But what that also means, practically speaking, is that in the day, there's a kind of wide palette of practices you can move between. And you can be quite fluid and quite responsive with that. So to try and do imaginal practice all day, I think would be too much. It would somehow imbalance the being. So you want some of that. And then when is it time to kind of go more into relatively unfabricated practice? Calming, simplifying, gathering, nurturing energy in the energy body, or just being with one's emotions in a healing way, or metta, or emptiness, or working with desire, as some of you will know we've worked with on other retreats.

So there's a necessity to move between different practices, and the possibility of this kind of skillful, responsive, sensitive navigation to when and which. Do you understand?

Before I get on to the four nodes I wanted to talk about this evening, just briefly, again, if it's not obvious, there's something about the relationship between these nodes, between these elements and aspects. There's not a linear relationship there. It's not like first this one and then you get that one. We could say there's a sort of commonality of ones that are maybe more likely to be noticed later or earlier. We could say that, but actually there's no order, and it's not like in any practice. First you do this, and then you do that.

We are emphasizing the energy body, but actually any node, the ignition of any node, can then ignite any other node. The causality is every which way in this lattice. And also in terms of the relationship between them, you know, I've said this before, but again, it's worth saying. Some of these nodes are sort of implicit, or this node is really a shade of that node, or a reflection of it, or an aspect of that other node, or it's already implicit in that node. So what would an example be?

For example, when we talked about dimensionality and divinity and beyondness and unfathomability, these are concepts or senses that kind of dance around each other, weave into each other. Other nodes have a kind of polarizing quality—they move in opposite directions between a certain pair, or they're a bit contradictory or almost paradoxical.

What would be an example of that? Well actually, in a way, you know the node of grace that Catherine talked about this morning and the very idea implicit in the whole idea of the lattice that you can kind of ignite a node and then it becomes more imaginal

—there's this important embrace of the receptive and the active, the technique and the mystery of grace. Do you understand? And so that somehow seems really part of the art of this whole practice. It's neither always one or the other, and the balance between the two can be very fluid.

So I'm going to speak about the next four nodes on our list, and I'm going to endeavor to be brief. Just a few points and suggestions and articulations.

The fifteenth one is the non-reducibility of what is sensed with soul. So what does that mean? It means that in the imaginal constellation there's a relationship with an image or with a sensing the soul, a sense of the soul. There's a relationship with it that the concept and the sense of it is not reducing it. This only is this. It only means X or Y.

So, for example, we can reduce things under the kind of rubric and the gaze of scientific materialism. I look at the tree, or the rose, or the curtains, and I just see flat, meaningless, the dance, random dance of flat, meaningless matter according to certain physical laws. That's a kind of reductionism. Everything is made of little subatomic particles that move meaninglessly. Do you understand? And you say, now, we can view that way, but if we only view that way, that flattening, that reduction, will flatten the sense in the soul. That's one kind of reductionism.

Another is a kind of, well, different kinds of psychological reductionism. So, for example, this image represents my empowerment.

my power, my self-empowerment in life, and this will give me that. Or this image represents my compassion, or some other brahmavihara, or some faculty of the mind, or something like that. That's what this is. In that reductionist view, it's a representation, it is this, and implicitly it's that it's only this.

So it's okay that we view it as, yes, it's matter, we can understand matter in that sense, but not only. And it's okay that we could say, this is a representation of empowerment, but not only. And compassion, but not only. Do you understand? It's the "only" that's the killer, that's the flattener.

Or, again, we can have an image and say this image is arising because it's representing, it's re-presenting something from my psychological history, something from my past, something from my family. And yes, it may be related to that, but again, it's the "only" that squeezes the soul out of it. You understand? It's only—I'm having this image because it's because, and only because, X or Y happened to me when I was a child, and this is representing it.

In the scope and complexity and richness of images and sensings with soul, that can be part of it. That can be part of why that image is coming up, but only one level of it. The "only" is reducing, and that's what will kill the sensing soul. It will literally squash the dimensionality and the richness and the complexity and the unendingness and the mystery and all of that, the multifacetedness.

So we touched briefly in the Q&A and also in one or two interviews—this image may be related to my past, may be related to some character in my family, my father, for instance. The image kind of echoes that. It's not just a representation of my father and how he was tyrannical with me, or whatever it is.

And then there's this possibility—a reductionist view would say the image is caused by what happened to me in my life, and it's representing it now as a psychic image, and that's what it is. So the causality runs from real material event in the past to image now in the present. You understand? The causality is conceived that way. If it's only, that's where we lose the soulfulness.

There's another way of thinking that images are actually primary. I've touched on this on other retreats. Images are what drive. They drive our lives. The image that I've shared in the past, the image of a solitary warrior, soldier, or the image of the lonely wanderer, the solitary wanderer—I can see that that has been generative in my life. It's like the image comes first, not so much first in time, but it's primary. It gives me my life. It shapes my life. It shapes my perception of things.

So we can conceive the causality going that way instead, or we can conceive it as coming from a whole other level, as I mentioned briefly in the Q&A. Soul, the mystery of soul, gives me, offers me, my images and the events of my life. It's another level of possible conception. But reductionism will kill, in one way or another.

Related to this, that's the fifteenth, related to this is the sixteenth—what we were calling autonomy. So, again, if I consider this image is a part of me, then it's not autonomous. It's just a part of me. Now, in certain psychological languages, I'm projecting this image, and maybe I project it onto a friend or a lover, I project my mom or dad or whatever. But then the image doesn't have autonomy. It's somehow part of me, which is projected as an image.

Versus the image is both me and not me. It's something beyond me. It's something—it has its own personhood. Like a person that we know, a flesh and blood person that we know. So, again, these nodes, you can notice them. And people reporting, it's like, after a while you start to notice, oh, this image has its autonomy. It really feels like another being.

We're talking about... You understand? Or the tree that I am sensing the soul has its kind of personhood, if you like. And so that's another aspect of autonomy. Again, we could have separated and made another node of personhood, but that's...

In considering the movement between self and image, we find what we might call the node of twoness. When I encounter an image that possesses genuine otherness, the eros flowing between us doesn't simply collapse this relationship into some universal unity. The image doesn't melt away into undifferentiated oneness.

Instead, there's an attractive pull, an erotic tension that maintains the distinctness between myself and this beloved other. The differentiation is preserved—not dissolved in some white light of unification or absorbed into a blissful melting union. This is essential: the erotic tension sustains the particularity of both self and other.

Even when I become an image—when the boundaries shift and I find myself inhabiting its perspective—differentiation remains. Perhaps twoness isn't immediately obvious in such moments, but distinctness of particulars continues to be preserved in soul-making perception. We're not moving toward some undifferentiated oneness, but rather maintaining the fertility that comes from the dance between separate and connected, distinct yet related.

This differentiation can manifest in various ways. There might be the image and the world in which it exists—each with their own particularity, their own texture and qualities. Yet alongside this differentiation, there often exists an implicit sense of underlying oneness. The image and its world are separate, yet in some mysterious way, the world is that image. They are the same thing, but this recognition doesn't collapse the relationship or melt away the distinctness.

The modes of relating to an image are fluid and dynamic. You might sense it as completely separate at first, then find yourself becoming it—fusing with it, entering into its experience, seeing the world through its perspective. Then the relationship might shift again, returning to separation. This fluidity is quite normal and part of the natural rhythm of imaginal engagement.

If you notice your relationship with images tends to follow only one pattern, you might deliberately experiment with different modes. If an image always remains separate, you could explore: What would it be like to be this monster? What is it like from the inside to be Aslan, to inhabit his fierce tenderness? Allow yourself to discover what emerges when you shift the quality of engagement, when you consciously explore different ways of meeting the imaginal.

The last mode I want to explore tonight is the eighteenth: what we call the theatre, or the imaginal middle way.

This quality emerges naturally when we work authentically with imaginal images. If you ask someone deeply engaged with an image whether it's real or not real, they'll likely find those categories inadequate. There's something that exists between real and not real—a different kind of reality altogether. This is something we can actually notice and cultivate when we linger with images.

Sometimes Catherine and I explore images together, and we've learned to distinguish when our practice shifts into different territories. One of the hallmarks of imaginal work is this sense of theatre—this quality of being neither real nor not real. To me, it's profoundly beautiful, liberating, and potent.

We might call this the imaginal middle way—the middle path between real and not real. Consider the experience of truly excellent theatre in an intimate setting, where the actors are close enough to touch. You know it's play—literally a play, not real in the conventional sense. Yet it can be utterly vulnerable, powerful, and transforming. The imaginal realm carries this same theatrical quality.

This is what it means to recognize artistic truth or poetic truth—a different kind of truth with immense power, yet distinctly particular in its nature.

People sometimes ask in our sessions whether all this emptiness work is necessary—the gradual reduction of fabrication until we reach the unfabricated and see its emptiness. It's an open question. I don't believe it's strictly necessary. Some people naturally develop this middle-way perception through emptiness understanding. Others access it through their artistic sensibility or poetic understanding of reality. Still others simply notice this middle-way status of images, this theatrical quality they naturally possess.

Consider the eternality we explored today. Is an image real or unreal? The most obvious truth about images is their impermanence—they come and go, just as the sensing soul comes and goes. Time's passage and change are completely apparent. Yet simultaneously, there's often a sense of timelessness, of something always already happening. The image becomes iconic rather than narrative, existing as an eternal presence somewhere in the vastness of psyche.

We can be sensitive to this quality of timelessness and eternality while never losing sight of impermanence. Bodies are impermanent. Lives are impermanent. Everything is impermanent, and images certainly are impermanent. When we see both truths simultaneously and hold them together, we avoid landing in either camp as ultimate truth.

Each of these modes contains profound depth, richness, potency, and liberating efficacy. Entering this particular node of theatre liberates something essential while retaining the power of poetry, art, theatre, and the middle way itself.

All the nodes possess tremendous depth and richness, along with potency and liberative efficacy. When we enter into some of these nodes—like this theatre of perception—something genuinely liberates. It truly releases something within us. This power endures: the power of poetry, the power of art, the power of theatre, the power of the middle way.

These are not mere intellectual constructs but living doorways to freedom. Each node offers its own particular gift, its own way of opening the heart and mind to what lies beyond our usual fixations. In the theatre of perception, we discover that we are both the actors and the audience, the dreamers and the dream, participating in a drama that is both utterly real and completely insubstantial.

The middle way shows us that we need not choose between these apparent contradictions. We can hold the fullness of experience without grasping, witness the play of phenomena without being caught by it. In this way, the very impermanence that might seem threatening becomes our greatest teacher, pointing always toward the freedom that lies at the heart of all experience.

Shall we sit?

Soulmaking Rivers (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 51 min

> In this wide-ranging Q&A session from the 'Tending the Holy Fire' retreat, Rob Burbea skillfully navigates complex questions about soulmaking practice and its relationship to traditional Buddhist teachings. He addresses a practitioner's visceral reactions to religious language like 'God' and 'divine,' explaining how these concepts can be understood as pointing toward mystery, ultimate value, and meaningfulness that transcends conceptual capture - qualities that connect to the Buddhist understanding of Buddha-nature.
> Burbea explores the fundamental question of fabrication versus reality, drawing on emptiness teachings to show how our usual assumptions about what is 'real' versus 'made up' require deeper investigation. He explains how soulmaking deliberately emphasizes fabrication as participation in creation and discovery, rather than mere invention to comfort ourselves against meaninglessness. The discussion touches on how imaginal practice can naturally lead toward unfabricated states similar to jhāna, while maintaining the particular essence of images.
> The conversation also addresses practical concerns about cultural diversity in imaginal practice, the role of community in sharing images, and how personal and collective soulmaking intersect. Burbea emphasizes trusting one's authentic sense of soul-making while remaining open to healing old wounds around spiritual concepts, offering both direct inquiry and indirect approaches through what naturally resonates.

Maria raised a question about God that had been troubling her since the beginning of the retreat. She noted that the dharma talks had been particularly focused on divine language—terms like angel, sacred, reverence—and while this vocabulary drew her to soulmaking, it also triggered a visceral reaction due to her difficult religious history.

"I have a very tight relationship with God historically," she explained. "When I hear language like angel or sacred, reverence, I kind of feel..." She paused, describing an immediate, gut-wrenching response that bypassed rational thought—decades of conditioning from a religious background creating an automatic recoiling.

Maria mentioned that certain ideas had been helpful, particularly the concept that God too is empty, just like everything else. But the physical reaction to these words remained challenging.

When I asked if there were alternative words that might work better—sacred, holy, angel, divine—she responded with the same resistance. "All of it," she said simply.

So let's approach this conceptually for a moment. When someone is comfortable using words like God, sacred, angel, or divine, and you ask them what they actually mean by these terms, they often struggle to articulate anything concrete. This difficulty in capturing meaning is actually one of the most significant aspects of such language—these words are inherently open-ended, carrying an essential mystery.

"How's the word mystery?" I asked, clarifying that I didn't mean Agatha Christie.

This points to something crucial: these terms carry an unfathomability, a sense that there's something present that can't be fully grasped. It's not that we can't say anything about the divine, but whatever we do say won't completely capture it. Wrapped up in this mystery is a deep meaningfulness that we can't even fully articulate.

So we're speaking of something we'll never completely understand intellectually. We might offer concepts and descriptions, but somehow it remains of utmost value despite—or perhaps because of—this uncapturability. There's a cluster of qualities here: ultimate value, essential undefinability, profound meaningfulness, and mystery.

you could make up a word or words and translate as we go along. But that's really where we're heading.

What may have happened in the past is that these words have become associated not just with certain punitive or restrictive measures. I was also brought up in an orthodox environment, which I really didn't like for the most part. And it's almost as if there's something about this whole business—which we touched on yesterday—that will break vessels, including what any concept means, like divine, or God, all of that.

So it's almost like if you know that's where you're going, then at the moment there's a kind of encrustation based on the past about what these words mean—not just the emotional, relational associations with them, but also what they actually are. I was brought up with a very strangely narrow conception of God, as this kind of judge who was somehow separate from me. And at some point, that has to get stretched or broken. Maybe I'm just confused for a while. Maybe there's a not-knowing phase. But at some point, either that word or other words can come back to point toward and suggest—they function really as much as anything as poetic words, poetry words that suggest into the soul something of this mystery that's ultimately valuable and ultimately meaningful in a way that I can't quite capture.

There's something else worth saying about the notion of divinity. Some would prefer Buddha-nature, and there are certain streams of dharma where the idea of a kind of ultimate cosmic deity and certain ideas of Buddha-nature are pretty much the same. So there's this value, this benevolence—that's not really the right word, but something like that—wrapped up vaguely in the concept.

There's also a way that it's not separate from me, and I think that's very important as well. Again, I was brought up—if I just share about my background—with no indication that the divine or God or whatever is not separate from me somehow. It was always portrayed as something other that would judge me or discern where I would end up or something like that. There was this kind of separation there. So non-separation is also woven into this concept, along with this endlessness, this kind of endless reverberation and unfathomability and all that.

You can hear in the words I'm using many of the other nodes. They kind of imply each other. But that's the kind of thing we're going for. So it's much more open.

Does this make sense? So that's one way of just knowing that actually, this is completely normal. It could be around this concept, it could be around something else. It could be around body, it could be around emotions, it could be around relationship, it could be around what the cosmos is, it could be around what matter is. There are certain ways we get—we touched on this yesterday—things frozen by ideas or things that have happened to us or our personal history or our energetics or the way we relate to our emotions. All kinds of ways something gets stuck.

If I can find ways of entering into what we're calling soul-making—any way in—so you don't even have to go in at these words that feel difficult. Find something that does relate, and if the alchemy of that vessel... it's like yeast rising, something expands in the kneading of the dough. Something expands and it starts to gather into it other aspects of the being that aren't yet included.

Now here's the issue. There are two ways of approaching it. Here's the difficulty: we can approach it directly and inquire into the difficulty. I'll come back to that in a second. You can also not bother too much about the difficulty and just go in with whatever makes sense and resonates with you out of what's being said here and what's being taught. Go in where there's a feeling of soul-making, where there's that sense of soul-making, and just get into that. Let that speak to you, let that resonate in the being, in the psyche, and it will start doing its alchemical expansion process in its own time. Eventually, other aspects and concepts of the being at different levels that at the moment are outside of that process will get included, subsumed into that process.

So you can just trust what works and trust that we're going somewhere that is going to be—whatever words you end up with, whatever works for you as concepts—quite different from what your background is. In a way, you don't have to... it's good that you recognize there's a problem there, but you don't have to bash your head against it.

So it could be anything. Maybe something else just works for you. Or you could ask: which bit does work?

So in a way, you don't have to—it's good that you recognize there's a problem there, but you don't have to bash your head against it. So it could be anything. Maybe what actually works for you is something about—I'm making this up—or you could ask yourself, which bit does work?

"Sure."

Yeah, okay, beautiful. So nature—there's a sense of soul-making in nature, and you can sense nature with soul. You go that way. You trust that, and something happens that expands. What these words that we're using—and you might replace them with other words—but that kind of concept and idea and intimation that we're pointing to will come out of that soul-making where it works for you. You understand?

So this is a general rule. And at times you may want to, for instance, inquire into the particular kind of pain in relationship to these words. So it's actually like, you know, in a safe space—maybe with someone you trust, maybe with a teacher, with a friend—actually drop those words in and just notice: what is it? I get angry. What is it? I feel oppressed. I feel... And just notice what happens. And then what does that mean?

So as always, there are different directions in. It's really helpful to look at what's difficult and explore what's going on there. What are these walls that I have? And what do they need in terms of healing or opening? And sometimes we don't need to go towards the difficult. You can go the other way and trust this rising of the bread there, this alchemical presence, where it works for you—which is what you're saying in nature.

Does this make sense? Yeah? How does that sound for now, Mary?

"Yes. It's helped me to take away all the pressure."

Yeah, absolutely. There's no pressure. First of all, we're going very quickly through this material. And some of it just won't make sense. Or there'll be reactions—all kinds of reactions. It's all fine. It's all part of the working of the process, the turning of the soil.

And you can really trust your sense of soul-making. That's like a golden rule—go with that. And at some point, there might be some really interesting kind of heartful investigation of these wounds, basically, around these ideas and those relationships.

"Just going back to the thing you were saying about trusting, so there's also a part of me that thinks—just as man kind of fabricates God to be like me—are we fabricating soul-making to give life meaning?"

Yeah, thank you. So the question is, man... well, some people would say man fabricates God to give life meaning. And the question is, are we fabricating soul-making to...

So we could say yes, but the usual way we then understand that idea is like a certain level of understanding. We say life is ultimately meaningless. And the reality is there is no God. And then what we're doing, because we can't handle that—we're a little morally weak—we invent things that make us feel a little bit better and more comforted.

That's based on a certain kind of "this is real." Meaninglessness is real. Soullessness is real. Godlessness is real. You understand? So oftentimes in the framing of that kind of question, there's already a reality assumption there.

I think partly where I want to tie all this with emptiness is—if we start with the idea of fabrication. We fabricate, we make up stuff, or stuff gets believed in or perceived or created. Then I have a question to investigate, and it's a very deep thread of a question: What's not fabricated?

So I can see, for example—and everyone in this room knows—when you experience papañca, and you're just lost in some blah blah blah, and you come out of that and you think, "Huh, that was fabricated." You gain your sanity again. So I know, okay, at that point, that's fabricated—all that nonsense, papañca and that kind of mess that we get into.

And this is real, the hard reality of that, and I can settle with that. But what if we don't stop the investigation of what is fabricated right there? What if we keep going? I've seen that papañca is fabricated. What else is fabricated?

One way of understanding what Buddha Dharma is, that journey, is to keep open that question. What is fabricated? How do I know? How can I investigate and see? So this sense of self, most people take completely for real. And then you start going in and out of different states of meditation. You start looking at what is it that makes this sense of self feel so convincingly solid and fixed, and then at other times not. What does it depend on? And then at a certain point you realize, goodness me, that sense of self is fabricated. And then maybe an even more subtle sense of self, and so on. And the same with other realities.

Now that's a long and profound journey, but at the end of it, let's say, one realizes it's all fabricated. So there is no "life is like this, the universe is like this." There is godlessness. Meaninglessness is an existential fact. And we're just fabricating on top of a basic reality to kind of paint things pink. It's actually that it's all fabricated. That's an extremely deep insight.

But I'm not asking anyone to believe that insight. Some people will just have an intuitive belief in that insight and that's fine. But what if I'm actually, if I'm really ruthless and rigorous and I say, let me find out what is fabricated and what is not fabricated. And then I just keep going with this question. I don't see, for instance, that papañca is fabricated or that meaning is fabricated. I follow it and I go even deeper. Meaninglessness is also fabricated. Godlessness is fabricated.

So that's one way of going through. We have chosen the word soul-making because it emphasizes the fact of fabrication. So it's actually, yes, we're fabricating. Yes. And then it's like, why is that not justifiable? And actually, is that something beautiful? So participation is a much deeper, more fuller word. We participate in the creation and discovery of all of this, all of this.

So it's really good to be skeptical and doubtful. But if you're going to be skeptical and doubtful, be vigorously, rigorously skeptical and doubtful. That is, to everyone. Do you understand? You've got this question. It's like we settle so easily for answers and we rest in assumptions as human beings so easily, sometimes without even recognizing, oh, I don't know that. It's just an assumption. So what happens if we just keep this? It's a bit like what Catherine said today. It's like "I know what reality is." Can we keep that open as an exploration? Do you understand?

There's another thing that reminds me. The other thing that we assume is that the generator or the fabricator, me, or whatever, is a real thing. So it's like this self is fabricating soul-making. Actually, again, when we go deeper and deeper, you start to realize that self, too, is empty. The fabricator, the mind, the soul, they're all empty. And that's like there's no ground to any of it.

And it might sound a bit, I don't know how it sounds now, where it lands in different people, but the deep felt realization of that is something truly magical.

It's something wondrous and mystical. It's not something like, "Well, that was a drag." It's something—it's hard to convey in language—but there's this thrill of that journey as well, of simply keeping this question open: What is fabricated? Is there something unfabricated? Is that real? There's an integrity and power and beauty to that thread of questioning itself.

And to me, it doesn't come out somewhere nihilistic at all. It comes out somewhere magical and mystical, with so much blessing to it. But maybe those aren't nice words. So, yeah.

This is still forming, but I've been reflecting on what's alive—these layers of personal soul-making, this collective here, and then, if you could imagine, the soul of the universe soul-making together, and thinking about that in relation to social context.

The other day you used the word temenos, I think, as a vessel or sacred space. Over the last few months of doing these practices, it has felt to me that what you could call my "image library"—just to simplify it—is shaped to some extent by dominant culture, both personally and collectively. In some of my work, talking with other people and hearing their images, I've realized... A colleague was giving an example—he's Afro-Caribbean—and he was talking about the Juba dance, which arises from this collective archive of trauma. It's performed and then it disappears, and it's always new every single time. That was really rich for me, and I would not have known about that.

I think, but I'm not sure, that temenos is also meant to include all archetypal, cultural elements—that it spans cultures, that it's not just specific. So I guess I was wondering how... you've elegantly woven us together in community, and you even talked a little bit about the environment. Thinking about this group—it's not hugely diverse, so if we were in Ghana we would be having very different images—is there a way, or is it important to think about, how could we collectively contribute to a kind of "image library"? We can read about things, but even hearing yours and Catherine's, it's like, "Oh, this is..." I forgot about that, or I've never been exposed to that.

I was using the word temenos only occasionally so far to mean a kind of... It's as if when there's an image, whether it's just on my own practicing or whether I'm practicing with others—like when we did the sharing practice yesterday—there's such... We need an alchemical vessel. It needs a vessel or container. When there's eros, it also needs a vessel, needs a container and a boundary, without which the soul-making can't happen. It doesn't really catch.

Some of you might have noticed already—you're in a group, or you're in one of those fours or in a dyad, and someone says something, or Catherine or I share an image in a talk, and that image lands in your soul and functions either as a spark for other images or becomes an image for you. Do you understand? Or someone becomes an image—Catherine or I or someone here or someone you know becomes an image for you. Or, again, you hear images. So there's a way that happens, but it needs a kind of temenos to happen.

There are different aspects. Part is just sensitivity, presence, care. I think formalism also helps.

In terms of the conceptual framework, what we're trying to do is a little bit what you could call a meta-framework. In other words, we're not so interested in gathering together around a certain image. For instance, in Christianity, the cross is one very potent image, or the body of Christ, or all kinds of things. And there's a gathering together around a certain image—community around an image, a commonality of people resonating with the same image, maybe in different ways and at different depths.

We might do that temporarily. Even when Catherine laid out those artifacts today, we're sharing an image for the space of a ritual. And some people will feel it more or less. But we're not choosing certain images and then making a religion out of those.

Maybe it's something to do with Western culture. Maybe it's something to do with our personalities. I think what we're aiming for is this sense that images are infinite in possibility. What we want to do—the business of this work—is the question of what's common to the whole process and the experience and the constellation around any particular image. Do you understand?

So that's what we're teaching - principles you can take anywhere and use in relation to any image or sensing of the soul. We're exploring what's common to this whole process, the elements that help this work flourish.

This approach may partly respond to our time and place in Western culture - a culture of individuality that we cannot now erase. This certainly brings difficulties: the alienation so common today, the loneliness, the persistent self-judgment and social anxiety. Do I look okay? Am I okay? Do I measure up? Am I good? All this is endemic in Western culture, arising from the birth of the Western sense of self centuries ago through slow, gradual, complex processes.

This inheritance brings challenges, yes, but also gifts. It offers the possibility that any one of us can receive images in any direction suitable to our soul. We can be fed by anything at all, following our own unique path.

Perhaps this reflects simply my inclination, Catherine's inclination. Or perhaps something in Western culture at this time needs this kind of openness, this deeper legitimization. Not only in Buddha-dharma, but in our larger culture, we lack real, deep legitimization of the imagination. Maybe what's needed is a structure that legitimates, supports, and deepens practice while remaining much more free and individual.

Regarding what you're calling the library of meanings - absolutely, you have to discover what works. In talks over recent years, I've tried offering a whole range of images: some ethereal and blissful, others seemingly violent, devouring, bloody; some very sexual, others peaceful; some unremarkable, others incredibly dramatic. The point is to show the range - it's endless, infinitely possible.

Sharing images or receiving them from other cultures could seed ideas for you, for others. We can do this with each other. But what really helps seed images... when I open a book of mythology, I often get bored quickly. Yet when someone tells me an image that's alive for them, or when a writer writes with that aliveness, something about the soulfulness, the soul-making spark in another, travels and plants a spark or ignites something in me. That may then become soul-making. We could create a library, but perhaps we also need that spark of ignition - we must receive the soulfulness, not just this is what it looked like.

About limitation and shaping - as the soul-making process unfolds, everything eventually gets woven into this vortex of soul-making. Even difficult things that happen to me, the events of my life, both beautiful and challenging, are sensed as given by soul, felt as part of the grace even when tragic.

This understanding expands further. What's given to us culturally - in both personal and cultural history - comes from the world soul, the anima mundi. There's an intelligence, alongside the deep non-intelligence, in our culture's unfolding, in the images and difficulties we face: environmental, political, social challenges. These are given by soul to us collectively. This is what we're faced with, our soul food - what we need in the dough for soul-making to occur.

Any situation can remain just a difficult circumstance, or a wonderful cultural gift, or it can be transformed into soul stuff. This offers an entirely different view of what gives us both images and our history, this culture and its challenges.

Again, the concept, the logos, expands into such a view. Then we receive a completely different sense of what life is, what the cosmos is, what's actually happening and unfolding. Am I trying to convince anyone or argue this as absolute reality? No - it's a poetic idea that can have tremendous power, beauty, and possibility to open the soul. While the whole question of ontology is vast, this view can have real soul power.

So there's that journey, and there's the possibility of the fullness of that journey, then emerging through different states of unfabricating into the unfabricated itself, opening to that. Some people would stop there. Some people would stop before that. Some people would stop there. But it's possible then to go even beyond that.

Because when you go that far, then you've got the unfabricated and the fabricated. And there's a kind of duality, which some Buddhadharma is very dualistic about. This is all—it's just the realm of samsara and dukkha. It's really not worth much. It's only a place to get out from, not to be reborn in. It's not popular teaching these days, but it's quite classical. There's a duality: the unfabricated is good and the fabricated is not.

One can go—Mahayana picks up and goes beyond that and sees even, we might say, the emptiness of the unfabricated. I'm just touching on this very quickly to get to something else. And then what that does is open up the possibility of fabrication, because fabrication is holy too. It's sacred-making. So there's no duality.

Now, the imaginal practice—as I think about it and as we've been exploring it—is fabricating. It's creating images. It's imagining. It's making more complexity, not less. So it's moving in a completely different direction than those three paths I mentioned: the insight into emptiness, the metta path, and the samatha path, which all move toward less fabrication.

The imaginal is moving toward more fabrication, but it's doing so in a way that's conscious and artistic and soulful. It's sacred fabrication. And when one has gone through that whole journey I described—into the unfabricated and then beyond that duality—then fabrication becomes possible as sacred art, as sacred creativity.

So in that sense, the imaginal practice is not a path to the unfabricated in the way those other three are. But it can be a path of sacred making, of holy creativity, of soulful fabrication. And that, in its own way, is just as sacred, just as valuable, as the journey into the unfabricated.

This is why I say soul doesn't want a full stop. Soul wants the endless creativity, the endless making of meaning, the endless weaving of images and stories and possibilities. Not because it's running away from the unfabricated, but because fabrication itself can be holy.

It all becomes the possibility of all becoming sacred. Is this okay so far?

With the imaginal, in a way, it's interesting. We could go around and ask everyone—we won't, but we could—how much or what kind of permission and legitimization do you need to get into imaginal practice or sensing the soul? For some people, it will be exactly related to this question of fabrication. For some people, it will be related to where it fits in the context of Buddhadharma. For some people, it will be something about, "Well, isn't it dangerous?" For others, it will be, "What about all that eros?" People will need different kinds of permissions and legitimizations.

But there is a legitimization that can come strictly from that kind of really deep understanding of emptiness that liberates the possibility and legitimates the possibility of fabricating beautifully. Why? Because fabrication is empty too. There is no duality with the unfabricated. One has sensed the equal holiness and non-duality of all things. So that legitimizes it.

A lot of people—there's probably a real minority in this room right now of people who've actually practiced all that way with emptiness in order for it to liberate the permission for the imaginal. That happened to be my path, but it's not common. Other people need a different approach. I'll talk about this tonight just a bit. What we need, though, is this sense of neither real nor not real with the imaginal. And that can come through art, through that sensibility, through poetry, through literature. We have that sense there. But I don't need to necessarily go through all that practice with the emptiness. Do you understand?

Some people approach the imaginal—they're attracted to it and start practicing with it before they've done all that emptiness business, so they've only done a little bit of it. And they find that, for instance, like we were talking with Nick yesterday about one of the things you might see with the self-view is just this multiplicity of self-sense. And you live it and you feel it, and so it brings with it this kind of "Which one is the real me?" And it brings a loosening of the self-sense, for example, and can bring a loosening and a liquefying of the world-sense and the other-sense. So there's a way that something similar to the emptiness process—the loosening of that, the un-reifying of that, de-reifying that—can happen through imaginal practice. So that's more emptiness, in this understanding of the non-inherent existence of things.

In terms of the unfabricated, this actually relates to a couple of the notes I had. So what can happen? A couple of people mentioned in their notes—meditating on an image. In this case it was infinite Aslan space. Do you know who Aslan is? The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe. It's the lion. When I first read it, I thought it was infinite Asian space. Anyway, it's infinite Aslan space.

So, in other words, she's got—Aslan is an imaginal figure for her with a history. And what can happen sometimes is the image, the form of the image fades and we kind of get to the essence. So it wasn't just space or just infinite space. It was space imbued with the essence and the character of Aslan and what everything—all the richness and the unendingness and the complexity of what Aslan meant—but without the form. You understand?

Now there's another one here which is a lot more complicated, and I think I'll maybe talk to the person if I can just extract a couple of things from this. This is a person—it's a complement to what I've just said about the Aslan. So that's something very beautiful, goldenness, and it's the kind of simply pure, noble, etc. Everything that Aslan would kind of represent and more.

I'll have to move through this next example quickly because it's complex, but it's really fascinating. This person had more complex images involving destruction, death, and suffering. They had an image of a skeleton that had been around for a long time, and then the skeleton dissolved. This was quite surprising. What was even more striking was that there was huge love and joy emanating from the image, yet the practitioner was plunged into sadness.

So unlike what I'm guessing was the Aslan image—quite lovely, radiant, noble, and uplifting—here was a more complex, emotionally nuanced experience. When the image faded, there was a space filled with what they described as "liquid light slash love slash limitlessness" but also sadness and grief. Something had happened. This image hadn't quite captured the essence of that original form, but it had transformed and gone into a kind of boundless samadhi space, similar to the boundless Aslan, which captured certain values and emotional resonances.

This isn't on the Buddha's map. But what you find if you really delve into jhana practice and explore it extensively is that the Buddha outlined one path, but there are all kinds of cocktails, mixes, shadings, and variations—a whole realm of infinite possibilities.

So occasionally, this is possible: the form of an image fades and its essence remains. It could be an essence of loveliness. Perhaps there's a goddess, or a friend whose angelic form I'm meditating on—their particular loveliness. Then the form fades, and I'm left with that loveliness. But it's particular, carrying the essence of that specific character. Do you understand? It's not just universal, generic loveliness. It could take another step toward universal loveliness, but then we'd have to say we're no longer doing imaginal practice because the image is gone, the particularity is gone. Yet it might still be soul-making because, as you said, "wow"—there's something the soul is expanding into and learning.

For those experiencing this, the sadness is fine. This practitioner continued: "I have leaned into it, stayed with it. It is not a sorrow that contracts." Here's a clue—there's something soul-making and beautiful happening. "It is as expansive in the energy body as love and very beautiful. The sorrow was beautiful." This is characteristic of soul-making; we can recognize it by these qualities.

Returning to your original question, I view it all as one integrated practice. Whether it's samatha moving toward the unfabricated, metta, emotional awareness, psychological healing, imaginal practice, or emptiness—it's all part of this big mandala, this vast range of interconnected practices, and it's all important.

There are ways of entering the imaginal that loosen our understanding of emptiness. There are ways of entering the imaginal that reach this essence and then move toward unfabricating, toward the fading of perception—like the jhanas, but different. With practice, you can learn to lean one way or another.

For example, taking the simpler Aslan case: here's this infinite Aslan space, and it's genuinely lovely. Within that mixture, there's probably some fundamentally jhanic quality—let's say equanimity—mixed with all the qualities that Aslan represents. I could lean toward that, find it in the mix, attune to it, and it will amplify out of the mixture. If it's equanimity in that mix, I just tune more to the equanimity, and it will move into classical equanimity of the fourth jhana. Or I can stay tuned to the Aslan quality itself, and it remains a variation. Or it can move somewhere more universal.

There's also a way it can move toward the unfabricated, though this is quite rare. I wouldn't recommend pursuing this all the time because if it becomes too universal, you're losing the richness of the imaginal practice itself.

It's great, but if you do it all the time, then you're losing the particularity of the imaginal practice. So it's there. There are so many tributaries. It's an endless world of wonder.

So you can do that. If you do it all the time, it will take it a bit out of what we're calling imaginal. Or you can stay with the essence at times, but you have to make sure that it's got this particularity to it. So that would be the same as saying an image could be very vague. I have the vague sense of a presence. I don't see it visually, but it's something quite particular and it's speaking to me with all those particular resonances. Okay?

Great. One time... This is super quick. It's completely related.

Is the phrase "to see or think this image" equivalent to the phrase "to see or think with this image"? Or are they kind of two sides of the coin?

It's not quite equivalent, but they're related. Maybe we can pick that up. Maybe I'll pick it up tonight.

Let's just have a bit of quiet, then the tea wash rappers will go, and we'll all meet back at 8:15 instead of 8. Is that okay?

All right.

CHAPTER 145

A Temenos Exercise (in threes)

Rob Burbea · 1h23

> In this experiential dharma session, Rob Burbea leads participants through a structured group meditation exercise called a 'temenos' - a sacred container for spiritual work. Working in groups of three, practitioners explore multiple dimensions of awareness and connection through progressive rounds of sharing and witnessing.
> The session begins with establishing energy body awareness - that spacious sense of presence that extends beyond ordinary body consciousness. Participants then engage in mettā (loving-kindness) practice while maintaining eye contact and sensing each other's presence, learning to hold both self-awareness and awareness of others simultaneously. The exercise unfolds in three rounds: first tracking and expressing energy body sensations, then exploring emotions, and finally sharing what touches the soul - those deeply meaningful experiences that resonate with imaginal and sacred dimensions.
> Burbea emphasizes the interdependent nature of expression and witnessing, noting how speaking and being seen creates a 'rolling dynamic of sensitivity.' The witnesses practice whole-body listening, bringing their energy body awareness into relationship with the speaker. The session concludes with chanting the sacred syllables 'Om Ah Hum,' representing the body, speech, and mind of primordial Buddha nature that encompasses all aspects of experience - light and dark, harmonious and discordant. This practice demonstrates Burbea's distinctive approach to soul-making dharma, where meditation becomes a vehicle for sacred psychological and spiritual exploration.

Setting again, really grounding in the sense of sitting—the sensations of sitting, the sensations of contact with the floor, with the earth, the backside, the sacrum, the legs. Even that grounding, even that connection with the earth can be multi-leveled at times. There's the simple mindfulness of sensations in their so-called bare actuality. There is the energy body connection. There is the imaginal sense of the body—this body, how it's perceived sitting on the earth.

Opening up the awareness to the whole body, a little bit larger—what we call energy body awareness, which really means the whole range available of what that space might feel like. It doesn't mean any particular kind of experience—bright, sensitive presence through the whole space of the body, a little bit larger. Again and again it will shrink, it will collapse, and again and again just inhabiting that whole space, opening up again the awareness, the presence, the aliveness through that whole space.

When you're ready, move the eyes open. What happens to the energy body awareness when the eyes open and you take in that you are with two fellows? What happens to the energy body awareness? What happens to the attention? Does it go all over there? Does it withdraw? Does it go somewhere else entirely? Just noticing.

Is it possible to have both in the awareness—both the sense of one's own presence, one's own space of energy body, and these other beings, these two beings? A sense of an attention that can hold and embrace both particularities.

Let yourself make eye contact. You don't have to. Sensing each other, opening to the presence of each other. Beginning to wish well, to radiate towards your two companions goodwill, blessing. May you be at peace. May you be happy. May you be at ease.

There's so much about you I don't know. So you've got your energy body, the sense of the others, and this goodwill, this repeating of the intention of metta—just the intention, perhaps the energy of metta. Awareness has all three: energy body, other, and metta, blessing, wishing well.

Again, in this moment, you know you are being wished well. You are the recipient of metta, of loving-kindness, of goodwill. Can the attention hold all of it—the energy body, the heart, the other, the giving and the receiving in loving-kindness? You are bathing others in loving-kindness.

There may be eye contact or there may not be. You can actually do this with the eyes open, with the senses open, sensing other. Sensing when we get lost in the other or in ourselves by withdrawing. There may be eye contact or there may not be, but the senses are open to the other—giving and receiving.

Really just letting that intention for metta flow, the awareness of the metta flowing. It remains as a foundation for everything, in the background, always ready to be activated consciously if necessary, but it's a basis—energy body awareness and the sense of other, others, and the sense of the senses in relationship.

Similar to what we did last time, the first stage of the exercise is just someone's going to go first and we'll go around.

And this time you have somewhere between two and three minutes. Somewhere between two and three minutes each to express or share: What's happening in your energy body right now, in this moment?

In those three minutes, it's going to change. Some of that might be quiet, some of it might be "I don't know," some of it might be "I feel numb." Some of it might be "I'm tingling" or "I feel electric" or "something's tight in my belly" - whatever it is. It will go through its own journey in the three minutes.

So you can be tracking that inside and expressing it. Again, you can express it in conventional descriptive language. You can express it in poetic language. You could express it in movement or in sound.

Sometimes the sense of the energy - we're opening up the meaning of this word energy - sometimes it actually involves an image of the body. We're sensing the body as image. So if that's there too, you can find a way to express that perhaps in words, describing not just the feeling in the body, but the image of the body, if that arises.

Does that make sense?

The job of the other two in the group, while one person is speaking, is to bring all your senses into engagement with the other, with the one who is speaking. So you're looking and you're listening. And what is it to bring your whole energy body to know the other with your energy body, with your whole body? Not touching, not intruding in any way, but my whole body might be sensitive, open to the other.

Is that clear?

So perhaps someone in each group could volunteer to go first. It will be somewhere between two and three minutes, and the witnesses remain silent. You're not saying anything or feeding anything back. Your job is to track your own process and your emotions or your mind as you're witnessing and opening, sensing the one who's communicating.

Do you understand? So you have a job too. You're receiving, but you're also tracking your own process.

Someone asks: "Can we still stay with the metta while we're listening?"

You can if you want, but if it feels like "Oh, it would be really good to go to the metta now," I wonder if it can be there in the background. Otherwise, your job as witness is to really just be as fully present in all the expanded meaning of what we mean by fully present on this retreat. Sometimes it might be "I need to do metta," but I would probably view that as just - we're setting it up, and then we're letting it go, and it's the basis.

Catherine will ring a bell to start us, and then we'll ring a bell to stop. Again, it will be just a short pause, and then the next person.

Eye contact can come and go. For the witnesses, what I'm asking you to do is really bring your senses into relationship with the other, which means eye and ears, and actually - what does it mean to bring my whole body into knowing, my whole energy body into knowing the other? We don't really have that in our culture; we don't think of that, but I'm suggesting that as much as possible too.

The person who's speaking sometimes will probably want to close their eyes to track something and can make eye contact or not, or look away. That's just natural in human psychology.

Is that good?

So just in the pause between turns: What's happening in the energy body? What are the echoes, the reverberations? Having spoken or expressed and having listened and sensed and seen - it doesn't need to be anything at all. Then the bell will ring for the next person.

Perhaps go around clockwise as if you were looking from the top.

And just to add, if it wasn't clear - as the person's speaking, you might say something, but do you notice there's an effect of speaking? There's an effect of speaking and being seen, and everything's dependent arising. So part of what you can track and then also express somehow is this very process itself.

The effect of having said what I just said, or shared or expressed, or of saying it right now. Do you understand?

So that's part of what you can include in your awareness and in your expression—this kind of rolling dynamic of sensitivity and expression. Checking out the echoes and the reverberations, whatever they are. Whatever they are.

Again in the silence, in the pause, noticing any reverberations, whatever's moving in the energy body, also in the mind, in the emotions—the sense of things.

Let's return to the metta. So again, taking in with your senses. Don't do this just with your eyes closed. Take in each other. See who you are offering metta to. Sense their presence, their beingness. Wishing well, emanating kindness, goodwill to your two companions.

With your energy body awareness. Maybe eye contact, but it doesn't have to be. It might come and go.

And know—be aware, recognize—that you are receiving that stream of kindness and loving kindness right now. You are giving and receiving the blessings. What is happening for self in the body, in the emotion, in the mind? Whatever is happening for other—wishing well, being wished well, however transient this flow of experience, just wishing well, bathed in kindness.

And then gently letting the active intention and awareness of metta go. Letting that form a basis or background, and aware again of yourself sitting and aware of your two companions.

Is there a kind of attention that can embrace both self and other in the particularities of each?

Again, for the second round, I will include emotions. Emotions are the primary thing now. Any mode of sharing or expressing emotions could be through gesture, through movement, through speech, through conventional use of language, through sound, poetic language, image language.

And again, the witnesses—just witness, bringing the fullness, as much as possible, of the being, of the attention, of the senses into taking in the other, receiving the other, attending to the other with the fullness of one's body and senses. And the witnesses track what's happening in the emotions and in the energy body—in their energy body.

And the person sharing is sharing or expressing what's happening emotionally right now. And again, it could be that now having said that, or as I'm saying that, I notice this—and sharing that. So is it possible to track the effect, both in the emotions and in the energy body, of the one who's speaking? Energy body and emotions are very connected, of course. But to share mostly about the emotions, but to notice all of that. Does that make sense?

Catherine will ring the bell again, and we'll have three minutes to go around.

Pausing again and, of course, sensing the heart, the emotions—what's there right now? Actually, the whole energy body is implied in the emotions as well. Whatever it is, whatever is reverberating in the emotions.

The heart is right now, over the gentle intensity, that knowing—inform and pervade the energy body, letting the energy body and the heart be involved in that knowing, be touched by that knowing, be shaped.

Gently letting the metta go into the background to form a basis.

Again, with the third round, each turn will be a little longer—about five or six minutes perhaps. You may not feel you want to, and it's okay to just say, "I'd rather not."

But the same as the other night, if you want to, and if it feels okay—so check in—is there something that has touched my soul? Something that feels soulful, something that has those resonances, feels deeply meaningful? It could be an intrapsychic image, could be a sensing in the soul, could be a relationship, could be something happening in this moment. It could be the very fact of sitting here, the very fact of sharing this way, the very fact of being together, the very fact of what's passing, what's arising in the senses right now.

If you want to, and if it feels okay, share that similarly, expressing it in any of those ways we've described. And again, the witnesses—your role will be to take in through the senses, to be clearly present with whole body and heart, and track what's going on in oneself, in the energy body, in the emotions, in the sense of things.

If what we're sharing isn't six minutes worth, can you share more than one? Share whatever you want about what nourishes your soul, and it might evolve in real time.

The person sharing might also—it might feel like too much of an ask, but it might be possible to, as you're sharing, again notice: How does this sharing affect me now? What do I notice in my energy body as I share this? What do I notice in my heart and my emotions? What do I notice in my mind, perhaps in terms of commentary or thought or perception of this very situation, of my sharing right now? What's my sense of myself and how it is to sit here right now? There's quite a lot there to be open to and sensitive to.

If I could add one more small element—it's nothing new: Who are these witnesses? Who am I sharing this with? Who am I voicing this with?

If you don't feel like participating, you can just sit quietly. Otherwise we'll go round again. It could be whoever wants to go first this time.

So again, perhaps begin with that real fullness of being, and everything that has come to mean for you over these days with these teachings. Take your time so you can track what's arising—you don't have to be speaking all the time.

Whatever is arising, whether you are the person expressing or a witness, notice what is arising right now in the energy body, in the heart, in the emotions, in the mind. Whatever you notice in your sense of self, sense of others, sense of how it is to be here right now with these companions. What does it look like? How does it feel? How is it sensed?

Catherine will ring the bell in a moment and we'll move to the next person around the circle. Again, how much can the senses and the sensitivity and the awareness be engaged, be involved, whether you're sharing or witnessing?

Whatever is reverberating right now in any of the aspects or dimensions of being—including the sensing—whatever it is, it's fine. Whatever it is teaches us something, something to learn. It's not to be judged, not to be dismissed or ignored or improved. It's something to learn from—all these things: emotion, thought, assessment, perception, inner and outer.

As we ring the bell to move to the third person, if that person doesn't want to share, then just hold that silent space, either with the intention of metta, or simply with the senses open, seeing what arises in the senses.

Bring the whole of the being, the whole of the attention, the whole of the body into relationship, into engagement with what is arising right now. What is arising includes what's happening in the body, what's happening in the heart, what's reverberating, what's arising in the mind, and the sense of this moment in this place right now. Where are we? Where are we?

Where are we? Where is the energy body, your awareness of your own experience, and also the sensing of your companions?

Beginning again to resume conscious active intention and metta—wishing well, wishing well-being and ease. Include your senses. Sense the moment as well as yourself, embracing both, knowing and recognizing that you too, again, are receiving right now. You are the recipient, the object of well-wishing, of kindness, of benevolence, of mercy. You are being looked upon in this moment with eyes of mercy.

Who sees me? Who listens to me? Who celebrates?

Before we finish this session, we'd like to do one more thing together. You can stand up if you want, or sit down, or even move. You can move if you want while we're doing it.

It's a really simple chant: Om Ah Hum.

These are seed syllables—magical, mantric syllables that have, as usual, multi-dimensional, multi-aspected meanings and resonances. One of the levels, or one of the multi-levels, is that they're the Om Ah Hum—body, speech, and mind of the primordial cosmic Buddha.

Soul makes things manifold. You start with one Buddha, you get more. The Buddha starts getting more complex with more aspects, more and more and more, in the realization, in the liberation through soul-making.

These primordial Buddhas have every possible aspect, every possible feature, every possible demeanor, every possible expression—light and ethereal and wrathful and dark and raging with holy rage. They include suffering, and they include bliss, and they include equanimity. They're still and they loom. They're silent and they sound. Everything is in there.

The actual basic chant is very simple, but you are free to stand up, sit down, move, and sonically embellish in any way you want. Sometimes when we chant, we all try to find the same pitch or we find nice harmonies, so harmonize to your heart's content—make little trills and counterpoint and all that. Sometimes we always go for the pretty harmonies. If you feel moved to and you want some dissonance—Om Ah Hum. Because it's the primordial Buddha, it's everything: including the dukkha, including the light, including the dark, including the pretty, including the seemingly ugly, including the rub, and including the smooth.

Om Ah Hum...

Destiny, Autonomy, Love, and Soul (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 39 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea addresses deep questions about the relationship between duty, destiny, and personal autonomy within soul-making practice. He explores how the sense of duty arises naturally when working with images and soul-sensing, explaining that this duty can manifest in various ways - from simple reverence and beholding to more concrete life expressions. Burbea emphasizes the participatory nature of this work, where we both create and discover our sense of purpose through the middle way ontology.
> The discussion delves into challenging territory around dark or seemingly 'evil' images, clarifying that darkness in soul-making can carry profound beauty and meaning without necessarily being pathological. Burbea explains how images arise through dependent origination, influenced by our conceptual frameworks, trust, love, and other factors. He addresses the autonomy of images - how they can feel like they're asking something of us while we retain our freedom to respond or not.
> The conversation concludes with an exploration of how we can recognize being loved by images or soul-objects, from obvious communications to increasingly subtle forms of reciprocal relationship. Throughout, Burbea weaves together the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic, showing how conceptual openness allows images to expand in dimensionality and come alive with soul.

Just a reminder: if you would like to ask something or share something and you'd rather it wasn't recorded and made public, please let me know and I'll press pause.

Karen has a multiple-part question about duty—specifically how to relate to duty, how it intersects with emptiness, and how to relate the understanding or experience of emptiness to image and to duty itself. She's also wondering whether duty shifts over time, if it changes, and how all these elements seem to coalesce around this central theme.

Let me start at the end of your question and work backwards. The nodes of the lattice reflect each other, imply each other, contain each other, and also complement each other. Some of them are almost like different sides of the same coin—they draw each other in. So when you have a sensing of soul, everything you described I would expect. I would expect exactly these questions and this kind of unfolding.

The word destiny comes up, though we haven't mentioned it yet, but I would expect it to emerge. Something happens when we work with an image, with this sensitivity, with enough openness of logos that Catherine was talking about, enough conceptual framework—it starts growing. It starts expanding. More and more elements of existence, not just of ourselves but of existence itself, get woven in and sensed with soul and caught up in that whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

Wherever there's image, in some way or another, there's a sense of duty. Actually, wherever there's any soul-making, there's this quality. Let me give you a brief example of something that's not image. Consider jhana—the quieting of images. When you first authentically open to jhana, it's very rare for someone to simply say, "Well, that was nice." It comes with a sense of duty. It's like, "Wow, look at what is possible. Look at this vista that has opened up in terms of a realm of consciousness." At minimum, the duty might be something like: I need to explore this more, I need to practice more, I need to find out more. Maybe I need to go beyond this. Maybe I need to share this with others.

Anytime there's a stretching of the psyche in a way that feels meaningful to us, we have some kind of sense of duty with it. With an image, as you said, this can manifest in different ways.

This is really important—all the parts of your question truly do intersect. The danger in duty, of course, is the fundamentalist religious terrorist, isn't it? Someone who says, "I have this vision that sounds divine, and I'm on fire with it, and my duty is to kill"—or whatever it might be. What's missing completely—well, quite a lot actually—but one of the things missing is this: we participate, we assent, there's this create-discover imaginal middle way.

When I think about instances of duty that I might feel in relation to something soul-making or some image or sensing with soul, it can feel like the most important thing in my life, that duty. But it still feels real-or-not-real. It still has that amplitude, that breadth of the middle way ontology. For me, that's really key.

This is something we notice, something important to think about and discuss conceptually.

But I think one of the things I'm emphasizing about these recognitions is that we actually notice them. You start in whatever order it comes—you notice a sense of duty, but then you'll also notice this middle way, if there's sensitivity, if there's delicacy, if there's the energy body present, if there's openness, all the rest of it.

We can have this notion of duty, and then something gets cut off, and we engage this question about duty on a purely intellectual level. That's important—part of what I'm saying is that everything gets subsumed into soul-making, including the intellect. I point up here, but it's not really up here, is it? Intellect is everywhere. So including conceptuality, but you can also use your body and your sensitivity, your mindfulness and attention. You will discern this sense of duty that feels so touching to the soul, so calling.

I say again, for me it feels like the most important—these duties are what feel like the most important things in my life. I've said this somewhere before, but one of the things that brings me deep equanimity in relation to possibly dying soon from cancer is the sense that I'm on track with my duty. I have tried to do my duties, plural. That does something to the whole sense of existence, life and death. It's not everything, but it's immense—to die with that sense. Do you understand?

But I would never try to convince anyone else that what I sense as my duty is some kind of independently objective fact in the universe. It's something I participate in. To go back to today's framework, I create-discover that duty. And yes, it can change over time, curiously.

I can think of certain images I shared recently in a talk—longtime images that in the dance of life and image, in the infinite echoing and reflection of those, have transformed over time. So the duty is different. But that wasn't something I decided to change. It was something that evolved in this dance, in this mysterious, infinite echoing of life and relationship and that image. The sense of duty began to change naturally. It's like the same image evolved in the process of soul-making, not because I decided it would be better, or I'd have less dukkha, or it would be an easier journey if I changed the image and the sense of duty with it. Does that make sense?

So yes, it can evolve like that. Yes, there's always this sense of participation, and yes, there's always this sense of free will. I was speaking quickly about autonomy earlier, and one of the things I was trying to stress is that we always have a choice with soul-making. It cannot happen without our conscious participation, without some sense of my autonomy and freedom to say no—I'm not going to do that duty, I'm not going to engage this image, I'm not going to follow this eros, I'm not going to listen to that calling. Or I am.

So there's always this sense of both the autonomy of the image and my autonomy. Something is asking something from me. Something calls me, wants something from me. A lot of psychology would approach imagination asking, "What can I get from it?"

That's part of it, but there's a whole deeper, more beautiful dimension—territories, landscapes, vistas that can open when we also ask the other question: "What do you want from me?"

In a way, it's a bigger ask. This autonomous image—it's me, but it's not me. It's part of me, but it's beyond me. It wants something from me and from my life. But I always have my autonomy. So not only am I not going to be possessed in some way, doing some zombie thing, but I can also say no.

Let me just... Yes. And there was something else.

Okay, so the destiny... Oh, I know what it was. So two things. Yeah, destiny. We'll hold on to that for a second. And discerning what the duty is.

A lot of this work, if I think back on my journey with this kind of exploration, at the beginning it was all very clunky. Describing it to others might have sounded quite dramatic, you know—pretty dramatic images with this journeying process in a landscape with dragons and all that kind of stuff. As it progresses, and this applies to other meditations as well, like emptiness, everything gets more subtle. We grow in sensitivity and delicacy.

So the question of duty—take that religious fundamentalist terrorist. It's anything but subtle. Blowing yourself up in a bus station is not a subtle gesture at all. But the duty with an image can be all the way to just: my duty is to behold it and to be touched by it and to be open to it and to have that sense of mystery. In my heart, even though I might not physically bow, something is bowing. Something has that reverence. That's the duty.

Sometimes it's just that, and no one else knows anything about it, and no one else can see any obvious manifestation in your life. You've just been touched by the poetry of something, and it's between me and the image, me and the divine, me and existence. Other duties manifest more concretely in life, but I would be a little suspicious of ones that reflect too accurately the image.

For example, and I've shared this in lots of talks, one image for me is this kind of solitary soldier. That's one of the ones that's changed—it's really not that present much anymore. But for a long time it was there. Now the last thing I would want to do is join the army. Really not my cup of tea. I was never into fighting. I didn't even like rugby and all that stuff.

But I can see in my life how combative I am when I need to stand up for something or some vision or sensibility that feels encroached, or some kind of care that feels encroached socially, politically, or in a certain scene. So there's a kind of reflection there, but I'm certainly not driving spears through anyone. There's a kind of reflection, but it's not literal. Do you understand?

How to discern? I don't know that I have an answer to that, really. But maybe it's something to do with this other note of the infinite echoing and mirroring. There's a sense of my life, my choices, my actions, my behavior, and the image, and they mysteriously echo each other, so that as everything gets more and more subsumed in soul-making—which means everything: my body, my intellect, my sense of my journey, my dukkha, the cosmos, the sense of God or Buddha nature, materiality, relationship, everything—then more and more we get this echoing sense, this infinite mirroring.

As I said, I'm not sure when it was yesterday, we can conceive... A normal way of conceiving images in our wider culture would be something happens in my life or something exists in my psyche and the psyche generates the image of that. It's a result. It's a representation. We can play with a conception the other way around. My life is generated by the images. The image is primary in that sense. Does that make sense?

This begins to raise the question: what's my destiny? Is my destiny somehow—and tie this in with the autonomy—not given so much as I'm offered something? I'm offered something, and that thing might be a really difficult thing. It might be really...

But it comes, so I have to say yes to that. This cancer could just be cancer. It could just be death. It could just be pain. It could just be ordinary suffering, or it can be sensed with soul. It can be transformed. So that's not a destiny so much as an offering: Do you want to pick this up and sense it with soul? And then it becomes a destiny. We make it. We soul-make. Do you understand?

So again, even the sense of destiny is created, discovered. We participate in it. We retain our autonomy, and yet there's something possibly calling us. And all of that is both a kind of concept and an image, really—of life, sensing the soul of life—but also conceptual ideas that arise out of the alchemical process of soul-making. I would expect these things to emerge. Everything, everything, everything will get woven in. Soul wants to grow. Soul, as I said sometime, loves soul-making and will just reach out and draw in everything into that process. Do you understand?

Participant: How's that for the first part? The other question I think is quite a big one and it sort of shades into some of what you just said. It's about evil.

Rob: Evil, yeah.

Participant: I wonder if other people would... I'm not sure about... I don't know what to do. Okay, so it might be a much shorter one, actually. It's just about... So I get that sense in some images that it's really dark and that sometimes I have had that experience of being quite terrified. But also there are feelings that are in the dark space, the loving that you have in the cross. And there's a kind of... And then, so I just kind of wonder about, and I'm thinking about a particular person, whether that's the same thing or, you know, then obviously there's like a whole area of mental health...

Rob: Sure.

Participant: Sorry, that's a little bit...

Rob: Yeah, so the questions about evil and images that feel evil, and then images that are terrifying or dark but not necessarily evil. And how does it fit in with mental health and other cultures where they're much more comfortable? People believe in spirits and spirit possession and that sort of thing.

I can just say for me, I can't say about your friend because they're not here and I haven't met them and I don't know. If I'm with someone who's agitated in some way that maybe suggests something like that, I guess I, for me as a teacher, have a certain sense of whether there's a possibility there to convert an image, even if it seems evil and terrifying, for that to become imaginal. We talked about this spectrum. On one side, papañca and that kind of reification, the clinging, the terror of that.

So sometimes people might come with something that's really disturbed them, but there's something in what they're saying that shows me a possibility. And then we can work together with a lot of skill. And other times—and I can think of several examples—where a person wants to work with the imager, but I can see they're really not ready. They don't have that capacity yet. And so I would say, absolutely not. Not for you.

Not for you yet. And they might need other kind of help first.

Part of our conceptual framework is that the image is a dependent arising, like everything else. So it arises according to conditions—how the image appears, whether it seems evil or, as you say, dark. This is really, really important if you haven't grasped this yet: an image can be dark and involve dukkha, but yet have that love in it somehow, and the beauty, and it feels soul-making. Really, really important to know that.

There's the light side and the ethereal side of soul, and there's the dark side, and there's not any greater beauty in one or greater soulfulness. This is really, really important. So there's that range of what an image can be—the tonality of an image, let's say, in terms of light and dark in the broad sense of what those words mean.

But in our conceptual framework, in our logos, the image is always a dependent arising. That's partly what the lattice is saying. It's saying that the image does have a certain autonomy, but at the same time, when we talk about the imaginal, or what's imaginal, we're talking about the whole thing—the whole mix, gestalt, of all the lattice, some of which seems objective, and some of which seems part of me, subjective.

So when we talked about trust, it's like if I can just sprinkle a grain of trust there, the image changes. The image will become less threatening because I've now put something into the alchemical vessel called trust. I've put this substance called trust into the alchemical vessel, and the alchemy of what then happens is changed. Do you understand?

What Catherine mentioned today—logos is also one of the nodes. So what actually arises depends on the conceptual framework. In a culture like Thailand, for example, they live and breathe a conceptual framework of spirits and ghosts and possessions and all kinds of phenomena. When they have a certain experience, they are bringing—even the least intellectual person there—that whole logos, not as a big articulated philosophy, but just kind of implicitly. And that colors the experience too.

Now, if that's not shiftable—Ajahn Chah is not going to sit down and teach them about dependent arising and all that necessarily—but he will introduce something like love. And so, again, the node in our language, the node of love, is something I notice, but also something that I can bring. My loving the image—it's like the trust—starts to change something.

This works because the image is dependent arising, but also the conceptual framework. So again, if in my conceptual framework there's the idea of it as a dependent arising, there's just for a little bit entertaining the idea that soul has treasure for me, that there's something redeemable in what appears dark and what is dukkha. And redeemable doesn't always mean making what's dark light. It means seeing the beauty and the soul in the dark. Do you understand?

But that's part of the conceptual framework. The idea of dependent arising is part of the conceptual framework. So in some situations, you simply can't change the conceptual framework. It's too big a job. Someone asked me, "Can you recommend some talks that explain the conceptual framework?" Well, yeah, but they're quite long. The thing about conceptual frameworks is they're quite heavy machinery. A lot of it's unconscious.

But eros is something that can flicker up very quickly and die down very quickly. Image can flicker, but tends to stay around a bit longer. Logos is slower. And some of the logoi that we have are really entrenched. We don't even realize we have them—like about what matter is, or about what the universe is. We've inherited that from hundreds of years of Western culture. So that's the slower piece in all of this, which is why it's hard to sit down with someone and just get them to change their conceptual framework.

After a while with this kind of practice, you can actually just go into seeing things with this conceptual framework. When soul, when concept and conceptuality and the thinking mind and logos gets involved with soul, then it ignites it, it fertilizes it, it makes it active. It will push out, it will expand, it will gain complexity and also gain flexibility, so that it becomes quite possible to just change a conceptual framework right in the moment.

I just see it this way. I just conceive of it that way. So going back to your thing about duty, I just conceive of it as given to me as destiny. Or I'll conceive of it as, no, I'm completely autonomous. Or something else. So that becomes, with practice, really quite flexible. You can just step in and out of different conceptual frameworks.

But the main point here is that the image and the tonality—in terms of evil, good, benevolence, dark, light—the image arises as a dependent arising, dependent on concept, affect, trust, sensitivity, energy, body, awareness, love. We participate. You can't not participate. And it's just a matter of realizing the full beauty and extent and depth of the participation we have.

Let me turn to Jill's question about loving and being loved—how that works, especially the being loved. When you ask how does it work, Jill, do you mean what's the conceptual mechanism there, or how do I recognize it?

Let me take the recognition part first. Some images are just obvious because it's a grandma that's hugging you, or some actual images just tell you, "I love you." And again, we said, what does the image want? It wants you to know that you're loved. It wants to communicate this love. And your duty—if we can link it—my duty is to see that and recognize it and let that in. So that's very obvious, and it could be sexual, erotic love. But it could manifest in all kinds of different forms, more or less obviously.

But if we can link it to something we said with Gareth, a lot of what happens is the whole feel of things can expand its range to include what's much more subtle. So it's interesting—I'm with this tree, or whatever it is, maybe it's a real tree, a physical tree, or I have an image of some kind of stone. How do I recognize this more subtle communication?

I have to be very delicate in my attention. It's not obvious. It's not going to do something obvious in terms of its communication.

It might, actually, because the tree could speak or something. But sometimes the range of things just gets more subtle. So that means we just have to be quite delicate and open about how we might feel that.

One interesting thing is if you—so everything's interconnected, so it might be some other node that starts to ignite this node, but it might also be that this node's really a pair: loving and being loved. So if you communicate your love somehow or other—in words, in gesture, in image—it might then, in the reciprocity of things, in other words, your love ignites its love, and then it becomes more visible. So sometimes the communication acts as a kind of alchemical spark. So I don't think there's an exact answer so much as just to know that it can get really, really subtle.

Does that make sense?

The conceptual mechanism... I mean, in a way, it's part of the sense of the autonomy of the image. So, in other words, this image has personhood in the sense that it has soul. So it has its own sensibility, its own way of knowing, its own intelligence, its own affect, its own love, its own eros. It desires you. So there's... it's totally... yeah.

So again, this is something that we could have played another game on this retreat, which is just given some instructions, and I could have had a sealed envelope, you know, like they do on some game shows or whatever, and it would have the nodes in it. And you would each have a sealed envelope. And I would just wait, if it was a longer retreat, just wait in interviews for you to come and report which node. So it's something that you'd notice, right, in the mystical unfolding. But it's something we can also activate as well.

How does it happen? It happens because... let's relate it to what Catherine shared about the soul-making dynamic, this Eros-Psyche-Logos. Here's an image, which we call as part of psyche, as image. And that image has something beautiful and attractive to it. And in—feels like here—arises my eros. There's something, I'm drawn to this image, or

I want to fill out in it, or there's some kind of dynamic that wants to kind of be more intimate with it, inhabit it more, or touch it more, know it more, or, you know, that's what we could call eros.

If the logos decides that, well, an image is just a—you know, for example, it's just some brain neurons firing, it's just some nonsense—nothing's really going to happen with that. It might give you an idea of what you might chase in life, but you'll have to go looking for it out there.

If, though, the logos and the sensibility allow a kind of expansion, what happens is the image itself starts to get more rich and more deep and more imaginable, more multifaceted, and it starts to come alive, really, through this kind of dynamic of eros, which is looking for more. Eros is always looking for more—not in a problematic way, if it's allowed to expand, if the image is allowed to expand.

And as the image expands, it begins to feel like some of these things, it begins to feel like it's asking me something and it's loving me and it's got this dimension and that dimension and this aspect and that aspect. Do you understand? So the wanting more, it's like it inseminates something and it starts to expand. And because the logos allows it to—because the logos we're starting with, the logos saying, "Just maybe there's a treasure here, maybe imagination has something, the imaginal has something of value, and maybe there's something to discover here." So that, and then the logos can expand even more to... you know. And so the image gains dimensionality, aspectedness, complexity, multifacetedness, all character, personhood.

Does it make sense then? It's got... because, like a person, you then are in relationship. And just as with a person, you wouldn't say... You know, you would grant them full personhood. You would only—someone with some kind of cognitive incapacity would not be able to sense the personhood there, the fullness that there's eros there, there's love, there's intelligence, there's a kind of knowing, even if it's very different than what we're used to.

So this image of a stone, it's like, how does this stone that has come so alive with soul, how does it know? It knows in a very different way than I know. It doesn't have all these fancy ideas and doesn't talk for hours on end.

Yes, precisely, it communicates exactly, yes. So there's a resonance and again there's this kind of mirroring—infinite kind of mirroring of you and the stone, for example, or whatever. And it's very multi-leveled.

Rather than getting simpler and simpler, it gets more and more rich, more and more complex and diversified and multi-dimensional, multi-aspect. And then because of that, there's more for eros to fall in love with. And it's more. And there's a sense of, I see more and I sense even more that I can only dimly... and that attracts the eros even more. So the eros kind of wants more, things expand more and more and more. And that's actually infinite. And then everything starts getting, as I said at the beginning, caught up in the soul-making dynamic: self, other, sense of world, sense of eros itself.

All of it becomes imbued with soul—given this quality of holiness, dimensionality, depth. Everything is sensed through this lens of sacred meaning.

And so we come full circle. The soul-making dynamic reveals itself as this infinite spiral of deepening perception and expanding love. Each moment of recognition calls forth more Eros, which in turn reveals more beauty, more mystery, more of what calls to be loved. The self that perceives, the other that is perceived, our sense of world, even our sense of Eros itself—all become woven into this sacred dance of meaning-making and love.

This is the gift of the imaginal—not as escape from reality, but as a way of seeing through to the soul of things, to the inexhaustible depth that lies waiting in each moment, each encounter, each breath. When we learn to see with these eyes, everything becomes a doorway, everything becomes an invitation to fall more deeply in love with the mystery of existence itself.

Let us rest now in this understanding, letting it settle into the spaces between thoughts, into the quiet depths of our own being. May this exploration of soul-making continue to unfold in your practice, in your relationships, in your daily life—revealing ever more of the sacred dimension that is always already here, waiting to be discovered anew.

Discernment in Soulmaking (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 57 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea addresses several nuanced questions about soul-making practice. He explores the relationship between different approaches to working with images - comparing James Hillman's archetypal psychology with the specific framework of soul-making dharma. Burbea clarifies that while everything can be seen as image or perception (leading to spaciousness and liberation), soul-making requires a particular conceptual framework and sensitivity that allows for the unfolding of what he calls the 'lattice' - qualities like eternality, duty, and love that characterize imaginal figures.
> The discussion moves through practical concerns about balancing active and receptive modes in imaginal practice, using the metaphor of right effort from traditional meditation. Burbea emphasizes that soul-making is fabrication, and explores how experiences at different levels of fabrication can be soul-making depending on their capacity to stretch and expand one's sense of existence. He addresses the role of eros and sexuality in soul-making, explaining eros as a movement toward intimate knowing of the beloved other that drives the entire soul-making dynamic.
> The session concludes with challenging ontological questions that naturally arise from this practice - particularly the uncanny experience of being 'created-discovered' by imaginal figures. Burbea suggests that rather than seeking final ontological truths, we can engage in 'ontologizing for the sake of soul-making,' allowing our deepest conceptual frameworks to remain malleable while seriously entertaining radical shifts in our understanding of reality.

So I'm struggling with a message I'm trying to figure out why, and I think I've started to distill that. A phrase came to me today, which I think is from Kevin, but I haven't checked it out: something about how you don't do justice to the image if you require it to have meaning. I was extrapolating that further—you don't do justice if I require it to have eternality, or for it to love me, and all these things.

I think my logos, my understanding of the imaginal, comes a lot from here, is that image is primacy, and you can come to understand the psyche in this wholly different way—that everything within the psyche is imaginal. So that memory that you have of your mother, that you thought was a representation of the factual account of what happened to you when you were a child, is in a way an imaginal memory. That figure of your mother is an imaginal figure, and you can be in relationship to that. In becoming in relationship to that, something can happen—I mean, you know something can happen, but something can happen.

What came out of that is I realized that actually a lot of my relationship to the imaginal is just coming to view my psyche as imaginal. So if you take the mother example, I come into relationship with the imaginal figure of a mother. But that figure doesn't have eternality. When I work with it, it doesn't love me necessarily. I don't feel a duty to it. I'm going between the images all the time, in a way. I might see that there's an imaginal element to that—it's got this constellation of qualities and images around it—but it doesn't have all of these things that we're talking about.

It's like this dichotomy is forming in my mind between all of that and then this other thing: these images that fit into the lattice. Actually most of my images don't seem to fit into the lattice. They don't have this eternality. Does that make sense? What is the relationship between these two different things, or two different practices?

Yeah, so I'm not one hundred percent sure it makes sense to me yet. If I try and summarize what you said, and then maybe we can see where I'm not understanding, or maybe I have understood...

Iona is sharing that she's having problems with the idea of the lattice as any kind of map of what imaginal might be, and certainly as a demand of what imaginal might be. Rather, her sense of imaginal, which she thinks she's getting from James Hillman, is more that anything that arises in the psyche is image. When she pays attention to her experience, a lot of the images don't seem to have these qualities that we're identifying in the lattice. To require that of them would feel wrong.

I didn't invent the word "imaginal." It was actually Henri Corbin. Hillman got it from Corbin. Corbin meant something quite different from what Hillman meant, and quite different from Jung. In a way, I would say what we're unfolding here is different from Hillman as well. There are overlaps between all that, and I would say that certainly Corbin really didn't like Jung and probably didn't like Hillman as well. Hillman had huge respect for Corbin. People borrow, because you borrow authority—so and so said this because it lends weight.

So basically there's this word, and what do we do with the fact of two things? First, that people are using it in different ways—there are more ways than that. Now it's become, as I said right in the beginning when I introduced it, quite popular, this word, in certain circles. People mean quite different things by it. Some people are not quite sure what they mean by it, or it's very, very loose or whatever. That's just a kind of fact—a social fact, a linguistic fact.

What do we do with that? And then what do we do also with the fact that all four—Corbin, Jung, Hillman, and what we're doing here—would discern a difference in quality or kind of images? They're not just different contents. You can have an image of your mother, you can have an image of your father—different contents, but they're really different ontological status, whole different kinds.

We somehow have to either just say everything is image in the sense that everything is perception, therefore it's image. That's an important point, dharma-wise.

And people mean quite different things by it. Some are not quite sure what they mean, or their understanding remains very loose. This is simply a fact—a social, linguistic reality. What do we do with that?

And what do we do with the fact that all four approaches I mentioned—Corbin, Jung, Hillman, and our work here—would discern a difference in quality or ontological status among images? These are not just different contents, like an image of your mother versus your father, but genuinely different kinds of being. We somehow have to navigate this territory.

We could simply say everything is image in the sense that everything is perception. Dharma-wise, this is profoundly important. Having this view—that everything is perception, everything is image—already brings a certain kind of liberation and spaciousness to all experience. This is wonderful and valuable.

But in itself, this won't unfold what we're calling soul-making. It will move in a different direction, toward more spaciousness and equality of things. What I'm trying to communicate is not so much a demand as an understanding of the imaginal as dependent arising. Perhaps in time, these aspects will be noticed naturally.

A mother image, if I linger with it and bring all my sensitivity, and if it's not constrained by a particular conceptual framework, will probably unfold these soul-making qualities. Let's call this a postulate, a thesis to be discovered, rather than a demand.

I don't know anyone who's mapped out the complete territory of possible human images—what constitutes psychic phenomena, ESP, or other experiences. Maybe someone has attempted it, but if so, at some point in human history, it will never satisfy everyone completely.

If we step back and ask what we want—if we want that expansive, liberative freedom and spaciousness—then we can practice seeing everything as image in the sense of perception. This creates its own kind of beauty and limited soul-making, but more specifically spaciousness-making and liberation-making.

If we want what we're calling soul-making, then a certain conceptual framework and attunement of being, sensibility, and attention will help that unfold. What arises in perception—whether imaginative or otherwise—is always dependent arising, partly dependent on our conceptual framework. Even our idea of what soul-making is will unfold in different directions based on how we conceive it.

Rather than making an absolute ontological claim, I'm suggesting this as a possible unfolding that some people may find deeply valuable.

At the end of the day, I retain my autonomy—it's up to everyone to decide what they want. If I decide I want this thing called soul-making, then these ideas, sensitivities, attunements, and conceptual framework might serve that in a sustainable, ongoing way. If I want something else, then I need a different approach.

As a human being, I can actually move between these orientations. From one moment to the next, I could shift into seeing everything as image for spacious liberation, or relate to my mother conventionally for psychotherapeutic reasons, or simply think I should call her because we haven't spoken recently. I can move fluidly between these rather than adopting a rigid posture or conceptual framework.

I encourage everyone to have this kind of autonomy. I'm not interested in imposing anything on anyone. Find your own way, what you're drawn to, your own range of options at different times. This feels really important to me.

The question you're raising touches on soul-making, fabrication, levels of fabrication, and complexity. You're describing a particular experience that feels relatively unfabricated—very body-based, visceral, primordial in quality. Yet the state itself and the movements arising from it feel important to your being, to your soul, even though they feel very different from imaginal images with their depth, resonance, mirroring, and complex layers.

You're wondering whether that experience in itself constitutes soul-making, or whether it becomes soul-making through how you relate to it and integrate it into your life. This touches on something quite

Both really, but the question is about whether that rhythm - the metta, the gentle inquiry, checking with the energy body - would be a model for engaging with soul-making ourselves.

Yes, absolutely. And you've identified something really important there. What's happening in those exercises is exactly what we might call a soul-making approach to relationship, to encounter with another, and to encounter with experience in general.

So when you're offering metta, you're creating a certain quality of space - a kind of tenderness and care that allows things to unfold rather than forcing them. The gentle inquiry is this willingness to be curious, to not know in advance what's going to emerge, which is part of that sense of discovery that's so central to soul-making. And checking with the energy body keeps you rooted in the felt sense, in the embodied knowing, rather than just staying up in the head with concepts.

And yes, that same rhythm, that same quality of engagement, is exactly what we want to bring to soul-making practice more generally. Whether you're working with an image that arises in meditation, or you're engaging with a difficult emotion, or you're exploring some complex situation in your life - that same quality of tender curiosity, that willingness to feel into things rather than analyze them to death, that checking in with how things are landing in the body.

It's like creating the optimal conditions for soul-making to happen. Because soul-making, as we've been saying, is partly about discovery - and discovery requires this kind of open, receptive, curious stance. It can't be forced or manufactured. But we can create the conditions where it's more likely to emerge.

Does that resonate? Have you found that rhythm helpful in the exercises we've been doing?

Or in yourself? Like, yeah. I mean, not the complete thing, but just... Yeah. In a way, yes.

I don't know that it needs to be quite so linear. In this retreat that we may be doing in June, I think it's called Foundations of Soul-Making Dharma, and partly it's a double meaning with foundations. It partly means what are the personal prerequisites that you need to have to make this work, without which it's not really going to work.

One is, I would say, awareness—bodily awareness, energy body awareness, emotional awareness. And also emotional ability to care, you know, and to handle well what arises. Without those two skills, and also without the kindness. So if I don't... if I'm regarding what happens in myself with judgment and unkindness and dismissal, it's not going to be... it's not going to be the capacity for soul making, you know.

So there are probably just... those are three, right? Energy body, emotional—let's call it awareness and skill—and just, you know, kindness with one's own psychology and being. Those are three out of more we could enumerate, kind of prerequisites for doing this kind of practice.

Eventually, it's a bit like when we did the metta in those exercises, and I kind of said, okay... you actually asked, it was you, Bo: do we need to keep doing it when we're listening? Do you remember asking that? And in a way, I think there's a way you can kind of, when these things are established as more just almost easily accessible and almost habitual, then you can kind of let them go a little bit, especially the metta, because it's just there. And if I need it, I can bring it as a kind of... but it's kind of there as a backdrop. So right now, I just feel confident that there's metta here, you know, and I don't have to kind of keep... I mean, I could, but it's just there as a kind of...

Yeah. And then rather than doing it linearly with the emotional awareness and tracking and the energy, it's more like it's concurrent as we sort of build up to that exercise. Can you share... it's really hard to speak and really be... did you notice this... and be aware as you're speaking of what's happening? So it's one thing to listen—even that can be quite hard—to listen to another, take them in with the senses as fully and track your own process. That's already quite a skill. To do it yourself, you know. But eventually we want this to be concurrent. So if you're working on your own, yeah, the whole kind of... the whole multi-faceted process is going together.

If we separate them, it's an exercise. So we're practicing this foundation and then that foundation. You could isolate something—it's like when you practice, you know, in music or something. You want to... this thing, you isolate it and you develop it, and then you put it back into the mix. Does that make sense? Does that cover what you... yeah, okay.

Oh, Andrea. Yeah. This may or may not be quite long, so do you want to ask? Okay, it might be short. This is kind of what Katherine covered with active versus receptive when you're working on the image? Create, discover?

Well, no. It's more how... I think I put it in as another kind of spectrum that they relate to. Yeah. How active you are in that thing versus just kind of receiving it. And I just... The examples obviously can't be concrete that you give us because with an image or I'm bringing an image in, and there's a sense of I'm moving this thing and I'm not giving it autonomy, but it's too active. And so then I try to pull back into the receptive or discovered thing, and it doesn't quite manifest there. I'm checking the energy body the whole time to see what's alive there, but I didn't know if...

I remember you talking one time about John Coltrane and where he appeared in the room, this particular place. I sometimes think of that when I'm thinking of where this image wants to be—do they want to be behind me or in front? So I didn't know if that's something that comes with time, just dexterity, working with images.

So Andrea's asking about... if I can understand the sort of this range that we have in relating to any practice, actually, not just imaginal—that can kind of lean all the way to the sort of very active end and all the way to the very receptive, just let it happen. Yeah. And so what's the question? Can we develop more...

Yeah, yeah, yeah. So this is really, really common. And again, I'm not just talking about imaginal practice. I'm talking about any practice. We try to be active, and it gets really clunky and forced and too pushy, too much efforting, too tight, and then sometimes even a whole other level of judging oneself that one should be able to do this and that. So I think to me, even outside of the realm of imaginal practice, this is part of the sort of right effort, that balance thing.

And I would say instead of like one point on that spectrum, one point where we just kind of reside and that's where we do our practice—I'm always kind of entirely receptive—I would encourage that the whole spectrum, the exploration of the whole spectrum. And to develop skill, I have to know what it is to make too much effort and be too active and know what that feels like. The thing is, every moment is different.

So it's like... you know... Again, I shouldn't give surfing as an analogy because I've actually never been surfing. But I think what can happen in time is that the doing—we learn how to do really, really subtly.

So if we relate that then to what we're talking about this week, sensing the soul and the lattice, one of the things is just noticing. I'm not actually making this thing happen or demanding it. I'm just noticing—what can I notice? And the very, very delicate attuning of the attention to some aspect or other that's maybe just a little bit kind of... I can't quite make it out. And then just that aroma of it.

This is really, really subtle. It's just a noticing. It's just an inclining of the attention to notice something. That noticing something brings it alive, and then something emerges.

When we talk about doing, it can be really, really gross. You know, like when you're nodding off in meditation and someone says, "Can you do something? Go do some walking meditation, take a brisk walk, open the eyes, cold water on the face, stand up, breathe deeper." That's a really gross doing, and sometimes there are times when there's a real place for that.

And then it might be the same experience—almost the same degree of sloth and torpor another day—that needs something so much more subtle. I just realize, oh, there's this tiny bit of resistance to something I'm not even sure what, and I just soften that. Something gets clear and emerges maybe in the heart, and I pass through that, I work with that, and then I just hold that maybe. Not even that—I just hold that. And then the energy comes back.

Part of the art of all practice, I think, is this willingness to try different things, to develop different ranges and not to know in the moment, not to have this formula of "this is what I do and it's always going to be like this."

[Responding to a question about John Coltrane]

There's something about when you say you can bring an image up. As a writer, you're asking, "Where do I want this figure?" And then, oh... Two things: one is that "where do I want this figure?"—who is the "I" asking? The autonomy is there, but maybe it gets...

If we go back to Hillman, he would jump at and flinch at any kind of practice of the imaginal or active imagination that seemed too deliberate. I would say something slightly different. It doesn't matter how much huffing and puffing and deliberate intention and activeness there is. What matters is the sense of soul-making.

I'm sure many of you have had this—you think, "I just made that happen." And then you think, "Oh, that's the ego. And the ego is bad. And it's bad in Buddhism, and it's bad in other spiritualities, and it's bad in Hillman."

What I would look for more is this responsiveness. Maybe it was my ego, whatever that is. Maybe it was coming out of excessive yanking. But then maybe it suddenly becomes soul-making. And then we sense when something's soul-making. So it doesn't matter how it got there. It doesn't matter at all. It's not this principle of "this is good and that's bad." It's just that if it's soul-making, you can feel those soulful resonances and trust it at that point.

The thing with John Coltrane—I've moved, I don't live at Gaia House anymore, so we can't be in the same place. We have a different room. But he still comes sometimes. When he comes, actually he and another figure—this kind of Sufi teacher or something—they sit at the end of the bed. And they both share the same spot. And it doesn't matter. It's not that it has to be or not, but it just might be that I can't even tell: do I put them there, or do they just like that spot? It doesn't really matter. It's like, trust the sense of it. If something doesn't feel right, you can—I would use the word play. You can just play very delicately, but sometimes play just means: what am I attuning to?

It can be so subtle and so unpressured and unforced. When I go back to what I said this morning, it's like: don't force a sense of soul and don't imagine that it's going to be there every time. There are plenty of times where nothing really works, and that's fine. Not too much pressure.

There are two questions here, so I won't get to these unless someone else has one live. No, it's very long, and it's already... Well, actually, I'll do these. Is that okay? Sorry, yeah. I'll take it back.

So this is from a few days ago, which I didn't get a chance to respond to. You spoke a little last night—so this is already some nights ago, I think—about what people need for permission to work with the imaginal. And when you said eros, that really hit a chord for me. So I was wondering if you could speak or write a little about why it is important, why sexuality is important in soul-making, why it is necessary.

Like all these things, once we go into it with soul, it just becomes huge. So what's the involvement of eros and sexuality?

The way we're using the word eros is more than to mean sexuality. Sexuality is one manifestation of eros. Actually, you can have sex without eros in our book. But eros is this movement or some kind of movement or desire towards the beloved other—some kind of movement to know them more, to be more intimate, to touch them more, to be touched by them more, to enter or fill out or open. That's what eros is. It's a very simple definition.

And Eros has within it this other Greek god called Pothos. And Pothos is always looking beyond. He always wants more, always more. So that creates a certain dynamic. Eros wants this intimacy, enjoys the intimacy, and wants more, more.

Part of that can be sexual, but that whole movement of the psyche—that movement of eros—is something that drives this whole process with the eros-psyche-logos in the way that we described. On the abstract level, it functions as a concept that really holds everything together and is the catalyst to unfold, the catalyst for this dough, the bread to rise. Does that much make sense? I said it quite abstractly, just as a sort of bare concept.

We've covered that a lot. But to me, that whole eros-psyche-logos business is really one of the linchpins of all this work. Understanding it can really... understanding it and getting familiar with it can itself be soul-making and will be part of what really galvanizes the whole process of soul-making—is understanding that eros-psyche-logos, what we call the soul-making dynamic.

So sexuality, sexual longing, sexual desire, sexual energy is one manifestation of eros. It's a kind of eros. And within it has a huge range. Sometimes in the being, or even if we're doing imaginal work, there's so much eros that it kind of has to become sexual—not necessarily in any act, but in the image itself. It's holding a kind of intensity of eros, which is part of the depth and the richness of the psyche. Is this making sense?

But then also, turning it around a little bit—if we're going to have the fullness of soul-making, we need to have the fullness of our eros. And our eros needs to be able to manifest how it wants to at any time. So sometimes it's very, very subtle, not at all sexual. Sometimes it's very, very strong and dramatic and forceful and not at all sexual. And sometimes it's subtle and sexual, and sometimes it's intense and sexual, or in the imaginal realm.

From the other perspective, I said that as the soul-making dynamic gets more into our life and our life becomes involved in that, more and more aspects of our being and our existence get drawn into the soul-making dynamic. One of them will be sexuality. In other words, sexuality gets made soulful.

It might already be quite a lot for many people in our culture for sexuality to be heartful—and let's not underestimate that. But for sexuality to be soulful, what does that mean? And again, this might be the actual physical sexuality, sexual acts, but also just the whole realm of sexuality. Part of that will touch on the body—to be ensouled, to become subsumed, to be given dimensionality, to give this sense of sacredness. And it doesn't mean just light—it can be dark as well. Body, sensuality, the senses, sexuality—they become drawn into and ignited in the soul-making dynamic.

It's necessary in the sense that it's necessary to the fullness of the process of soul-making. It's necessary that it spreads out that way. And eros is fundamentally necessary to soul-making. No eros, no soul-making.

There's an energetic dimension to this that's crucial to understand. What often happens when there's sexual desire is the desire and the energy get cramped somewhere in the body. They're not given space, the energy itself. And this relates to the question: can I bring the whole energy body in? When the energy gets constricted, it becomes hard to tolerate, and I feel I have to act immediately.

There's also a deeper level involving the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. If everything is just flat, flatly material, and just what it seems to be to conventional agreed perception, then the pothos in the eros that wants more can only go in one direction. When we're talking about sexuality—though this applies to any area where there's craving—the eros wants more, but where can it go?

It has to go into material manifestation, and then I'll get bored of this particular material manifestation, this particular partner or whatever it is, and I'll seek another one. Because it can only go horizontally. I refuse dimensionality because I'm not engaging the sensing with soul. And so the eros that wants more can only seek another high, another experience.

But if I allow the eros to inseminate psyche, to fertilize psyche, then—to use an image—the dough rises, and it's allowed to become imaginal. Then the more that pothos and eros warms, it gets more by virtue of the dimensionality, the complexification, the multi-aspectness, the divinity. And actually it doesn't need the endlessly horizontal satisfaction of craving.

Eros, this wanting more, can either go into craving—and it just demands more and more. It's insatiable, as the Buddha said, this unquenchable thirst, tanha. But it can only go horizontally when I refuse to see, or I'm not encouraging a sense of dimensionality.

If I do allow dimensionality, then things can get what they need in the dimensionality itself. There's more, and it grows more dimensionality. So there's an energetic pressure, and there's also a kind of psychic pressure, but it's getting more space to be, to get its needs met, its desires met.

We have so much good stuff in our culture—so much sexual liberation and sexual possibility that perhaps wasn't there in different places at different times in history. And we have many other positive developments. But we also have a lot of difficulty with that freedom sexually, and we're given different challenges.

Like so many other things, from a certain perspective, they could use being more ensouled. And this is not to say it's always easy at all—not at all to imply that. But one can have choices, and the imaginal amplitude that fills things out gives one more choices.

And it's not to say you should or shouldn't, you know, within the limits of ethics, but there's space there that can be filled in.

There's a question here about reality and ontology. I've resisted asking a question about ontology because I imagine it would take too long, but if somebody else... Let me say something very brief. I'll read this note and then say something very brief, because part of what I want to say is that ontology is endless.

Does everyone know what ontology means? It's the branch of philosophy that deals with the question of what is real, what reality is. So this comes up because of what we're talking about. We have a typical kind of cultural norm of what's real and what isn't, and imagination is definitely in the "not real" category in the typical cultural norm. When you start doing this kind of practice, it starts to raise some of those questions.

This person wrote: "Sometimes I have the perception that I am autonomously creating/discovering an image, but at others I perceive the image to be autonomously creating/discovering me. This is quite uncanny. Given the equal emptiness of all things—i.e., our equally insubstantial claim to inherent existence—truly mutual perception in co-creating/discovering each other raises some perplexing ontological questions. I would be grateful if you could clarify."

I'd be grateful if I could clarify! So let's just see. What's important here? A lot.

I find this is part of the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic. This is exactly this thing happening—when I start to practice this way and when I move this way and I have repeated experiences, it pushes on the Logos, part of the conceptual framework. Part of that is: "Boy, is it real?" So that's part of it expanding and pushing on the logos. We would expect this kind of process.

When we see that everything is empty, that functions in one sort of very basic way in relation to this work, and then possibly other ways. But one of the basic ways it functions is this: if for someone who really goes into the emptiness teaching and the fabricating and unfabricating and understanding all that and that whole depth of that journey, and you see that absolutely everything is empty—as the note says, what we can say about everything is that fundamentally they're equally empty.

What that does is... one of the things that does, one of the most basic things that does, is it relaxes a kind of objection in the consciousness that says, "That's not real." And it came up in another Q&A. Implicit in that "that's not real"—of whatever experience I've had—is a hidden whole set of assumptions about something else being real. Once you see everything's empty, then that whole... whatever I'm thinking is real gets relaxed. So the whole dichotomy of real and unreal just gets loosened. Does this make sense?

So what that does—it's a slightly different thing to say everything has exactly the same reality status than to say everything has the same kind of emptiness status. So that's an important point.

And as I said, going back to I think it was Iona's question, I don't know anyone who's mapped out all this ontology, or it could never be mapped out to everyone's satisfaction. One of the interesting things I find about ontology, which really is a important subject to me, fascinating, etc.—there's a movement in modern Western philosophy of people who say: Because we can't arrive at any final position about reality and unreality, let's just drop the whole ontological business. It's just a waste of time.

I find that not very soul-making. And what you'll notice in certain philosophers that do that is exactly an absence of soul-making. And also a default fallback. So they might say, "Yes, yes, yes, we can't say what's real." But in their lives and the way they live and their commitments, they're falling back to just the conventional modern Western view of what's real. That giving up of ontology—it might be quite fashionable in certain modern philosophical circles, but it's actually not a deep giving up. It's just a kind of shrugging and going back to how one lived before anyway.

I don't think humanity—however long, I don't know how long humanity has been around, and all the different cultures and all the different histories and all the different thinkings and perceptions—I don't think that because we haven't arrived at any conclusive ontology... I mean, we have certain ontologies that people favor at different times, but in the sense that modern Western philosophy says we can't... I think it's endless. This ontologizing, thinking about these things and changing our perceptions and adopting different conceptual frameworks about reality and non-reality—that's endless, and it's part of soul-making. Does this make sense? It's part of the logos getting caught up and activated in the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic.

Now there's one more thing: Why am I ontologizing? Or why do we do ontology? Oftentimes it's because I want to arrive at the truth. What if I was ontologizing because I want to soul-make? It's a different purpose. What's the purpose?

Do you understand? And so that's quite a radical difference of intention. I'm not going after some kind of finally objective truth that humanity will then embrace - like we've done that, tick. Rather, maybe the nature of reality will remain an endlessly fertile mystery that we can participate in, in that creation-discovery of the reality of reality. And that's part of the whole soulmaking journey.

If we hone in on this note a little bit, again, I would expect this kind of experience in the very unfolding of the imaginal work. Because of the autonomy, there's this kind of flipping - it's still create-discover, but it's just flipped around. And then what is it to be able to seriously entertain that conceptual framework that I am being... I and my life is being created and discovered by some image that in some sense has, you could say, more reality than me. But I'm not settling on that as something that I'm going to then argue about or convince others of. Do you understand?

So there's this malleability of the deepest level of conceptual framework. But again, the question is, what happens?

I didn't know what the word uncanny meant, because what does canny mean? It means knowing. So uncanny means not knowing - weird. It is weird, certainly weird compared to most modern Western ways of looking. There probably are other cultures that may have something like this.

What I would prefer in terms of practice is when someone has arrived at this complete flip of experience and conceptual framework has emerged out of practice in, I think, the most beautiful way. Is that fair to say? And it's startling and opening and radical. Rather than then look for another culture or philosophy - because I might think, oh, is it like it's all Vishnu's dream or something like that? Does that exist somewhere? Yes, that exists. I could go and find that. But something might die for me in the aliveness of that very experience and the way it's unfolding in my practice.

I'm not demanding anything. It's emerging. And then what's my own personal ontology, if you like - my own conceptual framework - what does that do to my soul? So there's ontology for the sake of soulmaking and the experience, inhabiting that experience. What does it do to my sense of existence and life and my journey when I have that sense? And I don't need to make it a gospel truth, you understand? But I can have a real kind of entertaining, a real seriousness about it in terms of its reality status.

So that's all I'm going to say about ontology for now.

CHAPTER 148

The Rhythms of Soulmaking and Elements of the Imaginal (23 - 28)

Rob Burbea · 40 min

In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the natural ebb and flow of soulmaking practice, emphasizing that sensing with soul comes and goes dependent on conditions - inner, outer, past and present. Drawing on insights about dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda), he explains how soulfulness cannot be forced or summoned on demand, but requires careful attention to conditions while avoiding excessive pressure or judgment.

Burbea completes his exploration of the elements of imaginal practice by discussing nodes 23-28: fullness of intention, duty, meaningfulness, infinite echoing and mirroring, values, and participation. He emphasizes how these elements can deepen to make experiences more genuinely imaginal, and how they interconnect with each other. The talk addresses the tendency for inner criticism to construct itself around any emphasized practice quality, and encourages practitioners to maintain imaginal practice within a larger palette of dharma practices including mettā, emptiness work, and energy body cultivation.

Throughout, Burbea stresses that this work involves everything - the soul wants all aspects of experience to be touched by soulmaking. He presents these teachings as an invitation to adventure rather than demands, encouraging practitioners to work with whatever arises in their journey of sensing with soul and participating in the larger mystery of the mundus imaginalis.

I want to try and say a few general things that I hope will be helpful, and also try to finish touching on the rest of the notes—the rest of the aspects that we haven't touched on. Time is limited, so there will be a brief touching on these.

I don't know if you've noticed something about practice in general, whatever the practice. If you've been in an environment, in a climate, in a community of practice—on retreat or off retreat—where some particular practice or quality is emphasized—mindfulness, metta, focus of mind, ability to stay with the breath, or whatever it is, or soulfulness—what can easily happen is this: through the repeated emphasis on that particular quality, which is a lovely and important quality, whatever it is, the self-judging tends to construct itself in relationship to how I am doing and how I think other people are doing in relation to that quality.

The same happens with soulfulness. This is really, really important to just know—the sort of wily patterns of inner critic self-judgment. It's a dependent arising. If we were here emphasizing something else, it would construct itself in relation to that quality. So this can happen in relation to anything.

Soulfulness, soul-making, the sensing with soul comes and goes. We've said this. It really comes and goes, and it comes and goes dependent on conditions—inner, outer, past also. Our conditioning, the way we have been formed and cast in all kinds of ways, all levels of our being—mentally, emotionally, energetically, relationally—all that feeds into what happens in this moment or what can happen. Inner, outer, past and present—all those conditions matter.

If we were on, say, a jhana retreat, at some point it would occur to us: oh, a jhana arises when the conditions are there. It's less something to judge oneself about. So we can sometimes put too much pressure on ourselves to have experiences of soulfulness and to be sensing with soul all the time, or this or that.

Can there be a kind of attitude—again, somewhere in the middle way—between an over-pressuring or an over-forcing for something, and kind of not taking care of the conditions that we can take care of, not nourishing, not feeding in those conditions? Being soulful in our culture—soul, soul-making—is unfortunately not a habit for us. We don't... we might have that experience, but we don't tend to sense with soul by default unless it's supported by listening, by reading, by conditions, by practicing, by attention to the kind of things that we're talking about. So there's this kind of balance: something needs nourishing and practicing, taking care of all the different conditions, and I can't force it, I can't pressure it. Soulfulness on demand is not really possible.

So related to that, again, I just want to emphasize that what we're doing here—we're talking a lot about imaginal practice and sensing the soul, etc.—but it's within a larger context, with this larger palette. You know what a palette is? Like a painter's palette with different colors, different kinds of practices, all of which kind of help nourish the being, but also nourish the sense of the soul.

So imaginal practice sits alongside gathering the nourishment in the energy body and the harmonization, the well-being. It sits alongside taking care of my heart and the woundedness or the pain that comes and goes there. It sits alongside metta practice and emptiness practices and working the desire and letting go—letting go of desire, dropping whatever involvement. All of these are part of the colors of our practice palette, the colors of our artist's creation toolkit. So you can really think about moving fluidly and kind of balancing between these practices, different practices—really important.

The palette, the palette of practice. A palette can become a palace—a palace, a house of soul-making with many mansions.

Sometimes when I'm on retreats, I've got a week and I really want something to happen this week. These are teachings to take away—everything we're talking about is something to kind of digest, rather than trying to pressure some kind of experience arising for the week. So it's takeaway.

Soulfulness, soul-making, sensing the soul arises, like all things, dependent on a whole host of conditions coming together in the moment—influences from past, present, inner and outer. And it happens not in a linear way, not in a smooth way. In other words, what we experience is some kind of opening—you know, sensing the soul, some kind of sense of soul-making—and inherent, intrinsic to that process of soul-making, or that sense of soul-making, is this expansion we talked about. The vision, the senses are expanded in some way or another, the energy, the mind, the sense of what is perceived, etc., the ideas.

And then what happens—or that alternates with periods where there is no soul-making, or it doesn't feel very soul-making. Something is just not being fed into the conditions, or we meet some kind of limit or block.

So this could be ideational. We talked about the eros, psyche, logos dynamics. Sometimes there's an idea—sometimes we're not even conscious of the assumptions we have about ourselves, about what we're sensing, about reality, about all kinds of things, about path, about liberation, about whatever it is. These assumptions exist usually, at best, semi-consciously in the psyche, and they form kinds of limits or walls. At some point the soul-making bumps into them.

But there can be other kinds of walls, or limits, that kind of lock the soul-making for a time being. For instance, there may be some kind of block or limit in how much the libido, the life force, is allowed to move in the being and flow and open things up. Sometimes, for all kinds of reasons, the flow of the life force is blocked in our life or blocked in certain areas.

It could be just an energetic thing or just in terms of our enthusiasm, our love. Something arises and it quickly gets quelled or shut down. Sometimes it's so quick that we just have an instant, a flicker of liveliness, and then something gets shut down. That can be energetic, it can be psychic, it can be all kinds of things.

Or sometimes in relation to the eros, we're a little bit suspicious of that much eros, especially if it's sexual. And that suspicion or that prevention of the flow of eros and the fire of eros also forms a kind of limit, hopefully temporarily.

Or the psyche can be blocked in the sense of the images we have. We're fixated on certain images. So all this is very delicate and it needs a lot of care, a lot of discernment.

So we talked a bit about duty yesterday in the Q&A. We can have the duty of an image that goes with an image, the duty of the image. But there's also the image of duty. So this node, for some people, which I'll talk about just briefly now and a little bit more later—the image of anything that could be soul-making, that image of that thing might be locked. Perhaps from our past, and for all kinds of reasons, the notion of duty is, or any other notion, or the image of relationship, or the image of self, or some image that I associate with my history gets locked. Do you understand? So the image, the psyche then, is not allowed to expand.

What happens in the life of soul-making is that there are periods, long or short, where there are different kinds of walls that are met. Lock, lock, lock. So we don't expect this kind of incredibly smooth, endless, endless opening of soul-making. It has this stopping, starting, stuttering, coming and going rhythm to it. Really natural, really important. The whole shebang is what we're interested in. The whole picture.

And as I said, sometimes those walls, those blocks are just shattered through. They're just broken in what can sometimes feel very dramatic, but also quite difficult—what I call the breaking of the vessels, borrowing a Kabbalistic term. And sometimes it's just very gradual, something stretched. And sometimes we're locked and we don't even realize we're locked and it's going on.

So all this is interesting to us, and to be expected, rather than not having any soul-making today, or it feels flat, or whatever. The question is, what is there, and what can I work with, and what can I become aware of, and to expect that kind of pattern.

Okay, so let's just visit a few notes. I think we're on twenty-three, which is the fullness of intention.

Again, to think of these as really, rather than on-off switches, each node is perhaps a sense of something that can be deepened or filled out, become richer in meaning. And as that happens, we can say the experience becomes more genuinely imaginal, something like that, or fully imaginal.

So it's very natural as human beings, and also as suffering human beings who want to grow, who want to develop in certain ways that we see this quality is lacking in me, or I miss this in my life. It's very natural to want to appropriate any practice for the sake of that self-development, and for the sake of that easing of dukkha. Of course it's normal. And so I think what we're saying is not that that shouldn't happen. Of course it's going to happen, and it's healthy, and it's normal.

But at some point, maybe you've had this sense already, you can kind of glimpse a bigger vision of intention, a bigger possibility that somehow in this image, or with this image, with this sensing the soul, with this practice, what I'm wanting, more than this self-development, more even than just the ending of this dukkha that I'm feeling right now, or the development of this pattern, of that quality or whatever, is: I want soul-making. That becomes the bigger thing, a bigger vision of serving, a bigger reason of why we're doing this.

I think that's quite a rare thing. So again, it's going to come and go, and you can get glimpses of this. What is it to practice for the sake of soul? What is it to engage in one's meditative work and one's investigations in other language for the sake of the divine? Doing it for God, not just for me. What does that even mean? It's one of those concepts that can just, like all of you, there's no end to this idea.

Also, what's wrapped up in that is sometimes—and I think maybe all of you have tasted this, otherwise you wouldn't be here—this work, these kinds of practices, they can be very thrilling at times.

At times.

And sometimes we find our vision of what soul-making is getting a little smaller. We're just chasing that sense of vitality, or that sense of connection, or that sense of thrill. Again, very normal, very human, but soul-making involves everything.

Sometimes, for instance, the soul knows that it wants, as Catherine said yesterday, to fall in love with logos, to fall in love with ideas. Are they being left out of my whole vision of what soul-making is? The soul wants everything. It wants everything to be touched and involved and drawn in and contaminated and infused with soul-making.

So the fullness of intention also means I'm not just dwelling in "I love it when that flow of vitality comes and the energy, or I love the love, or whatever"—but it's the whole, the whole, it's the possibility of it. But again, sometimes you can't force this so much as you might notice this at times, or you might just gently remind yourself of the possibility, and then something opens up more, more imaginable, so to speak.

The twenty-fourth node is duty, and we talked quite a lot about that in the Q&A. It's interesting, again, if we think about connecting nodes with each other. So there might be a sense of duty in relation to an image that seems to communicate to me or hand me this sense of the possibility of picking up and engaging and assenting to the possibility —the invitation, not the forcing, the invitation to assent to some kind of sense of duty. Part of my job is discerning what that is.

If we pair that duty with, for instance, the node of divinity, then it has a certain flavor to it. If I pair the node of duty with the node of creation-discovery and emphasize the creation, then it modifies the relationship, the other one, the connection we've made with divinity. Do you see? Because oftentimes with divinity, what tends to happen for human beings is it gets very rarefied, very solidified.

Duty is a loaded concept for many people. It's not an easy one in our culture. There's probably historical and social reasons for that. So sometimes people can hear the word duty and it's a bit like—well, there were twenty-seven, there were twenty-eight, but I only seem to remember twenty-seven. That could happen with any of them. Sometimes, some people just relate to it completely fine.

What I was trying to say was that we can think of duty on its own and we bring our history to that. As I said earlier, we bring already an image of what duty is, and I might have gotten that image from who knows where. And that can be constraining. If I connect nodes, and I remember, "oh, divinity," then in relation to the notion of divinity, my sense of duty can get very hard. And that's why we talked about that fundamentalist terrorist—it's all very hard and rarefied sometimes.

If I connect the node of duty with the node of creation-discovery, then the whole sense of duty becomes less rarefied because it's got that element that's like, you know, I'm participating in the creation of this duty. It's not just some absolute objective truth. So there's a way that these—not just the nodes, but also the interrelationship with nodes—as I said, sometimes they are aspects of each other and sometimes they kind of balance each other.

I'm not sure what else to say about duty. We talked about it a lot. I think I'll leave it.

Related to duty, actually, one duty could be seen as an aspect of the next node, which is meaningfulness. This is twenty-five. Meaningfulness. So I use that word—I hope I'm using the word correctly in English. Meaningfulness means more than meaning. In other words, an image or a sense that we have might mean something to us. For example, it might reflect something in my life, or it has this meaning or that meaning, or reflect something in my history, or this duty, or this teaching.

It might give me a teaching. It's telling me something about how I tend to approach something. It might be telling me something about how I tend to approach practice. And it gives me a teaching about how I might do things differently, for instance. But that teaching is one meaning that the image is pregnant with—an infinite possibility of meanings. And some of those meanings are not discernible yet.

So this again relates to the beyondness and the kind of hazy edges. Sometimes very clear—yes, I recognize that meaning, I recognize that teaching, I recognize whatever it is. And then I have a kind of vague sense of other meanings, and the knowledge, or the even vaguer sense, of just a kind of inexhaustible richness of meaningfulness.

This relates to the 26th node, infinite echoing and mirroring, which I think we touched on yesterday. This quality is easier to discern with an image, with an intra-psychic image, than it is with sensing the soul. But there can be a sense to be noticed that this image echoes my life.

I see that lonely, solitary wanderer image that was, for a long time, very important to me. I could see how that image echoed my life in many ways. But I could also see that my life echoed the image. Do you understand? There's a shaping each way. Some of those echoings are obvious. But again, there's this kind of haze of dimly perceived echoes and mirrorings. I don't quite know what they are, but I just sense this depth of echoing, a bit like when you—I've never been to the Grand Canyon, but if you shout there, I assume it just echoes, and if it's one of those echoes where you don't really hear the end of the echo, like it just... Is that how it is? The kind of echoing where it shades into infinity.

There can be that kind of sense with an image. My life and this image and my story and my pain and my duty and my calling and my passions—there's this echoing that happens. Again, sometimes we get locked into thinking this is related to causality: my life causes this image. The events in my life, the history, what I've been exposed to, what I've been subject to, creates the image. It's a representation. You can also view it the other way, and there's a possibility of just seeing two mirrors facing each other. Again, you get this infinite kind of mirroring. Where does it stop? You can't actually discern the end of it, but there are these discrete, connected, infinite mirrorings.

So I mentioned that lonely wanderer image, and I can see there's this relatively obvious way that has been mirrored in my life, and that my life mirrors that. And there are all these subtler ways. The image related to that of the outcast. Sometimes we identify too much with something in our life. I am the outcast. I feel like the outcast. I am the lonely one. I am the lonely wanderer. I am broken. I am the broken person.

This infinite echoing also implies separation. I am that and I am not that. It is other than me. When we have that separation by echoing, by interconnected echoing, there's more possibility for it to become imaginal, because I'm not just stuck in "I am broken. I am outcast. I am the one on the edge."

In the beginnings of my trying to experiment with imaginal practice, I used to have an image of being in a prison cell, like down in a dungeon somewhere and left there alone. It was actually lovely. It became, for a while, a kind of fertile place where images would come into that space. But there was something in me and in my life that—I could feel that echoing. There's something about being a solitary prisoner in some kind of dungeon that just echoes something. And yet it's a prison, but there's beauty born in that prison. There's fertility and richness in the darkness there.

Because they're separate, there's this echoing of two things—the image and the life. There is the possibility of fertility. But if I'm just identifying with being imprisoned, or outcast, or the lonely one, or broken, or the sacrificed one, or the victim, or whatever it is, the identification doesn't allow the thing to become rich in the imaginal. Do you understand?

These images of ancestors—they are other, and I am them. I am them, and I am not them.

I am in the lineage of those ancestors, and I am not in the lineage of those ancestors. I am heir to them, and I am not heir to them. There's something in this together—connected, but separate, echoing, mirroring, and the mystery of that in the infinitio. And again, a lot of this is subtle, so it's more like we just sense that possibility. It might be quite dim, but that can be enough to ignite that node and allow the thing to become more imagined.

It's a little trickier to see with sensing with soul, but actually a couple of people, even on this retreat, have alluded to it. Again, relating to a tree or sensing a tree with soul or whatever it is. And there's a way that my energy body experience and my psychic experience starts to mirror that of the tree. I come into some kind of resonance, also of sensibility and of energy body texture, the solidity of—the way that the tree knows is echoed in my being. Possibilities there.

The twenty-seventh has to do with values. When we are sensing with soul, when there's an image, there's value. What is valuable is implicit in that. Now that's also part of meaningfulness. In other words, this pregnancy of meaningfulness includes values. So beauty is also a value, but goodness or nobility—that's a value. And it's part of the meaningfulness of when we sense with soul. Does that make sense?

So I'm sensing something with soul, and there is a mix present for me in that experience. Sometimes just noticing that—we could say a whole lot more about that, I don't want to right now—but sometimes just noticing can ignite something. Sometimes you might bring to mind someone you know and love, or something you know and love, and bring them to mind and steady the attention on them, and open the energy body, and tune in to what you value there. And that can begin to open up, make that thing, that person, that being, let it become image for you, become imaginable.

There's also the possibility—the person who wrote the note mentioned this—Aslan from The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe, this sort of lion king, really. Somehow meditating, finding themselves in a kind of quasi-jhanic space that was imbued with the particular character of this Aslan without the form of Aslan. There's an image—we could say that's still an image. Without the clear form, it's still an image.

But it's possible at times to even extract the value from an image. So I wouldn't do too much of this, but for instance, within one of the qualities of Aslan—I would say, maybe the person would say differently, but just for the sake of example—there's nobility. Aslan's a very noble being. And so nobility is a quality or a value. And it might be that here I'm meditating on Aslan, and it's a form, and there's the sense of the lion, and then that may go to some kind of space of Aslan-ness, and within that one may tune into the nobility. And then it's like the essence of that value. One can meditate on that. I really wouldn't recommend—I'm just mentioning it as a possibility, but it's mostly not what we're doing.

Or beauty. This is interesting, because one might be sensing something with soul, or it might be an internal image, and it feels very beautiful. Maybe it's connected to a feeling. I'm hearing music, and actually it came out of some dukkha in relation to music and no longer being a musician, etc. And then I heard—I let the mind spin this music, create music, improvising music, and let myself be touched by that music. And then there's a possibility of saying, oh, there's beauty here.

I'm just mentioning this as a possibility. It's possible to extract the essence or let the essence of beauty extract out of that, but it's no longer even tied to a form. The music has faded and it's just kind of pure beauty. Just mentioning it as a possibility without wanting to suggest that too much as a line.

And the last one is participation—the twenty-eighth node. In a way, sometimes I think this feels like the hardest one for me to articulate, or one of the hardest ones. And I have a real sense of it as being something that can just get deeper and deeper, the sense of what that means.

Partly, with the emphasis on ways of looking and fabrication, we can get very much into the idea and the insight—the emphasis on the insight—that what we perceive, what we sense, depends on the subject's way of looking, depends on the way of looking. To me, the word participation kind of fills it out with the other side. It doesn't neglect that there's some sense of an objective pole there, some kind of objective pole of value, of sacredness, of reality. So it kind of holds both. It's a bit like create-discover: we're participating in both sides of it.

To me, also, that word participation—it preserves my autonomy.

You think about the word - I participate in this, or this participates in that. It preserves the autonomy of the participator and that which is being participated in. So it preserves a sense of autonomy with also a sense of non-separateness, which to me is very valuable in giving a sense of what we have when we're sensing the soul.

So I participate, I have a sense of participating in that archetypal image of the lonely wanderer. It's something - again, it's me and it's not me. It's something I mysteriously participate in, this thing that is bigger than me somehow, holier and bigger. My life somehow is participating in this image, or the outcast, or the lineage of ancestry. We participate in an archetype, in a divine archetype. We participate in the mundus imaginalis, as Catherine referred to, the world of the imaginable. We feel that we're participating in that. We're not outside observers. We're somehow our life and our perceptions participating in all that.

As the soul-making really starts involving every element of our being - also our eros - my desire, my sexuality, my eros in the much broader sense than sexuality, we start to feel that as not just mine. Whose is it? We start to sense this eros that I'm experiencing right now is participating in the divine eros, the eros of the Buddha nature. The whole other sense of one's existence in participation, in a mystery of participation.

Our soul-making is participating, is necessary to, is adding to the soul-making of the world, the soul-making of the world soul, the anima mundi, the soul-making of the Buddha nature, the soul-making of the primordial Buddhas, the soul-making of God. It's not just me doing my soul-making. There's a sense of something, some much vaster, more unfathomably mysterious participation.

I invite you to view all this as a journey, as an adventure rather than a demand, rather than a list of what should be happening or evident right now already - an invitation to an adventure, the coming and going of things and the coming and going of soulfulness. Whatever is arising right now, whatever is here today is really, really fine. It's part of that journey.

Let's have some quiet.

CHAPTER 149

Nothing Happens By Itself

Rob Burbea · 8 min

> In this profound teaching, Rob Burbea examines how soul-making, like all meaningful spiritual processes, requires intentional cultivation and supportive conditions. Drawing on the Greek concept of temenos—a sacred, protected space or vessel—he explores how both solitary practice and relational work need careful tending to allow the 'holy fire' within us to flourish.
> Burbea addresses the practical aspects of creating conditions for sensing the soul, emphasizing that this work doesn't necessarily require extensive samādhi or lengthy meditation sessions. Instead, he points to the importance of sensitivity, awareness, openness, and attunement to the energy body. He suggests that even brief encounters with meaningful images can have profound effects when the right conditions are present.
> The teaching particularly focuses on soul-making in relationship, acknowledging that much of this work happens through connection with others. Burbea explores the delicate art of sharing images and soulful experiences, emphasizing the vulnerability inherent in this sharing and the need for formal, honored spaces. He addresses the complexity of human relationships and how unresolved issues can affect the sacred vessel needed for this work, inviting practitioners to explore what supports and what hinders soul-making in both solitary and communal contexts.

Thank you to all of you for being here, for participating, for the fullness of your practice and your willingness to explore, to question, to open. It's very beautiful. I really appreciate it. And thank you to our wonderful team of managers and to Mark for everything he's done in the lead-up to this.

Nothing happens by itself. And the same is true of soul-making. It doesn't just happen by itself. It needs our participation, it needs our care, our support. That fire, the holy fire we feel within us and without us, needs tending, needs attention, needs fuel, needs support, needs conditions.

We've used this word temenos—it's a Greek word meaning an enclosed, protected and sacred space, a vessel, an alchemical vessel. We can see that in one's own practice, the conditions need to be right in our solitude in order for sensing with soul to have the right support and conditions and vessel in which something can unfold, and actually the unexpected can unfold as well.

We've touched on many of what those conditions are: the sensitivity, the awareness, the openness, the energy body, the emotional care and responsiveness, the attunement. All this creates, in any moment, in ourselves, so to speak, a temenos in which there is the possibility of unfolding, of blossoming, of flowering, of the fire stimulating the alchemical process. And that comes and goes, and there's a kind of grace in that.

I was talking with someone yesterday about this. As you leave here, if you're interested in exploring this kind of practice, I don't think it necessarily needs a lot of samadhi. You don't need the mind to be really quiet, really still, or to do hours and hours of sitting. My guess is you'll discover that's not actually necessary. I mean, it's fine if that is there. But sometimes an image arises just for a couple of minutes and it has potency, and its fragrance, its perfume and its effects permeate the life. It makes an impact on the being. So it doesn't always equate to deeper meditation, calmer states, longer time, etc. This sensing with soul, when the conditions are there, is accessible. It's there for us in our life, in the way we sense ourselves, the world, each other.

It may well be the case that a lot of soul-making, perhaps for most people, most soul-making happens in relationship with others. There's this magic of a spark here igniting a spark there, and some reciprocal feeding of flame and of poetry and of beauty. But that too needs a temenos.

Some of you will want to share this with others and will want that support, that input, that flow, that meeting. But there too, if you're in twos or a group, a temenos is needed, especially if you're sharing images. Images, sensings with soul, soulfulness needs this care.

What does it mean to create a temenos in relationship? If I just casually mention an image to someone that's been meaningful for me and it's the wrong moment—it might be the right person but the wrong moment, the person isn't really interested, or you haven't taken care of how to be present with each other—maybe you haven't even created a formal space where that can be held, where that vessel will support. So that in itself is a creative exploration. This question: What actually supports soul-making? What supports soulfulness?

Images can be very vulnerable. Even if one would write the image and wouldn't think there's anything vulnerable about that, there's something about the sensing with soul that touches us so deeply. We don't just put that out willy-nilly anywhere. It's something precious and something—not necessarily to be hoarded, but to be honored.

Sometimes the formality really helps. To honor something as if it were divine will allow it to become divine. But part of what happens in relationships is all the messy complexity of human relationships. If you're sharing images with another person and there's something left over between you from yesterday, last year, that has nothing to do with any of this, that complexity can interfere with the sacred vessel needed for soul-making to flourish.

It's going to be in the field, and unless it's addressed, opened, and explored, it's going to affect that vessel, that temenos.

There's much we're not going to explore right now, but there are many skills, arts, and prerequisites that enable this kind of vessel to be created between human beings. Can we see that—I invite you, if you're interested—as an exploration, an experiment?

Why is it that whatever we're doing—whether it's solitary practice, whether it's moving together, whether it's sharing images or something else, or even studying together—becomes soul-making? There's plenty of material now to study and contemplate, to digest and assimilate the ideas. But what makes any of that soul-making? What supports that? And what prevents it? What gets in the way? What doesn't help to provide that vessel?

It's a question—a creative, open-ended question to explore.

CHAPTER 150

Opening Talk ('To Kiss a Falcon')

Rob Burbea · 27 min

> In this opening talk from the 'Foundations of a Soul-Making Dharma' retreat, Rob Burbea establishes the conceptual framework for understanding soul-making practice as both art and spiritual path. He emphasizes how all traditional Buddhist elements—mindfulness (sati), ethical conduct (sīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (paññā), and the divine abodes (brahmavihāra)—serve as foundational supports for this approach to practice.
> Burbea explores the delicate balance between precision and elasticity in conceptual understanding, suggesting that the willingness to question received teachings and assumptions is itself part of the foundation. Drawing on poetry and contemporary cultural critique, he addresses how soul-making practice might respond to what he calls the "anthropological crisis" of our time—our limited understanding of what it means to be human.
> Central to this talk is the invitation to approach practice as creative art rather than mere technique, emphasizing experiential discovery alongside intellectual understanding. Burbea introduces the concept of "eros-psyche-logos" dynamic, suggesting that genuine soul-making involves a passionate engagement with ideas, discriminations, and the ongoing refinement of perception that reveals ever-more facets of experience and being.

That's beautiful to hear what people were sharing there. We've called this retreat "Foundations of a Soul-Making Dharma," and I want to say a little about that word "foundations." In a way, it implies that we're going to try not to introduce any new material—some of you are probably quite relieved. There's already a lot, and it's time perhaps to consolidate, to digest, to establish those foundations.

What may be a little different are some of the relative emphases between different elements of this teaching, this path. That may shift somewhat—we'll see. But we're emphasizing trying to condense or distill the teachings and material down to basic building blocks. What skills are involved in practicing this way? What kinds of qualities or attitudes serve these kinds of openings, these directions and avenues? What kinds of understanding—so what kinds of skills, what qualities and attitudes, and what kinds of understandings, plural—are part and parcel, are the bones and flesh of this art, this practice.

We're going to try to condense and distill and present all this. I should say right from the start that we're not trying to be exhaustive—this isn't about creating canonical lists or anything like that. There are also great individual variations. People are, of course, different in their constitution, personalities, inclinations, where they're gifted and where they're more challenged, in their history of practice and what teachings they've been exposed to. All that needs to be acknowledged and brought into the mix.

But the foundations of this art include everything you already know from your practice of Buddhadharma, particularly from insight meditation. All the mindfulness, all the sīla—the emphasis on goodness, ethics, and virtue—the samādhi, paññā, insight, mettā, the brahmavihāras. In a way, all of that forms the foundation for what we're discussing. So everything you know comes into it, and probably more than you already know in terms of other possibilities, other ways of doing things, other ways of conceiving and looking at things. What you know, plus probably a bit more.

And also, I would say, the willingness to question what you know—to question ideas we have absorbed or arrived at at this point in our lives. Ideas from Buddhadharma, ideas from insight meditation culture, ideas and assumptions from the Buddhadharma, but also about the Buddhadharma. That's actually all part of the foundations. It's a kind of shaky foundation—the foundation that shakes, that questions, that dares to question what we've received and arrived at.

This includes what we've learned from psychotherapeutic investigations or practices, or what we might have encountered from exposure to words like "imaginal" and "soul-making" and "eros." Or what we might have found in similar or overlapping paths—shamanism, energy healing, and such. A lot of the language is quite similar.

But part of what we're interested in here is—well, Mary mentioned breaking through, and while I don't want to tell you what you meant, one way that could be interpreted is that breaking through is very much part of what happens when we let soul-making get going. Stuff gets broken through.

So that willingness, that courage, that boldness is actually part of the path—along with refining clarity alongside that boldness and willingness to question assumptions. That's all part of it.

It's asking a lot. It brings in a lot. Actually, it will involve and bring into the mix everything—all the elements, all aspects of our life. And within that asking a lot, we have to bring wisdom to questions of pacing and digestion. When am I ready for this?

When am I ready to question that? That's all part of it, and there will be huge individual variations that need to be respected. It's part of the maturity, part of the care, part of the wisdom.

So we're going to try to communicate in ways that hopefully support you in gaining a sense—really a sense and taste—of what we mean when we use words like "imaginal" and "soul-making" and "eros."

and also to try and open up and get a taste of what that implies, what that unfolds, and what that indeed opens up in terms of the possible visions, ideas, and senses of what it is to be a human being and what a human being is and what the world is.

There's something about this that's going to—has the potential to just really open up and give a sense of where this is all going, and the possibility of that being opened up as well. Awakening or the goal of the path or whatever—this all again comes into the mix, gets metabolized in the soul-making.

Someone said, "What brings you here?" Someone else said, "Beauty." And I used the word art before, referring to this as an art. Even just those two ideas there, beauty and art—what might that do to your whole sense of what the path is about and how we conceive of it and the kind of language we use and the kind of either clear or vague ideas of where we're going?

Some of you have been practicing a long, long time, and it might be interesting for you to just question: Where do I think I'm going with this business of awakening or enlightenment or liberation—give it any words? What do I think that is? Where is it going? What is it that I actually really want? Am I using the right language and the right ideas to support the truth of what my soul wants?

And some of you have been practicing not that long, perhaps, and that might be an interesting question to introduce.

So I used this word art, and I didn't want to mean it in a kind of facile way, where it's very easy to talk about the art of this or the art of that or the art of whatever, and to imply in that word art something like, well, it involves a skill, but there's also kind of an intuitive element, and some people can get really good at that or whatever.

All that, I suppose, is the case. I don't know what it means to be really good at soul-making. But I think I mean the word art in a slightly fuller and potentially more radical way. When we really think about art, making art, and great art, it's like—what's the purpose of it? Why art? Why do people make art? Why do we love art? What is it that we're after? Where does the process or the engagement with either making art or loving art—where does it lead us? What's the goal? What does it serve?

Some may not relate to the word art. It's just one way of conceiving what we're doing. And if that doesn't really relate to you, there are other ways of opening up the sense of what this might all open out to. And there might be another fantasy rather than that of art. But also in relation to art, there isn't really—I think we're trying, but there isn't really—a dogma here, much as there isn't with art. And it's not really a question of truth in the usual sense we think about that.

Some of you have heard teachings around soul-making and stuff we've talked about before. So there's a kind of—if you like—a particular relationship with notions or ideas of truth and reality. There's a particular relationship that we're interested in. We'll talk about this as the retreat goes on, if some of you have heard this before. But it's that particular kind of relationship with the whole idea of truth and reality that opens things up in certain ways that they wouldn't otherwise get opened up, opening up a different domain and range of experience, and giving us a different sense and idea of everything—everything.

Actually, if you linger with this idea of art, I think—even when it's not obvious, when it's not spelled out in words or pictures that make obvious sense—I think that all art that I would call wonderful, beautiful, meaningful, soulful art is, even if it's not in an obvious way, it has an ethical dimension. It has a dimension that addresses us in terms of value, that touches our sense of value, makes us want to live differently somehow, makes us want to be alive differently. Someone—you know, you guys know I like John Coltrane—is just playing some sounds. There's nothing in the title, there's nothing, and it does something to the sense of existence, and there's goodness and ethical values wrapped up in that. Art touches on that. So I use the word art in relation to the practice that we're doing in all those senses with all those implications.

Someone sent me a lovely poem, a really touching to me poem, not too long ago, a week or two ago. And she said in introducing it—this is not someone I know yet—"Yesterday was my birthday, and I have a tradition of getting up early and writing a poem on that day." It's a nice way to spend your birthday mornings. And then she said, "I think you'll find the teachings, the soul-making teachings influencing here."

So this is the poem:

"This year, a Syrian girl gifted me a red poppy.
This year, the sunflowers grew as tall as the roof.
This year, Annette's son died a week before Mother's Day.
This year, I kissed a man who was also a falcon.
This year, I was a cloud, and when I rained, she cried."

This year, the long-tongued deity taught me wild equanimity. This year, I prayed naked, and the gods loved it. This year, on winter solstice, we laughed so hard we peed off the edge of the mountains. This year, I traded babies with a miner to our mother. This year, I was a gazelle eaten by a lion. This year, children reminded me that you can become a robot when it's pretend real, that we can share mermaid dreams with the dog, and that kings make bad fathers when they've lost their bones. This year, the electronic billboards lit snowfall in Nanjing. This year, a pair of cranes landed on a river when the sun fell. This year, Steve and I were still learning to dance. This year, I played peekaboo with a blue-eyed spider. This year, an insane amount of people decided to keep loving me. This year, a few decided to stop. This year, the crow finally flew from that windowsill and we became each other.

And she continues, in this birthday writing: "I am not being abstract. These things happened to me. But I'm also not claiming that any of it is real or not real. It's just that life whispers in many tongues. My dear Western culture, my darling inheritance, in all your brilliance and brutality, this year I've come to realize that you've forgotten many secret languages, especially the ones that make us most human. The 'let me create you and you create me' love languages. The languages of belonging. Let's keep remembering, shall we? This year I discovered how to belong."

Beautiful. So "let me create you and you create me" love languages. She mentions in there this inheritance that we all have of Western culture and its brilliance and brutality. And there's so much gift in terms of science and social infrastructure and that kind of way of thinking that we are heirs to, that we benefit from.

And I think it's become clear—it's becoming clear—that the culture, the intellectual inheritance and the inheritance of sensibility and outlook, metaphysics and all that, has a brutality to it as well. It comes with a cost. We see every day there's something in the news. Unfortunately it's usually way down in the back pages, but every day there's something of some kind of ecological, environmental crisis somewhere. We are living through multiple environmental ecological crises that are somehow the result of our vision, our brilliant and brutal and limited vision.

We're living through environmental crises, ecological crises. I think we're also living through anthropological crises. What is a human being that we look on each other these ways? Anthropology means the logos, the ideation of what a human being is, in one sense. In a way, humanism that came with the Western Enlightenment—there's a kind of crisis in it, you could say.

Now, I'm not saying, and I don't think Catherine would say either, that what we're doing with soul-making is the solution, and absolutely not. There's plenty of people addressing these questions and there are many possible solutions. But what we're doing and what we're wanting to bring into this, and the way practice opens up the being—it does address those issues of what it means to be a human being and what the world is and what our relationship is organically, naturally with other human beings, ourselves and the world.

So, as I said, in our time, there are many views and ancient traditions and practices and epistemologies and ontologies that are resurfacing or being resuscitated to address some of these questions. And there's so much of value there, so much of value. And there's so much need for it and so much hunger for it. All this stuff comes up and in a way then it lands on the table. And gradually, gradually, we can start to sort and sift what's there—these different ideas, these different practices, these different understandings and outlooks.

And I really absolutely don't want to say this one path is better or this conception is worse or that way of practice is more advanced or anything like that. But they are different. There are differences there. And to sort them, to understand what's been brought up, resuscitated and brought to the table in attempts—multiple attempts—to address these kind of predicaments that we globally face now. I think making delineations, making discriminations and discernments between these different ideas and practices and outlooks is quite important.

Actually, some of you might know already or have heard us say that this making of discriminations is actually an element of soul-making. The more on-fire soul-making is, the more discernments and delineations and proliferations and complexities and faces of things open up. We will explain this. It's what happens when what we call the eros-psyche-logos dynamic gets going. All these differences and different aspects and faces—worlds upon worlds—open up. And part of that is delineation and discrimination. And in all that, there's a maturing of understanding and of practice that's possible.

So that one element—certainly not the be-all and end-all, but quite central in this whole soul-making process—is the realm of concepts and conceptual frameworks. There's a dance here, I think. A dance to be witnessed, to be entered into: a kind of middle-way dance between precision of conceptual understanding and precision of conceptual delineation on one hand, and elasticity on the other—fluidity, flexibility, capacity to stretch.

In all that, what can be allowed in this dance between precision and elasticity is the creation and discovery of more and more facets of soul, more and more worlds, more and more dimensions, more and more realms of being—a proliferation of richness that happens with the whole soul-making dynamic. This feeds and requires developing sensitivities to make these discernments and differentiations.

We're talking about what you could call a soul intelligence, which is not just an abstract, intellectual thing. It's lived, it's felt, it touches the soul with beauty. It involves a great deal of present-moment, alive flexibility of conception and ways of looking.

So eventually—for some of you it already does—this soul-making dynamic will involve eros for ideas, eros for the conceptual, eros for these differentiations. Some of you might find that very hard to believe. But everything gets subsumed. Everything starts to burn, come on fire. Everything. Even more things than you can think of when you hear the word "everything," because in the process of create-discover, we discover more things that we didn't even know were there that come alive, that come into the dimensions of our being.

I'm highlighting one element tonight, not at all to say it's the most important one. The conceptual is part of it—part of what will be involved, part of what will be swept up into the flames and the flowering of soul-making. In that, you will come to love that ongoing refinement of ideation and conception and ways of looking. Your love, your care for these kinds of discernments and discriminations, because you realize it's part of the creation and discovery.

If we just throw everything together and say it's all one, it's all the same, all paths are the same, I don't know that this reflects the utmost care. Someone who really cares about cooking—a really top-notch chef—doesn't just say, "It's all good." They relish the subtleties of discrimination and the nuance of tastes and aromas and the visual. It's a sign of their care.

I'm not talking about something that's an intellectual abstraction. I'm talking about something that opens up awareness and avenues of experience and practice and sensing—actually sensing. So I really want to encourage you to play and experiment and have fun with this: first-hand experiential understanding, first-hand experience of the creation and discovery that's part of soul-making.

Experience and idea, praxis and logos—they can unfold, they can open, they can be enriched together. There's tremendous beauty in all that. Tremendous beauty. Riches.

Finally, practically speaking, I wish sometimes when teaching retreat that there would be some way of instantaneously downloading all the teachings in one go. Samsara being what it is, that's not possible. Things have to happen in a certain order. But the order we do things in doesn't imply any inherent sequence—first you need to do this, then that. They all feed into each other. Given the limitations of how time is structured, we're going to try to build things so that what comes later builds on what comes earlier, so it can make sense that way.

You've heard us emphasize this quality of play and experimenting and letting yourself taste what opens up when you bring those attitudes. So I really want to encourage that.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 151

Growing the Energy Body (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 35 min

> In this Q&A session from his Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma retreat, Rob Burbea responds to practitioners' questions about working with the energy body. He explores various approaches to accessing energetic awareness, from the simple 'body bubble' technique of expanding awareness beyond physical boundaries to more sophisticated practices involving light and breath work. Burbea addresses the balance between staying with familiar practices versus experimenting with new approaches, emphasizing that different methods work for different people at different times.
> The discussion delves into the relationship between energy body work and samādhi development, clarifying how tuning to specific qualities or 'vibrations' can support jhānic states while maintaining the neither-real-nor-not-real perspective characteristic of imaginal practice. Burbea distinguishes between using the energy body as a navigation tool in emptiness practices versus its role in soulmaking dharma, where it opens to subtler qualities like meaningfulness, sacredness, and mystery.
> The session also explores collective energy body experiences, acknowledging how groups can share energetic fields during ritual or practice, while maintaining important distinctions between imaginal work and paranormal phenomena. Throughout, Burbea emphasizes patience with the process, encouraging practitioners to trust their experience while remaining open to the gradual expansion and refinement that comes with sustained practice.

And so today, just as much as possible, if there are questions about what we've been talking about—the energy body, what that is and how to practice with it—then this is a good space for that.

Jill asked about something she had learned ages ago called the "body bubble," wondering if she had her concepts right, whether the body bubble could be one of the things on the spectrum of ways of working with energy. I'll repeat because usually people can't hear: Jill is asking about what I must have called the body bubble, which is really similar to what we talked about this morning in terms of expanding the space of awareness just a bit bigger than the body. That whole region becomes sensitized to as a field of energy or vibration or texture. Is it right to view that as one way of working with the energy body?

Yes, absolutely. For a lot of people, it will probably be the easiest and most efficacious way in. Something just happens when you open up the awareness, just like we did first thing this morning. Open up the awareness, just hang out there. Sometimes you don't need to do the breath or lights or all that stuff—it's just, oh, actually it's already a field of energy. Not for everyone—everyone's different—but oftentimes that is the easiest way to start getting familiar with and sensitized to a certain way of feeling this bodily experience. And then from there, it can expand to all kinds of other things.

To clarify, she's used it to check in, and also to infuse the space with quality—peace and so on. Either of those approaches works beautifully. With this body bubble way of working, one way is to just check in: how am I doing, what's going on? The second way is to deliberately infuse that space with a certain skillful quality—what the Buddha would call a skillful quality like peace or happiness.

With the first approach, the checking in, that's what I was talking about this morning a little bit. This way of paying attention becomes a really fine, potentially very fine discrimination of what's going on, particularly emotionally. Or as I said, checking in with an image—just the sense of, my mind doesn't get this yet at all, but I can tell there's something here for me just because of what happens in the energy body. So I'm checking in almost as the thing's going on, and it can tell me an awful lot. We can get really quite refined, developing a refined sensitivity to that.

The second thing, infusing a quality, is more what I would associate with working in certain ways when we develop samādhi. One way of understanding what samādhi is: you're really tuning the whole being—the energy body and the mind and the consciousness—to a certain quality. You can think about the jhānas that way. With the first jhāna, the quality that you're plucking out of the ether, if you like, of the space—resonating to and absorbing into, getting into—is this kind of rapture or pīti. With the second it's happiness, and so on. There are many more than just the eight jhānas. You can be quite creative and make all kinds of cocktails and combinations.

Basically this idea of tuning to certain vibrations or qualities is really skillful. It's very helpful for samādhi. It's also part of what goes on in imaginal work, because what's happening when an image gets going is that there will be a whole constellation with it—partly not just one emotion, but several emotions: love and eros and maybe grief or tenderness, all kinds of things. You can tune to that whole constellation or different elements within it. All this develops with time.

Jill mentioned feeling quite relieved to find that she can actually do something worthwhile. As I said last night, what we're laying out is a lot, and you'll be drawing on everything you know—mindfulness, mindfulness of body, samādhi, and all this stuff.

This also relates to something else Jill was intrigued by from what Catherine said today. There are certain approaches that feel really aversive—she doesn't like the idea of them at all. Yet when she went outside and felt the sunshine, when she put her feet on the ground, that felt like something she could do, rather than some other way that felt a bit dark. So there's a question about the balance between trying something new and what feels comfortable.

Certain things to try with the energy body feel really easy and comfortable and familiar—they work, and immediately you get a sense that this is helpful.

And there are other things which really don't. So the question is partly like, what's that balance between trying new things and actually just staying with what you know works?

Personally, I don't think there's one answer. We have to try new things. Otherwise—well, you're free not to, of course—but there's a way that we won't expand beyond what we already know. Catherine and I were just mentioning earlier, talking with each other, how easy it is to get into meditation habits. And even of posture. You see, I sit a certain way, and it's fine. And it works, and I can be mindful, and I can know what's going on emotionally. But it's actually not quite fully open and upright, just the posture. And you know what happens? The whole energy state, the whole... well, energy, but also then the experiences that open up will be limited by, in this case, a postural habit, which turns very easily into a meditation habit.

Similar thing with ideas or attitudes or stances or what we're trying to do. It's so easy. Everyone here has done plenty of meditation experience. So it's just human. But within those habits, we've got lots of good habits, lots of really good habits, and lots of good things we know how to do. So you don't want to throw that out. That's part of your bank of resources and your tool set and your skills. Lovely, yeah?

And for me, a lot about this practice is about just this attitude of daring to experiment and try things. The thing about experimenting in this situation is it's perhaps not just completely like a science experiment where you try something, it doesn't work right, so you just throw it out. Because what you try one day might work—you know, might close right there and then, nothing happens. And then, you know, two hours later, it's actually perfect. So there's this whole quality, there's this whole fact of the kind of fluidity of our energy experience, our whole being, and a necessity to respond to that. Do you see what I mean?

So I'm not quite sure about this. But let me just say something. So was it something one of us suggested?

"Yeah, okay. And so what did the ray of light have?"

"Well, it's just I've tried to do several times over several years to do this rays of light going into different parts of the body."

Okay. Something goes... Yeah. So... Maybe leave it, you know. But if you're talking about light and energy body, then there's plenty of other things, you know, plenty of other ways. Like, in a way, the light is all around, or the light's coming from inside of you, or what I mentioned briefly—this body is, that bubble is a bubble of light that you talked about. All these things. And it might be that in time, that opens up further possibilities, which at some point include this. But, you know, it doesn't really matter at all. It's not like... Boy, you're not really getting this until you can get that death ray started. Or whatever it is. It's not a fight. You know. Okay? Yeah? Beautiful. Okay.

Okay, good. Yes, Dave, please.

"It's sort of a similar question to Jill's in a way about that balance between doing what sort of flows more easily. But rather than balancing that and trying something new, the balance between that and working on those bits that through discrimination you've picked up—okay this feels important and it's something I'm maybe avoiding or not paying attention to because it's easier to follow another route. So specifically with the energy body I find it a lot easier to almost start with image. And something I've noticed in this retreat is a sense that it's important to find a way to, especially in practice, Catherine was talking us through with, you know, having you first before you then go into tuners."

Perhaps what's happening is, as you're working more with bringing sacredness to the breath or the energy body, you're learning that sacredness itself actually supports samadhi. The sense of the sacred—even without elaborate imagery—can create a quality of reverence and devotion that naturally deepens concentration.

So one possibility is that you're discovering something quite beautiful: that when we approach our practice with a sense of the sacred, it actually enhances rather than hinders the samadhi. The reverence, the sense that what we're doing matters, that it's holy in some way—this can create the conditions for deeper absorption.

Now, regarding fabrication: there are different kinds and levels of fabrication. The classical teaching is that as samadhi deepens, fabrication lessens. But what you might be discovering is that initially bringing in a certain kind of fabrication—the fabrication of sacredness, of devotion—actually creates the platform for less fabrication later.

It's a bit like using a ladder to get up to a roof, and then you can put the ladder away. Or like using a raft to cross a river. The initial fabrication of sacredness helps establish the samadhi, and then within that established samadhi, there can be less fabrication.

Another way to think about it: there might be a difference between effortful fabrication and what we could call natural fabrication. When sacredness arises organically in practice, it doesn't feel forced or constructed. It feels like you're discovering something that was already there. This kind of fabrication might actually be more aligned with the natural movement of consciousness toward absorption.

Does that resonate with your experience? When you bring that sense of divinity to the breath, does it feel effortful or does it feel like you're uncovering something inherent?

You understand? So I would say, with just pure jhānas—without the imaginal—it's an interesting thing. For myself, definitely, sacredness starts to really come in at a certain point. As you get deeper into the jhānas, it's characteristic of that. They can be more or less infused with sacredness, depending partly on how much you tinge it with image or some kind of conception.

So for example, here's this bliss, and I regard it in that moment as some grace from the divine. Now, the Buddha doesn't talk that way, but the same experience will just be infused more with that characteristic.

So you can—again, this fork business—you can peel off and kind of emphasize different aspects. So it might be interesting, if you want to, to start with image as you're doing, start with whatever kind of mystical ideas of sacredness, kind of semi-imaginal mystical ideas, open up the samādhi. Then if you want to—it's not that you have to do this, but if you want to, just for the sake of your exploration—you could stay with that mix.

Again, it can be the whole constellation: mystical imaginal idea and sacredness and whatever the samādhi quality is—bliss or whatever—all mixed together relatively evenly. Or I can start to lean a bit more one way or another.

Within that mix that you're describing, you could lean just into the pure sensation of—let's say it's pīti—just the pleasantness, and kind of let the mystical idea or the image be very secondary or even fade out. What you pay attention to will filter out of the experience and grow.

Again, I don't think it matters too much about order. Samādhi, I would say, is dependent on happiness and inspiration. You can nail your attention to your nostril tips and not blink for a microsecond, but if it's lacking in juice and inspiration, you're not going to get into any jhāna or nothing at all. Jhāna is dependent on a certain kind of happiness and inspiration.

Now, if it takes something imaginal to open that up for you, great, so be it. But once that's there, then you can kind of play with the relative weightings through the attentions. Does that make sense?

Padmasuri asks: "I wonder about individual and collective energy body. Like Catherine yesterday sort of set us in tension with the Avalokiteśvara mantra, and all of us go into the same space and sort of form a collective energy body. Could you see it like that?"

Yeah, absolutely. So thank you for mentioning that. No question about it. Energy body experience can be individual or collective, and so can image. People can enter into a collective image with another person, or a group of people.

This is what starts to happen when you start practicing in these ways—and now we're talking about energy body, but also with image. You start to have a certain range, and then you get into practice, and then it's like, "Oh, hold on, this is a whole other thing now." Collective energy body sense. Could be in a dyad, a triad, could be a whole group of people.

And then there's also the possibility of collective imaginal sense. What I was saying was the possibility sometimes of when a group shares a ritual—you're often actually, it probably won't be everyone, but there's a kind of collective entering into or sharing of a certain imaginal sense.

There's something to repeat again: the nature of these kinds of practices is that they start expanding in all kinds of ways.

They start growing. I hadn't even thought of that as a possibility. And then you go, whoa, this is what Catherine will talk about. Eros, Psyche, Logos starts expanding and breaking into new territory. And part of what becomes interesting, if it captivates you, is the question: what supports that? What supports that?

So if you and I—we haven't talked much about live dyad imaginal practice, like in twos—but if you and I were practicing in a certain way, what allows us to feel a shared sense of energy body, and what gets in the way of that? All kinds of things can get in the way. There are psychological hang-ups and clinging and just not paying attention. We could list countless conditions that allow that coming together, that opening out of the experience of a collective energy body, and countless conditions that close it or make it unavailable. The same applies to a shared imaginal sense. Does that make sense?

So yes, thank you for saying that. And it's something that Catherine and I work with, but we haven't really put it out there yet. But absolutely, if you sense that, then that just becomes part of your experience, and if it feels comfortable, go for it.

One more question. You said today that you would like to download the information to us, but that's quite difficult. But if you have this collective sense, would information be able to go through?

Sometimes I feel yes. And there's a level where perhaps that can feel extremely mysterious or uncanny. It's almost like... Catherine and I were talking about this a while ago. It's almost like when you have electrons in an atom and they orbit the atom and they jump—it's called a quantum jump. Do you know this? The electrons jump from one state to another. Sometimes what can happen is the field jumps together. So one electron jumps, you jump, and I just find myself jumping with you, or vice versa, and you can't even say who started that.

When there's a lot of openness between people, when there's a lot of sensitivity and attention—again, we could list these conditions—when there is this kind of sensitivity to these things, that sort of occurrence can happen. But we could make this into something grandiose.

Two things about that. First, just think about sharing a joke or you saying something or us cracking up about something together. What is going on there? There's something of the same kind happening. We understand something. How are we going to put that into words, and what happens in the field? There's something magical and mysterious about that, and a similar kind of thing is occurring. This is an everyday thing, hopefully. So this is not something so strange.

Second thing to say, and it relates to what I was saying about realism: I don't know how to say this. I'm really not sure how to say it, but I think the distinction or the mapping out of what we're calling imaginal and, say, ESP or remembering past lives or seeing ghosts—there are distinctions there and some overlap.

For me, it feels—and I'm not at all suggesting that you're doing this—but if we get a little bit interested in the paranormal sort of thing, it might be fascinating and interesting, but it won't be the same as opening up the soul-making. And again, this goes back to the intention. There's a way we grasp at the paranormal as something real. It's unusual and interesting, but it's real. The imaginal leans more towards the neither real nor not real. And that opens up experience in a very different way, with different kinds of sacredness and blessing that other approaches won't offer.

So there's a subtle distinction.

And yet there are relationships and overlaps between these domains. Not that this was implicit in your question, but just as a general clarification. Does that distinction make sense? Good, thank you.

Sampo is asking about his experience working with emptiness practices where the energy body is involved, but primarily in two ways. First, it serves as a navigating mechanism—registering whether I'm on the right track, sensing whether there's letting go happening or contraction arising, and if there's contraction, finding ways to release it. Second, there's what I mentioned earlier as the fork in the path—you can be doing an emptiness practice and move into samadhi with the energy body.

But all of this, as you point out, even including the different tones of samadhi that can arise, represents a much smaller range than what I was describing earlier and what you're alluding to—the full spectrum of what's involved in soul-making perceptions and what becomes available through the energy body.

So yes, much can be more subtle. I'm not sure about the "not bodily" aspect you mentioned. Perhaps what you're referring to is that many of these qualities—meaningfulness, the sense of soul-making—are what we might call mental qualities reflected in the body, or they're not as tangible in the usual sense. If I'm understanding you correctly, then yes, basically I agree.

Again, it's a matter of having been comfortable with this particular range of practice, and now it's opened even more. There are all kinds of colors and shades, directions and possibilities, and we're slowly getting used to that, becoming comfortable with this expanded territory.

Is there a question in this, or are you simply sharing your experience?

Ah, perhaps what's challenging is that it feels like a new kind of sensitivity is required. Sometimes there's a sense of numbness, as you mentioned—the qualities we're especially looking for, the sense of being, sacredness, or soulfulness, aren't as immediately apparent as we might expect.

This relates to some of the earlier questions we explored. You don't need to push too hard on what feels like it's not working or not as vivid as you imagine it should be. If there's an image present, a sense of soul-making and meaningfulness, and you're registering that somehow—even if it's not quite as vivid in the energy body as you might wish—it doesn't matter. Simply enter into it and enjoy it.

Recognize that sense of soul-making, tune into what feels soul-making, and just register that. From this engagement, the experience naturally enriches and expands. We become more sensitive, as you noted, but without forcing what feels underdeveloped.

For navigation, you don't have to rely solely on the energy body aspect. There are other qualities available—mystery, for instance, or unfathomableness. Consider sexual desire: when it becomes contracted and small-minded, it loses that sense of unfathomableness—of the object, of the subject, of the eros itself. It misses the mystery, the dimensions of beauty. Some of these qualities you can recognize anyway as indicators, without requiring immediate reflection in the energy body.

You understand? So trust—it's already there for you. You trust these other indicators, and the other elements of the experience will begin to fill out and come alive slowly.

Very good. Let's have just a bit of quiet before we end.

[Brief period of silence]

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 152

The Energy Body (A Little Bit of What, Why, and How)

Rob Burbea · 49 min

> In this foundational talk from his Soulmaking Dharma series, Rob Burbea explores what he terms the 'energy body' - a specific mode of attention that perceives the body as a field of energy, vibration, or texture rather than through conventional mindfulness of discrete sensations. He offers both narrow and broad definitions: the narrow definition describes a receptive awareness that encompasses the whole bodily space, while the broader definition includes felt sense, conception, and image of the body across an infinite range of possibilities.
> Burbea explains why this approach serves multiple purposes: it naturally inclines toward deeper samādhi states and jhāna absorption; it enhances mettā practice by grounding loving-kindness in embodied experience; it provides crucial feedback for insight meditation by reflecting the felt sense of letting go; and it supports imaginal practice by helping transform craving into eros and mental proliferation (papañca) into soul-making imagery. The energy body serves as both indicator and foundation for these practices.
> Throughout the talk, Burbea emphasizes a phenomenological rather than realist approach - the energy body is understood as dependent on ways of looking rather than as an objectively existing subtle body system. This philosophical stance opens vast territories of embodied experience, from conventional physical sensations to imaginal transformations where one might experience the body as fire, music, or geometrical constellations. The practice requires patience and gradual development, ultimately serving not just personal healing but what he calls 'fullness of intention' - practicing for the sake of soul-making and the divine rather than limited personal goals.

In a way, I wish this retreat was maybe two weeks long. When we think about building blocks for this practice, there are some essential things we need to cover, offering what everyone might need given their different background histories. The consequence of this means that the first couple of days—today and tomorrow—will be probably a little more dense with teaching than as the retreat goes on, just to get a certain amount of material out there so that you can start playing with it. There'll be a talk this evening, for instance, and tomorrow there'll be talks in both the morning and evening. I hope that's okay. It's obviously in the service of getting things across.

What I want to talk about now, hopefully in just under an hour, is this term "the energy body" that you've heard about. I want to say a few things about that. Again, as Catherine probably mentioned, consider what you need—where's the consolidation for you, the reminder, and what's the next thing for you?

I should mention at the start that I already somewhat regret this term, "the energy body." It got coined in my mind somehow some years ago in the context of different practices, but I can't really think of a better one that's not an enormously long mouthful. So I'm staying with this for now.

I want to talk about this and introduce it as part of the practice. What are we talking about here? I want to explain why—why this particular way of paying attention to the body? You have mindfulness of body as the first foundation of mindfulness, and if you practice insight meditation, you're saturated in that. So why this approach? I want to address that question and talk about what it is and how you can work with it.

If we address the "what" first, there are perhaps two levels of definition or description: a narrow one and then a larger one.

In the narrow or smaller definition, what do we mean by the energy body? I would say it's actually a kind of attention. I'm putting it more in the subjective rather than in the object—you understand? It's a range of ways of paying attention that feel or sense the whole bodily experience as a kind of field of energy or vibration or texture.

When I pay attention in a certain way to the space of the body, it opens up differently to this sense of a field—of energy, vibration, texture—which is slightly different than if I pay mindful attention to, say, the sensation of my knuckles. We're all used to that. So we're talking about something different in this smaller definition.

Let's play with this a little bit. Come into a meditation posture. With the energy body, posture is actually quite important at first—it will help you access this sense initially. Later it becomes less important. Find a posture that's comfortable, relatively relaxed but upright. Already in the posture itself, there's a tone and energy reflected in the physical posture of openness, relative energization, uprightness, and balance. Find a posture right now that has those qualities inherent in the physicality of it.

First, you can connect with the sensations of contact, of sitting, in the usual way. Then, when you've established that connection, open up the space. Open up the space of awareness just a little bit bigger than the whole space that your body occupies—the whole physical space that your body occupies. Rather than paying attention to one point or several points in the body, we're opening up a whole space of attention, just a little bit bigger than the body space.

What happens if I just dwell with that more open, spacious awareness—or relatively open? I just feel: what does it feel like in that space? The attention is kind of light and receptive, a delicate attention. What is the experience? If I use words like vibration or texture or energy, sometimes just doing this—just opening up the attention this way—I already have a sense of something. It's somehow related to the uprightness of the body, the symmetry of the body, the openness of the body. So it can be quite subtle when we talk about energy.

Now what happens—and this will happen a gazillion times—is that the awareness, the attention, will shrink from this relatively open space. It does that for lots of different reasons: often when we get distracted, when there's contraction, just out of habit. So expect it to shrink, and then just open it up again to that same size and remain sensitive to the feeling in that space.

It's okay right now if you don't actually feel anything, but just inhabit that space with awareness, with sensitivity, with receptivity. Keep opening it, keep stretching it, because it will collapse many, many times.

What happens right now if you sit a little more uprightly than you usually sit? You're not forcing anything, but you're opening the body so the spine is erect. There's almost like a line you can imagine of energy from the base—the tailbone, or even beneath the body—up through the center, perhaps out the top of the head.

And you're attentive to the whole space—very delicate, receptive attention to whatever is going on there.

What happens now, if you feel okay with it, gently beginning to breathe long and slow, deep breaths without moving a lot of air. So actually you don't have to take huge gulps of air with this, but just let the breath be long and slow and smooth, and let it fill that space.

Find a long, slow breath that's comfortable, and how does it feel? How does it ripple through? How does it expand or contract, or what happens in the space of the body when you do that with the breath? How does the energy, how does the felt sense, the vibration move or change or is informed by this long, slow breath? Opening up the body with the breath and opening the awareness to the whole body, that whole space.

So let the breath be long and slow but still comfortable. And if you want, what happens if you imagine—or feel even—the breath coming in at the solar plexus and entering the body instead of the usual way we think about it, through the nostrils and the mouth? Coming in at the solar plexus, and then—it's really okay to imagine this and just see what happens—the breath going both up and down the body at the same time, coming into the solar plexus and moving up and down in two lines from that solar plexus: up into the head, maybe even out the top of the head, and down to the feet.

And with the out-breath, it retraces those two paths and out of the solar plexus, out of the front of the body. Keep opening the awareness and feeling in. Long, slow, smooth, comfortable breath. We're feeling, imagining the breath energy in the whole body space, radiating out from this point at the solar plexus where the breath energy comes in, radiating out up and down, and then reversing out with the out-breath, opening the body, letting the energy open up the sense of the energy body.

So I'm moving very quickly here just to give you a little taster if possible. You could keep the breath if you like, or you can let it go at this point. What happens if you imagine this space that we're calling the energy body a little bit bigger than your physical body—that whole space—what happens if you imagine it as a cloud of light?

And if you're not visual, that doesn't matter either. It's just a cloud of energy that's somehow radiant. Use your imagination, but you're feeling into it as well, feeling into what that imagination does to the sense of the body, the sense of that space. Here's my body as cloud of light—perhaps white or gold or any color that feels right for you.

And again, stretching the space when it collapses, opening up again and again and again. Opening, opening, opening. Mind has a habit to contract, so just opening again and inhabiting, filling that whole space with delicate, sensitive awareness. Bright awareness.

Whatever you experience is really fine. No pressure here. But if we again move on a little bit, and if you have been using the breath, let it go now. You're still attentive, stretching this whole space.

And what happens if this space is imagined as the source of loving-kindness, the source of metta? So perhaps with that light, perhaps just with the sense of the space, and it's bathing, bathing all parts of itself and radiating out goodwill, metta, loving-kindness—the energy body as radiant metta, source of metta.

Keep opening that awareness, that sensitivity to the whole space. And when you're ready you can open your eyes.

So as I'll explain, these are just some of the things you can play with—just a small few ideas that can help to open things up or get a sense of it. The energy body will also, if you like, express or reflect the emotions. So sometimes it doesn't feel like a radiant cloud of metta. It doesn't feel open, energized. It feels there's a twist in it or it's contracted. This is completely normal. This is completely what we expect. Absolutely. This is really important to see.

Actually, another reason—we'll talk about it more tomorrow—for emphasizing the energy body is it's a really good place to become aware of and to work with emotions, both lovely emotions—metta and joy and peace and appreciation—and also the difficult emotions where we get contracted. So as you pay more attention to this, you'll become aware of different flows of energy, of different kinds of texture, and different kinds of blocks and contractions. It's all just part of the everyday life of the energy body. Absolutely. So come back to that later.

So that's, if you like, the small description. It's just, as I said, this kind of attention that feels, if you like, in terms of a field of energy, of vibration or texture.

Why? Why do this? As I said, that's a question I wanted to address. Lots of reasons actually, but just to touch on, list them very briefly. When a meditator enters into deeper states of what we call samadhi, or like jhana, or that kind of real harmonization, collectedness, unification that the Buddha talked about in absorption, it's basically a state of the energy body.

This is essentially what the experience entails. One becomes fused with that state, open to it, relishing it, enjoying it, intimate with it. So this way of working is almost like gently moving in that direction anyway. It establishes an inclination, a natural leaning toward these deeper states.

This approach proves very helpful in developing samadhi—cultivating well-being in this field, right here in this body, as a source of nourishment and resource.

It can also be extremely useful in metta practice, either as a source of the loving-kindness itself—doing metta more from the body and from the energy rather than from phrases—or as an indicator telling you when you're on track with practices like metta. You'll sense, "Oh yes, that's the attitude, that's the intention," and recognize when you're less aligned.

This kind of attention to what we're calling the energy body becomes extremely helpful in insight practices as well. It serves as an indicator here too. When there is letting go—which is the very function of insight practice, to let go right here, right now—you feel it in the energy body. It's reflected there. So you can discern, "Oh, what I'm doing right now, this way of looking, this is helping. I can feel it. I feel it viscerally in the field."

As I mentioned, this sensitivity also applies to working with emotions. They're reflected and expressed in the space of the body. There can be tremendous subtlety and skill in working with this, which we'll explore more deeply another time.

Regarding imaginal practice, opening to this kind of sense of the body helps the experience become, instead of mere papañca or daydream or obsession or fixation with a certain image, what we call erotic imaginal—which moves in the direction of soul-making. It's one of the essential ingredients. This kind of attention and sensitivity to the body helps the experience open up to become more soul-making. It helps what could be craving transform into eros.

If I have cravings and bring my whole energy body awareness to them, it can help the craving become eros. It can help what we might call papañca become imaginal. So it serves as a really helpful ingredient.

Again, it's indicative. Pay attention to this body—it tells me when there's a sense of soul-making occurring, and that becomes my guide. An image might seem like a waste of time to my mind, but my body says, "Hmm, I can feel that doing something," and I trust that sensing.

The energy body possesses this sensitivity that serves as a helpful indicator. When there is an imaginal image, it's very quickly reflected in the energy body. There comes a kind of coherence, a harmonization, an organization, an opening and an energizing. When something is truly imaginal, it has an immediate effect on both the energy body and the mind. If the mind was scattered, something shifts and settles.

What this means is that paying attention in this way to the field, to the energy body, supports the imaginal. And conversely, the imaginal opens up the energy body and helps it. They feed each other mutually.

You'll also discover at some point that images can arise through the energy body itself—rather than the image being something out there that I am looking at, this body actually becomes image, or the image bursts through the body. I become an image via the bodily experience.

So this addresses some of the "why." None of this will be possible—or would be much less accessible—if we don't first hold the body still and pay attention in this particular way. None of these indicators would be available to us.

There are some practices where one lets the body move spontaneously in meditation with a flow of energy. I was involved in such approaches many years ago. But if you do too much of that, then none of these indicators I'm describing—none of the help for soul-making, the indicating function for samadhi—none of that will happen. It may be wonderful as its own practice, but if we want to develop soul-making and related practices, I would encourage not pursuing that approach.

Instead, the body remains still and poised with this sensitivity, so I can feel the flows or expansions or whatever is happening energetically. We'll talk about movement and soul-making as the retreat progresses, but for now, keeping the body still and developing this sensitivity rather than engaging spontaneous movement would be tremendously beneficial.

One implication of this is that when you're doing imaginal practice, working with images, because it harmonizes and opens and energizes and creates coherence in the energy body, you might find yourself working with an image when it's as if a fork presents itself on the path right there in meditation. Here's this image with a sense of soul-making, and simultaneously there's a sense that the energy body feels quite lovely—coherent and aligned and harmonized.

So the fork in the path becomes: I could, if I choose at that point, lean toward emphasizing more the feeling of the energy body. I could actually put more weight there and let the image either dissolve completely or recede into the background.

And I'm more getting into this sense of harmonization and good feeling and well-being in the energy body. Then I'm going more in the samadhi direction. Or the other fork is I prioritize the image and I'm just enjoying and noticing and being aware of how the energy body feels, but the image and the soul-making sense with the image is what's priority. So there's a choice—a little bit this way, a little bit that way. And you can develop control over all this.

I'm going to say something for some of you who are already quite experienced with all this. I was talking to someone a few weeks ago and she said, "Well, this image comes and often what happens is I just spontaneously go into this kind of space of lovely energy oneness and the image just disappears." So there's a kind of habit there of moving towards this really lovely sort of melting into oneness, a kind of samadhi state with this person. It's not wrong, but it's just a certain path. If that's the only thing that ever happens, then that's going to be problematic.

So what happens if an image arises and it gives rise—births together with it—a sense of nice energy in the energy body, and then instead of just melting into that, we actually let the energy itself become image for the self? So we have an image then—it's this twoness. We're not melting, we're not unifying, which would be the usual direction of samadhi. We're actually keeping a twoness. There's this energy, and there's the sense of self. And that can become image. It's like, what's the sense of the blessing of this energy in relation to the self? What's the imaginal sense? A bit like we did with that chant last night. Then the whole thing can become imaginal and not just collapse into a samadhi thing.

One more thing. For those of you who have a lot of experience with this, it may not make sense to some, but what is it to take the whole thing to another level and sometimes see the energy as imaginal? I'm not even going to explain what that means. I'm just throwing it out there. What does it mean to actually relate to the energy as imaginal? This perception is imaginal.

So there's a little bit of the why, and I gave the more narrow definition. If we say what would be a broader definition—which I'd like to open up now, just for the sake of making more sense and more space in the teachings—in the larger description or definition of what we mean by energy body, you could say there are three interrelated aspects to it.

Again, energy body means a kind of poise of attention, a kind of attitude, a way of looking and of conceiving. That, number one, feels—just as in the more narrow definition—feels the body as a field of energy, of vibration, of texture. So that's the first aspect. Same as the smaller definition.

Second is a conceiving right then of the body that does not limit it to the usual modern Western conception of body, which is either a kind of scientific materialist conception of molecules and atoms and tissues and all that, or the usual sort of "I'm too fat, too thin, too ugly, too this, too that"—the kind of way we appraise the body fed by the more superficial levels of our culture. So there's a conceiving going on. It's part of what we talk about as energy body, but it's not a limiting conceiving. Within that, you can have all kinds of different conceptions of the body. We're not limiting it to this or that.

And the third aspect—so you've got the felt sense, the conception, and the third aspect is an image of the body. So right now, even if you shut your eyes, it's not necessarily an imaginal image, but it's just, well, in my case, I've seen my body and I sort of see a shape. I can see I've got these maroon trousers on, I've got my legs—it's just a shape. There's an image, there's a form sense of the body.

So these three aspects of what we could call bodily awareness—felt sense, conception or idea, and image or form sense—what I want to do is say all that opens hugely wide. The conception we usually have of what a body is, we don't narrow it down to any one conception. At any moment, it might be anything. And the image one might have of one's body and the felt sense—the range there is huge.

And what I really want to encourage, when we say energy body now, what we mean is the opening of that range of experience and sense and conception and image of body. Does it make sense? It's a much bigger definition. And suddenly the whole territory is vast in terms of experience. So that's really what I want to encourage.

Now, whatever nice nugget of a term someone can come up with—let's say energy body for now. Someone asked me a few months ago, "You talk about energy body and it's great and I really like it, etc. Why do you never mention the chakras? I've never heard you say anything about the chakras." And someone might be hearing all this energy body thing and think, "Okay, I get all that."

If you investigate the teachings of chakras, you'll see that systems vary quite significantly—the colors, how many chakras there are, where they're located, what geometry accompanies each one. When we use the term "energy body," the experience we have of body is dependent on the way of looking, just like anything, actually. The experience we have is dependent on the way of looking.

We're not talking about energy body as some kind of independently existing objective reality—as if it's like this: if you get it right, you'll see this, and then the next stage is, you understand? It's a different conception entirely. This underpins everything we're doing. While this might sound a bit abstract right now, this understanding will open up the territory enormously—the territory of experience. What we call energy bodies are dependent on mind in many, many ways.

In philosophical language, we're talking about a phenomenological approach, which means I go by experience rather than preconceived ideas. It's a certain stance that allows a much wider range, opening up whole realms of experience, of possible experience, including in the imaginal sense of the body.

When I first introduced this term "energy body," I was really trying to help people move toward samadhi. For that purpose, it points toward more etheric, open senses—very light, tingly, that sort of thing. Energy body is quite helpful for pointing in that direction because it naturally implies those qualities. We're including that, and we're also including the normal, humdrum, everyday experience of the body as just one particular window in the whole range of wavelengths available to us.

I could be sitting here having an experience of the body as dense, hot sand. There's an image there, a very particular idea of body, and there's a felt sense of that heat and density—and it's blissful in its own way. I could be a pterodactyl in flight. There's an image, obviously, so image and energy and felt sense all wrapped up into one, carrying with it a certain experience. I might be sitting here—no one else can see the pterodactyl—but it's an alive energy-body-imaginal experience.

My body might become fire. My body is fire. My body might experience flows and lines of energy of all kinds. My body might be just a field, a relatively amorphous field of energy. It might somehow become a geometrical constellation of mystical primordial elements—earth, air, fire, water. How does that feel?

What about if the image I have is: I am music. I am music. If you ask me who I am, what my deepest identity is—or yours—I am music. What does that image sense, this strange image sense, do to the sense of body?

I think I shared once how the birds outside my window felt like they were weaving and healing my energy body. That's a particular kind of idea, a particular kind of image with a particular kind of felt sense that accompanies it. Or perhaps a flock of ravenous wild birds devouring my body—it's an image sense that comes with a whole feeling.

Or my erotic, imaginal beloved is there, looking at me. We're looking at each other and she's breathing, and where her breath comes toward my body, flowers grow out of my body. The exquisite bliss of that, the exquisite tender healing—this is all energy body, image beginning to amalgamate, concepts stretched.

All of this includes, as I said, felt sense, implicit idea or concept—what we're calling logos—and imaginal sense, image sense. Sometimes it won't be imaginal. There's an infinite possible range here—infinite, endless. Endless creation and discovery in this felt sense, what we might call an expanded version of mindfulness of the idea and the image of the body.

As I said, this includes the very normal sense, the very conventional everyday sense. It includes the modernist, scientific materialist idea—absolutely, why not? It's just part of the whole range, along with an image of the body that, as I mentioned, is not imaginal but just a kind of internal picture of this form.

When we talk about energy, and indeed when we talk about images, human beings often seem tempted to bring in very quickly a kind of realist perspective. "Aha, this is now the truth, this is a certain deeper level of truth, or this is the reality." And then we bring to the whole endeavor the usual tendency to seek social agreement. We look for corroboration. Who sees this energy body experience as I do? You've got these chakras, you've got these phenomena. This is the way we usually think about reality – it's real if we all agree, or if enough people agree. The outliers can be dismissed. If enough people agree, then that's a validation. We think, okay, this must be real.

But I'm not interested in that approach. It's a different thing we're talking about, and a whole range of different possibilities will open up because of that shift. We're not interested in social corroboration of so-called independently existing realities. If we bring that realist perspective, if we stay too attached to it, somehow this whole practice we're doing, this whole art, will get off on the wrong foot. It will prevent things from opening up as much as they could – certainly with the energy body, but also with the imaginal and the soul-making practices.

This means certain experiences won't open up, certain senses won't open up, and certain whole conceptual possibilities won't emerge. As I mentioned last night, our very ideas of the self, of the world, of the mind, of the goal – where are we going with all this, where can we go – if there's too much attachment to realism, the whole endeavor gets constrained. There will be some attachment to realism – it's just part of being human – but if there's too much, it's like we get off on the wrong foot and the whole thing doesn't open up sufficiently. What we're talking about – this whole soul-making dynamic, certain kinds of sacredness – won't be as available.

Let me pull out again one element of what I said. There's an idea, or we could say we use a certain language, a logos or concept of the body that is often implicit at any time – an understanding of what the body is. There's an implicit idea we carry, often without thinking it consciously. It's an element of the energy body experience.

So yes, if you know certain systems, we can experience the meridians, the acupressure and acupuncture meridians. If you know that system, we can experience chakras, we can experience certain kinds of sheaths of the energy field that many people call the subtle body or the etheric body. All of this is often connected with healing paradigms and certain kinds of healing work. That's all wonderful and valuable. We can experience all of that.

But in this kind of approach, in this pushing the boat out, we're not taking any one of those systems as an objective, independent truth – nor the scientific materialist view either. There's something about the whole underpinning idea of this soul-making work that allows concepts and ideas to expand their range and become enormously flexible. Eventually, we can simply decide to have a very different idea about this experience right now. You can see it in the conventional way, you can see it in all kinds of ways.

What emerges is an enormous flexibility with the kinds of ideas that actually shape perception, that direct and open or close or limit our experience. That's part of where we're going with this. The beauty and facility of being flexible with ideas is fundamental to this work. It's part of what we're calling the phenomenological approach.

So back to the question of purpose. I touched on this earlier, but the purpose of practicing with the energy body is not to try to achieve a state where the energy body always feels open and harmonized and pleasant and bright and energized. That's not the purpose. It won't happen anyway – it's impossible – and it's not what we're doing.

To take this further, the main point of this kind of practice with the energy body, or imaginal practice, or emptiness practice, or samadhi practice, is not healing – unless by healing we mean something much, much wider than we usually mean. What does it mean to heal perception? If healing means opening and not being rigid about "this is reality," if soul-making means healing and healing means soul-making, then perhaps. But conventional healing is not the primary thing we're doing here. It might be part of what we're doing – absolutely, and at times there may be more emphasis on that aspect – but there's something else at work.

If I use the phrase "fullness of intention," part of what really galvanizes and opens this whole practice is not limiting our intention for what we're trying to do or why we're doing it. Soul-making will, to borrow Mary's term again, break through whatever intentions we have for this practice – whether it's healing, getting the energy body just right, or whatever else. It will expand beyond those boundaries.

There's something profound that happens when I come to these practices with this fullness of intention. The intention is not for personal growth or development. It's not even to have less suffering. What happens when I have a real fullness of intention – and is that even possible? It's not that common, not that easy.

What does it mean to practice not for me? What does it mean to practice for soul, for soul-making, to practice for the divine, for the sake of the divine? So there's a possibility here of opening up the ideas of why we're doing this. Yes, healing can happen. Yes, a kind of beautiful re-visioning and re-feeling of my history and my hurts and my difficulties—all that can happen. Something more opens up if there's the fullness, if there's that openness of intention.

We really want to encourage this. We said before, if we talk about energy, we're really talking about a huge range—actually an infinite, endless range of possibilities. That's what we would like to encourage: this openness to possibilities of sense, of experience, of conception, and also of intentions.

This takes time, everything that we're talking about. Even just this felt sense—and you might have sensed, "I'm not sure I feel anything, I don't know," when we did that little exercise just half an hour ago—it takes time. And expect it to take time. And that's really, really okay.

So people have different backgrounds with this, and as Catherine said, different kinds of tendencies or whatever. I think it's really, really worth it. It takes time, but it's such a wonderful investment to develop these kinds of sensitivities and awarenesses and skills. It will really help imaginal soul-making practice, as I said, and other practices too.

