looks another way, sees a particle. The kind of observation determines what is observed.

In quantum theory, prior to observation, we can only speak of what's called a probability function or waveform. There isn't a distinct thing with distinct properties. An electron or proton exists more as a probability wave—probability of being here or there or way over there, of having this or that velocity, occurring at this or that time with so much energy. None of this is discrete, defined, or determined, but exists as a kind of smudge or wave of probabilities.

The very thingness of the thing and its most basic properties—what it is (wave or particle), when it occurs, where it is—depend on the way of looking. This isn't due to disturbance or inaccuracy from observational apparatus. This is fundamental indeterminacy at a very basic level in the universe. There is no objective reality to things independent of observation, way of looking, and approach of observation.

But that conclusion—that somehow the way of looking, perception, or consciousness on one hand, and the world, matter, etc., are interdependent; that matter, its appearance, behavior, and properties depend on the way of looking, the approach, the conception, the consciousness, the perception; this interdependence of world and observation, of matter and way of looking—that is so outside of the very ideas that form the basis of the scientific revolution centuries ago.

For instance, the ideal and the possibility of observation free of bias—that's a fundamental scientific ideal, that we can observe things objectively, free of bias, and that we can discover an objective independent existence of things, which we can discover if we are able to observe free of bias, which we can.

And there's the whole separation—the independence of mind and matter, stemming from and championed by Descartes, who divided existence into res cogitans and res extensa. Res cogitans means the mind, the cognitive thing, the cognitive function. And res extensa—matter extended in space.

So these ideas—the possibility and ideal of observation free of bias, the objective independent existence of things which can be discovered in that way, and the separation and duality of mind and matter—are fundamental ideas that underpinned classical science and allowed its progress. Wonderful, amazing progress.

But somewhere along the line, they became, for many if not most, dogmas—beliefs about the nature of reality. And with that, there is a fear for many still that without these kinds of assumptions, there can be no science. Without the idea of an objective, independent existence of things that can be discovered and the distinction between mind and matter, there can be no science. Without them, the whole edifice of science will crumble.

So how to save science and save those beliefs? Different postulations, different conjectures. Rather than the idea of the way of looking of the observer determining whether we see a particle or a wave, whether it's here or there, there is the conjecture that both the particle and the wave exist—or in one universe it's a particle, in another universe it's a wave, in one it's over here and in another it's over there, or in a third place, or very far out in another place. Anything that is even remotely probable, according to this smudge of probability in the mathematical waveform, anything that is even remotely possible—each possibility will exist in one of these parallel, separate universes in the modern physics idea of the many worlds interpretation.

It's only one idea, by the way, among others. And as I said, you can't really prove it, and it's certainly not popular with everyone. I'm not sure whether it's the observation that actually causes the universe to fork or split—perhaps in some versions—or just that these universes already exist, and in each one we have a particular version of reality, a particular outcome of what might be seen in our universe as a probability prior to observation.

So there are these multiple universes in this many worlds interpretation of modern physics—innumerable universes running in parallel, separate, without any interaction between these universes. But all of them, each of these innumerable universes, has objective, independent existence. And each thing, whether it's a large thing or the smallest subatomic particle, has objective, independent existence.

As I said, that idea is not popular with all modern physicists at all, and some would regard it as a kind of baroque idea, really. There's one physicist whose name I can't remember who said this is very heavy baggage, this idea of multiple universes, multiple parallel, separate universes—very heavy baggage for not entertaining the idea of the interdependence of the way of looking or consciousness on things. Refusing to entertain the idea that seems so dangerous to the fundaments of scientific paradigm. When we refuse to entertain that conclusion from the quantum experiments, then we have to carry this very heavy baggage of this many worlds interpretation of modern physics.

You might say in Dharma language, the cost of not entertaining or not opening to a view of the emptiness of an objective independent reality is this kind of very heavy baggage of this idea. And again, it seems to me it's a conjecture, so therefore I'm not even sure if it comes in the realm of science. But there are other possibilities, one of which is more entertaining—something more akin to the idea of emptiness in Dharma teachings.

So it's not necessary, this idea that is still kicking around fifty, sixty years after it was first proposed in 1957 in the modern physics world.

But again, just to make clear, Chaim Vital and others in different spiritual traditions through the centuries are talking about something very different here than this modern physics notion. There's verticality, dimensionality, possibly hierarchy, and there is not the separation of these worlds from each other or from this one here.

And if you just let these ideas, fantasies really, images—these two, the one more spiritual cosmopoiesis, and the other the more flat conjecture that abounds with some modern physicists—if you go back and forth between them and let them resonate, echo, reverberate, and have their effects in the soul, I would say one notices quite different effects on the soul of entertaining each of these ideas about the cosmos.

One, because of the dimensionality and the verticality and the non-separateness, seems to me to be an idea that is soul-making—an image, a fantasy, a cosmopoiesis of soul-making. The other, because of its flatness, its separateness of these multiple parallel universes, does not give rise to the same soul-making. Or any soul-making. Science fiction and that kind of thing, or strange existential notions or feelings. But not so much soul-making.

Anyway, that was in some senses a footnote, but worth making the distinction.

So many of the main religious traditions of the world, spiritual traditions and practices, have this idea in the cosmology, in the cosmopoiesis, of many worlds. And also many levels of body—you get this in Tantrism, whether it's Buddhist or Hindu, in Sufism, and so forth. Levels of the body. So yes, there's this physical body, and then there's the ethereal body, or the body of light, or the subtle body, or whatever. And these different levels of the body conform to the different worlds that we were just talking about. So each level of body or each kind of body has its own world or its own earth that it inhabits.

This metaphysical framework sometimes runs implicitly through many of these cosmological ideas. But what I want to emphasize—what we want to emphasize on this retreat—is that these concepts, such as the pure land in Buddhism, Buddha realms, or the world as mandala, are not referring to something separate or distant. That is here now.

We're not talking about something removed in space or time. We're talking about perception, about experience. It's possible to experience and see this right now—the room you are sitting in, this space around me, and myself—can all be experienced as a Buddha realm. These levels are not separate; they're here now.

The entire foundation I want to establish is what we could call phenomenological and experiential—it's rooted in practice. We're not engaging in what's often derogatorily dismissed as "speculative metaphysics"—fancy cosmological ideas that bear no relationship to what can actually be experienced.

Sometimes, phenomenologically, in our direct experience, we encounter what feels like a hierarchy. It doesn't have to feel this way, but it can seem as though there are levels of perception available to us as human beings. Pure lands, Buddha realms—whatever language you prefer—these different worlds can be experienced. And so can different bodies—different wholes, different senses of embodiment.

The Buddha speaks of this in the Pali Canon. I'm not certain if it appears in the long version of the Satipatthana Sutta, but it's found in the Samaññaphala Sutta, "The Fruits of the Homeless Life." The Buddha describes the skilled meditator creating a mind-made body—a kind of etheric body. There's an awareness of this body that can, if the meditator chooses, separate in location and journey forth, having all kinds of adventures with a complete sensorium of experience, separate from the physical body's location.

Some of you listening will recognize this as a familiar experience in various forms. It can arise in many different ways. I remember someone on retreat who was simply sitting in the lounge having tea when a blue light body unsheathed itself—that's the very word the Buddha used—from her physical body. She remained quietly in the library, calmly watching this blue light body walk to the other side of the room.

With practice—and I don't want to overemphasize this as necessarily important—such experiences can arise very spontaneously. There was no sense that this was some kind of schizoid break or mental breakdown. She simply observed this experience with calm interest. It was nothing alarming—actually a very peaceful, beautiful experience. With certain meditative states, this becomes readily available and quite enjoyable, opening a whole other dimension of embodiment.

Phenomenologically speaking, it's a phenomenological fact—a fact of our experience, of what appears to us in perception—that there are levels, if you wish to think hierarchically, or a multiplicity of perceptions and experiences available to us. This is simply factual.

We can argue about metaphysics and dismiss things as "mere metaphysics," but as human beings, we face the undeniable fact that a range or multiplicity—or if you're comfortable with the term, levels—of perception and experience are genuinely available to us. We can train in opening to these different levels, extending our range, inhabiting all of this, perceiving more clearly, feeling more fully.

This becomes part of our training in the flexibility of ways of looking. Why emphasize this? Because when we understand meditation in this light, part of the training involves opening up to and recognizing this phenomenological fact. This I cannot argue with.

Someone might be listening and thinking, "Well, that's not my experience." I'm sorry, but I would simply say: you need to practice a little more before making such claims or extending that assertion that "it's not real." Practice more. Open up your experience through practice.

Of course, that person probably needs instruction in practicing in certain ways to open up both their practice and their view of practice. This is what I emphasized earlier—it's not just about meditating more. I need to meditate in certain ways. I need to frame and conceive of meditation in terms of fabrication, ways of looking, and dependent arising.

And I must do this without presuming—as often happens when people discuss fabrication—that "yeah, that kind of thing is fabricated when I'm really caught in papañca, when I'm really believing this crazy self-hating thought. I realize that's fabrication, but other stuff is real."

What happens when I don't make that assumption? What if I remain open in my exploration of fabrication? Who knows what's fabricated? Let's find out. Let's discover this by experimenting, by viewing meditation in a certain way, by exploring and developing ways of looking, and then see what reveals itself as fabricated in terms of experience.

Someone might hear all this about phenomenological fact, experiential fact, the availability to experience of different worlds and different levels, and actually experience that. This is probably much rarer. They might experience even the dependent arising—when I look this way, I see that. This is the perception. They experience all these levels of perception.

And still, even after experiencing this over and over again in lots of different ways—this dependent arising, this dependency on the ways of looking and how perception is fabricated—let's say theoretically that they still hold to, cling to this idea that reality is one-dimensional in this modernist way. Then what?

Then I would say we need to expose and question the epistemological assumptions of that person clinging to that position. What's happening, and what are they assuming about what constitutes valid knowledge? What are they assuming about what knowledge can be trusted? They're not trusting their own experience. This is a person who's hypothetically been through all this and seen this in meditation. Then what are you trusting as valid knowledge and why?

You can see these philosophical questions can sound so abstract, but they're absolutely at the basis of all that we're talking about. Reaching these walls and actually starting to question these assumptions is inevitable for someone who questions their existence deeply, who wants to look deeply into their existence. These questions are inevitable if we want to really open up or even question whether there is a basis for re-enchantment, for cosmophasis.

So what are the assumptions epistemologically about knowing? In this hypothetical case, I'm not trusting my own experience. What then am I trusting and why? Am I just trusting the view that happens to be most popular in the cultures that I move in at the time that I happen to be alive, the common view? A little reflection will show that most people hold that view without having thought about the whole thing much at all or explored it either intellectually or experientially.

Or am I trusting so-called science, but actually what I mean by that is really quite an outmoded version of science and the scientific approach? Or am I just trusting my inclinations, because I have a certain predisposition to a certain view? Why should I trust my predispositions? Why do I assume that they're right?

Or is it fear? Am I actually afraid of opening up the worldview, perhaps because I feel safe in the little container that I've constructed for myself without realizing it? Perhaps I'm afraid of the implications of a widening of the view.

But at any rate, either it's a question of developing the meditation, thinking about the meditation, framing it, conceiving of what on earth meditation is, and opening up that frame in a way that allows this whole thing—allows space and air and actual movement in terms of these openings of perception and these questions—or it's a question of questioning my assumptions about knowledge and what's called epistemology, how I can know anything and what is valid knowledge.

What I really want to emphasize here, over and above all this, is the phenomenology. All these ideas and cosmologies—many worlds or flat world or whatever it is—can we bring it back to practice and experimenting? The whole thing is a phenomenological exploration. It's an exploration of our experience, of our perception of what appears to us and how. In other words, bring it back to practice.

For example, with regard to the body, I can experience and look at the body in a way that sees it as a field of sensation. In terms of insight meditation, that's the most normal way. I can see and experience it, approach it through a way of looking that reveals the energy body. That becomes the appearance, as we've been emphasizing on this retreat. I can see, experience, feel, and perceive the body as imaginal, imbued with image, or the imaginal body as theophany as well. The body as theophany—my body, your body—as theophany, as face of God, the face of the divine.

And I can approach and have a way of looking at the body that has different kinds of conception of organic matter—through molecular or genetic or evolutionary or all kinds of conceptions of what organic matter is. And there are others too that are not quite so reductionist.

But phenomenology, as a philosophical enterprise, always includes conceptions. Some philosophers don't quite realize this. They believe in the possibility of just having a view without any conceptuality involved, a sort of pre-conceptual view of things. It's quite common in spiritual traditions—just being, don't think—as if we can have this naked view, naked phenomenology, naked experience of things.

Always, I say—and I've gone on about this in other talks and retreats—always appearance, phenomena, perception, experience involves conceptions. Perception involves conception.

Most of the time, very subtle, not even fully conscious.

And in terms of, if we just stay with that range, or that example of some of the range of ways we can practice with ways of looking at our body and sensing our body, maybe there's a hierarchy there for you in those. And you can organize them into some kind of hierarchy, or you feel there's a hierarchy. But not necessarily. There doesn't need to be.

And again, there's a flexibility of conception that I would favor. Just reading recently about Plotinus and Neoplatonism, how there was, in his way of teaching too, this flexibility of conceptualization. So sometimes he talked about matter as if it was a kind of illusion far from God, the furthest emanation of the divine energy. And other times it's actually no matter, it's equally divine. Everything is equally divine. They're just different transformations of divinity, if you like, of the substance of divinity. So complex and, for me, amenable to flexibility of conception.

There's a... Most of you know what pantheism means. It means God is... everything is God equally. God is, if you like, nothing else but what exists. So matter is God, and that's kind of it. Actually, it's probably different versions. But then there's something called panentheism, which includes the idea that there's, if you like, again, a level of God, a level of perception which transcends appearance. So there's, yes, all matter is divine. All matter is imbued with divinity. Everything in the world is imbued with divinity. And there's also a dimension, if you like, to the divine that's the unfabricated, the transcendent, that's beyond matter, actually beyond all appearance, all object and thingness.

But in relation to mindfulness of the body and what we were just touching on, when people often think about mindfulness of the body as the first foundation of mindfulness, as I said, they tend to think, in our world, of physical sensations. And wrapped up with that is usually either the rhetoric or the implicit assumptions that when I'm with my physical sensations, I'm with the immediate reality. Immediate meaning there's nothing getting in the way, no concepts, nothing. This is just the immediate reality of things.

And one's not seeing that way, that mode of approaching things as a way of looking. It's taken as the immediate reality and not as a way of looking. You understand? And if I assume that, and if I see that kind of mindfulness of the body as immediate reality and not as just another way of looking, then the whole talk of the energy body is just like, well, that's just something you're imagining or dreaming or believing. It's a fabrication. Whereas the other one is not a fabrication. The sensations are not a fabrication.

Actually, they're both modes of approaching practice. They're both ways of looking. Both of these are ways of looking. They're both modes of mindfulness of the body. And a deeper exploration of emptiness and fabrication of perception also sees the fabrication of sensation through clinging, through conception.

About the energy body in relation to these different kinds of body. We're talking about the energy body. We've been emphasizing it because, going back to the opening morning, because it provides us with a manifold, a multiplicity of resources for lots of different kinds of practices in lots of different ways. I'm not going to repeat that. That's why we've been emphasizing it.

But also, it provides us with one strand, one possibility, among others, of a way in which the body and the sense of the body can be re-enchanted. The energy body provides one strand, among others, of ways that there can be a re-enchantment of the body. Meaning, it's not essentially, truly, the nature of the body is not just matter, just molecules and genes and all that, but there's depth, dimensionality. There is this availability to perception of a subtle body, a body of light, a body of energy.

And that dimensionality, that more subtle body, if you like, or the energy body is connected to and integrated with the cosmos, but not only in the sort of modern materialist ways of conceiving as, of course I'm integrated into the cosmos because I exchange atoms with it through eating and going to the toilet and through breathing in and out, I'm connected with the cosmos that way. That's fine and that's great and that's important. But the ways that the subtle body or the energy body might be perceived to be connected with and integrated into the cosmos are different than that. And there's dimensions and depths of that. I'm not going to go into that. It's to be explored in practice, to be discovered in practice.

So all of this, this question of matter...

Bodies, worlds, and all of it—we could say we're in the business of alchemy. All this has very much to do with what we could call a way of conceiving what alchemy is. I hope I don't need to say that alchemy is not a sort of pre-chemistry. It was not a pre-chemistry where people were trying to convert lead to gold so that they could get rich. That's a certain view of alchemy, but I'm not talking about that at all. I doubt that for most serious alchemists that was at all what was involved.

Alchemy, as I've touched on before, is rather, if you like, a transubstantiation of matter, of world, of body. But this transubstantiation, this transformation of the substance of things, is something that happens in and through perception. So when we talk about alchemy, we're talking about the realm of perception, of our sense of things.

And this transubstantiation is available to us in all of the six senses. So yes, through sight, yes, through sound, yes, through touch—through the footfall and the touch of the foot on the floor or on the ground, on the earth, as we walk, or in the walking meditation or whatever. There can be an alchemy available that's arrived at through any of the six senses, and then again it might spread to the other senses.

So, for example, in touch, what's characteristic of this transubstantiation is that the one touched and the one touching are felt to be transubstantiated together. Again, we're back to the self-world thing. Because subject and object are never separate as they appear to be. The nature of the fabrication of perception is that subject and object get fabricated together. There's a mutual dependency, mutual co-dependency of their arising.

Someone—I can't remember where it's from—defined alchemy or summed it up as the spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit. The spiritualization of matter and the materialization of spirit. And they said that's what alchemy is.

But when we talk about this transubstantiation, this making divine, if you like, this alchemy of matter, or this realization of the divinity of the substance of matter, of world, of body—it has different images and metaphors for that in alchemy, which I don't need to go into—but this transubstantiation, and this is really, really important now, this transubstantiation doesn't necessarily involve or mean or imply a making ethereal in the perception, making less solid or making translucent or luminous or any of that in the perception.

In other words, there can be this transubstantiation and yes, of course, one option is that I'm looking and the world seems to me luminous, ethereal, less solid. That's actually very common. But it's only one option.

Because also there's the possibility that the very density and, if you like, what people used to call the darkness of matter or the sleep of matter—that is spiritualized. The materialization of spirit right there in that density, in that non-translucence, in that solidity. That solidity itself is not transformed, is not changed to something more ethereal. The solidity, the density, the darkness, whatever you want to call it, is itself infused with a sense of divinity without the object—whether it's body or matter or world or this object or that—without that becoming lighter and brighter.

So there's this transubstantiation in the very sense of density and solidity. It's rendered—that very density and solidity is rendered divine.

Again, going back to what we're trying to do here in the broader picture, we're opening and extending the sense of sacredness. So sacredness doesn't always look like white light or translucence or ethereality or whatever. We're opening and extending the sense of sacredness to everything eventually, in all forms and all perceptions.

And as we emphasized before, all this, this transubstantiation, this alchemy of perception, we're regarding it as art. It's an art.

So, for example, when we talk about seeing the world, seeing the surroundings, seeing the environment now as a deva realm or a buddha realm, as the palace of a buddha or a holy mandala, sacred mandala, and practicing that, or either that arising spontaneously through practice—yes, there's a way of approaching that, and a very valid and lovely one, where, for example, in the mandala, each location has an exact symbology and the detail of all that is important to the way of practicing. That's great and that's fine.

On this retreat we're emphasizing the art of it—a much looser approach, much more poetic, if you like, or potentially more creative, more open. So it's less formulaic. Not necessarily less precise, but less formulaic. And it may be precise or it may be vague.

But involved in that, in that art of feeling the world as deva realm, as the palace of a buddha, as the mandala, whatever language you want to use, what's involved in that art is the sense of all of it being sacred. It's, again, more than the typical modernist view of matter. Something is transubstantiated in and through the perception.

But that includes, if we're talking now about mandalas and all that, it includes a sense of the geometry, a sense of the space and the actual configuration of the space is not something that's kind of dissolved or transcended. I'm not just talking about being in a field of white light, kind of homogeneous, everything dissolves in that. Objects are not faded. I mean, that's a valid meditative experience and direction, of course.

But in this kind of perception of the world around me as mandala, it's not that the objects are faded or I'm replacing one perception of an object with a very different one. But things have their space. The space is set up in the same way.

The geometry of the space is set up as we perceive it usually. But the matter and the space itself is given this or felt to have this dimensionality, verticality. So that's part of the art of this inhabiting a mandala, this cosmopoiesis.

Or again, when we do the exercise of hearing all sounds as mantra, to quote a tantric instruction. Again, we can do it in a sort of very precise way with some set of very precisely defined symbology wrapped up with the syllables of the mantra. Or we can do it in a much looser way, a much more personally creative way. So on this retreat, that's more what we're favoring in this art of alchemy.

So just a couple more things. I mentioned time before. Wrapped up in this whole notion of cosmopoiesis, this whole notion of worlds and what the world is or how we perceive the world or different worlds, is the whole notion of time. Through practice, either through going deeply into emptiness practices—that's one avenue—or another avenue through going deeply into this art of cosmopoiesis and the imaginal, there are two avenues there. Both of them will eventually, and in the case of the cosmopoiesis, probably sooner rather than later, though it's variable, open up our conceptions and our perceptions of time.

Going the direction of deep insight meditation practice via emptiness and this exploration of unfabricating, of fabricating, the fabrication and unfabrication of perception dependent on the way of looking—that way, eventually one will have experiences of timelessness. And they can happen in all kinds of different ways. I'm not going to dwell on it here, but just to say that. And eventually there's the possibility of not fabricating. There is the cessation of the fabrication of perception. No perception, no thing, no self, no other, no object, no space. No time, no event. This is, if you like, a realm or sphere, ayatana as the Buddha called it, completely transcendent to all conventional experiences beyond time. There's no continuity of time there. There's nothing like it.

So that's possible, this completely transcendent experience beyond time of timelessness, beyond any perception. There's also possible through this deep emptiness practice perceptions of that kind of level or that kind of timelessness but in and through the perceptions we have of things happening in this world in time. So kind of the timelessness sort of shines through and we have this again, a multi-dimensionality available to consciousness. Yes, of course this thing is happening in time, and at the very beginning, in the very same perception, if you like, there's a sense of the timelessness of this moment, of this perception, of this thing, of all of that.

So this is what's available to us through deepening in what I would call insight meditation as the way of exploring fabrication and unfabricating will issue in this. And it can happen spontaneously in meditation. Some of that can happen spontaneously. So that's one avenue.

And the second avenue is what we're emphasizing more in this retreat, the avenue of the imaginal and the cosmopoiesis. I've talked about this in other talks, other retreats, about how there can be a sense of the timelessness of an image because the image is kind of iconic and there's a sense of eternity, of the eternality of what one perceives, whether that is the world that one perceives in cosmopoiesis or this particular image or this dimension of a being or a relationship. There's a sense of it happening, if you like, in a different time.

Corbin has the phrase hierophanic time, meaning the appearance of the sacred, literally—two Greek words, hieros sacred, phainein appearance, face. So he talks about the imaginal realm, events in hierophanic time. This image that touches me so deeply, that seems so soul-making, it has a sense that it's happening in another time and eternally.

Alex Wayman, who writes—he's a Buddhist writer, not sure if he's still alive, but wrote a lot about Tantra and translated some Tantras—talks about fruitional time or great time in contrast to, I think he uses basic time for the usual sense of time, linear, unfolding, and time passing, impermanence and all that. In contrast to what he calls fruitional time or great time. And this is the sense of time or the time of the imaginal realm, the time of the sambhogakaya. Again, to mention that word from Vajrayana Buddhism, Mahayana Buddhism—the world of the imaginal having its own kind of time, which is, if you like, an eternal time, a timeless time, an iconic presentation of the events and the images that take place in the sambhogakaya, in the imaginal realm.

I think why Alex Wayman calls it fruitional is because, if you like, that is, on the one hand, a fruit of awakening. In other words, this is part of the perception of an awakened one, a Buddha or a bodhisattva who's had certain levels of insight, of realization into emptiness. It opens up both the sense of timelessness in the first sense that I was using, but also this sense of the eternity and the sense of timelessness that imbues images and events in the imaginal realm, in the sambhogakaya. It opens up the sambhogakaya, in fact, which is characterized by a sense of eternality, of timelessness, to the images, appearances, events there.

But it will also happen as a fruit just of practicing imaginatively, eventually. We recognize, sometimes it needs to be pointed out to us, but we recognize that the images, the perceptions have a kind of timelessness to them.

And so this, at multiple levels, our sense of time becomes available to us and accessible to us—regularly accessible and easily available as perceptions. Different kinds of timelessness simply become part of how we see the world, not only when we're in a state of transcendence, but actually in and through the very appearance of things.

Yes, of course there's time, of course there's the perception of time, and one deals with that and relates to that. But in the very same appearance is this dimension of timelessness, or dimensions—different kinds of times. So this is all wrapped up in this whole notion, this whole possibility of experiencing worlds and imaginal realms.

Going back to the theologian I mentioned, Walter Wink said the ascension of Christ, or the resurrection of Christ—these are happening in another realm, in the imaginal realm, and that's always available and always accessible, as I pointed out. Why? Because there's a kind of eternality there. It's always happening.

Sometimes a sense of timelessness, either through an exploration of certain expressions or certain ways of approaching insight meditation, will bring an experience of a timeless realm—something separate, as I said, and dualistic with this world, the world of appearances. That can happen. In a way, what needs to happen then is a deeper understanding of emptiness. Or there can be this kind of separation and dualism between the imaginal realm and this realm, this world.

So that might happen experientially, but eventually, sooner or later, these worlds—this multiplicity of worlds that's available to us in cosmopoiesis—and these multiple dimensions in our perception of time, time and timelessness, they are here now, available in the appearance of this world, this moment, all this existence. Not separate, not dualistic, not only transcendent.

Back to the panentheism. Yes, there is the capacity for transcendence beyond all experience, beyond matter, form and all that. And there's the possibility of the perception, the experience, here, now, in and through—and in and through also all the particulars, not just dissolving things. So that non-duality, non-separation of these worlds, of these levels of perception, these realities, dimensions, and non-separation of time and the timeless—all of that can be here, now, available, not separate, not dualistic.

The last thing regarding the way our practice evolves, or the way we evolve towards that realization of non-duality of all this, or the availability, or the inclusion of all these different levels and dimensions and worlds and levels of time—the way we move towards that more integrated experience of this as integrated into this very appearance now, or inherent in, available in, present in, present to perception, to experience, in and through this very appearance, not as separate—the evolution to that availability in practice, in our sense of existence, to that non-separation, to that non-duality, the evolution of that—it might be that duality or separating out of what is sacred from what is profane is actually, for some people, a necessary stage.

It's interesting—everyone would like to jump to a view of "everything is sacred." And of course, I would say that's a more mature view. It is a more mature view. And that's what we're interested in, that spreading, as I said, of the sacred, of the sense of the sacred, the senses of the sacred. So that's great. Everything is sacred as an idea.

But oftentimes, if that as an idea is just words, or it's not deeply based and a fruit of deep and consistent exploration and practice—it's just an idea, and sometimes it's even a secular kind of idea—what happens is that actually everything sacred experientially really drifts or slips or becomes nowhere. Nothing is sacred.

So sometimes many of us, or some, are actually helped by deliberately circumscribing: this is sacred, or this place is sacred. So this temple—there are the precincts of the temple, and within those borders, it's sacred space. We create sacred space somehow or other, perhaps through ritual, perhaps something or other. We conjure, we enchant this space and it becomes sacred. And we're in it and there's an out of it. There's a duality there.

Or people making a pilgrimage. The classical way of thinking about pilgrimage is that place that I'm making a pilgrimage to is sacred. And that's why I'm making the pilgrimage there. It's special. It's different. In a way, it's other.

So what I want to say is: we have to be practical with all this. I'm really interested in practice, in development, in the evolution of perception, of experience, of what's available and what makes a difference in our existence, in our life. And sometimes for us, or for some of us, for many of us perhaps, separating out the sacred deliberately, caringly, and giving that more sanctity or approaching it with more sanctity is actually a stage on the way to perceiving everything as sacred.

So I just want to acknowledge that and actually leave room for that. Because always, when we talk about practice, whether it's these kinds of practices or other kinds of practices or simple mindfulness, always the question that should be imbuing practice and in the background or at the foreground of practice at all times is: what is helpful here? What is helpful? And if I'm interested, deeply interested in moving towards a vastly deepened and enriched and opened up sense of existence, that really one has expanded the sense of the sacred, the senses of the sacred, then I need to be practical about that.

What actually helps me move towards that? I don't care about dogma or nice-sounding formulas. What I'm interested in is actually making a difference in life, in existence, and indirectly in culture.

So not dogma, not dogmatism, but pragmatism. What is actually helpful here? And what are the temporary stages, the provisional stages that move me towards deeper and deeper insight?

Often certain kinds of duality need to be respected and seen and entered into as stages of perception—stages of realization and insight—because they're on their way to non-duality. People want to jump to the non-dual perspective, and while not always, oftentimes it ends up having not much power at all, not much transformative power. It sounds good and there's a kind of attraction to it, but the question remains.

Always, always, always—whatever the practice, whatever the direction—what's helpful here? What is helpful?

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 39

Matter, Bodies, Worlds (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> In this opening exploration of matter and perception, Rob Burbea examines how our fundamental assumptions about the nature of matter, bodies, and the world we inhabit profoundly influence our spiritual practice and possibilities for healing. He contrasts reductionist views that see birds merely as survival-driven biological machines with perspectives that recognize them as theophanies—faces of the divine.
>
> Burbea argues that most psychological and spiritual work today occurs against an unconscious backdrop of a "meaningless, mechanistic universe," severely limiting what healing and flourishing can accomplish. He explores the intimate connection between self and world, showing how the re-enchantment of one necessarily involves the re-enchantment of the other through their mutual dependent origination (paṭicca samuppāda).
>
> The talk critically examines our cultural inheritance of classical mechanistic physics and scientism—the overextension of scientific materialism into an exclusive worldview. Drawing on philosophers like Nietzsche, Horkheimer, and Adorno, Burbea reveals how this "single vision" has become a hidden mythology that constrains our perception. He introduces quantum physics and relativity theory as examples of how science itself challenges our ordinary assumptions about space, time, and matter, opening possibilities for multiple valid ways of perceiving reality while maintaining the crucial distinction between mature imaginal enchantment and superstitious thinking.

I remember some years ago listening to a talk by a senior Western Buddhist nun in the Hinayana Theravada tradition. She was talking about insight, and she said, "You know, you might sit out in the garden and look at the little birds there flying around, sitting on a branch of a tree, singing even, and you might think, oh, how beautiful these little birds, how graceful, whatever, and feel touched by that. But actually, you're deluded. You're wrapped up in delusion because—look at them closely. Look how they move their heads, jerk their heads from side to side, always on the lookout for predators or for a worm to eat, always caught up basically, obsessed, programmed by the necessities of physical survival. And this is the basic harsh reality of their existence, which you are just not really seeing or choosing to ignore."

So the emphasis there is on this fact of dukkha and this disenchantment with the world and with beings in a way. There's imbued in that, or rather that is a description of a view. Can you hear how that's a view? It's a concept in that sense of view, but it's a view, it's a way of looking, it's an interpretation.

Can you also hear how wrapped up in that view and that interpretation, in this case of the birds, is something akin to some versions of modern existentialism, but also a kind of reductionism—a reductionism to explanations according to biological evolution or according to hardwiring of neurology in the bird's brains and nervous system that make them act this way. And wrapped up in that reductionism to physicalism, evolutionism, and neurology, implicit in what she was saying—actually I think it was more than implicit—is "this is reality. Get real. See this. See that this is actually the fact. Anything else you see is a superimposition, a delusion, an obscuration, a veil over that reality."

So explicitly or implicitly, there's a reality claim there. And that reality claim is extensive and thorough. In other words, this is all there is to know. This is the most important thing to know and understand. This is our explanation of what a bird is, why it behaves like it does, even why it sings. And this overextension has been a big part of what I've been calling scientism, as opposed to science.

Now compare that view, that sense, that perception and interpretation—that implicit interpretation, conceptual and perceptual—of the birds in the garden, and compare that view with the view of the birds as angelic beings, as theophanies, as faces, as expressions of the divine. Two views, two different worlds, actually, that are then felt, sensed, inhabited. In a sense, those two views are descriptions of, reflections of, and will give rise to different worlds that we sense ourselves in and perceive ourselves and feel ourselves in. And this is really crucial—of course, it's the main theme of the retreat, but it's crucial to everything.

Nowadays, in Dharma circles and in psychotherapy circles, there's so much emphasis—rightly so—on our psychological growth, our healing, our human flourishing, the flourishing of myself and self-expression. But in a way, most of it, whether in psychotherapeutic circles or in some spiritual circles, is happening within, or I could even say against, a background of a meaningless, soulless, mechanistic universe. So here I am, pursuing diligently my growth and healing and flourishing psychologically, so-called spiritually, and it's all taking place in a bigger context, a literal background—because it's not something I pay attention to—of this soulless, mechanistic, meaningless universe that actually doesn't care a damn, doesn't give a damn about your process, my process, psychologically.

And that background, and the fact that I'm not really paying attention to it, has an effect. Actually, whether I pay attention to it or whether it remains, if you like, subliminal, it's having an effect on me, on my sense of existence, on my actual psychological, spiritual growth, healing, flourishing. It is not irrelevant. It is not without effect. Actually, I would say the effect is enormous.

So whatever we might mean by healing, or whatever we might accomplish in our flourishing, or my personal growth, my personal process, my healing, is actually quite severely limited. Whatever healing is possible is quite severely limited by the context of the world that I inhabit through my view, through my conception, through my assumption. The healing itself is limited. What we mean and what can be achieved in a healing, what a healing can encompass, what a healing can reach, what flourishing can reach, what growth can reach—it will be limited.

And in most psychological, psychotherapeutic, psychoanalytic circles—certainly not all, but many—and certainly the world of mindfulness and quite a lot of the insight meditation world, the whole discourse, the whole conversation, the whole teaching leaves out this side about what the world actually is. How do we perceive and feel the world? How do we conceive of it? It misses the relevance and the effect and what possibilities there are there. Or else it assumes something and then gets locked into it. But generally speaking, it's not given attention. We don't realize the effects that this has, or realize quite what we're assuming and how that ties in with notions of what's possible and who I am, what a human being is, what's possible.

This awareness isn't deliberately included, or when it is, there's usually quite a narrow view that assumes a certain version of reality—for example, certain secular modernist or existentialist versions of Dharma.

As I've pointed out before, the notion of self and the experience of world are always tied together—always. Self and world arise in codependence, influencing each other, shaping and fabricating each other, informing the perceptions of both. The healing of self, or the freeing or liberation of self to whatever degree, and the re-enchantment of self, happens in mutual dependence with the re-enchantment of the world. Re-enchanting self and re-enchanting world are actually aspects of one movement. We're separating them somewhat on this retreat, but as I've said, that's an artificial separation.

Even more than that—the healing of the self and the healing of the world go together. What does that mean, the healing of the world? What is the fullness of what is meant there? What does it mean to heal? What does it mean to free the world? The healing of the self and the healing of the world are inseparable. When I heal the world, I heal myself. When I free the world, I free myself. What does this mean? What does it mean to free the world?

As usual, there's this mutual dependency. I'm leaving those questions open—I think I've touched on them elsewhere. But there's a fullness of mutual dependent origination here. Self and world go together. Causality goes both ways. When I re-enchant the world, I will inevitably re-enchant the self. I cannot not.

Sometimes we break it down into stages, and that's just a pedagogical tool—a way of presenting practice. Things can happen in stages, and sometimes they do evolve that way. For example, when we do a kind of deity yoga or work with an imaginal figure where there's eros and love, we might first notice this figure where the self is in relationship to an other. Then, as a sort of stage after that, we notice that the divinity of that image spills over in cosmopoiesis to the world, to the cosmos—a perception and divinizing, a making divine of the cosmos.

Similarly, when we do the mantra meditation, hearing all sounds as mantra, we may start with a sense of devotion to compassion—maybe compassion for ourselves, for others. It's to do with self and maybe other. But as one way of opening up that whole practice with the mantra, as we're exploring on this retreat, is that it opens up beyond what the self wants for the self, or for this other, and beyond even sound. There's this expansion into a fullness and a sort of all-pervasiveness of cosmopoiesis—self and world together.

There's a direction of evolution there, but things can happen the other way around too, and they can happen together. They often do happen together; it's just that we don't quite notice, because as I've said, we're often somewhat indoctrinated and trained to keep the attention on the self—the self's growth, the self's freeing, the self's healing.

Within this whole movement of re-enchantment and cosmopoiesis, whether it's re-enchantment of the self or re-enchantment of the world, or both together, I really want to stress again the crucial importance of this relative weighting between self and divine—the orientation. Am I orienting practice and healing and growth? Is it actually oriented within a conception of self-growth? Is that the priority? Is that the orientation? Is that the intention? Is that the conception?

Or is it more weighted towards the divine, with the self really as a vehicle for the divine? Practice, path, life, existence, self-expression, so-called flourishing, freeing—all of it, liberation, the whole thing—for God, for the sake of the divine, not for the sake of the self. That's a radically different view. Where am I generally in my life, and generally at any time, on this spectrum? For the self or for God?

I'm not just talking about words or slipping back into a self-view. I want to pick that up again and stress how much depends on this orientation or relative weighting between the self and the divine. This applies not just to the re-enchantment of the self, but also to the re-enchantment of objects in the world. Just as much as it applies to the re-enchantment of the self, it applies to the re-enchantment of objects in the world.

When there is some kind of enchantment with an object or thing in the world, and that enchantment actually has more to do with the self—more about the self, oriented towards or from the intentionality of the self rather than the divine—that's more my interest, my thrust. Oftentimes I don't even realize this is going on. But when it's that, when it's more actually about the self, this enchantment I have with this object or this whatever it is, piece of jewelry or whatever, then it's probably more akin to what we might call infatuation or superstition.

So things like this amulet or this mala, these lucky charms—we're in the realm of that kind of magical thinking. And their purpose, these lucky charms or this pendant I wear around my neck or whatever it is that people wear all over the world—the purpose of it is for the self. It's to give the self luck or to give the self protection. It's all for the self.

Versus, or in contrast to, seeing these objects, this thing in the world—whatever it is, a natural thing or an artifact—seeing these objects as theophanies, as faces of the divine. They're not for me in any way. Or again, there's a spectrum here. But sensing them as theophanies, feeling them as theophanies. Mostly when I use the word seeing, I really mean sensing. It's just a habit of language. There's quite a lot to say about that, but really hear the word sensing.

But sensing them as theophanies, seeing them as theophanies—rather than tightening it around self and self-protection and lucky charms and all that—this thing becomes a gateway to opening through which beauty is opened in this wide sense. There's a widening, a deepening of beauty, of meaningfulness, of the sense of divinity, and of course the sacralizing of that object, which is implicit in seeing it as a theophany anyway.

With all that there's soul-making—the soul dynamic, if you like, of Eros, Psyche and Logos expanding, feeding each other, nourishing each other, inseminating each other, deepening, enriching, widening together, pushing each other further, penetrating deeper, opening more. All that is made possible by the theophany and much, much less so when it's really seen from the point of view of self-investment and self-conception. For me, rather than for God. As something for me, rather than as a face of God, or for God.

And notice also in that kind of superstitious or infatuated relationship with things and objects of the world, that a kind of immature enchantment in that infatuation or superstition involves also a reification often of their magical power. I really believe that this thing is going to give me luck or protect me from evil. There's also reification of evil then. There is not within that kind of immature enchantment the seeing of image as image. There's what we call an immature enchantment with certain things and certain objects in the world, and I'm not seeing image as image when that's going on. Not only is it about myself and for myself, I'm also not seeing image as image.

As I said, so much hinges in this work, and we don't often realize this, but so much hinges on this: where I am at any time, where I am more generally, in this relative weighting or leaning, so to speak, in the direction of or for the sake of self versus divine—in my conception, in my aspiration, in my intention, in all of that.

Now this whole question about worlds that we, or the world that we inhabit and the nature of that world and the perception of that world, necessarily brings up the question integral to that whole meaning of world: the whole question of matter. And then again, the nature, the perception, the conception of matter. Because the world is, to us nowadays, a world of matter. And matter also implies body. So matter, world, body are completely integral to each other. The views, the conceptions, the sense, the perception of all that is tied together. This is absolutely crucial.

Matter. What is the relationship with, what is the view and what are the ways of looking, or way of looking, if it's singular, at matter? And when people use that word—matter or body or world—what do we mean? What is meant when a person says matter or world or body? What is the conception and the perception?

So again, with matter, most of the time when a person uses it, and obviously mostly they do, what's wrapped up in their use of that word matter is the normal modernist view, underneath which, if you poke them a little bit and say, "What do you mean by that, or what is it?" they would probably eventually, sooner or later, articulate a kind of high school version of classical mechanistic physics. It's made up of atoms, which are a bit like billiard balls, and they sort of ricochet around and they combine, none of which has any meaning or anything else going on, and they form different things which disintegrate after a while back to the atoms.

But matter might also mean a sort of quantum physics understanding, a more current understanding of matter, where matter is not—if you like, anything—it's not reducible to subatomic particles as things in the way that we usually conceive of things. As independent of the way they're being observed, as being located at any time in any place with certain other properties that we just take for granted as being part of properties of things. So subatomic particles in a quantum understanding are not things in the way that we think of things. There is a whole realm of difference there with what matter might mean once we actually start getting more current with our scientific view.

Or for another person, another time, say matter—the view, the conception of matter—if they've meditated in certain ways, and we've touched on this before, one of the lovely openings that can happen, mystical openings, and can become very much a regular, or not 100% steady, but quite accessible and prolonged in time, perception is that all is one, and different flavors of one. All is one, all actually is awareness in substance.

So matter is a kind of—or the way most people tend to perceive matter—in this view is actually, the reality in this other view is that it's actually awareness, or it's actually love, or it can be many kinds of oneness. But that's a different view of matter.

Or for someone else who's explored emptiness and dependent origination extensively and gone deeply into the whole question of whether matter is real in the way that we think it is—there's a whole way that the perception and conception of matter and materiality, when one explores that view sustainably, deeply, thoroughly, opens up the sense of what is meant by matter.

Or again, there's a kind of Neo-Platonic view where, and this has different versions, matter is seen as an emanation of the divine in a kind of hierarchy. In some formulations, there's a transcendent divine and then a world soul, descending to a divine mind and then matter. But matter is perhaps imbued by the divine. It's a transformation of the divine.

And then also, perhaps a little more at one remove, different psychotherapeutic paradigms. What one means by body or how one relates to that, or the conceptuality underlying body and matter, is also quite different depending on the paradigm. There are psychologies that attempt to be very biological-based, talking about neural networks—very popular nowadays. What's underlying that? And others that relate to the body primarily acknowledging the fantasy through which body is seen, or body actually seen primarily as a field for that and not acknowledged as a fantasy, actually claimed as a reality. Body means different things in different psychotherapeutic theories. And again, that can become very dogmatic depending on the view. This is reality.

Or again, when a person talks about matter, what are you actually talking about? What do you mean when you use that word? Do you mean the experience, the perception, and wrapped up in that, the conception of solidity, of density? Is that what you mean when you talk about matter? Then there's the whole question of air and water and how solid and dense—and of course that's matter as well. But if you're talking about the experience or the perception or the conception of something like solidity, density, how aware are you? Are you holding that as a reality or as a phenomenon, which means appearance? Are you seeing there's an appearance, an experience, a phenomenality to solidity? It's a perception. It's a phenomenon, which means appearance, perception. Or are you just assuming there's a reality?

So these notions of matter—they're actually underneath. They influence radically as a basis our notions, our senses of the world. So as I said, it's wrapped up in that and also reality. And it's massively significant.

One thing to notice here as well is the word matter, M-A-T-T-E-R, and the word mater, M-A-T-E-R, which is a Latin word and means mother. They're actually related, I think, etymologically even. But there's something about this matter and mother, matter and mater, in terms of how we relate to that.

Very often the fantasies and images of matter—in other words, what we're conceiving of, but also our whole imaginal sense of matter, and of mater, meaning mother, meaning also origins, the birth of things, what gives birth, what are origins of things, or actually to do with motherhood—the fantasies and the images of all that, which nowadays, especially in a lot of psychotherapies, are very central to a lot of the thinking, a lot of the assumptions of those paradigms.

But it's interesting. So paradigms about trauma, about what's called perinatal psychology and influence and what happens in embryonic stages, or just about motherhood and a person thinking about themselves as mother or potential mother. And just the whole area of developmental psychology that has to do with mater, mother, origins, and also matter. All this is woven together, or all the origins in terms of the origins of Buddhism. And this kind of fantasy, historical fantasy, of getting back to the basic Pali Canon Buddha and exactly what he said and the origins—and the origins being better.

Notice with all of that, those kinds of ways of conceiving and really fantasizing and imaging matter and mater, mother, origins, all that—it seems to me that those kind of fantasies and images which imbue all of that thinking about developmental psychology and all this kind of stuff, there is almost what we could say an almost intrinsic tendency to concretize, to not see image as image. These fantasies going on—and somehow because of the matter, in fantasies about matter, there's a tendency not to see image as image and to concretize it. It presents itself—it's a fantasy, but it presents itself, or there's an assumption that this is reality.

So whether we're talking about actual matter or whether we're talking about, as I said, fantasies of origin, whether it's historical fantasies or developmental fantasies or biological fantasies of origin and mothering and all that—why?

Because why is it concretized? Why do we not see image as image? This relates partly to the subject matter itself. The very nature of fantasies of matter tend to make themselves more solid, more concretized. It's an interesting psychological phenomenon—when we engage with images and fantasies about matter, there's something in their very nature that resists being seen as image.

So as we inquire into this area, as practitioners and human beings interested in existence, interested in our existence and our life and this world, can we recognize that there are operating for us—often at a subtle unconscious level and with huge effect—conceptions, perceptions, fantasies and images of matter? These have great effect on how we conceive, perceive, feel, imagine, fantasize about body, ours and others, about the world, about life, and the whole notion of being with life. Sometimes they give rise to more existentialist perspectives and philosophies. All of that is grounded in, based on, conceptions, perceptions, fantasies of matter.

If we talk about re-enchantment, the re-enchantment of the world and matter needs—almost by definition—to see matter not just according to the modernist view, not just this view of flatness. Matter is all there is. The meaningless movement of atoms is all there is. There is no other level of things, no other level of materiality, no other level of anything—it's all just matter. When that becomes the exclusive perception and is deemed the only reality, re-enchantment needs an opening up of all that. It's not just that.

We can talk about spiritual re-enchantment, where that perception of matter opens up and includes other views. There's a recognition that there's a multiplicity of views—yes, I can see matter as matter, but I can also see all matter as sharing in the substance, the essence of this oneness of awareness, or oneness of cosmic love. There are many different kinds of spiritual re-enchantment.

There's also the possibility of what we've been calling, somewhat clumsily, this mature imaginal-based enchantment. This implies the multiplicity or the availability to perception of more than one dimension. It implies this matter, this object, or the world as a whole, as theophany, in and through the particulars. This is different from the more general, universal, impersonal spiritual re-enchantment. It's in and through the particulars that the theophany of this thing or that thing or this object manifests.

Just like the self, just like desire, just like will, just like our emotions and even our suffering and our difficulties and our difficult histories, just like our images, just like ideas—matter also, just like all of those aspects or dimensions of our existence, in the re-enchantment of it according to the mature, imaginal kind of enchantment that we're talking about, is also seen as divine, as theophany, as having divine roots. But this is in and through matter, in and through the object. When we speak of levels or having divine roots, this is not separate or something only separate or only transcendent to the appearance. It's not something else that I can't see, something outside of experience, something beyond form and matter.

All this is necessary in this kind of enchantment that we're emphasizing on this retreat. But it's interesting—it's difficult with language to come up with words that both make a coherent system and describe well the subtleties of what we're talking about here and what's available. Sometimes I'm aware that the language I'm using will rub certain people the wrong way, or they'll take it to mean something that I'm not quite implying.

More generally, I think it's a really interesting exercise to actually inquire into your experiences of enchantment. When you feel an enchantment with things, when you feel that sacredness or beauty, inquire into what actually is involved for you in that experience, perceptually and conceptually.

We can have experiences of everything being equally enchanted, but oftentimes it's interesting—some things seem to be more enchanted or enchantable than others. For example, plastic artifacts made without seeming care for aesthetics, just functional or convenient, versus a flower. It's easier to have that sense of sacredness and enchantment with the flower for most people. Or in nature or wilderness, as opposed to on a busy city street or a run-down city street. Not always, but generally.

With spiritual enchantment, it's more possible to have everything equally enchanted. But sometimes—and this is just a suggestion which I think is very interesting and can be subtle and difficult to actually discern—when there's a sense of divinity, what conceptions are wrapped up in that perception of divinity for you at that time? It's hard to articulate, hard to actually discern.

It's probably obvious at this point that wrapped up in this whole question of the world that I inhabit is the question of matter, and all of that has very much to do with typical scientific thinking that has imbued our culture. So wrapped up in this whole practice of cosmopoiesis and re-enchantment is the questioning of science, or rather, the relationship with science.

I want to quote from Nietzsche, who writes about science as a prejudice. He's really talking about this faith in scientism, this overextension, this exclusivity, this claim of scientism that everything can be reduced or explained in terms of a certain kind of reduction of scientific thinking. There's a sort of delightful ranting and vitriol in the way he writes sometimes, so you might react to that, but you can also just enjoy it. It's kind of theatrical.

So Nietzsche presents this theatrical critique, one of the many selves he consciously inhabits, offering a delightful vitriol against the faith with which so many materialistic natural scientists rest content nowadays. He questions their unexamined belief in a world that supposedly has its equivalent and measure in human thought and human valuations—a "world of truth" that can be mastered completely and forever with the aid of our "square little reason."

"What?" he asks. "Do we really want to permit existence to be degraded for us like this, reduced to a mere exercise for a calculator and an indoor diversion for mathematicians?" Above all, he insists, "one should not wish to divest existence of its rich ambiguity." Again, there's this call to the multiplicity of perception, the multiplicity of possible interpretations, this rich ambiguity that deserves reverence for everything that lies beyond our horizon.

Rather than circumscribing things in this neat little view—thinking we have reality mapped out with just a few more discoveries to make—Nietzsche asks what lies beyond that horizon. Is there something in us that wants to push through and beyond, to expand that horizon with reverence?

He challenges the claim of justifying an interpretation of the world that permits only "counting, calculating, weighing, seeing, and touching, and nothing more," calling it "a crudity and naivety, assuming that it is not a mental illness and idiocy." Would it not be rather probable, he suggests, that precisely the most superficial and external aspect of existence—what is most apparent, its skin and sensualization—would be grasped first and might even be the only thing that allowed itself to be grasped?

This seemingly obvious empirical experience, upon which positivism bases its claim that we can only understand through empirical experience and resulting science, might be the most superficial layer. A "scientific interpretation of the world," as commonly understood, might therefore be "one of the most stupid of all possible interpretations of the world, meaning that it would be one of the poorest in meaning."

He continues with a thought "intended for the ears and consciences of our mechanists, who nowadays like to pass as philosophers and insist that mechanics is the doctrine of the first and last laws on which all existence must be based." An essentially mechanistic world would be an essentially meaningless world. He offers a brilliant analogy: "Assuming that one estimated the value of a piece of music according to how much of it could be counted, calculated and expressed in formulas, how absurd would such a 'scientific' estimation of music be? What would one have comprehended, understood, grasped of it? Nothing, really nothing of what is music in it."

This relationship we have—whether we realize it or not, whether we think about it or not—with classical scientific, mechanistic ideas and scientism is actually crucial to our sense of existence, our life, what our practice is, what the path can be, this whole notion of the possibilities of re-enchantment. Philosophy of science becomes important, curiously, because it's not at all abstract. So much of our assumptions, so much of our perception, our sense of existence and the world, so much of our Weltanschauung—our worldview—is informed by, influenced by, indoctrinated by certain actually outmoded scientific assumptions that we don't realize we hold.

This philosophy of science is really important nowadays because it's not abstract at all. What has this got to do with the Dharma? It has everything to do with it nowadays—everything to do with our sense of existence and liberation and possibility.

About a hundred years ago, philosophers Max Horkheimer and Theodor Adorno wrote The Dialectic of Enlightenment—referring to Western Enlightenment, post-scientific revolution thought. They too critique the assumptions of science that have come to pervade our culture, pointing out that this classical scientific approach and its mechanistic assumptions cannot accommodate everything about existence.

It cannot explain everything about existence by trying to reduce and approach the whole of our existence as if its reality is best and most truly explained at the ground level by this kind of classical scientific, mechanistic approach. This is actually one-sided and prevents—or rather, it provides only an incomplete, diminished understanding of nature—and an understanding of nature as an object to be controlled and manipulated.

This was something that Theodor Adorno stressed quite a lot, and you see here the beginnings of a critique about our relationship with the environment. Nature, through this view, becomes an object to be controlled and manipulated. As they write: "Men pay for the increase in their power with alienation from that over which they exercise their power." So yes, science and technology have enormous power over nature through this classical scientific mechanistic paradigm, but we pay for it with alienation from nature.

As the scientific revolution gained steam and its ideas became more pervasive over a couple hundred years, as they became the dominant view in our Western culture, that ostensibly rational movement intrinsic to the Western Enlightenment—the seemingly rational movement to try and eliminate all forms of prejudice and dogmas—remained, paradoxically, limited. That's the whole principle of the classical scientific approach: let's get to some kind of objective, unbiased reality through the scientific method. We have faith in that. We believe in that.

Yet even as this positivist reasoning gained dominance in the culture, it still remains, as Horkheimer and Adorno write, "engulfed in mythology." You haven't actually gotten rid of mythology. You think you have, you believe you have, but you haven't. By positivism, I mean a sort of dogmatic assertion—there's a dogma involved in this philosophy. It asserts, as dogma, that nature must always be understood in terms of quantitative categories. Again, it's tied up with that whole notion of measurement I mentioned on the opening evening: if something can be measured, then that's a sign that it's real. Measurement and reality go together.

But the process, they point out, "is always decided from the start." Mathematical procedure, including the procedure of measuring everything and construing what is measured as real, "becomes, so to speak, the ritual of thinking." So tied up in our whole assumption, the way we think about things, is this mythology and ritual that we don't even realize.

There have been many critiques in modern Western philosophy from different directions and starting positions, beginning to see that we cannot simply adopt the classical mechanistic Newtonian view or assumptions of the scientific revolution. They just do not hold for many different reasons. What I'm emphasizing here is how much this underpins our sense of things in modern culture.

So again, what liberates that? What opens it up? It might be an approach through Western philosophy. It might be that some of us simply have a more poetic attitude to existence, to things, to life and selves. It might be through deep exploration of the teachings of emptiness and the practice of emptiness, seeing dependent arising. It might be through deeper understanding of quantum physics—actually through science itself—that starts to subvert the very principles or assumptions on which science was initially based.

That's an interesting development, because still most scientists, often including quantum scientists, simply ignore the philosophical implications or questions that arise. They know they're there, but they ignore them, or it makes no impact in their lives.

But as I said, why am I emphasizing this? Because it has implications for our sense of the world we live in, and that has all kinds of implications for self, path, practice, existence, possibility—all kinds of things. Even such fundamentals of existence as time and space—and perhaps in other retreats I could give whole talks about time and space—are part of our way of thinking about world. World involves time, our sense of time, assumptions about time, and assumptions about space. They're fundamental to when we say or feel or sense "world."

But what is the relationship with all that? What is the perception and the conception? Even our notions and sense of space come to be questioned through modern science itself. The usual understanding—again, it's a modernist, cultural modernist understanding of space as the most obvious thing—is that space is simply a kind of empty, neutral, meaningless vacuum that's then filled with stuff at certain locations. That's, funnily enough, actually quite a modernist view: that it exists objectively, and that's the reality of things.

We don't realize it. It's so intrinsic, so woven into our very sense of existence and what the world is. But that's actually a culturally conditioned, culturally constructed, modernist view, and it was not always the view everywhere and for all time that humanity had, that human beings had.

And with the rise of both relativity and quantum physics, we start to see that space is not actually independent of matter and energy. Again, the usual view is there is space and matter is the lumps of matter here or there, moving around in space as something separate from matter. Space is just a context, if you like.

But with Einstein's general theory of relativity from 1916, actually space and time, in fact, are not independent of the matter in it. The matter is not separate from it and actually shapes space and time, as does energy. And then in quantum physics, there are also notions that actually, at a quantum level, space is nothing like what we conceive of it as. It's more like what they call quantum bubbles or quantum foam. Actually, there's all kinds of theories.

So things that are so obvious, like space, like things being separate in space—there's this end of something and that end of something, or there's this corner of space and that corner of space of a room or whatever it is. There's a beginning of something and an end of something. But these seemingly so obvious notions of separation and continuity don't actually hold. They're not, so to speak, fundamental realities as the quantum world gets probed.

Most people these days have heard of the idea of wormholes. They're popular in science fiction movies and novels. So you go through a wormhole in the universe and suddenly end up on a different side of the universe or a different time—wormholes in space-time. What a strange idea.

But even more than that, stranger to our usual notion of space, much stranger, much more challenging to our habitual notion of space, is the whole idea of non-locality. It came out of something called Bell's theorem and then was proven through experiments. Whatever future theories of reality come out of science, this idea that actually two particles can become what they call entangled and actually influence each other instantaneously, even if they're at different ends of the universe—the whole idea that this place is different from that place, and what happens here takes time to get to what's over there, the whole notion of whether they're really different places—it's a radical challenge to our whole notions of space and time.

And John Archibald Wheeler has had a theory of what's called geons. So actually what subatomic particles are is not so much a lump of something, a billiard ball of something, or a point of something moving in space, but actually a particle is a hole—H-O-L-E—in spacetime. So this is a theory that hasn't been proved yet, but it's a way of conceiving. So that matter and space both are not at all how we assume them to be. All of this is getting challenged through science.

Actually, wrapped up in this is a whole other level—what the status of scientific theories is as well. That's a whole other question, but I won't go into that now.

So the typical view, the typical conception of matter, world, space, time, body—it's fine. It's completely fine. It has its validity. Clearly, it's functional. What I absolutely want to object to and raise my voice against is the insistence that it is true and that it is the only reality. This is reality. Anything else is make-believe or delusion or whatever.

Of course it's fine as a view, and it's fine for someone to spend most of their time in that view. Of course it is. This insistence that it is true, it's the only truth, and explicitly or implicitly founding a total philosophy or a kind of dharma or a path that's somehow limited to that and limiting in that way, and founding that on its supposed truth—whether it's an explicit or an implicit claim—this I do have a problem with. Something not conscious, not thought through, not aware, maybe dishonest, or maybe just lacking in insight.

To get back to what Blake said: "Save me from single vision." That's the single vision. And then it's asserted dogmatically in something that's called aggressive secularism or whatever. This we must raise our voices against, open up through questioning and through insolence that can happen in all kinds of ways.

CHAPTER 40

Neither 'Is' nor 'Is Not': Of Emptiness and the Imaginal (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 32 min

> In this penetrating Q&A session, Rob Burbea addresses fundamental questions about navigating the apparent tension between emptiness teachings and ethical responsibility. When a practitioner asks how to respond truthfully to realities like climate change while understanding emptiness, Burbea articulates the middle way between existing and not existing—neither reifying phenomena nor falling into nihilism.
>
> Drawing on core Buddhist insights about śūnyatā (emptiness), Burbea explains how genuine emptiness understanding doesn't diminish compassionate response but frees us from contracted reactions. He explores how both ethical action and imaginal practice can be soul-making, emphasizing the plurality of archetypal dimensions within each practitioner. The discussion reveals how 'ways of looking' (diṭṭhi) are all we ultimately have, liberating us from the duality of real versus unreal.
>
> Burbea addresses practical questions about working with divine images, whether for developing specific qualities like compassion and strength, or in service to the images themselves. He clarifies the relationship between samādhi, imaginal practice, and cosmopoiesis—how imaginal qualities can spread from particular images to infuse one's entire perception of the world. This teaching demonstrates how deep emptiness realization paradoxically opens rather than closes the heart to beauty, meaning, and ethical engagement.

Truth just comes along and says, "This is what needs to happen. This is how you need to live, this is how you need to think." It has a kind of demand on you. I appreciate that, but I'm struggling to work that out in relation to this material.

Anne is asking about truthfulness coming along with its demands. She gives the example: "The first time I found out about climate change, it came along and said, 'Change your life. Now you've got to start making more choices about what you buy and what you use and how you live and how you spend your time.'" She's asking how this relates to integrity and the imaginal work we've been discussing.

This is a really important question. I'd say maybe two things here.

In terms of the imaginal piece, it's something we enter into consciously. We enter into an imaginal relationship with things where it's not so based on conventional truth. But that's a conscious moving in and out of something. To always live with one imaginal perspective on something—that's a fixation. It's become delusion, it's become something that's contracted around.

So it might be that we feel into our life and there are certain situations or facts or contingencies of existence where we can find an imaginal dimension of our relationship to them. And there are others where there's something about truth that needs responding to. We're not adopting one or the other; we're adopting both. And as always, the skill is discerning when. When do we move? What's possible here?

But I would also add this: it's not that the truth of climate change isn't real. It's real. But both your responses to it and how the self imagines itself, fantasizes itself, in response to climate change—that's where the imaginal comes in.

Consider these possibilities: the world burns around the still meditator. For some people, that fantasy of imperturbability and transcendence has appeal, though it obviously has problems. Or there's the fantasy of the engaged activist who lets his rage and forthrightness flow, who is willing to be perturbed and involved and get dirty.

Here's the fact of climate change. Around that fact swirl all kinds of fantasies and ways of imagining ourselves in relationship to it. There's room for both the reality and our imaginal relationship to it.

Part of the question involves soul resonance and the fantasy of integrity. This came up in the other group yesterday, actually. For me, integrity and purity are really something that lives in my soul. It's something I deeply resonate with. So there's a fantasy level to everything, if you like, that's not the same as just not dealing with reality.

It's more that there's a phenomenon, and it can be seen in different ways. The self, in relationship to it, sees it, images it, fantasizes it differently. Do you understand? Does that make sense?

So there are all kinds of fantasy already involved. You have a resonance with purity, integrity, ethics, ethical questioning. They're alive for you intellectually, morally, actively, but also fantastically. It's like allowing that dimension—just to recognize that that dimension exists in all of that.

This also relates to emptiness. What does it mean to say something is empty? So climate change is empty. I need to respond to it. Not "climate change is empty, therefore, who cares?" If that's a response, I haven't understood emptiness.

So there are two ways of seeing all this. One is as image, and one is in terms of the emptiness of things. And they can come together very much, but there's always with the emptiness path—which is a lot of what you're working on recently—it's like it's the middle way between existing and not existing, and we're always just tipping one way or the other.

So it's not that emptiness is right when there's this sense of not reifying, not contracting something, and not the self contracting in response to it, but still a response—and still a response of care and compassion and embodiment. And that's the middle way.

Can you say what the problem of connection is?

I mean, that's what I was going to say for Catherine as well, about that kind of being very removed by the mantra. But then it's like, no, you can't have that. Why? Because of a kind of Christian part with a sense of truth. You can't have it. So "I can't have it because it's not true."

Okay, so this is really crucial, and someone else wrote a note today. This, I think, is the hardest thing for some people. "If it's not true, I don't value it." Some people don't struggle with that, interestingly, but many people will.

So this is why I keep saying there's such a radical basis—at least in the way that Catherine and I would like to present these teachings—which is not on a realist basis. And that's really rare. It's rare for someone to really be able to hold that perspective. It's extremely rare in teachings anyway. But for a practitioner to actually be able to hold that basis, that way of looking at things—because we tend to go, either it exists or it doesn't. And if it doesn't, not worth it.

Some people don't have such a problem with that because they're more able to enter into a poetic or artistic mode of sensibility and of relationship with things in life. And it might have been in that talk that you listened to the other day—how much art can move us? We know it's not real. And so what's going on there? It touches so deeply and stirs so deeply and stirs us to movement so deeply sometimes. And sometimes ethical action, nothing is real there.

So there's a way into all this, in this balance between true and not true, real—just through the artistic relationship with things, the poetic relationship with everything, actually, with life. So life becomes art, life becomes poetry, more and more, or in places.

A second possibility is the whole emptiness thing, which you're working on, but it takes a while for that to go really deep so that this "either existing or doesn't exist" is really understood and it really becomes a place that's, a perspective that's alive and kind of unshakable and real.

So one answer would simply be more emptiness practice. And I'm not saying this glibly, because I realize how rare it is to actually hold that perspective. What you hear frequently, whether in Dharma or other teachings, is "Yes, yes, yes, it's all empty," followed immediately by speaking as if everything is real, or as if this or that particular thing is real. It's almost like we forget the emptiness, so we're simply paying lip service to this middle way understanding. We're quite interested in placing it right at the foundation, while also recognizing that this is challenging.

Some people can naturally place it there—some coming from philosophy, modern Western philosophy; some from emptiness practice; some from the artistic perspective. Usually wrapped within the question you're asking is the assumption that something is real.

This business of "it's not true"—I can say, "Yes, yes, I understand, everything's empty, therefore I can't trust that, therefore this divine connection is rubbish, it's not trustworthy, it's not real. I can't let it have its power because it's not real." The same applies to meaningfulness. So much in our lives these days, people say, "Well, life has no meaning, the cosmos has no meaning, your life has no meaning. You're free to create meaning, but ultimately, it's just made up."

Underneath this creation of personal meaning and meaningfulness lies a vague belief that the actual truth is meaninglessness—a kind of nihilism. Again, in this stance, I can't believe in anything because I believe something else is real. It's interesting—what then do I actually think is real? It remains almost subliminal. As long as there's something I consider real, everything non-real becomes lesser in relationship to it.

Once you reach the point where everything is not real—everything, everything, everything—then it might still be hiding there, this belief in some kind of reality. If the reality is meaninglessness, or matter, or whatever it is, once all of that dissolves, then everything becomes free. Not into nihilism, not into meaninglessness, but into what I would call the possibilities of divinity, the possibilities of re-enchantment, without any sense of "less than."

In the end, when we speak of emptiness, all we have are ways of looking. That's what it's revealing. There's nothing but ways of looking. There isn't a reality where I can look at it this way or that way, but it really is a certain thing, whatever that might be. There's no certain thing—only ways of looking. And the ways of looking are empty too.

Once you realize there's nothing but ways of looking, this frees up everything and liberates it from the duality of real versus not real, better than versus not better than, valuable versus not valuable, higher versus lower.

How to proceed? Continue as you are—you're doing the practice. You're working extensively with emptiness practice, which is exactly right. It's somewhat like we discussed in our interview the other day. There are certain places where the tendency arises to believe this or that is real, and certain things you can see are not real. What happens as one goes deeper into emptiness practice is that this range expands—both the range of what we genuinely know is empty and fabricated, and our conviction in this understanding.

At some point, it becomes simply: I just know it. As you mentioned the other day, when the gun is against the head, actually, no—I know this is empty. Life, death, all of it. So there's this expansion of both range and conviction that develops.

None of this, for me, takes away from the beauty of the heart's and soul's resonance with integrity, with truthfulness, with dedication, with honesty. If it does, something is wrong—something is out of balance with the understanding of emptiness or the way I'm holding all this. That becomes our measuring stick.

again, indicator or compass or barometer—if I lose the care, if I lose the passion, then something's off in the way I'm understanding emptiness. Something needs more, deeper and more complete understanding or filling out. Yeah?

Okay. There's also a question about how to tell when something is genuinely soul-making. It can be almost like a false friend or a near enemy, because I want to let myself off the hook—I don't want to deal with suffering.

So on Tuesday night I went to see Chris Rock, and the beauty of people like great comedians. I was thinking about divine comedy. But then I thought, where is my compassion for these trade unionists who have told me all these stories? In this moment, my ability to connect to that suffering is diminished. I wondered, is this really soul-making?

Before I answer that, let me just clarify—there was no connection between the comedy show and the sweatshop work. The sweatshop came first and I felt completely compelled and called to action, to participate. And then when I went home...

What I would say about that really is I would draw attention to the plurality of our souls. In other words, both are soul-making. But oftentimes we have, if you like, divinities within us, or archetypes within us, that don't exist at the same time. They move between each other, or they battle each other even—they're contradictory. At times they don't gel, but other times they might gel. So there might be some way where divine comedy and ethical action come together.

But what I really want to emphasize more is not just the multi-dimensionality but the plurality of archetypal characters, of soul voices and directions within each of us. Do you understand? Some people have more of them, or they emerge in different periods of life, but both of those might be soul-making.

Now, they feel different, okay? Both of them involve, will activate, the energy body and the heart and the resonances and the meaningfulness and the sense of dimensionality—all of that. All these are characteristics of soul-making. How do I navigate with all of that? Not any one of them, but all of them.

And it comes alive imaginatively. So even just "divine comedy" is already an imaginal term, you know. The comedians weren't using that language, were they? No, exactly. It's your imaginal filling out. It's come alive as soul. Through that, there's a vague ideation there that's part of the image, you understand? The same thing with the sweatshop and the ethical action. Back to Andy's question, it's like the self is imaged and fantasized in relation to this. The heart is involved, the energy body is involved, the vision of what's going on. So they're both imaginatively alive.

Even if you were a full-time sweatshop activist, heavens, you'd need some time just turning that off and turning on the comedy. That's just practical—like taking care of resources. So be careful of monistic thinking, or single-tracked thinking. You're multiple, you're complex. Soul is multiple, complex, alive in different ways. And they don't always seem like they would fit together, but they are.

So hold the differing possibilities and trust that you'll retain openness to other suffering. I mean, you'll get the feeling. See, if I'm facing a suffering and actually I don't want to deal with it because it's too painful for me, and I turn on the TV—ah yeah, great, where's the popcorn, the chocolate, the beer?

What am I doing? I'm numbing out. It won't feel soul-making to me. But if the thing is soul-making, it's something you enter into, you come back to. That one's not going to die because I enjoy a bit of divine comedy.

So it's like you can trust that things have this ebb and flow. They come, they knock on your door. You know, the characters of the soul knock on your door and they demand something of you. Sometimes it's like right now. Sometimes it needs action in the life. Sometimes it's a more internal reverence that needs to happen. And sometimes it's just—these are threads that come, surfacing and going back down again, surfacing. This soul creature is coming up. It will come up again. Do you understand?

So I don't think it doesn't sound like there's any contradiction there, to me. It's more thinking about the richness of the soul, you know, and the multiplicity of it.

Yeah? It's clear. Okay, good. Please proceed.

I quite like the fact that you've put all this in the book, Catherine. So I've been kind of working with three images, and for me it links into what the person before me was just saying. It brings up a different quality of the divinity, which I'm kind of viewing through the diamond approach—the idea of different facets of light, word, body, nature. And I don't know whether I'm making up my own version of the five things that we talked about after lunch.

The way that I'm trying to do this—the image comes in and I sense the impact on my energy body. What I want to do is to bring that part into my consciousness more. And so I'm kind of stuck between—if I do the first one on your list, which can lead to samadhi, then it doesn't sound like that would just bring up a sense of well-being as opposed to the specific quality of the divinity. I don't really understand the cosmopoiesis in this way, but it seems like I'm straddling the two.

Because what I'm wanting is that quality of the divine. And I guess I'm a bit unsure how to proceed because my ultimate intention is to be able to touch those qualities of Buddha nature to then hold my pain and suffering. Because it seems like they're antidotes to the different qualities that are coming through. Some are about strength, so that helps me when I want to collapse. Others are about love, which helps me when I'm pushing away from stuff. So I'm really noticing there are different qualities which are antidotes to different emotions. But I don't know how—and where does the cosmopoiesis come in? How does that—well, I don't really get the cosmopoiesis if I'm honest, but for me it feels like that's where the divinity aspect is.

But these are big questions. So you know, a lot of this—I might say one or two things. We could speak a lot in response to this.

So just to start where you ended, actually, for me, the divinity is involved in the definition of the imaginal. Okay, so it's not particular to cosmopoiesis. It's like when we say imaginal, or when I say imaginal, when Catherine and I say imaginal, we already mean an implicit divinity there.

So I can use the imagination and imagine my friend or imagine kindness or all kinds of things, but there's no sense of divinity there. It's just my imagination. But when we use the word imaginal, one of the things that it implies is a divinity.

Now that's in a way related to the rest of your question, Chrissie. So I don't think there's any right and wrong here. I mean, obviously there's probably limits, but generally speaking in terms of how people relate to all this.

So one way of using and conceiving of images and image work is, as you said, actually translating images to aspects of being or whatever in a kind of running language. But then what's happening is I'm making the image subordinate to something else. The image is subordinate in two senses. The image is subordinate to something called being that has a kind of—actually almost monotheistic quality. It's one thing of which there are different aspects, and those different aspects might manifest as this or that image. And secondly, I'm using the image to serve my growth, as you said.