Is it necessary? I actually don't think so. Jung and people like James Hillman—I don't think they had a clue about this kind of thing. It wasn't integrated into their way of working, and probably you'd never hear them talk about their bodily experience when they describe their work. Lots of soul-making going on there, in certain directions and stuff. So I don't think it's necessary.

And of course there's loads of Dharma that doesn't do anything remotely like this. It's really about very different kinds of sensations that we all know about. But if you want to—and we are encouraging it as part of this kind of art that we're trying to open up—then the development of that, the journey, does take time. It's a journey of opening up this range, opening up the range of experience.

And part of that range will include what I alluded to earlier: the relative sense at any time of solidity or density of the body and ethereality or insubstantiality. So normal for Western people is not to feel any kind of sense of ethereal lightness. For some people here, it might be the more normal one, and it would be good to explore the more dense, solid range. But really we're talking about the whole thing opening up.

One last thing. So opening up that range is part of the journey—opening up the range in lots of different ways. But also opening up, and again gradually in time when we feel ready, how much energy we can experience. So it's not at all to say more is better, or the direction is we're going towards kundalini explosions or anything. Not at all. It's just that sometimes a person has developed in their life, in their personality, and also in their bodily experience, where the range of energy is actually quite limited. They're completely normal, well integrated into society, have a very functional and beautiful life, lots of sensitivities, but actually the range of what can be felt here, how much energy, is actually limited. And that has all kinds of knock-on limitations.

So sometimes, you know, this little exercise we did with the long breath—that's one of the ways of actually experiencing more energy in the body. Sometimes people are very resistant to it, partly because it takes a little getting used to, but partly because there's a resistance to feeling more energy. Actually, you're opening up the body and just...

So I put that out as well in the mix of what might be involved in the gradual path of opening all this up and developing. And then the skills to work with the energy body and open up things and that sort of thing.

Okay, so today, I think if we can, in your practice, as you move through the day, you can lean more towards the intention for samadhi, for well-being. So it's working with the energy body as primary, but the real kind of gentle intention is just to feel this space here as a kind of space of well-being, of energization, of harmonization, and just dwelling with that and enjoying it. Does that make sense?

Now, images may arise, and that's fine, but if you can just hold that very lightly as a kind of background emphasis of attention for today. As I said, even if an image arrives, you'll notice that there's the sense in the energy body of the harmonization, etc., that comes with something when it's imaginal. And then you can just be aware of that, include that. So we're developing familiarity, awareness, sensitivity with this kind of attention.

And we're also developing the skill in a certain direction. That's the emphasis.

Through this gentle cultivation of samadhi, we begin to recognize how the energy body responds to different qualities of attention. We develop sensitivity to the subtle shifts that occur when we orient toward well-being, toward harmonization, toward that spacious sense of vitalization that emerges naturally when we allow it. This is not a forcing or a striving, but rather a patient development of familiarity with these more refined dimensions of our experience.

As you continue with this practice, notice how this quality of attention begins to inform other aspects of your day. The same gentle intention that brings harmonization to the energy body can be carried into your interactions, your work, your moments of rest. You're cultivating not just a meditation technique, but a way of being that recognizes the possibility of well-being as an ever-present potential.

This development of skill moves us gradually toward greater ease, greater capacity for presence, and deeper access to the nourishing dimensions of consciousness itself. Through this patient cultivation, we discover that samadhi is not something we achieve, but something we allow—a natural flowering of awareness when the conditions are supportive and our intention is aligned with wisdom.

Thank you for listening.

Trust, Ethics, Image (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 34 min

> In this Q&A session from his Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma series, Rob Burbea responds to profound questions about navigating difficult energies and ethical concerns in imaginal practice. Participants ask about working with aggressive impulses that feel uncontrollable, the fear of energetic impact on others, and engaging with images that seem to contradict personal ethics—particularly those involving desires for worship or power.
> Burbea emphasizes that the very presence of ethical concern and intelligent doubt signals spiritual health. He introduces the crucial concept of the "middle way of the imaginal"—understanding that images are simultaneously "me and not me," "real and not real." This neither-nor quality creates spacious possibility rather than narrow constraint. When aggressive or sexual energies become truly imaginal rather than merely imaginative, they gain sacred dimensionality and mystery, requiring less compulsive acting out.
> Central to this teaching is developing trust in the imaginal process through attention to the energy body's responses rather than initial mental judgments. Burbea explains how soul naturally seeks to see and be seen as sacred, making apparent ego-inflation actually an expression of divine recognition when held imaginally. He advocates for patient cultivation of this trust, allowing grace to unfold rather than forcing imaginal development, while maintaining ethical sensitivity and care for one's spiritual development.

Very violent things emerge, and in some way I can deal with it through the spirit of metta. Often these energies overflow into something that feels uncontrollable or uncontrolled, and I can get back to center—I can inhibit and work towards metta again. But I'm wondering how to play around with this a little, because it feels somehow like not inhibiting at times might allow the energy to flow more freely. Yet there's some fear. And also, sometimes it feels very real, like with people around. Sometimes I see things when things happen—I'm not sure.

"You see things where things happen?"

Yes, I see things in my imagination—streams of energy that push somebody in a direction, and suddenly they'll start walking and do something. But I don't know if...

Let me see if I can summarize and capture the gist of what you're asking. This is about aggression and perhaps relates to what we explored with movement and what I discussed this morning. There's concern and fear because you recognize a lot of what feels like aggressive energy inside, and you're unsure whether it's controllable. So there's a wanting to inhibit it at times, and a wanting to practice metta as an alternative to divert that energy.

And then the last part—sometimes you're unsure if your state of consciousness and energy is affecting other people in a real way.

Yes, particularly with respect to that aggression, because I wouldn't want that to have a negative impact on people.

Thank you. These are really important questions. The first thing to say is that the very fact of you asking and having this concern is a really good sign—a sign of health. This kind of intelligent doubt indicates that these are things you care about. You want to do what's best, what's healthy, what's right. That in itself I read as a very good sign. It's a good way to approach any of this work—with a dose of healthy, intelligent doubt and discrimination.

If that concern wasn't there and you were reporting all kinds of uncontrollable aggression, then something else would need to come in. But the fact of doubt and concern is a really good sign.

This, and probably sexual eros as well, are two areas where we understandably have a lot of concern. There are many answers or responses we could explore outside of the soul-making paradigm—practicing metta and all kinds of other approaches. But I think within the soul-making paradigm, this becomes more nuanced to realize.

When the sexual arises—when I have attraction to someone and it becomes very real—it's definitely possible to work with this within the soul-making paradigm, but not necessarily easy, especially at first when you haven't fully grasped what it means for something to be imaginal. I know what imagination means—I can feel energy in my body and all that. But as I said this morning, this word "imaginal" has quite a richness and dimensionality to it.

When that dimensionality begins to open out—that fullness of what it means to be imaginal—it's almost like it opens up more space for something. For instance, aggression can become imaginal and holy. And the more imaginal and holy it becomes—or sexual eros, attraction to someone who's unavailable or simply the wrong person to be attracted to in the wrong situation—the more space there is.

The normal impulse we have as careful, sensitive human beings is to try and rein all that energy in. That's a valuable avenue, and we need to be able to do that. In time, with these practices, there's the possibility of letting the thing become more imaginal.

In the case of aggression, oftentimes it's structured as "I" as subject—the person with physical power and intent to destroy something. With sexual eros, we can let the object, let that person, become more imaginal. What does that mean? They become more than flatly human. They become full of dimensions, complexities, mystery, an unfathomable beyond. As all that begins to fill out, it creates more folds and spaces in which the eros can be contained.

If the eros is not contained, it has to spill out into action—we have to have that person, we have to concretize some kind of relationship or sexual action. I'm not saying that's wrong or right, but when there's not that amplitude, that dimensionality of the imaginal, then the eros or aggression or energy has to act out on a flat material level.

This is not a basic teaching at all. I have to say, I think it's really possible, though not necessarily easy. But the more we get a sense of what it means for something to be imaginal—what is that constellation of qualities and aspects and relationships—the more we trust that wherever there's dukkha, it can be made holy by becoming imaginal, by being sensed with soul. Wherever there's eros and attraction—"I want that person, I need to have sex with them"—it can also be held. It doesn't have to be acted out.

Similarly with aggression—it has, if you like, a holy dimension that we're not really taught about in this culture, whether with aggression or with sexuality. But it becomes accessible more and more. And when that space opens up, it's like more space, less pressure. You understand? Like a gas—there's more space, there's less pushing that it has to do something constantly.

But as I said, I don't think this is certainly not what I would—that's not a beginning sort of practice at all. It takes quite a lot to do that. And there are plenty of people in this room who have a lot of energy and have a lot of eros and have a lot of—you could say, from a certain psychological perspective, which is not the normal sense, the gods are knocking loudly, asking for something from them. And there's no conceptual framework to hold or to even regard that energy that moves in any kind of way that gives it any more sanctity or depth. There are many people in this room right now who have that kind of psyche. And it's difficult. It's an art, really, to learn to open that up to different possibilities.

So I definitely don't think it's the easiest thing, but I do think it's possible. And probably the way it comes is really, as I said, just getting more and more of a sense gradually of what it means for something to be imaginal. What's that experience? What's that relationship? And slowly we begin to trust that more and more.

In loads of interviews, someone presents something and there's just so much difficulty there. By this point, it's not that I would always use the imaginal as how I relate to looking at something, but I have, by this point, a trust in me that whatever it is, there is an imaginal way. There's a way it can open up imaginally that will redeem it, that will give it these holy roots, that will create less difficulty with it.

What to do right now, I don't know, because we haven't so much spoken about practice, so I don't know quite where yet. But it might be more a matter of leaving that aggressive thing aside a little bit, and concentrating more on just what ways the imaginal does come, and what ways you can get a sense of it.

Probably if you have a lot of aggression—or a lot of people with a lot of sexual eros or whatever—it might be that you see this is characteristic of images that arise for me. So I've shared in talks that I used to get a warrior image or different kinds of soldier images. And I can really see I have that in me—I'm a warrior, but not on a physical level at all.

Once that becomes an image and I kind of sense the holiness in it and the sense of what my duty is to that and the sense of it being neither real nor not real—that's really key, the reification piece—this is neither real nor not real, and it gets refracted into my life, not in an obvious way. So the warrior, for me, manifests in all kinds, has manifested in all kinds of ways. I've never hit anyone, I'm not interested in physical violence, etc., but it manifests. It refracts in a not obvious way, and part of allowing it to do that is getting a whole sense of what it means for something to be imaginal, which also includes this neither real nor not real thing.

So it might be just growing more in the sense, getting more accustomed to the sense of what it feels like and what the experience is of something being imaginal, and you begin to trust it more. But I would probably guess that in the process of that happening, some of the images that come will involve power or aggression or that kind of thing. And you will see in meditation, the mind goes, "Oh, I don't know, this can't be right, I don't trust this." Very normal, and again, good response, healthy response.

This is where I go back to things like trusting more the energy body sense. So let's say I have an image of some stomping warrior-like figure, or something, who seems full of power and energy and ready—he could destroy anything, it seems. "I don't trust this, it doesn't feel very peaceful," etc., is what my mind says. But I check my body, and lo and behold, there's this kind of alignment. It doesn't feel agitated in any way, it feels open and harmonized. I trust that more than my initial mental response.

And then I pay more attention with just openness. And I was saying to someone earlier, you can put a ring fence around it. I'm just going to give this five minutes of trust. And after that, I'm going to go back to being suspicious of it. I'm just playing, because trust is one—and we'll talk about this—trust is one of the key ingredients in the relationship with the imaginal.

So I can just put a ring fence around it, trust it a little bit. And in that five minutes, slowly, you'll start to pick up on the soul-making, the sense of soul-making. There is something mysterious about this. Yes, there's clearly power and physical power and a capacity to destroy. Plenty of people have realized you can't create without destroying. Destruction is not as simple as it seems.

But I start to get a sense that there's more to this than what my little mind thinks it is. It's got, as I said, an inexhaustibility of meaning, an unfathomability, a mystery. There's a curious beauty to it. When these qualities are there, they're part of what it means for something to be soul-making and imaginal.

And slowly, slowly, I learned that I can trust these dimensions of experience.

When I was first exploring and developing all this, I used to have images that were sexual, or at least offered the possibility of sexuality. I had a dream where a woman was trying to seduce me. This was some years ago, when I was just beginning to explore the imaginal and discover what it might mean. My tendency, given all my practice history, was to think that can't be spiritual, so we won't engage with that.

It took me probably a few years to trust this kind of material. In this dream—or perhaps it was later in morning meditation, I can't remember—I was being my monkish sort of self, and she looked at me with tremendous love and said, "You're kind of stupid, aren't you?" She said it with such love: "You don't really get it, do you?" There was something about the way she said it, as if she were teaching me something.

So I gradually let myself trust that and realized that what appears as hindrance or defilement in the usual spiritual framework actually opens up to something much vaster when we approach it through what we mean by the erotic-imaginal. Yes, it includes the sexual and all that, but it encompasses so much more than we typically imagine.

I would say the same is potentially true of what you're calling aggression or power. But it emerges through relationship, and we have to discover it. That takes time—all of this takes time.

With all this work, you have to ask yourself: What am I ready for? What's my edge? What feels okay? What do I need to have in place? Some people just jump in at the deep end and start swimming, and that's fine. But I have to be responsible to this being and care for myself and my pacing with this material.

There was a reason—beautiful reasons—why I was so cautious. Partly it was spiritual indoctrination, but there was also, just as in your question, a concern that reflected love. It reflected my willingness not to just follow what feels good. There was much more care involved.

My hesitation came from devotion—devotion to whatever the deepest truth is, whatever the fullest spiritual learning might be. If that meant not simply indulging in something that might feel good, then that's what I would do. So my concern, my hesitation, my slowness was actually a beautiful thing. And she had to teach me in this particular way.

I don't know what the exact journey will be for you, but there's something in what you're touching.

I would never say everyone needs to do this work, or that it's the only way to address aggression or sexuality. It's just one possibility. But some of you—perhaps you already sense this—will feel a certain suspicion, a sense that you don't quite understand everything being said here, yet you feel drawn to it. You have an intuitive sense that somehow, even though you don't understand how it will work, this might be your thread. You follow that, and it does start to unfold. You begin to really trust, and the fullness and richness begins to blossom there.

Andrea asked about navigating images: "After that session, I went outside for standing meditation. At one point, with hands on my belly, an image came of a complicated pregnancy. The image was immediately beautiful as a concept—as a poet and writer, it touched me—but it wasn't fully imaginal. I just liked it.

"I tried to resonate with it, but the liquidity wasn't there. There wasn't a softness, and my relating to it still felt like relating to a concept, something rather dry. So I stopped—partly because, as a writer, I didn't want to tinker with something, didn't want to kill something that had beauty. If it's not ready to be written, it's not ready to be explored.

"Later, while walking and thinking I would ask you this question, I felt very soft and open out in the fields. Then there was a slight resonating with..."

And how a complicated pregnancy sparked something - looking at the loss of a possible unfathomable beauty that you don't yet know yet, and then immediate tears and immediate soulfulness, meaningfulness in that moment.

So then there was a knowing that something had aligned, and then a continued walking trying to almost resonate more or pull out more dimensionality. And they're wondering, oh, should I just have left it alone and stayed with that sense of just that beauty? So I guess this is just to express that the navigation of these things is - I seem to have a sense when it charges or when there's that feeling of soulfulness. But then it feels very clumsy, the trying to draw out more and more dimensions.

Can I briefly sum it up? Drez is asking - sometimes, in this case, what happened was a concept arose, or just words in the mind, and they seemed like they were full of imaginal potential, or even creative potential as a writer. But it wasn't really going to that kind of juicy, full, resonant sense. But later, the added idea or sense of not just a complicated pregnancy, but of a mystery that could have been born but then was missed and not accessed, not opened to - and that idea touched a lot and felt full of soul. But then wondering if you tried a little too hard to kind of put the foot on the accelerator and extract more juice.

This is really key, I think - not to put pressure on the psyche, really, and not to put pressure on images. One of the characteristics of the imaginal is a sense of grace. Grace means receiving for some unknown reason - not deserving, nothing. It just comes, it's given. So it's not the whole truth of what it means to be imaginal - it's one aspect. And sometimes with that, there's the attitude that fits a recognition of grace, which is understanding that it comes and it goes, and it blows in and out. And we're given a whole thing or half a thing or a glimpse of a thing.

So I think sometimes that attitude is really important. That relationship with a sense of grace, recognition of grace and relationship with it, is already something soul-making, potentially, and already an ingredient that, if something is ready to come, it might help.

On the other side, there are different aspects of the imaginal. And sometimes, slowly, slowly, you can get a sense of - it's a matter of noticing something. And that noticing of a characteristic there. In your example, it may be the love - love for this unborn or this loss, and maybe some mysterious love of this that was unborn for you. Maybe that love is an aspect both ways of the imaginal, or this sense of grace. You begin to slowly get a sense of what are the things I can notice here. They're already there, they're just not obvious to me yet. And that noticing draws them out, and that allows the whole thing to come alive.

But in terms of pacing, sometimes it's hard to tell. Certainly what happened was there was this initial thing that didn't seem to go. Then there was this middle stage, and there was some juice. It's a bit like what I said this morning - there's some soul-making right there in the richness and the juice of that, and maybe to linger there and let that do its work on the heart. Heartfulness is part of soulfulness, definitely. So let that do its work on the heart and the energy body without rushing to ask, "Okay, what's next?"

There was already plenty of juice there. It's a matter of resonating with it, and that's a big part of what I said this morning about tuning and resonating and letting something work on you as opposed to you working on it. Sometimes there's - none of this is fixed. Sometimes it's "let me work on it" - more active. And sometimes the poise has to be, or the tendency has to be corrected a little bit in someone to be more receptive.

So it could be that in that middle stage you're describing, there could have been more of just hanging out with this and letting it reverberate and ricochet in the being and feeling it and recognizing the beauty in that and being touched in that. And if it wants to go to another level, it will.

My question builds on the first one. I work more with images that don't share the ethics of my own life—images that act in ways I wouldn't act. This connects to something I explored a little yesterday. I feel strongly pulled to certain energies that come up frequently for me imaginally, but I'm afraid. I have a fear that as I work more with those images, when there isn't the strength of the imaginal container, that energy is strengthening in my life outside of it in ways that are totally not what I'm trying to do with my life. I'm feeling in the midst of that and curious about it.

So, energies or images?

Images. There are often images where the imaginal self is wanting worship or wanting to be worshipped. That's one of them.

Thank you. That's beautiful, and I'm really glad you said that. There's a tension between our usual culturally dominant ego psychology—our regard for what is a healthy ego and what's too much ego—and some of the things that soul-making opens up, some of the things that images open up.

When an image arises, even if I feel like I'm inside that image or I am that image, even when I'm identified with the image, there's still a sense of, well, it's me and it's not me. This is really, really important. It's part of what I meant to say this morning but didn't have time—what I call the middle way of the imaginal. It's real and it's not real, it's me and it's not me. That sense is crucial.

Even when the image is other, it's not me and it's me somehow. Tuning into that sense amplifies it. The more I notice this—that it's me and it's not me—that's part of what I call the middle way of the imaginal. It takes its place between real and not real, between me and not me.

At first it feels like walking a tightrope between those polarities. As I get more of a sense of this neither real nor not real, me and not me, this tightrope becomes actually a wide open boulevard. It feels like the most spacious place to be—in that neither real nor not real. It opens up doors. What was a narrow entranceway or pathway actually becomes huge.

Again, as we said with the bodhisattvas, it's a matter of getting a taste for this and beginning to trust it more. So it's me and it's not me. And who's the not-me part? Part of the not-me is—pick your language—the divine, the Buddha nature, the angels. Or it's soul.

It's me and it's not me, and the part of not-me is its divinity. It is soul. And I would say soul wants to be seen. Soul wants to be seen as sacred. And soul wants to see as sacred. So the wishing to be worshipped, or recognizing that worship is appropriate, or that sense of devotion—it belongs to the nature of soul sensing.

This is a very heady idea, but the more I sense this, the more comfortable I become in this me and not-me, and it's the divine. What soul yearns for mostly is to sense with soul. Soul yearns to see and be seen, to show itself and reveal itself in images, and to have the soulful response to images.

That's what soul wants. You, unfortunately—as we all are—are just instruments of soul from a certain perspective. We're vehicles for this process, amazingly delicate and very unique instruments for this process to happen.

Is this making sense? It's a very different conceptual framework, a very different way of understanding what's going on. If it remains abstract, it just doesn't make any difference. But there's a way in the practice, in the thick of the practice, where you can get the senses of these things.

Related to the earlier question, the more I sense this, the more I sense that I can trust this. It looks like something we would be suspicious of in our usual psychology—whether it's aggression or sexuality or what appears to be some kind of ego amplification. But something potentially much deeper is being played out there in the theatre. As you get a sense of that, the ego doesn't tend to identify with it so much. It doesn't need to have the thoughts of superiority or whatever, because we're tasting what is superior—we're tasting it and getting the blessing of it, but not as "me" in the usual ego sense.

Again, this might all sound very far-fetched, but at this point I absolutely trust that this is what will happen if one goes into it with all the sensitivity and care. This is what will open, as opposed to becoming more egotistical or demanding that everyone bow at your feet.

This business of trust is hard, but I think it's probably the case that most of you have this glimmer of trust in something. We tend to think from one level out—these images are mine, they reflect me, they're expressions of me—as opposed to recognizing that you are an expression of an image. Actually, you are an expression of many images, some not yet born. Your life is that. Turn everything upside down.

I'm not saying this is the truth—it's a concept. And that concept itself is a potentially soul-making concept. It's rich, it's beautiful, and it does something to the ego needs. It just does something.

Certainly there are other ways of working with ego, and Buddha Dharma is full of them, and that's great. But there's also this soul-making approach which looks like it's going in the wrong direction. But it's not, because things get filled out and amplified, given their archetypal roots, given their dimensional scope and their sacredness—and that changes everything.

It becomes about divinity, if you use that word, and not about me, or only about me insofar as I wish to somehow live and express and sense divinity. This business about fullness of intention—why am I practicing? Why am I doing this?—eventually becomes more about that level. It's what soul wants, or it's what the divine wants. And that becomes the primary reason, as opposed to me and my personal development, or anything even more grubby than that.

These things take time. It might help, me saying this, but it's really in the sensing... We're talking about ideas now, but you can sense these things in practice, and slowly, slowly, it's like: ah, there's a freedom here, a whole other dimension of freedom and possibility that we wouldn't have otherwise discovered. You have to taste it for yourself. It usually happens gradually.

Let's have a bit of quiet here.

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this innovative dharma talk, Rob Burbea introduces movement and vocalization as integral aspects of soulmaking practice. Moving beyond traditional sitting meditation, he guides practitioners through embodied exercises including warrior movements, subtle gestures, vocal expressions, and partnered witnessing practices. The teaching emphasizes two primary intentions: developing the capacity to perceive everyday movement, gesture, and voice as expressions of soul, and opening new channels for soul's manifestation through the body.
> Burbea explains how the energy body (kāya) and physical form are interconnected - when bodily channels remain closed or habituated, certain images, emotions, and spiritual experiences cannot arise. Through playful yet mindful exploration of movement and voice, practitioners begin loosening crystallized patterns that may limit the range of possible soul expressions. The session includes partner exercises in witnessing and moving, emphasizing the balance of attention between self and other while maintaining loving-kindness (mettā) as a foundation.
> This approach represents a significant departure from conventional insight meditation, integrating the body more fully into contemplative practice while maintaining careful attention to intention and sensitivity. The teaching is particularly relevant for practitioners interested in expanding their spiritual vocabulary beyond traditional sitting and walking meditation.

I want to experiment a little bit. In the past, some of you may have encountered it on the web or in person, I've talked about movement and its relationship with soul and the imaginal, and also about mudra and gesture. I gave some instructions and was encouraging the inclusion of that exploration in the larger scope of the practice we're doing here.

One of the things I said, and I want to offer it again as an instruction, is that sometimes you're practicing and there's an image. You're with that image and connected to that image and moved. The soul is moved by that image. Sometimes the image is in motion. For instance, recently I've had some images of dancers, so the image is one of movement. Or the image might not be in movement, but you feel a sense of something moving in the energy body as part of the interaction with the image.

An instruction—a totally valid, kosher part of our practice now—is that you can let it move the body, in here when we're sitting, as long as it's not too noisy. So that's a part of the practice. Or our walking periods—we could now call them movement periods. They may look like walking up and down slowly, as it usually looks in our culture, or they may look like something very different. You're letting the image be embodied with all the same sensitivity and care and mindfulness and relational nuances.

A second option, which I also mentioned when I introduced this, is that sometimes it feels more fruitful. The same thing is going on, but the physical body is completely still, and the dance is still going on. The energy body feels two things at once: it can feel this body sitting still and it can feel the movements of the dance or whatever. So the outer, so-called body is still, but the energy body is moving, and that's part of what you're paying attention to.

If you want to explore this in practice sometimes, you can do it in two ways. I would encourage you to actually do it, not always one way or the other, just to see, to experiment.

Sometimes the image is other. I have an image that I'm in relationship to, and that image is other. It might be that the movement—that image is not a moving image, it's a still image—but maybe I feel devotion, for example, towards that image. Maybe the movement that I then embody is a devotional gesture or something like that, or a gesture of receiving somehow. It could be anything.

Or sometimes when we're working with an image, you become the image. I am that dancer, or whatever it is. Then I might move in relationship to the world—the image in relationship to the world.

I want to reiterate and open up that instruction, open up that possibility. As I've talked about this in the past, I want to see what happens if we put a bit more emphasis and attention on it now and explore it a bit more.

One of the things I think I've already said on this retreat: when the soul-making gets going, it's like a fire. It will reach out and catch everything—not necessarily all at once, probably not all at once—so that different aspects and domains of our being get drawn in and involved in the soul-making. They become soulful, they become infused with eros and that whole eros-psyche-logos dynamic. One of them will be body, one of them will be movement, one will be gesture. At some point, if you pursue this kind of thing, it will start to involve every aspect of the being. Voice as well, which is something we'll play with a little bit.

When I introduced this before—I can't remember when it was, maybe two years ago—I talked about mudra, these subtle hand gestures, and I think it was perhaps not so attuned as a teaching, probably just too subtle for where a lot of people were at. That's fine—it's there floating around somewhere. Now I would like to do it in a way that's not just subtle, but also some really not very subtle stuff.

Also, and I did mention this before, it would be great if we could normalize this in the culture. When I introduced it, it was interesting how few people seemed to pick up on it. I think one of the things is just social pressure. It looks a certain way. Again, we're back into meditation habit and meditation mindset and attitude and conception, so that generally what looks normal in here is this.

Of course, when the postman comes, after all these years he thinks it's pretty weird that people are walking up and down like that or sitting still like this. So it's like how much we're shaped and constrained by culture, and can we actually start to normalize this kind of what we might call the soulfulness direction in movement? Can we normalize that in this culture? Sometimes we feel a little bit shy or it's not okay. So there's a desire for that.

Why are we doing it? What's the intention here? Actually, I would say two things primarily. I want to point this out because it can be quite easy to grab hold of these kinds of things with all kinds of other intentions, which is fine and great, but I'd like to highlight some possibilities that are a bit more honed in terms of what they're intending, what the purpose is.

One is—and I think it's really, really important, although not so dramatic—to sense and see, to have the capacity more often, more available, to sense and see everyday movements: your everyday movements, your friends' everyday movements, and gestures and voice. The capacity to sense that as soul. Moving my hand or the voice, the sound of the voice and the fact of the mystery of it—what is it to perceive movement, gesture, voice as soul? To have that as just part of the healing of perception that we're trying to open up: to sense with soul and as soul. So that's actually primary.

The second intention here is to open up the range and the channels of soul. We're not trying to—and we're going to do some exercises in a minute, movement stuff—we're not trying to kind of develop into these sort of movement artists, just able to do amazing stuff and kind of channel their soul in their movement in some wonderful way. I mean, fantastic when you witness something like that, it's just gorgeous. But that's not what we're aiming for here. If it happens, great. But it's more these two other intentions: to sense everyday movement, voice, gesture as soul, and to open up the range and channels of possibility for soul.

When we start to do this and we talk about this, it's quite a lot. Some of this, in different ways, might be a stretch for many of us in this room. So really, with all this stuff, think of it as a kind of gradual evolution. People are in very different places—their relationship with their body, their relationship with movement, all that. So it's very normal and it's really okay.

If we think about it, it's quite a big deal just to be mindful of the body, isn't it? And to be in the body and aware of what movement feels like. Most insight meditation, most of the training is either sitting still or walking up and down. So what is it to do other kinds of movements, still just have that really basic mindfulness? So that's one level. It might be that's actually the level I'm working on right now. Super, absolutely super. I just have to pitch where my edge is, where my growing is.

Then we've talked about energy body. So it might be actually to be aware of the more subtle energy body effects of certain movements. It's a slightly different thing than just the mindfulness of sensation.

Then there's a whole issue—another kind of stage or aspect of this—just what about self-consciousness and social anxiety if you have to wiggle in a certain way in public or whatever it is. So that's a whole territory or level that might be an edge and might be just, "Oh, this is what I'm looking into with this."

Just having a connection between self and movement—I don't know if you can see this—for some people there's a very direct connection with self-movement; for other people it's much more blocked, it doesn't flow, there's something a little constrained there. Wherever we're at with this, whatever reasons and history, it's really fine, but these are all different aspects of what we can be slowly looking at, opening up.

Another aspect is the freedom to move, the fluidity. Again, you can see sometimes it's really there—a person is very fluid in their body and free to move in different ways—sometimes they're not there. And it's really perfect, whatever it is, and there's room to grow.

And what is it to be able to express with movement and through movement? There's starting to be more of a connection with soul there. And then as I said, what is it to sense with soul and as soul? To actually sense movement imaginatively—my movement, your movement, whoever. And there's a possibility of becoming soul movement artists or something. That's not what we're aiming for.

I really want to say, so it's kind of like there are pitches here. Everyone's different. We've all got very different histories with this, different practices. So wherever you are, it's good.

It's really okay. There's going to be something for each of us to learn and explore, wherever we are in our practice.

So why don't we play with this a little bit? I should mention that I'm not going to be doing the movements myself—I've done something to my ribs and back and need to be really careful at the moment. But in a way that's a teaching, because for anyone who feels that certain movements are not okay for your body, just either don't do them or find a movement that somehow seems related or similar that works for your body. Really don't damage anything.

And also, if something feels like just a bit too much of a stretch for the soul, that's okay too. Either leave it for now or come back to it later, whatever feels right.

So why don't we start by moving the mats to the side again, and then we'll see what we can do here. If we can be somewhat spread out in the room—given the number of people, just the maximum possible space between us, which isn't very much, but still. You'll have to excuse me; I'm just going to either sit or stand for this since I don't feel my body is able to participate in the movements at the moment.

Let's start with just feeling the connection with the ground. Feel the whole body. Is there the possibility—feeling your body—to feel your body is blessed, whatever the condition of your body: health-wise, appearance-wise, skill-wise? You sense your body is blessed.

Maybe begin by doing a few of those sort of tai chi twists, where you swing your arms. They don't have to be wide swinging—just to loosen the body a little bit. Then whatever movements your body needs to do right now to loosen up, bring mindfulness there. Let the whole body be filled with awareness, just feeling what this feels like.

There's always some problem or other with the body, so it's never going to be perfect.

Exercise number one—or rather, game number one. You're drunk. You're completely plastered, off your rocker. And you're walking around the room. This is actually just a bit more of a loosener. See how much you can give yourself to being totally blotto. How does that show itself in the movements? Just get into it as much as you can, wandering around, using the whole space. Take care not to harm each other.

Can drunk people get excited about something? At least for as many moments before they forget what it is they're excited about. How would such a person move?

Beautiful, beautiful. And now—with the magic of the mindfulness bell—this drunken lout is transformed into mindful stillness.

Beautiful. That was really great. Let's take just a few breaths.

Hard work being drunk.

Let's take just a few breaths. Feel the feet. Feel the whole body. Let the breath come and go, animating the body, giving its blessings to the body, receiving breath. Can you feel this body is blessed? Can you know this body is blessed?

Now for a second exploration. I might need someone to demonstrate this. What is it to engage in a movement where the body expresses something or is carried by something where there's ferocity, power, courage—all the energy and intention flowing through the legs? Squatting, connecting with the earth. There's power coming from the belly and from the root. There's strength, and the body is expressing this courage and ferocity and power.

That's good. It's actually scary, you know? It's intended to show—it's a warrior. Maybe that's a way of putting it. The whole body expresses this. It's a lot in the body and the hips and the belly, feeling that connection, that power. It's really about power and strength and this unmovable warrior determination.

It also comes out through the mouth. The tongue comes out like those gargoyles or tantric wrathful deities—in the tongue, in the voice, the throat, everything's coming out. The chest, the whole body is involved. And the eyes—can you see that? The whole body is channeling something, embodying something, expressing something.

You can do this in cycles—do it a little bit and then pause, then do it again. If you feel more comfortable doing it facing a wall, just do it that way. You might prefer not to have anyone watch you, or you don't want to see others—that's perfectly fine. Just face the wall.

So let's try this. You are some kind of wrathful deity or warrior. Just do it in your own rhythm, in your own time.

Now we'll add the other levels of this awareness. Going back to what I was saying before, there are different levels of awareness or sensitivities as you're doing this. The body is doing something, and then the awareness can pick up all kinds of things. One thing can simply be: what does it feel like to stand like that?

What does it feel like in the throat? What does my face feel? Just simple mindfulness of sensations. But then there's also what does it do in the energy body? And then there's a whole other level of sensing the soul, possibly.

So it's not like there's a right or wrong. It's more like what can I notice here? And it may be that the whole thing, if you like, becomes image a little bit. Does that make sense if I say that? The sensibility, the sensitivity picks up on different aspects or nuances of the whole experience. Like, what do I notice here and at what level? And any of it is good.

So let's do another round of that. You can do a few. Probably some of you will hurt your voice if you just do it continuously. Do it in rhythms and see what happens.

Fabulous, okay, good. It's quite tiring, yeah?

Why are we doing this? So, why are we doing this is a good question. Well, it says here. So the purpose here is not to prescribe a kind of soul expression. Now you all need to—this is what all of you need, or this person or that person needs. Nor is it the kind of—sometimes what you get is like, oh, we're supposed to kind of balance our archetypes. So I have my, whatever this screaming warrior is, and then I have my, I don't know, little angelic cherub sort of image or whatever it is. In this system, we're not aiming for some kind of wholeness as a balance or a complete set of archetypes that are all in perfect balance. Some systems do that. That's not what we're going for.

It's rather to open up the channels of possible soul, images, energies, movements, postures, expressions. The emphasis is on possible, so that if soul at any time wants to flow that way, it is available. It's not a no entry. So that certain images can constellate. You know, the mind affects the body, but the body affects the mind. And if the body is not open in a certain way, sometimes the mind won't open in certain ways. It won't go down certain... Certain things won't arise. Certain images, certain energies, certain expressions, certain characters. Does this make sense?

So, if soul wants to or has a sort of momentary impulse to go in a certain direction and it's blocked or it's rusted or broken, then that thing cannot manifest—it cannot, either internally or externally. Mind and body mutually dependent, so they feed each other.

I mentioned this this morning: we're not aiming for some kind of catharsis, like I'm really angry and if I kind of bellow in this way then it will be out of my system and gone and purified. We're actually more trying to loosen, loosen possible channels, if you like, or avenues of expression, an embodiment in the body, in gesture and movement, in energy, and therefore in psyche, so that they become an available color, an available style, an available resource, an available image or archetype. Like when we talked about frustration and dynamism this morning.

One more thing and we'll try something else. And I mentioned this too—you know, for many of us, we're creatures of habit. The mind is, one way of understanding what the mind is, is a set of habits. And the body is also a set of habits. Like we get energy and expression, gesture, get crystallized into certain habits.

And sometimes what happens is there's a habit of the energy body and even the amount of energy to be limited. And as I said, sometimes it's not obvious. It's not at all obvious in a person, unless you're really thinking this way and kind of attuned in this way. And the person doesn't even think, realize that or notice it. Everything's fine and functional, but there's actually a limit on what manifests in terms of how much energy, what kinds of energy, what kinds of images, and what kinds of then mental and experiences in consciousness.

So partly, one of the things we're doing is getting used to just having more energy and more energy flowing.

And sometimes that can be really challenging - oh, I'm just not used to this. I think I mentioned, you know, just on a much more subtle level, that long breath that we played with very briefly on the opening day - that also gives more energy. And sometimes people spending more time with that practice need to get used to having more energy.

When the energy is limited in different ways, when the energy body is limited, then also the emotions and the images - everything can get limited and constrained.

Okay, so let's try something else. This is jumping from something quite gross that we just did to something much more subtle, okay?

Catherine is going to demonstrate. So you can see Catherine. Just standing - yeah. Maybe if some people sit down near the front, then the others can see. Good idea, thank you.

So, feet are sort of hip-width apart and loose at the knees. And really, really subtle movement, really not dramatic. The head is just tilting up and down, repeated tilting, slowly tilting up and down. That's it. Actually, that's one part of it. And, if you want, the arms can outstretch. The arms are outstretched, and the head tilts up and down.

So already she's noticing something - I don't quite know what yet, but this noticing could be at any level. So of course you move the head or you hold the arms and there's just physical sensations, and we all know that from mindfulness. But there's probably movements in the energy body. There's probably some kind of subtle emotion being constellated by the movement, and possibly an image, an imaginal sense constellating of that body in movement.

You don't have to share, but do you want to say a little bit or not?

"The first sense I have is a heart sense of a kind of tender... assent means to say yes to something."

So you can already hear in what she's saying, there's already a sacredness there. She's tuning the level of attention - not that this is right or wrong, but she's tuning right to a soul level with the emotional level. It's all quite subtle.

Do you want to say more, is that good? Have you got more to give? Don't have to.

"There's a shyness... some kind of become more humble."

Okay, beautiful. Thank you very much.

So it's not like this is exactly what's going to happen if you stand like this and wiggle your head up and down. It may. It might be something completely different. What's important is the sensitivity and the particularity. And particularity means individuality. And it might be, okay, not much happens, or I don't notice much apart from the bare sensations, but there's a direction here. And as I said, wherever we are is just completely fine.

So should we try this together, this one? Yeah, just enough room. Come into the space a little bit, yeah.

And so the arms are outstretched, and the palms sort of facing forward. And there's not an exact posture. So just find kind of what feels somehow like it's a fruitful or helpful one in whatever ways that is.

And then very slowly, and again at whatever pace and whatever range of movement, both feels doable and comfortable and not harmful to your body. And also somehow right. You're moving the head, tilting it up and down.

And bringing this receptivity of sensitivity and fine noticing to that. So actually the key thing is not the movement. The key thing at this point is the sensitivity.

And that can be at all different levels. So where's your playground of discovery for this particular exercise? What level or domain of attention and sensitivity? And if it's simple basic mindfulness, then that's beautiful and wonderful. And if somehow the movement itself becomes imaginal, becomes image, that's also beautiful. Your experience, your body, your care.

When you're ready, just come the arms down to the side and bring the body to stationary stillness. Feel the contact with the floor, feel the air on the body. Is it possible to know this body as blessed? Mystery of movement, the mystery of a sensitive body, a sensitive soul, all kinds of sensitivities. Can you know this body is blessed?

The next exercise—some of you may be familiar with it. Again, it's quite a subtle one, reasonably subtle. It's just a small smile. Eyes shut. And just as much of a smile as feels natural happening. What happens? Again, bringing the sensitivity there. What do you notice in the whole body, in the consciousness, in the soul, at whatever level, in whatever way? Just a small smile.

And then you might let it go and rest for a while, then bring it back and just notice the ripples from this tiny movement. The ripples in the energy body, in the consciousness, in the being. Allow your whole body to be open to whatever reverberations of such a small movement. What effect does that have on the heart, on the soul? Maybe it becomes imaginal in some way. Maybe not. It's all fine. What can I see? What can I sense?

Some people call it a half smile. You just play with how much and what it does.

Okay, and then letting that one go. Again, just coming into contact with the floor, the sensations of the feet on the floor.

This next one is a vocalization, and we're going to hiss. And you can try it two ways. Try it just with a sssss, and that might have all kinds of emotional flavors with it, so you see what that is. Just with the voice, and then do it sometimes with the voice and anything the body wants to do with it. Does that make sense? In your own time, in your own space, in your own rhythm with this as well.

So hissing. Hiss. And again, find the pitch of the attention and sensitivity. Whether it's simple mindfulness or energy or image, or emotion, or some or all of those. Sometimes just the voice, and sometimes the voice and the body, however it wants to be. And again, the key is sensitivity as much as anything, and noticing. And if it doesn't feel right for you, if it feels like just a step too far, any of this, remember you don't have to do it.

Last few seconds of hissing.

And then let yourself again come to stillness. A sense of contact with the floor, a sense of the whole body. Opening your eyes, taking in the room.

The last little game is optional, as all these are. And I think actually, Catherine and I will demonstrate, is that okay? This, yeah, well, we can sit and do the cushions. It's in pairs, so if you don't want to be in a pair and if you don't want to do this, then while the people who want to do it in pairs do that, you can just move however you want your body to move and let the attention be on yourself and what that movement feels like or what you want to do, okay? But it is in pairs and what we would do, so some people sit so we can see.

You can find partners in a minute, don't worry about that yet. But if you're working with someone in a pair, then either both stand or both sit. Do you have a preference?

Okay, so we're going to both stand. In other words, we're at the same level. So we're going to face each other, probably two or three feet apart, something like that. You can decide whether you want to sit or stand.

Having played with the balance of attention, then one of the pairs will move—can move in any way they want to move. And the other is still and witnessing. Both people are paying attention with all the sensitivity to what happens.

So if Catherine will move, my job is just to witness. I'm bringing my whole energy body into relationship, into the witnessing. I'm knowing with not just my eyes, but with my whole body. She might move and move... You'll be conscious of it, but primarily you're just moving how you want to move, though you'll feel me in relationship.

My job is to notice how her movement impacts my energy body or my soul or my emotion or my mind or whatever it is. Again, there's a pitching of the attention to what feels most fruitful. Some might be hard to articulate. When you do it together in pairs, you don't have to report "I felt this" or anything. You just notice, and then you'll swap.

So eyes are optional—contact or not contact, or you can go in and out. Sometimes when we do this pair work, I think there's a bit of pressure like "I have to lock eyes and if I don't I'm a sissy," and we stay there thinking "Oh my god, when are we going to ring the bell?" But that's actually not how human interactions are—at least not healthy ones.

So let it be. Sometimes there's already something when we make eye contact. There's a lot here just in the contact itself. I can feel it in my heart, in my energy body. There's a lot of possibility here for sensitivity, but neither of us have to remain glued with eye contact. We can, or we can go in and out, or not, or whatever. But obviously I need to have my eyes open to some extent to see her move.

So I'm completely still. I'm not doing anything. Occasionally a bit of a smile comes or whatever, but basically I'm not moving. She's moving. We did this a couple of weeks ago just as an experiment, and the movement was much more elaborate. But in a way it's really great—there was very little this time. It was quite subtle. But again, if I'm attentive, I can see that with each movement of her eyes, there's just a change in the direction of her eyes.

I feel it in my energy body.

This is not about what you do, it's simply an exercise in developing sensitivity in different ways.

You don't have to do this - you don't have to do any of it. I mentioned this at the beginning. But if you want to play, then find a partner. If you'd rather not, then perhaps find a space where you can explore your own movement just for the period of this exercise, focusing on yourself.

If you're with someone, you want to stay really close to them. Like Catherine - you can see she moved over there, which she didn't when we practiced this at my house, but that's fine. I mean, if she went way over there, it would be a bit much because you'd be wondering where your person went amongst all the others. So keep it in a fairly tight orbit if you're going to move at all.

So if you want to play, if you want to see - find a partner. And if not, as I said, just find a space where you can explore your own movement. I'll guide you because we're going to work with the balance of attention as well.

First, simply close your eyes and ignore the other person. Come into your own space, into inhabiting the fullness of your experience, your energy body right now, whatever is happening in that space.

Then, if you're not already, without opening the eyes, just become aware of the fact that you have a partner in this exercise sitting in front of you, standing in front of you. Let that into the consciousness, into your awareness. Just notice what happens with the attention. Does it go all into that fact of someone there, or do you find yourself having to keep reminding yourself that someone's there because you're mostly with yourself? Just notice the tendency.

Really bring a lot of kindness to this, whatever you notice. This business of two-ness of attention is not easy. You'd think it was, but it's actually not very easy at all for most people.

Remain aware of your energy body, your emotions, and just gently, gradually open your eyes. You don't have to make eye contact, but you're bringing more fully the other person's presence into the possibility of your consciousness.

Now let's try this kind of proportion of 80-20. Eighty percent of your attention, if you like, is with your own experience, your own space, your own energy body. And twenty percent with the other. Sometimes for some people it's easier as a fluid going back and forth - eighty percent of the time with yourself and twenty percent with the other. But there's enough rapidity to make it stay in touch.

Most of the attention on your experience, your energy body, your space, your emotions.

Then, is it possible to play with 50-50? Again, either spread in a kind of whole space of attention, or a fluid back and forth fairly rapidly between the two of you, so the attention is balanced between both of you.

It's not an easy exercise. You'd think it would be easy. It's not that easy, and that's really okay. We get better at it.

Let's take a few moments to radiate metta toward your partner. You may know them, you may not know them. Just wish them well. Wish them peace and ease, well-being and health. Maybe there's eye contact, maybe there isn't, comes and goes - it's all fine.

Now, as you're giving the metta, can you also be aware at the same time that you are receiving metta? Again, there's a kind of balance of attention there. You are the recipient right now of goodwill, of well-wishing, of kindness.

Giving and receiving both.

Now perhaps among you, if you can fairly—without too much fuss—decide who's going to be the first mover and who the first witness.

So the job of the mover is to move in whatever way they feel moved to, within this space of staying in relationship or even in one spot. It's a movement that's still somewhat in relationship with your partner. And you can move however you want to move. It could be really subtle, it could be quite expressive.

The job of the witness is to simply witness. And of course the mover will also notice what happens as they do this—how do they feel, what happens emotionally, what happens in the energy body. What images arise? How does it feel to be witnessed like this?

The witness stays stationary and just notices what the effects are in the body, in the energy body, in the emotions, in the soul—at every level.

When you're ready, mover number one, you'll have probably somewhere between one and two minutes, so don't think you have to choreograph a whole ballet. When you're ready, please begin.

[Movement period]

The last ten seconds or so... gradually coming to stillness again.

Just checking in, each of you—what's reverberating in the body, in the heart, in the mind, in the soul right now?

And offering metta to yourself, to this mystery that you are and this mystery of body and sensitivity. And then including your partner in the reach of the metta, in the sphere of metta, so you're offering metta to yourself and to your partner both—wishing well, wishing ease, wishing happiness.

And again, recognize that at this moment you are the recipient of intentions of well-wishing, of metta, of kindness. They are being directed, beamed your way.

Gently letting the metta-intention just drop to the distant background. It's always a base of what we do, but not so conscious.

And when you're ready, mover number two can begin. Again, let your movement be at least somewhat in relationship. Be conscious of the relationship as well. You're moving in relation to.

And the witness—with the whole body, the whole senses, all the senses and all the sensitivity—witnessing, sensitized, open, noticing.

[Second movement period]

Again, last ten or fifteen seconds of moving and witnessing... and gradually coming to stillness.

And again the metta—starting with metta to yourself. Metta for this body, this instrument. Metta to this heart and mind and soul, perfect where it is, how it is. And then adding, including your partner in the sphere of metta.

And recognizing the giving and the receiving simultaneously. You are giving and you are receiving. You are the object of loving-kindness in this moment.

Bowing to your partner, or some way of thanking them—whatever feels right.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 155

Heart Art and an Introduction to Image

Rob Burbea · 56 min

> In this dense and rich teaching from the Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma series, Rob Burbea covers two essential areas: advanced energy body work with emotions and an introduction to imaginal images. He begins by expanding on energy body practices, showing how to work skillfully with both pleasant and difficult emotional states. Rather than only seeking samādhi or the four brahmavihāras, he introduces the radical possibility of sanctifying seemingly unskillful emotions—rage, hatred, madness—by allowing them to become imaginal and finding their archetypal roots.
> Burbea demonstrates through personal examples how emotions can give birth to images when felt as dynamism in the energy body. He shares the profound image of an old king losing his powers with a baby monkey offering pure love—showing how dukkha can be transformed not by elimination but by gaining new dimensions of meaning and sacredness. The second half introduces imaginal images as distinct from ordinary mental imagery, characterized by qualities like beauty, eros, meaningfulness, autonomy, and soul-making. He emphasizes that the clarity of form matters less than the sense of soul-making that arises in relationship with these images. Through various practical approaches—from liquefying practices to working with dreams—he opens doorways to a dharma that includes rather than transcends the full spectrum of human experience.

Good morning everyone.

So this morning there are actually two areas I want to try and cover in this session. It's quite a lot—as I said, it's perhaps a little dense in terms of teaching at the moment. I can share a few things about these two areas, and some of it will be in the form of simply: there's this, this, this, this, and this—not necessarily elaborating so much on each point, which brings me back to something I'll address at the end of today.

The two things I want to discuss are: first, taking the energy body teachings a little further, specifically with regard to working with emotions; and second, beginning to talk about images.

Yesterday we introduced the idea of the energy body and the practices of the energy body with a particular orientation towards developing and moving in the direction of samadhi—cultivating a kind of well-being in the energy body through integration, harmonization, and energization. We emphasized that direction of intentionality.

Within that framework, when there is anything at all pleasant or comfortable or even lovely in the energy body—or in the emotions as well, such as joy or peace—these will reflect in certain textures and energies, certain wavelengths, if you like, in the energy body. When anything like that is present, there is the possibility of leaning, inclining the attention towards resting in that, enjoying it, developing it. This is a direction towards what we call samadhi.

So here's this—maybe it's just a kind of light sense of open peace, but I can feel it harmonized throughout my whole body. Well, I can open to that. I open my body to it, I open my consciousness to it, I open my awareness to it. I endeavor to be intimate with it, to really get close to this texture, to relish it, to taste it, to know it—really touch it, touch it with the body, this loveliness, whatever it is. It could be extremely lovely, mind-blowing, or it could be quite subtle. But the intention is to nuzzle into it, rub yourself in it, open to it like you're sunbathing. Become intimate with it and basically enjoy it. Yes? "Thou shall enjoy"—it's the first commandment of samadhi practice.

Work with the whole energy body. It's really about turning on a hedonistic attitude and getting into it, bathing in it. Involved in that is what we could call a tuning. We're tuning, as I said, to a certain wavelength of energy. Let's say the wavelength of this kind of peace, or this kind of lovely tenderness, or this kind of effervescent joy. In energetic terms, it's a certain wavelength. And I'm tuning to that wavelength with my attention—but actually with my whole being, with my body, with my focus, with my mind. Everything's tuning. That's the wavelength of that particular loveliness that's available right now. Like tuning a radio dial, you're tuning to this.

As I said yesterday, the energy body will not be—cannot be—lovely all the time. It cannot be open all the time. It's just not the way it works. So within the intention of developing samadhi, within that track, there is the possibility when the energy body is not so open—when it's a bit twisted or contracted, when something's a bit tight, or when it's just not really available, when it's a bit agitated—there is the possibility to gradually develop skills to work with those difficulties and knots and contractions so that they open up and the whole system moves back towards some kind of loveliness.

This is a whole art in itself. I've talked about it elsewhere, and you can certainly ask about it. I'm just mentioning it now. So there's actually skillful relating to this difficulty with intentions like: "Okay, how can I maybe finesse it or nuance it to open up, to soften, to move basically towards something more comfortable, more pleasant, more characterized by well-being?" It's a skillful, deliberate intention. It's not a grasping or a forcing.

So that's all available. But as well as that intention towards samadhi and working with the difficult, there are other intentions. One might be: "Well, here is this difficulty, and maybe it in itself has a certain kind of intelligence. Maybe there's something in the middle of this difficulty that I need to honor, that I need to open to and be with, and it can somehow teach me something—I don't know what. Maybe it has a treasure in it."

This opens a whole realm of possibilities in itself, this slightly different attitude. What is it to relate skillfully in that sense to what is difficult? The intention here is not so much to change it, but to somehow honor it and see what might be learned, if anything. Or just to be able to be with it. That's all. Just to be able to be with, to bear with, to hang with the difficult.

So there are lots of possibilities, and I'll just offer a list here. One possibility is actually learning to focus. Here's this tightness in my throat—I'm not sure, is it an emotion?

Is it a grief? I don't even know yet.

Okay, it's possible to very delicately focus the attention right on those sensations and just train them there. And then the question is: how much? Laser beam or really delicate? What does it need?

And within that, I'm letting it be what it is. This moment and the next moment, I'm not saying, "Come on, I can just nudge you so you can be nice." That's fine. That's not like, it's not Buddhist to do that. It is Buddhist to do that. It's just different options, different orientations.

But in this mode, it's just allowing it. It's like, just like that with the hands, a little bird can land there and then it can fly off and see what's next, and it flies off. This is the atajas, a very delicate allowing and holding. That's one possibility.

Another possibility might be, again, to bring in the whole energy body. But the energy body, the space of the energy body, forms a context—a space, really—for this difficulty. So here's, let's say, I don't know, I've got this tightness in my belly or solar plexus, and again, I'm not sure: is that—am I anxious? Or—don't know yet. Well, maybe I do know.

But I can then open up the energy body awareness and let this difficulty sit in the middle of this—Joe used the word "body bubble"—this space of the energy body awareness. It gives it a different context. Do you understand? It puts it in that awareness. And oftentimes there is, in that larger awareness, there's a certain kind of—sometimes there's a certain kind of okayness. So it kind of holds it in a certain way.

We can—third option—we can learn to hold the difficult in love, to bring in or, let's say, access a quality of metta or compassion or tenderness or holding, again, around. So this difficulty, this contraction, this hardness, whatever it is, this knot—again, it's almost like it's held in a bath of something else, some warmth, some tenderness, some care. So this painful shard of rock is touched by something different. And you're just letting those two things come into contact with each other, the difficulty and the lovely warmth. And you just put them together without forcing anything to happen. You understand?

I should mention—I mentioned it somewhere or other, but I can't remember when—but for those of us who've done a lot of training in mindfulness, it's often the case that when we come to work with emotions, we use a very skillful approach, which is: "Okay, let me find—I see my mind is blah, blah, blah, all over the place, and there's all this stuff going on. Let me focus"—again, I tune the attention to the sensations of the emotions. So I say, "Oh, here's this heaviness in my chest or whatever it is. And I say, can I, in my mindfulness of the emotion, can I just look at the level of sensation?" And in a way, everything simplifies. You familiar with what I'm talking about? Yes? Wonderful.

And sometimes what can happen is that a person who does a lot of mindfulness practice, insight meditation, actually that becomes almost their only option. It's like one mode of relating to the emotions. What's it missing? One thing it's missing is it's missing self and story, right? Because part of the whole idea of mindfulness is let's just kind of leave that out, okay?

So for some of you, it might be interesting to introduce, again, open up the concertina, the fan of options. So what is it to be with this emotion in this kind of bare mindfulness, supposedly bare mindfulness way? No story, no self, it's just these sensations happening in the moment. Great, one option.

What would it be, though, to let it—to bring yourself in contact with that whole constellation of emotion, including the self? So it's not just sensations and just emotion, it's me having the sensations. And that's important. Catherine talked about yesterday, a practice with "no self, no self, no self. I just want to kind of ignore or get rid of the self." It won't be full enough, rich enough, juicy enough—just psychologically, let alone soulfully. So sometimes we go into a mode—we open to a mode that includes self, and that might include story.

And then there's further differentiations. What kind of self are we talking about? A reified self, or a self that I also know is empty? A self I see as image? Do you understand? There are different kinds of gradations of the mix one can put into this, if you feel ready to explore that kind of thing.

Dependent on that—dependent on what kind of self and how much self, if you like, is there, and how much story, and what the attitude to the story is—the experience unfolds differently. Is this the reality, this story? Or does this story also have the liquidity in it to be sensed as image? Dependent on all this, the experience unfolds differently. It's dependent arising.

All that is in the beauty and the art of what we can explore with the difficulties. Slightly different emphases and angles, and different experiences open up. Different kinds of healing are available. Sometimes healing won't just happen from looking at those sensations all day long. Actually, something is not getting healed because there's not enough self in it, and there's not enough story, or the story is too rigid. So again, there's no right answer, no right way to do it. You can't just do this one thing for the rest of your life and expect everything will be fine.

Sometimes, as another option, we can bring an image to meet the emotion—just as we bring the metta, for example, tenderness to sit around the difficulty. We can bring an image. Maybe you have imaginal figures that you already sense love you and you love them. So you can bring this image. What does this image perhaps communicate to you in your difficulty? It witnesses you there. It sees you. How do they see you? Can you see how this image is looking at this dukkha? Can you see and feel how you are being gazed at?

Again, there's a kind of alchemy that happens when I put the difficulty in contact with something. Just rattling through a list here.

Another option is turning the allowing dial up to eleven, as they would say in Spinal Tap. Meaning, here's the difficulty, and I'm not just kind of letting it be in the usual mindfulness sense, which is great. I'm totally—the thing I'm completely interested in is how much can I allow this? How much can I let go of completely, even the smallest trace of aversion or resistance? That's what I'm mostly interested in. That's a very skillful way of being. Some of you know what happens when you do that. It's an extremely interesting thing to try.

Again, rattling through the list. Sometimes, in fact often, an emotion—difficult and lovely—has a kind of dynamism in it. It's a vortex of moving energy, if you like. Because of that, you can feel that dynamism in the energy body. This rage or this frustration or whatever it is—you can actually feel a kind of power and dynamism in the energy body that's related to the emotion.

Because of that energy, it can give birth to an image. Sometimes this is extremely gross—the dynamism and the power that is associated with this emotion I feel in the energy body, and lo and behold, then I become a fire-bellowing dragon. Wonderful. The whole thing has moved. Or it can be much more subtle.

I'll give you a little example. Catherine mentioned that I've been—I don't know why it's arisen, but I've got all kinds of problems with my hormones now, different hormone levels. I can't remember if this was before or after I started the medicine, but either way, I've been feeling pretty strange lately. So let me just share this with you.

So I was meditating in the morning, feeling utterly confused and discombobulated, lacking in mental capacity recently. It's possibly a consequence of a thyroid problem—question mark.

Sitting this morning, I felt into the difficulty. This is what's happening, and I feel this difficulty, this whole gestalt of the difficulty. It's mental, it's physical—everything. I feel the difficulty of it. I feel it as difficulty. I see there's some aversion to it—subtle, but definitely there. I sense the contraction, subtle contraction in the energy body in relation to it. It's in my chest, in my throat and chest that accompanies this.

I tried to work with it in different ways, but the mind was not very focused, which was part of the original problem. Then somehow, out of my willingness to be with it and to be intimate with the difficulty in this open way, suddenly an image came.

The image was of an old king sitting in a room alone—well, almost alone—sitting in a room that looked very much like the living room in my house, which I wasn't in at the time. He's alone in that room, except that there's this very small baby monkey with him.

He has on this mauve velvet cloak, he's very old, and he wears this mauve velvet cloak and a crown, but the crown is really not very fancy. He's lost his powers—he's lost his powers. He's really old, and his mental and spiritual faculties are compromised. He's pretty confused as well; maybe he has dementia or something like that. He's completely lacking in energy.

And he has to see something now. Despite his state, he has to get clear about something, or gain some kind of clarity about something: that his kingship is not his. It was given to him by the divine, by the earth, by the Buddha nature. And nor are his spiritual or mental powers his. They're not his. They never were.

If death is coming, this is a time of relinquishment. Somehow his heart needs to understand, his soul needs to understand—a time of relinquishment, anatta, and seeing: this is not self, this is not mine. And in a way, entering the very simple state of the erasure of one's mental and spiritual powers. The simple state—just all that goes. And the erasure of these qualities and the gifts that were bestowed on him.

The little monkey, this little baby monkey, climbs onto his chest. You know how they do. So he's very lost and doesn't quite even know where he is, confused. And this little baby monkey climbs onto his chest and presses itself—the way very young babies can, when they're old enough to communicate love, their love, not just receive it. They can communicate this love.

So it presses itself against him like a baby, with a very young child's loving—very pure, very innocent, very sweet.

This is what I tune to. It's that interaction. It's one of the things I tune to. And it's something very lovely. You can hear it's sweet and soothing and pacifying. It brings a lot of tenderness and another level of okayness with what's happening.

I give you this example for particular reasons. Sometimes when I choose examples, there are different motivations. One is that the dukkha is involved. This wasn't an image that just went around the dukkha or ignored it—like, "Oh, that's all right, but look at this wonderful thing that's happening here." The dukkha is involved. It was part of the crucible that gave birth to the image. And it was still there at the end of the image. It wasn't like the monkey climbed onto his chest and suddenly transformed into some handsome young prince ready to rule another kingdom.

The dukkha stays. It receives other harmonies with it, other dimensions.

It's one of the reasons I'm choosing this image. It's more than simple anatta practice—more than simple "not-self, not-self." Beautiful, wonderful practice though that is, there's something more here. It includes that, but it's more.

The self—and you can obviously see the parallels there—the self becomes image. There's a real, I felt, a real relationship between me and this king, my state and this king. The self-sense moves towards an imaginal self-image. Do you understand?

We can say there's letting go, but in a way there's more than what we traditionally understand by letting go. As I said, it's got whole other levels of dimensions and echoes and juiciness around it. These are some of the reasons why I choose this image to share.

This soul-making conceptual framework includes many possible angles and approaches and intentions and directions within it. Like we said, I can do samadhi, I can be with difficulty, I can look for image—all kinds of possibilities.

When we talk about emotional awareness in this larger soul-making paradigm, the purpose of our emotional awareness is not only to reach peace. It's not only to reach peace. It's not only that we work with our emotions so that they can purify and the only emotions we end up having are the four brahmaviharas. I'm not saying it's not that—I'm saying it's not only that.

There is also in this process, in this journey, the movement towards the invitation to sanctify what we tend to regard as unskillful or impure emotions. What does it mean to sanctify rage? What does it mean to sanctify fierceness, to let that become image and holy, to find the holiness, the holy roots of these kinds of emotions?

Hysteria. Hatred. James Hillman said, "You've got to hate something." Actually, on a soul level, there's something very wise there. Gotta hate something. What does it mean for hatred to be given these extra dimensions?

Roaring. What is holy roaring? Madness. What is holy madness? The sanctification of being also madly in love. Priapic—the eternally horny. What is that? What's the holiness in that to be found in the echoes there?

These things can become image, can find their archetypal roots. And it's not that then we identify with these things, but it's that something is opened in the range of soul-making, something is opened in the soul-making with them. And the range of—this is so important—the range of our sacredness is opened, the range of our senses of sacredness is opened, the range of our images and the range of beauty and duty is opened. Beauty and duty.

So it's not only in this framework that we're saying, "Have your feelings, be connected with your feelings, be mindful of your feelings on your way to peace." There's a bigger invitation here.

Sometimes a person is working very diligently, with a lot of care and goodwill with their flow of emotions. Often with this typical sort of mindfulness mode where you're focusing on the emotions almost as sensation without so much story and self. But it's just going on, and the person is tracking their emotions, and it's actually not very fruitful or helpful.

I don't know if some of you have ever had this kind of relationship with difficulty, where it's just, "I'm aware of it, I'm aware of it, I'm aware of it, I'm aware of it." So there's a certain clarity there, and certainly a certain mindfulness, but there's no—going back to what I used to say—there's no dynamism. Nothing's happening. It's not going anywhere in that process. Something is stuck, and the wheels are kind of going round and round in this difficult emotion.

Sometimes—I'm mentioning this because maybe four or five people have mentioned something similar to me in the last month or so—sometimes with all that, there's actually frustration at the whole process. "I'm not supposed to be frustrated because I'm supposed to just be okay with what is." No. I'm fed up.

Maybe I need to feel the power and the dynamism of feeling fed up. So I'm concentrating on everything else, but I'm feeling the fed upness. It's there. I'm somehow not clocking it. It's somehow not allowed or what? Or just I'm not used to feeling it. So maybe I need to feel that and allow it and allow its energy. Or sometimes maybe I need to vocalize. What does that sound like when I let my body express that frustration? Or again, feel it in the body.

Sometimes this tuning into the dynamism and allowing the dynamism—or even allowing yourself to express it—gets things moving. It loosens things. I'm not talking about catharsis. I'm not talking about getting rid of, purifying. Here's this emotion and if I kind of primal scream or whatever, then it is released. I'm not talking about that. I'm talking about loosening something so that an alternative flow or an alternative circuit can be found or introduced.

So sometimes working with difficulty—and it might already be, there's already an image or it might be without an image—at some point it's like, can I sense where is the dynamism in all this? What is it? Where's the point where there's power and movement in potential? And actually tune into that and allow that to move things.

Again, we're not trying to get rid of. We could say in a certain language, we're tuning to and supporting a kind of native intelligence in the difficulty. I'm not buying the dynamism so it will kind of bugger off. I'm actually... there is an intelligence here in this frustration, in this whatever it is. And so in this way, possible flows of energy and emotion are opened by feeling it in the energy body in this way and allowing it, feeling it to its power, the movement there, the dynamism. Different than this "allowing on 11" practice that I talked about before. That will actually do something different.

So sometimes feeling the emotion as energy, and the energy moves, and when the energy moves in the energy body, the self-sense moves. Energy body, self-sense—all these things are connected. I let the energy move, the sense of self will change. And sometimes when the sense of self changes, an image can come, sometimes.

So I use this word "dynamism," not that all images are something so dynamic, like that image I shared of the old king and the monkey. But out of the sense, in that case, of weakness, of lostness and loss of power, an image was born. There was something liquid in going to the image.

End of part one. Is that okay? I said there's a lot to get through. Is that okay? All right, part two, about image.

We use this word "image," and so if you just imagine right now... imagine, just however you are able to imagine, don't worry, you don't have to get in the lotus posture. Just imagine a toilet that you know well. At home, or where you've been staying regularly, or even upstairs, or wherever it is. Imagine a train station or a bus stop you can imagine well. Imagine maybe someone who would be a neutral person in the metta practice would fall into the neutral category.

So these are all images, you could say, they're imaginary, even if it's not visual, you have a sense of something. Actually, there's a way in which we can call any perception an image, any perception at all, in a certain way of using language as an image. So you just looking at me right now or looking at your hand or the room or whatever.

What do we mean when we use this word "imaginal"? What's an imaginal image? There's a problem with language here, but just because it's a mouthful to say "imaginal image" every time, mostly when we use the word "image," we mean imaginal image. Occasionally we don't, just to keep you on your toes.

So it's actually—there's quite a lot, it's quite a lot of richness involved in what does this mean, this word "imaginal," in the way that we are using it in these teachings. So for us, there's a gradual evolution, a gradual development of understanding what's involved in the richness of that idea.

What we mean when we use this word "imaginal" is far from a simple black and white determination of whether something is imaginable or not. Probably the toilet wasn't imaginable, but rather than making such stark distinctions, we can speak of a spectrum. Things can be more fully imaginal or less fully imaginal, instead of simply asking "have I got it or have I not?"

Part of what we mean when we say imaginal is that certain qualities are endemic or intrinsic to the imaginal. Beauty is there. Eros is there. There's a sense of meaningfulness that reaches beyond just a meaning or even several meanings. There's a kind of inexhaustibility to imaginal images—I cannot reduce them to just this or just that, or even to a handful of discrete things. There's a sense of dimensionality, of unfathomability.

Love is present with the imaginal, flowing both ways. An imaginal image is sensed as autonomous at a certain level. It's not just a part of me, nor am I in control of it like manipulating a puppet. Often there's a sense—we could even go a step further—of personhood to an image, even if it's not depicting an animal or human. It has its own kind of personhood.

Humility emerges as part of this constellation. When there's an imaginal image present, there's a sense of humility in the relationship. I am somehow humble before this image. And duty arises—in some way, I owe something or am being asked something by this image. With all this and much more, there's a profound sense of soul-making occurring.

So when we use the word imaginal, it encompasses all of this and more. These are qualities that arise in relationship—it's not as though the image by itself possesses these qualities in isolation. The humility resides here in the subjective pole. The beauty feels like it's more over there in the image. But the imaginal speaks to something about the relationship between my experience and this phenomenon, whatever it may be.

Let's consider humility more closely. Here's an image—perhaps fantastical, with dragons and all manner of extraordinary elements. But something about it lacks juice, fails to touch me deeply. There's not this sense of profound soul-making present. Perhaps, and I offer this tentatively, one element missing is humility. I check and discover I don't feel humble before it. I lack that sense of reverence. Sometimes simply noticing this absence allows something to shift. Something changes in my relationship because now humility enters the dynamic, and the whole experience opens up and transforms.

When we speak of the imaginal, we're truly speaking of a relationship, an entire constellation of relational dynamics. This means that something can begin as fully imaginal—rich with all this juiciness and depth—but if I'm not careful with the relationship, it collapses and becomes flat. Whatever eros was present transforms into craving and clinging. The whole experience becomes brittle, one-dimensional.

But the opposite movement is equally possible. Here's something that didn't begin with much juice or soul-making potency. It felt rather flat. There was definitely a good dose of craving present rather than eros. Yet as I attend carefully, working subtly with the relationship, the craving transforms into eros, and the papañca—the mental proliferation and flatness—becomes imaginal. This is part of the art and the alchemy involved.

The imaginal quality depends entirely on the relationship, the conceptual framework, and the way of looking present at any given moment. Today I want to explore what we might call intra-psychic images. But we should recognize that we can sense the tree outside, this very moment here in the hall, or even our own body in imaginal ways.

The senses can be sensed imaginatively. The world can be sensed imaginally, and others can be sensed imaginally. We could call that extra-psychic. Right now, let me say a little about intra-psychic images—those that are apparently more internal.

After a while, this whole distinction will lose its meaning: intra-psychic, extra-psychic. Everything gets sensed with soul. Everything becomes—the world becomes imaginal, potentially. But for now, let's make that distinction just for teaching purposes.

When I say "image," it's not necessarily visual. There's a problem in language. In English, we say "image" and you immediately think visual. It's not necessarily visual. It can come predominantly through any sense, or a combination of senses, or sometimes in ways where I can't quite locate the sense, or there's a kind of synesthesia involved. All these are possible.

If it's visual, the visual detail is often not very important. If it's aural, sometimes the sonic detail is not important. So the clarity of form of an image is not the most important thing. We're not doing visualization concentration exercises. What's important? Soul-making is. The sense of soul-making.

Sometimes the image is very vague, but the soul-making sense is there. So it's not like I have to get clearer about what the image is, or see it clearly. Do you understand?

Let me give you an example. This is another hormonal one. I was struggling with the effects of hypothyroidism—not sleeping, a very unpleasant buzzing energy in the body, heart rate really fast and thumping. In all that, it was hard for me to get a sense of my depth of resources, or even depth of perception. I felt somehow thin, spiritually thin, not easily settled, not much calm.

So I focused on the sensations and sensed the dukkha—this is just what's going on. I recognized this dukkha and opened to it. Eventually, after a few minutes, I decided to play with seeing it as empty, and me as empty—some anattā practice. It fragmented into aggregates and sense elements, and I mixed that with a sense of the emptiness of time.

Then there was a sense—one of the possibilities—where my whole life became like slides, like film stills. The whole thing was there all at once: frozen, timeless moments of perception and experience. The perception of it and me was empty in this way, at least at that level. It helped ease the dukkha. There was considerable release and some quite pleasant space opened in the experience.

There was a sense of the possibility of some samādhi because of this softening. But actually it didn't feel personal at all. What I had done was look at something in a very universal way, moving toward a universal experience of the dukkha. There was a kind of universality, and the space that opened was a kind of universal space.

Then my mind wandered briefly. I remembered that I'd moved house recently and found a box of old tapes from years ago—some from when I was a music student. I had put some on, and it wasn't very good. Anyway, my mind wandered in the meditation to that memory from two days ago. Then my mind drifted again. There's a reason I'm giving all these details.

My mind drifted off again to hearing some music internally—improvised jazz lines that I could see, given my musical training, as melodies on the guitar manifesting immediately. There was a kind of fluidity in all of this. Actually, it was a kind of daydream; I was just drifting off into a little reverie. But with it came this fluidity of improvisation and way of being, and because there was a relaxation of mind and focus, it was actually really lovely—this quality of free-flowing music sort of in the ether, if you like.

Then something shifted. I sensed, it just came: I am this music. I mentioned this the other day—I am this music. I am the music I make. My being is, my person is music. I am played. I am being played. My life is music. It's really hard to articulate in words. My essence is music.

And it's personal because it's this music. At that point, the music I was hearing was not that clear. The soul-making sense was in this different—I don't know, is it an image? Because it's not clear what sense it's in. It wasn't like I really hear this music clearly at this point. The image sense is there's an image of self, really an idea of self, but there was the soul-making sense.

This is where the juice is. This is where the soul makes itself. So I allowed the perfume of that to move through my being and allowed myself to be touched by it. And it's personal because it's this music—a particular music, as if my life is these sounds, these melodies, these harmonies, these rhythms happening in time and eternally. Given to me as me and created by me, given to me and made by me, and created contingently on, dependent on, in interaction with the circumstances of my life—the situations, the events, all of it.

So the emptiness sense I had worked on a few minutes before was still there, but now it was added to by this very personal poetic sense of this existence—this existence in this very different sense of it. Including the dukkha and including the challenges—they were part of the music. You understand? All of it, all of it. And there's this tremendous beauty here, and a big relief of the dukkha, like a whole other level.

The sensations are still there. I'm not going for some fade-out where the sensations disappear and everything. It's not doing that. It's taking it in a certain direction where the dukkha stays, but it's made holy.

Again, why this example, when we could choose how many others? Because the form of the image is not clear. I could have chosen to really hear that music clearly so maybe I could write it down later, whatever. No, that wasn't where the soul-making was. It was in a much more amorphous sense of things.

I choose this example as well because, again, it came from dukkha and it included dukkha. It included a couple of moments at least of the mind wandering. And you know what?

It's okay. There was the opportunism. The mind wandered, it was like, whatever. It's not a problem. What it wandered to became image, became fertile soil. There's an opportunistic responsivity in the practice. It's not about "Can I just really stay with this one thing?" Again, there's emptiness, but actually it's more than emptiness that we're talking about. Again, the self has, in this case, very much become image, but it's not clear what's the—it's not a visual image, it's not particularly an aural image.

And also, this example, because implicit in that, or actually more than implicit, is a whole kind of, if you like, a kind of anthropology and cosmopoiesis. Say to a scientist, "I am music." They say, "Well, I'll put you under a microscope. I don't see it. I can't hear it." There's a whole implicit kind of poetic anthropology. What is a human being? What is this cosmos? So eros is wrapped up in the whole imaginative sense.

The soul-making sense is what's important. When I first started teaching imaginal practice, I think I gave a series of talks somewhere and then someone came to me and they said after a few talks, "Oh, I know what you're talking about. You're talking about ghosts." And I was like, "Wow."

So on the last retreat we did—some of you were there, not at Gaia House—I was in bed at night and suddenly someone came into my room and I sort of sat up and turned around and it was this little old woman. We sort of looked at each other and she just turned and went out. And afterwards I said, when we were packing up, the people that were helping clear up, who worked there, they said, "Oh, did you see the ghost?"

And I was like, "Oh, it's funny you say that," because now that instance, there was nothing soul-making in it at all. There's an image, if you like. It was weird. Slightly. It was kind of, yeah. But there was no soulfulness there. It's not imaginal. It's something else, okay?

We were here once in a teacher meeting and someone took a photo of one of the teachers—it doesn't matter who. And I guess it must have been on a digital camera or something, but they saw the photo right then. And it had, in his chest, it had a kind of ball of white light. And some people were like, "Oh, something refracted wrong in the light." And other teachers were like, "Oh, a deva."

Now, probably for the people who said it's just light got in the camera somehow, it's not soul-making. But some of the people who said, "Oh, it's a deva," it was like, "Oh, it's a deva." It wasn't soul-making at all. It's just like... So it's the sense of soul-making that matters. Actually, either one—the mystery of light and refraction could be soul-making. It's not in the thing, it's in how we relate to it and what happens in that moment, whether it's soul-making or not.

Let me zip through some practice possibilities. I'm talking about intra-psychic images. How can we work with them? How can we kind of support contacting them, etc.?

Number one: play with any practice that liquefies—any practice like samādhi or emptiness practices that you know or mettā. Actually, what they're doing in technical language is they're fabricating less. And in that less fabrication, there's a kind of liquefying. So you do that and you enjoy it. And then after a while, you can kind of just come out a little bit, just relax the attention a little bit. Everything has got kind of liquefied and that can be a very fertile kind of ground out of which images may arise.

Second, I've already touched on, is an emotion that's there.

Whether it's difficult or whether it's beautiful, has enough energy in it that if I feel it in the energy body, it can give rise to an image. It's got some generative energy in it. So through the emotion, emotion has energy wrapped up in it. That energy felt in the energy body can give rise to image.

Third, I used to, when I was first trying to explore all this, what I found really helpful was imagining, actually deliberately imagining going to certain places. And there were places where I would just wait and an image would arise. After a while—one, I don't do it anymore, but one that became quite common for me was somehow a prison cell down in a basement. And I would go down and I would be in this prison cell as the prisoner, usually, and then different images would come. But it might be under a big tree or down another staircase somewhere. It might be a certain place that you go that just becomes the place where you can meet images.

Fourth, you already have plenty of images or potential images in your life—people, historical figures, places. Gaia House might be an image to you, or certain teachers, or memories. There's lots in your life that's already potentially imaginable. Sometimes you can deliberately bring that. I never met John Coltrane—he's an imaginal figure for me, or other musicians, loads of people. They're historical figures, but they function in my psyche as potential imaginal images. So you can bring them.

Fifth, might be you've worked before with an image and it felt fruitful, and you can deliberately bring that back.

Sixth, a dream that feels like it's really touched you in some way—potentially you can bring that and work with that dream image.

And seventh is a prescribed image. Sometimes we're teaching and we just pick up on an image or offer an image or an image from somewhere else, a tantric deity or whatever. That's another option.

In working with an image, the awareness—you want to keep including the whole energy body and the emotional state and the fluidity of that. It's okay, as I said, you're going to lose focus. It's fine, you just come back. No big deal.

And what we're really tuning to is the sense of soul-making. That tuning to the sense of soul-making—implied in that is that mindfulness and sensitivity are very much part of this practice, very much. And again, there's a sense sometimes of which direction in this image, which direction or what aspect of it gives the soul-making. So if I go back to that music image, I could have gone more clearly to hearing the music more clearly, but that wasn't really where the soul-making was at. So it's a sense of guiding that way.

You guys look tired, so I'm going to stop, although I have more to say. No, there's seven, but there's other stuff I was going to say. I mean, it could be that you're not, and you're just looking that way. Let's somehow find a time later to finish this. We'll jiggle things about and I'll find a time to say the rest of this.

Let's just sit just for a minute or so together.

CHAPTER 156

Towards the Imaginal

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> Rob Burbea offers a comprehensive exploration of what makes an image truly 'imaginal' in the context of soul-making dharma. He presents a detailed constellation of 28 interconnected qualities that characterize imaginal experience, including love, eros, beauty, trust, dimensionality, unfathomability, and the crucial 'middle way' of neither real nor not real. Drawing from his understanding of dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda), Burbea emphasizes that the imaginal is fundamentally relational - not just about the image itself, but about our way of looking, conceiving, and relating to what arises.
> The talk addresses practical aspects of working with images, particularly the common arising of doubt and the importance of judging by the 'fruit' of soul-making rather than initial mental reactions. Burbea explores the sophisticated balance required in imaginal practice, including the expansion of the middle way concept beyond the traditional Kaccāyana Sutta teaching to include ranges of energy body experience and openness to both luminous and difficult (dukkha-laden) images. He emphasizes the gradual maturation possible in this practice and encourages experimental, embodied exploration of how subtle shifts in view and intention can dramatically alter the texture of imaginal experience.

Okay, so, yes, just to pick up on and add a bit to something Catherine said in the opening talk. There's a lot of material here, and of necessity, some of what we present we will just touch on and mention, while others we will elaborate more fully. That's simply the nature of the limits of time, and not wanting to talk at you all day long.

This connects to what Catherine said in the opening talk about listening in a proactive way. There's a way of listening which is to simply sit back and let things come in or drift through—which can be a lovely style sometimes. But for many different reasons, it would be good to listen more actively: "That piece there, I don't understand it, but I'll bookmark it for later and then I'll chase it up after the retreat or I'll ask questions." So you're listening with a kind of self-reflective, critical attitude—what are the pieces that I personally am needing or missing or not quite getting, or that I can shelve for later?

I want to pick up where I finished the other morning and go through that material with you, then add a bit more. In terms of meditation instructions, at this point they're fairly open. We've touched on several approaches. We spent the first day emphasizing the intention for samadhi—for gathering a sense of harmonization and well-being, just leaning towards that. So that's always an option, always a gear you can go into.

We also talked about the energy body as a way of working or opening various ways to work skillfully and carefully and with compassion with what's going on emotionally, whether it's lovely or difficult. So that too is a gear, an option when it feels time to do that.

Then we started to introduce the idea of images—intra-psychic for now, more inside, so to speak. So there are those three options, plus going into basic mindfulness or metta practice, if you see fit.

It's quite open—there's no prescribed order here. It's not like first I do this, then that, then this other thing. You can be very flexible with all of this. Consider it like an open buffet: if you want your dessert before your mains, it's completely fine. You can't be practicing with an image or images all day long and not doing anything else—it's not in balance and won't be helpful. So you want to be gliding in and out in response to what's going on between these different kinds of practices: being with the emotions and caring for them in the energy body, cultivating samadhi, working with images, maybe some other practice that you already know that seems helpful right now.

Just to reiterate, we're introducing the possibility of moving—not just walking up and down, but actually moving the body in here or outside. So the walking period is now called a moving period. You can move in relation to an image or to energies, primarily an image, if that feels helpful for you.

Now, a little bit about some practice things. Doubt—this is really, really common. It's common anyway on the path, as you know; it's one of the hindrances. But in relation to this kind of practice, it's extremely common. There are different kinds of doubt and different aspects we can be doubting. Very often, a couple of moments after an image might arise, the first thing that arises afterwards is doubt. It's often something like: "That's probably not significant," or "It's not very interesting," or "It's not as bizarre and weird as I hear other people say," or actually "It's a bit too weird," or very commonly, "I made that up—that's just my ego, I made that happen," or "It's just a random daydream."

These couple of moments of doubt are really, really common. Expect them. They're just part of the process. But so often, despite that mental reaction of doubt, it's still worth gently persevering with a kind of gentle attention to what's just arisen. You can be aware of the doubt without having to buy into it.

If you stick with it, what you will often notice is that what seemed insignificant or just a kind of ego projection—if I tune to it, if I work with the energy body—actually does start to gain imaginal flesh and richness and depth and beauty, and becomes soul-making. What seemed insignificant is actually potentially fertile and important.

So let the judge be not that moment of mental doubt, but let it be the sense of soul-making. Stay with something, play with the different approaches we'll describe for relating to images, and let the sense of soul-making be your judge of whether something is worth sticking with or not. Judge by the fruit, not by the initial idea of how the image arose.

Whether an image is fruitful depends on the relationship with it. In some of the examples I gave, mine started as daydreaming—I was daydreaming some music or whatever. It wasn't particularly amazing in the first instance, didn't seem that significant. But in developing a relationship with it, it became much more fertile and meaningful.

But just nuancing the relationship with it, something becomes more imaginable. It's in the relationship.

Related to that, I think we don't want any kind of dogma or rules necessarily, but to prioritize a kind of sensitivity to the sense of soul-making, to trust that in the moment with an image. It may be that it comes through one very specific aspect of the image, or it may be in the whole gestalt of it. But this will be the most fruitful thing. This is what my nose is following. This is the thread, the sense of soul-making that will bring things alive and be most fruitful.

It may, as I said, as we both said now, include and even come through, arise from dukkha. So that's also part of just being aware of that.

And again, I've probably said this, but not to prioritize, and the implications are not to prioritize how clear is this image, the form. So we're not doing visualization meditation or exercises. Not the clarity of form so much is important. Occasionally it might be, because that clarity of form might actually help soul-making. But the sense of soul-making - which is often a more nebulous, hard-to-pin-down kind of quality, but you can recognize, you get better and better at recognizing when that whole soul-making dynamic is going on, when there's soulfulness.

Implicit in this, and I'll come back to this hopefully this morning, very easily we can relate to an image and say, "What is the guidance for me in my life here? What's it telling me to do? Maybe I have a job choice or a path. Should I go to India? Should I..."

whatever it is. And we want the image to come as a guide: "You should do this," so clear. Sometimes that happens, or sometimes we get encouragement or whatever from an image.

But again, it's about intention. If I prioritize this, something closes down. It's not that it doesn't happen sometimes. So can I not have my primary intention in relation to this image be "Guide me" or "What is the guidance for me?" Rather, tuning into and staying with what gives the most soul-making sense, what gives the most soulfulness.

And in a way, that's a kind of experiment. So I see - well, we'll elaborate on it starting this morning, in fact. But see, find out for yourself what kinds of attitudes, relationships, concepts, stances support the soul-making to open and what tend to close them down. Be your own researcher. We will certainly put some teachings out about that. But this is a much more interesting question.

And all meditation is like this. Right now, what's helpful? The question is, for each practice, what does helpful mean? So in this practice it means what's most soul-making. There's just a gentle sort of responsive, artful responsiveness to what's going on. I'm sailing this boat in response to the different currents and winds that are around.

And it can all be very beautiful, very subtle in the relational field between, let's say, self and image. Let's say that. So that it's better to focus on qualities of the beauty, the kind of beauty that an image seems to have for you in the moment. And it may be very vague - and Catherine talked about it last night - the sense of divinity that seems to inhere in this image, or the sense of grace, or mystery, or my sense of humility in relationship to it. All this can be very, very subtle, but these are all part of what it means for something to be soul-making, all these qualities. Focusing on that will be much more helpful for the whole process as we are outlining it and what it opens up to than looking for guidance or trying to get visually clear or whatever. Okay?

All right. Now, in a way, I've said a little bit already but started to say the other morning and implied a little bit in what I've already said is this question: we use this word "imagine" a lot. A lot of people use it - not a lot, but quite a few people and different schools and things use it this way - and what does it mean, or what does it mean as we are using it here? And we want to kind of convey and open up - there's quite a lot involved in it. It's a rich concept. It's not like a simple thing. It's rich and it's almost paradoxical and nebulous in some areas by necessity. It's a necessarily partly nebulous concept. Usually we like things to be really clear.

On, off, black, white, is it this or is it that? And this whole, the art of this is not—we have to be okay with the kind of nebulousness and elasticity of definitions and descriptions and concepts and all that.

So, having said that, we could—we have in other situations asked: What does it mean for something to be imaginal? What does that mean? What is an image? And actually delineate or point to a whole cluster of qualities or characteristics or attitudes or perceptions that are there that kind of constitute what it means for something to be imaginal.

And so we can call that the constellation of the imaginal or the lattice of the imaginal or something—all these qualities. Some of them, we're just mentioning this, some of them we're just going to kind of throw them out and list them, and some on this retreat we will go into a little bit more detail. But the idea is that, again, this is not such a black and white thing. It's more like a spectrum.

So if we go back to me asking you to imagine the toilet that you're most familiar with, and there's imagination involved in whatever way, maybe visual or some sense of that toilet. But it is possible that that could be imaginal with all the beauty and divinity and everything, if you spend a lot of time like I do. But probably not. It's a use of the imagination. It's an image in a certain sense of the word. But it's probably not in this fully fleshed out, soulful, multidimensional way. It's probably not imaginal.

So again, rather than saying on, off, have I got it, have I not? Do I understand what they're talking about, do I not? I think everyone else has, but I haven't, I'm not getting—my experience can't be. Let's just think of it more as a spectrum, as a direction. And as more of these qualities that we'll list, as more of them get lit up, the whole thing we could say becomes more imaginal, more fully imaginal.

So there's no point in this kind of spectrum that we can say, you got it, you haven't got it. You can say to yourself, but we're thinking about the kind of possible fullness and richness of it. Does this make sense as an idea? Yeah. So just watch the mind that gets into black and white thinking. And then particularly, you know, the ego and the self puts itself in relation to that black and white thinking, usually in the negative light. I'm really not getting it.

Okay, so it's a direction. It's an aspiration. It's a possibility of fullness, of further riches, of further beauties. We can talk about what it means to be more fully imaginal in the way that we are using it in these teachings.

So why talk about this constellation or lattice or these elements? Two reasons. One is in order to get clearer, because I said it's a subtle, rich, complex concept in our teaching, what it means for something to be imaginal. It's not like you can just go boom, it means that. And people often ask me, can you just—some, well, maybe. So, but partly we want, we would like you to get clearer, to form a bit of a, to kind of get more and more internalized, this almost intuitive gut sense of, oh yeah, that—now something illuminates and you get a sense of the richness.

So partly just for the sake of clarity. What are we talking about? What kind of possibilities of soul and psyche and consciousness? What kind of experiences are we talking about? What direction? What realm? So that's one reason, for the sake of increasing clarity and understanding.

And the second reason is that it turns out that this kind of knowing about this constellation of different elements of the imaginal, it turns out that that's actually really helpful in practice. So sometimes, for instance, something arises—that toilet or whatever, or just a daydream or something—and it's an image and it's there, but it's not particularly imaginal, it's not particularly rich and unfathomable or inexhaustible or mysterious or all these other qualities.

And one of the things that's possible is there are elements actually—let's say, not immediately sensible in the imaginal experience, in the image experience, in that moment—that my noticing of them illuminates them, it draws them out. So for instance, and I didn't plan to talk about this one, it's the one that's coming to my head right now. There's often love between—love is one of these elements, it's characteristic of what we call the constellation of the imaginal. Love both ways. I somehow love that image. I might be a little suspicious of it. I might be scared of it in some way. I might be questioning, what does this mean?

But there's somehow some love there. And there's somehow some love of the image for me. This image loves me. And again, a lot of this work is about expanding ranges. So very often I say love, and we tend to have quite a narrow idea of what that looks like or what constitutes love. Sometimes with an image, the kind of love is not the kind of love that we're used to. So something is happening here also to open up our sense of what love can mean and can look like.

But the noticing of the love—I haven't noticed it at first, and so I just look and I begin to see, oh yeah, there's a kind of love here. I can feel that. Wow. It might be subtle at first. My noticing of it draws it out. In the attention, it illuminates that star in the galaxy or that star in the constellation of what imaginal means. And the illumination of that quality starts to illuminate other things. So the whole thing starts to come alive, get illuminated.

So not just saying all this for the sake of clarity, we're saying all this as part of the art and the subtlety of being able to support something to open up in soulfulness and soul-making. Sometimes also, you can deliberately introduce one of these elements. I'll come back to that. So not just noticing it will amplify it and draw it out and illuminate it, but actually I'll say, oh, let me deliberately introduce one of these things. And that, again, ignites the whole, or potentially ignites the whole lattice.

There's not an order through these. So we could list them. A few things about this whole concept of this constellation, or lattice, or whatever we want to call it, is that it's not an exhaustive list. If I go through it, you could say, well, what about such and such? It's not intended to be exhaustive. It's just to begin to open something up. We could have sliced up the elements slightly differently. So in other words, some of them overlap with each other, some of them kind of pull in different directions. They seem a bit in a kind of tension of some contradiction between each other. And there's not an order here. So it's not like first this one, and then number two ignites, and then number three ignites. It's all a web of mutually dependent potential illuminations.

So I said some we're just going to list and mention and some others we'll elaborate on just because of time on this retreat. And again, if this sounds interesting to you or if some of you either have already or will fall in love with this whole thing—you'll fall in love with this soul-making business—and if that's the case, then chase it up. This material is already out there on the web. Ask one of us, talk with each other. Learn from each other. But again, going back to that proactive listening possibility. And some of you won't, and that's fine. It's not quite for me. But if you want more, then take that into your own hands a little bit. Ask. Seek out.

So, I don't know whether to go through the list now. Just the whole thing? You want to hear the list? All right. I'll just name them, and some of them won't mean anything to you at all at this point, and that's fine. I'm probably going to go through it too fast to write it down at this point. Well, you can try. It depends how fast you write. We can have a race.

Okay, so, not in any order. This is the important thing. This is, again, mutually... this is the thing about dependent arising. There's not like cause and effect. There's a mutual arising and the mutual fading of things.

So we have 28 elements, and as I said, it's not exhaustive. Some of these elements imply each other or overlap, while others might even seem opposite. This reflects the nature of the imaginal—it's not a neat, linear system but a living constellation.

The first element is the lattice or constellation itself. The recognition that we are working with a constellation is fundamental, because it tells us that nothing is imaginal by itself. An image isn't imaginal simply because it appears mythic or fantastical. You might see a griffin or some other mythical creature, but that alone doesn't make it imaginal. What makes something imaginal is the relationship, the whole constellation of which it's part.

An image exists as much in my way of looking, my way of conceiving and relating, as it does in what appears before me. Some elements of this constellation are more subjective—they characterize the practitioner, the one relating to the image. Others are more objective—they characterize what appears. Together they form the imaginal constellation.

The second element is the energy body—the involvement of and sensitivity to the entire energy body. This is clearly a subjective element, something happening here in the practitioner.

The third element, which I've already mentioned, is love and being loved. The two-way flow of love is inherent in the imaginal.

Fourth is eros, which includes love but extends beyond it, as Catherine pointed out earlier.

Fifth is beauty. Something in the image touches us with a sense of beauty, though this may not be conventional beauty. The soul finds its own sense of the beautiful in whatever arises.

The sixth element is trust. This operates in multiple directions—I trust this image, even if it appears violent, disturbed, or utterly strange. I also trust the process itself, the whole practice we're engaged in. Without this trust, the imaginal cannot open fully.

This trust is essential because, as we discussed with doubt, when trust is absent, the imaginal closes down. Each of these elements works this way—their absence contracts the imaginal, while their presence allows it to flower.

It will just stay as an image, a bit more flat. But if I can introduce some trust, just a grain of trust—this thing is not what I'm used to, this thing looks like it's defilement, this thing, whatever it is—if I can introduce that, then that trust, again, in the dependent arising of things, it's like I put a grain of some kind of alchemical elixir in. Just some trust. And that does something, as it always does. It opens things out. Without the trust, it won't open out.

And of course, human relationships are like that as well, aren't they? But basically, dealing with images is a lot like being in relationship. One way of saying what we're saying this morning is that the whole thing is relational. We're talking about relationship in lots of different ways.

So sometimes this is hard, the trust thing. It's not like, "Oh, this is really easy," for lots of different reasons. But I think I said it in the Q&A yesterday afternoon—you can sometimes just put a ring fence around it. Five minutes, I'm going to play with some trust. I sprinkle that—you don't really sprinkle, Alexia, do you? Poor Alexia—a grain of sand of trust, whatever it is. Five minutes, I ring fence it, and afterwards, thank you very much, that was my little experiment in trust, and I can go back to holding it at arm's length or being slightly suspicious. So don't push yourself. But you'll probably notice something, as I said, that in that five minutes, the trust has a certain effect. It has to have an effect, because the whole thing is dependently arising, relational.

So seven is that an imaginal image in our sense is soul-making. In other words, there is a sense of soulfulness. It's partly circular, implied in all this—all the beauty and the love and the depth. And soul-making means that the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, what Catherine referred to the other night, is active. It's kicking in. All these things are opening each other and creating more complexity and beauty and all that. And soulfulness is more than heartfulness. It includes heartfulness, but it's more than heartfulness.

Number eight is a sense of dimensionality. This is not easy to put into words or even sometimes pinpoint. But that dimensionality—it's as if this thing is not flat. It has the vague sense of other dimensions to it. And these dimensions kind of move forward into divinity. Or rather, they recede into divinity. The divinity is implicit in this direction of dimensionality.

Connected with that is number nine. Images have a sense of something beyond, beyond just the surface. There's a beyond that I don't quite understand yet. In fact, they have a sense of unfathomability to them. I can't quite get to the bottom of them, just as actually a human being does, just as you do. When I don't feel my own unfathomability, I don't feel very well. There's something that's not right. Maybe some people are kind of stuck in that—you know, it would be difficult. You think, contemplate another human being, there's a sense of their unfathomability. An image is like this, unfathomable in lots of ways.

Number ten is related to this—the boundaries are elastic. This is actually soft and elastic. This is really important, because oftentimes what happens with perceptions, or we relate to an image with a certain idea, like it's this, and it just has kind of rigid edges. And again, like a human being, you think about your sense of self, or you bring to mind someone you love. Where are their edges?

Their edges are soft. You can't quite find where they are. And they're elastic. They move. They expand. I'm talking about the edges of being—the edges of who a person is, what an image is. It's soft and elastic.

And also, the concepts that we use in this whole paradigm are soft and elastic. They're precise, but they're also soft and elastic. And that's very important.

Number eleven: an image has a quality of eternality to it, of timelessness. Catherine used the phrase, "It's always already happening." So it's not so much a narrative, like I go on a journey and first this, and then I slay the dragon, and then I rescue the princess, and then we get married. This is not so characteristic of the imaginal. It's something—or if there is that narrative, that whole narrative is somehow always happening at the same time. So there's some sense of timelessness, eternality to the imaginal.

Number twelve—and again you can see how all these implicate each other or invite each other—is reverence. In the face of eternality, of timelessness, a natural response of the soul, if we allow it, if we don't get in the way, is reverence.

Number thirteen, which I've already touched on, is a sense of grace. There's a sense in which, with all the art that I can muster, and finesse and subtlety of altering my responses or changing my attitudes or the emphasis of energy and body and all this, and the art of how I can be active in relation to an image—there's also a very real fact or necessity to realize that an image is a grace. It's somehow given to us inexplicably from beyond. We don't control this thing.

Number fourteen—again you can see how connected these are—is humility. This is really important. In relation to this image, somehow I'm not regarding it as just mine, like a little puppet I can do what I want with, or that I can control, or that it's part of me. It's somehow bigger, and I am in the presence of something beyond, bigger than me, something I don't understand in some way. In some way divine, and therefore humility is again a very natural response if it's not blocked in us for some different reason.

Number fifteen: we're not reducing. This image doesn't mean just this. This image is not referring only to this thing that happened in my childhood, or this image means exactly and only this for my guidance. It doesn't only mean anything. You cannot fully capture an image or the implications of it or reduce it to something. It's not reducible to anything at all. It has this beyondness to it.

Sixteen is autonomy. The image is—again, it's not part of me. I don't own this image. It's like a person. It has, oftentimes, a personhood, and they have their autonomy. They do things. Images do things or say things that will surprise you. They're not in your control.

Now, in a way, they are in your control and you're creating them and it's a dependent arising, etc. So this is part of the art. I realize that, in a way, I grant an image its autonomy or the idea of its autonomy through my concept, my implicit concept at that time. You understand? So there's a dance here of—yes, it's autonomous and it's dependent arising. There's a very sophisticated sort of balance there in the art.

Seventeen—and with the autonomy, I'm explaining them all now—you don't ever lose your autonomy. This is another part of it. You don't lose your self-will. You're not going to be taken over and possessed by something so that you lose the ability to make heartful, rational, sensible choices. You have your autonomy. You need to assent. You need to participate.

So there's autonomy on both sides. And I think Catherine already alluded to this—there's two-ness. So it's not so much about dissolving in oneness. For soul-making, we retain a two-ness. Eros wants to retain two-ness. It wants to retain two. It needs that polarity between maybe me and the image—that two-ness is necessary. Well, let's say differentiations and particularities don't all dissolve. Maybe that's another way of saying it.

Eighteen—I will come back to this—it's theatre, or what I might call the middle way of the imaginal: neither real nor not real. It's really important. We get that sense. Oh yeah, someone asks you, "Would you say that's real?" Not quite. "Would you say it's not real?" Not quite. It's somewhere in between. I'll expand on that in a minute, hopefully.

Number nineteen, and related, is we realize that this image is created by us, we might say, but also discovered. To discover means it's already there. We create it and we discover it. And there's not really a word, in English at least, for getting that combination—that it's both created and discovered, or neither, or somewhere in between.

Number twenty is what we call the concertina, which means that when I'm relating to an image, I'm not shrinking it down. There's always a sense implicitly of other possible images. They might not be at all clear, but vaguely, it's like this is just one image of many possibilities. So it's not like this is the reality. This is one—there's a sense of there's more theatre possible. This is just what's happening in the play right now. But it could be different.

Twenty-one is in the imaginal sense is slightly less fabricated. I'm not even going to say anything about that right now.

Twenty-two is that concept is involved, even if it's implicit. A logos, some kind of idea—as Catherine was saying, some idea of what my suffering is, or something about suffering, some idea of anything at all. Ideas are actually implicit or explicit in the imaginal sense. We're not talking about a non-conceptual experience at all.

Number twenty-three is fullness of intention, which I've mentioned already and I'll come back to shortly. That's a very beautiful one—fullness of intention.

And twenty-four is duty, not beauty—duty. And that's, again, quite complicated. We'll come back to it. There's some sense of "I have a duty to this. I have a duty to this image." It's often not so literal. So it gets refracted into our life and into the way we live, or some attitude or something—what this duty is, or what's involved in that.

Twenty-five is an image is meaningful, which means it's full of meanings, and full of meanings that we can't even quite know what they are. So yes, they might have specific meanings. I can relate this to my—I mean, clearly that old king thing that I shared the other day is clearly very related to my situation, etc. But there's more. There's meaningfulness, which is different than meaning. "It means this," or even "it means these three things," or whatever it is. It's pregnant with a kind of infinity of meanings.

The twenty-sixth is—I just mentioned this now without even explaining—there's a kind of infinite echoing or mirroring between your life and an imaginal image.

They echo each other infinitely. They mirror each other infinitely.

The twenty-seventh element is that implicit in images are values, virtues, or ethical and moral dimensions. This is part of the meaningfulness. What's meaningful is wrapped up in an image—something of value that we find noble or beautiful, or important in life.

The twenty-eighth is participation. There's a sense of participating in something, and we may fill that out. That's quite a complex one, or quite a rich, profound one. We're participating in something much bigger than us. And yes, as was just mentioned, sacredness is absolutely implicit—divinity, holiness, something like that. Again, that has a very broad range of meaning, really broad. Some would be used to thinking of divinity this way or that way.

Alright, so that was the list. Let me reorganize here and say a few more things. I want to expand on one of them that I talked about—the middle way of the imaginal.

When I first thought about this phrase, there's a sense of theater. Like theater, you know, if you see really good theater—I have lots of friends who are very involved in theater, and I would go to performances where some theaters are really small. You're sitting right there with the actor and it's really intimate. You feel kind of naked there. And you know it's not real. But like all really good art, its power is potentially immense.

So there's something about this with image. It's not real. It's not not real. It's got this artistic or poetic truth to it and all the power that comes potentially with poetic or artistic truth.

But this is a tricky element, this neither real nor not real. I'm really not going to get into this now, but ontology is the fancy word for thinking about what is real and what isn't real. So the ontology, I think, is really interesting. And I would like to view it more as an open-ended exploration, a questioning of possible conceptions of reality and not reality, and that fine distinction of being right there in the middle. This relates to emptiness and all this, which also very much addresses the question of ontology.

So it's complex. It's infinitely rich. Humanity will never figure it out as a final answer. There's a whole history of it. It will continue as long as humanity is around, this whole philosophical endeavor. And it's variable—it's part of what can be variable in what we bring to the imagination, our whole concept of the reality status of things.

But what I would like to say is there's something about this paradigm that we're trying to unfold and open up: if we don't start with this imaginal middle way—neither real nor not real—as much as we can, just holding that in mind, if we can't quite get a sense of it, it's as if the whole thing gets off on the wrong foot a little bit.

If we can start there, it will be that the whole thing starts to, or can, draw in or expand the range of our notion of reality and bring in other things that we would have considered not real. It can expand the range there.

But there's something about starting with this middle way intention, as much as one is able. I know this is a really difficult one for people. But just as much as you can, it's almost like letting things unfold from there. If I start with some reality assumptions, it probably won't get so loosened, the whole thing. And again, actually, the range of experience and beauty and soulfulness that will open up will be less.

The middle way of the imaginal extends far beyond our initial understanding. While we typically encounter the middle way in dharma as the path between asceticism and sensual indulgence, there's another instance in the Pali Canon where the Buddha uses this term differently. In the Kacchayana Sutta, which Catherine referenced, the middle way becomes the middle way between reifying that something exists and asserting that it doesn't exist. This middle way refers to emptiness—neither existence nor non-existence.

Remarkably, about half of the entire Mahayana tradition bases itself on those two brief lines of dialogue between the Buddha and Kacchayana in the Pali Canon. The whole elaborate, beautiful, rich, deep, complex, and exquisite investigation of emptiness in Mahayana philosophy springs from that brief exchange.

Now we have a third meaning: the imaginal middle way of neither real nor not real, with all the theatrical quality and power that this encompasses. But I'd like to expand this understanding even further by adding two dimensions we've already implicitly explored.

The middle way of the imaginal isn't so much about static points as it is about balances and ranges. The first is the balance of range in the energy body's sense of density or insubstantiality. Sometimes a person experiences only a very ethereal sense of the energy body. But perhaps the imaginal middle way means having access to the whole range—sometimes dense and solid, sometimes very ethereal. One becomes free to move within that entire spectrum.

The third aspect involves dukkha. Again, this isn't a static point but an openness to the full range of imaginal experience. Some images are luminously glorious and free, while others—as both Catherine and I have shared—actually involve dukkha and pathology. The lame man as divinity carries his pathology. Hillman emphasized that all images must have pathologies, though I would disagree with that absoluteness. Can we simply open to the full range?

The imaginal isn't always triumphant, radiant, or glorious. Sometimes images involve dukkha, but the dukkha carries its own divinity and beauty. I've shared many such images, as has Catherine—the lonely wanderer, the soldier, images of old lonely men. Even when something appears very angelic, like the angels who came to kiss my heart and minister to me while I was struggling upstairs writing a book on emptiness, the luminous and angelic quality existed in relationship with the dukkha. The angels didn't dissolve everything with a triumphant "yippee, all is fine now." The dukkha remained part of the image, part of its beauty, humanity, and divinity.

Given all this about range, it's worth examining our tendencies. Does my imaginal experience tend always toward the ethereal and free of dukkha? Or does it always involve dukkha and solidity? Simply checking our range reveals our patterns.

Yet we must also acknowledge individual soul styles. Some people's energy body experience tends more commonly toward the ethereal. Others have what I call a darkness to them—images that tend to involve more pathology or dukkha. We need to respect and account for these individual soul styles rather than expecting everyone to be perfectly balanced around some midpoint.

The images that arise in this infinite echoing naturally reflect our lives. When I was struggling with writing that book, of course some images reflected that challenge. If we're moving through something difficult, that difficulty becomes woven into the imaginal fabric, not as something to be transcended but as an integral part of the sacred drama unfolding.

Expanding the idea of the middle way of the imaginal, one other element I want to pick out for now is this fullness of intention. I've already touched on this in various ways. Even when we have an intention for healing—and many people come to Dharma for healing in the broader sense, psychological healing, healing of the past, healing of dukkha—even this intention for healing may be something less than the fullness of intention. While most people come to the Dharma seeking some kind of healing, we're suggesting that even this doesn't quite reach the full scope of possibility here.

What fullness of intention means includes healing, yes, but extends to soul-making itself—the intention for soul, the intention for serving soul. We might not even fully understand what this means. This is a tricky territory, not perhaps very common to really explore, but I'm mentioning it as an important possibility.

Going back to what I said earlier, there are times in life when we need to seek guidance, listen for practical guidance about choices or difficulties. Sometimes, as I mentioned, an image will offer guidance: stay with what you're doing, you're doing good, this is beneficial, invest in that, do this. Sometimes this happens in different ways.

But more often, I think—and here's the crucial question—is it possible for the predominant intention to be for soul-making rather than for guidance? The fullness, the open-endedness, the sacredness, the partly incomprehensible nature of soul-making, of eros, of beauty. You can never fully understand beauty. Human beings will never get to the bottom of beauty, or eros, or many of these profound dimensions. They're fathomless.

Somehow, my assent and opening and intention for the fathomlessness of all this—this becomes more full as an intention. I think that relates to Lauren's question in the Q&A.

Sometimes, as I've mentioned this morning as well, you can simply play with a kind of inversion of concept. This image is bigger than me. It's greater than me. I am derivative of this image. Turn everything upside down.

You can hear, I think it's obvious, there's a kind of maturing that's possible over time with all this—with understanding what on earth this is all about, understanding in practice. It's definitely available, this possibility of maturing in understanding and in practice, understanding in relation to these elements and practicing with these different elements. That takes time. And that's really okay.

When I first started exploring some of this and trying to work with it in practice, figuring out how to approach it—if I think back to some of my old notebooks—the images there were much more narrative and complex, with casts of thousands, characters, all kinds of activity going on. Now, as I practice, there's something more distilled. An image emerges—not much happening, but possessing this eternal quality and something condensed within it. My sensitivity has grown much greater, my intuitive sense of attunement and skill.

Or when we introduced movement yesterday, there's a real possibility of gradual maturing and growing in the possibilities of movement in relation to soul. Or the logos Catherine was speaking about, the conceptual framework—this too takes time. Even just conceptually, what we're discussing is sophisticated. It's not simple. There are many shades to it.

At some point, as Catherine was sharing, something turns on and there's eros for logos. We become excited about it. This happened on the other retreat—someone was listening to an interaction in the Q&A and right then, something shifted in her relationship with concept. It became illuminated, and now there's added eros, there's soul in concept for her.

All this takes time. This business about the middle way, about not reifying, the fullness of intention—these dimensions are full and rich and subtle. They take time to grow and grow into. Know that.

Teaching for me is always contextual and always responsive. Especially in one-to-one work—I find teaching groups rather an impossibility, to be honest.

You're all so different and have different inclinations and histories and all the rest of it. If I'm one-on-one with a person, it's different.

So I might say to someone in regards to the neither real nor not real thing, "You're not really a dragon. Do you realize that?" Or to the same person at a different time, or another person: "Do you realize you're more really a dragon? You're more really that dragon with that dragon's mission than you are a human being in the way that you usually think of that and your story and all that."

So for me, this is part of the dance of the middle way.

What would be wonderful and what I would like to encourage and invite you to is: can you begin to explore and begin to feel, to notice, to live the effects of subtle shifts of emphasis or subtle shifts of view or the conceptual frame?

So, for example, what happens if I can shift with that real, not real thing, just micro-shift and actually see, "Wow, that's quite a different texture and flavor and sense of experience that opens up"? You have to feel this, notice it, live it, be impacted by it. We could talk all day long about real and not real and all that. There's something—if you're attracted to it and you begin to play with this, you will see: wow, it really does make a difference in the dependent arising of things.

Or with this fullness of intention—what happens when that opens up to another fullness? Oh, that also changes the whole image. All this is dependent arising.

So experiment, play, find out, know for yourself. Know it. You know it in the body. You know it in the kind of beauty and richness of the experience.

Oftentimes, without even really adopting a conscious position, we take one position. And we're kind of attached to it. And there isn't this kind of flexibility or skill or willingness to experiment and see what's the difference. We just decide—it's not even conscious usually—this is how I look at things. This is how I look at this. And we don't realize that actually it's a kind of attachment to one view or one emphasis.

So with all that, it's really okay. Wherever any of us are with all this, it's a journey. We're journeying in this most wondrous, rich, truly amazing landscape. And it's okay, wherever we are in that journey. Gradually we can explore that territory, it can become more full, and we can understand it, make it our own.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 157

Sensitivity, Receptivity, and Respect in Soul Work (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 1h05

> In this Q&A session from his Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma retreat, Rob Burbea addresses practitioners' questions about working with images in meditation. He explores the crucial distinction between narrative images (which unfold in time and often center the ego) and iconic images (which possess an eternal, timeless quality that opens deeper soul-making possibilities). Burbea discusses the autonomous nature of imaginal beings, emphasizing that images deserve respect as independent entities rather than ego projections to be manipulated. He examines the relationship between eros and inspiration in practice, explaining how soul-making naturally spreads from object to self to world when not obstructed. The teacher addresses common challenges including intensity-seeking, the proliferation of shallow images when tired, and the surprise that often comes when images don't conform to our expectations. Throughout, Burbea encourages experimental engagement with images while maintaining sensitivity to what genuinely opens soul-making versus what merely serves ego gratification. He touches on the mystery of participation in imaginal reality and how both practitioner and practice can become imaginal objects themselves.

We've covered quite a lot of ground already, and as you can see, there's much to this work. You've thrown yourselves into it, so I welcome any questions or reflections you might have.

Lauren's Question on Narrative versus Iconic Images

Lauren asks if I can say more about the difference between narrative images and images that are more—what's the word I use more often? Images that stay with something that's not so narrative.

Yes, I have mentioned this distinction, probably not for a while. I call one type a "narrative image." At first I wasn't sure about the terminology, and I actually spoke to a friend who suggested these words.

A narrative image is something that moves in time—it moves from a beginning, from a situation, through a series of events in time to some kind of resolution or conclusion. Often it stars guess who? And that's part of the problem.

In contrast, I call the other type an "iconic image," which is more eternal. This relates to that element we discuss—eternality or timelessness. But I really want to get away from dogma and give this back to you as an exploration. See what's the difference in your experience when you entertain narrative images and stories in meditation, with all the sensitivity we've been discussing, compared to an image that just sort of—either it doesn't really go anywhere, it's almost like a timeless snapshot of something, or a little period of something. Or it may be a narrative image, but there's this sense that it's always happening. In other words, the beginning is happening at the same time as the end, and it's not really moving toward some catastrophic thing or triumph.

The reason for this distinction is that often narrative images star "me" and work in a way that builds and solidifies the self-sense, the ego-sense, not making it so imaginal, not making it so "neither real nor not real." They tend to get reified—to be about me and about my life and about what I'm going to achieve. Not always, but this is the tendency. There's a quality of happening over time and space.

An imaginal image, by contrast, tends to be more—not static, but as I said, eternal, timeless. There's something condensed or distilled about it, some important essence that carries messages more than could be conveyed in a narrative, more than could be conveyed for a self that makes this journey and then achieves something.

Does that make sense? Again, I would give it back to you as an exploration. Open it and see if you can feel the difference and the difference in effect. My sense—I don't know what you'd call it, my positing—is that there will be a kind of richness and depth and mystery in the more iconic images. They will touch you deeper and be an unfathomable resource in ways that extend beyond just yourself, giving more of a sense of what we call soul.

On Meeting Imaginal Beings

You mention characters on a journey that you meet at different points—the same character doing different things in different situations. That sounds wonderful. It's all really fine. Again, I would just give it back to you: What feels soul-making? I know we're explaining it has this quality or that quality, but what we really want is your firsthand experience of feeling that difference. You might not be able to articulate it, or maybe you can now with some of this language, but it simply has a different sense.

I would wager that you're going to prefer that sense to anything else, even if the other kind makes you more assertive or efficient in life. There's going to be some attraction to this soul-making quality over and above anything it gives you on a practical level. You can just follow that.

In terms of the images you're describing—meeting characters in different situations, having different kinds of interactions with imaginal beings—that sounds great.

When the Mind Creates False Narratives

I'll add one more thing: sometimes an image is actually not a narrative image, but the mind makes it into one, or thinks it is. I can only think of one example right now. I was walking on Dartmoor, near where I used to live, and the earth reached up these tentacles toward me with a kind of desire toward me. It was a wonderful image, really beautiful. But that was it—a brief snapshot. The mind could add extra elements, like "it pulls me down to what?" But that addition would be unnecessary. The power was in the iconic moment itself.

To dissolution, to union, to something. But actually it didn't. It was the moment of reaching, you know. Does that make sense? It's like, I was thinking, "Oh, this is an image about union," but actually it wasn't, because it never got to union. The image was preserved the tunas. Sometimes the mind jumps to a conclusion that's not actually there in the image.

How does that relate to the concertina? The more imaginal any image gets, the more this quality of timelessness is apparent, and it becomes almost a way we recognize an image. All the images in the concertina—it's like they're just there in the shadows. Usually you can't even make out what they are. Sometimes they may be related to this person in front of me.

I'm looking at my friend, my beloved, sensing her with soul, with imagining, and I can sense that there's almost like a selection of images available, kind of like a halo or cloud of available images. But any one of them is always already happening. It's going to be eternal.

For instance, here I am working in this dyad and looking, and there's the Eros, and I sense her as the cosmic mystical queen—whatever—and I might be in that image. I start to get involved as the cosmic mystical king, and there's this dyad there, and it's beautiful. That's one image, but it's always happening, and whatever they do is always happening. It's almost like you're tapping into something that's always happening.

But in relation to her as an object in this example—or it could be a tree or whatever—there could have been other images. These are what's waiting in the concertina. They will probably also have this sense of always already happening. It's as if you're tapping into some kind of more eternal level of things.

So Zazie is asking about an image that came on the last retreat—the most profound experience of your life—an atomic bomb, all the nodes, all the elements going off, tremendous opening. Since then, nothing has quite lived up to that sort of technicolor extravaganza experience. There's disappointment and comparison and craving, wanting that kind of intensity of opening again.

This is really important. An image is autonomous. It's like you're in relationship with a being. It's really helpful to think of it this way: this is another being that I'm in relationship with. Imagine if you and someone else were close friends or lovers or whatever, and you just had this amazing experience.

If you treat them with respect and care, you receive one response; if you approach them with demands or manipulation, you encounter quite another. This is simply the natural way of dependent arising in the imaginal realm.

So yes, that intensity was wonderful. It might have been exactly what you needed at that particular moment, what your soul required then. But that doesn't mean it's what's needed now. Further deepening, further opening, further refining and nuancing and widening—all of this may not come through intensity at all.

This points to something important about practice in general. Sometimes we become tremendously impressed by intensity, mistaking it for the measure of profound transformation or opening or learning. Sometimes intensity does indeed catalyze deep change, but often it simply remains just that—intense. We can fall into seeking intensity as a marker of significance when it may indicate nothing of the sort. This is precisely where wisdom must enter.

The second consideration involves the relationship between jhanic experience—mystical experience in general—and imaginal experience. Often, when someone practicing jhana and deep samadhi breaks through to a new state for the first few times—perhaps their first jhana or whatever territory is new for them—the experience feels like a dam breaking. It seems completely effortless and utterly mind-blowing. This might happen several times. And then the real work begins.

It's rather like falling in love, where everything feels magical and effortless for the first few months, and then the deeper work of relationship begins—or doesn't, as the case may be. That's where genuine depth can emerge.

In jhanic experience, what happens next is that the feeling of complete effortlessness gradually shifts. You begin noticing incredibly subtle differences and discovering subtle ways to shape the experience. This is where the real learning and authentic relating unfolds. The same principle applies to working with images.

Again, it's worth contemplating this quality of autonomy and personhood—and sometimes even recognizing that this is bigger than me. Therefore, I might ask: am I subjecting this being to my ego's demands? If I do, there will indeed be consequences. This doesn't mean that if I don't make such demands, the intensity will necessarily return. Rather, it's about entertaining a different conception, a different way of playing with relationship.

Consider this possibility: This is bigger than me. It contains more than I can possibly understand. It's both grace and mystery. I will never fully comprehend it with my ordinary mind. How would you relate to such a phenomenon? Certainly not by trying to make it serve whatever small, self-centered ends you might have.

Does this make sense?

Within the larger scope of practice, you're going to open and learn and grow and change through various means—sometimes through intensity, sometimes through one image repeated many times, sometimes through countless brief, one-time images. All of these contribute to your unfolding.

How does this sound? Rather than simply putting down that seeking quality, can you pick up something else—a more skillful way of entering into relationship, not just with that particular image, but with all images?

There's something here, I think, about a very common misunderstanding regarding intensity. Sometimes people fear intensity entirely—I don't sense this is your issue, but some practitioners need to learn: Can you bear a little more intensity? Can you open to a little more energy? But making the mistake of equating intensity with liberation or transformational experience—that assumption definitely needs questioning.

"Great, thank you. Chris, yes, please."

"Good afternoon. Thank you." Chris pauses. "So this happened before we even mentioned anything about pilgrimage."

"Oh, that's interesting as well, isn't it?"

Chris shares that just yesterday, completely spontaneously, an image of three pilgrims appeared in consciousness. There was a kind of halo around them, and they were carrying shepherd's staffs with curved hooks. His mind immediately judged this as "a bit hackneyed, a bit clichéd," leaving him uncertain how to proceed. When the pilgrims began to move away, he wondered: Should I engage? Should I follow them? Or is this just my ego creating fantasy?

"There are several things to consider here," I respond.

I don't even want to use the word mistakes, but we've got to be free enough to just try things and see how they feel. So if you hear me giving examples where I say, "Oh, then I tried this, no, that didn't feel right, that wasn't helpful," so I revert, or the image changes, I try something else and it doesn't work. It's okay to feel like, "Oh, that wasn't quite the right thing," or "I'm putting too much pressure on it."

I think you've got to feel free to just see what happens, play and see what happens.

Some of you may not feel this at this point, but there's a kind of superabundance of images. If you feel like "Oh, I missed it with that one," it's okay. On the other hand, maybe bringing it back deliberately and just hanging out and seeing what resonates with you—maybe walking with them, maybe just whatever it is—you can find your way back more deliberately to that and just try and see what happens.

But I don't think there's a kind of right and wrong. One of the things I'd really like to communicate on this retreat is the willingness to experiment without a sense of right and wrong and just see what happens. I think the key word there for me is experiment, which implies doing a range of things.

Sometimes what happens is a person might show up, and I've been working with images for ages—it's what I do—but there's actually a fairly fixed way of relating to them, and there isn't that experimentation there. There are different images, but how they relate to them is quite fixed. Does that make sense?

So this is the thing: don't be afraid—I don't even want to call them mistakes—don't be afraid to just try different things. You'll get a feel for what feels more soul-making. We learn in comparison to what doesn't. So in a way, maybe you have to go on a narrative and then make them do stuff and push them around and then realize it doesn't feel right.

On the other hand, as we said in some exchanges, it's not as a rule that me making stuff happen means it's not going to be soul-making. It might be. So it's not like anything can happen, but I'm going in there with a sense of "Well, let's see, let's play a little bit and use my intuition as to what might feel soul-making."

And then it's interesting—the fact that you had that image and then Catherine introduced that thing last night, and several people have said that they have an image and then the world seems to do something very similar. Great. That opens up all kinds of questions, which is beautiful, and I'm not going to say much more about it.

"I feel really at home in the imaginal. I feel very excited about all the images. There's something about inspiration—I can't quite put my finger on it, but I kind of feel the world of possibilities."

About eros and inspiration? They're definitely connected. There's no question. We haven't talked a lot about eros on this retreat—we have in the past in other retreats, and we could talk endlessly about eros and beauty and what it does. But eros, by definition, is a kind of alive state. It's a state of ignition and awakeness and interest and fire, illumination, all that. So all those qualities go with a state of inspiration. There are just those parallels.

But I think more than that, a state of inspiration or artistic inspiration has eros in it. There's a sense—I'll say this from my experience artistically, and if it doesn't fit yours, that's fine—but when you're inspired with something, you're kind of in love with this thing that you're doing.

Someone asked Stravinsky, the very prolific composer, "What's your favorite piece that you've written?" He said, "The one I'm writing right now." In other words, it is part of the creative process to have eros about this thing. It's got this mystery and this attraction for us. You understand?

And I would say—we've mentioned this but not fully explored it—that when there is eros for other, whether it be a piece of visual art or whatever it is, or an object in nature or an internal image, if we don't get in the way, at some point the self becomes imaginal as well. And so the artist at work, or that meditator inspired, has an image going on, a fantasy of themselves doing the work, doing the practice, dedicating themselves. Do you understand?

To some people that sounds like ego, that sounds like, "Well, I'm not concentrating on the thing because I should be lost in the object." No. There's actually—this is what happens, and we may talk more about this on the retreat—the eros spreads. And you'll notice when you're really inspired, then you go for a walk or whatever, and how does the world seem? The eros, the soul-making, will spread: self, other, world, everything. So everything becomes imaginal and becomes an object of eros, infused with eros.

So then I, as the image of the artist painting or whatever it is, I become an object of eros for myself. I become image for myself. And this to me is absolutely beautiful. So all that goes on in inspiration. Inspiration, I think, is full of eros.

We haven't lingered on it too much, but there's—Catherine talked about it—this idea of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and how it works together, but that we can get in the way of that in many different ways and stop it from doing its thing. So sometimes what happens is we stop it from coming back to ourselves. Catherine mentioned this: we stop—the other is divine and imaginal and we're not, for instance. And that's kind of lopsiding the whole process, and it doesn't move so well. It doesn't deepen and grow so well.

So there's all that. And then we can talk about eros in terms of fire analogies, also water analogies. It's a very juicy state, you know. And you'll feel that in the experience as well.

But I'm not sure if this is what you're after. Okay, good. So is there more there? Yeah. Where is it going to stop? Right. Yeah. So the question is, where is it going to stop? Is it a question of curiosity? Is there concern? Or is it not really a question?

But that's—in the conceptual framework that we have, that's a central principle: that if we don't get in the way, it won't stop. What does that mean, it won't stop? It means, similar to what I just said—okay, I start something, whatever thing it is, a piece of art that I'm doing or someone else's piece of art or a tree or a person or an internal image as an object of eros. It might start there. It could start with the world though. It could start at any place.

And then that becomes erotic, imaginal, other for me. And in the process, in the—I don't know what you call it—the movement, the involvement, the dance of eros-psyche-logos, it starts to involve me, as I just explained, and then the world, and then other objects, and then even aspects of me.

So then it's like, then even—for instance, my eros becomes, not just me, but aspects of me. Like for instance, my eros becomes an erotic imaginal object for me. My eros is seen and felt imaginarily, and with all that it starts to have dimensionality and divinity. My eros—is it mine, or is it God's, or the Buddha nature's, or whatever.

There's something—it will keep finding new faces of belovedness and new aspects and new complications and new folds in whatever it is. And if we don't get in the way, it won't stop. So there's an endlessness that's possible here.

[responding to question]

That's really important. So Maisie is saying, particularly towards the end of the day, mind just starts whirring up images, lots of images, very quickly, one after the other, and none of them seem particularly deep or anything. They're sort of interesting at a certain level, but not particularly soul-making or interesting.

To me that sounds like a particular type of mental tiredness, which I also get. Some people, when they get tired, everything just kind of stops in their mind. And other people, when they get tired, it gets a bit faster, this kind of thing. So it sounds a little bit like that, towards the end of the day.

It might be then there's a time to kind of let go of those images and come back to body and something much more simple and nourishing. And your mind might still wander—it's a bit tired—and just see if you can work with that kind of gathering the energy rather than trying to figure out now which one of these images and why aren't they meaningful and that sort of thing. Does that make sense?

So sometimes you get a sense, despite what I said about doubt and everything, sometimes you get a sense that this thing or that thing is not really worth particularly following. It's just sort of flotsam and jetsam of the mind that's floating around because of tiredness.

So if I understand it, Nicole's asking that there's a lot of eros that's comfortable and lovely and all that. And the question is about eros in regard to long-term projects, which there's a sort of personality inclination to want to commit to and to stay with, or long-term relationships or whatever. And is there something to be said about eros in relation to long-term projects?

I think there's something again about including the dukkha. I'm tired tonight so I can't really think of examples, but you gave an example of me writing my book, and several aspects became image there. Again, the book itself became image at a certain point. And then the writing of the book, including the difficulty of it and the isolation and things like that.

It might be that you're not looking for something that doesn't have dukkha in it. The image of the one who perseveres, the one who trudges endlessly through deserts or whatever it is, the one who shows up no matter what—all this can become image.

The way we're using it, imaginal image and eros, they kind of imply each other. Where there's eros, if it's left to do its thing, images are born and get deeper and get more varied. And images by their nature elicit eros, evoke eros, and so the whole thing starts mutually inseminating.

But it might be that there are images of whatever they are for you—for this long-term dedication, this willingness to be there when it's dry and when it has a cost and when you'd rather be doing something else. All that can become image. It might be an image that's other, or it might be you as image, or mixtures of all that.

And the other thing—it's a little harder to articulate—is that you can't have images all the time. That's part, for me, that's part of the grace aspect, so that we feel we're given an image or we have access to something and then it goes. If it was there all the time it might just get a bit ordinary, you see.

We can—it's as if, let's say, taken as an image of the long-term sort of commitment—someone who just has got to trudge, she has got to trudge through this desert to get to wherever, and they just need to walk. But there are little oases on the way, and sometimes the connecting with an image is like hitting an oasis for a while. It kind of can hold you more firmly. It's not going to be all the time necessarily.

Does that make sense? Is there a piece missing? Are you sure?

So if... I actually do work in my life. I do. It's not a problem that I have, but I guess it's like—I don't know if this is a correct concept—but if there is a love or something...

The question is: when we love something, is there always an image underpinning it?

It depends on how you mean "always." So I would say yes. When we really love something and we're devoted to it—maybe those two words, love and devotion—there's an image there. And I think that's part of... There's an image operating and driving that. You could say the drive for it is coming from the image as opposed to being a result of the love. That's a certain way of looking at it.

I would say to realize that is a certain level of psychological awareness. It's not an awareness that everybody has or that society kind of realizes or whatever. I would say that. However, so that's the "always" in that sense. In every instance there is. However, at times we lose contact with an image. And then there's just the dryness and the slog or whatever it is. And that's where these oasis businesses come in.

Yeah, and that can even form another level of image. Again, if you go back to the timelessness, it's like looking at your life from beyond death. You look back at the totality of your life—these periods of long dedication with periods of aridity and periods of inspiration and periods of non-inspiration, and the willingness to continue in the periods of non-inspiration. Do you get what I'm saying? That can become image. It's like a different vantage point on the aridity. Aridity, aridness, whatever.

So that's also connected to this time thing. And actually, just as a general point, that's sometimes a really skillful thing to do: to come out of your life and look at the totality from after death, so to speak. You see the totality of your life, and it can become image. You become, again, you become image for yourself. Your life becomes image, becomes pilgrimage, becomes image of devotion, etc. Hopefully, depending on how we live and all that.

I can't see. Is that Mewa? Okay.

Yeah. So if I try to understand, other retreats where there's a lot of intensity to the whole process and the images and things, and this retreat less intense but perhaps more subtle and more, getting more nuance. And then when Catherine did the seven steps exercise, was it that lots of different images were coming out very rapidly?

No. Okay. I missed the last bit. Another logos once.

Yeah, yeah. So, if I understand you right, following Catherine's instructions this morning and what we played with there, there felt the sense of trying that with different images and a sort of losing the sense of grace and the sense of replacing that with a sense of, "Oh, there's a kind of automatic process here that I can sort of do," and that lost the sense of beauty and specialness and mystery and grace. Is that?

Yeah. Yeah. Yeah. Okay. So, I mean, a couple of things.

Continue beautifying this talk (part 8/11). Maintain the same tone and style as previous parts.

One possibility is that Catherine and I were just talking briefly—it's not really a formula so much as an invitation to recognize something almost miraculous. Rather than a series of steps, consider this: can you see the beauty in each element itself? For instance, the practice that really struck me this morning was asking forgiveness—saying sorry. That deeply touched me, this offering of apology on behalf of the human species, certain cultures, and myself.

Rather than approaching this as step-by-step instructions—one, two, three, seven, ignition, takeoff—these are invitations to learn about practice and the mystery of participation in the imaginal. When my humility and willingness to say sorry becomes genuine, that act itself can become image. Rather than a technique, it transforms into something imaginal.

Your identity as soul-making practitioner can become image as well. This isn't a technique of mastery but a mystery of initiation, involving both art and grace, where you yourself become image. Your participation in something utterly mysterious—the profound levels of what participation means—can become imaginal.

The wonder lies in recognizing that everything can potentially become image. Within that recognition, you as practitioner, you as participator, can become image. This business of participation—the final node we've explored—remains the most mysterious of all the elements. The meaning and profundity of our participation in reality, truth, perception, in what things are and what opens up—sensing and feeling into that can become soul-making. This differs entirely from having a set of techniques and tricks to switch things on. It operates at a completely different level.

Let me check how we're doing time-wise. I'm tired, but not in a way that prevents continuing—more that I recognize I'm not quite as sharp as I usually feel. I'm comfortable with that if you are. Should we continue with a few more questions?

Matt asks about our use of the word "image," which we've employed in various senses without careful distinction. There's image in the usual sense—like the tentacles emerging from the earth I mentioned earlier. Then there's the sense of something becoming image, which carries different meaning entirely.

For something to become image means it begins to be perceived imaginally, sensed with soul. Many of you have experienced this arriving at Gaia House—something here was initially just a something, and at some point it begins to be perceived with beauty, dimensionality, mysterious depth, and all the rest. This could happen with a person who starts as simply a person you like or dislike, or relate to functionally, but then becomes imaginal for you. There develops an eros toward them—not necessarily sexual—a profound beauty, mystery, unfathomability. Rather than just a person, they become imagery, meaning something you can never quite articulate, carrying resonances in your soul with beauty and depth.

Roxanne raises a fascinating question about expectations in practice. She notices that when working with images toward soul-making, things never unfold as expected. She might begin with heartbreak, wanting to visualize something dark like a monster to match her feeling, but instead a beautiful image emerges—not something she was reaching for, but what naturally comes, offering profound meaning.

This points to something essential about imaginal practice...

That's what elicited and opened the soul-making—the image that actually came to you, rather than the image you thought you wanted. Is that so?

"Yes, and it seems I keep encountering this. We were going through the seven stages, and I was practicing, and I just thought of an image..."

Is there a problem here? In our logos, the images are autonomous—they're like people with their own intelligence and sensibility and care. All of which sounds like what you're experiencing. To be surprised, I think, is part of the territory. So it sounds great.

I think in different ways people will be surprised, and recognizing the autonomy—this is why we make that an element, recognizing the autonomy of the image. Look, if I could make everything do what I think I want everything to do, it wouldn't be very fulfilling or rich.

In relation to the first thing you said about feeling—was it sadness? Grief, okay. Grief and heartbreak. And then the image that arises is beautiful. But if we go back to what we said with Gladys, I can also become image in relation to the image that arises for me. So I am heartbroken and a beautiful image might then touch my heartbreak. The whole thing becomes the image, rather than just that part. You understand? You can begin to feel that actually what the image is, is that beauty in relationship to your heartbreak, in contact with it. The whole thing is image. Does that make sense?

"Yes, yes."

So again, not thinking, "Oh, that doesn't seem right." It's the two together. It's great.

Okay, maybe one last question.

"It's something about the way in which the image has more tolerance—that's clear. Yet sometimes, particularly when that image arises from a personal experience of suffering or whatever, there's a sense in which it's arising from the ground of my own experience. The image is arising with its autonomy, and yet I'm also there. I guess the confusion is about the connectedness between the image and myself. Sometimes the image might seem something totally separate from you. But it also always feels very personal. That raises the question about what you said before about the image—there's a sense that it's always been there. That's the thing. It's always been there, and yet it's wisdom from this personal experience."

So if I understand, Margaret is asking two questions. There's a sense in which an image feels autonomous, and yet it also seems like it's part of me. That's one. And the other is about images being timeless, while I can also see that they arise from personal experience.

All these are true. An image is me and not me. That particular sense of it being me and not me is more characteristic of images than either "it is me" or "it isn't me." There's some quality—it's me and not me. So that's exactly right.

When we say autonomy, it's almost like you can lean on that element a little bit to grant the image more space, to stop it collapsing into being just me. But it's never to the point where it feels like this has nothing to do with me. Actually, sometimes there is that sense, but usually that's where the infinite echoing and mirroring comes in. Usually there's some sense that this image, strange as it might seem, in mysterious, infinite ways, echoes in my life and my life echoes the image. The image echoes my life and they mirror each other.

So it's about subtle leanings. As I said, some of the elements in this lattice, this constellation, feel like they say the same things in different words or overlap.

And some of them feel a bit contradictory, you know. So does that make sense?

Similar with the timeless and the reflecting—usual modern psychology holds that an image arises because it's reflecting something that happened in the past. I think what's really potentially exciting and a beautiful thing to play with is: what happens if we turn that upside down? My life is a reflection of image.

The causality is—we're so used to thinking of causality in a certain way. It comes out of this scientific way of thinking: the past causes the present, and something that happened externally will cause an internal image to arise. What if we just play with that?

There's this Greek word called telos—it means the cause comes from the end. So this, if you like, the angel out ahead or something, the future causes the past. We can say, "What's all that?" But what if we can just play with that as a poetic idea and see what happens? So that my life is an expression of certain images. Certain things happen to me, certain choices are made, certain things are expressed because I am expressing certain images. I can say more than that—I am called on to express certain images.

Now, if I say "that's the truth," then maybe that's a little too tight. But you can play with turning things upside down. Do you understand? And I would say, if you can play with that, it's quite a different sense of things, and something very beautiful opens up. We can keep the other one too, and go back to the traditional or more common way of thinking about causality: "Yeah, this arises because of a cause in the past," etc.

Is this making sense to people?

And of course, traditional dharma understanding involves understanding causality in the present—my relationship with what's happening makes something arise right now in the present. So causality is really interesting. Most of us find it really, really hard to shift our concepts of causality from this kind of linear thinking where past and external events determine everything. For instance, "the events of my childhood caused this." It's not saying they didn't, but it's just saying there can be tremendous liberation, tremendous healing, and a tremendous soul adventure to sometimes play with turning that on its head.

Just play with that as a concept and see what that idea, very lightly, does to my imaginal sense, to my sense of existence, to my sense of what this life is, to my sense of—for instance, what Nicole asked about—dedication to something. All of that.

I can see my life is caused by—it has divine roots, it grows from the divine, the images of the divine, the gods, the deities, the daemons, and they express through me. They want something through me. Something to play with.

"Can I ask another question?"

"Sure."

"Which is around the me in the image. So I'm hearing—every time I go to the image, I become part of the image. Is that...?"

So the question is, every time you've had an image, somehow you enter the image.

"Yeah, so the imaginal other is related to me in the image. It's not necessarily related to me. There's an image of you in the whole... Yeah, so is that right?"

Yeah, all kinds of things can happen in terms of the self-sense. So it could be—just to delineate a few—it could be exactly what you're saying. Here's this imaginal other, and then I get an imaginal me interacting with the imaginal other. One possibility. Fine, beautiful.

Or that image is relating to me sitting here, as me. Or, as someone was reporting earlier, it's just that image—there's no me. And that image is just doing their own thing in their own world, doing their own thing. And that's where it's a bit more subtle. It's like, "What's this got to do with me?" Sometimes it's just not that apparent.

And sometimes those are oftentimes the most inexplicably beautiful images as well. This is where this infinite echoing and mirroring—it does have something to do with me.

Again, it's me and not me. And in some mysterious ways that image is refracted into my life and my life echoes that image. So that's a possibility—all kinds of possibilities. I don't think there's a fixed way that this happens.

The beauty lies in remaining open to these endless reflections, these infinite mirrorings that connect us to something vast and mysterious. Whether the images arise as clearly connected to our personal journey or appear as strangers living their own lives in distant worlds, they each carry something essential. Each reflection, each echo, offers its own teaching, its own invitation to see more deeply into the nature of experience itself.

This is the profound intimacy of imagination—how it weaves together the personal and the universal, the familiar and the strange, the self and the not-self. In these quiet moments of receptivity, we discover that the boundaries we typically maintain begin to soften, and we find ourselves participating in something much larger than our ordinary sense of who we are.

Let's rest in this understanding together, allowing whatever wants to arise in the silence to simply be present with us.

CHAPTER 158

Voice, Movement, and the Possibilities of Soul (2)

Rob Burbea · 53 min

> In this continuation of embodied dharma exploration, Rob Burbea leads participants through a series of movement and vocal practices designed to open new dimensions of awareness beyond traditional stillness meditation. The session begins with participants choosing between silent practice or continued movement exploration, emphasizing the importance of discerning genuine guidance from habitual patterns.
> The teachings move through several distinct practices: channeling uninhibited movement (the 'drunken dancer'), warrior postures that ground power in the lower body while connecting to earth energy, expansive breathing movements that relate self to space and cosmos, throat-based vocalizations, gentle head movements that attune to stellar and terrestrial forces, and pelvic rotations with sound. Each practice is offered with multiple variations - allowing movement to lead awareness, or having imaginal images guide embodied expression.
> Burbea emphasizes developing sensitivity to energetic, emotional, and imaginal dimensions that arise through these practices, while maintaining connection to both intimate bodily awareness and vast cosmic space. The session concludes with participants working with personal images in either still or moving meditation, exploring devotional relationship, identification, or energetic exchange with imaginal presences. This approach represents Burbea's distinctive integration of embodied practice with his soulmaking dharma teachings, opening practitioners to dimensions of experience beyond conventional mindfulness approaches.

I'm very confused. It's hard to tell for me right now what's needed.

I had planned to continue our exploration of movement that we started the other day and do some different things with that. But I just can't tell if it's the right thing. Maybe it's the right thing for some of you and not for others. So I'm going to give you the problem instead of me.

What do you feel would be helpful now? Would it be helpful to continue your practice in silence? This is a question for each of you rather than coming to a committee meeting decision together. Would it be helpful to continue in silence and more stillness? Or would it be more helpful to continue exploring that thread of movement that we started the other day?

Asking what is helpful sometimes is not easy because sometimes we have a certain inertia or a habit pattern in one way or another. We tend not to like to move because we're just used to being still, and sometimes there's just sluggishness or a habit of being still. Or sometimes we want to move because we don't want to be still, and it's just a kind of reactive thing.

I don't know. But if we give each of you the choice, then for those that want, we can continue to explore the movement as we began two days ago. For others, we have a kind of free schedule this afternoon. You can walk or move outside or practice sitting outside and come back later. How does that sound?

Let's just take thirty seconds together and see what the kind of guidance is, which is different than just habit. You understand? There's really no right or wrong or better or worse option, just see if you can get a sense of what would be fruitful for your practice at this time.

The mats are going to be cleared, so whether you're staying or going, perhaps if we could move the mats, and then those who don't want to stay can have a free practice period outside. You can sit in the lounge if you want somewhere indoors to sit in meditation. Some of it was a bit intense for some people last time, so it won't be so intense today, just so you know that.

So if we move the mats and make your choice, and then we'll see who's left.

Okay, so again, if we can spread homogeneously through the space so each person has some room. Two things, as before: it's all optional. The whole thing is optional, as I just pointed out, but also any part of it is. I've done something relative to my back and ribs, so I'm not going to be hardly moving at all. So if any movement doesn't feel right, don't do it, or just adapt it to what your body can do safely for you right now.

Let's just start again feeling the contact with the floor, feeling that rootedness, feeling the uprightness of the body. There's the gravitational pull and there's also a line of energy up from the earth, and the body gathers, organizes itself around that vertical with the sense of contact. Then the whole body as a field of awareness, a field of bodily texture, vibration, energy.

Taking just a minute to move your body however you would like in a way that just feels like it helps to loosen it up a little bit. So whatever that is for you right now.

Great. And feeling the contact again.

Now, the other day you all channeled with remarkably intimate insight this state of a drunken person. I was really, really impressed. This same friend of ours has been invited to a disco party—a seventies disco party, not trance techno. And they're even more plastered now. They're a really bad dancer. They have no idea that they're a bad dancer. They're loving it. They're totally into it.

Just for a couple of minutes, channel the boogie. You're really, really uncoordinated. It cannot possibly look good. You can hardly keep balance. There's not a trace of self-consciousness.

Yeah, okay, that's great. That's superb. You guys really know this. Wonderful.

Now, last time we did this thing with the fierce warrior, I want to tone that down a bit or take a different approach. Actually, I think it's better for this if, as much as possible, we arrange ourselves so you're facing the wall. So you're really doing this in your own space, kind of toward the wall, rather than in other people's faces. Perhaps we could form two ovals—if people face the wall, then it might leave people in the middle forming a smaller oval. Maybe I'll go into the middle to help with the arrangement.

Now we're going to do this two ways. There won't be any vocals with this one like there was last time with the screaming. So it's just with the body.

Catherine, can you demonstrate that? Yes, so this time it's like that—not like Gandalf. Again, it's this warrior who's got tremendous power in their legs, in their hips, in their pelvis, drawing energy down into the ground from the earth and down into the earth. But they're expressing this—I'm not going to do it myself—by stomping.

Catherine will demonstrate in a minute. But again, if you have any physical fragility at all, just temper your stomping. You've got to stomp, though. You can have a staff if you want. You can embellish this as you like.

Let me explain the two ways we'll approach this. The first way is to let the movement lead. So you do the movement, which is basically stomping with as much energy and awareness and intention and power and force in the lower half of the body. Then see what that brings up or what you're aware of energetically, or perhaps imaginatively. The movement leads and the awareness notices. Does that make sense?

What's that? Perhaps people don't know what stomp means. Do you want to show them?

So that's quite a vigorous stomp. My vertebrae would probably just crumble if that happened, but temper it to what your body can actually do. That's great. And you can do one after another. So just something from the body and let the soul be aware of what happens through the body. Does that make sense?

So let's go with that. When you're ready. Take your time as well. You can pause between stomps. There's the energy body awareness, there's imaginal awareness, simple mindfulness, emotional awareness—just see what you notice. And then maybe you want to stomp and let it resonate after the stomp in the stillness, and see what you notice resonating in the stillness, if anything.

Please respect your body.

[Practice period]

Okay, that's wonderful, thank you. Now, slight variation on that.

Yeah, take a moment to let your body rest a little bit.

Now for a slight variation. This time, an image leads, but it's a deliberate prescribed image of some kind of warrior, as I was describing—someone who embodies this quality. How does that warrior move?

You have a small space to work with. How do they exude and demonstrate the ferocity and power and strength that they have? None of this means badness ethically, or evil, or any of that business. So it might come out something very similar to what you just did, or it might come out different. Maybe your arms are involved, maybe your mouth is involved, but we're not vocalizing at this point.

You understand—the image leads, and see how the body enacts that image. When you're ready.

Perhaps there's a kind of feedback loop between the gestures that you make and the movements, and then the effects of those movements in the psyche. And that shapes the next movement, or what you want to do, or whether to be still. Do this in a rhythm, at a pace that enables you to also be sensitive to the effects and the feelings—emotional, sensational, energetic, imaginal.

How does your belly feel, your lower belly? What is the sense of the vertical alignment of the body? And also the alignment of the intention?

Now one more variation. Let the space of this hall that we're in, allow an awareness of that, and how does that influence the movement, influence the expression or transmission or enactment, embodiment? So there is a wider awareness—yes the body, yes the emotions, the energy, perhaps an image—but somehow it's connected to this space and the physical dimensions, geometries and actuality of this space.

You might have no idea what that means, but just what happens if you include that in the awareness? Stay facing the wall. You might want to glance at the room, just remind yourself what it looks like, but you probably know by now. And anyway, if it's an imaginal space, that's also fine. See what that does.

Again, in the time, the tempo, the rhythm that allows you to notice as much as possible as well. Same warrior, but in a certain space to which the senses are open. There's some kind of intimate connection, almost a physical connection between this warrior, their movements and the walls and the space of this hall. Some mysterious, almost physical, energetic, imaginal connection. They are two and they are one.

In the last few seconds for this warrior to exude in the body their essence, their being, their duty.

Lovely. Thank you.

Take a breather, maybe just a little bit of loosening of the body after those jerky motions, whatever needs to shake and loosen. Some breaths.

The next one—many of you will be familiar with this kind of movement. This one I can actually do. The hands come to the lower belly, like that, however that feels right. And then with the in-breath, they expand out like that. And with the out-breath, they come back in. See—big. Simple as that.

Your legs probably hip-width or even wider apart. Some of you will be familiar with this movement from certain other practices. For those people, I wonder—it would be really interesting to not just go straight into the usual way of seeing it or conceiving of it or interpreting it. That might be quite interesting. Can this become a movement that's open to other ways of sensing it, other ways of imagining it?

So it's really just that. And you can, if you like, feel yourself again really rooted with the floor, the connection with the floor, and perhaps centered, as if the center of your body is the lower belly, if that makes sense. And then you're breathing from there out into the world, or breathing in the world and then out, something like that.

Good enough? In-breath, the arms come out. Out-breath, they come back in.

If that feels wrong, switch it around. Just see. There's not like a right or wrong here. We're just partly developing different kinds of sensitivity. So play, yeah? Okay? Ready when you are.

And like with all of these things, there's the possibility of pitching the sensitivities, the noticing, the awareness at different levels. No right or wrong. So it might be simple mindfulness, just the sensations, contact with the floor, of the arms, of the breath. It might be energy flows or movements. But it might open up, could be emotional awarenesses, could also be imaginal awarenesses. This body with these gestures, these movements, this flow.

Again, when you feel ready to add to it the dimension of the awareness of this space, the geometry, the physicality, the corners, the ethos of this space. So the gesture, the movement and the space are connected, somehow mysteriously intimate, reciprocal, in relationship. They are two and they are one. They are one and they are two. And see what helps. Eyes open, eyes closed. It could be sensational, emotional, energetic or imaginal. What you notice. There's no right or wrong.

What is this body? Is it really just what I think it is? What I'm used to thinking it is? What I was taught it is? And what is this space we are now in together? What can it be?

Again, when you feel ready, adding, opening up just a little bit further, not just to the room, but to the world. The whole world. The earth with all its beauty, all its creatures, all its craziness. Maybe even the cosmos—the stars, the galaxies, the interstellar reaches. See how wide. If it feels better, just the earth, just the world, or even wider.

But this movement is in relationship somehow—self and world, body and other bodies, other forms, space. What can happen in your sense of this movement, in your sense of what it is, what it does, what you are doing, what is being done through you?

Just last few seconds of this one. Taking your leave of this particular window, this particular contact, this particular love. A little bit of wriggling, shaking, just to loosen things up. However you like.

The next one is vocal. And again, we'll do it two ways. Firstly, just the vocals, and then secondly, the vocals and how does your body want to move with those vocals. I don't know, it's probably got a name, someone might know, but I'm just calling it a throat hiss. So that's it.

You can just be still and do that, and again, you can see what's the most helpful. Right now, for me right now, what's the most helpful pitch of the awareness? If it's just, okay, so there's some sensations in my throat, it's good to be aware of. Does it do something emotionally or imaginatively or energetically?

And then let's just do that with just the voice. You get this? Throat hiss? Make sense? Sure, it's a to the wall one, yeah. But be aware if your mind puts this in a box or an ethical box. And again, let the rhythm be so that you can also pick up on any resonances or anything you notice in the body, in the heart, in the image, in the energy.

Okay, wonderful. And now we'll add the possibility of moving in any way that feels right, which might be you stay completely still.

Just as it was just now. But how would the body or how does the body want to move? Perhaps in conformity and expression of an image that goes with this, or just the energy or something. So this time you can move your body as feels somehow like it goes with these vocals. If there is an image, let the image lead.

Ready when you are. And again, maybe there's some echoes when you come to stillness and quietness, and then you can do it again. So if that helps, that kind of rhythm helps to see the reverberations, the resonances before you start again in your own rhythm, whatever feels helpful.

Just a few more seconds on this one. Thank you, that's great. Just coming to stillness and let your body relax. Stillness and relaxation.

Next one. Very, very subtle. Very, very simple. Again, it's okay if your body is just rolling the head. That's it. Standing and just... I would probably do this with the eyes open. It's just that—one way or another rolling the head, but how much in the simplicity and the smallness of the movement can you see how delicate the awareness can be? What you might notice in the sensations, in energy or an emotion that might go with it, or image.

Aware of your whole body, aware of the whole energy body. There's no particular thing that's supposed to happen. Who is it who is moving their head this way, whose head is moved this way? Who is it in response to the universe?

And very gently, can you bring this movement as you continue to do it into relationship with the molten core of the earth and with the stars? Somehow standing on the earth, the body upright and open and sensitive, between the mystery of the stars and the heart of the earth. And you and this body plunged into mysterious, inexplicable manifestation in this cosmos.

Just noticing what you notice with all the sensitivity, all the care of sensitivity that you can bring. And then coming to a close of this particular movement, taking your leave of that particular window.

And the next one, Catherine, do you mind demonstrating? So if you can all see Catherine. Oh, if big people need to crouch. So legs are going to be hip width apart, something like that. And the movement is just centered at the pelvic floor, or definitely the lower belly or even lower, and it's just a rotation. Either way, whichever feels right.

And at the same time, there's a vocalization, just R. But the R... Can you do it? And I'll talk as you're doing it. So the three parts: pelvic rotation, R, and then whatever feels the right thing to do with your arms.

Yeah? You've done it before. You did it at my house, yeah. So that's where it gets... See if it can start down where the movement is coming from. So it's really quite a low R. But as you're doing it, it might feel like actually it feels more right for it to come somewhere higher up in the body. So just kind of see what's right. And the arms can do whatever they... when they feel it. A steady pitch. Yeah, probably a bit more in the hips, like a bit...

That's a good point. So now, I'll just speed up the process.

Thank you to Catherine from Croydon.

So, just one more time. Let me explain this clearly. Got it? And then I'll throw in just a few little variations. Is that okay?

So, basically, from the pelvic floor, as low as you can get, there's this kind of rotation. What kind of rotation? A really subtle one or a really big one? A fast one? A slow one? What feels right? What pitch feels right?

Try first as low as you can go with the sound, like it's really coming from the belly, but maybe later it doesn't feel right. What kind of arm movements do you want to do? It's okay?

So, when you're ready, just play with it and experiment and see what feels right. Whole body awareness but almost centered at the hips, at the pelvis, pelvic region, belly, lower belly.

What do you notice in the sensitivity? Sensitivity. That's wonderful. Thank you.

So let's try one more thing, but it's a solitary, still meditation. Actually, I'm wondering practically about how long it will take to get back the cushions. Well, we're going to need to do it anyway, so why don't we do that now? See if you can do it with the whole mindfulness of the energy body, so don't lose the holding of that awareness as we put the room back together.

Once you're settled, just come into your meditation posture and the meditative awareness with the energy body, with the poise of mindfulness and sensitivity.

I'm going to give you a few options—you've actually heard them before. We'll just spend a few minutes on this. If we had longer, you could probably go through each of the options. But just explore what you feel drawn to of these different variations.

With all the energy body awareness and the sensitivity and in your posture, you bring, you call up something that either has been an image for you, or is an imaginal image, or that has come, or one that has touched you, or something that you have felt that imaginal connection with, as Catherine was talking about—the sensing the soul. It could be something out in the garden, it could be this place, it could be this hall right now, anything like that. Deliberately summon, invite this sense of that presence.

Then the options are to keep the physical body still and see how the energy body might move in relationship to this image—this might be a tree or whatever it is. Or you can actually, in your place, move a little bit. So instead of keeping the physical body still and just feeling that kind of imaginal movement and energetic movement, you can actually move a little bit. So that's two options.

And then it might be that the image is other. How do you move in relation to that image? So it might be a kind of devotional or some kind of erotic dance, or you might be receiving something from the image. Or you might enter that image and, so to speak, become that image. So it's no longer other. And how does that image move?

So there are a few different options. There's no right or wrong—they're just different variations of possibilities.

It's just that—and we'll spend a few minutes together opening up that option—there's a deliberate instruction here, so don't just sit and watch your breath or something like that.

So let's try that together. Does it make enough sense? Good.

First you have to invite the image with respect and come into relationship with it, just with sensitivity, with care.

Sometimes it's a fuller, richer experience if the physical body is still. It's interesting. And sometimes the opposite—fuller, richer if the physical body actually moves and enacts something.

Allow whole body awareness. Sometimes the movements that the energy body would make or is making are not actually physically possible. They don't even make sense anatomically. So be open.

CHAPTER 159

Sailing the Oceans of Soul (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 33 min

> In this Q&A session from his Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma series, Rob Burbea skillfully navigates practitioners' questions about the delicate balance between emptiness practice and imaginal work. He addresses the common challenge faced by experienced emptiness practitioners who find images dissolving due to habitual non-clinging and contemplation of śūnyatā (emptiness), offering practical suggestions including working with eros as a form of skillful desire that can sustain and complexify images.
> Burbea explores the fluid spectrum between form and formlessness, drawing parallels to tantric practice and the classical jhānas while expanding beyond traditional categories. He discusses how images can transform - from particular embodied forms to universal archetypal figures like Guānyīn, to essence-qualities that permeate space, to energetic resonances in the body. The talk emphasizes the crucial skill of discernment (viveka) in recognizing these different states and learning to navigate consciously between them.
> Practical topics include working with movement, sound, and concepts as gateways to soulmaking; the importance of articulation in refining awareness; and how anything - from abstract ideas like respect or evolution to physical sensations - can become infused with imaginal depth. Burbea concludes by affirming that 'sensing with soul' may be a more accessible term than 'imaginal' for some practitioners, emphasizing the inclusive nature of this dharma path.

The momentum of my practice is very much rooted in emptiness practices. When I'm working with an image, it can be challenging to preserve its appearance without it fading into a kind of equality or pure awareness. Sometimes I feel like I wish there was a sustain pedal I could press to keep the image alive.

One approach I've been experimenting with involves playing with lines from the Heart Sutra—you know, "form is emptiness, emptiness is form"—and changing the word "emptiness" to "imaginal." So we have "form is imaginal, imaginal is form," and so on. I found that this helps somewhat in keeping the imaginal quality alive in what I'm experiencing. I'm wondering if you have other suggestions around this challenge.

That's a really interesting question, thank you. Let me explain a bit for everyone's benefit. You've done extensive emptiness practices, and when you meditate on the emptiness of something at any level, what begins to happen is that whatever the object —a pain in the body, a form, or whatever it is—it begins to actually dissolve. This occurs because the appearance of anything is dependent on reifying it, on having an unconscious concept that it is something real.

When we look at something with a view that knows its emptiness to some degree, or contemplates its emptiness—and there are many ways of doing this—because of dependent arising, because the appearance of anything depends on avijjā, the fundamental delusion that reifies things, the object fades. Another factor that keeps an object in form is a degree of clinging. When we relax clinging, the form also fades.

So you're saying that you want to be with the imaginal, but having done extensive emptiness practice, when you work with an image, it starts to fade, and you wish you could lock it into staying formed. Your experimentation with reframing the Heart Sutra —"form is imaginal"—recognizing that images have forms, seems to work somewhat, which is excellent. You can certainly continue with that approach.

I think there are several possibilities here. One thing that might happen is that things become less fabricated—which is actually one element of the imaginal—but they might simply lose some substantiality and become more liquid rather than completely losing their form. It sounds like you're experiencing them actually losing their form entirely.

It might be valuable to identify what's operating in your perceptual lens that has become such an ingrained habit. What in your way of seeing is causing this dissolution? Is it reduced clinging? If you really decrease clinging, does that cause the fading? Are you automatically contemplating the emptiness of something in the background? If you can identify what's happening, you can ease off that particular approach somewhat.

It may also help to tune more into the sense of eros, because eros is, in a way, a kind of clinging—it's a wanting, a form of desire. If you tune into the sense of eros within you, the sense of desire for this figure, or beauty, or attraction to it, then noticing and nurturing that can actually increase the eros, which will reform and strengthen the image. In fact, it will create more elaborate forms and increase complexity rather than simplification.

Another consideration is simply what you're tuning into. What we pay attention to often emphasizes or draws out that particular quality. So if there's an image of some kind of being, what are the specific particulars that attract you or feel soul-making? Perhaps it's the way they move—with a certain elegance or fluidity that touches you. By tuning your attention both to that particular quality and to the way it's affecting you, to the soul-making sense it evokes, this honing of attention will tend to draw out and strengthen those very qualities.

These are a few approaches to explore, but I'd also encourage you to discover your own methods as you continue working with this dynamic.

This is one of the arts, actually, especially for people who've done a lot of emptiness practice. You learn to modulate the fading. And that's in my book somewhere. So you can practice so that things really just disappear and fade, and you rest in deep emptiness. But what becomes even more of the art, once you've done that, is learning to just take the foot off the pedal a little bit.

In a way, that's what tantric practice is—playing at this edge of form and dissolving of form in emptiness. It's really a matter of learning to hold it right there in the middle, where everything is super insubstantial and holy, but formed, yet very insubstantial and translucent. So that's a real skill, to hold it that way.

Having said all that, let me add something completely different. I don't think this is quite what you're talking about, Padraig, but I'll mention it anyway. Sometimes what can happen when working with an image is there it is, very formed and beautiful and everything. And then, for all kinds of different reasons, the image sort of dissolves, but we're left with the essence of the image.

So, for example, in that vague example I gave of an imaginal being or figure or angel or whatever, it's the way they move with such elegance and fluidity. Whatever it might mean to the perception for the figure to fade, the essence of elegance remains. So one might then be in a completely empty space that's condensed the essence of that image. There's not a form there, but there's a particular quality that one is then resting in.

I don't think that's quite what you're talking about, but I'm just mentioning it to everyone. I wouldn't do too much of that, but that's one of the possibilities that might happen. In a way, then, what that means is there's a sort of quasi-jhanic state—a jhana on elegance, whatever that might mean. It's the essence of elegance without a particular manifestation of elegance that belonged with the image.

So what this means, again, is that there's infinite possibility here of different states that can open up. The Buddha outlined eight jhanas—the very classical ones. Now, you might find yourself sliding into some of them with practice, because of what we said about the energy body harmonizing and samadhi being available.

And so you might find something like what I've just described, a sort of essence of some quality—could be nobility or courage. What does that mean? It's just space. There's nothing but space, but it's permeated with this essence of some value or virtue or something like that.

So that's a possibility. There's the retaining of the form with all its particulars and complexities and nuances and subtleties. And then there's another possibility where there's an imaginal being, but it's a more universal being. So, for example, Quan Yin. Sometimes there might be a figure and it turns into something more universal. It's still a figure with a form, but it's Quan Yin.

What you find with, let's say, Quan Yin, is she doesn't have that much of a personality. She's compassionate and she's beautiful and divine and all that. But some of the particulars have faded. So not just with the emptiness thing, but there are different kinds of ways that things can sort of relatively fade. All those would be fruitful meditations—all those categories, whether it's jhanic, whether it's this essence of a quality, whether it's a sort of universalized deity in figure, or whether it's a really particularized, very unique image.

This is some of the ways things can open up. What we're focusing more on is the first one—just the sort of what we've been talking about with images, with particulars and uniquenesses.

"Can I just add something to what you said? Because it might be a universal image that becomes particularized for you, so I just want to include that."

Yes, thank you. So there are all kinds of shades here, aren't there? Even if you go into the jhanas—the eight—and it's really good to get them really clear, then you realize actually you can mix them in ways that seem to contradict the rules. You can bring in other qualities and mix metta with the sixth jhana and stuff like that.

So things are never as discrete as they appear in textbooks. All kinds of fluidities can happen.

Because it might be a universal image that becomes particularized for you, so just want to include that.

Yes, so thank you. There are all kinds of shades here, aren't there? Even if you go into the jhanas—if you really go into the jhanas, the eight—it's really good to get them clear. Then you realize actually you can mix them in ways that seem to contradict the rules and bring in other qualities, mixing metta with the sixth jhana and such. Things are never as discrete as they appear in textbooks. All kinds of fluidities can happen.

I think one of the arts of practice, though, is to know what is happening and make that differentiation. It's not so much that this should happen rather than that, but "Ah, this is the flavor now," like that chef I was talking about. When I add that spice, then... aha, that's the difference. When I add it then, it's different. Or now this mixture is just like this. That's part of the art—this refinement.

Anyway, that's more than you bargained for, but please.

"Could a shade of that or one of those things... I sometimes feel like I can feel that sometimes an image shows up more as its particularities and then it fades more to its energy body. So I'm feeling my energy body and it's..."

Yes, so you're saying that sometimes working with an image, there's a sense that the image fades a little bit, but what's left is the sense of energy body, either just in oneself or the relationship of energy bodies. The energy body is still distinct. So what's imaginal has gone to energetic.

That's fine and lovely. I think if that's always what happens, you're going to... it won't have the full richness of possibility. So again, you get this kind of navigational possibility at any time. You can even—you'll probably find in time—sometimes just lean it that way if you want. Let's go to just the energy of what's happening and kind of resonate with that, or feel the mutual effect of energies or the mutual interaction of energies or what it does here.

That's fine. It's a conscious navigating, conscious leaning. It's great. But in that, a lot of the other particulars have gone from the image—the particular kind of beauty, for instance, or what touches you in the soul. It touches you in the energy, maybe, but shades of emotion, etc. So it's a choice, and it's great, and it's a great thing to kind of play with. But in the context of what we're doing, if you want the whole availability of everything, I probably would make sure I'm not doing that kind of thing all the time, or even most of the time. It's just one of the possibilities.

Does that help? Great.

"Yes, a follow-up question to what you were saying about discerning different states or different qualities. I find I can discern them as like A, B, or C, but I don't know what they are. Is that just a question of patience?"

Which different states are you talking about, then?

"I cannot articulate it even to myself. I just know, oh, that's interesting, that's different, and I'm having a really hard time..."

But are you talking about something with images or something where the images have faded and it's more of a sort of space or a state?

I don't know how important it is for everyone to be able to put everything into words—or as much, you know. Maybe that's just people who try and teach or something like that. But there is something about trying. I remember being in group interviews and people just in a state—just a lot of rapture or the first jhana or something. "It's impossible to describe. It's impossible. There's just no words for it whatsoever."

And it's like, "Oh, go on, just try a little bit." Once you start just throwing some words at something, you'll get some that's not quite right, that's right... "Oh, that's right!" And then someone might help you: "You mean..." "Yeah, yeah, that's good." And it starts to crystallize.

What we want is—part of the trying a little bit, you don't... it's not like the be-all and end-all—but the actually trying starts to... here's the mystery of it: the actual trying starts to shape things more. It starts to... they start to contrast more and you get more refinement of distinction and discernment.

"I find that's what I've been doing, different words and seeing what they resonate. And sometimes I think, oh yeah, that's that."

That's beautiful. There's an infinite number of words. There are, especially if you start adding Greek and things. So I wouldn't tie yourself in knots about this. It's not so much "Am I able to describe accurately?" It's more like "Can I refine my capacity to differentiate and discern?" That's actually part of this practice. It's a part of any practice, whether it's emptiness, whether it's jhanic, whether it's imaginal.

Sometimes what happens, let's say in an emptiness practice, what I've described with Papañca...

Things fade, and because there isn't yet the discernment, everything fades. It feels like nothing is happening. But actually, there is something still happening. What is this something that continues? Well, space is still here, for example. So there is indeed something that's happening. Or perhaps space fades. Well, what's still here then?

Why am I emphasizing all this? Because this capacity to discern is actually crucial. If I can't discern—let's say at that level where everything fades—then actually I won't be able to go any deeper. I just get stuck in a kind of pretty nice soup, but I can't take it any further. I won't reach the unfabricated; I won't discover other realms. I know people who hang out in that state for years and years and years. I mean, that's a choice or whatever, but partly it depends on this discernment that allows further movement.

Now, if we talk about eros, part of what eros does in relation to... I realized this morning—sorry, I realized that I didn't finish a sentence earlier. So there was a smaller definition of eros, and the larger definition encompasses much more.

That smaller definition is just the beginning. But once eros is allowed to do its thing—which means impregnate images and generate and create, discover shades and push the logos—once it's involved in the eros-psyche-logos dynamic and that movement is happening, then all of that is implied when we say "eros." You understand? So when we speak of eros, this entire process is contained within that word.

Part of this eros-psyche-logos process, as it unfolds, is making more and more discernment. Here's my beloved other, my image, and as I said, the eros wants more. One of the ways it finds, creates, discovers—creates slash discovers—more is actually by making more discernments and delineations.

Instead of seeing just "oh, it's just a human being, you know, just another one of those," there are infinite discernments and shades of the imaginal faces you can embody, infinite theophanies—faces of divinity that you can be. So there's something about discernment and differentiation, both perceptual, sensible, and conceptual, that goes hand in hand with eros. It's part of that whole unfolding, part of revealing the beauty of what's happening.

One more little thing. I was talking with someone today about whether we need to be able to describe everything. Sometimes you don't need to. And sometimes with images... well, part of the inexhaustibility of images is that you won't be able to describe them fully. The very process of differentiating and describing is part of what generates more. So you're never going to reach that point where you can say, "Now I've summed it up completely."

And part of what's actually beautiful that can happen between human beings—relating to Roxanne's question the other day about working in dyads with this kind of material or with others—is when you have an image that you begin to share. Maybe you feel, "I've just been completely inarticulate about that, I haven't captured it somehow." But there's a magic in human communication, and in the imaginal as well. You can start to say something in the most clumsy, inefficient way, and I sense the image—I pick it up, or it sparks an image in me. So don't worry too much about perfect articulation.

Have I answered your question? Okay, very good.

"I was just wondering, in the same way that we're talking about articulating different states, I was just wondering about movement."

"Yeah, sometimes I definitely feel like moving."

Several people have expressed this same question: can a concept become an image? This is a really important inquiry to explore.

Let me address this directly. Yes, absolutely—a concept can become an image. In fact, this is one of the beautiful possibilities we're working with. A concept might begin as something quite abstract, quite mental, but through our engagement with it, through our sensitivity and openness, it can transform into something much more rich, more multidimensional, more imaginal.

Think about how this might happen. You might start with a concept—perhaps the concept of compassion, or freedom, or even something like justice. Initially, it might feel quite dry, quite intellectual. But as you stay with it, as you open your sensitivity to it, it can begin to take on qualities that move beyond the purely conceptual. It might develop a sense of presence, of energy, of particular qualities that you can feel in your being. Colors might emerge, or textures, or a sense of movement. It might even begin to take on a more personified form.

This is part of what makes the imaginal so rich and accessible. We don't need to wait for dramatic visions or elaborate mythological figures to appear. Even our most everyday concepts can become gateways into the imaginal realm when we approach them with the right kind of sensitivity and openness.

The key is in how we relate to the concept. Are we just thinking about it, analyzing it, staying at that mental level? Or are we allowing ourselves to feel into it more deeply, to sense what it might evoke in terms of energy, presence, and meaning? When we make that shift, when we open that sensitivity, concepts can absolutely blossom into images that carry all the transformative power of soul-making.

So yes, definitely explore this. Notice when concepts arise in your practice, and experiment with opening to them in this more receptive, more feeling way. You might be surprised at how readily they transform into something much more alive and nourishing.

Absolutely. Or another way of saying it is a concept gets soulful for us. It could be beauty—again, it's a kind of abstract thing—or it could be just a logos, a conceptual framework. Several people have mentioned this, and I can't remember some examples now, but absolutely, it's possible.

Someone was talking about the concept of evolution, biological evolution of species, and how that as a concept actually can become very enriched and multidimensional and very fertile. So a concept can, absolutely.

"Because when I was working with... I had the concept of respect, because that's something very important. But then when I wanted to work with it, it would be helpful to choose an object, an image of a physical object, a tree or something, to work, to deepen it."

Maybe and maybe not, you know. So again, I would let the soul-making be what navigates you. So it might be, I just have this idea of respect, and I don't really have any particular image or object that goes with it, but I can feel it working on the soul. I feel the resonance, the beauty of it, and that's working. I don't need to do anything—I just let that stew and let myself be touched by it. If images come, great. If they don't, great. It's already become a soul-making object, you might say. So that's really wonderful.

"Actually, it relates to what she was saying about the movements. I was thinking about sound. We were playing with freaking sounds in a hall, and we don't usually do that outside, like holding or making noises. But I wonder if you can use that in the same way that you use movement, or listening to sound, too, to create the soul."

Absolutely. Again, there's just not time. That was one of the things I was thinking of offering you, is that kind of thing. We may or may not get to it. But yes, anything can. Basically, anything at all can become infused with soul, can become sensed with soul.

So it's making sounds, listening to sounds, and there's a whole mystery here. Look, we have a voice. What happens with our voice, what gets communicated, all the mystery of communication and kindness and insight and ideas and beauty and connection—it's happening through the larynx and the throat, and there's mystery there.

So even just the sense of taking up the mysterious sense of this vocal capacity. And again, maybe it's vocalizing that allows you to connect with that. Maybe it's being quiet, just similar as not moving and letting the energy body move that puts you in touch with that. Does that make sense?

But yes, try it. Try all of it. And sound, certainly—I've shared lots of images where birds and things become infused with a soul-making sense, and the sound becomes imaginable in all kinds of ways, interacting with the body and beautiful things.

So the possibilities are literally endless, I think. Just open the doors and play, and see.

"Just a simple question..."

Did you consider using the term "icon" for an imaginal image instead of "imagination"?

Yes, I have used it. I think I mentioned it once in the hall, in contrast to narrative image. Essentially, it's the same thing. An icon is an image, and anything can become an icon in the sense that we're using the word "imaginal image." Absolutely.

There's actually a whole set of talks newly on the website—eight or nine parts of one really long talk called "Between Icon and Idol," using Greek terms again. It's just another way of saying image.

Is that somehow related to French theology? Jean-Luc Marion?

Yes, the way he uses it—as far as I can understand him, and some of these French theologians can be quite challenging—there's this infinite depth of the icon and our participation in that. Absolutely.

I perhaps avoid the term because of the word "iconoclast." Some people who consider themselves iconoclasts are actually... Marion contrasts icon with idol, I-D-O-L. We're interested in destroying what's reified, flat, lacking depth. Some who call themselves iconoclasts—or maybe not iconoclasts so much as just anti-spiritual or anti-sacred, opposing imaginal figures that are sacred—are actually setting up other idols under the name of iconoclasm, without realizing it.

What would you say about destroying the idea of an idol?

Iconoclasm can become a cultural term for someone who has the courage to crash through things that have become ossified or falsely holy. But some people who might see themselves that way, or are seen that way, might actually be setting up idols under the name of iconoclasm. They're setting up other idols—things that don't have depth or sacredness, but to which they're still attached.

I have a related question. Catherine mentioned yesterday that you don't really like the word "imaginal," and you prefer "sensing with soul," which is a new term. I find it very helpful because, as you've said many times, it's not just about images. But images get so emphasized here that I got confused—I'm more tactile. When I tapped into sensing or embodied awareness, my whole body became alive, without trying to impose the need for an image, even subtly.

Absolutely. As I said at the beginning, if there were a way to instantaneously download everything, you could have used that right from the start, and probably others could as well. It's wonderful that you've got it—that opening of possibility. It's a matter of timing when there are so many different people at different places.

Even though we try to say an image doesn't necessarily mean something visual, it's embedded in the word and hard to escape. Maybe another retreat will start with that idea—sensing with soul—and take it from there.

I think we need to end. Let's have a bit of quiet together.

CHAPTER 160

Wisdom and Desire

Rob Burbea · 52 min

> In this profound exploration, Rob Burbea examines how our relationship with desire is perhaps the most significant force in determining our being, life, and experience. He challenges the traditional Buddhist approach of simply letting go of desire, asking whether we can truly live, love, or create without it. Drawing on his soulmaking dharma framework, Burbea distinguishes between craving—which contracts and causes suffering—and eros, a desire for greater contact, connection, and intimacy that can open into imaginal realms when met with wisdom and skill.
> Burbea argues that most practitioners are drawn to the dharma not merely to reduce suffering, but by love for the beauty, mystery, and sacred dimensions of practice itself. He introduces the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, showing how skillful engagement with desire can endlessly create and discover more beauty and depth in what we love, rather than seeking satisfaction through horizontal accumulation. The talk offers practical guidance for transforming craving into eros through working with the energy body, expanding intentions, recognizing the imaginal nature of experience, and cultivating humility and reverence.
> This teaching is part of Burbea's radical reimagining of Buddhist practice, suggesting that the ultimate goal is not the elimination of desire but the opening of "gates of sacredness" through skillful relationship with the full spectrum of human longing and love.

There is nothing more significant, more powerful, more central in the determination of our being, our life, our experience—nothing more significant, powerful, central—than how we are with desire.

How we are with desire, our relationship to it, our ideas about it, our logos about it, our skill or lack thereof, shape our self. They make us, they shape us this way or that—how we are, what we do, how we seem, the very sense of our being. They shape our life. That relationship shapes our life and shapes our world, opening it or closing it, coloring it this way or that. Desire is a maker of worlds.

Whenever there is perception, whenever there's experience, there's actually desire. We can't get away from this forever. We're always making something because there's always desire. What, though, are we going to make? What can we make? What freedom do we have to make this or that?

So this whole question of desire—what does it mean to open this up as a question, as an exploration, and bring wisdom in relationship to desire? Sometimes we're a bit too simple with this. So desire is something just to let go of, to get rid of, the quieting of desire, and that's what the path is about.

Can I do anything, anything without desire? Anything at all? The simplest: can I go to the toilet without desire? Can I practice the path? Can I live my life and have a full life? Can I love without desire? Certainly, can I be in an intimate sexual relationship without desire? Can I work well without desire? Is there art, is there creativity without desire?

On every level of our being, from the most complex and involved to the most subtle, I cannot get away from this, and I cannot get away from what it's asking of me. I can try to bring a simplifying answer to it, and maybe that reassures something in my heart and my mind. But if I'm awake, I very soon bump into the rub that that simple answer or conceptual structure doesn't actually fit my life. It doesn't actually work with the range and the power and the subtlety that we need.

So what is your relationship with desire? That's the big question. What are your ideas about desire? Maybe some of them will be conscious, some of them will be unconscious.

Sometimes in Buddha Dharma we can have this view: desire is not good. The path is to end desire somehow. And desire is always connected with vedanā. So desire is always kind of chasing pleasant or trying to get rid of unpleasant. But is that really the limit of what desire is? That it's something in relationship to the tonality of pleasant and unpleasant, either chasing the pleasant or avoiding the unpleasant? Certainly sometimes it is. Does that really capture the fullness of the human psyche's relationship and motivations of desire?

Is the only desire that's kind of acceptable a desire for a decrease in suffering? So how are we thinking about desire? How are we delineating desires in our understanding? We've got to have some desire because otherwise we wouldn't come to retreat, wouldn't book a retreat, wouldn't come. Maybe the only desire that's good is the desire to end desire or the desire to decrease suffering. So we can kind of have some discernment about desire, but we put it into two camps. And everything else is—it would be better if I didn't have it, but somehow I do have it, and I kind of arrange my life with it.

Do we live like that? Do we really live, if I look at my life, do I live in a way that follows this discrimination of "the only good desire is a desire to decrease my suffering or the suffering in the world"? I mean, there is that desire and that might have a lot of power, but is that really—are we really living like that? I'm just talking about honest and discerning self-reflection now. So I might have an ideational structure, I might have got it from Dharma teachings or somewhere else.

Is that really what's going on? Is that really what's happening in my life? Is there some kind of cognitive dissonance here? Do we need a bigger and perhaps more complex psychology around this thing called desire, this force called desire?

And what are the asks? What are the demands? We are born with this force called desire operating in our life. What is being asked of us here? Is it just the quietening of that? Is it just to put everything else aside as much as we can and just have the desire for the decrease of suffering?

Can we begin to discern different kinds of desire and different kinds of relationship with desire and different kinds of ideas about desire? So we talk about—I'll get back to this soon—but we talk about craving and eros and discerning between them. And can we discern between those two? Can we guide, if we're stuck in craving and the contraction of that and the pain of that and the tightness of that—can we actually, is it possible to allow that to open up, to skillfully guide it so it becomes eros, something much more beautiful, fruitful, open-ended, not contracted, fecund, in the best possible way? Do we have that skill?

So there are questions of discernment here and questions of skill I want to come back to. But let's again pause on the discernment thing.

Most of you here, after you've been—if you come to more than, I don't know, three retreats in your life—you probably love something about all this path and practice. What is it that you love? And what is it that you want? And is it really, again, is it really just to suffer less?

In a way, it's a little ironic or paradoxical or perhaps not fully honest that we have a terminology that talks always, with all its brilliance through the Four Noble Truths, about reducing suffering. And so we've probably got—my contention is we have all kinds of things going on that we desire and what we really love and why we show up here and are willing to sit through all the difficulties and walk through all the difficulties. Is it just because we want to reduce suffering?

There are plenty of people who relate to meditation like that, but usually they go to an evening course and learn a few techniques to suffer less. And that's great. And that's really important. Learning how to suffer less is really important.

But what is it that you're really wanting now? I mean, it includes that. But what else? What draws you here? Not just to this retreat.

Is it not that you are in love with a kind of beauty about all this? There's something about sitting this way and doing what you do that is beautiful to you. That you are in love with some mystery, some perfume of mystery that comes with all of this. And that in itself is not really about reducing suffering.

Is it not that you love love? And you love the goodness of heart and the beautiful qualities of heart. It's not just a functional relationship. When we're in love with practice, it's not just a functional relationship. "I come so that I can learn some things to reduce suffering." Yes, but more.

How many people have told me over the years, "Boy, when I heard the Heart Sutra for the first time, I didn't know what the hell it was talking about, but something—it's like, I want that." There's something ignited in the heart.

Many of you have this or talk about emptiness. "I don't quite understand." What's attracting you there? Is it just that, oh, that sounds like a very good idea that I could reduce my suffering by understanding that? Good, okay. That's not what happens. Something else comes into flame.

And I would contend, actually, the way I think about emptiness is you can understand it at lots of different levels. The beginning levels of emptiness, or the less profound levels, are very much about different ways of seeing that reduce suffering. As it gets deeper, it becomes much more about mystery, and I would say sacredness. There's a kind of beauty and mystical sense that opens up in the deep reaches of exploration of emptiness. Yes, that has an effect on suffering, but that's almost not what's driving a person to practice at that level and to be drawn at that level.

And yet somehow we don't quite acknowledge that or recognize that fully and give it its due and its place. And we just keep talking about reducing suffering.

Do you recognize that when you show up here and practice diligently, devoting yourself to practice over the years, you inevitably develop fantasies—multiple fantasies woven together—of practice, of path, of yourself as practitioner? These fantasies encompass the devotion to the tradition you walk in, the stream that supports, nourishes, and inspires you. They include practice itself, awakening, the Buddha, the teachers, the lineage of teachers. All of this has become imaginal for you to some degree.

And all that is beautiful. All that is, to some degree at least, erotic for you. There's image already there. Yet somehow we don't really acknowledge this. We don't say, "Hey, maybe this is significant." We don't have words for it, don't point it out. We just keep talking about reducing suffering.

So there are differentiations here—we'll return to this. And with these differentiations come the asks: What are the skills and arts that I can develop? What can I open up in relation to this whole complex mystery of desire?

Can you let go? Have you practiced that? This thing you're obsessed with, this papañca, this person you want who maybe doesn't want you—whatever it is—can you let go? We talk a lot about this in Buddha Dharma: let it go, drop it. How's your skill at doing that? Can you let go of those big attachments? Do you have enough practice with that? This is one of the foundational skills of all soul making. If you can't do this, perhaps developing this capacity needs to come first for many people.

And then, what about letting go at much more subtle levels? Yes, there's the big papañca obsession—this thing you want, this person you want. But then there's the whole possibility of letting go in meditation at increasingly subtle levels. Things you wouldn't even consider as objects to release, wouldn't even recognize as craving. The beauty of this movement into more and more subtle letting go, and what it opens up—yes, freedom from suffering, but much, much more. The beauty and mystery that opens up in relation to emptiness and fabrication and the unfabricated.

How is your journey with that subtlety, with letting go at increasingly refined levels? You might be listening and thinking, "That's so much to work on." How about seeing it differently: there are treasures everywhere. You are in the middle of the most glorious banquet buffet, and you say, "Oh, it's terrible. There's all this food I have to eat." Someone tells you, "It will be there. This buffet will keep getting replenished longer than you live." And you respond, "That's just terrible." But it's beautiful! I will never get to explore all the possibilities—partly because the territory keeps opening up more and more from a neuropsychological standpoint. And that's wonderful.

So there's that journey: letting go of gross attachments, then this exploration of increasingly subtle levels of meditative inquiry, revealing exquisite beauty and profundity.

Then there's another ask: Do you dare? Do you dare to follow the desire for what you love, even if it brings dukkha? This again relates to shaping our life. What happens to me, my life, my very being, if I don't? If I close that down and say, "Oh, that's dukkha. I might start judging myself if I don't get it, or I'll probably get hurt." What happens to my personhood, my being, my life?

Think about the Buddha's journey in that mythical story—prepared to endure tremendous suffering. Again, it's spoken of and conceived as his wanting the end of suffering. Or think of an artist's journey, the dedication, the frustration. Do you dare to follow the desire for what you love? There can be dukkha in that. Actually, there will be dukkha in that.

This is the question at the heart of it all: what is our relationship with desire really about?

There's a vast range of skills we could explore here, though we don't have time to cover everything now. We've discussed much of this territory before. In fact, we devoted an entire retreat called "The Alchemy of Desire" to exploring these different aspects of desire. That material is available on the website, along with another extensive series called "Eros Unfettered," which delves deep into these subtleties.

One practice we developed that surprised everyone with how accessible it was, we called the OCD practice—short for "opening the current of desire." Without going into detail now, this isn't about eros as we're discussing it here, nor even primarily about the imaginal. It's about the energy of desire itself and how we can cultivate a different, more skillful meditative relationship with that energy. This approach opens desire in completely unexpected ways, bringing fruits we never could have imagined would flow from such a relationship. The possibilities are endless, and while that material exists, we don't have time to explore it now.

But here's the crucial question for our work with the imaginal: We have this phenomenon we're calling eros—a particular kind of desire that we contrast with craving. Can I recognize the difference? Can I discern when something is craving versus when it's eros? And further still—is it possible to learn how to transform craving itself? Can I open up that pain, that contraction and constriction, that sense of being blocked, and allow it to flower into eros with all its inherent beauty?

This is a genuine skill, and like all skills, it must be learned through practice. How do we learn it? By making mistakes, as we discussed in Chris's question last night. We have to fall down. We have to get burnt. How else can we truly know the difference between craving and eros until we actually experience getting burnt? "Oh, that's what happens. Ouch." But it's okay—it's all part of the learning.

We're playing with fire here. If you want to engage with this territory, you must understand that you're playing with fire, and yes, you will get burnt. That's perfectly fine. You'll survive. We all can.

There's tremendous skill possible in all of this, and so much depends on developing these capacities. This is why I keep returning to this fundamental point: so much depends on our relationship with desire—our capabilities with desire, our ideas about desire. This particular fork in the road between craving and eros is especially crucial, because it determines what worlds are born, what selves emerge, what experiences become possible.

We can learn enormously. We can develop real mastery in this art. But we will never be complete masters of eros. It's bigger than us, like all the gods—always bigger than us. This calls for a particular kind of humility.

So yes, there's mastery to be developed, artistry and subtlety that are genuinely important. And simultaneously, there must be humility in our relationship to these forces. Eros, emotion, the imaginal—they're all larger than we are. And thank goodness for that! Would you really want to master all the mysteries completely? Would they still be mysteries if you were their master? Don't we always want something bigger than ourselves? Something we can never fully wrap our minds around?

Eamon and I were talking last night, and he made me laugh when he said—I don't know if he got the same response from the group when he mentioned it—but he observed, "Eros Psychologos... no one talks like that." And it's absolutely true.

Why all this Greek terminology? Yes, it's true—what the hell are we doing? But that's precisely the point: no one talks like this, or rather, no one thinks like this. We have a poverty of differentiation, a poverty of discernment. When we don't discern something called eros as separate from craving or other kinds of desire, we lack the language and conceptual framework to guide and support this endless and amazing opening. We keep putting everything back into the same box: "It's just desire. I like it. I want it." This doesn't open the avenues.

I don't know why the Greek emerges—I have no idea. But the differentiation itself is part of the world birthing, part of what supports that. Again, we're back to logos and all that. So yes, no one talks like that, but that's part of the problem: we don't have the language.

As I've said, look—it's already here. In the Dharma, we have this very simplistic way of talking about desire and letting it go and what the path is about. But just look, take some honest self-reflection as I talked about before. Is that really what's going on? Is there not already eros and already the imaginal air? And yet we don't have the language. That's why the language matters. This language will help to support and make sense of and open up these worlds.

We want differentiations, discernments, subtle nuances of recognition and ideas—and therefore words to communicate with each other—that support soul-making. We don't have that in the culture, in the wider culture and even in the Dharma culture. You might say, "Oh, that's fine, I'm not really interested in soul-making, that's fine." But there's a cost.

Consider how we think about desire in this simplistic view. We think it's either just ego or just chasing the pleasant on one hand—that's unskillful, and we try to get rid of that—or it's skillful, it's kusala, which would be like desire for metta and desire to end suffering. And that's it. There's this kind of bifurcation. With the skillful desire, we can say, "Hey, don't overdo it, don't push too hard." That bifurcation is actually great, that differentiation. But do we not need some more?

If I make just that bifurcation, those are the choices presented to me in my life. Either I'm just saying, "Yeah, I can't really hack the whole path, otherwise I'd be a monk or a nun. So really I'm kind of making a pact with—or just putting up with the fact, the recognition—yeah, I have some ego, and I kind of laugh at it. Self, ha ha ha, self does the silly stuff. And yeah, it would be great if I wasn't so into the senses and sense pleasure, but, you know..."

That conceptual structure—that over-simplistic conceptual structure—gives me choices that don't even make sense of my life.

So, eros. Catherine already defined it. Like I think I did with the energy body, maybe we can make a kind of narrower definition and a wider, fuller definition.

Catherine already gave the narrow definition. Among desire—which is a big, big complex thing—we make one delineation of this thing, this kind of desire that we're going to call eros. Then we make a further delineation between what we might say is just the basic narrow definition of eros, and then we'll open that up.

Basic narrow definition of eros—a small definition, if you like. Catherine already said it: any desire or wanting for more contact, connection, intimacy, opening to and opening and touching something—the beloved, the erotic other. Any wanting more of that.

So that's it. It's a very basic definition. The thing that's so significant is what happens to that wanting more. This arises for us as human beings.

We want more contact, more intimacy, more touching, more opening. But what happens when this natural desire meets our limited perceptions?

If I remain trapped within a narrow view of the beloved—this thing I desire and want more contact with—then it becomes flat, defined, confined to a box. This real self wants that real thing in a real world in real time. I want more of it. And I'm stuck in that conceptual prison, unconsciously assuming this is simply how reality is.

When this rigid conceptual framework doesn't budge, when I want more but see only flatness, then I must either suppress the desire—take the proverbial cold shower—or pursue it compulsively. I might pressure the other person, disregard the consequences of my pursuit, or endlessly chase similar objects horizontally. Flying from holiday to holiday, consuming more and more, regardless of what it does to the earth. I remain trapped in flatness, where more can only mean more of the same. The more is only horizontal.

But what if I'm not stuck? What if intelligence awakens? What if the imaginal opens up?

Then this eros wanting more begins to discover more by creating and discovering richness within the beloved itself. The desire starts to perceive not just this flat, boxed thing, but multiple dimensions. If the eros includes the imaginal sense, then this wanting more begins to create and discover depth in what I love. It becomes richer. I perceive more faces, more dimensions there.

You—if it is you I love—become alive to me with multiple images and depths and beauties. What a profound difference this makes! I receive the more because more is genuinely there for me. More delight, more wonder, more mystery, more faces, more complexity, more beauty. I get the more.

But then eros wants even more. And if this movement isn't blocked, the sense of the beloved grows exponentially—more faces, more dimensions, more mystery. If blocked, I'm forced back to horizontal seeking. If unblocked, the sense of things simply opens up, revealing inexhaustible depths.

This is such a crucial pivot. If I cling to the idea that imagination is mere nonsense—that I might have an image of someone, but that's not reality, this person is simply like that and that's it—then even when the imaginal arises from the power of my eros, my logos rejects the imaginal perception. I'm thrown back into prison, and the energy must go somewhere else horizontally.

But when this repeated opening happens, beauties upon beauties and mysteries unfold gradually. Not necessarily all at once, but through this repeated expansion of my sense of the beloved, something profound begins to occur.

As I move in and out of these wondrous, beautiful, touching perceptions—so different from conventional seeing—this flowing movement gradually transforms something deeper: my thinking about reality itself, about what a person is, not just who this particular beloved is, but what a human being truly is.

In this questioning—who am I, what is my perception, what is this eros—the world begins to look different. Through this repeated movement in and out, this continuous striking of the soul, something fundamental shifts. My soul is touched deeply, and at some point within this process, the logos itself—the very idea of what the world is, what reality is, what the cosmos is, what the self is, what humanity is—begins to open.

So the logos grows, not just the eros. Not just the psyche in terms of imaginal perception expands, but the idea grows as well. And as the idea becomes richer, the sense of things becomes richer. Eros becomes even more inflamed, and the whole dynamic can simply flourish endlessly. This is what we call the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—potentially infinite, endlessly fertile, endlessly creating and discovering more beauty and more wonder.

As this process unfolds, if we return to Amon as our example, more elements of the lattice become illuminated. More and more aspects of the constellation light up. The experience itself becomes more fully imaginable. This dynamic ignites those different elements we've been discussing, but it also requires them to support the entire process. It needs a sense of beauty, it needs ideational structure, it needs all of these components working together.

We need sensitivities, permissions, understandings, ideational structures, openness of perception, awarenesses—we need all of this to support us in not becoming trapped in the belief that a real self desires a real thing in a real world in real time, with all the havoc that such entrapment creates. In our globalized world, with the technological power we possess and the spread of consumerist culture alongside a flat metaphysics that doesn't allow for this kind of opening and depth, we see enormous havoc being created.

People are taught they can have their desires, they're given economic opportunity and availability, yet there's no metaphysics or conceptual structure that supports anything beyond the rampant destructive consequences of endless consumption—because the worldview is flat and can only lead to more, more, more in a very real way. What we observe personally in individual relationships, we can see mirrored globally.

I don't know that we need to become Greek, but I think we somehow need these concepts, this understanding.

Practice-wise, everything feeds everything else here. Once again, everything is dependent arising. Here I am—perhaps in meditation or in daily life—and I keep receiving images of someone I really care for. I want that person. There's eros present, and they come to me through images. This could be any imaginal figure or any object in the world where eros exists in the small sense.

At this crucial point, eros in the small sense—this desire for more—can move in either direction. It could become craving if it gets stuck in certain ways, or it can open into the larger sense and ignite the whole imaginal constellation more and more. So what supports this opening? How can I help it move toward eros rather than collapse into craving, open into eros rather than contract into craving?

One key insight is that all these nodes, all these elements feed each other. The more fully I bring my whole energy body into relationship with whatever I'm engaging—whether it's a person, an object, or something in my imagination—the more this supports the opening from craving into eros rather than remaining stuck in craving. This is genuinely good news, because it means there are many things we can do.

Generally speaking, what happens with craving is contraction—contraction of the mind around the object, contraction of the self-sense, contraction in the energy body. This is not so with eros as it opens in the full sense. Because everything is mutually dependent, we can work with opening the energy body more fully, engaging the whole body in relationship to this image or whatever we're working with.

What does this mean practically? It means knowing this object, being in relationship with my whole body, my whole energy body. This kind of embodied engagement supports the opening of eros rather than the collapsing into craving.

Now, this process will happen many times, and inevitably we will fall off the bicycle, we will get burned. But there are always ways of reopening, of returning to this dynamic. That's one approach.

Another support—and we could probably list countless others—is this fullness of intention.

"I want you. I want us to be in relationship. I want to have a baby with you. I want to go on holiday there. I want this. I want that. I want it to happen." And yes, very often that want can become oriented toward a real self in a real world. What happens if maybe that intention is there—there's a kind of small intention—but can I open up to this fullness of intention?

When I want you, or I want anything to happen in a relationship, what is it that I most deeply want? What if that could actually be—what I want is the soul-making? It seems to be you, but what I most deeply desire is the soul-making and the sacredness and the endless opening of that. Does that make sense? This isn't necessarily easy. But what happens if I can open up the intentions? What do I really want?

Sometimes people say, "I want—okay, it's not that thing or that person, but what I want is the aliveness or the juiciness that happens in their presence." Great, but I would say don't even stop there. You actually probably want something even wider and deeper than that. You want the fullness of soul-making, and that can be an intention.

This middle way of the imaginal again—where a real self wants a real thing in real time, real world—can I see that this that I'm wanting, or this that I have an image of happening and then think I would really like that to happen, is already happening? It's already happening. We are already making love in the imaginal realm if that's what I want. It's already, always happening.

And that recognition—that's actually to do with the eternality, sorry I skipped that—but that does something. I don't need to make this happen; it's already happening. It's a part of the imaginal sensibility. I recognize something, and that does something different to the nature of my desire. It opens up craving to eros; it helps to do that.

The one I meant to say was this "neither real nor not real." Can I find ways of playing with that? And again, actually get the sense. So it might come from emptiness. It might come from just, again, with these elements, we notice things. So if you look at—it's almost like you notice the fact that an image is neither real nor not real. It's not that you have to make it that. It's like if you just pay attention, you see, "Oh, yeah." Or when it's reified, you just remind yourself of that possibility, and then it has that quality of feeling neither real nor not real. That does something to how much we need to concretize this desire.

Is all this making sense?

I mentioned last night in the Q&A—there's lots of expansions potentially happening here. The expansion of all the elements in what we're calling the lattice or the constellation, to more or less degrees. The expansion of eros, psyche and logos. And the expansion of the imaginal sense from just the object, or expansion to self, other and world. So again, if it's just the object and not the self that's imaginal—the real self but imaginal object—that also causes problems, causes contraction. So is it possible to actually just check: where has the imaginal sense gone and the eros gone? And actually, is it possible to just allow it to include self and world? That more space takes the pressure off, allows more fullness, more beauty, stops the concretized "I want this, I need to get it."

Another one: grace. Just recognizing the grace in the sense of the erotic imaginal starts to open the hardness of the craving. It's hard to feel grace and feel contracted in craving for something.

The ideas—again, if I'm stuck with a certain idea of "desire is bad," then there's going to be all this dissonance in my sort of "want it and it's bad" and I don't have any kind of idea or conceptual framework about what is possible here with this desire. And maybe there's self-judgment as well and it's like, "I shouldn't be having this." Mess, contraction, not desire. So what's the logos that's operating? Can I check that and see if it can open out in some way?

The sense of eternality—that's huge. I mentioned that just now. Always already happening.

Humility and reverence. These are challenging territories. Humility—for most of us, it's a charged word, or we carry only a small understanding of what it might mean. But if that starts to fill out, here's another expansion. Each of these ideas, each of these elements can also start growing in our soul. What is humility? What does it feel like? What does it look like? I might begin with only a small idea of that. As soul-making takes hold of the idea of humility, that starts to become rich and wide. And as that gets going, again, it becomes very hard to have a small, tight, rigid craving. Something is softened, something is opened.

Now, here's a slightly different tuner. Sometimes there's this desire for something, and that desire starts to collapse in a kind of union. In other words, we desire something, we move towards it—even in our imagination—and then we just melt with it, which can be really lovely. That's a real option. But at that point—and some people define eros this way, as the desire for union, the desire towards oneness—that's not how we're defining it.

Many of these words are used in different ways, in different circles. We're saying eros preserves and needs a sense of twoness. It's in that erotic tension between the two that the whole imaginal can be born. If I collapse into it, it's wonderful and great and certain colors can open up, but it's a different experience than the erotic imaginal. There's something about preserving the twoness.

So it might be that what collapses the eros is simply a habit—perhaps a meditative habit or tendency—to just go to oneness. But eros needs two, and it actually creates more two. The same with the example of Amon—it will create more faces of the two. It preserves, creates, multiplies.

One last tuner for now. It's implicit in all I've said: the beloved other has elastic edges, soft and elastic edges. That's part of their mystery. It's part of their capacity to stretch. And because of that—because of both that sense of mystery and beyondness and their stretchability—that lets everything else be elastic. That's part of what eros is and does.

Someone wrote a note asking: Would you at some point specify what you mean by the fullness of image, or something being fully imaginal? Is the fully imaginal the goal of our practice, and what would be the other end, opposite of that range of more or less fully imaginal?

I don't know if the answer is already clear from what we've explored, but let me say a couple of things. Basically, eros and all these other elements—if eros is allowed to do what it wants to do, it wants to impregnate the psyche. It wants to enrich and complexify and deepen and widen what it beloves, its beloved other, and everything else, eventually. If it's allowed to do that, then what will happen is the object, the thing that we desire, will become more and more fully imaginal—by which we mean more and more of those elements will start igniting.

I didn't want to make it too much like "it is imaginal or it isn't"—too much of a black and white. Then people go, "Have I got it? Have I not got it?" Think of it more as a direction. You understand? Things can be more and more ignited because they're becoming more and more fully imaginal. Then we don't get so on-off about it.

Why? What is the goal of our practice? Is it for everything to become fully imaginal? Not necessarily. It's a mode of seeing. It's a mode of being in the world that comes and goes at times, I think. What's the point?

If you ask me to sum up in a sentence what's the point of all this, I would say: to open up the gates of sacredness. To open them wide and far and deep, more and more to expand the senses, the sense, the felt sense, the experiences of sacredness in our existence, in everything, any possibility. That's the point.

Now, we can do all that by, as Catherine was saying the other day, letting go of all desire in relation to objects. "I don't want anything but the unfabricated, that which is beyond all sense experience." There can be eros for that, and there can be a desire for that, and there's a certain kind of holiness that goes in that path. We can have that, absolutely. It's not either-or. You can have that whole movement and that kind of sacredness, and it's awesome.

But there are an infinite number of other kinds of sacredness that have to do with things and particulars—not the fading of things and particulars into universals, but things and particulars and angels and the world becoming angels. And that is endless.

So it's up to us what we want, but the purpose is this opening up of more and more of a sense of sacredness. And why? Well, either you want that or you don't, or you could say it's what soul wants. Soul wants to sense that way. That's what soul's about. And the range of that—whatever sense we have, "this is sacred"—it just opens that up more and more and more: the colors, the dimensions, the folds and angles of what that means. That's the point.

And for that, we need to speak in funny Greek words. No, we don't. But we need these discernments. No discernment, no opening of certain gates. So we need to make these differentiations of desire, differentiations, recognitions of how I'm thinking about it, what I'm allowing to be possible, making the discernments, and developing the particular skills or arts in relation to all these different avenues, doorways, and discernments.

Soul Making Dharma (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 41 min

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea responds to foundational questions about soul-making dharma and its relationship to traditional Buddhist awakening. He explores the paradoxical nature of "create-discover" in imaginal practice, where experiences are simultaneously created by the practitioner and discovered as gifts of grace. The discussion addresses how soul-making practice relates to dukkha and healing, particularly the contemporary suffering of soullessness in modern life.
> Burbea examines different historical conceptions of awakening across Buddhist traditions, noting how each vision of awakening implies choosing a particular cosmos and understanding of self. He discusses the concept of "soul" as the organ of perceiving soulfully, capable of growth through practice. The session covers practical aspects of imaginal practice, including the delicate balance between intentional effort and receptive openness, and the role of the energy body in supporting soul-making experiences.
> Key themes include participation in perception, the elastic nature of concepts in dharma practice, and how soul-making addresses levels of suffering not fully addressed by traditional mindfulness or emptiness practices. This teaching offers both theoretical framework and practical guidance for integrating imaginal work with contemplative practice.

Naomi began by raising a question about fullness of intention and working with all the elements that have been taught in this paradigm. She wanted to understand where this approach sits in relation to awakening - how it fits and how participation relates to awakening. She noted that there were aspects of what had been experienced that felt like what some people describe as aspects of awakening, though she understood that the logos of awakening is also fascinating territory.

Another participant wondered about the dynamic between creating and discovering in this work, and about the role of Logos as one of the stars in the constellation. They had a sense that there were times when something felt soul-making without having all the explicit frameworks in place.

There was also interest in the word and idea of "soul" itself - a request for some near synonyms or poetic alternatives to help understand this central concept.

One person shared that while they didn't have distinct memories from previous practice, they recalled moments when something really worked or clicked for them. They were aware of the emptiness of perception, of how it all works, yet these moments felt very much like what was being discussed. They sensed implications in the teachings about connecting experiences, but weren't quite grasping the full question they wanted to explore.

The inquiry touched on how we're naturally drawn toward moments of beauty and the sensing of the autonomy of another, even when we don't have these frameworks or vocabulary to understand what's happening.

Andrew raised a question about engaging with the energy body and working with the imaginal in practice. He drew a comparison with metta practice, noting that we don't simply wait around for loving-kindness to arise spontaneously. There's intentional cultivation involved, an effort required in practice. He wondered about this same dynamic with imaginal work - the balance between effort and settling back into simplicity. While the teachings mentioned we can't do imaginal practice all day long, and he'd noticed times when practice needed to settle into something more simple, he sensed that intentionality was still crucial. It's not just a matter of waiting passively for an image to arise.

Finally, there was a question about the teaching that "you love the image and the image loves you back." This reciprocal dynamic wasn't quite an exchange in the ordinary sense, but the questioner hadn't quite gotten their hands on what this mutual love actually meant in practice.

These questions wove together themes of intentionality in practice, the relationship between this work and traditional awakening, and the mysterious reciprocal dynamics that emerge in authentic imaginal engagement.

So where shall we begin? Perhaps with James' question about using the word "soul" and whether I can offer a poetic image for it. Actually, I would prefer not to, and there's a reason for this reluctance.

In this paradigm, in this teaching, we're not so much prescribing images. Whereas in other traditions or religions, you receive prescribed images—the Eucharist, Christ on the cross, whatever it might be, which is beautiful in its own way. But there's a kind of meta stance here, where images will be individual, created, discovered.

So while concepts, although an image will also be elastic and will evolve, for me, I feel tentative about prescribing or offering out images. Concepts seem like looser pointers in a direction that can then evolve.

One of the fundamental concepts about all this is that concepts need to be loose. They need to be elastic. There's a real tension between defining them too tightly and rigidly so that they can't grow, can't gain depth and meaning and width, on the one hand, and on the other hand, not bothering to delineate precisely and with discrimination between concepts so that there isn't much fruitfulness. There's this dance and tension between these poles.

Soul, almost more than any other concept we use, falls right in this space. But we could offer circular descriptions. Soul is, in one way, simply shorthand for a sense of soulfulness, with all that implies. But another way is to point to it in a more subjective sense, as it's usually used—you have a soul, or the soul has you.

What might it mean there? Again, it needs to remain very open, but circularly speaking, soul is the organ or the instrument of perceiving soulfully—perceiving in ways that are soul-making. The more we do this, the more that organ grows in its powers, its range, its capacities.

Seeing in ways that feel soul-making means engaging the eros, the beauty, the meaningfulness—all that eros-psyche-logos dynamic. Sensing in ways, whether internal or external, thinking in ways, relating to the body—the whole instrument becomes an organic, alive, multifaceted organ for soul-making perception in more ways than we're going to discover.

This leaves it very wide for me, but gives a sense of what it might be.

James offered a slightly cheeky follow-up: "If the word 'soul' didn't exist, do you have a sensible word you might use instead?"

Psyche.

Now, what happens in this growing of range and the kinds and depths and even modes of perceiving soulfully is that they are created and discovered. We discover them. Something happens.

There may be a word in English that means something like both created and discovered simultaneously—not partly created and partly discovered, not this bit created and that bit discovered, but something that somehow means both completely, in one. I don't know if there's such a word. Magic, perhaps, or I simply use "create/discover."

What this does for me is reflect the actual sense we have. Much of the language we use gives words to things that, if we just let this process happen, we'll naturally sense. A bit like the real/not-real phenomenon. Sometimes you ask someone working with an image, "Does it feel real or not real?" And they'll say, "Well, kind of neither and both," and that's just natural—a natural evolution of the soul-making process. It's what we begin to notice and sense about soul-making perception.

The same is true for create-discover.

Because there's a sense that I am doing this—I am creating this. But there's also a sense that I'm discovering something, stumbling across something. Something was given to me.

This element, create-discover or magic, reflects both, or is designed to reflect both. As you practice, you'll notice this—and there's a word or phrase for it. Oh, this is characteristic of soul-making experiences, characteristic of sensing the soul. It's got this strange amalgam of the two.

But it's also intended as a guide or balance point. When I remember that this is an element, then I remember something of my participation in the creation and the discovery. This has to do with participation. And that does something that's connected to neither real nor not real. It does something to my whole relationship with what I'm perceiving, whether it's something in the world or another or something purely internal.

At first it seems to narrow things because we're saying, "Oh, not that, not that, this thing in the middle"—create-discover, or neither. But it's like the old phrase: narrow is the gate, narrow is the path, but then it opens. By virtue of going on that path, just for a while, it might feel constraining. "Well, what are they talking about, and why do I have to constrain it to that, and why can't I just feel it this way or that way?" It's all good, but there's something about this narrow gate in a lot of these things that then opens up way wider than either of the other two—which is "just what I create" or "just what I discover."

So it's something to remember occasionally in practice, and that remembering starts to shape my sense of what's going on. My sense of what's going on shapes my relationship with what's going on, and that determines what then is possible.

Some of these concepts are tricky. Like I said, there's not really a word in English because a lot of the way we think in English about reality and about self and object is dualistic. And when we go to non-duality, we just kind of go to a kind of all-one soup or something like that. And this is neither. Both of those are great—it's fantastic to perceive and conceive dualistically at times. It's really important. And it's a lovely range of experiences and really important mystical experiences that happen when everything dissolves in some kind of mystical soup. But there's this other thing, let's call it in the middle, that seems narrow at first and then opens up a whole other range of experiences.

We don't really have the language for that, partly because language is based on notions of subject and object, and the verb is this thing done by the subject in relation to the object. There's something curious about this certain range here that really is not well captured, certainly in English language. I don't know enough about other languages, but I presume not so well either.

So it takes a while, but again, a lot of these elements are things that we notice. We're teaching kind of from the front here, but we could just say: if you just keep doing this stuff, at some point, these are things you'll notice anyway, regardless of whether you've heard them. If you're practicing with enough sensitivity—what's going on, what's the feeling here—I think you'd have some kind of sense of things when it really feels soul-making that is exactly that. You might put it in your own words, but it will be reflecting the same thing.

And that's very related to participation, which is actually just part of fullness of intention and awakening.

There's so much to say about this one. I've talked a lot about it. If you're interested, you can hear hours and hours of me exploring this territory.

But yes, there are many, many hours exploring this. There's a recent talk called "What is Awakening," and there's a whole series—I can't remember the exact title—of talk segments in "Eros Unfettered." A couple of years before that, in what I think was the November solitary retreat here, there was a talk called "Questioning Awakening" with two follow-up parts: something like "Buddhism Beyond Modernism" and "In Praise of Restlessness." That forms a three-part set, and there are probably others. Maybe some of you can point to additional material, but there's extensive exploration available. This is really key.

I suppose what I want to say briefly about this is—again, this is actually one of those subjects that I think by definition I would like to approach as endlessly expanding. This is not typically how we think of awakening. We tend to think of awakening as: I've got it, or I don't, or I'm halfway there, or whatever it is. In this paradigm, the notion of awakening is actually ever-expanding. And that relates to this buffet of treasures that I described the other day—this glory upon glory of beautiful creation and discovery.

Having said that, just to make a historical note that contextualizes all this: if you're around enough, even just around Gaia House, let alone going to Japan and looking at the history of Dharma in different countries, and you ask teachers or retreatants, "What's your idea or image of awakening? What does an awakened person look like? Where is this all going?"—you're going to get, just from Gaia House teachers, just from the Gaia House teacher council, a huge range.

This is the historical state of Buddha Dharma. You could also say there's a reason why we have this range that has more to do with the nature of soul, but I'll put that aside for now.

So you ask people, and sometimes awakening means coping with the existential, obvious reality of a meaningless material world—your birth and death within that—and just bearing up with it. That's what awakening means: trying to be kind within that reality and trying to have the courage to face it. For some people, that's awakening.

For other people, awakening is just a moment of awakening—this fresh perception of things that doesn't seem to have much ideation or will to it. That's a moment of awakening, and there's no grand awakening beyond that.

For others, awakening involves this transcendent, unfabricated experience where one encounters in meditation the deeper and deeper fading of things, opening to a realm completely beyond anything we can put into language. This tells us something about all this—which might be a kind of rejection of it all. None of this matters; this is samsara, worthless, nothing. The best thing is to escape this and not be reborn again. The one who is not reborn is the awakened one. Stages of awakening measure how near I am to not coming back to this world of perception—just samsara, just worthless.

It could go on and on, the different shades of understanding. What does it mean? And then even tracking back: awakening relates to the third noble truth in relation to the first noble truth of dukkha. But then we ask, what is dukkha? What actually are we addressing when we say suffering? Some of it's obvious, but if you expand the range of what that can mean...

I find all this absolutely fascinating—and fascinating how easily we can become really closed around a certain point of view. What's the place of soul in that, whether we're conscious of it or not? Why does a person choose to opt for this vision rather than that one? It's not just because it makes sense intellectually, because I see how the pieces fit together.

When I choose a vision of awakening, I'm actually choosing a cosmos. I'm choosing a vision of the cosmos and a vision of the self in response to that cosmos. A person can choose a meaningless cosmos in which the nobility of the self is to show up and bear with that reality, to have that kind of dignity and bravery and openness. Or a person can choose a magical cosmos—layers and dimensions and the participation of the soul in the creation and discovery of perception.

Psychologically, I think it's an incredibly interesting question: Why? Why choose this one or that one? What's going on for this personality or that personality? Without any right or wrong, but just seeing the whole thing from a soul perspective.

We can look at what we're doing here, this "improper dharma," from the perspective of "proper dharma"—fit it into, okay, so there's a lot of papañca going on, clearly.

And clearly there's a lot of craving. And there's a lot of overthinking.

But one can also turn things around and look at certain other versions of Dharma from a soul-making understanding. Again, why is the soul gravitating towards that? What is it about? And again I go back to what I said the other day - when we're in love with the path, any of those versions, those people who have those different visions love it, and there's eros there. They might not have that language, but basically something has become an image and a whole set of concepts that are meaningful to their soul and attractive to their soul. So then you have a whole soul psychology, kind of not deconstruction but perspective on conventional approaches. There's all that.

So then there's this question of suffering and dukkha and how it relates to the fullness of intention. I can only speak from my experience of dukkha I meet and what I'm dealing with and have had to deal with in the past, and also working with people, working a lot, especially one-to-one, with abuse history, sexual abuse and trauma and all kinds of things with this paradigm.

What it seems to me at this point - I think I said it somewhere or other - at this point I just have an absolute trust that all kinds of dukkha can be healed through imaginal work. Not necessarily they will be in this session, or a person is quite ready for that, or even quite ready to look at things that way, you know, to bring that perspective. But I just have that sense.

If I'm working with someone one-to-one, is that doorway open? Can I sense that this may be available for this person right now? My experience is that there is a healing available through the imaginal that addresses hurts and pains and soul torments and histories that other psychological paradigms - which I'm quite well versed in some - don't seem to do. And mindfulness doesn't quite do it. And even emptiness doesn't quite do it.

That was really interesting to me. I've seen that over and over again. It's to the point where I just trust it.

What makes that work better is this fullness of intention, kind of semi-paradoxically. Healing can be part of what I want - this ending of this dukkha. But if I can include a sense of actually, I want that in something even bigger, which is this fullness of soul-making and sense of sacredness. I want to ensoul my dukkha. I want to ensoul my history and the pain of my past and whatever it is. Somehow, if that fullness of intention can open up, then it becomes easier for this multi-spectrum, multi-level, far-reaching, far-penetrating sort of healing to happen.

Third thing - I mean, I could talk for hours, but I'm not going to. This is the last thing I'm going to say about this. I've shared this again in some of those recent talks, and I would say that - so again, what does suffering mean? We talk about awakening, the third noble truth, in relation to the first noble truth. What does dukkha mean?

It might be that different ages - certainly different people, but different ages, different eras, different cultures and different times have different kinds of dukkha. There probably have been in the history of humanity many cultures and societies and eras where a crisis of a lack of meaningfulness, or what we might call a lack of soulfulness, just wasn't a pain. It wasn't there, or rather it was very, very rare.

Whereas I think a key stratum of the dukkha of our society now, at this time, is the dukkha and the pain of soullessness.

One of the things I shared - I could again - one of the things I shared in those talks was about when I had cancer and was going to chemotherapy at the hospital in Plymouth. It's a huge hospital, and it was so hard for me. It was really on the edge of my practice. Yes, it was hard physically. There was an enormous amount of dukkha there.

But what was really hard for me was the soullessness of the place. Everything was plastic. There was this kind of cheeriness. Death was in the room, and people were sort of... and the way one is looked at by the medical system - basically, I'm a bag of chemicals with some really not very promising statistics attached to it. All of that, primarily the plastic and the lack of aesthetics, and despite all the physical dukkha and all the possibility of dying - that was the thing that was just on the edge of my practice. Sometimes it was really, really hard. I couldn't quite... while I was sitting there with these plastic pipes and poison being pumped into the body... that was the thing that was really hard.

There's a dukkha of soullessness.

That's a level of dukkha that, again, in the Dharma, we don't really have that language. We don't have these words to open up something. Look, there is a pain for many people at that level—the need for meaningfulness, soulfulness, and such.

So again, when we talk about awakening, in the third noble truth in relation to the first noble truth, what do we mean by suffering? What kinds of suffering are there, and what do they need? How will they be healed? This is some of what's in there.

The logos piece—is that okay? When we use the word logos, we don't mean anything necessarily obvious. Those two experiences you described in relationship and moving—there wasn't any kind of heavy edifice or machinery of philosophical structure there. But just the fact that you could say it felt soul-making implies that there's something like what we call soul-making, even though you haven't delineated it, and something of a soul and something of a value to that. So that's enough logos right there.

When we use the word logos or concept, we mean everything from something very complex, sophisticated, subtle, conceptual structure, all the way down to what I said earlier today: any perception whatsoever of subject, object, and time. That's already concept. It's percept. So it could be just the most bare sense of momentary awareness with nothing happening. And that's what I perceive—nothing. And it's happening now, in this moment. That's already concept.

So we're talking about something really, really subtle. It doesn't have to be complex. And yet one of the possibilities is a kind of quietening of the concept, but there's still a bare concept there, subtle.

One of the other possibilities is that while we're working with an image and it's touching the heart and the energy body is responding and we're moved and the soul is resonating, the mind can actually be kind of intuitively flickering and getting insights and seeing how—I don't know if you've had this experience—how different elements fit together and how the structure works, how soul-making happens. So sometimes, in the process of soul-making, it really involves the intellect, just in a kind of very automatic way. So there's that possibility too.

Derek, I didn't quite understand the question, but let me say something to see if it's accurate. Maybe part of bringing out this vocabulary and making these discernments is to say that this kind of stuff is going on anyway. This is just what the soul does. Either we have so-called intrapsychic images arising in meditation, and it comes out. And people have told me, "Yeah, I've been meditating for twenty years, you know, vipassana, insight meditation, and I never tell anyone these things that happen because it doesn't seem like it's welcome." Maybe it's not welcome.

So the soul does generate, create, discover—it's part of what it does. There's that way, and then there's also the fact that if you love something, if you are devoted to something, it has become fantasy for you. It has become image, which means the sense of sitting there on a hot day and working and dedicating yourself, the sense of the Buddha, the sense of the path, the sense of metta. It's all part of the love and dedication and devotion and eros to the path, whatever it is.

Yeah, you've talked about that before, but it's just interesting for me to hear about it and to think about that perspective on the practice. That sense of that's already happening and then coming towards this and going, "Oh, okay, I have these tools for working with something that's already wanting to happen, a process that's already going in that direction."

Yeah, that's part of it, exactly. Giving us the tools, the concepts, the refinements of skill and awareness that can navigate that. But there's a second thing to me, which is also—and I think I must have said it yesterday morning when I talked about desire—when we don't have the words and no one talks about certain concepts, we almost blind ourselves to them. And so I ask you: is that really what you love? Is that really what you're doing?

Is it for just the decrease of suffering? That's what draws you to Buddha Dharma? It's almost like just giving us the concepts and talking about it makes us realize, I think in many cases, oh, there's more going on here—yet we haven't had the language for it. And when we don't have the language, it's almost like we can't fill out the psychological understanding and see what it needs. Does that make sense?

Which to me is an important part of just psychological awareness of self. Like, what's going on in my life? What is it? How do I operate? How do I get drawn to something and become galvanized and all that? And that's, for me, a really important piece.

So that's a crucial element. I would say all practice, or deepening in any practice—we could be talking about metta, samadhi, emptiness practice, mindfulness, or whatever—as it matures, the deepening involves a kind of learning to play with the gas pedal: a little bit more, a little bit less. In the larger sense, as in deciding to take a break from retreating, or sitting late into the night. But also in the micro sense of how much effort, how much pressure, how much direct intentionality—the direction of intentionality and activity—is present in the moment.

And that's not an on-off switch. It can be really, really finely tuned in any practice. I would say that's a crucial part of any practice deepening—again, the sensitivity, the skill developing. And the same is true of soul-making and imaginal practice.

I think there's something almost intrinsic to soul-making. In the create-discover dynamic, right there you've got the "create" which is active and the "discover" which is passive. You've also got one of the nodes which is grace. The thing about grace is that it's inexplicable gift. It's just like, why was I given this? I didn't do anything. It just showed up.

And you've got the first node, the idea of the lattice, implicit in which is: hey, we can do subtle things that support soul-making. So right within those twenty-eight nodes, you've got the implicit dance of not just effort, but also attitude. I can see it as grace. I can see it as something that is an art for me that I can play with. You understand?

So there's effort, but there's also attitude and a kind of way of looking, a way of conceiving. And I think with a lot of soul-making material, it requires quite a delicate poise. So even just to have the intention to be receptive to an image—it's very different when you say, "Oh, an image will show up sometime. Maybe, probably not," with that kind of attitude, whatever.

There's a kind of real... there's already a kind of humility in the poise of "Let's see what comes." And in opening, I can feel there's already a delicacy, there's already sensitivity, there's openness, there's possibility, there's already humility of a kind. I may not even know to what—to soul, to psyche, to the divinity, Buddha nature, whatever. And there are the beginnings of all these qualities.

So that poise is a kind of place on the intentional spectrum, and that's very much part of it. It's much more delicate than, "Right, I'm going to..." whatever it is.

This is very, very delicate. Sometimes the energies that come and the eros that arises is really strong, but a lot of it is really, really subtle and delicate. And the kind of poise of intentionality or receptivity—it's the intention to be receptive much of the time, as much as anything.

So that poise is a kind of intention or a kind of place on the intentional spectrum, and it's very much part of it. It's very much more delicate than simply deciding, "Right, I'm going to do this or that." This is very, very delicate. Sometimes the energies that come and the eros that comes is really strong, but a lot of it is really, really subtle and delicate. The kind of poise of intentionality or receptivity—it's the intention to be receptive, as much as anything.

Does that make sense? And as always, it's not a fixed place. It's an arena, this whole thing. Intentionality, grace, receptivity, humility, activity, art—they're just an arena for us to play and experiment in and see what happens. It's never like, "Ah, nailed it, now that's it." Just as it is not with any practice. We can't just bandage the gas pedal in that position and leave it there. It's always very subtly modulated in the art of response.

One last thing about the energy body. Is there a kind of danger in alerting attention to the possibility of, for instance, breathing in certain ways where the energy body can have more energy? Potentially, yes. My experience meeting loads of people over the years is that most people don't have enough energy. Or rather, the energy is moving in their system in a way that it's just jangled and not really harmonizing in a way that actually creates a lot of available energy.

For most people, either the energy doesn't harmonize, or there's a kind of restriction on just how much energy they will allow—how much energy we're used to flowing in the body. So I think, if I'm not taking too much care to be completely comprehensive, I'll lean towards that side. You know, I go teach places, and I can just feel—there's every good reason for it, lots of reasons—but oftentimes people tend to feel quite chaotic and agitated inside when actually it's a state of not much energy. So if I haven't got much time, I'll lean on that side.

But yes, I guess there's a danger, though in that context I wouldn't harp too much on the possibility of too much energy. I feel very much that in a lot of cases when there is too much energy flowing in different ways, it's a lot easier to fix and liberate than a lot of people say. I don't tend to get too anxious about that stuff. For a person who has that experience with me, I know how to make it not so much a problem.

It's true there is a danger. Putting these teachings out about following imagination and eros—maybe some people would just take it and run with it, you know, make crazy choices. It's there. I think just the balance of things for me felt a calling that it was necessary to do it.

But it's also possibly a smoother path, isn't it? A smoother path in terms of both energy and ease. The way we tend to work with energy allows it to smooth more and not be so problematic. There are ways of working with energy body where you're just lighting fireworks to some kind of powder keg, and it's often not that helpful. So the way we tend to do it is much more organic, gentle, and things can open in a much more harmonized way.

I think it's a matter of just having that idea that it's possible for you to notice, but expanding the idea of what that could possibly look like or feel like or mean. When we think love, we tend to think, "Oh, it's going to look this way." But sometimes it can be fierce or very stern or whatever. So just expand the range and then just look. "Oh, yes, there's this kind, but I hadn't really thought of that as a kind of face of love before."

Let's have a bit of quiet.

CHAPTER 162

Sharing Soul Sense (A Temenos Exercise)

Rob Burbea · 1h15

> In this experiential session from his Foundations of a Soulmaking Dharma series, Rob Burbea leads participants through a multi-stage relational exercise called a "temenos practice" - creating sacred space for sharing deep aspects of experience with others. The session begins with establishing mettā (loving-kindness) as the foundational container, then moves through three progressive stages: expressing real-time energy body experiences, sharing present-moment emotional states, and finally communicating what has touched one's soul during the retreat.
> Burbea emphasizes the development of refined awareness, sensitivity, and discernment - qualities that are both prerequisite for and fruit of soulmaking practices. Participants work in groups of three, learning to witness with their whole being while tracking their own energetic and emotional responses. The exercise demonstrates how soulmaking dharma extends beyond individual practice into relational dimensions, showing how we can sense and express the sacred through various modalities including words, movement, sound, and poetic language.
> This practice illustrates key elements of Burbea's approach: the cultivation of soul-sense, the use of image and imagination in spiritual development, and the recognition that anything can potentially touch the soul when met with the right quality of attention. The temenos framework provides safety for vulnerable sharing while developing skills essential for deeper soulmaking work.

I'm certain you have gained a vivid sense of how much refinement of awareness and sensitivity and subtlety of attention and discernment is both necessary and a fruit of these kinds of practices—both a basis and a fruit. And that's part of the ongoing possibility of expansion. It grows in us. The more we intend to work in these ways, those capacities, those sensibilities grow.

Some of you may not have been there, but there was a question in one of the Q&A sessions a few days ago about whether it's possible to do this in relationship with another person. The answer is yes, and in quite a few different ways. There's a range of possibilities. So we want to do an exercise now, to play a little bit, that exercises our sensitivities and our skills with some of the elements of the soul-making practices in relationship—together.

This comes in three or four stages of exercise, but any part of it is optional. If you feel like you don't want to do something, you can just pass.

We're going to break into groups of three, and I'm going to ask that these groups of three be, as much as possible, with two people that you didn't know well before the retreat.

There will be a few stages, but I'll talk us through it. If you want to pass on a stage, you can, but you probably won't. Basically, we'll be exploring in the moment, in real time, the experience of energy body, the experience of the heart, and if you want to, sharing or expressing something that has touched your soul while you've been here. It could be in this moment or this week—an image or something you've sensed with soul that has touched your soul. That's basically what we're doing.

So find a posture that's comfortable. Begin with your eyes closed, and grounding. Sense of grounding—connecting with the sense of sitting, with the sensations of sitting, with the floor, the feet, the legs, the backside. Grounded. In contact.

Then, keeping that sense of contact, open up the whole space of the awareness of the energy body. You're really very much in your space, whatever is happening there right now, just in touch with the flow, the ebb and flow and movement, what arises, what passes, in the energy body, and also in the heart and the mind right now.

When you're ready, begin offering metta, offering the intention of loving-kindness to your partners. You can move between eyes open and eyes closed. You may make eye contact, you may not. You're just getting a sense of them, their being. Wishing them well. May you be peaceful. May you be filled with happiness. May you live at ease. Just returning to that intention, the gentle intention of metta over and over again, to these beings with you.

Is it possible, at the same time as you are giving, intending the stream, the flow, the bathing of metta towards your partner or partners here, that you recognize, that you become aware too, that at this very moment, you are the recipient of well-wishing? There is metta flowing towards you—goodwill, bathing your body, your being. You are wished well. A gaze of kindness focused on you, intentions of goodness and kindness. Aware of giving and receiving both—flowing in, flowing out, bathing all around and inside.

Now, the first round of this exercise will be that you take turns, and each person has roughly two minutes to in some way express or share—it could be in words, it could be in movement, it could be in gesture, it could be in sound that is not words—in some way to express what is happening, what the experience is in the energy body.

at the moment, as it's happening. And what you'll find is that in two minutes that might even change quite a lot. The fact of you communicating something in whatever medium or form actually has an effect as well. So you're simply somehow expressing out loud what is happening in the energy body through those two minutes, as much as you would like to.

What happens in the energy body can be anything at all, and there's no better or worse, no right or wrong. So it might be tracking into the energy body and discovering, "Actually, I don't even know. I'm not quite connected. Okay, give me a second." Or finding that it's numb, that there's not much going on there. That's simply what's happening in the energy body—it's neither right nor wrong, just what's present. Or perhaps going in and finding there's a lot of nervous excitement that's kind of unpleasant, but when I stay with it, I see that I can open to it and it becomes quite pleasant, like a fizzy fountain.

You can speak in conventional descriptive words, as accurate as possible, to describe what's happening in the moment. You could also speak in more poetic language, drawing on our expanded sense of the energy body that now includes the imaginal dimension. Perhaps the energy body right now is a volcano in the moment of its eruption, boiling luminescent lava erupting through the central channel out the top of the head. Or maybe the energy body feels like a cool stream of clear, pure water flowing in spring sunlight, this movement through the body. It could even be sensing that you're growing wings—huge, powerful wings that move the whole energy, whatever it is. No good, no bad, and you can describe in all kinds of ways.

Now, the witnesses are simply witnessing. You don't comment. But the job of the witness is to bring all your senses to the witnessing—eyes, listening, but your whole energy body. What is it to bring your energy body into openness to what you are witnessing and hearing? Your job is also to track what happens in your energy body when you are witnessing what you're witnessing, when you hear what you hear.

The intention here is purely for exercise. As I mentioned at the beginning, there are many skills involved in this work. We're developing these skills now in relationship. It's not that this or that should happen. I'm not trying to entertain or impress or prove myself in any way. It's purely an exercise. So check what happens in the intention sometimes when we come into relationship.

Take a moment now to decide the order you'll go in your groups. Remember, there's a range here. There's nothing one needs to impress. If I look inside and find there's just a knot in my heart and the rest is numb, and it feels really contracted, that's what's happening. That's what one expresses and shares in whatever way one wants. One could express that in grunts or any other form. Really, it's open. The experience is open and the range of expression is open, staying in your place and not touching each other.

Let's take a moment before we start to gather ourselves again. I probably should have done the explaining before—apologies. Just take that moment, connection with the earth, the grounding, and the whole energy body right now. Tap into the metta again, giving your partner or partners that flow of well-wishing, knowing that you are at this moment the recipient, the object of goodwill and kindness, of metta.

Then gently let the metta take its place as a kind of basis—not so much a conscious intention, but just a basis of everything that we do when we're in relationship. Just let it settle as the ground floor.

When you're ready, the first person has two minutes to speak, grunt, vocalize, move, express what's happening in the energy body right now. Both witnesses and communicator are tracking the effects of communicating in the energy body as well.

After each round, take a couple of moments to come back to your energy body. What's reverberating there now? What's the experience of either having witnessed or having communicated, shared, expressed? It doesn't have to be one thing or another. It's simply an exercise in developing awareness and sensitivity, in this case, in a certain relational context.

So that will allow other possibilities.

Again, just momentarily touching on the metta, bringing that up more consciously—the goodwill, the knowledge, the assurance, the recognition that you are receiving the intentions of loving-kindness right now.

And then the second person beginning in the same way, the witness completely open with the whole energy body and tracking their response at the same time.

And again, coming with the fullness of intention into your own sphere of experience of your own energy body. Just seeing what ricochets around there now, what reverberates, whatever it is.

In a minute it will be the third person's turn. But for those of you working either in pairs or alone, the pairs can just divide this time in half, if you like, as well as you can judge a half minute each, and just do that a bit more rapidly. And for those working alone, there's the possibility, if you like, of almost letting the soul come into two—a witness part of the soul and yourself as image, if you like, tracking the energy body.

Just again, just touching on, just opening the taps of metta, opening the waters, the flow of metta, just for a few moments—bathing the other in this stream of mercy, kindness, goodness, knowing that you too are right now likewise being bathed, gazed on with mercy, with well-wishing.

Letting that take its place as a quiet, tacit foundation, and the next person beginning.

Lovely. So that was round one, or stage one. The second stage actually adds a dimension, and the dimension that it adds is that of the heart, the emotions.

Pretty much the same thing, but what happens this time is each person expresses in whatever manner they like. It could be moving, it could be vocalizing without words, it could be descriptive, conventional use of language, it could be a poetic use of language. The energy body can become image, the emotions can become image. So all that is available as manners of expression.

And again, the witnesses are just silent with as much receptivity of their energy body.

So the person who's expressing expresses what's happening in the heart, in the emotions right now. And then the witnesses track in their body what's happening in the energy body and what's happening in their heart as they're witnessing, but they're not commenting. So the whole energy body, the whole being is really open and in relationship to what's happening. And you're just silently tracking your process as much as you're in relationship.

If you're a witness, maybe something like sixty percent with the person listening and forty percent tracking your own inner reverberations. So you're actually really quite aware of the reverberations inside you of what's being expressed or communicated. But for the expresser it's probably mostly inside, but really aware that this is happening in a relational field—I'm being seen, I'm being witnessed, opened to, listened to, very probably empathized with and gazed on with love and care.

So primarily it's emotion, but because that energy ties in with the energy body, primarily you're just sharing, again, in the moment—not "yesterday I was a bit down," but what's happening right now. And again, the effect of speaking itself, of communicating—everything's dependent arising. So you're just tracking the flow and expressing it.

One thing to look out for: In terms of patterns and tendencies, is it my pattern when sharing about where my heart is at to only describe what is lovely and the good feelings? Or is it my pattern to only share the dukkha and the difficult stuff? Just noticing that and seeing—maybe I want to experiment again with range. No force, no pressure, but just something gently to be aware of as well.

Is that clear enough for this round?

So again, starting with the connection—simple sensations of contact, grounding, earth, feet, legs, sitting bones. And again, opening the stream of metta, letting it flow—the gentleness, the well-wishing, the kindness flowing to your companion or companions, flowing to self.

And again, can you open up the dual awareness, recognizing that you are receiving right now? Right now these waters of mercy, the gentleness, the well-wishing, the radiance of kindness is washing over you, through you. Giving and receiving both, opening both ways.

And letting that metta rest as the background basis of what we're doing, not so conscious. And then the first person again beginning.

the stream of mercy, the eyes of mercy on the others, on self, on what you have just witnessed, on what you've just expressed.

Letting that recede to the background, the ever-present background of our intention, and then the next person beginning.

So as much as possible, what's happening now in the flow of the heart right now?

Again, taking just a few moments sensing your energy body, what reverberates, allowing, allowing, and gently supporting the flow of an intention, intentions of kindness. The beauty of metta, to flow from you to your companion or companions, and from them to you. Feel yourself give and receive, know yourself giving and receiving.

And again, if you're in a pair, you can try and roughly divide this into two, and the next person beginning.

Again, just settling, opening up the energy body, the awareness, the sensitivity to what's reverberating there and the intention of kindness in and through the energy body, out of the energy body and into the energy body, giving and receiving.

Eyes of mercy, the ears of kindness. It's a privilege to hear, to see, to share, to express.

Now in this part, stay for now with the eyes closed and with your own energy body, with your own energy body experience, and settling in the body, the openness of the whole body awareness.

And if you can, somehow bring into your awareness, bring up for your soul, remind yourself of what your heart longs for, what your heart may burn for. What brought you here? What brings you here? What brought you to this retreat?

That's what brought you into existence, to this life, in whatever way works for you to bring that up for the soul, in the soul, for the soul to behold, allowing whatever responses in the energy body, in the heart, in the soul.

Opening your body, opening the energy body to the effects, the reverberations of this that your heart burns for, longs for, loves. And then feeling yourself touched by this.

When the mind wanders and it slips away or it goes numb, sensing your devotion to this that you burn for, your alignment with, your desire.

Maybe it becomes image. Maybe you become image as the one who is devoted to that, the one who serves that, who wants to serve that. Maybe it's just energetic or emotional. Again, the awareness and the effects can be at any level, in any arena of our being, domain of our being.

And if you feel in contact with this, and if you want to, what is it then to stay in contact with this soul desire, the image of this soul desire, the image of yourself as lover of this, as seeker, as one who burns and serves, burns for and serves this?

To gently, if you feel ready, if you want to, to begin to open your eyes and sense from that place, from that longing, from that love, from that devotion, sensing self, your companion or companions.

Who are these who sit with you now, with your soul aflame, with your heart of devotion? Who sees you now? How do you see the world, this space, this moment, yourself, the others?

So at some point in this you may want to just at least make just a tiny bit of eye contact and see what the effect is to see and be seen. And by who? Who are these mysteries? Who are these angels that behold your fire, protect the burning of your love?

As much as possible, close to the fountain or the flame of what brought you here, what sent you here, what called you here to this retreat, to this life, to these difficulties, to these gifts.

When you're ready, gently letting that recede and again just coming to an awareness of whatever's happening in your experience right now. Your sense of energy, body, emotion, thought, also in the sense of what's around, who's around.

So the last part of this exercise - again, it's all optional, so you may feel like you want to leave this part, but please stay in your position. You can just wave with an eye, wave your part if you want.

There's a chance to, again, express in any way or combination of ways that feels appropriate or the right way for you - vocal, verbal, different kinds of verbal or movement or gesture - to express, share, communicate something, actually anything, that has touched your soul, has felt soulful to you.

It could be an image, it could be a way something here has been sensed with soul, has spoken to your soul. You can share, describe, communicate in some way or another.

And again, the witness is just witnessing, open to their experience, the whole range of their experience, which means, again, energy, body, emotion, heart. And also image. So what happens when soul hears image, when soul hears soulfulness or witnesses soulfulness?

You don't have to necessarily express or share the thing that feels the most intimate necessarily, but you might, absolutely. And if you don't want to do this at all, that's really fine too.

Does that make enough sense to you?

All of these exercises involve sharing, communicating, expressing, grunting, whatever it is, always has an effect. Everything has an effect. It's always a dependent arising.

And if you find that what you're sharing actually opens into something deeper, where this present moment is suddenly sensed with soul—this being here, this way, with each other, touched with soul—that's perfectly fine to share as well. Or it could be something from the week. Again, it doesn't have to be the most intimate thing, though it could be.

Each person will have around five minutes. Take your time.

What we call this exercise is a relational temenos exercise. Temenos means a kind of safe space or protector of what is sacred. So you're with good people, there's this soul gaze and metta gaze, and you take your time with all the sensitivity and care around what you want to communicate or express and how that feels as you do it.

You have around five minutes each, and you can move with a rhythm that allows you to be sensitive and respectful, noticing what's happening as you share.

It can be absolutely anything at all. As a piece of theory, anything can touch your soul. If that's what moves you to express, then let it be that. It could be an object, a thing, a person, a tree, an image—internal or external—an idea that's really soulful for you. Anything that touches you in this way.

Is that clear enough to begin?

Now, again, just that momentary connection—body, earth, energy body, presence, openness of sensitivity, and the love. When we speak soul, we are angels. The witnesses are beholding the angelic in one way or another, so there's the gentleness and beauty that goes with that, and the reverence.

When you're ready, the first person beginning.

Again, taking those moments in the silence to open that awareness, that sensitivity to the soul resonances and reverberations—sharing, witnessing, giving, receiving, beholding together. And all of this in love, in metta. The mystery of other, the mystery that you are.

When you're ready, the next person beginning.

Again, just allowing the attention to tune into awareness, noticing what you notice of what reverberates in actually receiving the gift, the privilege, the honor of witnessing soul. And what reverberates from sharing, from expressing what is intimate in a soul way. Kindness and metta for all of it.

Let those waters flow, let them bathe you in awe.

In just a moment the third person will take their turn, or if you're two, you can divide it again.

Remember that there is the possibility of witnessing at many different levels—energy body, heart, and also soul. What does it mean to sense with soul that which is being shared, or the one who is sharing, or yourself as expressing and sharing? So many things are possible. This moment, too, and this sharing can become image. All is possible. Nothing has to happen. You're just opening to the possibilities.

When you're ready, the next person beginning.

Hold that delicate poise of openness, of sensitivity, a certain stance of being open to your experience—what's moving, resonating in your energy body, in your heart, in your mind, in your soul. Whatever it is, we touch each other at so many levels, in so many ways. We touch and we are touched.

And then again, to end with metta—just opening that gate to allow the streams to flow, cool and gentle, bathing, touching, permeating self and other. Recognizing yourself in this very moment, bathed and touched and permeated by those very waters. Giving and receiving both.

Now opening your eyes if they're not already open, to thank and honor your partner or partners, or yourself if you've been doing this alone. Honor the privilege to share in this way, to be together in this way, opening up the dimensionality of what it means to be a human being, what it means to be together—who sees and who is seen.

Taking leave of your partner now, and returning to the call as it was, or to your places.

CHAPTER 163

The Spreading of Five Wings

Rob Burbea · 14 min

> In this foundational teaching, Rob Burbea presents a framework for understanding the expansive nature of soulmaking dharma through five key domains of potential growth and extension. He emphasizes that this approach has an inherently organic quality—like a living tree that naturally wants to expand—and explores how practitioners can investigate their own patterns and tendencies across these ranges.
> The five domains include: the constellation of soulmaking elements (eros, psyche, logos, etc.), the axes of self-other-world-eros in perception, the dynamic interplay of eros-psyche-logos, the spectrum from apparent pathology to purity, and the range of energy body experiences from ethereal to dense. Burbea guides practitioners to notice where they might be limiting their range in any of these areas, whether through unconscious preferences, fears, or simply habitual patterns.
>
> This teaching offers both newcomers and experienced practitioners a way to assess their contemplative territory and recognize opportunities for expansion. Rather than prescribing a single approach, it invites gentle investigation into one's natural soul inclinations while remaining open to growth across all dimensions of practice. The framework serves as a map for understanding how imaginal practice can organically infuse self-sense, perception of others, and relationship with the world.

Good morning, everyone.

You've probably got the sense already, the understanding or the feel, that these explorations and this kind of paradigm that we're exploring and presenting has as one of its key features and characteristics a tendency to expand and to want to expand into different arenas, domains, and reaches.

When there was a question and I said, "Well, in a way, if I had to sum up really briefly, what's the point of all this? Why are we doing it?" I would put that in the language of expanding, opening up further and further the senses of sacredness. So this idea of possible expansion, possible growth, is a feature characteristic—intrinsic almost—with possibilities of extensions, reaches, and ranges expanding in different aspects and domains. You've probably kind of got that sense already.

Soul is—you could say there's something very organic here. It's really like a living thing that wants to grow, like a tree or something else. And so this notion of, or fact of, wanting to expand, or at least the potentials to expand, is really key. So you've probably got that sense already.

This morning I want to draw together, under that rubric of expansion and range, five domains of possible expansion, possible extension of range. And then we won't have time to go into all of them, so we're just going to pick two to explore in a bit more detail. But let me go through them quite briefly. Actually, all this has already been said, but it might be good to think of this—put them all together as a list of five under the idea of possible ranges, and where am I with those possible ranges.

So the first is the whole idea of the elements of the constellation or the lattice. We might feel—you might feel—in your practice that so far you've got a really good sense of, or it feels like a very alive and rich sense of, some of those elements. They really make sense to you, you've experienced them, they've even opened up in ways that were unexpected. But others of them are a bit cloudy or even still relatively inert. Nothing has really happened there at all. They haven't really illuminated.

So there's no right or wrong in this, but there is this—let's call it an intrinsic potential or even an intrinsic eros that soul has—to reach out and open up and illuminate more and more of these nodes. So part of the investigation is, and we'll come back to this, where am I in my soul's opening out to a sense—an experiential sense and also an understanding—of these elements. Okay, so that's the first one in terms of a domain of possible expansion and increase of range in practice.

The second one—I could go in any order here, but the second one, again, I've mentioned all of these before, but just to collect them together from a certain angle in terms of this idea of expansion and possibility and where I am—the second one is the expansion along the axes of the soul-making beginning to involve, infect, infuse self, other, and world.

Actually, in any moment of perception, any moment of any kind of perception at all, there is always some sense, no matter how subtle or vague, of some kind of subjective sense, some kind of self-sense, some kind of objective sense, and some kind of world sense. And these three can feel very separate or very hard, or kind of much more connected and open, but still that triad is absolutely intrinsic to any moment of perception: self-other-world.

And the question for soul-making is: what are the perceptions of self-other-world at any time? But in terms of expansion, possibility and range, what do I notice here, perhaps? Do I have a tendency for the other—the object, for example—to be where all the erotic, imaginal coming alive is at, and not so much the self? Or I don't really let it spread to the world, or perhaps the other way around. I'm so taken with the way I come alive as an imaginal subject, and I can kind of fall in love with it. There's nothing wrong with that at all. It's really a question of balance. Are the waters of soul flowing in these three directions? Does it make sense? Or is one of them—does it tend to be a bit lopsided, and if so, which way? People will differ, and it differs over time.

But actually, I'd like to add one more element into that, which is eros. So self, other, world, eros. And you could say eros is a part of myself. It's an aspect or an energy or force in myself. But again, the question is: what tends to become quite fully and vividly and richly and erotically imaginal for me of those four, and which maybe tends to get missed? Like my own eros—has that become for myself an erotic, imaginal object at times? Can it? What would that mean?

Again, it's simply one way of thinking about territory and range and possibility—just examining my tendencies and patterns. What are the places where I might harbor an unconscious belief that it's somehow not good to venture there?

That's the second dimension.

The third involves the eros-psyche-logos dynamic itself. Here, when soul-making is allowed to unfold naturally, when eros is permitted to inseminate and fertilize and gather momentum, all these elements get drawn into the vortex of soul-making. They become involved, whirling around each other, reflecting one another, inspiring and inflaming each other further until the whole constellation grows richer, wider, and deeper.

The question for gentle reflection here is: What range is possible for me with each of these? For instance, am I somewhat reluctant to let eros become really strong? Perhaps it feels too intense and I'm uncertain about it, so my range of eros—from quite subtle to really intense and powerful—becomes truncated. Or perhaps it's not fear but simply habit; my energetic being and desire body haven't yet developed the habit of becoming inflamed, so eros inhabits only a certain range.

The opposite can also occur—where everything becomes super-intense all the time, like a perpetual raging fire. Yet eros can be extremely subtle. It may be sexual or non-sexual; sexual eros is just one variety. But is there a tendency or pattern, conscious or unconscious, toward only the intense side of eros's range? There's tremendous potential for working with really subtle eros—extraordinarily subtle.

The same question applies to logos and the full spectrum of their ranges.

These three together constitute the third dimension.

The final two dimensions relate to what we might call neuropsychological dynamics. The fourth involves the spectrum of apparent pathology, dukkha, madness, violence, or weirdness. This range extends from what most people in society would consider really strange and psychologically suspect—quite weird and dark—all the way to experiences that seem completely free of dukkha, obviously pure and light and sweet, traditionally angelic in the narrow sense.

Where do I stand with this spectrum? What are my tendencies? How open is this range for me? How comfortable am I with it? Do I relate to it with fear or preference? Or perhaps it simply reflects that souls are different, and images naturally reflect what's occurring in our lives.

This represents another possible range to investigate—simply noticing what arises when I consider these territories.

The fifth and final dimension concerns the range of energy body texture—the felt sense of the energy body from very ethereal, luminous, and insubstantial, with that lovely gossamer, filigree quality that's light and delicate, to something much denser and more solid. What are my typical tendencies or patterns here? What doors might I be closing on certain parts of this range for various reasons that don't accurately reflect my more natural soul expression? Or perhaps this simply reflects how my soul naturally tends to inhabit this range.

These five ranges offer territories to bear in mind and explore gently—examining responses, reactions, inclinations, desires, tendencies, fears, and uncertainties around each spectrum.

I should mention something about the second dimension—the self-other-world-eros dynamic—that's come up in interviews and Q&A sessions. For the self to become imaginal, it doesn't need to be a figure in an image. You might have an imaginal figure simply doing its thing, their thing in their own world and a person thinks, well, shouldn't I be in the image as well? Not necessarily—maybe, maybe not. Maybe it responds to you in your meditation, maybe you enter the image and become a figure in the image, but maybe not. What will happen in the infinite echoing and mirroring, and in the way this image mysteriously speaks to you even if you don't understand, is that it starts to infuse into the self-sense. Either right there in meditation or probably in other ways. Then the self-sense in life can become imaginal.

We get the sense that images are asking. We are born from images as opposed to images being born from us. Images ask something of me. We play with the idea that my deeper identity is somehow from the image. From the image I am expressing an image or images. I am asked by images to be their face in the world somehow, and that face is usually not literal. It's refracted in very subtle ways. You understand?

So in terms of the self, other, world, eros dimension, don't put that—how that might open up the range in terms of self—it's not necessarily so tight and obvious. Okay? Is that everything?

Okay, so that's the general introduction. We're only going to have time, as I said, this morning to pick two of those and explore them. But bear them in mind, this list of five, if you go on with this kind of practice, as just something you might want to let yourself explore at different times.

So Catherine's going to introduce how we're going to explore two of those lists of five.

CHAPTER 164

Of Hunger and Humility

Rob Burbea · 16 min

> In this closing talk from a retreat on the foundations of soulmaking dharma, Rob Burbea reflects on the natural unfolding of soul-making practice and the delicate balance required to support it. He emphasizes that soul-making is inherently natural to the soul—it's what the soul wants and does when we don't obstruct it. The talk explores the five ranges of experience that naturally expand in soulmaking practice: the lattice elements, self and world, eros and logos, energy and embodiment, and the spectrum from apparent pathology to wholeness.
> Burbea offers practical guidance for those drawn to this path, emphasizing two essential qualities: insatiable hunger for the dharma and careful humility in discernment. He discusses how easily soul-making can be diverted into familiar psychological or meditative paradigms, requiring skillful discrimination to maintain authentic imaginal perception. The teacher stresses the importance of daily exposure to beauty as fundamental to soul-making practice, noting that going deeply into beauty and going deeply into soul-making are essentially the same endeavor.
> The talk concludes with reflections on the fragile nature of the relational field (temenos) needed for soul-making practice, especially when practiced with others. Burbea emphasizes that this vessel requires careful tending through relational skill, honest communication, and sensitive responsiveness to conditions that support or hinder the imaginal dimension of experience.

Can you hear me okay?

I think the first thing I want to say—we're not going to talk for very long now—is simply thank you. Thank you for being here. Thank you for showing up in the full sense of the word, in the ways that you did, for engaging, for playing, for working hard. Just thank you for your practice. It's very beautiful.

I'm quite aware that some of you will have come and thought, "Yeah, thanks, it's interesting, but maybe it's not really for me." And that's really important—to make that distinction, and make that choice, and have that freedom, and follow what calls you.

Some of you might feel that there are some things here you could use, and some of the ideas and probably more some of the practices we've been offering will be added to your repertoire of what you do in practice in a somewhat piecemeal way. And that's fine too, of course. You're very welcome to that.

And then there'll be some of you for whom there's just something about what we've been talking about and what we've been trying to unfold together here that feels completely natural. There's something—it's almost like putting words to something that several people have said—putting ideas and words and a kind of framework for what the soul does anyway, or was doing anyway, or was pulled to. And you'll be hungry for more and hungry for all of it, and hopefully there are teachings and practices that you can begin to get your bearings and navigate with in all this.

I would say that there is a way in which what we've been talking about is really natural. In our language we say soul-making is natural to the soul. It's what the soul wants. It's what it does. And there's a way in which the path of soul-making expands and grows very naturally. It's what it does if we don't block it, if we don't get in the way. So in a certain sense, what we've been doing is just highlighting some of the ways we can get in the way, and some of what can possibly unfold.

I can't even remember now—was it yesterday morning we talked about the five ranges? That list, which I think is now up there, which I just ran through very briefly—five possible domains in which the range of our experience and our openness can extend further. We talked about each of the elements in the lattice and the constellation, the lattice itself. We talked about its spreading along the axes of self and world. We talked about the range of eros and the range of logos, the range of ideas which we can even entertain or play with or allow—ideas of what a human being is, what existence is, what kind of world or cosmos we live in or create or discover, the whole edifice of flexible metaphysics. We talked about the range of energy-body experience and sense, and we talked about the range of what we might call apparent pathology to apparent non-pathology.

One thing about that process—and I didn't really say it, though I think some of you understood—is that those ranges will unfold naturally as well. That's just the natural movement of soul-making.

I hope you didn't come away yesterday with the idea that we need to force these, that we need to push. "Right, range. Let's push faster. If I'm a little bit scared of the dark end of things, or I'm really not sure about this apparently pathological aspect, now I have to really try and have some really dark, weird images." No—it's just to be aware of what my tendencies might be, ways I might be closing, just even my conception of what's possible or available or right. Not to force, not to push, just to be aware.

Sometimes in this process of natural growth, there are periods where things just break open—they explode open, the vessels are shattered, and a whole new range opens up of experience, of perception, of energy, of idea, of eros, all of it. And there are periods where we're just at a certain place, a certain range, and we need to be there for a while. Maybe really a while. Just safe, consolidated—not really a plateau, but just at that range. So really not to force it. There's something very natural here that needs to be respected.

At the same time as there's a naturalness to soul-making and the opening of that perception, have you had the sense this week—and just even in your life, but also the experience this week—of just how easy it is and how common it is for us to get in the way of that natural opening of soul-making? So easy. Either through limited ideas, through limiting energy, through limiting eros, through limiting the possibility of image in any of these ways—how easy it is and how common it is for us to be working either in meditation or even intentionally with another person around soul-making with that intention, and how easy it is for it to divert very easily into something that's close, maybe something that's familiar to us about a way of practicing, about a way of thinking of practicing, about certain psychological ideas or ways of relating to dukkha or whatever—all of which are absolutely lovely and really valuable.

So there's this balance between what's natural and what might be asked if you're interested and have fallen in love a little bit with all this. There's the ask of this kind of respect for natural unfolding, and the kind of care of discernment—oh, when are we now actually in a different paradigm? When am I, in my experience, in my way of looking, in a slightly different paradigm? Not to say one is better or worse, but different. And there's a kind of care of discrimination that's possible there.

Also, when we're together in different ways—in groups or two people or whatever—and there's the intention for soul-making, how much of the potential there depends on the care of the relational field, and that something in the relational field can also prevent, block, divert.

So if we use this idea—I said it earlier in the retreat—rather than a black and white between it is soul-making or isn't, have I got it, have I not got it, it is imaginal or it isn't, hopefully there can be this kind of idea of like it's a direction. We can open up more and more what we might call the fully imaginal or the genuinely imaginal. So we avoid all this kind of judgment and we instead bring in a kind of care and discernment.

Soul-making, soulfulness includes heartfulness, definitely, but it's more than that. It includes love and metta, yes, but it's more than that. It includes certainly using the imagination, or being allowed to use the imagination, but it's more than that, it's more involved than that. And it includes being open to desire, but it's more than just that phrase.

And so there's a kind of invitation for those of you that are drawn or interested. There's the care of discrimination, not for the sake of better, worse, advanced—it doesn't matter. It's more this idea that something can seem a little narrow, but going through that narrowness just for a little while then opens up other reaches that wouldn't otherwise be available.

I guess this is true for this kind of dharma, what I'm about to say, but I'd say it's true for any kind of dharma that you love, whether it's emptiness or whatever it is. If people ask me, what advice can you give? What would be helpful? Two words: Be insatiable. Be ravenous.

Practically, you know, you guys have heard lots of advice about taking care of your practice outside and perhaps we'll talk a bit more about that. But in relation to soul-making, the importance of exposing yourself to beauty every day—in our culture, it takes the lowest rung in the pecking order above functionality, convenience, comfort, economics. Soul-making, you might also say going deeply into beauty is the same as going deeply into soul-making. It's the same thing. They can almost be interchangeable words—the fullness and the richness of what beauty really means to the soul.

There's something about taking care every day. What does that mean? Some exposure to beauty—art or nature or ideas or dharma or whatever.

And again, you might have sensed this already. I mentioned it just a minute ago. If it is soul-making that you're drawn to, and if some of your practice of soul-making is attempting to do that together—in groups, or two people, or whatever it is, in relationship—then how much that needs a kind of care and alertness and sensitivity and responsiveness, to care for the relational field, the temenos, in which soul-making can happen.

It needs a vessel, it needs a crucible. And this vessel, this crucible of soul-making—just even in ourselves, but even more so when we're with other people—is so easily shattered. It's a fragile thing. And it's asking a lot of us that care, relational skill, willingness to speak what's maybe difficult, speak one's honesty, work it through with another person.

So we have to be really interested. This question of—this was almost soul-making, or it was completely not soul-making, and what makes the difference? How? This is a question for discernment. We're really interested in, how do I care for, what are the conditions to care for that vessel? It's a living vessel, this temenos.

And so it can be really interesting, rather than judging myself—oh, I can't really—or judging another person—it's their fault, if they weren't here, it would be soul-making. Care. Care and discernment, and care in the discernment. It's a living, living thing, this vessel, this temenos.

Even this balance of attention thing that we just touched on so briefly—several people have told me we could have spent a whole week with that. How easy it sounds and how hard it is for human beings, especially in our culture. So actually, just even developing one's kind of sensitivity and skill with that is actually part of this vessel and how difficult that is, how challenging.

We'll talk more about that in a minute.

So if you're in love with this or some other kind of path of practice of Dharma, be ravenous. Be insatiable and be careful—the two together. And care means bringing all your intelligence, bringing all your sensitivity, bringing all your interest to discern what helps and what doesn't help and what are the conditions. And this is again, like all of this, it's an open-ended investigation. Bring your creativity, allow your humility.

So we can have both, and then the insatiability and this humility—which kind of contains the interest in learning to discern—they form two wings that balance each other. That balance each other. Something fierce almost in us, hungry, and something so exquisite and humble in its care. Hunger and humility, both.

And together, with these wings, the reach is open—where we can fly, where we can walk, where we can dig.

That's all I'm going to say. Thank you again for your practice, for your beauty.

CHAPTER 165

This Retreat

Rob Burbea · 1h02

> Rob Burbea and Catherine McGee open this intensive soul-making retreat with remarkable honesty and care. Rob shares openly about his metastatic cancer diagnosis and uncertain prognosis, creating space for the sangha to process this reality together. The session begins with Catherine's powerful welcoming that honors all participants in their full diversity and particularity - welcoming LGBTQ+ practitioners, people of color, those with health challenges, and all marginalized identities often overlooked in dharma spaces.
>
> The teachers establish this as an advanced retreat where participants share responsibility for steering their own learning journey, focusing on long-term practice development rather than prescribed content. Rob emphasizes that all soul-making concepts - eros, logos, energy body - are ongoing journeys rather than fixed understanding, encouraging openness to deepening rather than binary thinking about 'getting it' or not.
> The session includes embodied practices of blessing and divine perception, with participants moving through the retreat space seeing themselves and others as angels, as theophanies - faces of the divine. These practices establish core soul-making principles: that we are not limited to conventional perceptions of self and other, that blessing is our birthright, and that practice involves daring to see poetically and imaginatively. The retreat opens with profound teaching about holding death and life, illness and practice, vulnerability and divinity as all part of the sacred terrain of soul-making.

Good evening, everybody. Welcome. I see lots of really familiar faces, and a good number of people that I don't know as well. So welcome.

Rob is hopefully coming to join us tonight. I think you all know from either knowing him very, very well—which many of you do—or maybe knowing him less well, but from the letter that we sent out, that his health is variable. He'll say more about that. But he's in the loo right now, and that will be some of what happens during this retreat. It's quite challenging for him, as some of you know very well. But he'll come and join us.

Welcome, my siblings in birth, aging, sickness, and death. Hello. I want to welcome us here in this, our universal greeting. We set the table here. And maybe have a look around. This isn't going to be one of those eyes-down, all-on-your-own retreats. Do have a look around at your fellow siblings, sisters, brothers, siblings. These are the ones this week we will be create-discovering with, learning how to make soul, how to expand and restore open senses of sacredness, learning how to engage perception in ways that bring more beauty.

Here we are. This is us. And welcome to all of you in all the ways that you know yourself to be—all the particularities, all your peculiarities, all your strengths, vulnerabilities, sensibilities, blind spots, gifts. As you know, as probably all of you long-term Dharma practitioners do, the Buddha Dharma has not always had an easy relationship with particularities. It's very, very good at understanding how we are the same.

Oh, welcome! I think people might want to say hello before I carry on. Welcome to Rob in all his particularities and peculiarities.

Yes, I want to welcome us in this too. And in a moment, I will hand over to Rob. But welcome in all the things that make you you. And I particularly want to welcome aspects or ways you know yourself that are not always guaranteed a welcome wherever you go—whatever they are, really, really welcome.

Whether they're overlooked or undervalued or actually oppressed here or in the wider culture: welcome to all members of the gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, queer community. Welcome to all people of color. Welcome to people of all genders. Welcome to all people, whether visible or not visible, who are in states of non-optimal health. This looks like a pretty middle-class place here and is—welcome if you identify as working class. Welcome to those of us in this group who are at the very young end or at the very older end of our ages. All heritages, all first mother languages that are closest to your heart that we may never know a word of, welcome. All religious and ethnic groups, welcome.

And whoever I've missed, I'm sorry. Tell me after. Maybe you can call it out now, actually. Welcome. And to all of us in everything you bring here—all the things that make you you, your heritages, your gifts, your sensibilities, your aspiration, your courage, your nobility, your love of soul-making Dharma, your desire, because you wouldn't have gotten here without that. Welcome and bring it all to the table here.

We need for the soul-making dharma all our particularities, all of them. Let's learn to welcome each of them, even the ones in us that may not always look welcome, so that we can learn to make soul for whoever and to serve whoever and whatever you serve in your life, to see all of this in ways that bring more beauty, more richness, more meaningfulness, more sacredness. Let's do this together for whoever and whatever you serve.

Thank you for that beautiful welcoming, Catherine. Hi, everyone. I'm really happy to be here. It's really lovely and very touching. So I also want to welcome you in the fullness of your being, in all your beauty, your beauties. All the ribbons of your glory, even if they seem a bit tattered sometimes or like they've fallen off. All the colors of your soul, including the muddy colors, the shit, the difficult. All welcome and all can be made into soul.

So I'm really happy to be here with you. Really, really happy. It's like a real privilege. I don't know when Catherine and I started talking about this retreat and thinking about what we might do, but it was certainly some months before I got this new diagnosis, which I'll come back to in a minute, by the way. We were starting to feel and we wanted this retreat to be an opportunity and a space and a kind of crucible where in a way you could make it yours more. You can make it tailored to you and your needs and your soul needs and the trajectory of your practice, not just through this week, but with a long-term view in mind.

Some of you, not everyone here, but some of you here will be involved in these practices, these kinds of teachings and related teachings for maybe decades, really. What is it to think about that long-term trajectory? And what's needed? And what do I need? And where perhaps are my blind spots? Or what are the areas that need development or more understanding? It's actually, in my experience as a teacher, it's quite a rare faculty. It's a rare ability for a person, for a practitioner to actually be able to discern what it is that needs growing.

What it is that needs working on.

Sometimes we have so many ideas—"I really need to work on my focus. My mind just drifts"—and we buy into that. We simply believe such an idea, and it might be true. But it's actually quite a maturity, quite an ask to even have that kind of discernment. It doesn't have to be solely introspective; it can be in dialogue with teachers and friends. But to actually have that capacity—what's needed here? What's needed on this path?

I don't know about the word "advanced." I think we've used it occasionally. But certainly these soulmaking teachings ask a lot. They're demanding. They're subtle, deep, sophisticated, difficult, challenging, stretching. Definitely. And a lot is required. A lot of aspects need developing.

So the encouragement for this week—and I'll explain a bit more—is for you to really start thinking about that. We put it out in the application forms: start thinking about your process in this trajectory. Hopefully, in a way, you will lead the retreat. It comes from you, and we'll be offering material, but we'll be responding. There will be interchange based on your sense of navigation, discernment, need. So that's already asking for a step up, and it was there in the application form. It is demanding.

There's an enormous amount to it. It's complicated. "What the hell are they talking about? All these words." Don't get overwhelmed. Really don't get overwhelmed. Think of it as a journey. Think of it as something that can and will happen gradually. It will.

All of this—every concept we use, whatever it is: eros, logos, humility—all of them are a journey. It's very easy to think, "I don't get that," as if it's an on-off switch. We'll talk more about this, but it's a journey.

If you can somehow cultivate this art of having that openness: "However much I know, there's more about a particular thing." Do I think I know everything about eros? Forget about it. Even the teacher doesn't know—get a better teacher, because I don't know. I know some.

What happens with soulmaking is that it opens more. It opens. The very thing that comes alive, that comes alive with soul, that is made into soul—whatever it is: eros, body, energy, emotion, relationality—all of that starts to unfold and become unfathomable. It becomes more, and it becomes a journey.

So please, when the inner critic just wants to give you a red cross marked "failed"—and sometimes we need that humility of "I don't quite understand that yet"—don't fall into extremes. On one side, not lumping things into "Oh, I know what that is because I took a course in shamanism a few years ago and it's just like that," or "It's just like whatever this or that." That would be one extreme. The other extreme is to simply say, "I failed. I don't understand this or that."

Every aspect of these teachings is a journey. Do you understand what I mean? If we can see it that way, it's a kind of middle way. There's something much more soft, much more open, much more of an adventure—and kind of unended, unending.

So certainly we think about what comes up this week, and of course we deal with that. But also, if we can start thinking about the long term. In a way, this gives—we're giving you a responsibility here. We're going to share responsibility.

This shift in responsibility creates something much more organic. Rather than me arriving with predetermined material, we're crafting this retreat together as it unfolds. It's your retreat as much as ours—perhaps more so.

We envision theme days emerging naturally—perhaps a day exploring the energy body, or diving into questions of Eros, or whatever calls to us collectively. You can leave written questions on the board, and we'll weave them into the teachings, allowing the dharma to respond to what's actually alive in our community right now. These themes won't be rigid categories—nothing in the dharma ever is—but fluid investigations that interpenetrate and inform each other.

This collaborative approach was our vision months ago, but it's become more necessary given my current medical situation. The combination of medications I'm taking has profound effects, not just physically but mentally. There are times when clarity simply dissolves, when I couldn't articulate a teaching even if I tried. So rather than preparing extensive new material as I might have previously, I'm inviting you to help steer our direction.

I want to be transparent about the practical implications. My treatment schedule means I have a week off chemotherapy during the retreat—a fortuitous timing that seems to repeat itself. However, I remain on other medications that create unpredictable fluctuations throughout each day. I may need to leave suddenly, perhaps even mid-teaching. I may not be available for interviews. The entire schedule will need to remain fluid, responsive to how I'm feeling moment by moment.

Please don't be alarmed if I simply get up and walk out—it's likely just a practical need, nothing dramatic. But I do feel some apprehension that my responses may occasionally be less attuned or clear than usual. My mind is sometimes affected in ways that concern me. I hope this won't be an issue, but I want to acknowledge the possibility and ask for your patience if my usual clarity wavers.

Since some of you may not know the full scope of my health situation, let me offer a brief update. After three years on low-dose chemotherapy and a period of remission, the cancer has returned extensively—what we call metastases, meaning it has spread throughout my body with multiple tumors in various locations.

In medical terms, when this type of cancer metastasizes, it typically signals that the end is approaching. Most doctors would say I'm in the dying process now. The timeframe remains uncertain—it could be months, it could be years. There's always the possibility I might die of something else entirely far in the future. The uncertainty is complete, which is both challenging and, in its own way, liberating.

That's it. Just in case people—it would be a bit strange if people didn't know that was the case.

Maybe let's pause here, actually. So it's a lot to put into the field. Let's pause with hearing this in this context. Even though this is probably not news, in this arena, it's news to be in physical community together.

So take a moment to breathe with your body. You don't have to close your eyes. You can still do what you need. See what needs to be tended to and cared for in your heart and soul right now. And you may still wish to be seeing Rob, or not, with your eyes open or closed, as you need.

Check you have your breath. And see if there's anything in your heart and soul that needs your tending, your tender care right now.

Maybe somebody might have just frozen a little bit. And if there's a freeze in your body and soul, tend to this. Wait for your body to breathe. Because we're here in this setting, and it's where we're practicing. You know, it was quite hefty to apply for this retreat—it was a lot of work. We love this work, we love this soulmaking dharma, this gift that Rob has brought forth for us. So tending to whatever the responses are in this context is part of tending not just to yourself—it's part of tending to the field of this retreat.

So now, or at times during the retreat perhaps, if this calls you—Rob, Rob's health, your relationship with this, his possible dying, his probable dying, his maybe not dying. Whatever it elicits: your heartbreak or your grief, your love, your commitment to practice, your steely determination, your inquiry into death. Whatever is brought forth this week, that's part of tending to the field of this retreat. It's part of tending to each other, actually.

Have you got your breath? And if we can care for this—if it comes up for some of us, it will be more intimate than for others. There's no right or wrong about that. We're all in different places in the constellation with this. But if we can care and tend, then we may be with these beautiful teachings, with the lenses that we're learning to see with and sense with—that maybe this news and this truth can become part of the soul of this retreat.

Learning to see whatever arises in ways that bring more sacredness, more meaningfulnesses, more dimensionality, more beauty. Because death and someone's death are absolutely the terrain of soulmaking.

So breathe with whatever's here and what we thought. Do you want to say anything else, or I was going to make a space where we could just be quiet? Do you want to add anything?

Okay. So let's just pause. And we thought that we would offer a couple of things at this point—that we can just be together in community with this, with Rob. Wish you well. And I'll offer a compassion chant. And if you know it, some of you will know it, please join in if you wish. It's not one that we've done before in this group. But join in if you wish and you wish to bring your voice to it. And let whatever is here for you just be here. And we'll meet together on this channel.

And thank you for opening with this, Rob.

Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum, Om Mani Padme Hum
Om Mani Padme Hum

We'd like to give you the chance, if you wish, for a few minutes to meet in a group of three. The thought was that you'll have two, three minutes with your two colleagues witnessing, where you can just say how you're doing tonight in arriving here. Express anything that needs to be expressed that may or may not have to do with our beloved friend and teacher. It may, but it doesn't have to. Anything that wants to be expressed in your soul to help you to arrive.

Rob's going to share—absolutely, anything that wants to be expressed in arriving here. I really want to get into this work, or gosh, I'm really—you know, whatever is here. I'm really excited to be here, I'm excited and I'm... et cetera.

So if you would like to do this, find yourself in a group of three and then just be silent, and I'll guide us into this exercise. If you don't want to do it, that's fine. Just opt out. If you do, turn around and find some others. So three, sit in a triangle.

And sit a little bit formally so you have access to your body and your energy body.

There's no right way you have to be here. You might be super excited and full of joy and enthusiasm. Please remember we're here in our particularity. We're not trying to see how it is I'm supposed to be. Really important.

The two witnesses will have your eyes open. And the person who is going first, you can have your eyes open too, but you don't have to lock in contact. But you are in relationship, right? So open your eyes, just see your two companions, say hi in that strange way that it's tricky with three because one of you looks one way while the other one's looking the other direction. If you can do it easily without a major meeting, one of you willing to go first just raise your hand to the others. If you're willing to speak first, yeah. And why don't you nominate who's going to go second and then it's already sorted. And then that leaves the third, okay.

Be there with your eyes open for these two people. These people have filled in a hefty application form to come on this retreat like you. They know this work enough that they know what their weaknesses are and the places they want to move into more. These are people who love this work, okay? So I'll time it. I'll ring the bell and it's not a conversation—just bear witness to your colleague. Then I'll ring the bell after three minutes. Please begin.

[Bell]

Thank you. Thank your partners. Don't worry if you didn't say the definitive thing. It's okay.

So we'd like to do a little exercise also as part of arriving and setting up the retreat and being here in as full a way as possible. And it's going to involve us moving around freely in the hall. So we're going to need to move all the mats and the cushions to the side. We'll probably be doing this several times—well, we may be doing this several times on the retreat. Maybe there's a clever way of doing that. There is a clever way of doing this. I'm sure you know what that is. Yeah, so let's do the clever way. Let's really fill the room so we use the space.

Okay. Let's just start by feeling the connection with the earth, with the floor, in the feet. And keeping that root of connection, opening the awareness to the whole body. What is this body? We tend to think of the body in ways we've been taught to think of the body. What is this body standing here? Whole body awareness. Open to the possibility of the sense of the body, of the energy body.

Opening also to the space. Many of you know this place. Many of you know this hall. Many of you love this place. Many of you love this hall. It is already soul for you. It's already imbued with soul. What is it to stand here in the mystery of your body, the open-ended mystery of your body, the possibility, the poetic possibility of your body in this room with the magic of the room and everything that has transpired over the years in this hall?

The walls and the floor and the carpet and the space itself is blessing your body. There is some influx, mysterious influx, multidimensional, unfathomable. The floor is blessing you, blessing your body, blessing your arrival here, blessing your being, blessing your practice. What does that mean? Your mind doesn't have to figure it out. Wishing you well, wanting you to know something about yourself, wanting you to open the doors to create and discover more about yourself.

And let yourself, with the body awareness, with the connection with the earth, with the connection with the space and the room and the history, also be aware of the others, your colleagues, your fellows on this week. Who are they? Let yourself move around the room in whatever way you would like. You can make eye contact as much or as little as you like, but be aware of each other.

What would it mean and is it possible to bless each other? We see, we think of human beings, complex certainly, but we limit what they are. What is it to know each other as angels? The mysterious roots of your being are in divinity.

Don't worry about getting it right. Let yourself move however you want to move. You may want to be still. You may want to walk. You may want to dance. Let yourself bless each other. Let yourself feel blessed, even if you're not even sure what blessing means. Let your body receive blessing. The mystery of your body receives the mystery of angelic blessing.

And let it pour out of you—pour out of your pores, pour out of your body, pour out of your gestures. And if that comes out in dance, let it be so. And if it comes out in stillness, let it be so.

And the land—the luscious, rich, fecund Devon countryside—blessing you too. There's an influx from the land, from the night sky. All of this pours into us in ways that we can only sometimes even vaguely get a sense of. Don't try to figure it out with your mind. Blessing each other and receiving blessings from each other—no such thing as doing it wrong.

If it weren't for these angels here right now in the room, we wouldn't be here. You wouldn't be here. This wouldn't be happening. Your practice, your retreat, is supported on so many levels by each other, by the hidden dimensions of each other's being.

Don't believe a thought that doubts whether you can bless. "Who am I to bless?" It's your birthright to bless and to be blessed. It's who you are—your roots in divinity. Each of us a theophany, a face of the divine.

Your whole life, your whole narrative—your birth, your story, your death—it's all here. It's all angels, all face of angel. Yes, impermanent, but eternal in some mysterious way. If none of this makes sense, just let it be poetic. Let it be poetic suggestion, imagination.

You know, playing with these perceptions of angel, of being angel, of blessing, of having one's roots in divinity—it shapes and informs how we see ourselves as practitioners. The sense of possibility, the sense of magic, of wizardry and witchcraft. Not just me trying to watch some sensations at the tip of my nose. Dare to see yourself poetically in that way, imbued with magic, with the divine, with the bigger nature. Blessing each other's practice.

So just coming into stillness for a few moments, again the feet and the whole body. And we'll talk more about this, but what do we mean by body? And aware of each other, everyone in the room, the space, the land, the night. All of it alive as theophany, as face of the divine, as expression of the Buddha nature.

And just silently welcoming, welcoming everyone here on the retreat, blessing their practice, blessing the possibilities of their practice, blessing the possibility of knowing oneself and knowing others as angel, as image, as divine. So in this moment you are seen that way, you are sensed that way by others, you are blessed and blessing.

CHAPTER 166

A Rite of Angels

Rob Burbea · 1h04

> In this deeply moving dharma talk and ceremonial practice, Rob Burbea guides participants through 'A Rite of Angels' - a transformative exploration of recognition, blessing, and sacred perception. The session begins with acknowledging the foundations of our practice: Buddha, Dhamma, Saṅgha, and the gifts we have received from the tradition stretching back 2,500 years. Burbea emphasizes the importance of recognizing our own efforts and dedication in practice, countering the habitual tendency toward self-criticism and inadequacy.
> The heart of the session involves a ceremonial practice where participants form concentric circles, with some moving through the center while others offer blessing and recognition. Through the chanting of mantric seed syllables - 'Oṃ Āḥ Hūṃ' (representing body, speech, and mind) and 'Amitā' (limitless, immeasurable) - participants explore seeing themselves and others as manifestations of Buddha nature or 'angels.' This practice works with multiple levels: basic welcoming and mettā, recognition of each person's unique relationship to dukkha and the world's suffering, and the profound seeing of Buddha potential and divine nature.
> Burbea skillfully weaves together themes of soul-making, the capacity to hold eros and intensity without discharge, and the transformative power of being truly seen and blessed by others. The practice offers both a remedy to self-diminishment and an exploration of how sacred perception can reveal the angel-nature inherent in all beings, supporting both individual awakening and community connection.

Buddha, Dharma, Sangha. Time and the timeless—time past, present, future, and the eternal, that which is beyond time. Not lasting forever, but beyond time.

Like all these things that we dwell on and explore, these words are loose and elastic and unfathomable in their mystery. So we know what Buddha means, we know what Dharma means, we know what Sangha means. And we think we know what time means. But all of them have depths and dimensions and mysteries that we can open up and journey into and discover more.

Buddha, Dharma, Sangha, time and the timeless.

So there's kind of two parts to this tonight. And right now, a bit more stillness and meditation. Maybe settle into your body. And feel that connection with the floor, with the earth, with the earth that supports you and supports your life.

And here we have Buddha, Dharma, Sangha, time past, time future. And in your heart, in your being, in your body right now, can you bring to mind a recognition, an acknowledgement of everything that your practice has and does rest on?

Not just today, but through the years of practice that you've been involved and you've devoted yourself and all your efforts and everything that you've put up with and everything that you've explored and all the stretching and all the challenges and all the dedication and the showing up. What has that relied on? What has that rested on? What have been the bases that we have received through the generosity of others, through the Buddha and his teachings, through the Sangha?

Sangha means the tradition, the lineage from the time of the Buddha, 2500 years or thereabouts. That whole stream of teachings still alive, still healthy and flourishing today, an influx into your life, into my life, into our practice. That Sangha, the Sangha of the tradition of teachers past, some of which you never have heard of or don't even realize are inflowing into your practice, the possibilities that open up for you, and teachers present.

And just let yourself be aware of that, of the immense gift of that. And we rest on this. It supports us, it has supported us, it will support us.

And on that basis, is there the possibility in your heart, in your soul right now to recognize also the great efforts that you have made in your practice? Showing up time and time again on the cushion, in the walking room, in daily life practice. Intent on cultivation of what is beautiful, what is good, what is noble. Devoted to kindness. Yes, we fail every day at that. Devoted to ethics. Yes, we fail every day at that. It doesn't matter.

The intention has been picked up, lost and picked up again and again in your life. Your care and your efforts, how you spend your time in those micro moments of choices on and off the cushion. So easy to dismiss this, belittle it, not see it, look only at the negative, what's missing, what's lacking, what's not good enough.

Can you let the heart soften in the face of that recognition, that fact actually, that fact about yourself, about your history, about your life. Time past, time present right now and time future. What you are committed to be, devoted to, intent on, aspiring to, how much goodness there is there, how much beauty, how much desire and eros, how much hard work.

Let your heart, even just for a moment, soften to be touched by that recognition, by that awareness, by that appreciation of yourself for all of that.

So this Buddha, Dharma, Sangha and time past and present is what feeds us. In a way time future feeds us as well, what we aspire to, what we're drawn towards like a magnet with the eros, with what we love, with what we aspire to. Just let yourself align with that, to know that, to rest on that, to look to that, inner and outer, personal and communal.

Each of us will take turns—perhaps three at a time—entering this circular corridor between the circles, moving however we feel called to move. Those forming the circles will witness this movement, and here you can choose your own level of engagement. There's no right or wrong way.

At its most fundamental, this is simply about welcoming. We're at the end of our first day together—it doesn't matter where anyone is in their practice. This is about welcoming each person onto the retreat, into this space, into this land, into the temporary community we've created for this week.

For those witnessing from the circles, this welcoming can manifest in complete silence. It might express itself through the body—a gesture, movement, even dance. There's also a musical element I'll explain shortly. But the essential gesture is one of welcome.

Sometimes we forget these truths about ourselves—we lose touch with the facts of our history, what we love, what we do and have done, the care and dedication we bring. We need reminding. And sometimes it's others who remind us. Sometimes it's through the eyes of others that we learn to see ourselves more clearly, more truly.

Do you understand? When I sense myself being looked at in a certain way, I can take in that looking, receive it, allow it to inform how I see myself.

This practice, like all good dharma, has multiple levels, all of which are optional. We can engage as deeply or as simply as feels right. The basic choreography is what I've described, though we'll revisit and refine as we go.

The second fundamental element is metta—well-wishing. Who is this person walking before you? Perhaps you know nothing about them, or perhaps you know more than you care to know. Regardless, you wish them well. Whatever their circumstances, whatever their struggles, you extend metta to them.

This loving-kindness might manifest through your established metta practice, silently reciting the traditional phrases. It could emerge through the chant we'll engage in together, which naturally embodies and expresses metta. Or it might flow through your body—radiating outward through presence, gestures, or movement. The form matters less than the genuine intention behind it.

So those witnessing in the circles offer both welcome and metta to whoever passes through their awareness.

Now, Catherine has raised an important point about the intensity that can arise in these practices. Sometimes charge builds up—the heightened awareness of being seen, the social dimension, the sheer amount of soul present in the space. Soul can be difficult to tolerate because it carries eros with it, as we touched upon earlier. This intensity in the energy body and emotions can create impulses to discharge that charge somehow.

Let me be clear: no particular action or vocalization is inherently right or wrong. Please don't fall into that kind of judgment. What matters is developing an ongoing exploration of how you relate to the charge of eros, soul, and heartfulness. When intensity builds, what happens? Do you automatically seek to discharge it?

If you find yourself wanting to discharge that energy, that's perfectly natural. But consider this an opportunity to investigate your psychological patterning. Perhaps you might experiment with holding that charge a bit more, accommodating it rather than immediately dissipating it. This becomes a lifetime inquiry rather than a matter of correct behavior.

Beyond welcoming and metta, there are two additional levels of awareness for those witnessing.

The third level recognizes that each person moving through the circle carries their own particularities—their unique history, their personal dukkha, the specific shapes and colors of their psychological suffering. But more than this, they also bear the particular ways that the world's dukkha is held and refracted through them. Each of us feels what's happening to our planet, to humanity, to all species, in distinctly personal ways. We respond differently, bear it differently, struggle with it differently, and are impacted by it uniquely.

You may not know the specific details of how someone carries the world's pain, how they struggle to tolerate it, or what they manifest in response. But you can recognize that their journey is unique, particular, and unfinished wherever they currently stand. The awareness of this uniqueness opens space for blessing their entire path.

This level expands beyond the people in this room to embrace the whole of humanity and all species sharing this planet. Somehow, this broader community enters our ellipse of awareness and care.

This naturally leads to the fourth level—the possibility of seeing each person as angel. For those witnessing from the circles, you might sense the being before you with such depth that you recognize their angelic nature. What does this mean? Simply that their image, their very essence, is rooted in the divine, in Buddha nature.

We could say instead that we see their Buddha nature—for now, let's use these terms interchangeably, though I offer this as poetic seed rather than theological doctrine.

The term "Buddha nature" has been used across the tradition in many ways over centuries, so its meaning encompasses quite a range. At minimum, it refers to the potential for awakening that exists within every being.

And any human being has the potential to become awakened just by virtue of the fact that the mind is impermanent and malleable. So no matter how messed up I am now, in time and over lifetimes, that can change and I can become awakened. So that's the minimum understanding.

If that's what you resonate with, great. You're seeing the Buddha potential in this person. At the other extreme of what Buddha nature has come to mean is something much more mystical and cosmic and mysterious. This person already is the Buddha in some way. The essence of their being is the Buddha, is awakened, is the cosmic Buddha, is the primordial Buddha. If that doesn't resonate, leave it. Find your pitch with all this. It's not right or wrong. It's part of the tuning that we're talking about.

The musical part goes with this. So as we're moving, there'll be a chant. Catherine and Chris are going to lead this chant. It's fairly simple.

What it can mean is we are all emanations of the primordial Buddha, particular emanations. The primordial Buddha needs these infinite varieties of faces, of expressions that we each are. And we recognize that. That's a certain level of it, a certain way of sensing another person.

We could also say, back to the potential thing, that so often with these kinds of practices we've been doing, it's really difficult. It's really a stretch. It relies on a lot. You need this skill, that skill, that skill, that skill. Sometimes we can feel like, well, I'm not going to be able to do all that. I can barely sit still for ten minutes or whatever. So we get into a self-view of ourselves as practitioners that's very limited and limiting sometimes.

Again, sometimes we need the eyes of others and the blessing of others to remind ourselves of our potential as practitioners. You can be creative. You can be playful in your practice. You can be at ease and delight in the realms of subtlety and improvisation and playfulness. You can have that range. Sometimes it feels like, not me, maybe these other people. So this is also a way we are being seen as having this tremendous potential of creativity, of playfulness, of wisdom, of responsiveness, of subtlety, of improvisation.

All right. The musical part. Last piece before we do this. It has two parts—a high part and a low part. Just see which you want to join in and you can change. Chris, do you want to start the low part?

The lyrics are very simple. The low part, the lyrics are om ah hum. Om ah hum. And om ah hum are mantric seed syllables of the body, speech, and mind. Om ah hum of the human being, but also of the primordial Buddha. If we are manifestations of that, that means this person is the manifestation. What they manifest through body and the form of their body and the actions of their body. What they manifest through speech. What they manifest through mind and intention and thought and creativity and perception. Om ah hum. The forms that manifest in our lives, through our lives. Om ah hum.

When Chris sings it, it's quite chunky and delineated and stately, because that's what form is. Forms make distinctions.

And there's a second part, which Catherine will teach us, and the lyrics for that are amita. Amita is a negative in Sanskrit. Amita means something like limit or measure. So amita means limitless, without measure, immeasurable. And it has connotations of emptiness.

So form and emptiness together. Whatever manifests in body, speech, and mind must take form, but it's also empty, and we never forget that. And the primordial Buddha and the body, speech, and mind of the primordial Buddha which manifests through us—also empty, also malleable, also limitless in its scope. So these are just poetic suggestions. Find your way in to relate to this however you like.

Chris will teach us the bass part, and then we'll do Catherine's part, and then we'll try to put them together and then we'll nail it.

So there's this cloth here just in front of where I'm standing. When you get back to where you started, then you just join the circle, and then you become a blesser again—a blesser, a welcomer, a lover, an angel. You understand?

So Chris will teach us the bass part. The body, the speech, and the mind are the primordial Buddha. Your body, your speech, your mind—blessed, unfathomable, mysterious.

And so let the soul, as much as you want to, whichever level you're resonating as we do this, let it express in these seed syllables, in your voice. Let it come out.

Now if we just listen to Chris do the bass and Catherine will sing the treble on top of it, you can learn that for those of you that want to sing that part. So just listen to Chris and Catherine together.

You're radiating and emanating metta through your body, through your voice, through the syllables, through your song, through your gesture, through silence, through your intention. And the person moving is moving however they want to move and receiving, receiving that.

So as always, it's an exercise in perception as much as anything else. I mean, just playing with these poetic perceptions, these soulful perceptions.

So we might have two or three people in the circle at the same time. Let's say two. We might even go around again or something.

So two volunteers to start, to be in the circle. Should we just start and go for it?

Just once, but take your time. We want it to—I've said this so many times, it's hard to make soul. It doesn't just happen, okay? So that means this thing about: Am I discharging? Am I going too quick? Am I going too slow? What's my attention doing?

So let's do this. Just try to do it as an experiment, as always, in a way that you feel that it's soulful, that it's soul-making somehow or other. If you need to sit, it's fine. It doesn't matter if the people in the circle are sitting or standing.

There's no obligation to go. If you don't want to, you can just stay in the outer circle. Simply gauge what's happening, how busy it is in there. If there are collisions and multiple angel pileups, just gauge that and let's see. Let's try.

So let's root first. Feel again, whether you're standing or sitting—I think standing is preferable if you can, but do what's comfortable for your body. Feel this earth that supports you. Feel your connection with the earth, organic life and organic sustenance, solidity, ground, bounty, gift.

Already there's blessing. You can bless the earth in gratitude. The earth blesses you up through your feet. And again, this hall and the walls here can bless you, hold you. The deep, dark, velvet night has its blessings too, right now, on body, on heart, on soul.

Then we are aware of each other, of this temporary community of a week, of how we hold and support each other, care for each other this week.

Let's start the chant and just, before anyone goes, before the first people enter, we'll be with the chant and the multiple meanings and whatever it might mean for you. Make it yours. Let your body and voice and soul resonate with all the richness of possible intentions and meanings there.

So Chris, when you're ready... Let the blessings radiate through your voice, your whole body emanating the magic of mantra from your whole body. It's coming from you and from beyond you. It comes from the earth. It comes from the sky. It comes from the tradition. From all our teachers. From the unseen beings. It's yours and more than yours.

Beautiful. And then, whenever you're ready, you can lean into it now. Include your body, whether you're witness or walker, however you like. Dance, gesture, stillness, whatever.

Angels are seeing you right now, looking on you with love, sensing more in you than you can even know, seeing you as angel, knowing your potential. Let yourself be touched by and delight in their recognition of your beauty. Yes, let yourself receive. Soak it up.

These manifestations of Buddha nature—you, with dazzling and limitless potential as a practitioner, as a meditator, as a soul. You know that angels are grateful for human beings, for what they manifest. They are grateful for your past, for what you're manifesting right now, for what you will manifest, for the particular shapes and colors. And that includes your dukkha, your pain. What breaks your heart and what's hard to bear. They love you for this. It's unique. Only you can bring this into the world. Only you have the duty to be you.

So some more people can come into the circle. It can hold a few more, I think. However you want to move.

Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha.

It's okay if you forget your potential, if you forget who you are. These angels have your back. They see you when you can't quite see yourself. They know you when your vision is limited.

Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha. Om Amitabha.

Om Amitabha.
Om Amitabha.
Om Amitabha.

Whatever difficulty, limitation, or contracted self-view arises—it can all be redeemed in soul, made into soul. The view of the angel is patient, unswayed by the contracted mind. Welcoming, loving, seeing deeply, holding something for others when they can't hold it themselves. Reminding, blessing—animal, angel, human—that we are Amitabha. Amitabha, celebrating this particular being, their sensitivities, their stories, their struggles, their joys and gifts.

Feel free to embellish if you feel comfortable.

When we have shame, an angel is unflinching in their gaze of mercy—merciful eyes. Peace.

Om. Aum Aum Aum Aum Aum. Ah.

Angels know your depth. Aum Aum Aum Aum.

Oma Oma Oma Oma Oma Oma. Beautiful. Oma. Om. Om.

Aum Aum Aum Aum Aum Aum. OM AH OM OM.

So if you think you might want to move around the circle, I'd encourage you to take the opportunity. If you want to move in the circle, now's the time.

Om. Om. Om. Om. Om. Om.

There are these possibilities for ourselves in life—not all the time, in and out, in and out of the possibility of perceiving oneself as angel, as reflecting, informed by, emanating angel Buddha nature, and seeing others that way. Knowing that you are blessed and that you can bless.

Thank you for that, everybody. Thank you very much.

CHAPTER 167

The Imaginal-Energy Body (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 1h17

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea explores the sophisticated concept of the imaginal-energy body as a cornerstone of soul-making practice. He clarifies that the energy body is not a fixed experience but rather a poise of awareness that allows infinite expansion of three interwoven aspects: felt sense, image, and idea of the body. Moving beyond conventional mindfulness of body, this approach opens possibilities ranging from ethereal samādhi states to rich imaginal experiences where the body might manifest as fire, wings, or angelic presence.
> Burbea addresses practical concerns about feeling overwhelmed by the teachings' complexity, emphasizing kindness and the understanding that these practices unfold organically rather than linearly. He distinguishes the imaginal-energy body from concepts like auras through its non-reified nature - experiences are created and discovered rather than assumed to have inherent existence. The discussion covers navigation through energy body states as indicators of clinging or openness, the relationship between jhāna absorption and imaginal practice, and how psychological patterns manifest energetically.
> Throughout, Burbea emphasizes that this work extends far beyond traditional vipassanā approaches, incorporating emotion, narrative, mystery, and relational dimensions. The energy body becomes a vehicle for soul-making when approached with fullness of intention, whether in formal meditation, artistic expression, or daily life encounters.

I know I already said this, but I'll say it again. I'm really happy to be here. It was Catherine's turn to give teachings this morning, but if it was my turn, I just felt like saying, I really love you. We have so much appreciation and delight in you and the beauty that's here and the richness of your souls and your dedication and your complications and your wonderfulness. I really love you.

We've got a couple of practical things. One is about the culture and ambience here. A lot of you will be used to or somewhat used to these soul-making retreats and the kind of vibe we have. Some of you less so and more used to vipassana retreats or standard insight meditation retreats where you may have either received a direct instruction from the teachers or picked up pretty quickly on the sort of cultural norms—where you don't make eye contact, and you sort of shuffle down the corridor slowly so it looks mindful. And it looks a bit miserable.

That's an option. You're welcome to do that. Sometimes we need to be more inner, right? We need to be—something's going on, it needs my attention. I don't want to be pulled out and into contact. The attention needs to be here, and it's fine. So if that's what's going on, you go into that mode. If it's for five minutes, five seconds, five hours, it's fine. It's part of the responsibility, responding to what's needed. Similarly, if you see someone else doing that, well, they have their reasons to do that.

But on these retreats, we're trying to be more open in every regard. And that includes with regard to each other and the heart's connection, the soul connection with each other. You can make eye contact. You can smile. Careful what happens though, of course. As Catherine was saying, do I then have to show up in a certain way? Like, this person's coming down the corridor, I have to give them what I imagine that they want. Just that smile is going to do this or that.

So you can open up that way, make that connection. Let the body be open, let the soul be open, let the heart be open, let the eyes be open. Be with each other. It's so precious, the sangha. A lot of soul making happens in relation, not just verbal relation. So let that be here. Like everything, any choice you make comes with its risks and costs. And the risk of doing that is you smile at someone and they just stare at you blankly. And okay, then I have to handle that. I have to be okay with that, right?

The relational field is for us very much part of the practice. We're not just kind of diving deep into some kind of atomized deconstruction of this psychophysical experience. Sure, that's great, that's wonderful, and it's not the whole thing.

Second practical thing is we will start putting up some interview lists. There'll be groups and one-to-ones. So there'll be a couple tonight after the evening session at about 8:30. Have a look. Again, for me, I'm just not sure how things roll. So I will offer as much as I can. And when I can't, it's because I feel like something's going on in body and mind that makes it pretty much not going to be helpful for you, or I'm just struggling somewhere or away at a doctor's appointment or whatever it is.

If you would like to meet to work with an aspect of your practice in a one-to-one meeting, please print your name. So if you want a one-to-one, it's about practice, something about practice, which means this kind of practice—formal practice or informal practice or soul-making practice in life. It's not just because you want to say hi or hang out or whatever. So if there's something, an aspect of your practice that you would like to work with or talk through or get some guidance on, put your name down and we'll try to get to you. One of us will try and get to you and we'll let you know when.

But that gives you also your responsibility to think about what is it that I want to explore? What is it that I feel I need some help with? You want to be quite specific.

Catherine will also offer groups, providing opportunities for both one-to-one sessions and group work—a chance to explore together.

Now, thank you for your wonderful questions. There were many of them, and they're truly great. We probably won't get to all of them, and there were a couple I couldn't quite read as well, but even among those I could decipher, we likely won't have time for everything. I've arranged them in an order that seems to have a natural thread running through, so we can weave them together meaningfully.

The first one isn't really a question—unless something is missing—but it's important nonetheless. It says: "Sometimes it feels like there is too much on offer and I get a bit lost and overwhelmed."

To whoever wrote this: you are not alone. There is a lot on offer. There is too much on offer in terms of—what?—am I going to have it all figured out by the end of the week? By the end of the year? No. There is indeed a lot.

First, it's really important to recognize this reality. Second, it's crucial to be kind to yourself. When I feel lost and overwhelmed, when I'm not keeping up, what does the mind do with that? "All these other people know exactly what's going on and they're totally on top of it, and it's just me," or "I'm a failure"—the inner critic emerges. Please really take care with the kindness. This is so important.

There is a lot. It does demand a great deal. It's very sophisticated. It asks much in terms of foundational practices upon which to then build and extend. To say otherwise would be ridiculous. Each of us is on our own journey with these practices, and that's completely fine. There's no race, no timeline. Please watch what the mind does with this, what the heart does with it. We need the foundation of kindness and compassion.

All of this might be difficult, but it's also delightful and lovely. As I think I mentioned in the last retreat, it's like having an enormous banquet laid out and then feeling completely overwhelmed. You don't have to eat it all at once. This has a special kind of preservative—not bad chemicals, but good ones. It will keep. It's here.

Each person might also have their particular order in which they unfold. There isn't necessarily a "first you do this, then you do that." Sometimes we make it sound like there is because when you teach, you have to present things in sequence, but it's not necessarily like that. It's more like a ball of wool, and you just—well, here's this strand sticking out that seems to be in my face and looks kind of interesting, so I'll pull on that one.

After a while, as I get the hang of this, I see: oh, it's connected to this other strand. And that starts to unravel that one. All aspects of the teachings are completely interrelated.

My suggestion: please take care of the kindness. Watch the conclusions that the mind makes about yourself. Practically speaking, if this resonates with you, just choose one piece—either something you can't avoid because you keep bumping into it, or something that's actually interesting to you. Something where you think, "Oh, I had a glimpse of something with that," or "That sounds really intriguing"—and just go for it.

If the whole week is spent on the energy body, great. If the whole week is spent on the energy body around emotions, fantastic. It's one piece of the teaching, and it's priceless. Absolutely priceless. And the rest? It's being recorded. It's out there. Don't worry.

So be practical, and things will unfold. Does that make sense? Really, really important—take your time. I know this as a dharma practitioner myself.

I know it as a musician. Learning so many different skills involved in being a musician—whether as a jazz musician or anything else—can be completely overwhelming. Take a little piece, put a little box around it, dive in and get creative and practice. It will start to suggest other things and expand. That's okay.

One question here is quite direct: What is the energy body? It's actually not that easy to answer.

Let's go back to something we're all familiar with—mindfulness of the body. We're used to practicing with the body in a Dharma context, so let's ask: What is the body, and what is it to be aware of the body? Let's leave the term "energy body" aside for a moment.

When you're a Dharma practitioner being mindful of the body, there are actually three interwoven aspects of bodily experience. When I'm mindful of the body or aware of the body, there is first a felt sense of experience or sensations, usually in this location here. That's one aspect—the felt sense or the sensations.

The second aspect, not always so talked about, certainly in insight meditation circles, is the image of that body—the image of what it is that I'm paying attention to. When I shut my eyes and the teacher says to be aware of the sensations of the feet or the sensations on the bum on the cushion, subtly or less subtly, there's an image. It's probably not an imaginal image; it's just an image, some kind of representation of this body. Notice I'm looking at Mary right now, yet in the back of my mind, there's still a kind of picture of this body, Rob's body. It's just part of my awareness. It has a certain form. In usual consciousness, it has the form of two arms and two legs and whatnot.

The third aspect is the idea of the body, the concept or the logos of the body. What is a body? Most of us are totally saturated and indoctrinated with a Western materialist view of the body. Wrapped up there will be a whole bundle of ideas about atoms perhaps, or solidity, or what matter is, what a body is. Maybe mixed with that are ideas of what constitutes an attractive body and whether mine is one or not.

So there's felt sense, image, and idea.

When we start talking about energy body, we're simply saying: let's take those three aspects and open them way, way up, so that the possible range of felt sensations becomes infinite. There's no limit to what the felt sense of this space might be.

Usually you stop a person on the street and ask what they're aware of in their body. Of course, most people are not that aware until they hurt themselves or experience some intense pleasure. With practicing mindfulness, you become more aware—oh yes, the bum on the cushion feels neutral. There's warmth, pressure, maybe a little tingling. There's a certain expansion of the range of awareness.

As you practice, as you open that up, the range gets much larger. So it could be anything. The felt sense might feel like completely empty space, or dense rock, or a kind of warm field of ethereal energy. It could be anything, absolutely anything.

So when we talk about energy body, that range opens up. The image, too. When I first started teaching about energy body, it was really more about that felt sense. I gave it the words "energy body" and "subtle body" to help encourage the range of experience to move more into this open, ethereal, harmonized, energized sense that tends to occur when there's samadhi or letting go.

But actually, we want the range even more than that, so that the image, too, of the body starts to open. I don't necessarily have to have this usual form that everyone would agree on.

I could have a body of fire. I could have the usual form, but it's bellowing fire from my mouth. I could have wings or be made of water. It's infinite—the image of the body. So the body itself is given permission and possibility to become imaginal. The imaginal body. Does this make sense?

When I started using the words "energy body" in my teaching, it was in the context of teaching samadhi, jhana practice and samatha, and teaching emptiness. And that, as I said, tends towards a certain range of experience. Now we're doing soul-making practice. We keep all that as possibility and we add an infinite range, absolutely infinite range of the image. So we can talk about the imaginal body or the poetic body—those were two terms that Justin, who's not here, suggested a little while ago. The imaginal body or the poetic body. Does that resonate?

So there's the felt sense that has opened its possible range. The image of the body has opened its possible range. And the idea of the body has opened its possible range. Meaning I'm not—I include, yes, atoms and chemicals and biochemical processes, of course, all that that we're schooled in and used to, but I'm not limiting it to that.

In a way, the energy body is really an attitude more than an experience. It's a poise of the awareness that allows an openness, allows an opening of the range of the felt sense, of the image, of the ideas of the body. To include our usual conventional ones that everyone on the street would agree with and every mainstream dance practitioner would agree with. But it opens up beyond just that. Does this make sense?

So it's a curious thing. Someone asked why I mentioned before that I wished I had called "energy body" by a different name—what would I have called it instead and why? Well, a couple of things there. One is, actually not just with the word "energy body," but also with the words eros and image and soul—I don't know, any of these words we use. I wish if I could go back in time, we just had different words right from the beginning, because it's possible that someone has studied something, studied eros in a different context where it means something slightly different. It means something different than what we mean, or imaginal, or image, or soul.

So that's one of the reasons—it would be easy, and I think it's quite common, to just because words are the same assume that we're talking about the same thing. And then what happens is a certain direction gets washed over or diluted or mixed with other directions. Not better, not worse, but just different. There are certain possibilities that will open up through this path, where we're talking about the energy body, where we're talking about imaginal and soul, that won't actually open, whether you've done it in your psychotherapeutic training or shamanistic training or this or that, tantra, whatever. Not better, not worse. Some overlap, but different.

And so if we're not a little careful with words, there's a way it can all just be, "Oh, I know that." And something collapses and gets confused and diluted. So that's one of the reasons.

The other reason is just what I just said. I used the words "energy body" and "subtle body" originally because it was in the service of samadhi experience and unfabricating of perception, emptiness experience, which tends towards very ethereal, very open, harmonized, etc., and the kind of blurring of the form of the body, so that the boundaries dissolve. It's just a kind of field of light, for instance, or a field of pleasure. It's great as one portion, but if we want to extend the range into more the imaginal body and the poetic body, then we have to kind of stretch these words.

All these words that we're using—I've said this before—whatever they are, eros, humility, soul, they have to be loose and elastic. There's a balance between them needing to be very precise and differentiated, what we mean, and then actually stretching as our experience grows and they become infused with soul.

So back to what I said before. We could talk about this energy body as really "energy body awareness"—it's a kind of poise of the attention. A kind of stance or attitude or modulation of the attention that allows rather than shuts down the range of possibility. So it's curious. It sounds like it's a thing, the energy body, and it must be a certain experience. No, really it's more a kind of awareness. You understand?

So that's another reason why I use the wrong words sometimes. The energy body is more on the subject side of things, while the object side—the range of what can be experienced—can be huge. It's a poise, a stance, an attunement that allows an expansion of the range of sense, felt sense, image, and idea of what we call body. On top of that, it's also a poise that is more particular and that at any time attunes itself to what is appearing.

This is a little more difficult to describe, but it's almost like... you know, if I say I'm going to look at that notice on the wall over there—I can't quite see what it is—I put my attention in a certain location. But that's not quite an attunement. An attunement is something more to do with the modulation or delicacy of the attention.

Sometimes when you're listening for something delicate, it's not that you have to scrunch up and force your attention. Actually, you need to somehow make your hearing attention more delicate. Something similar happens with the energy body. There's a kind of poise that needs to be commensurate with, in tune with, what the experience is. If what's happening is I'm practicing and there's a lot of lightness and ethereality in this space, that actually takes a kind of delicacy of attention. It's a delicate perception which needs a kind of delicate attention.

When we say energy body, we mean this kind of poised stance that allows an open range—that doesn't box it into what we've been taught or what we're used to in terms of felt sense, image, or idea—but that also potentially tunes to what's happening now in a helpful way. Either helpful meaning it's supporting the samadhi, helping me navigate, helping me sense if I'm letting go or if I'm craving. And also helpful in terms of the soul-making. So tuned how? Well, tuned in a helpful way—either for soul-making or helpful in terms of letting go.

How has my experience of the energy body deepened over time, and what are examples of how shifting the experience of the energy body shifted the range of image? Well, maybe I'll pick up on what I said before. When I started with the energy body, I learned it from Ajahn Geoff—some of you know Ajahn Thanissaro—in relation to breath meditation. It was very much to do with samatha, developing samadhi and jhana. I also did a little qigong and sort of put those two together and just started experimenting on my own. But it was in the service of that.

So the range of experience that I had, because that was my idea and because those were my intentions, stayed pretty much within that realm of possibility. Ethereality, density, contraction, openness, harmonization, energization, and so forth. Once I started getting into imaginal practice and opening that, then these other possibilities opened up—of the body becoming image or energy becoming image, which is a slightly different thing.

You can feel, for instance, the energy between two people, and you think, "Oh, that's what's happening." But it can also become image as opposed to just a rarefied energy feeling. And so then all kinds of possibilities open up. There are fire bodies, fire bellowing. I've shared lots of these before. The body is here—it's almost like there are two awarenesses of the body at one time. I can feel the body sitting, the sensations. I can also feel the sort of energetic tone or texture or vibration of this space. And at the same time, there's some image or other, and I'm flying over there. And I have this double awareness at the same time. This is really sophisticated, but it just happens. And it can happen to you.

Not that it should or shouldn't, but it's a possibility. So there's this... Somehow my energy body is over there flying or turning cartwheels in joy or whatever it is. And I'm somehow aware of how that feels. And I'm somehow aware of how this stationary body that everyone can see and would agree on—Rob is sitting there—I'm aware of how that feels. It's a kind of... not splitting because it has negative connotations, there's a kind of double awareness. So that would be an example.

Let me share something that happened this morning on this note. Catherine did her lovely instructions and she said about touching the body. And so I, as you did, I started touching my body, and immediately became aware of the weariness and weakness and depletion in my body from illness and treatments. So grief comes.

So immediately see what's happening. There's certain instructions, very conventional, so to speak. And it might say, even with the intention of love. But I'm including the emotion. So that's already something bigger. There's story involved. So this is an option.

In other words, the narrative of my life, the narrative of the illness, the possibility of my dying, the probability of my dying—all that is there. Compassion. There was compassion for this body and for the trials and tribulations and what it has to go through, what I have to go through.

What happened to the self-sense at that point? It could be with the toucher. I am the one touching this body. Or the self could be identified with the touched, the one touched. I am the body touched and these hands are touching me. Do you understand? So this is normal about self. Self-identification will go here or there, or it can move around what it identifies with.

In this case, it just happened that I was, let's say, more identified with the body that was weary and wounded, et cetera, and being touched with love. And whose hands were these? Well, you might say, they're your hands, Rob. Don't be silly. But actually, no. I didn't know whose hands they were. They were angels' hands.

When we stopped touching, the hands were still there. And blessing and loving and tending to all that. And with the sense of it, I don't necessarily, I don't have to go into just sensation, no story—no, no, I could, that's a certain mode. And we're used to that from mindfulness, you know, get in right close to the so-called bare sensations, et cetera. But in imaginal practice, and when we talk about opening up the energy body experience, there's all kinds of possibilities.

So this included, as I said, the narrative of this body. Actually, I've been ill since my 20s, but the narrative of that—not just the bodily narrative, the narrative of my life. My death, my death has already happened. I'm already dead from an imaginal perspective. There's this... Some of you have heard me tend to, what is it to see, to sense things, to sense one's existence, one's life and death, from the perspective of eternity, from the perspective of beyond death, of the eternal. So that got mixed up with it.

Now you see how this simple bodily experience that could be as simple as I touch my chest and what do I notice? There's warmth and pressure. There's some kindness as well. Great, that's great, but it's quite a narrow range. Not good or bad, it's just that's a normal narrow range for dharma practitioners. And this opened up to include and draw into it all kinds of other elements and aspects of my being that were becoming insouled. Is this making sense?

So the emotion was there, the grief, the bodily experience, the weariness, the compassion, the angelic nature of it, the self, the narrative, the life, the death, the eternality—all that was there. The mystery. Invisible hands kept doing that. It was very beautiful.

So there's, for example—and we could give so many examples—just one example of a way the bodily experience started to become more imaginal. And the idea of body, all that I said about felt sense, image, and idea, starts to expand, starts to draw in all kinds of other elements. It doesn't stay necessarily that small.

Now it wasn't that my mind was wandering and I'm just going blah, blah, blah. It's not that. There's quite a lot of stillness and containment, but the range has gotten wider and richer, more multi-dimensional, more multi-aspected.

So when Justin suggested these two words—a poetic body or an imaginal body—I really liked it. Everything has drawbacks. The drawback with "poetic body" is that for some people it will emphasize too much an idea of poetry without the felt sense. And for me, insight meditation is so rooted in the felt sense. So that was one reason for keeping the word "energy body."

How does energy body relate to the concept of aura? It will depend. It's not a word I use a lot. I don't have any problems with it. It's just that, in my experience, the word "aura" and the context in which it's used—let's say very loosely, it's what people talk about in certain circles, maybe certain healing circles or so-called New Age circles, perhaps shamanic circles. It's the perceivable energy field of human beings or trees or anything, and animals—a perceivable energy field. And it's usually perceived visually, perhaps with colors or certain levels, sheaths or something like that. Or maybe you see the chakras or something.

So it's really fine. One of the differences is in terms of reification, meaning that usually the context in which the concept of aura is used is a context where there's an assertion, either explicitly or implicitly: this is a real thing that we're talking about. And one day we'll be able to measure it scientifically. And if you can train your awareness, two people will read someone's aura the same way. It's objective, it's independent, it has inherent existence.

With all of these teachings, we're tending away from reification. So energy body is an experience that's created, discovered in the moment and is not postulated either subconsciously or consciously as real. This is the way it is. This is a truth. This has inherent existence.

I tend—this is a really, really important distinction. It's massive. It makes a huge difference. Huge, huge, huge.

Already in the aura concept, there will probably be some limit given by that concept and the context it's in, of those ranges of felt sense, image, and idea. There'll be some limit and it will be a rarefied one.

Second, I tend to be quite kinesthetic, which means that I tend to feel things in my energy body rather than see them. So if I'm working one-on-one with someone, sometimes I feel like I can feel what's happening in the other person's energy body. But some people are more visual. So you may actually find that's more your modality—that it's more visual.

I'm conscious of how much these teachings may be shaped by my personal proclivities to be not that visual and more kinesthetic. I don't know the answer, but that's a thought.

Aside from materialist and modernist logos ideas and concepts, what other common conceptions limit people's experience of the energy body? Well, one of them is just that one might be too limited in terms of the idea of an aura, for instance, or the idea of chakras and where they are. One has been taught a certain system: this is the energy body, it looks like this, this is in this place and that's in that place and that's how it is. And it just gets taken as a truth and reified and not understood and not participated in as something that is created, discovered. So that would be one way.

One could get equally trapped in that kind of logos, that kind of concept. But actually, any idea can become limiting.

If we return to the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic—which we'll leave for another day—the soul-making dynamic stretches things. It will stretch everything. It will stretch whatever logos, whatever idea, whatever concept, whatever belief, whatever experience in its time. As it ripens, if we do not get in the way, if we allow it to do its work and ferment things—like fermenting bread or fermenting yeast—it will rise, it will expand, and it will push against ideas, images, conceptions, beliefs, views, ranges of experience.

There could actually be absolutely any idea about the body: that the body is here and not there, that it's separate, that it's mind, that it's countless—you know, countless possibilities. There's something inherent in the soul-making dynamic that will eventually, if we let it do its work, push and either shatter or just stretch these conceptions.

So it could be anything.

_Question_: "When the energy body collapses, how do I discern between constriction of the energy body or a change or shift of my way of perception? Or are they both the same?"

They're both the same. The energy body is not a certain experience. I can sit here and be aware of the energy body and report that it feels contracted or tight or small or whatever it is, and I'm still aware of the energy body. If I make my awareness big, there's a difference in the awareness stretching.

If I open up the awareness to include, let's say, just this much space—sort of a bit bigger than my physical body, my obvious physical body—and if I just am sensitive, delicately open and attuned to the vibration, the texture, the felt sense there, the possible image (which may be completely conventional), and possible ideas (which again may be completely conventional at that time), then my energy body awareness is open. That's all I have to do.

So it's not a right or wrong experience. It will get contracted. If you're not seeing that the energy body experience feels contracted or constricted many times a day, in and out, you're not paying enough attention. It's just—whoever you are, even if you're a Buddha—it's going to do that. Maybe not a Buddha. I don't know about Buddhas.

The experience, the object, can have this huge range, but I can always just open up the field and just be there with this kind of open, delicate awareness. Everything is connected, though. You'll see that what the actual experience is in the energy body depends on the kind of attention I give it. It's not like I can separate this subjective and objective pole.

If my attention—if I keep opening the attention—the experience of the energy body will tend to open up. It will tend to lighten. It will tend to harmonize and energize. Because experience of anything is dependent on the way I pay attention. Not always, and it might take some time, but that's all I have to do. I don't have to say that this is the wrong experience, because it's not the wrong experience. It's more the poise, the stance of my attention.

But that poise—for instance, if I go back to the example I gave—if in my attention as well, either deliberately or by the grace of the angels and the divine and the Buddha-nature, some compassion, some love comes in, or at least any judgmentalism and reactivity lessens, then I've got a different kind of attention. And that different kind of attention, because everything is a dependent arising, will give rise to a different, will seed a different experience.

Everything depends on attention, on the kinds of attention, the modes of attention, the way of looking. Everything depends on the way of looking.

_Question_: "You have mentioned the energy body can feel twisted or negative. I only feel it when I feel expansive, connected, absorbed, not when contracted. How is that possible, or have I misunderstood?"

I wonder if that's connected to what we just talked about. The energy body is not just this kind of experience or that kind of experience. It's an infinite range, way broader than certainly most people in the culture will be used to—even the most insight meditation cultures will be used to.

So if I'm feeling whatever it is—depressed or angry or fearful or reactive or withdrawn—or if there's simply some clinging, I will notice that happening in the energy body. That's what the energy body is at that time. That's what it feels like. And I can give that more attention and see if I can take care of the kind of attention I give it so that it's helpful.

What kind of information can I read from a contracted or expanded energy body in the face of another person or event? And is intentional expansion always a skillful response—creating space internally or externally to receive further response options?

This question touches on both the balance of attention and two-ness practices, as well as the energy body itself. When the energy body is contracted, it means there's some clinging, some craving. When it's more open, it means there's less clinging and craving. That's the most basic information, and it's really, really important. Dharma-wise, this is fundamental navigation. Is there clinging and craving here? Because that's going to lead to dukkha. That's going to tie me up in papañca and reification and all that misery. Or is there less? Where is it moving? This is a really important read.

Following on from what Catherine shared this morning with the exercises involving another in relationship, in dyad, in two-ness, in the balance of attention—it's not wrong to sit down in front of another person, notice someone coming toward me down the corridor, and observe a contraction. Then it's time to get interested.

There could be all kinds of possibilities. It could be that I simply notice the contraction and find a way of opening it. Or I might become genuinely curious: What's happening here? Is there a specific fear? Perhaps I'm afraid they're going to judge me. Maybe I feel a bit dull today and think they're going to judge that. Or I feel not interesting, or ugly, or whatever it is. Or perhaps I really want them to see how handsome I am. All of this is good to know. "Oh, that's one of my patterns. I see this arising again and again." Now what does that mean? We don't know the answer because it's going to be specific, but this is really valuable information to be able to read.

When there's eros rather than craving, the energy body tends to open and move toward harmonization—more ease, more delight. So that's part of the navigation. "Ah, now there's eros here, or at least openness"—and that's good to know.

This also tells us when we're on the right track. If the other is an event or an image, this is soulmaking. It's part of how I sense that I'm on the right track in my practice—through reading the energy body. If I'm cultivating samādhi, the energy body tells me whether what I've just done is working. I give more intensity to the attention, really drilling into the breath or whatever, and then notice my energy body contract. That's telling me that perhaps what I've just done with the attention is a bit too much and is causing contraction. Or I do that and energy arises and there's openness—oh great, it's the right thing.

It's not always going to be the same answer. So you're always like a sailor at sea, receptive to how the wind catches the sail, feeling it in your whole being.

I can see it, I can feel it in my arm. So practice is like that—it's like reading the billowing of the sail. Whatever I'm doing, if it's samadhi, if it's metta, if it's emptiness practices, if it's imaginal practices, this energy body is one of the aspects that gives a really good read on navigation in the moment.

But in addition to that, there's a whole range of personal psychological issues and patterns that's so important. We talk about roots of soul. Catherine and I were having a conversation some months ago, and she reflected on how it's a bit like this: someone starts regular dharma practice, not necessarily because they want to get rid of suffering, but let's say this hypothetical person senses the possibility of the mystic, of mystical experience. Or they hear about the unfabricated—they don't understand what it means—or emptiness. "I don't understand it, but something of that pulls me, calls me."

So they book on a retreat, and that's their heart's desire—they want to know that, for example. And then day two, day three, that's not what's going on. It's their knees screaming and their mother and their father and their siblings, or whatever. They may have to work with all that stuff—heal it, understand it, make it into soul eventually. These are parts of the roots, roots of soul.

Now that happens again, not in a linear way, not according to some dogma of order. It's not like you first have to do this in therapy and then you can proceed—not necessarily. For some people it is. But these aspects of psychological or relational difficulty, they're part of the information, the kinds of information I can read from a contracted or expanded energy body. Where is my joy? Where are the kinds of ways I contract and what does that need? So a lot of this is just about psychological awareness and relational skills in awareness.

Question: I have noticed that my energy body has a dark side and a light side, changing at the midline. In vision too, one eye has warm light, the other more blue. Is this just an epiphenomenon, or can I use it for soul-making, even if it is just an epiphenomenon?

Wonderful! I've never come across anything like that before, but so what? Is this just epiphenomenal or can you use it for soul-making? You can use it for soul-making. Do you have to? Not necessarily, but it's possible. Exactly what that would involve, we don't know. Anything can be made into soul.

Now, if it turns out that they call you in for a brain scan and the doctors say, "Oh, Hazel, we found this curious thing in your brain that causes you to experience this," and they say, "That's what's causing this," and you say, "Oh, it has nothing to do with soul"—no! Because in soul-making we don't reduce to one causal explanation. Sure, I've got a funny thing in my brain and it might cause something from a certain perspective, but because soul-making involves our participation, we're asked to create, discover.

So anything, even if the doctors or whoever says it's because of this, can be made into soul. But you don't have to. You might feel drawn to, and then it's a question of being creative and playful and navigating and sensing: where is the soulfulness, where is the sense of soulfulness with this experience? How does it start to complexify? And you can follow your sense of soul-making and allow soul to be made through this probably somewhat unusual experience.

Question: At times I can get very high, manic even, especially when working with desire, with the heart's desire in the energy body. Can you say something about this?

I'd probably have to hear a bit more about the specifics, but first thing is not to—again, okay, so I feel manic and high. "Manic" already is a loaded word to me. It has a lot of negative connotations. So my first question would be: is it really, does it really have those negative connotations, or is it just an energy state that I'm not yet used to and that most people in the culture aren't used to and most meditation circles don't talk about?

So again, watch what the mind is doing. Because it might just be—and what will happen, and actually what needs to happen with some people—is the range of their capacities, energetic capacities, needs to grow. Without realizing it, the person is kind, is mindful, is calm and clear and knows the teachings and practices well.

Without realizing it, the energy and the range of energy that can move through that being is actually quite tightly limited. There is not the possibility of a lot of energy. And with that, there is not the possibility of a lot of emotion, and there is not the possibility of a real fecundity and richness of soul-making image.

Since nothing is a root cause, everything feeds everything else. But it might be that for some people, something does need to shift—I need to learn how to tolerate more energy, to allow more to come through, to be okay with that. It doesn't mean I have to have some bonkers Kundalini experience for five years and then melt down. Hopefully not. Having been through that kind of thing years ago, I don't recommend it.

But generally speaking, some people are unaware of the ways in which their whole experience—not just of energy and body, but also of image and emotion and therefore of self and life—is actually contracted. It's not at all obvious that there is a kind of lock on that, and actually there's a very minimal amount of energy being admitted into the system.

So one thing is to watch the judgment, the conclusions that are being made. Another, just practically speaking, if there is a lot of energy—and I'd have to hear more about the specifics there—is expanding the awareness, giving it more space. It's like if the container is too small, the pressure is higher. There's more air in a smaller space, so it's higher pressure, more uncomfortable. Just expanding the container and giving it some holes can help.

If it's really a lot, the energy may want to come out in certain ways. What does it want to do? Maybe it wants to shoot out the throat or at the back of the neck and the throat, or at the heart, or at the feet, or at the top of the head. Just let it do that. Let the imagination do that, so you're kind of modulating it that way.

It also depends how much skill—obviously I don't know who wrote the note and what experiences, what teachings they're familiar with—but if I reify it, if it's a real thing that's happening, this energy state, and I'm convinced of its reality and its concreteness, then that adds to its difficulty. So can I see it as theater? Can I see it as empty? Even if I feel I'm not very advanced in this emptiness business—see, it's theater. That tends to take some of the pressure off and release.

I think I would need more specifics before I could say more.

Another question: "I sort of think energy body plus the presence of the aspects of the lattice, the elements of the imaginal, in meditation is soul making practice. Energy body plus the presence of the aspects of the elements of the imaginal. What are your thoughts on energy body and presence of the elements of the lattice in singing, art, movement, play, anything? Would you consider this soul-making practice? Could you elaborate, please?"

It depends. It depends on a number of things. One of the things it depends on is what the intention is. Certainly, soul making practice is not confined to any posture or any activity. It could be anything at all—in relating, in making art, in speaking, in walking down the road, in whatever it is.

What does make a difference, I think, is the intention. We talked about the elements and one of them is fullness of intention—meaning that the intention is not limited to, for instance, me as an artist. An artist has specific intentions. My intention is to make this piece of art and to do it well, to find the right words or to find the right colors or whatever it is. So I'm tuned to the aesthetic product. I care about that. I have a responsibility to that as an artist.

If that takes over my intention, then it's art practice that may feel soulful, and it's great. Fullness of intention means that it's not just the product, it's not just the healing—it's the soul making that is also included in the intention. It's a full intention, a full range of intention. So that's probably one of the things that makes a difference.

As a composer and poet, sometimes the process just felt wild, crazy, very unmindful even, because I was so intent on getting the product just so. In creating that product, you might go in and out of a sense of soul making, but my responsibility as an artist was to the product, to the art, to the piece.

People have very different relationships with the artistic process, very different.

So I think you have to go with your sense. I'm a certain personality and a certain artistic personality, so I wouldn't want to put that on everyone. But going back to everything we've said about soul making, it's like keep it open. Whatever you know and whatever you experience, just be aware there may be more. There may be more at the edges that you've yet to encounter and come across. But I totally appreciate what you've shared, and I think that's important and right.

I would really love to do this next question. Following Catherine's instruction in the morning about ensouling the energy body work and the tunis exercise, could you say something about the possibility of letting the energy body move towards or move into jhana absorption within a soul-making framework?

On the one hand, in jhana there's meditative absorption in some kind of yumminess—and there are different flavors, lots of different flavors of yumminess. The Buddha outlined eight in particular, but actually there's more, and there are gradations. It's yummy—a Pali word. On the one hand in jhana, there's a desire and movement towards absorption and merging rather than two-ness. And I seem to remember Rob contrasting them on a number of occasions, jhanas and soul making.

On the other hand, on my personal retreat lately, I've been encountering the first jhanas and it felt related to imaginal work in various ways. First, the jhanas themselves appeared as many-faced others, and relationship with them felt rich and nuanced and highly erotic. Even when there was strong movement towards merging, there was still a sense of self as that which is merging into the other—so never fully one, but it might just be my inexperience.

Then also, each jhana had specific images that were felt as her emanations or manifestations, not fully imaginable in some aspects but richly so in others—like a condor gliding on hot air currents, or a human body floating at sea for first jhana; the scent of jasmine, or a deer drinking from a spring for the second. A fully imaginal image that's very dear to me of a young man looking for gold in a stream became linked to the second jhana, and each could lead to the other. The jhana could lead to the image, the image could lead to the jhana.

Lastly, various kinds of images seemed to tend to lead the energy body towards different jhanas—soulful sexual images or concepts charged with eros to the first jhana, images of non-sexual love-eros-metta to the second. And they could be held rather vividly throughout the first jhana and most of the second. Even when disappearing towards the deeper end of the second as I so far know her, their scent remained. Thank you for creating this retreat where such a question can be asked. On rereading, this seems a rather dry list, but the experiences themselves aren't dry or clear-cut at all, but mysterious and constantly transforming.

Lovely. Totally what I would expect. Completely.

I think it's good to be clear about the intention and leaning at any time if this kind of thing is happening, or if it happens later on for you when you start getting into this kind of territory. Some of you have heard me use the analogy of a bird, like a bird of prey. If it just wants to change direction, just tilt the wings a little bit and ride that thermal that way. If you want to go that way, just tilt the wings and ride that thermal that way.

You can go deeper into a jhana and the image will fade. Even if a certain image might have triggered that jhana—at the beginning, for quite a while at the beginning of jhana practice, people often find certain images that either come up in the jhana that seem to express the jhana, or that trigger the jhana, that open the door to a certain jhana. A certain memory even, or an image brings delight, and then I can go with the delight and suffuse the body with delight.

So even if that's how I kick-started it, eventually one doesn't need any images. One can just remember a jhana and go into it. But that's quite a stage—of an image perhaps triggering. There can be all kinds of things. And of course the Buddha gives images for the jhanas as well.

So even if I started, I kick-started this pleasant state with an image, then my navigation comes in. What am I doing now? Where am I going to set my dial? Just fully into the nice feeling, the meanness, and just really get into that and let the image really go to the background.

Maybe I can use the image just like a glider aircraft - they get pulled by another plane and then you can let go of the rope, and then it can fly. I just don't do that indefinitely. Do you understand? So it's a matter of navigation and intention. There's not a right or wrong, but I'm clear about what I'm doing. What was my intention at any time? It's fine.

If I want to go more into the samadhi, I just steer that way. If I want to go more into the image and the soul of the image, then I may be aware that there's all this yumminess and lovely feeling, but actually I'm more focused on the nuance of the image and the soul aspect of it. Or I might be somewhere in the middle territory, and that's fine too. So it's really a matter of intention and clarity of intention at any time.

The jhanas are going to be rich and filled with eros, even if they're not imaginal. When they're new, the soul, the psyche, is opening to new territory. If you're doing jhana practice and you come to me saying, "I opened to the second jhana," and I ask how it was, and you say, "It was nice," I'd say that's wrong. Well, not wrong exactly, but you should be coming to me saying, "Oh my goodness, that was just the most fantastic experience I've ever had in my life!" It touches you to the core of being - the beauty of it, the loveliness of it. So there is eros. The soul is expanding, the psyche is expanding - the gorgeousness, the love, the attraction, all of that.

Even when there's a strong movement toward merging, there's still a sense of self as that which is merging into the other. There will be. There's less self-sense in a jhanic experience, but there is still self-sense. There is not complete cessation of self-sense. So there's still duality. No matter how merged and melted you feel, there's still duality. It's subtle. People don't notice it at first. After a while, your eyes get used to the dark and you think, "Hold on." Then people think, "Oh, I'm doing this wrong." They're not. It's natural. Only in a cessation experience is there the absence of any self-object duality.

Have I addressed the questions? Is there something I'm missing?

One of the aspects of jhana practice we can talk about is the degree of absorption. If I push on that pedal a little more into deeper absorption, then basically there'll be a fading of images and it comes more to this sort of amorphous, unformed experience of energy body or light or that kind of thing. But you don't have to do it. If you want to learn jhana practice, then you're going to have to do that sometimes. And that sometimes might be months and months - that's what learning how to do this involves. But there's no right or wrong. You can play with where you are on that spectrum.

Also, partly what I would expect - with the second jhana, the rapture in the first jhana oftentimes does feel very sexual. People say, "Oh, it's like an orgasm," or similar descriptions. So you would expect sexual images to accompany that. Oftentimes with the happiness of the second jhana, there's a lot of love in it. Sometimes people think, "Oh, the second jhana is primarily love, not happiness," but actually it's primarily happiness - it's just that sometimes there's a lot of love mixed in with it. So again, sometimes we'd expect the metta and the love to be blended with that. In other words, the kinds of images you're experiencing are exactly what I would expect.

Let's just have a few moments of silence before we close.

The kinds of images that arise are exactly what I would expect given the nature of this practice and these states of consciousness. The visions, the sensations, the qualities of experience that emerge—they all align perfectly with what we understand about the deeper movements of the heart and mind in meditation.

Does this make sense? Are we clear about this relationship between the inner landscape and what manifests in our awareness?

We really do need to bring our session to a close now. Let's just rest together for a few moments in silence before we part ways.

[A period of shared silence]

CHAPTER 168

Dukkha and Emotions in Soulmaking Practice

Rob Burbea · 59 min

> In this dharma talk from the 'Roots into the Ground of Soul' series, Rob Burbea addresses the intricate dynamics between dukkha and soulmaking practice. He emphasizes that working with suffering in soulmaking contexts requires an opportunistic, improvisational approach rather than formulaic methods. Burbea discusses how certain emotions may need basic psychological rehabilitation before they can become vehicles for soul, using anger as an example of how suppressed emotions can turn destructive when not allowed expression.
> The talk explores the concept of creating a 'crucible' for emotions - a particular stance and structure that allows dukkha to be transformed into soul rather than simply released or transcended through traditional dharma methods. Key elements include maintaining energized mindfulness that matches the intensity of difficult emotions, allowing some degree of self-sense and narrative (unlike traditional letting-go approaches), and cultivating humility toward forces larger than oneself.
> Burbea addresses practical questions about working with overwhelming dukkha, including ecological grief and trauma, suggesting that sometimes the imaginal work happens more through transforming one's sense of self in relation to suffering rather than the suffering itself. He concludes by acknowledging that soulmaking brings both profound freedom and certain inevitable costs - the 'polytheistic psyche' being pulled in multiple directions by different archetypal forces.

Are you tired? Yes. Is there enough light then? No. When you're tired, it's important to do something about it. It's really, really important. It's not something to just put up with.

There's a whole interesting thing about why we feel energized sometimes, why we feel tired. It has to do with emotions, has to do with inspiration, has to do with eros, has to do with closing down, opening up. So it's actually a really interesting investigation. It's good to know how to galvanize the system, how to catalyze things, how to inject energy, find energy sometimes. It can change like that. If you don't know this, this is something we need to discover. Why does it suddenly change? It has oftentimes much more to do with the heart than we realize, or the mind—the mind in terms of certain ideas or reactivities. That's a whole other subject.

Having said all that, I'm extremely tired. I really didn't know whether I could do this right now, and I still don't. So we'll see how it goes. I apologize if I'm not firing on all cylinders and not so coherent.

We invited some questions on dukkha and soulmaking, and then it occurred to me that perhaps wasn't the wisest thing to do. From the way I feel about it currently, that particular nexus, that particular interaction of dukkha and soulmaking, is extremely complex. As if the whole thing wasn't complex already, this dukkha and soulmaking is really complex. As Catherine mentioned, there's already quite a bit out on the web. I think I gave a talk at some point that was thirteen or fourteen hours long on the subject of dukkha and soulmaking. So there's a lot, and we could say more, but it's complex.

More importantly, if I just speak for myself, when I'm working in an interview with someone and there's dukkha present, I don't feel like I have any kind of formula or pre-conception of how to approach it or what's going to happen or how it's going to unpack or unfold. To me, a lot of these kinds of practices, but particularly when it comes to working with dukkha, are very improvised and opportunistic. I don't know, either with myself or working with someone else.

It takes a while in an interview, if I'm in the teacher role, to let what needs to be heard be heard, to let what needs to be felt be felt, to see what the different aspects are —of body, mind, heart, situation, history, propensity, capability. And then what windows, what doors are open? To me, it's all quite opportunistic. And it takes time. Usually those kinds of interviews where we're working with dukkha in a way that's related to the imaginal, they're not quick interviews. They're an hour or something like that.

So some of the questions feel like I don't have nearly enough information on what's going on for a person or what's there or what's possible or the history. This makes doing this kind of thing right now a little bit difficult.

It's also the case for me as a teacher, when I'm working with someone and there's dukkha present, I don't automatically assume this needs to become soulmaking. It's one option that may or may not present itself as a window of opportunity at some point. But it might be that actually what needs to happen is some other approach that just eases the dukkha in some way. So it's not always, where there's dukkha, "Okay, let's make this soulmaking." There may well be other needs.

A little while ago, I was talking with someone, and there was really a lot of dukkha for them. Asking them a little bit about what was happening, there was clearly some rage, some anger at a certain situation that they were not allowing themselves to feel. What happened instead, as is so often the case—not always, but so often—when anger is not allowed to be felt, it turns inward against the self and becomes a very nasty kind of depression, very self-destructive, very hateful, sometimes suicidal. So what's the need there? Not immediately to jump in and make this soulmaking. Maybe, maybe not.

But there's—let's talk about roots or foundations or bases or steps. There may be a gap, and I think I touched on this a little bit when we were talking about energy body—there may be a gap for some of us in relation to some emotions that we actually don't let ourselves feel. We do not have the permission to feel that emotion. In this case it was anger; in someone else's case it might be whatever. And sometimes it's even a positive emotion, sometimes even joy. It's not okay. It's not okay in our society somehow to actually feel deep joy. It's not okay to share it, whatever.

But the important point is that there's an intermediate piece there, and this often goes unrecognized. And of course, in certain contexts—for instance, a dharma context, where anger is basically... it goes in the box of "it's a kilesa, it's an affliction, it's a defilement." And so sometimes people talk about the Buddhist shadow or whatever—a person who actually doesn't really feel much anger. And it might look to their teachers like, "Oh, this is a good practitioner. Maybe they should be a teacher one day. Look how equanimous they are and how even," etc. They seem to have a good understanding, they're kind, they're mindful. It seems that way.

Something is not allowed, and the person doesn't even recognize that they're not giving themselves permission for this or that emotion. So when we talk again about these words—roots or foundations—sometimes there are basic kinds of emotional work, basic psychological gaps that need to be rehabilitated, drawn back into the fold and the field of psyche, drawn back into the hearth of psyche, and allowed and given a minimum degree of respect.

If I feel anger—it's partly why I said that thing about ranting in the popcorn thing today—something that looks like a defilement can actually be a signal of soul. It's the flame of soul. And it's coming up in a way that most people would be like, "Whoa, that's kind of not okay." I've come to recognize that if I can be a bit patient with this ranting mind, for instance, in terms of ecological crisis or other... I'll try not to go into that now, but there's actually a lot of soul there. And I feel like something comes through me. Of course, that could be a grand delusion, and there's always that danger.

The point is that even just for psychological health, before we even talk about soulmaking and its possibilities, there may be gaps that need addressing. There may be basic building blocks that need filling in and given some solidity. It might be, I need to give myself permission. I need to allow myself to acknowledge, to feel, to maybe at some stage express in some way or another. And that's a whole journey if we're talking about anger. Something's dead in the being and it needs to be able to come alive.

Assuming this all makes sense... When we did on the last retreat—some of you were here—we did some of that movement stuff and there was some sort of ogre-ish kind of things. It wasn't so much... and I explained, it wasn't so much, "Oh now we're trying to cathart" (if that's a verb), "we're trying to release something." We're interested in opening up the pathways—neurologically, physically, energetically, emotionally, psychically, mentally, cognitively—that are closed, so that they can become roots. You think of a root of a tree as a living thing. Things flow through that root, those roots. And if they're blocked or if they're cut off or if they're starved or withered, you can't even have a healthy tree, let alone the blossoms of soul.

So it may be in some cases that certain basics, certain foundations need to happen first. What was interesting with this person was then talking actually over a couple of days. And so that was my immediate sense: "Oh, this needs to happen first. It doesn't need to become imaginable yet." And then they came back and reported already some images. And so the images were coming alive, and the images had to do with power and rage, and they liberated something.

So, you know, it's tempting to think: first this, then that, then that. Now you're ready for the image or the soulmaking. And oftentimes that will be the case. That will be so. I've talked a lot about this kind of thing. But I've been too struck by the kind of non-linearity of things sometimes. So what does that imply? I don't know.

To be open-minded. And again, opportunistic, improvised. Here's this knotted ball of string. What if I just pull on this one? No, wrong one. Okay, well, ah, that's a bit better. That starts loosening something. I don't know which one to pull on first necessarily.

But if we talk about basics, some of those foundations may, I think we said in the opening, take quite a while. If I think about my history working with anger, I was really some years in psychotherapy back in the late eighties and early nineties, really working with that and learning how to express it and getting it completely wrong and overdoing it or underdoing it or not being aware. So just that journey around anger—recognizing that I actually felt angry in some situations, learning how to tolerate it, learning how to understand it, learning what my needs were, learning how to express it—it takes a while, you know, just that. And we haven't even talked about soul-making possibilities there. So this is a long-term trajectory for all of us, really. And in that, there's open-mindedness and humility, and it may not always be linear.

So, on the theme of nonlinearity, some of you will know the teachings about the 28 elements or nodes of the lattice and all that business, and some of you may not. So we may get to it this week, but very briefly, there's a way of pointing to what's characteristic of what we're calling imaginal or soul-making or sensing the soul. But there's no order there. So it could be, if you go back to the knotted ball of wool analogy, that each one of those is an end of a thread of wool. And I may jiggle or pull or wiggle anyone and it starts unraveling the whole thing. Or if we use a different analogy, I ignite one and the rest ignite.

So again, what that means in terms of working with dukkha is there's this openness to which of those elements might be available and might be ones that actually can implement some leverage and start to move things and start to ignite and open things. And I do not know beforehand. I have no idea. I'm dealing with my own pain and situations and whatnot or with someone else.

So is that good news or bad news? While a part of us might like simple formulas, I think these kind of practices are too rich to be just formulaic. It's a bit like this thing that I said about you as a practitioner and your ideas. You can become a playful improviser, someone who has that confidence, someone who's just able to do that without a formula. In time, it will come.

So I don't always know in advance, but I do have the trust. At this point, I have total trust that—it might not be this person right now that this can be made soul-making—but I pretty much believe at this point and sense that anything can be made into soul. Soul can be made in relationship to anything, and that transforms and transfigures it. But that, in a way, there's thinking about those different elements and just kind of being with something and seeing which might suggest themselves or be possible.

And it might just be the energy body, just opening the energy when coming into a relationship with dukkha or whatever it is, already makes a difference, something as simple as that. But it could be something, one of the ones that we don't usually think about or something else. All kinds of things.

That word opportunistic—I think I said it once in a talk years ago—you know, the root is porta, which is a door in Latin. So to be opportunistic means to be on the lookout for what doors are not locked and one might just slip through, or what doors are open and just obviously beckoning us.

When some of these elements—which, by the way, I always forget what they are, so people say, "I'm not very good at number 18," and I think, "Number 18, what else?" Anyway. When some of them start to ignite, it's as if they already start to complexify what's happening in a good way. They give anchor points or vantage points or, you know, what's it called when you rock climb and you put one of those things in? Pitons, yes.

Well, you know what I mean. You know those climbing anchors that secure the rope - these things give footholds and vantage points. Another way of looking at it is they start throwing something out and connecting things. In that connection, it's as if a wire goes here and there, then another wire goes between here, then another wire goes. Soon you've got a kind of net and structure, and that structure can make a crucible.

Everyone knows what a crucible is? It's a vessel, I think, from alchemy, where you put whatever material you were working with and it gets heated in this crucible. When we come to talking about dukkha and soul-making, Catherine writes that in a way, what we want is for this here to be a crucible. But we could also say that we want our emotions or our dukkha to be in a crucible. We need to have a certain kind of stance, a certain kind of relationship with them. And all these other elements start forming a kind of structure that holds something in a way that the flame can come alive.

So in relation to emotions, part of what we want is that there's a crucible of emotions. In that crucible, with the fire - sometimes the heat and the painful fire of the emotions - image is born or soul-making is born. If we're relating to our emotion in a way that's not crucible-like, then it doesn't happen. We might either spin into some kind of meltdown of dukkha, some kind of craziness, or we might relieve the dukkha through the many traditional dharma pathways that are available and there's a dissipation of dukkha and letting go. But without the crucible, there won't be the soul-making.

So the golden question is: what makes the crucible? As usual, it's not so simple and not so easy to articulate. But partly it's these different elements of the imaginal - for example, humility, or as Catherine mentioned this morning, the idea. So often when there's dukkha, in the back of my mind or in the forefront of my mind, this dukkha is caused by this. It's because of this in my past or my parents or that person or me being a loser or whatever. It's got a cause. Explicitly or implicitly the mind is reducing it to one cause - even if I say it's craving because the Buddha said it was craving. I've reduced it to one cause, and that element of the imaginal, that node, is dead. It's not alive. It's a damp wick, and the closing down of that idea will close down the possibility of soul-making. Catherine already said this this morning.

Let's linger on this a little bit. I've dwelt quite a lot over the years on working with emotions in different ways, long before the soul-making teachings. It's so easy to be imprecise when it comes to emotions. We just hear a sort of vague feeling - oh, kind of be with it and try to be with your body and just be open to it and watch it come and go or something like that and try not to identify. Oftentimes what happens is a person then takes that sort of vague instruction back to the cushion and it just kind of stews for a while until something else comes along that gets their attention. It doesn't necessarily really become fertile.

Even within traditional dharma, I feel there's a real place for precision about what I'm actually doing in relation to an emotion at any time, whether it's a beautiful emotion of joy or love, or a difficult emotion - despair, hatred, whatever it is, powerlessness. If I can be really specific and try different things, that tends to open a lot more doors.

One of the things Catherine mentioned this morning is that when there's an afflictive emotion, there's often a lot of energy wrapped up in it. Even if it's depression, depression has an enormous amount of energy, but it's in lockdown with certain kinds of depression. Anger certainly, rage, grief - there's a lot of energy. What tends to happen is then we hear, "Oh, kind of be with it or just open to it and just soften or whatever." The mindfulness that goes with that actually doesn't have a lot of energy in it. It's not very specific, and the energy in the emotion is more than the energy in the mindfulness. You understand?

If I can find a way—and it's interesting we started with this energy thing—of really bringing an intensity of mindfulness and energized mindfulness to bear with this emotion, then something's shifted and the energy doesn't overpower the mindfulness and then things can start to move.

So in typical Dharma, or rather in mainstream Dharma practice, that would be one of my suggestions—a very sort of straight, normal approach among many others. In a way, we want the mindfulness, the awareness to be bigger, not just spatially (that's an option), but also in terms of energy levels, if that makes sense—bigger than the emotion.

Also in mainstream Dharma, what we tend towards is letting go of the story. And with that, letting go of the self, because self and story often go together. So you want a kind of brightness of mindfulness and a kind of diving under or letting go of the self and the story. Does that sound familiar? Really, really skillful, really helpful. So good to have that in your toolkit as something one can go into at any time.

Because dukkha is dependent on self-sense and identification, and in a way it's also dependent on an absence of mindfulness, or an absence of energy and mindfulness, when we bring the energy of the mindfulness up, and when we let go of some self-story and sense, well, the dukkha goes down. It's all swings and levers, dependent origination.

When it comes to soul-making, it's a little bit different. I gave the example yesterday of when Catherine suggested touching the body and I explained what was going on—look, there's self here, look, there's narrative here. So I'm not going "no self, no story." There's a certain allowing of some of that to some degree, because that might come into the constellation of what then can make soul. When there's an image and when there's soul-making, it tends to involve self-sense and some kind of narrative, and it's more complicated and more diffuse in the elements of its constellation.

So already there's a difference there. And some of us are thoroughly trained in Dharma practice—letting go of the self, just bringing the simple, bare attention, mindfulness, being with an emotion almost as bare sensation. We've kind of dived underneath the emotion and missed it. It's actually happening at this level and we've gone down here where it's just sensation. It's great. Maybe it just disappears. Helpful at times.

Again, there's this kind of modulation of the attention. Opportunistically, what actually feels soulful and soul-making here? But it may well involve—and again I've explained this before—when there's an image, the thing that is to become image or is in process of becoming image might be my dukkha, might be my body, it might be something else, it might be something in the world. There's an object there. The image is object. But as things become imaginal, the self in relationship to that thing starts to become image as well. And the world also. And my desire to—and in fact all the elements. So all these things start to become ensouled.

What that means practically is I don't always have to be fixated on the object at the expense of self and story and world sense. Any of these can be picked up first, opportunistically.

Whatever object we're working with—so it could be a dukkha or it could already be an image—in the process of something becoming imaginal, let's say this candle becomes imaginal for me. Well, if I stay with that and meditate with it as image and allow it to do its thing and allow the soul-making dynamic, at some point what will happen is the self that is looking at that candle becomes imaginal as well. Do you understand?