Fantastic, beautiful, absolutely wonderful.

There is another option, both in conception and approach, that has to do with saying image is primary. It's not just a manifestation of this or that aspect of being. It is in itself primary. It's not something I can say, "That image represents my compassion, that image represents my power." The relationship with the image is more that I am serving the image. The image is not serving me or even my growth.

Now, that's one option. There's a spectrum here. It's not black or white. So when we relate to image and imagination, you can kind of decide: how am I conceiving this and how am I relating to it? They're both good, but they'll be different. Does this make sense so far?

If we relate the first way—in terms of images as aspects of being that I'm using to develop my compassion, develop these qualities—then that's absolutely beautiful and fine. It will be different. But if you're doing that, then to the nuts and bolts of your question: let's say there's an image of love or an image of power, either one. Just being with that image, my being comes into harmony with that. Part of the harmonization, and through the harmonization, I start... my being resonates with that. It vibrates in sympathy and I am gathering those qualities. They come into the fabric of my being and they get stronger in me. That's what you're talking about.

Now, exactly where I lean: sometimes I can stay with the image and feel those resonances and feel a degree of well-being and harmony, and they're all kind of mixed, and just trust that the harmonization and the gathering of those qualities is happening through that. Other times I can lean more into the samādhi, but the samādhi has a lot of that quality in it. So the character of the samādhi is well-being, but it also feels powerful, for instance. I'm gathering that quality. Or there's the samādhi there, the well-being, but it feels soft and compassionate. I'm gathering that quality.

So it's kind of like: how much do we keep the image around and how much do we let it fade just into the felt sense of the quality? The image can still be there and I'm still resonating with the quality, or I can let the image fade and go completely into the quality. It'll work both ways. Does all this make sense?

So there's that way of working. It's absolutely beautiful and it's working for you. It's absolutely working.

As I said, there's a spectrum of how we conceive of what the word "imaginal" means and how we relate to it and what the relationship of the self and the path with the imaginal is. Each person has to decide at what point in their life they're aware on that spectrum. It's not right or wrong, but they will be different. Does that make sense?

So to me it sounds like... And then the cosmopoiesis, just to clarify, is when an image comes alive—it could be any, let's say, Tārā. The image comes alive, there's all that resonance, there's the energy body, there's the soulfulness, there's the qualities there. And somehow in lingering with that image and tasting all that and letting it resonate, then I open my eyes, open my ears. I feel that the image quality spreads to the world, to the cosmos. It's almost as if that quality of Tārā is somehow everywhere. But it's a very particular quality. It's Tārā as I've just seen and sensed her. So that's what the cosmopoiesis means. It means it's spreading out of the particular of the image.

But just again to say, for you this sounds so wonderful. It's working brilliantly. Go for it. And also be aware that there are...

other ways of relating to the whole imaginal thing, which may or may not interest you at a certain point. But probably on this retreat, we're emphasizing more this approach, so it might sound a bit different. But absolutely fantastic—go for it.

Yes, it feels like I've had it the other way around.

Exactly. But I really want to say there's no right and wrong here. It's like, what's needed right now? Maybe it was really, really important that you had it that way before. So I want to say trust that. Let's see, because what you're describing is wonderful. It's absolutely wonderful.

Good. Should we end now? Is there something else?

How am I? I'm very well. I'm a little tired, but I'm better than I've been in quite a while. Thank you.

So let's just have a bit of quiet together.

CHAPTER 41

Hearing All Sounds as Mantra: A Jewel-like World

Rob Burbea · 57 min

> In this experiential dharma talk, Rob Burbea offers a guided meditation exploring the practice of hearing all sounds as mantra - divine speech that pervades the cosmos. Using the traditional mantra Om Mani Padme Hum of Avalokiteshvara, the bodhisattva of compassion, he guides practitioners through an exercise in cosmopoiesis - the creative transformation of how we perceive and sense the world around us.
>
> Burbea begins by clarifying five interconnected meditative directions: samadhi (cultivating well-being in the energy body), emotional awareness, working with imaginal images, cosmopoiesis (sensing the world as divine), and sensitivity to the energy body. He emphasizes these as overlapping intentions rather than separate practices, encouraging practitioners to be clear about what they're emphasizing moment to moment.
>
> The guided meditation moves from chanting the mantra aloud to internal repetition, then expands to hearing all sounds - including coughing, planes overhead, and everyday noises - as divine speech. Burbea introduces the poetic image of all phenomena as jewels pervading the cosmos, divine creative elements woven into reality's fabric. The practice extends beyond sound to all sensory experience, cultivating what he calls 'creative receptivity' - a way of sensing existence that re-enchants our ordinary world. This approach demonstrates how traditional mantras can serve not just for devotion or concentration, but as gateways to transformed perception of the sacred nature of all experience.

So in a few minutes, we'd like to do a bit of an experiment—a guided meditation. But I think it's worth taking a few minutes to recap what we've been doing in terms of meditation and instructions. There's a lot we're putting out, and it's hard to discern between things or navigate or understand how it all fits together. So very briefly to recap—some of you might want to write this down because it will help you keep it clear.

You could say that there are five directions we've offered so far as meditative directions or intentions. I'm using those words deliberately—they're intentions and directions. Partly why I'm saying that is because all five are actually interrelated. They overlap; they will occur at the same time. There'll be mixtures in the moment in practice. Sometimes two of them are happening, or five of them are happening. But to help us get clear, you can think of them as: what's my actual intention here? What am I trying to do right now in practice? Where am I gently encouraging the practice to move towards? What am I emphasizing right now?

They overlap, they're interconnected, they feed each other. So we're thinking about five different directions, but they're not really different.

The first is samādhi, by which I mean tending to, caring for, gently encouraging a sense of well-being in the energy field, in the feeling of the space that my body occupies and the mind occupying that space—enjoying that well-being, whether it's intense or whether it's really quite unremarkable. Some sense of harmony, of well-being there. The intention of samādhi is not so much whether that's happening or not, or how good it feels, but more that's what I'm gently working on. I'm tending to that. I'm encouraging it. That makes it, at that time, a samādhi practice.

It might actually feel quite difficult at times, but that's still my intention. I'm working with the difficulty to smooth out the difficulties or the wonkiness in the system. But my intention is—it's not so much what's happening, it's what's my intention with what's happening. Gently nourishing, shaping the feeling of the energy body towards more well-being. We could call that samādhi.

The second is a caring for and an attention to the emotional life and the emotional unfolding in the moment, again via the energy body. Sometimes it's working with the difficult: here's this heartache, here's this grief, here's this anger, here's this contraction. Sometimes it's just a much subtler emotional state like boredom or something subtler like that. So it includes working with the difficult. It might also include working with the lovely and opening to that, being with that, watching that in the energy body. Or perhaps something that's really quite neutral. But my focus and my intention is to be with, to watch, to care for, to hold, to be sensitive to what's happening emotionally.

As Catherine was talking about this morning, there's all kinds of skill involved—a lot of what you know from your other retreats and mindfulness practice and insight meditation you can bring to bear. And in the talks that we asked you to listen to before the retreat, there are many skillful ways of working with the emotions.

The third is the imaginal. This could be a spontaneous image that arises—you're sitting in meditation and something arises, and it feels like, oh, this is interesting, this is helpful, it feels resonating in my soul, and you go with that spontaneous image. It could also be a deliberately invoked image, something that has been meaningful and helpful to you in the past. Maybe the past is just the last sitting—it came for the first time an hour ago; fine, bring it up again if it feels helpful.

So there's the deliberate invoking, calling to mind, calling into presence and into relationship with an imaginal image. It doesn't have to be only the imaginal figure of love that we did on the first day. It can be anything, as long as it feels soul-making—it touches my soul. It doesn't have to be love. It doesn't have to be a certain kind of love. Love comes in a lot of different flavors.

But it can be spontaneous or deliberate with the imaginal.

The fourth way is what we've been calling Cosmopoiesis. Here the senses open to the world around us and to others around us. We're seeing—again, either spontaneously or deliberately—seeing others, seeing the earth, seeing the cosmos, sensing it other than we usually do, sensing it as divine in some way. On this retreat particularly, a divine that involves the imaginal. We'll say more about this.

Here there's an opening. We talked about opening the eyes, opening the senses. It's not so much just an imaginal figure inside, so to speak. We're actually sensing life through image, sensing the cosmos through image. This is cosmopoiesis—it's creative.

The fifth approach is really just to say energy body again—that all of this is to be done, as much as possible, with sensitivity to the energy body. And what do we mean by energy body? We mean a whole range. It's simply how this feels. It can be very solid—we're really talking about a sense of earthiness and solidity. That's just one range on the possible frequencies of how the energy body can be experienced. Or it can be very ethereal, very light and luminous and translucent and spacious. It's all just the range of the energy body.

Within working with the energy body, we talked yesterday about the possibility of actually listening to the energy body, feeling it and letting it manifest in movement or posture, allowing yourself to explore that. How do the hands want to be? What posture do I want to adopt? What movements do I want to adopt? Sometimes keeping the physical body still and just feeling the inner imaginal body—the energy body—actually dancing, moving in a certain posture.

So those are the five approaches, and they all overlap. Sometimes what you'll get is an emotion that's difficult, you're working with it, and then at some point it gives birth to an image. Then you come into relationship with the image and the image affects the emotion. Maybe from the image actually comes some well-being. Everything is going to affect everything else.

What matters, I think, for clarity is just being clear what's going on, but also: what am I emphasizing right now? Because I could be working with an image—a couple of people wrote this in notes—working with an image and then out of the image a very nice feeling comes. There I have a choice. I can stay with the relationship with the image, resonating with all the soul-making, beautiful fecundity and complexity of the image, aware of it and enjoying that it feels nice. Great. Or I can almost emphasize more the well-being in the body and let the image perhaps fade or go to the background, and then I'm leaning more in a samadhi direction.

Do you understand? There's just about taking control of my glider a little bit. What currents are here? Ah, I'll ride that one. Okay, now this one.

An image can spill over into cosmopoiesis—all of this, they're all connected. It's just to be aware of what's happening and actually at some point: okay, if this is happening, do I want to shift gears or shift direction and make an intentional shift to emphasize this or that?

Good. Very good.

Let's do this experiment. We're going to start with a mantra—a mantra that probably many of you would be familiar with—the syllables om mani padme hum. It's the mantra of Avalokiteshvara, who from the Buddhist pantheon is the bodhisattva of compassion.

There are many different ways to work with mantras. Many different ways. And many different meanings associated with them. Some people when they start working with Om Mani Padme Hum ask: what does it mean? Each syllable has a kind of very specific resonance in certain tantric teachings. So Om is the opening to the universal, some people say, and Hum of the Om Mani Padme Hum is the embodiment.

We could do all that, but actually what you find is different interpretations, often completely contradictory—which is interesting, again, given what we've emphasized on this retreat.

And it reinforces the idea that all this is creative. They're just ways of looking. We can adopt and shape this however we want. But rather than be very specific about what this means or that means or what it should do, again, we would like to emphasize more of a kind of looser, more poetic, creative approach to this. So this mantra can unfold in all kinds of ways. It can have all kinds of meanings. It can be different from one person to the next.

Now some of you are familiar with this mantra and you've probably heard different melodies for it. And this relates to what I was talking about yesterday with compassion and love. So it's the mantra of compassion, and we could use a melody and sing it in a way that's full of yearning and full of the pathos and the tearful resonances with the pain of the world. That would be one flavor of orienting the thing—or a certain tenderness, a beautiful tenderness, or just a spaciousness, or a kind of healing quality. All this is possible as characteristics of compassion which can be translated musically into the melody and the way that it's sung.

Partly why this is an experiment is what I want to get at today is, funny enough, not so much emphasizing the obvious aspect of compassion. I want to use the mantra, see if it's possible to use the mantra to open some kind of cosmopoiesis for us. So the interest is more in the transformation of the sense of the world, of the sense of what the world is, than so much in invoking compassion. But again, overlapped, overlapped. And it's all subjective as to what musical character gives rise to what. So let's just do this and see what happens.

If you want to come into a meditative posture that feels comfortable... Catherine and I will chant a little bit till you get the melody, and then join in. But let's come into your posture first and, as always, settle into the posture.

Is it possible to let the center of the awareness be in the heart center rather than the head center or anywhere else? So that the center of your awareness is in the middle of the chest, in the heart. Just letting the awareness be centered there and move outward to the whole energy body, the whole space. From that center... sitting in the heart, in the energy body, open, opening that space, filling it with awareness.

So there is, although we're not emphasizing it so much, there is compassion being intended and radiated through this chanting. So let that be part of it, that there's blessings coming forth from your heart. There's at least the intention for compassion, for care, for love, for healing and tenderness to yourself, to all beings, and actually to the whole world. Part of what's happening here is there's this radiating out of that. It doesn't mean you feel it all the time. It just means that that's the intention. That's included in the intention.

So Catherine will start the chant and we'll join in. And then when you feel like you kind of get the melody, please join in. Let yourself sing it, but connect it to the energy body. And then I will guide us as we go.

[Chanting begins: Om Mani Padme Hum...]

As you keep chanting, see if you can feel your throat and your chest open... And listen, listen as well...

So the chanting, the air, and the intention open you up. Let it open up the whole energy body. Just radiating to expand the energy body and fill out, radiate out from the energy body.

The intention, the sound comes from the whole of you pouring outwards in all directions. Opening, trusting the goodness of your intention.

Letting it take form, take embodiment through sound.
Om Mani Padme Hum.
Through the expressions of your body.
Om Mani Padme Hum.

Om Mani Padme Hum Li Om Mani Padme Hum Li Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum Hri Om Mani Padme Hum Hri

OM MANI PADME HUM

Now Catherine will continue the chant and you fall silent, but listen—listen. Let it echo in your being. The resonances of sound and of soul and of love. Of beauty, of sacredness.

OM MANI PADME HUM OM MANI PADME HUM

In chanting we are enchanting, enchanting. A spell, an invocation, magic.

Om Mani Padme Hum Om Mani Padme Hum Om Mani Padme Hum

In a way, the mantra, the sounds, are actually echoing something that is already present, something woven into the cosmos, part of the fabric of the cosmos. These sounds that are more than sounds—mantra, divine speech. In the incantation, in the chanting, we're joining in, we're adding to something that's already here, already everywhere. The dimension of the cosmos.

Om Nipani

Just very loosely, lightly, without pressure in the opening. You get a sense—the syllables, each syllable is a jewel. These jewels, infinite jewels spread throughout the cosmos. Everywhere already existing, this divine speech. Jewels that are creative elements, cosmic powers, part of the magical fabric of things. They are prayer, these jewels woven in. Woven into the fabric of things is prayer, blessing, praise. Jewels of many colors, beauty, holiness. Divinity.

And now, let it go silent for a bit. Can you have that mantra internally? Very lightly, very spaciously, very delicately. But it's still this more cosmic sense. It's the echoes in your mind, the roots of which are divine. The roots of your mind, of your consciousness, echoing, resonating with the mantra that is everywhere.

Maybe it's the whole melody, maybe just very faint echoes, filaments. Maybe it gets fainter. But the sense of the jewels, the mantra as jewels—that can stay. Just open, open.

So maybe it has the internal mantra, maybe very faintly, maybe it's faded. But these jewels of the imaginal realm that pervade the cosmos, the beauty of that everywhere—within, without, all around.

Om Mani Padme Hum Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Om Mani Padme

Actually, can we hear all sounds as mantra, all sounds as divine speech? So it's in Catherine's voice, it's in my voice. It's in the coughing and the sneezing and the shuffling. It's in the birdsong, it's in the wind. Open, hearing all sounds as mantra.

Through these jewels, the divine is blessing all of creation. Creation is not other than the divine. The divine is blessing itself. Blessing its blessing. So no need to get tight—we're opening to something, we're opening to a poetic, artistic possibility. Very delicate.

And maybe you get a sense—not just sounds, but everything. Body sensations, sights. All things are these jewels. All things, all appearances, all phenomena, all experiences—divine speech, beautiful jewels.

And again, if we just go into silence for a bit. It's not so much about sound, inner sound or outer sound. Perhaps that fades, even the echoes in the mind fade. But this more pervasive sense in all the senses, something more subtle, more magical—a cosmopoiesis.

This encompassing awareness—involving and including all of the senses—is actually what we're tuning into. This is, if you like, the object, so to speak, of the meditation. It's not necessarily in one place spatially; it's everywhere. No need to push anything, just gently opening and encouraging something subtle.

When you're ready, still in this awareness—if you can keep this awareness—and when you're ready, open your eyes and let it come into the sight as well, just a little bit. All things: sights, sounds, the plane overhead, the bird outside.

Now we could try one more thing. See if we can transition to standing up and putting the mats to the side of the room, but seeing if you can do that with awareness of the energy body. Just paying attention to the energy body in the transition of the movement. We're going to do one last thing with this chant. Just see, without pressure, if you can feel the body space as you're moving. So there's the mindfulness there of the body.

And then let's sort of homogeneously fill the room.

Again, in the standing posture, just connecting with the energy body. Letting that space a bit bigger than you, filling it out with awareness. But again, seeing if you can let that awareness center in the heart center, in the middle of the chest. And allowing and including what's moving through emotionally right now, whatever that is. It has a place. It's welcome.

So aware of the heart, aware of the space of the energy body, aware too of the sensations with the feet. But you're in that energy body space. You're filling that with awareness.

Catherine will start chanting again, and the same cosmopoiesis, the same encouragement to that art, that poetry.

Om Mani Padme Hum

So there's openness in the listening, receptivity. There's also poetry. It's a creative listening, creatively allowing the ripples, the radiation. Creative sensing of yourself, of the world around you. Creative receptivity.

Let the eyes open if they're not already. Stay connected to your heart, to your soul, to the energy body, the resonances. Opening the senses.

Now is it possible to walk slowly around the room, walking between each other, keeping this sensibility, this openness, this creative receptivity? It doesn't have to be super slow, but whatever feels like it works for you. You don't have to make eye contact, but you can if you want. But open to these beings around you here in this room.

Who are these beings? What are these bodies? Are they not also jewels? Is not each one a thousand jewels? Sensitive to the energy body, sensitive to the heart, the soul, but open. The senses open. Open to the mysterious depths of otherness. The divinity of these bodies, of these beings.

Om Mani Padme Hum.

And then just wherever you are, coming to stillness.

Om Mani Padme Hum.

Open to your experience, allowing the fullness of whatever's here—energy, soul resonances, heart resonances.

Om Mani Padme Hum.

And then just dwelling together in the silence with that awareness. Eyes might be open or closed if you prefer right now.

There's a mandala here. Maybe as we were moving it was a fluid mandala.

As we settled back into sitting posture, maintaining that same awareness of the energy body, I noticed how these transition times become fascinating opportunities for staying connected. In what we had just experienced together, I could sense countless possibilities opening—so many different ways this practice might unfold for each person.

This movement we're exploring, what we're calling cosmopoiesis, has a particular direction. It moves outward, always toward inclusion. Eventually, everything is embraced—nothing excluded. When we speak of hearing all sounds as mantra, we're not being selective. All sounds means truly all sounds: the sounds that aren't conventionally beautiful, the sounds of tears, even the sounds of pain and dukkha. As we explored last night, this is about re-enchanting even our suffering. The sound of an airplane overhead, the less-than-melodious urban cacophony—the movement of cosmopoiesis reaches toward everything, embracing all phenomena.

This practice is wonderfully creative and flexible. You might enter through various doorways. We began with actively chanting the mantra, but you could just as easily start with pure listening. Remember my story about the birdsong becoming imaginal birdsong through deep connection? Rather than beginning with vocalized mantra, you simply listen with complete openness, allowing sounds to become imbued with imaginal significance until cosmopoiesis naturally arises.

You might set an intention to hear all sounds as divine speech without any specific mantra at all. Or perhaps you're simply listening with radical openness, and through this very openness, something transforms in the hearing itself—in the art of perception, the poetry of perception.

Sometimes we can deliberately recall a cosmopoiesis—a particular way of sensing existence that we've experienced before. Just as we discussed earlier about intentionally recalling an image, you can bring back a remembered way of perceiving the cosmos, not forcing it but gently re-engaging with what has already unfolded naturally.

But ultimately, this practice expands beyond sound to encompass everything—all appearances, all phenomena, all experiences across all senses.

Let me say something about the miracle of speech itself. Right now, as I speak and you listen, we're witnessing something extraordinary. I have an idea, and through this complex orchestra of muscles, larynx, tongue, and breath, I vibrate the air. These vibrations enter your ears, and somehow you understand what I'm attempting to convey. Communication happens between two beings—how remarkable is this?

Consider the subtlety involved—emotion, nuance, even humor. A joke is particularly amazing: some quality of humor somehow crosses the space between us, and we find ourselves laughing together at the same thing. It's truly miraculous.

Speech carries both the miracle of semantic communication—what I'm trying to convey, what you're receiving, our mutual understanding—and the pure phenomenon of sound itself. Even as you're understanding my meaning, you can simultaneously hear this very speaking as divine speech, as mantra, experiencing the sacred in the music of sound rather than just the content.

There's the meaning level and the music level, and the divine permeates both. Can you hear just the sounds of this voice right now? It's the babble of the divine, the spell and magic of divine speech residing not in meaning but in pure sound. While one part of you receives and understands the words, another part can cosmopoetically hear the sound of this human voice—or birdsong, or any sound—in an entirely different way.

This operates on a different level altogether. It's easier with conventionally pleasant sounds, but remember: this sense of the divine isn't about pleasantness or aesthetic beauty. We're not talking about pretty sensations. We're touching something deeper—another level of experience we can cultivate awareness of.

In a way, it doesn't really matter. Again, this emphasis on playing, experimenting, finding what works for you. In a way, what Catherine and I are doing is simply putting out different ideas, different possibilities. Maybe you take them as they are. Maybe you alter them with your own creative variations. Maybe it's something completely different that emerges.

Play, discover, experiment. Find your own way. There's no formula here in terms of specifics, as we said before. The invitation is to discover what resonates, what opens doorways for you into this quality of divine listening, of receiving the world with sacred attention.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 42

Creating the Path (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 43 min

> In this engaging Q&A session from the 'Re-enchanting the Cosmos' retreat, Rob Burbea explores profound questions about imaginal practice and perception. He addresses how different forms convey divine qualities more readily than others, discussing the spectrum between realist metaphysics of deity figures and the creative fabrication of divine perception through the mind's imaginative capacity.
>
> Burbea introduces the concept of cosmopoiesis - how imaginal perception can transform our experience of the entire cosmos, moving beyond simple oneness experiences to perceiving the world as transubstantiated through particular divine qualities. He explores the role of eros and otherness in imaginal work, explaining how erotic connection (not merely sexual) with imaginal figures may facilitate the spillover from personal practice into cosmic perception.
>
> The discussion touches on integrating sexuality and other traditionally excluded aspects into sacred practice, emphasizing discernment through body awareness and soul resonance. Burbea concludes with reflections on choosing authentic spiritual paths, noting that while classical Dharma emphasizes freedom from suffering, some souls may be more fundamentally drawn to beauty, sacredness, or artistic expression. He encourages practitioners to discover what they truly want beneath cultural conditioning, while remaining aware of each path's particular dangers and cultivating the maturity to navigate them skillfully.

Anyone, please. Yes?

Rob, I have two questions. One you spoke about briefly in yesterday evening's talk, and I was wondering whether you could say a little more. I've been wondering about seeing the divine in different forms or shapes. Seeing Tara in an apple tree is somehow easier, and I think it makes a difference whether I meditate on Tara or Mickey Mouse—it might make a difference. What is it in the forms that makes them more transmitting or conveying?

The Mickey Mouse retreat is the next one—more advanced! This is really a good question. You're going to get different answers from different people, and this is one of those areas where I have a certain philosophical leaning, but you'll hear very different things.

On one extreme, you'll hear a kind of realism given to these deity figures. Tara is this, and she really has these particular qualities, and even she looks like this. As I think I said in one talk, what's really happening there is these things exist in an imaginal realm which has some kind of objective existence, but which has been dismissed from Western culture for centuries. Actually, it does exist in this realm. What you're doing then, if your perception is pure, is resonating with or perceiving those qualities, and they have power—they have divine power. So that's one version. To me, there's a lot of beauty in that.

I find that I can't—like I think I said at some point—I find it hard now, where I am in my whole practice and everything, to take any kind of realist metaphysics seriously, whether it's a materialist one or some other kind. So my tendency is more to say your perception, your way of looking, your mind is in a way creating that divine with certain characteristics. And that's what comes through. For different reasons, because of the cultural associations with Mickey Mouse, it's harder to do that.

So there are two different extremes. But there's also a bridge between these two, which I think I might mention at some point. If the roots of your mind, your consciousness, your citta, your soul, imagination are divine, then what comes out of your creativity of perception is also divine. So there's not "it exists over there separate from me" or "it's just my any old perception." Do you see what the bridge is?

It's saying, in a way, the imaginal realm is not separate from your mind. The roots of the imaginal realm and the roots of your mind have the same roots in the depths of the divine. So your mind and the fabrications of your mind can also be divine. You say, well, it somehow seems more or less divine at different times. Maybe that's true. Maybe it has to do partly with what's present in the citta at a certain time—the purity or the devotion or whatever, as we've talked about, the openness of heart. And partly it's what your mind colors creatively.

Do you see how that might bridge those two? Does this make any sense at all?

Well, they do, but this is also—if you know about art theory and literary theory—most people would not nowadays, or for quite a while now, accept the idea that beauty inherently resides in the art. One of the big chunks we edited out of the talk on art perception was about the dependent arising of art. My reaction, my being moved by art, depends on something in the work, something in me at that moment. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony moves me to tears one day, and the other day it's like... you know. So there's something in the present moment. There's also something in the culture. There's something about Beethoven and the image and what he might have said about it and what someone else might have said and some other authority in the general culture. All this feeds in to give a dependent arising of what arises.

To say there's nothing in the art, in the art object, would also be too extreme to me.

Why are you asking? What's with the question?

Why don't I see it in certain things, in certain options?

Okay, so seeing Tara in a piece of litter is possible. It's just a matter of practice, actually. I was practicing this. It's harder for me with plane sounds overhead—the plane sounds. Not because they were particularly ugly sounds. I just couldn't help thinking about the carbon dioxide.

Everything else was beautiful—this particular divinity, this particular character of the divine—and yet it wasn't stretching to include that airplane sound. But then I would experiment further. Was this dependent on pleasant or unpleasant experiences?

Walking outside, if it was too cold, then it became harder to sustain this perception. But this is all just practice. And then you can play with this.

So you have that sense—you're meditating, in this case, on Tara. Then you open your eyes and look around you in your room or wherever you are. At first you might notice that it's easier with a beautiful artifact or whatever catches your eye. Then I look at some plastic object and it's harder. But really, in time, with practice, this perception can extend everywhere.

"I just think there is a difference between different options," someone offered.

Well, there is, and I wouldn't deny that. Absolutely there is. And it also applies ethically. People have been writing notes asking, "How can you say everything's perfect when there's terrorism?" Of course, of course. All I would say is that with practice, that ability to see different kinds of divinity spreads.

Now that doesn't mean—as Andy asked—that we don't care about climate change or we don't do everything we can to address terrorism, including examining the effects of what we do that inadvertently feeds that terrorism. But there are still different kinds of divinity that can be perceived there with practice. Yes, they're different. What exactly makes them so, I'm not sure I could say—or rather, I'd hesitate to say.

Another question arose: "I just noticed at some point, okay, now that's just sensual pleasure. Just indulging. Although I tried to somehow keep it alive, some kind of vision—I don't know if that's right. But then I backed off because I felt this is not what I want."

The question becomes: what makes something imaginal is a sense of sacredness in it. To me, that's part of how we're defining imaginal—it has some sense of divinity.

But there are several things I want to say about that. First, the divinity is not separate from the sensuality. That doesn't necessarily mean sexuality, but it's embedded in—it's not something separate from—the appearance or the sensuality or the sensual connection with that being or experience.

Second, the divinity can have an enormous range. We tend to think that sexuality has to be of a particular kind—maybe something all about merging in some white, lovey-dovey, blissful way. But there are other kinds of sexuality, and one can discover different styles of divinity within those expressions as well.

However, if it feels like you're practicing and what's actually happening is there are contractions, or something closing down, or something shutting off from the divine, then leave it.

This is difficult territory because for most people in our tradition, this is a stretch. We tend to either ignore sexuality or simply notice it and breathe with it. It's not really included much in our contemplative framework.

What we're interested in doing—one way of summarizing how we conceive this retreat—is expanding the sense of the sacred. Why is it only here and not there? Why is this included and not that? And this includes, as has come up in previous Q&As, things that traditional Buddhism would call kilesas—defilements, impurities, and so forth.

In other kinds of Buddhism, this understanding is expanded further. Now, you can simply call something sacred and actually just be involved in greed. But this is why I return again to the practice of feeling in. Feel the energy body. Feel what's happening in the soul resonance. If there's beauty there, if there's sacredness there, if there's mindfulness there—which means sensitivity to all of this, to all the emotions and the body and the energy—you can trust it.

I was talking to someone this morning about what Jesus said: "By their fruits you shall know them"—by the fruits. And the fruits you can actually feel in the moment through these practices. It's not as though something will feel really sacred and then you get up from meditation and turn into an ogre. It's not going to work that way. You can trust what you feel in the moment.

Now, I know that because sexuality is... we get confused messages in the broader culture. In Dharma culture it tends not to be so included, not so integrated. There are all kinds of personal histories we carry with this. It can be loaded for people to even think about allowing themselves to approach it. So you don't have to push anything. But if and when you feel a little bit ready, you might explore. I could say much more, but perhaps that's enough for now.

Student: I'm a little confused about the cosmopoiesis aspect. This afternoon I had some really blissful experiences—nature being in me and me in nature, almost my body coming apart and becoming part of nature. They were very beautiful experiences. I'm not sure what the cosmopoiesis is. There was a sense of prayer with it, something sacred there. I don't understand... when you say spilling over and it becoming the actual enchanting of the cosmos, I don't really understand that.

Rob: Yes, thank you. So what do we mean when we say cosmopoiesis? Let me step back and explain this in contrast to a few different things.

There's imaginal work where you have an imaginal figure, and—maybe with your eyes closed or open—you're relating to that imaginal figure and experiencing different feelings and energies in that relationship. That's imaginal practice.

But sometimes what happens is... the key that often makes the difference for an imaginal figure to spill over into affecting the perception of the world... In our culture, there's a certain accepted cosmology—this is what the world is, this is what matter is, this is where we are.

Cosmopoiesis means that through the creativity of imaginal perception, we can see the world differently. It becomes a different kind of cosmos. A world of light, or a world of fire, or a world made of music. As Yuko was saying, somehow that tree is Tara, or Tara's energy is everywhere. There are many possibilities, but the world actually is—we're perceiving the world as transubstantiated. It's a different kind of structure to the world and our perception of it, which involves sacredness and imagination and beauty.

Student: Well, what was happening this afternoon was different.

Rob: It may or may not be. I'd have to ask you more about it. If I asked you: How did the world appear different to you then? How did the trees and the garden around you appear different than they usually do? What was the difference?

Student: Well, there was a sense of connection. No division.

Rob: Yes, beautiful.

So that's what distinguishes the imaginal realm from more conventional spiritual experiences. While the sense of oneness, the dissolution of boundaries with nature that you described is profoundly beautiful and occurs naturally in sustained practice, what we're exploring here has a different quality altogether.

In most spiritual traditions, including our own insight meditation and metta practices, practitioners commonly experience various forms of unity consciousness—everything is matter, everything is awareness, everything is love. These are genuine openings, natural flowerings of contemplative practice that I deeply encourage.

What's far less common, and what we're specifically cultivating on this retreat, is when a particular character, a specific imaginal figure, suffuses the entire cosmos. As Yuka mentioned, Tara isn't merely love in the abstract—Tara possesses distinct personality, unique qualities, particular presence. The remarkable possibility we're exploring is when everything becomes permeated with that imaginal figure's essence.

I'm theorizing—and this remains somewhat theoretical for me—that what catalyzes this transformation is erotic connection. By erotic, I don't mean exclusively sexual, though that's included. I mean the magnetic attraction between characters, the alive and juicy richness that emerges when two distinct beings encounter each other without merging into undifferentiated oneness.

This otherness is crucial. When you recognize the difference, feel the connection across that difference—that's where eros awakens. The imaginal figure isn't merely a projection of your psyche, not just your childhood memory or your compassion personified. It possesses genuine otherness, autonomous existence beyond your usual self-conception.

This autonomy actually helps define what makes something truly imaginal. When I contemplate an image that proves soul-making, I notice it carries certain unmistakable dimensions: a sense of otherness, autonomous presence, layers of meaning, beauty, sacredness. Though this beauty might not conform to conventional aesthetic categories—it operates by its own mysterious logic.

And it has a sense of other-dimensionality and divinity to it. These are the qualities we notice in an image when it's truly alive for us.

When there's an erotic connection present, I wonder if that's what allows the image, when I stay with it, to spill over into the second kind of cosmopoiesis when I then open my senses more to the world. There's something very retaining of the particulars—connecting, intimate, open, fluid—but retaining the particulars rather than merging into oneness and losing my personhood and the personhood of the image. It's retained there, and that spreads in a different way.

This isn't a big deal whether it happens or not. We're simply exploring possibilities. Catherine and I were discussing last night whether it's the erotic dimension that, when present and alive, encourages this kind of cosmopoiesis. The erotic is this connection—the desire for connection—but not the kind that moves into merging and the loss of particular personhood of self or image.

I'm just talking about possibilities here. None of this has to happen.

In a way, how we're approaching things on this retreat steers more toward this direction, and not so much toward the kind of experience you had in the garden. But if those experiences happen, I say absolutely fantastic. Enjoy them. They're so wonderful and nourishing and healing in so many ways. But we're steering slightly away from that direction.

Student asks: So that experience can then lead into this one?

It might lead into it, but probably what would happen in that experience is it would stay more in the undifferentiated oneness rather than moving from there into particular connection. In terms of what you described, I doubt it would move from that to the other kind. But anything can happen—this is absolutely brilliant, and you don't have to force anything. We're partly emphasizing this certain direction because it doesn't get emphasized, and there's a whole avenue there that isn't really often talked about.

Student clarifies: The images are still there with that oneness experience, but it is different.

Yes, exactly.

A Question About Kinesthetic Experience

Student (Zazie): One way my experiences tend to differ from much of what you talk about—though still within that range—is they fit much more in the kinesthetic realm. But then sometimes I've been wondering whether I've been getting the otherness aspect, because I feel the divinity of it and I think I get a sense of it, but it's not so much a sense of self and...

A few things here. First, for everyone: image doesn't have to be visual. It sounds like you understand this. It can be primarily kinesthetic, or sometimes you can't say exactly which sense it is—just a very particular felt sense. This is really important.

Regarding otherness—before I address that, one thing I'd say is that the sense of self arises very differently and to different degrees of obviousness at any moment. What could be happening in your experience is that the familiar sense of self isn't arising, but there's still some sense of self. It could be a much more subtle sense of self—not problematically, just much more diaphanous and light, less contracted, less solid, less personality-laden.

So you could pay attention to that. In a way, I'd say there's always a sense of self until the moment when everything disappears—and that's not what you're describing because you still have texture. Within that experience, you could gently feel out and notice: what kind of sense of self is around now? Part of the image, whenever there's an image, is that the self is imaged with the image. This is something you could include in what you're exploring.

As for otherness—it's an interesting word because it doesn't necessarily mean separate from me. What we want to mean by otherness is that it has autonomy. It's not something I can regard as totally under my control or totally part of me. If I do view it that way, something collapses and I lose what I'd call the imaginal dimension. Something loses vitality and power and depth in the image.

So there's some sense of it having autonomy, having power of its own, having its own voice. It's visiting me, and yet it's also part of me. Sometimes I become it, I change places with it—all of this—but still it has a kind of beyondness to it.

Student asks: In that autonomy of otherness, is that where, if there's the sense of autonomy of our image of the self, the way that shifts—sometimes I seem to have autonomy and sometimes I...

Compare that with some versions of modern psychotherapy. It's all me. I am just creating. It's just a part of me. There's two kinds of extreme... It's an aspect of me, or I'm just imagining this.

There are two quite extreme positions. For me, there's a kind of balance here between really understanding that, of course, it's a dependent arising. Do you understand what I mean when I say that? It depends on my mind and the way of looking. I cannot go outside of that understanding, because that's total Dharma understanding. I always understand that what arises depends on my relationship with it in the moment, depends on past conditions, but really in the moment, my way of looking, my conception, my energetic relationship. So it's fabricated in the moment with the mind.