And then not only that—then it starts to spread and the blue velvet and the room and the light and the whole world becomes imaginal. And then elements of my being start to become imaginal. I recognize eros, and it's not just my eros—that eros starts becoming imaginal, in other words it has dimensions and divinity, etc.

That process of spreading out and making a more complex constellation is part of what happens with soul-making, part of what happens when something becomes imaginal in time. But what it means practically is that I don't always need to just focus on the object. I might start to include more of the self. Can that become more imaginal, for instance?

So sometimes, for example—we talked about the mindfulness in a sort of traditional Dharma—the mindfulness instruction, one of the instructions might be for the mindfulness to be, if you like, bigger in some way than the emotion. Sometimes, of course, we don't feel that at all.

We feel that this emotion is bigger than me. Now there's a way that can just be overwhelming and depressing. The mindfulness can't get around it—it's bigger than me. I'm sinking with the emotion.

But there's a way too in which the emotion can be bigger than me in a beautiful way, in a soul-making way. There's a humility that arises—and that's a loaded word for a lot of people. What does that mean? What's a fertile soul-making humility? It's one of the elements.

This grief, this pain—whose is it? And again, typical Dharma is it's nobody's. It's anatta. Soul-making Dharma might be it belongs to soul, belongs to the world soul. It's from the divine. This pain that I'm feeling, this sensitivity that I have to the pain is the divine sensitivity operating through me.

So already there's—you can see—well, that's an idea. Now it doesn't have to be a big thing where my mind is churning with all this intellectuality. It's just like a little grain of sand there of a poetic idea. And I just sprinkle it there and it does something. It's part of the alchemical process.

So in that case, the emotion is bigger than me. It's bigger than the self. I'm not even hoping to get bigger than it or handle it, but something has changed in my whole view of it and my whole relationship with it. Do you understand? So these little sprinkles of kind of alchemical tinctures or materials can make so much difference.

Sometimes one may be sitting, there's some dukkha or something, and there may be accessible just a fullness of intention, which means, sure, I don't like this dukkha and I want to get rid of it, but as Catherine was saying this morning, I want the fullness of soul here. I want what's right for soul. I want this to become soul-making in the service of soul-making, even if that has some cost to it, even if that has some bite to it, even if not all the dukkha goes. That's one of the elements as well, this fullness of intention.

And maybe with that, there's a kind of humility. And I might not even know in relation to what I feel this humility. It may be just some vague sense of divinity that if someone asked me, "Well, where exactly is it? Or what is it? Or certainly what's your theology?" I wouldn't be able to answer. But maybe that's enough. That stance of just the fullness of intention and a humility that I don't even understand and that isn't even that precise. And it fertilizes things. It softens and opens and fertilizes things.

How are we doing? Is it making sense? And are you still awake?

A lot of these words are—sometimes used sloppily by me and maybe not Catherine, but certainly by me. But sometimes deliberately ambiguously and sometimes to mean one or the other. So in that case, I meant both.

So, in other words, the concept of soul, like everything else, will itself become ensouled. All of these concepts—Eros, soul, image, you name it. So we start with some idea, or maybe like, "I don't know what the hell you're talking about, but it feels good sometimes, so I'm kind of hanging out." You know? And then maybe, let's say for someone, it starts with this idea, well, it's my soul, and then you have soul, and so on.

In time, because of the soul-making dynamic and the eros-psyche-logos, the concepts begin to get fertilized. They start to get worked and develop more windows, more shadows, more shadings, more complexity—more dimensions altogether. So for me, sometimes that word can encompass both those meanings and more, in a way that remains loose and elastic and open-ended and unfathomable.

The danger, of course, is that it becomes too sloppy and ultimately meaningless. So we're always treading this delicate line. Again, where do we stand? Where do we position ourselves at any given moment between precision and openness? Well, it depends what we want. If we want soul-making, then we need to sense in the moment: is precision what's called for right now, or is it the more open-ended approach?

In this kind of practice, the gauge is always what serves soul, and how do I know? It gives me those feelings—that sense of soulfulness. That becomes my navigation.

Sometimes when working with dukkha, a certain amount of letting go in relation to the suffering needs to happen before it can be made soul. And sometimes it's only through being made soul that certain dukkha is able to be freed up.

Recently, especially with some of the medications I'm taking and getting very confused and under-resourced, I've noticed something. Sometimes, after having many conversations and doing research about different possible alternative medical approaches that might help—of course, once you're engaged in that research, it becomes goal-oriented, which is not to die. You're in a certain relationship and on a certain track with the whole situation and with the information. You understand? That track carries the assumption that it's not okay if I die, because we're trying to accomplish something else—somehow miraculously survive.

Sometimes just reminding myself, "It's okay if I die, it's really okay"—just that much letting go makes all the difference. If I've been too caught up in "should it be this dose or that dose?" or whatever it might be, sometimes that simple acceptance, that okayness, provides just enough letting go that the whole situation can become soul-making again. You understand? It's not that I then think, "Oh, it doesn't matter," or become indifferent. But just that certain amount of letting go can liberate things, loosen them enough that they can become soul-making.

Some of you in this room already know that nothing else has helped with certain dukkhas—intractable, long-standing suffering and deep pains—except when they become imaginal and when they're infused with soul. Nothing else. Not any of the other practices. Not years of psychotherapy. So again, there's this opportunism and flexibility that's needed.

A little less fabrication is one of the elements as well. When I say "it's okay if I die," there's a loosening of whatever clinging had built up there, and that loosening represents a little less fabrication. Then some soul can be made out of the situation.

As I said at the beginning, some of these questions would require far more information. I would need to be with the person for a while to get a sense of what might be possible or what else is present in the field. But let me see if I can offer something helpful.

Having given all that introduction as context, let me address a couple of questions about the ecological situation and the tremendous pain of that reality. Is it even possible for that kind and level of dukkha to be soul-making, to be ensouled? Here's where I would tie it back to what I've been saying—there was a reason I offered all that introduction.

I wasn't just getting lost. So here's a situation where there's an object—unprecedented species extinction and the heartbreak of that. Not just that actually, because part of the object there is not just species loss, but also the almost complete absence of commensurate response from humanity in relationship to it. So the object's already a complex one.

And then if we go back to what I said before, so there's this object, and then there's also self in relation to the object. Now, it may be too much to ask—someone wrote a note, can the rape of a child be ensouled—and someone might think it's not your business to tell that child, "oh, come on, you can ensoul this." That would be ridiculous.

But it might be then that the imaginal and the soul-making goes more to the self sense. Who am I and who will I be and how do I sense myself with soul in relation to what's happening in the world? And that's—in this self-other-world constellation—where it starts.

And I might arise as the warrior. Or, like Joanna Macy talks about, the midwife of whatever might be new. Or the hospice worker. But these are imaginal roles. The self in relation. And then the question: can that fill out? And again, that's going to take a lot of emotional work and imaginal work. And then what does that mean in terms of my duty and how it manifests in the world?

Of this image—if my image is a warrior, what does that mean? How does that refract into my actions? Does it mean I then go become an eco-terrorist or something like that? Or does it refract in a more subtle way? But that image is driving me.

Another important point here is that images are eternal, they're timeless. And that's one of the elements of the imaginal as well, which means in relation to something like climate change or the ecological crises, it's natural to want to think about goals and time and ending. But in a way that warrior is always fighting, is always available, impassioned, dedicated—the imaginal warrior. Do you understand?

And that awareness of that eternality gives the whole thing another level of resource, less dependent on the temporal outcomes. You can still care. I probably said this in a talk before—I heard that when the Titanic was sinking and there weren't enough lifeboats, they really hadn't planned very well. A lot of people were left on board ship sinking into icy waters, all the lifeboats gone. They knew they were dying, and they started singing hymns.

This was not quite the complete eradication of any sense of religiosity in the culture. So they sang hymns. What the hell's the point? You're going to be dead in a minute. What good does it do to sing a hymn?

But it matters for soul. Were they singing hymns in the hope that maybe God will let them into heaven? It had nothing probably to do with that. It's like what matters—yes, of course it matters what happens with species loss. Of course it matters what happens with climate change. But there's something on another level that the soul needs. It will do, it wants to express, it wants to reflect, it wants something to come through.

Soul, if we go back to the bigger sense, is asking of the human being for something to come through that doesn't just have to do with outcomes and life and death. Do you understand? There are other levels to this, and sometimes, especially—I know there are a lot of activists in this room—it's hard to not get pared down to the concrete level only. To allow those other dimensions of soul can be immensely resourceful for that kind of thing.

But it might be more in the sense of self that the image arises, not in the sense of object, of the thing itself. Diesel pollution in the UK—is that a soulful thing?

I don't know. It stinks, you know, and it's really nasty. But in relationship to it, I can become something. It may be easier.

Also in a way, you know, the sense of the earth, the species as sacred, the responsibility of the human being to other species—that's already a view. That's a potentially soulful view. This is a sacred world. Can I prove that to anyone? No. It's a view. It's an idea. But it's a soul view. Again, if we talk about self or the world, I start perhaps with the world and the sacred world. And now this sacred world is being desecrated. And that can galvanize something.

I'm going to read this question. I've been working with a particular manifestation of dukkha today with two images which feel to be on the opposite ends of some emotional spectrum. The first has qualities of compassion, tenderness, healing and vulnerability. The second personifies a kind of transcendent not giving a fuck in a joyful divine punk kind of way. Previously, you've talked about bringing images into relationship with each other. I feel called to explore that here. Any advice would be appreciated.

Yeah, so again, I would need to hear a lot more here. My initial thought was that some images are not really in relationship with each other. So this is an interesting thing. Jung talked very much or seemed to stress very much in his teaching a kind of integration of the different archetypes and the different images with the self and with each other, so that they come into balance and into dialogue and they kind of harmonize with each other.

James Hillman, massively indebted and respectful of Jung, but kind of in the context of reacting to that a little bit, stressed this idea that we have a polytheistic psyche, which means we're called in multiple directions that often are not congruent with each other. They pull us in impossibly multiple directions.

So I think I've shared this before. I have a monk in me. I have a teacher in me. I have a musician in me. I have someone who just wants to serve. They cannot all exist at the same time. So that there's some impossibility there in terms of the soul's calling and being pulled and stretched in different directions. And there's some grief there. There's some dukkha.

A lot of the questions are about how dukkha can be made into soul and sort of help that way. But there's also a certain amount of dukkha that we're assenting to by saying yes to soul making. And if we're not up for that, then we're limiting the soul-making. And it's possible that if we're not up for that, it's just because we haven't fallen in love with soul-making yet. It's possible it's just not our path. But there's a certain amount of dukkha that soul-making brings.

And if I allow the fullness of these pulls, so I have this—it's like this god of music won't ever let me go. I haven't been a musician for years and years. It won't ever really let me go. And so there's grief sometimes with that. And I realize I can't do that and this. I'm pulled in two directions. And I can work with it imaginably and it can refract into my life and my practice and my interactions in all kinds of ways. But there's a certain amount of pain for me in that impossibility.

I'm being pulled by soul and by the powers of soul, which, going back to what we said before, are bigger than I am. This god of music is bigger than I am. The god of dharma is bigger than I am. The god of teaching is bigger than I am.

I'm being pulled by gods in different directions. I'm not even trying to harmonize them or balance them or live some kind of neat balance where I do a bit of this and a bit of that and it's all very nice.

So my initial thought was: I wonder if these two images that the person's alluding to need to come into contact with each other, or if there's simply a certain incongruence and tension there. And that's part of what Hillman would call the polytheistic psyche. It's part of the dukkha of soul-making.

There's an enormous amount of freedom that comes from soul-making, and as I've said, some freedoms that come from soul-making won't get opened up by any other way. But sometimes it comes with cost, it comes with pain, a price. Sometimes the price is in the duty. It might not be this pulling in different directions. It might be that this image is asking something of me. People were alluding to this with the meaningfulness we shared earlier. And that duty takes its toll in my life. It means a sacrifice. It means I can't do this or that or the other. It comes with a cost.

But you have to decide what you want.

We should probably stop there. So apologies for the questions I didn't get to. Apologies if I wasn't so clear or bright, but hopefully it's helpful.

Let's sit for a moment together, and then Catherine has an announcement.

CHAPTER 169

On Practising with Images (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 1h10

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea explores key aspects of imaginal practice and soul-making meditation. He addresses how the self-sense becomes caught up in the imaginal process, explaining that recognizing oneself as image leads to a profound sense of personal divinity and dimensionality. Burbea discusses the malleability of images - how they can shift between imaginal and non-imaginal states within a single sitting, and offers guidance on working with dissolving or melting images. He emphasizes that what makes something imaginal is not the object itself but the way of relating to it.
> The discussion covers practical challenges like working with narrative elements in images, balancing particularity with unfathomability, and navigating feelings of unworthiness when encountering erotic beloved others. Burbea addresses concerns about working imaginally with real people, suggesting this can actually deepen relationships when practiced with proper care and the imaginal middle way. He encourages practitioners to trust their experience while refining their view, noting that encountering 'weird' content is natural in this work and can be redeemed through skillful practice. The session emphasizes the importance of attuning to what feels soul-making rather than getting caught in fixed ideas about how images 'should' appear.

Sorry to be a little late. There's not that many questions, so let's see how it goes, but we could also open it up to live questions and comments if that feels good. I haven't even had a chance to really look at them or put them in a particular order, so let's just see.

The first question reads: "A few weeks ago an image came to me in which the other was me. Not in a sense that the image was me as witnessed by me interacting with another, but me interacting with another version of myself. In the image, I was standing on a landscape, vast and seemingly empty. I felt the soft caress of hands at my back, beckoning me to turn. When I turned around, I saw myself standing in front of me. There was still a self-sense and a sense of other, but also a jolt of recognition that this was me.

"The self I was beholding flickered in and out of being—each time she appeared slightly different, as though seen through a different lens or the way different people at different times might perceive me in daily life. The energy body felt very rooted during this image, yet at the same time a shock of surprise ran through me like a bolt of electricity, followed by joy washing over me and a slight indecision as to how to proceed next.

"I could feel a narrowing in me, a leaning toward the imaginal me, wanting to hold on to her. What felt most soulful to me right then was to bow to the imaginal self and gently turn around. As I did so, I could feel her arms sliding around my back and waist and holding me in embrace. Tears came at this point, as well as an intense sense of well-being and homecoming.

"This is the first time I have interacted with an imaginal version of myself and the surprise slightly interfered with my ability to practice with this image skillfully. Could you say something about this kind of image and pointers for practicing with it?"

Beautiful. In a way, not to set up expectations, but I would expect at some point or other this kind of thing to happen. Maybe to say it better in another way: in some way or another, working with images—and I think I said this at some point—the self-sense gets caught up in, invited into, roped up in, included in the soul-making process. It gets included in what becomes imaginal.

Sometimes it can happen in this more indirect way where we're working with an object. I gave the example of looking at, let's say, this candle flame that became imaginal for me. As I'm enjoying that and lingering with it and feeling the resonances, if I don't narrow my attention too much to the object, at some point I start to see: "Oh, hold on, the image here includes myself. The self pole, the subjective pole has become image as well as the candle." And then I can explore—I could lean my attention to exploring the imaginal self that is arising in relation to this candle. So that would be one way, and it's very common.

Another possibility is that the image somehow—even if it doesn't feel like at the time that I'm working meditatively with it, even if I'm not noticing so much of the self becoming an imaginal self in relationship to it—implicit in that element of infinite mirroring and echoing and duty and these kinds of elements, there's already implication for self-sense and the actual sense, view and images we have of ourselves in our lives. So it's not necessarily right then; it's more subtle and it seeps out into the life, into the being and into the sense of self we have in life.

And then other times, something happens much more like what's in this report—something much more direct, where we really feel or witness the self as image. This can happen in all kinds of ways, but sometimes it is quite startling.

In a way, I would expect, let's say, in time with imaginal and soul-making practice, I would expect the sense of self as imaginal. Going back to the opening in that ritual when I was saying you may not have landed then by saying "you are image"—what is it to know yourself as image? What is it to know yourself as angel? This is what I'm talking about.

Something happens and the self-view, self-ideation, self-view, self-sense, self-image starts getting infected, infiltrated, caught up in, involved in the soul-making. And so what happens when we become imaginal is that very self-sense starts to become imaginal with all the nodes. We start to have eros for ourselves. We start to love ourselves in a whole different way. We start to recognize our own dimensionality and our own divinity.

Of course, culturally, this doesn't fit at all. In the wider culture, to say that I sense my own divinity—I mean, divinity on its own is a problem. And then to say self, we get such limited and confused and confusing indoctrination about the self in our culture, in our wider culture. On one hand, it's a very egoistic culture, of course, that's very individualistic and kind of caters to and supports a very superficial kind of thinking about the self—a kind of ego celebration. And on the other, we kind of get shamed for that kind of thing. So we get—do you understand what I mean? You're not supposed to be egoic, and yet it's an extremely egoic culture.

We receive these confused and confusing mixed messages. The same contradictions plague our understanding of sexuality—everything is muddled and bewildering.

But at some point we begin to sense ourselves as image and we sense our own blessedness. We have a reverence for ourselves. We sense this dimensionality. We sense I am more than what I'm told I am. And that "more" is not just expansive horizontally—not simply that I could choose to become an airplane pilot or brain surgeon if I wanted. No, I am more not only horizontally, but vertically, so to speak.

We start to really receive a palpable and moving sense, a deeply touching recognition of our own divinity—that we are the face of, let's say, at least one angel. We are the representation, the emanation of angel in this life and may be tasked with sacred work. All of this neither real nor not real, this imaginal middle way.

Given the usual history we carry both personally and culturally in terms of how we view the self, this opening is oftentimes utterly startling. I was speaking with someone recently about this unfolding to a whole other level. This person had done considerable work on self, had been in the Dharma for years with the teaching of no-self, no-self, no-self—self isn't important. Then they engaged a Diamond Heart approach where there's more emphasis on self, exploring and valuing the self, discovering who you are. And then came this entirely new dimension with the imaginal and the divinity of the self—the sense even of angels looking at the self, recognizing, being seen as angels, seen by angels.

If this becomes too rarefied, then the people around you are in for a rough time, and probably you will be at some point as well. But if we can stay somewhere within that actually quite wide range—the wide boulevard of the imaginal middle way—then there's so much fertility, so much joy, so much healing.

This transforms our sense of self and existence, our understanding of what we're doing here, our relationship to life and death. When I say I'm already dead, it's because I can sense myself as image and I sense that angelic mirroring or function or emanation. That recognition makes a difference to everything.

This journey into the self becoming recognized as image—with all the reverence and humility and beauty and eros—this is exactly the kind of opening that's possible. How rare is it in our culture to really know how beautiful you are? That's why I say it to you. We don't really grasp it. Our concept of beauty is so thin. When understanding deepens to another level, up-levels, there's no end to it. This is the kind of opening that can unfold, with such riches pouring forth.

If we know to expect this possibility, it might be less surprising and startling, which helps us receive it.

In some spiritual traditions—for example, the way Henri Corbin interprets certain Sufi and Islamic mystical traditions like Ibn Arabi—they speak of the angel out ahead. That angel out ahead is me. In that metaphysic, I have a kind of angelic counterpart. You have an angelic counterpart. We each have an angelic counterpart, and that angelic counterpart is the face of God for us. But it's us. We are the face of God. So we expect to encounter this if we're practicing well and if we're blessed with such grace.

Much of the soul-making work involves discovering how this natural dynamic is being prevented—how the natural expansion and fertilization and fermentation of the soul-making process is blocked by certain ideas or fixations or fixed views or certain images, whether cultural or personal, or in terms of our meditative capacity. Often the work is simply recognizing, "Oh, that's been a taboo in my mind," and acknowledging that, perhaps softening it. Or recognizing that I hold a certain view that's obstructing the process—some philosophical view about reality, among other things.

So it may be less about making this happen and more about noticing where something might suggest itself, and I might think, "Oh, I can't possibly do that." Or some kind of ideation might arise. As Catherine framed the question: Tell me an idea you have about sacredness that prevents the opening to more sacredness.

In terms of practical guidance for this work, the same principles apply: bringing the energy body there, bringing the heart, sometimes asking subtly if it wants anything—everything we've discussed regarding the imaginal.

This kind of opening might have quite an impact, because it's so profound. You have to be careful of the pacing. It may be that you want to linger longer because it's so rich or touching, so you take your time. You might want to deliberately return to this kind of image.

If this happens as a one-off experience, it might leave you thinking, "Wow, that was amazing," or perhaps "I couldn't quite grasp it." But a single experience may not be sufficient to truly begin changing the sense of self as it walks down Newton Abbot High Street or navigates difficult situations. It may require dipping in and out, returning to work with such images, and perhaps lingering in the post-meditative state as well.

I walk into the garden. How does the world look when I've just encountered that kind of divinity, self as divinity?

What's my sense of my existence, but also existence itself? You get a feel for how it spreads out and infects and involves everything else. That's one of the ways these images start to really seep down into the psyche. And it's not necessarily in the intensity of some moments of meditation, beautiful as that can be. It might be more in these moments of—I had it before in the meditation, now I'm just sitting waiting for my tea to brew or whatever it is. And maybe I can just bring the memory of it back, and again, the energy body, and just notice: well, how do I feel? How do things look with the tincture, with the almost homeopathic drops of that image coming in again and again?

The self-sense, of course, is one of the most entrenched things. It's why the Buddha and so many Buddhists give so much attention to the problem of self. So the more we shift it in imaginal practice—this way, that way, shift it, sit with it, see what the effects of that view are, come back to another view of self, etc.—the more we do that, the more malleable and open the whole sense of self becomes. And something like this, where we're really, in a very humble and touching way, recognizing deeply the holiness and beauty and divinity and angelic nature and function of our own selves—that's quite a shift, as I said, from the usual view. And so repeating it, you know, again and again—it's not something you need to grasp at or try and hang on to twenty-four seven. No, it can come and go, and it starts to have its effect.

Is there any more with that? Is that okay? Very beautiful, and exactly the kind of thing I would expect—and incredibly important. Incredibly important.

Something is unclear to me about the possibility of the self becoming imaginal in relation to an imaginal other, and how it fits with the elements. For example, this morning I encountered an imaginal other person, but I was a bird of prey. My energy body was the bird's body as well as my experience of the other, et cetera. Should I have also retained a sense of my human self relating to both the bird and the imaginal person? It feels like that would have been a rather different image.

I think I understand. So with a lot of these things, I don't think there's a right or wrong. And one of the general things I would want to say—and I've sort of said it at other times or other talks or whatever, maybe other retreats—if I think back to when I first started playing with all this stuff and exploring it and trying to make sense of it all, the kind of images I had were quite different from the kind of images I have now. And they were kind of long sagas with casts of thousands and very complicated plots and stuff like that, and all kinds of things going on. Now I kind of feel like it's much more—what's the word?—condensed. What appears is what's important, and the extraneous stuff has fallen away. It's less complicated.

But I wouldn't necessarily at all go back to that self—whenever it was, four or five years ago, six years, whatever—and say, you know, that's wrong or something. I had to, and I really had to work on the trust. So often, every time there's an image, there's like: am I doing this right? This can't be right. Surely not that kind of image. Or maybe this is too this or too that.

So yes, we talk—some of you were in the explanation about the elements. Yes, we talk about okay, what do we mean when we say fully imaginal? And can we kind of support it there? But you also want to kind of trust what comes up. So less about right or wrong. And sometimes you just have to kind of go with what is and trust that as you attune to what's appearing and work with it as best you can and incorporate the teachings, the whole practice will evolve.

That's a general point. It's not necessarily pertaining just to this note. But there's something about just diving in and trusting, and not trusting the mind that says, "Nah, this probably isn't right. I'll wait for something better." I actually expect that thought to come up most times. I expect it. And the answer is: okay, thank you, and then just get on with it.

So encouragement to trust. And even if we're talking and saying, actually, to be fully imaginal is more like this, not so much like this—don't worry so much. Just dive in. Get wet. Get your feet dirty. Get your hands dirty.

Play with it. Be touched. Sometimes you'll feel like, oh, you did a session. It was like, well, I don't know. Was that worth it or not? It's fine. You're exercising a lot of qualities just by engaging and working and trying to tune and paying attention. Do you understand? So trust. Trust your process.

In this question, should I have also retained a sense of the human self? Because she had become this bird, this bird of prey, as well as some other imaginal figure. Relating to both the bird and the imaginal person, they're both options. In other words, you could let yourself be completely that bird of prey in relation to the imaginal other.

Actually, you won't ever be completely the bird of prey. There will always be some kind of sense of, I know that I'm me as a meditator sitting here. I'm not like, oh, goodness—you know, like in Kafka's Metamorphosis or something. It's like, what am I going to do now? And will they serve me worms and bird food? Don't worry about it. There's always going to be some degree of the meditator witness watching.

But the options—you have the option of just going fully into the self becomes that bird. And then you can trust that in the infinite echoing of things, it will spill over into one's life in time, in its implications. It will have multiple meaningfulness and multiple meanings in relation to one's life and all that. So that's one option. Another option is to take this seat more consciously and watch the two of them. So it's a double image and they're interacting. And it's not right or wrong. They're just both options.

This looks like the same person, so I'm going to skip that for now. In the artistic story of the seven stories, beauty as a way to draw souls to new vistas is mentioned. I presume this beauty could include grief, fervor, depiction of harsh realities such as in war, et cetera, thinking of artworks of the past. As a sister of justice and truth, could art also inspire souls to action? Many thanks to you both.

So can art also inspire souls to action? Absolutely. Yeah, definitely. And I think there's more than one question there, but let's just linger for a second. Yes, there is. So it's funny. I mean, again, I'll give my opinions as an artist, but they're just my opinion. So, you know, it's me with the mic on right now.

But I feel that's one of art's functions. Absolutely. But it doesn't need always to be so obvious or deliberate. So I listen to a lot of music that has no lyrics to it, no nothing. There's no programs. It's just abstract music or abstract art. You think about a Rothko or a de Kooning or whatever. It's just abstract art. To me, if the art is deep and if my engagement with it is deep and it's touching me deeply, it makes me want to live differently. It does something to my sense of values. It does something to my sense of self and what I want to manifest in the world and what's important. It heightens my sensitivity. It opens my heart and my care. There's nothing in a Rothko where it's got three slabs of color.

How is it that those three slabs of color do something to my sense of caring for humanity? What's going on there? To me, it's part of the mystery of art. And then, of course, you get art that's much more programmatic or deliberately depicting something that's clearly trying to inspire action or political consciousness. That's great too.

Art and imaginal—they're almost synonymous for me. They're the same thing. And so you're going to get the soul being touched at levels that, as Rilke said, you need to change your life. "I saw the statue," and this depiction of the statue, and suddenly at the end of the poem, "you need to change your life." To me, certain music—it's all the same. It has that degree of impact. So absolutely, either in an obvious way or a less obvious way.

There was a question in the notes: beauty could include grief for the depiction of harsh realities such as in war, et cetera. Absolutely. So again, all these elements of the imagination that we talk about—all these elements—they're open-ended. They're medicine, and I have to drink it.

Typically, we took the examples I gave—for some of you, for those who weren't in the lounge earlier—let's take two or three of the elements of the imaginal: the numinous, love, eros, and beauty. Very easily we can think, "Oh, love is like this. This is what love looks like. It manifests in this form or in this form." But you can get a very stern kind of love, or a harsh kind of love, or a fierce kind of love. Those are faces of love that sometimes we forget.

What happens with the imaginal is if we can hang out and—again, not just believe what the mind is saying immediately: "Oh, this can't be right," or "It's threatening me," or "Well, this image seems to want to stab me or devour me or chop off my head or eat my intestines or whatever it is. That can't be love." Check it out. You don't have to do anything. But if you linger a little bit, you'll start to notice, "Oh, that's weird. It's this expression of my intestines being eaten. It's a certain form of love that I haven't encountered before." You don't often hear it in pop songs and things like that. But actually you can feel it in your being.

So a lot of this has to do with sensitivity. It's like your eyes get used to the dark. "Hold on, wait a minute. There is a kind of love here." And then the sense of what love means and can look like—the forms and expressions love can take—grows. Same with eros, same with beauty, same with all of them, in fact.

So yes, beauty can be terrible, dark, violent, apocalyptic, grief-filled—all of that. Actually, I would say grief, when we're relating to it in a good way, in a way that's helpful, has a kind of beauty in it. There's something about the way the heart is holding and feeling that grief that allows grief to be beautiful. Actually, it's even possible with anger and things like that. But definitely, yes.

Is that enough about that question? There was another one: "Can you say more about boundary? My image sometimes has clear boundary and sometimes dissolves or partly melts. When it's distinct, it's distinct. Is that the imagination before it becomes imaginal? Can a figure be sometimes imagination, then evolving into imaginal and back in one sitting?"

In terms of this last question—can a figure be sometimes imagination, in other words non-imaginal image, then evolving into imaginal and back in one sitting? Absolutely. Again, an image or an object in the world is not inherently one thing or another.

What makes it imaginal is the way of relating to it, the way of looking at it, the way of being with it. So in one sitting, certainly, something could start off as complete fixation, for example—here's this person and I'm really attracted to them and I want them and I this or that or whatever. It's possible, if I work well, that the craving and reification wrapped up there actually gets softened and transmuted into eros and the sort of theater-like quality of the imaginal middle way. And then the thing can become imaginal.

Or, for example, I'm with something and it's already imaginal. Then I lose my energy body or I get a bit reified about it and it becomes a real thing. And then I can just sense that some of the depth and dimensionality and beauty and mystery has gone out of it. When I said it will happen, it absolutely will happen. Eros will go to craving many times, and there are degrees.

Something that's imaginal becomes flat. Something that's flat is allowed to become imaginal again. No problem. The task of practice is to just recognize that, expect it, recognize it. Oh, what does it need now? What does it need? But you start to get quite sensitive to when images are flat images and when they're more fully imaginal in our sense of the word. So absolutely. And it's just a matter of, okay, now what needs tweaking? What needs supporting? What needs help there?

In terms of the dissolving and melting images, Rowan is saying there was an image, an imaginal figure, and it just dissolved into sort of water droplets by itself. And that was beautiful. Now here's a question: Was the beauty a soulful beauty? Or was it just kind of, oh, that's pretty? It was soulful, beautiful.

I don't think there's a right or wrong here. What you may want to be interested in is if that sort of thing happens all the time, then you might be thinking, okay, well, let's sometimes see if I can keep it back as a figure. But if it happens sometimes, you can just go with it. The image has changed, but the soulmaking is still there and the beauty is still there. And that's really fine. So again, your sense of the soulfulness at any time can lead you. If it's soulful, if it feels soulful, if the energy body is involved, if it's touching the being and the soul, then just go with it.

Can I share about the Aslan thing? On another retreat, Rowan was sharing that she had an image of Aslan, the lion king from The Lion, the Witch, and the Wardrobe. Sometimes in the meditation, what happened was that figure would kind of dissolve into a vast space. But that vast space was imbued by the character, the essence of Aslan.

This is, I think for now, I would like to keep as a sort of more rare option, but definitely I'm mentioning it as a possibility. It doesn't have—it's not a figure because the obvious form has gone, but it's still specific and it's still got the character of Aslan. So there's still personhood and particularity, even though it's not in the figure itself.

So if those things are there, you're still in the realm of the imaginal. It's great. It's just the form has changed. And so the job with the water droplets might be the same. Oh, is this now the same essence? Am I touched by it or is it a different one? Maybe it's a different one and that's fine too. Different feel, yeah. So then the job would be, okay, can I tune to that and get the sense of the soul of that and the practice would be the same.

Yeah, but you know those water droplets, they might then become alive in a way that water droplets are not usually alive for us. Does that answer?

Yeah, very good. So the question is, is it worth staying with a flat image and waiting for it to become imaginal or hoping or working for it to become imaginal? Or should you just wait for something that's obviously more imaginal? Experiment. I don't think anything other than experimenting. You need to kind of taste these things for yourself and taste what's possible and discover for yourself what's possible.

I guess there's a lot of stuff that moves through the mind that's just obviously flotsam and jetsam of the mind, but some of that, and as a technique sometimes, maybe as a last resort technique, but sometimes what passes through as a daydream, weirdly—you might be trying to be with your breath and then this daydream comes and it feels like that's just a waste of time—and then you start lingering with it, and it actually can become imaginal. So it's hard to tell in advance sometimes, but the more you do this, the more you'll get a feel of the potential of something.

Working with an image, I want to know more about it. This desire creates, discovers more details, texture, qualities of its particular face and manifestation. This particularity and its intricacy is meaningful, but sometimes ends up defining the image more and more, closing dimensionality and unfathomability. Still, the particular appearance feels precious. Could you say something about this balance, how to hold both?

I guess I wouldn't be from the beginning just convinced that it's necessarily the intricacy and the particularity per se that needs to somehow close the image or define it.

Let's just imagine I had a visual image and maybe it's a gate that opens, and I'm somehow moved by this gate. I don't even understand. There's something beautiful about this threshold and these gates. And then as I'm with the image, maybe the gates have those kind of filigree designs in them. And it's like, wow, like you get in some mosques and stuff like that. And it's like, wow, that's really beautiful.

The question really is whether the filigree itself feels soul-making or feels like a relevant, a soulfully relevant aspect of the image. So really what I want to navigate within an image—images start getting complex—and what I want to navigate towards is what feels soulful and soul-making. Everything else is kind of secondary.

Sometimes, especially if you're not used to working with the imagination per se a lot, sometimes the imagination is really not very vivid, and sometimes it's extraordinarily vivid. Like sometimes you could close your eyes and see every little hair on someone's chin, for example. Now, it might be that seeing those hairs is soul-making for whatever reason, but it might just be, yeah, okay, it's visually vivid, but so what?

So you have to kind of gauge what feels soul-making at any time. And that's what you kind of want to gravitate towards and linger with and resonate with.

But it might also be that the way that I start to pay attention to some element in an image or some particular particularity of an image is forgetting some of the elements of the imaginal, some of the nodes, or it's a bit too—I'm startled by the visual detail and I just kind of go like that. And then it becomes a kind of visualization exercise or a concentration exercise. Or it may be that in my relationship with it, it's a bit too craving. I now want something. Oh, yes, now we're getting somewhere. So there's something more in the subject pole rather than the object pole that's causing it to become flat a bit.

I often encounter images of a specific moment which has a quality of timelessness, but also encapsulates temporal circumstances. For example, two men drinking sake on a porch at night. I know that when they were young, they had some strong karmic connection, that they haven't seen each other for many years, and that something decisive is about to happen between them. Would you say such images have less soul-making potential? How to work skillfully with the narrative element which opens as I draw nearer such an image? Should such a situation be somehow personified so I can feel its love for me, for instance?

This is also important. Some years ago, I wanted to make a distinction between what I called an iconic image versus a narrative image. A narrative image is where you're going to do this, or this person does this, and then they do that, and then I'm going to do this—there's a narrative that usually goes toward either some great catastrophe or some great triumph, happily ever after.

I wanted to draw this distinction to point out that when we're practicing imaginatively, we're actually less interested in that narrative way that the mind uses its imagination—which can very often be like papañca, this kind of proliferative thinking, hoping, and so forth. We're more interested in images that have this timeless quality, where something is always happening.

However, what you often get are images with what I call a narrative backstory. This sounds like what's here—there's a scene, two guys on a porch drinking sake together, but there's an implicit backstory. That's fine. It's part of the richness of the image. That kind of narrative backdrop helps you understand something about what's already taken place or how it fits into a larger context. It's not a problem.

What's specific about this image is that it happens at this charged point—after many years apart, with their history, and before something else is going to happen. So the image is implicitly understood in a narrative context. The image is pregnant with this background narrative. It's contained within it, but it still has this quality of timelessness to it. This will happen quite a lot, and there's no problem at all.

Regarding whether such a situation should be personified so you can feel its love for you—I wouldn't rush toward something like that. Something's happening there. If it feels like there's some kind of soulful quality here, linger with it. You don't have to rush to think, "Okay, but where's the third node with the love and all that?"

Since you write fiction, this is the kind of thing I was alluding to earlier. There's nothing wrong with that—absolutely. It may be that your great masterpiece novel comes out of something like this. But when we're deliberately practicing imaginatively, we have a slightly different intention. We want to be guided and navigated by the compass of what feels soul-making. It feels like, "Oh, if I get too much more into the narrative, that's what I'm focusing on or interested in."

Then I feel it go flat a little bit. So, okay, what do I need to do? And sometimes it's just, okay, just that moment, just that. And what aspects of that moment—it's already quite a complex moment—what aspects of that do I need to feel the resonances with? And so much is about attuning, being attuned to the resonance, and then just lingering with those particular resonances.

So it's almost like just saying, put the brake on for now and just hover here. Like a helicopter or hummingbird or something, just hover. Like a hummingbird drinking—it's just hovering right there. And there are other flowers, but right here, this is where the nectar is. This is where the soul-making nectar is, and I hover with that.

And another time, you can have a very different intention, which is: now is my writing time, or I'm about to go to my writing desk, and let's just play and see and get the sense of what the story is.

Sometimes the shift is so subtle—it's a bit like when we were talking about the samādhi and that bird, that eagle. The shift is so subtle that it leans it one way, changes your direction one way or another, and changes actually the whole tenor and the whole feel of what's happening. So it's really, sometimes really subtle. We have to get quite subtle at this kind of really fine attunement to where the nectar is in any moment.

Question: "I have noticed that when working with an erotic beloved other, sometimes the image of self gets caught up in the soul-making dynamic, and other times it shrinks and solidifies and feels unworthy. In these moments, I have made the felt sense of unworthiness primary, giving it the most attention with my energy body and offering warm metta. This is soothing, but I find it takes me out of relationship with the imaginal other. Suggestions for other ways of working with this—ways of igniting certain nodes that keep the tuning and soul-making with that specific beloved other alive. P.S. Upon writing this, I am thinking it would be interesting to focus on the loving-being loved and humility nodes. Can I sense the image's love for me? I will try."

Yes, very good. You answered it.

Again, we're either very—in our culture, in some way or another—most of us have been or still are pretty wounded in terms of the sense of self. Or if we're not wounded, we're limited by the cultural view of the sense of self. What can often happen is some kind of shame or unworthiness is a common feeling in life for many people, in relationship and in practice as well, and in relation to an imaginal other.

Sometimes, focusing on the node or the element of loving and being loved would be really helpful. In particular, sometimes I would suggest to some people with this kind of question: what does the image do in response to your feeling of unworthiness? How does the image relate to that unworthiness?

So sure, you can actually—this is fine. It's like: stop, do some mettā, bathe in warmth, let go of the image, etc. But sometimes, an image again loves us in specific ways that we don't yet know how to love ourselves in those ways, or sees us with eyes that we don't yet know how to see ourselves with.

So it might be: I feel unworthy. I feel shame. Actually, I feel like I can't bear being looked at by this image. The image is gazing at me, and it's just too much. Well, maybe I say to the image...

I can actually bring my unworthiness, my sense of unworthiness, deliberately to the image. Or my sense of: I actually can't bear your gaze. I crumble in shame, or I want to hide, or I want to bury my head, or whatever it is. And I might say to the image: "You look at me like that, and I have a feeling it's good for me, but I just can't handle it. Or I just want to run away and hide," or whatever it is, and see what its advice is.

So the image embodies soul wisdom and soul gaze and soul love in ways that are beyond what we consciously know. So that would be another option—doing something like that.

So it's 5:34. Should we do a few more?

Yeah. Any suggestions or things to be aware of when I've done imaginal work with someone in my life upon engaging with the real person? So far, I've only encountered very healing effects on relationships or an intuitive knowing of the difference between the imaginal figure and the real, but it can still make me nervous.

I wouldn't encourage nervousness, but care with this. We haven't actually put out teachings overtly yet about—I'm not sure who wrote this, but I'm wondering if they mean actually working in real time with the other person, each becoming image for each other in real time?

Sabra's clarifying that you're not talking so much about what I just alluded to—which we haven't really taught yet, where two people are practicing in real time, each becoming image for the other and sharing that. That's a whole other level of practice which I wouldn't recommend at this point, generally, because it can get supercharged with all kinds of eros flying around and consequences that are sometimes difficult to control. But it has tremendous potential as a practice, and perhaps at some point we'll put out clearer teachings about that.

You're talking about when someone who's an actual person has also become an imaginal figure, and you're working with that image privately. Should you be nervous about that or take care? Yes, but I tend to be, at this point, more trusting and less suspicious of that than many people would be who might hear about that as a way of practicing.

Particularly if we incorporate all these other elements—humility, the non-reification, the imaginal middle way, the theater-like quality, even just the energy body—all this will keep it from being a reified, fixated kind of craving fest that then impacts the relationship in problematic ways.

I might even go further and say that to have a really deep human relationship—even if the other person is dead or doesn't know they're an imaginal figure for you—it has to involve the imaginal dimension. This would be a shift from thinking the real thing is the human, and the imaginal is some other non-real thing. But I think more and more that a really deep connection with another, when we truly love and value and care for them, involves their image for us. We have to know how to relate to that and how to handle it.

But if we take care of the elements and the sensitivity and practice, I don't think it will be a problem. Actually, I think the opposite. Sometimes people are forced into that kind of practice in relation to a person because they're an object of craving and reified, and they can't get over that. Then as I actually let them become more image—in other words, let them become more imaginal rather than less imaginal and more so-called real—as I let them become more imaginal, let it fill out and really work with that with the fullness of my being and everything we've talked about, they gain dimensionality and amplitude, and all the pressure comes off. The need for this or that to happen in the real dissolves.

It sounds like that's your experience, and I would say that's exactly what I would expect. Would I give that instruction to absolutely everyone? No, because I don't think some people are ready for that yet, and they don't have enough wherewithal practice-wise to navigate it. But it is absolutely possible. Sometimes it might feel a little hairy—if there's a lot of craving or desire for someone, it can get difficult. But it can be done, no question about it. And as you say, it can be very, very healing.

I would repeat: is that not the fullness of human relating and who we are? That we have these other dimensions—very different than how we usually think about them.

One more question. I was with the image of a gray-haired, kindly older woman who at first embodied sisterly and then more maternal qualities—this fierce yet tender, unconditional acceptance and love. After a while, I began to feel strong stirrings of sexual desire, maybe not directly towards her, but certainly in relation to her. This freaked me out, so I started to instead view her as a lover to avoid any Freudian monkey business.

I think we have a title for our next retreat: "Post-Radiant Monkey Business."

I have a sense all three women—older sister, mother, lover—are the same imaginal image, and yet I also feel they are distinctly different. Could this be the concertina node, or is this one image embodying all these qualities?

I don't know in terms of that bit of the question. What's important is experimenting, and also what's important is: where is the question coming from? By itself, it may not be that important whether they're one image or three images. You could try it one way, you could try another. It may be just a matter of hanging out with that figure or those figures, and in time it becomes clear whether they're one or three or both one and three.

I wonder if the question is coming from apprehension about Freudian monkey business. If so, that's where I would put the attention and say: don't worry about it. Freud's been dead a long time.

There's so much of this kind of thing—this apprehension, this hesitation—I've encountered it countless times. The mind that's been conditioned in certain ways can feel that such experiences are taboo, not okay, strange. "Maybe this will make me even weirder than I already am. Maybe I'll become dangerous to others." I don't think these fears are really worth our concern.

Again, if we can introduce even a little trust, just for a few minutes—the mother in the image is not my mother. Do you understand? She may look like my mother, may even be a motherly figure, but she's not necessarily my actual mother.

We tend to reduce everything to a particular kind of psychology, one heavily based on family dynamics in infancy. And while there's tremendous value in that work—starting with Freud and all that followed—it's also quite limiting. Once we enter these practices, we're stretching and opening certain boundaries.

Does the person want to say anything more? You don't have to, of course, but I wonder whether the question about whether they're one and the same is actually gaining its charge and momentum from apprehension as much as anything else.

If you do this kind of practice enough, you will, at some point, encounter something that's pretty weird by conventional standards. Some people encounter more unusual material than others, and that's fine—there are differences in personality. But we also need to check: Am I constraining myself? Am I shutting out certain possibilities?

This isn't to say, "Come on, I want weird stuff!" It's more about asking: Am I getting in the way of something here? Rather than steamrolling over fear, could I perhaps say, "All right, I'll play with this image for two minutes and give it enough trust. Maybe there's something here." I can feel that it's weird—okay. I can sense my apprehension, but there's also something soul-making in it.

If I can attune to that and decide on just a little trust—just two minutes of trust—and tune into the soul-making while working in the ways we've discussed, then what seems pathological or disturbing gets redeemed, becomes sacred. It might remain very strange from a conventional viewpoint, but you begin developing more trust in these experiences.

Well, it's 5:47. There's one more question, though I don't know what it says. We should probably stop.

What does it say? "There are three images that seem related and are arising together. I have played with treating each image individually, but the experience is much richer and deeper when taken as if forming a three-part harmony. The energy body feels more full and alive. One of the images is visual, the others are auditory. Is this an example of the concertina element coming alive?"

Maybe, but not necessarily. It may simply be a three-part image. Again, I would trust the sense of where the energy body feels alive and where it feels more soulful.

The concertina element is as much about the sense of pregnancy in an image—that there's this quality, in different ways with images, of more: more possibility, more otherernesses, more beyonds. So the concertina is, in a way, a pregnant sense of more possibility.

But simultaneously, the concertina is a kind of sense that this is not the reality. This image is not the one image, not the only image that can be presented. It's part of the loosening, non-fixating attitude that's present.

But it sounds like this is perhaps more like there's an image involving three figures, and they're in a certain kind of relation and harmony with each other—and that's the image. At least, that's how it sounds to me.

Yes, exactly. Very good. Thank you.

Let's just sit quietly for a minute before tea.

If you don't remember anything of the particulars of what we've said today, maybe just hold this—it's actually a phrase from a Dzogchen teaching: Trust your experience, but keep refining your view.

This applies to emptiness teachings, but it also applies to the imaginal. Trust your experience, even if it feels like "this isn't quite right" or "it's a bit different." Trust your experience and let your view refine with all this richness of teaching and sophistication and discrimination.

So trust, get in, get your hands dirty, play and trust—and refine in time.

CHAPTER 170

Eros and Desire (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 1h09

> In this Q&A session from the "Roots into the Ground of Soul" retreat, Rob Burbea explores profound questions about eros and desire in imaginal practice. He clarifies the crucial distinction between eros and craving, explaining how eros requires twoness—a maintained tension between self and beloved—while union dissolves this creative polarity. Burbea addresses concerns about whether any object can become problematic in erotic relationship, drawing parallels with mettā practice to show how the issue lies not in the object but in how we relate to it.
> The discussion covers the sanctification of selves, worlds, and cosmos through imaginal practice, which Burbea identifies as the primary purpose of this work. He explores how emptiness itself can become imaginal, the phenomenon of "walking in two worlds" where imaginal and ordinary reality interweave, and practical questions about sustaining imaginal experience. Throughout, he emphasizes that both eros and craving may share the same root—the soul's love of soul-making—but differ in how the lattice of imaginal elements is maintained or collapses into reification.

So again, apologies—I didn't really have time to order these questions into some sort of logical thread. Let's see what we can do anyway.

The question begins: "Not strictly on topic, but I'd love to hear your thoughts at some point. You've both emphasized the importance of the two-ness. On many occasions prior to the retreat, an image of an adventurer or warrior or samurai would arise. There would be two-ness, but often at some point we would merge for a while. I would normally enter them, as it were, and then become very active—slashing, fighting, jumping—with lots of energy arising in my chest and through my body. At times I'd be fighting soldiers. We would then eventually unmerge. Any issues or concerns with this merging?"

No. It's always hard to find the words for the different elements of the teaching. There are at least two reasons why we go on and on about this two-ness business.

One aspect of what we call two-ness is really about the balance of attention when you're working with an image, but also in a dyad with another person. As we've touched on, as many of you know, what can often happen is that we're not very free or flexible within that dyad, within that balance of attention when there's two. This is particularly true in human relationships.

We haven't talked about it so much yet in the teachings—we haven't put this out there—but there's a whole body of teachings about practicing live in real time with someone else, becoming image for each other in the moment, with all the eros and sharing that, handling that very carefully in a very formal way with boundaries.

On this retreat, we haven't done much, if any, but the last couple of retreats, we were doing quite a few exercises where people were in groups of twos or threes, sharing in real time what was happening energetically, emotionally, and then also, if they wanted to, sharing an image—which might have been something that happened yesterday, an image that touched them deeply, or something that was actually present right then as they were speaking.

Part of the reason we harp on about this two-ness is that in those kinds of situations, it can be very tricky for us as human beings, in this culture especially, to be in that relationship, to be in that dyad or whatever it is, or with more people, in a way that's actually fertile, that's not closed down, that doesn't lose myself because I'm over there, or withdraw over here, or some other aspect of my experience just shuts down. It becomes inaccessible, short-circuited, something becomes hard.

One piece of what we're calling two-ness is about that skill in twos, or skill in relationship with other. And one of the basic skills of that whole range of skills is just: can I have both my experience and the experience of the other? How fully can I enter into the openness of relationship and relational possibility there? It sounds really basic, but actually most of you know how difficult it is. You know what happens, especially when the person is looking at you, to be seen so directly, so intently, so upfront like that.

So that's one of the reasons we talk about two-ness, or rather what we're pointing to with two-ness and the practice of two-ness. But it's not really what the note's talking about.

The other reason is that eros needs two-ness. Eros involves what we might call an erotic tension. Some people define eros as the movement or the wish to merge, to unite, to become one. In the Western canonical tradition, that's a longstanding definition of what eros is. We're defining it somewhat differently, and it might all sound like nitpicking or quite subtle, but as I said, the differences in the realms that will open up are huge.

When we talk about eros, there is an attraction. There is some kind of movement towards, but the two-ness is retained. It's like two poles of a magnet that are attracted, but are somehow held apart. There's a tension there, and with that there's some discomfort. If the poles of the magnet collapse, you lose the tension. The physics analogy breaks down, but if you're in oneness, there are no poles of the eros. Do you understand?

What happens when there's merging and union is there's a dissolving, a dissolution, a fading of particulars. Everything merges into one something or other—whatever that one something or other is: one being with a capital B, one awareness, one love, one whatever. This is wonderful. Of course, in the range of mystical experience that's available to human beings, to taste that, to know that, to be comfortable with it, to dip in and out of that—priceless.

Most spiritual teachings will tend towards that, will point towards that and even raise it up as the highest possibility for a human being. I think what we want to say is that's great and wonderful, and we could talk a lot about that. You'll find many teachings about that that I've given and many other teachers have given. It's great, but there's a whole other avenue, a realm of possibilities that opens up when the two-ness is preserved and that erotic tension is preserved that would otherwise collapse or get dissolved in this oneness.

So when we come to that element of the imaginal, the two-ness...

I would also add the word particularity, or retaining particularities. So in this instance, the person, the meditator, is becoming the image. They think, "Well, where's the two-ness? I'm not two with the image. I've become the image. I've merged." This is not a problem at all, and it's quite a common way for images to arise. Rather than there being other, we enter them, or they enter us, and we become them.

What is still preserved, though, is particularity. It's not that in this instance the person enters this samurai or this warrior and then everything just goes blank. The samurai or the warrior still has particularities, is still differentiable from the environment, from the other soldiers they're fighting. They probably have certain characteristics, look a certain way, feel a certain way, have a certain character. So it's really that particularity we're pointing to.

The actual locus of the self-sense when we're practicing imaginal work doesn't really matter. There are no issues at all with this. Perhaps if you find in your practice that it's always "I am becoming image" or "I am entering an image," or if it's always other, then you might deliberately want to experiment with whatever the complement to that is. You could try retaining the image as other and play with being more deliberate about that just to see what happens. Or the other way around—if it's always other, it might be interesting to enter the image and become the image, to see the world through the perspective and experience of that imaginal being.

There are little tricks to facilitate this. I was talking to someone earlier—if the image is other, is sort of over there, sometimes looking deeply into its eyes allows you to enter it. You enter through its eyes. It's a little trick. And sometimes, curiously, feeling into what the small of its back might feel like is another way that can put you in its body. Why that works, I have no idea, but these are just little technical approaches. The main point is, if you find it's always one or the other, it might be interesting to explore.

We also had a question where there was this self and other, but they could become two others for a third that is the witness of that. There are all kinds of possibilities, and they're all good. You should feel free to explore.

"Is there any sort of eros in imaginal practice to be wary of? I am thinking of an image I had this morning that became eros for the self by the image of the self, if that makes sense. Is there any risk that this could become vanity or narcissism?"

So, no. We're probably used to feeling nervous about all this material, particularly about the object—what the object is. It's my girlfriend's mother, so that's a bit weird. Or it's myself, so isn't that egotistical? Or it's something that seems insignificant—how can you have eros for something that most people would regard as completely inconsequential? It could be anything, a glass of water.

We're mostly used to getting nervous about the object, thinking "that object's okay, but that one's not." I would say any object can become problematic as an erotic object, and any object can be entirely unproblematic. It's not in the nature of the object itself.

Is there any risk that this could become vanity or narcissism?

This follows on from other questions we've had, right? We talked a bit about this, and I would say no. We tend to get nervous around certain objects being taboo. In the Christian tradition, to have Jesus as an object of eros was completely taboo for most of the mainstream, but there were contemplatives who were deep into that practice of having Jesus as an object. It wasn't taboo at all for them.

If we take this question and replace eros with metta as a parallel question, what would you say? When I started insight meditation, no one was practicing metta in the 80s. All kinds of people, including myself, had apocalyptic, thermonuclear explosive experiences that were really unhelpful, and that actually lasted quite a long time. I moved out of the scene for a while—lots of therapy, other practices. When I came back, metta was a mainstream thing as part of insight meditation. People had realized, "Oh, this is really important."

In teaching metta, what they'd also realized is how important metta to the self was in the West. At that time, when people were introducing metta to the self, people were saying, "Well, isn't that a bit dangerous? Aren't you going to get self-consumed and self-loving? That's not a very good thing." Just the same. It's exactly the same. We're just not used to thinking this way.

As I mentioned before, we have a fractured, confused, ill-educated relationship with the idea of self in our society, so that something like this feels dangerous. Something about recognizing the divinity of myself in my particularities, my necessity to God, my necessity to the divine—it's not just that I am one drop in an ocean of divine light, just like every other drop. That is true; that's great, that's wonderful to be able to know and explore. But to know this being in my particularities as divine, as angel, with all the eros there—it's just not a concept that is supported in the culture.

The problem is not in the object of eros, whatever that object is. The problem is potentially when—if we translate it into the elements of the imaginal, the nodes of the lattice—it's when those switch off, or some of those switch off, and eros becomes craving and the imaginal middle way disappears into some kind of reification. When there's no humility, when there's no open-endedness, when there are not loose and elastic edges—that would be the problem.

In other words, it's not the object, any object of eros that's potentially a problem. It's, if you like, the kind of eros we could say. Or it's what's with the eros, what's in the field, in the relationship of that eros. Does that make sense? It's really, really important.

You will doubt all this stuff. Believe me, lots of doubt will come up. But something that may help is just making a parallel question with metta. So no, there's no risk—well, or rather there is a risk, but it's not because the self is the object of eros and has become a beloved, a divine beloved other. It's that the eros shrinks or something gets reified.

Would you say that on some level, the imaginal practice could be seen as a method of inquiry or contemplation and/or a way of gradually sanctifying selves, worlds, cosmos, thinking of the alchemical vessel and contemplation in mystical Kabbalah?

I would absolutely say that the whole point—the whole main point for me of imaginal practice, above healing, above reclaiming one's sexuality, above all of that—is as a way of gradually sanctifying selves, worlds, cosmos. That's absolutely the point. Anything else is kind of secondary, I guess is what I would say. I'm not quite sure what "a method of inquiry or contemplation" means specifically, but if that's good enough for now...

So absolutely, yes. That to me is the point. Of course sometimes the point can get lost because there's so much material and so much detail, and who knows what someone just glimpsing it from the outside might think. But to me that's absolutely the point—completely, one hundred percent. It may include lots of other good stuff on the way, but that's the main thing.

Lying out on the lawn earlier, my body and mind were full of knots and chaos and everything felt wrong. An image came of another me who was also my friend and also my lover. She picked up another different other me who was lying on some different grass in much the same state of unhappy contractions my physical self was feeling.

Now, I think I understand what's happening here. This person is lying on the grass, experiencing considerable difficulty. An image arises that appears to be herself, but this image is situated on a different piece of grass where another version of herself is lying, and the first image picks up this other version of herself.

She writes: "I'll call these two other me's—psyche—the landscape they were in as well." When we use certain words in this work, and I want to keep you on your toes here, many of them carry double meanings and are employed in different ways. The word psyche, for instance, we sometimes use interchangeably with soul, but we also use it to mean image. In this case, she's using psyche to refer to the image itself—two selves, both resembling her, along with the landscape they inhabit. That entire constellation forms the psyche, the image.

"The friend-lover me picked up the lying-down one tenderly, then threw her violently down onto some jagged rocks. She picked her up and threw her down repeatedly until every one of the thrown-down me's bones were shattered. I, the physical one lying on the Gaia House lawn, felt my energy body become the stage in which this all played out. So it was happening between them, those two other me's, but also to me and also inside of me."

This illustrates something crucial: it's not in the object itself. It's not in what the mind's first reaction to the object might be. The invitation is to hang out, to trust a little, to listen and feel and see what unfolds. If the mind jumps in too quickly—"Oh my goodness, now I'm going to start self-harming" or "I'm going psychotic" or "I'm splitting personalities—now there are three of me, one of them obviously a violent, raging psychopath and the other just a neurotic mess"—all of this is simply mind creating stories.

This is partly why we emphasize the energy body and sensitivity. When we speak of the nodes of soulmaking, one crucial node is that an image, an imaginal image, brings soulmaking. Partly implicit in this understanding is the invitation to bring all the sensitivity, as much delicacy and refinement of awareness as possible into being, into relationship. Because that's where you'll feel: Can I do this? Is this right? Should I follow this? You feel it in the body, you feel it in the soulfulness, you feel it in exactly what this person is describing.

Our minds have been conditioned in countless ways, and much of this conditioning operates beneath the threshold of consciousness, working in subconscious patterns.

"As I watched the scene unfolding, the physical and energetic knots and chaos I'd arrived with loosened and calmed. The more violent it got, the calmer I felt, and my energy started flowing more freely. I loved it." She continues: "I love them and I breathe appreciation for them, and my breath became like bellows fanning the flames of the scene, keeping it alive."

If I may extrapolate here, this person intuitively discovered a way to practice what I was describing earlier about attunement and lingering. In this case, it emerged through feeling into the breath as bellows, entering into relationship with the image through this physical, intuitive response. Now, I wouldn't necessarily have offered this as a formulaic answer, but she found it organically, somatically. "Ah, this is part of the tuning. This is part of sustaining and lingering with what wants to emerge in soulmaking."

Who could have predicted such a response? Perhaps it works every time, perhaps it doesn't. But one remains opportunistic, with as much openness, sensitivity, and receptivity as possible—all facets of one's being present and aware, ready and willing to be both active and receptive. And then magic can happen.

"It felt very personal—like who they were and what they were doing was meant just for me. And it is, it was. And the gift of it made me nearly cry in appreciation. There was an intimacy between us, me and the image, such that when the lunch bell rang and I opened my eyes, I felt I was kissing a lover goodbye. However, the image has lingered. I emerged into this lunchtime-at-Gaia-House reality, but I have not left the image behind, or rather it has not left me."

It still feels very close, and I can see it every time I blink or close my eyes. It's like I'm walking in two worlds. The imaginal one is somehow affecting this one, leaking into it, so that Gaia House and the retreat and all my anxieties and preoccupations are smoothed around the edges through having the image beside me, inside me, all around me like this. Our love—mine with the image—blesses everything else. Can you say anything about walking in two worlds like this, interweaving this world with the imaginal?

Again, all the details are necessary, but this kind of experience is exactly what I would expect in time. You could say that this sense of parallel worlds or realms have mirrors of ourselves and of this world. There's just one level of world that we usually share. So that tree exists in all the worlds, but at different levels. There are different levels of worlds or planes of existence or realms. So I would absolutely expect this kind of thing. Often it doesn't happen until a little further on, but there's no real linear order in this.

Immediately, you can hear in the very idea, in the very concept, in the very sense of it—there's all this dimensionality. This world suddenly just has all this implicit dimension. What that does to the world, to the sense of self, to the sense of care and sacredness—it's beyond priceless.

That as an idea, you will find throughout mystical traditions. You'll find it in mystical Kabbalah. You'll find it in some Islamic mysticism, this idea of levels of worlds. You'll get it in Buddha Dharma as well—talk about other worlds, other realms of being, the deva realm, this realm, that realm, and so forth.

The person isn't asking if there's a danger, but no, there's no danger. There's absolutely no danger. There's nothing in here that at all hints of "get away from this world, this world is not worth it, I'm off to that world." There's no escapism at all. Nothing like that. Instead, it does something—it fills out the beauty, the dimensionality, the sacredness, the poetry, the love, the eros for this world.

I don't know what to say other than just trust it, feel its beauty. There will be eros for this, tremendous beauty here, and how much it's touched the being. Because we love eros and all of that, you're going to want to linger with that sense. Sometimes it will come up very vividly for a long period of time. Sometimes—there's a saying I can't remember now—but you can bring it up deliberately, or it's just a hint, just the echoes of that experience.

But those echoes, those little moments, affect our sense of this world. And we can bring that back deliberately, just for a moment or two. It could be anywhere—you could be sitting on a bus, wherever. It doesn't matter. It doesn't have to be a formal practice.

Or it might just come by itself. But it's in the repetitions and those moments and those little tinctural exposures, and in the way we let them seep out—as in the note here, seeping out into the world.

So letting it seep out into the world, into the sense of self, into the sense of others, into the sense of not just the self right now, but also the narrative of my life. You understand? Remember, we're not shutting out narrative. We're not shutting out self in these practices. And what does it do when I then consider my death or the difficulty of my past or my problems or whatever, when I see it in the context of this multidimensional cosmos? Huge.

Another word we haven't used so much, but this would also be an example of cosmopoiesis in a way. There's an image, and that image begins, because of the way that it's working in the soul and in the psyche, to affect the self-sense. Obviously, there's an image there, so the image is already impregnated with soul. And then that seeps out into the very perception of the world.

When we talk about cosmopoiesis—poiesis is just a fancy Greek word for a kind of artistic creation, like poetry, like writing poetry. So poiesis. Cosmopoiesis means world-making, world-creating or world-discovering, cosmos-creating and discovering.

When an image becomes alive, sometimes it comes alive in a way that begins to spread into this world. The same world—with the trees outside, with lunch at 12:30 and dinner at 5:30, with everyone gathered here. Same world, yet also different world. This is cosmopoiesis. This world has been recreated through the power of the soul-making dynamic, through the tinctural power of that particular image. It spreads out into the land, into the grass, into the sky. Do you understand?

That's very, very beautiful. Thank you for sharing that. I'm not quite sure which to choose.

Can emptiness be imaginal? Yes. Does the person who wrote this want to say a bit more about their sense of what they might have been glimpsing or wondering about?

Karen is sharing that sometimes it's all a bit much to do imaginal practice—which is something we should have mentioned on that opening morning, but we said it this morning instead. Sometimes there's too much intensity, and we need balance. We could say imaginal practice is skillful fabricating, but what we want sometimes is skillful unfabricating. Samadhi practice, metta practice, emptiness practices—these are all unfabricating. They all quiet the perception, whether it's regular conventional perception or imaginal perception.

It's really important to move between these modes, in all kinds of ways. That movement can be very fluid, as we've touched on.

Sometimes Karen finds herself in imaginal practice, then goes to some kind of emptiness practice or contemplation, and finds at times that the emptiness itself becomes imaginal. There are actually many ways this can happen.

Let me share something from an interview, if you don't mind. I remember we were working with one of your particular figural images, and then it faded and there was just emptiness. There was a lot of bliss with that, and you dissolved into it—it was lovely. I said that was wonderful, and then mentioned there's another option: not to let yourself dissolve so much, but to step back a little and see the self in relationship with this emptiness.

By doing that, it's possible for a relationship to emerge between the emptiness and the self. The emptiness starts to feel like it's gaining personhood in a way, being in relationship to the self. The self too becomes an imaginal self. Does this make sense?

So that's a possibility—you're steering between pure emptiness practice and the quieting of fabrication back into something more imaginal. It's not better or worse, again, but I would consider things like: does it always tend toward that dissolution and dissolving bliss? If so, it might be good to explore something different. If it happens by itself, that's fine. If it always keeps happening that the emptiness fills with content, then I might think about how to keep it as a purer emptiness practice and go deeper with that.

The sense of emptiness itself becomes an object. If you love emptiness, it becomes a beloved object. Then there's a way of having an erotic relationship with that. If you preserve the self-sense a little—the twoness between them, the separateness—then that kind of thing becomes possible. All kinds of things can ensue from that.

So Karen is asking: is that a legitimate way to deliberately enter imaginal practice—via some kind of emptiness or quieting of fabrication? Absolutely. You'll find that in classical Buddhist Tantra, this is exactly how it's taught. You do the emptiness first, then you do your visualizations or deity yoga. We're a little more fluid in our approach, but it's definitely possible.

So any of those practices, because they fabricate less, they tend to loosen things. Now, if I go too deep, everything goes quiet—the imaginative faculty, everything, all perception will just go quiet. So it depends. Sometimes you can go deep and then come out. Sometimes you can go just a little bit if your intention is to do more imaginal work. But yes, that quietening loosens things, makes them more fluid. I used to use this phrase: "don't proceed until everything has become liquid"—it's an alchemical maxim. And emptiness will do that, but so will samadhi and so will metta. So you dip in and it loosens things, and then in that looseness, something can arise. So it's totally valid.

There's one more possibility I should mention. For many people who love the path and love practice and love Buddha Dharma and love the promise of emptiness and the teachings of emptiness—even when they don't fully understand it or love whatever glimpses they have—when they start to practice with emptiness or even aspire to practice to some degree with emptiness, emptiness or the unfabricated becomes an object of eros. "I want that. I want to know it. I want to move towards it." And one loves it. So emptiness itself, or the idea of emptiness or the unfabricated, becomes an erotic, imaginal object.

But again, with that, what else will happen? The self will get involved, because it's not just object—it's not just other, but self as well. So the self as practitioner, as one who aspires, as one who's moving towards that realization or that mystical knowing, as one who is supported by, borne along, nourished by the truth—that self, and even the tradition, all this starts to become imaginal. We're talking about fantasies of the path and that sort of thing. Does that make sense? So that's another way emptiness can become imaginal, in a more comprehensive way.

A participant asks: "I have a technical, practical, and pedagogical question about the distinction between erotic or soulful desire and craving. In my own practice and the work I do with others, I find universally that both flowers share the same root. So both erotic desire and craving share the same root—it just needs trusting and following back down the stem, or the onion needs a few layers peeled, to mix metaphors. The sacred jewel is always there either way. So my question is: in practice, what is the scope of usefulness or effectiveness of this distinction between eros and craving?

"Two things I see are: one, labeling a desire as craving raises a flag that signals attention needs to be paid to the subjective pole—has it collapsed and tightened around the object? How is the integrity of the energy body? And two, if that way of working is beyond the abilities of the practitioner in that moment, then a new object should be chosen. Or is that too binary? Any clarification is much appreciated."

I think for simplicity, I'd agree—they have the same stem. So craving and eros may well share the same stem. They're stimulated by the same movement. We could actually make a very fundamental postulate and say the soul loves soul-making. It sounds simple, but actually a tremendous amount follows just from that. So the soul loves soul-making, and eros is a part of soul-making. The soul has a natural inclination and movement toward soul-making and toward eros, toward impregnating things with its eros so that they can bloom, so that psyche can bloom, so that logos can get stretched—all of that.

You could put that as more fundamental than—just playing with ideas here—attachment theory or evolutionary theory about what's operating in a human being. I'm not going to argue about realities, but it might be quite interesting to actually place this as really fundamental: This is what souls want. And then what follows from that? What does it imply for developmental psychology, which operates from a very different set of assumptions?

But yes, for now, for simplicity, we could say the root is the same. What happens is we cannot sustain that—basically because of all kinds of reasons, but often because we're not taught how. We're indoctrinated in a way where we don't have these words. We don't have a word for eros; we just have words for craving or whatever. There are all kinds of taboos, all kinds of ideas about what's real and not real, limits on this or that.

So it actually becomes very, very hard for many reasons to allow the soul its love of soul-making and allow it to flourish—all kinds of ideas or energetic habits of constriction or short-circuiting or collapsing or non-attention or non-care. It takes so much. So many conditions need to be there to actually allow this soul love of soul-making to blossom into soul-making. But when it doesn't, we could say that one of the things that happens is it becomes craving—the eros becomes craving.

Now, where I would maybe expand a little on what this person has written: "Labeling a desire as craving raises a flag that signals attention needs to be paid to the subjective pole"—in other words, over here. "Has it collapsed and tightened around the object? How is the integrity of the energy body?"

I would probably point back to all of the elements. Particularly reification, and some of the ones that are more about the object as well. In a way, there's not really a difference, but it could be anything—anything at all in that sense.

But yes, a good working assumption, even if we take away the assumption that they're coming from the same root—and some people might think, "Oh, that's a bit much for me." I'm happy with it, but some people might find it a bit much—practically speaking, most if not all craving can turn into eros and be helped to become eros and open out into everything. And most eros can quite easily collapse into craving.

So the question as a practitioner becomes: Am I on the lookout for that? Do I recognize when that kind of thing happens? And do I have some things that I can do? One thing might be that all the elements of the lattice might be relevant—any of them.

Another thing—and I've said this before, but it feels important and relevant, so I'll say it again—relates to what we were talking about earlier in this session. Here's the beloved other, and there may be an enormous amount of eros there. So easily, all my attention and devotion and eros goes towards the other. And I unwittingly am not allowing the self-sense to be caught up in the soul-making process and not allowing the self itself to become an object of eros.

I think of this as a bit like some kind of circular tray or fountain. The eros is all flowing over there—the water is flowing all over there. If it's just flowing over there, it's going to tip the balance of this tray. It's precarious because it's all about the object.

If I allow—and to some people it doesn't even occur to them that actually the self can also be seen as divine—I'm so taken by the divinity of that beloved object. But if I can allow, and this may take some work, it may just be a matter of including the self in the awareness and remembering to do that—if I can allow the self to be caught up in the soul-making, in the imaginal, and actually allow the self to become an erotic beloved as well as the object at the same time, then what happens to this tray or fountain is the water is flowing on both sides and it's more balanced. It doesn't capsize.

Then if we extend that also—and this relates to some of the questions from before—if I allow it, it will also spread to the world. If there's eros for some beloved other, the self will also become—I recognize the divinity and dimensionality of self, the self becomes erotically beloved to me. And not with all images and not always immediately, but then that can also—I go out of the meditation, I open my eyes and just hang out there. How does the world look now when you've had a particularly beautiful or touching image? Check out the sense of self and the sense of world.

When you walk out into the garden after such a meditation, how does the world seem? This is another way in which this water actually wants to spread in all directions, and the fountain tray becomes much more balanced. Do you understand the point I'm making here?

One more element that can become caught up - and should eventually become caught up - in the erotic soul-making process is the eros itself. Self, other, world, and then also the elements of the self, including the eros.

So at some point, all this eros - whose eros is it? One looks through the soul-making lenses, through the imaginal lenses, and sees it was my eros, of course. But it's also divine. It's as if I'm somehow - I don't know what words we could use - the channel of God's eros, the divine eros, the eros of Buddha nature manifesting through me. And the eros itself, my eros, becomes erotic for me. Do you understand? All this is helping that fountain tray to become more rich, more full, more balanced, able to tolerate more flow and become larger.

But regarding the second point here - there are people I've worked with or known who ask me, "I want to do imaginal practice," and my sense is that they're just not ready. There may be mental health issues or all kinds of things, or a person simply isn't ready. Like when someone asks about practicing with someone as an imaginal erotic other - sometimes the person doesn't have the practice wherewithal to do this. It keeps getting rarefied and they have no sense of something that's not rarefied. Or they don't really have their energy body, or they can't tolerate much emotion. In such cases, it's probably not a good idea to try this practice. Perhaps another object would be better if one is attempting this work.

Catherine spoke about relating to one's own body as the beloved and an object of eros as part of the energy body practice. Could you say more about the fullness of this practice?

I'd probably want to hear more about what's prompting the question. Does the person want to elaborate?

When using the body as beloved, some of the nodes didn't really feel like they came alive. This will always happen with any object - there's really a spectrum when we talk about fully imaginal and not, and sometimes you don't want to get too hung up about that.

What I was thinking when I received this note was something I said the other day: sometimes what galvanizes and empowers imaginal practice is that we're dealing with something that really matters to us. If I just choose an object and think, "Oh well, I'll choose that. That's interesting. Let's see what happens," it might be that in that moment of relating to it, it's actually a fairly neutral object. You can do things and it becomes somewhat imaginal, but there's not a kind of soul need at that point for it to become fully imaginal.

So often, again, we go back to dukkha and soul-making. When there's some kind of pain - either physical pain or painful relationship with the body, whether it's about dying or ugliness or whatever it is - then there's enough in the crucible. And we still have to make it crucible-like, but I have to really feel the pain of the issue. Or it might be the other thing - that I'm suddenly struck by the miracle of body and gratitude to my body. Again, there's enough charge to start with to galvanize a process, and then there's more likelihood that the nodes fill out that way.

I'm not sure what else to suggest, but is that okay for now?

I've been trying to find a female representation of the qualities that eros stands for. To have a female archetype, goddess, or whatever figure would feel very empowering. Do you know of any female manifestations of this desire, longing, passion?

I can't think of anything straight away, but there's Aphrodite in the Western canon. There are all kinds of goddesses if you look in actual tantra. Ragarati is a goddess of the Guhyasamaja tantra, and raga means desire or lust.

Jung introduced and popularized the concept of archetype, but for him, an archetype was not a form. Aphrodite is not an archetype, nor are Tara or Quan Yin. They are not archetypes themselves. An archetype is a forming principle—it has no form of its own, but it shapes and influences this or that, including human beings. It's like a program, though that word is too narrow. It's more a style of forming, an intelligence that forms things in certain ways.

What this means is that as we look around the world—going to movies, reading novels, walking down the street, meeting friends or teachers—we see people manifesting certain archetypes. They're probably manifesting a mixture of archetypes. But it may be just as powerful and transformative to start tuning into this directly. This person, that movie star, that character in a novel speaks to me in a particular way. They embody and manifest something that attracts me. We can follow that attraction: what am I attracted to? I'm attracted to the divinity, the goddess or god energy coming through them.

This approach follows your own attraction. There are certainly figures you could choose—I'm not sure what else to say about that at this point. Often these things are more powerful when they come either as spontaneous images for ourselves, which will have more power than someone like Tara or Ragarati, or when we see them in someone else. We start to really appreciate how that person moves, something in their being that emanates and communicates something that touches us.

Again, it might be outside the box of our usual sensibilities and conventional acceptabilities. We have to be alert for what doesn't quite fit. For something to come up spontaneously, there may need to be a certain amount of emotion—even wish for that to happen, distress that it's not happening, or frustration. All those kinds of emotions can sometimes function as generators.

You could try both approaches. There may well be figures available—the Guhyasamaja Tantra has Ragarati.

_Student_: The word eros has a lot of masculine connotations and it makes it hard for me to integrate it into my being and relate to it.

Is there a word you prefer? Do you want to try a Sanskrit or Pali word? Like raga? Ragarati, this goddess, embodies raga.

It may be that the word is important. But it may be less about the word and more about getting glimpses and trusting what glimpses you have. Even if it feels like some of what you're feeling surely isn't what we're talking about—that's fine. I return to what I said about trusting. Just get a process going by trusting. You'll increasingly differentiate in your own time between the different kinds of desire or whatever we want to call them. But you'll know it more from the inside, from those glimpses.

You might look around at women who seem to embody or express something that attracts you, something that you feel has that quality.

I think we probably need to stop—it's almost ten to six.

That's fine. I return to what I said about trusting—simply getting a process going through trust. You'll gradually differentiate more and more in your own time between the different kinds of desire, or whatever we choose to call them. But you'll know this more from the inside, through those glimpses, and proceed in that way.

It might be that you look around you—in this case, at women who seem to embody or express something that attracts you, something you feel has that quality. Maybe.

I think we probably need to stop now, as it's almost ten to six. I'm sorry I didn't get to all the questions here. Should we have a bit of quiet at the end?

CHAPTER 171

Image, Ethics, and Awakening (Q & A)

Rob Burbea · 1h32

> In this Q&A session, Rob Burbea explores how ethics evolve within soul-making dharma practice, moving from foundations to organic roots that can grow and respond to complex modern challenges. He addresses concerns about consent in imaginal practice, explaining how the elements of the imaginal naturally create safety through sensitivity and the understanding that images are neither real nor not real.
> Burbea discusses the role of ritual in soul-making practice, describing how it extends sensing with soul to include body, voice, and worldly objects, sanctifying ordinary experience. He offers practical guidance for working with sexual eros, including techniques like expanding energy body awareness and viewing desire as simultaneously personal, impersonal, and divine.
> Addressing questions about meditation difficulties like 'dark night' experiences, he critiques approaches that prioritize rapid impermanence perception with narrow attention, advocating instead for the softer, more open approach of soul-making practice. The session concludes with reflections on the Bodhisattva path and authentic spiritual goals, emphasizing the importance of discovering what one truly wants from practice and life.

Just before Rob comes, I'd like to let you know how we're thinking about the possible endings of the retreat. First, if you've put your name on the list for an individual interview and haven't had one yet—and there are a good number of you—we'll hopefully offer a couple more tonight and tomorrow. If you're able to stay after lunch, we can see some more people then as well. If you want to check in around that or let us know when you're leaving and you're still on the list, please let us know.

I mentioned the other day that people who haven't had a chance to express their love and thanks to Rob in an individual interview, or if you had one and didn't get to do that, we'll make time tomorrow semi-informally in the lounge after the closing session here at 11:30. That's also room cleaning time, so that still has to happen, along with the books and everything else in the library. But in the lounge, Rob and I will be there, and if you want to have a moment—a minute or two or three—to have a private word with Rob, that's how you can do it, coming in and out of that space. Bear in mind there are lots of people here as well, so it won't be a full interview, but if you want to make that contact, there will be a chance for that.

We'll also do some other pieces around ending, of course. That's where the more personal and private part can happen in that way, but we'll have other forms in the ending of the retreat as well.

Tonight, one of the ideas we had—on the night before a retreat ends, often there will be a dana talk. On our soul-making retreats, Mark has done a fabulous job of offering dharma talks, as he does. Not because he's not here, but we had another idea this time, which we'd love to invite you to participate in. I'll set it up tonight, if you're up for it, where you're all sort of facing into each other with a space in the middle, semi-ritualized in a way, but where the dana talk is offered by the community. In the way that Lee Brasington does it, or some other teachers do it now, and we've done this on our Buddha Dharma Sangha camp where there's a mature community of practitioners—let's say there will be twenty statements of dana made. One person stands up or sits down and offers their statement, whatever is on their heart to say about dana. When they're finished, the second person who is called upon to speak speaks in relation to dana for this retreat and the staff and the ensouling—all of it. Then the third person. When twenty people have spoken, or whatever number we decide is good, they're not each giving a dana talk. They're offering the part that's in their heart. When twenty, if that's what we decide is the number, are done, then it is complete. It's a really lovely way I've witnessed and been part of. Rob and I wouldn't be here for that part. This would be yours.

That's not the only thing we intend for tonight, but that was one idea. Then we'll have something else tonight, and then tomorrow morning, sitting before breakfast, Nick will offer our staff coordinators' closing information. In the closing session here, I think it's at 9:30 to 11:30, we'll have some formal ending together as well. I know there's a part where some of you have written notes and would like a place where we can bless Rob. We'll see if that's part of it too.

Hello.

Again, I apologize, I had a couple of points and didn't have time to collate them into a logical thread of order, but let's just see.

"Is there a reason you don't have a ceremony of taking some form of precepts at the beginning of this kind of retreat? I would find such a ritual very supportive in the creation of boundaries and safety within which this beautiful work can take place. Thank you."

Yes, interesting. You're probably not alone, whoever wrote that. All the retreats at Gaia House are run with the explicit understanding that everyone here will be keeping the five precepts. That should have been gone through by the coordinator before the opening. The reason Catherine and I didn't do it is just because often it feels like with these kinds of retreats, there's quite a lot that we would like to do on the opening evening. We're conscious that people have traveled and we'll run late anyway. So in a way, we're looking to minimize what we do. If the coordinators can do a bit in their opening, there's just a practical reason to hand it to them.

Of course, for some people, a coordinator sitting up here and just reading a list of the precepts doesn't carry the same impact on the soul, on the being, or beauty as a ritual might. So yes, we acknowledge that maybe it's something to think about.

But more broadly, people will probably differ. If I speak personally—and not to say everyone should be like this at all, people differ—some people, I have heard them say that at some point in their history of Dharma practice and exposure to Dharma teachings, they formally took the precepts with such-and-such teacher or in such-and-such a place in India. Of the people who say that, for some it's clear that was really a turning moment in their life and they took that very seriously, and perhaps their ability to incorporate that as a turning point was due to the ritual and the ceremony and the way it was set up. For other people who have reported that to me, I see that they took the precepts and it didn't make much difference. They're still not keeping this or that precept.

So the presence or absence of a ceremony in itself doesn't really do anything. Again, people are different. That's really important. But if I think back, I heard my first Dharma talk—I had never heard any Dharma at all. I think I was...

19 or something in college. Probably memory's a little hazy, but I seem to recall the teacher just sort of talked for I don't know how long and went through the precepts and the Four Noble Truths and Eightfold Path in one talk. I was like most other 19-year-olds—ingesting certain substances, partying, you know—and I heard this talk and I stopped smoking cigarettes and drinking alcohol and everything, just there. I've practiced every day since then, apart from when I had that thermonuclear explosion thing when I was actually sent away from a retreat. But that wasn't for breaking the precepts. That was for being nuts.

So my point is that the presence or absence of a ceremony may help some people. It may do nothing. To me, the precepts are just a way to live. They're completely incorporated into my being. I would say these practices—any Dharma practice—totally rest on the precepts. That's what the Buddha talked about. We talk about foundations, bases, roots, and the precepts are a foundation. You want to start playing with all this super fiery eros and things like that when you don't have a really rooted basis in the precepts? It's not going to fly. Things will break. The vessel, the ship will fall apart on the stormy oceans.

So to me, they're just completely integrated. Maybe so much so that it's a blind spot and we should emphasize them more because it might not be the case for other people. But for me, they're just how you live. They're not saying how you be on retreat or off retreat, or "now we're doing something special." It's just part of how you live, and that goes with a commitment to kindness and compassion and care and sensitivity and all the rest of it.

This isn't in the question, but I would just add—so they form a foundation. I think I seem to have been absent every time Catherine seems to have gone through this with you, but the difference between foundations and roots. You've said that. Yeah, physically absent.

So anyway, there's a foundation. And then what happens to the precepts as the soul-making Dharma goes deeper? Or we should say this: what happens to one's relationship with ethics as the soul-making Dharma goes deeper?

When I first started talking about soul-making Dharma—I hadn't even thought of that word back then—the first couple of talks I gave were actually about ethics. "The Meditator Is Revolutionary" and "The Necessity of Fantasy." They were about ethics, climate change ethics and image or fantasy. They were probably way too long and complicated, so probably most people just heard talks about climate change, which is fair enough and fine. But part of the point I wanted to make—and I still want to make it—is that it can be easy and maybe even common for some Buddhist practitioners to look at the kind of things we're talking about and doing and worry about the ethics there. Or maybe not hear so much about ethics and think, "You're talking about all this sexual stuff and you have this violent imagery that you're saying it's okay."

What I was trying to do all those years ago is actually say, "Look, we have all this talk about ethics and we have these ethical commitments in the Dharma. Are there not gaps in them?"

Image is operating anyway, whether we have even heard the word imaginal or soul-making. So oftentimes the image, the archetypes that are prevalent and dominant and influential for a lot of Dharma practitioners are ones of passivity and equanimity. You don't get—especially in Theravadan Dharma—you get the picture of the Buddha like this: he's got his eyes shut and he's meditating. He's very, very peaceful and fine, thank you very much, while the world is burning. It's not at all to blame the Buddha or anything like that, but images operate for us. They're highly influential.

So what can happen—I'm not saying it always happens—what can happen is that then there are crises, and the range of responses or the range in which the self, the practitioner self can then manifest and embody forth or speak up or not speak up gets limited by the archetype that is unconsciously operating. Do you understand?

So what happens when we do soul-making Dharma? Everything gets stretched. The archetypes get stretched. There is the place of the troublemaker. There is the place of the person who will not shut up, who will rage, who bellows fire, who puts themselves on the tarmac and gets arrested—as some of you have been doing. It's just a different archetype. It's extended the range of archetypes, and in the extension of the range of archetypes, it's extended the ethical response.

So you say, "I'm okay because I'm following these five precepts," and there's actually very little engagement with ethics and very little kind of creative tussling with the wrestling—wrestling with the almost impossible questions and conundrums that we have in modern times in a globalized society.

I don't know where the hell this came from. What conditions was it made under? Who suffered for this and who profited? Yet I keep the five precepts. I don't have to say anything about sweatshops in Bangladesh or whatever it is.

I'm not saying there's nothing valuable in the precepts, but when the eyes awaken, we can see where there might be a kind of complacency. "Oh, I'm a good Buddhist. I follow the precepts." But there actually isn't that real wrestling with the deeper questions: What on earth are we going to do about climate change and species loss when there are seven billion people to feed? Most of them are in poverty. These are difficult ethical questions.

And if it always looks peaceful, if it looks okay, if it looks equanimous—maybe the heart feels a little something, but there's no real engagement—then we're missing something essential.

Soul-making, I would say, becomes the foundation of ethics. It becomes a root—something organic that can grow and nourish, like the root of a tree. But then that enters into difficult territory. I'm going to piss people off. I've pissed plenty of people off. I have to be okay with that and decide: Well, maybe it's the cost of the ethical—the price of pissing people off versus something else.

So that's one point. The second point is element number twenty-seven. This is actually one that I know—I think Marian will tell me I've got it wrong. Is it values? Yes.

So values, including ethical values and moral values, are actually implicit in images, interestingly. They're not immediately obvious, but they're there. Images make us ethical beings. Again, I was physically absent, but I think Catherine mentioned that when the word "justice" is spoken, more of the neural network lights up.

We have the human soul—the healthy human soul, let's say—and it has this love of moral values. I was planning to give a whole series of talks on ethics, but I got the metastatic diagnosis and have just been completely busy with that. I don't know if it'll be possible, but I hope so.

But the point is that values, including moral values, are actually wrapped up in images. They're there. And again, we can tune to them, turn them on, see what they say, get turned on by them.

And the whole question of values—look, humanity has been debating ethics and values since before written history. It's complex. It's one of these subjects that's so rich, it's unending and it's not comfortable. In other words, if you think you've found easy answers to ethics in your life, you're just not really engaging it as fully as it might be engaged. They're open-ended, ongoing, difficult questions that we wrestle with. And if there isn't that wrestling there, well, something else is going on. But it's not that full rooting or becoming root of ethics.

But going back to what I said before, the range is extended. So it doesn't just look kind of—speak softly and calmly and it's all very good at letting go and equanimity. It never says anything that might offend anyone. You think about Jesus or someone—of course it got him into a lot of trouble, didn't it? It didn't end so well. It depends where you put the ending.

But anyway, you get the point. To me, it's a really important area, and it's integral to what we're doing.

And if it isn't at the beginning, it will become so. It must, just because of how the soul-making dynamic works. It will pull these things in. They will become obvious. It will extend your range ethically and your ethical sensibility and moral sensibility, all that.

But yes, in terms of ceremony, we can certainly think about that.

Here's an interesting question. I actually don't know what... Well, actually, here's one that follows immediately. Can you see a place for ritual or a need for it in soul-making practice? And if so, where does it fit?

Absolutely. We usually have a few rituals as part of these retreats. Maybe less this time just because of my health and capacities and energies. But we're very keen on it. I think partly the function of rituals is, from a soul-making perspective, is that they start to... What's happening in ritual... Again, this is one of these subjects we could talk about a lot. But one of the things that's happening in ritual is that...

So when we meditate, it looks very still and the eyes are closed. And it's, you know, what's engaged? Mind, so to speak. And okay, experience of body, but action of body is not. It's still. And then typically when we meditate, we close the eyes. So there's a kind of shutting out of a lot of the sensory connection with the things of the world.

In ritual, one of the things we're doing is including the actions of body, the manifestations of voice, speech, as well as mind, and the objects of the world. And all that gets included, which doesn't usually happen when I sit silently with my eyes closed meditating on something.

So when we talk about sensing with soul and when we talk about this idea that the whole point perhaps, I mean for me anyway, the whole point of these practices and this teaching is to extend and expand the range of our senses of what is sacred, then ritual is very much a part of that.

I remember a beautiful ritual that Catherine led. Some of you were here. It was a few retreats ago. And I think it was this on the floor. And then she spoke a little bit about certain words and things. And we had these tangerines, if I remember. Were any of you here for that? For me, through the ritual, the tangerines right then, in that space of whatever it was, half an hour, they became sanctified. My sense of the tangerine was of sacredness right there.

So this is part of the function of ritual, that it starts to include the things of the world, the objects of nature and the senses, and supports and opens our capacity to sense them with soul, to sense them with sacredness, as sacred, including this self, other selves, bodies, the actions of body, the gestures, the movements, etc.

So in a way all the stuff we haven't done on this retreat, we did a bit of movement. I think we had three or four sessions of movement on one of the retreats. And again, the function is the same. It's really, look here I am fiddling with my hat or moving my hands. If I'm sensing with soul, this very movement of hands, it's just automatic when I blah, blah, blah. The very movement has this poetic sacredness to it.

So it's part of the function of ritual to make things like the ordinary movements or ordinary objects, food, tangerines, whatever it is, and sanctify them, bless the eyes, bless the senses that they can sense that way, sensing with soul. That's one of the functions.

So absolutely, I think there's a place, and I never used to be into ritual at all, and now I totally love it. Just, yeah, like I said, this retreat had to be limited, unfortunately, somewhat, but there's still time, so we don't know what might happen.

Here's the question I didn't quite know how to answer really, but I'll say it anyway and see what comes. Do you think any consent is needed before relating to someone as image live in the moment? For example, over soup yesterday I had a highly erotic encounter with the person sitting opposite me. My energy body was very alive and it felt soul making. Really, I'm very curious about what seeing others and self as image whilst interacting with them or live as it were in the moment can open up question mark the benefits, the risks.

Yeah, I don't know about the consent thing. I think that... So I don't know, that's my main answer is I don't know. But I can tell you the kinds of things I'm thinking is that if the elements are there and they're switched on, in other words, if it's really fully imaginal or towards that end, then there's no danger, there's no intrusion, there's nothing like that whatsoever. Why?

Because it's not real. It's neither real nor not real. And there's humility and there's the sense of divinity and there's love which implies a respect for the other person's being. And anyway, to perceive that way takes an extraordinary amount of sensitivity. So it's not that in the seat of that sensitivity one's going to be exquisitely sensitive to how beautiful they are and how much eros one is feeling and completely insensitive to another person and their space and what they might need. I guess it's possible, but it's highly unlikely.

So I think my answer is I don't know, but I would think that if all the elements are there, then actually it's completely safe. If they're not there—in other words, if a person hasn't really tasted it, if they just randomly pick a talk on Dharma Seed and start listening, "What the hell is this?"—and then they write to whatever the international Buddhist authorities are and say, "Do you know that there's these people in Devon?" That's all based on trepidation and fear, and the assumption that it must be unethical. But that's all based on just not having tasted it, not having understood. I think if a person really knows this work, then they'll recognize these elements and they'll recognize the non-intrusiveness of it.

One thing I've thrown out once or twice is this: when we talk about energy and energy body and the energy field between people, most spiritual cultures tend to think of that as a real thing. There are concepts like psychic vampirism—such things may well exist. But that's not what we're doing here. More importantly, I think when things really get going, the sense of the energy is neither real nor not real, not just the image, not just the object, not just the self, but also the energy. And that does something as well—it makes it unintrusive, uninvasive.

But if these pieces aren't there and you just hear a bit of this and then feel like, "Oh, basically it's just saying it's okay to do whatever," I would get a little nervous with that. So those are some of my thoughts about that.

A new question arises: "I am still very new to the imaginal practice. Could you outline very briefly again what it is that's important or necessary to pay attention to when just at the cusp of entering into a specific imaginal practice or when bringing in an image to be worked with? What are the important questions to be asked to oneself or the image? Is a certain amount of resonance, aliveness, or meaningfulness of the image a prerequisite to be able to work with it in the imaginal? Or can anyone be brought alive by slowly tuning into the elements?"

Again, the simple answer is I would point to the elements, and they don't necessarily have to be in a specific order. There are many examples where I might be sitting—maybe not feeling so well, maybe affected by medications, maybe not; it's kind of irrelevant. The point is that the mind drifts off whatever I was trying to do. There are bits of daydream floating around, and some of those daydreams initially seem uninteresting. But there are many times where for some reason I decided to take one of those daydream fragments and actually bring it in and work with it, and it becomes imaginal.

One that often works for me is music. There's just music going on, and then I work with that and very rich imaginal territory opens up with the musical daydreams that were happening. So it's not the object per se. It's more the way of looking, the way of relating. Everything that we've been talking about in terms of energy body and attention to the nodes, seeing if I can ignite this or that element, balancing, seeing if the self can get involved—all that will fertilize and support whatever is going on to become more fully imaginal.

As I said when I gave a short talk on the elements of the imaginal in that lounge, there's this tension, this kind of creative contradictory relationship between some of the elements. The very first element of the lattice is just the lattice itself. In other words, it's saying: look, it's not the object, it's the way of looking. Remember that. All these elements are part of the way of looking. Nothing is inherently imaginal.

Lord of the Rings movies are not inherently imaginal. I mean, they might be to someone, or they might be to someone in a certain state of mind, but they're not inherently imaginal. They have ogres and—I'm not really into them, so I don't know what else—princesses and wizards and elves and hobbits and this whole Middle Earth landscape. You might think it's totally imaginal, but it's not inherently so. Mythical content doesn't equate to imaginal. Imaginal in our language means the elements are coming alive, and the more they come alive, the more fully or authentically imaginal something becomes.

So what this means, in terms of this question, is that on the one hand you have this encouragement: it's up to me to finesse and work with and shape my way of looking, meaning my whole relationship with this object or image or whatever it is right now. Maybe in doing that, in that technical art—the art of the technique and the technique of it—it helps the most seemingly irrelevant thing to become fully imaginal. It was just this "blah blah blah" that went through my mind, but actually because the relationship has been worked, because I've done that actively, it transforms.

So you have that on one hand, the encouragement to be active, to say you can change the way of looking, you can play with the relationship. And if you do that skillfully and with art, you're going to create a kind of relationship in the moment that allows the image to become fully imaginal.

So you've got that on one side. On the other side, you've got element number I don't know which - grace - with the implication that, and maybe you've tasted this, a lot of these elements are to be noticed. So it's more like, it was a grace, it was a gift. I couldn't have made that up. I couldn't have choreographed it in the very precise way it mirrors my life or my dukkha or my situation.

So you've got this kind of inexplicable gift, grace, on one side, in a somewhat contradictory relationship with the encouragement to develop one's techniques and skills. But basically, I would point back to poise. There might be something in terms of that node of grace - a certain posture that's open to grace, that goes with humility and reverence. So a certain poise is very much part of these kinds of practices.

It's not all about "let's fix this thing," nor is it all about passive waiting. There's something balanced there. But if we're talking about grace, grace also requires a certain sensibility to open to it and to receive it. It's actually quite a delicate, beautiful, subtle poise of the being to be open to grace and to notice grace.

So there's a tension here. I wouldn't point to any one particular thing. It's often good to start with the energy body, but it doesn't actually have to be linear at all like that. I think that answers your question.

Now, someone asks: "How to deal with sexual eros in 'real' relationship after the retreat - for example. A bit of guidance is required." I have no idea what I'm trying to aim at with the response here without more specificity.

I wonder whether what's prompting the question is awareness that sexual desire can harm people. In fact, mostly when sexual desire is involved, at some point someone or other gets hurt in some way or another. And certainly there's the possibility of intrusive or unwanted or abusive sexual desire being acted out and being devastatingly harmful.

So I wonder whether the question is coming from a concern about that and therefore not quite trusting the soul-making practice and one's own capacity to tolerate eros, to be aware of it within this imaginal middle way, neither real nor not real.

Again, I would point back to more practicing and not encourage someone to practice with sexual eros if it actually feels like "I don't have the vessel yet to handle that." I wouldn't practice with it in meditation if it feels like I'm spending twenty-three and a half hours a day under the cold shower. You do need a certain capacity and therefore a certain skill with energy body, with view as well.

One of the things I mentioned in a talk was a list of things you can do when it starts to get really hot and it's almost intolerable, the sexual eros. One of them is expand the energy body. Why? Because eros is not a problem. What's a problem is craving. Craving goes with reification. Craving also goes with a contraction of the energy body. Every time there's craving, the energy body contracts. If you don't know this, study it until you absolutely know it for certain. A hair's breadth of craving and you can feel it in the energy body. Relaxing of the craving, the energy body opens. Open up the energy body and sometimes the craving soothes and that craving can then become eros.

So what often happens - it may happen more for men than women - is that sexual energy often gets contracted in a certain area of the body and then there's enormous pressure in that area. It can feel hard to contain and then we must act or release or this or that. But a really simple thing: practice, practice, practice. The more space there is in the energy body awareness, the more that sexual energy can actually fill the whole space. And like a gas, when it has more space, there's less pressure.

Did they teach you this about gases? So more space, less pressure—that's one very simple thing.

A much more sophisticated approach in this list—which I cannot remember now, but is somewhere in the Eros Unfettered series—is available if you're able to do it. Again, this will only make sense or be accessible if you've already done quite a bit of soul-making practice and imaginal practice. The question becomes: this desire, this eros, this sexual energy—whose is it?

Of course, the normal human response is: it's mine. I don't even think it; it feels like mine. Either I feel bad about it or whatever, but it's mine. I'm identifying with it, just as we normally identify with anything happening in the body.

Typical—or rather mainstream—Dharma can ask "whose is it?" and answer that it's anatta. It doesn't belong to anyone. It's not yours. Don't identify with it. If you take something happening in the body—let's say sexual energy that's uncomfortable—and you decide to see it as anatta, contemplating again and again that it's not me, not mine, there is this energy, there is this sexual energy, there is this discomfort, rather than thinking it's mine...

You do have the idea that it's yours—that's just the normal human way of functioning. But in the mainstream Dharma approach, one of the contemplations called the three characteristics is contemplating it as anatta, as not-self, not me, not mine.

What happens when I take any experience and keep regarding it over and over as not me, not mine? I know you know the answer. Come on, humor me.

It fades.

The sexual energy will go away. At first, you have to develop skill in this—it's practice you gain facility with. Initially, probably nothing happens. Then if you stay with it, what occurs? There's a bit more space, a bit more relief. You have a bit more distance from this sexual energy. It's not so compulsive, not so painful and difficult and oppressive.

If you develop your skill with that anatta contemplation and keep practicing it—whether with sexual energy, knee pain, or anything else—it starts to fade. The perception itself begins to fade. And so bye-bye problem, bye-bye sexual eros as well.

This is really, really skillful, really wonderful to devote time to developing that kind of practice. But the main point is not the relief it can bring in those situations. That's actually completely secondary—way down the list. What's much more important is what this reveals about emptiness and dependent arising in the long run, and that view.

So there's the normal view: it's mine—of course, I don't even think it, I feel it, I identify with it. There's the possibility of a traditional Dharma view of regarding it as not me, not mine. And then there's the possibility of a soul-making, an imaginal view, which sees this desire, this sexual eros—however hot and lusty it is, however uncomfortable and forceful it may be in one's being—as mine and not mine and God's. It's the divine's. It's Buddha nature's.

It's not just what they call a non-affirming negation—"it's not mine" without saying whose it is, as you do with anatta. You're actually entertaining a kind of triple view at once. Mine? Yes, of course. Not mine? Yes. And God's.

In other words, through this—through my eyes, through my lust, through my passion, through my desire, through my body, through my libido, choose your words—the divine eros is operating, is seeing, is desiring.

Is that an absolute dogmatic truth? No, it's a poetic point of view. We're entertaining a logos, a certain logos. And what happens when we do that?

A whole other level of beauty and soul-making emerges, but also the pressure comes off because the tightness of identification makes it uncomfortable. When desire is seen as part of the divine or Buddha nature, the problem dissolves while the eros remains—unlike with anatta practice.

This is quite a sophisticated approach, but it exists as a possibility.

Regarding the question about how to navigate sexuality or relationship after the retreat—I'm not entirely sure what lies behind this inquiry. Perhaps it concerns a long-term relationship and the level of intimacy, with one partner feeling called to open to another dimension while uncertain if the other is interested. I couldn't possibly address this without understanding much more about the specific relationship and its possibilities.

Like all retreats, even mainstream dharma retreats, we must be careful about what we, in our enthusiasm, attempt to impose on others—particularly those close to us who may not be interested, ready, or wanting what we've discovered. If you suddenly start speaking Greek to them lustily, it may not be well received. They might wonder what you're even talking about.

This work, like any retreat experience, requires tremendous sensitivity and care—both for others and for yourself. You're going to be deeply sensitized, primed. Certain profound soul desires will awaken and ignite, and we're essentially saying: let yourself have that, let yourself open to it—it's part of who you are. Everyone else here seems to be allowing that. But then suddenly you return to the world where this isn't the shared agreement, isn't the prevailing view. You encounter the old structures again.

So we must truly care for our own openness, sensitivity, and vulnerability, as well as that of others. I'm sorry I can't offer more specific guidance without knowing more. There's always the opportunity to ask again or write if you'd like to explore this further.

Lauren, could you share your question about image-sharing?

Thank you, Lauren. Could everyone hear that? I think this is indeed important, and it feels like a natural outflow of the richness of practice.

We've done some formal exercises in recent retreats where images were shared—not necessarily seeing the other as image in real time, but simply sharing images. Those of you who participated, or who might explore this through recordings, can sense how potent this is. We're touched by the poetry of someone else's image. Images can be infectious, shared. Often in interviews, someone shares an image and I find myself living that image right there, as if my perception of it is as valid as the person's original experience. Or it stimulates another image entirely.

If we had more time and capacity on this retreat, we would have explored more of this practice of working with another person, seeing each other as image in real time.

Two considerations arise here. First, if you're already with your partner and there's established intimacy, then you're working within that existing container. This avoids the complications that could arise if practicing with someone who's married to another or bound by agreements that don't include openness—where eros might fly around without appropriate boundaries. That's a significant challenge to navigate.

One reason I'm cautious about sharing some of this material is that I feel these teachings are so new and need safeguarding. Even if three people went out and practiced with great enthusiasm, crossing established boundaries, upsetting others, starting rumors—this could affect the entire paradigm. Guhyasamaja House might question whether to allow another Soul Making retreat.

I feel extraordinarily sensitive to the various ways this approach needs protection, especially at this nascent stage. Unlike the Buddha's time, or even when insight meditation arrived in the West in the 1970s, we now have the internet. Someone says something here, it appears online, and someone in California is already doing something questionable with it.

I feel both responsible and hopeful. In many ways, I feel dependent on and vulnerable to you all—not just because I might not be around much longer, but because we're all responsible for safeguarding this work together. It's so easy for teachings to become diluted or misconstrued.

and acted upon, either irrationally or without care, creating ripple effects that influence other people in this room who may have no idea what transpired. This is one of the reasons I'm somewhat cautious about these teachings.

I can't remember my other concern now—apologies, my mind has gone blank. Perhaps if there's time, we could record some specific teachings about this practice. I think it simply needs tremendous care. I'm sorry, I can't recall what else I wanted to say.

How does that sound, Lauren?

[Response: "Yeah."]

Perhaps at some point we can explore this conversation further. Let's see how things unfold. Did you want to add anything?

[Lauren's response about the richness and intensity of the practice]

Yes, there's quite a lot to say. The remarkable thing about this kind of practice is that it's abundantly rich—not just in terms of erotic charge, but profoundly rich in multiple dimensions. It's like turbo-charging the entire process, though this isn't always the case since sometimes there won't be that particular spark between people. But when it's present, it asks a tremendous amount of practitioners. It requires the capacity to handle great intensity, both within oneself and within the dyad.

[Questioner asks about Jung, Hillman, Nietzsche and whether soul-making dharma offers a smoother path]

This touches on the difficulties that meditators sometimes encounter, such as kundalini experiences or what Jack Kornfield describes as "dark night" phenomena. These are enormous topics that could easily fill hours of discussion, so I'll be necessarily brief.

Something struck me about Hillman's observation regarding Jung's early explorations. When Jung began his investigations, the Jungian tradition—perhaps less so nowadays, but certainly for many decades—used language describing the unconscious as this terrifying abyss of darkness populated by monsters and unknown threats that might emerge to devour you. This became almost a preconception, and as Julia asked yesterday, when you operate with such preconceptions, lo and behold, that's precisely what gets created.

Hillman, writing decades later with his characteristic sarcasm, pointed out how the unconscious had essentially become domesticated—something people simply journal about, no longer scary or overwhelming. So what's the truth here? It depends significantly on the conceptual framework we bring to the exploration.

Nietzsche presents an entirely different consideration, and I'm not certain he was truly engaged with what we're discussing anyway. Let's not venture into Nietzsche territory right now.

Regarding whether soul-making dharma offers a smoother or safer path, particularly concerning phenomena like kundalini experiences or "dark night" episodes—some of you may be unfamiliar with these terms. Jack Kornfield's "A Path with Heart" and similar books describe or borrow the term "Dark Night of the Soul" from St. John of the Cross, though he meant something completely different—utterly, utterly different.

The modern interpretation within Theravadan Buddhist circles has come to mean that when you practice insight meditation with great intensity and begin penetrating deeply, profoundly uncomfortable experiences arise. Disturbing and unpleasant phenomena begin manifesting, perhaps creating a sense of mental instability, physical illness, cycling endlessly through these difficult states. People have adopted this borrowed term "dark night of the soul" from St. John of the Cross, who intended something entirely different. Similarly, kundalini experiences involve explosive energetic phenomena, resembling the thermonuclear dynamics I alluded to earlier.

I feel quite strongly about this issue. Looking back at my book on emptiness, I realize there was so much I thought would be obvious if stated subtly and gently, but clearly it wasn't obvious at all. I should have been much more direct and emphatic.

I believe these phenomena represent complete misunderstandings and mistakes. Why? Because everything arises through dependent origination. If I feel ill from practice, it's because of how I'm practicing. If I feel agitated, sense I'm losing sanity, or experience cycles of depression, it's because of how I'm practicing.

These phenomena—whether kundalini experiences or "dark night" episodes—tend to manifest when two particular factors are prioritized in insight meditation: the contemplation of rapid moment-to-moment impermanence combined with an extremely narrow focus of attention, attempting to atomize awareness as much as possible. So when there's pain in the knee, the instruction becomes...

How microscopic can I get into those sensations? And how fast can I see them change? And the more microscopic and the faster I can see it change, the better my practice and the, quote, deeper I'm going. And with that, there's a lot of intensity of effort encouraged.

Put those three things in a box. What do you get? A box of mad frogs. Not for everyone. It also depends on the psychophysical type.

If I think about my psychophysical makeup—look at me, I'm even thinner than I usually am—I'm thin, I'm kind of wiry and wired and sort of hyper alert. This is the wrong body and psyche type to do that kind of practice. You get thermonuclear frog parts all over the place. And it's almost like you can just wait for it to happen.

You put someone else in who their body type—it has words in Ayurveda, I can't remember what they are—but they're more kapha. They're more plump and more slow, more grounded. That kind of person can often, and also their mind is not so fast and intense, that kind of person can do that kind of practice all day. It's not a problem. It won't do anything to them. Partly it's to do with the psychophysical makeup.

But what's also happening there is it's prioritizing impermanence as the main one of the three characteristics. And it's seeing anatta, seeing not-self, through the approach of impermanence. There is no self because all I see in here is impermanent things. And there are other ways to do it—you can find it all in the book or in recordings.

Then the whole insight practice unfolds very, very differently. I'm saying it now—I think it's a little bit ridiculous, to be honest. A lot of people suffer a lot or get really proud that they're going round and round in these cycles of misery as if it's some badge of accomplishment. And I'm really near to throwing up because it's really, really miserable.

So to me, there's all kinds of problems with that. But one of them, and probably in a way the most serious, is that the deep insight isn't there. One's just seeing impermanence and things are exploding or disappearing or going nuts or energies flying all over, whatever it is. But where's the insight into dependent origination? Where's the insight into deep emptiness? One has seen impermanence, impermanence, impermanence. It's not a deep insight. It's not the level of insight that I think is more beautiful, more mystical, more transformative.

When we come to our practice—and sorry, that sounds opinionated. I'm partly in response to, as I said, trying to say things so subtly and gently that it seemed like no one saw that they were there.

When we do this, we're emphasizing there's a lot of softness. Even when we say open the energy body, put the energy body in relationship with something, it's a lot softer than kind of burrowing my attention into some microscopic point and then just holding it there. So the whole inclusion of the heart and the sensitivity and this kind of encouragement to modulate and attune the attention—all this is soft and subtle and open. So that the path deepens in soft, subtle, and open ways for the most part, and it doesn't need to be all these explosions and difficulties and crazy, crazy-making stuff.

Is it safer? Heavens, why don't I just stop now while you're hanging around? Say yes.

Now, here's a question that went with a long question about the loving and being loved. Is it okay for the person if I read the longer note? How are they going to respond to that? Is it a yes? Yes, okay. So here's a longer version of it.

I partly don't know the answer to the main question, so that's actually interesting in itself. But it was such a beautiful image, and I just thought to share it. And I can answer some of it, if that helps.

"Late in the retreat, I know, so I understand if you cannot answer my questions. I feel moved to share an image anyway and trust that in its sharing, something will reveal itself. A logos of keeping what is sacred, safe and protected inside will be stretched by sharing this one.

"After the sharing last night, my energy body contracted in contact with the thought of Catherine and all the whispering angels' grief. This morning, an image arose of my sister, I think in part response to this, which touched me deeply..."

My sister is passionate, beautiful, with a soul that naturally loves soul-making. She is imaginative, highly sensitive—perhaps too sensitive and passionate for this world at this time. Since age eighteen, she has suffered from schizophrenia and is now completely housebound. The outside world is simply too impactful for her.

The image that arose: my sister lies curled on the floor of her flat. She is naked. Her features are not distinct, yet I know it is her. What strikes me most is the room itself—tall ceilings, a space that feels holy, sacred, like a chapel. The light is dim, yet there is luminosity. The colors are muted hues of brown.

Her body is twisted and contorted, indicating immense pain. But there is a sense that she is assenting to this pain, choosing to remain in this room, taking on the suffering of other souls who cannot or will not. Around her lies a chaotic collection of eclectic objects—crisp packets, popped balloons, rubbish, trinkets. I sense a bird building a nest around her, offering these objects to her. The bird is not visible in the image, just a vague sensing.

You see how much detail emerges here? You get the sense of an image, an aspect of an image, but it's not necessarily visual. It's all part of the imaginal. Don't get hung up on the visuals. The antennae are up, attuned to what's resonant. There's a bird, but I can't see the bird. I sense it, I intuit it. How do I know? I don't know how I know. It doesn't matter. What matters is the feeling of it and the sense of soul-making.

This image became like a holy altar. My energy body filled out fully, and inwardly I bowed. My heart center opened bright despite being moved to tears. Bearing witness to her suffering feels beautiful, despite—or even because of—the pain.

This image immediately opened my perception of the previous night and of all fellow retreatants as angels bearing their own particular joys and pains. The conception of individual suffering—theirs and my own, and what I and all of us have been asked to hold in this lifetime—expanded.

Already it's doing something to the heart, to the soul-sense, to perception. This is a new image, almost a snapshot in time, yet with a sense of the eternal.

My question is: where in this is the eros? Is it between me and the image, the holy altar? Or is there something in the bird's tendings and offerings that do not ease the pain and yet...? Or is the eros toward the poignant beauty in the image?

I would say all three. There is eros between the meditator and the image, toward the holy altar of this scene, toward its poignant beauty. But also within the characters of the image, there is eros. Most of the nodes are alight within this image.

But love and being loved? With a human or animal image, I understand this, but with a snapshot image—who is being loved? I feel love, but I'm sure I will figure it out if I stay longer.

I don't know the answer to that. There's definitely love in the image, and maybe you don't need to figure out where exactly the love is. It's so full of beauty, so much soul being touched. You can trust that. We don't have to think, "This is all going swimmingly, but there's just that one node," and then worry about it. It's working. Don't worry about it.

Maybe we'll receive some expansion of the teachings here that we haven't thought about yet. It's quite possible. As you say, you feel love there—there's somehow love present. There's love for your sister, so there's love that way. There's some portion of it already present, certainly between the characters in the image.

I don't know the answer actually, and I find that interesting. It may well be that as you hang out with this image, it becomes clear. I just wouldn't lean too much on that question, at the risk of disturbing the natural soul-making fermentation that's happening there.

Do you want to say more? It's beautiful.

It's ten to six. There are actually only a couple more questions. One asks: "What would you have called Eros Psyche Logos instead? Please expand a lot."

The notion that there might be a single word to replace these terms brings up something interesting. Actually, I'm not sure what I would have called them instead. The only issue I have with those words—I know some people resist the Greek terminology—but in a way, the Greek serves us well precisely because these terms are, to a certain extent, unfamiliar. This unfamiliarity prompts the question: "What is that? What do you mean when you say that?"

If we used words like "love" or even "desire," "passion," or "lust," they carry such common usage that we tend to think we already know what they mean, what their range encompasses. Giving these movements of soul slightly unusual names helps support that sense of inquiry—what is that? I don't quite know what it is yet.

I truly have no idea what I would have called them in retrospect. The only reason I sometimes wonder about using different terminology is what I mentioned the other day: these words appear in many different practices, settings, and traditions these days. As much as I understand about them, it's clear that we also mean something different by them. It's very easy, when using the same words, to assume the same meaning is intended.

This is less true with logos. Logos was once widely used in Western culture—it opens St. John's Gospel: "In the beginning was the logos," though it gets translated as "the word." That term carried rich meanings from Platonism and other traditions, but it's fallen out of common usage. The only place I encounter it now is in the Ridwan teachings, where they speak of "the logos of the teachings"—meaning the conceptual framework and paradigm of the practice.

So I'm less uncomfortable with logos simply because it's rarer and therefore less likely to be automatically categorized with what we might have encountered elsewhere. As for eros and psyche, I don't know—perhaps we could invent entirely new words, but I'm not certain it matters that much.

Regarding the lovely image of the sister, I don't think the question relates to the snapshot quality. That's simply a particular temporal style the image took. Some images appear as snapshots, while others unfold as narratives—like what Karen shared, where an image carried an entire narrative background. I don't believe this temporal quality relates to the question of love and being loved.

There's another question I didn't fully grasp yesterday, though the person asked again today. Let me read it, and perhaps you can help clarify: "To be willing to experience fully the grief of extinction of life on earth, of humans, of ancestors, and all the blessing of their particular lives or lines. To be willing to fully accept this also means to stay connected deeply to everyone else and their grief, rather than freedom from suffering. Isn't this the Bodhisattva path? I'm also referring here to the four-part talk you gave about awakening, asking what do you want."

Could you expand a little? I'm not sure I understand the question completely.

"There's something about when I've been in a very good place with positivity, I sometimes turn toward the suffering of the world. The myth of the Bodhisattva, as I understand it, is to not pursue full awakening—not seek freedom from suffering—in order to remain with the plane of the world, almost in solidarity with it, or in connection with it. What you described sounds similar to the Bodhisattva myth. When you asked 'what do you want,' what's important to me is staying in contact with myself. My sense was that's what you were doing."

Thank you, Ron. I appreciate that clarification.

I don't remember exactly what I meant in those talks, I'm afraid. But I do think one significant development has occurred since the Buddha gave his teachings. However some people might try to extract certain elements from the Pali Canon, the Buddhist teachings remain deeply embedded in a worldview that assumes rebirth—the possibility of being reborn according to your karma, suffering repeatedly until you awaken and escape that wheel of rebirth.

If we take that out, and a lot of people no longer believe in such a cosmology, then we're left with fundamental questions: What does awakening actually mean? When you remove this ending of rebirth as the ultimate goal, what you get is a multitude of different interpretations.

I feel it's quite important to be on a path that feels authentic. You need to be on a path—I need to be on a path—that feels authentic to me, that makes sense, that I can really get behind in terms of what I'm trying to do and what the goal is. So I don't know what I meant in that previous talk; it was probably within a certain context, and I don't want to hazard a guess right now.

But this principle remains: What do you want? If your sense is that this is what you want from your life—to be in solidarity, not removed, to be available, to be in service to the world and the planet and its suffering—then you should trust that. The question becomes: How can I support that? What do I need? How do I make this a sustainable path and a beautiful path?

Historically, even the notion of the bodhisattva has undergone significant changes across different cultures and over time, particularly now in the West. If you went back and read Shantideva or some of the original teachings on the bodhisattva path, he speaks of wanting to sacrifice himself for all beings. He expresses this through very florid poetry of renunciation and self-sacrifice. Then you turn the page to the next chapter, and he's saying, "Right, let's get away from all these people and find a solitary place where I can meditate and become awakened, where there's no one around and I'm not disturbed by anyone."

This idea was wrapped up in what it means to be a Buddha. In the Mahayana understanding, a Buddha is someone who—and this is really complicated—is somehow a transcendent being but has emanations here on Earth. Whether they're actually suffering or not becomes a whole question in itself.

Somewhere along the way, the bodhisattva ideal came to mean someone who would postpone their awakening—though this didn't originally mean that. More recently in the West, it's come to mean simply someone who sees their path as much about service as about meditation, or even more about service than meditation. That's what they want to do—they want to be in the marketplace, in the thick of things, in the refugee camps, or out on the pavement with Extinction Rebellion. And that's their path. There is a certain freedom in that—there can be.

So the word means something different now. But I think the more important thing is this: because the whole metaphysic is completely up for grabs these days, I would give the question back to each of us.

What do you really want? You don't know when you're going to die. You don't know how long you have. You don't know how long you're going to have your faculties and your energy. What do I want? Can I let that go deep and burn deep and stay steady with that, and have it translate into my life and make it a priority? That will be different from person to person.

We live in this predicament of postmodernity where there's no agreed-upon metaphysics. So you're free, basically. Now that it's not universally agreed that the end of rebirth is what awakening—full awakening, arahantship—looks like, the question becomes: What do you make of it? What do you want? What does it mean to you? What do you most deeply want for your life?

So I would give it back that way.

Just one very brief thing within that framework. You're going to notice—I noticed some years ago, this was more than twenty years ago, maybe around twenty years ago—I had been focusing a lot on jhana practice and really getting into it, making some headway and feeling super excited about that. I had been on retreat and was back home in my life rhythm, practicing. I would notice that on the days when the samadhi was really good, my heart didn't feel as tender and open as it did on other days. Sometimes when my heart was tender, those were the days when the samadhi wasn't so available—when the jhanic samadhi wasn't so accessible.

That really struck me. It's similar to what you're saying. In a way, we'd like to think there's this state of mind where you can just access everything and have it all right there, where everything's available and perfectly harmonious. I'm not sure that's how it works. It might be more fluid than that.

It's interesting to me that when the Buddha talks about right intention—the second factor of the Eightfold Path—he sometimes puts things in the negative.

He describes right intention using negatives - an intention for non-harming, an intention for non-cruelty. To me, this always implied the possibility that if I'm right there in the fourth jhana, I'm not actively doing metta. I'm not thinking about it. I'm not even that sensitive. But I'm in a state of non-harming and non-cruelty. It's an absence.

So I wonder whether he put things in the negative because he realized you can't be in any one state that's going to have all of that. What we want is a life that has access to these states - that they're never too far away, that you can fluidly move between them. If you're an activist, you need some deep resources. You need some recharging, some rest. And that samadhi, that experience of just being with yourself, is so helpful when you then go out and meet the suffering in the world, or when you want to do something courageous that takes a lot of energy and work. So the going back and forth becomes really skillful.

In a larger context, on a longer time frame, I look at my life and feel very called to serve in different ways. But I've also obviously been very called to explore meditative depths and that whole dimension. I've done long retreats. At one point I spent most of a three-year period on retreat. Even at the time, amidst all the joy and seclusion, barely speaking to anyone, it was always clear to me that this was a portion of a journey in the service of something that wasn't just about getting to feel good.

Some people have figured out a life that's kind of balanced, just balancing these things as they go along. If I look at my life - and I'm not saying there's a right or wrong, just different styles - I can see rhythms where it's much more contemplative and rhythms where it's actually a little bonkers, where I'm way too busy, but I'm in the flow of service or whatever. So I look more at that balance.

But anyway, if you're dedicated to serving and caring and compassion, to embodying and expressing that, you're going to need to take care of yourself as a minimum. So those periods when you feel a little less in touch - it's okay. When you're fast asleep, no one would say you shouldn't fall asleep. You need to rest. Things get turned off. The world gets turned off when you're asleep. We need that.

I would give you back the question: What is your vision of what's beautiful, what's noble, what calls you? What is the life that you feel, if you were on your deathbed looking back with a clear mind, you would feel you don't have regrets? Not that you achieved everything you wanted to achieve, but at least you went for it. That's important. And only you can answer that. I can't answer that for you. The Buddha can't answer it.

So that feels really important to me - to know that, to be clear about it, to stay close to it, to stay true to it, to live that with passion.

CHAPTER 172

Closing Comments From Rob - Soulmaking and Saṅgha

Rob Burbea · 18 min

> In this heartfelt closing talk from the "Roots into the Ground of Soul" retreat, Rob Burbea offers tender guidance on transitioning back from intensive soulmaking practice. He addresses the unique sensitivity that arises from imaginal work - how the heart opens in ways that require careful tending, different from the sensory overwhelm common in traditional meditation retreats. Burbea emphasizes the sacred nature of soul-touched experiences and the importance of discernment when sharing them, noting how precious insights need proper conditions and receptive hearts to be truly held.
> The teacher reflects on his own journey bringing soulmaking teachings to Buddhist communities, describing how he would call upon "angels and demons, past present and future" - an imaginal lineage of beings who supported this sometimes controversial work. He expresses profound gratitude as he recognizes retreat participants as now embodying this supportive lineage themselves. The talk concludes with an invitation to those feeling called to engage more fully with soulmaking practice - both in solitude and through deep saṅgha relationships. Burbea stresses that both soul and spiritual community require careful cultivation, encouraging practitioners to support each other's understanding while remaining rooted in thorough assimilation of these sophisticated teachings.

I'm not quite sure exactly what I want to say or what feels called forth. Thank you for being here. Thank you for your practice and all the beauty of your being that you've brought forth, brought into this space and shared together—shared with us, shared with everyone. We really deeply appreciate it. It's quite profound.

Just a practical thing about transitioning out of the retreat. These kinds of retreats have less silence and perhaps less of certain kinds of meditative intensity for most people, so that it's less the case that one needs to guard the senses and take care with sense contact and the overwhelm that you can get from certain forms of retreat practice.

But there may be other kinds of sensitivity. Some of you who have been on these soulmaking retreats before may have noticed that the heart and the being are opened in ways and available to be touched in ways that the world isn't so carefully set up to take care of or to acknowledge. So you may find emotions moving through, things might move you.

Just be aware of these kinds of sensitivities which are more particular to these kinds of retreats. If we'd done a different style of meditation, the sensitivity might be more sensory in terms of the intensity of contact. So really take care of the heart and the soul in the rest of today and tomorrow and in the coming days. What does it need? What kinds of contact does it need? What kinds of care? What kind of space? Maybe it needs solitude, maybe it needs certain kinds of sharing.

These retreats and their consequences in the being are a little different from other retreats you may be familiar with. So there's real encouragement to take care with that. There's nothing to be apprehensive about, but just care for the soul and the heart.

As I mentioned last night, there can be a great flush of enthusiasm for the whole soulmaking endeavor and your practice, and you may wish to share that with partner, family, spouse, friends at home. Again, just the encouragement to be sensitive there. What's right? What's needed? What does it mean to care for the other person and for myself?

We haven't done much sharing of images on this retreat together in the temenos space. Many of you will know that when something has touched the soul deeply, it needs care. You can't just spout it out to someone just because you have a history of a certain kind of intimacy with that person. The moment may not be right. Their state of being in that moment may not be right. They may not be that interested in that moment. You may be super interested and on fire, and they may not be. They may be polite and nodding their head with a modicum of interest. Take care.

When something is precious to the soul, it needs looking after. Even with someone you love, someone who has a history with you, or someone who's a fellow soulmaker—if we don't set it up right, the sharing, then it's like we're spilling our soul and it hurts. It hurts when that preciousness is not held in a temenos, is not met. There's no ill will, nothing like that, but when something feels sacred, it needs care.

So if you want to share, check the moment, check the conditions, including the other person. You can tell—just like a regular retreat—you can bounce in with your enthusiasm about wanting to share certain experiences or insights that you've had. Get a feel, sense whether this person is really interested. I mean, really interested. How is it being held and how am I holding it in this sharing? You can feel it in the eyes of the other, in just how interested they are. People who are interested tend to ask questions, they want to know. You get a sense that they're interested. Really, just the encouragement to care for that with each other, with people who are not here that you love, with whomever.

Catherine and I were really touched hearing from just one or two people—of course it may not have been everyone's experience—how beautiful and moving your dāna ceremony and talk was. Of course we weren't here, but it was really lovely to hear that and to get an indirect sense of it.

When I started speaking about imaginal and soulmaking in Dharma talks here and other places, it was difficult. For me, it was difficult. I felt like there was a lot of opposition. Some of you were in certain places where I came and there were eruptions and fracas and protestations—placards.

What's that? Placards, yeah. Picket lines. Really nasty notes, all kinds of things. And no, seriously, it was quite difficult, I found. I felt it my calling or duty to push through that.

I haven't shared this with many people, but I started to get the sense—okay, this is going to be difficult, this talk I'm going to give. I can sense that some people are going to love it, and some people really not, and some people will get upset. So in the moments before going to give a talk, I would open myself, tune myself, make myself available to the angels, the demons, past, present and future that wanted it to be given, that wanted it to be said. And that was sort of an imaginal practice, a way of ensouling the whole thing and giving me a sense of being on track and having the support that I needed—or in a way, handing it over to them and to that lineage of soul-making beings, whatever dimensions we're talking about historically and whatever else, and feel in a way that they were helping to give the talks.

Similarly, when I became ill over the last three and a half years—almost four years now—sometimes so tired and I had to do something, a podcast or this thing or that thing, and felt so depleted, again I would call on or align myself with that lineage, a timeless lineage, imaginal lineage, and entrust the whole process to that when I felt very depleted.

One of the reasons, I think, hearing about last night and the dana ceremony, and then I know that some of you went to the church—I don't know what happened there, but whatever. Yeah, you were praying. That's right. There's a sense, indirect and maybe more tangible, that you are those angels now.

Some of you, or those of you who will enter this more fully and take it on and explore it more fully—there's a sense, for me, that you're supporting the whole thing now. Does that make sense? So that's very beautiful and I feel very grateful for that. I'm very touched. There's a lot of delight in that and a lot of beauty in that and a lot of gratitude. You are that imaginal community now. Some of you—no pressure. If you feel that in the calling of your soul, in your being, in your togetherness. So that's something very heartening for me, soulful for me. For us, I think, if I should say, if I can.

And so, a couple of things about that. We've, on and off on this retreat, kind of wanted to put the onus back to you, to pass the buck back to you. For those of you that think you'll be really into this, some of you will just take little bits of this and maybe use a little bit in your therapy practice or some other thing, and that's completely fine. And some of you will be much more holy and wholeheartedly engaged and committed and in love and on fire and hungry to fill out these teachings and let them fill out in these practices and explore, and in the fullness of time, having digested what is really quite complicated, quite sophisticated, profound and wide, will bring your own creativity and your own beauty and add to it or make connections—I hope, and I hope that happens. I hope if it does happen that it's rooted in a kind of really full assimilation and digestion of what we've been talking about, before just sort of tinkering with adding it to other things or mixing it.

But again, there's this encouragement from us to, if you feel the calling, be a little proactive with that—alone and together. What do I need to develop? What is it that I don't quite understand? What needs filling out? What needs to become a more firm base for me and come alive that way? Where are my blind spots? What are the things that I just need to develop in order for this whole vessel in my personal practice to really be shipshape and able to sail on rough seas and meet whatever?

So there's this encouragement to really think that way about one's practice. And we can do that together. So we can certainly do it in solitude, in one's own reflection, in one's own practice, but also together—sharing together, studying together, learning together, supporting each other. It may be that certain aspects are clearer to one person and less so to another and vice versa. So to have that sense, the sangha sense of really being really good friends to each other.

If you feel that calling, if there's that opportunity, then what does that need? What does it need? How do we take care of these relationships? I've said this before—soul doesn't just happen by itself. Soul making won't just happen. There's a lot of care and a lot of conditions need to come together for that to happen.

Similarly, for Sangha to flourish—for the sense of community and deep soul friendships to deepen—conscious effort is required. Of course, we are thrown together fortuitously and gratefully and miraculously with people whom something blossoms with, but still it takes considerable work, sometimes very hard work.

So what does it mean to care for each other, to be good friends to each other—deep, supportive friends who explore together and open things together? This is the question before us if this feels like your calling and what you would like to cultivate.

Thank you for your practice. Thank you for being here. Thank you for your beautiful souls.

CHAPTER 173

The Way of Image

Rob Burbea · 1h33

> In this introductory talk from the "Four Circles, Four Parables of Stone and Light" series, Rob Burbea establishes foundational concepts for imaginal practice and soul-making dharma. He distinguishes between three types of relationship with images: fixated images (papañca), mindful observation of images, and truly imaginal images that embody the soul-making dynamic. Burbea emphasizes that imaginal images need not be visual, offering detailed examples of kinesthetic, auditory, and intuitive sensing with soul - from being kissed by an unseen presence to sensing oneself as sacred text. He clarifies how imaginal practice differs from shamanism, channeling, or energy healing, stressing the importance of the "imaginal middle way" where images are neither completely real nor unreal. The talk explores how foundational dharma skills like mindfulness, metta, and samatha can themselves become "roots" that grow organically within soul-making practice. Burbea discusses the spectrum nature of imaginal experience, where images can become "more fully imaginal" as practitioners develop skill with the twenty-eight elements of the imaginal lattice. He concludes with guidance on maintaining both precision and organic mystery in practice, trusting experience while continually refining one's understanding of what constitutes authentic imaginal engagement.

Good evening, everyone, and welcome to this series of talks. I want to try and cover certain areas in this series. Given the quite challenging conditions at the moment, let's see what's possible.

I hope in this series, after a bit of an introduction this evening, to go into certain aspects or areas of the whole skill and art or alchemy of imaginal practice, sensing the soul, with a bit more subtlety and refinement. I want to focus on the whole teaching of the elements of the imaginal—the nodes of the lattice—particular elements, and say a bit more about some of them. Perhaps, if there's an opportunity, I'll say a few things about soul making dyad practice, practicing in twos. Maybe something about ritual. We'll see.

Hopefully I'll address again, going into a little more of the philosophical underpinnings—the metaphysics, the ontology, the epistemology that are involved and necessary, if you like, as a basis or to clear enough space for soul-making dharma. Then also perhaps some reflections on the Dharma itself, meaning the tradition and our relationship with tradition and the history of that tradition, and how soul-making Dharma places itself or might be placed in relation to that tradition. And lastly, hopefully, something about ethics and opening up that area in relation to soul.

So let's see what's possible.

Tonight is basically an introduction. In a way, most of the principles I will talk about tonight are things you will hopefully already have heard, but they bear repeating, I think. Some of the examples may be new, but just by way of getting us going, placing us, situating ourselves again in the territory.

When we talk about the art or the alchemy of imaginal practice of sensing the soul, there's a lot involved in that. It actually presupposes in a way, or at least it involves, everything that we bring or learn in regular Dharma, mainstream Dharma. Everything we have to deal with as part of our Dharma practice is not outside of the constituents of soul-making practice.

Just as a person may be attracted to regular Dharma and come on retreat, for example, out of a deep attraction to the unfabricated—they may have heard something or read something, maybe not even using that language, but there's this pull, and that's the reason this particular person is practicing, that's the main pull in their soul, if you like—what do they find when they come on retreat and practice sincerely and wholeheartedly? They find they have to deal with, meet and work with en route to this realization and opening that they are longing for and enticed by. En route to that, they have to deal with, meet with and work with pain in the knee, monkey mind, their mother, all their psychological patterns and relational patterns. All that stuff comes up and it can't just be bypassed and avoided. It's, in a way, an integral part of the path.

Very similarly with soul-making dharma, we may have heard something about images or someone tells us something, or something attracts us, or we've tasted a little bit already and gotten excited and fallen in love with it even. But we still meet all these other, seemingly more mundane obstacles, difficulties, challenges, issues—areas of practice that need attention and care and exploration. So all this is, in a way, included when we talk about what's involved in the art and alchemy of imaginal practice, sensing the soul.

Recently we taught a retreat at Gaia House called "Roots into the Ground of Soul," and Catherine and I were talking a little bit beforehand about the difference between foundations and roots, since we'd had another retreat called "Foundations of Soul-Making Dharma" the year before.

If you think about the foundation of a building, it's something that's static—it doesn't grow, it's not organic, it doesn't itself provide nourishment. It's just there as a basis, basic to allowing structure and stability to whatever you want to build on top of that. So we can talk about various foundations of soul-making dharma: energy body awareness, basic mindfulness, certain insight practices, metta, samatha—the ability to calm and gather the mind and wellbeing—all these are foundations. Certain skill with the emotions as well.

Many of these, and even some of those difficult issues that I talked about—certainly one's mother or even monkey mind or one's psychological patterns, one's relational patterns, one's bodily difficulties—all of these too can become roots. A root is something that's organic. In other words, it grows. It's not a fixed, once-and-for-all structural thing. It grows, it changes. A root, if you think about the roots of a tree, grows, changes, provides nourishment. And roots are actually themselves part of the whole living structure.

So it's not necessarily that when we talk about foundations or basics of soul-making Dharma, you need this and then you can do the soul-making Dharma. Rather, all those elements, or most of those elements that seem like foundations, can then become themselves in soul.

It's one thing to be able to be aware of your emotions, to feel them in the body, to have some skill with them. All that's great and really indispensable, and we could say those are foundations. And at a certain point, if the soul-making practice is going and blossoming and enriching itself and filling out and exploring, those very aspects of emotional life, of the heart life, become roots. In other words, they become in soul. The whole way we relate to and conceive of and sense and work with our emotions and our emotional life and how that plays out itself becomes sensed with soul. Our emotions can become imaginal in the sense that they become images, they become erotic objects for us, if you like.

There's a lot involved in this, what we're calling the art and the alchemy of imaginal practice and of sensing of soul. We'll touch on some of this in a little bit more detail as we go through these talks, hopefully.

I think for everyone, actually, it's worth checking: just where am I with all these foundations? I've spelled them out before—the energy body skill and awareness, skill and awareness with the emotions, mindfulness, metta, samatha, and all this. Relational skills, just even emotional capacity—if we talk about emotional skill, many, many things are foundational. It's worth checking, or periodically reviewing and asking oneself: where am I with all that? How solid are my foundations? Which ones are a little bit shaky or actually not even there—that brick is missing in the structural foundation?

Because it does demand a lot, these practices that we're talking about, this whole soul-making Dharma. It does demand a lot, it asks a lot. We might hear things and be attracted, but it won't really get off the ground unless many of these pieces are there.

So, awareness. And also realization that as we grow in practice, these very foundations can themselves become transformed, can grow, ferment, rise like bread with yeast in it, and become fuller, richer, more multidimensional, more beautiful—all of that—as they become ensouled and drawn into the soul-making practices.

Okay, so I said tonight in this talk it's really just an introduction, but there are some things that bear repeating and reminding ourselves of. So it's worth taking the time to do that.

We use a lot of words, some of which are familiar sounding but used in a different way, and some will be very unfamiliar sounding to many people. Even words that are part of somewhat of a renaissance—the use of the word soul, for example, or imaginal or eros, words we use a lot. And to recognize, I think it's really important to recognize that we are using those words, words we share in common with certain other traditions today, but we're using them in very particular ways. And being clear about those delineations and definitions is, I think, really important so that certain directions open up that wouldn't otherwise open up.

So some of these words, like image or imaginal in the way that we're using it—it's hard to sum up what that is succinctly. Even eros, we could give a little formula, but it's something that needs, yes, a careful definition, but also then the living of it and the noticing of it, and it growing in us.

When we say soul, we mean something... We could give a short definition, a succinct definition of soul, which I'll do in a minute, but also to say with any definition we give, or concept we use, that there's a sort of dance on a razor's edge between precision and clarity and differentiation from other closely related concepts or other usages of the same word in different traditions. So there's that on the one hand, this need for clarity, precision, differentiation.

And on the other hand, the concepts and the words we use need to be able themselves to grow. So we don't want to pin something down conceptually or by definition in a way that's so tight that it then gets restricted and cannot be organic. So a word like soul has to retain a little bit of, A, space to grow, and B, a kind of fuzziness—what we call soft and elastic edges. So that's an element of the imaginal, one of the nodes you'll recognize, but it also applies to the concepts that we use as well.

So there's this dance on the razor's edge between precision, clarity, differentiation on one hand, and a kind of—let's call it mystery, an organic mystery, perhaps—on the other hand.

So, having said that, we could give a definition of what we mean by soul as something like the following: Soul is that which—we say looks, but really senses—that which senses in ways that are soul-making, or that increase soul-making. So soul is that which senses in ways that feel soul-making. And again, we'd have to explain what does soul-making mean. We've talked about that before—the resonances, the depths, the dimensionality, all that.

So soul, we're using that word loosely to mean that which looks or senses in ways that support and deepen and open and increase the sense of soul-making. And it's that which wants to look in these ways, wants to sense in these ways. So axiomatic to our whole paradigm is that the soul loves soul-making, the soul wants soul-making. And so when we talk about soul-making, it's that this organ of—it's an organ of perception, of sensing in the ways that are soul-making. And it's also an organ of desire. It wants that.

So we're including sensitivities and also desire and eros as part of this organ that we're calling soul. It's an organ of perception and an organ of desire.

So that's a fairly succinct definition, but it leaves quite a lot of room for growth, for different ideas and vantage points and angles on it.

So, for example, we can definitely conceive of my soul—that in me, if you like, that organ in me which senses in ways that open up soul-making and that wants to sense in those ways. Or we can talk about the soul. We could talk about a world soul or a cosmic soul that's operating in me or through me. There's different logoi, different ideas about whose soul is it, what's actually happening here.

Or sometimes, again, just to touch on dyad practice—and you might have experienced this either with practicing with a dyad or in a group soul-making practice—then actually there feels to be a kind of, if you like, soul of the dyad. And it's both independent and dependent of the two people that make up that dyad, or the people that make up that group. And this dyadic soul, if you like, is kind of a third. If you like, there's me, and this person I'm in the dyad with, and there's a third that seems to encompass us, but it's sort of separate, and sort of includes us, and we sort of include it—but that's where the soul is.

And again, we are, perhaps, as members of the dyad, constituent parts of that soul.

So there are different logoi—different conceptual frameworks—that we can bring to bear on how we're conceiving of soul at any time. These will either be opened up through practice, through experience, and also the different logoi, as we kind of take them for a spin a little bit, hold them, entertain them lightly, allow different kinds of experience to open up. So as always, there's a very intimate relationship between perception, experience, and conception. In this case, I'm drawing attention to how they influence each other. Perception influences conception. Conception influences perception. But actually, the intimacy is even deeper than that.

So we talk about soul, we talk about images. I'm going to speak about images tonight a little bit, but I'm not going to attempt some kind of succinct definition there. Let me offer just a few reminders of what we mean when we say imaginal.

We introduced the term "sensing with soul" as a sort of equivalent term or interchangeable term, but one that reminds us more of the possibilities that images are not necessarily just intra-psychic—something that happens with my eyes closed as some completely private object. So I could be looking at this lamp or this desk or this book, or my body, something that other people would agree is there in a kind of socially agreed upon perception. But the way that I am seeing it, I'm sensing it with soul. It has dimensionality. It has meaningfulness. It has beauty. There's eros toward it. There are all those other elements of the imaginal.

So when we say image, we mean intra-psychic, but also extra-psychic, if you like. I use "sensing with soul" and "imaginal" interchangeably, but the phrase "sensing with soul" serves as a reminder that we're not just talking about private intra-psychic images. We're also talking about perceptions of commonly agreed upon things—objects, situations in the world—which are sensed with soul, sensed in a soul-making way.

I'll leave aside trying to define eros for now. I've done plenty of that in the past. And there's a whole bunch of other terms, but tonight I think we just want to touch on image and imaginal.

Just to say that soul-making dharma also includes, as we've said, much that isn't obviously just image—all kinds of other aspects around that or that create a platform, a basis to allow that. And soul-making, in a way, also happens any time the mind, or the heart, the experience, expands its frontiers in ways that feel meaningful and enriching and deepening. Some of those might not be through images or sensing with soul.

Again, just some reminders, but I think they're somehow worthwhile.

So when we talk about image, mostly I use the word image to mean imaginal image, but I'll qualify that in a moment. When we talk about imaginal practice, despite some of the similarities, I want to really delineate it from shamanism, for example, and from explorations such as energy healing or extrasensory perception. There are overlaps here. The territory is not that cut and dry, but I really feel that it's worth carving out a very specific area that we're calling imaginal practice in differentiation from—despite some of the overlaps—these other areas. Because imaginal practice is quite rare, and it's rarer than those other areas. It's more likely that if we mix these areas of exploration up, the imaginal will be the first one that's lost, the first one that's diluted, and its power and its potential to open up certain doorways and directions gets lost because it's just confused with other idioms and traditions and explorations.

So despite some of the similarities and overlap—and I find these other areas very interesting certainly—I feel I have a duty to make clear what we mean by this particular area called imaginal practice in contradistinction to some of these others.

We're not talking about channeling. Imaginal practice is not channeling, it's not shamanism, it's not energy healing, it's not ESP, it's not seeing ghosts. It's not quite equatable with Buddhist Tantra either. Again, lots of similarities, lots of overlap, but not the same thing.

I'm not saying this imaginal paradigm, the paradigm of the imaginal, soul-making and that whole path is better or worse. I've said all this before; I'm just repeating. It's not necessarily more or less advanced or anything like that, but it's different in significant ways.

Again, if we assume that our soul-making, our imaginal path and practice is the same as any of those other areas, the particular avenues that come with the imaginal—the openings, the creation, discoveries—won't open. Because certain presumptions, whether they're implicit or explicit in the operating logos, in the conception of these other paths, even if I'm not conscious of them, will fabricate experience along different lines, along certain lines and with certain constraints. And in a way, we'll get off on the wrong foot or divert into some other area.

So like we said, there's a lot of overlap in words—soul and image and soul-making—but there are differences, especially in the philosophical view regarding ontology and epistemology and all of that. This imaginal middle way—neither real nor not real—is one of the key differences. And also the fundamental intention of soul-making practice and imaginal practice being what we call the fullness of intention: the intention for soul-making, if you like, above all else, including other intentions for healing and all kinds of other things. But this primary intention for soul-making, or the fullness of intention to include everything but paramount is the intention for soul-making. These are fundamental differences among others.

These are important distinctions. I don't know whether you can sense that this matters or not, but to my mind it matters a great deal and will, as I say, determine or constrain or divert what unfolds and what opens from practice—or doesn't unfold or doesn't open.

Sometimes too, people assume that anything with any kind of seemingly mythical element equates as imaginal. It doesn't in our teaching necessarily. Or that typical archetypes must be imaginal, or limiting the imaginal to some predefined set of typical archetypes. Someone was saying, "I have four imaginal figures: the king, the jester or the trickster, the ascetic or the monk, and the lover." These are obviously very classic kinds of archetypes and tarot card emblems, but almost stereotypes mainly.

But if I do that—if I limit myself to these four, for example, or any other four or five or whatever it is—I'm limiting the whole logos. I'm limiting what I mean by image. I will end up limiting my practice, as conception affects perception. And if the conception, if the logos is limited, it will limit the experience. It will send the experience and the interpretation of experience down certain railway tracks with not much possibility, or much less possibility, of moving off those particular tracks and into other areas—more open areas, more fertile areas, more multi-directional areas.

So there won't be, in those cases, if I'm limiting my conception of what's involved in imaginal practice, the kind of infinite and endless possibilities for eros, psyche, and logos that we talk about when we describe the underlying workings of the soul-making dynamic—this idea of endlessness of possibilities, infinite open-ended possibilities for the soul-making dynamic and the fertility there.

I know I've said it before, but I think it's really, really important. Yes, I have to say, also given my health situation—I'm probably dying soon—it feels very important to me to make sure that all these rich waters of different traditions don't just get mixed. Because in that mixture, something will get lost, and probably the first thing to get lost, being as it is the rarest, I think, and in a way somewhat unique, will be the imaginal paradigm, or what we're calling the imaginal paradigm.

I think it's wonderful to explore all these other territories if one has the capacity and interest. But one can do that and at the same time be really clear about what makes what what. What are the distinctions? What are the differentiations? How does that affect things?

As I said, when we use the word image, mostly it's a slightly lazy shorthand for an imaginal image, and imaginal means all those elements are involved—the whole soul-making dynamic is involved. I'm going to talk a little bit more about it tonight, but we can, if you like, make distinctions.

Sometimes we have an image of a situation, but we believe that image is true or real—really how things really are. We might call that a fixation or a fixated image. To be more precise, I want to delineate three kinds of relationships with images which determine actually whether that image is imaginal or not.

We can have a fixated image. Something happens—a person looks at me in a certain way, I have an image of that person, if you like, a sense of them. We also call it papañca in the Buddhist tradition. So that's one type of image, or image gone down a certain track into fixation. It's become fixated, it's become a real thing. There's not a lot of depth in it. There's not all the elements and the soul-making dynamic and potential there.

There's also the case where something happens and an image forms—let's say this person that looked at me funny and now I think they hate me or whatever it is. There's an image or a story or fantasy that's running in our mind about the whole situation, or about my narrative or my life, or why does this always happen to me, or I'm like this, or that person's like that. But in this case, in the second case, we're mindful of the presence of this image. We're mindful of what it is and what's going on in the mind. And because of the mindfulness, there's just a withdrawal of the credit, if you like, and the credulity of it. We're not believing it so much.

Yes, I notice that the mind is spinning the story, but because of the mindfulness—just simple mindfulness that we've all been trained in—we're aware of what's going on. We're not believing it so much. There's less identification with it. We're less lost in it and less believing it's true. There's some distance to doubt it or to doubt that it's completely true. So we can call that mindfulness, mindful observation or awareness of an image.

And then there's the third category: what we call imaginal. An image that has become imaginal might have started as papañca. This is really important. So it might have started as papañca, but because of the way we skillfully related to it...

worked with it, it became imaginal and opened up all those beautiful and enriching elements of the imaginal, the nodes of the lattice.

So in that, again, one of the elements is this imaginal middle way. It's neither real nor not real. And that's part of what it means to be imaginal. We naturally sense that. Rather than completely believing it or just completely dismissing it as an irrelevant daydream, just flotsam of the mind, there's this quite wide avenue of the imaginal middle way. And that's one of the characteristics of the imaginal. It's kind of theatre. And because of that, we're less lost in it, less believing it completely flat out.

So when we talk about freedom in relation to what comes up in the mind, certainly when there's mindfulness of an image and mindfulness of that tendency or the stirrings of papañca, there's a certain amount of freeing with respect to that image. But when an image becomes imaginal, there's also freedom, a certain freedom—much deeper, richer freedom in relationship to it. Whereas the mindfulness of an image disempowers the image, mindfulness of papañca disempowers papañca, when there's the kind of mindfulness that's involved in imaginal practice, when an image becomes imaginal, it actually empowers the image. So there's freedom, but the image is empowered, instead of freedom that disempowers the image.

There's also a way that mindfulness of an image in the second category tends to either disempower the image or just cut it, draining it of its life, or just holding it static. Whereas when an image becomes imaginal, it's allowed to be dynamic. And the whole soul-making dynamic with the eros-psyche-logos dynamic is allowed to infuse it and work on it and ferment it and expand it and deepen it and enrich it.

So we could make those distinctions in what we mean when we use the word image. But as I said, mostly when I say the word image, I kind of mean imaginal image—it's just a bit of a mouthful.

We also use the term fantasy at times. So how would we define a fantasy? Again, it's a loose definition. Sometimes I just use the words interchangeably—image and fantasy, imaginal image and fantasy. But in a way, I suppose I think of fantasy as something, an image that is a little bit secondary, if you like, or not so much in the main focus.

Usually when we're talking about imaginal practice, like, "Oh, this image came, this dancing ape," or whatever it is—this image, and that's an object, and so I'm focusing on that object in the practice, and I can decide how much or how little to focus on it. But fantasy is often something that operates more in the background. It's not the main focus. So fantasies inform our life, inform our sense of our narrative, but also our choices in life.

Where we love deeply, where we are devoted deeply, usually there's a fantasy there. We might not recognize it as a fantasy. In other words, there's this kind of imaginal sense of things and of oneself that's usually operating a little bit in the background until we become aware of it as a kind of image that we call a fantasy image. And sometimes we almost catch these, so to speak, out of the corner of the eye. They're not often deliberate objects of attention unless we really draw attention to them.

So for example, when we gave those talks about fantasies of the path, different fantasies of the path, in a way what we were doing was naming something, addressing it, giving some possibilities, and then lo and behold, people start to become aware of, "Oh, I guess this was the fantasy that was operating, and maybe this one could operate, and this one wants to operate," or whatever it is.

But unless you kind of get imbued with imaginal practice in this whole soulmaking dharma, one doesn't often—certainly in a lot of mainstream psychologies or mainstream Dharma—acknowledge that element, that strand of our soul, of our existence, of our way of sensing life so openly. So once we become more involved in imaginal practice, we start to see and start to sense our whole lives that way and become more aware of the fantasies that are operating.

Okay, so if we're again just reminding ourselves of what we mean by image, imaginal image—it really seems worth repeating. I'm aware I've said it many times, but an image is not necessarily visual. So the word in English tends to connote some visual object usually, but when we use the word, it doesn't necessarily mean something visual. Of course it can, but all the senses are involved, and sometimes we can talk about something imaginable, but we're not even sure what sense it's operating in, which of the six senses it's operating in, or all of them, or none of them, or something else, some intuitive awareness of something.

So I'll try to give some examples. A person—I think I gave this example years ago, but a couple of people have mentioned something similar—just meditating or just on retreat or somewhere else and there's a sense of being kissed on the mouth, but I don't see who's kissing me. And yet the sense of that kiss is sensed with soul. It's pregnant, it's full of all the beauty, the eros, the meaningfulness, all the other elements of the imaginal that we've drawn attention to. So it's coming through the tactile sense, the kinesthetic sense, for example.

Or a person was describing they were doing mettā practice, using the phrases and repeating the phrases, "may I be well, may you be well." And then she felt like her hair was being combed, as if the mettā was sort of stroking her hair. The phrases of the mettā were stroking her hair. So something's happening already with the sense of the mettā there. Something's beginning to ferment, to grow, to expand. And this sense of the mettā stroking her hair, like combing her hair, that then became a kind of image of being attended to by a maid and sort of readied for a banquet, she said. But none of this was visual. So it's just a sense. It's a sort of idea, but it's a lived, fleshed-out image, some of which is kinesthetic, and some is just a sense of an imaginal scene, if you like, of which one is a part, but it's not visual.

And in this sense of things, her heart is suddenly covered in armour. Numbness of heart had been something she had experienced and was actually concerned about recently. And so here, into the image, comes the sense of armour. And then, in response to that sense of the armour around the heart, the maid's hand came gently to touch the armoured heart. All of this non-visual, as an example. And again, the beauty there, the heart being touched, the emotional resonance, the meaningfulness, the echoing and mirroring of one's life—all these elements present without it being visual. The depth, the dimensionality, all of that.

Some of you might have been on a retreat at Gaia House—I think it might have been the Foundations of Soulmaking Dharma retreat. It might have been on the opening evening. We did an exercise, which I think Catherine and I led together. We were chanting the mantra of the Bodhisattva of Compassion.

Some of you who were actually there may not recall this aspect of it, because at some point we also began milling around the room and coming into contact with each other, and of course in the context of silence and strangers and people you love, it can be quite loaded. So it might have been that the instructions I was giving at the time got a little lost. But I'll explain what I said and why it's relevant to what I'm talking about now—the non-visual aspect.

So we were all chanting and we were milling around. And then I asked, if I remember: whose is this compassion? Whose is it? We introduced the chant with the usual radiating of compassion and care to oneself, to others, and so forth. This mind, this heart, this consciousness has the intention of compassion, of soothing, healing towards others, towards all beings. It's the usual way we would conceive of that—it's my compassion.

But whose is this compassion when we're chanting the mantra? In asking that question—because it's always mine, but with the words of the mantra filling the room, the space of the room in which we move, in which we're standing and moving, is filled with these syllables, with these sacred syllables and chants—whose is it? Supporting a sense of the mystery of it and feeling it kinesthetically, that we're in something here. Something is coming through us. Something is touching us from the outside through the sound, through the energy body.

Then we can begin, or a possibility is that compassion itself can be sensed with soul. It begins to have more dimensionality, more unfathomability. Again, these are some of the nodes, the elements of the imaginal. It becomes—we sense it as more than what we have conventionally and habitually conceived of it, how we have conventionally and habitually viewed it as basically a human quality or intention. It becomes something pertaining to the fabric of the cosmos, something that's coming from another level—the divinity or the Buddha nature of Avalokiteshvara. It's not just mine; it's coming. It has this dimensionality, this depth. It has an unfathomability. It has a mystery. It has beauty.

It's not visual. It's coming through the sound, but the sound itself is enriched and deepened through the imaginal sense that's opened through being sensed with soul. It has autonomy. In other words, again, it's not just me deciding to do the compassion, to generate this compassion. Yes, of course—wonderful. But the syllables themselves, the sacred syllables of the mantra, the energy of compassion has its own autonomy. It has its own intelligence. It has its own will. It has its own presence and its own origin. And grace—it's coming. It's not just me intending it; it's gift. All of this, and it's mystery.

It becomes unfathomable in the sense that however I want to, or however I tend to limit—well, I think I know what compassion means: compassion means something that wants to alleviate suffering, an intention that wants to alleviate suffering. Yes, great, wonderful definition of compassion. But as we start sensing it with soul, the whole definition—again, it's the soft and elastic edges—begins to ferment, to expand, to grow, to deepen, to enrich.

And this is not visual, so it's felt with the body, with the energy body, in relation to the sound, in relation to sounding and hearing sound. It's an aural and bodily sense, not a visual sense. So that would be another example.

notes or people tell me, "Oh, I don't get images" or "I don't see this or that." It may be worth giving a few more examples just to fill out what we mean by image—not so much by definition, but by example.

It's a long story, I suppose, but I used to be a jazz musician, and then I gave up. I was a composer for a while. I gave up playing, and then I became a composer, and then I gave up. I threw myself into the Dharma full-time. But periodically in my life, there are times where I feel grief. I miss music. I miss making music, I miss playing, I miss that whole world. Sometimes what happens is I just get repetitive dreams of practicing guitar or playing guitar, and they just come and won't go away. Sometimes I start playing again and the dreams go away. Then I stop playing and they come back. This has gone on for years and years.

So this was one of those days where I had been practicing a little bit of guitar, just a little bit, and then stopped, and then the dreams resumed. Again, the dukkha that went with that—the grief, or the feeling a little bit torn between wanting to get back into music but having other obligations and other pulls.

I was sitting with that in the morning meditation. It wasn't particularly intense, but I let my mind—or perhaps it was already generating sort of music in my mind—improvised melodies and lines and a picture of a guitar, all with the difficulty of the situation and other factors. But I let myself listen to the music. I let the music play in the mind. There's a kind of looseness and fluidity, and it begins to feel wonderful. It's beautiful and there's something powerful in it.

So again, it's a gradual transition. Something that was actually a bit of a daydream, that actually was involved with some dukkha, begins to take on other dimensions. It begins to grow as I go into what seemed like a daydream and pay attention to it with a bit more respect and reverence.

Then, at a certain point, I get a sense of music as a god—a pitch black, featureless god like black empty space, but somehow with many long waving arms, the way Avalokiteshvara has. But again, it's not visual. I can't explain exactly how I get the sense of those arms. If that aspect of the image—the arms—was prominent at first, it soon faded very much to the background. What became the prominent aspect of the image, and the aspect that was at that time the most soulful, the most soul-making—this instruction to kind of hone in and tune to whatever in an image feels the most soul-making, we'll come back to this.

This god definitely felt masculine somehow, and it felt like he has a claim on me. This god of music has a claim on me, on my soul and my life. In recognizing this claim and surrendering to it, I feel a relief and a kind of understanding. It's like I understand something about my life, about my narrative. My surrender to it feels to me like a feminine mode—I'll put those in inverted commas—as if I'm being taken, I'm taken by this god. There is an awareness that he is greater than me, much more powerful than me, this god, as all gods are.

All that feels very beautiful and blissful in my whole body, and particularly in the lower belly. I understand with it—it's not so much that it has to manifest materially. I don't have to be a musician again. I seem in fact not to be one of those chosen for that fully, or throughout my life at least. But I understand that this god Music—infinite in his possibilities—has a claim on me, almost as if from behind, so to speak, in the sense that it might not be the principal thing I'm directly focusing on or devoted to or attending to or working on. But whatever that principal thing is—Dharma or whatever—there will always be flitting in and out, with more or less intensity, the pull, the claim of this pitch black god.

Again, this teaching of the polydirectional pulls of the different gods and the impossibility of serving them all fully in the literal ways that might seem obvious to us.

So maybe it had just a suggestion of a visual element right at the beginning, but actually the sense of that—you could say what became image—I became image, or the sense of my narrative, myself, my narrative self became imaginal in relationship to this very powerful god of music. It wasn't really visual like that.

There was a time when these kinds of images around music and working with music—and the grief that I sometimes feel about leaving it—would appear quite regularly, and I'm working with it over maybe even a few weeks on and off. But it's quite hard to articulate how one kind of senses that. What sense is it being known through?

The claim of this god is like a kind of light or a shadow cast over my life—but I'm using those words metaphorically. It's from elsewhere, so to speak, permeating my life or like a canopy over it. The redemption, the opening up and the soul-making come in the relationship to it—in the recognizing, acknowledging, surrendering to it, seeing myself, sensing myself with soul, my narrative with soul and all that.

Some days later, there was another experience. I had alluded to it at the beginning of that description—there's a way of listening to music in my mind's eye, or rather my mind's ear. It's not necessarily crystal clear; it might be or it might not be. But then it opens up a realm of music, a cosmic realm, a space of abstract music—an infinitely fecund realm or world that is just music, just continual outpouring of music.

I've touched on this many times in previous retreats, this opening to an imaginal sense of a realm of music. Again, it's not visual here but aural, and even then sometimes the aural begins to fade and becomes even more abstract. Yet it's definitely music, definitely beautiful, and definitely a realm. This can open up a kind of cosmopoiesis in the moment with respect to the sounds that are actually around me—the birds, the wind, even the cars, people's voices. Very beautiful. The sensing with soul spreads to the whole environment.

Following on this series, some months ago I was driving to Gaia House, listening to music in the car. I wasn't particularly into what I was hearing; I found it boring and predictable. But something shifted, and I got a soul sense of my relationship with music—of music's claim on me, its power, its presence in, over, and through my life. I sensed it as refracted. Refraction is when light hits water and deflects, bending rather than following a straight line. Similarly, this music, this presence of music in my life, was refracted—not actual music so much as the image of music refracted or radiating into my life somehow. It was the image of music, not actual music itself.

Instead of feeling that subtle grief or disempowerment, that grieving for the impossibility of actual music in my life right now, there was an empowering emotion—as if this was exactly right, that I have other manifestations to steward, to give and receive right now.

Let me give a couple more examples of non-visual images. I had a dream about a dharma teacher colleague. All I remembered in the morning were fragments: the house where I grew up, something about the sun shining, a student of mine, and this colleague. She said, "You're going to die soon"—or relatively soon—"but you need to take care of your legacy, because there's a powerful possibility here that you need to tend."

Just these dream fragments. In morning meditation, I remembered them, then let them go. After they went, there was an imaginal sense of my dying soon, of not being here, being dead—not being present as a physical presence in the world. So there was a sense of absence. But this absence became a very powerful kind of presence or force in the world.

Again, there's no visual object at all. It's actually an absence, yet that absence had this imaginal sense to it. It was full of the elements—the neither real nor not real, the beauty, the infinite echoing and mirroring. For this to be imaginable in that moment, it had to connect with a recent decision and intention I'd made to study certain areas, including ethics in relation to soul and the nature of matter. Somehow that intention, that channeling of my will and energies, felt powerful in itself, but it fused with and impregnated with life force and direction that imaginal absence that comes from death. Again, not a visual image at all—very hard to articulate.

Here's another, quite recent—perhaps six weeks ago. I was being driven to the doctor on a sunny early spring day. I had my eyes open in the car when an image came of my chest opening as if it were a cupboard with two doors. But in the imaginal sense, it was more like what's called in Jewish tradition the ark, the Aron HaKodesh—a holy receptacle, a cupboard where they keep the Torah scrolls.

It was as if my chest was opening like that. I'm not sure it was really visual—more a kinesthetic sense with this association. It felt very open and blessed, with vague traces of the sense of my body as sacred text, like the Torah scroll. This is perhaps more idea than visual image, but it combined with a sense of straddling two worlds—the world of life and the world of death. I'm not even sure what I mean by that exactly. A sense of different planes of existence, of this plane of obvious material manifestation being just one among other dimensions that perhaps have a different...

cast a different light on death.

So there was a sense of myself then, with this probability of dying in the near future, straddling these two worlds, being somehow in both worlds at once—the world of life and the world of death. And with that straddling, tremendous softness and surrender and letting go and peace increased. The gaze, the way that I saw the world around me and the situation—the fields and the trees and the sky—was infused with so much sense of mercy and compassion and beauty.

It felt in that moment that all and any kind of gross level of clinging to life was gone. So it was really a sense of blessedness and peace. And it also felt like blessings poured forth from my being, from my chest, from my eyes. Something very, very lovely.

So those were two aspects: the opening of the chest and the sort of sacred text, the place of the holy scrolls; the straddling of life and death with all the peace and beauty that gave to the sense of things, all things.

And then the third aspect was a kind of immediate cosmopoiesis. Right then, the sense of the land that we were driving through was perceived as having its own intelligence, its own life in a way which I don't think I'd experienced before. So something quite new. Again, very hard to pinpoint. This land has intelligence—something I've touched on before, but the particular experience there was quite new.

All three of those aspects opened simultaneously, actually, were experienced together. I had maybe touched on each of them individually in the weeks before in practice, formal or informal, but they came together then. The eyes were open, the land was sensed with soul, the sense of death and my life and narrative—they're all equally important integrated aspects of that image.

I don't know whether we'd call that an intra-psychic image or not, but partly I want to say that it's not visual, and partly I want to give a sense of how images can actually become quite complex constellations in very lovely ways, fusing together different aspects.

Okay, last example of something not visual: sitting in meditation and letting my body sense lead with the whole energy body and that awareness, letting that guide the practice and guide me. And I sense in the meditation then that I'm being tended to lovingly by angels. Tender presences—they feel very feminine, but it's not visual. So it's just something that feels feminine there.

I'm not seeing them, I'm feeling something, I'm sensing something, but I can't exactly tell you what sense it's coming through. It's probably more kinesthetic than anything else, but even that is quite vague. The sensual detail is not clear, not sharp, not distinct, but the imaginal sense is very strong. This is what's happening: tender, loving angels are ministering to me. It feels very beautiful and very delightful.

It's not clear whether they are tending my corpse after my death—this sort of transition to death—or whether they're healing my still living body. Something about that uncertainty, is it this or is it that? Is it healing, or is it actually a sort of image of the profound tending and ministering to a corpse that's been through the trials and tribulations and wearing difficulties of life and illness, and now receives these loving, tender, angelic ministrations after death?

That uncertainty, is it this or that? It seemed somehow necessary to it. The answer wasn't forthcoming. It seemed like it wasn't right to ask, so I let it go and just opened to the ministration. So much love there, so much love.

Again, a sense—perhaps at this point becoming slightly visual, but not predominantly visual—of water being poured on me, like anointed or bathed, again with tenderness, with blessing, my body being stroked, water poured on my head.

So those are some examples of images that are not visual. And just to labor the point and to open up in case some people are still stuck on demanding visual objects in their imaginal practice—if we again just linger a little bit, what do we mean by imaginal? I'm just filling out some things, not everything, just a few things tonight.

Obviously we can have image as other, like I said—here's this dancing ape I am looking at, or seeing this dancing ape, this image. So the image is an object there. But also the self can become image. And that will happen anyway, as we've talked about. I want to go into that in a little more detail in this series of talks—how the self can and should get involved in the imaginal sense and become itself imaginal. But it could be that the primary image is the self, or it takes place here as opposed to an object seemingly over there in the psychic space.

So, for example, I was sitting in meditation, and there were many things that had happened in the last few days—a lot of emotional resonances and stirrings still present in the heart from all these different events. Suddenly, out of the heart center or the solar plexus center, came this image of a bare-branched tree, like a tree in winter, almost black. It grew out of my chest, and suddenly it burst into blossom—beautiful, radiant blossom. I was that tree, or rather that tree was in the place of my body. The image there is the self becoming image, and the location in psychic space is here. My body has become the image, as opposed to being an object over there that I'm looking at. Both are possible.

Another crucial element we've touched on is this node of create-discover. Images are created-discovered. One of the implications of this element is that it's actually okay if you deliberately invoke an image or deliberately change an image or deliberately bring back an image that touched you before in another time. That's deliberate creation, yet it's potentially just as valid as an image that comes completely out of the blue, unbeckoned and fresh, where it seems I did nothing to create it.

We tend to think that if I made it happen, or if I deliberately change an image, it has to be ego—and ego is something other than the unconscious, something other than soul. I don't buy into that distinction. I would rather say either way is okay, whether an image comes unbidden and surprisingly, seeming like pure grace, or whether it seems like something I've generated, or even following a guided meditation, or resurrecting an image, revisiting an image, re-invoking an image I've had before.

What matters, rather than who made this, is: Is it soul-making? If it feels soul-making, it doesn't matter that I've made it, that I've created it, that I just added something to that image or took something away or changed it. What matters is the sense of soul-making. Even if an image comes completely unbidden with all the mythical qualifications—"Oh, this must be an image"—if it doesn't feel soul-making, it's not, in our language, imaginal yet.

What matters is the soul-making sense. That's one of the nodes as well, because soul-making is what makes something imaginal. This is what we should use to guide us: Are we on the right track? This is also part of how we support an image to become more imaginal and to deepen—by tuning in to what actually feels soulful, what are the soul-making aspects of this image. An image is a complex thing. What parts or dimensions of the image actually feel soulful? That's what we should gently tune into, linger with, feel, explore. So this notion that "I shouldn't make something happen because that's ego"—I wouldn't put too much stock in that.

A couple of last things for tonight. When we talk about the nodes or the elements of the imaginal—or can we call them aspects of the imaginal, aspects of the lattice—at times we've used those three words: nodes, elements, and aspects. When we talk about them, it's not that we're discussing something that operates purely as on-off switches, though they are sometimes that. A node suddenly fires. Suddenly there's a sense of divinity, or suddenly the eros is there. Like an on-off switch or on-off setting.

But sometimes they're more like each node itself, each element itself, is more like a spectrum or more like a dimmer switch. When it's an on-off switch, it can feel much more passive—something that just happened, something that happened to me, suddenly something ignited. This switch just got flipped into the on position. When it's a dimmer switch, there's actually the possibility of our intention turning the dial, turning the dimmer switch. Or if we use the analogy we've employed of fire—this flame igniting another flame.

A flame can also have variable intensity—you can turn the gas higher or lower, add more wood to the fire. Fire is not merely on or off; it too has a dimmer switch quality.

It's helpful to envision the model of sudden sparking—a sudden ignition of one node that, in its sudden sparking, triggers or ignites the sudden sparking of other nodes or elements. This model conveys something of the quantum leap quality that can often occur in imaginal practice, whether practicing alone or with another.

At other times, however, the experience of individual nodes feels more like dials or faders. We can turn any one of them up by simply noticing it, paying attention to that node. This noticing itself—this kind of delicate attention without pressure—actually begins to either ignite it or turn it up, amplifying that element in the experience. Then perhaps the whole lattice, the other nodes, gradually turn up, or they may suddenly ignite once a certain threshold has been reached with the first element. There are many possibilities here.

With practice—gradually, with the development of skill and art in this alchemy of imaginal practice—we may be able to guide the relative balance of the settings of any two or even more of these dials, these elements. For example, attention to the energy body is an element that might remain as background awareness. We can turn up that dial and become more immersed in the sense of the energy body. Perhaps it becomes very pleasant in a certain way and takes us into jhāna, while the image as object relatively recedes into the background.

We can begin to alter the relative balance of these different dials, these different flames. With emotion, it might come to the fore or fade; the sense of real or not-real can come to prominence, or we can bring it forward by turning up these dials through our noticing or through tweaking them in certain ways.

This takes practice and usually time to develop such skill. It's somewhat similar to how I would teach insight practice in relationship to samādhi. We might be practicing certain insight ways of looking, and because they bring letting go and ease in the energy body—a relative unbinding of clinging and the knots in the energy body—that starts to feel quite nice. We can lean a little more into the awareness and enjoyment of that pleasant feeling in the energy body, taking us in the direction of samādhi, giving less priority to the insight at that point. We can play with any kind of relative balance between the insight way of looking and the samādhi.

The metaphor I've used previously is of a hawk or any bird of prey riding thermal air currents. When they change direction, it's a very subtle inclining of the wings this way or that—even just a part of the wings—and it takes them in a different direction. It's as if they're picking up opportunistically on currents already there. We pick up on currents already present—flames, thermals, if you like—that are already there in imaginal practice or in insight-samādhi practice. With just the subtlest realignment through attention, we change the direction of practice.

I wanted to be clear about what we mean by "imaginal" by explaining the elements, the twenty-eight factors and so forth. But it's also important to recognize that it's not so black and white. We can speak of something becoming more fully imaginal or more authentically imaginal. Again, there's a spectrum here—from, say, fantasy on one side, through something having more and more of these elements, a richer and deeper involvement of each element, becoming more and more fully imaginal.

Partly this describes the unfolding experience itself, but I also say this for pedagogical reasons. Some people hear these teachings and think, "I don't know, maybe I've never had an imaginal experience." Another kind of person, or the same person at a different time, might automatically assume that any image they have is imaginal in the sense we're meaning.

So much about teaching is contextual and relative to each student or each student at a certain time. There's this middle way where we recognize a spectrum, where we can talk about becoming more fully imaginal. This means: don't necessarily believe, if you have a tendency to think, "I don't know what Rob and Catherine are talking about. I don't think I've ever had such an experience. I probably never will. I don't know this and I can't do that," and so on. Trust that you're on a spectrum and you can grow. The experiences can grow; the explorations can develop more and more into what we call the fully or authentically imaginal.

For the other kind of person, these teachings about the nodes might be important to say: hold on, if you think something's imaginal, just check—does it have all these other factors, all these other elements? Because that's what we mean. What you're calling imaginal may not actually be fully what we mean yet, or what's possible in the directions we're discussing.

It's tricky as a teacher, obviously tricky as a student, but thinking of it as a spectrum is helpful in all kinds of ways.

There's a saying from the Dzogchen tradition: "Trust your experience, but keep refining your view." In the Dzogchen tradition, this relates to the view of Dzogchen or a certain emptiness view. Trust your experience, but keep refining your view. There's so much wisdom in that.

This goes for imaginal practice, it goes also for emptiness practices. We have certain experiences, a certain level of insight, and it may well be—it often is—that they can be deepened. That level of understanding or insight, that level of experience, if you like, can be deepened and enriched. So I'm not throwing out my experiences of images or imagination. I'm trusting that, but I keep refining my view. What else is there? What's different here? What might I not be seeing? What's possible? What are some of these other elements that I maybe haven't experienced or incorporated or understood yet? So trust your experience and keep refining your view.

I'm also reminded of Ajahn Chah talking one time. He said, you know, as a teacher, I'm like someone walking beside my students as they walk down the road, and there are ditches on each side of the road—trenches on each side of the road. And if I see a student veering too much to the left and in danger of falling in that ditch, I say, "Go right, go right, move to the right." And if that same student or another student looks like at a certain time they're in danger of falling into the ditch on the right-hand side of the road, then I say, "Go left, go left." So teaching is always contextual. It's always relative to the student, where they are at that time, what their mindset and patterns of psychology are—all of that. So each individual at any time needs a slightly different emphasis.

One of my teachers, Ajahn Jeff, Ajahn Ṭhānissaro, when I studied jhānas with him many years ago, said—I'm pretty sure he said, "You know, if you think you've had an experience and you think, 'Oh, that's the first jhāna' or 'that's the third jhāna' or whatever it is, just put post-it notes on it for a while"—those post-it notes, those sticky labels.

Because then what will happen is your experience will mature and it will change. So if you've had an experience of what you think was the first jhāna, you go, "Oh, that must be the first jhāna." But as you practice more with that state, it starts to change through practice. It refines. It matures. It grows. It starts to differentiate. "Oh, actually, that was two states, and I got them mixed up, and that one's that, and that one's that," as well as the experience itself changing. We could talk a lot in terms of jhānas—I won't talk about that now.

But I think there'd be some wisdom in saying something very similar for imaginal practice. Think, "Oh, this is imaginal" or "that wasn't imaginal." Just put a post-it note on it. Just be light with the labeling or the "have I achieved this or that." It's a real kindness and it allows things to grow as you grow into discovering more of what's involved and what we mean by imaginal.

The last thing to say right now is that all of the elements of the imaginal—so all of those twenty-eight elements that we've listed and outlined and talked about elsewhere—they all have, as I alluded to briefly before, soft and elastic edges. Each of them is unfathomably deep and infinitely developable. Each of them are created, discovered. So, again, what that means is humility or divinity or dimensionality or beauty, etc. Each of these might mean something to us at this point in time in our life and our practice. But because they have soft and elastic edges, they can be stretched. What does beauty mean? What does it encompass? What does divinity mean and encompass? What does humility mean and encompass? It can get stretched. Its meaning can get expanded, deepened, enriched, become itself multi-dimensional, multi-aspected.

As I alluded to right at the beginning tonight, things that are both foundations or roots or elements of imaginal practice themselves become ensouled, and we go on a journey with that, or they expand and teach us. They are unfathomably deep. We never come to the end of what humility means, certainly never come to the end of what divinity might mean, or beauty. And infinitely developable. And we're involved in that. So this is all part of, I think, what we need to bear in mind as we walk this path of soul-making dharma and practice.

Just helping in the sense of offering clarity and cultivating the right attitude. What kind of attitude nourishes the practice? What gives it space to grow, provides it with good soil so that it can be truly fertile?

This is the soil we seek to cultivate—one that allows our imaginal practice to flourish, one that honors the infinite depths we're exploring. When we approach this work with the right understanding and the proper attitude, we create conditions where the soul can unfold its mysteries, where the imaginal can reveal its teachings, where the journey of soul-making can proceed with grace and wisdom.

The path we walk is both ancient and ever-new, both grounded in timeless wisdom and responsive to the unique calling of our individual souls. It asks of us patience and passion, humility and courage, discernment and openness. It invites us into relationship—with the images that arise, with the depths of our being, with the sacred dimensions of existence that surround and interpenetrate our lives.

May this exploration serve not only our own awakening but the awakening of all beings. May the images we tend, the souls we nurture, the divinity we recognize contribute to the healing and transformation our world so desperately needs.

Thank you for listening, and for your willingness to engage with these profound territories of practice and understanding.

CHAPTER 174

The Crucible

Rob Burbea · 2h03

> In this profound exploration from his "Four Circles, Four Parables of Stone and Light" series, Rob Burbea examines what creates the proper conditions - the 'crucible' or 'womb' - for imaginal practice and sensing with soul. Drawing on alchemical metaphors, he emphasizes that our relationship to emotions must fall within a specific range: neither dismissing them through spiritual bypassing nor being overwhelmed by them without mindfulness.
> Burbea addresses fundamental questions about vulnerability in imaginal practice, distinguishing between genuine spiritual openings and fears of possession or loss of autonomy. He explores how images can arise from memories that become imaginal over time, sharing beautiful examples including a daughter's experience of her father's blessing kiss and his own encounter with angelic trees. The talk emphasizes the importance of an opportunistic, research-oriented attitude toward practice, trusting the soul's intelligence even when images seem initially unpromising.
> Throughout, Burbea stresses that imaginal practice involves both art and grace - while we can cultivate skillful conditions, there remains an element beyond our control. He discusses practical aspects of tending to images, including questions about artistic expression of imaginal content, and concludes with reflections on the Neoplatonic concept of epitēdeiotēs - the soul's fitness or aptitude to receive divine forms.

If you've had experiences of images that have affected you deeply, if you've had experiences of sensing with soul, then you'll recognize that using a term or describing it as a kind of alchemy is appropriate. There's a kind of transubstantiation of the sense of ourselves, of others, other human beings, of the world, of nature, of bodies, of matter. All these aspects of our existence and all these realms of perception are transubstantiated through the process, which of course is central to what alchemy is or was.

And so if we talk in those terms—the art of the alchemy of imaginal practice—then we can perhaps look into analogies of the alchemical vessel and the different processes. A kind of crucible is needed, or some kind of vessel. Actually, there are different kinds of vessels in alchemy. I don't want to stretch that analogy too far—there's a breakdown pretty quickly, probably.

Or we could talk about, if we're asking what is it that opens up the world of images? What is it that opens up the world to being sensed with soul? Using another analogy of birth: what kind of womb, what's involved in the gestation of those kinds of perceptions, those kinds of images, what's involved in caring for the birth and then caring for the tending to the image or the sense or the perception or the soul-making transformation that comes?

So we could use either of those metaphors, analogies—either the alchemy or the birth from a womb. But again, I don't want to stretch them too far. I want to say some preliminary things today that I hope will be helpful and then get into more detail about some of the aspects of skill and art in these practices.

One of the pieces that I really want to return to and emphasize is the importance of the relationship to our emotions. This relationship has to be within a certain range. If I dismiss my emotions, if I bypass them, if I deconstruct them, if I zap them with some emptiness way of looking, atomize them or whatever it is, spiritualize them away, then the crucible cannot heat up enough to ferment and to catalyze the alchemical process.

If, on the other hand, I'm just lost in an emotion without mindfulness, without any sense of a skillful relationship to that emotion, then that also will not be helpful. The alchemical process, the gestation, won't be served, won't be permitted, or is very unlikely. So part of that emotional relationship—I'm going to come back to this in detail, but it's a really important point—part of that range of helpful relationship to emotions that allows imaginal practice and sensing with soul has to do with sensing in the energy body. We've talked about this, and the energy body involves more than just emotions, but this is really important.

As I said, I'll return to it in later talks, but let me say a few things about that and about what are the conditions that support the birth of images, the reception of images?

In relation to emotions, actually someone a little while ago on retreat, who'd done quite a lot of imaginal practice and was really in his element there, asked me a question in an interview. He came in and reported that some images recently come and seem to last just a few seconds or a minute or two. "I can see that all the elements are there, all the nodes of the lattice are there," he said. "And they have a big effect, but then they're gone. Whereas it used to be that images would stay and I would be with them for one or two hours or more, the same image." He asked, "Is this just a natural change as imaginal practice develops, that images get shorter in duration?"

I thought, hmm, that's interesting. I don't actually know. But I don't think it's necessarily just a natural change as imaginal practice develops. What occurred to me were two factors that might be relevant there.

It may be that when there is not a sustained emotional challenge in one's life—for example, some kind of relationship crisis or even a marriage crisis, some long-term dukkha, a really challenging illness, or working on a project that's really stretching and challenging you in certain ways—it may be that when there is not a sustained emotional challenge in one's life, maybe the images don't actually need to last a long time. Let's put "need" in inverted commas. Images don't "need" to last a long time.

The emotional energy that is present is part of what gives birth to and sustains an image. We relate to those images emotionally, out of those emotions, and out of those emotions if we relate to that emotion in the right way. We don't need to be with them a long time necessarily. Some of them just do last a long time, some less, but it might be the ones that last longer are coming partly—or that duration is coming partly—out of the emotional ferment that's there, in something that's really challenging emotionally.

An exception might be the kind of beautiful cosmopoiesis that we experience when an imaginal sense spreads to the whole world, or to one's whole environment. There's a sensing the soul of one's whole environment, not just of one object, intrapsychic or extrapsychic. Or it could be one object sensing the soul—extrapsychic object sensing the soul.

But there, you know, for instance, the garden becomes a Daedalian realm, an angelic realm or something like that. Many of you have experienced that kind of thing. And that can be sustained from or with a kind of emotional well-being, some kind of quasi-jhanic state or well-being. And that is the emotion, so to speak, that's sustaining, that's part of sustaining, if we use that language, that perception.

So that was one reflection that occurred to me.

The second is, and again, it's something we'll come back to, but an image needs us to tune to whatever are its most soul-making aspects. So sometimes we get hung up on the visual and the clarity of the visual, or we're demanding some visual clarity or something like that. But that may not be at all what's most soul-making, really where the juice is, where the life of the image is and the vitality of the image is. But if we don't tune to what is most soul-making—and there's not a formula for what is obviously most soul-making; I have to intuit that, feel it, sense it in the moment without a formula—so my antennae have to be up, I have to be receptive and sensitive. But if we don't tune to what is soul-making, if we're actually focusing on something else, some other aspect of the image, the image will lose its energy and its cohesion and, for instance, the mind gets distracted.

So emotions have a part. They're an integral part of imaginal practice and sensing the soul.

We could say, and I can't remember if someone suggested or asked, you know, is vulnerability one of the nodes, perhaps? Is it, for instance, a 29th node? So that, to me, is a really interesting question. Of course, we could put it there, absolutely. The elements are not rigid dogmas, or they're not engraved in stone on tablets. But let's explore a little bit this notion of vulnerability.

Vulnerability actually means, from the Latin vulnera, as a wound, as vulnerability able to be wounded. It's sensitivity, if you like, but also it's more than sensitivity. It's this capacity to be wounded. A vulnerable wound can also be an incision, which is also kind of opening. You know, when there's a cut in the body, there's a kind of opening there. But let's ponder this a little bit, vulnerability.

So some people might be nervous with respect to imaginal practice and believe or fear, be concerned that they're vulnerable to some kind of possession by an image or a kind of loss of control or loss of their autonomy. I do not think that is a real possibility, a real vulnerability of soul-making and imaginal practice. In other words, I don't think that's at all likely to happen. I've never come across it. It might happen in other circumstances, but not the way we're teaching imaginal practice.

A person might, however, carry that fear of being possessed as a sort of habitual pattern of expectation and behavior. And they might carry that into any relationships—fear of being taken over, of being dominated, of losing one's autonomy. Any relationship, human or imaginal, a person might have that concern or notice that pattern, actually do lose my autonomy or seem to. And that fear, if it's there, will hinder the soul-making. It will actually block the soul-making dynamic, the eros, psyche, logos dynamic, from expanding and deepening, widening, getting richer, more complicated.

Or one might have, for example, a tendency towards merging with another, and in that way kind of, not so much being possessed, but something like that. Or withdrawing—the opposite is sometimes what psychologists call a schizoid tendency, to withdraw, to split, to kind of hide back in oneself, so to speak, or even behind oneself. Or alternate those. There might be a pattern of I do this and then I withdraw. I merge and then I withdraw and I don't seem to have any control over that.

Either of these tendencies, the merging or the withdrawing, will prevent eros in our terms. It will block the eros. The merging, why? Because we've said the eros needs two. And when we merge, we've lost the two. And the withdrawing loses the vitality of the connection, the libido, the juices cannot flow between self and a potential imaginal object or a beloved other or whatever it is.

So a person might be carrying those patterns or those fears and they will have an effect, but in itself I don't think imaginal practice and sensing the soul has to it. If there are those fears or that one recognises I do have these patterns in any relationship—not just in a relationship with an imaginal object—then that's where we can train a little bit. That's why we've been doing those two-ness exercises or what we call sometimes the balance of attention either way. Actually, what is it to be with another? Whether that other is something from the natural world, whether it's a human other, whether it's an intra-psychic image, what is it to be in relationship with another where there's the two-ness that is connected and alive, that the eros can flow without collapsing into one, without emerging, without losing myself in the other, or without a withdrawing?

And so one can practice that, and I'll hopefully return to that a little bit in the series of these talks, how we can kind of fill out that practice a little bit.

Again, talking then about fundamentals, basics, or potentially roots of soul-making practice. There might be a kind...

I mean, actually, there certainly is a vulnerability to craving taking over, or something that starts as eros—some relationship which feels full of eros—and then that eros becomes craving at any point if we're not caring for it, if we're not tending to it well.

The expansion and the opening, the life-giving and dimensionalizing that eros supports, allows, and engenders, collapses when the eros collapses to become craving. And that's a definite vulnerability. Of course, craving is dukkha, is painful. So there's a kind of vulnerability to the wound of dukkha, of craving, at any point.

The good news is that all this is quite labile and quite amenable to our input, our responses, our careful guiding. We might be working with another human being in a dyad, we might be working with an imaginal object, we might be working with a human being who's not present for us but who has become imaginal. There's a lot of eros, and then that becomes craving—but it's very possible to reopen that craving so that it becomes eros again. So yes, there's a vulnerability there, absolutely, but it's not anything that one cannot, as one develops the art of practice, learn how to respond to skillfully and get back on track.

I suppose there's a vulnerability too with sensing the soul, with working with images. There's a vulnerability to my duty to an image, to the sense of duty that I might have to an image or to a sense of things when I sense with soul. Partly for a number of reasons, but one of the reasons is because that duty that comes from an image or a perception—a sense of something or things that has really touched us deeply in the soul—that sense of duty often wants to be seen by others. It wants to be expressed in the world and seen by others. Again, this is something I'm going to return to. And it wants to be valued.

Of course, that's dangerous territory, because it might be that we are blocked in one way or another, internally or externally, and not able to express it in the world. It's not seen by others. Or it is seen—we have expressed it, it is seen—but it's not valued by other human beings.

That's a vulnerability, and that vulnerability can never be entirely under my control or predictable. I cannot guarantee that what I find valuable and what I'm loyal to, a loyal servant of, in terms of discharging my duty from the imaginal sense, I cannot guarantee that will be received well, noticed, paid attention to, valued by others in the world. There's, of course, plenty of instances through history where people have done that and it hasn't been valued. Perhaps the value comes a hundred years after the person dies. Van Gogh—there are countless examples.

But there is that vulnerability. The duty is a kind of vulnerability, it's a burden, it's not a guaranteed success. We might have the pain of some kind of failure, the pain of some kind of incompleteness of human connection and a frustration of the soul's desire to be seen. Again, I'll return to this. This is quite important, and it's quite contrary to a lot of popular psychologies that would just put such things in the category of delusion. Of course, there is a danger of over-reification, or put them in the categories of ego: "Oh, why do you want to be seen? Why do you want to make such an impression on people?" We'll come back to this in later talks.

Sometimes, if we talk about vulnerability in relation to imaginal practice, I don't know that it will ever be that an image comes or a sensing with soul is there, and in that moment the very perception of the image blows us away in the sense that it's actually more than our circuits can handle. Sometimes it's the case that the eros can feel more than we can handle, but I've talked about how to work with that skillfully, and that's a really important part of the art: how to handle a lot of charge, how to develop one's capacity and skill handling eros so that it stays productive and doesn't shrink into craving and doesn't just feel too much energetically to tolerate.

I don't know that the emotional impact of an image can actually be—I doubt that we're ever given more than we can actually handle in the moment. But sometimes the duty aspect may seem to us to be more than we can handle, more than we can take on or do. We're asked to do something that feels really at the edge of our capacity or capabilities. It may seem that way.

I was thinking about Mary, Jesus' mother, at the Annunciation when the angel Gabriel came and announced to her that she was pregnant, pregnant with divine life. In the first chapter of Luke, if I remember—probably in the other Gospels as well—she responds to the angel Gabriel when he comes to announce this at the Annunciation. She says, "I am the Lord's servant. May it be to me as you have said." It's beautiful, the humility, the openness, the willingness, the surrender there. "I am the Lord's servant. May it be to me as you have said." And then the duty that she has as a mother...

Her duty as a mother was not easy at all. They had to flee from where they were living and escape Herod's persecution of newborn infants and his murdering of them. Her son Jesus, as you may know from reading between the lines in the Gospel, was regarded as a bastard. There was uncertainty about who his father was. Was Joseph actually his father? Don't think so. And of course, in that time and culture, this carried a huge negative stigma. To be a bastard, not to have a father, not to know who one's father was—Mary, as well as Jesus, had to deal with that. That was part of her duty in raising a son who was regarded in the community as a bastard and ostracized for it. And then, of course, Jesus is put to death and crucified, with Mary at the foot of the cross, losing her son. So the duty that she assented to, that she opened herself to—"may it be to me as you have said"—came at a cost, really stretching her in human terms.

We can also turn this around, though, this question of vulnerability in this story of the Annunciation from the Gospel. With all these things, the Bible and all that, can we hear it with a kind of imaginal poetic sensibility and allow its dimensions to open up for us instead of just regarding it, reading it completely flatly? Because of course, when heard that way, it just sounds ridiculous to our modern sensibilities and assumptions.

What if we hear it imaginatively? What if we bring our imaginal sensibility, our poetic sensibility, our religious sensibility, and all the openness that this means for the heart, for the soul, for the being? All the hermeneutic, the interpretive, the infinite interpretive possibilities that such stories open up—they really become, when we relate to them as images, unfathomable. They take on those nodes, they become unfathomably deep, unfathomably always harboring more possibilities for interpretation, for touching us, for angles of perspective on that story.

If we read and listen this way to this beautiful passage from the Gospels, you can also say that actually, God is vulnerable here. It's not just Mary who's vulnerable—God is vulnerable here. Because Mary may say no: "I don't want this child. I'm going to have an abortion. I don't like it. What will people think?" Perhaps that's why, from a certain angle, her words in response to the angel Gabriel's Annunciation are recorded. It's not just her humility, but God's dependence on her assent and her attitude and her relationship and the beauty of that.

God depends on human assent, human perception and human action. We've touched on this in a number of talks over recent years. There's a Zoharic teaching of how we create God, how God needs us, how somehow our perceptions, our intentions, our actions, our thoughts, our conceptions are part of allowing, supporting and engendering a harmony in the Godhead. And even further, sometimes it's as if we create God through our attitudes, perceptions, conceptions, acts.

There's also that puzzling passage in the Old Testament where Jacob, as he's traveling on a journey, encounters an angel in the night. Jacob wrestles all night with the angel, and he wins. Jacob wins, but he's wounded. And he carries a wound—the angel wounds his thigh. The vulnerability, the wound, the capacity to be wounded again.

What would happen if we read that and sensed into those kinds of stories imaginatively? If we don't hurry through that story of Jacob and just fill out a couple of other elements that are relevant and resonant to our paradigm of soul-making and sensing the soul and imaginal practice and this issue of vulnerability—the angel and Jacob, and sometimes it refers to the angel as God. So it's either an angel or God or the angel is the face of God. They wrestle all night, and in a way, the angel couldn't completely overpower Jacob, but wounds him at the hip and thigh, and also blesses him.

Those two go together in that story—the blessing from the angel, the blessing from the divine, and the wound go together. The angel then, in blessing him, gives Jacob a new name. He gives him the name Yisrael. There are different interpretations of what Yisrael means, what Israel means. Philo, the ancient Jewish Platonic philosopher, interpreted the meaning of Yisrael—El is God, Yisrael is "he who sees God," one who sees the divine. Corbin, Henry Corbin, also follows that interpretation for the meaning of Yisrael.

So this angel and Jacob, they wrestle all night. In leaving, the angel wounds Jacob at the hip and blesses him at the same time. And in blessing him, gives him a new name—one who sees the divine.

Again, what happens if we hear such a story with our poetic sensibility, our imaginal sensibility?

We could say that vulnerability is an opening to the imaginal in certain ways. Certainly sensitivity is indispensable as part of imaginal practice and sensing the soul. We need to be able to be impacted, and we need to be able to develop our subtlety of sensitivity.

Sometimes what can happen—if we talk again about the vessel or the gestation of images—is that something touches us in life: some sense or perception of things, or even physical touch. At the time we register it and interact with it or whatever. But later on, maybe a little while later, or sometimes even months later, the memory of it becomes image. This can happen in all kinds of ways and through any of the sense doors.

Sometimes it can happen, for instance, with sex. There's some kind of sexual lovemaking or interaction with someone, and at the time maybe it's enjoyable and lovely and wonderful. But sometimes later, something in the soul is metabolizing or digesting that experience, and the memory of it becomes image—the memory of that touch, the memory of that kiss, the memory of that togetherness.

There's no reason why whatever that was can't be sensed with soul right then in the moment, during that touch or that event. But sometimes there are other things going on in the heat or the complexity of the moment, or the difficulty of the moment. All kinds of other considerations and factors prevent it from being sensed with soul in that moment. But later it can come back and be very beautiful, very fertile, very powerful image.

Someone shared with me a very beautiful story—I asked her permission to share it. It's not sexual, but it illustrates the same principle of a memory becoming an image.

This person's father was in a coma in a hospital in another country. He was in a coma for a long time—two months or more—and she went there and got an apartment near the hospital. Every day she was basically living in the hospital, and maybe sleeping in the apartment, or sometimes sleeping in the hospital.

Eventually, after a few months, he came out of the coma. She didn't know—and I didn't know either—that when you come out of a coma, it's a very gradual process. It's not just suddenly you wake up and everything's how it was. It's a really slow process of regaining your faculties, and they control that gradual emergence with drugs and other interventions.

So he was coming out of the coma very gradually. He couldn't speak at first. He had a tube in his throat, and his arms were tied down in the bed—part of this controlled emergence from the coma that they try to guide.

One evening she was washing up, getting ready to leave him for the night. With his arms tied down in the bed, he beckoned her over with the minimal motion that his wrists were capable of—repeatedly making a gesture: come over.

She was about to go, but she went and put her head close to him to see what he wanted. When she did that, he kissed her on the forehead. And that was it.

She was recounting the whole trip to that city and hospital. It was very stressful dealing with the hospital and the family and the apartment where she had to scramble to get a place—it had lots of problems. She was completely exhausted when she got back home. The whole memory, the whole trip was just very difficult—a whole difficult period that she got through.

Then, really some months later, she was doing walking meditation at Gaia House. The memory of that kiss to her forehead suddenly came as a primarily kinesthetic memory—not necessarily visual. She kind of felt it on her forehead again.

In that moment, months later, she said it felt like a kiss of blessing from God. This gentle, loving...

blessing, probably grateful kiss from a father to his daughter. And so she calls the image God's kiss. And with it, that kiss, a grace that opened a door to a whole other sense of the whole time, the whole period, that whole stretch of months just had a whole other sense to it. So much meaningfulness, so much beauty there, a completely different view moved her to tears.

And just to be clear here, in becoming for her the memory of that kiss, in becoming for her God's kiss, as she called it, it's not then in that image divorced from the father's kiss. It's the father's kiss still, but it's gaining the dimensionality of the divine. It's not now something other, and the father's kiss is forgotten. There is a growth, an extension, an enriching, a complexifying, a dimensionalizing of the original experience and of the memory and of that event.

So, if we talk about gestation, there's also this possibility, and again, some of you will recognize this kind of thing from your experience: there's also the possibility of something happening in life, something impacting us, and at the time we don't even recognize the impact, or it actually doesn't have the impact, it doesn't seem to have the impact at the time. A little while later, it's the memory of that exchange, event, touch, whatever it is, that sense, impact comes back and it becomes imaginal.

And sometimes that can even be—images can come from life, like I've just described, also from art. And again, it might not be in the moment that something in a book or a movie feels like it's imaginal and impactful at that level. But something goes into the soul, the soul metabolizes it, digests it, and makes image of it. It creates, discovers image, imaginal image from this thing.

So I remember I saw this movie. I don't know if some of you have seen it. I saw actually, I don't know if it was the second half or some portion. I definitely missed a big chunk of the beginning. So I couldn't quite figure out what on earth was going on, but it might have also been just that kind of movie. It was called, I think it was called Cowboys and Aliens.

Anyway, I won't try and explain what it was about but these cowboys were sort of battling these bad aliens and there was, it turns out at some point, a good alien amongst on the cowboy side. And so I was just kind of watching this, I think I must have been a little bit drugged on some medication or something, but I was kind of watching it somewhat bemused. And there's a scene right near the end where the good alien woman crawls into the core of the bad alien spaceship with an explosive device, clasps it with crossed arms to her heart center. This is a gesture. Can you see that? Crosses her arms, clasps this sort of small bomb, obviously a very powerful bomb, to her heart center, closes her eyes, and blows herself and the bad alien spaceship up in an act of self-sacrifice for the sake of her people and the humans on Earth.

And I didn't think that much about it at the time, other than what an odd movie this is, with cowboys and aliens in it, doing battle. But that image came up for me several times over the next few days, and it became imaginal for a few days. I sensed somehow a kind of—I sensed it somehow mirroring or mirrored in a way of relating to my life. Again, here's that echoing, infinite echoing and mirroring part of the meaningfulness. A way of relating to my life with the possibility of dying soon. And this was actually some months before I found out about the metastatic metastases.

Somehow there was something mirroring my life, the possibility of dying soon, my illness, a dedication to my work, our work, my sort of time and purpose and possible sacrifice for the sake of—and there's where the openness—but it had that openness, that infinite echoing of possibility there, for the sake of what? But it was powerful in its effects, this sort of image from a funny movie, extracted from a funny movie, in the energy body, in the sense of alignment, in the resonances, in the sense of my existence.

So her suicide in the movie, her dissolution in sacrificial explosion, seemed somehow to open up a kind of space of time, if you like, for my sense of a life dedicated to my soul duty, with all the kind of specifics of that, and the nebulousness of that, and the open-endedness, and the fuzzy edges, the soft elastic edges, and the individual meanings within an infinite meaningfulness, all of that.

But I choose that partly because it was such a sort of—seemed odd place for an image, a potent image to come from, but basically art can spawn images in us.

If, again, if we talk about the vessel or the womb in which images might take birth, I recall—sometimes I have to remind myself of this now. In the beginning, the initial stages when I was beginning to explore imaginal practice and how sort of completely opportunistic I would be, which I think is—what I'm trying to say is that's a really good thing. There was a huge willingness to go with the slightest kind of clues or sense of possibility of something becoming an image, the slightest cues. And that attitude, I think, is really helpful. It's part of a helpful vessel.

So sometimes we're too—I've talked about this again before. Sometimes doubt almost always comes up. "Oh, I don't know if that's a worthwhile image. That's probably just rubbish in the mind," whatever the doubt says. "Oh, that's too weird. That's not weird enough." Whatever the doubt is.

But that attitude of just being willing to go with something, work with it, see what happens—this is essential. And of course, sometimes you feel like, well, that wasn't very fertile, maybe that was a waste of time. But you can only learn something in the process.

I think at this point, for you, it might be a little different, because back then for me, there was no one telling me this is what should happen, or this is what you're aiming for, not this, or that's the path, these are the teachings. There wasn't that. I had read some Hillman and some Jung and some other material that didn't really touch me, and in a way, I was just exploring a whole territory of possibility and seeing what could be made of it or what felt helpful, what felt important, what ways of working were helpful, what ways of conceiving were helpful.

That's a little bit different from you maybe listening to Catherine and me saying it's like this and an image is this and not that. But still, what I want to emphasize right now is there's something about having a really "just go for it" sort of research attitude. Not prejudging whether we think something is going to be helpful or not. You'll learn a lot that way, and a lot that seems really unhelpful to start with can actually become potent image.

That's why sometimes when I give examples, I actually include those moments—oh, and the mind was drifting, and then there was a daydream, and I thought I was ignoring it and kind of putting it to one side, and then I decided to turn towards it, and that very daydream that seemed unimportant became really fertile.

So I want to encourage that kind of attitude of opportunism, research, just trying, just going for it. This is really important.

And then as one works with an image, of course, because it's so dependent on the way of looking and the way of relating, when we can start to tweak and change the relationship we have with an image and respond to what's happening, something that may have seemed very inconsequential or irrelevant or just silly can become image.

Related to this—and I've shared this before—I remember back in the initial stages when I was exploring this, the images were really quite different than they are now. And I look back and think, well, that really wasn't imaginal in the sense that we have, but it doesn't matter. It's part of getting the feet wet, working out, getting practice, getting skill, getting facility. And then you can steer that process guided by what feels soul-making, what feels beautiful, as it goes, rather than being too quick to judge, oh, that's not right, oh, that can't be, and then dismissing things. Nothing can get going that way.

I've put out in the past, in the imaginal talks and maybe in some other talks as well, a whole list of possible techniques—I don't have to call them tricks, but techniques—to see if one can kick-start the imaginal process or at least receive some images that can then become imaginal. I'm not going to list them again, but sometimes—and this might be something I've said before, but it's worth saying again—sometimes we put too much pressure on demanding an image.

No one's going to have images all the time, all day long, in any way. It's really important, as we've stressed on retreat, to move between imaginal practice and other practices, like just being with the emotions, or being with the energy body, or exploring that. But sometimes we might be trying too hard to get or receive an image, and it may be that we need to actually be more sensitive or attentive to, in an unpressured way, sensitive and attentive to the pain or lack or confusion we are feeling. Or, as I said, veering. Don't put too much pressure on that. Just do some practice with the energy body or with the emotions as I said, or samādhi, or emptiness, or metta, or whatever it is.

Sometimes—and again, partly why I include the fact of, oh, in this image there was some daydreaming or the mind kept drifting off or whatever it was—it may be actually that we need to loosen the mind and let it drift a bit sometimes. And out of this, somehow, an image will constellate.

But if we go back to what we were talking about in the definition of fantasy yesterday evening, sometimes we need to stop putting the pressure on the meditation. The image may already exist for us in our lives and how we see our lives at times, as fantasy or as a being or event in our life that either is already somewhat imaginal or certainly has that potential. And it can be picked up on there outside of formal meditation quite easily and then perhaps brought into the meditation if one wants.

It's interesting with some Dharma practices, and certainly with imaginal practices, if we think just a little bit about, for instance, the way mindfulness is often taught—just to make a distinction, a difference. With mindfulness practice, the instruction is repeated so often it becomes kind of implicit in the contemporary definition or understanding of mindfulness. It's a whole question whether that's actually what the Buddha meant by mindfulness or his intention. But the instruction is repeated so often, the instruction being: it doesn't matter what experience arises. Mindfulness is not about this or that experience, but it's a way of being with or a relationship to any experience.

So most of you will be familiar with that kind of way of understanding, a way of practicing mindfulness. So it becomes possible to practice mindfulness every day, formally and informally in life, and sort of put the time in to practice without any real possibility of failure, because it doesn't matter what experience arises. And if you forget to be mindful, you just remind yourself again, you get back in the saddle.

With metta practice, or breath concentration practices, or other more popular practices, this same idea is taught, that actually it doesn't matter what the experience is. But usually in those contexts of metta and breath practice, it takes a little longer for the student, the practitioner, to catch on that it doesn't actually matter. Usually it's, I'm not feeling any metta, or I was feeling it, now it's really dry, or the breath... I'm not having any great experiences.

And again, usually it's taught or we do teach that in a way it doesn't matter when we're talking about working with using the breath as an anchor or doing metta practice. But once that coin, that penny drops for the practitioner, that maybe it doesn't matter, then similarly to mindfulness practice, the student can put the time in and just return over and over, return to the phrases, just keep going, just come back to the breath, it doesn't matter. And not concern themselves with the need for any particular experience to arise, with doing it wrong, with the whole notions of failing or succeeding at practice.

So all that's actually really good and really helpful as a teaching, as an emphasis, especially for our modern culture of individualism where there's also the concomitant pandemic of self-criticism and inner critic and all that. So it's good, it's skillful teaching. It's really important.

It also, though, has its potential pitfalls. Sloppiness and even incorrectness or unhelpful practice can become a kind of unquestioned and unquestionable norm. So the conscience is soothed by a kind of blind faith: "I'm just doing this over and over." But it may not be that this way of practicing, or this way of regarding practice, is actually the most helpful.

Sometimes what happens for some people, or even in some sanghas, is that practice and the path can become devoid of any sense of progress or goal. In a way, there's a kind of merciful release in that because one does away with the pressure or the danger of feeling like a failure. But it can also mean that practice delivers only a pitiful fraction of what it otherwise might.

When we think about different practices and the attitudes toward getting certain kinds of experience—if we consider emptiness practices, for instance—I would teach that they actually are supposed to yield certain openings or experiences or shifts of perception. But there's also a way that such practices can be regarded as simply engaging repeatedly in this or that way of looking, eventually subsuming everything else into that way of looking, just as mindfulness as a way of looking or stance can subsume any experience, even after the fact. "Oh, now I notice I've been lost. Okay, that noticing I've been lost is a moment of mindfulness, so it's okay, it's good." You're probably very familiar with hearing that kind of teaching.

But if we translate that to, let's say, anicca practice or anatta practice—as I would conceive them, where one deliberately sees things as anicca, as impermanent, or as anatta, as not me, not mine, not self—and the mind wanders while one is trying to do that practice, then one can decide to see the actual wandering of the mind as impermanent, or the staying focused as impermanent. So everything can get subsumed in those practices, anicca, anatta. Again, it helps loosen and soften the brittleness and danger that can come with over-emphasis on "Am I succeeding? Am I failing? Am I getting the experience I'm supposed to get?" Even when the mind wanders, it's just anicca.

The focus of the mind is anicca. The stability of the mind is impermanent. Or that drifting of the mind is not self—it's just the mind doing its thing. It's what minds do, and then later they do something different.

What about, though, if we ask the same question regarding imaginal practice or soul-making practice? This is a little more complex because an image is a certain experience, and an imaginary image is a certain experience. Sensing the soul is a certain realm of experience that's not run-of-the-mill, ordinary experience. So what can we say about this?

One thing is—remember, as I stressed yesterday—there's always the possibility of practicing what we might call foundations or fundamentals: the energy body awareness, the samadhi, the emotional awareness and skill, practices like anatta, the tuning and the balance of attention. All these are part of soul-making practice. So it's not probably wise or even possible to do imaginal practice all the time, but one has a much broader palette of practices to dip in and out of.

When an image is not arising or seems difficult to sustain, one can always move into these other practices, and we're still taking care of the foundations and roots of imaginal practice. As we said, you can always revisit a previous image or a prescribed image or a kind of conventional image, or one can entertain a deliberate idea. Remember—I'll come back to this both tonight and in future talks—one can entertain a certain idea, and that idea, because conception influences, shapes, opens or closes perceptions, can be transformative. Entertaining, lightly holding a certain idea about the cosmos, about self, about matter, about the world, about one's personal history, about dukkha, about anything—that entertaining of that idea deliberately, lightly, skillfully, becomes like a seed or yeast that opens up the perception to more sensing with soul.

So there are all those possibilities when it seems like certain experiences—imaginal images—are not occurring immediately. Sometimes an image isn't arising; it seems a bit barren. But we can try to adopt, just gently, skillfully, a stance of humility and openness—openness of the energy body, openness of the heart, of the being, of the soul, in relation to one's life. That might be in relation to the whole narrative of one's life, the span of one's life, in relation to a dukkha, even a trivial or relatively trivial dukkha. Is it possible to find my way into some kind of stance of humility and openness with regard to all of that?

Perhaps in relationship to some vague sense of divinity—and that is not formed as an image. So I have a kind of beginnings of humility, beginnings of openness, or I'm attempting to support a gentle openness to all that, to the dukkha, to the sense of life and being and soul. I have some vague sense of divinity—it's not an image—but all that is soul-making practice because we're dealing with the elements there that are roots, fundamentals, aspects of images. Even if an image doesn't arise from that, it's a beautiful space to be in.

It's a beautiful posture, a beautiful poise of the soul to inhabit and to practice. And it's possible that it will be very fertile. That out of that humility and openness in relation to dukkha and in relation to some vague sense of non-imaged divinity, something may emerge. The self, or one's life, and one's narrative becomes image, arising from that soil, that fertile soil, the material in the alchemical vessel, from the womb that's being created there.

As I said before, imaginal practice is partly art and partly grace. There is an art to it. That's why we talk about all these elements. That's why I'm giving all these talks and saying you can do this, you can do that, or emphasize this more, draw that out, pay attention to this. There's a lot of art—sophisticated and subtle art that we can develop—so that we are tending to the conditions that support the possibility of images arising and touching us and moving us and becoming soul-making.

But it's art and grace. There's always going to be an aspect of imaginal practice that is beyond our control, that's not in our power, never completely within our mastery. There's some kind of... we are given images. Sometimes images arise—if you've been practicing soul-making Dharma for a while, you'll recognize this—sometimes you have an experience, or you're with someone who's reporting an experience, and you wonder: how could it be, given everything that was going on, this particular dukkha, and that particular history, and that particular view, and this difficulty, that some image arises that one never could have predicted? And yet it somehow carries with it the soul's intelligence of perfectly addressing and perfectly opening up in the most beautiful ways, in the most particular ways, the most particularly attuned ways, everything that was involved in the constellation of difficulty or situation or perception just beforehand.

It's a gift from the depths of soul. It's grace. We couldn't have conjured that, couldn't have figured it out. "Oh yes, I think I should imagine this." So part art, partly grace. And that's really good to remember with imaginal practice.

Yes, we are interested in certain kinds of experiences—sensing the soul and imaginal experiences. But I'm really talking about attitude. Attitude is part of the vessel. The attitude is part of a healthy, nourishing, rich womb.

Sometimes it's good not to put too much pressure on the visual sense. Even when a person knows and has understood that images are not necessarily visual, or that's not the most important thing, sometimes there can just be a subtle habit or tendency to expect or demand some kind of visual experience.

In the last week or so, I've found a helpful phrase for myself: let the body lead. Let the body lead. This of course means the energy body and the whole awareness and sensitivity to the whole energy body. It's as if that has a kind of intelligence. That becomes a factor, one of the elements, but as an element it ignites and is part of the alchemy. It's part of what allows the alchemical process, because then something comes through the body, or the body senses, and the body leads the way to an imaginal sense, which may then involve something visual, or may not—instead of almost unconsciously putting just a little bit too much pressure on wanting something visual, some visual experience or transformation of a scene. Let the body lead. Just check, take the pressure off any visual expectation or demand for visuals.

And notice the heart and the emotions. Sometimes it's about relaxing with that and finding or tuning a certain poise. So much of imaginal practice and sensing the soul is really about poise—finding, being responsive and tuning, discovering the right poise of being, poise of attention, poise of heart, poise of intention, attitude. All that is part of the poise that will vary from time to time. What is the poise that allows image to come forth, if it's given by the grace of the gods at that point?

A little while ago, on a spring evening with beautiful light through the young green leaves and the translucence of the foliage and trees, I let the body lead. I was in a car, relaxing the body and being aware of the whole energy body. What came first to awareness was the sense of being loved. It wasn't something visual that came first. There was this poise, played with a little bit in relaxation—take the pressure off the visual, be with the whole body, let the body lead, and notice.

I noticed there was a sense: I'm loved. It wasn't visual. That's what came first. And that's a node, isn't it? It's one of the nodes: loving and being loved. So it was part of one of the nodes that came first, not any kind of image, not sensing the soul in the more obvious sense that we might commonly expect. And being with that very lovely feeling—subtle but lovely feeling of being loved—I wasn't quite sure who was loving me here.

And then slowly, gradually—it happened over a minute or two, I think—all the trees began to reveal themselves differently. There was a sense, and again it's quite vague, and I'm pointing out the vagueness so that you will recognize that sometimes you have a powerful imaginal sense and there are aspects of it that are vague, and it does not matter.

So either the trees were angels, or they were somehow associated with angels—angels I could not see, again, not visual. I sort of heard them; that's the closest I could come to it. And these angels that either were the trees or were associated with the trees, resonant with the trees somehow, they were loving me. And that was the image sense, the imaginal sense—that was the sensing the soul. But it was probably allowed by taking the pressure off, this really subtle and unconscious demand for a visual transformation, a visual experience.

Again, by the way, this points to something important. When we talk about an imaginal image or a sensing the soul, we're talking about a confluence of elements: energy, body, poise, attitude, love, being loved, and so forth.

Just lingering on that example a moment longer—there's again this kind of opportunistic attitude. It's as if, as I said, the antennae are open and working without pressure, just ready to receive, ready to tune. They're sensitive, tuned to receive anything that could be or become soul-making.

Actually, what's also interesting here—this is a different experience, but somewhat similar that I had—the being loved came first, and then an emotional awareness came of grief. So what does this imply? It implies that in this confluence of elements that we call an image, an imaginal image or an imaginal constellation, there's not always a linear or predictable progression of the ignition of the elements of that imaginal constellation or of the lattice.

So in this case, it was, as I said, the love, being loved came first, then the emotional awareness. Oh, there's an emotion there that was kind of liberated to be felt more clearly and more helpfully and more deeply. Now we could ask—this is by the by—was that emotion, was that grief there already, so to speak, waiting to show itself, to be felt when love was present? Or is an emotion anyway always a dependent arising, so that it doesn't, like anything else, pre-exist this or that condition that's part of it? So there was a certain emotion that arose with love that wasn't there first. That's by the by.

Again, talking about what can help us to receive, to open to images, for them to be born, for the transubstantiation to happen in our chemical vessel: sometimes we might be feeling quite flat in the sense that our perception is quite one-dimensional. We might feel unresourced or unanchored or overwhelmed, and so on. Taking that into the meditation, including that into the meditation—and I've talked about this, I think, in the Dukkha and Soul-making talks—there might be a way of gently regarding one's life and oneself from the perspective of beyond death, so to speak, subspeciae eternatis, from the perspective, from the view of eternity.

As if you see your whole life, your whole narrative, however long that is, however long it's given you on this earth, in this form, in this manifestation—you see the whole thing as if from beyond time, like a tableau, a snapshot. And that move, that perspective, if you can find your way into that perspective, including all the difficulty that's going on, all the challenge that's going on, it can—that very move itself can allow and support a sensing the soul of oneself.

One senses oneself with soul, one's narrative with soul, and then also the world, and so forth. And it may not be that an intrapsychic image arises from that. It may just be that that's the imaginal sense of myself, of my life, of my journey between birth and death, of this whole movement of the narrative with all the difficulties and the challenges and the duties and the beauties there, and the particularities.

So again, when I say this from the point of view beyond time or beyond death or from the perspective of eternity, I don't mean a kind of view that goes into a perception of it all being one in some vast awareness. That's great—it's a wonderful mystical perception, really helpful at times—but what we're talking about includes and retains and gives import to and significance to the particularities of our soul, our lives, our journeys, our narratives, our difficulties, our dukkha, and so forth. Rather than dissolving them in some kind of equality of oneness—wonderful as that is at times—this is a different kind of leaning.

But there's a change in perspective there that allows self and world to be sensed with soul. So that kind of thing is very potent and important too.

Another example: Catherine and I were talking a little while ago, and she was sharing something—which I won't explain from her angle—but one of the things she shared was an idea, the idea: "I am soul." It was just a piece of what she was saying, and she had taken it and was taking it in a certain direction. But that idea, that phrase stayed with me: "I am soul." And I began over a few days practicing with that idea. It became quite potent for me.

So there was this idea which she shared—it was just a part of something she was sharing, an exploration she was sharing with me.

But somehow that idea landed in my mind and heart, and I began using it as something in my practice that helped to engender sensing the soul. So "I am soul," in a way. What it really was, or part of what it was for me, how I used it, was this kind of movement of identification away from a sort of maybe typical or default modern view of who I am or what's the essential reality of a human being. And it was coupled with this idea of the Buddha nature or God participating in my soul. So "I am soul" is also that I am soul—I am part of God's soul or part of the Buddha nature's soul. My soul participates in God, in the Buddha nature. So all that was part of this loose idea. It was fairly loose, but potent, in that it relativized the relationship with the body and matter, and relativizes also the ontological status of the body. I am soul. I am not just body.

Again, this wasn't filled out as an idea in all its details and all its philosophy. It was reasonably loose. But with that relativization of the ontological status of the body, it's a bit like seeing the emptiness of something—of the body and matter. And so perception, there was a degree of less fabrication, just some, and it kind of loosened and liquefied the perception of self, body, world, matter. We talked about this importance of liquefying, loosening through slightly less fabrication.

With that, there was the element of the fullness of intention—the intention for the fullness of soul-making. So not just "I intend to" or "I hope that I survive physically somehow miraculously, I hope that this body survives this illness, some miracle happens with matter." Sure, I can hope that—that may be part of an intention, even in prayer, even in imaginal practice—but the fullness of intention goes beyond that and includes as more paramount this wanting to serve soul.

So with those elements there—the loosening, the liquefying, the sense of participation, the fullness of intention—then the world around me, my body, my illness, my life, myself, matter, the interaction of body and soul, all of that was open to sensing the soul. Very, very beautiful and fertile opening that happened.

One of the more general principles in what I've just shared is the fact that there's an idea—and even when the idea is not that clearly spelled out or worked out, "I am soul"—and it became associated with other ideas and might have been a little bit different, or even quite a lot different from what Catherine meant originally. It doesn't matter. The principle is: an idea, as I mentioned earlier, can be taken up and function as a kind of soul-making seed, a seed for soul-making, a yeast, something that fertilizes and opens the sensing the soul and the perception of anything, really.

Again, I don't want to stretch the analogies of alchemy or womb and birth too much. But if we talk about how to take care of images once they're there and how do we take care of them—here's a birth and how do we tend to that infant? Again, I don't want to stretch the analogy too far, but I want to share something from a yogi who gave me permission to share this. Just to emphasize this point: when an image is partially formed, our attunement, our kind of sensitivity to what is essential here—in the sense of what feels, what aspect of it feels soulful, feels the most soul-making—and it might be an idea, or it might be an aspect of the image, or it could be anything. But that attuning helps to nourish the image and allow it to become more fully imaginal and potent.

So this person was sharing with me a while ago—more than a year probably—sharing that the painter Egon Schiele, a Viennese painter at the turn of the century, some of you will know, Egon Schiele the painter, and also Bach's music are often imaginal figures for her. Not so much Bach the person or the composer, but Bach's music, and Egon Schiele the painter. So these two were images.

And she shared an image with me—the image of Schiele painting her portrait. I'm not sure if she was posing naked for it, but that was the image. And having heard the teachings that I gave on eros and sexuality, and also having felt like there was a certain aridity in general in her practice, which she thought might be blocking her eros—because she felt no opportunity to express or share eros, share her eros sexually or romantically in her life, and so that she was blocking her eros, and that caused a certain aridity in general in her practice—so she was wondering about that and kind of thinking, well, if that's the case, maybe I should steer the image towards something more sexual. But it didn't feel right.

So it's not the fact of having thought "maybe I should steer it this way" and then steering it that way. That in itself, as I said last night, is not a problem. It may be a problem, but we ascertain: oh, it just doesn't feel right. It doesn't feel like that's what needs to happen. Or that doesn't actually feel soul-making. Partly what was happening here was that there was a limited idea of what eros is.

But the not feeling right, she tried something, tried to steer it towards an image of sex with the painter, but that didn't feel right. And that not feeling right is an indication and a sense to trust, just as the feeling right is also an indication and a sense to trust, conversely.

But again, going back to the point about eros, it's worth stressing again. Eros in our language is not necessarily sexual. There can be eros that has no sexual element in it at all, and sex can certainly be without eros in our language, in our sense. But anyway, eros is not necessarily sexual.

So perhaps she also had a kind of limited idea of eros and also what needed to happen in her life. So I was responding to this and suggested that there was eros in the being painted. The painters had eros for her body and for art and for the making of art, and she could perhaps get a sense or an experience of that kind of subtle, if you like, more subtle, at least non-obviously sexual eros, through his being in the image.

In other words, tuning into, here's the image of him painting me, what's his experience of eros? And not confining it or expecting it to be sexual. It might be other than sexual - for art, for body, for beauty, for whatever. And in his being and in the whole scene, there might be eros also in the sense of being painted, of being looked at like that, of the body being an object of the regard, of the reverential artistic regard, an object for the perception of beauty.

And maybe that, again, who knows what would happen, I didn't hear back from her after this, after that interview, but it might be that then eros comes in her life for her own body in different ways, all kinds of possibilities from that seed.

But again, it's this necessity to tune into actually, in this case, where is the eros? Because with the eros will be the soul-making sense, right? They go together, of course. So where is the soul-making? Where is the soulfulness? What's the aspect or strand of this complex image? Already I've got someone painting me. It's already complex as an image. It has all kinds of things in it. What of that... where do I kind of hone in on what's soulful and soul-making? And this is a way we tend to, we care for an image, we nourish it, we allow it to grow.

Same person shared another image, which was actually a passage or a scene from Bach's St. Matthew's Passion. Some of you may know it's a great piece of music. And the centurion at Christ's crucifixion, centurions are guarding or watching Christ's crucifixion, in Bach's piece, says or sings twice, "Truly thou art the Son of God, truly thou art the Son of God."

And she said, reporting this, that passage moves me to tears every time. All of it, the music of it, the theatre of it, even though she said, "I'm not, and I never have been, a Christian." It's just something in there moves me. It was, again, inexplicable. The soul is touched inexplicably there.

And again, my question was about eros. So, again, there is eros there. It's in the centurion for Christ. He, in looking that way, he didn't expect to have that experience. "Truly thou art the Son of God." His feelings and gaze towards Jesus are more than just metta, and certainly more than some kind of coldly logical conclusion about Jesus's ontological nature. "Oh, you are divine." There is, carried by the music in those words, "truly thou the son of God," there is more than metta and more than a sort of deduction of some kind of fact, existential fact.

And unlikely in her image that the centurion has got some kind of sexual attraction to Jesus. I mean, there's no reason why that might not be part of it, but it didn't sound like that's what was going on. But this gaze and this relationship in that moment of the centurion, in his feelings, there was eros there. They're erotic in our sense, in touch with, attracted to, drawn to, sensing the beauty and mystery and dimensionality and divinity of Jesus.

And so, I'm looking for the eros and the eros goes with the soul making. So tuning into that in the image, relaxing the usual preconceptions, in this case about eros, and tuning into, ah, there's the eros.

How does that feel? What kind of quality does that have? Can I let my soul resonate with that? In this case, the centurion's imagined experience, or imagination of the centurion's experience, our sense of that, our receptivity to that experience—that's where the soulfulness and the soul-making is.

So sometimes it's just a more subtle receptivity and sensitivity to notice and tune to where the eros and soul-making is with an image at any time. This is very much part of what allows an image to have its vitality and allows us to nourish it, to feed it.

And again, if we talk about tending images, some of you may have noticed this, but sometimes images happen in a series. Sometimes you get the same image coming back deliberately, or it just comes back for a while or long stretches of time, or periodically over sometimes years. But sometimes you get images that seem to express a similar theme or have a similar kind of object, but they're actually different. We can see that sometimes images are happening in series like that. There's a series of images, which is important.

I remember about a year ago, I had an image of a dervish—the Sufi dancers, beautiful dancers, mystical dancers, out of divine love. It's actually not so important what the image was. What is important is that, again, it wasn't very visually clear. It didn't even have, this particular image didn't even have, at the moment of arising and working with it in meditation, a very strong impact. And I think the mind was actually drifting quite a bit. It was at a time when I was struggling with certain medication and not sleeping because of a thyroid condition. So the mind was drifting. It didn't have a strong impact, and it certainly wasn't very visually clear.

A little while later, though, I was on a train platform going to see a doctor, and the train was late, so I just took the opportunity to walk up and down the platform. And the body felt so open and free, and I might say naked, but again, it was a very particular kind of feeling of openness, freedom, and nakedness.

What had happened before that dervish image was that there was this whole series of images related to body. A few of them had to do with sensing my body as an instrument. And that came out of a little bit what I shared last night about the grief in relation to music and giving up the instrument that I used to play as a jazz musician—guitar—and working with it over a period of time in the meditation and actually seeing, sensing my body as a kind of instrument, to be played or for me to play or both. And so that was a certain sensing with soul of the body. And that was, I think, some days or maybe even weeks before.

But images may come in series to affect this or that, to make soul—the organ of sensing—the soul, in this case sensing the body with soul. Each individual instance of an image in that series, sometimes we might not even connect them, and then you look back and you see, "Oh, there's a connection here." Each individual image may not always be powerful, or you might even think, "Well, that was kind of neither here nor there, it's not one to write home about." But cumulatively, something is being worked on in the soul.

Again, the soul's intelligence is operating, in this case, in a series of images of different perceived impacts and importance at the time, but somehow the soul is stitching these together over time with gaps in between. And in that walking up and down, that sense of the body, which is also a sense of self, sensed as—again, it went into a kind of cosmopoiesis in its connection with the surroundings, but very particular, particular to that image, particular to the kind of nakedness, a sense of nakedness and openness and freedom that came into the body with that.

The point is about the series, and somehow, again, attitude, trust, not dismissing something because it may be part of a bigger picture which we don't grasp yet, we don't glimpse yet, because we haven't stitched those things together. Something is operating below the radar with an intelligence that is beyond us. And it's only after the fact, or after a little while, we say, "Oh, there's a process there."

There's also, you know, I've sort of said this, but it's worth just making it clear—some images are very slow to become fully imaginal, for all the elements to sort of ignite. Sometimes that happens over many sessions, sometimes it's gradual, sometimes they don't seem promising at first.

So this, again, I think I alluded to it or spent a bit of time talking about it, the whole question of pacing in the path of the imaginal talk, and a kind of sensitivity or achievement or wisdom to the pacing that is involved in any kind of imaginal birth and imaginal tending, or tending to the imaginal path. Do I need to stay with this for longer, or move on to another image, or whatever it is, or let something develop, even if it seems not so promising?

So this is all part of, again, whether we call it part of the womb, or part of the tending, or part of the birthing. The analogy breaks down, it doesn't matter, but I want you to understand the point there, really about attitude to practice and what actually can support more helpfully the opening up the world of images and sensing the soul.

Sometimes a person, following this theme a little longer, sometimes a person has an image and wants to write a poem about the image. So this is, again, something for you to find out and do your own research. I have periods in my life where I write a lot of poetry and it's something very important to me. But I don't actually, for myself, tend to write poems about images that come in imaginal practice. It feels like that does something. It takes away—for me, it takes away some of the potency and the possibility of that image.

So again, I don't want to set down rules, but it's something to be careful about and to investigate whether you want to, or if someone wants to paint an image, you know, or sculpt it. Now Jung, I think, insisted that when patients could, that they painted or sculpted or rendered materially manifest some image that came to them or a dream or something. I'm a little more cautious, and I think, again, here's one instance where perhaps our practice forges a different path, goes in a different direction.

When I contemplate creating something material from an imaginal image—writing a poem, painting, sculpting—I encounter a delicate consideration of timing and intention. If I move too quickly to artistic expression, it may diminish the potential development and fullness of the image itself, potentially detracting from our relationship with it in its purely imaginal dimension.

This isn't a categorical prohibition, but rather an invitation to careful investigation. Does artistic expression enhance or limit the soul-making potential of a particular image? To truly understand this, one must experiment thoughtfully—working with some images through artistic expression and allowing others to remain in their imaginal form, then observing what unfolds.

If we do choose to create artistically from an imaginal image, we must consider when, how, and what needs to be involved in that process to preserve the image's soul-making potential. There may indeed be artistic potential in such creation, but this may not overlap with the soul-making dimension—they might be entirely different aspects.

As an artist or poet, one naturally has other concerns: form, rhythm, balance, sound, visual composition. These require careful attention and tuning, but they are not inherently imaginal. However, the engagement with art itself can become imaginal—the self as artist in that process may become imaginal. This differs from the image itself being imaginal in our relationship with it.

For me, these represent divergent directions rather than the same path. I maintain a soul-making relationship with writing poetry, composing music, and crafting dharma teachings. But this differs from allowing a specific image to be fully soul-making, to work completely in the soul and catalyze the soul-making dynamic in relation to that particular image.

While Jung and Jungian approaches tend to emphasize the materialization of images through painting or sculpting, I believe our practice materializes images differently—through the energy body, through emotionally sensitive relationship, through refractions into duty and infinite mirroring. These constitute genuine forms of materialization: the image materializes in the body, in emotions, doing its transformative work and shaping our being.

This process, along with the refractions into duty and the infinite echoing mirroring in our lives, demands great sensitivity and attentiveness. When our sensitivity becomes occupied with artistic intentions—with form, color, shading, balance, or rhythm—we engage a somewhat different intention than pure soul-making in relation to that image.

Similar considerations apply to expressing images through movement and dance. Again, I don't wish to establish rigid laws but rather encourage careful exploration. If you choose to investigate this territory, do so with integrity, discernment, precision, and open-mindedness. You may discover you can maintain both artistic process and soul-making relationship—perhaps it's a matter of timing or approach.

In our retreat explorations of movement—whether with others or alone, in groups or individually—we've touched on movement's relationship with soul-making and image in various ways. The potential here is genuinely exciting, though we must remain alert to whether movement diverts, hinders, or limits the soul-making potential of particular images.

Several practitioners have shared that dance and movement powerfully stimulate images and provide the most fertile ground for image generation. This may indeed be true, and individual differences certainly exist—what renders the imaginal impossible for one person may be profoundly generative for another. These possibilities encompass both personal propensities and capacities that can be developed through practice.

The crucial question becomes: are all the subtleties of imaginal practice accessible while moving or dancing? They might be, or they might become accessible through dedicated practice and training. Yet by the very nature of movement and dance, we might limit how delicate and sensitive we can be in relationship to an image, potentially constraining the fertility, depth, richness, and potency of soul-making with that image.

This remains territory for exploration, experimentation, and research—for myself, for others, for all of us drawn to these possibilities. I want to ensure that this teaching doesn't simply reflect my own tendencies or capacities at the expense of different capacities others might possess. The logos must remain spacious enough to embrace diverse ways of engaging with the imaginal while maintaining the precision necessary for authentic soul-making.

So we can talk, and we have been talking about, what is it to take care of the ground of images and the ground of soul? What is it to have a good working alchemical vessel? What is it to take care of the gestation, the birth, and the aftercare of images—to have a good womb and to have the possibility of the birthing of images and the tending to what is born there?

There was a great pagan philosopher and Neoplatonist called Iamblichus who lived many centuries ago. He's not that well-known actually, but he talked about pagan rituals and the relationship with the gods, using a certain Greek word: epitediotis. What he really meant was the kind of fitness or aptitude to receive a form—to receive, let's say, an image for our purposes. In other words, the care of the vessel, the care for the womb and the birth.

This epitediotis is this fitness or aptitude. It came to be used by Neoplatonists to explain why there were different kinds of experiences in ritual—different mystical experiences. Iamblichus used an image which parallels some of the Buddha's teachings: just as dry wood provides the capacity, the fitness or aptitude for fire to manifest, to be actual, similarly, the purity of a soul provides the capacity for a god to become manifest.

Plotinus as well, the founder of Neoplatonism, accounted for different experiences of souls in the presence of the holy ideas as being due to differences in the fitness of the recipient, the quality of the vessel at that time. We don't have to say that this person or that person is always more fit—it's not who they are. Rather, at one time, the vessel is like this; at another time, the vessel is like that. Plotinus compared it to the reception of light in clear or muddy water—how that water holds or reflects or carries the sunlight that falls on it differs greatly depending on whether it's muddy or clear.

For Iamblichus, it's interesting that his teaching puts everything very much in the passive voice—it's the gods doing things. When we talk about the element of autonomy, that the image has autonomy, meaning personhood and intelligence and will, Iamblichus very much emphasizes that as being more important than our ability to control what happens, what experiences occur, or what mystical openings unfold. So he talks very much about the fitness, the epitediotis—the aptitude of a passive element to receive the influence of an active one, in this case, a god.

Purifications—and this is a loaded word, I know, but I'm going to try and give it a certain slant—are necessary for every soul. Iamblichus says that the time one spends in prayer nourishes the intuitive mind and generally enlarges the soul's receptacle for the gods, the soul's readiness for divine transformation. He's talking about this aptitude, this fitness. It describes conditions of the soul that are fit to receive the god, a kind of cleansing of the soul that makes it fit. The soul itself was a kind of receptacle of the god, the soul itself is the alchemical vessel.

In our paradigm, in our language, then, all the elements of the imaginal—all those twenty-eight nodes we've talked about, and maybe more, such as vulnerability, certainly humility, certainly the imaginal middle way, the theater-like quality, the neither real nor not real, certainly the openness to duty, certainly reverence and love, fullness of intention—all of these we could say are part of the epitediotis, the caring for the aptitude, the fitness to receive image and to receive divine image. They're part of the purity.

You can hear the humility, the reverence, the willingness, the openness to duty, the love, the fullness of intention. These all have to do with purity of soul at that time. And they allow the image to become fully imaginal and the sense of divinity. And also, as we said before, the relationship with emotions—this is all part of the fitness of the vehicle, the aptitude, the caring for the vessel at the time.

Okay, so we're going to go into quite a bit more detail on some of this, but I just wanted to give some hopefully helpful pointers today.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 175

Opening the Sense of the Energy Body

Rob Burbea · 1h17

> In this foundational talk on imaginal practice, Rob Burbea presents a comprehensive exploration of energy body awareness as essential to sensing with soul. He defines energy body through three interconnected aspects: felt sense (the texture and vibration within the body's space), image (how we picture the body), and idea (our conceptual understanding of embodiment). Drawing from both conventional materialist views and alternative healing paradigms, Burbea emphasizes the primacy of felt experience while remaining open to the full spectrum of bodily possibilities.
> Burbea offers practical guidance for 'bringing the whole body into contact' with imaginal figures, sounds, or natural objects, describing how this creates synesthetic perception where the entire energy body becomes an organ of knowing. He discusses the crucial skill of opening the energy body through practices like long breathing from the Ānāpānasati Sutta, connecting this capacity to broader spiritual development including samādhi, generosity, and devotional opening. The talk concludes with advanced teachings on perceiving energy itself as imaginal rather than merely experiential, demonstrating how this shift can transform both individual practice and dyadic work. Throughout, Burbea emphasizes experimentation, sensitivity to what actually supports practice, and the interconnection between physical openness, heart opening, and spiritual freedom.

As I mentioned in the introductory talk, a significant portion of this series will be devoted to different aspects of the skill or art of sensing with soul in imaginal practice. My intention is to share quite a few things I haven't presented before, though there will inevitably be some repetition, which is beneficial. Hopefully there are insights here that prove helpful regarding different areas and strands of the weave of imaginal practice and sensing with soul.

There's no necessarily obvious order in which to present this material, and there will inevitably be some overlap between the different areas and strands, but I'll try to present each strand despite that inevitable interconnection.

Tonight I want to explore energy body awareness. There's no particular reason I've placed this first, but we do emphasize it considerably, though actually everything is important. We're talking about developing skill and artistry in energy body awareness—that kind of sensitivity, the possibilities that exist, and the capacity to work with it skillfully and artistically.

Let me begin with a review of what we mean by "energy body." We could say it's actually a kind of awareness more than a thing itself—a particular kind of experience or poise of awareness. We can break this down into three interwoven and overlapping aspects.

The first aspect is the felt sense. When we speak of energy, this is crucial—the felt sense of the space that my physical body inhabits, the space outlined by my physical body, perhaps even extending slightly beyond it. What does that feel like? What is the texture, the vibration, the experience there? The tightness, looseness, energization, harmonization, or whatever arises. This is one aspect of the energy body.

The second aspect is the image. We don't necessarily mean an imaginal image, though it may be one. There is usually some kind of image of the body present. I might close my eyes and have a vague image in the back of my mind of my body sitting here, wearing what it's wearing, with limbs in their relative locations—very conventional. Other times in meditation, perhaps in the first jhana, the image I might have of the body could be simply a diffuse cloud of white light corresponding with the felt sense.

The third aspect is the idea or concept of the body. In our Western society, we typically hold the idea that the body is composed of cells organized into organs and systems, with cells made up of smaller components extending down to molecules and atoms. Through the exchange and interplay of molecules and atoms at the cellular level, the body is structured, formed, and functions either healthily or unhealthily with various capacities.

This is essentially a reductionist model. There's nothing inherently wrong with it—it's simply one view, the dominant view of our modern Western worldview. This perspective holds that fundamental truth lies in basic building blocks that are purely material, existing as material entities functioning according to known physical and chemical laws. From this foundation, the body as a complex organism with its appearance and capacities arises.

A different idea, more popular in certain circles throughout history and present in some healing paradigms, New Age circles, or shamanistic traditions, takes more of a top-down approach. This view suggests the body has different levels of being, different strata to its existence. For instance, there might be an astral body or various sheaths—perhaps seven or nine in different systems. The astral body, as a level of higher energy, might function as a matrix that forms, shapes, and directs the material physical body. Rather than being reductionist and bottom-up, this approach suggests that higher energetic levels of the body inform, shape, direct, and in some sense care for the physical, material body that is obviously manifest to most people.

Of course, there are infinite possible ideas about the body, just as there are infinite possible felt senses or images we can have of the body. Some will be common, depending on culture, upbringing, and personal propensity, but the range remains open.

All of this together—these three aspects—defines what we mean by energy body. It's a poise of awareness, a poise of being. We might more accurately call it "energy body awareness"—the kind of awareness, attention, or way of looking that remains open to all possibilities within the range of these three aspects.

In some senses, the first aspect—the felt sense—is experientially primary. We want to be anchored, very conscious, and intimately in touch with the felt sense.

I've probably suggested this a few times in guided meditations or thrown it out as a possibility: imagining, as you're sitting in meditation, three lines of energy that course through the body. Two lines flow down each leg, meeting and centering in the very lower belly, while a third line rises vertically upward, perhaps even extending out through the top of the head. There's a kind of convergence—triangle isn't quite the right word—but three lines meeting at a point and radiating outward.

Recently, someone came for an interview while working on samadhi, though I can't recall their main focus at the time. They reported trying this practice, attempting to imagine these lines in close detail. Perhaps having heard elsewhere that energy tends to spiral into or out of the body—as in chakra teachings—they were trying to visualize each line as a detailed spiral. It wasn't particularly productive for them. "I'm trying that," they said, "but it doesn't really do anything."

To me, this missed the point of my intention in sharing this practice. Again, it's not so much about the visual details, which may or may not be important. Here there was a certain preconception about what was significant and how energy actually moves—that it spirals, for instance. This isn't to say that sometimes seeing or imagining energy spiraling in the body can't be extremely helpful. The question is: Is it helpful at that particular time?

The main thrust of what I intended in sharing this practice was really about structuring the body or energy body awareness. Once you place those lines there in imagination, something happens to the sense of alignment, openness, and harmony in the body. It's about the geometry of those three lines in the space the body inhabits and what that does to the sense of well-being, the sense of the body, the sense of posture, and also the possibility of samadhi. It's more about the geometry and structuring of the body sense that emerges from this visualization.

Again, what I'm emphasizing is that the felt sense is primary—really, really important. We don't want to lose the felt sense because we're chasing some kind of idea about the energy body that isn't actually fruitful.

When we speak of image and idea as aspects of the energy body, all three elements—felt sense, image, and idea—are intimately connected. If I'm playing with a certain idea, like spiraling, I need to check the felt sense and notice what impact this has. If it's an idea that doesn't bear much fruit in terms of energy body awareness at that time, then it's not particularly helpful.

Another key principle to extract from this incident is the importance of experimenting, improvising, playing, and feeling and noticing. When I do this, when I imagine that, when I think this, when I conceive that, when I do this with awareness—whatever "this" or "that" might be—what happens? If you're cultivating samadhi and something feels good, feels right, then you go with that. This experiential approach—experimenting, improvising, playing, and feeling, noticing in the moment what results from each particular experiment—becomes crucial. How does it feel? What do I notice? Is it helpful?

Stepping back to a more general point: in practice as a whole—any kind of practice, any direction whether samadhi, emptiness, contemplating vedanā, mettā, imaginal practice, ethics—there's something developable here. Some people have more of a natural gift initially, but it's definitely cultivable. It's like developing what we might call a nose for what's important.

So often I hear long-term practitioners getting caught up in certain differentiations or ideas about this or that practice or teaching, when it's actually irrelevant. They could spend considerable time pursuing various approaches that don't actually make much difference. The importance, really broadly speaking about any practice, is developing a sense of what's crucial. What goes to the essence? What's to the point? What matters?

In this student's case, trying to imagine spiraling in detail almost missed the point entirely. I could offer countless examples across different areas of practice. This is a very general principle: Can I develop this intuition, this sense and sensitivity, this nose for what is significant? What actually is the nub of what's important in whatever practice I'm engaging? What am I trying to accomplish? How are the pieces working together, and which ones matter? Which ones are secondary or irrelevant, or at least more irrelevant?

When we do imaginal practice—when we're sensing the soul—there's an instruction I often give that I consider almost universally beneficial. Whether you're practicing with an intra-psychic image, working in a dyad, or sensing the soul of some being in nature, I generally encourage bringing your whole body into contact with the sight, sound, or whatever you're encountering. Sense it with the whole energy body.

But what does this actually mean? Let me break this down into several aspects.

First, it means spreading or balancing the attention or awareness to include the object, the other, and the self, along with the sense of the energy body. As we do this, we begin to see that the energy body might start to include the other—as if there's a larger energy body, a larger sense of energy encompassing both. Certainly awareness spreads to one's whole energy body, but then that energy body is brought into connection, into contact with the sight or sound or whatever we're encountering. This opens the possibility of sensing energy as encompassing the two together.

The second aspect concerns the center of knowing or perceiving. Our default is usually the head—our sense organs are gathered there, so we tend to think of it as the center of knowing and perceiving. We're seeing with our eyes, hearing with our ears, and these are located in the head. But rather than this default center, we work with the whole energy body as center. For some, this may be felt at the heart center, the usual place for soul sensing to feel centered. For others, including myself, it's the whole body as a total field. This can vary. But the whole energy body becomes a center of knowing and perceiving. One feels it, senses it, imagines it, and in our language, creates and discovers it this way.

The default in our culture—really almost hardwired into our sense of things—is that the center is in the head. But what is it to actually feel, sense, imagine, create and discover the whole energy body as an organ of perception?

Sometimes this opens the possibility of synesthesia. With the whole energy body brought into contact and conceived as this organ or center of knowing and perceiving, the senses can begin to mix and blend. Sound and sight and touch become less separate. They weave into each other, imply each other, reflect each other, manifest across the boundaries between different senses. We hear with our body—not actually such an uncommon experience when listening deeply to music or birdsong, or even to a lawnmower's vibration. But there's rich possibility here for synesthesia, for the mixing of senses that can be very beautiful and fruitful.

A fourth aspect is that the energy body sense is open to the whole potential range of perceived substantiality, image, and idea. The whole range from very etheric and light to very dense, the whole range of imaginal possibilities and ideas. Bringing the whole body into contact means bringing the whole range of possibilities of the body—how I conceive it, feel it, imagine it, image it. The gates are open; the range is open. It's possible for the energy body to manifest anywhere along that spectrum.

Lastly, and overlapping with the first aspect, a connection—sometimes even a flow—is sensed between the energy body and the object. When I bring this sensitivity, delicacy, and careful mindfulness to the presence of another in a dyad, an intra-psychic object, or an object in nature, there can be a gradually discernible or immediately apparent energetic connection between the energy body and the other. They form a kind of unit, a dyad of connection.

So as I said, I've already touched on that in the first of the five dimensions here. But a unit of dyads means yes, there are two—I can definitely feel two here—but I also sense a kind of unifying energy, or at least an energy that connects us, flows between us, ties us together.

If we linger with this and expand some of what I've just said, again, we're so conditioned by the dominant materialist, reductionist, scientific and scientistic worldview of modern culture that it's sometimes hard for us to actually have certain experiences. The logos becomes so entrenched, so limited within certain circumscribed parameters, that it simply doesn't allow other ideas—and so it might also inhibit certain experiences. Just as we talked about the eros-psyche-logos dynamic that can be inhibited or blocked from its natural tendency to expand, it can be inhibited and blocked at certain times. One of the ways this happens is through a limiting idea that we're clinging to, and sometimes we don't even realize what it is or that we're clinging to it.

In our culture, the language and ideas and models we have for sensing and sensation aren't quite adequate for sensing with soul. For example, as I've touched on, where is the sensing? We tend in our culture to think and feel only that touch happens on the skin. At the end of the hand, I touch another person, I touch my beloved, I touch this tree—only there, that's where the touch happens.

But when we touch, for example, when we touch a beloved who is for us an erotic, imaginal figure, or we touch the earth as erotic, imaginal other, when we sense it with soul, or when we listen to sound—to music, to birdsong, to anything—we don't only sense or think of touch as taking place at the skin or with the hand, or hearing happening with the ears. Rather, we sense with the whole energy body, which is larger than and more than the physical body. We touch and sense with the emotions and heart.

Again, in our culture we tend to separate these: body is one thing, sensory contact is one thing, emotions and heart something else entirely—which again in our culture might reduce to some kind of chemical process. But when we begin sensing with soul, these things come together. I touch it with my heart. I touch it with my emotions. It touches my emotions. We have that word already in the language: I'm touched by something. It's touching my heart. The heart also touches, and the soul resonates. All this is involved—receiving, resonating, shaping and touching the object.

So again, there's this much richer and more comprehensive and multi-dimensional sensing that happens when we sense with soul. The whole idea of this body and the instrument it is, its capacities and how it works, its sensitivities and sensibilities—all of this gets expanded, enriched, complexified.

There's a sense, then, that we can talk about opening the energy body. What we really mean is opening the idea, opening up the range of possibilities, opening up what we imagine the body to be and what we actually experience. Opening up that whole range, as we said.

There's another sense in which opening the energy body is actually quite important—for all practice and actually for living well, but certainly for practices like samādhi and imaginal practice and sensing with soul.

I think I might have said this before, but it bears repeating because sometimes when a teaching is really relevant to oneself, one hears it but doesn't really take it in. It doesn't land. It's almost like I'm so caught in a certain pattern or idea about how things are or what I need to do that I don't recognize that this strand of teaching is actually significant for me—I'm so set on something else being more important.

I would say—and I want to tread carefully here in this portion of the talk—but sometimes a person may well need to develop the energy body awareness and the skill to really allow imaginal practice. We have placed it, and will continue to place it, as something quite fundamental and indispensable and integral to sensing with soul, to imaginal practice, and the whole soul-making dharma. But for some people—some of you might be interested in images, you like hearing about sacredness or whatever it is—but there really isn't that basis. We're back to foundations now, or foundations that can become roots, as we'll see. And there really isn't that developed basis of either awareness of the energy body or skill within. They might need to work and practice in different ways that really focus on that for a while.

Sometimes what's a factor here as well is that a person's not used to opening the energy body in the sense of having a lot of energy and openness in the energy body. We can feel the energy body at different times as being more or less energized, of course. For a lot of people, there's a whole range of holding and having energy course through the body, or the sense of the body being filled with much more energization than one is used to. For many people, that whole range of having more energy in the energy body, or the energy body being opened by having more energy, is just not an experience that they're used to. Many dharma practitioners as well.

So for some people, one piece of their developing the awareness and skill with the energy body is actually becoming used to having more energy.

One of the ways more energy flows through the energy body is through the long breath. In the Anapanasati Sutta, the Buddha begins with breathing in long breaths—the practitioner knows they're breathing in long, then breathing in short as the second instruction. Many times this simply gets ignored. It becomes just "okay, know whether your breath is long or short." But even that receives little attention, as people focus more on sensations at the abdomen or nostrils.

I'm not insisting on any particular interpretation. I don't really mind what the Buddha meant—it doesn't matter. My point is that one could read this as an active encouragement rather than just passive noticing. Actually breathe long for a while. Fill the body, the space of the body with prana, with the chi of the breath, with that sense. What this does is open and energize the energy body if you stay with it for a while.

Sometimes this proves quite unusual, and in being unusual, quite uncomfortable for people. They resist for all kinds of different reasons. Sometimes it's simply unfamiliar. Sometimes it's frightening. Sometimes there are other aspects of being that become attached or consequential when there's abundant energy. When there's much energy and openness in the energy body, it's hard for the mind not to open. It's hard for the soul not to open. It's hard for the emotions not to open. It's hard perhaps for certain psychological structures not to open or be revealed or changed.

The person may, consciously or unconsciously, feel some resistance to all that. There are countless possibilities for what may be happening. Sometimes one needs to explore those reservations or concerns, going into the psychology and working with it gradually and caringly. Other times, one doesn't. One simply needs to practice the long breath, for instance.

I gave some retreats on samatha and the art of concentration in 2007 and 2008. There's guidance there if you want it, and you can find it other places as well. But opening and energizing the energy body with that stage of breath practice is one example. One becomes accustomed to feeling it, used to the body being open and energized, having more energy. The capacity of the energy body grows.

I've tried to explain why this is relevant, but often a person simply doesn't see it as relevant anymore. They think other things are important, that something else is the issue. I'll return to that.

I've been lingering on this point of opening the energy body for a while. This openness of the energy body—you know, the energy body opens and closes all the time. It's doing that all day long in different stages of openness and closure for many different reasons. Practicing the long breath tends to open the energy body. When there's craving, it tends to contract the energy body. When there's eros, it tends to open the energy body, and so forth. There are many factors that influence the state of the energy body at any time.

But the capacity or accessibility or even the habit of opening the energy body may prove quite significant in the long term—certainly in one's practice and the direction of practice, and in one's life as well. Opening, opening. The openness of the energy body is not divorced from many other factors, as I mentioned a few minutes ago.

For example, radical generous courage—radical, courageous generosity—is also an opening of the being. You can see that. It's like the fist is closed, clinging onto what I've got: my coins, my pension, whatever it is. And there's an opening of the being. I have to open the fist to give.

So generosity is an opening, radical generosity that is almost courageous in how much it's giving. It too will have an effect. Everything's connected. The dependent origination can't get away from it. That opening of the being radically in radical generosity will open the heart, open the energy body, open the sense of self, opening all kinds of possibilities.

You can see, for example, sometimes a person's been practicing Dharma for thirty years, but they've never really practiced generosity, or the level at which they practice generosity is quite limited. I'm talking about all kinds of generosity here. There remains a sort of contractedness, a stinginess of being, just holding, holding oneself in, holding—almost like making this gesture, holding the energy body in. That's what happens when I'm not generous. And the opposite happens with generosity.

So you see some people, as I said, practice for thirty years, go all over the world, check this teacher out, check that, read this, read that, do this practice, do that practice, and something's still contracted. There's still this kind of almost perpetual tightness there. I mean, yes, some other things change, but still you get a sense of their being—there's something still kind of tight there.

Other people have been practicing much less time, but are willing to experiment with a kind of radical generosity of being and the courage that takes. And you see all kinds of consequences: an openness of being, openness of heart, ability to let go.

So there are a lot of factors—a lot of capabilities, readinesses, tendencies—that may be related to things like the ease of samādhi. I don't think we ask enough: How much is my openness and generosity connected with my capacity for samādhi? I would say a lot. Why? Because, again, they're both opennesses. Samādhi is a state of the energy body being open and a kind of surrendering to whatever—again, if we talk about the first jhāna, I'm surrendering. Part of it is, as much as I penetrate the pīti, the rapture, the bliss there, I'm also surrendering to it. I'm abandoning myself to it. I'm opening my energy body to that and letting it fill.

So this capacity, this readiness, this willingness and tendency to open in different ways is all connected. Again, a person might be practicing for twenty years and say, "I really need to work on my focus. My mind just wanders. I really need to just come back to the breath again and again and develop my concentration." And they're sort of interested in jhāna, but they've basically given up, and they keep trying to develop their concentration, convinced that if only they can just keep the mind in one place, nail it to whatever it is—the abdomen or the nostrils or whatever—that they will develop samādhi there. "My mind just keeps wandering. I just need to keep doing this."

And they don't see that actually their lack of opening to the loveliness of samādhi and the possibility of jhāna may actually be much more related to the openness of the energy body and the unfamiliarity or disinclination to open it, as we said before, with the generosity, with the long breath, whatever.

Sometimes one might hear this kind of thing and not even think it's significant, because they know what they need to do is just nail their mind, their attention, to the tip of the nose or whatever it is. And of course that is an aspect—that ability to stay focused, to concentrate in that narrow sense of the word, is a factor in the development of samādhi. But it's often just way too overemphasized. A person doesn't grasp the broader set of often much more significant conditions and factors that come together to allow deepening, allow opening to jhānic experience and that kind of thing.

But this openness in the energy body, and for example, what I'm calling radical generosity—that whole exploration and lovely territory—may also be related not just to the ease of samādhi that a person experiences, but also to their ability to let go in general. In other words, to their freedom. Again, you can see it in the analogy of opening the fist in giving, in generosity.

It might also be related not just to the ease of samādhi and the ability to let go in general, but also to one's capacity or propensity for religious feeling, what we might call —for devotion, for opening, for surrender, for a sense of divinity and all that. I'll come back to that in a second.

I'm not saying this is the only factor. There are lots of factors involved in developing samādhi, involved in our ability to let go in life and be free, and also lots of factors that feed what we might call religious openings, religious sensibility, religious devotion and attunement. But these factors that I'm pinpointing right now, coming out of our discussion about opening the energy body, they may be much more significant than we realize.

I have a colleague, Suvadharo—some of you will know him—and I was sitting in on a talk that he gave at Gaia House some years ago, and if my memory serves me, he said something I thought was great. He was talking to a room full of people about meditation, and he said, "You know, some of you would be actually much better served by opening your house to a refugee family than by sitting on a retreat."

That's a bold thing to say, and it probably startled quite a few people, I imagine. But again, it comes back to this radical generosity idea and the opening that comes from that and then what that sets in motion, or what it opens in the being, and the ramifications for letting go, for freedom, for opening sensibility, for samādhi—all kinds of things.

So there's a lot to consider here. All these things, as I said, will be mutually dependently arising. It's not that one thing comes first and then another. Any of them can feed the other.

A devotional experience will tend to open the energy body. Generosity will tend to open the energy body and potentially serve as one of the supports for the capacity for religious experience, for sensing the soul, all kinds of things.

Sometimes in relationship to practice, a person has been practicing for a while and encounters all this talk about letting go and craving and freedom, and they say, "I should let go of craving and aversion and fear." But it might well be that practicing, for instance, more generosity, practicing surrendering and abandoning in relationship, opening in relationship to the energy body and the sense of energy there—that may be much more helpful in supporting the ability to really let go of craving, aversion and fear, rather than simply saying, "Oh, I should. I've been practicing so long and I should."

These factors feed each other. I want to draw out one strand and repeat it: the capacity to open the energy body and the being in surrender to something higher—some kind of sense of divinity in the loosest, broadest sense. This opening of the energy body is related to our capacity to surrender, and not just to a jhanic experience or a dissolution of the self and the space that opens up there, but also our ability to surrender in devotion or have a devotional sense. It's the same kind of movement—there's a lot of overlap between what is actually happening in the soul, in the energy body there.

All these factors are tied together in a kind of mutual dependent origination. I'm hoping to offer in these talks certainly tips and techniques, but also things to consider and reflect on or to question, whether or not they might be relevant to you at any time.

When we talk like this, we want to really steer clear of a tendency to view myself, to view oneself in a certain way. So back to non-identification, anatta. "I am like this. I'm just closed. My heart is closed. I'm a miserable, stingy person. My energy body is closed. I'll never feel devotion. I am like this." As opposed to understanding the mind, the heart, the body, the energy body, the attention—all of this we could see, and I think it's very skillful to understand all those aspects of our being as habits. As habits, they're trainable, they're malleable, they're shapeable. They're not fixed in stone.

Yes, we can talk about habits of energy patterns. You can see it or sense it in people's bodies—there's a certain habit this way or that way. But it's not who I am. This is really, really important if you're listening to some of this and there's some kind of contraction of identification and either praising yourself or more commonly beating yourself up or despairing. It's really, really important.

At the same time, we can also talk about styles of soul, soul personae, if you like. Souls are different. They're still trainable and shapeable, but we're also born with different souls, different soul styles and different soul personae. There are these two balancing considerations when we're really looking at the whole thing. Yes, we have individual soul styles and soul personae that we seem to be thrown into this world with, or as. And all of it is trainable and malleable.

Just another brief point to consider is that the kind of dharma that one might gravitate towards might also be determined by, amongst other factors—and it's not going to be just one consideration—but it might be determined amongst other factors by, for instance, this capacity: How do I have the capacity to really open the energy body? And then related with that is the possibility: Is it possible for me to feel devotion? Is it possible to have a sense of divinity and dimensionality without which devotion remains fairly flat?

All these factors will contribute to determining what kind of dharma one gravitates towards. If there isn't the capacity to open the energy body, there might not be the capacity to give oneself in devotion in a really deep way that feels deep in the sense of permeating the levels of the soul and the body and the heart. And so one is less drawn to a dharma, for instance, like soul-making dharma that tends to talk in religious terms and soul terms, and devotion, and divinity, and all that. One may avoid samadhi practice in the sense of jhana practice, etc.

But it might be that these factors, our capacities here—or our trainings here, maybe that's a better way of saying it—our training of our capacities here may well determine our direction, not just in practice, but in life. That's not to say that any one dharma direction is better or worse. That's just a completely irrelevant thing to try and measure —soul-making dharma better than this dharma or Mahasi. It's just not interested in such comparisons.

But there are different styles, and different souls will be called to different styles. The question again is: am I permitting my being, my life, my soul, my practice to be called where it is truly called? Or is it constrained by just habit—for instance, the energy body not being open, which then limits my sense of capacity to open to any sense of divinity, making me uninterested in certain paths?

It's great if it's intrinsic to my being that I choose this path over that path. It's less great if I'm propelled in one direction rather than another only because my choice of direction is limited and constrained by habit, indoctrination, fear, or whatever it might be.

I'm reminded of an aphorism that Nietzsche wrote in Beyond Good and Evil: "The degree and kind of a man's sexuality reaches up into the topmost summit of his spirit." In a way, he's talking about the same thing. How we are with the body and our capacity or ability to open that body in surrender, in abandon, in connection—to tolerate a lot of charge, a lot of energy—all that's intimately related with how we are sexually.

This is obviously fraught territory, and there are all kinds of wounds people carry. But again, sometimes we can talk about different soul styles, different sexual styles that are more or less intrinsic. Sometimes we're talking about the result of wounding or indoctrination or intimidation. But there's a connection here between sexuality and what spiritual path and spiritual possibilities actually open up for us.

I know this is loaded and can be tender territory for people, but I hope you can understand the point I'm making without any temptation to judge yourself. Again, these are things to consider, things to reflect on. Is it relevant for me?

Let me say this again: it's not that one path is better or worse than another. What I want is this: am I free to choose? Am I free to choose according to what I love and what my soul feels drawn to and what makes sense to me?

First point. Second point to repeat: Yes, I think we can talk about different soul styles, different soul personae that we are born with, that we are given. I'm given my soul. How did it come to be that I'm like this? I'm given my soul, and it's a certain way, and it has certain tendencies and certain capacities, while other capacities are more limited, other tendencies are less developed.

So yes, there's that. We can talk about being given a certain soul intrinsically, and we can talk about the trainability and malleability of our capacities, tendencies, inclinations, and what's available and accessible to us.

There's another sense that we can talk about opening the energy body—meaning opening up in particular with regard to the image and the felt sense of the energy body. I've put this out recently, but I want to emphasize it to really make sure people get this development or furthering of the teachings and the possibilities in this teaching of the energy body.

We can, as I said, experience at any moment—whether we're with another or with an object in nature or just with ourselves in meditation or going about our day—we experience the energy a certain way. The energy of this body or the energy between bodies. There's a felt sense of that. There's also an image of it, as part of two of the three components of the energy body.

But it's another step to then see or sense that experience of energy at any time, to experience it as imaginal. So often when people talk about energy body or subtle body, there's either an explicit or implicit tendency—we're talking about something real here. Maybe not everyone can perceive it. Maybe scientists would quibble with it. But we're talking about something real. The energy is like this. My energy was like that.

That's all good and fine, but there's a kind of reification there. This is how it is. What happens when the felt sense of energy—well, when the image of the energy—is actually seen, sensed, conceived of, and felt as image? There are all kinds of possibilities here.

When this shift occurs, what needs to be present? The energy must become neither real nor not real, taking on that imaginal middle way quality with its theatre-like character. There's a recognition that this energy, this very sense of aliveness and connection, is itself a kind of sacred play, a divine imagination expressing itself through our embodied experience.

This transformation from ordinary experience to imaginal perception can be quite profound. What was perhaps initially felt as simple sexual attraction or energetic exchange suddenly opens into something more mysterious, more pregnant with meaning. The energy itself becomes a character in the sacred drama, neither merely physical nor purely conceptual, but occupying that fertile middle ground where the imaginal dwells.

Sometimes practitioners report that when they make this shift - when they consciously choose to see and feel the energy as imaginal rather than simply as experience - the whole quality of the encounter changes. There's often more space around it, less of the compulsive quality that can sometimes accompany strong energetic experiences. The energy becomes more workable, more fluid, more available for the deeper transformations that imaginal practice can offer.

This principle extends far beyond dyadic work, of course. In solo practice, one might experiment with seeing whatever energetic experiences arise - whether it's the simple aliveness in the hands during meditation, or more complex energy body experiences, or even difficult emotions that carry their own particular energetic signature - as imaginal rather than just as experiences happening to us.

The invitation is always the same: can this energy, whatever its flavor or intensity, be held and perceived and related to as imaginal? Can it participate in that sacred theatre where meaning and transformation become possible? This doesn't diminish the reality of the experience - quite the opposite. It opens the experience to depths of significance and possibility that purely literalistic perception cannot access.

What emerges from this way of working is often a much more fluid and creative relationship with the whole spectrum of our energetic life. The body becomes a space of sacred imagination, and our various energies become the very medium through which the imaginal expresses itself.

What factors need to ignite to make that shift? And again, with that transformation, the whole texture of the experience, its range and dimension, and what opens in the entirety of the experience might change.

For instance, where I was imaged but the other wasn't, and there was just this sexual energy that wasn't quite imaginal, both might become subsumed. Self and other might become imaginal. The eros itself, the sexual image, the images, the energy and desire—all of that might then ignite. The sense might arise of participating mystically in some kind of cosmic sacrament, again with that participation and cosmic dimensionality.

This attraction here, this sexual image, reveals other dimensions—cosmic dimensions. It becomes a holy sacrament that has its roots, its origins in the mundus imaginalis, in the world of images. Everything becomes imaginal there. So that's one example of the kind of opening that might occur.

I'll give one more example to end tonight, again speaking to the impact of that shift. I was practicing in a dyad, and the person I was practicing with was gazing at me and describing her experience. Almost all of what she described was energy body experience. I was very sensitive to her gestures, felt very sensitive to her words and her energy. The concertina opened for me.

As we've discussed, concertina as one of the elements, one of the nodes, refers to the spread of potential images, the incipient or inchoate images waiting in the wings around a central perception. They're not fully present or fully dominant there, but nothing really ignited to become fully imaginal.

As I was there and she was describing her energy body experience, and I was there with that sensitivity and the sense of the concertina, something felt slightly blocked in the process, despite my partner having strong energy openings which she was describing to me. There was a lot of energy, and she was being very careful and mindful in attending to it and opening to it and sharing it.

Then I asked her at a certain point, "Is that perception of energy, is it an imaginal perception?" She got it immediately and it shifted as a result of my just dropping that in, or rather she did something inside to shift it to an image of energy. The energy openings she was feeling and sensing were regarded as imaginal.

The point I want to make is partly about the effects of that, but partly about dyad practice. When she made that shift, I felt my experience open up to image. What I'd felt a little blocked in my experience from my end—like the whole thing wasn't fully imaginal, was just sort of potential there in the wings, the concertina, but something felt like it wasn't quite igniting—that's really interesting. Her experience changed, and my experience changed.

This is fascinating to me, again about the effects of what we call a shift of level—of sensing energy as image, as imaginal image, and the capacity to do that, and what happens when we do that. The second point is how interesting this is regarding dependent arising of experience in a dyad. My experience depended on a subtle shift in how she viewed her experience.

Something happens in one person, in one component of the dyad, and something correspondingly is then allowed to open in the other and in the dyad as a whole. So yes, there's the significance and power of the option of sensing the energy body or the energy field between two people—of sensing it with soul, rather than just as plain experience or fact, which is the default and implicit way we tend to sense energy, if we sense it at all.

But secondly, there's this fascinating and mysterious sense of what happens between two people when one person has a certain shift, or makes a certain shift in their experience—in this case, viewing the energy as imaginal rather than just as energy—and how that then affects the dyad, affects the other person's experience, and affects the whole range of what then becomes possible.

I think I'll stop there for this evening.

CHAPTER 176

Heat and the Material

Rob Burbea · 1h58

In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea delves into the complex relationship between emotions and soul-making practice, addressing how our cultural conditioning shapes views of healthy psychology and emotional life. He explores how emotions can function as "heat" in an alchemical crucible, allowing psychic material to ferment and give birth to imaginal images. Burbea discusses various approaches to working with difficult emotions—from mindful pacification to creating supportive containers that allow emotions to transform rather than simply dissolve.

The talk examines why some practitioners struggle to access intrapsychic images, often due to habitual patterns of dismissing or atomizing emotional experiences. Through detailed guidance and case examples, Burbea illustrates how emotions like anger, when properly contained and respected rather than immediately dismissed, can become foundations for soul-making practice. He emphasizes that emotions may need to be felt within a certain range—neither suppressed nor overwhelming—to support the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

Burbea also explores the mutual dependent origination between soul-stretching experiences and image generation, suggesting that moral challenges, heart stretches, and conceptual breaking can create particularly fertile conditions for imaginal practice. The talk concludes with practical navigation principles, including working through the energy body and recognizing dynamic elements within apparently static images.

This evening I'd like to speak about emotions and the relationship with emotions—the conception of emotions and skill with emotions in the context, mostly, of imaginal practice and soul-making.

One really general thing I'd like to say right from the start, and actually emphasize because I think it's quite important: when we talk about anything at all, but certainly when we talk about emotions, and we're being perhaps a little prescriptive in the sense of "try and do this with the emotions," or "this is what's good with the emotions," or "this is what's healthy," or "this is what a healthy psychology is"—certainly when we talk about our views about emotions and psychology, I think two things are really important to say.

I don't think human beings will ever come to the end, reach some final understanding of emotionality and emotional life and everything that's involved there. It's one of those rich, endlessly rich, endlessly fertile mysteries of human existence and of the soul. So that puts us in a relationship of necessary humility, inquiry, experimentation, open-endedness with regards to emotion and also psychologies. That's not to say that we then throw out any exploration or throw out any conceptions or ideas or conceptual frameworks or approaches—not that at all. But we hold them in an awareness of an ongoing exploration that I don't think we'll ever finally figure out. And hooray for that, I say.

The second thing, and it's related, is that when we talk about emotions and human psychology and someone puts forth certain kinds of ideals or divides what's a healthy kind of emotional life or approach to the emotions from an unhealthy one, we need to really be aware that those kinds of views are enormously culturally, historically situated and therefore conditioned.

It's easy for us to read a contemporary psychology book that says something about emotions and psychology—how it works and what they are and where they come from and what they need to be and what a healthy emotional life looks like—and kind of assume that, oh, that's right, and perhaps other periods in history or other cultures are engaged in repression or hysteria or whatever it is. I think there's an arrogance in that, and we, all of us, including myself, need to be careful about that kind of thing.

You only need to look around in contemporary cultures, cultures that exist in the world, and even subcultures—like this particular Dharma culture, or that particular Dharma culture, this religious culture, or that secular culture, this group, that group, let alone nationalities and ethnic heritages—to see what a huge range there is of what's regarded as healthy, appropriate, helpful, normal relationship with and conception of and attitude to emotions.

So I'm going to say some things—some things to reflect on, to consider, to work with perhaps with regard to our soul-making paradigm. But the whole thing has, if you like, a huge caveat that we can all remember about the cultural historical situatedness and therefore contingency of views and psychologies around areas like emotion.

Actually related to that, it's interesting that it might be, given perhaps certain contemporary views about healthy psychology and healthy emotional life, that some of the people who are attracted to the soul-making dharma and this kind of paradigm are people who, let's say, tend to be quite passionate, tend to love deeply. There was that psychology book from the eighties—what is it? Women Who Love Too Much or something? I never read it. I actually don't know what it said, but such people might be seen by others as having a style of loving that is hysterical. There's something unhealthy, out of balance there, just a bit off or too much or whatever.

Or it might be assumed that this person is that way—they tend to be overly passionate or love too much, whatever that means, or too deeply or whatever—because of some early lack rooted in their upbringing, in their childhood, probably their family, the mother, the father, whatever it is. And what's really driving this, quote, "loving too much" or being so passionate is some kind of neediness, some kind of clinging, a tendency to papañca, some kind of hysteria.

But to some of those people, the soul-making dharma will be very attractive and make sense. Yes, for some people, the way passion moves in them, the way emotion moves in them, the way love moves them, it may move them to certain manifestations of clinging, of papañca, or a kind of craving that becomes a neediness. But it may not always be because of some cause in their personal history. It may not just be a defilement that's driving them, a kilesa.

But it may be actually for that person that there is already a lot of eros and tendency to image in their soul. That's the soul that they are, the soul that they were given, that they were gifted with. And it's a lot to learn how to handle such a soul that has a lot of eros, that has a tendency to image. It's like being given a gift of a powerful horse, and you actually have to learn how to ride that horse, and that takes some time. It's very different if someone gives you a gift of a little pony.

So some people may have such souls—such rich, deep, fiery souls, lots of eros, lots of tendency towards image or inclination towards image, ease with image. But there's very little help or guidance in the culture in being able to ride that, relate skillfully to that soul so that this tremendous gift can actually flourish. Without such guidance, one gets thrown out of the saddle, trampled on, starts galloping away in this or that direction completely out of one's control.

There's very little help or guidance in the culture to allow that soul to make soul, to engage in soul-making, for the eros-psyche-logos dynamic to expand and enrich and deepen in the ways that we've talked about. So in the absence of that help and that guidance and that ability to learn, that support in learning that, it does go towards craving. The eros does become craving. What could have become imaginal does become papañca, unfixated image.

So for some people, with that kind of style of persona, of soul, it may be that part of what's happening is they're attracted to the soul-making teachings because they recognize something there. It's not just a cheap kind of legitimization of their quirky foibles or pathologies. There's something deep there, but you need to learn how to relate to this—how to ride and befriend that horse. So it really can be a gift, a powerful gift.

Of course, not everyone attracted to the soul-making dharma has that kind of soul style or psychology. There's a big range, and some tend toward much more apparent equanimity, calmness, steadiness. Some have a range, so I don't want to restrict it to that style, but just in terms of cultural views around emotion and what's considered healthy psychology.

Following on from this, I said recently in the Roots into the Grand Soul retreat that for a large portion of imaginal practice and soul-making practice, especially when there's dukkha, we have to realize that our relationship to the emotions needs to fall within a certain range in order that they can ferment the soul-making process, fertilize, and give rise to images. I think I used the analogy earlier in this series of talks of a crucible, an alchemical vessel. And if that crucible doesn't do its job of containing the material and tolerating the heat, allowing the contents to ferment and undergo the soul-making dynamic, then images won't arise.

For some people—and again, there's so much that really needs to be individually tailored in these teachings—part of the reason they might say, "I don't get images, I don't get intra-psychic images. I can kind of sense a sacredness in the environment of a certain kind, but I don't tend to get any images, or very, very few"—for some of those people, it may be that there are certain habits in their ways of relating to their emotional life that mean the crucible is broken in a not very helpful way. The vessel doesn't conduct heat, however we want to stretch this alchemical analogy.

In alchemy, sometimes what the alchemical material needs is heat, and that's part of the process. You put something in a vessel, a crucible, and you heat it, and that allows something to happen. Sometimes the material itself is generating heat, like compost or fermenting material. But there's a way that if we talk about heat as the emotional life, there's a relationship there. Not always—I'll come back to that—but for some people, without them really realizing it, the crucible around the emotions is not built well. It's not serving the purpose for imaginal practice. It might serve all kinds of other purposes in their life.

Some people are habituated to not actually registering or not even allowing certain emotions and certain emotional intensity, and they don't even realize that pattern. Sometimes that kind of pattern is actually sanctioned by role models these people may come into contact with, or by the Dharma itself preaching this sort of even equanimity. So such a person—sometimes that's the reason, not always, but sometimes that's a reason or part of a set of conditions preventing the birth, the arising of certain intra-psychic images.

It might look from the outside like this person is a good practitioner, a good Buddhist. They're calm, reasonable, even-keeled, certainly warm and friendly. But the way they are with emotions, or certain emotions at least, doesn't allow the kind of heating up or galvanizing of the whole soul-making dynamic in terms of generating images.

There's another way where someone actually does have a lot of emotions, but for different reasons—either just a lack of training (that's why we call this skill with emotions and the art of being with emotions, working in different ways with emotions and having that range, different approaches in different situations and for different ends)—someone may not have had that training. It just wasn't really given. Or they may have a tendency toward a lot of emotions—they do tend to feel anger or jealousy or judgmentalism or huge passion, whatever it is (we're talking now about the more difficult emotions)—but they don't really have the training and skill, the art of working well with those emotions to create a kind of crucible.

Or again, they have a kind of unquestioned indoctrination from Dharma teaching where they know they're feeling something—jealousy, anger, whatever—but they also know from their Dharma teachings that it's really not good, not helpful, it's a defilement. So the way they relate to it leaves them caught between a rock and a hard place. It's going on, they're sort of entangled in it, it's got them a little bit, and at the same time they're trying to dismiss it and push it away, get beyond it or get over it. So it's not that the emotions aren't arising, but there's this arising accompanied by judging themselves for having it or trying to get rid of it or pre-deciding that it's unhelpful.

Now, of course, for some people and for any person at any time, images don't just arise out of the heat of emotions, and certainly don't just arise out of dukkha. They can come out of the deep cool of equanimity—the Buddha often talks about the coolness of equanimity, the depths of that equanimity. Because equanimity is very related to unfabricating, and in the coolness, in the equanimity, in the unfabricating, there's this liquefying that I talk about sometimes. The liquefying of things, and out of that coolness can come very beautiful sensing with soul and other images.

So if we talk about heat meaning emotion and the material, it's not always the case that we need a lot of heat, or even any apparent heat. Sometimes it will come from coolness. So again, you can hear how when I say something, there's a caveat—really this is... or there's an "in this case, in that case, on the other hand, it could be..."

So when you listen, please regard these as things to consider, and really to ask yourself, because oftentimes I see these kinds of things are going on for people, and they're just not aware that they're going on. They're just not aware that that's a pattern that they're in.

Now, of course, Eros is a form of fire and heat, and I think I used that analogy in one of the talks on another course. So we can include that. But when we talk about heat, we might mean the whole range—coolness, eros, the whole range of emotions. Seemingly pathological emotions, seemingly beautiful emotions, joy, love, all that.

But this is important, this factor: it may be the case with some people that the way of —or a certain range of ways of relating to the emotions—are just not accessible to that person. And so a kind of opening up, a self-awareness, an opening up and a training, an extension of one's habits needs to happen. All this is complicated and very individual, I think. So I'm making general points, but it's very individual.

Some people—I remember talking with someone not too long ago, actually feels a lot of different emotions, but not anger, this person. Didn't feel anger, and I think she was on the retreat where we did a little bit of movement and sort of careful—some were quite extravagant and energized movements, almost violent movements and soundings, and some were much more subtle. But she was on that retreat, and when we did certain movements that involved stomping and roaring and stuff like that, she just said it just didn't resonate at all. There was just nothing in her that felt any need for that or any place for that. It was slightly puzzling. I think a few people had different kinds of reactions because it was quite intense.

I'm talking about this person now. So lots of emotions were there to feel, but not anger. But this person also has a history of depression. And what's becoming clear is that in certain situations, when something feels unjust or she feels something that's angering her—what a person's doing or what a group is doing or some dynamic or something—that actually the anger doesn't even register. It completely bypasses the anger and instead it goes into depression, in this case a very, very vicious depression, very self-destructive.

Which is one of the—I've seen that before in both some friends and other practitioners. And again, it might be—I don't think it was in this case, but it might be sometimes a shadow of Dharma teaching that automatically puts anger in the category of defilement, kilesa, and something to be shunned and not allowed.

But in this case, there was a beginning to notice that link: "Okay, I feel, or I go into this depression when I feel somehow silenced or shut up." Now, maybe partly the external situation was silencing her to a certain extent, but a lot of the silencing was just internal. There was some mechanism operating below the radar of consciousness that just didn't allow the anger to be registered or felt or validated. And it went straight—the anger was turned on the self in a very deep and destructive way. Very, very painful. Paralyzingly painful.

So this pattern began to become clear. And it might be then that a stage of practice for that person is actually to realize that and perhaps replay a scenario—now I feel shut down, now I feel depressed—let's go back to that situation where it seems linked somehow and actually replay the scenario in one's imagination and slow it down a little bit. There, how do I feel about being shut up? How do I feel the frustration, the pent-up energy in that? How do I feel about what these people are saying or what they're trying to do or how they're manipulating, or how it seems they're manipulating the situation?

And not worry so much. So it's a practice. It's in a safe space. It's internal or with a friend or with a teacher in an interview, whatever it is. And actually slow it down. Not worry about: is this right? Is it wrong? Was it really the perception that they were manipulating, or am I just projecting that? Don't worry about that. Don't worry: am I going to then bite this person's head off? Don't worry. You just practice actually slowing the thing down and just—there, what's that feeling right there? It might start as frustration. It might start as just a feeling in the energy body, but we want to feel that energy in the energy body and have it be okay.

If we recognize it's anger, and you want to fucking kill that person, it's like okay—feel that, and really have that be okay. This doesn't mean you're going to kill the person. It doesn't mean you may or may not even say anything to that person—that comes later. But to actually feel it, give it some degree of respect, feel it in the energy body, give it some degree of respect—that's a huge step and hugely important.

So if we talk about—again, with all the caveats I said right at the beginning about cultural conditioning and views and being historically situated and contingent in that way—but it might be, speaking now in this culture and from the point of view of our paradigm and what we're elaborating in terms of soul psychology, it might be that this ability and willingness to actually recognize anger, feel it, contain it in the energy body, and give it some degree of validation in the sense of not just immediately dismissing it—at least that—may be what we call a foundational element of soul-making practice and dharma. It may be one of the foundations.

It may well be, again given all the caveats I said about culture and history, also one of the foundations just of psychological health. And it may be one of the foundations of healthy relationship, human relationship. But more than that, it may be one of the building blocks, one of the foundations of imaginal practice and soul-making dharma. This person could have lots of images, but it may be that in certain directions or certain possibilities of images never could arise.

Such a foundation, if it is a foundation of soul-making practice, might be, in the longer term, an example of a foundation that becomes a root, that then becomes something that itself is living and growing and nourishing. So this ability to feel anger, to tolerate it, to feel it in the body, to recognize it, to not dismiss it—yes, good part of emotional awareness, skill, health, etc. Yes, a part of what can then allow images to come. But it might be at a certain point that that becomes a root in the sense that the anger itself, to follow this example, the anger itself becomes imaginal. The anger itself becomes an erotic object.

Does that mean now I'm going to become hysterical and go out and buy a gun? No, of course not. We've talked about all this, about reification and literalization and the non-danger of that if one is really listening and following the teachings.

So there's one thing to have just a crucible that can hold material that can then ferment to create images. It's another step, perhaps, that that material itself becomes imaginable, that anger itself becomes imaginable, erotic. It starts to have other dimensions. It starts to have divinity. It starts to have even eternality. It starts to have theatros. It starts to have fullness of intentions wrapped in all that grace, even the grace of anger, participation in divine anger—all kinds of possibilities.

So there may seem to be an obvious progression here. First you develop the human psychological skill as a foundation that allows certain directions and openings of images that might not have been otherwise available. And then it may be in time that that kind of emotion or these kinds of emotions also become roots in the sense they become roots—like I said, alive, vital part, nourishing part of the actual structure of the soul-making, as opposed to just something on which soul-making is built.

And again, lots of caveats because there's so much individual variation. Sometimes things don't happen in the sort of obvious linear order of progression, of gradual progression—first this, the easy step, then the intermediate step, then the advanced step. Sometimes the advanced step, or what is apparently the advanced step, happens first, and everything happens in the reverse order. Sometimes divine anger opens up as an image, and that image itself then allows—in drawing on the image, being supported by the image, nourished by the image, bringing that image back in a kind of, as a tincture into human situations, either meditating on it beforehand or in this almost homeopathic background way while one's in relationship—that the image itself then allows healthy human relationships at the normal, at the conventional level, etc. And it may change the relationship with the energy body and allow other possibilities in terms of opening up the energy in the energy body, etc.

Yes, we can talk about, "Well, generally this is easier and that builds on this and that builds on the second bit," etc. But sometimes things happen in very different orders and an image is given and everything shakes down or is informed by that image top-down, so to speak, from the divine to the human, if we use such language.

So there's something in here—you know, notice I said not dismissing it, a certain amount of validation—there's something similar, maybe some of you can recognize already, with a step in what we call the OCD practice, or the opening to the current of desire, a step of which is just to suspend the value judgment, the negative value judgment about what we're desiring. And just entertain the idea, even just for a limited time in practice, entertain the idea that there might be treasure here. Possibly there's treasure in this thing that I've been taught is akusala, that looks like a defilement, that's certainly difficult, that I'm a little bit wary of because heaven knows what might come out of my mouth or what I might say and do.

But there's something similar in terms of, let's just suspend that judgment and can I just drop in a grain of trust, maybe for a limited amount of time. Maybe there's a treasure here in this difficult emotion.

So there's a lot here. There's a lot about just healthy internal psychology, about human relationships, and certainly about working with images and the receiving or generating of images. And there's so much more to say. There's a whole step in learning how—and this is an aside now—but how do I express that anger in a way that's helpful and skillful? And the Buddha talks about our skill in communicating the difficult, etc. And that usually takes time. I have to say that usually really takes time to learn how to do that. But again, there are always exceptions.

As I said, some people may need to work more with their emotions. In some instances, there's apparent skill with certain emotions. A person might say, "I'm good with this kind of emotion, that kind of emotion." It looks like they're working with it, being present with it. But other emotions remain completely out of bounds. Again, there's tremendous individual variation here.

It might be that a person needs to allow or feel more, to get into or sit with particularly the difficult emotions. Sometimes positive emotions are equally hard to tolerate—a lot of joy or a lot of love. These aren't culturally normal, and we're not used to that intensity. But sometimes a person needs to actually be in that more and more inclusively, not refusing, not ignoring, not veering away from the emotions they habitually or dogmatically don't like, don't approve of, don't trust.

This allows the psychic energy in the emotion to form a kind of crucible and give birth to, ferment an image that is powerfully soul-making.

Having said that—again, a caveat—is this a universal truth? I don't think so. There are all kinds of other factors, as I mentioned earlier. This is just one factor, but it's really worth looking inside over a period of time, reflecting, asking questions. Maybe even ask a good friend what they think, because sometimes we can't see ourselves that clearly, or a teacher who knows you well.

So is it a universal truth? I don't think so. It may be that some people or some cultures—as we're talking now about what might inhibit the transubstantiation of psychic material into an image, the giving birth to images in the imaginal world—it may be that some people, some cultures actually need much less of the galvanizing that happens from emotions, much less of that kind of heat in order to give rise to images. And that may be for different reasons.

It may be that such a person is more accustomed to and more comfortable with a logos, a conceptual framework that supports the imaginal. So their default logos, or they can happily and fairly easily spend time entertaining a conceptual framework that's actually much more supportive to the imaginal. Someone else may be okay with their emotions, but there are certain concepts or conceptual frameworks that are just locked into place—again, maybe consciously, maybe unconsciously. And that's the reason.

Whereas the other person, as I said, is comfortable with a certain logos, and that logos is well-oiled. It's not like an unfamiliar, clunky, or rusty piece of machinery. It's quite smooth, quite ready, quite accessible. So that's a factor.

It may be, too, just what arises from meditation habit. One person might have much less of a habit of dismissing images in practice. They're so trained—as I was for many years—in dismissing any kind of image, just through the usual instructions of mindfulness. You might note something and put it aside, or you're concentrating on your breath, so images or whatever else are just irrelevant.

This might be trained over months, years, decades in some cases, like my own. And that actually means certain pathways have to get oiled, have to get smooth, have to be opened up, because there's such a habit of immediately dismissing any image that comes. "That's just a daydream. It's not what meditation's about." And that can become a deeply ingrained habit.

It may be as well, as I mentioned earlier, that there's just a different—and I think there is—just a different natural propensity in different souls to have more or less images, to have that more accessible.

And then, of course, there's cultural situatedness. There may be for some a kind of cultural affirmation and reinforcement of images—certainly deep images. So maybe in certain more religious cultures, or for a person who has had that background where deep images—by deep I mean not necessarily imaginal in our sense with all the imaginal Middle Way and all that, but deep in the sense that they touch the soul and they're designed to touch the soul. Not just an image of whatever—an advert for an SUV car or whatever—which interestingly try to touch something in us of our longing for freedom, mystery, beauty, autonomy, the image of the self. Well, the car ads are really about the image of the self.

Anyway, but in certain cultures where there's an affirmation, a reinforcement, a normality for deep images, and those deep images are public, shared, talked about, respected, venerated even—all that is also going to shape and support the arising of images for an individual person. Someone else is in a culture that dismisses or denigrates images that just don't have any place except at the most superficial level of adverts and consumer culture.

It might also be—again, we're talking now about what allows images to arise more or less easily—it may be for some people that emptiness practices and understandings have gone deep enough to liquefy and divinize all perception. So I outlined this in the book Seeing That Frees: emptiness goes deep, deep, deep into the unfabricated, and then, if you like, out the other end, where one realizes that sacredness is everywhere, not just in the unfabricated as opposed to the fabricated.

So maybe for some people, and for myself—I shared this before—I think that was my path to the imaginal. It opened up through pursuing emptiness deeply. But not for everyone. Yet for some people, that will be a very significant factor: there's often enough accessibility to that kind of liquefied and divinized perception of everything.

It may be, again, that the energy body awareness is just more readily and wholly available. So again, we're talking about what are the elements that need to be there? And we've talked so much in the past few years about how just opening up the energy body can help support the movement towards even the reception of images, and then the images becoming more imaginally alive.

So there are lots of factors here, but this business about emotions, as I said, is really worth considering and developing one's skill there, wherever one's at with it.

I've mentioned in the past when I talk about the breaking of the vessels and the Kabbalistic term shevirat hakelim. We could say something more general: the soul-making dynamic, or soul-making over time—not necessarily from any individual image, but soul-making certainly over time—involves and catalyzes a stretching, a stretching of our being, of our soul, of our mind, of our heart, of our energy body range. There may be a shattering, this breaking of the vessels, a certain kind of tension.

With all that, often some territories of unsureness, complication. In the very dynamic itself, we talk about how the eros-psyche-logos dynamic complexifies itself so that the image becomes more complex. The ideas, the available ideas that are implicit as conceptions within perception, become more complicated, or as seeds for perception and reflection become more complicated. One's relationships may become more complicated.

Over time: stretch, shattering, tension, unsureness, complication, fertility, and ask—or several asks, challenge, duty. In other words, yes, tremendous beauty in the soul-making process, in the soul-making dynamic, but also difficulty as well, challenge and difficulty.

And so sometimes I feel when people only report loveliness from the whole imaginal and soul-making practices that it may be that they're missing something. Again, there's lots of individuality here, but it may be that a whole wing, if you like, is not being allowed, not explored so much.

I think I talked about that in the talk called "The Spreading of Five Wings"—that short talk is a reminder of what may need opening to and including and extending, what ranges may need extending as we grow in the soul-making. And again, given the caveat that souls are different, therefore the ranges are different—people have different ranges, maybe we could say almost intrinsically, and it can be trained.

But the point is that generally soul-making, not necessarily from any individual image, but generally over time, involves difficulty and challenge and stretch and the discomfort of that, as well as the beauty and the ease and the liberation.

Let's go back to that passage from Genesis that I mentioned the other day: Jacob wrestling the angel. The wound and the blessing came together in that case. And there's something, again, reading that story through the poetic lens of the soul-making dharma and the conception and the imaginal sensibilities—the blessing and the wound go together. No blessing, no wound. And so this is often the case with soul-making and the soul-making dynamics, certainly over time.

So this is interesting. Let me try and explain this. Having said what we just said, I want to talk about why it is sometimes, or why it may be, what might be the case for some people who feel like, "I don't get many images, certainly not intrapsychic images."

So it may be for some people that this is relevant: In imaginal images, if they're really allowed to galvanize the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, as we just said, there will be an opening, a stretching, potentially a breaking—either a gradual stretching or a breaking of vessels—as part of the soul-making dynamic sometimes.

Now, here's what I want to add to this. So many things in the domains of psychology, spirituality, soul work, dharma, where there's a dependency one way—in other words, this stretching, this sometimes uncomfortable breaking of vessels and stretching with all the potential difficulties that I just outlined, where that's dependent on the soul-making dynamic—the dependency often runs both ways.

So when you see a dependency one way, where as part of the gift there can also be the challenge, the stretching, the breaking, where there's dependency one way like that, we can usually expect—it's usually really worth looking for—the dependency runs the other way too. Dependency is usually mutual, mutual dependent origination. This depends on that, but that also depends on this.

In other words, when we are opened up—mind, heart, sometimes body—when we're stretched, when we're broken sometimes, or there's a breaking of vessels, whether that feels like internal mental vessels and containers and compartments and understandings, whether it's relational, whether it's philosophical or emotional—when there's that, in the reverse dependency, that very opening, stretching, breaking can give rise to images and to eros.

So when we're in love, something is really opening and being stretched in us. And our whole perception, not just of the beloved, but also of the self and the world—something's really being stretched there, with all the craziness of falling in love. So it's not necessarily always just a stroll in the park, being in love.

When we're in a moral crisis, that kind of stretch—and I'm going to come back, as I said in the introductory talk, I'm hoping that I will have time and capacity to come back and talk about morality and ethics. But one of the things is, in a way, it's hard to be a sensitive human being these days and not feel some degree of moral crisis with the complexity of the world and the difficulty of what's going on globally.

But certainly when we're in moral crisis, that's also an opening, a stretching, a tearing of the fabric of the view, of the heart, of the inclinations, of the desires, of the will. Or when there's a moral stretch where we feel called to take a stand, to speak, to act in a certain way that may require all kinds of courage, stepping out of our comfort zones—it stretches us in some way morally, or a heart stretch, or our ideas of this or that, our conceptual frameworks, maybe a map of the path, or an idea of who we are, or what the world is.

When we encounter teachings or teachers that profoundly touch our soul, this too creates a sacred stretch. Our existing frameworks—what we thought we knew about healthy psychology, our conceptual maps of the spiritual path, our fundamental understanding of who we are or what the world is—all these may be broken open or expanded.

When ideas shatter in this way, when our familiar containers can no longer hold what we're experiencing, these become examples of being opened, stretched, broken—vessels breaking or expanding beyond their previous limits. When we're stretched in these profound ways, then again, because of mutual dependent arising, these become particularly fertile times for images to arise.

And the images that emerge can be deep, deep guides for our soul. They have everything to do with the angel out ahead. They have everything to do with what we feel called toward, what we want to move toward—with eros itself.

So by "stretched," listen carefully to the kinds of stretch I'm describing. I'm not simply talking about being busy. Most people nowadays are too busy—we're all too busy in that superficial way. Neither am I talking about mere ego concerns—worrying about giving a presentation and what others might think of me.

I'm talking about soul concerns. The soul being stretched by soul-making itself. This organ of soul that we've discussed—the one that senses in particular ways and yearns to sense in particular ways—actually grows. We make soul. We add to it. It becomes a bigger, more complex, more multifaceted organ. And when we're stretched, when the soul is stretched by deep soul concerns, then that becomes particularly fertile soil for images to arise.

One reason some people may not experience intrapsychic images—and I don't want to present this as a universal rule, but it's worth honest, deep reflection—is that they actually avoid moral stretches and crises. They may be busy doing good work in the world, but there's no genuine risk involved. There's very little breaking out of established molds, no truly courageous taking of stands, no extending beyond what has become routine, ordinary, or comfortable.

Because such a person is actually living in a constrained way—and they might not even realize it, thinking "I'm engaged in good work, I'm a Dharma teacher, or a psychologist, or whatever"—their soul isn't being stretched in certain essential ways. They're not placing themselves in situations that would create that sacred stretch, that would make things somewhat unstable, that would risk the kind of extension and perhaps even breaking that constitutes crisis.

I remember when I first began giving talks on soul-making and the imaginal—for a year or two, I think. As I shared in the last retreat, there was a real stretch for me. Even though some people had been quite hostile to emptiness teachings for various reasons, the level of hostility and anger from some people regarding soul-making and imaginal teachings was quite remarkable.

Going places to give talks, or even at Gaia House in some situations, I would feel: "Wow, this is a stretch." Not just the material itself—which by its very nature was stretching, even breaking, the Dharma paradigm, depending on your perspective—but also putting myself in situations where I could sense the hostility, where people would write notes or speak to me with considerable antagonism.

That stretch itself, knowing I was entering those situations while wanting to offer this material that felt deeply important to my soul, to soul in general, to the Dharma, to our culture—that required courage. I was taking a stand for something essential. And that was enormously fertile in terms of giving rise to images that echoed and mirrored that very situation, that very difficulty. Really helpful images, profoundly fertile ones.

Having cancer and probably dying soon—that's also a stretch. That whole strand of my life in recent years involves a kind of breaking: breaking of the body, breaking of life, breaking of one's continuities and relationships. This too constitutes a stretch of the soul and being, encompassing deep soul concerns.

The unfolding tragedies of climate change and ecological degradation, mass species extinction—these tragedies can be felt as something truly breaking in the heart, in our being, in the fabric of our civilizations. It's breaking the fabric of the only home we know in the universe, the fabric of nature in which we're so deeply embedded.

Anger, especially the righteous indignation we can feel in response to moral issues or regarding climate change and species extinction and humanity's insufficient response—that anger arising from deep soul concerns can also be ripping at fabrics and stretching things.

It might simply be being touched in our soul by a teaching, a teacher, or a tradition.

It might not even be our main tradition, but all these are examples of things that stretch the soul and open things up and maybe break things in us, break vessels in us, and that can give rise to images.

There's this mutual dependent origination between soul stretch and soul-making as part of what's going on in the soul-making process. We stretch the soul by what we're opening to, or opening ourselves to, or the situations we're putting ourselves in life. Stretch the soul in life, and there's soul-making that happens through that, very probably with lots of imaginal images being part of that process of soul-making. And where there's soul-making over time, there will be a stretch. So the dependency is mutual—it runs both ways.

In the opening talk of this course, I made a categorization into three modes. There's what we might call fixated images and papañca as one mode of the imagination. There is mindful awareness or deconstruction of images as a second form. And the third is allowing the images or supporting the images to become imaginal and soul-making.

Wrapped up in those three, we can also trace a corollary tripartite division of the relationship with emotions. In the case of papañca and fixated image, the emotions are usually unskillful. They're not helpful—they've got us in their grip, and we're being sent through the spinner. They've got us, and they're unskillful emotions. Even if there's love, there's a lot of grasping or clinging in it.

When we're mindful of what's going on—like there's some tendency to papañca, there's a certain image—and when we're just mindful of that, it tends to quiet, to pacify the emotions. That movement is actually part of a larger movement of lessening fabrication. So also the emotion itself is fabricated less, and we go towards a coolness, a calming, a kind of emotional neutrality. Mindfulness, as I've pointed out several times, is just a certain degree of less fabrication. So we're fabricating less story, less self, less image, less emotion.

In contrast, when we're on the imaginal track, then the emotions—we form a kind of crucible for the emotions so that the emotions can be integral and part of, and nourish the whole, giving birth to the imaginal. Then they tend to—they might still be intense, so they're not necessarily pacified, they might be intense—but they're transformed, or given other dimensions, or other roots, and they tend to be liberated in the best sense.

Just to linger on this tripartite division for a moment: there are ways of being with emotions. For example, in typical mindfulness instructions, we let go of the story, let go of the self. What that does is there is a little less fabrication that pacifies the emotions. And in so doing, it doesn't become soul-making. That's just a pacification. It doesn't become imaginal—there's just a pacification.

Those set of instructions I gave called "Working with the Emotional Body" from 2011—where I made the point about emotions being something we'll never get to the bottom of as a species, our understanding of them—there I gave seven guided meditations, instructions. They also will tend to pacify. They're skillful ways of working with emotions. So we're not throwing these out for good reason. We're not throwing them out once and for all. We want to keep that kind of way of relating to emotions—just a simple mindfulness, a simple lessening of the fabrication. And within that, there's a range of ways. There were these seven modes of paying attention and working with emotions. All of them are kinds of mindfulness, kinds of stances of mindfulness that would pacify the emotion and with that self, and the fabrication.

But if we want the imaginal to come from the emotion, then we need a kind of crucible. We need to let the emotions heat up in certain ways in that alchemical vessel. So in this tripartite division, we could make distinctions: What goes in each division? What kind of image? What kind of desire?

What kind of emotion? And what kind of fabrication?

With what we're calling papañca, or fixated image, well, that's the kind of image. It's fixated, it's reified, it's papañca. What kind of desire? Craving—the contraction of craving, and the dukkha of craving. What kind of emotion? Unskillful emotion. It's got us, it's tangled us, it's taking us for a ride, we're caught up in it. What kind of fabrication? Unskillful fabrication. The self, other, and the situation, the world, are all fabricated in ways that are bringing dukkha, that are not helpful, that are reified.

I see myself this way, clinging to that view. That's how I am. I see that person that way because they looked at me this way, or they didn't speak to me, or they did speak to me. I'm fabricating the perception of them in a very literalized, very reified way, and usually in a way that brings suffering. And the situation, the world—maybe it spreads to everything. I see everything a certain way. So: fixated image, craving, unskillful emotion, unskillful fabrication of self and the world.

When we practice one of the skillful kinds of mindful attention that are more standardly taught—the kind that I and many other teachers probably put out—then again, we can go through: what's the kind of image, what's the kind of desire, what's the kind of emotion, what's the kind of fabrication?

There's a quieting, a pacification of the images and actually of perception in general. There's a pacification of desire, eros and craving through the simple, standard mindfulness and the deconstruction that brings. Pacification of images, pacification of perception, pacification of desire, to some degree or other, depending on exactly what practice one is engaging. There's a pacification of emotion, as I said earlier. That's the kind of emotion—this torrent of probably unskillful emotion is pacified. And pacification of fabrication. So we're somewhere there on the spectrum of unfabricating of self, other, world.

There's not no-self. In standard mindfulness, there's less story. There's less personality. But there's not no-self. There's just less self. Less self is being fabricated.

When we consider these categories in the imaginal domain, then we have an imaginal kind of image. The kind of desire becomes eros with everything that that means and the pregnancy of that and the impregnating faculty of eros. The relationship with the emotions is one of a crucible that allows the generation and the reception, but also allows the transformation of everything, including the emotion, sometimes.

Sometimes the emotion becomes another emotion, transformed through the alchemical process. Sometimes the emotion stays difficult. We've talked about this when we talk about dukkha and soul-making. It stays grief, or it stays whatever it is—anger. But it has other dimensions to it that make it much more liberating, much more liberating. Much more space is opened up in the emotion because, if you like, the territory of the dimensions of the beyond is opened up. There's more vertical space, so to speak, in the emotions.

And also it being sensed as rooted in the divine, if it does, gives it—we have then a healthy respect, reverence even, humility in relationship to the emotions, trust. That's all part of what is allowed because the crucible is there.

So imaginal image. Desire becomes eros rather than craving. An emotional crucible is formed and forged and allows all kinds of possibilities with regard to the emotion and the image. And there's skillful fabrication and there's soulful fabrication, soul-making fabrication of self, other, and world. The self can become imaginal. It's not just me in the flat view way of regarding me and my psychology and my history. But included in that is the self can become imaginal.

So what might be involved, or what are some of the elements that might be involved in a more potentially soul-making relationship with emotions in this range of skills that we're talking about for being with the emotions? There are a few things we could point to, actually. There are many, but I'll just throw out just a few right now.

You know, as I wrapped up what I just said, a result of skillful imaginal involvement with emotions—or of imaginal images arising from right relationship with emotions—is that the emotion then feels as if it's not just mine in the flatly conceived sense. Rather, it has its own quality; in a way it's bigger than me, rooted in divinity.

So again, with mutual dependent origination, if the imaginal can open up that sense of the emotion, then if I can view the emotion that way, it might open up the image. We're playing with conception, with logos, with perception. I may be able to simply see an emotion a certain way, and that seeing it differently changes my relationship with it. In that shift, something in the jammedness of things shifts—like tectonic plates shifting—and something can move, and an image can arise.

Often in psychotherapeutic settings, and certainly in Dharma settings, we're taught either that the self, in a psychological context, is larger than this emotion—"You're bigger than this feeling"—and to cultivate that view over time as a helpful way of relating to emotion, so that we're not overwhelmed or driven by it. In the Dharma, we don't say so much that the self is bigger; we might say something like awareness is bigger than the emotion, or mindfulness can be bigger than the emotion. I've certainly taught that way, and it's very important as a view. Can we make the mindfulness bigger than the emotion? Can we have a sense of awareness being bigger than the emotion?

In imaginal practice, in soul-making dharma, these ways of looking where we or mindfulness or awareness are regarded as bigger than the emotion always remain available as modes we can move into at any time. But in addition to that, the emotion may be sensed and conceived as more than me. Actually, this thing that I'm feeling is bigger than I am—bigger than certainly my history or whatever. Why? Because it has a divine root. It's conceived, felt, sensed as having a divine root. It belongs to or originates in the angel, something more than me.

That view doesn't lead to an out-of-controlness where the emotion is bigger in the sense that it's completely tossing us about, putting us through the wringer, leaving us out of control and driven by something in a really unhelpful way. It doesn't lead to that kind of chaos. It doesn't lead to unethical or inconsiderate behavior. But there's a flip in the view there. And again, with mutual dependent arising, this may arise as a result of the image bringing a different view of the emotion. Sometimes I can simply try to gently encourage a different view of the emotion that allows image to arise.

There are other factors we could point to. I'll amplify something I mentioned already. In some ways of skillfully and mindfully paying attention to emotion, what's really happening is we're atomizing the emotions—breaking them down into sensations, for instance. Whatever the emotion is, it's looked at with a kind of high-resolution lens in mindfulness. Instead of getting caught up in the story, we're going underneath the story. The story is a gross level of resolution. We're going beneath that: Where's the sensation? How closely, how finely can I look at the sensation? Oh, it's just pulsing or it's just heat. This anger, I experience it as heat, for example, or pressure, or whatever it is.

In that sense, there's a kind of atomizing of what was a complex, rich phenomenon—the emotion itself, and the emotion in the way that it tied into myself, my narrative and stories. We're atomizing that through the intensity and high-definition resolution of our attention. This will prevent images from arising. It's really skillful at times, really skillful. This is part of the whole art of navigation—when this approach, when another approach. But certainly if we atomize our emotional experience through the kinds of ways we're paying attention, that won't give rise to image.

So there are other ways of being with emotion that we need. We need to include some self-sense. Maybe I need to include a narrative. I might need to hold it a bit more lightly, a bit more spaciously, that self-sense and narrative. But it needs to be included in the kind of aura or nebula around what we consider the emotion, rather than diving in and atomizing it. And again, we talk about involving the whole energy body rather than zeroing in on sensations in one location at a very atomistic level.

I need to make sure that I'm not reducing this emotion to one cause. "I'm feeling this emotion because of this"—because that person said that, or because this can't happen, or because that happened when I was young, or I was treated this way, or whatever it is. That may be part of the reason. But for the soul-making dynamic to include the emotions, that reason—because my mother said this, or because my father didn't give me that, or because that person said this, or because whatever it is—may be regarded as one cause, but there are more causes, even if we don't know what they are.

We're just opening up the conception of causes. This is one of the elements—that we're not reduced to one meaning or cause or causal explanation. It's one of the twenty-eight elements. Not reducing to one causal explanation or meaning.

But again, it might be that in the mix of qualities that need to be there, I need to let myself be moved. That's the other one which we've touched on, actually. Being moved, being touched—that is an element of soul-making, as we said before. It's an element of the breaking of vessels, of the soul-making dynamic: that things are shifting, that we're touched, that we're moved, that it's meaningful. So we need to let that be the case. If we shut that down in relation to the emotion, or we limit what it can mean in relation to the emotion, then it's not so fertile for the images.

And the eros as well—maybe we're not allowing eros. If we talk about eros as more than emotion, it can be included in that territory. And again, trust, which I've alluded to earlier—just a grain of trust here.

Not narrowing down the values. And again, values are one of the elements of the imaginable. So if I've, in a predetermined, preconceived way, narrowed down my range of what are acceptable values or what is valuable, then that too can limit the trust and limit the possibility with regard to emotions, as touched on earlier.

Sometimes an emotion is going on and actually we don't see—perhaps at the edges or underneath or around it—there is love there. We're somehow feeling loved, or there's love for something, or love for ourselves in allowing ourselves to feel this, or love for our sensitivity, or whatever it is. And maybe beauty. Sometimes we don't see those elements. And in seeing them in relationship to what I'm feeling right now, difficult as what I'm feeling right now might be, that also can allow more possibility, more fermenting of the material in the alchemical vessel.

Of course, seeing, sensing the beauty and the love may be easier if the emotion becomes the emotion of an imaginal other. Okay, so I'll touch on that in a moment. Yeah, let's come back to that.

So there are different—we could probably name some more, but these are some of the threads to consider in terms of what kind of—as I said, range. It's not really exactly this one relationship with emotions that's going to give rise to image, but it's a certain range. And in that range, there are lots of possibilities. There are lots of strands to follow. If it's a ball of tangled wool, there's lots of threads that we can pick up and just start following and see if it untangles or creates something more helpful, more beautiful, more soul-making there with regard to the emotion and also in regard to generating images.

So one of the strands there was this not reducing—not reducing, again, either consciously or unconsciously. So much happens unconsciously that we're not aware of that can actually limit the soul-making process. This is really good to shine the light on. Actually, am I doing this? How am I regarding X or Y?

So we just touched on not reducing the explanation of this emotion to one, to just one cause. Because if I do, that will tend to block the image, especially if that cause is a kind of flatly conceived cause without the dimensionality.

So let's just say something about that as well. You know, of course, just again to highlight this thing about unconsciousness—sometimes we don't think, "Well, I'm not thinking about causal explanation here," but actually at some level of our mind we are, where the mind has already kind of locked down on a certain explanation, a certain view of why I'm feeling this. Because this happened, or because I'm this way, or because I'm just no good at whatever it is. So it's really worth, as I said, shining the light to unearth, to uncover, to discover how we're viewing things in ways that sometimes we're not aware of.

But if we linger on this one about not reducing to one causal explanation: if we always or too often see interactions, relationships, certain effects of the past, of family—you know, my mother or father or whatever—if we're too often or always seeing certain effects or certain interactions or certain relationships or difficulties or emotions through the lens of this past cause—my family, my history, this or that event—it may many times miss, or such a way of viewing may many times miss or obliterate what we could say are more primary reasons and motivations for some affect, some emotion being there, for some response arising in us, for some relational choice or movement. I've decided it's because of this. And there may be something from a certain paradigm that's actually more primary, more fundamental.

So, for example, someone not wanting commitment in a certain relationship, or not even wanting intimacy in a certain relationship, or at a certain time, or more widely, just seeming to avoid that. And so easily a certain explanation comes: "Oh, you're afraid of intimacy," or whatever it is, and there's a kind of whole psychological paradigm that gets dragged in there. But it may be because of an attractive pull, a calling to the angel of purity, for example. Someone's called to a kind of purity that may involve, for instance, more celibacy for a period. Or it may be the pull of the angel towards certain kind of creativity or manifesting certain creative work. It could be many things.

In other words, it's not coming from an inhibition or a fear that's based on my past. There's a telistic, a telos operating here. We're actually called to something else. Yes, it has a cost. In this case, whatever—I'm not open to intimacy.

I'm not open to pursuing this relationship or making this commitment to this person, or whatever situation or project at work. You're not pulling your weight, you're a slacker. But I may not be a slacker. I may not be lazy. I might be pulled to something else. I might be called to something else. I might not be afraid of intimacy. I might not be afraid of commitment. I just have a commitment to something else. I feel called by some other angel.

Some duty or calling other than intimacy in the usual, commonly conceived, psychotherapeutically correct sense. A duty other than, a calling other than to family or to relationship or commitment, whatever beckons. It's not from the past - it's from, so to speak, the future, the angel out ahead calling us to something.

But again, if we're not open at least to the range of these possibilities and ideas and sensing and asking, "What's actually going on with me and my soul and my life and my choices and my inclinations?" - sometimes we lock things down. Everything gets jammed up and inhibited in the sense that certain possibilities that may be really rich and really soul-making are not possible.

So again, if we just linger with this question of what might be among the strands - the helpful strands of ways of relating to emotion that allow images to arise that are fertile, that are potentially imaginal. Sometimes, to add to our strands there, sometimes a slight regard of the emotion as anattā, as not-self. It's not me and not mine, this emotion.

If I lean too much on that regard for the emotion, that's a very, very powerful unfabricating practice. And if I really linger with it, then the emotion will fade. It will go into deep equanimity. And if I just keep going, even with the anattā, the equanimity, even that will fade and it will go beyond, towards the unfabricated.

Certainly with skill in development, with emptiness practices, but even before that, it might be just possible. Don't underestimate what's possible, even without certain trainings sometimes. It might be possible just to sort of slightly loosen the self's appropriation - or normal appropriation - of the emotion, normal regard for the emotion as being me or mine.

Of course it's my emotion, we assume, or we feel. Naturally we feel. Of course it's who I am, or certainly mine. It's just the default, normal way - even, again, not even conscious of, often not even conscious of viewing emotions.

Sometimes it's possible to just - can I just see it as not me, not mine? And that loosening, that slight loosening, again, it's like loosening the jammed elements, the jammed hardware, loosening the tectonic plates, so the waters of soul can start to flow, the waters of soul-making can start to flow, and images can be born from those waters.

Sometimes - I think I alluded to this a few minutes ago as well - sometimes we can say I'm feeling an emotion and it's a difficult emotion. Grief or anger or heartbreak or sadness or frustration. And sometimes it's possible, rather than just that slight loosening with the anattā, not me, not mine, actually going a step further and just creating, generating or inviting an image of another. In other words, an imaginal object who is feeling that emotion.

So who is it who's feeling that emotion? Tentatively, it's me. But what if we just allow it to constellate, to form, as if we were witnessing some imaginal other who feels that emotion? And then there's a witness, the self who's meditating, practicing and watching. Of course, the self will still feel some of that emotion. But allowing it to become other actually opens something up.

And then we might be able to have a slightly different regard for that other than we do for ourself. Maybe there's, for instance - I don't immediately get locked down into judgment. And I say, "Oh, there's a kind of nobility in them experiencing that emotion or bearing that emotion. There's a kind of deep sensitivity." And I sort of see - wow, how beautiful is that, the sensitivity of the soul of this imaginal other, that they feel in that way and that they're impacted in that way. Back to the vulnerability as being maybe a necessary element - they're able to be impacted. They're open to being sensitive and perhaps to being wounded.

But making it other just creates a bit more space sometimes, and that can allow a different relationship with the emotion. And it's already become image to a certain extent, and then it can become - that image can start becoming more imaginal, more complex, more rich, more deep, and reveal what it reveals to us, teach us in the way that it teaches, draw us on in the way that it draws us on.

Related to that, again, it's so worth repeating the sort of non-linearity, a non-formulaic nature necessarily of soul-making work, sensing the soul, imaginal practice. So especially when we were talking about the dukkha and soul-making, and Catherine and I talked about that, and we really stressed, and I'm stressing today as well, the importance of really feeling the emotions. And not just feeling them, but feeling them within a certain range or with these different strands and feeling them in a way that's supportive, but actually feeling them, being with them, allowing them, recognizing them.

And then out of that, as one supportive ingredient or factor or condition in the alchemical process, then an image arises. But again, the absence of formula or my suspicion with regard to sort of formulaic solutions - it's always like this, there's always an order you do it in like this, first the emotion and then the image.

Sometimes, as I've just alluded to a couple of times, sometimes an image comes or we generate an image and it leads to an emotion or it liberates an emotion - an emotion that was stuck or felt like it's definitely there, it's an emotion, but it's all a bit compacted or I'm just looping with it in a certain way. The image itself, of course, again, because of the dependent arising, because of the multi-aspected, multi-elemented nature of the imaginal, the image can give rise to emotion, can liberate an emotion, or can transform an emotion.

Something that can almost move to the opposite emotion, or move to the same emotion as I said before, but it's got dimensions now, and it's got space, and there's something beautiful and liberating about it, and we wouldn't want to trade it for anything, despite the dukkha that might still be in it. There's something sacred and precious, and feels really right, and feels really necessary for the soul.

So yes, very often emotion first. Make sure - am I allowing it? Am I recognizing it? Am I feeling it?

Am I relating to it in ways that are not blocking the soul-making process and the birth of images? Emotion first, then the possibility of image arises. Sometimes the other way around. The presence of an image, or the deliberate instigation of an image, or the recall of an image that's been helpful before, actually either gives rise to a certain emotion, or liberates an emotion, or ensouls an emotion, or transforms it. All of that.

Sometimes what happens is we don't actually realize an emotion is present and things are a bit jammed up, but again the way of being with the emotion can liberate an image that's helpful in the whole process, or an image comes and helps the emotion.

I'll give you one example. A person came for an interview and they were quite stuck —or I'd say more unsure than stuck. They were really unsure about their invitation to join a collaborative creative writing project. They also presented this image: the image was of a mule resisting with all its strength and determination, resisting the pull of a rope. You couldn't see in the image what the rope was attached to, who was pulling it, or why. It was just this mule with a rope pulling it one way, but doing what mules and horses sometimes do—standing in this way that they're actually unbudgeable. All its strength and determination were resisting the pull of this rope.

She was baffled by the image, but it felt important. Actually my initial response was, "Well, I've no idea," which is often the case. Sometimes people describe images or dreams and I'm initially just baffled and sort of daunted by them. But we were talking about it. She felt there was some connection between the invitation to collaborate on this writing project and the image.

But as I've said before, we have to be careful with literalizing and also with the scope of our intention. The fullness of intention means I don't just want to rush in to working with this image asking, "What does it mean? What does it imply? What does it tell me to do? Give me guidance." We can recognize such an intention because guidance may well be part of what's going on in an image—specific guidance in relation to a specific choice may be part of what's there in the imaginal. But if I reduce it to "that's what the image means" and relate to this image solely for the sake of personal guidance in my life, then that tends to shrink things and not allow the full blossoming of the imaginal and the soul-making.

So here's this image, and I guided her gently: "Is it possible to enter into the bodily experience of the mule? Here's this mule standing there, its feet planted and resisting with all its strength and determination. Can you meditate on the image and in this moment, with your energy body, with your bodily sensibility, can you feel the mule's bodily experience?"

In doing that, she began to feel the kind of strength and determination and alignment there, by almost putting herself or feeling into, sensing into the mule's body. So what happened was strength, determination, a sense of alignment came into her. I also sensed at that point something of the heart was involved here—it wasn't immediately obvious yet, but something of the heart.

So very gently: "Can you include the energy body experience and the emotional experience, the heart there? What's the heart feeling?"

And she said, "Oh, power. Power." And I could feel it. This is why it helped me guide the questions here. There's tremendous power here. Don't rush. Don't rush. Linger there. Let it fill. Let that feeling of power fill you, fill the energy body, fill the heart and the being.

Very often—and we're back to where I started—very often feelings of power are not common for people to actually feel. I don't mean power over another or bad power, just power in the being, power in the energy body, power in the soul. Power as the ability to do, power as a sort of gathering and harmonizing of one's energies. It's actually quite rare, and maybe sometimes even more rare in some Dharma cultures where power is too close to the possibility of abusive power or anger. So very often people are not accustomed to allowing it, to letting it come into the being, to recognizing it, certainly not to lingering with it and feeling it and letting it coalesce and letting it shape the whole experience of body and self.

Because that was actually what I asked her next. Does the self become involved or become image?

So from the energy body sense or via the energy body sense, ignited by this unfamiliar energy body sense of power, an image of self comes up or is allowed. Instead of the usual range of how one feels and senses and conceives of oneself, because there's a different experience here—the experience that originally was not seen as mind because it was in the mule, and it seems like other—and then feeling into that, feeling it first in the energy body, lingering, slowing down, including the heart, including the body, letting it fill, letting it fill the energy body, the feet planted on the ground and the fullness of that, the beauty of that power, really. And then it's allowed, it's allowed then to ferment, to spawn an imaginal sense of self as, in this case, powerful, strong, and the words with so much integrity.

Integrity has a lot to do with power as well. When we're split, when we're not honest to ourselves, not aligned with ourselves, we lose our power. Power and alignment, harmonization, integrity—all these things go together. So much integrity. So again, this was, in some respects, in some domains, new experience of self.

To me, it looked very beautiful. There was a beauty in this. Again, in a way I pointed that out at that point, and that's not to praise myself—it's more to make the point of how so often we're so unaccustomed to all this that we don't see the beauty and specifically the beauty of ourselves, our own beauty, the beauty of this imaginal sense of self, the beauty of this new experience of self, and love there—love of this self.

And again, for so many, it's such a struggle to really love the self deeply and know deeply one's deep beauty, for the self to become a beloved erotic object for oneself. How rare, how very rare in our culture. So just gently pointing out: can you actually see, feel how beautiful this sense of self is, this imaginal self, yourself, and the love of this self?

So there's multi-dimensionality there, there's mystery, all that's wrapped up in it. And again, we're back to pacing, the necessity with these kinds of openings to really linger and go slowly, and particularly in this case with the elements that are new, especially the love and the self-love and the beauty of sensing the beauty of self.

Even in the process one can fall out of that—oh, the energy body awareness shrunk—oh, feet planted on the floor, and that connection. But there's a kind of mist or a constellation of all these beauties and all these qualities that coalesces there, condenses there, and one's sort of in that mist, that holy cloud, mystical cloud of all these elements of the imaginal, one's sitting in it, one is it, they're part of the fabric of one's being at that point.

And then maybe, and again, taking care with the pacing. What happens then if we introduce the notion of reflection and mirroring, the infinite echoing, infinite mirroring, and we introduce, put together this self-image, this imaginal self, with the narrative of your life, past and future? Because at that point, it was just me right now with this different sense of self. And it's not really connecting to the story and the narrative of years and decades, perhaps years and decades of difficulty and choices or feeling strange because of this or that or alienated or whatever it is.

What happens is, just very gently, we put—I don't know how to say it. It's like we put in neighborhood of each other, in the vicinity of each other, just gently this self-image, this imaginal self-sense, and the whole narrative of one's life, past and future. And of course the future is unknown, but just the sense of a narrative moving into the future. So that's a real possibility. Again, the importance of including the narrative sense in a lot of imaginal work. Not as a rarefied, fixated thing, but as something, again, that can be opened up, stretched, dimensionalized, divinized even, through the alchemical process of sensing the soul.

Then, you know, maybe we might introduce the idea or the possibility of this particular creative project into relationship with this imaginal constellation, energetic constellation, state of the soul, perspective on the soul. Introduce into the vicinity of that with the energy body sense, with the self image. And from that came a different relationship and a kind of freedom in relationship to this invitation to collaborate. Freedom not to participate, but also recognizing the beauty of it, the importance of it, the love of it, the duty perhaps. But it's coming from a very different place now with a different self-sense and the power and the integrity, this freedom not to do it, to be involved in that project, not to be pulled in an unhealthy, unconscious way, in a limited way, not to need to prove myself or to seem important because I'm part of such a project.

So there's an important navigational principle in that. The image allowing a certain emotion or opening up the possibility for a certain emotional sense, a certain self-sense and all that. There's another one which I'd like to point out regarding the art of navigating with an image or in the territory of the imaginal or sensing the soul. And it's the importance of going via the energy body, which we always emphasize, but here in particular.

Here's this puzzling image, and it's really a very, it looks like a very limited image. Where's the dynamic element in the image? Where's the power in the image? So at first —well, nothing's happening in the image, it's just static, it's stuck, it doesn't even seem to have a context. But how does the mule's body feel? In all its strength and all its determination, the dynamism was locked there. The power was locked there.

I think what's more important here is the dynamic element. Something that looks very static and very stuck, this mule just resisting a pull from an anonymous rope puller, actually had a lot of potential dynamism. And dynamism means that which can move things on. It's going in that way, sensing. And again, it's not formulaic. It was just an intuition in the moment. But we might raise it as something to consider.

Where's the dynamic? We say, where's the soul-making element? Where's the immediately soulful element? That may not always be obvious, but it might be that there's something that holds a kind of dynamism. And it may be locked. It may not be obvious or apparent at first.

There's a potentially dynamic element, and in going into it and feeling it, entering into it and lingering and allowing it, allowing the alchemical process to do its work with the appropriate sort of sensitive, responsive pacing, then actually that locked dynamism became dynamic and put into dynamic motion the whole soul-making imaginal process. Then things could move and the whole self-world could transform, as I've described.

This is different than asking, "What does this mule mean? What does this image mean? How can it guide me?" I'm actually going by something rather than... I'm going by what's alive in the image. And again, in this case, it had a lot of dynamism but it wasn't apparent.

It's different than asking, "What is this image telling me to do in this situation? What's the guidance here? What does this mule mean?"

These are things to consider, maybe to practice with, maybe to reflect on, to inquire into. Different pieces will be relevant for different people at different times, as always.

CHAPTER 177

Until All is Liquid: Emptiness and Sensing with Soul

Rob Burbea · 1h41

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines the medieval alchemical principle "don't proceed until all has become liquid" as it applies to imaginal practice and sensing with soul. He explores how unfabricating perception through emptiness practices creates the necessary loosening and liquefying that allows images to arise and empowers already accessible images.
>
> Burbea discusses the journey of understanding emptiness (suññatā) as fabrication and ways of looking, emphasizing that this is not about complete dissolution but finding the middle territory where form remains malleable rather than solidified. He addresses individual differences in approaching emptiness - some practitioners need deep emptiness understanding while others can work imaginally through artistic sensibility or philosophical background.
>
> Using personal examples including illness and potential death, he demonstrates how even intermediate levels of emptiness perception (like seeing experiences as "just appearances") can support powerful imaginal constellations. The talk explores parallels with Tibetan tantric practices and Jewish mystical traditions, showing how love of the unfabricated opens the energy body as "garment for the soul."
> Burbea concludes by examining the relationship between the imaginal middle way and emptiness middle way, noting they're related but distinct. He discusses the spectrum of reification possible in imaginal practice and mentions experiences that may fall outside the imaginal realm entirely, such as encounters with other planes of existence that approach death might reveal.

Over the last few years, when talking about imaginal practice and introducing sensing with soul, I've quoted an alchemical maxim or guideline from the Middle Ages that says something like: "Don't proceed with any operation, with any alchemical operation, until all has become water, until all has become liquid." Don't proceed until all has become liquid, until all is liquid.

We've adopted this maxim and interpreted it in line with our teaching around the kind of loosening or liquefying that happens when there's less fabrication, and the necessity of that in sensing with soul and imaginal practice. This is what I want to explore tonight—this aspect of slightly less fabrication, this loosening or liquefying or degree of unfabricating of perception, self, other, world, and the elements or aspects of our existence and being.

Notice that the maxim doesn't say, "Don't proceed until everything has disappeared." Things are liquefied, but not completely faded. It's not possible to practice imaginal practice in the depths of fading, in the proximity of the unfabricated. That whole meditative journey and exploration into the deep end of fading towards the unfabricated, opening to the unfabricated—I think that's absolutely lovely and priceless for a human being, something amazing. If anything deserves to be called amazing, it's potentially liberating. It should be liberating if one approaches it the right way, understands it, and contextualizes it properly. Sometimes it's liberating for people even if they don't fully understand it or haven't arrived at it with proper context. So beautiful, lovely, amazing, potentially utterly transformative and liberating.

In the depths of fading, all perception disappears—self, others, world, subject, object, time, present moment, space. The whole show fades through less clinging, through the withdrawal of clinging. This whole experience and its beauty are really important. When we come to practicing with sensing with soul, though, we can't operate in those depths of fading and unfabricating. There is no sensing there, certainly not in any usual sense.

Sensing with soul needs this wide middle ground, this middle territory, middle region where selves, objects, things, materials, world appear and still retain form. Form is part of the perception of this or that, or this or that imaginal object sensed with soul. Some form is there. We're not going toward a dissolution of form through fading. There's a range where form is retained, but there's a kind of looseness to that form, a less reification. The territory for sensing with soul practice—a wide territory—operates where there's form, but it's loose and somewhat less fabricated. It's liquefied. It's malleable rather than rigid and reified, entrenched and solidified.

There's a kind of dance around reifying and non-reifying, but probably more important for now is this region of form but liquid form, form but malleable form, form but unreified form.

We've been talking about emotions and self-view and self-sense, and we'll return to self-sense as these talks continue. In order for powerful soul-making to happen with respect to emotion, image, dukkha, self-sense, eros and the sense of eros, these need to retain some form—emotion, image, self, eros, dukkha, whatever it is. We're not completely dissolving those. In that retaining of form, but liquid, malleable, unreified form, that's the region we're interested in—the region of quicksilver in alchemy, like mercury.

Tonight I want to talk about the place of that unfabricating and loosening and liquefying, and also the practices of emptiness with regard to that. If we talk about practicing with emptiness or emptiness practices and understanding emptiness, fathoming what that really means and the fullness and radicality and comprehensiveness and depth of what that means—I think it's a journey. It's something very profound, subtle, complex, really at the edge of what conception can articulate and then going beyond that edge.

That journey of exploration in practice and understanding takes time. Like any journey, it takes time. Generally speaking, maybe there are some people who just get the whole thing in one go. I've never met anyone like that. I've met people who think they have, but when I hear them speak or read what they've written about emptiness, it seems to me to be missing either some depth or some comprehensiveness or both.

For me, it's something—I'm saying this as a reminder to those of you interested in that journey into the depths of emptiness and the fullness and radicality of what that means—it's really a journey that takes time and work and play and willingness to experiment.

It's interesting that we're back to individuals and the variance between individuals with regard to so many different facets of what we're laying out and explaining, and with regard to emptiness too. Some people don't seem to have a need for any deep emptiness practice.

They can work well with images, they have a sense of the imaginal middleware, the theatre-like quality of them being neither real nor not real, and for sensing the soul in imaginal practice, they don't seem to need emptiness.

I would definitely acknowledge that possibility. Not everyone needs emptiness. I think I haven't put the full stop on that conclusion yet, but I think that may be a possibility. I haven't reached a final conclusion for myself on that possibility.

Some people, either because they have an artistic temperament, or because they've read deeply in modern philosophy about ontology and epistemology and cultural contingency—and that philosophy has not just been a superficial mouthing in academic circles but has actually gone deep, permeated their being—or because they have this kind of artistic, poetic sensibility that's accessible to them as part of the way they naturally see things, or for whatever other reason, seem able to engage the imaginal without needing emptiness practices.

Other people do, I think, need emptiness practice as part of what grounds sensing the soul and imaginal practice. Without it, there is too much tendency for reification. It takes practice out of the realm of what we would call imaginal practice. So emptiness practice grounds it or keeps one on the path, wide as it is.

In some respects, the emptiness practices help because there's a middle way there in terms of real and not real that comes from emptiness understanding and imbues one's sense of everything. As one goes deeper, one's perceptions, one's sense of life, one's sense of the world are all affected.

Some people approach emptiness with a kind of "should"—"I really should practice emptiness because Rob and all these other Buddhist teachers go on about how central and important it is." But there's no real eros for emptiness, no real attraction to the unfabricated, not really for the teachings of emptiness so much. The whole impetus to explore emptiness practice is coming from a should.

Generally speaking, my observation is that when any practice or aspect of practice comes from the motivation of some kind of should—because a person thinks they should—then there isn't the eros there, there isn't the juice, there isn't the libido and the lubrication and the aliveness and the fire. Practice explorations that are driven by some sense of should that's been imported from somewhere tend not to be very fruitful.

If that's the case, somehow, at some point—and it might be later on in one's practice—if one needs emptiness, that should needs to be converted to a real curiosity and aliveness of desire to explore, to understand, to play.

Of course, some people have a real eros—something lights up in their soul when they hear about emptiness or when they hear about the unfabricated or taste it, wherever they are on that journey. I alluded to this whole journey of unfabricating, but even more the journey into understanding emptiness, which is a bigger journey than just unfabricating. Wherever they are in that process, they love it, they enjoy it. There's just a desire, an eros, to want more. That's an ideal relationship with emptiness exploration.

Some people, it seems to me over the last years, especially when I've been teaching imaginal practice and contextualizing it with emptiness teachings, or letting the emptiness teachings inform and form a basis for the whole soul-making paradigm—some people take the emptiness on faith. They don't have a deep personal realization of emptiness through practice, through meditation. They don't fully understand it, but they understand a little bit. They understand, for instance, that there's no ultimate reality and therefore there are just ways of looking, and that legitimizes the flexibility of ways of looking. In a way, they're taking that understanding on faith from me or another teacher, but it's enough. Or it's enough for a certain range and depth and fertility of exploration of the imaginal. That's quite interesting to me as well.

The full shebang with emptiness and the unfabricated and all that, and out the other side of the unfabricated, is really quite rare. I'd say unfortunately, but whatever—it's just how things are for different reasons at this time. But wherever one is, and this is one of the points I want to make, wherever one is in one's understanding or practice of emptiness, it can be really fruitful. That's one of the main points I want to make tonight.

It's interesting that sometimes a person hasn't got that personal understanding—meditatively based, experientially based conviction, understanding, realization of emptiness—but they've taken some understanding on board through faith in a teacher or teaching, or just a resonance with a teacher, just like "I know that's right."

I think back to myself years ago. I think I mentioned this in some talk—I had this intuitive trust in emptiness teachings, which I didn't understand and had limited sense of experientially. But something in me kind of banked on it, and then later explored practices and understandings more deeply to fill out and add to that intuitive faith. This is interesting to me: there can be something—an understanding absorbed on faith—that forms some degree of a basis, a platform to engage soul-making practices.

I will mention one thing here just about the strand of emptiness practices per se. It's not exactly what I want to talk about, but I'll say it anyway, because part of that journey—at least the way I would outline it—and certainly there's no way around this if you're wanting to experience and understand deep emptiness, involves the movement towards the unfabricated, the movement of unfabricating at different degrees and ranges and depths, the movement towards more fading. A person engaged in that direction of exploration and all the... subtlety and beauty and rigor and enchantment of such a journey, that thread there of unfabricating.

It's almost... Everyone, in fact, I don't know that I've encountered anyone who's taken that journey who doesn't at some point get tight or pushy trying to achieve more fading. So there's a certain degree of fading of perception—of body sense, self sense, world sense, this or that vedanā, whatever it is—and one feels like, "Oh, this is going great. Now I've seen this much fading before. Let's just push for some more." And so it becomes a kind of task to achieve more fading, and one can get quite tight around that, and one can actually feel that tightness and that pushiness in the practice.

This is very, very common—this trying to achieve more fading, more fading than however much one has, unless it's a totally unfabricated experience. And then getting tight around that, stressed around that.

So a couple of possibilities here, just to put them out. One is that one can check one's intention. Notice that that's happening right in the thick of practice, in the subtle, delicate surgery of that movement. Recognize it's going on.

And actually just two things, two possibilities. One is just slightly shift the intention. Not so much to achieve this or that amount of fading, but the intention is a curiosity around dependent arising. I'm really interested in, I'm really curious about why there is this kind of appearance now, or this degree of fading, or this degree of solidity, substantiality, now. What is it dependent on? Clinging. What does that mean? Clinging, in the way I use the term, is a very big word. It involves a lot, at lots of different levels. But shifting the intention to curiosity about dependent arising takes some of the pressure of trying to achieve more fading. They're obviously connected as intentions, but an intention of curiosity is a lot less pushy and it's less driven toward the goal of achieving more fading. So that's one possibility.

A second possibility is actually to remember that insight, in the way that I commonly use the word, actually is what brings letting go. And in bringing letting go—so where there's insight, where there's an insight way of looking, where I'm looking at something with insight, sensing something with insight, with a degree of insight, understanding—then it brings letting go. It should bring letting go. Often it will bring letting go right there and then as I'm sensing this thing with that insight way of looking. And because there's letting go, there's ease now.

So that, again, the motivation, for example, for doing a practice like a welcoming practice or relaxing clinging or anattā or regarding objects of perception as empty or whatever—the second intention, apart from curiosity, can be actually ease. It should bring ease now. And so I'm practicing this with an intention for ease. So again, that shifts the intention out of the tightness or crampness of clinging to the possibility of achieving more fading.

So in that second one, even then, even the striving to achieve more fading is let go of as it's perceived as dukkha. It's a kind of clinging, right?

Another point in relation to this journey into the depths of unfabricating is not to worry if not everything fades. So yes, there's that possibility that all perception, every element of perception disappears, fades, gets unfabricated, is not fabricated at that time. But in a way, it's okay if, and it's quite common for, say, most of the body is gone, but everything is gone except my teeth, or... And then what can happen is that we say, "Oh, that's not faded yet." And then one gets pulled to focus on trying to get that thing—my teeth or whatever it is, sounds or a certain realm of sense perception or a certain object that doesn't fade. One gets pulled into an intention of focus on trying to get that to fade. And that actually becomes a kind of obsession. Again, it's a clinging and aversion.

And clinging and aversion, if we understand dependent arising deeply, are exactly what will fabricate an object. So if I'm aversive to this object, essentially, because I want it to fade, because I want complete fading, I want to get rid of that remaining thing, it's a kind of aversion, and that keeps fabricating the object, so actually it won't fade.

Some partial fading, some only partial fading, can often be enough for a practitioner to intuit the universal truth of the insight regarding clinging and dependent arising and fabrication. In other words, yes, not everything fades or the experiences in that sense door or this object or whatever it is doesn't fade. But there's enough moving up and down of this spectrum of fabrication and experience and understanding the relationship with clinging—clinging again in the broader sense—that at some point, up and down, up and down, I see it: let go, let go, let go, everything fades more and more, even if it doesn't completely fade into a total experience of the unfabricated. At some point, the sort of intuitive wisdom grasps something, it gets something, and it gets the truth of that insight regarding clinging and dependent arising.

Conversely, some people actually have a total experience of the unfabricated, as I mentioned earlier, but they're not understanding it at all in terms of clinging and dependent arising. They may not gain any liberating insight, or they may certainly not receive the full possibility of liberating insight there. What's more important is the insight and the understanding. This can be grasped by the intuitive wisdom faculty even when there isn't complete fading.

I put this out for those of you who are perhaps exploring this movement into unfabricating as part of the larger weave of soul-making dharma practices, or who are taking time out from soul-making to go deeper into emptiness. And what do we mean when we say emptiness? I hope to return to this in another talk, but if you've been around the dharma for a while and are listening and reading carefully, you'll see there are many different interpretations of what that means. So I hope to explore that variety and the implications of those choices of interpretation.

What do we mean when we use this term? Well, in answer to the question "What is the basic reality?" we could say emptiness is the basic reality. Then a follow-up question: What is emptiness? Emptiness is no basic reality. Emptiness is the reality of no basic reality. So in a Zen-like nutshell, that is what we mean when we use the word emptiness. Emptiness means there's no basic reality. Emptiness is the basic reality, and that basic reality is that there is no basic reality.

Wrapped up in how we talk about emptiness are two central concepts you'll hear me use often: fabrication and ways of looking. We've already touched on fabrication—this meditative, experimental exploration and curiosity about the fabrication of perception, not just of the self-sense and personality, but of self at every level, all objects, all phenomena, the whole world, time, space, and so forth. As I said earlier, this involves developing skill in certain practices that fabricate less, understanding how the mind fabricates more at times, and then understanding that the mind itself is fabricated, awareness is fabricated—so really there is no basic reality there. Time, space, the whole show.

This notion of fabrication is central to how I would teach emptiness, explain emptiness, and encourage someone to explore it. There are other ways too, but they all come back to fabrication.

Implicit in this is the second idea: ways of looking. This means that consciousness, when perceiving anything, is always engaged in some kind of way of looking, way of sensing, way of relating. I use "ways of looking" as an umbrella term for all that—way of sensing, way of relating to whatever it's perceiving.

Through playing with different ways of looking, we discover that some ways of looking are more fabricating than others. They fabricate more dukkha, more self, more solidity, more subject, more object, more sense of time, and so forth. So we play with different ways of looking, seeing their effects on fabrication and dukkha and all kinds of other things. There's the possibility of taking this all the way into the depths of unfabricating, opening to the unfabricated, and then realizing that in a way there's nothing but ways of looking. They're empty too, but we're just left with ways of looking.

And the possibility of looking, of sensing in this way at times, in that way at times, in this other way. This is happening automatically anyway, and we have certain default habits of looking, of sensing in this way or that way. But through practice, we begin to loosen the rigidity of entrenched pathways of ways of looking that tend always to solidify this or that, or reify the self, or reify time. All that gets loosened up, and we can begin to explore: here's a kind of way of looking that loosens things in this way, loosens dukkha, loosens self; here are these kinds of ways of looking that loosen self to a certain extent but allow some skillful fabrication—the whole range there.

So emptiness, fabrication, and ways of looking are completely tied together. That there are only ways of looking, and that no way of looking reveals an ultimate truth to how a thing is—this is an understanding of emptiness. That's what emptiness means. It's only ways of looking. No way of looking is the ultimate truth of this thing or that thing.

Now again, regarding the eros that might be involved in such exploration, I think it's important that this whole idea of ways of looking—this logos of ways of looking, the possibilities of ways of looking, this conceptual framework—really comes alive. The logos itself, the idea of ways of looking as I've briefly outlined and much more elsewhere, needs to become imaginal. It needs to become poetic, beautiful, powerful.

In other words, that creative-discovery possibility that's implicit in the whole idea of ways of looking—that the way of looking creates the appearance, shapes, informs, fabricates whatever appearance—this...

The magic of things, the groundlessness, the sense of possibility of viewing oneself as an artist of perception, as a magician, as a sorcerer—all this may be woven into falling in love with the whole idea of ways of looking. As opposed to it sounding like some abstract concept—yes, sure, ways of looking, you can look at things different ways—or just some intellectual philosophy. So we end up bowing to all that in some way.

This whole idea of ways of looking and everything involved in it becomes imaginal in the sense that it becomes dimensionalized. The self, other, world, the idea of ways of looking, the self that relates to ways of looking, and the world that it opens up—all of that becomes taken up by the soul-making dynamic, all the elements, the eros-psyche-logos. So the whole relationship or conception to that idea is not a kind of anti-libidinal or deflationary idea. It's not "oh, it doesn't matter" or "it's just a way of looking" or whatever, as if we don't care. There's something very beautiful.

And if one goes deeply enough into it—I think this is important—if one goes deeply enough into it, that the whole idea and practice, when we've absorbed it in the heart of ways of looking, that whole conceptual framework and the exploration of it, reveals and opens us to a really profound mystery and sacredness about consciousness and the cosmos.

So at one level it might seem, yes, we can have a way of looking that sees sacredness, or we can have a way of looking at another time that decides not to see sacredness or doesn't see sacredness or whatever. And that's true at a certain level. But as one goes deeper into this whole exploration of ways of looking and that whole logos there, in practice, it reveals the mystery and the sacredness of the indissoluble entwinement of consciousness and cosmos, the poetry of that, the beauty of that.

So in that sense, emptiness and ways of looking has everything to do with participation as well, which again is one of the elements. So there's a relationship there between the whole idea of participation, the mystery and depth of that concept, and also the whole teaching of ways of looking.

So when we can fabricate a little less through whatever means—there's all kinds of ways of doing that—when we can allow things to become liquid, when we can liquefy and loosen things, then that allows image to arise. There is the possibility in the loosening and unbinding to some degree of perception of this or that. There is an increased possibility of image arising in practice, of sensing the soul.

Actually, I should throw in one more discrimination there, or a related point, slightly different. Liquefying things, loosening things with a taste of deep emptiness, unfabricating, not only allows the possibility of image, opens up the possibility for the birth, the reception of an image. It also may empower, give power and depth to an image that is already accessible.

So I think on the recent retreat we did, Roots into the Ground of Soul, I shared at some point that sometimes before, for instance, giving a talk on the imaginal soul-making, especially when it felt like there was a chance of a difficult audience and hostility—but actually any time, really, in the past, and I still do it—calling on the imaginal soul-making lineage, beings, historical and angelic, if you like, of the past, of the present, of the future, imaginal beings and calling on them for help, for support, recognizing myself as wanting to serve that lineage and support it and move it on and be part of it and conceiving of myself imaginatively as part of that tradition, that lineage.

So yes, before any time, really, often I talk about soul-making, certainly before a difficult talk, or when I'm very tired, sometimes from illness, and I think I mentioned our podcast was scheduled and I was really struggling with health and fatigue, and didn't want to let the side down, so to speak, didn't want to let this lineage down, this tradition down for whom I'm one of the temporary spokespersons, perhaps, imaginatively.

So then, imaginatively, prayerfully, aligning myself in the imaginal realm with that imaginal lineage and devoting myself to that, putting my intention in alignment and devotion to that, and calling for help. What I failed to mention on that Roots into the Ground of Soul, just in the moment of it, was that what I often do with that is have a few moments of really deep emptiness perception beforehand. So I go, just based on past practice and all the work I've done, very deep into some unfabricating of all things, and then coming out of that, dipping into that, coming out of it with that powerful liquefying and unfabricating, then engaging in this prayerful, devotional, dedicated relationship with the lineage and asking for help.

And that dip into deep emptiness and that deep unfabricating, even just for a few moments, lends that whole imaginal sense of the lineage of myself and what I'm serving and what I want to serve—gives it much greater power. It's already accessible as an image, it's something I can generate and call on and call back, but the power and the soul-making power of that is amplified, I think, significantly, through that dip into emptiness, deep emptiness.

So yes, deep emptiness can empower images that are already there, already accessible, and it can also, the unfabricating, the loosening can support and open the possibility of an image appearing, coming, visiting, being received.

And in regard to that latter possibility, we have to point something else out. As always, there's a mutual dependent origination. So yes, dependent on fabricating less and liquefying is the arising of image, but as always, the dependency runs both ways. There's a mutual dependent origination, which means that when we sense with soul, when there's an imaginal perception, there is some degree of loosening. There is some degree of less fabrication.

So I sometimes give the example of, especially recently, you know, challenged with health stuff and sensing that, sometimes I describe going into a mode of sensing my life and death from the perspective of eternity, spesiae eternatus in Latin, the sort of bird's eye view from beyond death or beyond time. And in a way, what that's doing is stimulating or igniting the node of the element of eternality, of the 28 elements. Seeing my life, my death, my narrative from that perspective ignites, turns on the eternality node. And then myself and my life and my death and my journey through life to death, from birth to death, becomes image. And in that, there's a certain loosening, unbinding, fading of perception to some degree. To some degree. Which is exactly what we're talking about.

This alignment brings energy and integration, harmonizing all the elements together.

Returning to the alchemical maxim: "Do not perform any operation—do not perform any alchemical operation, do not begin the work—until all is liquid." Yes, this principle holds true. But it also works in reverse. The arising of an image, to the degree that it's truly imaginal, will also liquefy things. It will certainly liquefy the sense of that image, but also the sense of self, the sense of world, the sense of time—all of that dissolves and softens.

I want to stress this non-linearity of all the elements that comprise the imaginal. Yes, this liquefaction—this unfabricating to some degree, this loosening and unbinding—is an integral part, a necessary component of what happens in imaginal practice. But it might not always proceed step by step. It's not necessarily: first you do the unfabricating a little bit, then you can have an image. The elements might arise in any order.

There's something important to be aware of here, because I know some people might hear teachings on emptiness—whether independently, in the context of an emptiness course, a book, or within imaginal practice—and feel somewhat daunted. They might think, "I'm so far from those kinds of experiences you're describing. There are so many different practices, and they all seem quite advanced." I want to address this concern directly.

What I really want to convey is that any degree or depth of loosening, unbinding, unfabricating—any bringing in of emptiness, however slight—is generally going to be helpful with imaginal practice, with sensing the soul. The exception would be if one has the foot rammed on the accelerator with emptiness contemplation, really leaning into and emphasizing that understanding of emptiness as a way of looking at all perception. In that case, everything will simply fade. As I mentioned before, during such intense emptiness practice, there won't be any image, there won't be any perception. You can dip into that state and emerge from it, and things will be loosened afterward. But not during the time of full-throttle emptiness contemplation.

Most importantly, whatever little bit of emptiness or liquefying or unfabricating we can bring to bear can be tremendously helpful.

Let me share something from a few months ago. I was struggling with aftereffects of treatments, quite tired and physically uncomfortable, with different bodily systems taxed by medication. I sat to meditate and almost immediately, a soulmaking constellation came together. I use that word deliberately: constellation.

I can't remember the exact order of appearance of the various elements, but one was the idea—really just a word initially—of stamina, forbearance, patience with suffering and difficulty. But that word was lit up in a certain way. It had a sense of significance, of depth. It was woven into the imaginal tapestry.

Another element was both an idea and then the experiential sense, the meditative sense, that all experience—including and especially the dukkha of the pain I was feeling, the discomfort, the inconvenience, the frustration with medical matters and doctors, the whole situation of being very ill and the likely movement toward dying—all of this is just appearances.

Some of you familiar with emptiness practices will recognize this as a certain level of emptiness perception. Whatever I regard as "my body"—it's just an appearance. This thought—just an appearance. Even the perception of this desk—just an appearance. Time itself—just an appearance.