And this thing about autonomy is almost something like... at the same time as I'm holding that understanding of dependent arising, I'm entertaining the idea. I'm just being generous in my mind and granting this thing some autonomy. Believing it, entering into a lightly held view that it has autonomy. And other times it's more like I sense a certain level of autonomy. But all of those kinds of ideas are held together.

Does that make sense?

Yeah.

Does that sound too much of a stretch, or does it sound like...

No, it's not what you were talking about. It's not quite...

Okay. Try again.

I think the nature of self is that it has no inherent existence. The nature of image is that it has no inherent existence. Rather than shutting things down, what that opens up is that all of this will feel different at different times. Sometimes I feel like, "Well, this is part of me that I'm in control of." Sometimes it has more autonomy. Sometimes I'm merging. Sometimes I become that. Now I'm here and that's there.

It's like the very emptiness of it all allows this complete movement between different conceptual views but also experiences of the relationship and of what's here and what's there and who's where and all that. So that's actually part of the whole deal – there's a real fluidity. For me, there's no real formula other than these things about divinity, which are more general principles, but the actual experience of what belongs where – to me that's open and there's plenty of room for movement and it's all good to explore.

Does that... you're just being polite.

Okay, good. But we have a little time if there are more questions.

Yeah, Lawrence.

So my question is... does Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu buy into the metaphysics presented at the time of the Buddha – that rebirth and all that – in the same way?

Yeah, I just kind of have this sense... I wonder... you know, in a way, underneath the question is some fear or anxiety, right? About, you know, what will be the outcome of this? And how would you know? How would you...

So Ṭhānissaro Bhikkhu would say – I can't speak for him, obviously – but I think he would just say that he's very much in the Theravada tradition. He's staunchly Theravada, you know. But underneath your question, it's a question about what will happen. Is it, you know...

I suppose there is a personal element to it.

Yeah.

You know, there's all this soulfulness and deep meaningfulness, and it's kind of like, where do we go with this? Is it... you know, all of these divine images that want to come through us, and you talk of them having...

But that could be very soulful for him.

Sure, sure. Yeah, I think one of the key words there was "swept away."

There's a lot I could say here. I'm just aware of time, but let me share some brief thoughts and perhaps we can check in at some point.

But this notion of being swept away—I actually want to step back. I feel very strongly, and I think this is important maturity for everyone to realize: whatever path we choose—Theravada, Mahayana, this tradition, that tradition, secular mindfulness, whatever—it's going to have a danger. There is no path, there is no practice without a particular danger. If I think there is, I'm just missing something.

Some people think secular mindfulness is really safe. Well, it may not drive you crazy, but it'll do something else. Or rather, the danger in it is something else—a potential danger. Every path has a potential danger. Part of maturity in practice is knowing what is the potential danger with this path that I'm on.

So one of the things with purely secular mindfulness is that it's not very soulful. One of the things with Theravada Buddhism is it's cutting off the world. Its aim is actually not to be reborn. The world is not sacred—it's a place to escape from and never to come back to. The danger with this path, as you say, is one could get swept away or could over-reify these things.

Every path has its particular danger of reification—what it reifies—and then its particular effect on the soul, if you like. So that's just something to really be aware of. And if I've chosen a certain path, if a certain path attracts me, then I really need to know what are the potential pitfalls of that path.

So you put your finger on one—getting swept away—and you know that. This is why I say: sensitive to the energy body, mindful of the resonances and all that, but also seeing image as image, like we talked about the other day. That's one of the things that prevents getting swept away, as well as a whole bunch of other factors—cultivation of good qualities, awareness of one's emotions, knowing when to back off, all this stuff.

When that's all in place, then the path becomes less dangerous, because I'm aware and part of my path is a sensitivity to all that. Does this make sense? So that's part of the path. Whatever path I do, it's a maturity to know that and to be on the lookout for it.

And I can't remember if I said this to you, but this kind of thing has come up with several people—the fact that you're asking the question reassures me. It's showing that your mind is alive to the potential pitfalls, interested, curious, alert, sensitive, healthy doubting, all of that. If you weren't, and you were just gung-ho—yeah, blah, blah, blah, and I believe this, and this is the reality now, and everyone should be, you know—then I'd be concerned. So the question shows something already.

I'm moving quite quickly here because we have to end. I'll say one last thing, which I actually addressed in a talk for this retreat, but it's not part of this retreat format: you have to decide, or your soul decides or feels what it really wants.

Dharma—classical dharma—is premised on the Four Noble Truths, which originally contextualize it as an escape from the world, not being reborn again. But we could say more loosely it's about freedom and suffering less. There are some souls for whom that is not the most important thing in their life. That is not the most important thing.

Because we're surrounded by a dharma that we just, day and night, hear about freedom from suffering, release, peace, equanimity, da-da-da, sometimes what happens is a person takes on that and is almost indoctrinated a little bit to think "that's what I really want." And I would say: ask what you really want. Find out.

If that is it, go for it. And what does that mean to you? Because freedom has a whole range of meanings and depths and extents and breadths. What kind of freedom? What level of freedom are you talking about? What range of freedom are you talking about? What areas of freedom?

But it also might be that you really look inside, and it's not freedom that's... Freedom is important, but it's not the thing that's most important. For some people, sense of sacredness is more important. For some people, artistic expression is more important. For some people, it's the sense of beauty—the infinite ranges of beauty.

And in the depths of their soul, that's actually what they care about more. Is that Dharma still or not? There's a whole soul relationship with that question. How am I conceiving how I stand in relation to what the dharma is? Am I a soul that just steps right out of that? Dares to step out of it or not? Or do I create a dharma that actually incorporates... There are whole levels and dimensions to this whole thing.

But I think more important is: what do you really want? You know? Beauty and sacredness don't mean being swept away, being completely crazy. So it's not like black or white, one or the other. But there's something here really important about being truly authentic and just clearing away a lot of what we've simply been told.

Here, over and over, every book you read, every Dharma talk, it's like—great, wonderful. And how much there is to discover about freedom and the depths of freedom and the range of freedom. And either at some point, or always from the beginning, something else was actually more important or becomes more important.

So that's quite a radical question. But basically, you know, am I going to live my life in contact with what I most want, or not in contact? Authentic or inauthentic? In touch? From that root or not? You know?

There's a lot more we could explore here, but there's much in what you're bringing forward that deserves our attention.

Let's have just a minute of silence.

CHAPTER 43

From Inertia, Towards the Solutio (A Fragment)

Rob Burbea · 7 min

> In this fragment from his "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" series, Rob Burbea examines how the mind operates as a "mechanism of habit," creating inertia in our ways of thinking, perceiving, and experiencing reality. He explores how we become locked into particular patterns of seeing ourselves, others, and the world around us, often without realizing these limitations.
>
> Burbea introduces the concept of "cosmopoiesis" - different ways of sensing and creating our world through perception. He emphasizes the importance of "loosening" these habitual patterns through practices like walking meditation in sacred landscapes, moving prayerfully, and allowing the whole body-being to participate in contemplative awareness. The teacher discusses how softening our gaze, attitude, and heart can create what he calls "liquidity of perception," enabling more creative and malleable ways of seeing.
>
> This teaching offers practical guidance for expanding beyond conventional sitting meditation to include walking and standing practices that incorporate awareness of the elements and sacredness of the natural world. Burbea encourages practitioners to work with both mental and physical inertia, allowing space for new dimensions of experience to emerge naturally rather than forcing particular outcomes. The emphasis is on creating conditions for transformation through gentle encouragement and openness to what wants to be born in awareness.

As we move forward in the retreat, the encouragement is to open up a little bit more, as Catherine was saying. We began by emphasizing the energy body—be here, become really wedded to or inhabiting the energy body. This will always remain a part of the meditation, always a fundamental aspect of experience that we're endeavoring to incorporate, always maintaining sensitivity to and involving the energy body.

But now the encouragement is to open up the senses and allow, or even gently encourage and play with, this poetry of perception, this art of perception—a cosmopoiesis, or in the plural, cosmopoieses. In other words, different ways of sensing this world around us.

This obviously spills over into the other postures, especially walking outside. That's a place that offers much availability to this kind of practice—walking on the lawn, going for a walk, standing and moving as we've discussed.

One way of understanding something fundamental about human nature is recognizing that we are habitual creatures. The mind is, from a certain perspective, a mechanism of habit, a creature of habit. This means the ways we tend to think, conceive—even below the level of thinking—and the ways we see, sense, and perceive are often quite habitual. We just tend to see the world in a certain way, tend to see myself in a certain way, tend to see others in certain ways. And they repeat. There's a kind of inertia that goes with being a human being.

How do we soften this inertia? How do we loosen things up? We were talking some days ago about how much of this practice is about loosening—loosening up so that other ways of seeing, other ways of knowing become available to the soul and to the heart.

It's interesting: one aspect of allowing ourselves to perceive differently, or supporting a different kind of perception, is a kind of softening. In our habits of mind, we can look in certain ways or hear in certain ways, and something in the mind automatically rigidifies around a way that we already know how to see, how to hear, how to smell. This fabricates what we see, what we hear, what we smell. It's this—this is its reality. We don't even think this consciously.

Sometimes what supports the cosmic poise is something softening—something softening in the gaze, in the attitude, in the heart, in the being. It's just a little bit of softening that allows more of this liquidity, the alchemical solutio, and that allows the more creative seeing, the malleability of the seeing.

So if you're going to do walking meditation during the day or standing meditation, we're not forcing anything, but opening up to the possibility. What is it to walk, as Catherine was talking about, with this different awareness of the elements and the sacredness of the elements? What would it mean to walk in a sacred landscape? To walk prayerfully in a sacred landscape?

What does that mean? It can mean lots of things. What does this word "prayer" mean? We've talked about that. Prayerfully—what does that mean? How does that affect the body? We've discussed these hand postures or movements, or allowing your body to move in a certain way. Some things—just like when we were chanting out loud—it's as if the whole body is involved. The whole being can be involved.

What is it to walk prayerfully in a sacred landscape? You don't have to force that. It's more that we're trying not to prevent it, so that there can be this liquidity of perception.

Minds are inertial. They're not locked, but there's an inertia there. And sometimes bodies are inertial too. We get used to sitting with our eyes closed, sitting in a certain posture and keeping it still—and that's great, it's a great discipline. But then there's a kind of thinking: "Well, if I do this movement business that we were talking about, I'll be a bit self-conscious because that's not really the culture here." So there's an inertia that comes from being self-conscious. That's a part that we might need to pay attention to.

What we're doing is recognizing that we're often locked in—as I said—to thinking, to ways of relating, to ways of perceiving. Most of the time we don't actually realize what we're locked into. So a lot of what we're doing is loosening, allowing that loosening to happen. Sometimes only after something has loosened do you realize that you were locked into something.

A big part of what we're doing is loosening, allowing that loosening to happen. And then there can be the shaping, the sculpting, the creativity.

So allowing it to expand, allowing it to be liquid, allowing it to spill out into the world without forcing, but opening up a space where that can be possible.

And when it is, it's almost like, let's say you're walking and there's a sense, some kind of sense of sacredness or cosmopoiesis, something like that. That becomes the meditation. It might be through the soles of my feet, it hopefully will involve the whole body, but the thing that I'm concentrating on is the cosmopoiesis. That becomes what I'm tuning to. It's a dimension of experience that one is then looking to engage and relate to and linger with. Tune to.

No forcing. Allowing things to loosen so that things can be born for us and then gently encouraged, supported.

CHAPTER 44

The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 45 min

> In this third part of his series, Rob Burbea delves into the integral relationship between meaningfulness and the enchantment of self. Drawing on insights from Einstein and Jung, he explores how meaning creates healing power and makes life endurable. Burbea examines the complex dance between creating and discovering meaning, addressing how mature insight into śūnyatā (emptiness) prevents nihilistic interpretations of constructed meaning.
>
> The talk weaves together Kabbalistic teachings on infinite souls with roots in multiple worlds, the concept of amor fati (love of one's fate), and Nietzsche's question of eternal recurrence. Burbea discusses how meaningfulness involves duty and embodiment - not just conceptual understanding but practical integration of imaginal experiences into life. He explores the sophisticated notion of both becoming divine and creating/shaping the divine through our actions and consciousness.
>
> Throughout, Burbea emphasizes that re-enchantment requires conceptual frameworks flexible enough to allow soul-making - the mutual enrichment of eros, psyche, and logos. Even the smallest acts can be woven into what Kabbalists call "the soul's garment of splendor" when viewed through enchanting conceptions. This is not merely intellectual exercise but practical training in dimensions of perception that reveal timelessness, sacredness, and infinite potential within ordinary experience.

So if we're talking about enchantment of self—and again, wrapped up with everything we're saying, all of this connects, every element of what we're talking about connects with every other element—the enchantment of self is integrally related to, integrally involves the sense of meaningfulness that we have in our life. Enchantment brings meaningfulness. Meaningfulness is an element of enchanting the self.

Einstein, actually, in some of his later writings, a book called The World As I See It, wrote: "What is the meaning of human life or organic life altogether?" He continues: "To answer this question at all implies a religion." So he's aware these are religious questions. "And then," he says, "is there any sense then, you may ask, in putting it? In other words, it's a matter of conception, belief, and not of so-called science. Is there any sense then, you may ask, in putting it? I answer: the man who regards his own life and that of his fellow creatures as meaningless is not only unfortunate, but almost disqualified for life."

Jung's view also emphasized so much the necessity of meaningfulness, of finding or creating meaningfulness. He actually saw psychoneurosis, psychological suffering, as ultimately the suffering of a soul which has not discovered its meaning. Whereas meaning, he continues, has an inherent curative power. So finding meaning in our lives has an inherent curative power. "Meaning," he writes, "makes a great many things endurable, perhaps everything." A sense of meaningfulness makes a great many things in our lives, in our existence, endurable—perhaps everything.

So the question of meaningfulness is so integral to our well-being, to how we live our lives, obviously, but it's also integral to a sense of an enchanted self, an enchanting life. As I think I mentioned in another talk earlier on this retreat, when we open the goals and the aims and the directions of our practice to include meaningfulness, to include soul-making and enchantment and beauty and the sense of sacredness—when these become the goals—then the aim becomes open-ended. The direction of travel, the avenues of the path of practice become open-ended.

There's an open-endedness of enchantment possibilities, an open-endedness of range, but it doesn't stop at a certain point. You can always somehow move further into all this. There's an unachievability in actualizing all of this fully, completely, ever fully arriving at an endpoint of all possibilities for seeing sacredness or beauty or deepening that, of fully living out one hundred percent our individuation.

There's a freedom that comes with all that, an expansion of freedom that comes with re-enchantment and imaginal work and cosmopoiesis. All kinds of freedom open up with that. And also duties. Images, cosmopoiesis, as I said elsewhere earlier on the retreat, seem to demand of us something—some kind of duty, some kind of embodiment, often though not always, some kind of action in life. A part of grounding, if you like, in relation to images may well have to do with duty that comes with an image. And if we neglect that, we're actually ungrounded with the image and the image becomes ineffectual for us. The enchantment, the cosmopoetic experience becomes ineffectual for us because it's not being grounded through embodiment in both senses—both in the body sense, in the energy body, but also embodiment in terms of duty, action, implication for life.

This is subtle. Again, it's so delicate talking about all this stuff and walking around these areas. But again, Carl Jung wrote: "Any content that emerges from the unconscious into consciousness"—that's his system talking; again we talk about images or cosmopoetic experiences—"involves a spiritual or moral task which, if not accomplished, leads to misunderstandings, complications, suffering and illness. Without the corresponding spiritual work of assimilating and integrating the contents, the experience, the image"—the experience, however fascinating, however amazing or fascinating this image is or this cosmopoiesis or whatever, this enchantment, however fascinating—"loses its value and its meaning."

He was actually, in that instance, talking about drug experiences. People can have amazing images or cosmopoetic experiences on certain drugs, but if it's not somehow integrated through embodiment, through translation, through the duty that's there, the follow-up work—the duty may involve acting in the world and it may not involve acting in the world; I've talked about this in other talks, I'm not going to repeat it here, so I'm not implying that it always involves an action in the world—but some kind of duty in relation to this image, some kind of honoring of it, needs to be made manifest. And that's part of it. So there's a freedom and a duty. And this duty is part of the meaningfulness. Sometimes it's clear what that is, and sometimes it's a lot more vague.

A few months before he died in a plane crash, Dag Hammarskjöld wrote in his diary—he kept a diary published posthumously—just a few months before he suddenly died, he wrote: "I don't know who or what put the question. I don't know when it was put. I don't even remember answering. But at some moment I did answer yes to someone or something, and from that hour I was certain that existence is meaningful and that therefore my life in self-surrender had a goal."

So there was no event that he remembered, no specific person or image. Something was being asked of him to which he said yes, and that constellation created meaning for him. There was a duty in that—he was in a dutiful relationship of self-surrender, with goal and meaningfulness wrapped up together.

When deep meaningfulness runs through our lives, it brings the enchantment of the self, because the self is given this meaningfulness and trajectory. But part of that is that the meaningfulness feels as though—or we could say we entertain lightly the conception—that the meaningful is being asked of us by what is more than human. Can you hear that in what Hammarskjöld wrote?

We entertain the idea that the duties we have, what we are responsible to, what gives us meaningfulness and therefore enchantment—enchantment and therefore meaningfulness—is asked of us by something bigger than we are, bigger than the human. We're entertaining this idea at the very same time that we need to see image as image and have equanimity in relationship to this sense of duty and embodiment and action. Complex, tricky.

I could have gone into it more on this retreat—this question of how images get translated into life or meet life, how we see life as image, how we navigate this relationship between the imaginal and life. It's an art, complex, requiring many skills as I said.

I can't remember who wrote it, but there's a Latin phrase: Vocatus atque non vocatus, Deus aderit—"Called or uncalled, the God will come." It expresses a certain view that the gods, the more than human, are present in our life whether we ask for it or not. That's already a certain view, but we need to entertain that view and that perception. Entertaining that creates the meaning.

Meaningfulness and this enchantment of the self through meaningfulness does not come without entertaining certain views and conceptions—admitting them, allowing them, holding them lightly.

In all this, again, there's this ambivalence, this both-and quality. We are both creating and discovering meaning. I create meaning and I discover my meaning, my meaningfulness, my duty. Some deep, mature insight involves really holding those two together and acknowledging them both.

This is particularly difficult around meaningfulness. People who do extensive work on emptiness sometimes go through a phase where they think, "Oh, it's all empty, therefore it's all meaningless. I see that I can create meaningfulness, but I'm only creating it." There's a kind of nihilism there—a stage that needs to be moved through.

The recognition that I create meaningfulness, that meaningfulness is created for me, will only lead to a puncturing of that meaningfulness and a certain nihilism if lurking in the background of my beliefs is the idea that there is some independent reality where things are actually meaningless, and therefore I have to create meaning. The assumption that really, independent of any creation, things are meaningless.

There's a very deep insight here into the emptiness of meaninglessness itself. Nihilism need not arise—it may be a stage some people go through, but the fact that I acknowledge and recognize that from a certain perspective I create meaning, even as I have a sense of discovering meaning and it being asked of me... I create that too. The psyche creates that. It takes mature insight to not view this in a nihilistic way, not to assume that the real truth is meaninglessness.

There's so much tied up in this re-enchantment of the self. I mentioned Chaim Vital, the Kabbalist, and his statement: "There is no soul which doesn't have endless roots." All souls have infinite roots in this infinite amount of coexisting worlds and levels of existence. Again, it's a metaphysical idea that we're taking more as a poetic idea, which is tremendously powerful.

Can I, in my practice—and this is what practice is—convert an idea like that, hold it poetically, let it have its power by moving it away from the purely intellectual to an actual way of looking? What would that be like?

How can I practice seeing and feeling myself—seeing and feeling another—as having an infinite amount of roots in an infinite amount of coexisting worlds? Even if it's not infinite, just other worlds, other roots. I have multiple roots in multiple worlds.

When I look at the self, can I convert that idea, see it, feel it as a poetic idea? In my art—the art of my living, the art of my practice, the art of my existence, the poetry of my perception—can I convert that poetic idea into something powerful, into a way of looking at self, at other, at world?

Wrapped up in that too, because Chaim Vital continues in his teaching: in each of these worlds, the Torah—that's the Hebrew word for the Bible—the Torah is read in accordance with that world's subtlety and spirituality. So there's this teaching, very profound, radical teaching, that there are infinite interpretations of the sacred text. But more than that, this word "text" can be used more widely of any text, but also of nature—nature as so-called text. Infinite interpretations of nature, of self, of other, of existence, of cosmos.

All these ideas are wrapped up together. All these ideas are, if you like, vital, vitalizing in the re-enchantment of self and the possibilities of re-enchantment of self. And all these ideas actually make possible something—I think I mentioned these words—Latin words: amor fati, the love of one's fate, the love of one's destiny. I believe it was a phrase Nietzsche used.

But all these ideas make that possible. So the re-enchantment of self means that all these ideas can make possible the love of one's self, the love of one's fate, because it becomes something sacred. My life, the events of my life, the tragedies of my life, my suffering, my struggles, my perceptions, my openings, my vision, my work, my creativity, my difficulties—all the amor fati. And not just bearing it. This isn't a teaching of "accept what is."

Included in all this, at least in how I would like to present it, is this understanding: there is no "what is." "What is" is a kind of modern spiritual myth, in the worst sense of the word. It's empty. What is is empty. What is available to us are empty ways of looking—this flexibility of interpretation.

So loving my fate actually becomes, again, an art. It's openness to multiple perspectives. What is can be seen from so many different ways and is colored and shaped and fabricated by so much that there is no independent "what is." So we're not talking about accepting what is; we're talking about loving what is. Loving our fate, loving our life, loving the self. Amor fati.

So my self is not different from what befalls the self, including the sufferings, including the challenges, including the difficulties, including the pain, including my life and death and whenever they come. This knowledge that it's empty, this love of that—love of it, knowing that it's empty, knowing that it's art in how I see it. And again, recognizing that within that we're sensitive to the dimensions of myself, of my existence, of my fate, and the divinity of all that.

So yes, it's given, and yes, we create all of it through our perspectives, through the art of perception. So this loving it—again, to emphasize a distinction we're making in this retreat—it's not "I love it and it's all perfect because all is one." All is equally the same substance of God or oneness of awareness or love or whatever it is. That's included as a level within this understanding that I'm talking about when I use the phrase amor fati. It's included, but we want to add within that the inclusion of, as I said, the personal, the particular as necessary. All of it is relevant for my soul, the persona, for my personhood, and also necessary for God, for the divine.

Nietzsche had this question of eternal recurrence. If you had to live every moment of your life again, over and over and over, your whole life in all its details, without anything changing, over and over for all eternity—so that means all the periods, all the moments of pain, of suffering, of struggle, confusion, even stagnation, and the durations of all those periods, and the timings, the order in which they come, not changing any of that. The joys as well, not just the pains, but all of it. And not smoothing the experience and the life out to being nice.

How would you feel about that? It's only in this amor fati that you can recognize the sacredness of it. What would make such an idea tolerable? And the test of your art of life is your response to that question.

So again, so much about what we're talking about in this re-enchantment of self, the re-enchantment of existence and cosmos, is creative, is art. We're really emphasizing that. I've said so many times.

In many traditions from ancient times unto the present, there's this idea of the possibility of becoming divine. The human being has the possibility to become divine. Acknowledging that that's rare, that kind of development, but we can, if you like, become God or a god or divine. You get this in Plato and Plotinus and then the Upanishads and Buddhist Tantra, in Jung as well.

Many others express this teaching as well. In Orthodox Christianity, it's called theosis. Let me read you something from theologian Jonathan Jacobs, writing about this possibility in Eastern Orthodox teachings. According to the Eastern Church, theosis "transforms the entire human person, including her sense perceptual capacities." This aligns beautifully with what I've been exploring—transformation occurring in perception itself. "Hence the deified, the ones made divine, are those who see things as they truly are."

There are some differences in understanding, but let's elaborate on what he's saying. Before this becoming divine, our sense faculties don't reveal things to us as they truly are—this is part of what's called our fallen human nature in the Christian tradition. He makes an analogy with autism that's worth considering. It's not that our perceptions are completely untrustworthy. Our current epistemic situation—our current condition of knowing through perception—is not unlike that of an autistic person. Autistic persons can perceive much in the world and indeed often have more finely tuned abilities to perceive some things. But they don't have the same abilities others have when it comes to perceiving persons. They may be able to see facial expressions and describe them accurately in detail, but they cannot see them for what they truly are—expressions of emotion, for instance.

Similarly, our "fallen" sense capacities need not be unreliable in general to be defective in what they deliver. We can see things in the world accurately; we just cannot see them for what they truly are. In this case, we cannot see the theophanies—selves and things and events as faces of God. We are, like an autistic person unable to see certain aspects of a person or thing, unable to see them as theophanies, or at least less able to do so.

In Buddhism, there's the teaching of authentic seeing—one definition of ultimate wisdom in some Buddhist teachings. Authentic seeing is the way a Buddha sees experiences as divine and beings as deities, as Buddhas. That's actually authentic seeing. Anything less than that is inauthentic seeing.

Panayiotis Nellas, writing about the Greek Orthodox tradition, explores this idea of being made in the image of God. What this really means is that we have the possibility to tend toward the archetypal image—related to what I mentioned about the angel at our head—and we have the possibility of serving as effective instruments of the Christ. This is a gift given to us by the divine, but also a gift of our being, a gift of ourselves. It's also, if you like, a destiny, or at least a goal, or at least a potential of our being.

He speaks of a pledge—I'm not entirely sure what he means. Perhaps we pledge ourselves to this, or perhaps the divine makes a pledge to us through creating us in the divine image. But this pledge becomes a marriage—a marriage of the human to the divine image. He writes: "In the archetype, it's in the archetype that one finds one's true ontological meaning." We return to the image and the archetype giving us direction, pulling us, offering us duty and meaning. This is the meaning of our being—our ontological meaning through the archetype, through the image.

For most of us entrenched or saturated with modernism, these are strange ideas. Even if they're beautiful, we can almost hear them as quite dangerous. If you know certain psychological concepts about inflation and ungroundedness, there's the possibility of lack of discernment in all this. But as I've said, skills, capacities, wisdoms, and cultivations need to accompany all these ideas about becoming divine and manifesting the divine to make them less dangerous. Through practice, we actually realize—we make real—the beauty of these ideas.

So there's this thread through many historical strands of becoming God, becoming divine. And then there's also the strand I've mentioned several times about both becoming God and, in that process and through our activities, creating God as well—creating the divine.

You see this in different versions. We talked about Walter Wink's understanding of ascension and resurrection—shaping, creating, influencing, changing God. You see it in Hegel's philosophy as well, where the human being and the consciousness of the human being, and the evolution of that through time, creates at least a level of God.

In postmodern understandings—though it's still very rare within postmodernist theories as a whole to even talk about the divine in more than a dismissive manner—there are glimpses of this recognition.

And there's also the strand I've mentioned several times about both becoming God, but in that and through our activities, creating God as well, creating the divine.

So you get this in different versions. We talked about Walter Wink talking about the ascension and the resurrection—shaping, creating, influencing, changing God. You see it in Hegel's philosophy as well, that the human being and the consciousness of the human being and the evolution of that through time creates at least a level of God. Post-modern understandings, more postmodern understandings—though it's still very rare within postmodernist theories as a whole for this even to talk about the divine in more than a dismissive manner.

This idea that we both become and create is quite a common idea in a lot of Jewish Kabbalistic strands of teaching. So that our prayer and our voicing in prayer, and the breath that comes through us, and our intentionality in prayer, as much as our psycho-spiritual work, as much as our actions in life, in embodiment—all of this shapes and creates and influences and maintains God, the divine, the divine archetype.

So yes, our actions in the world and our mental states and our work draw down what's called the divine influx. We draw that down into the world. We create it in the world. But also in the so-called supernal realms, in the higher realms, all of this maintains, shapes, influences, creates the divine or brings aspects of the divine together in erotic union. So it affects the intra-divine nature. These are radical ideas that most people who think about religion would never think would exist.

The whole idea in the Jewish tradition of mitzvot, of commandments—as many commandments as Buddhist monks follow, actually more than Buddhist monks, but both traditions have so many things, rules to follow, commandments to fulfill, ways of acting, ways of not acting. But there are ways of seeing that those very actions, those very seeming constrictions on one's behavior—do this, don't do that, do this little thing, this thing I don't even understand the reason for—there are ways of seeing that that enchant existence.

Seeing those little actions, the blessing involved. And with that, those actions become the action of the divine intelligence. Again, this might be in our kindness, in our acts of compassion, in our serving, in our creativity, or maybe more prescribed in certain monastic orders or in the laws of Judaism and Islam. But they become the actions of the divine intelligence through the human, because the divine intelligence is innate there in the human. Entertaining that idea.

So through our actions we express the divine, we manifest the divine, and we create and shape the divine. What's called in Jewish tradition the Shekhinah, the feminine manifestation on earth of the divine—it's that which, through our actions, through our prayer, through our cosmopoiesis, through our images, through our psycho-spiritual work, all of that, is brought into erotic union with other aspects of the divine.

And there's this idea in Hebrew called tzorech gevoha, the need on high—in other words, God's need. A certain level of God is beyond all this, is completely unaffected, transcendent, unfabricated, beyond anything that we can do or conceive, beyond anything we conceive. That level of God is unaffected, the ain sof, the infinite. But there are other levels of God or aspects of God that have a need, a necessity—as I said, a necessity for you, for your personhood, for the particularities of your personhood.

So become God, but also become and create God. This is quite a sophisticated notion to be able to entertain and hold and have as one of the ideas that one entertains, one of the conceptual frameworks and the richness that can bring, the possibilities. Quite a sophisticated concept to hold, to entertain, to hold lightly, to look through, to act through, to live through.

Nietzsche said God is dead, but it's so narrowly understood what he meant by that. Certainly he was referring to a certain popular, dominant view in Western Europe at that time, at the end of the nineteenth century, of what God is, based on popular Christian view, and he's saying that view is dead. But really what he meant more fully was God as any truth, any supposedly independent, inherently existing thing. Very radical thinker, and that idea—this notion or belief that we have of independent truth—he said that's dead. When he said God is dead, that's what he meant was dead, of which a certain popularized version of Christianity's version of God is just one instance. He was pointing to something much more radical, much more challenging for people to even understand, and much more far-reaching in its consequences.

But is there a way, just as he said with the concept of soul, there may well be with the concept of divinity? Don't throw that out. Expand what it means. Acknowledge the art there that we create and discover both.

So again, as we said so much right from the beginning of the retreat, all this that we're talking about in the re-enchantment of self—aspects of self, elements of self, dimensions of self, and of the whole of existence and the cosmos—all of it is allowed by the flexibility or the elasticity of our concepts, of our ideas, the ability to move between different concepts or stretch concepts, or that the conceptual frame we start with in the beginning is ample enough to include these ideas of creating God, becoming God. All this is ample enough, the ways that we can see the self, right from the beginning.

So our views and our ways of looking and our practice and our re-enchantment can grow into a much bigger space. It has a much bigger space to grow into right from the beginning.

You get this idea of levels of soul—if we just talk about the concept of self or soul, you get this framework quite sophisticated and ample, amply spaced, having a wide range—in Plotinus and Neoplatonism. Apparently in the Upanishads, although I'm not sufficiently versed in them to know, and also in Buddhist Vajrayana, these ideas of levels, of dimensions of being, and also of worlds. But there's already there quite a lot of space for different views and flexibility of views of what the self is, all of which allows re-enchantment.

So conceptual frameworks that allow all this to happen in terms of the re-enchantment of the self—but these are not just intellectual frameworks. The conceptual framework needs to be translated to ways of looking, to seeing the aggregates as not just anatta, not just non-self, but as divine, as Buddha nature, seeing self as Buddha, seeing others as Buddha, as deity, and making that an actual practical vision, sense, perception, way of looking that we can practice and develop and move in and out of.

And when we talk in that vein, then we're talking about dimensions and levels of experience, not just conceptual levels of defining soul. Sometimes when you read this stuff—Plotinus and all that—it seems so intellectually elaborate. You realize he's talking, I would say, and for us it's absolutely necessary—we're talking about dimensions of experience. Yes, a conceptual framework needs to be translated to practice, to experience, levels and dimensions of experience of the self.

So we see that, and I mentioned before, one aspect is at a certain level, then timelessness, for example, is something that is included both in the sense of self and in the sense of other things. Other levels of conception and practice and view and sense of self doesn't have that timelessness in it. It's more locked into time. And that has its validity as well. But experientially, we experience certain levels where timelessness as an aspect of those dimensions becomes just—we can't not see it. It's integral to that perception.

So whether it's the awareness or the consciousness that's regarded as Buddha nature that's seen as timeless, the consciousness of this perception, or maybe I'm looking at a field and the sun or the trees or whatever, and I get a sense, a felt sense—this knowing of that is timeless. This perception is timeless. This moment is eternal. These are not just conceptions of self; they're perceptions, senses available to us. And actually even frequently available with practice.

So we really get the sense of moving between levels of perception of self and the aspects of self, of dimensions of being, and also across a wide range, as we talked about earlier. But we need, in relation to the self, again, we need conceptions or conceptual framework that will allow this mutual opening, expansion, deepening and enriching of eros, of psyche and of logos. The very conceptual framework itself needs to be able to expand.

And through this, which we've talked about in other talks, through that movement, that soul-making movement, even the smallest act in our life, the smallest, most seemingly insignificant act has a sense of infinite ramifications, infinite resonances, infinite depths to it. It touches on the infinite. It moves into the infinite and towards the infinite. To quote a Kabbalist, it becomes woven into the soul's garment of splendor.

When I am able to view the smallest act of my life, the smallest instance of my self-manifestation, self-expression, self-acting, in certain ways that re-enchant, that allow this soul-making, this seeing through a conception, allows this eros-psyche-logos, mutual fertilization, then even that small act is woven into the soul's garment of splendor. Lovely language.

So we need conceptions, again—I've said this so many times—and we need conceptions that will allow soul-making and will allow an infinite potential for that soul-making because it is open-ended. The pothos in the eros will continue to want more, deeper, fuller, wider connection. The psyche needs the image of myself, of this other, of this thing that I love, of this object, of the cosmos needs to keep expanding. There's infinite potential, infinite space there for all that to expand. And with that, the logos, the conceptual framework as well.

And it's not that that infinite sort of expansion and deepening happens without difficulty. We stagger, we stutter, we stall at times. But that's all part of it, because the suffering also is enchanted. Not that this is all smooth and gleeful all the time. But the conceptual frame of it needs to allow the soul-making, the infinite potential of that dynamic of soul-making. It needs to allow meaningfulness. It needs to allow enchantment for the self, for others, for things, for cosmos. All of this is necessary for all of that, for the re-enchantment of all of that. For the ongoing, open-ended discovery, creation-discovery of senses of beauty and senses of sacredness in all of it, in all of existence—self, other, things, cosmos.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 45

The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h13

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea continues his exploration of re-enchanting the self by examining what aspects need re-enchanting and how to approach this delicate work. He discusses how all levels of the self - from the most fabricated and solid to the most ethereal and barely-there - require seeing as divine, along with all aspects including emotions, desires, dukkha, imagination, and creativity.
>
> Burbea addresses the complex relationship between desire and spiritual practice, distinguishing between transcendent longing for the divine and daemonic desires that don't fit conventional spiritual categories. He explores how eros - the desire for connection with its quality of inexhaustibility - relates to but differs from craving and clinging. The talk examines different notions of causality beyond just past-causing-present, including archetypal and atemporal causation, and how this affects our understanding of suffering and healing.
>
> A key theme is the balance between seeing aspects of self as anatta (not-self) versus seeing them as divine - both being skillful ways of looking to be navigated wisely. Burbea discusses the importance of allowing 'artifice' into our feelings and spiritual practice, drawing on Nietzsche's insight that introducing art into our emotions can be more spiritually fruitful than seeking only 'genuine' or purely authentic expression. This challenges reductive secular humanist approaches to healing and opens possibilities for deeper soul-making and enchantment.

So just to sum up what we've explored thus far, disenchantment arises partly from the pervasive flattening of either biological or psychological reductionism—reducing everything to neurophysiology or past historical events—or sociological reductionism that reduces everything to social conditioning. There's a profound flattening in that reductionism.

There's also an inhibited capacity for enchantment that emerges from certain spiritual emphases, whether in the Buddhadharma or other traditions like Advaita Vedanta. These teachings overemphasize the universal: the self as process, the self as nothing, always regarding the self as empty. This oneness orientation, whatever form it takes, emphasizes teachings or levels of perception that highlight the universal versus those that emphasize and include the particular—the particular person, what is my individual personhood.