One can choose to employ this as a way of looking: just appearance, just appearance, just appearances. These can be very beautiful and very liberating practices. It's not the deepest level of emptiness perception—it's one of a whole range of practices, a certain level among many. But in this case, it arose almost by itself, something I had practiced extensively in the past.

Though not the deepest level, it was enough to completely transform the relationship at that moment with the whole health predicament, with dying itself.

And like all emptiness practices do, as I said earlier, it should release aversion. It should be a letting go. It should release clinging and aversion. And in so doing, it releases dukkha. And also then allowed a sense of stamina and the kind of ability to persevere with strength, with steadiness, with a sense of uprightness.

So there was this idea of stamina that came, alive with imaginal import and portent. Then there was this certain emptiness perception at a certain level—not the deepest—which from past practice I'm quite used to. It just kind of came by itself.

There was a third element to this imaginal constellation, which was a kind of Middle Eastern man in a black robe. His features were not visually clear, but his energy was quite stern, and he was encouraging me to stamina. He was standing and sort of dancing opposite me, quite fierce, with a tremendous amount of energy—as a kind of tough love, I suppose, he was teaching or communicating to me. He somehow communicated, not necessarily in words, that my illness and possible dying may be for the sake of more than me. I had certain associations with that regarding the Sangha and things like that.

That piece I checked out. I'm always a little bit cautious when something in the imaginal practice has to do with self, and I check it out. And it's like, yes, it had the imaginal middle way. I wasn't reifying that as some kind of self-glorification or something like that. So that put me at ease with that aspect of it.

So these three aspects came together: the word stamina, the idea of stamina; then the sense of all experiences as just appearances; and then this Middle Eastern, stern, fierce teacher who was communicating to me as he danced. And I felt better immediately, just very, very quickly. The body softened, the energy body opened, the energies opened and were enveloped in a warm light, I felt. I could feel that as potentially healing if I wanted to, so I lingered there a little bit.

So several points here. One is, by way of illustration, notice the complexity of some images—that they actually involve several elements in combination. I identified three in this case.

Second, as I said, and this was the main point that I wanted to communicate right now: the use of emptiness perceptions and practices to loosen things, liquefy things, and to aid in that way the imaginal possibilities is really important. So this "just appearances"—this attitude, way of looking, of regarding all experiences, especially the difficult ones, as just appearances—was really an integral part of what opened up here and of supporting that possibility of opening.

But, and this is the point, they don't always have to be the deepest emptiness practices or perceptions one knows. In this case, I've spent a lot of time exploring emptiness, and there are much deeper emptiness practices than this "just appearances" view. But it didn't have to be the deepest one. So really, wherever you are in your exploration of emptiness and loosening and liquefying and unbinding, unfabricating things, that's going to be helpful. And if you've gone quite deep with these things, then anywhere along the range of what you've explored up to that point will be helpful. You don't always have to go to the deepest level of emptiness. I mean, that can be great and helpful too, but it's not always necessary.

So that was the main point, but let's just say a couple of other things. The facets of the imaginal constellation there, those three facets, affected and transformed each other. They were mixed up, involved in each other, affecting each other.

What happened as the thing became more imaginal was that the emptiness perception—that emptiness way of looking of phenomena and experience as just appearances—also became more soul-making than it would be in a purely emptiness practice that wasn't imaginal soul-making, because it was affected by, wrapped up in, in dialogue with and informed by the other more imaginal elements that were going on: this idea of stamina and this stern, fierce teacher in a black robe.

So "appearances"—the word "appearances"—came to me and also gained range and dimensionality and depth and fullness and richness. It meant, it included certainly my illness, the dukkha, dying early. That was appearance, with all the freeing ramifications of that. But it included more also—the narratives of my life, again. And even more than that: these appearances, the narrative and the experience and the illness and the dying and all that—they are me and they are not me, of course. But they are me and not me. They are my soul.

So this was an intuitive, imaginal soul-making understanding: these appearances are my soul. Now, of course, other times I can have a completely different way of looking—appearances, experiences, my narrative, none of that is me. In this case, because of the flexibility of ways of looking, there's a possibility, and this just happened organically in the imaginal mix of things in the constellation there. There was the opposite view: they are my soul. And that...

That sense of that narrative and the early death and the illness and all these experiences, and even the things that I was looking at in the room—the sofa, whatever was there, the table—they are my soul. And all of that—the narrative, death, illness—formed an image. And there was awareness that this image is not just for me, but it's also for others.

There was awareness of self being an image for another, of course, which we can be, and I think we should be in the fullest and deepest and most beautiful human relationships. We become image for each other. We become imaginal image for each other.

The emptiness perception itself, the emptiness way of looking of just appearances, as I said, also took on this quality—became dimensionalized in becoming imaginal itself.

There's a way of using emptiness practices—I'll come back to this in another talk—but there's a way of using emptiness practices at times that kind of denigrates experience and the phenomena of our experience, internal and external. Because it's in the service of letting go, it's like, "Oh, that doesn't matter, that doesn't matter, it's empty, it's empty." And there's a kind of letting go, a holy disinterest, I've called it sometimes. It's almost like saying, "It's nothing, it's empty." And that's very valid at one point, but it leads beyond the world, so to speak. If I just keep regarding things that way, it will take me to the unfabricated. Of course, it could get hijacked with aversion and, as I said, with anti-libidinal tendencies and deflation and all that.

But in this case, the notion of appearances that got opened up and filled out in both a liberating way and an imaginal way was not a kind of denigration or degradation of appearances.

I was reminded of a passage from Henri Corbin, where he in his lifetime was accused of being a docetist. Docetism was regarded at some point by the church authorities as a particular kind of heresy. What it means—D-O-C-E-T-I-S-M—is the view or philosophy that Christ was not truly human, but was an appearance. And some of you will know parallels of that with certain teachings about Buddha nature, that actually the Buddhas that appear in the world are appearances. They're kind of appearances projected forth from another level—the Dharmakaya and Sambhogakaya.

Corbin, in his teaching about the Abrahamic traditions and his interpretation of those stories and teachings—that they would be more helpfully regarded as appearance—was accused of heresy. And he replied, "Yes, I am, but it's a docetism that is far from degrading reality by making it appearance. On the contrary, by transforming it into appearance, by transforming seeming reality into appearance, it makes this reality transparent to the transcendent meaning manifested in it."

Do you understand? It's not just appearance as a way of just letting go—"Ah, it doesn't matter." And then usually there's something that's real, and this is just appearance, and I want that real thing. But he's saying no: in making it appearance, by transforming it into appearance, it makes this reality transparent to the transcendent meaning manifested in it. In other words, when we sense it that way, what it means to be appearance is that it's illuminated, it's translucent, it's transubstantiated into the theophany or angelic manifestation or radiation of divinity—it's perceived that way.

Similarly, what happened here in the weaving together of these different imaginal elements—a certain emptiness mode of looking, way of looking that could be denigrating of appearances—was actually then woven into something that was much more sacred and beautiful and soulful.

There's a relationship—you can recognize some of what we're talking about in this—a relationship between unfabricating and sensing the soul and the opening up of the imaginal. You can recognize some of that in other traditions.

Certainly in tantric teachings, as I've pointed out many times, they're actually premised on understanding of emptiness. One is usually instructed to meditate on emptiness for a certain amount of time and then engage in deity visualization.

I'm going to quote something from the Jewish mystical tradition. This is from Shneur Zalman, in a book called Likutey Amarim, sometimes called Tanya, and he said: "Love derived from the understanding and knowledge of the greatness of the blessed Ein Sof..." Ein Sof means literally "without limit," but when you read the explanations of how that's used in the Jewish mystical traditions, the Kabbalistic traditions, it really means a kind of nothingness. So it's something akin to the unfabricated.

"Love derived from the understanding and knowledge of the greatness of the blessed Ein Sof, of the unfabricated, let's say, is called cheshek"—which means heart's desire. So in other words, when we love that experience and the understanding we get from it, we love the unfabricated. There's that movement. That love is called the heart's desire.

"And from this heart's desire is produced a garment for the soul in the world of Beriah." There's a lot of Hebrew technical terms here, but that world of Beriah is one of the strata of many worlds. This world of physical manifestation is just one world. There are other planes of existence. Beriah also means the world of creation.

So this love and desire, this heart's desire for the unfabricated—from that heart's desire, from that love, is produced a garment for the soul in the world of creation, which constitutes the higher Garden of Eden.

Here's a love derived from knowing the unfabricated, a heart's desire for the unfabricated and for all that that implies. And from that heart's desire is produced a garment for the soul in the world of creation.

And that world of creation constitutes the higher garden of Eden.

In our language, we can understand this more directly. The heart's desire based on knowing itself means the eros based on knowing emptiness and the unfabricated. When we translate these terms, we find that the eros based on knowing emptiness and the unfabricated—that eros, as being eros—if it's allowed to do what it does, will impregnate and deepen, richen, complexify, expand the psyche and the logos and the whole sense of things, so that the energy body and the imaginal body and the whole world open up and become imaginal and become dimensionalized and become divinized.

This garment for the soul is in the higher garden of Eden, in the garden of Eden. You understand? So this love of emptiness, this knowing of emptiness and the unfabricated, that eros does something, based also on the experience of emptiness. It opens up the energy body. That energy body becomes a garment for the soul. The energy body experiences a garment for the soul in the garden—in a world transformed, dimensionalized, divinized, eternalized, given meaningfulness, beauty, resplendent with all the elements of the imaginal.

So that whole indispensable place for emptiness, unfabricating, and the love of that too, the eros for that too, and what it can open up—it has parallels in Buddhist tantric teachings and also, as we just quoted, in certain Kabbalistic teachings from the Jewish tradition. And we can understand that with our words.

So I hope that makes sense. Emptiness is powerful, you know. Going back to what I said earlier, people have different relationships within, different degrees of desire and curiosity, but it's powerful in terms of what it can deliver for our dharma practice, for our lives, and definitely for imaginal practice.

Lingering on tantric parallels, some of you will have heard of tummo, the practice of inner fire, the inner heat, that famous practice among Tibetan yogis. Lama Yeshe has written about it, and Geshe Kelsang and others—you can find books about it.

What it involves is visualizing the channels of the energy body and visualizing certain things happening in those channels and in the central channel, the vertical channel of the body, of the energy body. In a way, a byproduct of that practice is the generation of internal heat. The purpose of the practice is not so much to keep you warm in the snow, but rather that in working with the channels of energy in this way, a very deep perception of emptiness comes about. So rather than through some kind of analytic meditation or other playing with fabrication, one actually works with the energy body and that delivers a deep understanding of emptiness.

Again, mutual dependent arising—things work both ways.

You will notice when you're contemplating emptiness, when you're engaging in emptiness practice and it's working well, there is an alignment, harmonization of the energy body, just as there is when we do imaginal practice and an image is becoming imaginal. But this can go very deep.

When we have a deep moment of realizing emptiness—and it could just be a moment—you will feel something quite dramatic. That's not really the right word, but there's a real sense of the energy body and the whole bodily experience being cleared out and purified, as well as being aligned and harmonized.

So the work with the channels and visualizing can lead to a sense, an experience of emptiness in the Tibetan teachings, but also the other way around. Emptiness practice, emptiness experience will purify the energy body and the channels there, and you can actually feel that. And it will liquefy and unfabricate to some degree all perception.

I want to say something else about that. At a deep level, that's quite a dramatic, palpable experience, but even a little bit, you'll notice that. Something happens in the energy body because it's untangling the knots and the contractions that clinging causes.

As I said earlier, with regard to its place and its use in imaginal practice or alongside or supporting or opening imaginal practice, there are all kinds of ranges of the kind of depth and power of different emptiness practices. And they're all going to be useful and helpful. So don't get hung up that it has to be this really deep thing. Sometimes it can be really deep. And these things can, with practice, become very quick. That usually takes quite a bit of time of developing emptiness practices, but there's always individual variation.

Sometimes what's very powerful, for example, in opening up, sensing the soul, is just a few moments even of contemplating the emptiness of time. Now, for those few moments to be powerful, they will depend on probably quite a lot of practice and familiarity, developing familiarity with contemplating the emptiness of time or ways of looking that unfabricate time or realize its emptiness.

But if that's the sort of thing you're interested in, or if it's the sort of thing that's available to you, or if this is relevant later on, sometimes this can be very powerful—few moments perhaps only of some way of seeing the emptiness of time, and then turning the attention to anything. It could be the body or something else. Anything that appears in time and changes in time, which is all things that we know in the world of conventional experience.

So some contemplation of emptiness of time meditatively, and then turning the attention that's imbued with that understanding of the emptiness of time, just turning attention to something which appears and changes in time, and the sense of a timeless dimension will be allowed, will be supported and made manifest there. And again, that being one of the...

nodes of eternality, timelessness, there can be then the perception of that thing, whatever thing it was—the body or whatever else, the body, the world, whatever—that can be sensed with soul, because we've ignited one of the elements of the imaginal, one of the nodes.

But as I say, things can... any kind of emptiness practice or any level, don't get—please don't get—daunted or self-critical or despairing if you hear about practices that you haven't approached yet or that seem a long way off for you. I mentioned, I think, in one of the talks already on the retreat, how just a little bit of anattā practice of regarding something that we would usually identify with or take as me or mine, and engaging a way of looking that regards it as not me, not mine, very lightly. A degree of that anattā practice can allow the self to become imaginal. The sense of self becomes an imaginal sense of self.

Why? Because anattā practice is one of those unfabricating practices. When we regard things as not me, not mine, it's actually very, very powerful, potentially. If we can, it's really worth developing as a practice, if you can, if you're interested. So some—not the whole, again, not the accelerator, the gas pedal rammed down full throttle, because that will just fade everything, and then you'd have to come out of that, and that still might be helpful. But just a degree of anattā, a sort of light touch, liquefies things. It liquefies, in this case, the sense of self.

And in a way, anattā practice is also stepping out of the normal self-sense. So the normal, habitual, mostly unconscious kind of program for consciousness is to appropriate this or that as me or mine—body, feelings, perceptions, thoughts, intentions, consciousness itself, etc. And so by engaging the anattā way of looking, with respect to some of that or all of that, you're actually stepping out of the normal self-sense enough. And in stepping out of that normal kind of entrenched self-sense, then there's actually room, space for the self to be viewed in other ways. So a degree of anattā practice doesn't have to be—like I said, the whole hog—can be really helpful in liberating the possibility of sensing an imaginal self, rather than just the locked-in, conventional, reified, solidified sense of self.

I want to mention another possibility here, that again, I feel very strongly that emptiness can and should be in the service of love, certainly, and the brahmavihāras, and not just liberation, not just personal liberation—emptiness in the service of the brahmavihāras, but also in the service of a sense of sacredness and senses of sacredness.

So what you can notice sometimes is that opening to more emptiness or deeper emptiness at some time can actually open up and support a sense of prayerfulness. Or it might be that we feel moved to adopt a prayerful stance with respect to something or some situation, or just with respect to the cosmos, and not really prayer as supplication, as asking, but just a prayerfulness. But very easily for us as human beings, that prayerfulness can feel blocked at times, or limited, or stuck in some way.

Of course, when we're asking for things, when there's a supplication, oftentimes it's because there's something we want or feel we need and the self wanting that is reified. And that reification of the self actually limits the sense of the prayerfulness and the openness of the prayerfulness. It doesn't feel so alive or so rich or so deep or so beautiful when the self is reified.

So, seemingly paradoxically, when there's, so to speak, less self, when the emptiness of the self is seen, or we're engaging a way of looking that experiences the self more emptily, that actually opens up and fires and supports a deeper, wider, more beautiful and richer, more soulful quality of prayerful supplication. One still might be in the level of prayer of asking, of supplication—if that's the right word, I hope it is. But the whole thing has become looser, less solidified, less contracted. There's still a self that's praying in the asking sense. That's one level of prayer. But that self is kind of see-through. It's looser, just because it's seen as more empty.

So the emptiness, just as emptiness opens up and should open up the brahmavihāras, and support the brahmavihāras—I've talked about that in the past—so also the emptiness can open up the prayerfulness and enrich and deepen it and make it more beautiful. And it might be, unless you're used to this, that that seems paradoxical. The self is asking, if I see the emptiness of self, why would I ask for anything? Because self is empty, it doesn't need anything, there's nothing to need. But actually it's not—yes it can go to that level, but we're talking about sort of the more subtle play of the pedals here, some intermediate territory of emptiness that opens up the richness and the breadth and depth and beauty of soul-making perceptions, of sensing the soul.

We talk about the imaginal middle way, the theater-like quality, neither real nor not real, being one of the elements of the imaginal, of sensing the soul. But that doesn't really equate completely. So the imaginal middle way is not the middle way of emptiness that Nāgārjuna and others talked about. Not exactly.

So I want to come back to this later, but, you know, all things are empty—at least in my understanding of emptiness, and I think Nāgārjuna's and other people—all things are empty. So that means something that's, an imaginal perception is empty, but also a conventional perception is empty. And a deluded perception is empty. All of that is empty. All of those perceptions are empty. All things are empty. But still, although all things are empty, they're not...

Partly, things are empty in different ways. At the deepest level, they're all empty in the same way. For instance, everything is empty—all things are empty because time is empty, and anything that exists must exist in time. So everything is empty at that level. At other levels, there may be more: some things are empty in certain ways that others aren't. The stock market is empty because it's just a social convention that people get very het up about, but it's merely a social convention.

At a deep level, all things are empty. But still, as I've said before, there's an ontological difference in status between an imaginal object and a conventionally perceived physical object. To say that they're all the same because they're all just empty—there is a difference in ontological status there.

So when we talk about the imaginal middle way, we're not talking about exactly the same thing as emptiness. I want to come back to that in another talk, hopefully. But what I do want to say right now to finish is about the degree of latitude or flexibility or range with how much we reify at any time in imaginal practice.

We really emphasize this neither real nor not real, theater-like quality—imaginal in a way. But maybe there's a rightness to relating to certain images where we are reifying to certain images. And in that sense, those images are empty, but just empty in the way that a person is empty, or any conventionally agreed-upon physical entity is empty. So there's more reification going on than what we mean with the imaginal middle way. Or within that imaginal middle way there's a range, and we can reify a bit more or a bit less at different times, perhaps. Maybe there's a rightness in all that.

I've said before that I think it will be, in the long run, much more fertile to be quite diligent and curious about that sense of the imaginal middle way. It's really a certain flavor, this theater-like quality, and give that quite a lot of importance to begin with. "To begin with" might be for years in imaginal practice. And then, based on that experience and feel for that—it's really a certain feel, it feels very different than other experiences—based on the familiarity and experience with that, then we might start exploring more possibilities of more reification with certain experiences, certain images, certain senses. I feel that will be much more fruitful.

It will also preserve, as I said, the territory and the domain of imaginal practice from just getting mixed up with other stuff and its particular fruits being lost, its unique fruits being lost. So my request and encouragement is to lean on that for a while. I know it challenges people or even irks some people, but I do feel it's important.

Having said that, there might be at times and with certain experiences, certain images, the possibility of reifying a bit more and maybe even the necessity or the appropriateness of reifying a bit more. Some of that might be just to do with a person's own growth of their soul or psychology. So for someone it might be good for them to pray to a personal God, asking for help for themselves, humbly and reifying self, situation, and God. It might be that a person just jumps too easily to this non-reification and there's not with it enough of a certain kind of traction in the being, in the psychology, in the soul, in the heart. So it might be for personal reasons.

But it's a tricky one in teaching. Also emptiness, middle way. It's really tricky, and it's something that really, in the journey of understanding and practicing with emptiness, refines itself and gets more and more subtle and more and more precise—what it really means to say things neither exist nor not exist. Things neither do exist nor don't exist—this emptiness middle way. It's really a part of the journey, and one wobbles back and forth either side of that middle way as the understanding hones in on what it really means intellectually, but also really intuitively and experientially.

Similarly, with the imaginal middle way, it's a tricky teaching, it seems, for people. On the other hand, like I said, it has a certain flavor to me. And I can tell when I'm working with someone whether they're in that or not, and they recognize it if I point it out often—not everyone, but if there's enough sensitivity and familiarity, it's palpable. You're in a different realm there when there's not the reification. So I think it's sometimes really palpably obvious, and it seems to be something that many people struggle with for different reasons.

But I was talking with Catherine as well, and we realized that we don't want to get attached to a position of non-reifying. There may be a spectrum of reification in imaginal practice which we are free to move along at any time, more or less, and maybe for different reasons at any time that it's more right to reify, more appropriate, more helpful for whatever reason we have in mind.

So it might be, as I said, something to do with a person's personal growth, something to do with the fullness of their being. Or it might have to do more with the experience itself and the image itself—that there are whole categories of being, categories of experience that share a lot of aspects with imaginal experience, but they're not imaginal. We're talking about other things. We're talking about opening to different realms as perceptions that are as real as anything else, as real as seeing my friend walking down the street or having a cup of tea or whatever. It may well be—my inclination is to say there are many kinds of realms of experience and being.

And in those cases, to adopt a non-reifying stance in the imaginal way may not be attuned or appropriate. So it's complex—really complex. But it feels important to mention that there are certainly realms beyond the imaginal.

There's a whole spectrum of psychic phenomena—ESP, shamanism, energy perceptions, aura perceptions, and all that. This is all important and significant, I think. Again, I wanted to differentiate it from the imaginal. But I've also heard accounts of people in the process of dying reporting as they're on their deathbed perceiving angels, perceiving other planes of beings, knowing things about friends or relatives on the other side of the world without any communication—all kinds of extraordinary phenomena.

Since my diagnosis of the metastases and the high likelihood of dying soon, there are times when I also feel as if other planes of existence are opened up to my perception. I shared this very briefly in another talk the other night. Sometimes it's almost like the perception of the angel, or the angelic dimension of a human being, is weighted more heavily than the perception of their ego or human aspect—if we can even separate those two.

This has a different quality than what we're calling the imaginal or the imaginal middle way. There is really a sense of opening to something that has the ontological status, the degree of being and reality, equivalent to any human perception or any physical perception.

I just want to mention this. It's obviously a huge subject. I don't have it figured out at all, and I don't know anyone who does. But this business of the importance of the imaginal middle way—it's not quite the same as emptiness. It's quite a wide middle way, and we might have a range within it of more or less reifying. Again, it's quite individual when to lean toward less reification, more fluidity—"Can you notice that theatrical element?"—and when actually to lean toward more reification, even if it's imaginal. Sometimes this sense of your soul may be more real, this imaginal sense of yourself, this imaginal sense of the angels or the angel, more real, more important, more significant, more central, more of a solid pillar and guide in your life than anything which conventionally, socially agreed-upon perception would sanction.

There are individual differences at different times, certainly in teaching, but we also get a feel for this ourselves—moving within that range of the imaginal middle way. And there might be a whole gamut of experiences that fall outside of the imaginal altogether, and therefore the imaginal middle way doesn't pertain to them so much as the emptiness middle way pertains to them, as it does to any object, physical or otherwise.

I just wanted to mention this as the teachings evolve and to point that out.

Let's stop for tonight. I will hopefully say more about emptiness in a later talk.

CHAPTER 178

Daimon, Refracted

Rob Burbea · 2h08

> In this profound dharma talk, Rob Burbea examines how thorough insight into śūnyatā (emptiness) paradoxically opens up rather than closes down possibilities for conceiving the self. When we see that all views of self are empty of inherent existence - whether personality, the five khandhas, or cosmic oneness - we become free to explore the full range of self-conceptions as legitimate theatrical costumes.
>
> Burbea introduces the concept of daimons (interchangeable with angels) and explores how the self can become imaginal through various practices: externalizing aspects of ourselves that love or desire, working with images that feel like "me and not-me," and allowing apparently impersonal images to dimensionalize our being. Drawing on Henry Corbin's notion of the "angel out ahead," he presents a revolutionary view where we don't just represent angels - rather, we as earthly beings represent and typify celestial existence.
> The talk offers practical approaches for working with challenging patterns like the inner critic, demonstrating how frustration and anger can become alchemical heat in the crucible of practice. Burbea emphasizes the importance of balance - ensuring that self, other, and world all become imaginal rather than remaining stuck in flat conceptions. Through guided meditation on the voice and embodiment, he illustrates how any aspect of our being can become ensouled, spreading to transform our entire sense of self into something sacred, dimensional, and mysterious.

If one's practice and understanding of emptiness, shunyata, goes deep enough and wide enough, radical and thorough enough, then we see, amongst other things, that any view or sense of self is empty. Any self concept is empty of inherent existence. It is not an ultimate or basic truth.

In that fuller and more radical understanding of emptiness, it is not the case, for example, that the personality is somehow illusory, but what really constitutes the self is just the process in time of the five aggregates of consciousness, physical materiality, feelings, perceptions, thoughts, intentions, and so forth. Nor is it the case, if one goes that deeply into emptiness, that self is an illusion but some kind of oneness is a basic reality. All these views, all views of self, are seen to be empty.

Where that leaves a practitioner who has seen this, who has understood this, is not with a sort of impossibility of using the language of self or using the views of self and a nowhere-to-go situation in their life regarding self and anything else. Because everything is empty and there is no hidden, basic, building block reality or fundament that is not empty, where it leaves a person seeing that is: it opens up any and all views of self as legitimate views and concepts to play with, to entertain, to put on the way an actor would put on different costumes.

So there's the legitimizing through deep insight. There's the legitimization to see and conceive and perceive self in different ways at different times in the whole range of views of self. Yes, I can practice at times seeing or conceiving of personality being empty, ego being empty, but all there is is this process of the aggregates in time, for instance. This is a legitimate view, very helpful, quite freeing, quite simplifying at times to a certain level. Or a view of just cosmic oneness of one kind or another, where the ego or the separate self is an illusion. Yes, beautiful, lovely, liberating to a certain extent at times.

But it also legitimizes seeing, sensing oneself as angel-like, or the self of another as angel, as theophany, as having a duty to one's daimons, which we can actually use interchangeably with angel, for now at least. The deep emptiness seeing, the radicality, the thoroughness, the totality of that legitimizes and opens up all kinds of possibilities, in a way an infinite range of possibilities, rather than closing down all these possibilities. We're free to conceive and perceive and talk and entertain any sense of self. We're free to move in that whole range, knowing all the time that whichever costume one puts on, whichever way of conceiving, sensing, viewing the self is empty, as empty as any other.

When we talk about the imaginal middle way—not just the middle way of emptiness in the Dharma, what Nagarjuna calls the middle way—we're not talking about simply a dissolution, a melting of the self, a dissolving, a disappearing, a fading of self or other objects of the imagination. To be an object of the imagination, it must be formed in some way. It must retain some degree of form, this form or that form. And again, there's the infinite range there.

The imaginal is formed, but it's theater. If you've been to good theater, it's powerful. You know this is not real, what's happening in front of you, but it affects you. And it can effect a transformation in your being, a transformation in your life, heart, in your soul, in your view of things, in your aspirations, in your desires. Theater needs forms. But knowing that it's theater doesn't take anything away from the power that these different forms of self, the different senses of self, can wield.

There's this kind of dance across the range of the imaginal middle way. The imaginal middle way might seem neither real nor not real. It can seem, just like the emptiness, like a very narrow path that requires a kind of razor's edge of precision in terms of reification and non-reification. But actually, it's helpful to conceive of this middle way as more of a broad boulevard. We have this possibility to reify less at times or more at times across that range that still constitutes basically a sense of theater with regard to an image or a sensing.

In the last retreat we did, Gaius, The Roots into the Ground of Soul, I tried to give an analogy for the necessity, if you like, for soul, of the imaginal sense beginning to involve and enliven and dimensionalize the sense of self. Oftentimes we talk about image as other, as the image feels like it's other—though not always. The image is other. It's an object. But in time, it might become important that the self becomes an image as well. This might not happen immediately with a certain image, and with some images or some experiences of sensing the soul, it's not always important that the self becomes an image.

Of course, we've touched on that. The image is other. It's an object. But it's important in time. It might not happen immediately with a certain image. And again, back to questions of pacing, etc. But to look... And with some images or some experiences, sensing the soul, etc., it doesn't always need... It's not always important that the self becomes an image. It might be just fine for this other to be image and the sense of the imaginal doesn't spread to involve the self sometimes.

But if one looks over time at one's sort of tendencies or patterns with regard to imaginal practice and sensing the soul, and one notices that, for instance, oh, I'm always—it's the other that's always divine. And I don't tend to sense my own divinity because the sense of self has not become imaginal. If one senses, if one recognizes looking back over a stretch of time with many images and says, oh, that's really quite rare, then one might be recognizing there an imbalance.

So I gave this analogy, as I was saying, on the last retreat of a fountain. So you can imagine like a fountain, a stone fountain in one of those squares, you know, in a city or a village, in a piazza or wherever it is. So if you imagine this fountain, and the water shoots up out of the central nozzle, and we could say, in this analogy, that's kind of Psyche's creations and discoveries rising up from the central nozzle, this sort of infinite and endless outpouring of the inclination to make soul, the desire to make soul and the raw material of soul.

And so the water comes up out of the central nozzle and then, as it does with fountains, it falls back down. And that central nozzle is central in a stone tray, maybe a circular stone tray. And in falling back down, if the water just falls back down on one side of the fountain, and not around the whole area, around all the different sides of that circle, then if the stone is not too heavy and there's a lot of water—again, analogies get stretched—then if it just falls on one side, that basin and the whole fountain is going to tip over. It's going to be made lopsided and eventually kind of lose its balance, fall, maybe shatter if it's lopsided.

If the water is falling down equally or relatively equally over the different areas of the circumference of this circular basin, then there's more balance there. So when we talk—I've put this out there a few times now, but I'm stressing its importance—so self, other and world want, soul wants self, other and world to become image.

So where there's, let's say, an image that's an other, like an erotic object that maybe I'm sensing as divine, etc., there's a natural tendency, and again it might have its own, let's say, natural pace, if we can even use such terms, for the sense of the self also, and then the world in cosmopoiesis, to also become image. So the initial image might have been an image of another, and working with that, and if we don't get in the way, if we allow soul to do what it wants to do, which is to make more soul, then self and world as well as this other will become soul.

So I hope that makes sense. Without that, as I said, there will be a tipping over. So there will be, for instance, very little equanimity if just this other is divine but I'm not. Especially if that other is a human other whose divinity I am sensing because I am sensing them with soul and I am not. I remain flat or lacking in divinity, etc.

So, this, when we talk about self, other, world becoming image, or soul wanting self, other and world to become image, then we also have to point out it doesn't have to happen in any order. I have been sometimes sitting, for instance, teaching a retreat, and the yogis, the sangha, become image for me first. And then it might spread to the world and to me, include the imaginal sense, the self gets subsumed, involved, needed in to the imaginal soul-making and the creativity and discovery of that. So it can happen in any order.

It might start with a cosmic vision. It might start from some lovely sense of nature opening up, some imaginal sense, some sensing of soul, either of one object or of the totality of one's environment. And then move to the self. So any order is possible. But over the long term, we want to get a sense that the waters of soul are allowed to flow always, all those three ways, self, other, world. The order is not important. So that's something to check.

And what I really want to talk about tonight is the self becoming image. So that's a general point in terms of contextualizing it. We could go further with that and actually delineate other aspects of being, of experience, that also will tend to become in-souled if we let the soul-making dynamic and process do its thing, if we don't get in the way or block it or inhibit it in some way.

So we could say also that eros will become dynamic. Our own eros will become an erotic, imaginal object for us. And in fact, any aspect of our being that sort of comes into the orbit of our attention will—if, when the soul-making is happening, at a certain point it will become, it will get drawn in to the soul-making dynamic and hence become imaginal. So, self, other, world, other aspects too, but it's important that self also becomes imaginal at some point. Or sometimes, at least. And that can happen in any order.

So, in a way, like I said, we could say this is just what soul will naturally do, left to its own devices, if it isn't blocked. But still, we can investigate that whole movement a little bit more, and at times we can encourage or help it, and that's quite interesting to explore that.

So I think I already mentioned, I didn't really fill it out, you know, sometimes what happens is we're dealing with something that's touching the heart, maybe touching the heart in a difficult way, whatever this issue is, or a very lovely way. But we see that we desire something. And maybe that desire is already eros, maybe it's a painful kind of desire, or it's stuck in a painful place. One possibility sometimes, again, quite deft in the touch here, and delicate in the sort of maneuvering rather than formulaic and sort of yanking things around. But one possibility then is to... almost like externalize the self who loves this or that, the self who has desire for this or that, or has eros for this or that.

So once feeling it in oneself, and even getting to that point, it might be that that was a journey, even to recognize, oh, I have desire for this, or wrapped up in this complicated dukkha that I feel afflicted by right now, or lost in, actually is part of the whole constellation of dukkha, there is desire. There will always be desire when there's dukkha, and that goes back to the teaching of the OCD practice, the opening to the current of desire. But often there's love too. I love this or that. It's wrapped up with desire, of course. I love this or that. I have eros for this or that. I have desire for this or that.

But externalizing the self. So we say, here's all this complex dukkha. I recognize that one strand of it is my love for this or that, or my desire, or eros for this or that. And externalizing it means let that, let the one who loves this or that, the one who desires this or that, let that become image. She, he, they who love this or that. So almost putting it in the third person and letting it constellate as an image, which then obviously has echoing and mirroring and kind of maybe feels a bit like myself, but is also other.

Sometimes that's a really skillful move. Again, if it's deftly and delicately done and handled without too much pressure or clunkiness or demand or formulaic sort of going through the motions. She, he, they who love this or that. She, he, they who love, who desire or have eros for this or that. And then being with that image, it might be that one actually recognizes, oh, one has eros, or there's an erotic relationship with that self that we've just externalized.

So let it be other. But it becomes imaginal. It might start as just a sort of more flat image, but as one recognises the eros, as one recognises the beauty there, it might become image. And sometimes it's easier to have that sense of eros and beauty when it's externalised like that. For all kinds of reasons and social taboos and cultural conditionings and whatnot and contractions of being and psychology, it's harder to have that, to recognize the beauty and the dimensionality and to have an erotic relationship with oneself. So one kind of externalizes it by just making an image. Don't worry if it's not imaginal at first. It can very soon become imaginal, more fully imaginal, with the eros there.

So, the one who desires and loves opening, the one who desires and loves to be touched, one recognizes that becomes an image, and one sees, as I said, the beauty, the dimensionality, the eternality. There's eros there, there's reverence, and one recognises the echoing, the mirroring. It's me and it's not me. But that might have come, this imaginal sense of she who, the one who desires and loves opening, one who desires and loves to be touched, or someone else said the one who is faithful and devoted to beauty. All these, these are actual examples from interviews, but they came out of a condition of being that wasn't at all clear to start with. It was just a contracted sort of tangle of lots of different painful elements, history and psychology and situation and self-view, etc.

But as this image was sort of supported to come to birth and to emerge there, then it reflects back on the self in the infinite echoing and mirroring. One recognizes something. One recognizes something about oneself. And oneself has become image. Although there's this kind of other, it doesn't matter. Some magic, some alchemy has happened in the sense of self. So it might take a little while to get there, because one has to deal with the tangle of dukkha sometimes. It might not be that tangled, it might not even be dukkha to start with. But then if you like, I don't want to make it too formulaic, then the beauty is revealed, the eros is revealed, the whole self-sense can open up.

So this is important. And there's so many possibilities, you know, working with image of the way the self gets pulled in, dynamic pulled into the imaginal sense, how the imaginal sense spreads to include the self.

So someone on retreat at Gaia House was sharing with me, this is a while ago, they were in the garden and a blackbird flew into a window of Gaia House and was wounded, fell to the ground and was wounded. And she heard the sound, saw it, found the blackbird in the sort of undergrowth and in the flower bed or something. And it was clearly wounded. And so she just sat with it and she stayed with it in its wounded condition, in its suffering and stayed there with compassion, with care, with concern, but also with, you know, a troubled heart. And there was quite a lot of papañca at first with that situation, despite the compassion, etc. There was, you know, what should I do, and quite a lot of, the being was stirred up, partly in a not very helpful way.

But then, as she sat with it, or later actually, the whole thing became imaginal. Like the whole scene, and the blackbird, and the wounding there, became imaginal, and in our framework, when something becomes more imaginal, actually a lot of the unhelpful complication and proliferation that we call papañca diminishes. So as the imaginal grows, the papañca diminishes. As the papañca grows, the imaginal diminishes.

So somehow in being with it and being with it later in her life, back in her room, the papañca declined, peace came and a healing sense came, something that was healing in the soul. She went back in the morning to check on the blackbird, but it was gone, so either it was presumed dead or a fox got it or something.

The next day, the image returned. And she was reporting this in an interview. I asked her, in the image, is the bird alone or are you in the image sitting with it? And she said actually the image was of her sitting with the bird, rather than the bird alone. Actually, both would have been fine. It was more I just wanted to get a sense of what the actual image was, what it included and what the possibilities were. But there was something, I think, a particular possibility or direction gets included if she was in the image. It's not better or worse, it's just a particular possibility or direction gets included when the image is the wounded bird and the self there.

Sometimes in a kind of simple way, this works. It's almost like I'm then implicit in that image. I didn't actually linger on it. I kind of said very little because I wanted to let the process work by itself without me leading it or suggesting too much a direction or what needed to happen.

But one of the sort of basic possibilities of working with image in this way is that sometimes we don't see things about ourselves. And sometimes some aspect or quality of our being comes more clearly to be recognized. But it's not just that. There's more to it than that. In this case, her natural goodness, deep, natural, innocent, almost childlike care for beings. Something that, in my sense, was very natural to her soul, part of her soul.

So we recognize something—recognize our own positive qualities—but there's more to it than that because the whole thing can then become dimensionalized and divinized, which is different than just recognizing "oh I'm good at this and I have that quality" and that sort of flatly conceived psychology of self-esteem or whatever. That's maybe one level. But then there's the possibility when things become imaginal, with the dimensionality, with the theater, with the eternality, with the divinity and theophany, that it can become more of that.

Still, that basic level of recognizing certain qualities of oneself through an image is important. As I said, sometimes it's easier when it's externalized like that.

I'll give you a couple more examples. Someone a while ago came into an interview and reported two images and was actually interested how to connect the images with the self and with the particularities of herself. So one image was a kind of dramatic image of a queen with a long robe, and the robe was trailing blood. So she's leaving this trail of blood in her long robe, from her long robe.

So that was the main part of the image. Who is this queen? What's her story? So I can't remember if I asked that. I think I did. Or she might have wondered, or she might have just offered the background story. And she was concerned in offering this background story that, oh, but I thought images were not supposed to be narrative.

We touched on this, I think, in a Q&A in the Roots of the Groundless Soul retreat. Sometimes you get an image which it's not so much a narrative image as much as it has a kind of backstory. It has a kind of imaginal background, so one understands almost actually implicitly—not like watching a series of events, but one understands implicitly the story or the narrative, in this case, of this queen or whatever the imaginal character is. So in a way it's part of the image, it's just more in the background and intuited implicitly, but it has a narrative structure and still the whole retains a sense of eternality, of always already happening, of timelessness.

So that's actually not a problem with images, even if they're narrative, sometimes it's not a problem. And getting a sense of this queen trailing blood and her poise and strength. So I think, again, it's almost like I might have had to ask questions to tease out the character and the quality and maybe a bit of the backstory of this queen trailing...

And so again, I asked, "Do you notice—" as she was sharing this image, the image became alive for me. We were entering into it together. I felt like I was perceiving the image just as much as she was. It became, in a way, a common object between us, which is a very lovely thing to happen, as many of you will know.

When I asked, "Do you notice her wisdom?" This queen has a particular kind of wisdom, a shrewdness, but without any of the negative implications of that word shrewd. There's a kind of practical wisdom, a diplomatic wisdom. "Do you notice her kind of attuned, appropriate, measured responses to her subjects and to the people in her court?" "Do you notice her dignity, her nobility?"

All this was, to me, pregnant in the image and needed a little bit of teasing out to become more palpable, to become more recognizable, and to be recognized, to be witnessed, to be made clear. And then it's possible, again as a stage of practice, to resonate with her qualities. So poise, strength—each one of these: dignity, nobility, wisdom, attunement, appropriate response, measured response—all these individual and connected qualities can be... Take your time in the meditation and just be with them and witness them and put the energy body and the soul and the heart and the sensibility in touch with them.

Just by virtue of opening to them and witnessing them and appreciating them, one opens one's being to those particular qualities, and the being, the soul, the energy body, the emotions, start resonating with those qualities. In so doing, we absorb those qualities. We absorb, if you like, into our life in ways that can actually then become manifest, practically manifest, really manifest in our relationships over time. We absorb those qualities.

Now sometimes people practice with images and that's the total scope of the intention. Sometimes people even practice Vajrayana practices to do that. It's great, and it's a very powerful way of practice. Sometimes people practice metta just by imagining Kuan Yin, Avalokiteshvara, or Jesus, or whatever, and their love, and just beholding that, opening the being to that. Through that there's this resonance and this absorption, and it begins to ignite and empower those qualities and those capacities in our heart, in our life, in our relationships. That's wonderful.

In our paradigm, we're saying: yes, great intention and wonderful that that happened, but remember the fullness of intention. The image is not here just to serve me. I am serving the image. The fullness of intention means the fullness of soul-making here, rather than just becoming this or that quality, becoming empowered in this or that quality. Becoming empowered in my life and in my relationships, in my expression, in my speech, in my action—this may be part of serving the image, may be part of what the image wants from me, may be part of doing my duty to the daemon. But it's really helpful in our paradigm to remember the fuller scope, the fullness of intention—actually the fullness of soul-making. Included in that can be this absorption of qualities, this empowerment of different aspects and capabilities of our being.

We talked too about a situation back home with some voluntary work that she was doing and the relationship with that community and finding her voice there and being able to speak up with strength. She saw all that was relevant. There was this echoing, mirroring—again, part of the infinite echoing, mirroring—in its relevance and the echoing and mirroring to these particular situations with regard to community and how she manifested and spoke up there.

A second image that was shared was a naked goddess who lives in a tree, resides in a tree. One particularly salient feature of this goddess was that she has her legs open—her legs are spread. The yogi shared, "It's actually not sexual, but she's opening my legs too." So there's already a relationship of the self as meditator in relationship with this image. This image, this naked goddess living in the tree, is very gently opening my legs. It doesn't seem sexual. Something very delicate happening.

There was a little concern from this yogi. She said, "I'm trying not to become ethereal in the image, and I'm trying to retain my particular self." Again, her initial question with these two images was: what's the relationship between these somewhat puzzling images and the self? She couldn't seem to connect them or ground them. In this image, she said, "I'm really trying not to become ethereal and to retain my particular self."

You don't have to always do that. Even if you become ethereal, it's not a problem. To become ethereal—we've talked about this—how does the energy body feel? That range from insubstantiality, ethereality, to dense and substantial and everything in between is one of the ranges of the energy body perception. It's all open.

To become ethereal is not a problem. It's simply what's happening with this particular image at that time. It might be very appropriate for this particular image. I think in this case it was. And also, to become ethereal—if my energy body becomes ethereal—this is not the same as melting in union and losing the twoness, losing the differentiation between self and image, and with that the eros, and so forth. There will be the reflecting and the echoing in the life from the tunas. I don't have to become the image. Even when there's a sense of self and other, there will still be this infinite reflecting and echoing just because it's what the imaginal does. It's part of it.

Again, there was a sense here of the image being expressed and then shared as if I could sense it as well. I was living that image at the same time. We were living it together. But I was careful. I didn't want to—I always question my inclinations and responses and intuitions. So to me, it was checking it out. Is this right? Is that right? And to me, there was a real sense of exquisiteness. So this naked goddess had a real exquisite, refined, very sensitive, very delicate quality. And so I asked her if that was the case and she said yes.

Again, it's like sometimes: is it not part of your soul, this exquisiteness that you see in her, in this goddess? Is it not part of your soul? And your particular kinds of gifts in this life, your particular kinds of exquisiteness are being mirrored and echoed in this goddess. Or we could say, more powerfully I think, your life itself—your being, your personality, the way you are with your body, your sensibility—echoes and mirrors the exquisiteness, the particular kinds of exquisiteness of this goddess. There's a refraction there. They won't be exactly the same, but there's this emanation that then gets interpreted or reflected in our particular ways.

And might not this sense of exquisiteness also be part of what, so to speak, the gods, the daimons, the angels ask of you? So again, not to identify with it and not to make a rigid, tight ego belief, an ego view around it. So this is the delicacy of the middle way. There's a way where that can have all the power—witnessing that exquisiteness, conceiving of it and sensing, more than conceiving, sensing of it, having the heart and soul sense of our being and our persona and our narrative in this life being a very particular refraction or emanation of that particular exquisiteness of that image. And not to identify with it, but to feel the power of that.

And with that: is this not part of what the gods, the daimons, the image, the goddess, the angels are asking of you? So the image is brought into a very powerful relationship with the self. But it's got all the lightness, partly helped by the ethereality, but it's got all the lightness of touch, of non-identification—or not over-identifying, put it that way—and making a rigid ego identity around it.

So there's the duty wrapped up in it and the sense of self and the way this image then informs and flows into the self. The self is—again, there are different levels of the way we can sense and conceive this. So there might be, with a lot of these images—again, whether they're images that are sensed as other or the self becomes image—there's this sense of gift but also duty, ask. And that's part of the deal. It's part of the deal of the self, part of the deal of imaginal work as we conceive it, and part of the deal of the self getting embroiled, involved, worked on in the soul-making dynamic in the imaginal process.

So you can already hear beginnings of a different range of views of self and conceptions of self and psychologies about self than are perhaps more common or dominant in contemporary psychology.

Someone asked me a while ago—I feel like, so they're talking about themselves now—I feel like I want to leave an impression. I want to make an imprint or leave an imprint, I think she was saying on me, but she was also thinking on others, on the world. And she was very skeptical about this desire. So why do I have this? This person had done a lot of practice, a lot of mainstream Dharma practice and Advaita and different things, non-dual practice and that kind of thing. And so she was very wary of this desire, impulse and intention and desire that she noticed within herself, wanting to leave or make an imprint on others, or on a particular other or particular others. So why? And she was judging it.

And it's easy to assume under the rubric of many psychological, spiritual, conceptual frameworks that this is ego. Why do I have to impress people? Why do I have to try and make this imprint? Why do I have to be important that way? Et cetera. But we were talking about this and you can actually ask: who wants this?

Her tendency was to be very suspicious of it. Because she had practiced so long in paradigms that put aside the self, moved towards dissolving the self and dissolving it in some kind of ultimate oneness, there was this suspicion. So it can only be an ego thing. It was troubling her, really, like some kind of itch that she wanted to get rid of.

But we can ask, and I said, we can ask, who wants this? Who wants to make an imprint? Maybe it's what the soul wants. Maybe it's the way it communicates with other souls, if you like, or we could say amongst its parts, if we're part of a world soul, if we're conceiving of the soul that way. The way it communicates amongst its parts is by making impressions on the other parts. One soul communicates with another by making an impression, and that's what the soul wants to do.

You know, if I think about John Coltrane, Jimi Hendrix, Beethoven, Peter Maxwell Davies, James Hillman, Etty Hillesum, friends who I love deeply—these are all, for me, in my life, deep, beautiful, precious imprints on and in my soul. They are my soul, or they're part of it. My soul is informed, has the impression, has the stamp of these deep soul images. Coltrane, Hendrix, this friend or that friend, et cetera. And I treasure that. I treasure that. I want to be impressed upon in that way. I want to be impressed upon. Don't we as souls want to be impressed upon by soul and by what is soulful?

In that desire to imprint on others, I think, is actually the nascent sense of an imaginal self. So it's not necessarily the ego. Again, it's the soul. And soul expresses itself in images to a great extent. It's not just the ego self that wants to make an imprint. It's the soul self and the image, the imaginal self or the imaginal selves, the budding sense of that that wants to make an imprint on others—a deep soul imprint on others.

And that imaginal self, again, it's me and not me. It's neither real nor not real. But somehow it's very profoundly me. Somehow it's very profoundly me, maybe more profoundly me than anything else. The self needs to become image; it wants to become image. Soul wants to make things imaginal, to discover their imaginal dimensions. And it needs to imprint. It wants to express itself. It wants to connect with other souls. This is how soul grows. Soul making is being impressed upon. Sense of soulfulness is to be impressed upon.

If we don't allow the imaginal dimensions of self, et cetera, then that impulse to imprint stays as ego—in other words, flatly conceived self. And not eros, but craving. And the only recourse then is to try to live that out, trying to impress people from this flat level, trying to make an imprint, an impression on people, but it's all flatly conceived. And that's going to be misery for everyone, probably.

Or the only other recourse, if we're inhibiting or disallowing or dismissing the possibility of this whole soul dimension of self, is to dwell in no-self, whatever that means, and try and live one's life with this kind of ideal of no-self—whether that's I'm just this process of aggregates or I'm just love or whatever it is, I'm just awareness or I'm just cosmic consciousness or whatever. Again, in the way I would understand, that's great. Those particular views of no-self are wonderful to move in and out of, but to try and live a whole life with all the complexities and demands and particularities of our ways of loving and our creativity and our duties, et cetera, doesn't really work.

So without the imaginalizing, the dimensionalizing, the divinizing, the theophanizing of self, our possibilities are very limited and they don't really work. So in a way this person was bumping into repeatedly the failure of a paradigm of no-self to comprehensively address the totality of our being and her needs—spiritual, soulful, et cetera.

We're just so used to a certain idea of this is right, this is spiritual, this is psychologically healthy or whatever. And just something else wants to happen. And partly what allows it to happen is to conceive it in a way that gives it some respect and believes there's a treasure there, believes there's a necessity of soul there.

So self, other, world—maybe also one's desire, one's eros. There might be eros to imprint on others, this desire to imprint on others, on the soul of others.

My soul desires deeply to make this impression, and there's not craving, not even just desire, but eros there. But self, other, world, eros need to become erotic, imaginal objects for us. Then there is unfathomability, sacredness, beauty in these—in the self, in other, in world, in desire, not only beyond self. The unfathomability, the divinity, the beauty—it's in them. They are expressions of it, broadening expressions of it.

I think I touched on this very briefly in an earlier talk in this series, but if we allow this and begin to sense it or allow ourselves to sense it and conceive of it as a soul desire—it's not ego, it's soul—then, if it's allowed to do its thing, it can be soul as opposed to ego. If we can conceive of it the right way, it can be soul rather than ego.

But of course there's dukkha there if it seems like we're not making an imprint. The angels want to make an imprint. They need to—it's what, one kind of conception is, that it's what we're here for. It's what human beings are here for: to express the divinities, the divinity, the angels and their particular faces, the faces of the gods. We are here to express the faces of the gods, and the angels want that, and they want that from us.

So the dukkha of feeling like I'm not imprinting, there is no connection there in what I'm trying to put out or communicate of my being—the dukkha might not even be an ego dukkha, primarily. It might be the dukkha of that whole sense of "this is what the angels want, and this is what I'm here for," and it's frustrated, it's blocked. There isn't the reception.

We could say, if we just play with this idea, that the ego's desire to impress is a kind of contraction of, or a dim echo of, the soul's desire to impress. So again, we could make a whole psychology of this idea, kind of premise or maxim: the soul wants soul-making, the soul loves soul-making. And that's the urge, that's the fundamental movement in life. And everything else can kind of shape down from that.

And what happens sometimes, if we play with this conception, is that that soul's desire to impress gets shrunken or flattened or tightened or contracted. And so it becomes a contraction or a dim echo of the soul's desire to impress. And it just manifests as ego. And it feels like ego. Something's got shrunk.

So that kind of conception is quite a different conception of self and reading or interpretation or hermeneutic of what we're doing in us, what we're trying to do. Or what, if you like, the angels are trying to do through us. My daimons, your daimons are trying to do through you, with you, as you.

There was, you know, some of you will have heard this story from Oscar Wilde, where he was travelling between countries and the customs officer asked him, "Do you have anything to declare?" And he sort of said, "Only my genius."

And it's funny—sometimes I've shared a few quotes of Oscar Wilde before, and sometimes it seems to me, I don't know if it's the case, but it's almost like you can hear these little witty quips that he has and these little retorts that he has to certain situations on two levels. So at one level it's just a funny sort of self-aggrandizement kind of thing, declaring that he's a genius in the way that we usually understand that word.

But that word genius actually originally referred to something like a daimon. So it wasn't that a person was a genius; a person had a genius—so a particular genius, like their, if you like, angel or their spirit or their daimon.

So: "Do you have anything to declare? Are you bringing anything with you through into this country, through customs?" "Am I bringing anything with me? Only my genius." So you can see I have nothing here, very few bags or whatever it is, but I'm bringing this invisible daimon that you can't see—like illegal goods might be hidden. So he's declaring that.

So I don't know if that's what he meant, but as I said, a lot of times I get these kind of double-leveled interpretive possibilities, possibilities of interpretation of things he says. And then the relationship with that could be very different than the first interpretation of just a kind of ego thing, "I'm a genius, I'm declaring my genius, I'm a really smart guy," or whatever it is. Not ego—it could be the conception of that daimon, of that genius in the original sense. It's him, not me. And so there's a relationship of humility with that.

But this has really gone out of fashion. If it was ever mainstream in any culture, I don't know, but it's certainly gone out of fashion.

I remember in a music history class studying about Stravinsky, the famous, brilliant twentieth-century composer. He wrote The Rite of Spring, as some of you will know. And he was being interviewed by his assistant, Robert Craft, and they recorded it at one point. And they were talking about the composition of The Rite of Spring back in the early twentieth century, and this was much later.

And Robert Kraft got him talking, and at some point Stravinsky said something like, "I was the vessel through which the Rite of Spring was born, through which that music was born." And then a little while later, Robert Kraft quoted him back as saying that. And Stravinsky said, "I never said that." And Kraft said, "You did, it's on the tape recorder."

It's a kind of slightly taboo topic because I think, like so many other things—sexuality and all kinds of things—we have such a confused notion of what we're allowed to think and say and how we're allowed to view self and what's taboo and what's regarded as ego. So in the flow of the conversation, he was expressing perhaps a certain natural perception of being in service to something. In this case, the service of the angel was a piece of music. Étienne Souriau, the French philosopher, sometimes talked about "the angel of the work." So this composition, this 20th century composition The Rite of Spring, it was or had an angel, and that angel wanted something out of Stravinsky. But then he said, "I never said that." "Yes, you did."

So we're constrained and confused by the mixed messages we get about self. In so many ways we live in a very egotistical culture, but we also view that badly and we judge ourselves or others when it looks like they or we are being egotistical. There's nowhere else. There are no other conceptual levels. The conception is so thin and so limited, and we're just shunting back and forth between a rock and a hard place there. Either ego—because we have no other level to think of—and so we pursue things out of a sense of ego aggrandizement, or the judgment and denigration of that in ourselves and others. There's nothing else, because the wider conceptual frameworks in the culture offer nothing else. All the dimensions have gone, all the possibilities have gone, and there's a real impoverishment there.

So Corbin, of course, talked a lot about—I shared before—talked about the angel out ahead. He's almost like a counterpart of ourselves, a second half of our soul, if you like, and our relationship with that through the imaginal and the importance of that to the sense of who we are and the direction we have in life and our duties to that angel.

Just paraphrasing a passage from one of his books, Temple and Contemplation, I think the book's called—you know, so in this case he's calling it the "person archetype." He said that's not a symbol of something in me. Rather, it is the earthly human person—it's me—who by gravitating towards this spiritual person, this angelhood, I represent and typify something. A hypostasis means an existence, a being of the angelic world. You understand? So the usual way of seeing it is, "Oh, this image is representing some aspect of me." We've talked about this before. It's representing some aspect of me. The image is a representation.

Turning it around. No, I represent and typify this angel of the angelic world. And he continues: the human being is called upon to answer for it on earth. So again, there's his way of saying this sense of duty. Everything's reversed here.

He's actually talking about ritual in this passage, so it's how the ritual relates to these kinds of ideas. He says human gestures, human representations and imaginings are so many methods whereby a human being can be led to typify and exemplify in themselves a celestial existence. By celestial existence, in our language, it's other dimensions of being. So there's that dimensionality node here.

And again, he's talking about ritual, but he says if a celestial person, if an angel is represented by a particular gesture or word or phase of the ritual, then to observe these is already to exist in the manner of that transcendent person. It's a very different, back-to-front, upside-down view of reality, of self and reality.

And so, as I said, that brings dimensionality into our being, and not just the dimensionality of, let's say, Freud's unconscious—a sort of deep, dark well of shameful secrets and inclinations or whatever. This dimensionality, all kinds of dimensions there. And yes, divinity, sacredness, theophany. Self is dimensionalized, divinized, recognized as sacred, or allowed to flower in a sense of sacredness. Self as theophany, or as potential theophany.

So this angel out ahead, or what he's calling in this case the celestial person, is eternal. Our selves—our human selves—don't seem to be. Sometimes when Corbin—I'm not an expert on Corbin, his writings are sometimes very dense and he was very prolific—but sometimes it sounds like he's talking, when he talks about the angel out ahead, as if there's just one angel out ahead, or one genius, or whatever.

In the soul-making Dharma, there's not necessarily just one. So going back to the beginning, we're free. There are many images, what Hillman calls more polytheistic psyche—images that sometimes, imaginal beings, angels, that sometimes are kind of in conflict with each other, or at least move, pull us, draw us, beckon us in different directions, ask of us impossibly divergent things.

I mean, it may be that they all refer to some kind of more fundamental, higher dimensional archetype, if you like—I don't know—but in some of these paradigms. An archetype, if you remember when I talked about that word, I think it was in Path of the Imaginal—in the original meaning, it meant something without a form. It was rather the principle of forming. Forming like this or forming like that. So that which is not an image but forms images.

So it might be, if you think about it that way, that it generates many images.

Now, of course, sometimes what we encounter in or with the sense of self doesn't feel divine at all. It doesn't feel sacred. If it feels eternal, it's more just a sense of seeming to go on forever with its afflictive gestalt or constellation.

Sometimes, for example, we struggle—especially in our culture—with the inner critic. This is very, very common, partly as a result of our culture and its limited ways of understanding and conceiving the self, but also as a result of social fragmentation, individualization, individualism—all kinds of things historically.

I've talked about working with the inner critic in the past. Many years ago, I gave some talks on it and offered a whole set of approaches or things one could do in meditation, both when the inner critic is active and present, and also when it's not active. Some of those approaches involved working with the imagination with regard to the inner critic and relationship with the inner critic. But that wasn't imaginal—it was working with imagination, not imaginal in our sense. However, it might be that we can actually allow things to become imaginal with respect to the inner critic.

Some of that might start with just a more deliberate imagination. Let me give just a couple of possibilities to start our exploration.

Sometimes perhaps the inner critic could be seen as part of the self, part of the psyche, which among other things has become the sole locus of power. When the inner critic is badgering us and taking over and hounding us, all the power, or most of the power, has gone there. There is this psyche with its complexity, this self with its complexity, this soul with its complexity, and all the power of that soul seems to be gathered under the purview and domain of that inner critic. The rest of the being feels weak, collapsed, lacking in power. But actually, my psyche, my self, my soul is part of that.

So, a couple of possibilities. Sometimes, maybe, feeling one's frustration and anger at the inner critic. We're back to this crucible thing and the emotions and where the emotion is, and where the point of entry is that can allow things to start to become dynamic and galvanize a little bit in terms of liberating process, but maybe even soul-making process.

Feeling one's frustration, one's anger—one can be so fed up with this inner critic. Instead of getting dragged into listening to the inner critic, what else is there? I'm feeling really fed up. I'm feeling actually really angry at the inner critic. The heat of that emotion—I have to sit with it in the energy body, have to kind of tease it out of the afflictive mix that's happening at the time. But in being with it, in holding it, in being with it in the energy body and recognizing it, actually letting it heat up, letting that frustration and anger—recognizing there may be a treasure here in the frustration and anger, which I usually would see as a defilement, as a kilesa, as something that's not helpful.

Letting it build up in the energy body, in the alchemical vessel, in the crucible, and out of that, an image might arise out of the heat of the frustration and anger at the inner critic. An image might arise and that may well have power in it because frustration and anger have a lot of potential power wrapped up in them. And so another part of the psyche is empowered and it changes the relationship with the inner critic.

Another possibility is to go ahead and deliberately imagine—it might not be imaginal at first, don't worry. It might never stay imaginal; it might still be liberating. Go ahead and deliberately imagine, for example, destroying the inner critic violently. Whatever it is—smashing it to bits, clunking it on the head, whatever. That deliberate imagination may not be imaginal, and it may be liberating without this ever becoming imaginal, or it may become imaginal. Then that actually going ahead and deliberately imagining destroying the inner critic violently may actually liberate the feeling of anger.

In the first approach, it was: can I feel the anger first? Can I feel the frustration first and let that constellate an image? Or it might be that I'm actually playing with the imagination and that liberates the possibility of feeling that emotion. And in that anger is power. The third step there would be to actually—can I almost filter out the sense of power in the energy body from the feeling of anger?

Those are some possibilities. Again, in that last illustrated thing, putting those two together—there's non-linearity here. It's a tangled ball of wool. I pull on this and it might be that this loosens as well, this other thread.

There's also a slightly different possibility. The inner critic tends to arise in relation to something we are deeply longing for or that we actually have eros for. Someone was talking to me about the inner critic, and I asked her when it comes up—is it there all the time or in certain situations? It was coming up in relation to or in the context of certain kinds of public speaking situations where she really cared about what she was communicating or teaching. For a lot of people, it comes up in relation to practice and wanting to practice well.

So this is interesting, you know, I'm not saying it's always the case—sometimes there's a more pervasive, low-grade sense of inner critic, of course—but oftentimes it's actually coming up in relation to things that we really care deeply about, or that we really long for, or that we have eros for.

So rather than getting caught up with the inner critic and what it's saying and what it's doing, et cetera, again, it may be possible to let it do its thing, but can I kind of contact the eros or desire that's there? Because I want—I'm judging myself for being a bad meditator or whatever—but actually, can I contact the eros and the desire to meditate well and deeply and discover and play in that way?

The inner critic is still doing its thing, but I'm kind of just honing the attention, directing it to other elements, other aspects of the tangle of what's going on. And with that desire, again, as I touched on earlier, might be wrapped up the dukkha of the frustrated desire. You know, I really want this thing and I'm just frustrated. I'm not making any headway, or I really want to be able to communicate well in a teaching situation or whatever, but I feel like I'm not doing well enough.

So there's the dukkha of the frustrated desire might be part of what I come into contact with when I'm looking for the eros or desire underneath, underpinning or associated with this inner critic. And that's okay, you know, because frustration also has this heat element and it's very close to the desire, the eros. But again, out of that crucible, out of that—I'm directing the attention to some elements of the being, the eros, the desire, or even the dukkha, the frustrated desire—there's heat there, and there's potential dynamism there.

And out of that crucible, if I can relate to them and hold them the right way, an image might arise in relation to the self, or the self might become image. And one might have a very different sense of it all, even a different sense of the inner critic, different sense of self that's healing there, etc.

What was interesting when this person raised this with me was she was taking a public speaking course to try and develop her skills as a public speaker. When they were given certain exercises and things like that, but in this case I don't think—or it may not be that—the underlying desire, the deep longing comes up in the context of those public speaking exercises. There might still be self-judgment, but the desire won't be there. But when it came to teaching or speaking in public about what she really loved or what felt really important to her, then there will be the desire.

The other things were kind of just giving exercises or techniques that you can do to improve as a public speaker. All really important. But it wasn't just that she wanted to be a good public speaker just for the sake of it. There were things that she wanted to communicate, that she deeply wanted to communicate and communicate well. So you have to look for the desire in the right place if this is the case.

And we'll hopefully come back to this, but there's a way—and I know some, probably at this point, maybe most of you know this—there's a way that we, as one of the knows, loving and being loved, we can feel loved by an image or images in ways that heal so deeply. And so sometimes connecting with an image and recognizing, feeling, opening to its love for us—it's so tailored and so tailored to our being and our particularities and so attuned to us and empowered by the dimensionality and the divinity and the beauty, et cetera—that in a way that kind of love, the love that images have for us, profound and almost mysterious, mysteriously attuned love, it can heal the inner critic and that whole painful constellation almost more powerfully, I think, than anything else.

So if we just lay out some possibilities with regard to the self-becoming image, the self-becoming imaginal, soulful sense of self, soul-making sense of self. There is, as I said at the beginning this evening, there is the possibility of externalizing, so to speak, the self that loves this or desires that or feels this way or whatever, and letting that become image, letting it become other, and then that becomes imaginable. And that starts to then echo back and change our sense of self and dimensionalize it, et cetera, and allow it to become more imaginable soul-making.

Then there is also the possibility of an image that is already other, but we sense it's me and it's not me. It's not me, it's other, but somehow it echoes me. And in Corbin's language, we recognize the angel out ahead. It has something profoundly to do with me and my soul. Somehow it's profoundly me and it's not me. And so that becomes, if you like, part of our sense of self, part of our soul sense of self, part of our sense of soul.

There's another possibility that I haven't really touched on, where an image can arise and it's sort of apparently impersonal. It seems like it's not to do with self, it's not an image of self, but actually it's doing something that's allowing the self to gain dimensionality and become image. So there's images that are apparently impersonal that don't retain particularities.

So, for example, I've been reading in the last few years at different times a little bit about what's called the Ten Sephirot. So it's a Kabbalistic teaching. There are ten—you'd call them aspects of the Godhead or aspects of God or aspects of the way God emanates from the sort of unfabricated, dark mystery of the innermost being of God emanating in these ten qualities. And so love and strength and wisdom and etc. And there's all kinds of literature on this and ways it's interpreted, et cetera.

And so I was meditating one day with this, having read about this, and then with the idea that my being contains or expresses these ten sephirot, these ten aspects of God. Our beings do. Everyone's being does. So they themselves are part of and rooted in the divine being. And our emanations are set at different levels of the divine or the Buddha nature, if you prefer that word.

And again, in Dharma language, Dharmakaya actually means the body of qualities of a Buddha. That was one of the original meanings of it. And it came to have other dimensions of meaning. So there's a similarity there between the teaching of Dharmakaya and Sephirot. But then was added to in my meditation with this idea that my being contains and expresses those ten aspects of the divine, of the Buddha nature.

And meditating in that way, they remain impersonal, but the self begins to be given a kind of dimensionality and divinity, and it's complexified in that way. Because of that, the self begins to become imaginal. And then, as I said right from the beginning with the fountain basin analogy and also then the world in cosmopoiesis, the world starts to become imaginal as the self becomes imaginal, or it might be that the perception of the world is conceived of and sensed as self—that kind of way of looking.

But in that meditation, you can hear that it all sounds quite universal and impersonal in a way. Although the self is involved, it seems to be being seen as just a universal kind of manifestation of God, of the Buddha nature, with these ten qualities that everyone has. But there was a way of doing it where my particularities were retained—they weren't dissolved. I wasn't dissolving the sense of self or omitting the sense of self. My narrative, my struggles, my joys, all that was included in this meditation on the nature of God and the nature of the human psyche—a human being—and the continuity of that in terms of the Sephirot, the human being as emanation of the Sephirot, but without dissolving the particularities, without omitting me and my narrative and struggles and all that.

So there's the particular, unique way these ten Sephirot manifest and express through me. Something that can start as an apparently impersonal image, or even sound like it, actually can be—by including the narrative and the particulars and the uniqueness—rendered more unique, retaining its particularities, retaining its personal personhood and uniqueness to self. There are all kinds of possibilities. I'm just throwing out a few here.

But if we linger for a moment with this particular area of senses of self that are apparently impersonal, then it's worth mentioning—some of you may know this—in some of the Buddhist tantras, the tantric texts, the elements, for example earth, air, fire, water, sometimes space, sometimes consciousness—either four or five or six elements—are, you could say, personified or associated with certain divinities, certain bodhisattvas or Buddhas or goddesses. You could say more than that. You could say that the elements are the refractions of those goddesses.

For instance, in the Guhyasamāja Tantra, the four goddesses: Māmakī, who is or is behind or emanates or symbolizes liquidity, the water element; Locanā, who symbolizes, who represents, who emanates, who is the element of earth, of solidity; Pāṇḍarā, who is or symbolizes or emanates fire, warmth element; and Tārā, who manifests or emanates or is the goddess of air, the air element.

And so for some tantric practitioners who base themselves, for example, on the Guhyasamāja Tantra, practicing that way, that would form part of their mandala and part of their meditation. And there are different ways you can do this. Some of it will be very prescribed, but there's no reason why one can't improvise with it a little bit. So sometimes one may be meditating outside with a sense of the elements in relationship to one's body, and there's a sensing with soul of, for example, the four elements. And one plays with that, one encourages it, or it just opens by itself, and one senses them as divine, maybe as goddesses, personal divinities in this case, or one's following this prescribed image.

So that's all lovely, and we could include that in soul-making dharma and that kind of thing in imaginal practice. There was once—maybe it was on the Foundations, I can't remember, I think it was in a Q&A—someone asked me, and I responded to, categorizing the different kinds of image that can arise that aren't... You know, there are the imaginal images and the way that we talk about them for the most part, but then there are other variations where you can kind of get this formless space that retains the essence of the particularity of the character of whatever imaginal figure one was meditating on, but the actual sensible apprehension of that imaginal figure has gone. It just retains their character. An empty space with their character can be very beautiful, very profound. That's a possibility.

There's also a whole possibility of what often tends to happen with more prescribed images or archetypes—Guānyīn or these four goddesses from the Guhyasamāja, for instance, or Tārā—where it's almost like one's working with an imaginal figure, but that imaginal figure is kind of, in a way, semi-universal. And that's fine, that's a very popular form of practice of using the imagination and visualization, especially for Vajrayāna practitioners. And it can stay there, like this goddess Tārā, whoever it is, doesn't really become a fully particularized character the way imaginal images, in the sense that we mostly are talking about them, tend to. But it's still really valid and can be really fruitful.

And of course, an image may start that way in a sort of more universal archetypal sense of this image, Tārā, or this goddess, or whatever it is, and then become more particularized with practice. Not that it should or shouldn't, it's just a slightly different realm that one's in, a slightly different direction.

Or again, it could be, for instance, in practicing with sensing the elements with soul, the four elements—earth, air, fire, water—and letting them become divinity as goddesses, like that. Again, then, as one meditates, it may be, and one might be able to steer it this way, or it might just happen this way—it's not better or worse—that they become particularized, these goddesses, or their relationship with this body, this self, and the elements in relation to these more universal archetypes. That relationship relates to this particular self.

And again, as we said in the introduction, for example with the practicing of the ten Sephirot, the particulars of this self and this body and the way the elements have manifested in this body and in this life and in this narrative and do manifest right now and will in the future—that's where the particularity is kind of not just retained, but also then involved and highlighted and amplified even in the practice.

So they remain kind of somewhat universal, the elements and the goddesses behind them in this example, but it starts to become more personal through the relationship. How do those elements, how have they been incorporated into my life, this life, this narrative, this being, this self, this body? So that's a possibility.

There are a couple of possibilities there: letting it be more universal archetypal, and it becoming less so through the particularization, the uniqueness of the self; or, through the particularization and gradual particularization and uniqueness of these divine figures, they become more particular, more like proper characters.

So you can see there are all kinds of tributaries of possibilities here. But even if something starts apparently impersonal, it can stay impersonal and still be very soul-making, very beautiful, very fruitful kinds of practice.

Or there are ways that it can be apparently impersonal and then gain more personal relevance and particularity, either in oneself or in the image.

So just throwing out some different possibilities here. I mentioned we're talking about what can support the sense of self becoming imaginal and the sense of then dimensionalizing the self and sensing the self as having divine roots, as being theophany, as having its origins in other dimensions.

And I mentioned several times now ways of practicing where one has a kind of panoramic view or bird's eye view of the whole of one's life, as if from the other side of death, beyond death, after death, seeing it all at once as a tableau—the birth, the life, the narrative, and the death—from the perspective of eternity.

One can just play with that. It may take a little practice, but it's just using the imagination a certain way. But in gaining that perspective on life, then it can be that the eternality element, the node of eternality is triggered, is ignited, and that can allow the sensing of one's life, of one's birth, narrative, and death from this perspective, from the eternal perspective. And the whole thing can be sensed with soul. It starts to flesh out and come alive in the soul. One sees it, one senses one's self, one's life, one's journey, all of it with soul.

So I've mentioned that a couple of times, but actually there's all kinds of possibility when we get into the domain of time and timelessness and perceptions of time and eternality.

I don't know if you've ever experienced this, but sometimes in your love for someone—a human, other, a beloved other, of course maybe an animal even, or a tree or something—where there's love, sometimes it's possible, because of the love and because of the eros, that the perception becomes soul-making. You actually sense them with soul at times, this beloved other.

And sometimes it's possible, I find very lovely perception, to perceive this other, this beloved other, or oneself even, as the sort of contemporaneous totality of the temporal slices of their life. In other words, one can see plainly there—I'm with them and it's now and they are X years old, whatever that is—but somehow I'm seeing not just that, but I'm seeing them when they were a little girl. I'm seeing them when they were a baby. I'm seeing them when they were a teenager. I'm seeing them in the full bloom of adulthood. I'm seeing them when they're an old person. I'm seeing them when they're very old. All those kind of temporal slices exist at once. All those ages exist. And one loves them all, and one perceives them all at once in the being.

Again, in the sensing with soul, there's the, through the eros, inseminating psyche and logos, inseminating the imaginal object, the beloved other, and it complexifies, it diversifies, it presents other faces, more and more faces, more and more dimensions. And so that's one very lovely way of perceiving either oneself at times or someone you love.

All kinds of possibilities when we get into the realm of time and the perception of time.

Another possibility, and last one for now, is meditating on an aspect of your being. So it could be the body or anything. It could be the voice. And meditating on it in a way, sensing it in a way that allows it to become ensouled, allows it to gain dimensions and significance for soul and the elements to come alive with respect to that aspect or area or domain of our being. And then, maybe from there, it spreads to the whole sense of self.

I could give an example of this, but you might even try it as a guided meditation if you feel like right now, just very briefly to give you a sense of what the kind of possibilities are.

So if you're listening and you want to engage and put your body into a posture that's comfortable and appropriate for meditation or helpful for meditation, whether it's standing or sitting upright or whatever it is, take some moments to actually sense the body, just in the simple way of sensation. And the energy body, and expand that awareness of the energy body.

But include in your awareness, as we've touched on—this always has to be the case—but for right now, let the sense of self, which includes your narratives, let that be there too. It doesn't mean getting lost in it. It doesn't mean going off on a distracted tangent or fretting about this or that. It just means having a sense of the body, how the body feels, how the energy body feels, its presence right now, its material presence, its energetic presence and feel. But also of yourself. There's a self sitting here, so to speak. That self has a narrative and that can be included in the larger scope or background of the awareness.

And just gently, very gently, suffuse your body, yourself, your narrative with metta, with loving-kindness, with unconditional love. Every part and aspect of your body, as the Buddha would say, leaving no spot untouched, totally permeating and saturating your body with the healing balm of friendliness, of kindness, of love and well-wishing. Let that metta include yourself and your narrative and narratives. Very gentle, very light touch here. Aware of the body, aware of the energy of the body, aware of the energy of the metta, touching the body, permeating the body, surrounding and suffusing the body.

And you can let the metta be somewhat there as a sort of implicit background or basis of this short guided meditation. So let that go into the background, but still be there, underpinning everything.

Aware of the body again. Aware of certainly the energetic field, the energy body, but also aware of the materiality of the body, the physicality of it—sinews, muscles, nerves, fibers, skin. Your body. Yes, it's not yours, but let's say it's yours right now. It's you. It's not you, and it's you.

Just checking that the metta is still there, sort of implicitly in the background—warmth, kindness, well-wishing. If that needs a little boosting, just give it a gentle shot.

Seeing if you can dwell with this sense of body, the mystery of embodiment. The mystery of you having this particular appearance, this kind of form, this kind of body. The miracle of that. The gift of that. And yes, all its particular quirks and all its particular ways it doesn't work so well, maybe failing in this way or that. It's still an amazing thing. It's a beautiful body, totally a miracle. And there's no other body like it. And it's tied in to your being, your soul.

Then within the scope of the body and the bodily functions, let's just focus in on the voice. As far as the body is concerned, we can identify maybe three or four regions or centers of voice production in the body that are involved in vocalizing and making sound.

There's the chest—the air in the lungs and the whole resonant cavity of the chest. Just be aware of that as part of the instrument, part of the miracle, part of what allows you to sing forth, sound forth, communicate, reach out, touch other people through your voice, to express your uniqueness, your point of view. Let yourself be aware of your chest in the context of the gift of voice, the mystery of voice.

There's the throat and the voice box or the larynx, also obviously integral to the production of sound, our voicing in the world—part of the gift. And the mouth, the malleable cavity of the mouth that can shape itself as a resonant chamber in all kinds of ways, all kinds of amazingly precise ways to really shape sound very precisely, very uniquely. And then there's the tongue and the teeth, which are also included in the instrument, part of what shapes and supports, forms the voice, the sounding.

So this miracle, this gift of embodiment—and part of that miracle, that gift of embodiment is this particular set of areas, regions, centers of the body that are involved in vocalization and voice.

As you are with your sense of the body and with the sense of these four areas or regions or centers of voice production in the body, begin to include in the awareness, in your meditative awareness, what comes through the voice, what can come through, what comes through of soul—through the voice, through your voice, through our voices. What comes through as soul through these regions, these centers of the body.

Kindness can come through. Love can come through. Humor—mystery of humor. Flashes of intelligence and brilliance come through, articulated. All these aspects of soul, your soul, coming through, being given life, manifestation, embodiment through the voice, through this physical entity, through this miracle of body. Your perspective, the way you see things, the way you sense things.

Fire can come through—fire in the voice, fire in the perspective, fire in what's articulated. Struggle, story—we can convey our story, our struggles, our difficulties, our pains, the sensitivity of our heart. All that manifests from and through these regions of body: the chest, the throat, the voice box, the mouth, the tongue and teeth.

Poetry can come through, either literal poetry or just poetic speech. You don't divide them. You can say body is the instrument of soul, the gift of body in the service of the gift of soul to you and from you into the world and to other souls.

In the voice there's obviously the possibility of carrying verbal communication. We communicate ideas and feelings and requests and all kinds of things as I've elucidated. There's also the sound itself, the music of speech. So often when we listen to someone speak or we speak ourselves, we're concentrating on the words and their meaning. But there's also the parallel, intertwined, ongoing music—the sounds, the syllables, the mystery of that. And somehow this too is part of the communication of soul.

Of course it's there when we sing, but it's there when we speak—this music. Right now as I'm speaking, you can listen to the words, the meaning, what's he talking about, I'm trying to follow these instructions. But there's also a music in the sounds of the spoken voice. And it doesn't necessarily mean anything. It's music. And it has dimensionality and it has mystery, if we can hear it in a certain way. It has beauty. All this comes through you, comes through the gift of body, is embodied through body.

What happens right now if you just experiment in this meditative state, in this soul sensitivity, as much as you can encourage it gently right now, with the full awareness and the sensitivity of the resonances and the ripples in the heart, in the soul, in the energy body, perhaps even in image...

You just let yourself make certain sounds that are not words. Maybe certain syllables. Puh. Puh. And listen. Listen to the mystery of it. You are part of that mystery. Listen to the music of it. It doesn't mean anything. It's full of meaningfulness.

The mystery of this ability to vocalize. Doesn't matter what sound right now, what syllable. If you want to, you can press pause and for a few minutes just play with that. Let yourself vocalize meaningless or apparently meaningless sounds and hear it as music. Sense the mystery there. It can be in the vocalization, in the sound, in the rhythm if you string syllables together. There's music there.

What happens now if you say "I"? I. This time with the implication of the meaning of I, the self, the mystery of that I. What happens when you vocalize that I? What happens when you vocalize "you"? So really as delicately sensitive and open and alive to anything that you notice, anything in the nuance of reverberation, of resonance, of mystery, of beauty.

When you're ready, coming out of that particular meditation, whenever you're ready.

Maybe that gives you an idea—you could take any area or aspect of being, as we did with voice, or it could be body or whatever, and meditate on it in a way that supports or opens the possibility of sensing that domain of your being with soul. And from there it can spread to the whole, the self, and perhaps even into cosmic consciousness.

So like I said, these are just some possibilities. The possibilities are infinite, really, for the ways that the self can become imaginal and gain that dimensionality and divinity in our sense of it.

Really, we might turn it around and ask: what actually gets in the way of that happening? What prevents us from sensing the self with soul?

One is, of course, as usual, a logos—an idea, a conception that disallows it. For example, the example I gave earlier: this wanting to make an imprint or this wanting to make an impression, I just assume that it's ego and it's not okay, and I judge it. There's a logos there that's actually limiting my sense of things and my understanding of myself and my impulses and the movements of my being. So very often, a certain logos gets in where we don't even realize it.

Or, as I said at the beginning of the talk, not noticing the possibility that in working with an imaginal other or an imaginal object, the self too can become infected, caught up, involved in the soul-making dynamic. The self-sense can become imaginal—either not noticing it or not allowing it for whatever reasons. Maybe I don't even know the reason; it just feels blocked. So that's going to get in the way, obviously.

Of course, the opposite can be true, as I touched on. It's always myself that's imaginal, and I fail to allow the world or others to become imaginal, to sense them with soul. That's also a possibility, and it would be a problem.

What else gets in the way? Over-identification, over-reification of the sense of self—any sense of self, even if it's a beautiful one. It feels like, "Oh, this is what I am now." If it's too reified, problem. If I'm too identified with it, problem. It will squeeze the soul out of it, like squeezing the juice out.

Or, on the other hand, I just dismiss it: "Oh, that's crazy, that's stupid, that's not real." Over-reification or under-reification, in a way. Like I've said a couple of times, we're dancing on the breadth of this boulevard—the imaginal middle way with respect to reification, how much, how little, at different times.

Sometimes, or with some people at some times, it's important that they view or that they are encouraged to view: "Do you realize you're more really that? You're more really or more primarily angel than you are what you appear to be in the conventional sense, in the conventional view." Sometimes, of course, a person's gone the other way and they've identified too much with that angelic dimension or the imaginal self and need a bit less reification.

But our culture doesn't really support that view of the dimensionality of the human being, of the imaginal self, of the angelic refraction. So because the culture doesn't, we might need to lean on it a bit more to re-legitimize it and reinstate it and open up that possibility. But it's also very individual and it can vary at different times and different situations.

But there is the possibility of sensing the self with soul, sensing the self as a temporal emanation of what is timeless, the angel, a theophany. We hold it lightly, and in that light holding of it, as I said, can have enormous power, bear enormous fruit. Something very, very beautiful.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 179

Dimensionality, Humility, Duty, and Love

Rob Burbea · 1h43

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea delves deeply into four crucial elements of imaginal practice within his soul-making teachings. He begins by clarifying the dual purpose of understanding the 28 elements of the imaginal lattice: both for conceptual discernment and as practical tools that can be deliberately activated in meditation.
>
> Burbea explores dimensionality (or depth) as the sense of 'more-ness' and multiple levels of being within images, using the metaphor of humans as refractions of angels existing at other dimensions. This dimensionality provides a profound anchor for the soul, different from temporary mindfulness practices. He examines humility not as self-deprecation, but as a beautiful receptivity before mystery and unfathomability, requiring a lighter sense of self-fabrication.
> The discussion of duty reveals how imaginal figures make claims upon us, wanting something specific that reflects their own nature. Burbea suggests that imaginal figures themselves may have duties they're aware of, creating corresponding duties for practitioners. Finally, he explores love as a particular rather than universal force - imaginal figures love our uniqueness and potential, not unconditionally like metta, but in ways that call forth our deepest essence. Drawing on philosopher Nikolai Hartmann, he describes how this love penetrates beyond empirical personality to the ideal image within, creating transformative recognition and inspiration for actualizing our angelic nature.

This evening, I'd like to make a few brief general points about the nodes of the lattice—about what we call the elements of the imaginal. Then I want to move on to explore some ramifications of what we discussed regarding self, self-sense and imaginal self, self-becoming imaginal, examining how this relates to some of the nodes of the lattice, some of the elements of the imaginal.

First, let me offer a few brief general points about the nodes of the lattice, about these twenty-eight elements of the imaginal. Some of these I've mentioned before, but they bear repeating.

First, remember what the point of this teaching of the elements of the lattice is. It has two main purposes. One is discernment—clarity about what is or isn't imaginal in our sense, or what constitutes an image or a sensing with soul becoming more fully imaginal, more authentically imaginal in our language. This serves to aid conceptual understanding, but also helps in the navigation, in the steering. What openings am I trying to encourage or lay the conditions for?

The second purpose of these teachings of the elements and imaginal nodes is that they can be used in practice. By noticing a certain element—for example, the sense of time or the sense of ontic status, the reality status—and actually paying attention along the lines of a certain element, that element can be ignited. We can notice something there, and that noticing and attention can ignite that element, thus allowing the image to become more imaginal.

In igniting that element—whether it's the element of eternality in terms of temporality, or the element of theatros, or imaginal way, or whatever it is, or love, or beauty, eros—that igniting can ignite other nodes. Sometimes it's simply a matter of paying attention and noticing: "Oh, I am loved here. I didn't notice it before. It doesn't fall into the usual appearance of what I tend to think love looks like, but there is love there. Let me pay attention to that and feel that." It might be quite subtle, a really different manifestation. In the noticing, it brings it more alive, becomes more prominent, ignites, and then the other nodes follow.

But it's also possible to deliberately ignite a certain node just by deciding to or by jiggling, wiggling it in a certain way. For example, with energy body awareness, we can always reopen that, spread that with awareness in the space and environment of the body, fill that with sensitivity and presence, and notice if there's an image of the body. That's actually deliberately igniting that node, and that can have an effect. So sometimes through noticing, sometimes through deliberate tweaking, jiggling.

This teaching serves a double purpose: conceptual clarity and conceptual differentiation from other experiences or paths that may overlap or be similar—the conceptual understanding, understanding the conceptual framework and logos, and the navigation—and secondly, that it's actually helpful in practice, either by noticing an element or deliberately doing something there.

Just check in yourself if your understanding or your relationship with this teaching of the elements has only included part of these purposes. Either you've forgotten that one can actually use it in practice as part of the art of practice, part of the alchemy, and you're thinking more in terms of definition. Or sometimes a person reports, "Yes, I've had that one, I've had that one," as if they're things to collect as opposed to engage and work with.

My second point is that there's no real order, no uniform and regular order in which these nodes or elements ignite. What this means is that in the art of our practice, we can be opportunistic. Which ones can I notice? Which ones may be available to my engagement, to my activity, to my subtle responsiveness, to my turning them on? But it might happen in any order. There's no linear, predictable, formulaic order in which these nodes need to be engaged or noticed or played with and in which they tend to ignite. Anything can happen in any order.

Another point: they're all connected. All these elements are connected. It's hard to start talking about one without it beginning to spill over into talking about another one, or a group of them tend to go together. So they're all connected. There is overlap. They're concepts with soft and elastic edges. They're fuzzy. They're interconnected.

The nature of that interconnection is sometimes one of tension—not paradox so much as opposition. They're pulling in different directions. For example, the autonomy of an image may be...

pulling in a different direction than the fact of it being created, but that we're engaged in creating, partly. So sometimes there's a kind of opposition, but they pull in different directions. And that's part of the tension or maybe paradox or mystery of the imaginal—this sensing the soul.

Sometimes two nodes overlap or seem to imply each other so that they are close in meaning or overlapping in meaning. Dimensionality and unfettered mobility, for instance—not exactly the same, but they relate very much. Eros and beauty... we could analyze them all and look at the kinds of relationships between the nodes, but there's a general point there.

I want to take this opportunity now to make a couple of corrections or revisions to the list of the elements. One has to do with "not reduced to one meaning." I would like to add: not reduced to one meaning or one causal explanation. We've touched on this before, but if I tend to think, "Oh, this image is here because of A, or because B"—because it's representing my personal power, or my compassion, or some wound from childhood—that may be part of an understanding of the causal explanation of why this image is arising.

But if we reduce it to just that causal explanation, whatever it is, then we're limiting the image, limiting the possibilities of the image, and amputating parts of it. It will lose some of its life, depth, breadth, resonance, and power. So that element we can now say is: not reduced to only one meaning or only one causal explanation.

The second correction has to do with two-ness, which we could expand to say: two-ness, differentiation, or retaining particularities. Sometimes the image arises here, in my body—I become, my body and my sense of self become the image, like the tree that I shared as an example briefly in one of these talks. It might then be that my sense of self as meditator splits out from it as image. That will always be there to a subtle sense because awareness is always in a dualistic relationship with its object.

But even more significant is the fact that it retains particularities. There's a particular tree with particular qualities, this tree—particular colors, particular shape, particular geometry, particular feel and aesthetic presentation. Retaining particularities also means it's not moving towards dissolution, melting, oneness—a kind of loss of features, loss of form, fading and loss of features and form.

That is certainly part of soul-making in the larger sense, in terms of the beautiful directions that the soul and consciousness can experience and explore. But in terms of imaginal work, mostly we say it retains particularities, differentiation, and sometimes the sense of two-ness.

Those were the brief general points about the nodes, about the elements. As I said, I want to pick up some of the threads of what we were talking about in relation to self-sense and self as image and self-becoming image, and unfold some of the ramifications there with respect to some of the other nodes.

Implicit in, or even obvious in, a lot of what we were talking about regarding self and angel out ahead and daimons is a sense of dimensionality. It's interesting hearing back from people which nodes make sense to them and which make sense much less. Sometimes someone reports, "I don't really understand this dimensionality node." Actually, a couple of people reported that.

So it may be that a better word is depth. When I hear "dimensionality," I think of an x-axis, a y-axis and a z-axis, or length, breadth and width—as if there's some kind of rectangle there at right angles to each other. So maybe a better word is depth, in the sense that the image or the sense of this object has a depth dimension. It has a sense of more-ness to it, of beyonds, of other levels of being, other planes of existence in it, other mysteries within it that are either directly connected or intuitively sensed, dimly, vaguely sensed.

Someone else wasn't quite sure what dimensionality meant, and they found it helpful when I explained one way you can understand it: the idea or concept of the image of, for example, a human being or an action as being the projection or emanation or refraction of the image of an angel. This image is a refraction of an angel, or this human being that I'm seeing now is an emanation, a projection, a refraction of an angel—the embodiment of an angel who exists at another level, so to speak, with another dimension.

Within that—and I'll come back to this—to realize that the human or the self or the action or the duty that's involved can never be a perfect or exact replica of the angel. That's why I use the word refraction, which means when light hits water, it's slightly bent a certain way. It's the same ray of light, but it's given a kind of spin by the water. So the angel is given particular spins by the human being, or the image. It's not a perfect one-hundred-percent mirroring.

That's an important point we'll come back to in other contexts and to make other points in terms of implications for our life and our sense of what we value and what we're aspiring to. So a human being—we can have a sense of a human being as refracting an angel, as a refraction, a projection, an emanation of an angel. And that whole idea, just because the angel exists at another dimension, gives a sense, or is an example of a sense of dimensionality, or depth.

An intrapsychic image also can be the image of such an angel. And then the dimensionality is there. The more-ness is implicit in the whole space between the image and the angel. So this image maybe is not the angel—it's the refraction of the angel, it's an emanation of the angel.

The more-ness and the dimensionality is also in the kind of bottomlessness or unfathomability of the angel. And that's where the image gets its unfathomability from. It's connected to the unfathomability of the angel. And as we mentioned, a person, for example, can be the projection, the emanation, the refraction of many angels.

Contrary to some of the writings of Henry Corbin—and sometimes it's hard to say when he writes whether it's his teaching or his interpretation, a refraction of the teachings of these different Islamic mystics and scholars through the ages—some of what he writes makes it sound like there's one angel for each human being. We're saying yes, it might be one, it might be many more than one, with all the added richness and complexity and sometimes difficulty that brings. But Corbin was very prolific and was probably reporting on different traditions and teachings, so sometimes it might be this and sometimes that. It's not important for our purposes.

A person, we would say, can be the projection of many angels. For some people, just that idea might begin to give some entrance into the mode of dimensionality, some sense of beginning to understand that possibility. Of course it can open up in different ways other than that and more than that. But this is absolutely crucial, for many reasons. The sense of dimensionality so much rests on this. Again, we'll come back to it, and hopefully, if I get a chance to do those talks on ethics, we'll return to this.

But why is it important? If things are just flat, if things are all the same in terms of the level of their being, it doesn't feel very soulful, for one thing. It doesn't feel very rich and deep, because the depth or dimensionality is not there. But it also doesn't enable us in our life to have an anchor that's deep.

An anchor for our being when things are difficult or confusing, when we've lost our bearings—like a ship at sea, if the anchor that it puts down does not reach and find traction and connect with something of another substance other than water, the ship just drifts. It's the same for us as human beings. Without a sense of something of another level, of another dimension in all kinds of ways—existentially, psychologically, spiritually, soulfully—we drift. We lose our bearings, we lose our sense of meaningfulness, orientation, steadiness, courage, all kinds of qualities.

Sometimes some ways of relating to the Dharma want to pin so much hope on mindfulness and the practice of mindfulness. There is a kind of anchoring as we come back to the breath or mindfulness, as awareness is different than its objects. But mindfulness is not really an anchor at another level. It doesn't have so much of a sense of dimensionality. Even if awareness is larger than objects and experiences, mindfulness is impermanent. It comes and goes. It exists in time.

An image or a sensing with soul has this implicit dimensionality, as we're teaching, that we can get a sense of. We can begin to notice it, begin to feel it, begin to feel its import and how that sense of dimensionality actually touches the being. The dimensionality there is something of another level. So when we need an anchor—when we're lost, when we're confused, when we're agitated, when we're unsure morally, when we're in some kind of crisis, when the wind's blowing and swelling turbulently around our ship—then we need some sense of something of another dimension.

It's curious because the normal contemporary, the dominant contemporary way of understanding things is to try and find an anchor in some kind of solidity, some kind of obvious assurance or investment in money or house or this or that, a relationship. And of course, that does provide an anchor to a certain extent. Correspondingly, the dominant contemporary mindset and worldview would dismiss images and sensing with soul as being way too insubstantial, unrealistic, not really there to provide any kind of anchor.

But actually, because there is this sense of dimensionality, and that sense touches the soul—it touches the heart of the soul—it provides a better anchor because it's a different level. It's a different substance. It's not just water. It's something of a different material and a different level of being.

Of course, there are many kinds of anchors of a different level of being. The experience, for example, of cosmic or universal love—not so much my love, my metta, my self-love, but the sense of the universe and the cosmos being made out of love, being shot through with love, love being woven into the fabric of the cosmos. That's a perception of a different dimension of being than the usual habitual flatland view.

Similarly, the meditative sense or opening to a cosmic or universal awareness—not just mindfulness, but a universal cosmic awareness that holds everything, or that things really are in the depths of their being this awareness, this cosmic awareness. Both those examples, the awareness and the love, when you have the cosmic sense of them, there's a dimensionality and, as I've said many times in explaining things in these talks, there's usually for people some kind of sense of divinity with them. A practitioner opening in those kinds of ways starts to use the language of divinity very often, even if they've never felt comfortable with it before.

So the dimensionality and divinity are there in those experiences. But neither of them, neither the cosmic awareness nor the cosmic love, include the personal—the necessity of my particularities and my unique personhood.

So there's something about an anchor, about the kind of anchoring that images offer us—that is both a powerful anchor because it has another dimension, another level of being, another kind of substance to it, but also an anchor that includes the necessity of my unique personhood. It speaks to me uniquely. It's relevant to me. It includes my particularities and is resonant with and attuned to and tailored to my particularities.

But this principle of dimensionality and anchoring is very, very important. It makes such a difference in life, or it can make such a difference if the sensibility is allowed to open to it, if it doesn't dismiss it out of hand, close the eyes and the senses to that possible sense. If the sensibility is trained, it's right there.

As I said, these elements of the imaginal are really things to notice. It's almost like you just hang out and you start to notice, "Oh yeah, there is that sense, oh yeah." And these words that we're putting out for the elements are just sort of best efforts at kind of pinpointing or naming these aspects of the imaginal that are there waiting to be more clearly discerned and noticed.

The importance of this dimensionality struck me particularly while practicing in a dyad a little while ago. As I mentioned in the beginning talk, I hope that I can say a little bit about dyad practice. Dyad practice has all kinds of levels. So far in the recorded teachings, we've just put out very basic dyad practice or triad practice—this very basic sort of almost exercise-like aware of the energy body, aware of the emotions, speaking that and receiving it, then sharing an image, maybe seeing the other as angel. But people have really loved it and gone for it.

Hopefully, we'll return to dyad practice and add a bit. People have asked me, and I think I've said in response, there are other levels where the dyad itself can be full of eros. It's implicit in seeing another as an angel, in fact, and being seen as an angel. The other person can become image for me right now, and I can become image for them right now in the present moment, and that's what we're practicing with, what we're engaging together and sharing together and talking about together and opening together.

Sometimes that eros can be non-sexual, and sometimes it can be sexual. We've expressed caution about doing that kind of practice just because of how much eros can arise, and sometimes how much sexual eros can arise, and the necessity to be a little bit careful. It's like, okay, what are the conditions of my life? Do I have monogamous obligations here, that there's so much eros in this dyad now that I'm a little bit in danger of acting out in a certain way, which will also potentially break the eros in the dyad anyway? All kinds of issues that cannot even handle that energy.

So we've been deliberately holding back about those kinds of teachings, or that level of teachings of dyad practice, but it's there, and maybe at some point we'll release more teachings about that.

Anyway, that was a long prelude and caution to say that I was practicing in a dyad with someone, we were looking at each other, and there was a lot of eros there. There was romantic eros, if you like, in the imaginal, the erotic imaginal. And the image of us as mystical husband and wife echoing, mirroring the emanation, the refraction of a kind of cosmic husband and wife. Very, very beautiful, and the sense of all the elements were alive as it became fully imaginal.

But what struck me at this point was the sense of participation. There was a sense of this experience now, and this image now, or this sensing with soul now—so my sense of her, my sense of us—being retained. The forms were retained, but there was a sense of these being echoes, refractions of us at a higher level, an angelic level, a cosmic level, whatever language you want to use. And of course in that, then this level, this human level and the sense of it in opening to that kind of sensing with soul is that we are participating, participating in the image which has higher roots, roots in divinity.

So the element of participation was very strong, and grace and eternality—this cosmic husband and wife and their eros and their love and their bond, always already happening. And the human experience can open to that, enter into that, and participate in it.

This element of participation, I think, is one of the deepest and most important of the imaginal. But with that sense of participation and grace and the eternality was a real sense of privilege that really touched my soul. And in a way, I felt that very often, but it felt more clear to me, and partly perhaps because of my health situation, my probably dying soon, that all three of those nodes—the participation, the grace, and the eternality, but particularly the participation and the privilege of participating—privilege of participating in this cosmic image, of somehow being part of that, participating in a theophany, in a face of divinity, in something, in an image that has roots in divinity.

And that privilege gave me, really, I could feel it, its impact on the sense of dying and on the relationship to death. So that when there's that kind of sense of privilege, even if it only lasts a few minutes or seconds even, something is touched so deeply and so one really recognizes, "I've drunk from a treasure here. I've drunk from a deep and infinite well. And somehow I am part of that. I've recognized that I am part of that."

It changes the sense of one's being.

So this enormous sense of privilege and recognizing, changing the sense, the relationship with death, recognizing—you know, a long life. I still feel quite young. If I die soon, I'm dying young. But recognizing with this really profound sense of privilege touched my heart and soul so deeply, a long life is not so important. A long life without that sense of privilege and participation and how that touches the being and what it says about one's being and about one's existence, even if one struggles to articulate that—a life without all that is not so great. A short life that includes times of touching or opening to those kinds of perceptions, those kinds of elements and senses, is worthwhile, is very okay.

I'm reminded of the Buddha, who said: better one moment of knowing the unfabricated than a hundred years of life without knowing the unfabricated. It's akin to that. So it really relativized the whole relationship with death at that time.

It's not just that the eternality element was turned on, and therefore there's a different relationship with death, because death obviously is an ending in time, and where there's a sense of eternality, it sort of transcends that, or relativizes it. So this sense of dimensionality, participating in other dimensions, and the privilege of all that, the grace of all that—so potentially profound and impactful in our relationship to all the vicissitudes of our existence, including dying.

Now that's an example from dyad practice, but it might be all images and all sensing with soul actually have that same kind of opportunity in them—in the sense of dimensionality, in the sense of participation, in the sense of grace and eternality. There is this sense of privilege and it can really... there's potentially a sense of liberating, beautiful, fulfilling, meaningful.

That was an example from dyad practice, but maybe any image, any sensing with soul. It may be extra powerful when it's in relation to an actual physical human other, because then there is this kind of transubstantiation or filling out, dimensionalizing of this level of existence. It goes right to the core of our humanity. But I think it's there as a possibility and a potential opening, glimpse, taste in any sensing with soul. So you can hear that dimensionality is implicit, and sometimes we make it explicit in some of what we were talking about with regard to self the other night.

But let's follow on and touch on a couple of the other nodes.

Humility.

Humility, as we are using that word—a couple of things. Like I've said before, each of these nodes will expand in time as we experience it, as we fill it out, as the soul-making dynamic does its work and the dough gets kneaded and the fermentation happens and the richness and the complexifying and the deepening. Each node itself will also grow. Our sense, our understanding, our range of experience—each of the elements themselves will also gain dimensionality and meaning.

In our paradigm, when we use the word humility, it's in relationship. Humility is in the face of. It's humility before. In other words, in relationship with mystery and love and dimensionality and unfathomability and divinity.

More commonly in the dominant secular culture, humility just means a person doesn't think too much of himself, or maybe just daunted by something that they feel incapable of addressing or carrying out or understanding or whatever it is. It's a relative size thing, but it retains just a flatland dimensionality.

I was talking and listening to someone a little while ago about climate crisis and things like that. And it struck me a little while later, as I was thinking about the soul-making teachings, that although she had a sense of "I don't understand the complexity of this problem"—which is, you know, an appropriate response. It's so complex psychologically, economically, socially, politically, probably even complex in terms of the Earth's geo-weather systems and all that. Or, you know, "What to do? What do we do about climate change? What can we possibly do? I'm just one person. It's such a huge issue. We're just such a small minority who seem to really want to engage and do something about it."

And so there's a kind of—we could call it humility there, but what was missing was, in the whole relationship, there was not the mystery, there was not the unfathomability, there was not the dimensionality and the divinity there. So I'm not even sure I would use the word humility in that case. But that too, you know, I felt like potentially there were whole other levels and possibilities and breadth to her whole relationship with the climate crisis that might be able to be opened if some of these other more imaginal elements can be opened, and particularly the sense of dimensionality, divinity, etc., which then would allow a different sense of humility in relationship to it.

So self, dimensionality, humility—these are all really, really key elements, and very much you can see how they kind of, as I said, they're connected. They have implications for each other. They weave into each other.

When we're talking about humility, it gets a certain spin sometimes in our contemporary secular culture, in the dominant culture at least, and it can be a kind of self-denigration or self-effacement or that kind of thing. So again, I hope this is obvious anyway, but the way we're using it is much more to do with, or much more includes a sense of healthy self-esteem. It's not in any way in opposition to that.

So that one can feel this kind of deep humility, a beautiful, rich, soft humility that, as I've said, is a humility in relationship to mystery, to love, to unfathomability, to dimensionality and divinity. And none of that has any implications or any offshoot into self-depreciation, self-denigration, self-worthlessness, and all that kind of stuff at all, so that we can even be proud, in the good sense, of our being and our direction and what we've done and how we are and what we're oriented towards and all of that, at the same time as we're humble. They're not in any way contradictory.

To quote Nikolai Hartmann, who I'll come back to several times—a German philosopher of the first half of the twentieth century for the most part—it would be a mistake to suppose that genuine pride, which he points out was for Aristotle in the ancient Greek teachings, the Hellenistic teachings, part of the makeup of a great soul, would actually have a healthy pride. There's nothing in that that excludes a genuine humility. The person who is justified in being proud will always, if they see themselves clearly, have something before which they humble themselves. But the humble person must always have something in himself which he prizes, if it's going to be a healthy humility and a genuine virtue.

I might have pointed this out before, but again, it's worth saying again, because we're talking about self and self-sense. So again, words like humility and even grace—they're often loaded words for us in this culture. And they can mean different things or be dependent on our past conditioning and our past associations with such words. They can be loaded problematically sometimes in different ways.

But with regard to sensing with soul in imaginal practice, those words and those attitudes, like humility—the attitudes to which, the poise, let's say, an attitude to which those words refer—

They can't be too self-weighted in the sense of being too focused on self, and certainly not on sin. This is one of the unfortunate associations or spins that such words as humility and grace have been given through what I would call a narrowing of Christian teachings over the millennia. Sometimes when people think of those words, they associate them with a sense of sin, worthlessness, feeling bad—and it's very selfie. The self that has them is a kind of very solid, heavy self. It's contracted, dense, and there's a tight fabrication of self there.

In our usage of those words, it's almost more fertile if the self-sense that feels humble is actually much lighter. Perhaps it exists in a certain region of the spectrum of self-fabrication. The self that's fabricated at the point of feeling the kind of humility that will be fertile as an element of the imaginal won't be a heavy, solid, weighty, contracted self that's somewhat self-obsessed. There's a certain region where there's a lighter self-fabrication. Again, this ties in with the node of slightly less fabricated.

In that region, the self-sense can still feel humility. There's a self-sense, there's form, but it's light, it's malleable, it's liquid. And in that region of lighter self-fabrication, there can still be a very poignant and moving and beautiful softening humility that is fertile in terms of the whole generation and reception of images. Outside of that range, there may not be that fertility. The imaginal perception won't work; the sensing of soul will be much less possible.

Again, we talk about self as possible refraction of angel. We talk about dimensionality, divinity, we talk about humility. But all of this actually needs to rest on or rest in a certain spectrum of self-fabrication that's not too heavy, too dense, too tightly fabricated. The order isn't necessarily linear—it's not that I have to lighten the self first. It might be that I lighten the self-fabrication, and then all kinds of possibilities open up imaginatively with the elements of the imaginal. Or it might be that they open up, and automatically in that there's an igniting of the slightly less fabricated node, and the self-sense lightens. So it's not necessarily linear, but wrapped up or implicit in our understanding of humility is, generally speaking, a slightly less fabricated sense of self.

I can't remember if I mentioned the possibility of actually starting with humility—starting even with the sort of light intention to be open and receptive to images, should they come, should they be born, should they be given. Actually starting with humility, where there's no image there yet. But still, if the self is not too solid, not too densely and tightly fabricated, and if my sense of other or object is not yet a formed image or a clear image, it can still be within that sense of a less solid self.

With that sense of a less solid self, there can be a sense of other, beloved other, that may be very vague. Some sense of the more-than-me that's unfathomable, that has mystery and dimensionality. That may be it—just some vague sense of other that's more than me, that's unfathomably deep, that's pregnant with mystery and dimensionality.

Just that stance, that poise, that openness with the self less rarefied, with a vague sense of other that's already pregnant with those more mystical and soulful qualities, and a relationship or poise of humility from the self in relation to that, in the face of that, before that—that may be, in a way, igniting the element of humility. Out of that beautiful crucible, an image may arise. And even if it doesn't arise, just to hang out in that space with the self not so solidified, just with a vague sense or mystical sense of the other that's more than me and unfathomable—that's a really beautiful place to hang out.

I don't have to demand an image. I don't need a clear visual image. It may come, it may not come, but just to be in that space is doing something to the soul. It's soul-making. We could say it's already imaginal just by virtue of those elements being alive in the vague sense of other. There's no clearly sensible image there, or delineated, or discernible, but in that vague sense, we could say that's already image.

Whether we call it imaginal or not, in terms of the soul and what it's stretching and opening and nourishing in the soul and the soil, the way it's enriching and caring for the soil, changing the soil of the soul—this is going to be very beautiful and soul-making and beneficial.

Again, if we just linger on this need for the self to be not fabricated as much or in the ways that it usually is, in relation to humility and the more-than-me and divinity.

I touched on one level of prayer being—I think it's the right word, I should really look it up in the dictionary—but prayer as supplication. I'm using that word to mean prayer as some kind of ask or request. People pray, humanity has done this forever: I pray to this god or that god for this or that, for the rains to come, for protection, for whatever it is, for healing.

It's interesting. Sometimes, and I think I pointed this out maybe in the Eros Unfettered talks, I can't remember when, but sometimes that very stance of asking for something—this self asking another, in this case God or the Buddha nature or some divinity or angel or whatever, asking for, wanting, hoping for, desiring something, maybe in my case desiring healing or whatever—

But the desire itself can be—can be, not always, but can be—a slightly problematic element. Because of dependent arising, we know that desire tends to fabricate. And it can fabricate more sense of self. So that the self-sense that's asking can actually feel, starts off already as feeling separate. I want—I as separate self want something from this separate other, or hope for something, or ask for something.

And because of the desire implicit, and the sense of separation, and the desire, the self-sense actually becomes, through the action of prayer, actually becomes more separate from the divinity. You understand? Because it's fabricated more, and partly what's fabricating the sense of self is a sense of separateness.

One of the possibilities in that kind of situation, if you're engaged in that kind of practice—you know, the beauty of prayer, and there's so many possibilities when we talk about prayer—but one possibility, if we've noticed that kind of thing happening, is actually to introduce a subtle idea, very, again, very delicately introduced, a logos, that my wanting, my asking, or let's say my desire, is actually part of the divine desire.

So that my wanting, whatever it is, healing or this or that, that's not just mine. I'm already introducing a conception of it as part of the divine desire. Again, I'm participating in the divine desire. This desire of mine is somehow participating in the divine desire, in a divine desire. In introducing that logos, again, where we're not exacerbating the sense of self, we're changing the relationship and the conception with desire, and we're igniting the element of participation, among other aspects.

And then the whole sense of prayer can be a real, much more soulful experience and can open up in different sensings with soul, etc. The prayer itself, and of course that can spread to what's around you, or your sense of yourself, all of that.

So, less separation, because we're relating to the desire in a different way, instead of exacerbating the sense of separation and solidity of self, which can kind of frustrate or block the sense of prayer, actually, or block its deeper possibilities, deeper soul possibilities, let's say, in the soul sense of the prayer. Less separation when you introduce that kind of logos, that kind of subtle idea, and you introduce it subtly.

So again, these things are not to be clanked around with or kind of rammed in there or shouted in the mind, etc. There's really quite a delicate touch that's needed, especially in the realm of conception and logos, when we're working with that in the soul-making.

But because the sensing with soul then gets ignited more, then there's just much greater beauty. Beauty in the sense of prayer, beauty in the sense of self, beauty in whatever's around you, beauty in the sense of the divinity or the Buddha nature to whom you are addressing the prayer, with whom you are in relationship, etc.

But again, you can hear in all this, this dance that I was mentioning the other day, this dance of how much reification, how much fabrication to the sense of self. And we can play with it at different times. If it gets too solid, too tight, too real, too dense, too contracted, too fabricated, the sense of self, it will cut off the possibilities. If it gets too unfabricated, it will also cut off certain possibilities.

So if we want the soulfulness of prayer, for instance, in the sense of supplication, we need to dance in that middle ground with form and the liquidity. If we want the angelic dimension, the sense of refraction, projection, emanation from angels, the sense of participating in that, again, we need to dance in this territory where there's form and emptiness together.

Related—again, implicit in some of the ideas that we were putting out the other night about self and its relationship with angel, the angel out ahead, wrapped up in that, again, sometimes more implicitly, sometimes obviously and explicitly—is also duty and necessity or rightness.

So someone was sharing with me an image, and the image was of a hysterically grieving woman. It was a very powerful image, obviously with a lot of energy in it, with the hysteria, etc. When we were talking about it, and I think it was obvious to her, even before I talked, or we drew it out in the conversation. But here's this hysterically grieving woman, and it does not feel right to imagine bringing her a cup of tea or a blanket or calming her down or giving her a Valium or whatever.

In some modes of working with the imagination, psychotherapy or perhaps other spiritual paradigms, I don't know, there is that sense of wanting to kind of rectify and normalize the image along the lines of the normal conceptions and assumptions and models that the normal level of mind has. But it absolutely—again, you just have to hang out with the imaginal to get the—to kind of don't buy into that immediate sense, oh, this is a pathological image, there's something wrong here. If there's something wrong with her in that image, it must mean there's something wrong with me, etc. Those kinds of immediate, often pre-programmed reactions and assessments of the mind just let that be and you get another sense that maybe less obvious at first but then comes more to the fore as you get used to it: no, there's something right about this and to step in and fix her you really recognize that that feels wrong.

So there's a rightness to the image, and sometimes with the rightness to the image, it's connected with our sense of duty. So duty, again, we touched on it in the talks about self, and the angels want something from us. And there's a whole range of what they might want and what that might imply for our lives, of course. But the rightness of the image has something to do, is connected with the duty, often. Or the duty, again, because implicit or explicit in some of those ideas about self and its relationship to angel or daemon is a sense of duty.

The particularities of an image which seem or feel important or the ones that feel soul-making, again, they often harbor or sometimes hide or sometimes indicate more obviously the sense of duty.

So there was an image that Yogi shared with me of a woman in the process of giving birth, of birthing, on a completely dried up, devastated landscape, a sort of almost apocalyptically barren landscape. And she was lying there and giving birth, birthing. And we were talking about this image, talking—I was asking her, is there... There's a two-ness there. Is it between... Well, perhaps the... She was asking me about the two-ness.

I can't remember how it came up, but anyway, is the two-ness between you and her, as it often is? There's the image as other, and there's a sense of self in the two-ness. Or is it between you and the landscape, or her and the landscape? Or, as we mentioned as one possibility the other night, can you see her as the woman so that the self and the image separate? Can you actually introduce that? Or is it the woman and the baby or the child inside her? Is that the two-ness?

The person's answer was very immediate, very quick: "No, it's the woman and the birthing itself." There's the sense of the two-ness there—the significant two-ness, the woman and the birthing. When she said that, it immediately gave me the sense that the woman knows that birthing is her duty.

So wrapped up in the sense of what felt like the significant dyadic relationship there—the woman and the birthing itself—and that immediately gave me the sense that this woman in the image knows that birthing is her duty because of the desolate, destroyed land. And it's her duty with all the dukkha it demands. She goes through, puts up with, meets and includes. Gently pointing that out to the practitioner, she recognized the soul relevance, the soul truth in that. It was very touching for us both.

In this case, from that sense of duty, then it might be that the sense of dimensionality and divinity opens up from the sense of duty. It can be. So as I said, all these elements are connected.

If we actually just linger a little bit on this question of duty, I started to wonder: does each imaginal figure herself, itself, himself—whatever—have a duty it's aware of? So we've talked so far about the duty being our duty in relationship to the imaginal figure, our duty given, if you like, by the angel, refracted into our life from the angel through our participation, through our interpretation, through our choices, because we retain autonomy.

But I started to wonder: does each imaginal figure themselves have a duty that it is aware of? And that duty of the imaginal figure is then refracted into a corresponding duty for the soul-making practitioner. And if that's the case, is it also that it's only more obvious with images that express in some ways a pathology or a dukkha?

So those solitary wanderers that I've shared and other people have shared—similar kinds of images of solitary wanderers—there's dukkha there, but they seem to have a duty to keep wandering and to be solitary to some extent or to a large extent. Or the images that I used to share: the evangelist, the soldier. Again, there's dukkha there—the burden of the battle, the difficulty, the relentlessness, the fatigue, the danger. Or the hysterically grieving woman, or this woman giving birth in a wrecked landscape.

I don't know. Perhaps every imaginal figure's duty is to be itself fully and somehow express that. So I'm just wondering about these things. I don't know.

And if we're talking about nodes and this sort of thing around duty and different aspects, someone asked—is necessity a node? I can't remember, or I was wondering. Maybe I was just wondering. I don't remember if someone else asked or if I was wondering. In other words, that this image feels it has to be this image. It's necessary.

I don't know the answer. Is that a twenty-ninth element of our lattice? I'm not sure. Perhaps. If it were, it would be paired—we talk about the relationship between different elements—it would be paired in opposition to the self's autonomy and the create aspect of the create-discover relationship. So "it's necessary, it has to be this" is in a slightly paradoxical relationship with the sense of "well, I'm creating it," or acknowledgment of creation.

I don't know the answer. We could perhaps include something like necessity as a twenty-ninth node, or it might already be woven up implicitly in the node of soul-making—that an image is soul-making. And for soul-making, it has to have those resonances that are particular and, as I said, attuned, tailored to this particular soul and what's meaningful, what's right on the money, with this intelligent sort of addressing and speaking to my situation, my particular soul, my makeup. So perhaps necessity could be conceived of as part of the node of soul-making and soul-making resonances.

While we're on the subject, someone was asking about recognition, which again may be related to this necessity. Is recognition possibly an element? You know, sometimes, for instance, in that image I shared of the claim of the god of music on me, there's a kind of recognition. I recognize something that makes sense of an aspect or strands of my life and my struggles, my aspirations, my inspirations, et cetera. But again, recognition will then be related to infinite mirroring, to meaningfulness, to also humility, and perhaps also values, in a way, perhaps.

So I don't know about that. I'm not sure it's necessary to include or add another element. It seems to me implicit in the infinite mirroring and meaningfulness, and so forth.

Vulnerability was another element we suggested—I think I suggested it the other day, or perhaps someone else might have. It could indeed be an element. We talked about it the other day.

Or significance was another one—again, I don't remember if someone suggested it or if I thought of it. It doesn't really matter. There's clearly a sense of the significance of this image, the significance of this sense. But I don't know whether we need to add that to the list necessarily, because again, it's implied in the node of meaningfulness, it's implied in the node of infinite echoing and mirroring—that's why it's significant—and maybe implied in the node of duty.

I'm not sure. We wouldn't want the list of elements to get too unwieldy—twenty-eight is already a lot. On the other hand, as I said, I don't particularly want these teachings to be engraved forever in stone without the possibility of creative discoveries by others at some point.

But if we talk about humility and if we talk about duty, then, as I pointed out earlier with humility, and as I hope you get a feel for when we've been talking about duty over the years, that includes love. So again, there's this overlap or implication between the elements of the imaginal.

Let's talk just a little bit right now about the element of love. Love—loving and being loved—we said was one of the elements of the imaginal. One of the things that's important to realize is this love is not metta. Or rather, it's not just metta.

The love that imaginal figures have for us is not a universal love. It's particular to us. It may include metta, which is a universal love—metta is a universal love for sentient beings, universal in the sense that all sentient beings are included no matter what. Whereas the love that imaginal figures have for us might include metta, but actually, it's not universal. Rather, it's a kind of love of our uniqueness. They're rejoicing in, if you like—they're delighting in, they're loving, they're celebrating and expressing gratitude for our uniqueness and some particularity in us. And that's different than metta.

In metta, it doesn't matter how this person is different from that person, or even whether this person is in some ways more developed or better morally, or kinder, or more beautiful, or wiser, or more intelligent, or less. It doesn't matter. But a significant characteristic of the love that imaginal figures have for us is different—it is particular. It's not universal. It's not metta; it's more than metta. It may well include metta.

Neither is it an unconditional love like metta is. Metta is to all beings equally. No one deserves more or less metta. So it's universal in that sense. It's also unconditional, as what I was explaining before explains the unconditionality of metta as well. It doesn't matter. It's not dependent on, it's not conditioned by this or that quality in the being, or this or that behavior. So a pathological serial killer is worthy of as much metta as a Buddha in the teachings of metta.

But the love the imaginal figures have for us is not universal, and it's not unconditional love either, like metta is. Rather, the imaginal figures' love for us is, to some extent, contingent on us being a certain way, or acting, or choosing, or feeling, or intending, or sensing in some particular way which is dear to and somehow refracts those similar dispositions in the imaginal figure. Do you understand?

We could say the imaginal figure loves our potential, our kind of ideal being. This is significant because it's connected to duty, isn't it? They want something from us. They have an ask, a demand, a duty, and the love that they have is wrapped up with that. Sometimes they just celebrate our being, our sensibility, and sometimes they want us to be a certain way in the world.

And that way is somehow connected to their way, how they are. This is important to realize when we talk about love of imaginal figures for us, of being loved. As we've pointed out—and actually earlier even in this talk—that love can look really quite different from whatever perhaps more narrow models or ideas of love we have.

So it can look quite stern, quite fierce, quite demanding or taxing or all kinds of things. We've given many examples over the years, even the devouring, what seems violent. An image that eats me up and devours me, or cuts me up into little pieces. All this can be love, if I don't get pulled into my immediate, indoctrinated assumptions that my mind has. I start to see, "Oh, there is a kind of love here, and it's not the usual kind." But I have to train my sensibility, opening my sensibility and receptivity and my discernment to the range of what love can mean.

The love is not metta, it's not universal, it's not unconditional. I mean, it might include that as a stratum, but it's more than that.

I mentioned Nikolai Hartmann briefly. I want to return to him—if I get to do the talks on ethics, I will return to him. He talks about what he calls personal love, which is different than... He really means love of the being because you sense the image. You sense him, her, them as image. That imaginal level of the human being that you love, he calls the ideal, the personal ideal. I hope to explain that language a bit more when we get to the talks on ethics.

So there's what he calls the empirical personality, which just means what you actually sense, what you see. You see this form, you see that action, you see them be grumpy, you see them snap at someone, you see them be lazy or whatever it is at times. The empirical personality, he says, never strictly corresponds to its own ideal value, to the image.

When we love really deeply, we have, if you like, the imaginal sense of the other. Now, he tends to think there's just one imaginal sense—let's go with that for now, a bit like some of Corbin's interpretations of certain teachers. He calls that the ideal personality.

Since the empirical personality never strictly corresponds to its own ideal value, to the image, but love—in his sense, personal love—looks exclusively to the latter, to the image, to the ideal. The ideal is not some preconceived notion of how this person should be. It's a sort of intuitive sense of the angel that they're refracting, if we put it in our language. He's putting it in different language, different concepts. He doesn't use the language of images or even the idea of images.

So it adheres in the essence of personal love to pierce through the empirical person to his ideal value. You see through the everyday foibles and failings of this person. You also see the wonderful things that they do and their beauty, but you pierce through the empirical to the ideal value—meaning to the image, to their angelic nature and what they're refracting in their being there. This is at least its tendency, he says. Its commitment is to the ideal of personality, to that image.

"It lets that stand for the empirical individual, accepting him as equivalent to his highest possibilities, as raised to a power above his actual being. It loves in him what inheres in his essential tendency, the axiological idiosyncrasy of his ideal."

That fancy language just means his particular unique set of values and sensibilities that reside in his image. We are like we are—we have these kinds of values, these kinds of sensibilities, these kinds of directions, aspirations, propensities, the deep ones—because of the image that we are given, the image that we are refracting, the angel that we are refracting, that we are the refraction of.

"Not as an ideal, but as a trend towards actuality, just as if it were already actualized in him. For it, for this kind of love, the man as he is, in the trend of his, the preference of his ethos, of his being, is accepted as a guarantor of a higher moral being."

Again, he's using the word "moral" in quite a wide sense, but let's not go into that right now.

"Which of course he is not, but which only in him and nowhere else in the world finds something real that approximates to its own value."

So only in us, only in you, is there anything that's approximating that angel. Unique. And that's all we can do—that's the closest we can come to that angel, if you like, through the human. It's the closest it comes.

Personal love—meaning this fuller, deeper love that sees, that senses and loves what he calls the ideal person in the other, or what we might call the image person—"personal love lives by faith in the highest that is within the loved one, which despite its inadequacy, love senses prophetically. Such love is ethical divination in the preeminent sense of the word," he says. The love of the ideal of a particular, meaning the image of a particular individual.

And he continues: "The distinctive power of all love which enters deeply into one's personal life is that it brings to light the otherwise hidden and neglected essence of one's individuality."

So this is a long passage and I'm taking my time reading it, but I'm mentioning all this because not only is this relevant to human-to-human relationships where we allow them to become intimate, to be enriched and to open out to the imaginal dimension—I've said this before, I think real love, deep love of another human being, includes them being imaged to us, and the love of that image, so that we're loving the whole spectrum of their being, the whole spectrum of the dimensionality of their being.

So he's talking about love of human to human, which I want to include, but right now I'm talking about the love of images for us. Because images love us in that sense—in the sense that he's talking about. "And the distinctive power of all love which enters deeply into one's personal life is that it brings to light the otherwise hidden and neglected essence of one's individuality."

It's as if these images, they look at us, they witness us, and they know us sometimes better than we know ourselves. And in their gaze and in their love, what is sometimes hidden and inaccessible within us is brought to light through their gaze, through their love. They know something that perhaps we're not in contact with. And it starts to activate and actualize those aspects of our being, if you like, the inner core of our being, the imaginal dimensions of our being, the images that we are, that we are refracting, that we can potentially refract, that we can choose to engage with more fully.

It brings to light and to life, I would say, the otherwise hidden and neglected essence of one's individuality.

He continues: "That this revelation can be achieved only in a life of another order than that of the empirical is because of the gulf between him"—between the empirical man and the ideal of himself and the image. So there's this separation. The image—that's why I use the word "refraction"—it can never be, as I said before, a complete one hundred percent faithful replica of the angel. He calls it the gulf between the empirical man, the actual manifestation, and the ideal, the image.

And then he continues: "The loved one feels the power that upholds him." So think about this. I hope some of you will have tasted this already with images. Something about the way they love us. Of course, you can taste it, you can feel it and taste it when you're related to with a certain love by another human being—again, when they're opening to and allowing the angelic, the imaginal dimension of your being. They're allowing themselves to witness that, to open to it, to sense it, to relate to it, to love it.

"The loved one feels the power that upholds him." I hope you've felt this. I hope you have tasted this with images, also with other human beings and practitioners. "He feels that the loving glance penetrates his empirical being and points beyond it. Thus he is aware that for the one who loves him, he has become transparent. It exalts him above himself." This exalts him above himself.

"And he feels also that which shames him for not being in actuality as the other sees him. But instead of feeling that he is misunderstood, he has rather a sense that he is known to a preeminent degree."

So even when there's a sense of the image and the ideal of the image, and we feel we're not living up to it, and the image knows that, we still feel deeply understood, deeply known.

"And at the same time, he's forced to be what the other sees him to be."

So there's something again in the alchemy of images, of opening ourselves to the gaze of an image, to the sense and the conception of the imaginal in the way that we're talking about, that will galvanize all this. It changes our life. It directs us. It gives us power and also gives us courage and inclination to follow a certain direction, or calling, or action, or manifestation in our life.

Something very beautiful here. I want to talk about it in both domains: the domain of regarding an image or sensing the soul, something we're sensing the soul in the way that it loves us in this way that he's talking about; and or the human relationships, actual human relationships, when they're allowed to open, when we don't disallow that kind of opening to those imaginal dimensions.

Now, of course, some of you from the dharma background will get pretty nervous at this kind of language when he talks about one kind of ideal of a person. So we're using that—his language, as I said, the ideal of a personality is roughly akin to our language of the image of the self-image or the image that the other is seeing in us or we see in another, or the angel out ahead. We can just, for now, just lump them together.

[Continue beautifying the talk part 12/13]

This imaginal love is not only a disposition or an emotion or striving, but also a kind of knowing—a cognitive element always contained within love. Anyone who equates knowledge solely with thinking, reflective, rational consciousness of an object will naturally find contradiction here. But this represents an untenable idea of knowledge that neither science nor life would admit as adequate.

There exists a knowledge based on feeling—an intuitive knowledge. When we love this way, implicit within that love is that we know something profound about the person, or the image knows us deeply. As Hartman writes, "In a certain sense, the popular saying is right: love is blind, insofar as it does not see what is before its eyes. More correctly stated, it sees what is not in front of its eyes—what is not really at hand. It sees through."

This is the transparency—love's glances possess the nature of divination, seeing through to the ideal essence behind the actual person. To this love, the ideal essence behind the actual human is the person proper. Again, we're invited to play with this conception of ontology, to explore this range of the imaginal middle way. Who is the real being here? Is the image more real than the flesh and blood human manifestation?

"As regards personality," Hartman continues, "he who loves is the only one who sees, while he who is without love is blind." He begins with the phrase "love is blind" but actually turns it around completely. If you don't love deeply in this way—if you don't include the imaginal dimension—you're actually not seeing properly. You're blinded by a certain level of what's obviously palpable, sensible, and agreed upon.

This gaze and this kind of love discovers the ideal in the empirical. It discovers the image in the human manifestation. And that love, within the limits of its power, creates it in the loved one. There's a kind of intuitive understanding that, through love and relationship, fertilizes and allows that seed to germinate, permitting it to actualize and come into being. This constructive work of love follows after its discernment, yet there remains a penetrating knowledge within this intuitive love.

Returning to epistemology—this way of knowing that Hartman describes represents a step further epistemologically than merely a way of looking. He's actually claiming this constitutes genuine knowledge, that there's truth to it. He very much belongs to that philosophical camp, and we want to open up that territory because there's such a tendency to dismiss these kinds of knowing in our culture.

The question then becomes: How far are we able to unite the life of the ideal with a sober view of the actual? It's not that we don't see the actual life—

It's not that the image doesn't see the actual in us, it's not that we don't see the actual in another person—their humanity, their faults, their foibles, their failings, their fallings. So how much can we unite the actual life with the ideal vision?

That combination, he says, need not be a compromise. The whole art of love consists in retaining this high point of vision as a perspective and remaining under its spell. Now he's talking about human relationships, but we might also translate this to the realm of imaginal relationships. We have to retain this openness to the image that loves us in that way. We have to let the image, as it naturally will, retain that high vision that it has of us, that perspective. And we are under the spell of that vision.

All that is implicit as part of the possibilities of what we can sense in the love that images have for us—the beauty of that, the way the soul is touched by that and opened like a flower opening, and guided and inspired and anchored.

CHAPTER 180

The Invitation of Otherness (Autonomy, Eros, and Intentionality)

Rob Burbea · 1h32

In this profound exploration of imaginal practice, Rob Burbea delves into the essential dynamics of relationship with images, focusing on three interconnected elements: autonomy, eros, and fullness of intention. He examines how the autonomy of both self and imaginal other creates the necessary 'two-ness' that allows authentic eros to flourish, distinguishing this from union states where erotic tension collapses. Burbea carefully unpacks what autonomy means in imaginal practice - not alienation, but the retention of choice, discernment, and the capacity to assent or dissent to contact with images. He explores how recognizing the image's autonomy - its own intelligence, desire, and will - paradoxically deepens relationship rather than creating distance. The talk addresses common concerns about being 'taken over' by images, emphasizing that healthy imaginal practice maintains the practitioner's freedom while honoring the image's otherness. Burbea also examines the concept of anteros - the returning eros from image to practitioner - and how opening to being loved erotically by imaginal others can be profoundly healing. He concludes by exploring fullness of intention, arguing that approaching imaginal practice with the primary intention of soul-making (rather than narrow healing agendas) paradoxically allows the most profound transformation and healing to occur. Throughout, he weaves together practical guidance with deep philosophical insights about desire, cultural conditioning, and the nature of authentic spiritual practice.

We've been talking about various aspects of the relationship with images—possibilities for how we can sense and conceive of this relationship, our relationship with them, their relationship with us, their gaze, their love. I want to continue expanding and filling out some aspects of the possibilities for relationship with image, weaving this into some of the nodes, the elements.

Of course, all the twenty-eight nodes are, in a way, various components, characterizations, or qualifications of our relationship with images. The imaginal itself is more a relationship than a thing in itself. But relationship obviously implies two things, two entities—two subjects, really. This immediately connects with our element, our node of two-ness, which we expanded to two-ness, differentiation, retaining of particularities.

Eros, we have said many times, in the way that we're defining and conceiving of it, needs two-ness. So there's an erotic tension between two—between this subject and that subject, essentially subject, because what we are in erotic relationship with, we soon begin to sense as subject, as other, if we're not already sensing it that way.

So eros needs two-ness. Where there's a collapsing into melting, into union—lovely as that can be, and it can be very lovely and fruitful sometimes—with regard to the eros between those two objects, it collapses at that moment. The fertility of the eros in terms of its insemination of the soul-making dynamic, its beautiful proliferation of life, also collapses when the two-ness collapses into union, into oneness, important as that is as a kind of experience at times.

We could also say, and we have said in the past, that eros will create and discover more differentiation, more particularities, more otherness in a way. We have to be careful what we mean by that. A sense of otherness, a sense of an other, a relationship with an other, a two-ness—otherness is already a given for us most of the time. The way consciousness works and the constitution of experience entails, involves a sense of otherness, even when we know and perceive our fundamental oneness with all things.

That mystical sense, that important, beautiful mystical sense of knowing and really perceiving this fundamental oneness with all things—phenomenally, meaning in terms of appearance, others still appear to us. Even when I know deeply my oneness, I can still navigate in the world, go to the toilet, make my breakfast. This involves some degree of perception of other. The breakfast is other, the toast is other, the toilet bowl is other. So even when we know oneness, phenomenally, others still appear to us. Perception, in the way that it works, delineates self and other.

Eros, though, we say, creates and discovers more otherness. But what do we mean when we say that? We don't really mean that it creates a greater distance between self and other as a kind of alienation. Rather, eros will create and discover—there'll be ongoing discovery and creation of more and more dimensions, particularities, aspects, images—within a beloved other. So that beloved other has more faces of otherness, more kinds of otherness. The othernesses there become plural and richly complexified.

Two-ness, otherness, particularities—all of that. Wrapped up or very much connected with this element of two-ness is autonomy. We talk about the autonomy of self and other. Let's take just a little time to unpack some aspects of that.

When we're meditating with an image, when we're in contact, in dialogue, in relationship with an image, we'll probably or likely have a sense—again, it's something that we begin to notice when it's pointed out—that the image, or even just an aspect or a quality of that image, is somehow both me and not me. It's both mine and not mine. That's related to its infinite echoing and all kinds of things. So this sort of double sense—it's kind of me and it's kind of not me, it's kind of mine, or this aspect that it has is kind of mine, this quality that it has is kind of mine and really kind of not mine.

This double sense is part of the sense of its two-ness. It's also part of the image's autonomy, the imaginal figure's autonomy, and maybe also part of the imaginal middle way—me and not me, real and not real. But because of that sense of two-ness and autonomy there, that can support a sense of other elements. As usual with all the elements and their interconnectedness, the way they ignite and feed off and open each other up, turn each other on—with the autonomy of the other, the otherness of the other, the two-ness there, there can be a sense of grace, of gift. We're receiving something. Love also between the two. Sometimes we love them more when we recognize their autonomy.

Beauty, mystery, unfathomability, dimensionality—all of this is supported by that sense of otherness in many ways.

In discussing the element of autonomy of self and other, we've also mentioned personhood as possibly wrapped up with this—not just a sense of the autonomy of the image, but a sense of the personhood of the image. Sometimes I think we've put that out as part of the teaching. That's perhaps a little more questionable, or maybe not—it could be included, though I'm not sure.

I think autonomy, the autonomy of the image, is always there. That's a crucial aspect of an image becoming fully imaginal. It's not just a part of me. It's not completely under my control. It's like a being. It is a being. It has its own autonomy, its own intelligence, its own will, its own perception, its own desire.

Personhood is, as I said, a little more uncertain. Definitely, of course, sometimes we have the sense of personhood of an image. We might even have a sense of personhood of a tree, for example. We don't usually think of a tree as a person, but we can feel its personhood as well as its autonomy when we're sensing it with soul. But a lot of these things depend on where we draw the line with definitions.

I think at one point, and I mentioned it the other day, I delineated four kinds of domains or kinds of experience that can open up from an image. If I remember, the third one was this kind of space of the essence or the character of an imaginal figure. Someone was asking a question about Aslan—they were meditating on Aslan, the lion from The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe from the Narnia tales. At some point, the perception of Aslan as a form faded and went into a vast empty space, but that space was imbued with the essence, the character of Aslan. A very beautiful possibility that can happen sometimes. I'm not sure it should go there all the time, but still in the domain of the imaginal and soul-making, definitely.

We mentioned the other night the sense of the four elements—earth, air, fire, and water—and them having the dimensionality, divinity, mystery, unfathomability, and the way they connect with your body and the possibility of meditating that way. But they may or may not have personhood. If they get connected with those four goddesses, then they can begin to have personhood, but they may or may not. Still, though, they might have this autonomy. Again, it depends on definitions, how we're going to draw the lines between these words.

When we talk about the autonomy of self and other—that element of the imaginal, the autonomy of both self and other, both self and the imaginal object, the beloved other—let's just linger for a while on the sense of the autonomy of self. This is quite an important one and sometimes a tricky one for some people at different stages in their life and in their practice.

An integral and important aspect of imaginal practice is that the self retains a sense of autonomy. We're not being taken over or possessed or losing our sense of choice or will or discernment by the image. Nothing like that is certainly not being encouraged. Nothing like that is really going on.

When I talked about anchoring the other day—that an image has this sense of depth, that sense of possessing other levels or emanating from other levels, and that being able to provide us with an anchor and so keep us stable in regards to the vicissitudes of life. The anchor is like a kind of root as well, like a tree. Part of the function of the roots of the tree is to keep it stable, to keep it upright, to stop it getting blown over by the wind. So we can talk at times, and I have used the phrase at times, of being rooted in the divine, or rooted in the angelic, rooted in that dimensionality, rooted in the angelic dimension or in the archetype.

But that root, or being rooted that way and anchored that way, doesn't mean an inflexibility there. We're not pegged to the spot and immobile while something else has the autonomy and the mobility and we are being done to solely there. We still retain the autonomy of self there. That means freedom. Our freedom is there to a large extent, meaning we can choose how to practice, when to practice, when to get up from practice, what to do in practice, our pacing, our pausing. We're not stuck somewhere in this kind of anchoring and rooting.

There are all the gifts of a kind of anchoring and rooting, but not a kind of frozen subjugation, immobility, imprisonment. As I said, this is quite important for some people, perhaps given their history, given their psychology, for all kinds of reasons.

What do we mean? People use that word autonomy in terms of psychology. They use it in different psychologies quite differently, in different ways. I think in imaginal practice, autonomy, what we mean is—as I said, it's related to the two-ness, so it involves some sense of the distinctness, the two-ness, the differentiation of self and other, self and imaginal object, self and beloved erotic other, whatever that is, human—divine or whatever. So it is based on that differentiation, but also, as I said, the autonomy of the self—some sense of the distinctness of self and other at a certain level, at least even if one knows the oneness—and an ability of the self to assent or dissent to contact.

With the image, we can refuse contact at any point if we want. We can stop it, we can turn away, we can do something else, we can engage in another practice, we can get up. So the ability of the self is retained to assent or dissent to contact or engagement with an imaginal figure, or to the duty.

This is an important fact as well. Duty often comes—we talk about it—there's a limit to the kind of freedom that we get with the imaginal because of the burden of duty. But the duty is also something that we retain autonomy with. We can say no to a duty. We can say no to part of a duty. We can say no to a certain manifestation of a duty. So this retention of our capacity to discern and to choose, to assent or dissent—this is what we mean by autonomy in the context of imaginal practice.

Autonomy is with respect to the aspects of relationship with the other which feel or are soul-making. So it's very specific. We're talking about what's the relationship with not just the imaginal figure, but particularly those aspects of the image that feel or that are sensed as soul-making. And there's autonomy in relation to those. So we're not just swept up and kind of catapulted willy-nilly and beyond our will into some possession or imprisonment.

Sometimes in modern psychology or some spiritual circles, autonomy is used in a much more absolute and general way. So we're being quite specific here in what we mean by it.

But just to make a point about the way we can be influenced by—I touched on this the other day—the way we can be influenced by what are the current popular or dominant psychological paradigms. So when we think about what does it mean to have, in general, a sense of healthy autonomy of self, I wonder, or I want to point out again, that that sense or model of what is a healthy autonomy of self is culturally and historically contingent. It's an idea, in a sense, a model given to us by whatever culture or subcultures we move in.

And you only have to look back in history or look to other contemporary cultures or even subcultures to see that what perhaps you and I might share as a kind of almost automatic sense of what's involved in a healthy autonomy in our psychology is very contingent. The whole way we tend to feel ourselves or the way we kind of conceive of the self and feel it. And included in that is our sense of what it means to be a healthy self psychologically.

There's a case, and it has been made by others, there's a case that self—the way we feel and conceive it now, and the emphasis we give it, and the models we have of what a healthy one looks like—is actually a kind of secular, liberal, capitalist, Western, modern construction. What happens if we acknowledge that? Can we bring that acknowledgement into our understanding of soul-making dharma? So we're not assuming a kind of unquestionable truth about self in general.

As I said, just have to think back or do a little research into the self-concept or the idea of self in, say, medieval Europe before the Protestant Reformation, before the rise of capitalism and individualism and all that, or in aboriginal cultures, or Japan, even in the first half of the twentieth century. Very different, and with that a different idea about autonomy and psychological health and relational health. What is it to have my autonomy in this relationship? And some of that, we have to say, is culturally conditioned. Some of that cultural conditioning, of course, will creep into the soul-making dharma. Of course it will.

It's interesting to track Sartre's development of his thinking. In his late thought, he had this Marxist ideal of merging, the individual merging into and identifying with the group. So it was almost like losing one's autonomy. And that was his ideal there. So all these different ideals. And what is autonomy in a consumerist world of saturation with advertising? Am I really autonomous when I'm being fed all these messages that I can't help being influenced by?

So that's a little bit of an aside, but we're mostly wanting to talk about autonomy in a very specific way in regards to images and working with images and soul-making practice.

What does this mean, autonomy? We could almost say it overlaps with the element of twoness. But the word itself—autonomy—is from autonomos, two Greek words. So auto meaning self, and nomos meaning law. So it means self-governing and self-choosing. We retain this, or we develop this capacity if it needs developing, but actually we retain it—this autonomy, this capacity to choose what we do, when we do, how much we do.

in imaginal relationship.

So it's possible to exercise this capacity of our own, of the self's autonomy. And for some people, that's actually a really, really important stage. There might be all kinds of wonderful images flying around and visiting, all kinds of openings, and it's not to say one can't go with that and explore those, but again, it doesn't have to be linear. Somewhere along the line, for some people, there needs to be a kind of shoring up and reassuring oneself of the aspect of the self's autonomy.

So, for example, within an imaginal relationship, within an imaginal constellation, what do I go with? My sense of—I can—I need to have a sense that I can choose what aspect to go with, that I can say no, that I can slow the whole thing down and go at my pace or go faster or whatever, that I can pause the whole thing. And so actually practising that with an image—with some people I've worked with, it's helpful for them for me to kind of help them do that as we work with an image until they internalize it a bit more. In some instances, the image is actually helping them do that, interestingly, very beautifully.

That practice, of course, one can do in a retreat, in a soul-making retreat. And of course, going back, despite what I said about cultural conditioning, we could say, we could adopt the view—the popular view—that's actually part of healthy and fertile human relationships, to retain that capacity, to do all that in relationship, in the moment, or at least after a little bit, say, "Oh, hold on, I lost my autonomy there, or I wasn't in touch with what I wanted or what I needed," and to point that out, go back and redo something.

Sometimes it's a question of exercising it. I don't think I'll speak about it now, but maybe when, if I talk about dyads, I will say a little bit, I hope, about the actual practice of what we call tunas, or sometimes we call it balance of attention, because that's very connected with this, obviously. And there's some—it's a really helpful practice for many people, and quite, despite how simple it sounds, it's actually quite challenging. And there's some things that can help there. Really, really worth practicing with that, what we call tunas practice or balance of attention practice. We'll come back to that later.

But one can exercise in the ways that I just described. One can also just recognize that one's autonomy is still there. So even, as I said, when it seems like an image is very powerful or kind of exerts a kind of claim or gives us an honour or gives us a duty, we can actually, even within all that, at the same time, almost paradoxically perhaps—not quite a paradox, but—we can recognise that we still have autonomy.

So, for example, when I gave that example of the claim of the God of music that it had on me, the power that it had on my life. There's that vulnerability there. There's the recognition of that claim and the autonomy of the image and the power of the image in my life. But I still have autonomy. I can choose what to do with that claim and that pull. I can choose how to relate to it. I can choose how much to explore it and in what ways to explore it.

So sometimes we shore up and, as I said, reassure ourselves of our own autonomy, of ourselves' autonomy in relation to an image, just by recognising it. Again, there's so much about imaginal practice that's—it sometimes needs doing this, doing that, pulling this here, yanking that, make more of this, open that. And sometimes it's just a matter of recognizing something. And in recognizing, in noticing some aspect or some element, it amplifies it. And that's the case too with our own sense of our autonomy.

But this tunas, and also the double autonomy of both of self and other, this allows and opens the eros. As we said, eros and tunas, they're going to be connected and implicit in each other. And as we've said right from the beginning in all these soul-making teachings, the eros inseminates, it fertilizes the psyche, meaning the whole sense of the image, what we're sensing with soul, and also the logos, the ideation that we have, the concepts that we have. So the tunas is important to allow the kind of—I don't know if we've got the principal sort of driver or catalyst or spark or engine of the whole soul-making dynamic, the eros.

So let's say a little bit about that connection there.

Someone came in for an interview some time ago and reported an image of a big woman, a huge, large woman. I think she had lots of arms, I can't remember. Like Avalokiteshvara, like Kuan Yin, well, Avalokiteshvara. And the image was of this yogi sitting in this big woman's lap. And she asked herself, she was reporting on her practice, and she said, "What kind of—" so she was experimenting and exploring the elements, the nodes a little bit, and she said, "Well, what kind of love do I have for her? What kind of love do I have for this big woman who's holding me in her lap, I'm resting in her lap?"

And the answer came: lusty love. And so there was lust, in this case, the sexual eros there. Remember, eros doesn't necessarily need to be sexual. Our definition is broader than that, but it includes sexual eros. So in this case, lusty love. And the yogi went with that a little bit and started licking the goddess's belly, and then her breasts and sucking her breasts. And there was a lot of sexual energy that came with that.

At that point she got a little worried. There was considerable sexual energy present, and it concerned her somewhat. We're not accustomed to such experiences, certainly not within a meditative context where we're often taught that such energies represent defilement. We've explored these themes many times before.

So she became concerned and pulled back. Then, with wisdom and skillful practice—recognizing the concern, exercising the self's autonomy—she paused. She chose to return in her own time, but with a slightly different attitude, a different intention.

She returned to the goddess and sought out the divinity and duty present there. In other words, she focused on other nodes rather than becoming swept up in the growing sexual energy. This was a very skillful response and an exercise of her own autonomy.

In sensing the goddess and exploring the divinity and duty, she noticed that the goddess wants to and does nourish. That's what the goddess does—it's her fulfillment. This goddess exists for the sake of nourishing. So in a way, part of the duty becomes opening to that nourishment, opening to the suckling nourishment from the goddess.

I asked her in the interview if the goddess could be present now, and she could. Then I asked how her body feels, how the practitioner's body feels, and she said, "Very open in the chest." This was all quite clear—you could sense that openness.

Then I asked, "Can you experience the goddess's experience of her own body? Can you enter into, get a feel for the goddess's experience of her own body?" She could, and she felt the openness of that body that was open to give, to nourish—where the milk could flow, the nourishment, the elixir could flow, the giving could flow. The openness, the fearlessness that the goddess felt in herself, in her body, the joy, the abundance of her generous nourishing of others and of beings. The goddess was full of these qualities, and by entering into that experience, feeling into it, resonating with it, the practitioner got a direct taste of that.

I sensed with this yogi that those qualities—that openness, fearlessness, power and joy and generous, abundant nourishing of others—might be mirrors of this yogi's being that were perhaps only inchoately, only vaguely, only dimly sensed, or only in their initial seed phase. Part of the duty here for this yogi might be to mirror and echo that goddess in her life with all that abundance, power, joy, fearlessness, giving, nourishment, openness.

A kind of angel out ahead then, calling this practitioner to manifest something, calling them to echo the angel, calling them to that refraction in one's life and finding what that might mean—creating, discovering what that might mean.

So I lightly suggested something like that, but in different words. Sometimes you feel it's better for people to discover things themselves. Sometimes it's okay to point things out. Sometimes there's a middle way.

But again, we have the eros fertilizing this whole process. That means we have to tolerate eros and be okay with eros. In this case, tolerate and be okay with and respond wisely and creatively to sexual eros and sexual energy that was quite intense and full.

When we talk about the autonomy of the image—so there's the autonomy of the self, and there's the autonomy of the image, this double-aspected element—the autonomy of the image is not in contradiction to a sense of interconnectedness and even a knowing of oneness.

I have a friend who, for quite some years now, senses her ovaries with soul. There's a sensing with soul of her ovaries. They become alive, dimensional, with their own intelligence, with their own desire, with their own sensibility. They become autonomous. We've talked about this. She's reported it in different ways. I'm sure I've only heard a fraction of it.

She has a soul sense of her ovaries as deities. They have their own sense of things as autonomous entities—how do they experience things, what's their response to things, what's their sensibility. They know their own autonomy, and they know their own power. Power and autonomy are related, of course—we go back to the autonomous as self-governing.

But they know that, her sense was, they know that at the same time and naturally mixed with their knowing of their embeddedness.

So the autonomy is not, as I said, in contradiction to their knowing their embeddedness, their interconnectedness. When we were talking at that time, she was talking about their sense of the ovaries existing in a kind of ocean, an imaginal ocean. And so they had a sense of their own power, their own autonomy, but also their embeddedness and interconnectedness within that imaginal ocean. And also their interconnectedness with what they are in relationship with, whatever that is at the time, sensing this, sensing that. They are organs of perception, instruments of perception, soul instruments. And, for example, their dependence on sperm if there wants to be conception, etc. So autonomy of image is not in contradiction—it can include, just like self's autonomy can include a sense of knowing oneness at the same time. We don't lose that autonomy. Neither does the image.

One aspect of the autonomy of the image, if we're relating it to eros as well, is that there is this anteros—A-N-T-E-R-O-S. I think I mentioned it maybe in one talk; I can't remember when. In classical Greek mythology, anteros is one of the erotes, this gang of semi-divine beings. Eros is the principal one. Pothos we've talked about as part of our definition of eros. Himeros and anteros. Maybe some others, I can't remember. But anteros is the god of requited love. In other words, the returning of love. So, actually in our definition, he's the god of requited eros, the returning of eros.

So that's the point I want to make: that there's not just love and being loved; there's eros and being the object of eros. We have emphasized more in the teachings the eros from the self to the beloved other, to the imaginal object, to whatever we're sensing with soul. But again, as you get used to the imaginal terrain and the eyes, the sensibilities get enhanced to notice more there, one will begin to recognize: oh, not only does this imaginal other love me back in very particular ways that I may need to get used to or may not notice at first, it also has eros for me.

And that's eros, remember—so the love might be bigger than we usually think of love, but when we talk about eros, our definition, our conception of eros, it's more than being loved. It kind of may be implicit in it, the love, but it's more than that. So the eros flows both ways, and we can recognize ourselves as objects of eros, gazed at, related to with eros by the imaginal other, by whatever we're sensing with soul. And we can open to that. And what is it to feel oneself as beloved erotic other for this beloved erotic other?

So that eros is not necessarily sexual. It might be, but it might be just eros in a non-sexual sense. Either way, it's going to be healing. I think I mentioned this—I can't remember the context—on the last retreat, the roots into the ground of soul, to really know oneself as a beloved erotic, an object of beloved eros, does something to the being and to the soul sense and to the way we relate to ourselves. We can start relating to ourselves with eros. And that's more than love, which is more than metta. So all these are important: metta, love, and eros.

But one of the implicit dimensions of the autonomy of the image is the anteros, the fact that they can have their own eros for us. And in recognizing that, in tuning to it, in opening to it, in assenting to it over time, that's going to be healing the soul at all kinds of levels. Healing is not even the right word—opening the soul, opening the sense of self, opening the sense of existence at all kinds of levels. Maybe sexual, often not sexual; doesn't matter.

And if we come back to this relationship of eros and desire and autonomy, and we talk about the self's autonomy here—again, I really want to just keep mentioning this caveat about cultural views—but we would tend to think of an autonomous self, someone who has a sense of their own autonomy, as also included in that means a relationship with their own desire, so that they know themselves with respect to desire and their eros.

Now, old maxim from Athens or whatever, the ancient philosophers, maybe even before that: know thyself. Included in that must be the knowing of oneself in relationship to desire. So again, that's quite a popular cultural view nowadays that may not be shared by all cultures, but certainly for the soul-making dharma in the larger sense, it's important—this whole journey and exploration and opening to desire and beginning to understand it more, beginning to unpack some of the constrictions or shapes from other factors and relational factors over the years with it, beginning to unpack that and understand it and validate our desire and discern different kinds of desire and healthy desire.

And that's part of knowing oneself and the importance of that. So if I don't know what goes on for me in terms of regarding passion, desire, longing, goals, wishes, my relationship to them, my view of them, how or whether I can give myself to them fully, what is ego, what is deeper desire, then I don't really know myself. And my life—because I don't know well, I haven't opened out and explored and questioned those areas and those thrusts of my life, my heart's desire and all that's involved with that—I don't really know myself. And my life will be prevented from being as full as it can be.

Or the gifts that I potentially can put out into the world, bestow, offer to others through my being, through my actions, through my speech—they also won't be as fully able to be born into the world, to be given into the world. And what else are we here for? What else are we here for but that?

But this is hard, in the sense that some proportion of people, and even some proportion of people who are attracted to soul-making dharma, all that has gotten very jammed up or confused or limited or constricted or it's painful. And sometimes people have told me, "Whenever you ask, 'What do you want, what do you really want?' or that kind of question, it just freezes me, drives me crazy." As I said, there might be real cultural conditioning going on. Certain cultures, even contemporary cultures, don't put a lot of emphasis on individual desire, personal desire, knowing that, differentiating it, pursuing it.

Of course, that's changing with the sort of westernization of global culture. But still, that cultural conditioning operates for many people. And there's dharma conditioning as well, which we've talked about before—conditioning that tends to denigrate desire, or at least doesn't really explore its full range of colors in the psychology and in the being, and the ramifications of all that.

So yes, this work with desire is really important, and it's part of our autonomy as human beings. There are all kinds of cultural factors and individual factors and conditioning at play. When we explore this aspect—our relationship with desire, beginning to understand our desire—that whole realm is huge. We're really talking about a vast subject, one that forms a large strand, a weave of threads within the whole subject of our sense of our own autonomy.

There are certain things worth pointing out and exploring in this relationship with desire. When we talk about desire, it's always connected to other things. Obviously it's connected to an object, but it's always situated in a field of conditions that shape the whole field of that desire and our relationship with it, influencing what then ensues.

Let me mention four aspects. First, a desire is what we might call open-ended or not open-ended. "I want to eat dinner" or "I want to eat an apple" is not open-ended. If I can find an apple and dinner, I eat them and it's done. But when we've opened up the notion of the path and awakening in soul-making dharma as being open-ended, then the desire for soul-making can be open-ended. The desire for awakening becomes open-ended. It's not the case that I reach something and it's finished—it continues to unfold.

Whether a desire is open-ended or not makes a big difference to how we feel about it, how we relate to it, how we situate the self with it and view ourselves in relationship to the desire. It affects the whole energy we bring to it, the stamina, the pacing, all kinds of things. The whole way we see our life and our narrative. So it's quite an important distinction.

Second, a desire exists in a context or field of conditions, inner or outer, that make it feasible or not, likely or not, to achieve whatever that desired goal is, or to move toward that desire. What is it to have a desire that's actually achievable? What is it to have a desire that's not achievable? How do we relate to these two differently? What's wise there?

Third, a desire meets an internal pattern. This is complex and often tricky and often not fully conscious. For example: feeling lack or a habitual sense of lack, expecting disappointment, expecting to be frustrated in one's desires, quickly disallowing or not allowing desires, judging desires—or the opposites of all those patterns. These conditions around the desire have a huge effect on what unfolds.

If I have a desire and almost subconsciously I'm expecting disappointment, or I'm judging it, or I don't even allow it to become fully conscious and experience it, that shapes everything. It has a huge effect on what unfolds and whether the desire is felt or experienced as clarifying, empowering, healing, freeing. We touched on this when we talked about the opening to the current of desire practice—a lot hinges on the conception of the desire, and whether I can shift that conception if needed, out of perhaps my habitual way of viewing that desire as suspicious.

All these internal patterns are usually habitual and will influence greatly what unfolds around the desire, with the desire, from the desire, in relationship to desire—whether it all becomes dukkha in various ways. This is part of understanding ourselves: What's around the desire? What assumptions, conceptions, inclinations, inhibitions? Which of those are habitual patterns and which pertain just to this situation, this desire? It's all part of this journey of understanding, of knowing oneself in regard to our desire—if you like, healing our relationship with desire.

Fourth is whether a desire is authentic or not. Sometimes people say, "I want to practice emptiness, I need to practice emptiness." But actually, to realize emptiness is not really a soul desire for them. It's not really coming authentically from the depths of their soul, as a soul longing. Rather, either they've been indoctrinated that it's important, or the relationship with emptiness practice becomes just an attempt by the ego to measure up, to prove itself, to succeed, not to fail, to achieve this or that stage of practice. That's a very different thing than a soul desire—the ego's desperate, miserable attempt to measure up is very different from an actual soul desire.

So again, part of knowing ourselves, which is part of... knowing that, recognizing that, discerning that. It's really, really important.

But this journey with desire, this journey of healing our relationship with desire and eros, is fundamental to soul-making dharma. It's really important. And sometimes complex.

Sometimes people hear these teachings on eros, perhaps references to sexuality, and they hear just a fragment. They might approach me and say, "I want to heal my eros, I want to heal my sexuality. In recent years I've shut down my eros, my heart, my sexuality. I hear you speak about eros and sexuality in relation to imaginal practice. I want to use imaginal practice to reinvigorate and resurrect my sexuality."

But this approach can create too much pressure. What's often absent is the element of fullness of intention. They've heard talk about eros and sexuality, and that becomes their sole focus. They may even have preconceived ideas about what healed eros and sexuality would look like. But they're not approaching soul-making practice and imaginal practice with the primary, full intention of soul-making and everything that includes—which may include healing, and often does include healing in sexuality, but encompasses so much more.

When the intention shrinks to "I want to heal my sexuality," something goes awry. The person approaches imaginal practice with this narrow focus. An image arises, and they try to be sexual with it. But then something unexpected happens—again, this is part of the image's autonomy.

I'm trying to work with this single view, this single intention, not the fullness of intention, not the fullness of the scope of soul-making with all its range and depth and meaning. And the image simply won't cooperate. Perhaps the image pulls out a sword and plunges it into her heart, shocking the practitioner and throwing them completely off course.

Better, I think, to let the emotions of the dukkha—the feeling of being shut down, the worry that perhaps my eros is gone forever—be felt fully. That sense that something which used to be alive, which I used to enjoy, that sexuality and heart connection which once flowed like water into my life, lubricating and moistening my soul, may have disappeared forever. To feel that dukkha of dryness, of closure, that sense of concern.

Be with that. Be in the crucible with that suffering and let the image arise from there. The image that emerges may not be sexual at all, but it addresses the more pertinent issue. It might be sexual, but often it's not. It's arising from that sense of dryness. What image emerges from that dukkha when I can be with it in the right way?

Or if you choose to deliberately explore a sexual image, again, let the sense of soul-making lead you and respond to that. Stay and linger with what feels soul-making, not what the mind thinks needs to happen for healing. So much depends on not buying into what the mind habitually thinks and assumes, and instead trusting the soul read, the soul sense, the soul resonances in the energy body—those feelings of resonance and mirroring and echoing and beauty. Linger with that and resonate with that, rather than getting too narrow with healing intentions.

There can be such profound healing that emerges from soul-making practice and imaginal practice, but it needs to be approached in the right way. Then it's included as part of something much bigger—that fuller intention, that element of fullness of intention.

It's interesting—sometimes someone comes for an interview and they're very clear about their intention for healing their sexuality, perhaps because of abuse or trauma or various aspects of history. And sometimes that opens up beautifully and proves very healing through the imaginal. They come with clear intention for healing that aspect of their being, and it does work.

And in other instances it really doesn't work as I described just now. What's the difference between—why does one person, bearing that intention for healing her sexuality, why does the work with image that comes out of that become fruitful, both soulful and healing areas of her sexuality, and another person not?

I wonder about this, and I'm thinking of two specific examples. I won't go into the details, but with the example where it worked, I feel that in part it worked because her intention to heal her sexuality was really set in a much larger intention for soul-making, unlike the first person where it really didn't work—it just jammed up and weird stuff happened that threw her off. She didn't have much experience with soul-making. She just heard a little bit about it, thought, "Oh, this sounds kind of familiar. I recognize this." But she hadn't really taken on the whole—which I realize is an elaborate and complicated and very wordy set of teachings.

Whereas this second person actually had worked with image and sort of fallen in love with imaginal practice and soul-making dharma, and had so much richness there. She loved soul-making and was aware of that. So even when she came and said, "I'm bringing this thing about my sexuality and something needs healing there," explaining about past trauma, her intention to heal her sexuality was set in this much larger intention for soul-making that had become kind of implicit for her, or kind of normal for her over her years of practice with soul-making.

It was also the case with the second person where it did flower beautifully in both a healing sense and a soul-making sense, that she had already had access to a particular sexual image of a feminine being she gave a certain name to, and this image had visited her, and she had worked with her very beautifully over a couple of years, I think. So that image was easily accessible, and the elements were easily activated already there in relationship to that image, and that helped her meet the pain and the wounding around sexuality, whereas the first person I referred to actually had no such image or imaginal experience to call upon, nor really an understanding of or working familiarity with the whole imaginal paradigm.

But it's tricky, all this, because I certainly think—if I think about what's my intention when someone comes for an interview and there's some dukkha—and it's often the case that I have an intention for healing. So sometimes it seems that it works relatively well to seek out an image with the intention primarily of healing something. As I said, even when I'm working as a teacher in interviews, someone might come with something and we're working imaginally, but we're really addressing dukkha, and I can tell that my intention is to some large extent to heal whatever pain they're in or whatever pattern of contraction or confusion or whatever it is through the image.

So, helping facilitate or create a space where, for example, the self can become image, as we talked about, the self almost becoming other, and then in relation with her now—that self-image as other—then in relationship with the self, being slow and patient and carefully working on being seen by that image, not forcing to be other or different. The appreciation, the love from that image can also become eros, as we talked about, the eros from that image towards her, even towards her sense of contractedness, towards the contracted self, towards the frozen or jammed up self, towards the withdrawing self, the fearful self fearful of how things might—how she might sabotage, or this incapacity or confusion or contraction might sabotage a new relationship. And the image coming into relationship with that fear and that contraction and that self.

And so there's the imaginal work, but I can tell that in my mind, at least, a large portion of the intention in that moment is for healing and relief of dukkha. Healing, I would say, is a better word in this instance. But again, I wonder if it's okay and helpful only when there is already some degree of experience with imaginal images and a larger commitment to soul-making—that is, the fullness of intention—as a context in the one intending or leading the practice. In that case, me, if I'm guiding someone. Or the second person I referred to before in relation to her sexuality, in her kind of being with herself and leading her own practice.

But it might also be that, if we're talking about teaching now, it might also be that the one being led needs to have some love of soul-making, some experience with imaginal images and soul-making. But even that, I'm not sure. All kinds of things are possible. But as a general rule, I think healing goes better when there's the fullness of intention. It's more powerful, richer, more multi-dimensional.

So I guess we're on to that element of fullness of intention now. A really, really important element. Strictly speaking, I think when we say fullness of intention, it means the intention for soul-making is paramount. It's the most primary intention. But the phrase "fullness of intention" means it can include other intentions. So it can include, for example, the intention to heal this or that aspect of my being or history or whatever it is. But in a way, the intention for soul-making is in itself the largest intention.

Intention for soul-making. Because we've said that soul-making is in the service of expanding our senses of sacredness, a person might think, "Oh, an intention for sensing sacredness is actually the same as the intention for soul-making." It may or may not be. But it may be that an intention for more sense of sacredness may kind of unwittingly, subconsciously imply a kind of uniform and universal perception or sense of sacredness. Maybe a person doesn't even realize that. And that uniform and universal perception or sense of sacredness spreads to more and more things or activities. That's different than a potentially endlessly expanding range of kinds and flavors of sacredness.

Do you understand the difference? I might have a sense of, "I see everything as God," or "I see everything as holy awareness or cosmic love or whatever it is," and I want to see if I can kind of spread that over everything. But that's different than the range of kinds and flavors of sacredness endlessly expanding, endlessly proliferating, subdividing, complexifying, becoming, showing varied faces.

Sometimes when we have an intention to be mindful everywhere, for example, which is a great intention, and to be mindful everywhere and in all activities—so whether I'm going shopping, whether I'm shitting, whether I'm surfing the internet or whatever, can there be mindfulness there?—but the perceptions that that will allow, just being mindful in all those activities and kind of spreading the sense of mindfulness...

they will be conditioned to arise by that attitude of mindfulness, and they will be limited in terms of the range and diversity. So yes, you'll begin to see impermanence, you'll begin to see a certain level of not-self, you'll have the kind of perception of "this just as it is"—just this thing or that thing or that experience just as it is. You'll have the experience of sensations, the atomistic nature of things, and so forth. But the range of kinds of experience are limited. Certain experiences simply won't open up from there.

In a similar way, if I narrow down my idea of what sacredness is—often unconsciously limiting what kinds of sacredness are available to perception—and that becomes my intention for more sense of sacredness, then that's a smaller intention than the intention for soul-making. Soul-making, by virtue of the way the dynamic works, will constantly show us ever more kinds and flavors and faces of sacredness, rather than the same sacredness in more and more places.

So there's a kind of openness to surprise in a way—to new kinds of experiences—in the fullness of intention that goes with the ride of soul-making, that goes with the process, that goes with the assent to the soul-making dynamic.

Sometimes I've wondered whether this element of fullness of intention is actually quite rare. It seems to me quite a rare thing to come across in someone—not only as a way of conceiving and really feeling or intending the totality of one's path and practice, but also at any kind of juncture or moment or stretch of practice or path.

So often the wish is just to be rid of dukkha—very understandably, really understandably. So often this wish is given ascendancy, gains primacy in the face and the flow of life and relationships and friendships and work and our psychological patterns. And of course, sometimes there really is a lot of dukkha, and it's totally understandable. Sometimes that dukkha feels like it has a really long and seemingly intractable history, and it's difficult to bear.

But even when there's actually not that much great suffering, it still seems to be quite rare for this fullness of intention, rather than a kind of more narrow intention to be rid of dukkha. So I don't know if that's the case, but I sometimes wonder about it.

The good news, or a piece of good news, is that we can always—like the other elements—ignite this one, support its opening. We can just remind ourselves: can I open to a fuller intention, a wider intention, a more unfathomable intention? Because part of the surprise of the journey of soul-making is its unfathomability. I don't know where it ends. I can't even peer into its depths and its distant possibilities. I don't know what's going to open next.

But we can remind ourselves, we can support—as I said—support the ignition, the opening, the activation of that node. And that really makes a big difference. So it might be rare, but it's a very powerful thing when it comes online, this fullness of intention. It makes a big difference.

And as I said, it's labile—it's stuff that moves and that we can have a say in as part of our autonomy in deciding: can I support something different here? If the intention has—I recognize the intention has got locked or closed or narrowed or fixated—can I wield my skill and responsiveness and exercise my art in practice to actually allow a fuller intention? That's always possible because these things are malleable and labile.

It was a while ago I was working in an interview with someone—I can't remember if she realized it or if I gently pointed it out, but not important—but at some point she realized that she was intent on what she wanted from the image. That's why right at the beginning of teaching imaginal practice, I stress this thing: "What do you want from me?" Asking the image, what do you want from me?

So often in so many psychologies and even spiritualities that use imagination, there's a sense of "what can I get?" We do get lots from the image, but when we're talking about relationship with image, it's a very different relationship when we're not primarily relating to the image as "what can I get from it."

So she realized at some point that she was so intent on what she wanted from the image that she forgot to ask what the image wants. And in recognizing that, in realizing that, she actually felt some guilt—which is interesting. But luckily, there wasn't too much reified self around that guilt. Guilt can get very stuck and very jammed up, and it involves a quite solid, contracted, reified sense of self. It was more what I call remorse. There was a softness in it, and the self wasn't so reified.

But actually it was still important, I think—again, back to these issues of pacing, autonomy, and so forth. In this case, I was just encouraging her: "Okay, don't rush at that point. Don't rush. Can we linger and feel that remorse? It's not really guilt—it's remorse about being so intent on what I want that I forget to ask what the image wants, or find out what the image wants. Linger without rushing. Linger with that sense of remorse."

Feel it in the heart, feel it in the body—and she felt it behind her eyes, she said. And as she did that—so we're back again to the importance of the crucible, of being with the emotion, especially if there's a difficult emotion.

It needs addressing, it needs including, it needs working with, it needs a certain kind of relating to. And in so doing, everything softened. The energy body softened, but it softened everything in the imaginal relationship, including the perception of the image and the whole constellation.

When she was able to do that, then the self actually became an image, as we've talked about. Remember, self, other, and world all start to become involved in the imaginal constellations. We talked about that with the fountain image—the stone fountain, the stone basin. Instead of a real self in relationship, or a reified, contracted self in relationship with the imaginal other, the self became image as well. That's part of the softening, the liquefying of the whole process.

Then, interestingly, in relation to her eros and desire, the imaginal self's eros and desire was recognized as divine. As I mentioned, you don't have to rush this or make it happen or force it or push something onto the next stage, but this is exactly what I would expect. There's an inevitable, organic unfolding—in its own time, in its own pacing. Naturally, if we don't get in the way, there's a natural inclusion of the different elements of our being. They become imaginal. They gain dimension, they gain divinity.

So the imaginal self's eros and desire was then sensed as divine. And of course, the imaginal self is me and not me. The qualities and aspects of the imaginal self are me and not me. So it's not me, but it's also me. So it's my eros and desire that also begins to feel and be sensed as divine. She had a sense: "I am participating in divinity and in the divine eros."

With that, then, the craving that she felt before in relation to the image—which was also related to a craving in life—the craving subsided because the eros was allowed to flourish. In this case, the eros itself was allowed to become an erotic imaginal object, with the sense of divinity and the whole constellation feeling very soothing. So there's eros, but there's a different sense of the eros, a whole other dimension to the sense of the eros. We've touched on this before, and the importance of this. The agitation and contraction that she felt earlier was soothed.

So there's a kind of healing, if you like, in that moment in relation to what was going on. But more long-term—probably even more significant, definitely even more significant—is that we could say it is a part of insouling our eros and desire. The deepest healing is an insouling. Her sense then—it might have been the first time, or it might be the first time in a whole series of experiences—where she gets to taste the divinity, the dimensionality and divinity of her desire and her eros. Her desire and her eros become ensouled. That is a profound healing of one's relationship with one's eros and desire, and with oneself, with one's own mind and heart and soul.

So as I said at the beginning, you can get a sense from all this—and probably most of you at this point have your own practice—of just the gifts and the beauties and the surprises that open up when we take care of the relationship with images and with what we sense with soul. When we open up those possibilities, when we care for the relationship and we care for the elements and all that's involved—so much gift, so much blessing, so much that is wondrous.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 181

Logoi and Leanings

Rob Burbea · 1h45

> In this dharma talk, Rob Burbea offers guidance on navigating both within and between different practices in soul-making work. He explores the art of steering between imaginal practice, samādhi, mettā, and emptiness practices, using the metaphor of an eagle subtly adjusting its wings to glide on thermals. A key teaching addresses the common fork that arises in imaginal practice: when lovely feelings emerge, practitioners can either lean toward samādhi (enjoying and absorbing these qualities) or maintain focus on the soul-making aspects of the image itself. Burbea emphasizes that always choosing one direction limits the unfathomable treasures available through imaginal work.
> The talk extensively examines the indispensable role of concepts (logoi) and conceptual frameworks in soul-making practice. Without appropriate ideas supporting the work, experiences may feel therapeutic or interesting but won't fully realize their imaginal potential. Burbea discusses how limiting concepts—such as reducing an image to a single causal explanation—can block soul-making, while opening up conceptual ranges around causality (past, present, or teleological) can enliven perception. He shares personal examples of working with germinal ideas like "I am soul," showing how concepts can function as subtle seeds that contain powerful subtexts, orienting consciousness toward soulful perception without heavy intellectual processing.

This evening, I'd like to offer a few pointers, reflections, and things to consider regarding both navigation within imaginal practice or sensing the soul, and navigation between practices. So some thoughts about steering within practice, and secondly, some reflections on concepts and ideas and their place in practice and sensing the soul.

With regard to what we might call steering or navigating in practice—someone who's doing soul-making practice must understand that we're not just talking about imaginal practice or sensing the soul alone. Those practices, which are themselves very rich, are nestled within or part of a much larger practice framework of related practices. They need those other practices at times to support, nourish, consolidate, and balance what's going on in the imaginal practice—to give relief, take the pressure off.

As I've pointed out on retreats, it's probably not wise, probably not even possible, to try and do imaginal practice all day long. It needs the balance of samadhi, of emptiness, of metta, of emotional work, working with the energy body. A person engaged in soul-making dharma is actually moving between different practices at different times. And as always, there's an art to that, a playfulness, but also a kind of wise and attuned and sensitive responsiveness that's necessary.

Then there is, of course, the navigation and steering within practices. A lot of this steering or navigation—sometimes it's quite clunky, a move from one thing to another, but often it's much more subtle, the way we can shift between practices.