The alternative is a regarding of the particular through all the events of my life as divine, and even more than that, as necessary to the divine, necessary to God. My particulars, my person, your person, your particulars, your struggle, your dukkha—all the aspects, the infinite aspects that make you up—are somehow necessary to God. God needs you to go through this because in a way, through you going through that, he, she, it goes through it. It's part of the growth of the being of God.

There's also disenchantment from what's less obvious, more insidious: this relative balance between self-aspiration, self-orientation, intentional self-serving orientation in terms of healing, psychological growth, self-empowerment, or self-expression. It might use the language of the divine, but it's actually about self, or mostly the leaning is about self, rather than leaning more towards the divine. The purpose, the intention, the aspiration, the reason for practice, for healing—one is really grounding it and orienting it towards the divine. The balance is more toward that than toward the self.

We could use these as if they're two separate things, or as a way of really integrating the two. But oftentimes a person might think that's what's happening, or want to think that's what's happening—that it's really about God, and they use that language. But so quickly it slips back to a self-project. Or there's not really the fullness in what was sensed in the orientation in the first place; it really was always just about self, just a self-project. This is very common.

These are some of the reasons that constellate and condition and hold in place a disenchantment of everything, but in this case we're focusing on self and other.

Given all that, we could ask: what needs re-enchanting? When we say to re-enchant the self, what do we mean more fully by that? What aspects or dimensions of the self need re-enchanting?

I would say actually all levels of the self need re-enchanting. Let me explain what I mean by that, because I mean it in two different but related ways. All levels of what I've called the vertical spectrum of the imaginal—all the images of a self or other. I might feel myself or see myself through this image or through that image, and it's as if they exist on a spectrum. All of those images need re-enchanting and need seeing and feeling as divine. We need to see and feel them as divine.

Practice, for example receiving divine light or love—some of the practices we've touched on in this retreat—this receiving of divine light and love is received by all images of the self, anywhere on that vertical spectrum of images of the imaginal. All levels on that spectrum, and all levels on the spectrum of the fabrication of self-sense.

Sometimes the self is fabricated and tense, feels very solid and very contracted. Sometimes the self feels like an atomistic process—that's fine, that's slightly less fabricated. Sometimes a self is a much more universal, cosmic self. Sometimes a self is a nothingness. Sometimes a self is experienced as barely there at all—barely fabricated, very ethereal, very unformed, very tenuous, refined sense of self. And sometimes the self is felt and sensed, whether imaginatively or because of the degree of unfabricating, as already divine and already light.

But all these levels, whether the imaginal levels or the levels of different degrees of fabrication on the spectrum of fabrication of the self-sense—all of it needs to be both... We need to play with, in practice, seeing and feeling all of these different levels as divine. Or we could say practices where we receive light and love from the divine. Again, all the different levels, both imaginal and fabricatory. All of them, from the most solid and the most painful and contracted to the most blissful and divine and barely there at all.

Again, this is one of those things where the more one has played with emptiness practice and seen in practice this spectrum of fabrication, played with unfabricating and moved up and down on that spectrum and really seen the degree of range of the fabrication of perception of self, the more flexibility there is in moving up and down these spectrums and seeing it all as empty and playing with it in these ways.

Somehow or other, and in time, all these levels need to get included, seen as divine, felt as divine, and receiving divine light and love in order to re-enchant the self.

So all levels, but also all aspects of self and others. Our emotions need re-enchanting, our desire needs re-enchanting, our dukkha, our suffering needs re-enchanting, our imagination needs re-enchanting, our mind—and I mean mind in the broader sense, citta, heart-mind, soul—our creativity needs re-enchanting. Our meaningfulnesses need re-enchanting. By that I mean they all need to be given legitimacy.

Because of this confusion we've discussed about different cultures, not all our emotions are given legitimacy, and not all our desire is either. By "given legitimacy," I don't mean acting out or being lost in them or anything like that. Given legitimacy means recognizing that there is something here that is a treasure. There is something sacred. It might be emerging in a way that appears contorted. It might not fit the picture I have of what is legitimate or holy. But all of this needs to be given legitimacy. It needs to be given permission. It needs to be given space to grow and expand and move into—again, not constrained by a certain conceptual framework of what it is or what's allowed, or a certain image of what it must be or what's permitted.

All these aspects of self need to be, as we said before, seen as divine in their roots—if you like, their origins. Not necessarily their origins in time, but their roots—that's a better word. Given legitimacy, given space to grow, to expand, to move into, and seen and felt as divine in origin. So that's the work of both the conceptual framework and also of practice, practicing ways of looking.

We can touch on a few of these perhaps now. Desire—I mentioned desire as one of the aspects of self, one of the elements of self, if you like. I've talked about this in other talks in the past, and I hopefully will talk more in the future about this in much more detail, the possibilities there. But Henri Corbin, for example, talks about longing as being—I can't remember the exact word he used—but almost like the driver, the engine of the human being. There's a kind of nostalgia, if you like, for the divine. He doesn't mean this nostalgia as in the past, as if we were with the divine before the Big Bang or something like that, but a non-temporal nostalgia. Something in our being knows a closeness with the divine, and we long for that again.

Jacob Boehme, a very influential mystic writer from I think the sixteenth century, used words like "purity" and "innocence" because in a way he was surrounded by a culture that put so much emphasis on the impurity and the fallenness of humankind. So he used words like: there is in us still a purity and innocence, and it longs for, it desires what he called "the holy" or "the paradisal element." It longs for holiness and paradise, and that holiness and paradise is inner—it's within us, if you like, the core of our being—but it's also outer in the world. This world as heaven, this world as Buddha realm, as we've talked about. So there's a desire for that. We have a desire that is holy. We have desires that are holy, that are divine in origin, that need to be legitimized and given space.

As well as that, and I've talked about this on other retreats, there is, if you like, the desire that comes from the daimon—desires that we see in ourselves that don't fit the usual Buddhist or, for example, Christian pictures of what it is that we should desire. They seem darker, or we easily confuse them with greed, or we think they're deluded, or that's just clinging or whatever. I'm not going to go into this now. I'm mentioning these as, if you like, two different kinds of desire: this transcendent desire, if you like, that Jacob Boehme was talking about—something in us that is transcendent, that yearns for the transcendent—and also the desire from the daimon.

The whole question with all this, and the question of desire, is the question of eros. This, what I've been defining in other talks and retreats, is eros as the desire for connection. And that having, again, a quality of inexhaustibility, a quality of always wanting more—what the Greeks used to call pothos within the eros—always wanting more, always wanting more connection, this movement, insatiability, if you like. Very easily, we just put all of that into the camp of craving and clinging and greed, et cetera, in a kind of Dharma language.

So are they the same? How are they different? Maybe one is a treasure. One is the pearl of great price, or part of that, and other ways of relating to that actually make it problematic for us. Certainly the relationship is not simple between eros and clinging, craving, whatever, greed—whatever word one wants to use. So important for us as human beings to really actively ask these questions and not just to receive, as I said, something from a culture, which then becomes stultifying, constraining, actually does not work—certainly for enchantment, but does not actually work in our life.

So Gregory of Nyssa, one of the fathers, I think, of the Orthodox Christian tradition, said: "The thirst of human souls requires some infinite water. How could this limited world suffice?" The thirst of human souls requires some infinite water. How could this limited world suffice?

So again, the thirst of human souls being the seeking for the transcendent, for the oneness with God, but also this desire for the daimon—whatever it is, sexual or something else—so easily seen as ego or lower nature or this or that or clinging, craving, put into a bad camp. But maybe both kinds of desire, both, if you like, the transcendent and what comes through the imaginal and the erotic in that way... If I have a limited worldview and a limited self-view, that won't be enough for us. We require infinite water.

So there's this need for respect for our desires, for changing the view of our desires, for re-enchanting the desires, and also within that, recognizing that there's a kind of infinity to the desire as well. It desires the infinite, but there's an infinitude to desires as well, in terms of what they are in a deeper sense, what they're conveying in a deeper sense.

I said also the mind needs re-enchanting. So aspects of a human being—our mind, and again mind meaning heart, psyche, citta, mind.

We talked about in another talk how some views actually regard the human and the divine mind as being, if you like, on a continuum. So the human mind at its core, at a deep level of the human mind, is actually one with the divine mind. And certainly the human imagination is also on a continuum with the divine imagination. But if we say mind, then it includes our emotions, our imagination, our creativity. It's certainly that idea that all of this at its core is divine. We are impregnated with the seed, with the word, with the logos of the divine.

Although it's on a continuum with the divine, that is a metaphysical concept. But it's one that we can actually entertain in practice, if not one that we can intuit through practice, actually have a real sense of. Again, we create it, and then we see what happens when we entertain it, when we employ it, engage it as a way of looking. But we can also intuit it or discover it. It feels like, "Yes, I sense that to be, in inverted commas, true. I sense that I'm discovering this perspective or this metaphysical fact, if you like."

So these ideas—that particular idea—exist in many different traditions. For Corbin, there's really one fundamental creative matrix for all experience and all sensations, and that is this divine mind, and particularly the divine imagination. Because humans partake of that human imagination, especially when it's trained—what he would call imaginal—it is on a continuum with the divine imagination. And again, in certain ideas of the world soul, very similar, or certain versions of the Buddha nature teaching in the Dharma.

So this seeing of various aspects of our being, of our self, of our humanity—our mind or whatever it is, aspects of mind—this seeing them as divine is different, I hope this is clear, from seeing them as anattā, as not-self.

Many of you will hopefully know that there's a whole practice of regarding the mind, or regarding thoughts, or regarding aspects of mind, elements of mind as not-self, as anattā. It's a very, very important and skillful practice, really an avenue into a lot of depth. So when we regard things as anattā, when we adopt that way of looking, there is this dis-identification, not identifying with this or that, with the mind as a whole, with aspects of the mind. There's a dis-identification and the freedom that comes with that. But there's also something else that happens, which many of you will recognize. There's a kind of prying loose of our automatic tendency to value things, to believe in our thoughts and also what they say about us.

So when we regard them as anattā, we don't tend to believe them so much, and we also tend to not identify with them and not take them so personally in terms of what they mean for us, about us, about what's going on with us even. More largely...

So this is a practice, this seeing things as anattā, this work or a way of looking. To always do that, to always see every aspect of mind as anattā, would be a little silly. It's a practice, it's a way of looking. Again, we're back to this flexibility idea. We go in and out of that as a potentially skillful way of looking, and it's potentially extremely skillful, extremely fruitful. But the question is, when is it helpful? When is it actually the wrong thing to do to view things that way?

To try and view that way always would be silly. We move in and out and it brings much deeper insight regarding emptiness. It doesn't only bring a dis-identification in the moment and prying loose of the valuing and all that. It also brings deeper insights. But still, we move in and out of it according to our sense of when it's helpful, when it's skillful.

Just the same, just the same with this way of looking or playing with conception of the divine origins of the self, of the mind, of our images. We move in and out of that view. We need to navigate that movement in and out. We need to navigate our way, find our way with this flexibility. It would be silly and probably, you can imagine, pretty dangerous to always regard everything that moves through my mind, any element of myself or mind, as holy and divinely inspired and all that. So there needs to be some pragmatism and wisdom here, and sensitivity is really important.

There's another issue connected with all this that has to do with, if you like, the order of what we regard as divine, the order in which we regard different aspects as divine. What is light and what is good—it's easier to see that as divine. But seeing what is dark in us and what is, quote, bad or seems bad, to regard that as divine—would it be safer to really cultivate the good and see the divinity of that and develop what is light and pure, so-called, and then actually, on that basis, with that resource and having cultivated that, then to begin to learn to see and to practice seeing that which is, if you like, darker or the bad in us as divine?

Certainly Carl Jung thought so, that this was the order in which it was quite important that things happened. But still, he emphasized the importance of seeing the divinity of darkness, to open to the dark gods. So he wrote, I think in "Answer to Job": "The guilty man is eminently suited and is therefore chosen to become the vessel for the continuing incarnation"—it's kind of old style language. I hope you can get the gist of what's being said here. "The guilty man is eminently suited and is therefore chosen to become the vessel for the continuing incarnation, not the guiltless one who holds aloof from the world and refuses to pay his tribute to life, for in him the dark god would find no room."

For in him the dark god would find no room.

If we're truly to re-enchant the dark gods, they need to find room within us. They need to be re-enchanted—those aspects of ourselves that we would usually shut out of a spiritual view. "Now, that's not spiritual. That can't be divine." They need a way in.

But Jung's emphasis is that the good needs to be seen as divine first and actually cultivated first. We need, in his language, the development of the Christian virtues. We could say the paramis of the bodhisattva—generosity, patience, compassion, love, and so forth. But we also need insight, insight into emptiness, so that we don't start identifying too rigidly with all this, concretizing it, reifying it, making it real, shrinking around it, clinging to it as a fixed reality.

Many people hearing this will need to spend quite a bit more time developing what is light and so-called good—the classic Buddhist paramis and qualities—and cultivating insight into the emptiness of self and the emptiness of those qualities themselves. At some point, the being, the soul, and the understanding have the capacity and skill to start regarding much more beyond what is obviously light, obviously "good." They begin regarding all of that—the dark, what seems bad, what seems greedy—actually starting to find the divinity in that.

Sometimes it doesn't happen in that order. Mostly I would say that linear progression is one of the things that allows it to be stable and safe. But things aren't that simple for everyone. Some people do things in all kinds of orders, or it's just not so linear.

Wrapped up in all of this is the relationship with the view of the possibility of re-enchanting or enchanting our suffering, our dukkha in life. This is a delicate question. We have to tread delicately, sensitively here. It's complex. In the totality of the teachings of this retreat, from both Catherine and myself, we'd like to present different perspectives on this and give due respect to the complexity here.

Let's go into it from certain angles. Again, I hope you can hear some of this in the context of a response to at least what I perceive as the dominant paradigms existing.

One thing about re-enchanting the self and re-enchanting our suffering: judgment and enchantment do not go together very well at all. When we judge ourselves, or when we judge ourselves for suffering—seeing repeated patterns, still doing the same thing, still making the same mistakes after all this practice, still having the same problems—and there's judgment of that and self-blame, then the possibility of enchanting the self and enchanting the view of the suffering is obviously diminished. Similarly, it works the other way, as many of these things do through mutual dependence: the less enchanted we are with the view of the self and the suffering, the more likelihood there is to judge ourselves and judge the suffering.

When there's judgment, it's hard to see—almost by definition—the depths of beauty of the self. This piece about judgment and self-blame becomes quite interesting when we explore views of self and suffering and healing and the enchantment of that.

Sometimes a person has strands of suffering in their life that seem to last a long time, seem to be painfully persistent over years and decades. Then they're exposed to some psychological paradigm or work or idea, and they come up with what they believe is an explanation for their suffering, for the persistence of those patterns in their life. It might be certain wounds in their history, in the family—causal factors. Maybe a situation or an event caused even a change in neural mechanisms.

Now they have an explanation. This person has an explanation for their suffering, and more than that, for the persistence of their problems or patterns or failures in life. So that explanation is believed, and the believed cause of the suffering is no longer the self. It's because that happened. It's because of this event, or this ongoing set of conditions. So the cause is moved from self-blame to something that's not me—something other that happened to me, that was forced upon me.

There's less self-judgment, less self-blame. And then they find themselves feeling better. The problem's loosening. The pattern's loosening. The problem's alleviating a little bit.

Does that mean that explanation is necessarily true? Is it necessarily real? Or is it that what's happened is just the shifting away from the self as what is to blame? The alleviation of self-judgment is what is actually healing there—that is actually the element that's causative in healing. What's actually going on?

Because the self-judgment, the self-blame, can lock—can be part of a kind of cyclic mechanism that holds the whole patterns and dukkha and problems and persistent failures in place. It's the self-judging.

And by whatever explanation, that's relieved and something begins expanding and moving. There's essentially a restoring that happens, a re-storying, an alternative narrative. Instead of "I'm hopeless, I'm a failure, it's my fault," etc.—which may even be implicit, almost sub-verbal—there's a re-storying of the past, away from self-blame, and this is actually what liberates, maybe. What's going on there?

And these restorings, you know, in different cultures can be vastly different. I remember years ago when I lived in the States and I was studying music, and I used to go around to a friend's house. Hikaru was a Japanese from Japan who was also studying jazz guitar. And we used to play together. We used to jam together for hours.

My Japanese was completely non-existent, but his English was really not very good at all. So our conversations were quite limited. But one day—he was generally a very buoyant personality—and one day I went over in the evening, and he was clearly really down. And I was trying to understand: can I do anything? What's going on?

And in his English—he did have some English and it wasn't that bad really—but in his English he said, "It's my ancestors." And he didn't mean it's my family or something that happened to me in my childhood. It's my ancestors. He was talking from a whole different paradigm, a whole different set of beliefs that was clearly still used and operative in Japan. "It's my ancestors," he said.

But that view of it was clearly something that enabled him to get a little distance from it, to not self-blame, to make him okay with this dukkha that was there.

So are these different views of what's causative for my suffering and my patterns or my difficulties—persistent difficulties—are we talking about truths? I explain it like this, and then that helps. Does that mean it's true? Or are we actually talking about the power of beliefs, of interpretations? Are we seeing how the view and the interpretation of something has an effect, which is part of the theme of this whole teaching, teachings that we're given? What's going on there?

Restoring is part of healing, is a big part of healing. And we can have a naive understanding of what's happening there: just believe now I've seen the truth. Or actually a more sophisticated and I'd say honest understanding: restoring, re-fantasying, re-imaging. Recognizing that this is necessary and part of our humanity, part of enchanting, part of our psychology. And certainly part of healing.

And even when we see—you know, for example, this person, I can see them, or they tell me about how now they're caught in this painful triangle with a friend and an authority figure, and then they report something in the past of how a similar triangle, a painful triangle, with a sibling and a parent, and then the current situation, the pain of that, seems to be replicating past family relationships and triangles and difficulties, etc. Seems to be replicating.

And we easily think, "Ah yes, the cause is there, the cause was in the instance in the family, in the past." But actually not necessarily. That's not proven. It's not proven that implies that the family, the prior family, historical one, was the cause of the thing that happened later in time.

What about this notion, you know, when I use this phrase of something—some element of ourself or something or some image—having its roots in divinity, having its origins in divinity? I don't mean its temporal origins.

What about archetypal causes as an idea? Not the cause, or not the only possible way of interpreting things, way of explaining as the cause is in the past human history. Maybe the cause is archetypal. Maybe this triangle is archetypal. Now, of course, that's the whole Oedipal—well, one version is the Oedipal thing, but I'm not necessarily talking about that at all.

But it's putting—or entertaining the idea that the causes are not purely human and historical and concrete in origin from the past, etc. If I don't allow that kind of causality, then I will be fixed only on a certain range of possible causes, because that kind of archetypal causality is simply not in my frame.

The image is primary. That as an idea. You've maybe heard me say that in other talks, other retreats. If I exclude that idea, then my frame for possible causes can only contain so much. And I automatically make an assumption, an explanation. And it seems obvious.

Years ago, I remember this psychology class or something—this photo that psychologists took and showed to people, asking them to say what they thought was going on. The photo was a street clearly in London in the seventies, or not necessarily London, but what looked like a UK city in what appeared to be the seventies. The photo showed people on the street, a busy high street or whatever, relatively busy high street.

Within these people walking around and shopping were two figures. One was a black man running in a certain direction down the street through the people. Behind him, about ten or twenty yards—I can't remember exactly—was a policeman in a police uniform, a white policeman in uniform. They asked, "What do you think's happening in this photo?"

Most people said, "A policeman is chasing a criminal."

Part of the thrust of what they were trying to get at was this sort of implicit racism, but also something about frames. Because it actually turned out that what they said was, "No, actually what this is a photo of is two policemen—a black plainclothes policeman that you see there in front, by ten or twenty yards, of a white uniformed policeman, chasing a criminal who is not in the picture. He's out of the frame."

So a certain causal interpretation of what's happening is constrained or conditioned by the frame. By frame here, you can see that it's perceptual as well as conceptual. Similar dynamics operate in relation to suffering and healing and causality.

Of course, we can see that the images that arise for us have their origins in the past as well. They're not completely out of the blue, autonomous from beyond, with no relationship to our life. Any exploration of imaginal practice will see that this is the case too. But if I only regard images as being a result of the past, then that won't give them that divine dimension that we've been saying is so important.

Could I see, could I extend that? Yes, of course images arise from the past. But not only. And maybe even extending it further—an even more radical idea—maybe my past also has its roots in divinity, its roots in archetypal causes, if you like, its roots in archetypal images.

So this person who seems to be replicating an early family pattern—it's not that that early family pattern was the cause of what's being played out now in other contemporary relationships, but both are actually mirroring an archetypal cause. Where is the causality here, and what's going on? This is the whole opening up of our whole sense of existence. So not just images are archetypal, but actually the events of our life are archetypal, are divine in origin. They have their roots in divinity.

That's a much more radical and far-reaching idea. Something of the divinity of everything is much more deeply integrated into the view. So we can talk about a mirroring there, maybe not even a causality. Causality in the divine is more like a mirroring—the archetypal, the early family, and the contemporary. All these events and experiences are mirroring each other. Where is the causality here?

This is interesting if we just stay with this idea of causality now, because it actually has a tremendous bearing on this question of re-enchantment of self and dukkha and other aspects of our being. We could say there are three or four notions of causality that are possible.

We can, of course, have a sense that the past—something in the past, some event or some set of conditions—causes the present. The past causes the present. Of course, that is the most common, if not the exclusive understanding that we tend to have of causality. Past causes present. Of course it does. What else does? Past experience, past event causes present event, present experience.

But there's also a notion of the present causing the present that's possible. Now, I mentioned in another talk this idea of non-locality, this instantaneous fact discovered experimentally that even over vast distances, astronomical distances, two particles can actually affect each other instantaneously. The present, if you like, causes the present. That's not the kind of thing I'm talking about right now.

More I want to talk about or emphasize the understanding that's necessary for a Dharma practitioner to understand how views in the present fabricate the perception in the present. The conception and the view, the way of looking in the present, in this moment, fabricates the perception. This is not something that happens in time.

It's a dependent arising. We understand the teaching of dependent co-origination, as the Buddha said—how the present causes the present. We start to wonder about that word "cause." That's the second way of understanding causality.

A third possibility is the idea that the future causes the present—a future event, something in the future, so to speak, causes the present. Again, there's a parallel in modern physics. John Archibald Wheeler proposed certain experiments where you could actually see this possibility, but that's not what I'm talking about. I'm talking more about the idea of telos, the Greek word telos, of what Corbin called "the angel out ahead"—this image that we have that's calling us to something, that's giving us not so much a foretelling of the future, but calling us to our destiny, to our future, to our fulfillment, to our living out and embodying of an image, our individuation.

So causality from the past, causality from the present, causality from the future. And that as a notion or an idea... We could also talk about—I mean, the fourth option is kind of overlapping with the third, but just kind of atemporal causality. So what exists in us, but also for us, but exists beyond time, atemporal, and exists for us as blessing and as challenge. Beyond time, it exists in us and for us.

If we pay attention to our lives, the gifts that we have also bring with them challenges. We need to learn to grow into, to develop skill and art in relating to the blessings and the gifts that we are given, because they also bring particular challenges with them. But what exists as a kind of cause atemporally, beyond time—the integration of that and the consciousness of that happen in the linear time and through the linear time of our lives and our consciousness unfolding. But they come from or they exist beyond time.

So there are three or four possible notions of causality. But the causality from the past is by far the dominant idea, almost universally accepted. So if I hear a Dharma teacher give a talk about how the past, perhaps trauma in the family, causes the present, how the difficulties, the dukkha we have from the past, or even intrauterine, or in the struggles of the embryo, sometimes even in the struggles of the sperm to reach the egg—all of that is a cause of what happens later. The past causes the current experience, and there's a way in that explanation that supposedly is an understanding, and there's a kind of liberation that comes with that. It's a certain view of causality and of dukkha.

I think this is very significant. What do we do with causality and time, and how does that affect our understanding of time? What does that affect in terms of both our sense of suffering and liberation from suffering, but also the enchantment, or the possibility of enchantment, of suffering and of self?

Probably since Freud, and nowadays most psychoanalysts or psychotherapists would, in their relationship both to dreams and to images, construe them as coming from the past. They have their origins in the past. So the dream is conveying something, some pain or triggered by something in the past, whether it's in a purely mundane kind of uninteresting way or something deeper from the past. And that goes for dreams and images. The origin again—causality is in the past, maybe the past as it runs into the present, but from the past.

I just wonder what happens, as in so much of what we're talking about, what happens if we just can have enough wiggle room, enough space inside the consciousness and flexibility to actually suspend that assumption that the images that come to us are coming from the past, that the dreams that come to us are coming from the past.

In terms of dreams, you may have seen this: how often we dream something and see many dreams. If we pay attention, not just to what happens in the days before, because certainly dreams pick up—Freud had a word for it—the remnants or the fragments, the debris, the flotsam and jetsam of the days before and use that. But not only that level of past, but also the deeper past and wounding and all that. But dreams pick up not just the past—they also kind of indicate and usher in the future. They open to the future. There's a forward-moving quality to dreams.

Now this could be something very banal: I ordered something ages ago and it just hasn't arrived, and then I have a dream and lo and behold, in the next one or two days the thing shows up after all this time. Or more commonly, something like I see an old friend once in a blue moon, I hear from them once in a blue moon, we get together once in a blue moon, and I have a dream about them, and one or two days later, in the next couple of days, they call.

Or something deeper for us, something more complex, like a dream comes and it has perhaps a particular kind of religious feeling to it. Or it has in it a particular kind of creativity. We dream in that way, and the dream touches us and moves us. There's a beauty to it. It goes deep. And then one or two days later, or a short time later—often that one or two days seems to be characteristic of dreams, this forwardness of dreams—a short time later, there is an opening or an advent, an arrival of something in the being related to the essence of that dream or that image that I had. Or there is at least, a few days later, the beginning or an initiation into some opening: a new spiritual direction, a new practice, a new kind of creativity that's really something that then unfolds over years. But the beginning happened just shortly after the dream.

So there's this quality of dreams as opening to, indicating, ushering in the future. And what does this imply?

What might this imply? And what is the self that experiences these kinds of dreams and images—premonitory, if that's the word?

What is the self? Is it just the result of the past? Just the result of my family upbringing and societal conditioning? Just the result of my genes and biological evolution? Of course, it involves all that—but only as part, perhaps only some levels.

If we pay attention, if we are open, and if our frame is open enough, we can see we are visited, we are summoned, we are called by visions, by dreams, by angels, if you like. And in that we're connected to the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal realm, connected to the angels of that realm. We're not separate from that dimension of existence, that imaginal realm.

You could say, of course, that that dimension is an element of the self, but you can also say we are an element, an aspect of that dimension. Both. And integral to that—integral to that dimension, as we've mentioned in other talks—is that the self is not just limited in the ways that we usually feel ourselves to be, spatially and temporally.

The self is more than just something spatial and temporal. I exist here, and I exist now, and I exist from this point to that point, birth to death, or as some say, even longer—lives longer than that, beyond death. But something in us, something of the self, a dimension of the self exists beyond space, beyond time.

We are not only trapped, or only, to borrow Heidegger's phrase, thrown into linear time, the inexorable marching of time—in his case, towards death. Sure, there's time. Sure, that's a fact, a dimension, an aspect of a certain dimension of our existence. But we are not only that.

We get this sense of the self, our being, being more than just spatial and temporal. Not just trapped in time, nor actually just trapped in space as it is usually conceived.

Both—again, repeating something I said before in another talk—both in the meditative playing with the lessening of fabrication, with unfabricating, with that spectrum of the fabrication of perception, and both through imaginal practice and entering into iconic images and magical and tantric worlds through these practices that we're doing in imaginal practice, through both that and through the experimenting with the fabrication of perception in meditation, time collapses, if you like, or explodes, and we have different tastes, different glimpses, different openings to eternity, to what is timeless.

We recognize through all of this, in this forward-lookingness of dreams, this premonitory aspect of images—we recognize that a dimension of the self is beyond space, beyond time, or dimensions of the self are beyond space and beyond time, and that in different ways as well.

Regarding this, we talked about Corbin talking about the angel out ahead and this idea of images—this telos, this future, calling us to something or something beyond time, then finding its way into our life as blessing, as challenge.

Listen to something from Henri Corbin. He says: "The ritual celebrated by man, the human being—the ritual celebrated by human being in the temple of his being—is his own metamorphosis, his own transformation, transubstantiation, bringing to birth within himself of that form of himself, which conforms to the angelic archetype." This is the angel out ahead.

And through imaginal practice, this ritual celebrated by human being in the temple of their own being is your own metamorphosis, your own transformation into that angel out ahead, the bringing to birth within himself, herself of that form of oneself which conforms to the angelic archetype. He gives a capital to the F of form. There's a kind of platonic idea there of something kind of inherently existing, which we're playing with as an idea, but not holding to as a truth. You can also see the dependent arising of that.

But note also a difference here with, say, a lot of tantric practices in tantric Buddhism, where the ritual celebrated, the angel or deva or deity visualized and practiced with and imagined is actually pre-prescribed. I've touched on this before. In Corbin's version of Islamic practice, the angel is, so to speak, conformed to the individual, to the person. The archetype is not universal.

So this angel out ahead is very particular to me. You also get that in Jung—the individuation, that an archetype is something we never actually experience. What we experience is individualized images that appear to us conditioned both by the archetype that we can never know and the way that forms the image, but also by my personality and cultural conditioning, all kinds of things.

But something here needs opening up in the view—to say this over and over again. And in particular, in relation to suffering, in particular in relation to the self, and the suffering self, in this case.

So, taking that direction from what we just talked about, from Corbin and tantra, and again, Nietzsche refers to seeing the madman—in other words, your craziness, your difficulty—seeing the madman as the mask and a speaking trumpet, the mask and the speaking trumpet of a divinity.

Back to the idea of persona that I mentioned actually on other retreats, but this—my personhood, including my craziness, my struggles, my weirdness, my eccentricities and my suffering—the madman as the mask and speaking trumpet of a divinity. Persona—what sounds through my personality, my dukkha, the particularities of my life.

How do we tend to view and conceive of our madness, our suffering? It's often not as the speaking trumpet of divinity, or if a person does that, then it tends towards some kind of mania, and it's over-literalized. It's reified. It's clung to. There's too much identification. So there's an art here.

We're going to come back to that delicate, tricky art that involves skill, navigation, and insight.

But in all of this, to pick up something mentioned earlier, we see so much the tendency toward reduction to what we call secular humanism—in the way we regard what the human is, in the way we regard our suffering, in the ways we regard what healing actually is and involves. There's this reduction to secular humanism that's become so endemic, so saturated, so sedimented into our modern view, our modernist view.

So healing the past may actually be—I would say it's actually only one level of healing. Healing the past is only one level of healing. It's only one conception of what healing can extend to and embrace. For us so often nowadays, that's what healing means, psychologically at least.

What about the healing of the imaginal? The healing of concretizing, liberation from concretizing, liberation and healing from any fixed singleness of vision, singleness of view—whether that's physicalism or, on the other extreme, a kind of New Age reificationism of angels or whatever it is. Any kind of fundamentalism, religious or secular—secular humanism, whatever it is—a liberation from all that and a liberation of soulfulness and soulmaking. That's another level of healing: the liberation of soulmaking and soulfulness, the full liberation of the spaces and the depths into which that soulmaking can expand.

Now over time, over a lot of practice and a lot of work, maybe a person—or usually over time—maybe a person experiences both levels of healing: the healing of the past and the difficulties of upbringing and societal conditioning and schooling and family and all that craziness, and this other healing, the healing of the imaginal, the healing of the fixedness of view, the healing of fundamentalism and the rigidities, and the healing—the liberation of soulmaking, the fullness of that, or the allowing of more and more fullness of that.

The person experiences both, opens to both, goes through both, and looks back and may feel that this other kind of healing, this second kind of healing—the healing of the imaginal, of the soulmaking—feels that actually of the two, this is the wider healing, the deeper healing, the more radical healing, and maybe often even the more necessary healing.

And again, we're back to this question of order. Do I need to do the healing of my past before I open to all this soulmaking, re-enchantment business? Oftentimes that's the assumption.

But I actually don't know. I think it varies. It really varies. It's a delicate, complex, individual question. But I would say that rather than an order being universally necessary—that's certainly not true, or even in an individual case—it's more a case of, if we really actually ask what needs to happen here, the fruits of each kind of healing, or gaining the fruits, or a successful healing, if we can even use such a word, that's actually dependent in each case, whether we're talking about healing the past or healing the imaginal.

In each case, it's dependent on the development of certain skills, certain capacities, certain insights, certain abilities, psychologically and in relationship. The fruits of each depend on that, rather than "I do this first, and then I need to do this, and then I need to do that."

So each one of these healing dimensions needs a whole host of capacities. If we're healing the past, it involves compassion. It involves the different flavors of compassion. It involves learning how to feel our feelings and tune into them and hold them and have the capacity for them. It involves all kinds of psychological discrimination, all kinds of things. Many kinds of skills and capacities come together to allow that healing of the past. I've talked about that in other places; I'm not going to go into it now.

But the same thing with healing in the imaginal. So each of them are dependent on different capacities, rather than "this needs to happen, this kind of healing, and then that kind of healing." This kind of grounding, then that kind of grounding, or whatever.

So in regard, as I said before, in regard to healing, in regard to suffering, in regard to self, there's this so commonly a reduction to some kind of secular humanist idea, a reduction to secular humanism. And even in regard to art and our relationship with art—Oscar Wilde wrote, "All bad poetry springs from genuine feeling."

Now, for some people, they'd be like, "What?" All bad poetry springs from genuine feeling, he wrote. What's going on there?

Well, there's a couple of meanings here. "Genuine" is from the Latin genuinus, and it actually means inborn. It's different than what we usually take it to mean. Inborn. So all bad poetry springs from inborn feeling—that is, we could interpret what he's saying this way: my personal feeling. All bad poetry is usually too personal. It's too conceived in terms of, again, the secular human, not something beyond the human or divine or whatever.

All bad poetry springs from genuine feeling—something that's too me and my history or whatever it is. There's something too simplistically one-dimensionally human about it.

But of course, "genuine" has this more common meaning to do with authenticity as opposed to artificiality. And again, that also I think is implicit in what Oscar Wilde wrote: "All bad poetry springs from genuine feeling." So this idea that we have to be authentic and true to what is authentic, and what is so-called authentic carries much more soul and weight and importance than what is artificial, what is artifice.

So what—again, I'm actually going to quote Nietzsche again. He wrote, "The worst of all tastes: the taste for the unconditional." Now he's unpacking something that's a little complex there. The worst of all tastes is the taste for the unconditional. By the unconditional, he doesn't mean the unconditioned, the unfabricated, in the way that Buddhists might use that, or some Buddhists might use that word. He means the word conceived in a certain way that leaves no space for art, for the emptiness of things and for the creativity to come into relationship with things. It's just unconditional. It cannot be conditioned by our creativity or realized to be a dependent arising.

So the worst of all taste is the idea that wants this or that or anything—concept or self or whatever—to not be empty, to not be open to the art of creative interpretation and shaping. This is the worst of all tastes, he said. And he goes on: "It's cruelly misused and made a fool of until a man learns to introduce a little art into his feelings, even to venture trying the artificial, as genuine artists of life do."

To introduce a little art into his, into her feelings, and even to venture trying the artificial. So this encouragement, again, to not be shy of artifice.

You can see that in metta practice, very, very simply. And if you like, we're acting as if something were true, as if a certain view was true, or entering into something. I may be angry and I'm saying, "May you be well," etc. There's a little bit of artifice there—actually a lot of artifice. In some cases I'm not pretending that I'm feeling that, but actually there's a place for—you see, as we get more and more into understanding and experiencing the fabrication of things, how much our experience, our feelings in this case, emotions and vedanā, actual sensation of pleasantness, unpleasantness, is shaped and shapeable by the view.

Artifice, and allowing artifice into our feelings, our emotions and our vedanā. We learn to actually shape and reshape and refabricate even basic pleasantness and unpleasantness. What is unpleasant can be very often learned. We can learn how to convert that into the pleasant just by shifting the view. And we see how much the view of something contributes to its shaping.

So for example, seeing the divinity of my emotion, allowing that artifice in, actually shapes the unfolding of that emotion.