I've given the image many times of an eagle or a hawk soaring on the thermals, the warm air currents. If it wants to glide to the right, it's just a very subtle leaning, an inclination of the tilt of the wings—the left wing upwards, the right wing downwards, and vice versa. The art is in the subtlety, oftentimes. Or if you're riding a bike, sometimes the steering happens more by the leaning, or a motorbike or bicycle. If you've seen people sailing in relatively small boats, they lean over one side, pulling the sail.

Sometimes that's quite dramatic and vigorous, but a lot of this navigation is really quite subtle. As things develop, as our artfulness in practice develops, we can find that the whole movement between emphases, between directions in practice or between practices gets correspondingly subtle and more subtly attuned.

The general point, which really bears repeating: sometimes we wonder, when should I do this and when should I do that? When should I just be with an emotion and when should I try and drop it or see the emptiness of it? I don't think there's necessarily a mistake in each instance, or that one should fear making a mistake.

Let's say we're talking about emotions and something's coming up emotionally that's difficult, and one decides in that moment to steer away from it: "I'll just come back to the breath. I'll just regard it as a bit of papañca, or I'll just see the emptiness of it and let it go." Now, of course, that may not be the most helpful decision, either at the time or in the long run. But I don't have to fear so much about it. If that's the case, it will tend to come back and keep knocking at the door, or something will feel like it's dried up or not working. We'll get the cues and clues and indications in our practice and in our life that we need to go back to that and explore it.

Conversely, a person might decide to go with emotion and be with it and explore it. But after a while, again, the cues, the clues, the indications tell me, "Actually, I think I'm just creating a lot of mud here. There's nothing really deeply authentic or real in this particular emotion. It's just the mind spinning and making a mess," as it has that tendency and habit.

So in each instance, don't get paralyzed thinking, "Should I do this, should I do that? More samadhi, less samadhi. More imaginal practice, or should I do an emptiness practice?" We can go with something, but if we stay sensitive and receptive to the cues that we're getting back from our experience in relation to whatever choice of direction or leaning we've taken, then we can read that feedback and always change something.

I don't think fearing making mistakes in the moment is really justified or helpful. What may be a mistake—or what I sometimes tend to think is perhaps the only mistake in navigating between different practices—would be to always do the same thing. Only one thing, only one of two choices. So always be with an emotion, or always drop it and return to the breath. Either one of those "always" approaches is going to be problematic. I'm not going to learn nearly as much in terms of the total territory of what we can learn and discover and open up in practice if I just do one or the other.

Some practices, some traditions in Buddha-Dharma teach to always work with microscopic attention—always boring the attention into something, atomizing experience. In that system, this is held to be the way you're going to get insight. So the attention is always trying to work in this atomizing, microscopic way.

Other traditions, either within insight meditation or borrowing from Mahāmudrā, Dzogchen traditions, sometimes Advaita traditions, always work with a wide awareness. Again, one will almost certainly be missing quite a lot of insight by just doing one or just doing the other. All kinds of things won't become apparent, won't get absorbed.

We'll have partial insight. And there are also other reasons—energetic consequences from doing just one or the other in terms of how the mind feels, how the energy moves in the body, and so forth.

So sometimes I like to say to people: don't fear so much the mistakes in the moment. Look at this kind of overview of your practice, or look at it over time. If you're always just doing one thing—always just one kind of approach or one kind of response to some particular area of experience that comes up—that always doing one thing, I think, would be a mistake.

So less fear, more openness to the possibilities and the diversity and the range and the flexibility of approach, of direction, of way of looking, of practice. But that then invites the question of discernment, brings that question in, and so we have to address that.

One of the possibilities that can arise both in metta practice, in emptiness practices, and in imaginal practices is that in the opening that happens in any of those practices—in the letting go, in the beauty that we're touched with—it's possible that lovely feelings arise, lovely experiences in the energy body arise. And it's as if the path then forks, potentially it forks.

So one option is to lean into those lovely feelings and pay attention to them with the intention of enjoying them, of spreading them, of absorbing into them. And if we lean that way at any time, then we are moving down the samadhi route—the pervasion, the permeating of body and mind with whatever quality of well-being is present or has arisen as a result of our practice, or just spontaneously, or whatever.

When we're doing imaginal practice, that's a common occurrence. When we're doing emptiness practice, that would be a very regular occurrence. Or when we're doing metta practice... well, with each of those three practices—metta, emptiness, and imaginal—the instructions would be slightly different. I don't want to particularly go into those differentiations right now.

But the samadhi qualities, if you like, or ingredients that come from working with an image—an erotic imaginal image—will arise quite regularly. People have found this is related to the way the image opens up our energy body and aligns and harmonizes our energy body. Openness, alignment, harmonization of the energy body are all absolutely characteristic of certainly the first four jhanas, but in a way we could say of all jhanas and all samadhi. It's central to what I would take samadhi to mean.

So when we do that, or if we always do that—whenever the kind of loveliness in the energy body and the emotional qualities of joy and peace, ecstasy, rapture arise—if we always lean into them and go into samadhi, we'll, in a way, only gain a portion of the imaginal's immense treasures.

I'm saying this partly because someone was reporting this to me indirectly. She didn't kind of realize she was listening to talks on soul making and playing a little bit, and discovering that often these samadhi qualities came up and they were quite new for her. So she was leaning repeatedly into the samadhi, almost like using the imaginal to then get these lovely qualities in the energy body and the heart, and then kind of honing in on them, opening to them, absorbing them, leaning it towards the samadhi and towards jhana.

But if we always do that, as I said, you're going to miss a huge portion of the unfathomable and diverse treasures that are there in the imaginal. It would be a bit like someone making a profound and beautiful work of art—maybe it's made out of a precious substance, bronze or gold or whatever—and you melt it down and extract the bronze or gold because that's worth something, it's valuable. The work of art, though, will be worth more. If it's a great work of art, it's going to be worth more than just the value of the material it's made from.

So financially it's worth more, but existentially even more so. It will keep on giving if it's a profound work of art. It has that unfathomability, which profound works of art have—closely related, or if not the same thing, as imaginal images. They keep on going. They have that unfathomability, that inexhaustibility. They can touch your soul endlessly.

So to always go towards the samadhi, take the samadhi fork, is going to limit actually how much we open to recognize and receive the gifts—the diverse and profound gifts—of the imaginal.

But sometimes it's a really helpful thing to do. Here's this image, and there's loveliness coming up because of the eros or whatever, and the beauty there, and the opening in the energy body. To decide to let the image be secondary, and those lovely qualities in the energy body, in the mind and heart, be primary—joy, peace, whatever they are, ecstasy, rapture, even if that's quite mellow—to hone in on them, to open to them, to absorb into them, to really get intimate with them, developing the samadhi... that's really, really helpful.

As I said, partly as a balance to the imaginal practice, because it would be too intense and too probably unhelpfully entangling to do imaginal practice all day long. Partly because we rest well there, we get nourished and resourced, which influences our view on all kinds of things. There are all kinds of other things to learn in samadhi practice.

And part of the kind of—I almost want to say the witchcraft of samadhi practice, the wizardry of it—is we learn a lot there that bears fruit in all kinds of areas, including imaginal practice. So sometimes doing that is really valuable. Always doing it is we're really going to miss this treasure—just like if we melted down this amazing sculpture that was made from bronze or whatever, just because we want the bronze. We've missed the art. We've missed the profundity of the art that would feed our soul.

But this is one of the kind of common and classic possibilities of forks when we're doing imaginal practice—forks in the path where we can lean one way or another. And it will arise quite regularly, I think.

What makes the difference is... because sometimes what we get is the image is there and the lovely feeling is there.

And so I kind of have to decide where am I leaning exactly? Am I leaning primarily to the lovely feeling in the energy body and the mind and the heart? Then I'm going towards the samadhi. Am I leaning primarily towards the soul-making aspects of the image and resonating with them and opening with them and the eros and so forth? Then I'm doing imaginal practice—then the image is primary. Am I balancing the two?

You know, what's the relative degree of balance between these? So all this can be played with. And it could be that one lets the image completely fade, or it just goes to the background, while the samadhi qualities are most prominent, or vice versa. The samadhi qualities, I kind of let them really go to the background while the image comes forward, or I hold the two in relative balance. But I should be familiar with moving and working along that whole range again.

We're talking about ranges, flexibility, making sure that when we talk about these different ranges—as we did in that talk on the "Spreading of Five Wings"—that the whole range is available to us and we're not kind of always hanging out or preferencing one area of that range.

So in moving between samadhi and image, or actually in moving along the spectrum between pure samadhi and pure imaginal practice, the key factor is intention. For example, when I'm leaning in the samadhi direction, my intention at that moment is to support, to stabilize, and to enjoy the factors of samadhi—pīti, sukha, or whatever. That's my intention. It's the intention that makes the difference, because the intention directs and primes the attention. And when I'm trying to enjoy something, it shapes—it not just directs the attention, but it shapes it or flavors it or conditions it in a certain way.

An intention that's trying to enjoy has a certain kind of morphology to it in the sense that it's open, it's tasting, it's penetrating, it's relishing. All that is wrapped up in the attention, but it's driven by, it's programmed by the intention. This is what makes a difference.

When my primary intention is to go down the imaginal practice path, and I'm leaning that way, then my intention is for soul-making. That's why it's important. What nodes need lighting up? Where's the soul-making factor in all this complex image or imaginal constellation where the self and other and the world are involved? Where's the sense of soulfulness right now? Can I tune into that? So again, the intention is for soul-making and that directs and shapes, informs the attention.

So there might be working with an image and there are all kinds of lovely feelings going on. The body is in complete rapture and it's dissolved into whiteness, etc. But it still might be possible, despite the intensity of that lovely feeling—which could easily go into jhana—my intention at that moment may be towards soul-making. The image is still there. I'm aware of what's going on in the body and mind and the loveliness there. But my intention is towards the soul-making.

So the intention is the primary thing that kind of determines which of these forks we're going down at any time. And that's an important thing to bear in mind.

Again, I'm offering these as reflections, things for you to try out in practice and get a feel for them yourselves, make them personal. I know what that feels like, I see, I get the feel of that kind of leaning, of that kind of steering. I get the feel of how this or that emphasis or intention or whatever we're talking about makes a difference. So everything we're talking about is there to be incorporated, discovered in your own practice, or deliberately incorporated, tried out, experimented with until you get taste for it yourself and you make it your own. You understand it, you've absorbed it.

So there's this, as I said, this possibility of emphasis or leaning between imaginal soul-making emphasis, imaginal practice, and samadhi. And within imaginal practice, I've already made this point, but again, it's worth repeating: with the elements or the nodes, we must remember that there's not a kind of formula for the order in which they go. There's not a predictable unfolding. First this element lights up, first I do this and then that. It's not so linear like that.

Again, what that means for practice is it throws us back into a kind of openness of possibility. We don't exactly know what will light up first. It means my antennae have to be primed. I have to be receptive. I have to be delicate and sensitive in my attention so that I can notice: where is the soul-making? What's igniting right now?

What would be helpful? What's possible right now out of all the different elements that we can give attention to, begin to notice, or begin to deliberately ignite, tweak, play with?

As I've already mentioned, there are different starting points. I gave examples where sometimes the sense of being loved came first, then an emotion, then the imaginal sense of the trees. We often begin with instructions about the energy body, but it doesn't have to come first.

You will find—and I've pointed this out many times—that when an image is imaginable or potentially imaginable, has meaning for the soul, meaningfulness for the soul, is potentially soul-making, it opens up the energy body. It harmonizes it, aligns it. The other way around also works, and we've emphasized this many times. Sometimes you're working with something that's not really imaginal, there's not really the sense of sensing with soul there. Open up the energy body, inhabit the energy body, let the body lead. Bring that whole sensitivity of awareness to the entire space of the energy body, and that allows something to become more imaginal.

So the imaginal opens up the energy body. Opening up the energy body, inhabiting the energy body, can open up the imaginal. There's not necessarily a formulaic linear order.

Again, from some examples I've given in this series of talks, one might choose deliberately to focus on the sense of timelessness or eternality and gently open that out or shift it—perhaps in a more sudden quantum leap in different ways. In doing that, it allows one's self or some aspect of one's existence or what one is sensing right now, internally or externally, to be sensed with soul. It allows the whole thing to become more imaginal.

Correspondingly, of course, because timelessness and eternality are elements of the imaginal, when we are sensing with soul, when something does become more fully imaginal, we will notice—or at some point—the eternality element will switch on, will ignite.

Just remember this and what it means in terms of our poise, our stance, our openness, our need for sensitivity, receptivity, opportunism. This is very much part of navigating within imaginal practice.

When we talk about navigating or steering, we're also including this aspect of pacing, which I've touched on over recent years. But I want to say one more thing about it with regard to eros and the eros-psyche-logos dynamic.

When we defined eros, we included the pothos element in the definition. Eros wants more contact, more connection, more touching, more opening, more intimacy with its beloved erotic other. That "more" was a key aspect that drove the whole movement of eros and its stimulation of the soul-making dynamic.

But if you pay attention to your experience, you will notice that eros doesn't always want more right now in this moment. Often it does, and there's that sense of more pushing into creating, discovering more of the beloved other, the beloved imaginal object—creating more faces, more aspects, more dimensions, more images within the image.

But sometimes the "more" that eros wants may simply be to linger. Right now, with the loveliness and delight of whatever perception is there—the loveliness and delight that are part of the subjective experience of eros—rather than wanting to reach, penetrate into, open to beyond, wanting to see more, or wanting the image to complexify or to create and discover new faces, new aspects of the beloved. Sometimes eros wants to linger longer. The "more" is in the more time. It wants to linger for more time with the loveliness it has, with the delight it has, with the sense of the beloved that it already has right there.

Again, we have to be respectful, sensitive to and respectful of what does the eros want right now? What kind of more? Often it is that more that will naturally create and discover more faces, more dimensions, more beyonds, that wants to penetrate and open those beyonds and that unfathomability. But sometimes it's not. It pauses for a while and lingers.

This has to do with pacing—the pacing of the whole movement of the soul-making dynamic, the whole movement of what's happening, what's opening, what's moving, and how and when and in what kind of rhythms it moves when we're working with an image, with sensing with soul.

Eros and the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, the soul-making dynamic, have rhythms. They're not necessarily gradual or smooth. If you perhaps got that impression from descriptions we've given in the past of the way eros works and the way the soul-making dynamic works, just bear in mind that the rhythms there may not be gradual or smooth. They may be more step-like rather than a smoothly linear graph.

That step-like rhythm might be more obvious with the logos in general, which tends to move the ideas of things, selves, objects, world, reality. Logos—our ideation, our concepts and conceptual frameworks—tend to move and open at a slower pace than eros or psyche or image.

I'm saying this partly because I don't think I've spelled that out clearly in talks before, and perhaps I've given the impression that it's always in motion with the soul-making dynamic, that eros is always wanting that kind of more. It does generally, and for the most part, but as I said, there may be rhythms. The river is flowing, and then it comes to a place where it's relatively still and pools for a while, enjoying that stillness and pooling, and then it moves on.

Again, the need for withholding a kind of imposing of formulae, the need to listen, to be sensitive, to be open and receptive to what's happening and to respect that—or at least be open to respecting it. Because sometimes we need to respond to what's happening and make it different.

Help it to become something else.

And sometimes we need to kind of impose a sort of slowing down or a kind of stasis in what's happening, in what's unfolding. Sometimes this is for the sake of stability and equanimity in the being.

It can happen—I'm not sure how common it is, but some people might be, for different reasons, more predisposed to it than others—that something opens up in the sensing with soul. And there's a lot of excitement. And that excitement is, of course, part of the eros. But sometimes the excitement can fizz in the being, in the energy, and in the mind, and in the heart in certain ways that just actually mean that what could be absorbed and learned and opened to is not so well absorbed, learned, and opened to. Maybe the being just gets agitated in a way that's not that helpful. Maybe something in the whole stance and structure of the being gets thrown off balance in a way, again, that's not that helpful.

Of course, at times, being thrown off balance is extremely helpful, despite the fact that it might feel difficult. We've talked about that—the stretching, the breaking of the vessels. But sometimes it can be wise to introduce something or lean in a certain way or navigate within the imaginal constellation that's happening, within the sensing with soul that's happening, so that we kind of balance things out, balance the being out, which allows more absorption of the illumination of whatever we're sensing with soul and allows more illumination of the soul and more digestion for the soul of that illumination over time.

So going back to this teaching about the fountain and the basin of the fountain and that needing—the waters of soul needing to kind of balance out, the waters of what becomes imaginal needing to balance out and at least include self and world. Not with every image, of course not, but again over time.

And sometimes within one image, again, we might find something's out of balance here, something doesn't feel quite right, or I can't quite tolerate this. For instance, the eros is so much leaning towards the other in its gaze, in its belovedness, in its erotic charge and directionality. And that's tipping the being over in some ways. So we can counterbalance that—not diminish the eros, but actually in a way add to it by allowing ourselves or helping ourselves to become an erotic object for ourselves. The self becomes imaginal. So that the eros can flow both ways. There can actually be more eros, but it's balanced. The eros flowing towards the self balances the eros towards the other, and the world.

Included in the world also, we might say, what's the sense of the world right now? What kind of world? What kind of cosmos? What's the cosmopoiesis here? What's the perception of things? And included in that is the perception of time. So again, one might balance things out by just paying attention to what kind of perception of time is happening right now. Maybe the perception of time—time begins to get sensed with soul. And again, there's all kinds of possibilities there in timelessness or the kinds of perception with time. And that allows the eros and the soul-making to flow in that direction, fill out in time. And that also balances out the flows of water here so that there can be enough equanimity, enough stability in the moment and over time in practice that things are digested, absorbed. They don't just get bowled over by some amazing experience that was—I can't decide whether it was more amazing or just more agitating.

Sometimes what happens for some people is that the whole sensing with soul brings one into sensing something in nature or some kind of universal process—the arising of appearances or something about the cosmos, something about consciousness. And the whole sensing with soul, it's hard to say what's sensing with soul and what's insight. Maybe there isn't a boundary there. And again, with the insight, there can be a lot of excitement and a lot of turbulence sometimes.

So going back to different teachings we've given, perhaps there might be certain of the elements at that point. If that's what's happening, I don't want to throw the whole experience out. There's a lot of insight here. There's a lot of opening. There's a lot of beauty and amazement in this sensing with soul. But perhaps if I just noticed, for instance, the sense of grace, and I give that a little bit more attention, or the sense of being loved—there can be soothingness in both those qualities. We're pervaded by this grace, we're held by it, we're given something. Or being loved—usually there's something soothing about being pervaded by that sense of being loved.

So just some attention—doesn't have to be all the attention, but some attention to those kind of qualities, or as I said, maybe that eternality can kind of soothe things and allow things to be more stable, more sustaining, more digestible, and in that way, more fruitful, more soulful, more fruitful for the soul.

And also the balance of attention, as we said, with self, other, world—where can I play with this balance of attention and actually feel more the sustainability and stability come into the experience right now?

Of course, one has to remember sometimes—I don't know how common this is, but sometimes if there's really a lot of excitement that's happening with a certain experience, the excitement means we can't remember so well. But I do think this kind of thing is very possible.

I've seen it to be so, and in interviews, just guiding people gently, it's very possible. It's part of the art of steering.

When we're still talking about steering now, and steering for the sake of soul-making, of course, or if I'm steering in emptiness practice, it's steering for the sake of those insights making a difference. So something to bear in mind is these two factors of energy body and also ideas or conceptual frameworks and how significant they are.

They're the primary factors that allow soul-making practice and also we could say emptiness practice as well, to realize their full potential.

Energy body, we've talked about—it's involved in the steering. It tells me when something is potentially soul-making, even if my mind is objecting or horrified by something or thinking, "Oh, this is not very interesting or boring or it's probably rubbish, it's probably irrelevant." The energy body can tell me. I can read the energy body and with this harmonization, alignment, opening, it's telling me I'm on the right track here, no matter what my mind is saying. And I can go with it and trust it.

So it's part of the steering. But it's also part of what allows the digestion, the chewing, the absorption of the soul-making experience. It allows us to open to it more. It allows the sensing the soul, whatever we're sensing, the imaginal object of the eros, to penetrate the being, to touch the being. It's working, it's kneading the dough of our body and our being, and not just our body, but through our body, our consciousness and our soul.

That's part of, as I said, also with emptiness practices, because we feel in the body the release that a certain emptiness way of looking or insight way of looking brings. And that allows us to really absorb that insight and to feel the freedom of it and to feel the liberation of it right then and to absorb it more long-term.

So energy body is involved both in steering and supporting the soul-making and emptiness practices to realize their full potential.

But also the ideation—the conceptual framework or the ideas supporting soul-making and imaginal practice, or if we're talking about emptiness practices, the ideas that are underpinning them, supporting them, those are absolutely key.

We can have an experience in either one of those practices, either imaginal practice or emptiness practice, and the experience itself, if we can even talk about an experience itself as if it's separable from other conditions and the surrounding factors. But we might have some experience, and that experience itself may be therapeutic to a certain extent. It may feel therapeutic. It may feel healing. It may be interesting. It may be amazing in either of those two practices, soul-making or emptiness.

But it might not be either fully imaginal or soul-making or delivering of liberating insight into emptiness. Because the ideas that are supporting it are not—ideas are excluded, or they're narrowed down, or they're not conscious enough.

As you can tell over the years in the talks, there's a lot of ideas that support the whole soul-making logos. And if they're not operating in a way that—in the time of practice, it doesn't necessarily mean they're at the forefront of my mind, but if they're not operating in ways that support the practice, then yes, I might have something that feels, to a certain extent, healing. I might have something that's, wow, if I tell my friends about it, it might be something that's really interesting. But there won't be the fully imaginal, fully soul-making potential there. I won't receive that.

And similarly with the emptiness. Something might fade through some practice, but if I haven't got some portion of my mind understanding the idea of why that fading is significant—it fades when I do this, or when I drop that, or when I don't do this, and that's teaching me about dependent arising. So yeah, sure, if there's some painful papañca, painful story, painful history, body pain, and it fades, we feel great, that was really helpful, amazing that it faded. But if I'm not linking it up, if it's not undergirded by certain, again, lightly held concepts and ideas that are appropriate, that are the ones that are helpful, well, it won't be helpful, that experience. Or rather, the help of it will be limited. And I doubt I will have any kind of long-term benefit from it.

So, energy body, but also very much ideas, concepts, logoi, conceptual frameworks—that I want to go into, offer a few things, reflections and considerations about tonight.

The importance, certainly, of conceptual frameworks, but also of individual concepts. We use this word logos for either one concept or one idea or a much larger frame of ideas, framework of ideas. Like, for example, the Soul-making Dharma is a whole conceptual framework, or the way a certain tradition practices Theravādan insight meditation is also a whole conceptual framework—a whole network of related ideas that together form a kind of hopefully coherent framework and helpful framework.

So by logos, I can mean either of those, either one idea or a whole framework. We've stressed the importance of this and how a kind of limited logos or inappropriate logoi, or narrowing down or rigidification or holding on to some logoi can block and inhibit the whole soul-making process.

But let's consider the possibility of even more flexibility around causality. What if we could hold, at times, multiple perspectives simultaneously? What if this dukkha arises from the past AND is conditioned by my present way of looking AND is pulled into being by some future angel, some calling from ahead?

This multiplicity of causal understanding - rather than limiting us to just one explanation - actually opens up the dimensionality that allows for sensing the soul. When we can hold these different causal frameworks lightly, when we don't rigidify around any single explanation, then something much more alive becomes possible.

The image can breathe. The dukkha can reveal its deeper nature. Instead of being flattened into one causal story, it becomes multidimensional, richly textured, imaginal.

So we might say that a skillful relationship with causality involves this kind of conceptual flexibility - not abandoning the notion of cause and effect, but expanding our repertoire of how we understand it. Sometimes the most healing perspective might be historical. Sometimes the most insightful approach is to see the dependent arising in the present moment. Sometimes what's needed is to sense the teleological pull, the way this experience is actually serving something larger, something that wants to emerge.

Each of these causal frameworks can be valid and useful. Each can serve the soul-making process in different ways. But when we get stuck in only one, when we insist that this is THE way to understand what's happening, then we've moved into the kind of conceptual rigidity that blocks the very aliveness we're trying to cultivate.

This flexibility around causality is just one example of what I mean by logos serving soul-making rather than inhibiting it. The concepts become tools in service of opening rather than closing, of dimensionalizing rather than flattening. They help create the conditions where images can emerge, where soul can be sensed, where the whole dynamic can unfold more freely.

Or this angel is grieving the plight of the earth, and the grief feels so deep, whatever it is.

So this third possibility, teleological causation, there's a telos there—something, a goal, something, an end, the angel out ahead, something we're being propelled or pulled towards.

Again, is it possible to open up that range, that range of possibility, and to exercise some flexibility in picking up and putting down, including focusing on these different causal explanations and trying them out? And they will make a difference. They will make a huge difference to how something is sensed, what the experience actually is that unfolds.

So again, we could add that to our list in the spreading of five wings. I can't remember if that one was already in there, or we can certainly add it. So just like the range of perceived density or substantiality, or insubstantiality of the energy body as a range, or the pathologizing or non-pathologizing images, there's this openness to the range of causal explanations right now. And sometimes these are just unconscious, so you can actually make them more conscious and deliberately play with them.

But there is that possibility—opening up the logos away from the typically narrowed, constricted range of causal explanation that goes with our contemporary culture, or the dominant culture at least. There's the possibility of that flexibility, that openness, that playing, that investigation. Really important.

In a way, the causal explanations also have to do with the nature of time. How can you have a cause in the future? That doesn't work, we would tend to think. But there's something here to open up.

There's a lovely passage regarding the conceptions of time from—well, Henry Corbin is reporting it. I can't quite remember where he's reporting it from, so forgive me for that. But he talks about it in his book Temple and Contemplation.

Some of you will know the story from the Old Testament of Moses as a baby. The pharaoh of Egypt had a premonition or an intuition or a rumor that a son would be born to the Jewish people and would be destructive for the Egyptian people—something like that, I can't remember exactly. It would be a threat or would liberate the Jewish people from their enslavement and their utility as a workforce for the Egyptians, for the Pharaoh. And so he received this warning somehow, and he tried to kill all the male infants to prevent this prophecy or whatever it was from unfolding in those ways—retaining his free workforce, essentially, and his power.

What happens is Moses' mother and his sister hide Moses in a little kind of wicker or woven willow cradle or crib or basket, a little ark that floated, and hid him in the bulrushes on the Nile, on the river Nile. So this little cradle was floating there on the bulrushes out of sight. The story goes that his sister Miriam was working as a servant, I think, for the Pharaoh and found the cradle, and they adopted Moses for Pharaoh.

But of course, if Moses had stayed there in the water, then he would have eventually sunk and he would have drowned. What Corbin reports here—and I'm not sure where it comes from—is that one of the symbolic properties of water is to typify the sense of time and of engulfment in time, according to some kind of system of symbology. That means engulfment in the inexorable movement of past, present, future—the usual linear sense and interpretation of time, the usual interpretation and reading of history, of past, and of events in time.

"Pharaoh's aim," he continues, "is to make all male children sink into time, sink into water, succumb to the indifferent uniformity of all that is encased in time." So this indifferent uniformity of all that is encased in time is just to sink in flatland, basically—to be engulfed by a flat perspective on everything. Time is just what it seems to be to the flat view.

And Pharaoh's aim is to prevent them from rising to the height of the worlds, of other worlds that can be revealed. In other words, the worlds of the angels, of the demons, the worlds of the archetypes and the myths, the worlds of the angel out ahead, the world where everything is, this is always already happening. The worlds of eternal time, hierophantic times. Pharaoh's aim is that they are to drown in the waters of secular one-dimensional history—one way of reading events.

It's also what Corbin's main point here is about—one way of reading the Bible or sacred literature as just a historic document, a collection of stories, some of which may be true, some of which may bear some relevance to so-called fact, some which may be made up, but they're all taken as literal rather than as symbolic and multidimensional and endlessly open to interpretation, to infinitely fertile hermeneutics.

They are to drown in the waters of secular one-dimensional history. And so in this little ark, this little ark preserved Moses from the flux of historical time—we should say from the perspective of that usual flux of historical time. What Pharaoh wanted was that only normal man should survive. So he was afraid, according to this interpreter, he was afraid of someone who could see more than just the linear, flat view and interpretation and sense of time. What Pharaoh wanted on the other hand was that only normal man should survive.

The man who conforms absolutely to the norm of a world which, he says, does not wish to know that it is in exile, but also does not wish to know that there are—what he really means is that there are other dimensions. That there is hierophantic time. There is the sense of the eternal and a whole perspective that, instead of regarding the eternal as just unreal imagination, recognizes that what is eternal, what is timeless, actually emanates or projects this world.

The events of this world, the events recorded in time, stories of scripture or whatever, are potential symbols opening up this other world, and the power of that, and the beauty of that, and as I said, the anchoring of that, the rooting of that.

So again, there's this causality which is obviously tied into our notions, our views of time, and the possibility of opening that up, shifting it, not dogmatically replacing one with the other as if there is no causality from the past. Of course there is. As if events don't happen in linear time or can be sensed that way and it makes sense to understand them that way. But that's not the only way we can sense things. And if it is the only way, then we're impoverished by that. We are limited by that. Our soul and our soul-making is grossly limited by that.

But more widely, we can again stress the real indispensability of concepts and conceptual frameworks for soul-making. You know, an imaginative experience is not a non-conceptual experience. There are concepts operating there. They may be subtly in the background. They may be at the foreground. They may have initiated the whole process. They may result from the process. They may be just woven in with the whole thing. The concepts are operating.

And more widely, as I said earlier today, the whole conceptual framework is necessary for a certain kind of fertility of imaginal practice. It won't really be that soul-making without a conceptual framework that supports it.

I remember talking with someone who reported in an interview that she'd been practicing with the imagination and being with images for years, but it all kept kind of collapsing into a kind of unfertile soup. She would be drawn to it and then the whole thing would seem ridiculous to her, or she would just get very confused, or it would all really stagnate. Nothing really blossomed much at all despite years of good intention and practice and curiosity.

As we were talking, it became clear to me that there was no conceptual framework supporting the imaginal or supporting a really fecund and rich working with image and sensing with soul. Rather, she had been a long time in the Dharma, in a certain tradition, and so the conceptual framework that she was bringing to meet the experiences of images was actually a much more typical Dharma conceptual framework. For example, everything's impermanent, as well as typical modernist views about reality, what's real and what isn't.

And there was also mixed with that a certain "loyalty"—I'll put it in inverted commas—loyalty to Buddhadharma, loyalty to being a Buddhist or identifying with being a Buddhist. The absence of a really coherent and supportive conceptual structure for the imaginal and to open up the imaginal and the sensing with soul, together with this kind of infection or infiltration with just typical Dharma conceptual frameworks about whatever it was—impermanence and death and the meaningless of the existential fact of impermanence and the pathos of that, that kind of secular existentialist dharma, together with modernist views about what was real and not—all that led to this stagnation and kind of circling in doubt for years.

So it's so crucial, and I know that some people struggle with the conceptual piece or it seems a bit heady or whatever, but again, see for yourself. Without it, the sensing with soul, the imaginal practice will either lack a lot of dimensionality and power, a lot of range, a lot of depth, and possibility of what can open up. Or it will kind of veer into a path that looks ostensibly similar at one level—some kind of shamanism or energy healing or whatever it is. All of which is fine if people have their choices of what they do, but if we actually want to really support what we're talking about by sensing with soul and the imaginal and those words, then the conceptual framework is crucial.

Same with emptiness practice or whatever. The conceptual framework makes a huge difference. People can have all kinds of experience. As I said, I mentioned someone could have an experience of the Unfabricated. Everything fades completely. There's a complete disappearance. And I've met several yogis who've reported to me in interviews something like that, but they don't seem to have got any liberating insight from it because they haven't tied it to a conceptual framework that understands emptiness and dependent arising.

Sometimes fortuitously they do. There's the opening of a mystical experience and it does something to their sense of this world and this self. Other times it doesn't. It's not helpfully underpinned by a conceptual framework that allows this opening and absorbing of things, their place and their power. So this is really worth bearing in mind.

And some of you may have had this experience. You can see just how important conceptual frameworks are. Sometimes when you're working in a dyad and doing soul-making practice, for instance, sharing an image or working with an image together, you can notice, or you will notice, how a limiting conceptual framework, even if it's held unconsciously by only one of the people in the dyad, by only one of the pair, is amazing. Two people are working. One person's conceptual framework is more full and more supportive of the whole sensing with soul paradigm, and the other's is not. There's some limits to it, or it's very partial, or it's not really there at all, but they like images and they like hanging out and they like the sense of intimacy or whatever it is.

Something in the magic of dyad practice and the mysterious nature of connection reveals just how powerful our conceptions and conceptual frameworks truly are. When only one person holds an unconsciously limiting view—perhaps not even realizing they're constraining a particular logos—it limits what can arise as image and energy for both partners, even though this view hasn't been spoken aloud and may not even be consciously held.

This suggests it may not be wise to engage in soul-making dyad practice with someone who doesn't share or understand the conceptual framework. While you can certainly practice many forms of dyad work together—balance of attention, sharing feelings, insight dialogue—attempting soul-making dyads without shared conceptual grounding will likely fall flat, feel limited, and prove frustrating or even painful for one or both partners.

I'm not suggesting this because soul-making is some kind of religion requiring adherence to a particular credo. Rather, I'm pointing to something fascinating: the profound power of concepts and conceptual frameworks to either limit or open, inhibit or support and deepen soul-making perceptions. This is crucial to understand for one's own practice, and dyad work provides additional compelling evidence of these dynamics.

So here's some practical advice worth considering: it may prove unsatisfying and unfruitful to attempt soul-making dyad practices with someone who doesn't share or know the conceptual framework. I understand the impulse—when this material feels exciting and transformative, you naturally want to share it with friends who are good practitioners or skilled at intimacy. But it may not work without a genuinely shared and supportive logos.

This consideration touches on questions of temenos, caring for your soul, caring for soul in general, caring for practice, and caring for your relationship with that person. If you feel frustrated and unfulfilled, they may sense this and feel rejected or somehow inadequate, which serves no one.

The importance and centrality of logos—concepts, ideas, and conceptual frameworks—cannot be overstated. They are indispensably crucial to soul-making practice.

Now, let me say something about how this can actually work. When I've explained the Eros-Psyche-Logos dynamic—and Catherine has offered some lovely explanations as well—we've often presented it as if eros comes first, inseminating and fertilizing psyche or image. As psyche and image expand, open up, and diversify, our sense of things in the world or aspects of ourselves opens through the experience of image. Over time, logos expands too. We begin questioning our views of reality, considering that maybe things could be seen differently, that there are other ways of understanding.

So the sequence appears to flow from the initial impulse of eros, through the expansion of psyche, to the expansion of logos. But it doesn't have to work in this order.

There may be eros for logos itself. Perhaps after years of resistance or wanting to push away conceptualization and intellectualization for various reasons, a person begins to fall in love with logos—with the whole realm of concepts, potent ideas, poetic ideas, and their transformative power in the soul. This might manifest as love for one particular idea, for the entire conceptual framework of soul-making, or for logos in general.

When there's eros for logos, the logos itself becomes ignited. Instead of eros inseminating psyche, the logos becomes image—an erotic, imaginal, beloved other. Logos is ignited through eros's passion for it, engendering more creation and discovery of other concepts and conceptual frameworks. Rather than logos always trailing in third place, expanding last as a result of eros and psyche, eros can directly impregnate logos with passionate engagement, igniting logos and giving birth to more creation and conceptual discovery.

The entire soul-making dynamic—the whole Eros-Psyche-Logos interplay—might be stimulated into expansion when logos itself is directly impacted, stretched, shattered, or ignited. You might read something, hear an idea in a talk, encounter a concept someone shares, or have a thought arise spontaneously. The mind of the soul becomes impacted by this idea, something breaks open in the entire realm of ideation, logos expands, and from there eros and image can emerge.

So there are all kinds of possibilities in this dynamic interplay.

And I gave some examples in this series already. So if we go back to that example of me reading about these ten sefirot—the teachings from the Kabbalistic tradition about, well, some would say the inner nature of the Godhead. Some would say the teachings are actually about the emanation of God or the energy of God, the manifestations of God, either way.

And the possibility of regarding them too, because, to quote the passage from the beginning of Genesis, humankind made in the image and likeness of God, that our human psychology, our soul, also has refractions, mirrors that structure of the ten sefirot that the Buddha nature has, that the divinity has. So that there's a kind of parallel process or even a connected process there.

Well, all that's an idea. It's quite an elaborate idea. And one can take that idea and begin with that in practice. One is actually deliberately taking an idea that's attractive to one and putting it in the gun chamber, so to speak, and seeing what comes out of that, what shoots out of that in the looking.

So that's an example of quite an elaborate idea. It might be a much less elaborate idea. There's all kinds of possibilities. And I'm sure over the years I've given many, but that's one from so far in these talks.

Or I also shared another one where I said I was talking with Catherine and we were talking about, or she was sharing with me this idea of "I am soul." And she was sharing what that meant to her and how that stimulated a certain direction of exploration in her practice. And I was listening to that, but I was left with this phrase, "I am soul." And I worked with it myself, but it took me in a different direction than what she was talking about.

So there's this kind of germinal idea, this seed of an idea: "I am soul." And I think I was even interpreting it—even though what those three words mean—it was taken up in my soul, in my mind, in my being and practice, with a different interpretation than Catherine had elucidated to me and explained to me about her practice.

So there's this—like seeds in nature, they float from one flower or plant or tree to another resting place and they give birth there. And the form that they give birth to might be slightly different. Just so we share ideas and we inseminate each other and we are inseminated by the ideas of others. But what arises from those sort of little germs or seeds might be quite different than what had transpired or arisen in the source of those ideas, where we heard them from, where we read them from.

So I'd shared this "I am soul," this idea, this phrase really that I got from Catherine, and how I'd shared it only partially about that, so I want to say a little bit more about it. In a way, there were a few ideas wrapped up in it, and that's partly what I want to emphasize.

So the "I am soul"—as I think I already explained when I mentioned it first—it kind of relativized the relationship with and the view of the ontological status of body and matter. So "I am soul" made the principle, the sort of weight of the principle identification—if you say that, I was playing with a different identification, "I am soul." And soul as this, as I said, loose definition, this organ of perceiving in soulful ways. This instrument that wants to perceive and does perceive in ways that are soul-making.

But that kind of then relative diminishing of the ontological status or the primary reality sense or degree of reality of, say, body and matter, did something to perception which became less substantial. In other words, it was fabricated less. It was fading to a slight degree. It loosened and liquefied the whole of perception. And then with that other elements came in like the fullness of intention, et cetera. And so there was a real malleability with regard to perception.

So that was one—one in these three words, "I am soul"—an idea that Catherine was communicating to me, it was picked up differently, and it also kind of became a constellation of ideas, a constellation of logos. It's not quite a framework, but it was more like a few ideas were sort of coalescing together, stitched loosely together in a way that was very fertile.

Because the second one—I can't remember if I shared this the first time round, but was that "I am soul," and what is the nature of soul? It's that there is an open two-way participation between God or Buddha nature and my soul. That God, Buddha nature participates in my soul, participates in that sensing the soul, in that organ of soulful perception, that instrument of soulful perception. And two-way, my soul participates in God, in the Buddha nature.

So that was a second idea or a kind of double idea, the double participation that wove its way into this and mixed with this other idea that kind of relativized the ontological status of soul and body and matter. So they became mixed together.

But then actually a third idea was woven in with this idea that I, and all that is happening—meaning my narrative, and I think at the time I was doing this was particularly prominent, was the sense of my illness and dying, et cetera—so I, and all that is happening, my narrative and all that, and all I perceive, including others that I was looking at and the surroundings, all of that is soul. I could say my soul, I could say the soul.

So you get the sense how there's all these kind of sub-ideas that are wrapped up in a kind of loose and light ideational structure. There wasn't a great deal of intellectual grinding and pondering and heavy, "Okay, let me really focus on that idea." It was all very light, very delicate. They're like little drops of tincture in the waters of soul, and they—things and alchemical reactions start happening from dropping this tincture in or dropping a seed into the water or whatever. Things start flowering.

But actually it's a kind of mix, a loose mix of strands of ideas. In that last sub-idea, the perception of sensing the soul there is kind of similar to emptiness practice perception of self and other not being separate. Some of you who have done some emptiness practice know that as a kind of staging post or important perception or way of looking at certain levels of self and other subject and object not separate. So it's akin to that. It has some similarities.

But here, the difference is, in that sub-idea, the difference from the emptiness idea is, it's not universal. Again, the particulars are retained and important. And even more than that, they're necessary to soul. The particulars, my particulars, my narrative. It's not just that things get equalized and kind of universalized and a little bit faded in the non-separateness of subject and object, of self. Rather, all these particulars are retained and sensed as necessary to soul, necessary to Buddha nature, necessary to God.

Necessary to God, this dukkha, this narrative, maybe even this tragedy if one looks at it a certain way. Retained and necessary, but somehow beautiful, precious, ensouled, divine, and lighter for that view. There is a relief of suffering with it.

So again, there's even another aspect to the idea. As I said, all these kind of seeds begin to coalesce a little bit loosely and give rise to the perception, the sensing of soul.

So you can, if you go back to the original, I am soul. So I wasn't so much thinking all this in some kind of mental verbal process. It was just, I was holding this idea, I am soul, and that three-word phrase, really, you know, short words, I am soul, it's almost as if it functioned as a kind of orientation and a stimulant to the sensing with soul, but it contained as a sort of silent subtext all these other ideas, these sub-ideas, subtexts, they're kind of written in small print, so to speak. They're implicit, but powerful.

So when we say idea, we don't necessarily mean, again, we don't necessarily mean some kind of slow, laborious cranking of the mental cogs with a lot of wordiness. They can be really, really subtle. They function like little seeds or germs or like a yeast or something. Poetic ideas, poetic seeds, but they include subtexts that slant and direct the sensing and the opening in different ways.

Some of those ideas, when this works, and again if you try it out, some of the ideas will still be very powerful even when they're very vague. They're not completely worked out ideas or completely coherent or I'm not really clear about exactly what I mean when I say that, but it still has that power. The ideation is functioning enough to have power, but not so much that I've worked everything out and certainly not so much that it becomes this kind of overly clunky, laborious pondering or cogitation or thinking through something. Not that that might have its place at other times, but when we're actually engaged in practice or employing ways of looking, then the ideation, this goes for emptiness practice as well, the ideation needs to be very light, feather light, really like little drops of tincture or seed or something.

So there's subtext, there's coalescences of sub-ideas. They may be vague ideas and concepts, and they may be illogical. It may be that they don't make logical sense. You know, there are some philosophers of science who are wanting to open up different kinds of logic just because of what's been discovered in quantum physics and with subatomic particles. So usually logic would say a thing cannot be A and not A. It's called the law of the excluded middle. Either it's A, either it's this, or it's not this, but it can't be both at once.

But when physicists look at the behaviour of subatomic particles, sometimes even molecules, so larger than atoms, and they see actually it's somehow, it's called the superposition principle, it somehow seems to be in a state where two contradictory states or conditions are existing at once. And so that needs... That's one example, but other findings as well suggest a need for a new kind of logic. Other people, like the philosopher J.M. Findlay, just in a kind of phenomenology of everyday experience, and in his kind of like, look, even everyday experience doesn't really add up and needs a different kind of logic to kind of understand it better or feel out better what's going on.

But, as I said, there's subtext, possibility of vague ideas, and possibility of ideas that don't even seem logical.

This idea of subtext is also common in emptiness practice. So, I think I might have mentioned in this series already, like the way of looking that sees just a perception, and looks at things, decides to look at everything, it's just a perception, it's just a perception. Actually, there needs to be a consciousness of what is the subtext for what I mean by just a perception. Because it could mean something like, it's not solid, it's just of the nature of awareness. That would be one possible subtext for the emptiness way of looking, just a perception. Or it could be, it's just a perception. In other words, it's fabricated by the way of looking, by clinging. And that's a slightly different subtext. And they will have different deliverances and different degrees of liberation. They will take you to different depths, the second being deeper than the first.

So this idea, when we're talking about ideation in practice and incorporating concept into perception, into ways of looking, again needs to be very light. And the subtext needs to be conscious, but not too heavy that it's clunky. We need to retain a kind of agility with it.

But these ideas, like I said, they flow between human beings, what we read, what we hear, something in conversation. Sometimes even mishearing something or misunderstanding something ends up implanting some misinterpretation that becomes a very powerful and fecund seed in one's consciousness.

Sometimes people - someone said to me the other day - "You know, I can't get on with guided meditations or people suggesting do this, this, this, but somehow I listen to you talk and you share this or that and I somehow absorb a certain idea. I adapt that idea and try it out in practice, and it opens up sensing the soul."

So formulae for using certain ideas might work, formulae for guided meditations might work at times or for different people, but there's also this possibility of more opportunistic seeding and stimulation of ideas between people.

As always, we create, discover. We create and discover these possibilities, sensitive and responsive to the soul-making resonances and the sense of soulfulness, and that allows us to navigate.

So an idea - we might discover it, and so it's given to us. We might create a certain idea. We might meld, as I gave that example with the "I Am Soul," bringing together in this very gentle weave, very light touch, bringing together certain ideas and seeing what alchemy happens when these ideas are lightly entertained and then allowed to shape and influence and determine and fabricate the perception, the sensing.

As always, the navigation has to be in response, in sensitive response, to what actually feels soul-making right now, what feels that it's opening that. All these possibilities, and many more obviously, are there, just to give you a little idea tonight.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 182

Soulmaking Dyad Practice

Rob Burbea · 2h39

> In this comprehensive teaching, Rob Burbea provides extensive guidance for practicing soulmaking dharma in dyadic relationships. He outlines different levels of practice, from foundational exercises like balance of attention and three-part temenos work (energy body, emotions, images) to more advanced imaginal perception between partners. Burbea emphasizes the extraordinary sensitivity and potency of dyadic practice, requiring significant relational skills, emotional awareness, and mindfulness as prerequisites. He explores how partners can fabricate different senses of self and other - from conventional human perception to less-fabricated awareness to fully imaginal sensing - and the healing possibilities that emerge when one person's imaginal perception affects the entire field. The talk addresses practical considerations including boundaries, the importance of shared conceptual frameworks, and the careful navigation of eros when it arises. Burbea warns against premature practice without adequate preparation, stressing that the intimacy of sharing soul-level perceptions often exceeds even psychological vulnerability. Drawing from Rumi's mystical poetry, he concludes with the profound sense of privilege in participating together in the mundus imaginalis, the imaginal realm where tender perceptions between souls are 'stored in the secret heart of heaven.'

This evening, I'd like to offer a few pointers and guidance for working and practicing in soul-making dyads—practice in pairs. This is a vast subject with countless possibilities and dimensions to consider and explore. I want to touch on some of these pieces and possibilities, highlighting things to look out for, consider, and practice.

Over the past few years, we've worked in twos and threes through various guided meditations that we call temenos exercises. We've introduced exercises typically with a human other, though they can also be done with an imaginal other, an intrapsychic imaginal being, or with objects and beings in nature—a tree, a flower, whatever calls to you.

The foundational exercise we explore is what we call the balance of attention or twoness. This forms a basic practice, a foundation for soul-making, imaginal practice, and sensing the soul. We might regard this as preliminary to soul-making and imaginal practice in dyads.

The other approach we've developed, which we specifically call temenos exercises, involves a three-part structure practiced in twos, threes, or sometimes fours. Participants take turns checking in with sensitivity and expressing what's happening in the energy body to the other or others. The listeners witness with full sensitivity, receiving and truly seeing the other person. The second round focuses on emotions, and the third explores sharing an image or something that recently touched your soul.

I encourage revisiting those recorded exercises from the past few years, as there are many nuances in the instructions. Even if you participated and enjoyed them—which most people seem to—and feel you understand the practice, listening again can be valuable. In the flow of Catherine's or my guidance, there are subtle details: little things to introduce, considerations to incorporate, ways to deepen the practice.

I've described this as somewhat like practicing scales. It's artificially contrived to separate energy body, emotion, and image into three distinct tiers practiced in sequence. But like musical scales, you separate and isolate elements to work on them specifically. When you later play the piece you actually want to perform, the ability to play scales well feeds into fluency, fluidity, capacity for improvisation, responsiveness, and the subtlety you can bring to the real music, so to speak.

These represent two foundational levels we've offered: the balance of attention exercise and the three-part temenos exercise. Within these, there's the possibility of sharing images with each other, which some people are already exploring. We also encourage tracking the effects of what is shared—the perceptions, experiences, and responses that arise—and voicing these effects when appropriate.

When someone shares an image or expresses what's happening in their emotions or energy body, notice what arises imaginatively for you. Consider the possibility of bringing that into the dyad, into the crucible of shared practice through careful, sensitive tracking and respectful sharing of these effects—essentially, of what is happening right now for both people. This can take various forms.

There's another level where each person becomes image for the other, or the dyad itself becomes an image. This involves sharing the perception of this meeting, of self and other in this present moment, when sensed with soul. This too can take different forms and represents another depth of practice.

There's yet another level where significant eros flows between the participants—the two elements of the dyad. I won't explore that level extensively tonight, but when substantial eros is present, the whole practice becomes turbocharged. The inseminating quality of eros makes everything very rich while requiring tremendous care and skill. All these levels, in fact, demand considerable care and skill.

Let me address several aspects of these different possible levels of dyad practice, along with some general considerations.

First, I want to emphasize how potent a dyad can be—or working in triads, or sharing images with another in that kind of intimate, open rapport. Some of you know this potency well: how all kinds of things can be sparked and ignited, sometimes yielding very beautiful soul-making perceptions, and sometimes triggering difficult reactions or contractions.

As an entity or crucible for practice, working in relationship is a very sensitive container. Little changes can make big differences. This sensitivity exists when practicing solo as well—eyes open or closed, sensing the soul on your own. Solo practice is potent and highly responsive to all our responses, relationships, manipulations, leanings, and navigation. The dyad may not necessarily be more sensitive, but it's definitely a sensitive space where everything responds: energy, emotion, heart, perception, soul, mind.

Just as we've emphasized certain prerequisites for imaginal practice, sensing the soul, and soul-making dharma over recent years, it would be wise to consider what skills are needed for dyad or triad practice to work well—to be fruitful, soul-making, safe, and beautiful; to avoid harm and prevent increased contraction and confusion.

Many skills are required here. We could outline some of them, but I want to pause with this recognition: for most people interested in soul-making, much of this work happens in relationship with other human beings. At the very least, considerable eros and image can be activated in these relationships.

And the question is, as I've just been saying, whether the initial spark that feels soul-making can actually sustain its generativity, sustain its fertility, sustain the soul-making dynamic—the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—deepening, widening, enriching both the soul and experience. Or whether that whole dynamic, and perhaps even the relationship itself, breaks in some way, short-circuits, blows a fuse, or backfires. This is really a crucial question here.

Part of the way problems can arise, and the soul-making dynamic—the eros-psyche-logos dynamic—can get disrupted, is in and around the times of relating, but also around the times of relating with another. Being conscious about boundaries, respecting boundaries—depending on people's situations, whatever their relationship commitments are and other considerations. There are all kinds of boundaries, in fact. Being conscious about boundaries, respecting boundaries, ethical considerations in some cases, being conscious of energy, emotion, psychological patterns, relational and communicative patterns and skills and possibilities. As well as handling skillfully erotic charge, desire, image, and the inevitable slides at times into reification or dismissal, or eros sliding into craving.

Noticing all this reification, responding to all that, developing one's skill and art—this is really important. A certain amount of skill with all that, and other elements too, as prerequisites for fertile and sustainable soul-making in relationship with other human beings and fellow soul-makers.

We haven't talked too much about that and given too much guidance. There's more I want to say a little bit tonight, but even what I say tonight is somewhat limited. Part of why I'm going into it is just that I'm aware people are practicing in dyads and noticing, as I said, the potency, the sensitivity, the care that's needed, and maybe getting a sense of some of the caution and skill and art that's needed. So it seems like it would be good to say a few things about that.

Again, not to underestimate how intimate it is to share in this way with others in a soul-making dyad. To share one's psychological history or one's difficult history in life, of wounds and patterns, is intimate. There's something about sharing images that are really soul-making for us, that really touch us, that feels even more intimate than, say, sharing history of being abused or something like that, or just sharing a difficult emotion or a lovely emotion. There's a certain vulnerability to that.

There's something about the level of intimacy of sharing soul, sensing the soul, sharing image with others that tends to even surpass those kinds of sharing—of revealing psychological history or emotion in the present moment. And it's curious. I've pointed this out before. It's curious—this thing, from one respect, isn't even real. It didn't even really happen, and yet it touches my soul, and it's important to my soul in ways that are so profound and so meaningful and so central that it's really an intimate space to enter into with someone. That needs a lot of respect and care, and a range and pitch of skills are needed to sustain it.

So don't underestimate the range and pitch of skills needed to sustain it and to enable it to be soul-making. Because we will need, in these kinds of practices, to be able to work well and skillfully with difficulties and relational problems when they arise. That's part of being in any healthy relationship, and it can very easily arise in these kinds of relationships when you're doing a dyad and something difficult comes up.

If we just think for a moment about prerequisites, it comes to mind: do I have, have I developed a certain amount of awareness of my emotional life? That doesn't just mean the difficult emotions. It means also the subtle movements—slight boredom, slight excitement, slightly wanting something. Do we call that an emotion? Yes, we could in the broader definition of emotion. These are all kinds of colors or leanings, inclinations, states of the mind-heart and consciousness at any time.

To be aware, to be able to notice these movements of the heart and changes in the heart, is really crucial. The more of that there is, the better placed one is to be able to do these kinds of practices. Some people, you could say, are just not quite ready, in the same way they're just not quite ready for imaginal practice, really.

Do I have skill with my emotions? So this is happening—this difficult emotion, or this lovely emotion—can I tolerate it? Can I be with it? Can I give it what it needs? Because I may not be getting that from another person, and I may have to give it what it needs. Can I slow down, if necessary, whatever processes in the mind and the impulses that emotion has kick-started? There are all kinds of skills involved, and that's why we put a lot of emphasis in Soul Making Dharma on emotional awareness, emotional skill, working with the energy body, and integrating those.

All that would be prerequisites. Really, as you're listening, ask yourself: how well developed are those building blocks for me? Basic mindfulness—if I can't be there and be present and sustain my attention to some extent, sustain my focus on what's happening in this dyad, in my experience, when the other person is sharing or the sense of the field...

without a sort of basic training in mindfulness and that capacity to remain engaged and plugged in and alive, present, sensitive to what's going on, attentive, alert, the crucible is cracked. There's no possibility of it holding its material and holding whatever fire is there.

Energy body skill and awareness we already mentioned. Where am I with the whole middle way? The whole imaginal middle way or the emptiness middle way? Either one would help when there's reification. I start believing this image of self or other or the couple or whatever in a way that's too tight, too literal, too solid, and usually will ensue either right then or in the course of time with some kind of problems or not-so-wise choices.

Where am I, again we're talking about possible prerequisites, where am I with the fullness of intention? When I enter into these kinds of spaces, formal space of working and soul-making, what am I really wanting there? And how easily, of course, for us as human beings, the intention can contract to something smaller, less open to possibility. Something sneaks in—sometimes we're unconscious of it—I'm actually trying to get approval, respect, a good feeling about myself, some kind of... maybe I actually want to pursue a relationship with this person, which may or may not be fine. But am I clear about what my intentions are? And can I open up that field of intention to the fullness of intention and that element of the imaginal, that node?

So all these and more will be prerequisites. And really to ponder for oneself how developed they are and whether they need more work. And if so, you might want to pitch the dyad practice so that it's not further ahead than you're actually equipped for, so it's not more advanced than you actually have the tools to cope with and the resources to cope with.

If we go back to what I said at the beginning, we talked about the balance of attention exercise, the three-part exercise—energy, body, emotion, image—and sharing it. Spending a while with those before opening up to other possibilities or other forms may be really wise, depending on where you get the sense of what's the appropriate pitch. In general, it may be actually, for a while now, I just need to practice the balance of attention thing. That's really what will serve me and serve my soul, and not be in such a hurry to go into imaginal practice.

So balance of attention is not necessarily... it's not really a soul-making practice in a sense. It's a preparatory exercise, but it's so important—so important for a healthy relationship, so important for a soul-making dyad, so important for imaginal practice. So there's this possibility of pitching, and again, the wisdom, the listening, the discerning, and getting a sense of where does it need to pitch right now? What do I need to... what's my pitch right now? What's my level right now? And that right now might be for a while, it might be right now in this moment, this afternoon, whatever it is.

Because actually just being opposite another human being and sitting a few feet from another, bodies in a way open to each other, looking at each other, for a lot of people is pretty damn intense. And for some people, it will be soul-making. It won't necessarily be imaginal, but it will be soul-making just to be in relationship, in dyadic relationship or triadic relationship. It's not imaginal, but it's soul-making in the sense that, remember, the imaginal is, if you like, a subset of soul-making.

So it might be soul-making in the sense of it's stretching one's soul's capacity and one's learning things that feel meaningful to the soul. It's not yet imaginal, but the soul is growing. So there's a kind of hiero-psychologos dynamic unfolding there. For many people just to be in relationship that way—so deliberately, so carefully, so openly, so present to each other and so intimate—will feel soul-making, and that's great. And so one should not hurry through just that level of it.

So yes, the being looked at, just being an object of someone else's gaze, a few feet, and they're sustained looking at you, they're sustained taking you in. The charge of that often, for many people in our culture, the whole complication and difficulty that can go with being seen. And then the sense of openness, perhaps in sharing whatever one's sharing, or just in being present with the body, open to another in that way. The intimacy that involves, being honest with another, learning, for example, developing the skill with this, playing with the balance of attention, playing with the sense of two-ness.

All that is really, really important stuff and may itself feel soul-making and it's not imaginal yet. So really to get a sense of the different pitches that you can play at and exercise at and what might be appropriate there rather than just, in some cases, trying to do something that's really beyond you just because it sounds like the most exciting or sexy thing or whatever. So the careful discernment there, the questioning, the openness.

If we just spend a few moments talking about that balance of attention exercise—as I said, there's quite a lot to this in the sense that it sounds really simple, but actually many people find it quite difficult. So you could very much just sit down with someone else with that intention particularly. Let's play exactly just with that, with the balance of attention, with the two-ness.

And one thing you might do if you decide to do such a thing or at another time in the context of some other dyadic practice—one thing that's really important is to notice the tendency of your attention. What do you notice over time is your kind of habit when in close relationship, when confronted with another and that kind of openness?

Is it, for instance, to somehow lose yourself? I'm so attentive to the other that I don't even notice what I'm feeling or sensing or what I need or want or all of that. Is there a kind of merging? And sometimes it actually feels like a person sort of... their attention almost goes into the other person and there's no attention in their own locus, in their own space.

So just to notice... not to judge, and this is really, really important. Can I withhold the judging?

There are going to be tendencies we notice—perhaps to lose a self, perhaps to merge, perhaps to kind of... I notice that in relationship, and it gets even more clear when we're sort of face-to-face like that, there's a kind of perhaps subtle, perhaps grosser way

I kind of comply with what I think or believe or presume or perceive the other wants. I find myself bending to that, and I haven't even decided to do that. It's an unconscious bending to fit usually some idea of what the other person wants, which of course may not even be actually what they want.

So I might notice something like that. I might notice that I need to somehow entertain the other person. I need to look good. I need to perform. I need to perhaps be a certain way, whatever that way might be. They need to see love coming through my eyes. They need to think I'm attractive, that I'm deep, that I'm intelligent, that I'm this or that, that the Holy Spirit moves in me, that it's obvious that I'm an angel, whatever. It could be all kinds of things.

But one possibility is just to sit down and practice balance of attention or be in a dyad. What's my tendency right now? And then over time, one might say, "Oh, I have a kind of irregular tendency" or "It's quite common for me to take that shape or to morph this way" or whatever it is.

So really, really important—if you're doing just that level of exercise, is it possible to just notice? There is certainly the possibility of bringing different responses in, bringing wisdom or compassion or soulful responses in many different ways to open it up, to free it. But actually one really useful thing to do is just to notice and see if I can just notice... also, what the effects of that on my being are.

Now, of course, we might notice effects in the dyad that are quite complex, but we might also notice just that there's some judgment of it, or we're impatient with ourselves, or whatever. What if we just notice that? I notice this tendency, I notice the judgment, and just create some space around that. So the exercise at this point is not trying to do anything else other than notice and create space and feel the effects of this pattern. It may be that within that then some compassion for yourself comes in, and that's going to have an effect. So that's important too.

So that's a very, very important level of exercise, but also potentially really helpful. You could say quite basic, but really, really, really helpful for many people.

Then there are other possibilities that one can explore. For example, some practices, like in some Mahamudra or Dzogchen practices, they encourage meditating with the eyes open, but relaxing the gaze. Usually what happens, the way the eyes work, the way the visual senses work, is the eyes and the eye muscles actually focus on something. And for that, the eye muscles have to kind of hold themselves in a certain focus. And there's a kind of intentness and intensity in there—it's quite subtle.

But it's quite a different mode to open the eyes and relax the gaze. So they're actually not focusing on anything. And so you can try this just... it doesn't have to be in an actual dyad, but you can just try it. What is it to open the eyes and relax the gaze? You will notice actually the rest of your body relaxing as you relax the gaze. It's like the eyes and the visual focus is not singling out and focusing on any one object. It's just open to a field of visual form and color and perception there. It's a more general field.

And in that then, in terms of the balance of attention, we could say the attention is not going out so much to this object—it's in a more receptive mode. So as I said, in some practices, some Dharma practices, some Dzogchen and Mahamudra teachings, they will practice that a lot, a lot, a lot, and really develop that practice and take it in a certain direction to do with the nature of awareness, etc., as they would see it.

But doing that just on your own in a room, doing it on your own outside in nature and getting used to that shift of being able—and then go back to focusing on something, that tree or whatever it is—really, really skillful, noticing the effects. And then for a while you could practice that in a dyad with someone. So what is it? I'm sitting opposite someone and I relax the gaze. And in that, actually, my visual field opens up to the whole space.

Now, this person might be talking and I can still hear what they're saying. I can still take in what they're saying. But I'm not focused on them as an object. It's much more that they become part of the space—they're embedded in the space and much less prominent. They're still going to be prominent, obviously, but much less so.

If there's a tendency to focus too much on the other, practicing in this way is really, really helpful. It relaxes that intensity or forward thrust into the other person, which is quite a common thing. It's possible then, within that receptive awareness, to also just be aware of one's own experience at the same time—what's happening with me emotionally.

For instance, if you do that, you'll be aware: oh, as I do that, the shoulders relax, and something in my belly relaxes, and the heart—something softens in the heart. Then one might notice other emotions. But correspondingly, the gaze doesn't need to be so penetrative to one's own experience. This is, again, part of playing with the balance of attention there.

I hope that makes sense as an option. Another possibility, if you've done a fair amount of metta practice—and especially if you've done metta practice the way I would teach it, which is intimately connected to and involving the energy body—is to use the imagination to kind of see and sense a metta-bubble or a metta-field that encompasses you and the other person or persons in the dyad or triad. So that becomes part of the awareness as well.

There's a sense of us sitting, not me necessarily giving metta to them—I mean that's fine too—but us sitting in a field or a bubble, a cloud of metta. The more one can imagine that and get a sense of it and feel the softness and the care in it, the holding of it, and feel it also in the energy body to some extent at least, that's going to really help. It addresses what can sometimes be a problematic intensity or fear in a dyad, but also the balance of attention, because there the attention has gone to the field as well, as a total space, rather than just that person or just contracting into my experience.

What we've done in the last couple of years, when we introduced this exercise with the balance of attention, is play with: Okay, can it be 100% my attention is with my experience? So I'm maybe aware that there's a person there, but I'm really just attuning to my energy body, my emotions, my thoughts, my experience here. Can it be 20% with the other person and 80% with me? Can it be 50-50? Can it be 80% with the other person, 20% with me? So that kind of very deliberate exercise.

And you see, this gear is a bit jammed. It's hard for me to get into that gear. Or for someone else, that gear is quite normal and easy—it's the sort of default that just keeps slipping into that gear and it's hard to get into another gear. Again, we're interested in range and flexibility and freedom across different ranges. So that would be a really good exercise as well.

The other possibility, which I mentioned when we talked about the energy body in this series of talks, is rather than to see the other person with the eyes, rather than to conceive that one is seeing and sensing the other person primarily through the eyes, to play with the energy body awareness and bring—again, same as we do in imaginal practice—inhabiting, filling out that whole region, that whole space that we call the energy body.

How often, if you're paying attention, you will notice, either in your own practice, in your own times, in informal practice, but also in relationship, in a dyad or triad relationship, how easy it is to lose the energy body sense. Or it shrinks, or it's like, well, I've got my top half, I might have my heart, but where's everything from the waist down? It's just kind of a dead zone, or we're just not aware of it there.

Don't underestimate how often that happens and how helpful it is to keep checking in with the energy body and keep opening it up, opening up, filling it with that awareness and stretching it that way. So it's really like the whole sensitivity pervades that whole space. Again and again, it's going to be really, really helpful. And one should notice the effect that has on working with an image, as we talked about, but also sensing the other with soul and the capacity to handle certain things in one's own experience or handle what's happening in the dyad.

As I mentioned in the talk on energy body in this series, there's the possibility of not conceiving or sensing that I'm just looking through the eyes. What is it to get the sense of the whole energy body as an organ of sense, as an organ of sensing? So I'm somehow seeing the other with my whole body. I bring that whole body sense into relationship. The center of knowing or perceiving is not simply in the head, the eyes or the ears. It might have a center of the heart or the solar plexus or the belly, or it might just pervade the whole space like that.

Really, really important. And then, as I said when I talked about the metta possibility, the metta field, there's also the possibility that the sense of the energy field, the sense of the energy body begins to spread to include the other and the self and one can develop a sense of the energy field between two people.

I won't say more about that now, but just how important that is and how helpful that can be when it feels like either there's a tendency to withdraw in a dyad, to sort of go back into oneself, perhaps to go too much into the other person, to merge or lose one's own sense of what's going on. Just how helpful it is to bring the energy body into play, to open up that awareness—really, really, really helpful.

We've used this word temenos a number of times, and it's another one of those Greek words. It's related to the word temple or sacred space or the boundary that protects the space and encloses it and protects it from intrusion.

The temenos is about creating sacred, protected space for this profound work. As I've mentioned, when the imaginal touches us so deeply, it needs to be respected and protected—cared for—and part of that is setting up the conditions where that care and safety can exist, so that the crucible can be there. The crucible can sustain whatever's happening without being easily shattered or broken.

When we come to practicing relationship in dyads, triads, or whatever it might be, formal space and time are really part of—can be really helpful in—setting up the temenos, the sense of a safe space, a fertile space, a special place. To share images more casually, when it's not the right time for the other person or for you—when they're busy, not completely attentive, the space isn't conducive, there are distractions, or something else is going on—none of that will be helpful at all. It will feel disappointing, even painful: I haven't been received here, we didn't meet, something felt important and it got dropped on the floor. Setting a formal time and space is actually part of the temenos. Just the formality of it helps create a sense of container, of crucible, of safety.

Posture too—to sit upright in a more meditative posture will really help. It enhances the whole capacity of attention, sensitivity, receptivity, openness, energy, engagement. All of that is actually part of the temenos. The attention—the quality of attention, the brightness of attention, the softness of attention—these are all part of the temenos. The sensitivity, the metta is part of the temenos, as we've stressed. The intention. Again, if I have the fullness of intention, it really helps the temenos. If my intention or the other's is something different or less than that, it's also not really conducive to forming a strong and soul-making temenos.

But the posture also gives a signal to oneself, to another: This is something—now we're doing something that takes all my capacity, all my sensitivity, all my care and attention. It gives that signal to oneself in all kinds of ways, and both beings actually respond to that. So there are many components to the temenos.

I'm really happy to hear recently from a number of people in the Sangha that they took it upon themselves—saw the necessity after some experiences of really exploring this area, this domain—of exploring temenos amongst themselves, thinking creatively about it and what it needs, exploring the sense of it when it doesn't work, and expanding really the teaching. I'm happy, first, because it's an important area, and second, because as time goes on, those who are deeply interested in soul-making dharma absorb the teachings, digest them, learn and develop their art and skill. Then they may be ready—some people may be ready—to begin to be creative in what they discover and what they add potentially to soul-making dharma, how they can extend it, how they can make connections with other paradigms.

Not prematurely, before one has understood and digested and gained fluency in this paradigm, in these practices. But in time, that's part of what makes a really alive, creative tradition—that it can be added to. That there's a dialogue, a digestion of what has come before, and then a dialogue with that, and a possible extension, new angles. So I'm doubly happy, feeling really heartened and encouraged and touched by those people taking that on together as an exploration.

One of the things they came up with was a new concept, if you like, of the temenos tail—T-A-I-L. In other words, here we are, perhaps working in a dyad or a small group or a three, and we take care of the temenos there. But what happens afterwards? What happens in the hour afterwards, in the week afterwards, in the months afterwards?

There can be so much intimacy and so much sense of being deeply touched in a soul-making dyad—sharing images together that touch the soul deeply—that then two people or more people go their separate ways, and they meet again in some other situation. Just because one has been so touched, or that dyadic encounter and exploration made so much impact on the soul, it can be very easy to assume certain things about that relationship—what one expects, what one is owed, what kind of interaction should then ensue or be committed to. Not to say any of that's wrong, but what is it to care for that tail end of the temenos? We've cared for it in the formal practice. What happens afterwards? So that's also a consideration and exploration that's opening as well.

I mentioned the need to share a conceptual framework. In order for a soul-making dyad to be really fertile and soul-making—and not frustrating or limited or limiting—it's important that the two people share the conceptual framework that actually supports soul-making. Part of that is sharing what we could call ontological commitments—a kind of sense of what is real, or what is to be respected as real. We could put it in the negative: what's not to be dismissed.

You try soul-making with someone who just considers imagination a kind of random nonsense—they don't have the same ontological commitment to the sense of the imaginal and whatever ontological realm or position that holds for soul-makers. For them, it's just rubbish. Correspondingly, if one is...

So if someone ontologically views whatever comes up in imagination that touches the heart as "real"—too real—that would also be an example of a kind of ontological commitment that's actually not going to be helpful for the diet. One person will occupy or have within their range certain ontological commitments, certain senses of what's real, what's to be respected, what's not important, and the other person holds something quite different.

I would extend this to say I wonder whether deep friendships actually often need, amongst other things, shared ontological commitments. How deep can my friendship with someone be? I can be friendly and we can have a laugh. We can share heartache and respond with kindness and engagement in all kinds of ways. But how deep can the sense of friendship be if there's not enough common territory in what I'm calling shared ontological commitments?

People don't often say this, or maybe it's regarded as slightly taboo. Even at Gaia House, when people want to establish or support more of a sense of community among the many staff, the assumption is: just give them some time together, have some practice together, meditate together, put them in a room and they'll start making deep connections. But it won't happen unless there's a certain overlap of ontological commitment—and also, I don't know if this is taboo or not—a kind of either shared eros or passion, or at least commensurate levels.

Someone who has a lot of eros, who's really on fire with eros, probably won't be that close with someone who just doesn't have much eros or it's not going on for them at the same level. The souls won't resonate with each other. I don't know—is that politically or psychologically incorrect to say? I'm not sure, but it's important. Even more so, the whole conceptual framework needs to be shared enough for soul-making relationship to really flourish and not feel frustrating.

This is an important consideration. If you want to share this wonderful new paradigm, this new practice you're into—you did this diet with someone and it was wonderful and soul-making—so you take it to another friend. You know they're heartful, interested, open, maybe open-minded, but there isn't that shared conceptual framework. The whole thing—again, the crucible is not there. This can be painful and frustrating for both people.

Even when one person is holding a conceptual framework that's limited or limiting from the soul-making point of view, and they're not sharing it—maybe not even aware they're holding it—somehow in the mystery and magic of that connection between two people, it actually ends up limiting the experience for both. What arises for the other person, whose conceptual framework may be more open, is somehow limited by the silent and even unconscious limited conceptual framework of the other person.

Again, this should suggest some caution in trying to engage in soul-making dyads with people who don't really share the conceptual framework and haven't understood or absorbed it to a certain extent.

Let me very briefly outline some of the avenues or ways of practicing—some of the possible approaches that this form can offer or allow—and with that, some things to bear in mind and consider.

If you're practicing in a dyad or triad, it's probably a good idea if you're at home to have some little gap or separation of that practice period from other activities. It's natural to do this if there's some sense of the sanctity of it, the form of that temenos.

Sitting down together—and of course you could stand or be moving, there are so many possibilities here—but let's say if you sit down together, it may or may not need some sort of settling time, meditating in silence. Don't assume that it does. Find out. See what you need at the time.

Sometimes just being opposite each other in a formal ritual space will already support some kind of gathering and energizing, coalescing of attention and being, some quieting, some heightening of sensitive awareness. Of course, it might be that for some people or in some situations, coming into a formal space with the anticipation of doing this kind of practice actually brings up mild panic or self-consciousness or inadequacy or some other agitation.

But generally speaking, you'll probably find that just being together opposite each other in that space brings a kind of gathering. If it doesn't, then what's needed? Either a little quiet time together—meditating, being with what's going on, being with the energy body, the emotions, the breath, or metta—or bringing that difficulty you're experiencing right into the diet when you start practicing. That's what's present. Let's practice with that and see: can soul be made from this? What does it need? Maybe it doesn't need soul-making. Maybe it needs some other kind of exploration or attention or response.

The temenos is crucial, as we've mentioned. If you listen back to those recordings from two, three, four retreats ago—I can't remember—

Mostly we call them temenos exercises, I think. You'll hear that we have a stage of metta there, and I would say this is really quite important.

If you listen again, you'll notice there's the giving of metta and the consciousness of receiving. So to consciously feel oneself as an object of metta, as being permeated by metta from the other or others, as being wished well, as much as giving. Both the necessity of having access to and registering both those directions of metta—the giving and receiving.

Then the metta can kind of go to this bedrock of the whole exploration. It never really goes away, but one isn't necessarily consciously, formally practicing the metta. One can rely on it as an intention, rely on the knowledge that the field is pervaded by that, that it is the intention, that it is part of the intention of both parties.

Only if you're really sure that it's there as a bedrock and it is unshakable—both your sense of receiving it and your giving it—only if you're really sure would I recommend skipping that step of just lingering with the metta and establishing that. Dependent on all kinds of factors, you can skip it, but be sure. Or, you know, it's a lovely thing to do. It certainly can't hurt to start that way and include that. And as I said, that's part of the temenos, part of establishing and caring for the temenos and for each other, obviously.

On those recordings that we did previously in the temenos exercises, as I said, they're kind of like scales—practicing scales. We somewhat artificially divided it into three levels: the energy body, the emotion, and then perhaps sharing something that felt soulful. We separated those out in time, and people took turns. This remains, I think, a really useful exercise to gain the facility, the skill, the fluidity, the familiarity with all that and those dimensions of practice and of being.

In time, you then might begin to include a tracking and a voicing of those three levels or elements of being: the energy body (remember, energy body also includes imaginal body now, and we've expanded the sense of what that means), the emotional level, and then the level of soul or image. So one can begin to, rather than separating them out, include them in real time in a kind of fluid real-time tracking and voicing, taking your time to feel. You don't have to be speaking or communicating all the time. You can track and then voice.

Again, we emphasize the voice and verbal communication, but it could be other kinds of voicing too. You might sing or sound, or you might gesture, or you might move or dance. Obviously the voicing, the verbalizing will be most common for most people, but there's all kinds of possibilities here. What matters is its soul-making.

So one can begin to include all that in a more fluid, real-time tracking and include with that a tracking of and voicing of how either the perception or thoughts about the other's expression—their presence, their attention, their gaze, their energy—how that's affecting, right now, my energy body, my emotion, the emotions that arise, what's happening in the heart, and the imaginal sense, or sensing the soul.

So that one's potentially including then the image of this moment, of the other, of the sharing, being seen, heard. This very being seen, being heard and being witnessed can become image. So that would be another level of domain of possibility, another avenue —just extending the exercise a little bit.

And this, how am I being affected, that latter part of that avenue and level—sometimes it doesn't make much difference. I share something and it's just how it is, or I share something, it wasn't particularly soulful, and then when I share it in a dyad or triad or whatever, it's the same. There's not much impact of that situation on the sense of soul-making or the energy body or whatever.

But sometimes the sense of how we are being listened to and looked at—including the imaginal sense of it, and of who is listening, looking... In some recent retreats we talk about being witnessed by the angel. So actually having a sense of the other as angel, as daemon, as having their roots, so to speak. One can deliberately instigate or ignite that perception of the other, of who is listening and looking at me, or it might just arise by itself. All kinds of other possibilities.

In the imaginal sense of who is listening or looking, there may be a much greater sense of soul-making. An image that originally didn't feel so soul-making, a little bit, but the effect of the potency of that situation and the sensitivity of that situation makes that image—almost in retrospect or as it's resuscitated there and re-communicated—it allows much more soul-making with the same image.

Conversely, of course, we might be sharing something, an emotion, an image, something that's in the energy body, and the partner or whoever it is in the dyad—someone was sharing, and they looked away. They told me, and I don't know why they looked away, but they just... I was sharing an emotion, and they looked away and sort of stared into space for a few seconds, and that just threw me. I felt disconnected and I stopped sharing the emotion. I was halfway through and I just stopped.

But here it's also possible then in the kind of flow and give and take, of course, to just recognize what's happening and ask: do I want to voice that, that effect on me when you just looked away like that? I don't have to blame or be aggressive, I'm just saying, oh, I notice I'm a bit thrown here by that.

And it's possible that the other person just witnesses that and tracks their response in silence to what you're sharing about that impact of whatever it is—them looking away. Anyway, if they don't say anything, if they're just taking it in in silence, there's a communication through the eyes and through the energy body.

Or it might be that they respond either there and then, or if you're taking turns in a more formal structure—now my turn, now your turn—then in their allotted time. And that response they give you will of course have an effect on the sense of connection and on what is shaped, what can arise, what can come into the field. So the whole thing can become much more fluid and responsive at times.

The point here really is to begin to notice and include and express—at this stage of the exercise, if you like—the effect of the sense of how I'm being looked at or listened to. Sometimes that's very gross and sometimes it's extremely subtle. If you're really sensitive, sometimes you can feel someone just blink or notice the slightest movement of their eyes, not even away in distraction or anything like that. And one can actually feel one's energy body impacted by that, affected by that. It's quite possible.

So there's a whole range here of what can be noticed and what can be included, of that crucible and the potentiality and sensitivity of the dyad or triad or whatever it is.

After that sort of three-tiered exercise, after you've maybe gotten used to that—and I think some people are very used to it by now, some much less so, so you'll have to see where you're at and what you need—then you can include the experience of this now, this sharing now, and this being seen, being heard by you right now in real time. So the whole thing gets a little more fluid and inclusive.

Another avenue or level of possibility here—they're not completely separate; you'll realize this very quickly, it's hard to actually cleanly separate these different avenues and levels—but another possibility is to deliberately take the other as an imaginal focus. That is, to sense them with soul. And to voice that—again, voice is a euphemism for a much larger range of communication, expression. It may include movement, gesture, verbal or non-verbal vocalization, all kinds of things.

And then the person responds, if necessary. Maybe they feel, "Hold on, this is a bit something or other." In a way, that's a kind of slightly contrived level and maybe a little awkward, with one person just telling the other about how they sense the other with soul. But see what works. It might be you take it in turns or whatever.

I would also recommend that if you're doing that, to again include self-other-world—to include not just your sense of the other, sensing them with soul, but also take in the space that you're in, the environment that you're in. If you're inside, the room that you're in; if you're outside, wherever you are—what's the environment? And let, or at least allow the possibility of the sensing with soul to spread to the world. So other, self, and world can be sensed with soul.

And that spreading to the world—sometimes we've called it cosmopoiesis when it starts from an imaginal sense of another—but that's part of the soul-making process, and as we've pointed out, probably very helpful at times for the whole balance of the process. And there'll be a lot to learn in that triple object, if you like—self, other, world—for sensing with soul.

And then again, another level or avenue of possibility would be to open to responses, optional responses from the other. Either you take it in turns and then the person responds after you've shared for a certain time or whatever, or just in the natural back and forth. So non-silent witness—if they're responding, especially if it's more in the fluid back and forth and not so formalized, separate "now my turn, now your turn," it's less of a witness, it's just a partner or whatever in the dyad.

And what are they responding with at this level? They would be responding what arises for them in the energy body, in the emotion, in the imaginal sense, in the sensing with soul.

What they're not doing at this level is critiquing what you've just shared or your perception, or giving guidance or feedback. That may have a place at a later stage. In other words, you can decide—and I think you should formally decide if you're going to do that thing. But I would say hold off from that for a while, because obviously it brings all kinds of other complications, potential complications into the dyad and would need even more care and sensitivity and intuitive awareness.

But as I said, the partner voices their response, their experience, either in their allotted time, or in just the open, natural back and forth and flow of things. So what arises in listening, in witnessing, in looking, in receiving the other?

I guess I should point out that sometimes you'll notice that you do, or your partner does, intuit or know things about what's going on with you. In other words, they can get a sense themselves of your energy body experience or your emotional experience or something else. But if you're sharing at this point, to really be careful with the assumptions of being right there. I think it's really important to always respect the autonomy and the mystery of the other, and their sense of their experience, and if there's a place for privacy, boundaries here also.

So yes, that kind of intuitive sense, empathic sense, of course can go on between human beings, and the range of that is a lot larger than the usual meaning of the term empathy—in terms of "I can see that you're sad" or "I can see that you're happy" or whatever it is and resonating with that. The range is larger than that. But still it's really important to respect, as I said, the other and to tread carefully with that kind of thing. If you're going to share it, you can check it out, you can say it lightly, you can say "I'm wondering if..." etc.

And it's also possible—and I've mentioned in this series of talks—that there can be a real sense of entering into and sharing an image with someone else. Sharing a sensing with soul of the environment you're in, of each other, of some other intrapsychic image.

One of you might have voiced that image first, and then both of you can enter it together. Sometimes this happens naturally, sometimes not. Don't put pressure on these possibilities to unfold. Sometimes one person simply shares an image that impacts you deeply, even though it hasn't yet become a living image for you. But the possibilities are certainly there.

With these various avenues or levels of practice, take your time to find the right pitch for you. This might vary from day to day, or you might simply feel curious about what happens when you limit the practice in this way or that way. The composer Strav-insky used to say that the most terrifying thing is an empty sheet of paper. Once he gave himself certain constraints in the creative process—arbitrary limits to what he could do in a composition—then he began discovering and creating abundantly.

Similarly with these exercises, you might think you want to jump immediately to the most advanced level, where fireworks are going off and everything is available. But you may well create and discover much more fertile ground by exploring what might seem like the earlier or simpler stages of these practices. They will lay the foundation for truly fecund, rich, and expansive practices—an opening out of experiences, insights, and sensings with soul as you continue in the whole practice, not just in dyads, but also in your solitary work.

Don't get too caught up in hierarchy or in needing to reach the maximum level. All of this asks a great deal and takes time to develop the sensitivities, skills, and artistry involved. There's tremendous depth here.

Let me mention some other possibilities. You can deliberately decide together on a theme you want to explore. The process might be the same—involving the energy body, emotions, sensing with soul, sensitivity to each other and your own experience—but you're exploring something specific together. Rather than simply sitting together openly to see what happens, you might be exploring a particular image you want to open out and investigate more deeply. It might be a certain kind of cosmopoiesis you've perhaps glimpsed or sensed is possible. It might be a particular form of dukkha you want to bring into the field for potential soul-making.

The temenos itself might be your theme. A couple of people told me about exploring the whole area of temenos in a group over time, including the temenos tale I mentioned. They discovered it was possible to sit down in a dyad and take the idea and sense of temenos right here, between us or around us, as the theme itself. They found this remarkably lovely and fruitful.

Your theme could be one of the elements of the imaginal, one of the nodes you particularly want to explore. It could be this dynamic relationship between self, other, and world—how they ignite each other, what the tendencies are. It could be something as fundamental as the nature of matter, which I believe is a profound and important investigation, especially in our time. We live dominated by a reductionist, scientific, materialist view of matter—wonderful as that perspective is in terms of what it has given us, but also carrying massive consequences for how we live, how we treat the earth, how we treat other species.

You might deliberately enter an image together, or one person might bring an image simply to share and see what unfolds. You could even deliberately enter into an image of each other. The possibilities are limitless.

In the practice, you'll notice many of the same larger considerations about navigation and responsiveness that arise in individual, solitary practice. Sometimes the concertina opens—that node, that element expands, especially when there's a lot of eros present. And again, this isn't necessarily sexual eros. But the degree of eros, the energy and force of it, can present many imaginal possibilities all at once, numerous sensings with soul as simultaneous possibilities. Then the question becomes: which do we choose? How do we choose? Why are we choosing this one over that one? This becomes quite fascinating.

The issue of pacing arises again—where should we linger, where should we slow down? As I've mentioned so many times, the importance of energy body awareness becomes particularly evident, sometimes even more so when working with others in dyads, triads, or quartets. The energy body awareness might shrink, or you might only be aware of part of your body, not really inhabiting or filling out the whole energy body space. So it's helpful to keep checking on this, to expand the awareness, to allow it to expand, to include whatever areas of that space are not being engaged at that moment. This becomes part of the ongoing sensitivity, responsiveness, and care for the practice.

There are so many aspects of experience in any given moment, just as in individual practice—so many facets of the complex experience arising. You can focus on the totality, the whole gestalt, or you can attune to any one or two particular aspects of this complex experience happening in the dyad or triad, deciding to explore that specific dimension.

And because this is life, things are impermanent. The attunement between two people, or even one person's relationship with themselves, comes and goes. That's perfectly okay—it's simply the nature of impermanence. Sometimes it feels like you're exquisitely attuned to each other. Sometimes one person might feel that the other isn't quite attuned to them in terms of sensitivity and attention, or that you're pulling in slightly different directions regarding what interests you in the moment, which affects the quality of attention.

All of this is completely normal and acceptable. Perhaps it calls for a moment of checking in—"Hold on, let's explore something here." Sometimes it's simply about recognizing this shift and knowing it's okay, that the attunement will return, the alignment and sensitivity will come back. You can simply wait for it to return.

But to expect that, of course. And sometimes if you do a lot of this kind of practice, you'll notice that sometimes there's an exquisite and profound and profoundly touching sense of connection and soul-making, igniting, etc., and other times less so. And, you know, that's again just like practicing on your own. So to be a little spacious and equanimous around that. Yes, we take care as best we can of the conditions and the art of it, and there's an element of grace here—it's not completely in our control. So that's important too.

I want to pick up on what I mentioned about what I'm calling the sensitivity of the dyad and just recognizing how... yeah, I think that's the best word—how sensitive that whole space is and that whole crucible is, so that little things, little gestures, little moments or movements of mind or energy or intention can really affect, sometimes quite dramatically, the sense of what's unfolding.

Remember the other day I shared about the yogi who came to an interview with the image of a really big woman, and she was resting her head, lying and resting her head in the lap of this big goddess woman. And then it became sexual, etc. Actually, when she came in that time, it wasn't the first time that she'd shared that image with me. When it first came up, it was a very brief image that arose as she was getting ready for bed. So it wasn't even formal practice. She was on retreat, getting ready for bed, and this image just came up very briefly. Then she did a dyad practice with a partner and shared that image. Quite unexpectedly to her, tears came as she shared it, when she was sharing this image. It moved her at a whole other level. Whereas when it had come up the first time, just briefly going to bed, it just sort of made an impact, but there wasn't that level of emotional and soul response.

So again, the power of soul-making in relationship where there's temenos. Something happens—some alchemy happens to an image that is possible for the soul-making associated with that image, and even how imaginal it is—to go to another level by virtue of the crucible of the dyad, by virtue of the temenos, by virtue of the space we're in and how we're being attended to. Or even the soul sense of the dyad itself. All of that. Again, this thing ignites that thing. And sometimes this can be quite unexpected.

Of course, it's sensitive, as I pointed out before, both for better and for worse, so to speak—in ways that are helpful to the soul-making and in ways that can end up shutting down the soul-making.

Someone shared with me that they were remembering an old relationship, a past relationship with a lover, and there was still some pain and grief around that relationship that hadn't completely been resolved or let go of in them. Then they worked with it imaginatively, feeling the pain, holding that in the crucible of one's being, with the energy body, with the emotions. And it did become image, or an image came in relation to that. It's not important what the image is, so I won't share it, although it's quite interesting. But it was a sort of baffling image to her, and even more baffling was why it seemed to help and exactly what way it was relevant to the pain or meaningful, and how it was healing. So there was this, these memories, the leftover pain from quite a while ago. It became an image that puzzlingly was healing and touching the soul and very pertinent.

And then she was doing a soul-making dyad with her current partner, her current lover, and decided to share that image—the healing image with respect to the old lover. But in sharing it, unlike the example I gave before where something didn't feel that soul-making and then one shared it and it suddenly was soul-making and touching at a whole other level, this fell flat. She shared the image which had felt meaningful and profound and healing and touching when worked with on her own. Now in sharing it, it just goes flat. Why? What's going on here?

Well, perhaps there was some fear of her current partner's reaction. Why are you thinking about that? Or why are you thinking about him? Or whatever it is. And this fear perhaps led to her leaving bits out of the sharing. So because of this subtle fear, she didn't share fully, and the whole thing wasn't really allowed or supported to become fully imaginal.

Now, that could have been done differently, perhaps, in various ways, but the point I really want to make is just about the sensitivity of this space. Again, on our own, in a large group, in small groups, in dyads, you probably will have seen this now. And as I've pointed out several times, soul-making doesn't just happen by itself. We have to really care for the conditions, the temenos, all the different aspects that allow it to happen.

And sometimes that is not just a default of the being. There are all kinds of other things that can happen, and just pull the plug out of the crucible, or just shatter it a little bit, or leave the lid off, whatever analogy we want to use. Soul-making is a really very sensitive business, and the dyad or group soul-making is also extremely sensitive in the ways that things catch from one person to the other. This is very important to be aware of, to take care of, and to be interested in, actually.

I shared this before, but it's worth repeating on the same theme. I was working in a dyad, and the person I was working with was describing her experience. At that point it was really almost all about her energy body experience. I found myself very sensitive to her gestures and her words and her energy, and I could feel the concertina was opening for me—the sort of spread of potential images, potential images waiting in the wings, their beginnings there.

But despite that concertina and the sort of potential there and the relative fecundity of that, nothing was really igniting to become imaginal fully. Something felt slightly blocked somehow, despite my partner having quite strong energy openings, which she was very in touch with and very mindful of and describing to me quite articulately.

At a certain point I asked her, "Is it energy perception, or is the energy perception an image? Are you perceiving the energy imaginatively?" As I said when I shared this the first time, she got it immediately. Then it shifted to—it's an image of her energy. And immediately I felt my experience open up to image right then, the imaginal perception, the sense of what was happening in her and myself. I just opened up from that shift.

Two points here. One is, again, the significance and the power of the option of sensing the energy body or the energy field imaginatively—sensing it with soul, rather than with the kind of usually not quite fully conscious implicit reification that we have when we're relating to energy and our perception of energy. But more importantly right now, just how sensitive the dyad is and the fact of the subtle dependent arising of experience in the dyad. My experience depended on a subtle shift in how she viewed her experience—just a subtle change from reified to imaginal in terms of her experience, and my experience changed. Again, there's some kind of magic connection that can be there in these kinds of processes that make it very, very sensitive.

I'll share something else. I was working also with someone in a formal dyad practice, and she felt stuck, and she also felt willfully stuck. Something in her wanted to be stuck in some way. I actually felt quite spacious despite the fact that she felt stuck. I was sort of metaphorically tickling her—being a little light and humorous—in the hope and the attempt that it would help. But she felt that my tickling, so to speak, dissolved her will. She was willfully stuck; my tickling dissolved her. And that touched an even deeper pain.

It was a pattern reminiscent from her childhood with her siblings. With her siblings, there was a particular dynamic—they would ridicule and she felt humiliate her when she was hurt and she wanted to kind of gather her will. When she wanted to gather her autonomy or her will, when she was hurt or crying, she would be ridiculed and humiliated. This really was quite a deep pain that was still echoing substantially years later.

We were exploring that and talking about that in a way, and it was good and helpful and honest and open, but it wasn't imaginal. Then suddenly I was able to see her and our relationship imaginally. Again, it's really to get a sense—I hope you can get a sense over time as you practice more and more—of what that territory is of the imaginal and how it feels, its particular flavors and qualities. That's partly why we elucidated the twenty-eight elements. It does feel quite different. You can be talking about the same thing, paying attention to the same dukkha, even using the imagination in working with that dukkha, but it's not imaginal.

Anyway, at that point, suddenly I was able to see her and also our relationship as imaginal. I shared that I sensed myself imaginatively as mystical husband. We've touched on this before, this particular dyad. From there, from that imaginal sense of being her mystical husband, I said, "I will protect you. I won't ridicule or humiliate you." But then it opened up for her, and that changed something for her. The whole kind of stuck grip dissolved and she felt empowered and much better.

What's going on here? Again, the sensitivity of the dyad. One person moves into the imaginal, takes a quantum leap into the imaginal, and senses it, maybe shares it—in this case I did share that particular sense in the soul—and it opens her up and heals something in her. She caught the soul sense from me. One person catches the soul sense from another, is ignited.

by others. We could view it that way, though it might also be that the image and the imaginal is, so to speak, in the field, and one person is simply articulating or experiencing it, allowing the whole field to make a quantum jump. In other words, it's there already—the field is pregnant with it—and it just requires one or both people to become aware. It exists in potentia, so to speak.

This is really interesting: the way a sudden shift into imaginal perception can then affect the whole field. Particularly fascinating here is the fact that it affected in a healing way what was happening with the other person. So one person's imaginal perception in relation to another heals what was conceived of and felt to be real, non-imaginal dukkha. To me, this is really significant.

I would venture to go a little further and say that sometimes when that kind of thing happens, it heals more than, let's say in this instance, an actual guarantee of so-called real protection. If I had just said to her, as a human being, as a conventionally conceived human being, "I will protect you," or "I won't let that happen," I don't know whether it would have had the same effect.

This is curious, because we usually—the normal view would conceive of the imaginal as not being real. Of course you want real protection. Here's what is, in a way, non-real, imaginal protection, yet it has more power. It has more healing, penetrative power for the being that feels in need of protection—vulnerable, unsafe.

Very probably this kind of thing happening imaginatively in the dyad would also be more healing than, say, just her mindfully imagining someone protecting her, or trying to use the imagination when it's not really imaginal. Similar possibilities exist with all kinds of realms of human need and pain and experience. Someone might need to feel respected or appreciated. Again, it might be that when that comes from an imaginal level, it actually wields a power and has an effect that is not available from more conventionally conceived human communication or relationship.

So I find this very interesting. It's partly a point about the sensitivity of the dyad—how things can shift very quickly when one person's experience flips into the imaginal or opens up to the imaginal—but also about what is going on in terms of dukkha and image, dukkha and the imaginal.

What exactly is the relationship between experiencing the need to feel the dukkha as real and linger there with that pain, and the opening up of the imaginal around and in relationship to that dukkha? Again, there may be different orderings. Sometimes—we've talked about this with dukkha and soul-making—you really need to be with the dukkha, experiencing it, taking it as real, feeling it. Then from that ground, from that soil, from that opening, an image can come. Sometimes it's the other way around: the introduction or reception, the birth, the opening to an image actually does something that allows the dukkha to be experienced more fully and to heal.

Is it that different dukkha, different situations need different approaches? Do different people have particular preferences in terms of the order they follow? I don't know. But the same choices, questions, and possibilities that arise in solo practice with dukkha and the imaginal also arise in the context of the dyad. The same kind of sensitivity, care, openness, and curiosity in navigating all that is required in a dyad.

I mentioned at the beginning—and possibly you can begin to hear as I share some of this—just how much this kind of practice demands of us good relational skills. On the last retreat, someone asked me about dyad practice, and one of the things I said in response was that it's really important to have the ability and willingness to "kiss and make up."

In other words, of course people bump into each other. Of course there are misunderstandings, conflicts of interest, things said that weren't so sensitive that cause pain and spin off, carrying residue, making impact, creating closing. Of course all that happens in human relationship. And in a dyad, working in this very intimate, very open, very sensitive and deep way with another person—it's a very sensitive field. So yes, expect that. Expect there will be things that happen that need attention and require considerable skill in repairing and taking care of.

I made that point on the retreat, and Yasmin picked it up in the closing circle—quite rightly, and I'm glad she said it—because "kiss and make up" sounds kind of superficial and flippant. It wasn't how I meant it, but it does sound something akin to brushing difficulty under the rug: kiss and make up, get on with it. That's not what I meant, and I'm really glad Yasmin pointed this out.

What I really mean is the willingness, the ability, the care, the carefulness, the precision, the patience, the humility, the openness, the flexibility, the love, the equanimity—all that is necessary, plus the sheer hard work sometimes of addressing difficulties that come up, whether in a dyad between two people, with one person in the dyad, or in a group.

Are you able to do that? Do you have that range of skills? They're not that common, actually. Certainly not commonly exercised in our world. There's not a lot of training in this—not even in the Dharma. But to be able to do that, I would say, is necessary to this kind of work.

So again, if we go back and talk about prerequisites, we really need to think: do I need to develop this if I want to pursue this practice? If I kind of like the sound of it, or I've had some times where I've practiced dyads or triads and it felt really beautiful, and I want to pursue it further?

Okay, but check your relational skills. Maybe they need some work, some exploration, some cultivation. Perhaps that can go on in parallel—maybe you take a little time and just develop that. Sometimes this needs to happen in the moment, in the fluidity of the back and forth of a dyad, in the give and take of real time. Sometimes something happens and people separate, then three days later they say, "Well, hold on, I really need to tell you something that happened the other day—I just feel really shut down." Then you talk about it after it happened. That's really important. But also in the moment, in the fluidity of the moment. So relational skills—really, really important. Indispensable.

One will also notice in practicing in dyads and triads and larger groups with soulmaking that you're going to notice all kinds of relational patterns. You'll notice your particular poisons, stances, contortions, inclinations in relationship coming up and hopefully beginning to be made conscious in the dyad. There are all kinds of possibilities here for what you might notice.

It might be the patterns of the way your energy is, or the energy body—there might be a certain contraction of the energy body, or a certain kind of brash throwing it out, or domination, or being dominated in ways that may be fine in some respects, even soul-making, but in other ways they manifest not so fine. It's a kind of habit, unconscious, not desired, and not very soul-making. You start to notice that one person or the other is doing most of the talking, and you think, "Oh, that's a pattern."

It might be patterns of the balance of attention—we talked about that. It might be a pattern of being more interested in one's own experience than the other, or vice versa, or not noticing the environment. It might be something quite subtle to put into words, not quite the balance of attention, but it might be that the gaze tends to be more penetrating of the other, and one person might have the pattern to be more penetrated, so to speak. I don't necessarily mean sexually, but there is that as well. It's more the intensity and intentness of the pattern of gazing.

All kinds of possibilities. I'm listing just a few general areas that one might notice patterns in. What gets really interesting is seeing and working with the subtleties of each individual and their patterns in terms of energy, emotion, psychology, relational patterns brought into the dyad.

We will notice all that. Sometimes these patterns will just change by themselves in the context of doing dyad practice. Because there's the natural expansion of the soul-making dynamic, of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, with all the change in perception and perception of self and sense of self and sensing the soul and sensing of other, sensing of relationship—all that naturally expands and can at times break certain structures, the breaking of the vessels. So sometimes these things change by themselves by virtue of the usually gradual alchemy that's happening in that particular crucible.

It's also really fine and available to notice certain patterns you observe about relational dynamics coming up in the dyad and decide deliberately to experiment with doing it differently. For instance, letting oneself be more the penetrated one, so to speak—more the gazed-upon one, more aware of oneself as object, as erotic-imaginal object for the other, rather than aware of one's erotic-imaginal gaze and attention penetrating the other. One decides to do it differently, or it might just change by itself.

Deciding deliberately to experiment with changing something—not changing this forever, but just trying to do it differently now, deliberately—again, that could be a theme. Remember, that's not ego. Just because you decided deliberately to experiment with something and do something or make a change in practice right now—just as in imaginal practice, when I decide to introduce something into the image or change the image or bring this image into relationship with that image, or bring this image into relationship with a certain dukkha—just because I decide to do that doesn't make it ego and thus not soul somehow.

The question, as always, is: Is it soul-making? Does it feel soul-making? Did I make this happen or did it happen by itself? It could be either. It's irrelevant. What matters, what's relevant, is: Does this feel soul-making right now, in whatever is happening, whatever direction one is exploring, whatever thread one is following?

Now in relation to all this—relational patterns, relational skills, the sensitivity of the dyad—I want to touch briefly on what we might call the different kinds and levels of fabrication that can happen in a dyad, specifically of self and other, but really anything. Specifically self and other, the different levels and kinds of fabrication of self and other in the dyad.

In soul-making dyad practice, we can welcome, expect, and be interested in and become familiar with and skilled with and get clear about whole ranges of the senses of self and other.

So we could divide that into, let's say, four right now.

One is what we might call the normal self-sense, the conventional human self-sense. Two normally conceived, conventionally conceived human selves in relationship, in conversation. So even though I'm sitting down to do a soul-making dyad, that level of perception, that level and type of fabrication—in other words, just the usual, normal, most popular level of fabrication—is just to fabricate the usual conventional sense of self and other.

That level is important and never just—even though my intention is to do a soul-making dyad, that doesn't leave that out as a possibility. It doesn't shut the door on that possibility. And often, this particular, this kind of conventional self-sense, if you like, is a really important stance when there's difficulty or relational stuff to talk through together or negotiate. So I'm sitting in a soul-making dyad, and it might be that actually for our whole time or some portion of the time, we're actually just talking as two human beings to each other on that level, working through a difficulty, whatever. And there's the kind of normal range and the normal type of the fabrication of the perception of self and other.

A second possibility is what I'm going to say in inverted commas is "no-self." And I'm putting that in inverted commas just because it's so common for people to report, "Oh, no-self, there was no-self. I was sitting with so-and-so and we were doing this or that soul-making dyad or whatever and there was no-self." I would say actually this refers to a range of ways and degrees of less self and other fabricating. So there are so many possibilities here.

We could feel like everything, including you and me, is all one awareness, one cosmic awareness, one cosmic love, as classic examples. There could be just the fading of personality. So my usual self doesn't arise and I'm not even really framing the other person in terms of their personality or their usual personality that I'm used to or they're used to. It may just be the fading of a kind of gross reactivity. So there's a really deep equanimity and quieting of the push and pull, the rub, the reactions of the being to whatever is happening. It could be very light experience. There are just five aggregates here, and there are just five aggregates there. And then all kinds of deeper perceptions of emptiness.

All of these involve some degree of fabricating of the self and of the perception of other, but less than the normal one that we usually are used to. So that's a possibility too. The normal self-sense, number one. Number two is just, let's say, not no-self, but less self in all kinds of different ways.

Third possibility is soul-making, imaginal perception, the sensing with soul of self and other. In other words, the self that I feel myself to be right now, and or the other. It's not the normal self-sense. It's not the conventional self-sense. Neither is it particularly unfabricated, like far down that spectrum. But it's an imaginal perception. It's a sensing with soul of the self, and other. And again, world and eros and whatever. And that would be the third possibility.

The fourth, which I can't remember if I've mentioned yet, is a sense of a third. Sometimes what can happen in dyads is this: I sense you, I sense me, and then I sense we, I sense us, and that us feels like not so much an independent soul entity, but it feels like it's a kind of soul. Somehow it includes us, somehow it's separate from us. So there's a sensing with soul of the dyad itself as a soul, if that makes sense. And that can arise in addition or at the same times as the sense of self and other. So that would be a fourth kind of sense of self and other that we could delineate there as possible, something to look out for.

This arising of a we—well, maybe I'll let you explore it, but it's potentially very significant. And I remember an interview with James Hillman that I read some years ago in a book of interviews. I found it a very interesting read. He said, he was talking about love, and he said, "Love needs a third. Love needs a third." So two is not enough to sustain love. There's I love you, you love me, wonderful. And for that love to be really—for it to be fertile, and when it is fertile, there's the arising, the sense of a third. And that the two, each both together, are in relationship to that third.

And if that third also becomes sensed with soul, if it has soul significance, soul resonances, if it's an imaginal perception—I don't just mean an intrapsychic, but if it's sensed with soul—then that allows... It's another level of, again, anchor for the relationship, another kind of influx or nourishment or service for the relationship.

So I'm reminded of a friend and her parents, sounds like, stayed in love with each other right into their very old age in what sounds like quite a delightful way. And partly, I wonder, unlike some other relationships that I can think of where that withers or something happens to the love there, her parents were actually both very committed Catholics, but also their Catholicism had a sense of depth and soul meaning for both of them.

And so there was this third that they were kind of in service to through their marriage, and they were in relationship to it. But there are many possibilities for this sense of "we." It doesn't have to be quite something like that Catholic example.

It could simply be the sense of we two sitting here. I can see that you're separate, and I feel separate to a certain extent. And yet there's this sense of a third that we can both access—not quite an amalgam, because the separateness, the two-ness, is retained within the we. But the we forms itself as a kind of third unit. You could say we're in it; you could say it's separate from us both. It's hard to articulate, but there are many possibilities.

I mention this as something that's possible to open up and discover.

But let's go slowly here. If there are all these different possibilities for the self-sense and the other-sense—in terms of whether they're imaginal, whether they're less fabricated, whether they're conventional—again, we're potentially faced with choices of navigation. How much conventionally human perception versus more fully imaginal at any time? Where on that spectrum toward the fully imaginal, fully authentic sensing with soul and eros—on that whole spectrum from the conventional to the fully imaginal—what's right right now? What feels right? How am I going to decide? What determines that?

And there's the possibility of steering it. Sometimes when things are really imaginal, we're not so interested in our personal stories, in the conventional human personal stories. We're almost other beings relating to each other. Sometimes the personal stories are then viewed imaginally, and they're sensed with soul, so there's not necessarily a separation there.

Sometimes attraction might come up of different kinds. Maybe there is eros; maybe it's sexual; maybe there's a sexual image and sexual energy arises. Or maybe there's sexual desire, but it's not really eros in the full sense that we mean it—in terms of impregnating the imaginal. There might be imagination there, but it's not really imaginal. Then the question becomes: is that okay right now, or do we want to steer away from that in different ways? Can I, for instance, see this human as divine manifestation—this human or that human as our portal into the divine? And that will do something to the whole sensing, the whole perception. Or I may be able to see and sense my human eros as the manifestation of divine eros.

All this range is possible, and all this navigation is possible. And again, the question is: what's right right now? What's necessary even?

What can also happen sometimes is that if you consider the self and the other, and also the world or environment, each of those—and the couple, the two—can be perceived either conventionally humanly or imaginally, or somewhere along that spectrum. What that means is you have four elements: self, other, the couple (the we), and the world. Each of them can be—let's just put it in binary terms—either imaginal or conventional, with all the different permutations of that.

So in one example I could give: there might be an imaginal self relating to a conventionally conceived human other. They might sense themselves conventionally in this conventional human sense, not imaginally. I might sense them that way. Or we both might be imaginal. Or of course, both can be conventional. Or it can be that my partner is an imaginal being—we're both perceiving her imaginally—but I'm still in my usual conventional sense of self, and she is looking at me from that imaginal perspective and talking to me. Maybe even that kind of gaze and that kind of relating from an imaginal to a conventional is healing.

You have all these possibilities there, with all those different elements, each of which can be in any position. You have to be a little careful if one is an imaginal other speaking to a conventionally conceived human self. I'm a little cautious about New Age channeling things and such. So all of it's imaginal middle way. All of it's with the fullness of intention for soulmaking.

But again, there are all these possibilities and directions that can suddenly find themselves in a certain constellation of these different permutations. Or deliberately, you're aware of it and you're actually cultivating a certain relationship between one kind and another. But all these are possibilities of what can open there. And healing is relevant—all that is relevant to healing sometimes—but again, fullness of intention, not just for healing, although that's in the bag of gifts.

But again, the question of what feels right here, what feels the most soulmaking, maybe at times what feels the most healing—how do we want to navigate? How do we navigate with that?

So in a way, what we could also say is that all these kinds of realms and possibilities of practice demand of us a great sensitivity. We could say, just in relation to what I just described, it demands a kind of triple sensitivity and triple capacity, at least:

One is sensitivity and capability of skillful relationship to the human level of the other—regarding them, relating to them, respecting them in the conventional human sense. Is that there? To what degree is that there? How can I cultivate it more?

Second sensitivity and capacity needed is to my human level—my conventionally human conception, sense of myself. Actually being sensitive to "Ouch, that hurt when they just said that," or "I need this right now," or whatever it is.

And thirdly, sensitivity and capability of skillful and artful relationship with an image that's present.

So the needs and requests of all three—conventionally human other, conventionally human self, whatever images are present—they determine together what is then appropriate.

I hope all this makes sense in terms of possibilities and things to look out for.

Now, I said I wasn't going to talk much about Eros, or rather, I'm not going to talk much about when there's really a lot of Eros between the two members of the dyad. I'll say just a little bit, but I won't really go into it and that whole realm level of possibility.

Just to be aware that in some instances, or with whatever, when there's a certain spark, or just the conditions are supportive, just how much eros may arise for the other. And then, you know, this brings the questions: Can I contain it? Am I okay with that? Are they okay with it? Can we hold the boundary, whatever the boundary is, if there is a boundary? Can I handle all that eros, all that desire, all that sexual energy, if that's what's arising?

What about the boundaries, but also what about just the inevitable slips of eros into craving, the contraction into craving, of the imaginal into some kind of reified perception? Does my art extend to the ability to notice when that's happening? Because it feels very different. I notice when that's happening and I can open things up, I can change things, I can support the movement, the expansion of craving into eros and of rarefied perception of fixation, fixated image into imaginal image.

And again, what else am I bringing in? Do I need to feel attractive here? Because that's not the fullness of intention, is it? As always, checking: okay, there's a lot of sexual energy, there's a lot of desire, whatever, it's definitely got some eros in it. Is it soul-making? And as always, letting that be the guide.

Some people will be practicing this kind of dyad where, this situation, either they are already in a romantic sexual relationship or they want to be and it's fine, there's no other issues, there's no boundary issues and it's all, it's kind of open territory. And they might be open and okay to having, you know, sex or some degree of sexual intimacy.

And it might be that in the course of working in a dyad, there's a lot of sexual eros that arises, and people decide to be sexual together. So as I said, that's grown-ups consenting adults. It's their choice, of course, and that's available as human beings, as long as it's okay with the other people.

But just a word about that. Careful, if I'm interested in the soul-making dyad, careful about the intention. It may be that actually having some physical, actual sexual contact may be soul-making. Or you may find, if this is your situation, this is what you explore as part of your larger explorations, you may find that being sexual in a soul-making dyad or kind of a soul-making dyad leading into that may actually squander the erotic charge and the erotic tension necessary to sensing the soul. The two-ness collapses, the sexual energy and charge collapses in different ways.

Now, that in itself is fine, but it's a certain choice and it's something to be aware of and something to decide: is that what we want right now? Or it could be that you decide to be sexual and physically sexual. And what is needed if we want to allow that and support that sexual contact to be sensed with soul, to be soul-making?

So remember, soul-making is more than heart. We can have our lovely, heartful, making love or whatever. It has a whole range, but soul-making means more than heart and more than a lot of other things. So what might be needed? If that's what we decide in this instance or whatever, that we're going to be sexual, we're going to make love or whatever it is, have some kind of sexual intimacy, actual physical sexual intimacy, and we want it to be soul-making, then what supports that?

Does it have to do with the intention? Does it have to do with attention? What kind of attention? Does it have to do with the pacing of the whole unfolding of the process? Perhaps. So I don't think there's any formula here, but you'll have to, if this is speaking just to those where this is relevant to at the moment, you'll have to kind of feel: okay, well, how does that happen?

You can have a lot of sense of soul and sensing the soul at one moment, and then it suddenly collapses. Like I said, you can't assume that just because I had it now, now we change to this activity, mode of behavior, whatever it is, we're going to have sex, and I assume that the soul-making sense continues. Maybe, but often not. It needs a certain kind of care. And what does it mean? I have to kind of experiment and find out, perhaps.

Or it might be that you decide: okay, there's a lot of eros, there's a lot of charges, maybe you're talking about it, maybe you're including it and working with it, but you keep the formal time, whatever that was that you decided to devote to soul-making dyad practice, you keep that formal time for practice and that formal space, and you let the eros channel into the sensing with soul without acting it out during that time. And afterwards, you know, your mobile phone timer goes off, right, the dyad's over, then you can do whatever you want, you know.

But these are choices. Again, it's not for me to set any rules or whatever, but again, just to point out how much, how sensitive the whole thing is, how sensitive the sensing the soul is, how sensitive the dyad is, how sensitive we are as creatures and as souls, and what care is needed and to find out and to experiment.

A couple more things. I mean, sometimes, and again, depends on the situation, depends on the actual relationship between two human beings who are in a dyad, etc. But it may be that one feels lots of sexual desire, sexual eros for the other, and lets the other know. So person A feels a lot of sexual desire, etc.

And person B actually feels it and is aware of it and lets person A know that they can feel it and can feel it flowing toward them. And actually they appreciate it and that it's lovely. And then it may be more bearable energetically in and for person A. Is it just because they shared it that it's then spread, so to speak, to be held in a larger field of the dyad? So there's less pressure, more space, and they're not just carrying it themselves? Or is it the fact that in knowing that it's okay and being reassured that it's okay for that degree of eros and desire and sexual energy to be around, that the other person doesn't feel threatened by it—that they feel less need to button it down and repress it or hide it?

So again, depending on the relationship, depending on the trust, depending on the context, including these things and talking about them and being careful how you hold them together, what you do with them, how you decide, how you sense them, how you relate to them—all of this is really, really important. But there's so much potential here in diet practice.

I'm not, as I said, just mentioning a few things about when the sexual eros gets really quite strong and intense, but really when there's any eros between human beings—not even working in a diet, not even sexual eros. That eros, as we've pointed out so much over the last few years, is a key and a galvanizer of the whole soul-making dynamic and therefore the sensing with soul and what that can open us to and bring to us and give to us.

There's a couple of lines from Rumi in this regard. I don't know where it's from, but I'm assuming it's a poem that he wrote to Shams, his mystical lover. And it says:

"The tender words we said to one another are stored in the secret heart of heaven. One day, like rain, they will fall and spread and our mystery will grow green over the world."

We could hear that—I don't know exactly what Rumi's whole philosophy was, despite the beauty of the poetry—but "stored in the secret heart of heaven," the tender words we said to one another, stored in that realm or dimension of being of eternality. They're stored there at that level in the angelic realm when our tender words are spoken out of sensing each other with soul. When not even just words, but those perceptions, that sensing itself is stored somehow eternally.

And you have, again, eternality as one of the nodes, one of the elements of the imaginal. There is that sense that they exist somehow. They make an imprint, an impression, and somehow they're eternal. Of course it's impermanent, but in some other way, this profound sensing with soul has touched my being, touched my heart and soul. It feels to be eternal. I sense it as eternal, stored in the secret heart of heaven, in the mundus imaginalis.

"One day, like rain, they will fall and spread, and our mystery will grow green over the world." It's like a kind of cosmopoiesis. Those words, that gaze, that sensing with soul will spread and its mystery will grow green over the world. It changes our sense of the world that we're in.

And as I said, I shared in an earlier talk on this series, sometimes there is a sense with any image, intrapsychic or extrapsychic, but perhaps more keenly I wonder when we're working in a diet or when we're sharing this sense of participating in an imaginal sense, participating in an image with another—that sense of participating, the privilege of participating in that dimension of being, in that, whatever we want to call it, the mundus imaginalis, the angelic dimension, can be felt to be such a privilege, such a grace, to participate in the eternal that way, and in the divine that way.

This can be sensed and felt in the depths of the depths of one's soul as perhaps one of the greatest privileges of human being. And to taste that, even if it's only for some moments or a few minutes, can change the whole tenor and outlook and relationship with existence, with life and death. To taste that for a few minutes, to taste that for a few moments even, changes my relationship with dying. Changes the way I sense myself, my human being, this particular other, but human being in general. Changes my sense of the world.

So that's there with all images, intrapsychic or extrapsychic, all sensing with soul. But I'm wondering whether there's something about sensing oneself in relationship with another actual human being that way that can bestow this gift and this grace and this sense of profound privilege.

Anyway, so much is possible. So much awaits discovery and creation.

CHAPTER 183

The Phoenix of Metaphysics (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 2h30

> In this opening talk of a series on metaphysics, Rob Burbea examines fundamental questions of ontology (what is real) and epistemology (how we know). He traces how the classical scientific worldview of Galileo, Descartes, and Newton - viewing the universe as purposeless matter moving according to physical laws - became dominant yet has been profoundly challenged by quantum physics and relativity theory.
>
> Burbea discusses how quantum mechanics reveals that observation affects reality, particles exist in superposition states, and the past itself depends on present measurements. He explores how philosophers of science like Thomas Kuhn showed that paradigms shape perception, and how even rigorous scientific method involves unproven assumptions and hidden motivations. Drawing parallels with emptiness teachings, he examines how our conceptual frameworks and ways of looking fundamentally shape what we perceive as real.
>
> This investigation has crucial implications for practices of "sensing with soul" and imaginal perception. Burbea argues that questions of epistemology are also questions of social order, affecting what we respect and value culturally. He introduces the possibility of an "imaginal middle way" - a poetic sensibility that holds images and soul-perceptions as neither ultimately real nor unreal, allowing for duty with freedom, sacredness without fixation, and endless creative interpretation.

I'd like to talk, as I said in the introductory talk of this series, about metaphysics - really, ontology and epistemology.

Ontology, loosely speaking, is a philosophical term for the exploration or study of what is actually real and what is not real. Epistemology is the philosophical term for the exploration of how we know - how we know what's real or not real, what kind of knowledge about the world, about ourselves, about anything can we trust, what constitutes knowledge and what does not constitute knowledge. These two areas, ontology and epistemology, are intimately woven together. They kind of really imply each other, and traditionally they form part of what's called metaphysics.

I've talked about this a fair amount over the years, woven into the emptiness teachings certainly, but also woven into the soul-making teachings. Perhaps there are slightly different openings into the territory tonight.

I'm supposing that some people will listen and feel a need to hear this kind of material - this kind of exploration, these kinds of questions, the history of our culture's thinking and explorations in philosophy and science that has gone on over the years. There will be a need for that both in terms of legitimizing for themselves practices of sensing with soul and the imaginal, but also how one relates to existence. Of course that's not different - that's not other than the practice of sensing with soul. Sensing with soul has implications about how I live and how I see and how I feel the world.

Some people will feel a need for this and others will just be interested and find it fascinating - there's some degree of eros in the exploration of these kinds of ideas and hearing about them. Other people will maybe neither be interested nor feel a need. All of that variety in where it lands with you is, to me, interesting. I hope to weave in the fact of that variety and that range of relationships to these kinds of explorations and questions into the points I'm trying to make.

But as I've already alluded to, why is this important? Why are the questions of what is actually real and what kind of knowing, what constitutes knowledge, what constitutes knowing, what kind of knowing and sense of things and sense of truth are trustworthy or valid - why are these important questions?

Well, you can, I hope, guess the answer already: all that has implications for how a person will regard or value the whole domain of practices that we're calling sensing with soul. If I've decided that this kind of thing is real and that kind of thing is absolutely not real and therefore worthless, not valuable, not valid, and if the kinds of perceptions and senses involved in what we call sensing with soul are in that category - not real, worthless - then those kinds of perceptions and what they bring to the soul and the heart and the action and the speech and the aspiration and the dedication and devotion in human life is also relegated to the pile of rubbish, unworthy, not valid.

Conversely, though, if we can open up at least the possibilities of ontologies and epistemologies that justify and give value and validation to sensing with soul, that undergird those kinds of practices and support them, then that has big implications - not just for individuals, but culturally, for our relationships to ourselves, to other human beings, to other species, to the planet, to the world, to our desire. All of that - how we view all of that and how seriously we take it and how powerful the consequences of such practices can be.

So I think there definitely is a case for saying this is important territory. And yet still, as I said, that range and variety of how much people feel they need to open this area up or explore it or hear about it and how much they're even interested - that variety itself is also interesting and something to consider and reflect on.

But in line with what I just said, someone called Moscovici wrote: "Questions of epistemology" - questions of what constitutes actual knowledge, what constitutes knowing, and not just illusory fantasy - "are also questions of social order." We could add: questions of ontology are also questions of social order. As I said, epistemology and ontology go together, involve each other.

Why are they questions of social order? Because of what I just said - because of the fact that what we consider real often forms the limit of what we genuinely and deeply respect. So if, for example, the kinds of senses of things and perceptions, the kinds of knowing that we open up to and support with sensing with soul, if that is considered not real, we won't respect it. We'll only respect something else called real. All that shapes what a culture does, what it prioritizes, how the economy is geared, where taxes go, what people invest in, how they measure progress and well-being.

There are also issues of power involved on top of that. As Foucault points out, knowledge and power are inextricably related. When a culture as a whole, either openly or more subtly, decrees "this is real and that is not real, therefore this is worthy of respect, that is not worthy of respect," then that also automatically brings into play a hierarchy of power, of social relations and social structures dependent on which camp one falls into. If unhappily one falls into the camp of sympathizing with and finding beauty and import in the kinds of sensing with soul, for example, and they're not respected, they're not in the dominant paradigm, then they get - either subtly or openly - pushed down the pecking order in the hierarchy.

Of course, all that can happen even ostensibly in a democracy where there's free speech, or in our culture where many people are still frightened or it's taboo - even for completely irreligious and secular people, it's still often taboo to discriminate against people who have certain religious views. And yet still there might be more subtle hierarchies of power in all kinds of ways.

So I think all this is important, and I want to trace a little bit of history, lay out how things have somewhat unraveled, at least at one stratum of society - maybe a more intellectual stratum - and also at another level.

and what that might open up, that kind of unraveling, that kind of... the place where we've arrived in relation to these questions about truth and reality and knowledge. Because many, many of us will actually be ignorant about all this.

There have been certain developments in philosophy but even more so in science in the last 120 to 130 years that really open up and challenge and shape the very foundations of these questions of ontology and epistemology, and yet very little of that has trickled down to the person on the street.

So, just very briefly, historically: following the scientific revolution some hundreds of years ago, and the fathers, if you like, of that revolution—Galileo, Descartes, Locke, Newton—what came slowly, gradually to dominate... and that's an important point as well, that this revolution, like many revolutions, wasn't something everyone said, "Oh yeah, of course, that's right, I get it now, how stupid we've been." It was something that was very gradually brought into the mainstream and gradually adopted by most people unconsciously through a kind of indoctrination to become the dominant view.

What Galileo, Descartes, Locke and Newton and others instigated or brought about—we can call that the classical scientific worldview. And that has become, as I said, the dominant worldview, probably for most people on the planet right now. So that even when a person feels allegiances to other contradictory views, there's still a lot of gravitational pull towards this classical scientific worldview. I think it was Charles Taylor who noted that one of the marks of a secular age is that no one can completely, naively believe certain beliefs anymore that don't fit the classical scientific worldview. There's always a kind of pool of doubt there because of the weight of it and the entrenchment of it.

And also, because it's been so successful—and that's partly how it grew to dominance—it wields great predictive power, for instance, about where a cannonball will land or a rocket or an engine or whatever it is, and great power in what it has enabled humanity to build technologically. Hugely helpful and hugely problematic as well, but enormous power, both in terms of its predictive power and its technological power and its power over nature.

And with all that—because of its predictive power and its technological consequences or spawnings—it has come to be regarded as true. It's the truth. It's how things are. Which, strictly speaking, doesn't follow. And if we care about these things, that's a point worth noting.

But what does that classical scientific worldview, the dominant paradigm of scientific materialism, what does it hold? It holds that the universe is made of little bits of stuff. We call them atoms, but we might be, in that view, loosely referring to subatomic particles, although that would be a mistake. But loosely, the world is made up—everything is made up—of atoms, and these atoms are set in motion and then follow their motions according to certain physical laws. And they bump into each other and interact with each other according to certain physical laws. And the whole thing runs like clockwork.

So there is no divinity present in the workings of that. And the whole thing is purposeless. The purposeless movement of atoms. It's not moving towards anything, any purpose. There's no meaning to the universe, to the movement of matter.

In its extreme form, it reduces the whole of the universe to just matter functioning like clockwork and somehow producing consciousness as well. And in fact, the clockwork analogy is interesting because it was a deliberate analogy, I think, on the part of Descartes and other people. And it was just that time in history where clocks were either becoming more prominent or had just been invented. So the idea for the philosophy and the vision of nature was given a little bit by what was present as a new technology and a prevalent technology that one encountered in the world.

It's interesting now, if you read reports on current scientific theories, how they don't talk about clockwork anymore—they talk about information, and the whole universe is just information, or the whole universe is a supercomputer, or even there are theories about the whole universe being in fact a computer simulation. The point is that it's interesting to note how the worldview can just be conditioned by what's prevalent in terms of the technology that we encounter.

But all of that either has nothing to say about meaning or, taken a little bit further, actually postulates dogmatically or posits dogmatically a meaningless universe, a meaningless cosmos. It has nothing to say about ethics, and correspondingly, in the strict view of that scientific materialism, there is nothing to say about ethics, as ethics are not integral to the universe.

It's also what we might call a kind of flatland view in the sense that it lacks meaning, it lacks divinity, it lacks a lot of dimensionality. And again, that word's a little tricky, dimensionality, but partly what we could say dimensionality is like depth. It's like what's not immediately apparent.

So actually, that scientific worldview, that classical scientific worldview, only allows certain kinds of dimensionality. For example, the mathematical laws—whether of gravity or electrons or whatever—are a kind of dimension of the being of matter. So there's matter and a deeper strata that's not separate from matter. It's part of matter, but it's a deeper dimension, if you like—the laws that matter obeys, the various mathematical equations and laws. And so it admits only that kind of dimensionality, and all the time it's supposed to keep the view that all this is subject to experimental proof. So if a law gets disproved or improved upon, or if a deeper strata of reality—a more fundamental particle, a smaller particle that makes up larger subatomic particles—is discovered or proved not to exist or whatever...

This view represents what we might call a flatland world—a flat universe without dimensionality. Yet depending on how we use that word, we can say that certain kinds of dimensionality are allowed within this framework. All of this, as I mentioned, came over time to be regarded simply as common sense—what everyone would agree upon as the truth of things. But it didn't start that way at all.

This worldview took considerable time to evolve into the dominant paradigm, where everyone would simply accept that this is how the world is, how we think about it, how we relate to it, and indeed how we actually see it.

This world, to specify some more of its components, is a world of what Newton called absolute space and absolute time. Space is conceived as pure, empty space—absolutely still and forming a kind of backdrop for all this purposeless movement of atoms according to physical laws. Space is simply neutral, a receptacle, a backdrop. Time, too, is absolute—the same for everyone anywhere, simply trundling on regardless of what is happening or what is present.

Also wrapped up in this framework is the element and postulate of cause and effect: this effect is due to this cause or these causes in the past. Central to the conception of this cosmos, both in the idea and theory of it, and importantly in what observations for a long time seemed to verify and validate, was that the universe is made of things that are clearly this or that. It's a wave, or it's a particle, or it's this kind of particle as opposed to that kind of particle—made up of clearly differentiable things with clearly differentiable properties.

For example, the position of a particle, its speed or momentum, its energy, the time at which a certain event happened in the life of that particle or collision—all these are clear and clearly measurable things. Accurately, definitively measurable, at least in potential. They all exist independent of the observer and independent of the way the observer chooses to observe, the mode of measurement or observation, the way of looking.

These clearly differentiable entities that this cosmos is made up of are also only influenced—their behavior and manifestation dependent only on obvious interactions they have had in their vicinity. All of which became, as I said, the common sense view. If this particle possesses this property or manifestation, it's because of this interaction or whatever, which we can trace to something in its locale.

After a few hundred years of this, however, experimental results came in that started to shake up this entire worldview and caused a great amount of commotion and agitation and debate and brilliant and bold investigation and discussion and innovation. This resulted in the double revolution of Einstein's relativity theories and also the quantum revolution of quantum physics.

It was really a shattering of that whole worldview—its very foundations. Its foundational assumptions were rocked and broken and brought into question as if the rug had been pulled out from under the whole sense of the cosmos and the ability to even make sense of the cosmos.

Some of you will know some of this, but for example, classically light was regarded as a wave, and then it was seen to be able to manifest both as a wave and as a particle. What it manifested to us—whether it manifested as a wave or as a particle—depended on the kind of observation we made. These are two complementary, or actually contradictory manifestations, contradictory attributes. To be a wave is something very different than to be a particle. A particle is a small thing in a fixed location, and a wave is not—it's spread out. What's the reality there?

There's a term called superposition. In quantum physics, this refers to something being in a kind of hybrid state of two complementary or contradictory states. For example, when we measure it this way, we see a wave. When we observe it that way, we see a particle. When we're not measuring it, it's neither one nor the other. The wave and particle states are superposed.

If that example is not that radical for you, consider also the example that's central to Schrödinger's cat thought experiment, where a radioactive particle is in a state of being both decayed and not decayed, or neither decayed nor not decayed. This radioactive decay—has it happened yet or has it not happened yet? It's said to be in a state of superposition, where it's both decayed and not decayed at the same time. But what that actually means is something very abstract.

With this superposition principle, recently in the last few decades, they've observed it in larger and larger objects. There can be a tendency for some people—and I think this is interesting when we talk about the psychology of epistemology—to hear some of these remarkable, mind-boggling results and facts about the quantum world and kind of relegate them: "That's all for very little stuff which I don't really encounter." They go about their everyday life with a view of reality that's essentially unchanged, that has absorbed that common sense, classical physics worldview and takes that to be the way it is.

But this superposition, this baffling, indescribable—at least indescribable in language or concept—coexistence somehow of this state that encompasses two contradictory states, this superposition has been observed more recently in larger and larger things. Where's the boundary?

Can I really just relegate all this, all these discoveries and conundra of the quantum world? Can I really relegate that to something that bears no relevance for my life?

As I said, these are contradictory states that are somehow existing together—even if we say "existing," I'm not really sure that's the right word. But there's a contradiction of the law of the excluded middle. If a particle has decayed, it can't be not decayed, and if it's not decayed, it can't be decayed. And somehow, before observation, that particle is said to be in a superposed state. It's neither decayed nor not decayed.

When we talk about an individual particle, physicists speak of the wave function of that particle. This really describes a sort of smudge of probability, a probability cloud of where that particle will be and how fast it will be moving and all those other properties that were thought to be independent of the observer.

One realizes that what happens when we're not observing it is all we can talk about is this abstract mathematical function in many-dimensional space. When you do a certain manipulation of it, you get the probability of finding the particle over there or the probability of finding it over here. In other words, before we observe it, it doesn't have a definite position. It doesn't have a definite velocity. It doesn't have a definite energy. It doesn't have a definite time at which a certain interaction happened, a certain event happened in its life. It doesn't even have a particular property of being, let's say, a wave or a particle.

This is radical. The whole world of discrete, clear, independently existing phenomena was decimated and was replaced with something that really the conceptual mind struggles to understand, even though quite sophisticated and very accurate mathematics has come out of it. We can make these predictions of the probability that we'll find the particle decayed, or the probability we'll find it over here as opposed to over there. But what actually is going on, independent of the observer, remains something that the conceptual mind really struggles to understand. Yet it's clear that it's not how we usually think of the world, and it's not the picture painted by classical science as developed by Galileo, Descartes, Locke and Newton. It's clearly not that picture that's reality.

Bohr coined this term "complementarity"—wave and particle as complementary views of something. But as physicist David Bell pointed out, that's not really the right word. Complementary is when you look at the backside of an elephant and see a tail and a bum, and you look at the front side and see a trunk and big ears. Two people who can't see each other, on either side of the elephant, get those two views. If they get a few more people and put those views together—the side view, the front view—then they'll get a composite picture of complementary perspectives on the elephant. They can put that together and make sense of it. It fits together.

David Bell pointed out that actually Bohr should have used the word "contradictory"—or rather, that's implicit in what he means by complementary. I wouldn't go so far as what David Bell said; he had a particular agenda. But really inherent in what Niels Bohr meant by complementary was contradictory. These are not commensurable pictures. We cannot put these pictures together—wave and particle. You cannot put the picture together of "it's decayed" and "it's not decayed" for this radioactive atom.

As I said, the whole idea of inherent existence, an objective existence of phenomena independent of the observer, independent of the way of looking, independent of the way of measuring—that got fractured, it got broken in a very profound way. It became clear that what we see depends on how we look, depends on how we measure. What manifests depends on how we observe.

This was also found to extend to the past. We think, okay, what manifests now depends on how I observe. But what seems to go even further—what does go even further—is the fact that a measurement made now seems to determine what happened in the past. So in other words, was this particle a wave or a particle? Did it manifest as a wave or a particle in the past? It can depend on a decision I make about how I look at it, how I observe, how I measure it, actually billions of years later. So how the Big Bang was in its details, for example, is something that depends on how we look now.

This was originally an idea proposed by physicist John Wheeler, and recently it's been corroborated in the laboratory on a smaller scale, but the principle remains. How we look now determines the sense we have of what happened in the past, what was actual in the past. There is no inherently existing past. It also depends on how we look.

You can hear, I hope, just how radical some of these findings are. Victor Mansfield is a physicist and also a Buddhist practitioner who has written a couple of books on this kind of material. He basically reports that we have an idea that a particle goes from here to there and we can trace its route. This is the flight path, so to speak, from A to B. And we can presume it took that path or we can observe it taking that path. And actually, that's not the case.

He says, "Our conception of nature is at fault. The natural yet incorrect assumption that the photon or electron or whatever has a well-defined trajectory, a well-defined path, as it works its way through the instrument in the laboratory or whatever it is, whether or not we look and whether or not we know that trajectory—it must have had one." So that's wrong. It's simply wrong to imagine that the past already exists in full detail in the present. So now he's talking about that absence of inherent existence of the past as well.

Light, and indeed all matter—electrons, protons, and everything else—does not take on either a wave or particle nature until we decide at the last possible moment whether to measure its wave or particle properties. Prior to our choice, its nature remains fundamentally ill-defined.

The profound implication is that the history of the universe is not written out in full detail. Such a fully defined and explicit past is an imaginary construction, a theory, a mental imputation—what Wheeler calls "a giant prejudice." While we can normally get away with believing in an objective past that exists in complete detail in our everyday lives, quantum mechanics reveals that at the deepest level, we must actively participate in defining the universe. Reality is not sitting out there, fully objective and independent, waiting for us to reveal its pre-existent, well-defined, intrinsic nature.

The parallels with how we teach emptiness and the radical dependence on ways of looking should be apparent. Wheeler continues: "Quantum mechanics demands that we abandon some of our most cherished beliefs about the world. Particles and waves do not exist simultaneously in some definite way, only waiting for us to call one of these properties forth. Prior to our measurement, prior to observation, the system is truly indefinite, lacking in independent existence."

There's also a complete collapse of our conventional notion of causality. Since causality requires definite objects exchanging energy or exerting forces on each other, is it any wonder that independent existence and causality fall to the ground together in quantum physics?

These ideas about the lack of inherent existence of the past were further developed by Richard Feynman and his colleagues Murray Gell-Mann and Jim Hartle in what became known as the consistent histories approach—different ways of understanding this fundamental absence of inherent existence, not just in the present, but in the past as well.

We could catalog countless such findings and observations—startling, radical, mind-blowing discoveries that shatter our conventional assumptions. Many of you are familiar with Einstein's relativity theory and the fact that time itself, the measurement of simultaneity between events, depends entirely on the observer's frame of reference. There's no absolute simultaneity independent of perspective—it all depends on relative motion. The same applies to distance: lengths contract, space and time become relative rather than absolute.

But it's not just time and space that prove observer-dependent. Mass—how heavy something is—and the energy of an object all depend on motion and perspective. These seemingly fundamental properties that we assumed were inherent and absolute have been systematically fractured and decimated as coherent, independent notions.

Even more startling is a theoretical prediction that, while not yet directly measured, has strong theoretical support: when someone is accelerating—whether in a rocket or simply being pulled by a rope in the vacuum of interstellar space—their measurements reveal a completely different reality from that of a stationary observer. Where the stationary observer sees empty space devoid of particles, the accelerating observer measures space filled with a hot gas of particles. What's there or not there, the very existence of matter, depends entirely on perspective and way of looking. Temperature, the presence or absence of particles—all relative to the observer's state.

This catalog of baffling results continues to grow. Many quantum physicists simply get on with their work—calculating atomic decay rates, building computers and electronic devices, even constructing weapons—while essentially shrugging off these profound implications. They can achieve remarkably accurate calculations and successful engineering without grappling with the deeper questions: What is actually going on here? What does this do to our fundamental sense of reality?

For some physicists, this entire quantum revolution strikes a deeply wrong note. Something must have gone awry somewhere; there must be some fundamental error. Among that relatively small portion of physicists who actually care about the implications for ontology and epistemology—for our understanding of reality itself—there remains significant controversy.

Let me share another perspective from physicist Marcus Appleby, whose language echoes remarkably the terminology we use in discussing emptiness: "In quantum mechanics, what you see depends on how you look. Make one kind of measurement on the electromagnetic field and you will obtain results consistent with it being a smoothly varying wave. Make another different kind of measurement and you will obtain results consistent with it being a collection of discrete particles. Which of these pictures is the true one? Quantum mechanics declines to say, just as it declines to say what is going on in a physical system when no one is looking."

The fact that the outcome depends on the observer's decision as to which measurement to make casts doubt on the assumption that physics passively records events that would have happened anyway in the absence of experimental intervention. Again, there's this parallel with our perception as human beings—is it a passive receiving? Is there even such a thing as bare attention? I'm not equating the two, but there's a parallel there.

He says this represents a subtle—though I don't think it's subtle—departure from the Cartesian ideal of total objectivity: the Cartesian ideal of the world trundling along like clockwork, independent of the observer, where potentially one can gather facts about the status of all things.

Marcus Appleby reflects on the history of physics since the quantum revolution in the early part of the twentieth century, noting that some, including Einstein, really objected to all this and said something must be fundamentally wrong. They tried to build alternative theories that were more congruent with the idea of things existing objectively and independently. But he goes on to say that no one can say for sure that Einstein's hopes will not be fulfilled at some time in the future, but it does seem that the effect of eighty years—probably more than eighty years now—of theoretical work has been to make these hopes look increasingly forlorn.

His feeling is that an adequate understanding of quantum mechanics ultimately depends not on sophisticated technical developments—not on new formulae or theories—but on some simple conceptual shift, something like the perceptual shift which occurs when one looks at a diagram like the Necker cube. You know those diagrams—drawings of cubes on a piece of paper where you can see the cube in three dimensions, and then you look again and the whole cube has flipped, as if you're looking at it from a very different angle. Or the duck-rabbit picture—those images where you look at it one way and see a duck, then look at it another way and what was the space around the duck now looks like a rabbit. Or those Escher paintings where there's a complicated scene that can flip in your vision to reveal a different scene where everything has a different context, geometry, and shape. But in all these—the Necker cube, the duck-rabbit, the Escher paintings—what you can't do is see both at the same time.

Then he goes on to say that quantum mechanics is not intrinsically weird. It only seems weird because we insist on looking at it through Cartesian spectacles—the spectacles we've inherited and absorbed almost into ourselves from the legacy of Descartes, Galileo, and Newton. Mind is separate from matter. Matter exists objectively, independent of consciousness, of the way of looking, of the way of observing, of the mind. And it's possible to get objective—at least in theory—measurements of the factual status of things at any time.

He says the problem is that Cartesian assumptions have become so deeply ingrained in our thinking that it's hard to find the right non-Cartesian spectacles.

So here's someone who isn't shrugging and just saying, "Well, whatever, I don't know, but I can get on with my mathematics and my calculations and my building computers or bombs or whatever." He's not saying he objects to these findings. He's saying what we need to object to is our insistence on our inherited and indoctrinated worldview about mind, matter, and how the cosmos is.

As these results presented themselves gradually over the years and decades in investigations in physics, at some point—stimulated by those puzzling results and by the wrestling of physicists with those findings and observations, but also by other factors—philosophers of science also began to question the whole conceptual underpinning of the scientific endeavor and approach itself. They questioned whether it might be not quite what it was racked up to be in terms of this notion—ranked up to be as an endeavor where the whole scientific enterprise was an approach to truth, a discovery of truth independent of any biases or fashions or ways of looking, independent of the conceptual framework.

Gradually, over the twentieth century and continuing still, many philosophers of science from different angles began to question the whole basis of the scientific method and what its relationship was to truth and its own kind of integrity.

Victor Mansfield offers a nice analogy here. He says the scientific method, with its demands of reproducibility, completely controlled environment, and quantitative measurement, is only one way of interacting with nature. Science is not a pure revelation of nature in isolation, but rather nature's response to our particular form of questioning. Exploring the issues of measurement in quantum mechanics leads us to realize that science is in part an expression of a unique interaction between nature and ourselves. In quantum mechanics—to our great distress, or to our great joy, I would add—we cannot say what nature is like independent of that interaction.

The scientific method has often been likened to a fishnet that captures certain kinds of aquatic life but allows many interesting forms to pass right through it. Because an extraordinarily beautiful little fish or alga escapes this net, should we deny its presence or reality in nature's ocean? Such elusive life forms might hold the key to a great deepening of our understanding.

He continues: if we do not understand the limits of the scientific method, then we are doomed to apply it where it hinders our understanding rather than enhances it.

He is a scientist, and I'm certainly not saying that science is rubbish or that it has no applicability, no use, no domain of relevance and import. But it often gets overextended. There is an overreach of the scientific method and project in what I've talked about before as scientism—believing that this scientific method and the worldview that goes with it, which is actually an archaic worldview at this point belonging to the mode of classical physics, can explain everything in the universe.

But it may very well be that this whole conceptual structure, this whole paradigm and the scientific method and approach, actually, as Victor Mansfield points out, only reveals certain things. Other aspects of reality, other phenomena in the universe, will simply not be picked up because you're looking with the wrong paradigm, with the wrong lenses.

As I said, how would we ever ascertain meaning in the universe or meaning to the cosmos? Right from the start, such things are barred from the scientific method. It's a methodology of approach that has at some point surreptitiously become a conclusion and is claimed as a fact. It has overextended its reach.

What we see depends on how we look.

What we see, and part of how we look, is the whole conceptual framework or paradigm. Thomas Kuhn, the famous philosopher of science, wrote that paradigm is prerequisite to perception itself. This means that we're always approaching phenomena —whatever phenomena—with some kind of conceptual framework, informed by some kind of history of what it's important to look for. What are the important questions? What are the salient features here? And our whole gaze, our whole perspective is engineered and conditioned and limited and empowered, both, by that paradigm, whatever that paradigm is. What we see—perception itself—depends on that paradigm to a great extent.

As I said, there is quite popular now a certain current, both among certain scientists but also among many lay people, this kind of overreach of the scientific method and an over-claiming of its conclusions. One unjustifiably makes certain conclusions about what is established fact in the scientific world. This is quite common with some neuroscientists or with people who are hovering at the interface with the world of neuroscience—some psychologists and different kinds of people—when they claim that mind and consciousness arise from matter. They say it can be explained purely in terms of neurological or electrical impulses in the neurons and synapses, as if that was an established fact and conclusion that had been proven. But it has not. It absolutely has not. But again, there's this kind of creep of claim.

There are, as I said, limits to the scientific method that some people are becoming aware of or have written about from all kinds of different angles. If we take that example I just talked about—this idea that actually there is only matter in the universe—it can be called a philosophy of materialism or, less ambiguously, a philosophy of physicalism. But it actually doesn't explain and cannot explain—there's a kind of quantum leap, metaphorically, between matter and mind, between the properties of matter and the properties of consciousness, and no one has bridged that gap yet. Is it possible? I don't know, but it's not an established fact.

It also leads to certain strange paradoxes and contradictions. For example, just reflecting on this: if we go with this, entertain this idea of a sort of fundamental physicalism—in other words, there are just material entities in the universe—and what happens in consciousness, or the fact of consciousness itself, and the contents of the mind in consciousness, they're essentially just material, because that's really what's real: matter. If we follow that a little bit, then mind contents are essentially—some people actually think this way or articulate this way—"I feel happy, it's just some chemicals and some neurological synapses firing. There's no inherent happiness. It's just a kind of illusion, because all that's real—self isn't real, emotions aren't real—there are just states of material particles."

What that means is that something like suffering is an illusion as well. It's just atoms and molecules moving in certain ways, interacting in certain ways in the brain. But actually we don't live or think like that. Even someone who claims allegiance to that idea as a philosophy doesn't actually live like that or think like that. And we don't run our societies that way. At least we try to, or say we do, take human suffering seriously in law and in ethics.

But if we really hold to this kind of project of proving everything is just the movement of atoms and material particles and their interactions, then it brings some strange conclusions that aren't actually congruent with how we actually live and view the world.

We can go a stage further and say: if you say suffering is kind of real, or at least respected, even though it's fabricated or built as a mental construct from simply matter—it's really in its essence just matter, there's no person suffering, there's no actual suffering, it's just some neurons creating a certain impression, but all that is just matter—if you say that, actually, then so is happiness, and so is a sense of beauty, and so is love, and so is soulfulness and meaningfulness, and the sense, perception, and conception and thought of divinity. All that, actually, is in the same category, if you like, as suffering. They're all kind of illusions based on, fabricated by, built by some kind of constellation or state of purely material elements, particles.

So all that—happiness, beauty, joy, love, soulfulness, meaningfulness, the sense of divinity—are as real or unreal as suffering and pain, even physical pain. Atoms don't hurt. They're just atoms in combinations. All these things, then—happiness, beauty, love, suffering, soulfulness, meaningfulness, sense of divinity, the perception of divinity—all are merely the movement and interaction of material particles or atomic particles that aren't immediately perceived or conceived as such. There's a conception of them as something different, there's a sense of them as something different, but really what they are is just that.

What that does, if I take this strange philosophy of physicalism to its extreme, is that it actually ends up inverting itself and kind of legitimizing all these areas of experience that are so important to us: happiness, beauty, love, meaningfulness, sense of divinity, soulfulness—legitimizing them just as much as we legitimize our suffering and our need to care for suffering and our respect for it. All are equally worth respecting or disrespecting. All have equal value: perception of divinity, beauty, soul, as much as physical pain.

So it's a strange philosophy. There's a kind of hurdle—would be an understatement—an abyss to straddle, to find the connection between mind and matter.

This kind of overreach and overclaim by those who profess allegiance to total physicalism—that material particles are all there is in the universe—leads to some strange paradoxes and conclusions.

In the world of philosophy during the twentieth century, partly instigated by the puzzling and shocking results from quantum physics, philosophers and philosophers of science in particular began to re-question the whole relationship between science, the scientific endeavor, and truth itself.

Marshall Walker states that no claim is made about the reality of a scientific model. I want to share a few quotes with you from Joel Weinsheimer's work. Walker continues: "The sole criterion is successful prediction from the simplest, most convenient, or most satisfying model"—successful prediction rather than truth, from the simplest, most convenient, most satisfying model.

As Larry Loudan observes in Progress and Its Problems, theories are just as modest as models. "One need not," he says, "and scientists generally do not, consider matters of truth and falsity when determining whether a theory does or does not solve a particular empirical problem."

But philosophers, he points out, even if scientists are not concerned with truth—at least don't claim to be concerned with truth—philosophers have been. "The preoccupation of classical philosophers of science has been with showing that the methods of science are efficient instruments for producing truth, high probability, or even closer approximations to the truth. In this enterprise they have failed dismally."

So the criteria of science shift radically. Thomas Kuhn wrote a very influential book in the 1960s called The Structure of Scientific Revolutions. He suggests that we may have to relinquish the notion, explicit or implicit, that changes of paradigm carry scientists and those who learn from them closer and closer to the truth. The whole idea of science marching onward, closer and closer to the truth, with occasional shifts of conceptual framework—like the transition from pre- to post-Einstein theories of relativity—and the assumption that such shifts bring us closer to truth, is very questionable to him.

Imre Lakatos explains most clearly how "the sure and steady advance of science toward the truth suddenly degenerated into a rout." He writes: "For centuries knowledge meant proven knowledge—proven either by the power of the intellect or by the evidence of the senses. The proving power of the intellect or the senses was questioned by the skeptics more than two thousand years ago." This goes back to the Greek skeptic philosophers who questioned these foundations. "But they were browbeaten into confusion by the glory of Newtonian physics."

As I mentioned, this revolution—the scientific revolution—was so dazzling in its power to predict, build technology, and gain mastery over nature that the philosophical skeptics were essentially silenced. Lakatos continues: "Einstein's results again turned the tables. And now, very few philosophers or scientists still think that scientific knowledge is, or can be, proven knowledge. But few realize that with this, the whole classical structure of intellectual values falls in ruins and has to be replaced. One cannot simply water down the ideal of proven truth."

Something very fundamental has been decimated; some vessel has been broken in the whole structure and idea of what science is doing, how it's progressing, and what its venture is in relation to something called truth.

The clearest example of how this whole notion of truth was brought into question emerges from the history of Newton's theories of gravity and mechanics. They were immensely successful and very accurate in their predictions and power. Then Einstein came along, particularly with his general theory of relativity, offering a completely different idea of what gravitation was—a completely different understanding of space and time. Together with this came mathematical equations describing that theory and carrying its predictive power, regarded as fundamental and universal laws of the cosmos, that were very different from Newton's.

The two theories had different ideas and models of gravity—what was happening, what it was, how it worked—and different equations describing that process mathematically. Some calculations about observed measurements will be just slightly different coming from Einstein's theory, but the fundamental edifice and ideas of what is actually occurring—in other words, the model of the universe, the model of reality—is radically different in Einstein's theory of gravity.

As Lakatos observes, "Newton's theory, the best corroborated of all scientific theories, turned out to be at best incomplete and at worst false, because it was superseded by Einstein's theory." It remains questionable whether Einstein's hypotheses might also become superseded or contradicted in the future. Even if they are corroborated, they should not be called true, because one never knows when an entirely different model or theory might emerge. Again, it might have only minutely differing predictions in some contexts about what we would observe, but the whole model of what is actually happening could be radically different.

All this calls into question: What exactly is the relationship between scientific theories—even when they seem to have been corroborated by experiment and observation many times—and truth and reality? This questioning remains very much alive in the world of philosophy of science.

Again, to quote Thomas Kuhn: "The developmental process described in this essay has been a process of evolution from primitive beginnings—a process whose successive stages are characterized by an increasingly detailed and refined understanding of nature. But nothing that has been or will be said makes it a process of evolution toward anything."

The evolution of science, in his view, is not an evolution toward something called truth or a truthful representation of reality. He calls all of this into question. "Inevitably, that lacuna, that gap, will have disturbed many readers. We are all deeply accustomed to seeing science as the one enterprise that draws constantly nearer to some goal set by nature in advance. But need there be any such goal? Can we not account for both science's existence and its success in terms of evolution from the community's state of knowledge at any given time? Does it really help to imagine that there is some one, full, objective, true account of nature, and that the proper measure of scientific achievement is the extent to which it brings us closer to that ultimate goal?"

So you can hear how radical these questions are to those of us who have grown up with a certain view of science, and that includes our contemporary culture.

There's a philosopher called Jean Grandin who talks about a conception of truth in philosophy which is different from the normal conception. He writes: "In dialectic, in that kind of philosophy, thought continually takes up new forms without there being postulated unconditionally a process of successive approximation to truth." This is the same thing that Thomas Kuhn is saying.

But then Grandin adds: "In philosophical hermeneutics" — in that branch of philosophy, that approach to philosophy — "this infinite process is designated as 'truth.'" So truth becomes, the whole notion of truth becomes, in these philosophers' approaches, something very different from a kind of fact which one either arrives at or doesn't, represents accurately or doesn't. It's a process, and it's infinite and open-ended. A very, very different conception.

There's another related debate about the nature of scientific theory and truth. Among others, there are two theories of truth, if you like, or theories of theories of truth. One is called the correspondence model. The correspondence theory says this theory, in what it depicts and the model it lays out, corresponds to reality. In other words, reality is like this, and the model mirrors it. And that's what truth is — that's what truth is in science, that's what truth is in theory or anything else.

In competition with that theory, there's what's called a coherence theory of truth, which abandons the idea of this possibility of ascertaining whether we have an accurate representation — an accurate and final representation of truth, or even if we're moving towards that accurate and final representation, as someone like Karl Popper would claim — and replaces it with the coherence theory of truth. What that really means is that the different components of this theory, whatever it is, this model of the universe, they cohere, they make sense together, they fit with each other, and they fit with other things that we know or other models. If you have a coherent theory, or the more coherent the theory, the more we are entitled to call it true. But that's a different claim than saying it corresponds to some reality — that this is now an accurate replica of reality or representation of reality.

All this has gone on in twentieth century and twenty-first century philosophy — the whole notion of truth, and in particular of science's relation to truth, has been called into question, decimated, opened up. Over the twentieth century and beyond, partly stimulated by findings in physics and the theories of quantum physics and relativity, the whole revolution in physics that happened in the twentieth century. Partly stimulated by that, with the suggested implications that there is actually not an objective, independent existence of things, of matter or anything.

Partly also, reflecting and stimulated by those findings, there were philosophers of science who began questioning the limits of the scientific method, but also, even more fundamentally, science's relationship with truth per se, and what truth actually means. Does science in fact reveal or even approach, approximate truth?

There were also other movements in philosophy that had, on the face of it, nothing — they weren't propelled by scientific discoveries. There were other considerations: political considerations, purely philosophical considerations, linguistic considerations, cultural considerations, historical considerations. Certainly in the twentieth century, even before that, starting with Nietzsche, into Heidegger, Derrida, but you could say even back to Kant — Immanuel Kant questioning the possibility, questioning that it is possible for us to have access to an objective, independent truth, and questioning the kind of hubris that would assume that we either do or can.

So there's a whole current in Western philosophy that questions that — depending on where you start that current historically doesn't matter — but it kind of reaches its zenith in maybe the eighties or nineties, where sometimes if you pick up any article, whether it's philosophy or articles on comparative religion even, or all kinds of things influenced by that trend in philosophy to denigrate any assumption of reaching some kind of objective truth about anything, and to denigrate even the possibility of doing so. Sometimes it's almost comical picking up some articles — they seem to sort of start with "I'm on the right side, I don't claim anything about absolute truth, and of course I wouldn't say anything like that" — a kind of "don't shoot me, I'm on the right team" thing.

There's that whole current, but again, what's interesting to me is that one of the things that's interesting is even with those philosophers who say that there is no access to truth, or there is no truth, or we don't presume that, it's not possible, we don't postulate any kind of realism — how easily and surreptitiously it sneaks back in, or it is sneaked back in, or it's actually never really been abandoned. The philosopher or whomever has not even realized that they haven't abandoned the notion of a basic reality or an ultimate truth in this or that area or domain of being or existence.

That definitely applies to some physicists who work in the area even of quantum physics, as I mentioned earlier, but even more so the philosophers who sort of tend to emphasize this point or this disclaimer and judgment even on the notion of the possibility of some kind of access to an ultimate truth or a principal truth. Still, it sneaks back in, or it actually was never really abandoned in some area or another.

If we go back to the philosopher J.N. Findlay, who is a very interesting and unusual character in twentieth century philosophy in that totally against the stream and almost in isolation, it seems, he did postulate ultimate truths, kind of mystical absolutes. There are some parallels with what we might call emptiness, but it's really something different. I may hopefully come back to this later in this talk. So he was criticized by anyone who bothered to pay attention to what he was proposing and writing about, working as he was very much on the sidelines of the academic world.

But he was criticised for these reasons, with people saying that what he was proposing was meaningless or self-contradictory or problematic in various ways. In response to these criticisms, he wrote something quite profound. Whether or not his ideas were indeed self-contradictory and empty notions—which was partly what he was being accused of—he observed that "self-contradictory and empty notions play a vast part in human experience and attitude."

There's tremendous wisdom in this observation. Self-contradictory and empty notions play a vast part in human experience and attitude. This is certainly true of humanity's limiting notion of absolutes. As I mentioned, he was interested in a certain kind of absolute, a mystical absolute. He continues: "Even philosophies which repudiate absolutes in their logic and have professedly built up radically contingent, value-free systems generally smuggle in absolutes of some sort—matter, logical space, the totality of atomic state of affairs, and so forth. The paradoxicality and ineffability of mystical absolutes is simply a logical consequence of there being absolutes at all."

Two crucial points emerge here. First, that self-contradictory and empty notions play a huge part in human experience and attitude—a very important recognition. Second, as I pointed out earlier, even when people claim they don't believe in absolutes or ultimate reality, they usually do so implicitly. Whether that absolute is matter—probably the most common choice—or the totality of atomic states of affairs, they maintain some notion of basic reality.

This pattern appears extremely commonly, not just in academic philosophy but across all kinds of contexts. Sometimes when I teach about emptiness, someone will respond enthusiastically, saying they really appreciate the teaching and find it sensible. Then they'll mention something about the brain and how it aligns perfectly with what I'm presenting—how the brain processes information to create different perspectives, or how neurological processes explain perceptual illusions, or they'll try to account for fabrication from a neurological standpoint.

What's virtually explicit in this approach is that brain and neurons and matter are more fundamental than emptiness or fabrication. They become the agents that fabricate, that create perceptual illusions. This establishes a causality resting on neurons and neurophysiology. But as I mentioned earlier, no one has actually proved this causality. It may be that neurological networks are an indispensable part of perception, mental functioning, and mind, but what's been demonstrated so far is merely correlation. There's corresponding neurological function that may be necessary, but not necessarily sufficient for mind.

More importantly, there's a kind of smuggling back in here. One hears teachings about emptiness, reads about fabrication, and then reintroduces a supposedly more fundamental notion of brain, neurophysiology, and matter. This approach forgets that matter itself is empty—whether we arrive at this understanding through physics or through deconstruction based on emptiness. Matter itself is empty. Time is empty. Space is empty. And without time and space, as we discussed earlier, there can be no notion of causality. Causality depends on time.

In the teachings of emptiness that I favor, fabrication itself is not ultimately true. You cannot explain perception at an ultimate level. At a conventional level, certainly, you can explain perception through fabrication and examine how this works phenomenologically. But it's not an ultimate truth because causality is empty and not ultimately real. Time is empty, so the temporal framework in which fabrication occurs is empty. What is fabricated is empty, and what fabricates is empty.

Any model or proposition that retains neurophysiology or matter as a fundamental basis is insufficient, in my view, because it fails to account for the emptiness of time, matter, space, and causality.

This represents just one common instance, but even among professional academic philosophers, it's very frequent for ontological commitments and allegiances and preferences to leak out despite their professing that there's no ultimate reality, no realism they're postulating, no privileged point of view—no privileged way of looking at things, no single correct perspective.

Take Richard Rorty, for example. He would frequently say and write such things, then let slip something like "the universe is just made up of purposeless movement of atoms." It's almost caught in the cracks of his argument—he's too sophisticated to state it directly, but when he's perhaps not paying sufficient attention to his writing, it tumbles out. That's actually the underlying view.

Or consider Michel Foucault, who wrote: "We should not imagine that the world presents us with a legible face. We must conceive discourse as a violence that we do to things." We must conceive conceiving as a violence we do to things. But how can we do violence to things unless things exist in a certain way in reality prior to our discourse, prior to our conceiving? Do you see the contradiction?

So the whole notion of doing a violence to things presumes that things already exist in a certain way that we can do violence to. It's built like this, and we smash it or we distort it by our discourse, by our conceiving, by our perspective. So even these champions or apparent champions of non-realism are often betrayed by their allegiances, their predispositions, their preferences and, if you like, agendas are betrayed in the cracks of their writings and language.

As I said, all this talk of non-reality and this kind of dismissing and pulling, tearing down assumption of the attainment or even the possibility of attainment of some kind of privileged perspective or ultimate truth about anything at all reached its zenith—that whole movement in philosophy—perhaps in the eighties and nineties following the writings of Derrida and others in what was called deconstruction in philosophy. Cyril O'Regan wrote about this and pointed out, I think, really importantly, that the art of deconstruction—that whole movement to deconstruct arguments that propose or that seem to propose some kind of privileged perspective or truth about anything at all—is "a serious play that shows, unveils, uncovers the hubris of a discourse that would be complete."

In other words, you can get this complete perspective, whether it's about anything—a scientific perspective, a perspective on matter, on mind, on philosophy, on psychology, on culture, on ethics, on whatever. O'Regan continues: "Taken at its word, deconstruction cannot indulge in statement, meta-description, and, least of all, in prescription." In other words, if you really trust what deconstruction is proposing and attempting to do, then it must deconstruct itself. And it can't then offer a prescription—you should look like this, you should look without positing an ultimate reality. That would contradict itself. Or to consider itself a more privileged perspective would be to contradict itself.

So he continues: "That despite itself, it manifests a tendency to do so"—to indulge in statement, meta-description, and prescription, being prescriptive—"is evident." And then he cites a deconstructive philosopher, theologian Mark Taylor, saying that a particular work called Erring "clearly indulges in an evaluative language of prescription and proscription, recommending this and prohibiting that."

He says you don't—I'm paraphrasing that a little bit—he says you don't find that so much in the work of Derrida, though even in Derrida's case "it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that he considers his own proposal to be right in the way the onto-theological tradition is not."

So onto-theology—I think it was Heidegger's word, or maybe Derrida's; I can't remember where it started—this postulate of: this is real, this is true, and this has privileged, almost divine status. Onto from ontology, theo from God. This perspective, or this statement, is true, is real, is privileged.

So Cyril O'Regan is pointing out, even in Derrida's case, all of these thinkers, they think that their proposal is right in the way that other proposals—say, for example, the philosophy of Hegel, which O'Regan is actually writing about in this case—is not. And then he continues: "Openness"—this openness of point of view—"is a prescription, a metaphysical or quasi-metaphysical recommendation. Closure"—the opposite, to say we've arrived at a truth now, this is now the best perspective we know, or whatever it is—"closure, a proscription, a prohibition, a quasi-metaphysical no-no." The deconstructionist use of the antithetical pair "closure" and "openness" has to be seen as "thoroughly evaluative."

So there's a kind of self-contradictoriness that runs through postmodernism and that whole philosophy, among other problems.

What is going on here? Why is this so? I think this is really interesting, and again, if we come back to John Findlay and something he wrote: "However much we may affect interest in the architecture of nature"—in other words, in science—"or its various departments, or in the various detached systems of ideas which proliferate abundantly in their glasting compartments"—in other words, in philosophical ideas—"it is plain that we cannot achieve clarity in regard to any of them without achieving clarity as to our empirical, conceptual and linguistic approaches to them. Without due study of these, we are more than likely to see our own thought habits and speech habits and problems merely written large on the cosmos. And there is, in fact, no easier way to fall victim to what is arbitrary and personal than to set out uncritically to be objective and impersonal."

So again, he's saying something about the whole approach—that we have to actually become more conscious of our whole way of approaching these questions we're investigating, whatever areas we're questioning. And without that consideration of our approach, our leanings, our frameworks—empirical, conceptual, linguistic—we're just going to project our habits onto the cosmos, inner and outer.

So our approaches, our frameworks constitute, in a way, or at least shape a part of what fabricates what we then conclude. Our approaches and frameworks, our paradigms—as Thomas Kuhn said, "A paradigm is prerequisite to perception itself." We can broaden, as we explore this more and more, we can broaden his statement beyond perhaps the limits of what he initially meant by it. And then, of course, whatever we're already assuming and what we might call ground assumptions that sneak in.

So I mentioned that René Descartes is regarded as one of the principal founders of the scientific method, and one of his main ideas, which many of you will know of course, is the question: Is it possible to place our method of inquiry and method of investigation and our reasoning on a really solid, clean foundation? A foundation we can trust, but also a foundation that doesn't drag in distortions, assumptions, that kind of baggage that would prevent a clear and objective seeing of the truth.

And so that was the idea. And then he postulated, well, what's the one thing I can trust? And he dismissed this and this and that and this. And he came down to this: "I think, therefore I am." This is the one thing I can trust, because he might very much question his conclusion there. But these are the principles: There's one thing I can trust. And on that one foundation, supposedly, I then proceed. And whatever follows from that is acceptable.

So it's what he would call radical doubt that underpins the so-called Cartesian method, the scientific method. You start with this, radically doubting everything. Is there one thing that's beyond doubt? And then build things on that foundation. And that's supposed to be as pure and clean and objective, distortion-free, value-free, assumption-free, desire-free method to follow.

However, as a number of philosophers have pointed out since then, there's something a little fishy here when you read his work and regard his opus. There's more than one thing, but one thing I'd like to focus on right now is something Charles Peirce pointed out.

Charles Simon Peirce was a quite influential American philosopher. Quoting Weisheimer again, Peirce observed that no one who follows the Cartesian method will ever be satisfied unless he has formally recovered all those beliefs which he has given up. In other words, someone professing to follow this method of radical doubt and that kind of antiseptic cleaning of all the mechanisms of inquiry and cogitation and deduction and observation will try to recognize what they believe and sweep those beliefs to one side. But then, actually, there's something operating that won't ever be satisfied unless he has formally recovered all those beliefs which he has given up. You have a process where what you're trying to do is recover those very beliefs that you had made a big deal of putting aside.

Weisheimer goes on to add to Peirce's comment: "It is not by accident that in matters of faith, for example, however heretical the Cartesian method, its results were quite orthodox and traditional." Here's this very heretical and radical methodology of inquiry and epistemology, but he ends up with—in certain areas at least—exactly the conclusions that were already there, the assumptions that he was already bringing to that inquiry. They were quite orthodox and traditional. The method itself seems a circular detour, less an exercise of self-sovereign reason than of rationalization.

There's a big trumpet blowing that we're going to be completely independent in our reasoning and observation, independent of any influences and conditionings and assumptions—distortions, wishes, desires. That would constitute so-called self-sovereign reason, if there even is such a thing. But the point is, actually, he's just rationalizing what he already was taught in childhood and had believed. Weisheimer goes on: "Descartes himself does not so much make a radical beginning as justify the beliefs that he had accepted as true from an early age."

Peirce made that observation, and Heidegger, in his Being and Time, reached the same conclusions about Descartes. Little time passes and other thinkers look back on that proclamation of Descartes—"this is what I'm doing, this is how it works"—and shine a light on it, and it doesn't look quite as spick and span clean and pure as Descartes presumed it was or claimed it was. He's dragging back in assumptions—or really, they were never removed in the first place.

Then there's the whole question, which I've touched on before, about motivation. What is actually guiding us or pushing or pulling us, propelling us in one direction or another in regard to questions of ontology and epistemology, of reality and knowledge? It's almost like we bring back in a consideration of psychology. What's happening psychologically for this person or that person that they're actually looking to make a certain conclusion, and indeed they do make a certain conclusion? They end up with the conclusion that they had been wanting to make anyway.

There was a man called Fiertz who wrote a biography about Newton, the physicist Isaac Newton. He points out—I'm quoting from an article by Christian von Baeyer—"The source of Newton's deepest ideas about nature, Fiertz found, were his religious beliefs." Absolute space, for example, is a manifestation of God's ubiquity—God just being everywhere, totally everywhere, equally and totally everywhere. Absolute time is an expression of God's eternity. This suggestion is not introduced idly or speculatively, but explained explicitly and in detail in the Principia, Newton's great work on physics.

In Newton's words, translated from the Latin: "God lasts forever and he is present everywhere, and by existing forever and everywhere he has established duration and space, eternity and infinity." What's more, the idea is supported by biblical references. For example, Newton quotes St. Paul in Acts: "For in him we live and move; in him we exist." God is space, in other words. What could be plainer? This is actually an old Jewish tradition—the word makom for space is one of God's names in the Jewish tradition. While God's nature appears as space and time, his dominion appears in the form of natural laws. And the most obvious effect of his actions is gravity.

Christian von Baeyer goes on: "It seems that for Newton the purpose of physics was not at all to reveal the mechanism of the world, as his followers down to our time imagined; rather it was to demonstrate God's influence on the world. Since God is utterly incomprehensible to us, the laws of nature, such as universal gravitation, are incomprehensible too. Anything we can say about God is merely symbolic, and therefore the laws of nature are symbolic too."

You can point this out for other physicists like Kepler and others. What's driving the motivation here? Contrary to what many people suppose, it was actually a religious sensibility and a religious agenda. He wanted to prove something about God. Newton was actually clear and explicit and very open about that connection, about what drove him, about his reasoning.

What's much more problematic and insidiously dangerous is when both the assumptions of reality and the motivations are not explicit, when they're actually implicit. This is what we get a lot today, particularly in the discourse and philosophies of the secular worldview. Many of the assumptions, conscious or unconscious, on which the conceptual framework and worldview—the Weltanschauung—of secular modernism rests are not made explicit. In a way then, the assertions and the views are dogmatic because they're not explicit.

If you lay something out, there's a way that it's less dogmatic. People can say, "Well, I disagree with that bit." If you hide it, consciously or unconsciously, it becomes a kind of dogma.

It's not quite clear what things are resting on or what to question. And then even more so with the motivation.

I've picked up this point before in the past. Why is it that I'm presenting a picture of the cosmos like this or like that? Why is it I am so keen to insist on a meaningless cosmos as almost a dogmatic point of certainty, or as if it's been proved somehow? What's going on for me psychologically? Why is it that I desire that kind of cosmos?

Now this applies also to any other view. So this question about motivation and underlying assumption and approach—I'm going to say three considerations. Three considerations. That applies also to the view of radical emptiness. It applies if we are kind of in favor of or trying to present notions of spiritual absolutes or metaphysical realities or whatever.

So I think it's really important to realize this—the place of agenda and motivation, which is very often certainly not made explicit and very often not even conscious. I've talked about this before. What kind of self and world do I want to kind of paint for myself and then inhabit? What's my predisposition? So yes, what are my assumptions that I'm not questioning and I'm not even sharing with others? I'm assuming this and this. What is in the whole framework of the way I'm approaching things linguistically and conceptually, and what's going on in my motivation about how I want to conjure the sense of the stage, the theatre of self and world?

So really important, I think, to realize this—all of us, all of us, whatever our inclinations and hopes and allegiances are—to realize this and to admit it, bring that into the discourse. Then it's almost like a whole other level of honesty, transparency, but also range and openness and complexity comes into these kind of debates and arguments and this kind of discourse and thinking.

To throw in even more jittery-making considerations and observations into the mix—things that shake us up a little bit and shake up the ground, make it all a little bit less certain, certainly more complex—is also, I think, to point out that epistemology is personal, it seems to me.

So I've noticed, particularly in the area when teaching emptiness to people or talking with them about emptiness and about if they're on this journey of deepening understanding and exploration of emptiness, what is it that actually gives a person a deep conviction in emptiness? And what's interesting to me is that it varies, so not everyone will be convinced by the same either meditative experiences or reasoning underpinning meditative experiences or philosophical analyses or whatever it is. It's quite individual.

What makes this person convinced at a very deep level of their being—that they would build their life around it and stake their life on it and that it affects their life deeply—what makes this person convinced deeply, let's say, about emptiness is very different than what makes this person deeply convinced about emptiness. And yet they both have a deep conviction, a deep, ingrained, passionate and powerfully effective and liberating conviction in emptiness.

This, I think, again, just observing over the years from teaching, is really interesting. For person A and person B, in those examples, what was convincing for person A is totally unconvincing for person B, and vice versa.

So there's a kind of... And when it comes down to how we're going to live, how we're going to orient ethics, how we're going to make choices in our life, what kind of liberation we're living out, then epistemology has to be personal in the sense that I have to trust it. I have to trust this knowledge or this insight or this reasoning or that perception or whatever it is. It has to be personal.

And when I observe what makes a difference for people—that actually they have this personal sense of something that they can trust—it really varies quite a lot. So I think that's very interesting.

And as I pointed out, I think, in one of the earlier talks in the series, it might be for some people, if we just talk about emptiness for a second, that they are in fact taking the teachings of emptiness and the conclusions of emptiness and the ontology of emptiness—they're taking it on board out of trust for some authority or a particular teacher, or sometimes it's me or whoever else, or some teacher from history.

What's interesting in Tibetan Buddhist teachings is they have a whole—it goes back to Mahāyāna Indian Buddhism—there was a whole exploration of these questions of epistemology. What knowledge can we trust? How do we... If you have a certain experience in meditation, how do you know whether you can trust that experience or not? If you're walking down the street, how do you know what you can trust in terms of your perception? If you're reading spiritual scriptures or whatever, how do you know what you can trust?

And so they really try to explore and expound and expand this whole area and these questions of epistemology. And one of the categories of valid epistemology is scriptural authority. In other words, you can trust this because it says it in that book, and that book's a good book.

So it might be easy for us sometimes, for some of us, to kind of poo-poo that. But again, what's interesting to me is just what a range there is in personal epistemology. In other words, what makes a difference for different people?

What really makes a deep difference so that they build their life, their choices, their risk-taking on a basis that's personal for them? It has to be personal to have that kind of faith in it. Because when we talk about epistemology, we're talking about what knowledge can I trust - it's a foundation. I dare to put my foot there because the ground is solid. That kind of knowledge.