CHAPTER 46

The Gift and the Artifice of Self (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this opening talk from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" series, Rob Burbea examines the complex cultural inheritance that shapes our understanding of self. He explores how Western culture combines scientific reductionism, Christian ethics, and individualism in confusing ways, while Buddhist teachings of anattā (not-self) can lead to suspicion of selfhood altogether.
>
> Burbea contrasts our secular, "purely human flourishing" with traditional views that see human beings as sacred vessels for divine manifestation - citing beautiful examples from African tribal traditions and mystical Christianity. He critiques both materialist reductionism and rigid dharma interpretations that view the self as "just a process," arguing these limit our capacity for genuine enchantment.
>
> The talk introduces the need for flexibility of self-view, drawing on Nietzsche's concept of "soul as subjective multiplicity." Burbea suggests that true re-enchantment requires elastic concepts that allow us to discover and invent different dimensions of selfhood, moving beyond the constraints of both secular materialism and dogmatic spiritual reductionism. This foundation sets the stage for exploring how suffering can become soul-making when we expand our conception of what it means to be human.

As human beings now, we almost all move in many different subcultures of the larger culture. It seems to me that our larger culture is a mix—we've inherited a mixture of historical cultures. We've inherited the perspectives of the Western so-called Enlightenment and scientific materialism, that kind of reductionist modernism of modernity I've been referring to. Yet still lingering, less ostensibly in their religious forms but still lingering, is the ethics or value system of Christianity.

In regards to the self—the views we have of selves, of what a human being is, the sense of ourselves and the parameters of ourselves—the larger culture is actually confused, simply as a result of history. We've inherited this reductionism that goes with science. We've inherited all that I've pointed out about modernity. But within that is, or part of that is, an emphasis on individualism. So it's a very individualistic culture and a humanist culture in terms of what a human being is—the range of that not really including the divine so much.

We've inherited all of that, and these ideas of virtue or value or sin, even if we don't use that word, that come from the Christian tradition. For example, pride is a sin and humility is a virtue. Now whether we don't consider ourselves Christian at all, those values in regard to the self—self-effacing, not blowing one's own trumpet too much—we don't like that when we see it in other people, we try not to do it because we know others won't like it in us. There's a kind of humility, which is often a false humility that runs through the culture, at the same time as being an individualistic culture, a culture of who's going to win, who's going to lose, of trying to pump up the individual in various ways, of the individual feeling alienated from society. All of this is wrapped up together and makes quite a confusing mix for us to have inherited in relationship to the sense and the view of self and other.

And then within that, in spiritual cultures, particularly the culture of Buddhadharma, we have this notion of no-self or not-self or the self is empty. This is, for a start, a difficult teaching for people to understand. I think it has lots of degrees of depth. There are many ways that we can talk about the self being empty in this way and that way. They're not the same. And there are levels there.

But what happens within Buddhadharma culture with that is that there's a suspicion of self quite often, or we tend to dismiss someone surrounded by, saturated by these kinds of teachings and attitudes. They tend to maybe lean their orientations in life in a way that self and the enchantment of self will sound suspicious, and maybe self and all that involves is a little bit denigrated and dismissed, or a lot. It happens less now as we have more psychotherapy imbuing dharma teachings or inside meditation teachings, but still, there's a tension here that comes from the complexity, the mixed messages in our cultures regarding self and the sense of self and the view of self and what a human being is. Self and other.

I want to talk a little bit about re-enchanting self and other, and a little bit about what might be involved in that. We've touched on some of that already.

Not as an aside, but as something relevant, there are accusations from some, especially of a more secular persuasion within the dharma—a secular agenda within the dharma—that almost view the whole point, or one of the main thrusts of Buddhadharma, what the Buddha was saying, as this kind of shattering of any notion of soul or self or divinity. That was the Buddha's central project originally. And then what happened historically over time is he died and that message got lost, and then lo and behold, foolish humanity brings back in old ideas that he would have utterly rejected in his secularism—ideas of selves and souls and divinities and all that. So the Mahayana and the Vajrayana teachings are regarded as a pollution and a devolution, as opposed to evolution, of the teachings. There are impurities coming in from other systems, from human lack of honesty and stiff upper lip and clarity and steel in the face of our real existential situation.

All this is there. Now, I've touched on this before, but hidden in there is an unacknowledged fantasy, an image of the Buddha, of the dharma, of the history, and what Nietzsche calls the glorification of origins—a thing is more authentically itself when at the beginning of its so-called existence and then gets downhill from there. The glorification of origins or the glorification of beginnings. All of that is fantasy and image.

Now, we can point that out. We could also play the game a little bit and say, if we want to, that if we want to play this game of fantasy of origins, actually rather than concepts like divine, divinity, God, angel, self, soul—whatever these words that we use now and that we're seeking to give permission to and re-enchant—rather than those, we can say actually it's the realism and the reification that is so much at the core and at the basis of a lot of contemporary dharma, as well as many other spiritual traditions nowadays, contemporary spiritualities. That's more of a return to self, if you like, and God, if you like, to use these words in their larger context.

Self in the Mahayana means not just personal self, but also phenomenal self—the self of phenomena. Self really means any belief in this thing, whether it's a human thing or an inanimate thing or an atom or whatever. Self really means the belief in that as having inherent existence, and it applies not just to human beings, but it applies to phenomena as well. Personal self and phenomenal self—both are empty.

But it's that return to the phenomenal self, to the kind of belief in the reality, a basic reality of things, whether it's an atomistic reality or just the reality of the existential situation, the reality of matter—all that conceived of in a certain way—that is the return of self. And God—words like life with a capital L or this—they are the god of secular modernism. They're kind of trump words that trump everything else. They're four-letter words that get used actually vaguely, but as if they're something real, as if we're talking about the same thing.

So it's the realism and the reification, one could say, that is more the return to self and God. And it's evident in all these different kinds of teachings and the conceptions of the path and the goal, and the almost ubiquitous language of "what is," of "bare attention," of "being with things as they are"—a phrase that the Buddha did use. The Buddha didn't use "bare attention," but used that phrase, "things as they are," though he meant it in a very different way. He meant things as they are—things are empty. "Be here now," "life as it presents itself"—we've touched on this before, but we could say that actually it's in the realism and the reificationism that the teachings are polluted, if we want to play along with that game of fantasies.

The most important thing is to acknowledge fantasy—the fantasy of Buddha, fantasy of Dharma, fantasy of history, all of that. So it's complex within this confusion that I was alluding to earlier, the confusion of cultural messages and cultural inheritances. And it's confusing.

As we've been unfolding on this retreat, we've explored different types of enchantment. When we talk about enchanting the self, we don't mean only what we might call spiritual enchantment—the kind that dissolves the person into universal oneness of this or that flavor, oneness that doesn't emphasize particularity but moves toward the universal. We've also been differentiating from what we've called, somewhat clumsily, immature imaginal enchantment and mature imaginal-based enchantment.

So all this is complex. When we come to the question of how to unfold or find a way forward with a re-enchantment of self and other, it's complex for all these reasons. It's complex because we have psychological needs, and there are certain psychological paradigms mixed in with all that about what constitutes a healthy self, a psychological self. These too are historically conditioned.

Again, we tend to think that our current view from modern psychotherapy and history—or depending on your allegiance to different contemporary psychologies—we tend to think that's real. Whereas a notion, say, from medieval times or ancient times about what constituted a self, what even a self was, and what constituted a healthy or unhealthy self, is vastly different now, historically vastly different. We just take it all for granted as reality, as, again, this subtraction story of shaking off prior illusions, encrustations, unnecessary veilings of what is a basic truth about self, reality, health, and psychological health.

So into this complexity as well is the whole delicate, complex question of psychologies, self-notions, psychological paradigms, et cetera. Somehow we need to include all this and navigate among all that in talking about re-enchanting the self and the other. I can only do a little bit of that in this talk, but we'll try.

One of the characteristics of modernity, of the dominant view of the culture in the West today, is that self and divinity have become separated. Or rather, in the dominant view—and this goes back even before modernity to certain entrenched dogmas in Christianity—there was a separation of the human and the divine. In the more mystical traditions, that separation was either never agreed upon, or different practices and teachings came in to re-wed the human and the divine in many different ways and at many different levels, both as a starting conception and as something to move toward. We'll maybe touch on some of that.

But within the dominant contemporary paradigm is this separation of the self and the divine, if there's any divinity, sense of divinity, or concept of divinity left at all in the general picture of what a human being is and what the cosmos is.

The philosopher Charles Taylor, the Canadian philosopher, in his massive tome A Secular Age, offers one way of defining what constitutes secularism: it's characterized by being a time in the evolution or history of human society where it's quite possible for many, if not most people, to have a goal in life of flourishing—purely human flourishing. In other words, one can live one's life, and really everything in one's life—one's work, one's relationships, whatever else it is, the food one eats—it's all seen from the perspective and with the goal of only human flourishing.

At a certain point in the West, in the last hundred years, that became quite possible and quite acceptable as the orientation to life that many people were able to have. Taylor claims it's the first time in human history, though I don't know if that's true, because actually reading the Pali Canon, you get the sense that there were certain sects or teachers who promulgated just such a view. How popular that was in the wider society, I don't know.

But this is his almost defining characteristic of secularism, or one of them. And I think it's quite interesting—this word "flourishing" has become so popular in some sociological and psychological and political discourses. Purely human flourishing. In other words, with no reference or need to have a relationship with divinity, or the flourishing is something that is a flourishing of something more than the human. What Taylor calls "self-sufficing humanism."

The human as conceived according to modernity, with that kind of flatness and exclusion of divinity that I've been alluding to repeatedly, and living one's life for the sake of flourishing within those parameters of purely human flourishing—very, very normal nowadays, very normal in our society, characteristic of secularism.

This is actually interesting historically. When Freud wrote his book Civilization and Its Discontents, he said there are two purposes of civilization or culture. One is to protect human beings against nature, and the other is to adjust the mutual relations of human beings in different ways, in terms of laws and things—protecting against nature, adjusting mutual relations.

Probably, well, maybe thirty years ago or some decades ago, a lot of politicians and sociologists would have said, "We've accomplished these now in the West." I would put a huge question mark on whether we have been so intent on protecting ourselves—so-called protecting ourselves from nature—that now we are actually more in danger from climate change and loss of species and environmental pollution and degradation. And as to our mutual relations, it seems to me that also needs quite a lot of work, though a lot of people would have thought that way.

So these two purposes that Freud pointed to were considered done, and the purpose of civilization was then allowed to expand and add this human flourishing. The very purpose of our civilization nowadays—now that we are, you know, much more protected from nature, many of our mutual relations are taken care of—despite all the lacunae there and the glaring problems that remain, what came in as an implicit or explicit purpose of culture was this goal: culture, or civilization, served human flourishing, humanistic flourishing.

Human flourishing. But again, what does it mean? What does it mean, this word that's so commonly used now—flourishing has become popular. "May you flourish," "allowed to flourish," and so forth. What does it mean? What is it assumed to involve? More than just the basic requisites: food and home and water. And again, even in the United States and the United Kingdom, even these requisites are not guaranteed to every member of society.

But over and above that—the thrust of this talk is not about that—but over and above the requisites, what is human flourishing assumed to involve? And what is left out or actually overlooked in what it means for a human being to flourish or what is a part of human flourishing?

It's worth pointing out that historically, arenas or containers or forms or avenues that care for and provide for and allow and nourish soulfulness—historically they have been part of the stable civilizations and cultures of the human past for millennia. It's only the modern West that is, historically speaking, strange in its lack of emphasis on soulfulness, in the way that it doesn't really integrate that need into its forms, into its rituals. It comes in anyway—it can't help but come in—but it's not really consciously thought about or provided for, probably in the best ways that are possible, because it's simply not part of the dominant paradigm in discourse.

So it gets squeezed out of public spaces, it gets squeezed out of public discourses and public activities and engagements. The self is regarded a certain way, and the whole movement of one's life between birth and death—what it is to be a human being—is all regarded in the dominant way within our different subcultures and all this complexity. But this leveling, this "only human," this secular humanism and the way the human being is now regarded in the culture...

Compare that to something I heard a few months ago: that in Burkina Faso, in Africa, in the tribes, in the countryside, in the rural villages, when a woman is pregnant—at about six months—the elders of the village or the tribe call the woman to a kind of council, a meeting. They put her into a trance, or she goes into a trance, and they address themselves, the elders of the tribe address themselves to the baby in her womb. They ask that baby, while the mother is in trance, two questions:

"What do the gods want to manifest through you?"

And the second question: "What needs to change in the village to make space for you?"

The mother in her trance is spoken through by the baby, and the elders listen, and they take it in.

Can you hear the way that the human being is being seen? The depth of the respect, the beauty of that, and how such a notion simply has no space in our contemporary society—not just by virtue of the structure of the society, but also by virtue of the structure of the thinking.

Compare that kind of reverence, orientation, respect, openness, sacredness of the human being, of the self being born into this world, being born into the world of society and manifestation, and being born into its individual place within that society and its calling. All of this is there.

Compare that with what has been exposed by various Western philosophers and social critics over the last few hundred years: a kind of individualism that's actually manipulated by capitalism and by the market economy. So we are regarded as pawns for the advertising industry, for the whole way the economy works—consumerism is necessary, you know, all these things. Michel Foucault talks about the objectification of subjects. The human subject, the human self becomes an object in a kind of power play. And the depth of one's humanity, what it means to be a self, is effectively disregarded, reduced in the most complete way.

Before Foucault there was the Frankfurt School—Adorno and Horkheimer that I alluded to earlier—who talked about the culture industry, the way that a whole industry was being set up through capitalism that really manipulated individuals in lots of different ways. Very, very different scope, range, sense, view of human beings.

Again, compare that with Islam, where they say the cardinal sin is the forgetfulness of who one is. In other words, to forget the sacredness, the depths, the range, the divinity of the human being, of the self, of your individual self and your individual callings and all the aspects of yourself. That's actually the cardinal sin: this forgetfulness of who one is.

In the teachings of Buddha-nature, in the Buddha Dharma, your true self—if one uses that language—or your essence, or at least your capacity, is for divinity. So the human being is something much, much more in its range and dimensions than this flatland version.

And again, in the Christian tradition, they talk about the imago Dei, being made in the image of God. And the possibility of the—in the mystical tradition—the possibility of imitatio Dei, but more than that, the incarnation of Christ, the mystical incarnation of Christ in the depths of my mind, in the depths of my heart, in my soul. There's a transformation, a transubstantiation that's already there in potential and at one level in actuality, but that can be incarnated in the fuller sense of that word—brought into manifestation, brought into this world of materiality as we see it in the different ways we see it.

So in modernity and nowadays in our Western culture, we get mixed messages regarding the self and the individual and individualism. Just as we get mixed messages—and this is all woven together—about desire versus greed, and how desire is trumped, and greed is bad, and sexuality. Mixed messages are hugely confusing. And all these aspects of self—I'm going to come back to this.

So we're getting mixed messages about all kinds of things. And yet many people, though it may not be clearly articulated, are suffering from what we might call the disenchantment that's integral to modernism. We're trying to enchant the self.

People are living within these paradigms—oppressed and constrained by them, constrained by social structures. Something within them wants to re-enchant the self, wants to have an enchanted sense of self and other. People do find ways of doing this, or at least limited ways—on occasion, when in love for a period of time, and so forth. But they're trying to enchant the self without allowing a sense of depth and divinity. That's not permitted.

Often this attempted enchantment comes through what modern society and technology provides—in some ways a vast set of toys to play with. But in another way, we're given a very thin, meager palette and set of tools with which the self can be re-enchanted. So many people are trying to fashion a unique, interesting self—to appear to create something, to fashion and manifest what appears to be "this is me and I'm unique and I'm interesting."

Yet there might not actually be that much genuine interest there, because the whole view of the self is constrained. It can't be that interesting. And what are we given to accomplish this with? Consumption. Consumerism. You can buy these clothes, create a certain look, buy that car, whatever it may be.

We are rich—we live like kings compared to people in the past. Our standard of living is equivalent to what royalty would have experienced historically, probably way beyond that. And yet at one level we are poor. We are poor in terms of what we receive regarding our view of who we are, what the self is. We are impoverished and unable to re-enchant deeply within that paradigm and with those opportunities we're given.

In fact, the opposite happens. The superficial self-sense seeks enchantment through the manipulations of capital and consumerism—being manipulated by it, being a pawn in a larger game, but given just enough possibility to try desperately to fashion something interesting so that our money and consumerist thrust might accomplish that. But all that trying at that level actually goes back to create or preserve a superficiality of the self-sense.

Because the self-sense is superficial, we try to re-enchant it. We have very limited possibilities for that, and those very possibilities keep the self-sense superficial. So we're caught in something here, potentially.

Add to this another common idea—again, quite a modernist notion though we wouldn't recognize it as such—the idea of the authentic self, the real me. We feel we're told that we need to be authentic, that there's a true me, and we really feel that at times. This pulls me one way, while on the other side there's social pressure arising from how society is structured and the lack of inner depth in how a human being is conceived and felt to be.

So I have this other pressure: what do others think? As long as I don't have access to that depth, what others think and the social anxiety and pressure to conform or avoid judgment becomes enormous. These forces pull in different directions. I've got to be authentic to myself—there is an authentic self that I need to be somehow true to and in touch with. And on the other side: what do others think of me? Is it okay? Am I okay? Tell me I'm okay. What can I do and manipulate and spend on to make others think I'm okay? How am I in the eyes of others? Am I okay? Am I enough? Am I singled out as faulty in the eyes of others?

All this creates so much tension and, if you like, creativity-inhibiting confusion and constraints around this whole wish we have for an enchanted sense of existence and of self and other.

And we've talked about this—I'm repeating myself now—but if I see the self, if I see what a human being is as only really a product of evolution, of biological evolution, then this is what we get down to when we're really talking about what's real. You are a product—in your behavior, your choices, the way you perceive—it's all the product of evolution, all the product of neurology, of neurophysiology.

Now, for some people, that view can be enchanting. But if we're only that, it's probably not that enchanting. If we're regarded with a reductionist view, a biological reductionist view, it's difficult to have a sense of a really enchanted self. Reductionism inhibits that.

Enchantment needs this beyond. We need to be more than that. So of course, biology and neurophysiology and evolution and all of that, historical conditioning, everything. But there needs to be something beyond, something more than, in order for a sense of enchantment, as we said right from the beginning.

And again, you know, Dharma circles are so common nowadays. If we're talking about the self, view of self and other, there's this sometimes dogmatic kind of conclusion or assertion: "The Buddha said, or the truth of the self is, what the self really is, is a process." A biological process and a mental process. Sometimes, in some cases, the mental process is reduced to a biological process, a neuronal one, a brain process. But the self is the process. And sometimes people say, "I've cracked what the Buddha was saying. The self is a process. This is the true nature of things. Anything else is a bit of a delusion. The self is a process."

Now, I would say that's a certain level of meditative view or a way of looking at perception that's available to us—to feel ourselves as process moment to moment, aggregates arising of sensation and vedanā and perception and consciousness and intention. Useful at a certain level. A certain level of freedom will come out of that. But it's only a way of looking. It's only a certain level of perception.

It's not ultimately true. It's not ultimately true the self is a process. I've talked about this in other talks. I'm not going to go into it now. It's not ultimately true. It's definitely not the deepest. That perception of the self as a process does not yield for us the deepest freedom. Absolutely not. And nor is it particularly enchanting as a view of the self. The self is a moment-to-moment arising of conditioned, mechanistic flow, a conditioned arising of a moment of sensation and perception and neuronal functioning. We can try and enchant that view of process and talk about words like flow and bring in river imagery and all that kind of stuff, maybe to a certain extent. But there's problems with that. Not ultimately true, doesn't bring the deepest freedom, doesn't really open up the capacity and the range of possible enchantment.

Or then there's another kind of view: the self is really one with cosmic awareness or one with cosmic love or one with God, or the self is nothing, the self is a total illusion or whatever. And that's the real nature of the self. And that also, I would say, suffers from the same three lacks. It's not ultimately true. It's not ultimately true that the self is one. It's a level, it's a deep mystical experience, a level of perception, important, beautiful, as is the sense that the self, the perception of the self is nothing—it's absolutely nothing. But it's not ultimately true. I'd say it's wonderful and important to have that as a perception, as a level of perception and understanding. It's not ultimately true, it's not the deepest freedom, and it will not open up the deepest and the fullest enchantment.

What is necessary for re-enchanting, for really full, really deep, really wide re-enchantment—and delivering us from what is not ultimately true, what is not quite deeply freeing—is the flexibility of view that I keep harping on about. Flexibility of self-view and the insight legitimizing and underpinning that flexibility. Do you see all these different kinds of meditative and mystical experiences moving in and out and understanding how they arise and how they disappear? Seeing that fabrication, dependent arising of both self and perception. And then you start to see what's really true is this very flexibility. The flexibility of self-view legitimizes that flexibility and the moving in and out and the adopting of different self-views. There's an insight here of what actually is ultimately true.

And we need a conception, an insight, that allows, supports, and actually insists on a flexibility of self-view. Allows, supports, and insists on a flexibility of self-view. It's this that most fully allows not just the biggest freedom, is congruent with the ultimate truth, but also most fully allows the re-enchantment.

So we can add to this, if we ask this question: okay, there's all this confusion and this disenchantment in our worldview, our view of the cosmos, and our view of self, our sense of self. And to have a soulful re-enchantment of self and other—

Whenever I use "self" in this talk, everything I say about self applies to other as well—other selves, both as an idea and as applicable in practice. I can practice viewing an other in these different ways.

What's needed in re-enchanting self and other is a view and a conception of personality and of the personal relevance of what arises for us. Both within and without, in terms of the ideas of fate or destiny—including the difficult—somehow that needs to get included. I'm going to come back to this. That also needs to get included, not erased out in a universality.

We somehow want a kind of enchantment that really includes and even emphasizes not just the universal, but also the very personal, the very particular and the personal relevance of what arises for us inside and outside in our lives. And included in that is the difficult, is the dukkha.

So that view allows and supports senses of sacredness of the person and of the personal relevance of what arises for us. The events of our life are somehow integrated into a whole view of sacredness, of the sacredness of the self, of the person.

Does the conception of the self—view of the self that we're entertaining, or the wider view of the self—does the conception of the self, but also the conception of its relationship with experiences, and its relationship with the cosmos and time, allow a transformation in our relationship with suffering that becomes soul-making? So that suffering becomes soul-making.

Does our conception of self, its relationship with experiences, and its relationship or constellation with regard to the cosmos and time, allow a transformation of the relationship with suffering, with our suffering, all kinds of suffering, so that that suffering becomes soul-making? And how fully does it allow that and support that transformation? How deeply does it allow and support that transformation?

This is what needs to be included and involved in a soulful re-enchantment of self and other.

At an even more subtle level of what self means—just as subject rather than object, just as consciousness—what does it mean to be enchanted, to re-enchant that subtle level, just consciousness, that level of self as subject? Again, purely the complexities of neurology—there's a certain enchantment in that. How full, how deep?

Some ideas of Buddha nature, some versions of the idea of Buddha nature in Buddha Dharma teachings, some philosophies in the West—certainly in Neoplatonism and other currents through Western history, but also in Hegel, the German philosopher—regard the human subject, in one's subjectivity, meaning in one's consciousness, as divine, as included. There's a view that can be re-enchanted by giving it other dimensions and divinities. We'll come back to this.

But as I said a few minutes ago, somehow an opening of the view, the views and the conception of self, of what a human being is, and a flexibility of views and conceptions of self and other—this is necessary to re-enchantment.

This is again something from Nietzsche. He says that the belief that regards the soul as a monad, as an atomon—meaning as one thing, as indivisible—this belief ought to be expelled from science. It is not at all necessary, though, to get rid of "the soul" at the same time. In other words, we don't need to get rid of this idea of soul. But it's the idea of the soul as just this—one thing that's rigidified and fixed, where there's a singleness of you.

But the way is open, he continues, for new versions and refinements of the soul hypothesis. And then he runs through a few different possibilities, such conceptions as soul as subjective multiplicity—in the sense of plurality of soul and plurality of views of what the soul is.

He's saying, don't throw the baby out with the bathwater. There's something in the concept of soul. Or rather, we can extend and give a range of meanings to what we mean by soul that actually might be very fruitful. Don't run screaming or cry "that's illegal!" when people use words like self or soul. Concepts, when they're skillfully handled, when they're related to with insight, actually open things up. And I'll come back and say more about that.

Then he continues with this opening views up this way. He says the new psychologist, by precisely that act of opening up the notion of soul, condemn themselves to invention. They condemn themselves to invention. In other words, you have to be creative in the view and in the perception. We're back to this idea of art and creation.

And he says, by precisely that act, they condemn themselves to invention and—who knows—perhaps to discovery. So again, this ambiguity about creation and discovery. Right there, invention and discovery through the skillful and open use of a concept like soul.

In another work, Nietzsche offers a profound insight: "Some souls one will never discover unless one invents them first." This points to a deep understanding of the fundamental interplay between creation and discovery that characterizes our relationship with soul, self, and other. We are simultaneously inventors and discoverers of the very depths we encounter.

This is why we need the kind of elasticity I've been describing—an elasticity of concept, whether we speak of self or soul or any fundamental notion. This elasticity allows the soul-making dynamic to flourish fully. The eros, the psyche, and the logos—the eros and the images, the imaginal sense and the conceptual framework—can then feed each other, fertilize each other, open and expand and enrich and deepen each other. All of this vitality depends on the elasticity of the logos, of our conceptual understanding.

When that conceptual framework becomes elastic enough, then we can fall in love with the self. The sense of self—whether the self of other or the self of self—can become endlessly deep, complex, enriched, and filled with image. But if we regard a human being merely from a reductionist point of view—through the lens of biology or cognitive science or mechanistic reductions—then the image of self dies. It loses that essential element of mystery, of inexhaustibility that an image needs to remain alive, as we've explored in other talks.

There needs to be a kind of undefinability as part of that mystery and inexhaustibility. Any concept that serves soul-making—whether self or love or the divine, whether dharma or anything else—requires this quality of undefinability. This allows for an endless moving into mystery, ensuring there is always a beyond, an inexhaustibility that feeds the soul-making process.

Anything that matters deeply to us needs to retain a certain amount of undefinability, mystery, and inexhaustibility. Reductionist explanations that claim to sum everything up cannot allow for this essential quality. But I want to emphasize that we're speaking of undefinability and mystery as something fertile—not merely something undefinable about which we shrug and turn away, not something we dismiss as nonsense simply because it cannot be neatly defined or because it remains mysterious. This mystery is generative, creative, alive. It is the very ground from which our deepest discoveries emerge.

CHAPTER 47

The Imaginal and the Middle Way (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 51 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea responds to practitioners' concerns about sustaining imaginal practice beyond retreat. He addresses the challenge of returning to unsupportive cultural contexts, emphasizing the importance of nourishment through reading, listening, and community support. Rather than continuous practice, he advocates for developing agility—brief moments of shifted perception that become increasingly accessible throughout daily life.
>
> Burbea explores the spectrum between practicing for personal growth versus divine service, noting how both can coexist and how one's position may shift over time. He discusses the delicate balance of the middle way—neither reifying experiences as absolutely real nor dismissing them entirely. This razor's edge, he suggests, actually becomes a vast playing field as understanding of emptiness deepens and an artistic sensibility develops.
>
> The conversation touches on integrating renunciatory aspects of traditional Buddhism with creative and intellectual pursuits, viewing these as archetypal callings that can be honored imaginally without requiring concrete life choices. Burbea also addresses concerns about religious ecstasy and potential psychological risks, recommending the cultivation of cooling equanimity alongside warmth, and conscious contact between blissful states and dukkha for integration. The session concludes with discussion of dark gods and shadow aspects, acknowledging that different souls require different approaches to the sacred, with some needing extensive work with light before integrating darkness, while others require both simultaneously for authentic spiritual development.

So again, just a reminder, we're recording the Q&As. But if you're not comfortable with having your question recorded, just say that, and we can pause it. No problem. Anyone, please?

Andrea: I have a question following on from what Lawrence said in the last session, which was more of a doubt of the process of the imaginal for him as a person, but this is more of a fear, really, about returning to the context of home. Particularly as it relates to here seeing your own divinity with so much permission and so much love and support. And it's been hard, even then, at times. So to return to a place that just feels in many ways that it doesn't support this kind of work. How can we take courage and continue?

Can everyone hear that? Hopefully we'll speak to that in the closing day. But the culture does not support that. In fact, the culture probably thinks it's unhealthy and mad, dangerous, et cetera. If there is something in you that feels moved, called to that vision of things, or at least moving in and out of that vision of things, then just like any practice, it needs support.

I was just reflecting a minute ago—it's pretty amazing that we can come together for less than a week and all this stuff can happen, you know, and people having experiences and understandings and connecting things and struggling with all that. Which kind of tells me it's more available. A lot of this stuff is more available than we tend to think or assume.

I think the secret being off retreat—and I will repeat this—is you need to be nourished. Now it doesn't mean 24 hours of every day, every day of the week. It means getting enough, enough input of different views. Because everywhere we look in society, this isn't the view that you're going to get. And we'll be talking about this in the talks tonight and tomorrow night. What is the cultural view of self? What does the culture do with self? We're inundated by that, surrounded by that. Ways of thinking about the self, pressures on the self. The self is this, it's not that. It's supposed to feel this way and at the same time it's contradictory—it's supposed to be doing something else.

So what's important, I think, is getting enough of another message. And that could be through reading. It could be through listening. It could be through friends who are also interested in that. And there's sharing and there's mutual back and forth and support and listening and other people's ideas.

I think we underestimate—and this goes for all kinds of practice and opening to the mystical in its whole range—it needs a lot of support. But that support doesn't need to be continuous. It just needs little openings, little injections, little short readings or whatever it is.

And that goes for practice as well. If we go back to the beginning of the retreat, when I said not emphasizing continuity, not emphasizing focusing the mind, et cetera. What I'm emphasizing or what I'm hoping to get instead is this sense of agility. And that means in one's daily life, in the busyness, in the demands and stresses, there are little moments, little pockets in the day where it doesn't have to even be a half an hour, 45 minute hour sitting—little pockets in the day where there can be this shift of the way of looking.

And that gets more and more agile. And absolutely do not underestimate those. You think, it would be better if I could do a long retreat, it would be better. Not necessarily. Absolutely not necessarily. There can be these little moments and just become these shifts of tapping into something imaginal, cosmic oasis, whatever—divinity in this, that self. They just become much more available, much more frequently available, much more accessible. And don't believe the assumptions of the mind that think they're not. Practice. Practice.

And as I said, I emphasize the flexibility of the way of looking, the agility of the movement of the way of looking over continuity for this kind of work. And actually also for insight work as I would conceive it in terms of understanding emptiness, etc.

[responding to a participant's question about practicing for the benefit of all beings versus divine intention]

You can use the bodhisattva word instead if you want. Could everyone hear that? So Daya is asking about practicing for the benefit of all beings, wondering if that's different from divine intention. For me it's not—it feels complete.

First of all, it's not either-or. It's not so black and white. There's a spectrum there and we move along that spectrum. So at times, or even periods of our life, it's totally appropriate to view the practice as for myself—for my growth, for my healing and all that. And other times, it's just flipped and practice is about practicing for God. Not for the realization of God, but for God.

You could say for bodhisattva, though I'd like to nuance a little bit an alternative to what you said as well. So you could say practicing for the Buddha, or it's the Buddha practicing, or the Buddha is creating the Buddha through my practice. God is making God through my practice.

But not too quickly. The first thing is that there's a range and we may—people fall in different places. No one's forcing you to be in this place or that place on a range ever. I just want to expand the possibility of the idea that there is a spectrum here. Someone's just hearing the idea, then a person can decide where they want to be on that range.

And we move over years. It might be that a certain amount of healing is necessary, a certain amount of coalescing or consolidation of self is necessary before one can then offer that up and let that go and see the whole thing from the perspective of the divine. So that's the first thing—that's really for everyone.

But in terms of really trying to keep this word divinity open so that if that's what works for you, great. It's interesting that I've been using—we've been using the word God and divine more on this retreat than say Buddha or Buddha nature. But you can think of them interchangeably. Even Buddha nature has a range of meanings in the different traditions, people arguing about what it means.

So it's up to you. If that's what is alive for you, then go for it. I still think there's a difference—two distinctions that may be possible just to point out. Again, not saying you have to do anything at all, we're just talking about possibilities.

One is this thing about levels and dimensions. So it could be that one is serving all beings or seeing one's practice in the service of all beings, but all beings is seen in what we're calling a kind of flat way. There's nothing wrong with that, but it doesn't have this other dimensionality, the sense of what a being is or what a human being is and what exactly I'm serving when I serve a human being. It's a bit—what I would call—modernist humanist. It's just a bit flat.

Now if that works for someone, if that's what they dedicate their life to and that's meaningful to them and that's alive to a certain extent in their soul and that's what they want, great. Absolutely wonderful. I really don't want to get into "you have to see it this way, you have to see it that way." Just in the language used, the language didn't communicate this sense of the beings. Now, it might be that that's there for you anyway.

So who is being served? What is a human being? And who is the one serving? What is involved in the serving? Or rather, what is the one serving? What is the bodhisattva made up of? What comprises a bodhisattva?

And that relates to the second thing. It's a bit like—okay, if we put it in more Buddhist terms—I might be meditating on a tantric deity, and my purpose can be to grow my qualities so that I serve all beings. And extending that a little bit, my purpose can be serving that deity. Like, my practice is doing that deity's work. It's part of that. And even—who is it really who's doing my practice? It's the deity. Who is it really who's speaking right now? It's the deity.

In some respects, these are really subtle distinctions, quibbling with words, but actually there's a range here of different dimensions or ways we're conceiving practice. So it could be the Bodhisattva, the one whose aspiration is to serve all beings. It could also be the cosmic Buddha—not a Bodhisattva, but one who has already arrived, already complete. It's already the perfect Dharmakaya manifesting in your practice, with the perfect Sambhogakaya and the perfect Nirmanakaya, the perfect manifestation.

That doesn't mean one becomes stupid and thinks everything one does is exactly appropriate and perfect, that no one can criticize. There's a kind of multi-dimensionality of the view. In this moment, as you're listening right now, this looking and listening is Samantabhadra, is the cosmic Buddha, and it's also the fumbling, foible-filled human being. Do you see? So there's this multiplicity.

What I really want to stress, personally, is that I find it troubling to be told how to view things, or to only be allowed a certain limited view. Unfortunately, that's too common in our world, and it's even common in the Buddhist world nowadays—different sects, secular Buddhism, and all this. It's almost like: "This is the only view."

What matters to me is that there's a plurality of views, because people's souls want different things, need different things, need different views. And there are many people who are actually comfortable moving between views. So even this aspect you're asking about—you can move between different views at different times and have that spectrum of views available.

It's like, if we take the art metaphor—if I say to you that you can only have one piece of art that you get to listen to or look at, that's hard. We want choice. We want a range. We want a range of moves, a range of all kinds of possibilities. Same with views.

There's one related thing around what you mentioned—it feels like such a razor's edge between this conceiving way of looking and belief. I want that to be really clear because I don't want to go into belief territory. But this whole thing about the razor's edge was also in a talk not on this retreat, and it's really important. This has come up several times, this question about real and not real, and it's the middle way in the Dharma. That's the middle way.

Two things. One is: my experience is that what seems like this really fine tightrope walking act between reifying and dismissing, between believing and denigrating—what looks like a razor's edge, this razor-thin tightrope act—the more we either understand emptiness or liberate that artistic view I was talking about, or develop certain philosophical perspectives, that razor's edge, which appears so thin that we might fall off one side or the other, actually becomes a huge playing field. If we can find our entry into that middle way, it actually opens up all the possibilities. It doesn't feel tight at all.

All I can say is—and apparently there was one teacher who, whatever anyone asked him, would just say "more practice is required," which is a little unhelpful—but in a way, I'm partly saying that, especially about the emptiness piece. The artistic piece is something different people find their way into even before they understand the emptiness aspect. It's just a mode of being, an artistic attitude or sensibility.

But also, I would say you're going to wobble. One is going to wobble. I've said this to several people: the fact that you're asking, the fact that you're cautious, it shows the awareness, the carefulness, the care, the alertness and being on the lookout. It's a healthy doubt.

You can wobble, and you can find your balance again. And you can wobble either way—in dismissal or in over-reification. I would say, expect it to happen. Because maybe you've felt like you've done it so much before and then it was so painful, or it led to bad consequences. But this doubt, the sincerity in your question, the integrity and openness and vulnerability in your question—it will prevent it from being so extreme.

But you will wobble. You'll fall off that way and then you'll fall off this way. And this is a micro thing—it's okay. You'll see it's not... there are micro wobbles usually, rather than this whole big lifetime plunged into the abyss of reification or whatever. Do you see?

So I hear the caution and the vulnerability and the pain there. I could of course be wrong, but my sense is it's not dangerous in the same way because of all that care. And it's almost like: don't be afraid.

As I said, it becomes not a tightrope act, actually, as you get into it. But let's use that analogy. When the tightrope walker is learning to tightrope walk, they get up on something this high, and they're falling off thousands of times. It's part of the deal. Or what's that thing about horse riding? You just have to learn to fall off? I've never actually ridden a horse. But yeah, or bike riding, or whatever it is. Part of the problem is the fear of the thing. And actually you realize these micro instances of falling one way and the other are just part of the learning.

And part of the deal.

Or... what's that thing about horse riding? It's like you just have to learn to fall off? I've never actually seen a horse. Yeah, or bike riding, or whatever it is. Part of the problem is the fear of the thing. And actually you realize these micro falling one way and the other.

And some people have a tendency to fall off more to the left, to the reification. And some people have a tendency to fall off more to the kind of nihilistic dismissal of everything. But generally, we just keep falling off.

And as we go deeper, you could say, or get more experience with all this, we get less afraid of falling off. It becomes less of a sort of big life catastrophe—you know, I'm stuck there for ten years or whatever. And we recognize it, and it's less of a big deal, and we can just find our way again.

So it's a really important question, but my sense is let yourself play. You know, children playing—they fall over, it's fine, they get up. That's the way forward.

This kind of relates to the last two questions, which is about moving back into classical meditation teachings and still wanting to engage seriously with that, and to take things like renunciation seriously. But then also recognizing that a lot of those renunciatory approaches can end up being kind of soul-shrinking rather than soul-making. I'm wondering how to balance the two.

So Andy's asking about the attraction to sort of more classical Theravadan-style Buddhism with its renunciation aspects, and how to balance that with these other things we're talking about. When you say renunciation, can you give me an example of that?

Well, I mean something like... when you talk about attitude to sexuality, for example, or to art, to aesthetic pleasure, to political engagement—it's like trying to love and care for all these things, but at the same time recognizing that they're going to be pushed aside, or you're being told, "Don't bother." And then the fear comes up: "Oh, but perhaps I am indulging too much."

Yeah. Perhaps you are. Just kidding.

One way of approaching the question is through fantasy, or through the recognition of fantasy. The renunciation is not just a good idea—it's actually alive for you as something that's attractive as a fantasy, a way of living. Do you understand? As is the artistic sensibility and the intellectual and the creative and all that.

So you have, as we've been saying several times in groups, you are a multitude. There are lots of archetypal callings pulling on your soul or inhabiting your soul. That's multiple blessings, and it ain't easy. Because sometimes they just pull in different directions. Sometimes one goes quiet for a while and one is more dominant. Sometimes they're active at the same time and it's not clear which way to go.

But one can have a life, I feel very much, where actually all of this is included. What partly allows that is sensing some of these modes—let's say the mode of renunciation—as image, as archetype, and letting that image be alive, or the artist, or whatever it is.

I think I shared in some talks, one image that's alive for me is the jazz musician. I was a jazz musician for many years, so it's alive in me. But that's an image that can live on in me and come up in all kinds of subtle ways and subtle moments without me needing to give up everything and go start practicing my instrument again and going out being a professional jazz musician. You understand? The image, fantasy, flavor of jazz music can come up with nothing to do with music. It can be there.

Also, the monk is very alive. And for a period in my life, I was talking to someone else about this—I gave up music. I was on my way to the monastery to be a monk. Gaia House kind of sidetracked me. I'm still here. No, I'm kidding. I changed my mind.

My mind was changed. But the archetype of the monk is still alive in me.

It's a bit like Andrea's question, in the sense that you don't need a big concrete chunk of time or a choice between A and B, between black and white, left and right, or whatever. The monk archetype can be alive for little moments in your day in such a nourishing way. So that hermit, that renunciate, the love of that, the fantasy of that is beautifully alive. Maybe in little actions, maybe in days of more silence or whatever. Maybe in just the smallest little thing, the smallest moment. And that's enough to nourish the soul.

It's getting out of the concretization of either-or big life choices and actually into the fantasy of both, whether it's art, literature in your case, or the monastic, the renunciate. It's like actually both of them can live. When I allow the imaginal to come alive, if I don't, then everything becomes a choice between, becomes so concretized.

So that's one way of approaching the question—actually allowing it to have more imaginal depth and breadth and richness, allowing these pools, you know, and these attractions. Where there's meaningfulness for us, where there's attraction, eros—in this case, the eros of attraction to the Theravadan archetype—where there's meaningfulness, where there's eros, where there's soul making, where there's beauty, that means there is an image operating there or several images that are alive. And you can—it's helpful to recognize that and let them become alive. And then we have much more freedom, much more depth, much more nuance with the whole thing. How does that sound?

"Well, a lot of this... I suppose it's just the kind of question that always comes up, especially when I'm having to retreat for a while, you know—I can move back into the kind of monk archetype. And then it's like there's sort of a worry that, like, well, you should... If you really want to kind of follow that to its end, then the others should be pushed aside. They're kind of wasting your time in that respect. And so it's just a question of whether things that aren't in that kind of archetype would pull away from the kind of..."

Well, one of the... Two things. One of the reasons, like I said, I left the States, I left the music, actually didn't sell—gave away everything—and wanted to be a monk. And part of the reason for deciding not to was realizing you didn't need to, I didn't need to. If you say, "I have to be a monk to realize the unfabricated, I have to be a monk to realize the depths of emptiness, et cetera," I don't think that's true.

The fruits of practice are available to us if we practice with our hearts, with dedication, with intelligence, with practicing in ways that liberate. We can also practice in ways that don't liberate. Spend lots of time with every earnest, heartful dedication, but I'm just going around in circles. I'm just hitting a brick wall. I don't think you need to be a monk. And I don't think one needs to be a monk. Actually, personally speaking, I don't think you need to be a monk—because I know him, I can say that.

So don't necessarily buy the hype. And then the second thing you touched on is about permission. I know it was kind of a joke, but in a way, just saying something serious about that—Catherine and I were talking—it's like a lot about this kind of retreat, and maybe you've felt it already, is actually giving permission to ways of seeing, to sensibilities, to things that are in us, giving legitimacy and giving permission to. And that's partly why it's good for people to come to Q and A's and groups because you actually see, "Oh, that part of me that I was a bit quiet about is actually shared, recognized, celebrated. It exists in others." So I'm just pulling that word "permission" out and kind of saying something bigger about it.

"My question is about religious ecstasy. I'm just going to name the fact that I'm very frightened right now. As I shared with you this morning, Rob, a lot of this retreat is very familiar, but it's gone really, really deep. So I'm kind of fortunate and blessed to be quite primed to lots of the things that we've been doing. They're very alive in my practice, like having a love being and four elements practice and cosmic kind of love surrounding energy bodies. These are really in my life.

However, the effect of the way that you and Catherine have offered these things to us has caused me to have numerous experiences. I want to say—I want to be brave and go there—I want to say cosmic orgasms. And I don't mean physiological. Like, not consciously at the time, but like looking back and saying, oh, I was enlightened for a few minutes there, and things like that.

What I would like to understand is that I don't feel that I'm going to be grabby or graspy of these experiences, and I have no idea, because I can't read the future, if I will experience them again at home. However, if I go home and find that I can, they might be dangerous or cause, trigger my potential to have psychosis or mania or like feelings of vast bigness, like self-aggrandizement. Please, will you help me understand how I can smallify them, or something. That's not a very good word."

So two things, perhaps I would say.

First, this is related to something important—you have to see what we're doing in the context of a larger path. When Catherine was talking about the black that surrounds the flame, that black is cooling. One of the original meanings of nibbana is cooling. It's one of the meanings—it means cooling.

In a way, people are very... that's why I say I think teaching group retreats is a crazy business. There's so much diversity in what people need, with different personalities and tendencies. It's all wonderful, but some people need to gather the resources of cooling, of calming, of equanimity, as well as the resources of a steadiness of love and steadiness of heart.

So it might be that one of the things for you to consider—not instead of all this, but alongside it—is also gathering and developing access to coolness, to space, to equanimity. This will balance things. It's really about having a vision of the breadth of practice. As I said this morning, this is asking a lot. There's much involved to really have available the picture we're presenting, and different people will need to develop this aspect a bit more, or that aspect a bit more, or this first and then that. You have to know your tendencies.

Since you're speaking of them, one thing would be developing more access to coolness, steadiness, equanimity—a kind of spaciousness of perspective rather than "Wow, here's that amazing thing and I'm just lost in it." What comes is a kind of balance, a poise. The flame can still be there, but it's not just burning everything up or being blown out completely. So consider the kinds of practices and reflections and attitudes that help you access more of that cooling spaciousness that gives you equanimity and steadiness.

The second thing relates to what we've been discussing about putting the divine healing energy you're feeling in contact with the dukkha. Sometimes this means, even when you're feeling great, deliberately bringing up the dukkha—the memory of the dukkha—and putting it right in the middle of that lovely blissful feeling. Just let that wash over, letting the two come into contact. The more you do this, the more the extremes of our existence begin to meet and integrate.

The third thing goes back to this question of real and not real. I don't know what else to say other than I feel it's not the extremity or intensity of bliss or vision that's dangerous—it's not that. It's making that real now, and either identifying oneself with it—"this is who I am"—or believing "that's exactly how things are. This is now the reality." It's the realism that's the problem.

Often what happens is we don't realize the realism is occurring. We're unaware. What have I made real at this moment? It could be a certain vision of the world, or it could be myself when I'm in this state: "I am that." We become so entranced or captivated, enchanted in not such a good sense, that we don't realize there's too much realism in it.

How does one move to let go of realism without falling into dismissal—"Oh, it's all rubbish, waste of a week, could have gone to Torremolinos"? It's again this pulsing thing, finding this middle way.

I can't think of anything else to say about that right now, but it's important to at least have this as an awareness. It's not just you—it's the human mind, it's consciousness. Just being aware of this and looking for it sometimes.

There's a way that, just as with art, these practices and openings of perception can have immense power to heal, to move us, to give beauty. And just like art, they don't have to be real to do that. They don't have to be believed. The power—that's why I made the artistic analogy—is in that. But you might gently be on the lookout for this kind of grasping realism.

So those would be three possibilities.

And I don't want to neglect this side. John?

"Thanks so much for your teaching this morning about mitzvot and blessings, which really spoke to me. It tied in with a worry I had about your last dharma talk—what you said at the end, which maybe I misunderstood. It was about pragmatism. You said something about pragmatism and then talked about the sacred and the profane..."

What these ritual actions offer me is that through the mitzvot of washing the hands and the blessing, the blessing sanctifies the act itself. If I understand what you mean by practicing correctly, it's not just that the action—that the commandment, the good deed—is merely a convenient or useful way. I feel I can't be instrumental about it.

"A useful way for what?" you might ask.

Well, for anything. The act is in itself holy. It's real.

I'm trying to remember exactly what I said. I think it was particularly in the context of circumscribing the sacred as separate from the profane. For example, going on pilgrimage—that place there is a holy place I will journey to from my ordinary place where I live. Or this retreat space is a sacred space, this temple is a sacred space, as opposed to profane space.

Sometimes you encounter teachings that say everything is sacred. In a way, that's where we want to move toward—seeing everything as sacred. But sometimes we want to jump there straight away and simply declare that everything is sacred. Quickly, though, that dissolves into a mush where actually nothing is sacred.

The pragmatism lies in recognizing the skill of circumscribing certain things as sacred. The biblical temple was sacred—it's not that the rest of life wasn't, but it was definitively a sacred place. The Torah scroll is sacred. There's something essential in this recognition. In Kabbalistic teachings and Hasidism, the encouragement is indeed to see everything as sacred, to redeem it in that sense. But the more intermediate step involves saying "this is sacred" and "that is sacred." You enter into a different relationship.

When you engage in ritual, you're actually creating something—creating a taste of the sacred. This serves a purpose, not merely an intermediate purpose, but intermediate in the sense of being on the way to seeing the sacred everywhere. That's all I meant by pragmatism.

"I understand the word 'circumscribed' now. I think I thought you were suggesting we could just jump over the sacred, whereas what I should have understood is the sanctification of the sacred."

Exactly. Precisely.

Another question arises about seeing all things as divine, especially the kilesas. The images of the divine we have—like the Buddhas and the Bodhisattvas—are all these light gods, these benevolent deities. Even though they might have fierceness in their compassion, they're not the dark gods I've mentioned many times.

For this practitioner, seeing the ordinary and pleasant things as sacred everywhere requires being able to see the dark side of things as sacred as well. Otherwise, somehow it doesn't penetrate as deeply with the light aspects alone.

This touches on something fundamental about spiritual development. People are different with this. Souls are different—they have different resonances, different callings, and different ways of developing. Some people, as you're expressing, can't fully access what the light gods offer unless they integrate the dark gods. Other souls need extensive time with the light gods first.

It heals something, it reassures something, it settles something, it opens something. And then maybe at some point there's a capacity to integrate the dark gods. So people are different. What you're saying, someone else might be like, uh-uh. And they may not even be ready to hear about dark gods. It's like it just won't fit. Or it disturbs them because of things that have happened in the past, or wounds, or stuff that is too similar to that, or because of cultural conditioning that they just can't see through—all kinds of reasons.

So first of all, there's a difference. I think when I started teaching about the imagination, I was very much emphasizing the dark gods, and partly... partly I just find a lot of what I teach to be a response to the context around me, which, as you say, it's all this. So it's like, "Well, hold on, what about this, guys? You know, what about this that we're missing?"

What do you need to know about it now? Like, what are you kind of asking? Because you just said, "Could you say a bit more," which I could say lots, but can you... what is it that you're needing?

Just that there's a lot of nice experiences with the light gods on retreat, personally as well. But there are moments when... yeah. There's more, or it comes in the analytical mind, kind of... it comes on, what about, what about. And then there's the sense, there's this... the sensibility kind of grows, or a kind of sense to that, that something's missing. I can't say much more about... some of the... all the loveliness around here.

So you're asking how to make that connection?

Yeah. Because the images we have and the images that I feel like are coming to me don't include those. I think it's more of a question of conditioning and less of a meaning.

Less of a what?

More of a question of conditioning, of kind of receiving those... receiving, witches readily, the dark gods.

Yeah, yeah, sure it is. And it's a question of culture and assumptions and all kinds of stuff. We, you know, culturally for thousands of years, we don't really have a place for the dark gods in Western culture. What happened historically was a lot of gods were sort of amalgamated into the Christ image and other gods like Aphrodite—where you could say sexuality as sacred—got seen as demonic. So culturally in the wider culture, also Gaia House culture, we tend not to—or Gaia House as an institution tends not to really go there and talk about that and include that or sanctify that or recognize the sacredness of the dark gods. And again, that's part of the reason for some of these teachings.

On this retreat, just personally, in contrast to the last few years where I've been saying a lot about darkness, I feel like it's been a little bit more towards the light. But in terms of how to do it, it might be just in imaginal practice—just be open to the diversity of images. A dark god involves a dark image, and "dark" in a very loose sense here. Things like sexuality, things like rage or certain kinds of suffering or loneliness or some kind of what might be regarded as pathological element. And it's like those images, if you like, are darker. Does that make sense?

So you can just be open in your imaginal practice and they will come. Otherwise you wouldn't be asking the question. They're part of what you need. They will come as images. And it's, again, it's always a sense of like, "Okay, the mind is"—not in your case, but maybe the mind is saying, "Oh, I don't know about this one. It's not, you know, it's this or that, or it's not holy or whatever, or it's just my kilesas."

In a way, part of the potency of bringing imaginal work alive and letting it do its soul-making function is just—I'm saying this to everyone now—just granting a little bit of trust to the image. My mind doesn't... I'm not sure if I can trust it. Just give it a little bit of trust. Just give it a little bit, just the beginnings of belief that there might be something holy here. There might be a treasure for me. There might be something that's asking something of me. And that's enough to inject life and potency into the image, and then it can start doing its work. And some of these can become really beautiful soul-making objects.

And the other way around is actually - so one is just more open in the imaginal practice and they will come. Or as you shared before, it's like what moves you, perhaps a painting that you see or a work of art and a character from that that's more dark, if you like.

A second way is through an emotional, through a bodily energy that comes up. Were it a longer retreat, we'd probably talk much more about desire and eros and that kind of thing. But what is it, again, to feel that and to allow it, in a way, and even just entertain the possibility as an idea: there's something holy here. It's not just an impurity, just a kilesa, just greed, just dirty sensual desire. Just having that attitude liberates it a little bit.

So one way is through things that are arising, and the other way is through images and just being open to more images, a range of images.

Is that OK? Are you sure? Like you said, you could talk. OK.

Okie doke. And let's have just a minute of silence.

Thank you for listening. To learn how you can support the teachers and Dharma Seed, please visit dharmaseed.org/donate.

CHAPTER 48

Sensing Divinity

Rob Burbea · 51 min

> In this profound dharma talk from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea examines the nature of divinity as experienced in meditation and daily life. He distinguishes between two interconnected forms of divine perception: universal divinity—experienced through practices like mettā (loving-kindness) and the brahmavihāras, where one senses an all-pervading oneness of love, awareness, or silence—and particular divinity that honors the sacred within individual personhood, including our struggles, desires, and unique life circumstances.
>
> Burbea explains how universal divinity naturally unfolds through reduced fabrication of perception, leading to mystical experiences of oneness that provide equanimity amid life's fluctuations. Yet he emphasizes the path also includes re-enchanting the particular self, seeing divinity within our very human qualities—even desire, anger, and suffering. Drawing from Buddhist tantra, Jewish mystical traditions, and his understanding of Buddha-nature, he suggests that both the universal and particular aspects of divinity can be cultivated through imaginal practice, where life itself becomes ensouled and image-like.
>
> The session concludes with a partner meditation exploring mettā while sensing the divine consciousness shining through another's eyes, demonstrating how spiritual practice can reveal the sacred dimensions already present in human encounter and connection.

So we said right at the beginning of the retreat that people use these words—enchantment, imaginal, soul, divine—in lots of different ways. On this retreat we're choosing to include in our meaning of what enchantment is, or the kinds of enchantment that we're talking about, a sense of divinity. When we speak about enchantment it includes some sense of divinity, of divine dimensions.

We've already been talking quite a bit, and Catherine was talking about how we're actually interested in enchanting the world, of course, but also the self. Can we re-enchant the self? Last night and in the next couple of days we'll be circling around this and exploring what does that mean? What does it involve? What does it require to re-enchant the sense of self?

There's so much we could say about all this. Let's take a step back and talk perhaps a little bit about divinity. The range of what that could mean, the depths of what that could mean is enormous. We've been making this distinction on this retreat between what we could call a kind of divinity that is sensed as universal—everywhere and in everything equally, regardless. In insight meditation and probably most meditative traditions that are around these days, that's probably the most common kind of divinity, sense of divinity that's open to us. It can come in all kinds of ways, but in a way it's a natural unfolding of deepening in meditation.

What's characteristic of that opening to universality or universal dimension divinity is less fabrication of perception. This isn't obvious for people, but someone doing extended metta practice, loving-kindness practice, eventually what will happen is it will feel like at some point the whole world has the fabric of love. The whole world is made of love. It is love. That's its essence, its substance, as much as it's concrete or whatever it is. At another level one feels that one's whole being, that the whole world is love or the whole world is compassion. This is a natural unfolding. It has a universal quality. Everything is equally that, including myself. I am part of that oneness.

What's actually happening there is the perception is being fabricated less. Instead of solidity and separateness and contraction of this and that being different, all that fabrication of the perception of separate things is calming down a little bit and joined together in some kind of oneness. It could be a oneness of love, it could be a oneness of awareness. It could be a oneness of silence. There's beautiful poems of Thomas Merton that Catherine was reading last night. One silence pervades everything. One silence at the core of my being, of your being. We can know this. These are beautiful, available mystical perceptions coming out of more usual kinds of practice that we do—one nothingness, one peace. They're all flavors of universal oneness that we can know. It just comes in different ways from letting go of clinging, and the perception just naturally will open out to these mystical perceptions.

Catherine was talking about desire last night. Some people have a passion, a burning desire to know that level of the universal divine. To know that silence, to taste it, to feel it at the center of the being and the center of all things. Or to know all of these kinds of oneness. Something is on fire in the being. I want to know that. And we can know it. So there's a desire for that.

Then interestingly—and this is all classical dharma teaching, what I'm talking about so far—there's a desire for that, a burning desire for these kinds of openings, these kinds of mystical universal insights of universal divinity. And then the knowing of that, the tasting of that silence, of that peace, of that love, does something to my desires in the rest of my life. It gives a context, the black around the flame that Catherine was talking about last night. That's what that black is. It's the universal peace or love or silence or whatever. The flame can burn, but it has context.

All these universal divinities give equanimity in our life in relation to the comings and goings, ups and downs, desires for this person, that person, this thing, that thing. It's all put in a different mystical context. Not, I hope, that we become anemic and bleached of all kind of engagement with life, but the whole swelling up and dying down of our desires in life is just held differently in a much vaster space, in a much vaster context.

And then the kinds of things that we've been talking about on this retreat—beginning to talk about—what is then the place of eros? What is then the place of sexuality?

How does that... We're asking a lot on this retreat, because we're not just saying, let it go—the imagination, the erotic, the sexual, the desire, the dark, the dark gods. We're not just saying, let it go, it's bad, get rid of it, iron it out. We're also not just saying, just be mindful of it.

Can we re-engage with it? Can we include it on the path? It's asking a lot. What we're setting up here as a path is really asking a lot—a lot of skill, a lot of healing, a lot of bases, a lot of development, a lot of intelligent perspective and conceptual framework.

But this black, this silence, this mystical oneness, or these mystical onenesses, as I say, give a kind of steadiness. There's a resource of steadiness in relationship to our desire. And we're freer with the desire. I'm not bowled over this way or that, because I've got this infinite, infinite resource.

So there's this universal kind of divinity and then there's the divinity that comes more through the imaginal. And a divinity that retains personhood, either of the imaginal figure or of myself or of the other, of this object, of this tree, of whatever it is. The divinity in and through the particulars and the persons, an imaginal divinity.

Now these, like we said right at the beginning, these overlap. It's not to make these little neat frames. These overlap, but there's a distinction here. Can we know and taste and develop skill in opening to both kinds of divinity, the universal and the personal? The oneness and the particular. Yes, we can. But as I said, it's asking a lot. It's actually asking a lot. I don't know if you can get the sense of the breadth of what would be involved in such a path, because we're including the dark. We're including the desire and all of that.

So again, we can have desire for both. We long for, I long to know both, both these kinds of divinity. I long to have my life infused by them, by that knowing, by that seeing. The first, the universal, will cool the desires in and for the world. An opening to vast universal divinity will cool the desires in and for the world. The second kind of divinity will inflame them. Somehow this needs to be balanced perhaps. And there's other factors that are contrary. There's too much to say about this, so we'll be circling around it in the days.

And then we come back to this question of self and re-enchanting the self and saying included in that is seeing, sensing, knowing, feeling the divinity of the self, yourself. How does it feel right now if you consider the possibility of seeing your divinity? How does that strike you, to know that you are divine? Both because you are part of a oneness that you may have glimpsed or intuited or know well, but also that you are divine in and through the particulars of your personhood, all the darknesses, all the difficulties, all the dukkha, your desires, the events of your life.

How does that even strike you right now? How does it feel as a possibility? You, unique you, your unique life, your unique life and death. What does that stir in your being?

And we could say a lot just about that, and we will. What our responses to even that kind of possibility can be. But if I add another question: what's your sense of what would help you know your divinity? In that second sense of the particular, your personhood, every little detail, every little uniqueness, what's your sense of what would help you to know that? Where perhaps have you glimpsed that or intuited that or gotten a sense?

So I don't know about instructions. I'm not sure, it's so individual in terms of so many elements that make this journey up, this part of the journey up that is very individual in terms of what order people do things and what needs to be developed, what needs to be there to actually allow that kind of transformation of perception. So in terms of instructions, I'm actually not sure. I don't know what you need, what's needed.

But we could say some general things. The universal kind of divinity happens, as I said, just through practicing sort of standard practices like mettā and loving kindness and compassion and those kind of things, the brahmavihāras, or resting in awareness, just being aware of awareness and open to all things. And eventually that awareness will just permeate everything, will have a sense of universality, infinitude, and divinity to it. Or just seeing emptiness more and more. All of them characterized by certain degrees of unfabricating and eventually, if one really goes deep and skillfully with the emptiness practice, eventually total unfabricating. And that gives this universal, different kinds of degrees of depths and flavors of universal divinity.

But the other kind of divinity, the more personal one, may arise as a natural evolution of imaginal practice. It may simply be what emerges over time when we open to the path of the imaginal and begin to play with it.

Something happens, usually slowly, that transforms our relationship to practice itself. Instead of having an imaginal figure that we work with during our meditation period, followed by our ordinary day, then another meditation period where we engage it again, something more pervasive begins to unfold. Eventually, a whole sensibility, a whole way of feeling and sensing life becomes available to us.

Life becomes image. Image and life meet, and life becomes image. Life is imbued with the imaginal. We discover a different relationship, a different dimension available to us—what William Blake called "double vision," which we've discussed before.

You can begin to sense this because when an imaginal figure or image is truly strong and soul-making, look carefully and recognize that it already carries the flavor of divinity. It already possesses a sense of dimensionality, a sense of eternality. An image that is truly alive, that genuinely touches you and stirs soul-making, is what I would call iconic. It has this timeless quality—this is the divinity inherent in the imaginal.

Through this process, life becomes ensouled. Soul is everywhere in life; it simply awaits our modes of being, our ways of looking. This includes the self with all its foibles and follies, its crazinesses and beauties and gifts. All of this becomes enchanted, becomes divine in and through the particular.

A couple of people have asked me about something I mentioned in a talk or perhaps wrote somewhere regarding my illness and the possibility of dying soon—or as people say, very probably dying soon. I said that's perfect, or rather, that I can sense in the depths of things a perfection in all of it. "How can you say that?" they wonder. "What's happening there?"

Someone also wrote about Ram Dass's teacher, Neem Karoli Baba, who used to say, "Can't you see everything's perfect? Can't you see everything's perfect?" I can't speak for Neem Karoli Baba, but I suspect that the kind of perfection he was pointing to related to universal perfection.

In the universal divine, if everything is love, if everything is simply awareness—regardless of what it's aware of—if that's the fundamental nature of everything, then everything is perfect. Life and death, good and bad, pain and pleasure—it's all one, all at a deeper level one substance. So everything's perfect.

This is one kind of knowing available to us. But when someone then asks, "How can you say that about terrorist acts and terrible things that happen and your cancer and possibly dying young?" I wouldn't stretch this as merely an idea trying to fit where it doesn't belong.

What actually happens is that these perceptions gradually open the heart, the being, the consciousness. At a certain point, we recognize there's a kind of perfection at that level of universality. But to try forcing it as an idea where it won't authentically go—no.

We must still respond with compassion, respond with wise action to these things in the world. If that response of wise seeing and wise compassion isn't present, and a person is claiming "it's all perfect," I become very suspicious. It's perfect, and yet one does everything possible to respond to suffering in the world.

When that compassionate response is absent and the heart remains untouched by the world's pain, something is off in the "everything's perfect" story. Something isn't authentic.

But when I spoke about possibly dying soon, that's not quite what I meant—or rather, I included that understanding but meant something more. This comes from imaginal practice itself. Yes, certainly emptiness and all that, but through imaginal practice, life becomes image. My life, my being, all the particular gifts and struggles and challenges, the duration of my life however long that turns out to be, the birth, the death, the things that come through me—all of this becomes ensouled.

In that soul, they are felt at times to be inseparable from what we might call world soul. All this arises naturally in the course of imaginal practice, filling out as the conceptual structure expands to hold these kinds of altered perceptions.

At one level, of course, I don't want to die. I want to live. At another level, I honestly don't know what will happen. There's something perfect in the particulars, and it's such a striking depth of seeing. There's a kind of amazement at the perfection of even the smallest details, all the little particularities.

This is the kind of thing I'm pointing toward.

It's different kinds of sense of divinity—the universal on one hand, and in and through the particular—and they're not really separate.

So in terms of instructions, in a way it's just a natural evolution of imaginal practice, that kind of seeing, that kind of availability of that kind of perception. We've been working with this imaginal figure of love, and it doesn't have to be a figure of love. It could be any imaginal figure. But there's a sense, as I said, almost in my definition of imaginal, that it includes a dimension of divinity. We sense a divinity there.

In the meditation, the imaginal figure—or any imaginal figure that feels divine in some way—is gazing at you. Maybe with love, maybe with who knows what. But the sustained gaze of that divinity on me, on you, in the meditation, eventually you become imbued with divinity. The gaze communicates all kinds of things. Not only love, but eventually I feel divine through the gaze of the divine on me. Eventually. I'm not talking about something that necessarily happens like that, but there's an evolution here.

In a way, that's part of what we talked about—the harmonizing. Here I am looking at this imaginal figure and I come into harmony with those divine qualities. And that harmony moves towards union so that I may become that figure or I become divine in these ways.

There was that beautiful quote that Catherine read—I can't remember when it was—from Thomas Merton: "None of me belongs to anyone but you, God. None of me belongs to anyone but you." Sometimes just letting these fragments of poetry arise in the mind and letting them do their soul work, letting them echo in the heart and resonate. "None of me belongs to anyone but you, God." We might not even know, what does it mean? What am I saying? But there's poetry there and the poetry works on us.

In that beautiful line of Thomas Merton, you can hear the surrender, the surrender of the being. "None of me belongs to anyone but you." And that surrender, as we talked about before, can open to a receiving, and that receiving to the harmonizing, and the harmonizing to a union. There is a sense of "I belong to you and I am divine also."

Or it might be that in a cosmopoiesis—again, the imaginer spilled over into the world—whenever an image is alive, whether that's an imaginal figure or a world seen as image in cosmopoiesis, there's always, at that point, the self being imagined at the same time. Sometimes we don't realize this. So sometimes you can just check: "Well, what's the sense of self right now?" And one might recognize there's a kind of divinity also in the sense of self at that point.

What happens, or what can happen—and some people who have been practicing with the imaginal for a while already report this—is being able to just remember the sense of divinity and just bring it into the moment and see something as divine and see oneself as divine. It gets more available. It just becomes something you can do. Just flip the perception, enter another mode of perception. That might sound like "I don't know how that works," but actually it just comes with familiarity, with practice.

I don't have that much time on this retreat, but what is it to—which we've touched on a little bit—what is it to know, instead of being always suspicious of my desire, "that's a kilesa, that's a defilement, it's one of the three poisons"—what is it actually to even entertain the notion that the desire has divine roots? That there's a divinity, a treasure in my desire, in my eros?

What's the difference between eros and greed? What's the difference? What makes it open up into soul-making? What makes it contract the being, contract the soul, shrink the life and the perception? What's the difference? Do I need to throw out desire? Desire being, if you like, an aspect of self. Can I see the divinity? Can I know the divinity of desire? Discover the divinity in desire.

Or anger, rage—these things that we view as enemies, defilements. Is it just so simple?

In Buddhist Tantrism, there are practices where one deliberately considers or imagines in different ways the divinity of different aspects of the self, like desire or anger or the body or the senses. These are imagined as different deities—all kinds of exercises that one can do.

In the Jewish tradition, there are 613 commandments, like little prescriptions for things you're supposed to do: how you wash your hands, what you're supposed to do or not do on the Sabbath, all kinds of things, every little detail of life. And there are prayers often with a lot of these things. So you wash your hands, you say a blessing. You eat, you say a blessing. You take a certain drink. Everything becomes blessed through these commandments.

So it can look like a bunch of rules, kind of lifeless and constricting. But at its root, the mystical idea there is to bless and to sense one's life and the world and one's actions as blessed. We're opening to seeing our actions as blessing and blessing God, blessing life through that.

And if that kind of practice goes deeper and deeper, this sense of ritual blessing, of blessing life, of being blessed by life, of blessing the divine in and through one's actions, in and through, including the actions of perceiving, of consciousness, of kindness. One can almost feel that one is part of God doing that. There's the divinity acting through me in this action, washing my hands, eating a piece of bread. Who's doing that?

In Buddhist teaching, there's also, who sees? Who are you? And one answer is, no one, nothing. Anatta, no self. Another answer, I would say, I hesitate to use the word deeper, but another level of answer, who sees? Who are you? The Buddha. Buddha nature sees. Buddha nature is conscious in your sight, in your sound, in your hearing, in your tasting, in your thinking. Buddha nature, Buddha is seeing, is knowing, is conscious, is alive through you. Buddha is acting through you. The cosmic Buddha, the Dharmakaya.

Sometimes the deeper one practices with emptiness and all that, the more these become available. But also sometimes they can just be poetic ideas and we can just try them on. There's a kind of concept there. But the concept is not just an intellectual thing. We can bring it in in a way that the concept becomes a percept, a perception. Not just an idea. It actually starts imbuing. I actually feel like my seeing is different now. It's the Buddha's seeing. It's some divine seeing through me.

And the body is involved. It's not just heady. Concept, percept, and body are connected, intimately woven together.

So really just, if you like, pointing out certain possibilities, how this might come, what might support it. This re-enchanting of the self and recognizing, being able to move in and out of the perception of oneself as divinity in all one's particulars. In one's personhood, not the erasing, the erasure, the blanching of one's personhood, but the inflaming of one's personhood with the divine flame, seeing that one's personhood, one's particulars, are divine fire.

I wonder about doing a little exercise now. Yeah, let's do that.

So, why don't you just turn to your neighbor and we'll do this, an exercise in that. Someone you don't know, if that's possible. So if you need to move places or whatever. Does anyone need a partner? If you haven't got anyone, just stand and... Ah, good, okay.

So first things first. Settle into the body, your body. Tomorrow's another day. Settle into your body. Feel the ground. Feel the connection with the ground underneath you, whether it's your backside, your legs, your feet, whatever's touching the ground. Really get that solidity and your connection with the ground. And just that establishment of grounding of connection.

And from that grounding, feel the rest of your body. Feel the uprightness of the posture. Feel your body. Feel your body sitting. And feel, as we've been talking about so much, the energy body, the field of energy, of vibration, texture. Again, whatever we do, can this be something that we're just remaining in contact with, sensitive to, open to? You're just dwelling, inhabiting, filling that space with your awareness.

So any time over the next few minutes that you feel you've lost that, just keep checking in. Do I still, am I still here in this space? Do I still have some consciousness including how this space, how the energy body feels?

And if you don't, then can that be retained? Not at the exclusion of the other necessarily—hopefully—but retained alongside or in the envelope of the awareness of the other. So that you have your experience and your experience of the other. Not losing myself, my sensitivity to myself in the awareness of other, nor am I losing the other because I'm just with myself.

With this, staying in contact with the energy body, let yourself just become aware of the other. You don't need to make direct eye contact at this point if you don't want to—no problem. But you're just aware of the being in front of you and aware of your own being at the same time. Body and being here, body and being there. Just awareness of self, of other.

Now this person who you may not know very well at all—you probably don't—just offering them metta, well-wishing. I don't know exactly what your struggles are, I don't know exactly what your joys are, but I wish you well. I wish your body well. I wish you well in your being, in your mind, in your heart. Just very gentle, just offering them that well-wishing, radiating it out towards them. Pure and simple. Doesn't depend on anything—what they look like or what you think they might be like. Just wishing well. And just having the intention to wish well. Again and again, the intention repeating gently, gently.

Now, as you're giving the metta—and you can just gently sustain that gentle intention, you're with your body and your energy body—can you also include an awareness that you are at this moment receiving the metta of the other? So you're giving and you're also receiving. And just lightly, spaciously holding or feeling both of those elements, aspects. There's the giving and the receiving of the well-wishing of the other. This other is wishing you well. This other has the intention to wish you well over and over, just as you are engaging in towards them.

And now when you feel ready, if your eyes are not already open, allow them to open and allow yourself to make eye contact with each other as you sustain this giving and receiving of metta towards each other. So metta means implicitly a letting go of judgment. So you're receiving gaze that has the intention for no judgment, only well-wishing. You're receiving that right now and you're over and over giving that. So let yourself make the contact, giving and receiving, caring.

And then we try to add one more piece. If you look into the other's eyes, can you see the life in the eyes? Can you see and feel and sense the presence that shines out of the eyes? Feel and sense the consciousness, the awareness, the brightness and the aliveness of that. This is consciousness that is visible, is palpable, sensible in the eyes of the other, through the eyes of the other. Is that possible? Get that tuning to that, the sense of the bright presence, the consciousness as it is radiating from the other's eyes.

There is this mystery there, this mystery of being, mystery of consciousness, amazing aliveness of that, the brightness, the illumination, the radiance of that, the presence. Sometimes you get a sense of the mystery of it and the depth of it and the almost surprise of it, the divinity of it. Very human and so much in it—the human has divine dimensions. The divinity of this consciousness, the blessing of the consciousness. It's a miracle of it.

And if you feel okay staying with that, or again you might want to return to the metta and the well-wishing—so you can include that awareness of the consciousness or the divinity, but then include now again the metta, the giving and the receiving, offering of these intentions of kindness, of well-wishing. Feeling your body, feeling the energy body, including self, including other in the awareness, in the metta.

And then just taking a moment to thank your partner, to thank yourself. And if you can, pry yourself away from that and return to sitting.

So just to reiterate something I think we said right at the beginning of the retreat: distinctions are useful and categorizations are useful, but they're also limited. So it's helpful to differentiate, I think, between universal kinds of perceptions—perceptions of a kind of universal divinity—and perceptions of more particular personified or personhood divinity. But they overlap. They totally overlap. But if we don't make a distinction, it's almost like sometimes the experience just goes in a certain direction and misses other possibilities. So distinctions are a skillful means, but they're not really real. All these things overlap.

It may be that as you go to walking—which, if you have a raincoat or don't mind the blessings of the rain, if you're happy to soak them in—be outside or be inside.

It may be that these effects or resonances linger after making contact in this way. Really take very good care to keep any inner critic out of the picture. "Oh, I blew it. I had my one chance at seeing divinity and I didn't do it right," or "The other one was more divine than me." All of those places where the better than, worse than, same as story starts to emerge—really take care with that.

We're allowed to practice here in the sacred boundary of the temple. We keep those kinds of assessments outside the gate. So you're really allowed to settle. Let your feet both give and receive blessing as you walk. Hold your heart.

This is a precious day. Every day is a precious day—we don't always realize it. You've put a lot of groundwork in. You have a lot of resource in each of your souls, even if sometimes we're working with feeling like we don't have enough resource. So really use the day. Really let it use you, actually. Let the day use you.

CHAPTER 49

This Fire, This Longing (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 47 min

> In this Q&A session from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea explores the complexities of imaginal practice in daily life versus retreat settings. He addresses how images ask something of us - sometimes requiring reverence, sometimes creative expression, and sometimes subtle integration into our interactions. The discussion delves into the spectrum between practicing for self-healing versus devotion to something beyond, emphasizing that souls have different needs and healing often serves a larger purpose of world-healing through transformed perception.
>
> Burbea examines the relationship between ideas and images, noting how meaningful concepts like liberation or the Buddha become alive as fantasy with varying degrees of sensual content. He discusses the role of faith and longing for the divine, acknowledging how cultural resistance can challenge but not extinguish this fire in certain souls. A significant portion addresses the tension between dharma teachings about non-striving and the demands of serious artistic practice, questioning dominant ideas about flow and spontaneity while honoring the soul-making potential of dedicated creative work.
>
> The session concludes with guidance on modulating effort in practice and recognizing our responsibility to movements of the soul, using the sense of soul-making as a trustworthy guide for navigating the duties that imaginal figures and devotional longings place upon us.

Just as usual, if it's being recorded, but if you're not comfortable with that, just let us know and Mark will pause the recording.

Anyone, please?

Yes, Nick.

"Yeah, a question about working with imaginary figures off retreat. Because obviously there's way less time to sit and there's less samadhi in the system and less in touch with the energy body, so it just feels like a very different experience doing it off retreat than on retreat. And if I'm honest, I spend more time with images not in meditation when I'm off retreat - reflecting on images that come maybe once quite intensely and then spending more time actually reflecting or writing or thinking about them. And that feels very rich as well. But I'm wondering if that kind of flattens them, or what the difference is?"

"The difference between?"

"Well, between meditatively being with them a lot while sitting and doing it more... it just feels..."

"Yeah, thank you. That's really good. Could everyone hear that? I think the question is - it seems easier to access images meditatively on retreat when there's more stillness and time to meditate. Off retreat, Nick's saying she's spending more time reflecting on an image or writing, etc."

I go back to the soul-making sense. How is an image best brought to life in the soul? How does it best have its power in the soul? How is it best honored and revered? Because one could spend a lot of time in meditation and that's all - and that would be one extreme. But maybe that's not what it needs, and maybe there's something in the meditation that's missing. I think it might even be touched on in the talk tonight - in a way, images ask something of us. Exactly what they ask, or exactly what the responsibility to them is, there's no formula.

Sometimes it might be mental reflection, sometimes it might be some creative work, sometimes it might be doing something different, and sometimes it's much more internal, much more meditative. I don't think there's a rule for that, but it's listening and seeing where the soul-making is. I can certainly think of certain images that maybe have come up once or twice, but they're alive for me. They're woven into my life. And then one can be creative.

When Andy had the question yesterday and I said I have this jazz musician image - probably meditatively it's come up more than once for sure, but one of the important things there, because there was a little bit of grief about leaving that world and having that opportunity for that music to come through that way, one of the things that was really helpful was bringing that in in a very subtle way to my life. I think I shared this in a talk years ago.

I might be sitting in an interview with someone, and I just remember that image. It's just really, really lightly in the back of the psyche, so to speak. But it begins coloring the interaction. Now, the other person doesn't know - I'm not suddenly... "What are you doing?" "Shh, I'm doing my thing." No, it's really, really subtle. But there's something then in the way I feel myself in response, something that is free in a particular kind of way or nuanced in a particular kind of way. What I'm doing then is bringing to life that image in a whole bunch of directions.

For me, a lot of Dharma work is about freeing us up - freedom, right? And with imaginal work, I feel there's also duty. We have duties. An image often asks something of us. It's not always clear what it's asking and how much actual physical manifestation is being asked. Some images require doing something different, changing a life direction - something really big - all the way down to something really subtle like the jazz musician thing. But it's coming in, even beyond that, to even more subtle levels. It just exists internally in my soul, but there's a reverence there. And all it's asking for is the reverence.

I may feel it in my body, it comes into my psyche, but the duty is in the reverence, in the respect, in seeing the divinity of it. Now all this can be worked with - some of it in meditation, but some of it is actually asking for life to become image, for image and life to meet. That's where the work is. It doesn't necessarily need to be purely meditative.

You know, does this... And the other thing, and I said it in response to Andrea yesterday, but I'll say it again. I feel as time goes by with imaginal practice that short periods of meditation—twenty minutes, if you're doing this kind of work, ten minutes—where the mind wanders to the day, or "I forgot to send that email," whatever it was, and then actually a little bit of contact with an image can have real power. It's this moving in and out and being able to access more. So it's not necessarily like I need to get back on retreat and have all that time. I think that's probably more available than you might imagine for you.

Does that answer what... yeah, okay, good, lovely.

Yeah, is it Dave?

"Hi. Something that particularly resonated in the talk we heard last night was the question, 'Who are you doing it for?' Is it for the self or is it for something beyond? For God or for something beyond? And it resonated partly because I think the most soulful that I have felt in my life is when there has been that devotion, a true devotion to something beyond. But certainly at the moment, my practice is very much self-driven, yearning for healing. So, for example, if a loving image approaches, I will imagine it touching the part of me that physically hurts. And then I can feel the resonance going... almost, because it's like I've taken the autonomy away. And I just wondered what guidance you might have on how, when there is that yearning for something from the self, how to open up more to the devotion."

Thank you. So everyone could hear that, right?

I think there's quite a lot in the question. It sounds like there are a few strands there. So let's see.

Like a lot of these distinctions that we've been making, they serve a purpose in that they highlight something that often isn't highlighted if you don't make the distinction. And I think I said yesterday—I think a whole talk was on this distinction that we didn't give on the retreat—but what often happens I find is that people feel they're doing it for one purpose and actually, it has the language of divine and all that, but actually it's just for the self. Or more, it's a spectrum. Potentially even the other way around, you know, that one is talking in terms of that, but actually somewhere in one's soul, so to speak, one is doing it for a greater purpose that maybe one can't quite articulate clearly. So just be cautious about too much dichotomy there. That's one thing.

The second thing is, and we've been stressing really, souls are different, needs are different, past experience is different, and the needs that come out of past experience or wounding or imbalances—and the order in which things happen—is different. And so it's not like first you do this and then the rest of the path is all about that. I mean, it might be, but it might also be you have periods where it comes back and forth, and there are periods, sort of levels of healing the self or the body or whatever. And so you have periods of that and then it opens up and then it's mixed and then it comes... All of that's good. So I wouldn't actually be too suspicious of that at all.

And if you are, if a part of you really wants it to be for something bigger, you can always hold this healing in the context of serving something bigger. But that's more in the back of your mind. Right now, this needs healing.

And sometimes people come here on retreat, for example, and often say other people in their life might say, "Oh, so selfish." Because they wouldn't say that if the person was going to lie on a beach in Bermuda for six months for some reason. I don't know why. Anyway. But a person can be on retreat here and really have the idea that "I am doing this. I recognize I need to build my strength, my equanimity, my capacity, my steadiness, my heart, all of that. Yes, I need to heal, and it's for something bigger." So the long periods of time I've spent on retreat have been with that always in the back of my mind. So there's a mixture.

About the autonomy, I don't know why... These words we've been using—otherness, autonomy, etc.—I'm not sure... The image is healing me and it's for my healing. That doesn't mean that it doesn't have autonomy, the image. This image is other.

But the healing is through the perception. So again, there's a kind of natural—let's call it evolution, but things can happen in different orders—that we can trust here that integrates these things and melts the dichotomies a little bit.

So there's quite a lot there. Ramira, can you clarify the distinction between image and idea? Not idea in the sense of thought useful to solve a problem, but in a deeper meaning.

And another question—about the role of faith in this process of re-enchanting the cosmos. Yesterday, listening to the talk, we were speaking about the longing for the Divine. I have experienced that very deeply, and it aches, that longing. But something very painful was added to that: not finding resonance in the culture. The longing not being legitimized by the culture, by the people I related to—friends, family. The stories around it.

So it's strange to me why I had that sense that didn't have support at all around, or resonance. Why that sense? Why follow that sense when everything around is either indifferent to it or hostile, or tries to squash it? Part of your second question is why that was arising for you—how it could stay and sustain itself despite all this? It's a general question.

Why, for some people, does this longing for the sacred come to life despite not being supported or even fought against by the environment? And what role do you give this in the whole process of re-enchanting the cosmos?

I don't know the complete answer. One possibility is that souls are different—they want different things. Some people, no matter what's around them, carry a fire of longing for divinity that burns clear and bright. They feel it, they feel the vulnerability and pain of that longing, but it doesn't diminish. It's simply their soul's nature.

I think fire, eros, desire burns with different qualities in different souls. For some people, it's their character to have this longing be very visible and fiery. For others, their fire is more like an even, sustained flame—harder to extinguish. Fire manifests differently in different characters, different souls.

But a second answer could be that everyone has that fire, that longing. What varies is how vulnerable different souls are to having it blown out, smothered, hidden, or dampened by what's around them. There are wounds from the past, cultural conditioning that feels forced, or threats that feel overwhelming. It's all related to the confidence one has in oneself and one's ideas.

In some circles, there's quite an aggressive dismissal and ridiculing of these sacred longings. Part of this becomes about how self-confident a soul is, how resilient, how tough, how independent a thinker. It's not just about faith—all these things feed each other.

Basically, I don't know. It's clearly the case that what you're describing happens, and in other situations it doesn't. Some people don't seem to have this longing at all. What's exactly going on, I don't know. As a teacher, I think about this a lot, but right now I'm cautious about claiming one explanation or the other.

Regarding your first question about ideas and images—I'm hoping to give some teaching exactly on that at some point, because I feel that implicit in an image are certain ideas. We tend to think of them as separate, but they're actually interrelated. Always when there's an image, there are ideas wrapped up within it. Even in insight meditation, you're playing with subtle ideation, subtle conceiving as part of the way of looking, and that's really important. These things are mixed up together—there's not such a clear division between the two.

Sometimes images don't come visually, and this is why I sometimes use the word fantasy instead. The amount of sensual content in an image—which doesn't necessarily mean visual, it could be sonic or bodily—compared with the obviousness of the ideational content can vary greatly.

As you say, certain ideas live as fantasies. Liberation is an idea. The Buddha is a historical image. The path—it's lived, it's felt, we feel it, but it's also an idea. Anything meaningful to us, that's alive, that we love, that moves us, has an idea wrapped up in it that comes alive to us as image. But that image might have very little sensual content or it might have a lot.

You can tell that there's soul in the image or idea—the corona of fantasy around that idea—by all the same ways: I'm moved, I'm drawn, I love it. It gives me beauty, a sense of depth, sacredness. All of this tells me something is alive as image. But what might be alive as image could be an idea, or just the sense of the body coming alive in a certain way.

This word 'image' is very broad and overlaps with idea. The boundaries are fluid, and we'll explore this more deeply later.

And how they actually may constrain someone in certain ways.

I realized that for me, I actually like working on something for months or years. I like the precision. I like—there's a word the Greeks had called philoponos, which means "work-loving." And I like—love is too strong a word, but I like the struggle with something, wrestling with an idea or a creative challenge over time. I like the discipline involved. I like having to show up to it again and again, even when I don't feel like it.

And all of that goes completely against the dominant Dharma ideas about flow and spontaneity and being in the moment. But for me, there's something deeply soul-making about that longer process. There's something about the relationship that develops with the work over time, the way it changes you and you change it. The way you have to keep coming back to it with fresh eyes. The way problems reveal themselves slowly and solutions emerge gradually.

Now, I'm not saying that's better than the quick, spontaneous approach. I'm saying we need to be very careful about our Dharma ideas and whether they're actually serving our fullest expression or constraining it.

So going back to the dukkha question—if your dukkha around being an artist is coming from ideas like "I should be more spontaneous" or "I shouldn't be attached to outcomes" or "this struggle means I'm doing it wrong"—those are ideas that are probably making that dukkha not soul-making. They're flattening it, making it just suffering instead of something that could be fertilizing your soul.

But if you can hold your artistic process—including the struggle, the precision, the long commitment—if you can hold that as sacred, as a form of devotion, as a way of deepening relationship with beauty or truth or whatever it is you're reaching for, then that dukkha becomes very different. It becomes meaningful struggle rather than meaningless suffering.

The question isn't whether you should or shouldn't paint. The question is: what ideas are you bringing to your painting? And are those ideas opening up the sacredness of what you're doing, or are they closing it down?

You know, it's because Dharma is rooted in the Four Noble Truths. It's about less stress, less suffering. But here's the personal bit I'll share, and it's just me—everyone's different on this, and again, you need to find what works for you.

When I first started, I was playing music and then began wanting to compose. I read a book by Natalie Goldberg called Writing Down the Bones. Some of you will know it. Her idea was simply to play, to do a piece on this and do a piece on that. I started doing that, but the idea was really not to care about the result at all. What happened was really liberating for me. And what happened quite quickly, though, is that I felt what came out was really something I liked, and it was really important.

Then quickly from that, I started—it became very intense. What's the word? It wasn't like a free, light process, composing and writing. If you saw me at the piano writing—"Where's the damn pencil?"—it doesn't look mindful and calm at all. I don't care. I honestly don't care. Why would I care about something like that?

But that goes back to the other question: What do you really want? Some people, there are other kinds of suffering involved in that. You have to look at what are the sufferings, because when you put something out into the world creatively, a lot is about what will people think. I'm not saying that's the case with you, but that's a certain level of ego-suffering, you know.

Some people want a peaceful, unruffled, stress-free life, and that's why they practice. Great, go for it. But that's not what I want, personally. And I'm not saying anyone should be like me. But I think I said in one talk, some people will care more about the art than about anything else. And that includes how stressed they are or whatever, or the cost it takes to do something like a long-term artistic project.

Because there's something in the soul about being creative, about embodying that. And there's something in the soul of the product—the artistic painting or whatever it is, sculpture, composition—that has soul too. The soul of the artist making and the struggle involved. Now, I can reify that and cling to it too tightly, just as we talked about with too much realism. But for some people, it's the soul-making and it's the art that matters more than being peaceful. And if it costs me, it costs me.

There was a time in my life where I said, "I don't care if I die painting. I just love this so much." And then I got really sick, and I could have died. I was like, "It's not that important." But I really hear you. Again, I would still say some people, when that same thing happens—when death looks at them—they say, "It is that important."

But it's up to you. Why am I doing this? And maybe something—this is a bit related to Dave's question—something starts with a purity of intention, and over years of being an artist (and this is really the case with Dharma too), either the original intention gets lost. We've lost track of it. We've lost even recognition or being in touch with why I'm doing something, whether it's practice or whether it's art. Or it gets infected with some other intention, which is self-aggrandizing in some way, even subtly. And this will make the process less soul-making, less beautiful, less all of that.

I just don't buy the Dharma—there's a lot of personal opinion here—but a lot of the art that is made with that ethos about being stress-free and quick, it's like... I know. Yeah, it's kind of—I don't want to make any judgmental statements, but there's something more possible.

So again, I'm sitting up here, the microphone is here. I'm being very cautious.

There was something else about the realism thing...

I'm deeply cautious about speaking from this position when my statements might carry undue authority. I really want to distinguish between my personal inclinations and more universal principles. I have a certain soul, a particular personality, specific inclinations—that's my business. What interests me more is drawing attention to ideas and ways we become indoctrinated without realizing it. Please understand that this is everyone's soul journey. You could make very different decisions or directions from me, and that's truly important. I must be careful, especially with things I feel passionate about, to discern what's merely opinion and personal style versus what's actually more universal.

In the past, I probably imposed too many shoulds because I couldn't reconcile these different approaches. How can I pursue artistic excellence when the philosophy I believe in seems to say that such striving goes against non-attachment? It felt like a fundamental contradiction.

Let me add something about striving. If you read the Pali Canon, there's abundant striving there and much encouragement to strive. There's a sutta where the Buddha discusses different kinds of equanimity and different pains that arise for practitioners, along with various ways of letting go. One type he describes is the pain of the practitioner who isn't yet realized but yearns for realization. For all the other pains, he prescribes letting go in specific ways, but for this yearning, he essentially says it goes with the territory.

The modern interpretation of "don't strive, let it go" belongs particularly to Western culture, where we have such a painful relationship with self. It's not written in the original teachings. There's tremendous emphasis on striving and acknowledgment that yes, it's going to rub, it's going to hurt at times. The Buddha simply says to accept the pain, knowing that when you realize your goal, it will be better because you'll have what you're longing for. He doesn't say to let go or stop striving. It's complex—our relationship with striving, what ideation and self-image we bring to it. It's not so simple, especially in our culture and with our divergent personalities.

In Dzogchen and Mahamudra traditions within Tibetan Buddhism, there's significant emphasis on non-striving. In Advaita Vedanta too, and in many traditions. But this whole question of striving versus non-striving isn't about right or wrong—it's always about what's helpful, what's skillful.

When someone says, "Just rest in the natural state"—a classic Mahamudra or Dzogchen teaching—how able is a person even to follow such an instruction? There will be vastly different levels of capacity for that. These teachings have their place, but the question remains: is it helpful to me, and what's arising from it?

Historically, Dzogchen and Mahamudra are presented very differently from their surrounding context. In the classical presentation, there would be extensive striving, numerous preliminaries, countless prostrations, with only brief periods spent in Dzogchen practice. It's not a complete teaching system. It's a gear they shift into perhaps ten percent of the time, if that. The rest involves considerable striving and devotion.

I think in the West we hunger for teachings that simply affirm we're okay as we are. That's important, but the question remains what's truly helpful, and that varies. It's genuinely complex.

Even on a micro level, it's about modulating effort in practice—knowing when to back off and become more receptive and open, when to bring greater ardency, diligence, and fire. In alchemy, there's a phrase: "He who masters the fire, masters the work." This intensity and effort—in alchemical times they didn't have temperature controls, did they? You're learning what kind of fire is needed right now.

Sometimes it means backing right off, simply being open and letting things come, dropping striving as much as possible. But there's always striving at subtle levels we don't actually recognize. Learning to modulate this appropriately, in a caring way—there's so much that could be said about this on all different levels of practice, in terms of both long trajectories and moment-to-moment awareness. It's truly complex.

Energy body and states of samadhi—if you want to explore this, I wonder if you would say that there's a limit to the skillful use of the concept of energy body when the perception of space is falling away. What happens with the energy body at these stages? Would you still see the idea, the concept of energy body as a skillful one, or would you say...

So Ava's asking about the idea of energy body when you get very deep in meditation and the actual experience of the body dissolves—and then even beyond, when there's nothing but space, and then even beyond that when the space dissolves.

Formulaically, the Buddha said the first four jhānas are what's called rūpa jhānas—form jhānas. They're actual experiences of the energy body. That's a way of thinking about it. That's part of the reason why I tend to emphasize energy body right from the start. Where we're heading towards is actually different frequencies of experience of the energy body, or different qualities within the energy body, and they correspond with different jhānas. Even before that—so the whole of samādhi can be approached differently. Instead of focusing on a small point and then somehow getting to this energy body thing, you could start right from the beginning with energy body.

As you move through the jhānas, the body becomes rapture, if you like. That's the energy body flavor, and the grossness of the body is dissolved—there is rapture in this space. Then this body becomes joy and it's drinking joy, or it becomes peacefulness, or it becomes stillness.

Then you get—if you're doing classical jhāna—the realm of infinite space, the jhāna of infinite space. One way of looking at this is that in the first four jhānas, as you go through them, the vibration (we're back to the spectrum of the energy body, very solid or very subtle) gets more and more refined. The quality of the energy body gets more and more refined so that the stillness of the fourth jhāna is an extremely refined state, an extremely refined perception. The vibration here is very, very subtle.

It becomes so subtle that there's no body there at all—it's just space. I could look at that two ways. I could see that as the end of the energy body; now we're talking about just mental perceptions, and that tends to be how the Buddha looks at it. Or you could say that at that point, the perception of the energy body or the characteristic of the energy body is one of space. What does it feel like here? It feels like space. It's characterized by spaciousness—I could put my hand through it. There's the absence of any kind of sense of substance.

Beyond that, I wouldn't really call it energy body because you're not even talking about spatial dimensions anymore. Although maybe the sixth one, with awareness, can have a very subtle sense of a body of awareness, but not in any solidified sense. But definitely after that, no way.

We need to end, so let's just have a little quiet together.

I just want to say one more thing—it's partly in response to something that came up, and partly in response to a note that I can't quite read or understand fully. It's about responsibility—the responsibility that we have to the soul, if you like.

Sometimes with imaginal figures or with the sense of devotion we have or longing we have, these are movements of the soul. They come, they knock on our door, they ask of us something. It's not always clear what they're asking, and we don't know: what is my responsibility? Sometimes we get a sense of what it is.

Two things: one is holding it lightly. That doesn't mean not engaging or not following through on that responsibility, but holding it lightly in terms of self-reification, realism.

The other thing is using the sense of soul-making as one's guide. What is my responsibility? How do I feel that? How do I follow through on that? When I'm trying to follow through on my sense of duty, am I on the right track? Again, it's energy body and sense of soul-making that we can trust. If something gets too tight or feels dead, we get the sense that we're not on the right track—something's a bit off.

So always part of the principle is: am I clinging too tightly? Is it becoming a realism? And also, how is my soul with this? How is this stirring the soul?

And we can trust that when it feels soulful, when it feels soul-making, we are moving in a direction that serves not only our own deepest flourishing but the flourishing of the whole web of existence of which we are part.

This capacity to sense what is truly nourishing to the soul, what opens and expands our being rather than contracts it, becomes one of our most reliable guides on the spiritual path. It is a wisdom that emerges from the integration of body, heart, and mind—a knowing that goes beyond mere intellectual understanding to touch the very core of our being.

When we learn to trust this deeper sensing, this soul-compass, we find ourselves naturally drawn toward what serves awakening and naturally moving away from what perpetuates suffering. We begin to live from a place of authentic responsiveness rather than unconscious reactivity, and our actions become expressions of wisdom and compassion rather than mere habit or conditioning.

This is the art of dharmic living—allowing the teachings to penetrate so deeply that they transform not just how we think, but how we sense, how we feel, and how we move through the world. It is a path that honors both the transcendent dimensions of spiritual realization and the very human, embodied nature of our existence.

May this exploration serve your own deepening practice and your capacity to live with ever greater freedom, wisdom, and love.

CHAPTER 50

Tending the Flame

Rob Burbea · 18 min

> In this closing talk from the "Re-enchanting the Cosmos" retreat, Rob Burbea provides essential guidance for practitioners transitioning back to daily life while preserving the precious insights and openings cultivated during retreat. He emphasizes the importance of sensitivity when sharing retreat experiences, recognizing that the heart and soul may be particularly open and vulnerable after deep practice.
>
> Burbea addresses the crucial role of saṅgha in sustaining practice, encouraging practitioners to seek supportive communities for continued exploration of imaginal and cosmopoetic practices. He discusses the middle way between realism and nihilism regarding imaginal experiences, noting that while the philosophical framework of emptiness is sophisticated, practitioners should trust what brings soulfulness and aliveness rather than adhering rigidly to authority positions.
>
> The talk concludes with encouragement about the vast potential of the path, emphasizing that imaginal and cosmopoetic practices can be fruitful even in short periods and without extensive samādhi. Burbea reminds practitioners that these approaches are part of a wider tapestry including mindfulness, samādhi, mettā, and emptiness practices—all mutually enriching when approached with intelligence, creativity, and the spirit of experimentation that keeps the flame of practice desire burning bright.

So we're already in transition, at the end of the retreat. Catherine and I want to say a few things in closing.

Because you've all done silent retreats before, you're familiar with transitioning out of silence, out of retreat, back to different environments, the busynness of your home and work life. A lot of that you know—I don't think we need to repeat it.

This retreat, because we haven't put so much emphasis on concentration and silence, there have been these exercises and more openness of the senses as opposed to focus on sense restraint and the smallness of attention. When a retreat emphasizes concentration, smallness of attention, silence, and solitude, the transition is harder in many ways, particularly in the domain of sense contact and sense impact. That's less the case probably for this kind of retreat.

However, the heart and the soul may be very open, so there may be a sensitivity at the heart and soul level more than at the sensory level. This needs care. We need to really respect and listen and feel into what the heart, what the soul needs today, in the rest of the day, in the next few days.

In a way, it's just a continuation—noticing the energy body, noticing the emotions, noticing when the heart is maybe contracting or feels vulnerable, and then what does it need? What does it need in that moment? Just staying, letting the energy body, letting the sensitivity to the emotions kind of guide, letting the contact with that guide and give wisdom about what's appropriate here, what do I need right now?

One part of that is about sharing your experiences or enthusiasm from the retreat. This is something I think we need to be careful with after retreat, but it might be asking again for sensitivity. You might get home and before you've even put your suitcase down you've downloaded the whole thing to whoever you live with—and maybe that's not right for you and maybe it's not right for them. It really does need sensitivity and noticing: what do you need, but really also what do they want? What does this other person want?

Sometimes I think we get a sense of the preciousness or something in this week that's touched us that feels precious and we want to share that. But we need to be careful what you do with that in relationship. It may make complete sense—I'm close to this person, they're my friend, they're my spouse, of course I tell them. Well, maybe, maybe not. Because if they're not interested, or if they're even disrespectful, that really has an impact.

You can sense this in the contact. You start to say something, the eyes kind of glaze over in the other person, or they're just trying to be politely interested. Be careful what you want to do with that. Maybe it's fine, but it's really just being sensitive to what you need, how you need to be received, and what they need. There's timing as well. They might be in the middle of a busy thing with all this other stuff going on. They've been at home dealing with that. When's the time that they're open and ready to hear if they're interested?

But we do need to share, I think. We need to share our practice. We need to hear from others who are practicing. That's fundamental to all practices—the importance of sangha, the importance of receiving, listening, communicating, having a back and forth. It's so nourishing.

In terms of this retreat and these kind of practices and maybe other related practices—emptiness and samadhi and imaginal work—Andrea has put a list together. If those are the kind of things you're interested in, you want to keep, have some contact with people, partly there'll probably be some people in London and other places who can actually meet in person, if that's what you want, or have email contact and set up other ways of contact. The importance of sangha is so crucial in nourishing and sustaining and kind of sustaining the fire under practice. I think it's easy to underestimate that. It's really easy to underestimate how important that is.

We need to talk. We need to share. We need to hear from others. We need to bounce ideas. We need to be supported. We need also, I think, to listen and to read. So easily practice just kind of... sometimes doesn't expand or grow or deepen in the ways that it could because we're actually not inputting much that's new or that's opening things or challenging things or building new ideas and things on which practice can then open to new vistas, new explorations. So we do need to be fed—whether it's dharma talks, listening, there's DharmaSeed and all that, or books, reading, et cetera.

Somehow we need to keep alive the flame of our desire. We talked about this yesterday in the Q&A. Somehow that needs to be kept alive—all the different ways that can happen. It's so easy for that to be diminished.

Part of that is also keeping what we've emphasized so much this week—keeping alive the spirit of experimentation, of play, of creativity. That's really so important to be kept alive. And with that, this question: what's working? When I say to have intelligence in the practice really means to ask, what's working?

What's opening? Where is this leading? How does it work? These kinds of creative, interested questions ensure that the practice is intelligent and actually unfolds in a fruitful way. That's part of the creativity and that's part of the desire.

Just going back to the sharing and the sangha—I think especially with the kinds of practices we've been exploring this week, even some dharma people will not be interested or respectful, or may even be disparaging. So it's really important to be sensitive about where you can find support for this kind of work, if this is what interests you.

Regarding nourishing the practice, I wanted to address something that connects to several questions that have come up recently. This concerns nourishing that attitude of experimentation around imaginal practice and cosmopoetic practice, and it brings us back to this real-unreal question and what's called in dharma the middle way—the middle way between "it is" and "it isn't," between "it exists" and "it doesn't exist," between "it's real" and "it's not real."

That's hard, generally speaking. The middle way is hard. It's a very deep insight, and it's very rare for someone to actually be able to dwell there and relate to life from that place—until the insight into emptiness gets really quite deep. Until then, there's going to be some reification of something. There's just a tendency to reify, which I want to say is really okay. It's not a problem. It's just how it is.

I said yesterday in the Q&A that Catherine and I, just by virtue of sitting up here and by history, are placed in a position of authority. And so we might emphasize this thing of "realism is a problem, drop the realism, don't grasp things as true," and so forth. I'm just cautious about the weight of that authority—that giving of authority, if that makes sense.

In addition to that, a person might feel—and several people have expressed this, and it's very common now in our society—all the damage and danger that has come from religious realism, from people clinging to "this is truth" and fighting with someone else who says, "No, that's not true, this is true," and the identification with that. So we're hyperaware in our culture of the dangers of fundamentalist religious thinking and realism. That may also create hesitation around entering into more belief in some kind of reality of the imaginal realm or of the divine.

There are different forces at play here. It's more recent in human history—and rarer—to see the dangers of secularism, which is actually just a belief in the reality of something else, as opposed to a belief in the reality of the divine. It's the same realism, misplaced somewhere else as the only reality. And there's just as much—well, you can have aggressive secularism as well. And you can be on the receiving end of that. That's another reason I caution about where to share this, because even some dharma people are going to look down on you and disparage it.

But in the bigger cultural and human history picture, realism both ways has caused damage. Don't forget that. It's only more recent—and it's hard to see what's more recent—but the damage of the flat view of physicalism, of secularism, of secular humanism, is not so obvious to us. For millennia, humans have believed in the reality of divinities, granted them reality and functioned that way, and despite all the problems in history and all the terrors, there was also a lot of beauty, a lot of opening, a lot of sacredness, a lot of meaningfulness.

So I'd like to say now: go back to what's helpful. If this middle way is hard—and it's not simple, it's a deep insight—but if it's helpful for you and where you are to lean toward granting a reality to the imaginal realm, believing in the reality of this or that divinity in some kind of way, if that feels helpful, then lean that way. There's a journey here, a journey of evolution of understanding.

We partly wanted to lay out something with quite a sophisticated philosophical framework because I think that's what we need now in our contemporary society, also because of the assumptions of secularism. It needs a response that's quite robust, that's not easily dismissed, that's philosophically quite deep and sound. And that's also contemporary—we can't really go back in time. We need something beyond modernism, incorporating scientific insight, incorporating modern philosophy and all of that. That's the reason I tend to emphasize, we tend to emphasize, that framework quite a lot.

But really, go back to this thing about trust: check the soulmaking, check the soulfulness. If I'm believing something, is the soul alive with that? Is it bringing something alive? Is it helpful? Is it freeing?

Is there beauty that's coming from that? These are the things to check in with, as opposed to allegiance to a position of authority, which might be Catherine or me, or both of us. "Well, Rob says this, so that's what I'm supposed to be doing." Check the heart, check the soul, check what's working. And there really is a journey with this stuff, so please trust that.

Just two more brief points. In relation to imaginal practice and cosmopoietic practice, I don't think necessarily that long retreats are really what's needed. I mean, they're great and they're wonderful, but there's a lot of potential in these kinds of practices for short periods of practice, practice off retreat, practice when there isn't that much samadhi. It can be really fruitful.

We're interested in this flexibility, this agility of the ways of looking, and these quick, agile shifts of the perception of the mode of being. With practice and in time, they can become something you can enter into and out of quite quickly, and this imbues the days and actually changes what's possible in our sense of existence. It's not necessarily "I should go on retreat for three years or whatever."

And last, which has come up indirectly—what we've been doing this week, actually we've been doing quite a few practices, haven't we? We talked about the energy body, we talked about samadhi, we talked about emotional sensitivity and skillful work with one's emotions, whether they're difficult or lovely or neutral. We've talked about imaginal practice and we've extended that to cosmopoiesis. There are a lot of things there, and we mentioned emptiness.

So just to put the imaginal and the cosmopoietic practices in the context of a wider buffet, if you like, of what's available and what's mutually enhancing, mutually enriching, mutually deepening. There will be periods in your life when you're maybe more into imaginal practice, or periods where you're really exploring mindfulness, or periods where you're really going deeper into the whole samadhi thing or metta or whatever. And just as on this retreat we say, "What's the intention right now for practice?"—sometimes out of retreat you can have an intention or a thread of practice that's really going for a few weeks or a few months. "That's what I'm interested in and that's really where I'm devoting myself to." Sometimes that's really fruitful, to just kind of go with something for a while, but know that it's part of a bigger tapestry, a bigger jigsaw of how things might fit together and be mutually nourished.

The path goes very deep. So much more is possible than I think most people tend to think. It goes back to keeping that flame of desire alive, keeping the intelligence alive, asking "What's working? What's helpful? Is this going where I want?" and keeping that spirit of play alive. When those things are there, an enormous amount is possible.

So the path is deep, but it's also very wide. All these beautiful practices and aspects and how they feed each other—it's there for you. It's totally there. It just takes this spirit of play, of questioning, staying true to what my soul longs for. It's all actually available. It really is available.

So thank you for your practice this week. It's been really lovely, really beautiful. Thank you very much.

CHAPTER 51

The Way of Non-Clinging (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h18

> In this opening talk from the 'Eros Unfettered' series, Rob Burbea examines the Buddhist teaching of non-clinging (upadana) and its various interpretations. He explores the rich Pali vocabulary around desire - including tanha (craving), raga (passion), lobha (greed), and kama (sensual desire) - and maps these concepts onto the twelve links of paticcasamuppada (dependent origination) through practical examples.
>
> Burbea contrasts different conceptual frameworks for understanding the Dharma, particularly critiquing overly simplistic approaches that reduce practice to 'just letting go of everything.' While acknowledging the helpfulness of traditional tools like mindfulness of vedana, reflection on impermanence (anicca), and working with papanca (mental proliferation), he argues these approaches can shut doors to deeper possibilities.
>
> The talk sets up a crucial distinction between limited understandings that aim merely for peaceful non-clinging versus more radical approaches that open to the unfabricated and reveal the emptiness of all phenomena. Burbea suggests that how we conceive clinging and desire fundamentally shapes our practice and determines whether we access profound mystical openings or remain trapped in conceptual limitations. This foundational teaching prepares the ground for exploring the more unusual teachings on eros and desire that follow in the series.

What I would like to do tonight is give a talk that in some ways could stand alone, talking about non-clinging. But in other ways—and this is my main purpose, really—hopefully give something that serves as a kind of preface to the set of talks we're going to start around the alchemy of desire, around eros and practice.