Most of us, in a way, have that kind of trust of authority, even though some might hear what I just said about scriptural authority and think of the more familiar Buddhist teaching of "don't trust anything, come and see." The Dhamma is ehipassiko - to be seen for oneself, come and see for yourself. But actually there's this whole other teaching of scriptural authority as well. Most of us have this relationship with authority and trusting knowledge - with scientific authority, medical authority, and these kinds of things. Even if you might be suspicious of scriptural authority, we rely on it in many areas of life. We have to, because there's too much knowledge for one human being to master.

Sometimes people practicing sensing the soul and imaginal practice don't feel any need for ontological or epistemological explanations, clearings, groundings, or legitimizations. Someone might say of those people, "They're just willy-nilly trusting these images and these strange spiritual or so-called soulful perceptions. Why don't they question the reality of that? How do they legitimize that? Are they being lazy or sloppy?"

Perhaps someone would think that from the outside. But if you stand back and look at the whole picture, maybe they're not any more lazy than most human beings who have heard or read about the radical ruptures, conundra, and shifts of ontology and epistemology implied by modern physics of the last 120 years. As I said, we hear about all this from physics and what it implies, but it doesn't seem to affect many people deeply - not even the physicists themselves most often, and certainly not lay people. For some physicists, as I pointed out, there's not a vigorous and energetic pursuit of these questions of ontology and epistemology. So someone who has an affinity with sensing the soul and wants to explore that path might not be being any more lazy than the rest of us who don't pick up these other questions and conundra of ontology and epistemology that are actually the heritage, the legacy of our Western culture at present.

When you really start to think about epistemology, you realize that all and any epistemology - any sense of "I know this" or "this is knowledge I can trust" - is always, at some level, resting on assumptions. At some point, you'll reach an assumption that's basically unproven. If you say to someone, "Why do you believe that about what knowledge you can trust or what's real?" and pursue that question - "Why do you believe this?" "Because of that." "Why do you believe that?" "Because of..." - at some point, they'll just have to say, "I just believe it." Whatever reason they give, you can ask another question, and eventually it reaches a bedrock of unproven assumption.

All and any epistemology, any choice about what knowledge we can trust - whether conscious or unconscious - and by implication the ontology as well, the notion of what's real, rest on unproven assumptions at some point. There's a parallel here with the situation in philosophical hermeneutics and the hermeneutics of literature.

We cannot get to the bottom of this. All and any epistemology rests on unproven assumptions. Can we realize this? Can we admit it? Do we even admit it to people we disagree with?

It's complex - all the things that come in here historically, psychologically, conceptually, philosophically - to actually stay true, to have integrity and thoroughness and steadiness and comprehensiveness with that assertion that there's no privileged perspective, that one is not asserting any ultimate truth or that it's not possible to do so. That's actually very difficult. There are slips and distortions and blind spots that come in for all kinds of reasons. Gaps, lacunae, shaky foundations, questionable building structures. Sometimes it's just lack of self-awareness; sometimes it may even be lack of honesty - self-honesty and honesty with others.

The position of what we might call deep emptiness - that there really is no ultimate reality, that there is no privileged perspective - is difficult to realize and difficult to sustain.

This position is also not as simple as it might sound. The fact that there is no real way something is, independent of our way of looking—that how it appears depends on our way of looking, and that it's not a something at all independent of our way of looking—these are all conclusions of the kind of deep, thorough exploration into emptiness that I would teach.

Yet all this does not equate to or allow us to say that all ways of looking and perceptions have equal epistemological and ontological validity, or that they are all exactly the same. There's something deceptively simple-sounding about the emptiness teachings, and it's possible to be a little lazy with them, a little sloppy.

What I said about epistemology resting on unproven assumptions applies also to the epistemology of emptiness. How do I know emptiness is true? How do I trust that insight, that perception? That trust—in other words, that epistemology by which I trust this insight, this knowledge, this understanding about emptiness—must also rest on unproven assumptions.

What do we do with all this? Sometimes what seems to be quite a common reaction is just to shrug and get on with things in the way that we're used to, which is basically the way we've been indoctrinated by a culture or subculture, or the way we're simply predisposed. But what ways are there—is there a way we can keep it all alive, creative, and still discover, so that there's some rigor, some integrity, some honesty, some challenge, some journey to all these questions?

For some people, given all this that I've shared—the revolutions in physics over the last 120 years, what's opened from the considerations of many philosophers of science regarding science's position vis-à-vis truth, questions of epistemology and ontology, what's been shown as the limitations of the scientific method, the calling into question of what we mean by truth—when we start to realize that we actually bring a whole package to these questions: conceptual baggage, linguistic baggage, methodological baggage, tendencies of perception and observation, habits, motivations, and this recognition that epistemology is both personal and must at some level rest on unproven assumptions.

Is there a way we can take all that earthquake, all the fracturing of the ground that we have become used to over hundreds of years—and actually more than hundreds of years, because before the scientific revolution it was just a different kind of solid ground in terms of epistemology and ontology that everyone believed in, at least in the West—can we take all that fractured ground from those multiple earthquake realizations and honest admissions and actually retain something that has creative tension in it? Something that doesn't just end up with us shrugging and things going flaccid and sloppy and lifeless and uncreative?

Remember Stravinsky's insight about how when there are constraints, it's actually a more creative process. When he had restrictions on what kind of shape or rules the music he was composing had to follow, then it became a much more creative prospect. If anything goes, then actually we get a kind of flaccidity, sloppiness. There lacks the tension in the wire, in the material, in the soil for creativity—in terms of perception, in terms of how we relate to the world, in terms of sensing the soul, in terms of how we relate to ethics.

So looking at all this fractured ground, admitting all that, taking it in—are there ways to relate to it that still have some integrity, some rigor, some challenge, some possibility of direction and journey and following a thread, rather than it just disintegrating into some kind of wobbly, sloppy blanc-mange where everything is just okay? Because then it will correspondingly lack power.

With all this, some people—I have no idea what proportion—are able not so much to sidestep, but to find a particular avenue with all these questions of epistemology and ontology, and move in and out of the mode of what we might call the imaginal middle way, or a poetic sensibility, a poetic view of existence and experience, certainly the kinds of experience we talk about in sensing the soul and imaginal perceptions.

The poet W.B. Yeats wrote something—someone was obviously asking him about these matters—he said, "Some will ask if I believe all that this book contains, and I will not know how to answer." I don't know what book he's referring to, but the important sentence is the next one: "Does the word belief, used as they will use it, belong to our age? Can I think of the world as there and I here judging it?"

Does the word belief, used as they will use it, belong to our age? In other words, does it make sense anymore, given everything I've said? Can I think of the world as there, as independently existing, and myself here judging it as an independent, objective observer of an independent, objectively existing world? Of course, he was a poet and had access to that poetic sensibility, that imaginal middle way.

I came across an article in The Guardian by Stephen Tompkins that pointed out there's nothing in the Bible, Old or New Testament, or in the Quran, that states these texts should be read literally. There's nothing there saying you should believe all these stories and statements literally. This is something Henri Corbin emphasized over and over again—it was really a big part of his agenda in his representations of various Islamic teachers from history: we're not talking about a collection of facts when we talk about the Quran, the Old and New Testament. We're talking about a symbolic opus.

The stories, the narratives, the parables—all of it, the whole thing is parable in the sense that it invites interpretation. And not just allegory in the sense that allegory means this represents that—where I figure out the code, so every time I read that, I understand this, and then the truth, the interpretation, the hermeneutics stop there. Not where I could rewrite the whole thing, substituting word X every time there's word Y.

So not allegory, which has a limited sort of "this means that," but what Henri Corbin calls ta'wil, from the Islamic tradition—this kind of open hermeneutics, open interpretation that holds the infinite possibility of interpretation, an infinite depth. Again, in our language, infinite unfathomability. I cannot box it in, I cannot reduce it to one meaning, one cause, one explanation, one representation. There's this endlessly fecund space that scripture—in this case the scripture of the Abrahamic religions—invites us into, and it behooves us to participate in that interpretation. It's something we meet, again create, discover. There's that possibility.

This is also a teaching you get in the Zohar, the Jewish Kabbalistic mystical text—a huge book from, well, depending who you believe, let's say the Middle Ages. And again, they're quite denigrating of people who just consider the Bible a collection of stories and historical data about whatever it is—the history of the children of Israel or whatever. While they might believe there's some truth in there, it's not just the Bible, not just the reports of those stories, whether they're factual or not, but also the events themselves that have this infinite hermeneutic. So there's again this idea, this possibility of infinite hermeneutic, this invitation to an endless interpretation.

So there is, certainly for Corbin, also in the events of life, what we would call the possibility of sensing the soul. It's not just what it seems. There are dimensions and possibilities there of imaginal middle way, this kind of poetic sensibility, this kind of openness and engagement in the endless and infinitely fecund possibility of interpretation, of hermeneutics, of image and symbol. That's one kind of stance with all this, one kind of thread of navigation with all these questions.

And again, I may be repeating myself, but I think it's important, so I will say it again. With regard to magical practice and the perceptions we have of the world through sensing the soul, given what I've said, it may be that humanity will not ever arrive at a fully complete and conclusive answer or truth regarding the ontic status, the reality status of imaginal images. So this philosophical question, again, can go on forever. And I think, rather than shrugging, I think it should. I think it's beautiful to engage in these questions with some rigor, with some integrity. What is true? What is real? What is not real? What knowledge can we trust? Even though we might never reach an answer, again, there's an infinite process there that's possible—not just unconstrained and not in relationship with the need to be coherent and to correspond with our experience and our discoveries. But we may not ever reach an end there.

But phenomenologically, with regard to practice, we can notice that adopting or finding ourselves in the imaginal middle way—in other words, sensing images and soul-making perceptions and sensing the soul as neither real nor not real, as we talked about, this kind of theater-like quality—automatically that stance of the imaginal middle way, automatically and often effortlessly, allows us to have and feel, with respect to an image, a sense of duty with freedom. We can have duty with freedom, and we can have relative non-attachment.

So there's this imaginal middle way—again, it's between two poles, real and not real, two extremes, as they would say in the Dharma: the extreme of reification, the extreme of nihilism. And the imaginal middle way, in being between those two poles, also delivers a kind of middle way, that we can have a sense of duty and the power and the way the soul is touched by a sense of duty and the alignment that gives, and the devotion that gives in life. We can have a sense of duty with freedom and autonomy and relative non-attachment.

So again, the imaginal middle way delivers something between two extremes: a duty where there's no freedom and just attachment and no autonomy, or freedom and non-attachment and autonomy but no sense of duty. And that stance delivers that, as I said, automatically and effortlessly—this poise of the imaginal middle way, phenomenologically speaking, experientially speaking, in practice.

Similarly, we can have a sense of sacredness and meaningfulness without fixation or tightness. We can have a sense of depth that is open to more discovery, so it's not a depth and now this is finished.

So there's something about this poise in the imaginal middle way, experientially, that is very fertile. It gives us a lot—it delivers a lot of power. Not power over, but power into our being. Power for the journey, power for creation, discovery, power for navigation in life, power for meaningfulness that actually works in life. So the imaginal middle way is a very helpful, very powerful, very fruitful perspective. And it's important to notice that—that we get these gifts with it: freedom, energy, wonder, beauty, joy. They all come out of that imaginal middle way.

Conversely, we can see and notice and feel—and this is an invitation to actually, as I said, see, notice, feel what happens, what dies, and how these gifts are unavailable. They shrink, they close, they become unavailable when an image is reified or a sensing of the soul perception is reified or literalized. So again, we can look to the effects to inform our choices, our stances, our attitudes, perspectives and conceptions.

So there may be this endless, endlessly open and difficult philosophical journey to go on regarding ontology and epistemology. And there is this possibility of the stance of the middle way, the imaginal middle way, at least some of the time, much of the time, and this poetic sensibility. And this, phenomenologically, we notice yields really good results. We can trust it.

We can trust what comes out of that stance, what emerges from this poetic sensibility and the imaginary middle way.

So that's one avenue of possibility out of this fractured landscape, this apparent fracturing of foundations regarding ontology and epistemology. There's also another territory I'd like to explore—one I began opening up toward the end of the Myriad Gates series, I think in the talks called "Icon and Eidos." There I pointed to the possibility of allowing a bit more reification, leaning somewhat more toward the reification pole within our spectrum of possibilities.

Is there a possibility of not being quite so strict or tight with the range of the imaginary middle way? Could we actually allow ourselves to lean more toward a kind of reification, permitting a kind of trust in the reality of certain perceptions and senses we have of things when we sense with soul? I'd like to explore that possibility as well—as another option for navigating this territory.

When we sense with soul, when we open to those deeper dimensions of perception, there arise certain knowings, certain senses of the nature of things that feel profoundly real and trustworthy. Perhaps there are times when we can honor that sensing, when we can allow ourselves to trust in the reality of what reveals itself to us through these deeper modes of perception, while still maintaining our awareness of the imaginal nature of experience.

This represents yet another way of working with the fundamental questions that arise when we begin to sense more deeply, when the soul's perception opens new territories of meaning and significance in our lives.

CHAPTER 184

The Phoenix of Metaphysics (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 2h15

In this continuation of his exploration of metaphysics, Rob Burbea examines multiple philosophical approaches to questions of reality and knowledge. He discusses how the dominant scientific worldview has shaped our understanding of epistemology and ontology, while exploring alternatives including the deep emptiness teachings of Buddhism, the imaginal middle way, and various metaphysical frameworks that postulate higher dimensions or mystical absolutes.

Burbea addresses the grief that can arise when practitioners worry that sacredness becomes merely a "way of looking" rather than an inherent quality. He explains how deeper investigation reveals that both subject and object, consciousness and appearance, are mutually fabricated together - "two vacuums leaning on each other." This profound emptiness paradoxically resurrects sacredness through the mystery of participation between awareness and world.

The talk examines how contemporary physics itself relies on metaphysical speculation, from string theory to multiple dimensions, showing that the boundary between physics and metaphysics is less clear than often assumed. Burbea suggests that just as Newton's "false" theories of absolute space and time enabled tremendous scientific progress, we can build fruitfully on unprovable ideas that support soul-making. He concludes by advocating for an expanded understanding of epistemological categories beyond simple "knowing" and "believing," suggesting that imaginal experience works more like art - providing profound meaning and orientation without fitting traditional categories of knowledge.

Just to very briefly recap, we've been talking in particular about epistemology and ontology as the areas of philosophy that explore the whole question of knowledge and what knowledge is trustworthy. Ontology is the area of philosophy that explores the question of what actually is real and what is not real.

We described briefly what came gradually over years, centuries really, to become the dominant worldview given to us by classical science. We described that we're very much believing in an independently existing reality and the possibility of objectively, clearly, fully even knowing that reality, that truth. There was a growing tendency to regard that world or sense that world as definitively and provenly meaningless, purposeless, lacking in divinity and dimensionality, and composed only of materiality. Those are some of its drifts and more extreme but still common tendencies.

Then we described very briefly the revolutions in physics at the turn of the 20th century, particularly relativity theories and quantum physics, and how that really severely brought into question the whole idea of an independently existing reality which we could know clearly, definitively, objectively as it is. This stimulated certain reflections on the nature of science in general, but particularly on the limits of the scientific method and also the relationship of science with truth—that whole endeavor.

There were other critiques of, or rather other reasons for the critique or the questioning, really, of science and its relationship with truth. There was a whole philosophical movement—or we can trace a whole philosophical movement—that again questions the possibility of knowing reality, of having a privileged perspective, or attaining the perspective, the way of looking, the way of conceiving, that achieves reality in postmodernism and other philosophical trends.

On top of all that, we pointed out that even though many philosophers would profess allegiance to that kind of non-realist stance, what leaks out very often is some or other kind of realist stance. Very often a secular existentialist and materialist view of reality, somewhat in some senses nihilistic, leaks out despite their positing and claiming to not have a position about reality or a claim about reality or the possibility of attaining truth.

Unpacking all that is the need to realize that what we bring in terms of framework, approach, language, history, culture, assumption and motivation—why I want this thing to be true, why I want the universe to be this way, why I want human nature to be like this—all those considerations need to be brought into this whole difficult soup, really, around epistemology and ontology. That applies whatever one's inclinations and wishes are.

We pointed out further that, to a certain extent at least, epistemology is personal. What convinces one person and what leads them to trust certain knowledge, certain insights, is different from another person who gains conviction by another pathway or another revelation or another consideration.

We also pointed out more generally that if you keep asking questions about epistemology—well, why do you trust that? Well, why do you believe that then? Why do you believe that?—and you just keep going, eventually asking questions, eventually one will come to the fact, one will realize the fact that we're all holding, whatever one's position, at some point we recognize that we hold some kind of unproven assumption. We're basing our epistemology and ontology on something that can't be proved.

Whether we consider all this a kind of cataclysmic earthquake in the whole enterprise of human understanding, a fracturing of the vessels that hold that human enterprise, or if one thinks such language is much too hysterical and views it much more as some difficulties here where we have to tone down our claims a little bit regarding truth—however one regards it, one still has to open to these considerations and digest them and respond to them. Of course there are many possible responses.

The realization, the deep realization of radical emptiness, the thorough and comprehensive emptiness of all phenomena and all things at all levels, is difficult to attain, difficult to hold onto, and quite sophisticated and subtle as a knowledge. Even that has its own epistemological blind spots and assumptions. Even that insight into emptiness rests on certain unproven assumptions—it has to, whatever they are. But that's one option here: to develop that understanding of emptiness and hold that stance of the middle way of the Buddha Dharma.

Another response, of course, is just to shrug and ignore all this debate and all this fracturing and all this rug-pulling that developed certainly over the 20th century, and just get on with things and ignore it. What that usually entails—and it's important to point this out—is that when we shrug, and it's a position that's popular in some Western philosophy, contemporary philosophy starting in the 20th century, we effectively say, "Well, this is unprovable. Ontology and epistemology will come to no end, won't come to an end, and therefore we're not going to indulge in them. Any indulging in those kinds of areas of exploration, and certainly any claims, all of that is a kind of human hubris and arrogance."

But effectively, practically speaking, often—I'm thinking of philosophers like Richard Rorty—what happens in such a statement is it effectively manifests as a kind of shrug, and in that shrug, one goes back to one's default positions. Hence, as we pointed out with Rorty, the leaking out of a quite secularist anti-religious agenda. So all this talk about no privileged point of view, but there's a denigrating of the religious that leaks out at the sides of his writing. What also leaks out is this belief and assertion that the fundamental reality of things is the purposeless movement of atoms in a meaningless universe.

We can say, "Oh yes, the philosophical problems here are too enormous. There's too much arrogance involved in claiming any progress towards truth or understanding ontologically, epistemologically. We put it aside and we regard ourselves as liberated from all that." But what often happens is that there is a kind of deflation of the being, of the soul in some ways. What was supposed to open up more territory for conversation actually ends up shrinking it. The default views, the indoctrinated views, the dominant, common views of whatever society end up just keeping their reign. Nothing has really changed there. But that's—I don't know if we call it an option, but it's certainly a choice that some people make in regard to all this, either consciously or unconsciously.

A third option we talked about is the imaginal middle way, that kind of poetic sensibility. We talked about Yeats and the open-ended, infinite, hermeneutic possibilities that Corbin emphasized in his reading of the imaginal.

both Abrahamic scriptures and sacred books, but also of this world and the events in this world and the events in history, and similarly in some Kabbalistic teachings and the Zohar.

I should point out—I'm pretty sure I've said this before, though I'm not sure when; it could have been just a couple of talks ago—but it strikes me as so important because of the pain it can cause in some people's souls from not understanding it, that it's worth repeating. Sometimes when I teach about deep emptiness and the whole notion of ways of looking, and there are just ways of looking, some people feel a great grief. They're attracted to that teaching, they explore it to a certain extent, often a fairly deep extent, but they reach a point where it seems to them: "Okay, so the sense of sacredness is something that I get just when I look in a certain way that sees sacredness. And I can look in another way that doesn't see sacredness. So sacredness takes a secondary status to the mind that sees in this way, that adopts this way of looking as opposed to that way of looking."

In that, as I said, there can be a lot of grief because the person—something in the soul—wants that sacredness and wants it to be something trustworthy, something less manufactured by the whims of the observing mind.

But going deeper into this whole process of exploring fabrication and ways of looking—if we just talk about emptiness right now—one actually realizes that the mind that looks, the mind that chooses to look in this way or that way, or is adopting this or that way of looking, the consciousness and the conceptual frame of conception, none of that awareness has inherent existence. It too is fabricated in the fabrication of the world and the fabrication of perception.

So subject and object, consciousness and appearance, awareness and world mutually entail each other. They mutually involve each other. They're fabricated together. Neither one, in a way, is more fundamental. They both melt into each other and rely on each other—two vacuums leaning on each other. Empty, empty, empty. They participate in each other.

That seeing, to me—that level of seeing—opens up in the breakdown of concept. We can't really, it's hard to even talk about or explain it in some way that logically makes sense or causally makes sense. But with it, there is an insight, a felt insight into the participation of self and awareness and consciousness and mind and way of looking. In that participation, the mystery, that participation, there is, to me, a profound sacredness. I would say to anyone who really tastes that deeply, it can't help but resurrect—if one has dismissed or let go of a sense of sacredness—it can't help but resurrect it, reestablish it, bring it back to aliveness and to the fore in some very deep, mysterious way.

So that position of deep emptiness also entails sacredness. It implies and involves a sense of sacredness in the deep mystery of what it means. Similarly, I would say that what we were calling that poetic sensibility or that imaginal way also implies sacredness. This is there in all the elements of the imaginal that we talked about: the divinity, the dimensionality, the eternality, the reverence, the grace, the humility—all these and other elements are part of the sense of sacredness.

So both the profound and radical middle way of Dharma teachings on emptiness and the imaginal middle way involve and invoke and elicit and open us to a sense of sacredness. Of course, there are some people who talk about artistic sensibility and poetic sensibility, and they're using it in a different way, and it perhaps doesn't, for them, involve sacredness. It certainly did for Yeats, whom we quoted, and it does in the way that we're using those terms.

So, three possibilities: shrugging; the penetrating into deep emptiness and the sophistication, subtlety and profundity of those insights; and the entertaining and exploration of the imaginal way, that poetic sensibility, the opening up of perception in sensing the soul.

Another possibility that I mentioned at the end of the last part of the talk was that with the imaginal way, there is room—we could say there's room—to move towards more of a stance of reification, more of a stance of believing or holding something to be a reality. And there are many different ways this can happen. As I mentioned, I started opening up that end of things in the final talks of the Mirrored Gates series.

But there are other ways, and there's one I just want to focus on right now—another subset of ways that would fall into that category of, rather than holding this precise middle way line in one way or another, actually falling into a category of entertaining the possibility of more reification. And that is to intuit or posit or deduce or entertain the idea of some kind of higher truth that integrates and makes sense of the paradoxes that we experience in our phenomenal world in the normal state of consciousness, and makes sense of what seems nonsensical there.

For instance, some of the quantum physics observations: the seeming impossibility of knowing objectively how a thing really is before we observe it, the problem of our observation always seeming to be determining what happens, and the apparent emptiness of things. All that could be made sense of—and those paradoxes and gaps and fractures in our knowledge or our different perspectives can be made sense of and integrated and made whole at a higher level of truth.

I've touched on this briefly—I can't remember where, just very briefly—and I gave the analogy of those old disco balls. I can't remember if they have another name. Some of you will remember. They're three-dimensional balls hanging from a dance floor ceiling, and they've got little tessellated pieces of mirror on them so that when the dance hall lights shine on them, they sort of iridescently radiate in different directions.

So that truth is really like that, or this higher truth, or this more absolute truth, is really like a disco ball in the sense that it exists as a real entity in itself, in this three-dimensional way, but we're only able to shine certain lights on it from certain angles at certain times, for the most part, in our usual state of consciousness and understanding. And so it will just reflect at different times this color light in that direction, that color light in the other direction. But in itself it is a reality. So there's a kind of emptiness there, but at another level it's not really empty.

The metaphor of cartography offers another illuminating perspective. Different map-making systems—I can't recall their exact names, though I know one is called MacArthur—reveal how we might understand this phenomenon. When you examine various maps, you'll notice that the relative sizes of countries appear vastly different across different projection systems. On some maps, Africa appears absolutely enormous compared to Europe, while on other mapping systems, Europe appears much larger in proportion. The distances between countries vary dramatically as well.

The fundamental challenge here is again dimensional. The three-dimensional Earth —the actual globe—exists with its true relative sizes and distances. But when we attempt to represent this spherical reality in two dimensions, we must inevitably make compromises, sacrificing accuracy in one aspect to preserve it in another. Neither style of map construction is without fault; both are, at best, partial representations, and in certain ways, misleading. Yet the reality remains what it is. These maps represent our best attempts to capture in two dimensions what actually exists independently and objectively in three dimensions.

Both metaphors come from Sanford Drop's writing, though I'm uncertain of their original source. Such ideas suggest that reality might indeed function this way. Perhaps through philosophy, meditation, or scientific progress, we can discern, extrapolate, or conclude something about the nature of a reality that, in our ordinary state of consciousness and understanding, we cannot directly perceive.

This kind of thinking appears with some frequency. I was recently reading something by Ouspensky that addressed the fourth dimension in mathematical terms. Though I didn't read the entire article, he made a fascinating observation about spiritual phenomena. When people conduct séances, attempt to contact spirits after death, or report ghostly apparitions, they invariably assume that these spirits, if they exist, inhabit the same temporal dimension we do—the same framework of time that we experience as moving from past to present to future.

Ouspensky suggested that a spirit or being after death might exist or experience time in a fundamentally different way, not belonging to the same temporal dimension we inhabit. He illustrated this with the analogy of a flat world—imagine a completely two-dimensional realm, like the surface of a piece of paper or a lake, inhabited by flat beings who can only move, sense, and conceive in two dimensions.

If a three-dimensional being were to dive into their lake or pass a pen through their paper world, these two-dimensional inhabitants would be completely baffled by the sudden appearance and disappearance of phenomena that seem to violate all their laws of physics. Picture someone diving through the surface of a lake—as their body passes through that surface, the cross-sectional shape would constantly change: wider in some parts, doubled with arms and legs, then singular again, expanding and contracting. All these transformations would appear inexplicably mysterious to the flat-world beings.

Yet from a three-dimensional perspective, everything makes perfect sense, following ordinary three-dimensional laws. For beings who have grown up inhabiting only a two-dimensional world, equipped with only two-dimensional apparatus, such phenomena would be utterly incomprehensible.

The implication is that higher dimensions might explain all kinds of phenomena we experience as problematic, paradoxical, nonsensical, partial, or contradictory. This idea is actually implicit in our dharma discussions, though perhaps I haven't emphasized it sufficiently. When we speak of sensing the soul, or when we explore eternality, we encounter something similar to what Ouspensky described.

The angel is eternal—timeless—occupying an entirely different dimension or realm of time. As we've established, these realities are always present, always occurring.

This imaginal sense, it's always already happening. Or as Salo said, it never happened, but it always is.

So the angel is actually eternal. The appearance is, if you like, a refraction of the angel into time, into our experience, our dimension of temporality, our dimension of anything else. Or the appearance in time is a kind of echo, an imperfect echo, or let's say a three-dimensional echo of something that's four-dimensional, but take that very loosely—an echo, a manifestation in our limited sense of dimensions, a manifestation of something that has more dimensions, including that different temporal dimension.

I mentioned the philosopher J.N. Findlay, who would undertake a careful, phenomenological look at our reality—our reality of seeming to exist in a world of solid objects that we can't walk through and that behave in certain ways. He would look at that whole experience of ours and pick up on the places where it doesn't quite make sense, where it doesn't quite add up, or where different perspectives that are contradictory and paradoxical seem to both be right somehow, and neither completely right.

In his careful, rigorous phenomenological analysis of everyday experience, he draws out those paradoxes and then proposes that they are resolved with the solution of other worlds that exist in other dimensions, so to speak. Here we don't just mean physical dimensions—length, breadth, height, or time. We're really talking about other levels of worlds. And then, as I mentioned when I quoted him the other day, this exploration of the idea, or deduction of the idea, of what he would call a mystical absolute world in which all these paradoxes are kind of integrated and made sense of.

So these worlds that he proposes—and I've talked about this before in the context of Kabbalistic teaching or some Dharma teachings or other teachings from mystical Islam—this idea of levels of worlds, multiple worlds at different levels, is quite a common one. These worlds are in a sense tiered and represent different degrees or stages between our sense of things at our level, at our limited dimensionality, in stages between that and this more mystical absolute that kind of unifies, integrates, makes sense of all these paradoxes that we encounter.

All of those that I've mentioned—also, like the deep emptiness, like the imaginal middle way—they are characterized not just by an implication of sacredness, but by a sense of sacredness. There's something intrinsically sacred in those notions of other dimensions and what they explain there and how they relate to ours.

But of course, also many of you will know from modern physics that beginning with Einstein's Special Theory of Relativity in 1905, the idea of four dimensions being the more accurate, more useful model of things rather than three dimensions became really prevalent. So physicists almost always talk about space-time as opposed to three dimensions of space and then time. It's put together in four dimensions.

As the twentieth century went on, there were all kinds of other theories, and certain developments invoked multiple dimensions. Nine, ten, eleven, thirteen became a very popular number, and then I just read about twenty-six dimensions. So this whole idea of other dimensions, the postulation of other dimensions explaining and making sense of what we experience—in this case through experiments in science—is common in physics as well. It holds sway in physics as well, though how many dimensions exactly and how they work is a different story. But the idea that there are more dimensions is pretty mainstream.

Can we prove that? Is that provable? We're back to that question of epistemology and ontology again. The answer, having said what we said before, is never finally. Because just like Newton's theory, which worked so well and seemed to be proven by its predictive power, its efficacy, its correspondence with observation, was eventually, after a few hundred years, dislodged completely—to be regarded as at best incomplete, at worst just wrong—by Einstein's theory.

So if that can happen then, it can actually happen with any physical theory, no matter how well it ties in to observed experimental data, no matter how many predictions it makes that turn out to be true when we do experiments. There's always the possibility that one day another theory will come along that will make a prediction that initial theory didn't make, and it will turn out to be validated, and it will have a very different idea of what's going on, and very different mathematics, and very different laws.

So can we prove that about other dimensions in physics? No, never finally. But what they seem to offer, and again why they're so dominant and popular and established in physics, is that they do provide beautiful, elegant and coherent explanations of phenomena that we perceive in our world and in our laboratories. Or they almost provide those explanations, because none of them have been completely worked out. There are many of these different kinds of theories.

I suppose that you'd have to ask a physicist whether they consider that sacred or not, and I'm sure you'd get probably a mix of different answers. I read recently about something I barely understood, but which was intriguing to me. Again, this was reported by Lee Smolin in his book, I think it's called Three Roads to Quantum Gravity. It's something called the anti-de Sitter space-time or the scale-invariant conformal field theory.

That's a bit of a mouthful. I don't really know what it means. But as I understood it, it involves basically the idea that there are other dimensions of space-time that obey certain geometries—so more than just the four that we're used to, there are higher dimensions that obey certain geometries.

The intriguing thing to me was the correspondence between those two different dimensions. There is a physicist Juan Maldacena and lots of other people exploring this. So this other higher world, let's say, with these other dimensions—he says that in some cases, quantum phenomena in the original theory, in the theory of our dimensions, translate into gravitational phenomena in the higher dimensional space. In other words, there's some kind of mathematical correspondence between these two kinds of world. One has more dimensions and a certain kind of geometry, and the other one is our world, or a certain take on our world.

Two theories which so far have been extremely difficult to unite—both extremely successful, quantum theory and Einstein's theory of general relativity, the theory of gravity—physicists have struggled to unite those two theories. They seem contradictory, attempts break down. So there's a lot of work going on into uniting those two theories.

What's interesting with this postulation and this mathematical model of another world is that these two seemingly incommensurable theories kind of mirror or correspond to each other across the dimensions. Solutions to Einstein's equations in the higher dimensional space-time give approximations to quantum phenomena in the lower dimensional space-time. Even something like heating up a gas of particles in the lower dimensional space-time corresponds to forming a black hole in the higher dimensional world. Pretty far out.

I don't understand it, and he gives some other examples, but it doesn't really matter. The point is this attempt to make sense of, make coherent and integrate things that don't seem integratable at our level of perception, level of understanding, level of conception and reasoning.

There's been quite a lot of objection in physics over the last hundred-plus years that some of these kind of really outlandish sounding physical theories—and we could string off a whole list, including the one I just briefly mentioned—are not remotely testable. There's no way one could come up with an experiment that would test whether it's possibly true. There's no way to find out is reality like that or not. Testable experimental predictions seem nowhere on the horizon at the present time.

So a sharp criticism that comes from some quarters—some physicists and some non-physicists—is that this isn't even science anymore. You do all that and you make your neat, lovely, beautiful, elegant mathematics work and this implies that and that fits together with this and that resolves that problem. But it's not science if it's not testable. That's not science, it's metaphysics. And here that word metaphysics is used in a very derogatory way to mean abstract speculation that is not subject to empirical observation, not subject to being able to be perceived and verified that way.

But if you think back over the history of both philosophical ideas and then scientific ideas, there were many, many theories that were untestable at the time. Many theories that became testable sometimes many years later, maybe sometimes hundreds of years later. At the time when they were proposed and considered and explored and put forth, there wasn't any hope that they would ever be testable, and they were just regarded as metaphysics. But what was regarded as metaphysics became actually the bread and butter of experimental science.

So are these physical theories that postulate other dimensions and all the rest of it that don't seem remotely testable—are they metaphysics in that derogatory sense, or are they not metaphysics?

In relation to the whole area of metaphysics, again Joel Weinsheimer, in this book on Gadamer, reports a sort of development in the twentieth century where there was this denigration of metaphysics and ridiculing of metaphysics in that sense. There was this movement towards what's called positivism—where you only trust as knowledge or only even waste your time thinking about and working on understanding what can be empirically observed, what's open to perception or obvious logical deduction.

This grew to its heights in the early twentieth century with the philosophies of positivism and logical positivism. Positivism is the kind of philosophy that all knowledge must be based on perception. It rejects any claims of metaphysical speculation. Knowledge is only empirical or, as I say, very simple logical deduction, which is almost tautology at times. For example, "all bachelors are unmarried"—correct. We can approve that as knowledge. So it's in support of what they call the positive sciences over things like metaphysics, religion, which they dismissed as just nonsense and a waste of time. This pursuit and claim of attempted dominance of what they would regard as definite certain knowledge arrived at in those ways.

But Joel Weinsheimer has a short passage in the book just tracing the history there. In the 1920s, with what's called the Vienna Circle in philosophy, really this kind of positivism reached its height. But he said time went by, and by 1975, he said, philosopher John Wisdom can speak of positivism only as a dead horse. But he dates the demise of this anti-metaphysicalism thirty years earlier.

This animosity against metaphysical meaninglessness, he writes in a book called Philosophy and its Plays, "had very many eminent followers, but they had all given up these extreme positions at the latest by about 1945." I remember Hempel, this philosopher, in the mid-thirties reporting it was customary in the Vienna Circle to interject "metaphysical!" if any member lapsed into a meaningless statement, a so-called meaningless statement, and that this happened so often it had to be shortened to "M." So you can imagine sitting around talking philosophy and then sort of pouncing on each other with "M, M," by virtue of someone believing that someone else had sinned by saying something or suggesting something that was possibly not strictly positivist and therefore metaphysical.

But he goes on: by 1945 this was a thing of the past. There was a cooling of this anti-metaphysical passion and a discrediting of some of the fundamental ideas and suppositions of the Vienna Circle and that whole positivist philosophy.

Charles Taylor, the philosopher, wrote: "Once we awaken from our positivist slumbers, we realize that none of these features that pertain to areas of our experience that are not strictly in the realm of natural science and physics—we realize none of these features, absent from the human sciences, hold of natural science either."

Let me explain this, because part of the agenda of the positivists was to reduce all knowledge, or the range of all knowledge, to the scope and model of physical science. That was their template. Everything had to conform—sociology had to replace religion, for example, and even sociology had to be modeled on the physical sciences. This remains a strong current today. The idea was that natural science—meaning physics and related fields—constitutes the only valid knowledge, the only kind worth pursuing. Anything that seemed absent from these domains, including many psychologies, some sociologies, and certainly religion and spirituality, was relegated to the rubbish heap of nonsense and uselessness.

But Taylor observes that these different domains "turn out to be methodologically at one, not for the positivist reason that there is no rational place for hermeneutics, no rational place for this kind of open interpretation of things, but for the radically opposed reason that all sciences are equally hermeneutic." As we explored earlier, this stringent idea of direct correspondence between scientific laws and truth has collapsed, or at least opened up and been shaken loose. We begin to realize that in all domains and directions of human endeavor for knowledge, for truth, to contact and represent reality involves some kind of epistemological and ontological latitude, some element of interpretation.

By the 1980s, those who would dispute the universal scope of human hermeneutics found themselves on the defensive. There was truly a turning of the tides—though it might turn again at some point. This marked the demise of anti-metaphysics.

Interestingly, if you read about the processes, aspirations, and guiding principles of leading physicists, you find that many of them—often the most prominent, forward-thinking, and successful—say they trust and encourage others to trust the beauty in mathematical theory to lead them. Rather than following laboratory observations and trying to piece them together sensibly, they follow their intuitive sense of the beauty of mathematical concepts, the elegance within them, trusting this to open new ideas, conceptions, and models.

Dirac famously said, "It must be beautiful"—speaking of whatever theory we develop to describe nature. The mathematics must be beautiful. If it's not, it can't be right. You can hear in that intuition the eros for beauty, for elegance, for simplicity and coherence and integration and innovation. There's a soul calling, the eros of the soul for that beauty, which mirrors our movement of soul-making. As we've said before, beauty and image go together. Beauty and soul-making are so intertwined we could almost replace one with the other—the same principles would apply in terms of what it is and how we respond to it.

Einstein shared this perspective. At a lecture in Oxford in 1933, speaking quietly and confidently, he urged theoreticians not to try discovering fundamental laws simply by responding to new experimental findings—the orthodox method—but to take their inspiration from mathematics and beauty.

One of the threads running through this talk is opening up our conception and approach to epistemology and ontology, examining what might be possible there. We're looking at the scientific method with all its gifts and what it has enabled for humanity, considering how it was initially conceived and presented, and the picture of it that we largely bought into. This was a picture of both science and the scientific method as a kind of pristine, untainted model of epistemology and ontology. That model came to dominate and influence all thinking, even our intuitive sensing of questions around ontology, epistemology, cosmology, and metaphysics generally. Science and the scientific method came to be thought of as the pinnacle of what represents a good, solid, clean, sensible approach to knowing, knowledge, and reality.

But as we unearth what's actually involved in the scientific method—as different philosophers and scientists have examined it throughout the twentieth century—we get the sense that it's not quite what it seems. We come to realize that questions of epistemology and ontology are actually more complex than they might appear, more complex than perhaps has been handed to us as the legacy of classical scientific method.

In its dominance as a model of good epistemological approach, other approaches were denigrated—they either fell by the wayside, were overpowered, or were openly ridiculed and dismissed. Among them was this whole idea of metaphysics in the sense of speculative, abstract thinking or conceptions that cannot be tested by replicable experimental observation.

But perhaps metaphysics never really went away. Perhaps it's been resurrected. Where, anyway, is the boundary between so-called metaphysics and physics, between metaphysical thinking and methodology and the methodology of theoretical physics?

When we examine it more closely, we can see that science—both in terms of its method and its aims—is not quite what many of us grew up believing it was or were taught that it was. It's not as unscrupulously clean or pure or tight as a method. Its conceptual foundations, the ways of thinking about things and building upon those foundations, are not always as clean-cut as presented to us.

None of this is to deny the benefits, wonders, and gifts of science, or to banish it somehow—if that were even possible. It's simply to point out that the scientific project, in both its methods and aspirations, involves elements that we might not have fully recognized or acknowledged.

methods and its aims and goals is not quite as simple or clear-cut or clean as it was taught to us that it is, and as many people would like to still believe that it is or still do believe that it is.

And this has implications—all this has implications on how we think about knowledge, how we conceive, again, of ontology, epistemology, of what is legitimate, for instance, with regard to sensing the soul and imaginal practice and other areas of human exploration. All this has implications on our sense of ourselves, our sense of things, our sense of what avenues are open to us and what kind of bases they need and how trustworthy they are.

So one of the really interesting things to me is the fact that so much that is helpful, interesting, and generative of further exploration—further noble exploration—can actually come out of what is not true. This is evidenced many times in the history of science.

So, for example, going back to Newton again, he forged ahead with his explorations of mechanics and gravity, and he based it on those dogmatic, essentially dogmatic assertions and assumptions of absolute space and time. His colleagues, his contemporary colleagues, thought he was bonkers. And they objected to these two ideas of absolute space and time. They thought it was completely absurd. And yet, based on those assumptions, he built his whole edifice of Newtonian mechanics and the theories of gravitation. And they were immensely, as I said, successful in terms of their material predictions and very helpful in all kinds of ways.

Later, as I said, they were proven untrue by experiments. Absolute space and absolute time are not held by scientists to be realities anymore. Yet, based on those false assumptions, dogmatic assertions, basically, that turned out to be wrong, this whole incredible opening up and blossoming of human knowledge and human capability came. Einstein's theory came as the two relativity theories undermined the ideas of absolute space and time once and for all, and then even more at a whole other level since then with quantum theories of space-time. It's a whole other level of kind of exploding the notions of an absolute space and absolute time.

But, as Lee Smolin points out in regard to that interesting historical trajectory there with those notions, he says absolute space and time was what was required to make progress at that time in history, at that time in Western history and the history of thought. And to see this was perhaps Newton's greatest achievement. And he brought in these notions. They were unpopular. They were regarded as ridiculous. They turned out, way after his death, to be not true. But based on these untrue, unpopular notions, all kinds of benefits and discoveries emerged.

Now, this to me suggests a parallel or analogous kind of legitimacy and usefulness of, at times, adopting in soul-making practice various assumptions or working logoi or conceptions that are either definitively not true, unproven or unprovable. So again, it's like the whole way we're working is not closed as tightly as the usual image that's presented to us of scientific methodology would seem to indicate.

Again, the fact, with regard to Newton, the fact that Newton's theories proved so accurate in their predictions and helpful made people assume that they were true, that those assumptions of absolute space and absolute time were true, and that the whole theory was true, until several hundred years later and those experiments and results around Einstein's relativity theories. So there's an assumption of truth just because of efficacy and predictive power and helpfulness. But the truth wasn't there, and yet all this could come out of it.

So with regard to the soul-making logos or different logos, different conceptions within the soul-making paradigm, different perceptions that we have, what does that imply? Might there be, as I said, legitimacy and fecundity and usefulness sometimes in just entertaining certain ideas, or building ideas, drawing ideas together, as I described in some earlier talks? Some of them may be definitively untrue. Some of them may be just—who knows—they're kind of in the realm of kind of metaphysics that's just about speculations, unverifiable, and yet can be immensely fruitful in what they open up, what they lead to, just as Newton's conceptual notions would form the basis of his whole architecture were.

Again, I'll just add those couple of sentences from J.M. Findlay: "Self-contradictory and empty notions play a vast part in human experience and attitude." And we might add, given what I've just said, that false notions, unproven notions, unprovable notions, can all actually be very fruitful in all kinds of ways.

And maybe, and I've said this before in the past, maybe we need ideas, we need concepts, we need conceptual frameworks. They orient us, they shape experience, they inspire us, they open avenues of sense and sensibility and perception and concept. In other words, ideas spawn other ideas, just as these ideas in Newton of absolute space and absolute time—on top of those ideas, with those ideas as a basis, further ideas came which were fruitful. And concepts and conceptual frameworks, no matter, as I said, whether they're sometimes untrue, unproven, unprovable, can in themselves be soul-making, or can be generative and supportive of soul-making.

Perhaps we need that kind of speculation, we need that kind of freedom with ideas. But ideas and conceptual frameworks are indispensable. It's part of humanity's soul to reach out, to grapple, to build, to speculate, to construct, to demolish, to sculpt these structures of ideas. And for our purposes, on that, or in that, wrapped up in all kinds of soul-making, all kinds of beauty, all kinds of opening for the soul.

Harold Fish wrote, "Man does not live by bread alone, but by the language which he discovers for signifying what is otherwise unsignifiable." Man does not live by bread alone, but by the language which he discovers for signifying what is otherwise unsignifiable. So in the face of the endless mystery of being, of the cosmos, of human being, what is otherwise unsignifiable—in the face of that, we live by the bread also of, he says, language. I would widen it to concept and conceptual framework. These nourish us. They open out possibilities. Like a scaffolding allows us to reach, to build things and to climb and reach places that we wouldn't otherwise be able to reach—vantage points. I can imagine going up a scaffolding and you can see you have a different view from that height.

So there's this need—I think there's a soul need—and soul-making needs conceptual frameworks. The question of what kind of ideas and where they stand in relation to truth or falsity, or proverness or unproverness, maybe that latitude may be wider than we have been taught to believe, have come to believe through this dominance of the classical scientific paradigm and its presentation of ontology and epistemology.

There's this need for the soul, for soul-making. There's a need for conceptual frameworks and ideas like that. But again, as I mentioned before, we need ideas. Maybe they don't need to be true, or maybe they're unprovable. Some of them, what we bring into the cauldron, the crucible of soul-making...

But still, I would say that although there might be this latitude, there is some constraint on it. Or maybe there needs to be some constraint on what kind of ideas and what their relationship is to ordinary perception, to our usual notions of reality, to what we take as truth or untruth. So that there is some rigor to a certain extent to the material in the cauldron. Or to the cauldron itself has some rigor—maybe that's a better way to say it. Some resistance, some constraint of solid material, if you like.

So that the ideas that we entertain, the conceptual frameworks in terms of soul-making, they're not just willy-nilly ideas. They're not just random ideas. A, they need to be generative of soul-making, but B, they're wrestling at least a little bit or somewhat in relationship with what we take to be true. They have some relationship with notions of truth. They're not completely divorced from that.

So they do have a connection with our experience and what we observe phenomenologically. There is some kind of connection with correspondence with what might be truth or reality. There is some kind of coherence of these ideas. So if there's more resistance there in the ideas, so it's not just willy-nilly, it's not just like moving air, there's some solidity and resistance so that this crucible is like molding clay. There's some solidity there, and in molding that solidity again, there's a kind of middle way there—more latitude than we might think with concepts and ideas and conceptual frameworks, and yet not completely so free as to become kind of just whimsical, ungrounded, airy, because then out of pure air a crucible cannot be built.

So again, there are two extremes, and somewhere in the middle, which is quite broad, there's fertile ground. Part of the fertility comes from a certain tussle and resistance, a kind of obligation to tether our ideation and what ideas we're experimenting with—tether it to notions of reality and truth, no matter how problematic the whole areas of truth and ideation are; to tether it to some kind of epistemology and ontology, no matter how open and complex and puzzling those areas are. It doesn't mean necessarily working it all out completely in some very finished product of philosophy—after all, no one has done that yet with any ontology or epistemology.

But I hope you get this point about this middle way that involves some sense of resistance while still having much more range and latitude and possibility than we might have thought if our thinking was completely dominated by what was presented to us as this model, this best way of thinking, this only way of thinking about ontology and epistemology and ideas that are entertainable.

So, for example, in the soul-making paradigm, some of the ideas that we've put out there, suggested or mentioned, alluded to at different times. For instance, the very—or the seemingly simple, most axiomatic proposition—the soul loves souls, taking that as a sort of very basic foundational idea which generates, spawns really a whole structure, a whole conceptual framework of soul-making. Or ideas like the possibility that our soul-making is God's soul-making, that we participate in the soul-making of divinity.

These are ideas that, again, they may not be proved, they may not even ever be provable, but they may be very fertile in different ways. Or as a variation on that, the idea I just mentioned, that our soul-making may be at times regarded as a kind of infinite jñāna. Jñāna—this word for gnosis. Buddha nature's ultimate knowing. A word that was amplified a lot in Mahāyāna, and particularly in Vajrayāna context.

What it implies, that word, or what it can imply in some circles, is that it's a kind of knowing that's able to fully see the emptiness of all things at the same time as it perceives appearances. And the subject and the object are not separate. The world that is perceived is not other than the mind, the Buddha nature mind, Dharmakāya that perceives it. They're all part of the same thing. And in the perception of the world, the temporal world, the perception is of divinity. So this Buddha nature perceives divinity everywhere. But in one and the same knowing, it can both know the unfabricated, the timeless, that which is beyond concept, the thorough emptiness, and the forms, the divine forms, and the temporal.

And that knowing might include embodied kind of knowing, other kinds of knowing, desire, the whole soul-making process. Our soul-making is a participation in that soul-making of the divinity, in the divinity's infinite jñāna, which is not a final process. It too is organic and grows with the soul-making dynamic. In that way also, our soul-making includes both this love and eros and attraction that we can have towards the unfabricated, as well as towards the perception of forms, this world, the world of matter.

An idea like that can come, or will come, I think. Some kind of idea like that will come, I think, just inevitably at some point, organically, out of the whole soul-making dynamic. As the eros with regard to our perceptions is allowed to infuse and inseminate them, expand the perception, expand the ideation, the eros-psyche-logos dynamic, we will begin at some point to experience the divinity of our own eros, of our own psyche, of the ideas that move in our mind, of what we see. And then an idea like I've just described—that our soul-making is participating in the infinite jñāna, or the soul-making of the Buddha nature, or of God, or whatever—that idea will arise naturally. I mean, I've mentioned it quite a few times over recent years.

Conversely, that idea might itself form a seed that stimulates the possibility, and opens, supports the possibility of that kind of perception of our process being divine that way and participating that way. And that idea and that perception together then may fertilize the whole soul-making dynamic further, crystallizing or growing, fermenting around that seed idea, and all kinds of other possibilities open.

So these ideas can be fertile, generative, opening. The whole idea of an angel out ahead, to borrow Corbin's phrase that we use quite a few times—of some image that is intimately related to me, sort of other than me, sort of part of me, me and not me, calling me, a telos, calling me, pulling me, attracting me, itself somehow timeless. Or the idea of eternality itself.

and timelessness as an element of the imaginal. All these ideas can be profoundly fertile. And they are, as I've mentioned, ideas that can come to us from our experience, or be suggested by what you hear one of us say, or read elsewhere, or hear someone else articulate. But importantly, they also arise from experience itself. In doing so, they can open up soul-making and support its deepening.

Conversely, these are precisely the kinds of ideas that, if we don't obstruct the soul-making process, I would expect to arise naturally—variations on these themes gaining substance and power in consciousness, in the soul. Through their relationship with our experience, you can see what I mean by the openness of ideas. We need not wait for something to be proven truth or reality, just as that example from physics with Newton's ideas demonstrates. Immense progress, opening, discovery, and technological creation—creations both material and conceptual—emerged from two ideas, absolute space and time, that eventually proved untrue.

Yet there remains some rigor involved in determining which ideas merit our engagement. While we needn't wait for them to be verified as true, these ideas must maintain some coherence within our larger conceptual framework. They must also remain contingent on our phenomenological observation—what actually occurs in our experience. Something unfolds in our process, in our perception and meditation, that suggests these ideas.

Consider, for instance, an idea that may have originated with Pseudo-Dionysius. He writes: "For this beauty, this ideal beauty, causes the existence of everything." In his metaphysical and spiritual system, there exists a transcendent absolute ideal of beauty, and he declares this beauty the source of all things. From this ideal emerges the existence of everything—beauty as source, as cause of all things.

He continues: "It is the great creating cause which bestirs the world and holds all things in existence by the longing inside them to have beauty. And there it is ahead of all as goal, as the beloved, as the cause towards which all things move, since it is the longing for beauty which actually brings them into being. It is a model to which they conform."

This presents a radically different understanding of causality than we typically encounter today. Yet perhaps this idea, even hearing this brief passage written centuries ago, stirs something in the soul and speaks to something deep within us. The idea itself, topsy-turvy as it appears compared to our usual thinking, can attract the soul and prove fertile in terms of what it accomplishes when we take it on, when we entertain it as a concept of causality.

On a human level, we can employ this idea in soul-making, as other paradigms do—for example, the Diamond Approach. The Ridhwan School holds that even the apparently ugly manifestations of our human nature, our choices and behaviors, are actually rooted in impulses toward beauty that have become distorted. Our pathologies, our kilesas—greed, aversion, and the rest—are actually grounded in the soul's deeper love of beauty. That was the initial stimulus, the seed, the original momentum. Only through conditions and the soul's avidya, its fundamental delusion, do these impulses get directed toward distorted manifestations of beauty, toward fixations of imagination rather than the truly imaginal.

We can entertain this more limited psychological idea about what actually drives our motivations, choices, and perceptions. But what would it mean to allow this idea to expand through the opening of soul-making to encompass the whole of nature, the entire cosmos? Is this possible? Through rigorous wrestling with ideas, could we allow this concept to open for us—even if unprovable—and become generative and powerful in the soul?

Or perhaps through meditation itself, through sensing the soul and allowing the soul-making dynamic to unfold in practice, our seeing and ideation naturally open until this perception of beauty-driven causality becomes something we actually sense. It becomes an immediate, tangible, palpable, striking sense of the universe and the cosmos we inhabit.

We could continue with countless other ideas—I've merely outlined four or five that readily come to mind. Over the years we've offered many possible ideas and concepts, and there are many more. But the essential point is this: it's possible to build upon ideas that are unproven, unprovable, and that may someday prove untrue. This happened in physics and likely continues to happen in physics and science generally. It certainly can occur in the realms of psychology, spiritual work, and soul-making.

These ideas can be fertile and supportive of soul-making without necessarily being true. Returning to the larger questions of ontology and epistemology, and dipping again into contemporary physics... Lee Smolin, the theoretical physicist working on quantum gravity and theories integrating gravity with the quantum world, reflects on recent decades and...

And voices a realization that dawned on him and other physicists over the last thirty years or so. Looking back, he says, it is clear that the assumption that a unified theory of physics—a unified theory of everything, or even just a unified theory of quantum physics and gravity—would be unique was no more than that: an assumption. There was this idea that if we could unify these different theories and arrive at a grand theory of everything, then that must be true. That must be it. Because there would probably be only one such theory.

But this notion—that there would be only one—he's realizing is merely an assumption. "There is no mathematical or philosophical principle," he continues, "which guarantees there to be only one mathematically consistent theory of nature." This returns us to the coherence principle: just because you can find a coherent theory, it doesn't mean there's only one of them.

For hypothetical worlds having one or two spatial dimensions rather than three—this is what physicists sometimes do, reducing their theories to make them more manageable mathematically—"we have constructed lots of consistent quantum theories, including some which have gravity, a fact which should lead us to doubt the assumption that mathematical consistency in itself allows only one theory of nature."

Elsewhere, Smolin introduces what he calls the hypothesis of duality. He presents this in the context of different theories—string theory, which posits that the ultimate building blocks of matter are strings rather than particles, waves, or fields, and field theory, which presents ultimate reality as electromagnetic fields, gravitational fields, or some kind of unified field of which all forces are manifestations.

"There is a possibility," he writes, "that both the string picture and the field picture are just different ways of looking at the same thing. They would then be equally fundamental and no experiment could decide between them. This possibility excites many theorists as it challenges some of our deepest instincts about how to think about physics. It is called the hypothesis of duality."

He emphasizes that this hypothesis differs from the wave-particle duality of quantum theory. It's a scaled-up version applying to whole theories and conceptual frameworks rather than just one kind of entity. Instead of asking whether something is a wave or a particle, we're considering whether whole theoretical edifices might be different ways of looking at the same reality.

"Like the principles of relativity and quantum theory," he explains, "the hypothesis of duality tells us that two seemingly different phenomena are just two ways of describing the same thing. If true, it has profound implications for our understanding of physics." He suggests that by embracing this hypothesis, several problems that have clouded physics for almost two centuries may be resolved, and this idea remains a major driving force behind current research.

No doubt some physicists find this exciting while others find it deeply disturbing. But again, this brings us back to these different meta-strategies and meta-conceptions regarding ontology and epistemology—how knowledge should proceed and can proceed.

When Smolin suggests there's no guarantee of only one consistent theory of nature, when he introduces this hypothesis of duality—that two different theories might be different ways of looking at the same thing—this could be akin to what I mentioned earlier regarding mystical absolutes. Consider two different cartographical representations of the globe: the Mercator projection and the polar projection. Because of our limitations in representing three-dimensional reality on a two-dimensional map, these systems offer different ways of representing the same globe, each with their strengths and limitations.

Similarly, our normal three-dimensional perspective trying to capture multi-dimensional reality in physics might require these multiple mapping systems. The globe itself, reality itself, nature itself, the cosmos itself exists in a certain way. Or consider those disco balls I mentioned, or the Necker cube—those two-dimensional representations that flip between different three-dimensional perspectives when we perceive them.

But here we're discussing whole conceptual structures, whole conceptual frameworks that, like the Necker cube perspectives, cannot be entertained simultaneously but between which we can flip. This goes beyond single ideas to encompass entire worldviews.

An example of contradictory single ideas would be our approach to sensing with soul: the perception that we project images—that images emerge from our minds, that we create them—versus the idea that the image projects us, that we are in fact an emanation or projection of the image. This latter idea is much less popular, but these two contradictory concepts can be held together. In the Soul-making Dharma, we speak of "create and discover," the imaginal middle way, attempting to harness the complementarity and paradoxical nature of these opposing ideas.

But they're single ideas. Here we're talking about whole frameworks, whole conceptual frameworks.

So these ideas that Lee Smolin is discussing for physics—that there's no guarantee of only one consistent theory, and this hypothesis of duality with regard to whole theories—do they imply this notion of similarity between maps trying to represent something at higher dimensions that actually is real in higher dimensions? Or do they represent a manifestation of the whole emptiness, ways of looking paradigm, where ultimately there's this profound mutual involvement, profound mutual participation of subject and object, mind and matter?

It may be that many physicists don't like that idea because their whole project from when they were young was to try and discover what reality is in an objective sense. So the idea that mind is involved in that way may not sit well with their inclinations.

It might be that these two ideas—the one of the absolutes and the one of emptiness, ways of looking—there are ways of conceiving where they're not actually that different anyway.

If we expand this consideration beyond the realm of just physics and again extend to include other antinomies—meaning insoluble dichotomies that are part of our experience of the world and our consideration of the world—and open up the philosophy of that without shirking from them as Kant did, and Hegel and J.N. Findlay and many others.

For example, the whole antinomy or paradox between free will and determinism. We sense that we have free will as human beings. And at the same time, we can also sense and see and understand, and in many cases seem like we can prove or show that our responses and our choices are determined biologically, culturally, in terms of conditioning.

How do we integrate those two positions—the belief in free will and the belief in determinism? If I just choose one over the other, I lose quite a lot. If I really just believe in free will, it doesn't leave much room for compassionate understanding—for instance, crimes or what's motivating a criminal, or when we fall short of our ideals ethically. When I just believe in determinism and leave no room for anything else—everything's just biologically conditioned or culturally conditioned or whatever—it leaves no room for free will.

What does that feel like? What kind of life does that form a basis for? What kind of sense of life? Kind of soulless, with actually very little meaning possible in life. Very little nobility. In that way too, also lacking in compassion. Lacking in wisdom as well.

Or the whole conundrum of mind and matter—how does consciousness meet matter? How does consciousness know about matter? How is there this quantum leap between that which doesn't have awareness and that which does have awareness? How can they contact each other? How can one arise from the other? Are they two? If they're two, how do they connect? If they're one, how is it possible that this one came out of that one?

As I said, there are these different approaches. We have the approach of emptiness, ways of looking. We have this approach of the mystical absolutes, akin to the analogy of the different cartographical representations.

You get certain philosophers who fall in one camp. For example, Hegel and J.M. Findlay, Samford Drob, who favor the idea of a real or true mystical absolute. It exists as it is. We cannot normally intuit that mystical absolute because our conception and perception doesn't tend to work at that level for the most part. We cannot see in those extra dimensions. We cannot think and conceive in those extra dimensions. But it is a real and true thing, and sometimes through reasoning and careful thinking and deduction, we can intuit that mystical absolute, that real truth in super dimensions. Or through meditation, we can intuit, open to, get a glimpse and a taste of that real, true mystical absolute.

In that absolute, there is a kind of coincidentia oppositorum—the Latin phrase with a long history in Western philosophy and alchemy. The idea of the coincidence, the kind of interdependence and interpenetration of things which seem opposite to each other. So for example, free will and determinism, mind and matter. There are philosophers that favor that approach and that whole idea, working toward that postulate.

Then there are other philosophers, probably much more common these days, who favor a kind of ultimate truth of things as a fractured, incomplete finitude of our human being and our human knowledge and the world itself. Slavoj Žižek has this notion of the parallax gap. Parallax is two perspectives on the same object. Actually there's parallax between your two eyes. If you close one eye and then close the other eye, if you look at an object a few feet in front of you and just close one eye and close the other eye, you'll see it moves. The apparent placement of the object moves when you close one eye compared with the other eye. So each eye is getting a parallax view.

Rather than, as happens in our biology, the brain integrating those views when we have both eyes open, he, along with many contemporary philosophers in the postmodern vein or stimulated by postmodern thought, suggests there is no ultimately reconcilable view.

There is no absolute that synthesizes this kind of coincidentia oppositorum. There's just parallax. We live in a fractured world. We are incomplete. Our knowledge is incomplete. Our vision is incomplete. It is that way. There's this gap between different perceptions, conceptions, and conceptual frameworks. There is no hard reality to which they refer. There is no truth. There is no synthesis. There is nothing in another dimension that we can hope to mystically open to.

But again, going back to something I talked about earlier, I would ask: what's the psychology that's going on underneath that kind of position? When someone insists on either one or the other—that there is this mystical absolute or there isn't—what are the motivations?

So what is going on in Slavoj Žižek's soul, if you like? What are his motivations for insisting on that position? And that kind of finitude—to borrow a term that I think came from Heidegger—that kind of fracturedness, he talks about a kind of nothingness, and that nothingness is, in a way, the ultimate reality. There's just this gap, this parallax gap. If I quote Sanford Robb writing about Žižek, he said: "Reality for Žižek is the irreducible gap between oppositions. They're the incommensurate views of his parallax."

And again, what's going on psychologically? What's the motivations for wanting this kind of world, this kind of postulate about reality? Because he's still making a postulate about reality. There's still a metaphysics there. He's saying the truth is there's no hard reality and there's just this fracturedness, this gap, this nothingness, this irreconcilable difference. What's fashion? You know, how much human beings are conditioned by fashion. As I was mentioning when I talked about reading some of the philosophy articles and books from a certain period in the late 20th century and how they almost start with what reads like an almost fearful proclamation of one's sort of guilt-freeness with regard to... What's fashion? What's intimidation? What's career moves? What other kinds of motivation are more to do with the way we want to fabricate self, other, world? Why? What's going on?

So these are all, to me, really interesting questions. And not that we can ever always get to the bottom of that, because whatever system we have for deciding or looking at the questions of motivation, psychology, and soul, they're also going to be based on other concepts and assumptions and systems—systems of psychology, which are very, very different. You know, what motivates people from the point of view of Freudian is very different than what motivates people from the point of view of a Jungian or a Skinnerian or whatever. Or from our point of view, for that matter.

So I don't know Žižek's work intimately at all. Sometimes when I read a little, it sounds a little bit similar to the emptiness, ways of looking thing that I've offered and laid out, but I don't think it is really. Again, as with several of the other philosophers I mentioned, there's very often a sort of hard reality being smuggled back in one way or another. And again, there's a difference in tone and the kind of world painted and the picture of humanity painted by that whole view of reality.

So it has the flavor, to me, what Žižek is propounding, has the flavor of that kind of tragic existentialist view of reality. But for him, that tragic existentialist view is, he would say, necessary for society to get on and live together and prosper and to have human freedom, etc. There's an argument a bit like Richard Rorty. He said we need to keep the conversation open and keep it happening.

But, as I said, so often that kind of view itself, rather than opening things up for people, there's a way that it can actually harden. There can be underlying agendas and opinions about reality and there's a way that the whole thing can become just a kind of shrug with regard to truth and with regard to the possibility of passionately pursuing questions of ontology and epistemology and truth.

So I don't know if I'm reading it rightly, but if you compare that kind of tone and feel and direction and kind of soul-scape, cosmos-scape, if you like, with what it does potentially to that passion, to that eros, with regard to ontology, epistemology and truth—if you compare that with a quote from Goethe, which I'm really, as I said, not sure if I'm interpreting it right, but I'll read it anyway.

People say, he says, that between two opposed opinions, truth lies in the middle. Not at all. A problem lies in between—invisible, eternally active life contemplated in peace.

A problem lies in between two opposed opinions. Invisible, eternally active life contemplated in peace.

Might he mean that in regard to these seemingly irreconcilable differences of view, of theory, of conceptual framework, of these lacunae and problems in our whole approach to and wish for and relationship with truth and reality, that there can still be a kind of open-ended eros and inquiry regarding truth and reality? Contemplate it in peace, so we don't need to start wars over this kind of thing.

Maybe—again, I may be stretching what he says in a direction he didn't mean it—but that peace can also include agitation. Just as the artist in their creative work can be okay with what Picasso called "the anxiety in the creative process and the agitation in the creative process." Maybe also as thinkers, as philosophers, as explorers of truth, as wanderers in both spellings of the word—with an O and with an A—wanderers in the cosmos, our peaceful contemplation of these things can be filled with eros and passion and agitation.

There's a certain level of stirring up the soul. We want to know, we're gripping, we're following threads, we have to hold on—it's complicated, it's confusing. So there may be a certain agitation there at times. At other times there can just be very easeful, fluid exploration of these things, fluid moving between considering and entertaining different conceptual frameworks.

But perhaps in what Goethe is saying is: no cheap answers, no cheap shrugging. In the face of no cheap answers, perhaps this open-ended eros and inquiry is possible for us. Perhaps the cosmos itself is beckoning us to that, ongoingly, forever.

I remember learning to swim. My father teaching me to swim. He would, in the shallow bit of the sea, stand sort of ten feet away when I was young—my brother and sister as well. And he'd say, "Swim to me." So we would swim. And he would—I'm pretty sure, though he would absolutely deny it—I'm pretty sure then he would just slowly walk backwards, so that I just had to swim further and further and would sort of improve my swimming. I kept saying, "You're moving backwards!" He said, "No, I'm not, I'm not."

But maybe there's something of that in the cosmos—the cosmos itself as meta-angel out ahead, in its mysteries, in the conundra it presents us, in what it allows us to glimpse, in what it reveals, and then that presents other conundra, other problems, other seemingly irreconcilable dichotomies and paradoxes. And we're drawn onwards by the cosmos, by our eros, by our love, by our curiosity, by our soul.

Maybe too—just adding a piece to something I mentioned earlier—maybe in all these questions about, considerations about ontology and epistemology and metaphysics and what's justifiable and what's legitimate and all that, maybe we also need to expand our notions and categories of epistemology, our notions and categories of ontology.

Usually, if you just think about it, when we think about epistemological categories, we think about either you know something or you believe something. In other words, in terms of ideas and perceptions that we can trust. So generally, epistemology: either you know it or you believe it.

We notice with the imaginal how much it can give freedom and strength. I've given a few examples—how imaginal images and the way they calm and touch the soul and open the soul can give great freedom and profound freedom and strength with regard to, say, dying young. But that whole category of imaginal experience doesn't really fit simply into either of those categories of knowing or belief.

I have some image of something or some sense of sensing the soul of the cosmos. And am I then insisting on that as a truth in the way that we usually consider the word knowledge—I know this, this constitutes knowledge, it's a truth? No. Neither is it belief in the usual sense.

So usually we have these two categories—knowing and belief—when we think about epistemology, when the layperson thinks about epistemology. The knowing category is further categorized into either correct knowing, accurate knowing, or incorrect—you're deluded. And then if there's not knowing, there's belief. And either when there's knowing or belief, that can give you power.

For the soul, it can give you a sense of something that the soul is trusting. And that thing and that trust has tremendous power and gives the soul, in this case, lots of support.

It may be that, wrapped up in the imaginal, the whole coherence of the conceptual framework may be a factor in the epistemological strength and efficacy of the image. I've alluded to this again as well—how important the conceptual frameworks are, that they are coherent, supportive, rigorous, that they make sense, that they lead onward, meaning they lead to more soul-making, and they're also in contact with our experience and with the rest of the ideations.

Or it may be that the whole imaginal perception, what comes to us through the imaginal, is more like art. The whole relationship is more like art.

Someone might say to me or to someone else, "Oh, you had an experience, you had an image or you had a vision or whatever it is, and that makes the difference. That's why you feel peaceful with dying young or okay with it or whatever it is." But underlying their comment is probably an assumption that because of that experience, you now think or believe you know something. You know something about reality that makes your dying or death in general okay, or that you believe something.

Again, they put it into those two more common epistemological categories, even though they don't think this way—those two epistemological categories that have become the only ones left to us in the current dominant worldview. But the effect of the imaginal experience is actually more like the effect of art. So it's neither knowledge in that limited usual sense, nor is it belief. It's a third epistemological category, most akin to the way art works when it profoundly moves us, when it profoundly touches the soul, gives us reassurance, gives us orientation in life and meaning, something we would stake our lives on, even though it doesn't fall into these two currently more usual epistemological categories: knowing or belief. It's something else.

So again, we go back to that Yeats quote about belief, and whether that's really the appropriate word, the appropriate concept for what happens with regard to poetic sensibility, artistic sensibility, and imaginal sensing—sensing the soul.

Finally, can all these possibilities remain open? The possibility of some kind of mystical absolute that's real and true, but exists at levels or dimensions beyond our usual conception and perception. The whole emptiness ways of looking idea. The whole imaginal middle way. The pursuit—the erotic pursuit in science, in philosophy, in psychology—our erotic pursuit of truth. The idea that we need to step back and actually think about other epistemological categories beyond the ones that we've just been handed by history and by our culture, by certain developments of Western culture over the years.

Is it possible that all these possibilities remain open, that they remain viable, that they're avenues we can walk down, travel down, explore? Open roads that we remain alive to, and they remain alive as directions, frameworks to entertain and explore?

I'm not suggesting this openness because I'm a nice guy and I don't like argument and I'm trying to appease everyone and have everything be really calm and peaceful. That's not why I'm saying that. All of them involve problems, involve limits, involve danger—if that's not too dramatic a term—intellectual danger.

There's a line from Leonard Cohen: "There's a crack in everything, that's how the light gets in." And we can apply that to conceptual frameworks. All these conceptual frameworks have cracks, for many of the reasons I've traced in this talk. But there's always a crack. There's always a hole in the foundation that's sort of patched together. There's always a crack that will appear. It's where the light gets in. It's where the growth gets in.

I would say the problems with regard to ontology and epistemology are ultimately insoluble, many of them. Humanity will never reach some final conclusion that's proven and satisfying, that doesn't have a crack in it. But those cracks in conceptual frameworks, those holes, those patchings over—that's actually part of the deal and partly what spurs us onwards, what draws us onwards, what allows other containers, which too will have cracks, so that there is growth there. There's a dynamic that's possible if we can relate to this in the right way.

It needs our openness—openness of mind, openness of heart and soul. It needs our eros, it needs our participation. We need to participate in this whole conundrum.

Something I've mentioned before: we tend to relate to these questions of ontology and epistemology in terms of wanting to know the truth. And I think that remains an important motivation and stimulus for that movement. But given everything I've said in this talk and previous talks, it may be that our eros and inquiry into truth and reality may not actually yield truth—yield some kind of final truth that we have then finished with, for the reasons that I've said. It may not deliver us to that truth.

But it may open up for us and yield all kinds of other gifts, some of which will be enormously helpful in different ways, all kinds of other discoveries and creations, just as with the example of Newton and his theories. And it may lead to soul-making.

So our inquiries into and wrestlings with ontology and epistemology can be considered not just in terms of the goal of truth, but of soul-making too. You understand? Why choose this ontology? Why even wrestle with these questions? Yes, in regard to truth, but also because of the soul-making.

So an individual idea, an individual logos or concept may itself be soul-making or supportive of soul-making. A whole conceptual framework—out of many different conceptual frameworks we can entertain—may or may not be soul-making. And the whole movement of inquiry into ontology and epistemology and truth, the legitimization of metaphysics or not—that whole inquiry itself may or may not be soul-making depending on how we're approaching it.

But we can expand the consciousness of our motivations so it's wider than just wanting to know the truth. We can actually realize that part of what's wrapped up in this is what delivers soul-making and what doesn't. And of course that may change not only in different periods in history and culture and place, but also right now in my practice.

Not everyone is going to get really passionately interested and even obsessed with these kinds of questions of ontology and epistemology. There are huge differences in souls and what they're drawn to and what they're drawn to at different times. But still, if I quote Harold Fish again—or actually expand on his quote, alter it slightly—you know, remember he said, "Man does not live by bread alone, but by the language which he discovers for signifying what is otherwise unsignifiable."

So human beings do not live by bread alone, but by the concepts and conceptual frameworks which they create and discover for signifying what is otherwise unsignifiable. That they create and discover to represent, to navigate, to orient, to open, to explore, to make coherent sense of the mystery of things—the mystery of being, the mystery of reality, and a human being's relationship with that in terms of epistemology and all else.

So this is something—whether or not we become really involved in the nitty-gritty of these philosophical questions, some will, some won't—still the importance of conceptual frameworks that have some rigor, some constraint, but also that we're open to create and discover. And mediated by that is the soul-making, or really as part of that is the soul-making. That is part of soul-making.

Again, to repeat something I've said in previous talks: to think that I can just throw away metaphysics, throw away and ignore, shrug and walk away from ontology, epistemology, metaphysical speculation—to think that I can avoid that in some kind of pure, non-conceptual relationship with the universe, with existence, to think that I can rid myself of all that—that's delusion.

It comes in, and we don't necessarily need to buy the limited old model that went with classical science and scientism. There are a lot of holes in that. There's an expansion possible there. And to enter into and open up to that expansion will support and nourish and give lifeblood to the whole exploration of sensing with soul and to our whole sense of existence.

CHAPTER 185

Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 2h24

> In this opening talk from the series "Four Circles, Four Parables of Stone and Light," Rob Burbea undertakes a deep examination of what constitutes a spiritual tradition, particularly focusing on Buddha-dharma and its relationship to soul-making dharma. He explores the essential elements of a living tradition: shared values, practices, texts, and beliefs, while questioning the tensions between authority and autonomy, unity and differentiation.
>
> Drawing on philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre's insights, Burbea argues that healthy traditions are "partly constituted by continuous argument" about their core values and purposes. He examines how cultural influences inevitably shape traditions, citing examples from Jewish Kabbalah's integration of Neoplatonism and Christianity's incorporation of Greek philosophy. The talk addresses the role of mystery and incomprehensibility in keeping traditions alive, contrasting clear, rational presentations with more poetic, mysterious texts that invite ongoing interpretation.
> Burbea also considers "creative mistakes" - how misunderstandings, mistranslations, and misinterpretations often contribute to a tradition's evolution. He references suttas like the Alagaddupama Sutta (MN 22) to show the Buddha's concern for protecting authentic dharma while acknowledging the inevitable diversity within traditions. This reflection is essential for anyone devoted to dharma practice, as our love for the teachings necessarily involves fantasies and images of tradition that shape our spiritual journey.

As I mentioned earlier in this series of talks, some of what I want to speak about is really for the sake of bringing things to our collective attention—your individual attention, our collective attention—for consideration, for reflection, certain aspects, certain elements, certain strands, certain dimensions of things. That reflection and consideration obviously involves the mind, but also the heart, and even more so the soul. What does it mean to hear something, to ponder it, to mull it over, to digest and let it sink in, not just to the mind, not just to the heart, but also to the soul?

One of those strands or elements or aspects that I would like to bring into the light, to shine some light on, is the whole question of tradition, or the whole concept of tradition. I really mean mostly what we might call religious or spiritual traditions—even if you don't like either of those words, religious or spiritual, you know what I mean.

Perhaps that might strike some of you as a slightly strange subject for a dharma talk—to talk about tradition, or traditions, or what a tradition is and what's involved in tradition. I'm not sure. Of course, some of you might think, "Well, Rob, at this point, they're all pretty strange, the dharma talks." So either way.

But I'd like to reflect a little bit on tradition, sort of lay things out, unpack things, open them up and kind of look at what we've got there. Within that, particularly, I'm talking obviously about the tradition of Buddha-dharma, the Buddhist tradition. And within that, as part of what we want to look at and consider as well, is the place or how we might conceive of the place of, say, soul-making dharma with respect to Buddha-dharma. What's that relationship there? How do we conceive of soul-making dharma? How do we place it with regard to the tradition of Buddha-dharma? And what would it mean to talk about or to consider a soul-making dharma tradition?

It's too early to say anything like that, but if there were such a thing to evolve in the future, or a feeling of such a thing, a perception of such a thing among certain people, what might we unpack, lay out that would also have relevance to that kind of situation, that kind of sense of tradition, or a tradition like that?

Some people would say, well, we're at a point in history, humanity is at a point in history where it's important to reflect on traditions for all kinds of reasons. Yes, that may well be true—after modernism or in the throes of modernism or the dying throes of modernism or post-modernism or whatever. It might be true that we're at that juncture, at that point in history.

But one could ask: is the whole notion of a point in history really a reality? That's something I'll come back to. Is there really a point in history that we can agree on? We are at this point of history. This is what characterizes this point in history, this juncture. These are the salient features. This is what's important. This is what constitutes that juncture or that point.

Some would say it's important to talk about tradition and our sense of that, our expectations of that, our views of traditions, our relationships with traditions because of where humanity is at the current time historically. But I would say perhaps more importantly: if you love practice, and if you are devoted to practice, and if you love the teachings, then—as you've heard me point out before—where there is that kind of love and devotion, there is fantasy in the soul-making sense of the word.

There is a kind of narrative image that potentially has all the qualities of the imaginal, all the elements of the imaginal filled out with beauty and dimensionality and eros. So if you love practice and the teachings, if you're devoted to practice and the teachings, there will be, wrapped up in that love and partly supporting that love, a fantasy of practice and yourself in practice and the teachings. That will involve fantasy of the tradition—an idea of the tradition, a sense of the tradition, a relationship with the tradition, an image of the tradition.

That fantasy also feeds your love. So there's again a mutual support, a mutual reinforcement, a mutual nourishment, a mutual dependency, if you like, of the love and the devotion on the one hand and the fantasy on the other. And they're not really even separable. So if you love practice and the teachings, and if you're devoted to the teachings, there will be the fantasy and there will be a sense of tradition as part of that larger fantasy, and you will care about these kinds of things that we're talking about tonight. You'll care about this question of tradition and what it involves and what to expect from it. It won't be abstract. It will matter to you. It will be of more than somewhat academic interest.

Not too long ago, I was speaking with a colleague, Stephen Batchelor, and was asking him how it was going with Bodhi College. He was telling me a few things, and one of the things he said was that they had put together a course and advertised it online about the Buddhist roots of mindfulness—really looking at the origins in the Buddhist teachings, in the Pali Canon, of contemporary mindfulness practices and teachings. He said that surprising to them was the fact that virtually no one registered for that course. There was very little interest from people who were either mindfulness practitioners or participants in mindfulness courses or mindfulness teachers or therapeutic mindfulness workers or whatever. And they were surprised by that.

On reflection, in a way, I'm not that surprised because it may be that in the way mindfulness is promoted in some circles these days and the way it's practiced and related to by many is really as a technique, or perhaps a set of techniques, for the alleviation of suffering—so that one lives one's life as one lives it, and one just incorporates these techniques as sort of useful and helpful strategies to reduce stress, anxiety, suffering, and dis-ease.

As such, as just a technique that has some utility in relieving stress and anxiety, pain for example, it remains just that—a kind of utilitarian technique. And it rarely, or for many people, it won't ever become more than that. They may practice mindfulness every day for the rest of their lives with a certain kind of commitment—let's not call it devotion, let's call it commitment. A certain kind of steadiness of commitment is important to them, and it's really helpful, and that's great.

But it's never more than that. It's never more than a technique for reducing suffering, so there isn't the kind of falling in love with practice and the ethos of practice and the rich constellation of dimensions and aspects and elements that gather around and make up something like a Buddhist practice.

For a person who's simply relating to mindfulness as a technique that's helpful in their lives, that's wonderful, that's great. But there won't be the falling in love. There won't therefore be the fantasy. And there won't be the sense of caring much about tradition and therefore caring much about the past and the stories and the history.

So in a way, on reflection, I wasn't too surprised to hear that from Stephen—that there was very little uptake or interest in such a course. If you love, and I'm assuming most people who listen to this talk will be people who love practice deeply, who have deep devotion to practice and to teachings, there will be a fantasy, there will therefore be implicitly some sense of and care about and kind of fantasy of an eros for tradition and everything that's implied in there.

Like I said at the beginning, I just want to bring some things to light, bring some of the aspects of this question of tradition to light, lay it out. I don't want to conclude too much from that. It's almost like just, as I said, laying out some things on the ground together. We can have a look. I don't want to impose any conclusions that I might have on that kind of laying out of material and considerations. I would more give it to you to perhaps make your conclusions, but also, as I said, to ponder, to reflect: How does this sit with me? How do all these considerations or these aspects, when we lay them out and look at them and say, "Yes, there's that and there's that and that and didn't think of that"—how does it land with you? How does it sit in your heart, in your soul, in your mind? What's the response of your being? And what's the responsibility of your being? Again, the responsibility of your soul, if you care deeply.

If you love deeply, again, it goes with duty. If you love deeply, if you're devoted, there's image around, there's eros around. Things are on the verge of or on their way to being fully imaginable, and part of that will be duty, and part of the duty will be to the teachings, to the tradition.

So in laying all this out, again, I don't want to force any conclusions that I might have or any perspectives that I might have too much. Some of that will be inevitable just in the nature of the situation—it's me talking, I'm in the role of the teacher here, some authority with that, some clout with that—but really I'm more interested in the process of how it sits, how it's digested, how it's related to and held in your heart.

Certainly my intention is not to be primarily deconstructive or destructive of loyalties and notions of tradition. Some might say, "Oh, you're saying some dangerous things." I'm not sure. I don't know about that. I think it's just a matter of maturity and honesty and consciousness and openness of mind. And then what do we do with this? How do we assimilate it, consider it, reflect on it? Where do we move from here? How do we look towards the past, towards the present, towards the future, inwards and outwards, at each other?

So it's really for you and about your process. And as much as possible, I just want to lay some things out for that kind of heart, mind and soul consideration.

If we just bring up the word tradition and immediately consider what comes to mind when we think about tradition—what is a tradition? What do we mean by tradition? And even more pointedly or relevantly, what do we mean or what's involved, what needs to be involved and included in a healthy tradition, if we might use such a term, or an alive, a living tradition? What elements and constituents might be necessary to form a healthy living tradition that retains some coherence and some vitality?

If we just think about it briefly—and I don't mean at all to be comprehensive, I just want to throw some things in a pot right now. But some of what I want to throw into that pot may not be immediately obvious when we think of what's involved in tradition. I don't intend to be comprehensive at this point, and actually through none of this talk am I intending to be comprehensive. There's other material that I've explored before around these subjects, so I don't want to repeat too much. But I do want to unearth or bring to light some elements to consider that, as I said, might not be obvious to many of us at first.

So what do you think of when we say tradition? What do you think is included or implied? If we just think almost off the top of the head, tradition implies a community for a start. So tradition has to be more than one person. And that community has to be spread, if you like. It has to exist in the present, so to speak. There's a community that extends in the present between people. And it also has to have a tie with the past, a flow from the past, and hopefully into the future.

So it's a community in the present with a past, with a connection, a feed from the past.

And that community—what's included? Again, we're just kind of throwing into a pot: what's included, what's necessary for a healthy living tradition? That community that constitutes a tradition needs to have certain things shared. So one is values. There needs to be a good degree of shared values. Some of what we can put in that part of values is the goals—what goals, what aims, what ends are considered valuable? And so there has to be a kind of common ground among the members of the community, extending both from the past to the present into the future, and also in the present among constituent members of that community, of that sangha.

There needs to also be shared practices, shared rituals or customs. Actually, let me open this up as a question rather than insisting there needs to be. I'd rather put it as a question. Does there need to be, or to what extent does there need to be in this community shared values, shared goals, shared practices, shared rituals, shared customs?

To what extent does there need to be shared stories—anecdotes from the past of characters, beings, teachers, disciples, practitioners from the tradition? To what extent does there need to be a shared history of that tradition? This is the history of our tradition. To what extent does there need to be a shared vocabulary, where certain words become meaningful, important, charged, rich, and also function powerfully as shorthands that people perhaps know what you're talking about when you say "Four Noble Truths" or "mindfulness" or whatever?

So shared vocabulary, shared beliefs. Again, really asking: to what extent does a healthy, vital, and living community need to share beliefs? Need shared beliefs, shared conceptual frameworks, logoi, and shared ontological commitments, which in a way are partly beliefs—what I talked about in one of the earlier talks.

Somehow, if we're going to feel part of the same community—me and this person, whoever it is, me and this group—do we actually have to share ontological commitments, a sense of what we believe and feel and invest in as truth? Including the truth with implicit epistemological considerations of what we believe are the ways to come by knowledge of the truth?

Does a living, healthy tradition need shared texts? So what is handed, what comes to us—agama in Pali and Sanskrit is often the word used for the texts, the suttas. It means literally "what has come," what has arrived, what has been received. So there is some body of received text—it could be oral, it doesn't have to be written—and that body forms a focus and a reference point and hopefully rich material for study. So there's a possible process of getting more acquainted with, more steeped in, developing understanding of this material, this agama, this text or received teachings.

But not only study—also for veneration. We can put that in inverted commas. So that might have a very obviously religious character where a piece of text is venerated to the extent that it's put in a stupa and people circumambulate the stupa or kiss the text or bow down to the text, even if they're not practicing it or don't even understand what it says. It could be that kind of religious character of veneration, or it could just be veneration in the sense of respecting the authority of that text. And it holds a certain kind of immovable or unbudgeable power. One has to reckon with what's written in that text.

So text, received teachings—oral, written—for study, for veneration, and also for interpretation, or interpretations, plural. This is where I really want to come back to this: to what extent does there need to be some focus material that is, or does it need to be, to what extent does it need to be open to interpretations, interpretation and a plurality of interpretations? So that it's not just one-dimensional, one unilinear text or material. Is there something in the vitality and health of tradition that actually needs root texts, core texts, canonical texts to have a certain openness to them, or to be related to them as if they had a certain openness?

I'm going to come back to this, but there's perhaps a certain tension between latitude of interpretation and the letter—if that's the right way of putting it. So that there's the letter, there's the text, there's the teaching, there's the recording, there's the oral transmission or whatever. And then is there a latitude of interpretation? I want to come back to that point later.

Or another way of saying it might be: does there need to be something in the tradition—not necessarily someone, but something—that is regarded as authoritative somehow? The authority resides in that text, if not in that person or persons or body or hierarchy or whatever. In that text, does there need to be something that's regarded as authoritative? And in that way, functions as a kind of immovable anchor, something one needs to reckon with.

But is there a tension between that need for something authoritative—and I'll put that word "authoritative" also in inverted commas—on the one hand, and also a need for some autonomy of the individuals who are involved in that tradition, who are members of that tradition? Is there some kind of tension? Are both these elements needed?

Something needs to be authoritative - perhaps someone, but maybe just something like a text. And there needs to be some autonomy allowed, some wiggle room, some latitude of movement, interpretation, and practice. Maybe both elements are necessary.

How much diversity does there need to be? Is there a minimum amount of diversity required in the tradition? Is there a maximum? What kinds of diversity are we talking about? Diversity of all kinds - not just personalities, ethnicities, gender, and sexual orientations, but all kinds of diversity.

Consider, for example, diversity of directions within the tradition. There are suttas in the Pali Canon where the Buddha describes his disciples gathered in Jeta's Grove or some other location. He points out that in one corner of the field or forest, there's a group of monks sitting with Moggallana, one of his two chief disciples, interested in developing their siddhis - their supernormal powers, their psychic abilities. Over there are monks sitting with another teacher, developing something else. In yet another area, monks sit with Sariputra, focusing on jhana or some other practice.

Within the larger community and tradition, there existed this diversity of directions - what people wanted to develop remained available as a range of choices within the community.

To what extent does a living tradition need to include both people who are further along the path - more advanced, more senior - as well as those who are newer, more junior, just beginning with the teachings, not yet developed in their understanding, practice, and knowledge?

You can already hear in what I've been saying that none of these elements is actually simple. We might think we can just define tradition as involving "this, this, and this." While I'm not trying to be comprehensive here, none of these aspects are simple when you pause to consider what's involved, what might be involved, what's healthy, what becomes too much, or what's not enough.

One question I want us to consider - and if you love practice and teachings, these questions will be important to you, if not now, then one day - is this: We've been discussing shared elements that need to be present for a living, healthy tradition. If we turn this around and ask what differences, what absences of shared ground become fatal for a tradition - fracturing it too much, rendering it dead or lifeless or stagnant, or causing it to explode in some way - what would those be?

At this point in history (if we can use that word, that idea of a time in history, which is itself questionable), this strikes me as a particularly interesting question.

For example, as I mentioned in another talk, if you're going to practice soul-making dyad or triad work - any group doing soul-making practice together - and there's not a shared conceptual framework, it might not work. It might prove frustrating and disappointing.

There's also this strange necessity, even for deep friendship, to share ontological commitments regarding the world, cosmology, and the nature of human beings. Would ontological commitments be an example of an aspect whose absence as shared ground becomes fatal for a tradition? When ontological commitments aren't shared or don't overlap enough, relationships can't really flourish because the difference is so basic. One set of ontological commitments versus another creates such a fundamental difference that it forms a fracture, an abyss. Two camps within a tradition hardly constitute a coherent tradition anymore.

All these considerations go into the pot, and very quickly we realize that none of these elements is actually simple. They all bear further reflection, further consideration, further opening out and feeling into.

Some aspects of what's involved or necessary to include in a living, healthy tradition might be less obvious than the lists I've just gone through quite quickly. And some things might be far less obvious.

So I have a question: Is it necessary for a living, healthy tradition - a vital tradition - to include some element of mystery or something mysterious, perhaps even to the point of relative incomprehensibility? This could range from the more poetic to the almost completely opaque.

Does it need some element of mystery, of something that's not clearly comprehensible? There's a question. That element is, to me at least, less apparent in, say, Pali Canon Buddha-Dharma as it's come to us, certainly in the West.

In some living traditions in, say, Southeast Asia—in Thailand and Cambodia—the actual tradition of Pali Canon Buddhism is so wrapped up with other influences. For example, in Cambodia, there was actually Mahayana at some point in history for a while. So there's a lot of Mahayana teachings wrapped up in Cambodian Buddhism. The vestiges of that are still alive and color and shape and influence the tenor and thrust and range and quality of Cambodian Theravadan Buddhism, so-called.

In Thailand, if you talk to people who've been monks and nuns there—Westerners—it's totally imbued. It's still retained, for example, the belief that you find all over the Pali Canon: the belief in devas and angels and wood spirits and the spirit of this tree and the deva that lives in that forest. And that's very much part of the whole tenor, flavor, range, color of that version of Theravadan Buddhism.

But as we've received it in the West, it's less apparent, this element of mystery. It's become more a kind of presentation of something that's more clear-cut, rational, it seems to me—though it may still be there.

If I look in other traditions, this actually occurred to me because I was reading the translator's introduction of a book called Gates of Light, Shaare Orah, by Joseph Gikatilla, who was a medieval Jewish teacher. The translator, Avi Weinstein, was commenting that this book was written at around the same time as the Zohar. Zohar sometimes means something like Book of Splendor or Radiance. It was written around the same time, this book by Joseph Gikatilla called The Gates of Light.

But there were differences, and those differences were very influential in the subsequent histories and receptions of those two books—the Zohar and Rabbi Gikatilla's book, Shaare Orah, Gates of Light. Just to name three of the differences:

One was that the Zohar was actually written in the thirteenth century in Castile, Provence, that area, but was presented—it was faked, if you like—ostensibly to be a rediscovered text that was written in the second century, hundreds and hundreds of years earlier. It was presented as... scholars are now pretty unanimous it was definitely written in thirteenth century Provence, Castile, Catalonia, but it was presented by its author, or main authors, as being an ancient text that was unearthed.

Secondly, it was written in Aramaic, which was no longer a vernacular, no longer a current language, and it was written in a fairly abstruse Aramaic, in a strange kind of version of the language.

And thirdly, it's a very opaque text. What does this mean? What are they talking about? It's full of poetry and symbolism that one's not quite sure what they're referring to, with multi-layered densities of allusions. It's a very mystical, poetic text.

Gates of Light, on the other hand, Rabbi Gikatilla's text, was written in contemporary language, easy to understand, a clear exposition, taking one through stages of what was ostensibly similar material in terms of Jewish mysticism and mystical teachings in Kabbalah.

Ironically, perhaps from a certain point of view, what happened historically was that Gates of Light, this clear text written in contemporary language, designed to be easy to understand, became not very popular at all. Not that many people read it. Whereas the Zohar became an incredibly popular text—venerated, studied, commentary upon commentary written upon it. It became almost canonical, not without some contention, almost canonical in the tradition, in the Jewish religion, and garnered great respect and veneration there, despite the fact—or perhaps because—it remained baffling to many people who could not understand the language, the Aramaic, and certainly by many people who, even if they could understand the Aramaic, found it pretty mysterious what it was talking about.

You could also say it was open because of its poetic nature, because of the mysterious language, because of the mystery of what it meant. Because of all that, it could become an object for eros. It could contain within its depths and mysteries and darknesses and allusions and poetry a wider latitude of interpretation, an infinity of interpretation.

It could become, because of its depths and mysteries, because it was kind of unfathomable, because one couldn't simply reduce it, because it had the beyonds, an object of the erotic imaginal. One could have eros, and it itself becomes an imaginal object —the Zohar, this book, this teaching, this tradition.

And because it was ancient, or because it was presented as ancient, it could quickly accrue the kind of eros for the ancient, because ancient implies tradition. And as I said, where there's love, the fantasy of tradition—the self in relation to the tradition and to the history in the past, the fantasy of the past, the fantasy of the characters in the past.

Partly the Zohar involves passages relating the wandering through Galilee of a small band of mystics, visiting different places in this beautiful land and discussing different mystical interpretations of Torah. So again, in the fantasy of tradition, if I have a love of a tradition, it involves characters from that history, from that tradition, becoming imaginal characters for me, that I have eros towards, that are important to me.

So because it was presented as ancient, because also of the relative obfuscation and opacity of it, because it wasn't clear, it allowed more interpretation. It had these dimensions of unfathomability. So it's interesting, also in the language, in the poetic language and the lack of clarity in the language.

Here is the continuation with the same tone and style:

Very interesting. I have this question: Does a living, healthy tradition, if it wants to have rich soil, need elements that are mysterious, even incomprehensible, certainly poetic?

This is less obvious, certainly, in some of what we have come to receive in the West as Pali Canon Buddhism. Maybe less apparent there. But certainly, if you look at Mahayana Buddhism as it's practiced in the West, or Vajrayana Buddhism, absolutely. The original Tantric texts are so baffling to us. If you pick up the Guhyasamaja Tantra or something and read just a translation of it, it's pretty out there and baffling. What are they talking about? Why are they talking about this? How am I supposed to relate to all this?

What's very common in the Vajrayana tradition is for people to read less of the texts in their original form, but to read commentaries on the texts, and even commentaries on the commentaries. This has become much more usual. The commentaries themselves become rich. There were actually two Chandrakirtis, two famous Chandrakirtis in the history of Buddhism, and the second Chandrakirti was famous for his tantric commentaries, particularly on the Guhyasamaja Tantra. There, as in the Jewish tradition, there are four levels of commentary. Each sentence, even each word, is given four levels of meaning. Similarly, in Kabbalistic interpretations or commentaries on the Bible, they speak of the obvious meaning, the hidden meaning, the symbolic meaning, and so forth.

The text itself, because of its strangeness and mysteriousness and partial incomprehensibility, its poetic nature, lends itself, offers itself as soil for image, for eros, but also for the proliferation of growth out of that soil—further interpretation, the richness of interpretations, commentaries upon commentaries, multiple perspectives. And the mystery never goes, because the core text remains mysterious and open.

Consider Christianity. Of the four canonical gospels, Saint John's Gospel is really the odd one out. It reads so differently. It's so mystical in its flavor and in what it says. Even the opening sentence is very famous: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God... and the darkness did not overcome it." The mystery of that kind of text raises the question: How necessary is that kind of strand and text within the body of a healthy tradition?

Or again, in Christianity, the whole theology that accompanies the Trinity—Trinitarian theology of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. It's mysterious. What you get is lots of interpretations, lots of rational explanations, but it remains at its core a kind of mystery that retains its mysteriousness, its unfathomability, its beyonds, its poetic nature at minimum, its mystical impenetrability at maximum.

So that's a question—something in this consideration, this laying out, this unearthing and bringing to light that I would like to explore together with you.

It's obvious to say that a tradition is embedded in and part of a larger culture, and that it contributes to that culture. Sometimes it contributes in very obvious and large ways, sometimes less obviously. Even if the tradition is very much a fringe tradition and very much against the stream of the larger society and culture, it's still embedded in that culture, part of it, and contributes to that wider culture.

But the opposite is also true. The culture contributes to tradition, whatever that tradition is—the tradition of teachings or practices. The culture, the contemporary culture and the history of that culture, contributes to and forms part of, and certainly shapes and informs, the tradition. This is probably obvious, but can we unpack that a little more and amplify our considerations of that fact and our awareness of it?

If we look at other traditions, consider Judaism. There was the importing, the confluence, the inclusion, the integration, the digestion, assimilation, the reckoning with Greek philosophy, principally Plato and Aristotle, into the body of the Jewish tradition. As far as I understand, the first person to do this was Philo of Alexandria. He's not well known, but he's beginning to attract more attention by virtue of the fact that he was the first person to consider the whole of Jewish teachings and traditions and the Torah in the light of Plato's teaching particularly, and to try to present the Jewish teachings to Greeks and Greek culture in a way that would be understandable to them.

He was quite a significant figure because he was the first person in Western history to do that. This movement of integration of either or both Plato and Aristotle as thought and philosophy and views into Judaism, into Christianity, into Islam—it was an undeniable fact, an important event, an important process in all three of these traditions. And he was the first person to do that.

Then, successively, there were different periods in history where even further integration occurred. Looking again at the Zohar and the blossoming—or birth, if you like—of Kabbalistic teachings in Judaism during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries in southwestern Europe, these developments were very much influenced by Neoplatonic teachings.

There was really—and "influence" is even an understatement—a marriage, an integration, a mingling, a birth, a co-opting of those Neoplatonic teachings within Jewish thought. This represented a reconfiguring, a representation, a rethinking of Jewish mystical teachings through the incorporation of Neoplatonic philosophy.

A little later, somewhere in the Middle Ages, Maimonides—the famous and very influential Jewish teacher and rabbi—favored more of Aristotle's teachings. So what you also find in the three Abrahamic religions is a wrestling with, or contest, or dispute between two different influences from Greek philosophy: one camp more influenced by Plato, one camp more influenced by Aristotle.

To complicate matters, there were texts believed to have been written by Aristotle that were actually Platonic and had been misattributed. So people were quoting Aristotle—or thinking they were quoting Aristotle and claiming they were—when it was actually Platonic teaching. But all this material was worked into the clay, into the fabric of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam.

In Christianity, I'm not entirely sure where Augustine of Hippo stood on this relationship. He grew up in pagan culture and would have been very familiar with Platonic teachings before converting to Christianity. Exactly how he viewed that relationship, or whether they were integrated in his thinking, I'm uncertain. But certainly Pseudo-Dionysius, whom I mentioned earlier, was very Platonically influenced, and his teachings became enormously influential in the Church—I believe he's from the fifth century.

Thomas Aquinas in the Middle Ages was enormously influential and very consciously borrowed from and worked with Aristotelian philosophy, relying on Aristotle's teachings for his interpretation and remodeling of Christian theology and philosophy.

All of this represents an enormous integration, influence, and incorporation of Platonic and Aristotelian thought into the three Abrahamic religions. For me, I almost try to imagine those religions without these influences, and it's difficult. They would be so different. My gut reaction is that they simply don't attract me without these more sophisticated developments and integrations of thought—of Plato's teachings, for example.

To add to this complexity, people traveled, talked with each other, and met across traditions. At some periods and places in history, interreligious dialogue was very open, encouraged, and fertile. What historians and academics are now tracing shows that there was Sufi influence—certain practices or views came into Jewish mystical teachings via the Sufis. There was obviously some meeting, dialogue, and mutual learning between Jewish Kabbalists and Sufis, with influences likely flowing both ways. When you get to Christian Kabbalah, it's rooted in Jewish Kabbalah, and so forth.

All of this exists as an inevitable part of history—the history of a tradition where culture contributes, sometimes in ways that are absolutely fundamental. It can almost change the constitution of a religion and its fundamental tenets. The whole thinking behind it, the conceptual structures, can become different, even though it may be wrapped up in the same vocabulary.

What I'm partly asking is: what are the implications of this fact?

Don't think this only applies to non-Buddhist traditions in the past—it's still happening today in the Abrahamic religions. You need only look at modern Western Buddhadharma, I think. Our contemporary Western Buddhadharma—the insight meditation tradition and other modern Western Buddhist traditions—includes so much of what has become commonplace, accepted psychological concepts, notions, beliefs, and aspirations about what constitutes health versus illness.

When we talked about self, the whole notion of self that we not just believe and think about, but actually feel, is culturally conditioned. What we regard as a healthy self, what constitutes a healthy relationship—all of this is very much given to us by contemporary Western culture of the last 120 or 150 years, since Freud and everything that emerged from that development.

This cultural influence is, for the most part, really woven in. Sometimes it's more apparent when a teacher consciously incorporates considerations from mainstream psychology into their Dharma teaching. But even when it's not explicit, it's there in the background, influencing and informing, being incorporated.

Modern Western Buddhadharma also commonly includes elements of what is really Advaita Vedanta. You can locate passages in Buddhist texts that seem to say something similar, but you can also make a strong case that this isn't actually Buddhist teaching—it's something else entirely. Yet this has become absorbed into the presentation of modern Western Dharma in many contexts.

I'm uncertain whether the Diamond Heart teachings or the Ridwan teachings are being incorporated and mixed in by some teachers in ways where you can no longer see the seams and divisions—where they become part of what the Dharma is understood to be.

Neuroscientific notions, beliefs, points of view, and models increasingly permeate our dharma understanding. Sometimes this integration appears quite explicitly—a teacher will present neuroscience as parallel evidence or explanation for jhana states, or describe how mindfulness functions in the brain. Other times, these scientific frameworks operate quietly in the background, forming an underlying belief system about what a human being fundamentally is.

This contemporary influence is already deeply embedded in our present dharma tradition. The contribution of culture—its mixing, infiltration, and shaping of contemporary dharma—represents a powerful formative force. Cultural conditions, artifacts, and trends all participate in molding the current state of our tradition.

Consider the development of Buddhist Tantra, once popularly dismissed as merely co-opting Hindu Tantra—supposedly an assimilation of alien, impure elements contaminating Buddhism from Hinduism. More careful scholarship reveals this characterization as inaccurate. Buddhist Tantra actually proved highly influential on Hindu Tantra, and over time, they undoubtedly influenced each other reciprocally.

Sometimes this cultural exchange occurs through simple osmosis, while other times it represents deliberate, carefully worked-out integration. In Jewish history, for instance, the encounter with Neoplatonism produced sophisticated syntheses in Kabbalah, Philo, and Maimonides. Similarly, Christianity's engagement with Greek philosophy flowered in Aquinas's systematic theology. These represent very deliberate, careful integrations driven by a sense that these developments needed inclusion, that traditions must grapple with and consider new influences.

But sometimes the process resembles unconscious osmosis—almost blind absorption of surrounding cultural currents.

As we examine this dynamic more closely, what does it imply? What does it ask of us? How do we feel about this reality? What stance should we take toward these formative influences?

Contemporary culture functions as a formative condition even when tradition founders actively oppose it. Opposition itself creates influence—the contemporary culture becomes a foil, something to contrast against, thus exercising formative power through negation.

I recall learning about the ancient Vedic practice of maintaining three sacred fires—whether in homes or temples, I'm uncertain. These fires held profound significance in Vedic religion and ritual, connected to creation mythology. By keeping them burning, practitioners sustained the cosmos's functioning and order—ensuring tomorrow's sunrise, seasonal rains, the universe's continued operation. The fires represented or even constituted elements of the Vedic creation myth, so maintaining them meant participating in the ongoing recreation and life of the cosmos itself.

The Buddha encountered this widespread practice and turned it completely around. Rather than keeping three fires alive, he taught extinguishing three fires. He identified these fires with three kilesas—three defilements of greed, aversion, and delusion. The goal became extinguishing these fires completely, preventing their return.

One etymology of nibbana points to this very image: blowing out a fire. Full awakening becomes defined as the extinction of greed, aversion, and delusion—the complete extinguishing of these fires.

The Buddha took something prominent in contemporary consciousness—a practice with significant cultural influence and popularity—and opposed it directly. Instead of creating more, the path aims to end creation, to escape the wheel of birth and death, to step off the cycle of rebirth entirely.

This example illuminates how profoundly the Buddhist teachings were conditioned by their cultural context, even through opposition. It raises a fascinating question: if the Vedic creation myth had featured two fires instead of three, and Brahmin practice had involved maintaining two or four fires rather than three, might we have developed a dharma teaching about two kilesas or four kilesas instead?

This conditioning through cultural context—whether by embrace or opposition—shapes even our most fundamental spiritual categories.

I mean, certainly a case can be made to reduce the kilesas to two anyway, because one could say greed and aversion are simply two sides of the same coin. When we're aversive to something, we're actually greedy for something else. When we're greedy for something, we're actually averse to its opposite. When I'm aversive to pain, it's because I want pleasure or neutrality. When I'm after whatever has a pleasant taste, I don't want the absence of pleasant taste, and I certainly don't want unpleasant taste.

But my main point is really about the cultural conditioning—the formative influences of culture, even when they operate through opposition.

Something similar is true about the twelve links of dependent origination. These links, so central to the Dharma alongside the three kilesas and their extinguishing, were also twelve aspects of a Vedic creation myth. Again, the Buddha was in a culture where that was the belief, the dominant paradigmatic presentation, and his teaching was formed as he wanted to differentiate it from that, to spin it a different way.

The creation myth was saying, "You know what you're creating with those twelve links? You're creating dukkha. That's what you're creating. Let's not create—let's stop creating. Let's stop those twelve links." And they have pretty much the same names, even, I think, for the most part, as those twelve elements of the Vedic creation myth.

I have a strong suspicion—I don't know, but I have a strong suspicion—that the same is somehow true of the five aggregates. I'm not the first practitioner, and certainly not the first teacher, to comment that they're kind of a strange system when you look at the aggregates. It doesn't really fit together as a sort of human psychology—why those divisions? What a strange thing.

Is it just the case that these were the primary elements of human being that were, at the Buddha's time, popular appropriation points for the sense of self? So that people would either claim that they were the body—there was certainly a philosophy that "we are the body" that existed. I know another philosophy that existed at that time, another teaching, another religious tradition, was "No, your true nature is bliss"—in other words, pleasant vedanā. Or obviously consciousness, or intention, which might be closer to some contemporary cycles. "You are your mental formations and your intentions." Or even perception. People would have certain jhanic perceptions—for example, one would come to the seventh jhana of nothingness, and one would take that to be who one was.

These were extant teachings, current contemporary teachings in different spiritual traditions and philosophies around at the time of the Buddha. So I wonder: did he originate the teaching of the five aggregates, or did he just look around him and see,

"Okay, so this school is identifying with that, that school is identifying with that—claiming that to be the true self—that school is identifying this to be the true self," and simply collect them together for the purposes of saying, "You know what? None of these are the self."

Again, it's a Dharma concept that was formed, or perhaps was formed in opposition, but still culturally conditioned.

But if all that is the case, then we must ask: how real are these things? I mean, we can see they're not real because of emptiness and the kinds of reflection I mentioned—like greed and aversion being two sides of the same coin. There are many other ways they're not real. Any of these links, and deep practice into emptiness, will show exactly that. There are no aggregates, really. There are no links of dependent origination, really. There are no kilesas, really. They don't form clear-cut, demarcated things. They have no independent existence.

But we can add another level of emptiness and say: they're also culturally conditioned. How real are they? So easily in our minds, they can become dogmas or truths as if they're referring to real things.

The larger point here is that cultural conditioning can happen via opposition—via a tradition wanting to demarcate itself, differentiate itself from what is around it, or wanting to push off in a different direction. This can happen in all kinds of different ways.

Just the other day, I was talking with someone whose job involves working with the Dalit Buddhist communities in India. As you probably know, Dr. Ambedkar was a Hindu who converted to Buddhism. There's a movement of untouchables—if you know the Indian caste system, there's a gross injustice there. There's a tiered hierarchy of castes and classes in India, and the lowest class—even lower than the lowest class—is untouchables. They're outside caste altogether. This whole thing is very much drawn along ethnic lines, so it's basically a metaphysically backed institutional racism and social injustice that has gone on for centuries.

So centuries, millennia. And in converting some of these people—in some of these untouchables converting to Buddhism—they then fall outside the scope of the Hindu caste system. This person was telling me that in working with those communities, he thought of me because a lot of the Buddhism they propagate in that Dalit community of converts is a kind of rational secular Buddhism. He said, "I thought of you because I know you've contested the whole premises and objectives of secularism and even secular Buddhism."

But I thought immediately: it's all contextual. And we spoke about it. It's all contextual. I've said this before—I see whatever I teach as utterly contextual. What I say, what emphasis I give, what direction the teachings evolve in, depends on the context.

I find myself speaking almost exclusively in the West, to people who live in a predominantly secular culture of secular modernity, in a situation where that kind of ideation—both within and outside of Buddha Dharma—has enormous clout. In a way, much of the soul-making Dharma teachings are placed in that context and in response to, in dialogue with, the dominance of secular modernity thinking.

Were I or we in a situation like the untouchables in India, where one is actually being subjected to great injustice—unthinkable injustice—based on some kind of metaphysical mumbo-jumbo and the hyped-up, mysterious authority of a certain spirituality and cosmology, might the soul-making dharma actually be given quite a different spin? Might it have a whole different element because it would be responding to that context and the dominance of that paradigm?

So, laying some things out. Where does it land? How does it sit with you?

All kinds of influences come through integration, but also through opposition—integration through opposition, if you like—from culture. Again, if we cast our eyes about us in contemporary Buddha Dharma, or even wider than Buddha Dharma, we see the prevalence of mindfulness teachings, which is wonderful in the West and is doing so much to help so many people. There's a whole range in how it's presented and the context in which it's presented.

I know only very little about it because I'm not really in that world. But there's some kind of more popular end of things—pop mindfulness—where mindfulness is defined as non-judgmental awareness. That definition has actually become quite prevalent, sometimes even feeding back into Buddhism itself and what might be called Buddha Dharma as well as secular mindfulness. Not everywhere, just certain strands.

Defining mindfulness as non-judgmental awareness can be enormously helpful. Why is it helpful? It's helpful partly because of our culture of judgmentalism. Again, even that formulation of the tradition was formed in a context.

But if you study the Satipatthana Sutta, the original discourse on mindfulness, you realize that this definition of mindfulness as non-judgmental awareness or presence, as well as the range of those teachings, leaves out so much of what's in the basic fundamental discourse on mindfulness, which is only a few pages long.

Completely gone are, for example, the death reflections and the vivid imagination of one's death and one's rotting corpse. The whole section on foulness of the body. What seems to be gone sometimes is the whole fourth foundation of mindfulness. So there's non-judgmental awareness of body sensations, non-judgmental awareness of feelings and pleasantness and impulses, non-judgmental awareness of thoughts, moods, mind states. But the whole fourth foundation, which has a slightly different kind of tack and flavor, is often gone.

If I read about the fourth foundation of mindfulness in the Satipatthana Sutta, a lot of it is exactly what would be called, by some teachers of modern mindfulness, "discrepancy-based processing"—which I've touched on before in the Eros and Feta talks. That phrase, discrepancy-based processing, was a kind of foil to the presentation of mindfulness.

Discrepancy-based processing is when I'm in this moment feeling there's a discrepancy between what this moment is and what I would like it to be. I'm processing or relating to or viewing, sensing the moment through a lens that's based on that discrepancy and wanting to move towards what I think or feel the moment should be.

The teaching is: that's fine sometimes. When the tiger is chasing you, it's fine. When you have to catch your train on time, it's fine. To a certain extent, some of that is important in life. But mindfulness is something different. Mindfulness is non-discrepancy-based processing.

Yet reading the fourth foundation, it's hard to take that conclusion away from it. The Buddha talks about feeding the seven factors of awakening.

What feeds the seven factors of awakening? What starves them? The Buddha instructs us to feed them and to stop starving them. The same applies to the hindrances—these are all categories in the fourth foundation of mindfulness.

Very much the thrust of that teaching in the fourth foundation is about feeding and starving. It's about doing. It's about discrepancy. Why do I need to feed the factors of awakening? Because there's a discrepancy between the current state of how active and alive and well and flourishing my factors of awakening are, and where they could be or where it would be better if they were. The same applies in reverse with the hindrances—there are too many hindrances, and it would be better if there were fewer. There's a discrepancy between where things are and where it would be better if they were.

So one is looking in terms of discrepancy and then instructed to act on that discrepancy in the direction of the desired outcome. Many of the other concepts in the fourth foundation are really what I would see as ways of looking, or lenses—looking in terms of the aggregates, looking in terms of the six sense spheres or sense modalities. This isn't bare attention; it's attention through a certain lens. Why? Because that lens is liberating. Because it's a way of looking that liberates. It's a seeing that frees.

So this whole presentation that we sometimes get in mindfulness as "non-judgmental awareness"—I think I know where it comes from. So many people struggle in our culture of fractured communities, ego psychology, and individualism. There's so much pain that comes from judgment and self-judgment, judging oneself and one's experience and where one is. So it's understandable that mindfulness would be given that kind of—I say spin, but it's more than a spin. It's a kind of truncation, if you like.

Yet when we compare it to what we have of the original discourse, it's like, wow, it really is a truncation and a partial view at best. As I said, the fourth foundation does have the encouragement and directive to discern, to notice the difference between what is and what could be, what is and what would be better, and to direct oneself towards that—to cultivate this, to cut that, to remove it, to strive to engender this or that.

Now I'm not saying this as a criticism of that kind of mindfulness. I'm really, really not criticizing even popular mindfulness approaches. I don't myself have much enthusiasm for this sort of attempted project of "what the Buddha really taught"—this looking back in history and trying to shave off everything, trying to find the original teachings pure from any accretions or cultural conditionings. I don't subscribe to that project. I think it's not necessarily helpful, or rather it can be held in a way that's not necessarily helpful and not that interesting.

I've said this before, but Nietzsche has a phrase—I can't remember the German, but it translates as something like "the fantasy of origins"—this belief that the original thing is better than what developed over time. Of course this is absolutely commonplace in the way most people in a religious tradition think of that tradition. Of course the Buddha's the real deal. Of course the origin and the start is the real deal.

But might it be that the real deal is something that's grown into over time, like a human being, like anything else that can grow? That the better or fuller or certainly richer—almost more real—thing is more in what it moves towards over time rather than at the origin? Anyway, this whole project of historicizing or historiographing is exactly that—it's a project.

I would say, along with a number of other contemporary philosophers, that in the project of history we project backwards. We can't help but bring our agendas, our spins, our perspectives, our contemporary perspectives, which are influenced by all kinds of cultural conditions, cultural valuings of what's important, what's significant, what's relevant, what's not relevant. Our own personal psychology is woven into all this, our motivations. So what we select as a central thread or central teaching, or what we dismiss as "just a cultural accretion" or "an impurity"—that's all very much conditioned by our own contemporary culture and by our own psychology. And we project that back.

So history, in a way, is not one thing. Referring back to what I said at the beginning of the talk: is there a point in history that we can say, "This is the point in history we're at now," and we can all agree, "Oh yes, that's the point in history we're at"? There are histories, there are versions, there are spins, there are perspectives, there are stories woven, all coming, in each case, from a different set of conditions that form that perspective, those agendas, those spins, those selectings of certain threads.

There's a quote from John Snyder from an introduction to a book by Gianni Vattimo called The End of Modernity. He writes: "The work of such theorists as Michel Foucault, Michel de Certeau, and Hayden White on the rhetorical and literary elements present in historical writing has belatedly led to a widespread recognition of the narrative and therefore fictional basis of a unified image of history. History appears today, rather, as a kind of writing which persuades its readers through the use of carefully chosen rhetorical strategies of the 'truth' of its account of events"—truth in inverted commas.

I remember—some of you will be familiar with it—there's a book by Howard Zinn, a U.S. historian, called A People's History of the United States. It asks: what if you write a history of the United States that they don't teach in schools?

A history written from the perspective of First Nations or African Americans who were slaves reveals a very different narrative entirely. There are multiple histories, multiple stories, and the idea that there exists one definitive history that we can somehow distill down to find the pure truth of what existed at the beginning - I would question that assumption. And even if we could achieve such distillation, is that necessary? Might this too be just another fantasy of origins, this pursuit of "the true thing" or "the real thing" - the real Buddhism, the real Dharma?

This was slightly a tangential point, but my intention is not so much to criticize what we might call "pop mindfulness" - though the very phrase sounds inherently critical - but rather to illuminate the culturally conditioned interpretations and presentations of Buddha Dharma. These conditionings are unavoidable. We exist within that soup. As Heidegger observed, we are "thrown" - thrown into a particular historical context, thrown into specific cultures. This thrownness inevitably influences and shapes how we see, how we relate to phenomena, how we interpret teachings and experiences.

I'm simply wanting to bring certain elements, aspects, and considerations to light for your reflection and contemplation. So what does all this imply for you? What are the implications? How does it land in your being? How will you hold all this in your mind, in your heart, in your conceiving, in your view, in your fundamental orientations? What is your relationship to these questions? How does your heart respond? And what shall we do with these insights as we move forward in our practice?

Some practitioners may identify as purists of sorts, seeking the Buddha's original teachings stripped of all subsequent additions. You might find yourself drawn to this fantasy of origins, unconsciously buying into the entire historical project without recognizing the projections involved - what Nietzsche called the fantasy of origins. But I would ask: is it even possible to not be thrown? Is it possible to somehow divest oneself completely, to scrub oneself clean, to cut off and sunder all those cultural accretions, indoctrinations, and learned perspectives, views, and values that we inherit from our culture? Can we transcend this thrown state - thrown into a specific time in history, a particular place, a distinct culture?

Is such divestment actually possible? Can we truly have a perspective that isn't culturally conditioned? Or when we attempt such purification, is there actually just a selective relinquishment occurring? We selectively abandon certain cultural influences while remaining blind to others that continue operating, driving us, shaping our view, determining what we pay attention to and what we fail to see entirely.

This leads to another crucial question: might it be that some of these cultural conditionings, accretions, integrations, shapings, and influences are actually improvements? How would we determine what constitutes improvement? What loyalties are operating within us, what hidden drives are at work?

These questions ultimately transcend mere mental inquiry - they are certainly not abstract or academic pursuits, not even purely intellectual. They penetrate the heart and affect the soul directly.

Opening this entire constellation of elements even further, laying them out more completely, we might ask: to what extent does a living, healthy tradition need to embody those characteristics I enumerated earlier - shared values, beliefs, ontological commitments, texts, and so forth? To what extent and in what manner should we hold the inevitable conditionings and shapings from both historical and contemporary culture?

Here's a fascinating new question: to what extent is conflict actually inevitable within a tradition? Might such conflict be a necessary component of that tradition remaining healthy, alive, and vital?

This inquiry strikes me as profoundly important. I want to quote from philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre, who I believe is still living. In his well-known book After Virtue, which explores ethics - though I'm not entirely enthusiastic about the work, it contains some interesting insights - he addresses how discussions of tradition often become polarized between conservative political theorists and their opponents.

And so there's a way that they look at it that's a little bit misleading because of their ideological agenda. MacIntyre writes, "Characteristically, such theorists have followed Burke, Edmund Burke, in contrasting tradition with reason and also the stability of a tradition with conflict." So the contrast of tradition with reason—in other words, tradition is just received stuff that hasn't really had the scrutiny of rational thinking. And the stability of tradition, on the one hand, with kind of conflict. Conflict does not go with the stability of tradition.

But as MacIntyre continues, both contrasts obfuscate. They just confuse things. They hide a reality here. "For all reasoning takes place within the context of some traditional mode of thought, transcending through criticism and invention the limitations of what had hitherto been reasoned in that tradition." All reasoning takes place within the context of some traditional mode of thought. So he says this is as true of modern physics as it is of medieval logic.

"Moreover, when a tradition is in good order, it is always partially constituted by an argument about the goods the pursuit of which gives to that tradition its particular point and purpose." I'll say that in other language in case that's a little difficult. So in other words, a healthy tradition, he's saying, when a tradition is in good order, part of what makes it healthy and in good order and alive is that it involves an argument. It's constituted by an argument about what? About the things that are valuable in that tradition, that give the tradition its point, its purpose. So what is awakening? What are we trying to do? Where should practice lead? What does a good practitioner look like and do? The argument, rather than being something that's anathema to tradition, is actually part of a healthy tradition.

So he continues: "When an institution—a university, say, or a farm or a hospital—is the bearer of a tradition of practice or practices, its common life will be partly, but in a centrally important way, constituted by a continuous argument as to what a university is and ought to be or what good farming is or what good medicine is." Traditions, when vital, embody continuities of conflict. Traditions, when vital, embody continuities of conflict.

Indeed, when a tradition becomes Burkean—in other words, when there is that dichotomy between, okay, if it's a tradition, there's no reason, and if it's stable, there's no conflict—when a tradition becomes like that, it is always dying or dead. A living tradition, then, is "an historically extended, socially embodied argument, and an argument precisely in part about the goods which constitute that tradition." In other words, what's valuable to that tradition, and for that tradition.

This, to me, is—oh, yeah, right. It's partly sort of semi-consciously obvious, but actually one needs to think about it a bit more. Oh, yeah. That's actually really part of the weave, the tapestry of what makes that a healthy tradition, a vital tradition.

John Anderson said, "Don't ask of a social institution"—in other words, an embodiment, instrument of tradition or part of a tradition—"don't ask of a social institution what end or purpose does it serve, but rather ask of what conflicts is it the scene?" Of what conflicts is it the scene?

Now, that can, when you first hear it, sound—well, that's pretty pessimistic or even cynical. But seen in the light of what we've just been talking about, what Alasdair MacIntyre was explaining, the need for, the necessity for conflict and argument in a tradition, it's not necessarily pessimistic or cynical at all. And actually the philosopher A.N. Whitehead wrote something like, "A clash of doctrines is not a disaster, it's an opportunity." A clash of doctrines is not necessarily a disaster; it can be an opportunity.

Of course, we could go a bit further and say—but what happens when, I might ask, what happens when all that remains of tradition, of a tradition, are words and names? So if we talk about Buddhist tradition, the word awakening, the word suffering. But the divergence of interpretations of what those words mean has become so wide as to be an abyss. People are talking about completely different things when they're talking about what they think awakening is meaning, or what suffering means to them, what the goal is. What you're relating to and trying to overcome.

So when that divergence of the beginning becomes so wide that it becomes an abyss, and attached to each interpretation are more fundamental metaphysical and cosmological views and fantasies, I would say this is the case among certain, definitely certain ones I know, contemporary traditions of Buddhadharma. Actually, some of the rifts there, conceptually, have become close to too wide to navigate, in some cases.

So what if that abyss renders argument—the kind of argument Alasdair MacIntyre is saying is important—what if it renders argument either impossible, it's become too wide, there's almost very little common ground even to have an argument that's fertile? Or at least seemingly, if not actually pointless.

Or another possibility—and it may come out of the situation or the perception of the situation that I just described—another possibility may be that someone or some subgroup within a tradition either suddenly or gradually stop caring about their identity, or stop identifying with that tradition so much that eros has gone for the tradition, and so the fantasy of the tradition goes as well, because eros and the imagination and the fantasy go together.

And in not feeling so identified with that tradition and not really investing it with eros and imaginal perception, fantasy perception, they actually don't have the energy or the will or the desire to engage in the conflict, engage in the argument. And not engaging in the conflict and argument atrophies the tradition. Their withdrawal, their non-engagement in the conflict actually ends up lessening the tradition or impoverishing it or weakening it or sometimes just killing it.

Let me read another passage by Alasdair MacIntyre from a different book, from an article. He's elaborating on this point that overlaps here, but I think this point is really important. This is from an article called "Epistemological Crises, Dramatic Narrative and the Philosophy of Science."

He writes: "The connection between narrative and tradition has hitherto gone almost unnoticed, perhaps because tradition has usually been taken seriously only by conservative social theorists." Again, usually the people that talk about tradition are those with a vested interest or certain spin on tradition and what it needs to be and what it means.

But he continues: "Yet those features of tradition which emerge as important when the connection between tradition and narrative is understood are ones which conservative theorists are unlikely to attend to."

This is the important point: "For what constitutes a tradition is a conflict of interpretations of that tradition, a conflict which itself has a history susceptible of rival interpretations."

Let me read that again. What constitutes a tradition is a conflict of interpretations of that tradition—a conflict which itself has a history susceptible of rival interpretations. In other words, not just the interpretation of the tradition and the text, but also a conflict about how to read the history of that conflict. Even the whole argument can be seen from different perspectives, the history of that argument.

Then he continues: "If I am a Jew, I have to recognize that the tradition of Judaism is partly constituted by a continuous argument over what it means to be a Jew." I actually think a better example would be Buddhism. And then he says: "Suppose I'm an American. The tradition is one partly constituted by continuous argument over what it means to be an American and partly by a continuous argument of what it means to have rejected tradition. If I am an historian, I must acknowledge that the tradition of historiography is partly but centrally constituted by arguments about what history is and ought to be."

He writes—this is a very important point: "Notice that all three kinds of tradition, religious, political, intellectual, involve epistemological debate as a necessary feature of their conflicts."

So we're back to what we talked about in the last talk and the centrality of epistemology. What was that phrase by Moscovici? "Questions of epistemology are questions of social order." When we differ about epistemology, in our views of epistemology, in our leanings there, that might be healthy to a certain extent, but it's part of what gets argued about. And again, the abyss can become so wide that it's unbridgeable.

"Notice that all three kinds of tradition, religious, political, intellectual, involve epistemological debate as a necessary feature of their conflicts. For it is not merely that different participants in a tradition disagree; they also disagree as to how to characterize their disagreements and as to how to resolve them. They disagree as to what constitutes appropriate reasoning, decisive evidence, conclusive proof."

Remember what epistemology means: How do I know? What is appropriate reasoning? What is decisive evidence? What is conclusive proof? What are the bases of my knowledge? So epistemological differences are quite fundamental to this. They're wrapped up in the kind of arguments and conflicts that a tradition has to have as part of its health—conflicts about epistemology.

But again, I would add: What happens when they get too wide? What happens when the rifts over epistemology are more like abysses? All these questions are for you. I obviously wrestle with them as well. But as I said at the beginning, I want this to be yours.

What else can we unearth here? Part of the conflicts within traditions and within the institutions that embody or transmit or carry traditions are between what we might call the conservative tendency and the innovative tendency. You just have to join a board of some institution to see that this will be the case. I would actually view that conflict as a kind of archetypal tug of war between the conservative tendency and the innovative tendency. There's something archetypal about it. There's something actually inevitable about it.

I just want to point out also it's not so black and white—in other words, what's conservative, what's innovative. But also it's not that we can point a finger and say, "Oh, that person's always conservative and that person's always trying to break new ground and be radical." Anyone, any one person can manifest both tendencies with respect to different aspects of Dharma or Buddhadharma, if we're talking about that as an example. And obviously that's the one that's going to be mostly relevant to most of the people listening to this talk.

So the same person at different times, in different arenas of discussion or debate, could manifest either conservatism or a kind of more radical innovation. But my main point is that it's inevitable. There's something archetypal and therefore inevitable about it. The whole point about Jung's teachings on archetypes is these things will occur. They're patterns that occur inevitably in human being and manifestation, inner and outer.

So there's an archetypal tug of war between, let's say, conservatism and innovation. And therefore we need to expect it within a tradition and within institutions that try and promote and nourish and sustain and support and offer a tradition in the world. Expected, but also, I think, regarded as a creative tension.

So again, back to Alasdair MacIntyre's points—the argument and conflict are actually healthy. And here there's a tension between two seemingly opposed tendencies, conservatism and innovation. And there's something in the difficulty of that, in the rub of that, that we should not just expect, but actually perhaps we can regard it as a blessing, difficult as it can be at times. That conflict of opinions that pull in two different directions, two different perspectives—actually out of the friction and the ferment of that is a kind of creative tension that can be fertile.

So again, there's an analogy here between what I was talking about in the talks on epistemology and ontology between the latitude of logos, the latitude of concepts and conceptual frameworks which we can include in our practice, in our explorations. If we talk about soul-making dharma, in our remit and range and furthering and growth of soul-making dharma, there's a creative tension, I pointed out, between the latitude of the logos that we entertain on one hand and what we might call the resistance or the constraint of the material on the other hand.

If you remember, I was talking about that with regard to science and with regard to epistemology more widely. The constraint of the material is through, well, something has to tally with my experience, with my phenomenological observation of things. I can't disregard that. That forms some kind of constraint on the kinds of conceptual frameworks and concepts and ideas I can entertain. Something, again, has some kind of authority, which again forms, to some degree, some kind of constraint on the latitude and range of the logos, the concepts, the ideas that I build on.

Things have to be somewhat at least coherent between all the different elements of ideas and practice and what I've received from authority and whatever. Something has to, in my phenomenological observation—principally the ideas themselves—something has to be coherent. So that need for coherence or that demand for a certain amount of coherence also forms a certain kind of constraint on the range and latitude of logos.

So there's an analogy there. Out of that tension between the need for latitude and the permission and the legitimization of a certain latitude of logos, the tension between that and the constraint, the resistance, the solidity of the material, that it's not, as I said, just thin air. There's something that I need to work with and partly against to shape this crucible, to mould this crucible.

So there are parallels there now, again, between the considerations of epistemology, ontology, and what we can build conceptually and therefore what supports and opens further soul-making, and this whole notion of creative tension in tradition—the resistance of conservatism versus the latitude of innovation.

And again, I'm putting this out to you as many of you will probably already have deep love and commitment and devotion to the soul-making dharma. All this applies to soul-making dharma as well. If we can talk about it as a sub-tradition or tradition or whatever, everything that I'm saying applies to that and needs to be considered—maybe now, maybe in due course, maybe whatever. It all applies, because I'm talking generically about traditions.

So to be loyal to the logos of soul-making will include, I think, a healthy loyalty, an alive loyalty, a vital loyalty, will include elements that are conservative. What was actually said here? What's actually the... Can we be true to what was said and not just go off on any whim of direction because it feels good or feels exciting or whatever? It will involve that. It will also involve, I hope, innovation in time and integration and connections with other traditions, with other influences, with other considerations, with other concepts, practices.

So to me, being in a tradition—I very much feel this in terms of Buddhadharma—that I am, we are, we can be in dialogue with the tradition. It's a two-way thing. Actually, maybe it's more of a polylogue, if that's even the word. It's a multi-personed, multi-pronged conversation. And that's part of what makes it healthy, that there's some rub and resistance and tension. It's part of what allows the friction that allows things to ignite in a good way. And of course, that ignition can ignite so that things burn and something is burnt to cinders and fire goes out. There's nothing left to burn. All is to consider.

Let's add something to the pot or drag something up from the bottom of the pot for our consideration to add to all this. Pierre Hadot is a writer—maybe some of you know him—who writes about philosophy and different religious traditions.

In his article "Philosophy, Exegesis and Creative Mistakes," Pierre Hadot explores how interpretive practices on authoritative texts—those considered canonical within both philosophical and religious traditions—often generate all manner of mistakes. He provides numerous examples and writes: "It frequently occurs that exegeses, interpretations, construct entire edifices of interpretation on the basis of a banal or misunderstood or mistranslated phrase."

He continues: "The modern historian may be somewhat disconcerted on coming across such modes of thought so far removed from his usual manner of reasoning. He is, however, forced to admit one fact: Very often, mistakes and misunderstandings have brought about important evolutions in the history of philosophy"—and I would add religion and spiritual traditions. "In particular, they have caused new ideas to appear."

In other words, some of what gets integrated into a tradition, some of how a tradition grows, doesn't come through the very careful, conscious deliberation that we might consider Thomas Aquinas to have engaged in during the Middle Ages with regard to Christianity and Aristotle. Instead, it actually comes from misunderstanding, mistranslation, scribal error, complete misconstruing—and one isn't even aware of it. Yet again, paralleling the story we told about Newton building his magnificent edifice of Newtonian physics on two ideas later proved invalid—absolute space and absolute time—similarly, in traditions, all kinds of errors and mistakes can come in that actually end up proving very fertile for that tradition.

One of my teachers is very dear to me. His teaching is very dear to me and hugely influential. I remember years ago hearing him talk about his teaching of the Buddhadharma, sometimes telling stories about the monastery he was in and the teacher there, the abbot. Then I read the abbot's teaching from a more direct source—a more direct quote, an extended interview with this abbot—and I was completely struck. How on earth did my teacher get his teaching from this abbot? How could he interpret this abbot as saying the things he then reported him to say?

The whole flavor of it, the whole thrust, direction, ethos—the feel of it, the scope of it—was so alien. For one, I feel extremely glad that in his situation—because he was in Thailand not speaking Thai—he kind of had to piece things together. Occasionally he had translators giving him little bits of the teaching, but the rest he had to figure out with maybe pidgin Thai, getting the general vibe. I wonder whether he came away with something completely different.

But I'm extremely thankful that was the case. His not knowing the language, not being very gifted with languages, whatever he brought in terms of his predispositions—I think this gave birth in him to a dharma that was extremely influential and inspiring for me, beautiful, and very much opened what the Dharma could be. I don't know whether I would have been very taken with his teacher's dharma, the abbot's dharma, had I just heard it translated by someone completely fluent in Thai.

So we add to our mix the possibility—in the past, recent present, even now, and certainly in the future—that there can be what Hadot calls "creative mistakes," unwitting errors of all kinds happening. Misunderstandings, misinterpretations, mistranslations, misconstruals that actually end up being formative and constitutive of a tradition's trajectory. This too is something we have to recognize as fact.

And again, the question is: How does it land with you? What are we going to do with it? How are we going to view it? How are we going to relate to it? What are our responsibilities there?

There are all kinds of tensions here. I was hunting for a sutta I couldn't find earlier—but there's a sutta somewhere in the Pali Canon where the Buddha hears that a monk is teaching something about the nature of consciousness in a certain way. He basically tells the other monks, "Go get that monk, bring him here." He sits this monk down who's teaching something about consciousness that the Buddha did not agree with, and he basically publicly humiliates him. From our modern reading, that's what it really sounds like—really scathing in front of the whole assembly of monks: "That's absolutely not what I'm teaching, that's not how to regard consciousness."

I couldn't find that passage, but I think it's mirrored in another one I did find called "The Water Snake Simile" in the Majjhima Nikaya 22. Just to listen to some of the language to get a sense... In this case, the monk in question had certain views. He would say: "As I understand the Dhamma taught by the Blessed One, those acts the Blessed One says are obstructive when indulged in are not genuine obstructions."

So the monks told the Buddha, and the Buddha said, "Go get him." Again, he was placed in front of the assembly of monks and basically humiliated. Let's see what the Buddha says, just to give you a bit of flavor of this.

And the Buddha asked him, "Is it true that you've said that?"

And he said yes.

Then listen to what the Buddha says: "Worthless man. Worthless man." This is in front of a whole assembly of monks. "Worthless man. From whom have you understood that Dharma taught by me in such a way? Worthless man. Haven't I in many ways described obstructive acts?"

And then he explains his actual teaching. But you, worthless man, through your own wrong grasp of the Dharma, have both misrepresented us as well as injuring yourself and accumulating much demerit for yourself, for that will lead to your long-term harm and suffering."

And then he turns to the monks that are gathered there, and he said, "Then the Blessed One said to the monks, What do you think, monks? Is this monk, whose name was Arita—is this monk established in this doctrine and discipline?"

And they say, "How could he be, Lord? No, he's not."

And it says, "When this was said, the monk Arita sat silent, abashed, his shoulders drooping, his head down, brooding at a loss for words."

The Buddha doesn't even stop there. When he was sitting like that—silent, abashed, his shoulders drooping, his head down, brooding at a loss for words—the Buddha continues: "Worthless man, you will be recognized for your own pernicious viewpoint. And then I will cross-examine the monks on this matter."

My point is just this: the Buddha is not saying, "Hey, it's cool, everything goes. People can have their different points of view. We're all happy family here. Let's not get entangled in arguments about what is the true teaching, the true dharma." He's quite scathing and not afraid to publicly—again, what we would read as publicly humiliate. And he's very protective of what he sees as: this is the dharma. This is the dharma that I have set in motion. And that, whatever that is, is not.

As I said, there was some sutta that was quite similar in terms of its social playing out, but it was more about something about consciousness. But here, I found that one.

Another time, it's from Samyutta Nikaya. On one occasion, the Blessed One was staying near Sāvatthī in Jeta's Grove, in Anāthapiṇḍika's monastery. Then Venerable Mahā Kassapa, who was a senior disciple of the Buddha, went to the Blessed One and on arrival, having bowed down to him, sat to one side. Actually, all this is quite instructive about the social aspects of tradition. And again, this question: what's needed, what's necessary, what's not.

And he says, as he was sitting there, he said to the Blessed One: "What is the cause, Lord? What is the reason why before there were fewer training rules and yet more monks established in final gnosis—in arahantship, enlightenment? Why before there were fewer training rules and yet more monks established in final gnosis, whereas now there are more training rules and yet fewer monks established in final gnosis?"

And the Buddha says, "That's the way it is, Kassapa. When beings are degenerating and the true Dharma is disappearing, there are more training rules and yet fewer monks established in final gnosis."

This is within the Buddha's lifetime. This is his perspective. As time goes on—I don't know how many years this is after his original enlightenment—he continues: "The Buddha, there is no disappearance of the true Dhamma as long as a counterfeit of the true Dhamma has not arisen in the world. But there is the disappearance of the true Dhamma when a counterfeit of the true Dhamma has arisen in the world."

So in other words, there's false Dhamma. He's pointing out there's a counterfeit Dhamma. There's false teaching being put forward as true Dhamma, but it's counterfeit. And he's saying when that's the case—boy, watch out. There's the disappearance of the Dhamma.

And he continues: "It's not this or it's not that that makes true Dhamma disappear. It's worthless people who arise right here within the Sangha who make the true Dhamma disappear. The true Dhamma doesn't disappear the way a boat sinks all at once."

And he continues: "These five downward leading qualities tend to the confusion and disappearance of the true Dhamma." So he's obviously been thinking about this. "Which five? There is the case where the monks, nuns, male lay followers and female lay followers live without respect, without deference for the teacher. They live without respect, without deference for the Dhamma, for the Sangha, for the training, for concentration."

Interesting. These are the five downward leading qualities that tend to the confusion and disappearance of the true Dhamma. But these five qualities tend to the stability, the non-confusion, the non-disappearance of the true Dhamma. Which five? There is the case where the monks, nuns, male lay followers and female lay followers live with respect, with deference for the teacher. They live with respect, with deference for the Dhamma, for the Sangha, for the training, and for concentration. These are the five qualities that tend to the stability, the non-confusion, the non-disappearance of the true Dhamma.

So he was very much concerned, and yet was not able to completely stop in his lifetime this proliferation of what he called counterfeit Dhamma—watering down, mixed teachings, mixed confusions, misrepresentations. And he was really quite strong about it.

You get that whole tension, and that whole kind of what seems almost—may seem like harshness to some people's ears—may seem like harshness and rigidity and a narrow-mindedness and an attachment and an anxiety on the part of the discoverer of the Dhamma.

Yet at the same time there's another story—and I can't find it again somewhere in the Pali Canon—where after the Buddha's death, as they were trying to codify and collect the teachings and canonize them with the help of Ananda, they found this Arahant, this old practitioner who was still alive some years after the Buddha's death and had lived when the Buddha was alive. They presented to him what they had codified so far, and he said, "Well, okay, that's fine. If that's how you heard it, if it's okay with you, I prefer to stick to the Dhamma that I heard myself from the Blessed One's lips, from the Buddha's lips."

It touches me when I say that.

They said to him, "Okay, since you heard it from the Buddha's lips," and he was an Arahant, so he had the certificate of acceptability and authority. They said, "Okay, you go with that."

There was this agreement to have this diversity of Dhammas there. Actually, they hadn't heard his version—it wasn't part of their codified version. And he wasn't really familiar with theirs. And he was like, "Well, okay, we'll just be divergent like that and it's fine," and there was mutual respect and mutual allowing and inclusion.

So there's this tension between constriction, constraint, authenticity, and latitude.

I heard also something quite interesting to me—that as the tradition went on in early Buddhism, and this again may have started with... I'm not sure how much the seeds of this were in the Buddha's direct words, but that differences of Vinaya, of the monastic discipline and rules and ethical precepts, were actually more significant than differences of interpretation of doctrine and teaching. I don't know if that's true, but I heard that somewhere.

This is quite interesting as well. Again, within the body of tradition, what latitudes are more acceptable than others? Somehow, somewhere along the line—again, maybe seeded by something the Buddha said, contrary to some of the other passages I've just read—it's okay if people have slightly different doctrinal interpretations, or maybe even quite different doctrinal interpretations. But really differing over interpretations of the Vinaya, the monastic discipline, the laws and guidelines of behavior and speech—that's a big deal.

Why is that? Maybe because the monks and nuns needed the laity's respect. They were dependent on them for alms. They needed to be regarded by the laity as being noble, upright, strict and rigorous in their observance. So maybe there was a practical necessity there for the tradition. It's also the case that when ethics gets neglected, all kinds of fractures will almost inevitably follow in a community.

I've also read—just putting these almost divergent pieces of a puzzle together—that at the beginning of the Mahayana, when the Mahayana began to grow and flourish in India, it was quite common to have monasteries where some practitioners were overtly Mahayana practitioners, openly Mahayana in their thinking and aspirations, and some practitioners were Hinayana practitioners. They coexisted in the same monasteries very amicably and peacefully, simply agreeing to have different views and directions.

To me, this is really interesting. It doesn't happen now. When that stopped happening is an interesting question. Why it stopped happening is also an interesting question.

How much that original amicable cohabitation was just a result of the fact that at the beginnings of the Mahayana, maybe a Mahayana practitioner was just someone who had a slightly different aspiration? So back to shared goals. All the understanding was the same, but there was simply the view that it's possible for some people to aspire not just to Arahantship, but to Buddhahood, which was much more demanding and difficult to attain. But the whole conceptual framework, the ontological commitments—they were all the same.

At some point later in history, the beliefs, the conceptual frameworks, the teachings, the ontological commitments actually became more divergent. It was no longer possible for those people to consider themselves as really part of the same tradition.

All this is interesting to me. What's involved here? What goes on in traditions? What's necessary? To what degree are different elements necessary?

To what degree are divergent elements necessary? Is there even—last thought for now—is there even a kind of higher-level tension that is necessary for a vital, healthy tradition? Is there a tension, maybe not at a meta level, but at a higher level, between unity or harmony—better yet, unity, a sense of unity—and also differentiation?

We can be in a tradition with the view that "it's all one, we're all saying the same thing, we're all agreeing." Sometimes to me that's just baffling—it's obvious that people are talking about different things. Sometimes I say something and someone interprets it just according to what they already believe, convinced that I'm saying the same thing they are. This is interesting, at least. Actually, quite frustrating.

But we need some sense of unity—at least harmony, but even more, unity—since this does form a cohesive tradition. And there's a tension between that unity and harmony on one hand, and differentiation on the other hand.

As I've pointed out—and I've spent a long time talking about this in the Eros Unfettered teachings series in "Dilemmas and Delineations," and maybe some other talks—it's through careful differentiation, careful discernment, that we recognize: actually, that idea is different from that idea. That conceptual basis is different and will lead in a different direction. That word is being used in two different ways, or four different ways, whatever it is. Actually discerning between them, differentiating between them—because out of that differentiation can come greater efficacy, greater power, greater precision in terms of where we're headed and our ability to actually get there.

By power, I don't mean power over—because that's another thing we haven't really touched on that goes with traditions and hierarchies, where this person or this group has hierarchical power over another person or group within that tradition. I'm really talking about power as efficacy—efficacy of an idea, the power of an idea, the power of a certain practice or certain way of practicing, a way of thinking, or whatever it is.

That differentiation, careful distinction and demarcation, delineation of ideas, concepts, practices, is actually necessary for a practice, for an idea to have power. So maybe there is also this need for careful differentiation, and there's a need for harmony and unity. And so maybe there's a tension between those two as well within the tradition.

Let's stop there for now. There are other aspects I want to also bring to light to consider.

Thank you for listening.

CHAPTER 186

Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 2)

Rob Burbea · 1h17

In this second part of his exploration of what constitutes a healthy spiritual tradition, Rob Burbea examines how personal inclinations, cultural conditioning, and fundamental world-views inevitably shape our understanding and practice of dharma. He presents four distinct cosmological frameworks - physicalist/materialist, transcendent/unfabricated-only, non-dual consciousness, and soul-making - showing how each generates entirely different approaches to practice, suffering, and awakening.

Burbea pays particular attention to varying interpretations of emptiness (śūnyatā) within Buddhist traditions, from Gelug preservation of conventional reality to radical views that see all phenomena as thoroughly empty. He argues that our choice of emptiness understanding profoundly affects whether we open to imaginal practice, sensing the soul, and cosmopoiesis, or remain limited to reductive materialist frameworks. The talk emphasizes the need for honest self-examination of our deeper motivations - whether we truly seek freedom from suffering or are actually disciples of beauty, truth, or meaning.

Throughout, Burbea addresses the crucial tension between autonomy and authority in spiritual practice, advocating for skillful inquiry that neither over-relies on external authorities nor prematurely concludes based on limited experience. He demonstrates how cosmological and anthropological views are far from irrelevant philosophical abstractions but rather primary determinants of what we consider authentic dharma and genuine awakening.

All right, just to recap very briefly, we've been asking the question: what is involved, what is necessary, what are the needed ingredients and constituents of a healthy, vital tradition? We've been looking, obviously, particularly at Buddha Dharma and also soul-making Dharma, and as part of that unearthing, opening out, shining a light on some aspects or constituents that may be less obvious, or that some implications of those certain aspects may be less obvious to us.

Part of what we wanted to acknowledge and bring more into consciousness was just how much cultural conditioning plays a part—how contemporary cultures, places and histories influence and shape and condition the tradition, the dharma, whatever it is at the time in that place. We also mentioned the unavoidable fact that creative mistakes creep in and sometimes can actually be very fertile in what they contribute to the tradition, to the Dharma, and how things get built on those mistakes, on the basis of those mistakes.

We're also opening up again the recognition and the pondering of the fact of the presence and maybe the necessity of a certain amount of conflict and argument that constitutes the tradition and shapes the community relations and the relations of ideas within that tradition. That's part of its life. So with all this, there's a whole other level of question: how much, how little, what kinds of tensions actually serve a creative function—perhaps even surprisingly—and at what point or what kinds of tension serve to actually fracture something, perhaps irredeemably? To fracture a tradition, to splinter it, to kill it?

All these factors are part of what shape Dharma, the Buddha Dharma, a tradition, any tradition. What are we going to do with that? How does it land with you? How do we orient towards that, relate to it? Where do we move forward in relation to that?

I want to add into that mix, into that sort of cauldron of ingredients, something I've emphasized many times before: the personal inclinations we bring as human beings into our choices, our preferences, our leanings, our openness or closeness with respect to this or that that we might hear or read or that's presented to us in the Dharma as a practice possibility, as a teaching possibility, as a concept, as a direction.

Personal inclinations—meaning soul styles, wishes, desires, fears—we cannot but bring that, and we must acknowledge it, we must be honest about that. There is a certain not just cultural, but personal element in all this that comes into the equation, comes into the mix, and shapes and directs our choices, blinkers us, opens certain avenues, closes certain avenues, makes certain possibilities just unthinkable or not even noticed. We just don't hear them. They just do not register.

In some ways we choose a Dharma. An individual chooses a Dharma to some extent based on their personal inclinations. And if you like, the sum or total of the individual choices will also shape the larger tradition, or sub-traditions. The Dharma that we choose—"I want this Dharma, I want the tradition to be this, I want to see the tradition to be this," or "I choose this kind of Dharma"—these choices and the wishes there, and the soul styles, are often with regard to worldview and the view of the human being. More than anything else.

What is it that determines these? What are the foci of determination? What is it that leads me to choose this kind of presentation of Dharma or this tradition or that picture of the Dharma, that model, that conceptual framework over another one? The most salient features there are actually the worldview and the human view. I've mentioned this before. In a way, when we choose a certain dharma, choose a certain image of awakening, we're actually choosing a certain view of human beinghood, humanity. So all this comes into it and we need to acknowledge it.

If we consider, for example, four different logoi or models, if you like, or beliefs about the world—and implicit views about the world is also views about what is real, so ontology—you can't get rid of it. You can't throw metaphysics out. You cannot burn it up so that it disappears and is gone once and for all. The metaphysics will come back. And it's central and basic, in fact.

So if we compare four views, four beliefs, four models, four logoi, really, of the world—pictures of the world, and implicit in that, pictures of what is real—and then see how each of them, in a way, orients the one who subscribes to that view of the world, that cosmology and that ontology. Each one of those orients the practitioner in a particular way and shapes the Dharma in a particular way relative to that worldview.

For example, if we believe what I was calling the physicalism or materialism view—in other words, there is really only matter, and there is this movement of particles, essentially purposeless, but somehow they have developed consciousness with all its complexity. But really what's there is that consciousness is an epiphenomenon of matter, and consciousness at root is just the movement of matter, of particles in neurology, and it's just a matter of time until we figure that out, how that works. But that view—there is only matter—then the whole Dharma, as one view, the whole Dharma that comes out of that is what we might call a kind of secular existentialist view of Dharma.

That's the real condition of things. There is only matter. Any sense of depth is in a way an illusion, of dimensionality is in a way an illusion. Certainly divinity and all that, and my freedom is really to be... The concepts of suffering and freedom are to be framed by that worldview, by that physicalist worldview, and my orientation then must be framed from that. The primary thing that I relate to is this strange existential situation that I'm in, to find some okayness with that. So that gives a whole picture of the Dharma, a whole basis and picture and limitation and trajectory and orientation of the Dharma.

Compare this with the first view. The first might be a very conscious view, or it might remain unconscious, yet it will still operate to shape and inform what Dharma one gravitates towards.

Consider a second view: that in fact, only the unfabricated—that which is wholly transcendent not just to matter, but to all perception—is real and good, and perhaps sacred. Then this life has very little inherent value other than as a stepping stone to getting out of this life. This perspective appears quite commonly in certain sub-traditions of the Dharma and remains quite popular, as is the first view I mentioned.

But then you can hear how that orients, shapes, constrains, and limits the entire Dharma—what situation we're addressing and what we're trying to reach. What do we mean by suffering? Suffering is basically being born into this existence. Suffering is the world of phenomenal experience. Life is suffering. And freedom from suffering means getting out of it—realizing the unfabricated so thoroughly that one is not born again. To speak metaphorically, though imprecisely, one dissolves into the unfabricated, and that's the end of it. The end of dukkha. The end of rebirth.

So again, there's a worldview and an ontological view about what's real, about what the world is and its ontological status, and also what's valuable relative to that. This shapes the whole Dharma and its direction.

A third view: All manifestation is equally one and divine. It's all the same divine substance, all the play of divine awareness, the play of consciousness—lila, the play of consciousness. Or it's all love, or whatever it may be. What kind of Dharma gets built up around that worldview?

Again, what's our predicament? Our predicament is simply not realizing that. We just don't realize that it's all one. We think we're separate; we think things are separate. When we realize it's all one, that's the end of suffering. Nothing is more or less divine than anything else. Nothing in particular is special because of its particularities, what it is, and its uniqueness. It's only special and valuable because of the substantial equality and essence that it shares with everything else.

The fourth view would be more in line with the soul-making perspective. Those first three are actually quite popular. I don't know how much you've explored this—talking to people after retreats or with Dharma friends about what view actually underpins their whole Dharma practice and therefore shapes it. Those first three are really quite common.

The fourth is more congruent with what we might call the soul-making Dharma, and perhaps less popular in the wider world of contemporary Dharma. In that view, all manifestation is divine—but not only because it shares a universal divine essence. There is that. There is the place for that perception and that kind of liberation and that kind of beauty and that kind of eros for that universal divine essence, or essences plural. I've talked about this extensively in the soul-making Dharma.

But not only because of that. All manifestation is divine, and each thing's particularities are divine and necessary to the becoming of the divine—the manifestation in time of the divine, or the Buddha nature, if you prefer. Rather than equalizing and therefore, in a sense, obfuscating and ignoring the particularities of the things of the world and of ourselves, each particularity is divine and divinely necessary, necessary to the divine, to the process of the divine. This includes your dukkha, your foibles, your madnesses.

How many things are there? Potentially infinite. Why? Because when the soul-making dynamic gets going, when the eros-psyche-logos dynamic is ignited, it will create and discover more and more aspects of things, more and more objects of eros. So there aren't a predetermined number of objects or phenomena in the universe, in ourselves, or even in this particular object I'm looking at. There's an infinite and potentially endlessly growing amount.

You can see what this view does, what this logos does to one's sense of the Dharma—what my job is, what my orientation is, what I'm moving from and towards. What is suffering then? How is suffering defined? What is its scope? What is awakening?

What is the scope of awakening and where it's leading?

So just for an example there, we could probably list more, but four logoi or models or beliefs about the world, or cosmologies if you like. Implicit in that cosmology are four ontological views about what's real. For example, only the unfabricated is really real; everything else is kind of illusion in the second one. All this phenomenal world is illusion. All this is illusion.

But these four logoi then bring four orientations, four ideas of jobs and work to do and scope and what the path is. Four dharmas, essentially, and implicit in each dharma is a kind of awakening.

How influential—what are we really choosing? I've made this point before in those talks on what is awakening, I think they were called. What are we really choosing when we choose a certain vision of awakening? Are we not both influenced by, but also choosing, really as perhaps primary, a certain model or belief or conceptual framework?

Again, if we're thinking really about what shapes a tradition, these different logoi of world and reality, different cosmology, different ontology, will shape very different dharma trajectories, very different dharmas, essentially. And what is it that predisposes us, or why do we choose one model, one idea, one belief about the world and about ontology over another? What's going on there? It's so basic in its implications, so basic in the way it creates divergent paths with all kinds of implications.

I was talking a little while ago, just as a chance conversation. I bumped into someone who was studying philosophy and had also been studying, I think, a couple of Jewish philosophers. I can't remember if it was Maimonides or Spinoza he was talking about. So we were having a conversation and he was a little bit familiar with the teachings about the imaginal and soul-making teachings and was reading his philosophy. If I understood him, he seemed to be saying that someone—I can't remember if it was Maimonides or Spinoza or Abraham Abulafia—regarded images in a similar way, as at best transitional objects.

That's a phrase from D.W. Winnicott, the psychologist and child psychologist. A transitional object is something like a blanket or a teddy bear that the child supposedly uses in the process of weaning themselves towards more independence from the mother, towards more autonomy, towards more self-sense, towards healthier relationships. In that process, they invest the transitional object, the teddy bear or whatever it is, with a kind of imaginary full beinghood, personhood, and then gradually wean themselves off the need for that imagination.

So he regarded images as at best transitional objects, which are eventually let go of to meet God directly, to know God directly, or to meet God's intellect, God's active intellect directly. Active intellect is a term, I think it originated with Aristotle, but it became quite influential. But the point is really that images are just stepping stones. Some people will need them as stepping stones for a kind of imageless, transcendent, direct participational melting into the wordless, unconceptual, non-representational, unformed sense of God.

Whether you call it unfabricated or the active intellect or whatever—different versions, it doesn't matter. So I wasn't entirely surprised to hear this kind of thing because that would again be quite common as a way of viewing these things.

It's also sometimes the way Dzogchen is related to: all these divinities and deities and visualization practices. A lot of people want to kind of bypass that or skip it over or view it as a transition, a stepping stone to actually the real deal in Dzogchen, which is the nature of mind, which ends up tending to be this kind of vastness of awareness. That's the real McCoy. The deity business is probably just some cultural accretions from the Tibetans, a bit backward. We don't really need that. We want to go for the pith, the essence, the real high deal.

But actually, if you read closely Dzogchen teachers—I'm thinking of Nipam Rinpoche and others—the nature of mind and the more formless teachings are just actually on their way to an even greater liberation which sees divinities everywhere and sees all things as divinities and does not relinquish the formed in favor of the formless.

As I've stressed in other passages in different traditions, in Ibn Arabi and others in the Islamic tradition and certainly in Buddhist Tantra: can it not also be the other way round than this person was construing? Can it not be that knowing the unfabricated, for example, knowing the formless, knowing the transcendent, that which involves no fabrication of image or perception, can in fact open the door for some people to imaginal practice?

Certainly understanding—if the understanding of emptiness deepens far enough, it provides the legitimization for some people for imaginal practice. We've talked about this in several talks over recent years.

But you can hear in this person's presenting it like that, and it does, I think, have roots in, for example, Abraham Abulafia, the Jewish Kabbalistic mystic, who very much thought that way: about letting go of images to be able to participate in the active intellect of God. Very influenced by Aristotle, and you get it in different traditions.

So there is that spin on it. But this person's idea then, or construal, presupposes a certain aim of, in this case, Buddha Dharma or Judaism, or whatever. It presupposes that the aim is to reach the unfabricated, and all else is either a hindrance or something that's a stepping stone, in his case. That's how he was viewing imaginal work, as just the transitional objects. They can help you get close to God, but the real deal is the unformed, no image.

So it presupposes a certain aim of Buddha Dharma or Jewish mystical practice or whatever, and it presupposes or assumes a limited nature of what images are, and it presupposes a certain psychology or makeup of the soul. All these views can't help but shape and orient us, and create a kind of Dharma, and then really create different subtraditions, or maybe actually divergent traditions, where the differences I point out become too different from each other to really feel like they cohere in one tradition.

I was talking to or hearing from a practitioner, or reading something—and it's not that uncommon these days, certain philosophers, maybe Thomas Metzinger, I'm not that familiar with his work directly, but maybe others—but their construal of what is really happening in awakening, in talk about nirvana or stream entry or arahantship or liberation or whatever, what's really happening is a neurological change in the brain. Maybe the brain and the whole neuronal system in the whole body. That's what's really happening. That's what really one is affecting through practice, through diligent practice.

One is rewiring or retraining something—the neurons. And that neurological change short-circuits the neural networks that have, up to then, been perceiving a separate self.

So here's a view then. You can hear how much, again, is wrapped up and implied by such a view. The experiential effect of that kind of neuronal change that comes from practice is the collapse or non-arising of a certain... well, this person was saying of the self or the self-sense. I would say of a certain range of self-sense. And there's the ensuing relative ease and peace and relative—I would say—liberation that brings.

But really, in that view, really there was only a neural network processing sense data in a way that produced the illusion of self-sense. So you can hear how much is, again, wrapped up, how much is implied, and what directions come out of that.

My question, or one question I have here, is about the anthropological and cosmological view that is either implicitly or explicitly wrapped up or stated along with the experience and along with the teaching of that kind of view of what's happening in awakening and what awakening is. And my question is: what effects will that kind of anthropological and cosmological view have in terms of the ethos, the flavor of being, the range of being, the sense of meaningfulness or the possibility of a sense of meaningfulness, of the sense of beauty, senses of beauty, of eros, of soul-making? What does it do to all those possibilities?

So what is the result, again? Relatively, at some levels, similar practices, but they're all undergirded by certain anthropological, cosmological views. In this case, a kind of physicalist, neurological view—a neurologically based anthropology and cosmology. What kind of awakening does that give rise to? What kind of human being does that give rise to? What kind of possibilities does it open? What kind of possibilities does it close?

I might also point out that what is wrapped up in that is, I would say, a more limited view of what emptiness is and what realization involves. So there is, in that view that I just presented, a basic reality, which is material, which is physical, neuronal. There is a neuronal network. It can either work like this or it can work like that. If it works like this, you get certain suffering, the self-illusion. If it works like that, you don't—that self-illusion is no longer in the program. The software has changed.

But the basic reality is the neurons exist, the neural network exists, the biological functioning exists, and so on. And the only real scope of what's seen as empty is the self, the illusion of the self, and it's that that goes. Versus a view of emptiness that I would prefer and find much more interesting, exciting, much more challenging, more radical, deep, wide: that everything is empty. Neurons, matter, process, time. You've heard me say that many times, read about it.

So there are two things there. What is the scope of the emptiness view? And is it as deep and as thorough as it might be? And what is the ethos that is implied both as a basis but also as a result in that kind of view? What's the ethos of the awakening of the soul that comes out of such a view?

If we linger a little bit on this whole question of—the whole fact, actually—that there are, if we look at Buddha Dharma, we can notice that someone interested in these things should notice quite rapidly that there are quite a few different versions of what emptiness means. Everyone using the same word, mostly emptiness, and the range of what's implied, wrapped up in that term, varies hugely.

So it's certainly true in the Tibetan traditions, if you even just think about the four main Tibetan lineages and compare, say, the Nyingma or the Kagyu traditions with the Gelug tradition. The Gelug tradition was founded by Tsongkhapa in the fourteenth century, if I remember, fourteenth or fifteenth century. And I don't quite know the background, but they put a great emphasis on preserving the reality of conventional perceptions—preserving conventional reality.

I think part of the reason for that was because Tsongkhapa looked around him at the time in Tibet and saw a lot of people using the language of emptiness as a kind of excuse to justify behavior that wasn't ethical. So perhaps his thinking and his solution or his perceived need there was to lean more towards not espousing a view that conventional appearances were in fact thoroughly empty.

So you get a strange—to me, strange—teaching in the Gelug tradition which says this thing, whatever it is, is empty of inherent existence. It's not empty of itself. And there's a lot of debate that came out of that that mostly Westerners have not really come across because they're sort of spared that for whatever reasons. But it's there in the hundreds of years of tradition—quite strong argument from different teachers. Certainly Mipham Rinpoche was very keen to point out the problems with that view, and the different Karmapas as well.

But that would be one version of emptiness that really, it's almost like you say things are empty, but it almost...

The danger in preserving the reality of conventional appearances and insisting that they are not empty, that conventional reality is not empty, is that emptiness just becomes... it has no effect. It's sort of just a kind of intellectual thing, but everything remains the same. That's one of the dangers.

Then you get different views of emptiness where again, the thrust or the aim—and often it's not made explicit—seems to be a kind of crusade against sacredness. A crusade against what we might call spirituality. And so again, what's happening in that choice of what emptiness means? Emptiness means don't get your hopes up. Emptiness means there is nothing sacred. Emptiness means there's nothing special. Emptiness means that the self with a big S is an illusion. Soul is an illusion, God is almost certainly an illusion, anything like that.

And that view of emptiness and that scope of emptiness, again, uses a lot of the same language—there's a lot of overlap—but it's got a certain purpose, and it's got a certain prescribed range and intent and scope to it, and goal to it, and vision of what awakening is.

In that, as I've pointed out, it also ends up casting the self in a certain light. So again, if I view the reality of things as this difficult existential situation—we are thrown into this world of purposeless matter in an inexplicable way, in an inexplicable universe of harsh impermanence and meaninglessness—then to see that as the reality, and then we have to find a way to face up to that reality and be okay with it, it's also casting the self as a kind of existentialist hero.

So the whole theatre of things—it's not recognized as theatre because there's presumed this is the reality—but there's a kind of theatre and one has cast oneself as practitioner. In my brave honesty I can face up to this reality which other people perhaps don't have the courage to face up to, this grim, difficult, existential meaninglessness and limitation of our existence, our finitude as human beings. But there's also a construing and a casting of the self in relation to something, as a real self-view in relation to a real reality. That's also part of what one is choosing.

There are views of emptiness that are just about simplifying things. Emptiness is really just the fact that all there is is processes. There is no mystery or depth to the whole notion of emptiness. It's just the fact that there are processes—there are atomic processes, there are neurological processes, there are mental processes that happen in time, this moment of consciousness, that moment of consciousness, that moment of awareness—and they're chained together in cause and effect. And our job is to see that's just a process. Don't make a big deal of anything. Don't make a big deal about the self. Don't make a big deal of anything else. Just this process is kind of atomizing and stripping down.

Some people will choose a version of emptiness that is based on what they can tolerate in terms of the fear that might come up for them. So they might hear about radical emptiness, that everything is empty. There's not even atoms, there's not even a process, there's not even time, there's not even space. Not just self is there as a kind of process in time. But a person might land on that view for lots of different reasons, one of which might be fear. When I hear or read about an emptiness that's even deeper than that, saying, well, it's not even a process, then the ground feels like it goes... Just hearing that, the ground seems to go from under my feet, and I'm afraid. I don't like that. So sometimes a person is choosing emptiness or a version of emptiness—and again, when I choose a version of emptiness, then my path, my tradition or sub-tradition will come out of that—and it might be based on fear.

Sometimes it might be the case that one is committed to or invested in one version of emptiness over another and wants that to be the truth of emptiness, might be partly based or conditioned by one's experience. There's maybe very little mystical experience, or one is afraid of those kinds of openings and pulls back from them in meditation. Or they're just very rare, those experiences. And actually what's happening there is a movement of, well, I don't want to think that I'm a failure. I don't want to think that there is some experience that perhaps other people have had, but I, maybe after years or decades of meditating, I've never had. And so the fear of seeing oneself as a failure actually is what conditions why one is committed to or invested in or wants this version of emptiness to be true over that version.

So partly it's based on what it delivers in terms of the possibilities, ranges, and limits on the worldview. Partly it's more to do with self—the self-view that's already existing, or fear of a self-view, or wanting to cast the self in a certain way. Or it's a commitment to a certain view of emptiness because of what we want, because of what we gravitate towards in terms of the possible ranges of self-view that we want to open up and experience, and a sense of the cosmos, and perhaps a sense of sacredness and divinity.

Someone also, conversely, might find that ego slips in because they might feel, "Well, I've realized emptiness, and there's nothing more for me to realize there. My version is complete." They consider themselves an arahant and declare, "I already know. There's nothing further for me there"—that familiar arahant stock phrase. So one becomes invested, for a slightly different ego reason, in whatever level one has reached in terms of a view and understanding of emptiness. This too is possible.

And then there's the view that I would favor, wrapped up in the soul-making Dharma perspective. What's the leaning there? What's my inclination? What's my personal soul star? What is it that I wish for? What does my soul long for? Yes—to open up the possibilities of self, to open up the possibilities of experience. A huge range is what I want. To open up the possibilities of sacredness, to open up the possibilities of how I can sense and conceive of the cosmos. I want my emptiness to be integrated into those kinds of possibilities, to support those kinds of possibilities.

If we linger a little longer with this emptiness business, I can point out a few more things in relation to the different views and soul-making Dharma's relationship with emptiness and imaginal practice's relationship with emptiness.

There are, as I've said, many different kinds or interpretations of emptiness despite the same word being used throughout the Buddhist tradition. Some are intended from and in the direction of a kind of anti-sacredness. In those construals, as I was pointing out, one's existential plight and material existence are real, and anything else is not. There's a kind of anti-spiritual agenda there.

As I've pointed out elsewhere, I would say that for many people, the very hearing about emptiness is already wrapped up with mystery and sacredness. It's not just a strategy or tool or concept or set of practices that liberate, that reduce suffering. Certainly it's that. But people love to hear about emptiness and they're drawn to explore it because of the mystery and the sacredness. My leaning and favorite inclination is to say that this is part of what we are wanting from emptiness. And I would say it's part of what comes when we explore emptiness deeply. As I've pointed out before, it's not just what we desire—it's also what the emptiness delivers at a very deep level.

Some people hold what's quite common—this process view. For some, their view or understanding of emptiness involves a certain reification of something or other. For example, the aggregates. For example, time. And for example, the process of aggregates in time. That would be a very common one: the self's not real, but what is real is this process of aggregates in time.

But again, just as in the secular existentialist version, this view of emptiness and understanding of emptiness actually implies that certain things are still real. And it also implies that images are not real. The imaginal is not real and not valuable because only this process of aggregates exists, which we can arrive at and perceive if we just train bare attention. We'll see that's all there is—just aggregates. That's the view there.

Therefore, the imaginal is not real because it's not that atomistic process. The options, certainly for the imaginal and imaginal perception, are not opened up. Only the self is impermanent; the phenomenal world is not. And there's not really this possibility of sensing the soul, of cosmopoiesis. There's not really the possibility of legitimizing that through that version of emptiness. It absolutely does not legitimize it, because what is true is atomistic process in time. Images and all that are just papañca in that view.

What's also implicitly true in that view is that impermanence is real. Sometimes emptiness comes almost to be synonymous with impermanence. But again, in the view that I would favor, the understanding of emptiness goes deeper than impermanence. So yes, definitely things are impermanent. But actually, as Nagarjuna and others have stressed, things are neither impermanent nor permanent. They're empty. Time is empty.

Thing is empty. Impermanence is not the ultimate truth. Permanence is not an ultimate truth. And I think when we really go deep into practice—really working with the teachings and the practices around clinging and subtle clinging, letting go at subtler and subtler levels of clinging, seeing how that's tied into unfabricating and how that allows an unfabricating of the whole realm of perception—we actually see: no clinging, no impermanence. Without clinging, there is no impermanence, because there's no thing at all. There's no flow. You can't talk about flow or process. You can't talk about sense data. You can't talk about atoms, whether they're material atoms or mental atom-moments. There's no time. There's no present moment.

So again, very different versions of what emptiness means, with hugely divergent implications for what they open up, what they call us to, and what they limit or not. As I said, emptiness in the way that I would favor understanding it, conceiving of it, exploring it and presenting it—it will open up sensing the soul. As I perceive the world more through the lens of emptiness, I come out of that a little bit, then inevitably, if the emptiness understanding is deep enough, the world becomes sacred, and all kinds of possibilities for sensing the soul are opened.

Emptiness also, in the way that I would conceive it, helps support the stance of the imaginal middle way—so crucial to the fully imaginal experience, the opening of the fully imaginal. So imaginal perceptions are neither real nor not real. They're like theater. And I've said before that the ontological status of images and conventional, what we might call conventional worldly perceptions, is surely different. They're both thoroughly empty at a deep level. There's something about deep insight into emptiness that just, for many people—not for everyone—helps support that stance of the imaginal middle way.

In our view as well, understanding emptiness actually legitimizes, for some people, imaginal practice and sensing the soul. I mean, it was my way, as I've shared before. I wasn't particularly drawn to images. I didn't have a lot of images. It had been, if you like, practiced out of me over the years. But because there's no comparison of an image to something that's supposedly real, the ontological status of the imaginal doesn't get denigrated. If I've seen the emptiness of everything, there's nothing that I can harbor as "Yeah, but that's not real, but this is real." So in that sense, there's no reality or pure perception that I can compare an imaginal perception to.

As I said, some people will need that deep emptiness to really purge themselves or divest themselves of that lingering belief that's fundamental to avijjā, to ignorance—that there is something real, whatever that something is, and that we can know that. Some people don't need it, as I've said before, because they're already in an artistic, poetic relationship, so to speak, with existence and perception, or their reading and research into some modern philosophy kind of legitimizes it, etc. Maybe some from their research into modern physics.

Just while we're on the subject, and again I've said this before as well, but it's also true that the influence can go the other way, the support can go the other way—that imaginal practice, when repeated and over time, can actually bring insight into emptiness, can open the insights into emptiness. And there are a few people, definitely more than a few, who the directionality of support is more that way. With the coming and going of all these images, many of which are kind of surprising, one begins to question the reality of this or that view of the self, for example.

I've said before, again, just talking about emptiness and its relationship or place in the whole practice of soulmaking—and it will have a different place for different people, as mentioned—so I've said, you know, careful not to be sloppy or lazy with the understanding of emptiness. There's a way it can be a bit glib and easy, rather than, for me, what's actually really quite sophisticated and subtle and profound understanding. That the view of deep emptiness is really radical in the sense of really absolute—cuts to the root of all things—and wide, comprehensive. So all that is possible is something that's really quite a journey, as I said when we talked in the series about emptiness.

There is the possibility for some people to explore the practices and understandings of emptiness in ways that are enormously sophisticated and subtle, go very deep and very, very wide. And at the same time—perhaps here's another tension—I acknowledge too that we each perhaps have a personal relationship with emptiness, if you like, and with epistemology, as we mentioned. Epistemology is personal, I said in the talk on epistemology. And epistemology of emptiness is also personal.

So on the one hand, don't be sloppy, don't be lazy. There's a possibility of really, really refined, careful understanding with regard to emptiness. And at the same time, acknowledge that there are different personalities here, different soul styles, different soul needs, and personal relationships with emptiness, personal relationships with epistemology, or personal epistemologies almost to a certain extent.

So you can hear just how complex all this is. Certainly complex if we're, again, thinking about what's in this pot that we call tradition, what contributes to a tradition, to our sense or to anyone's sense of what the dharma is—what are the rival or competing directional pulls, the assumptions, the inclinations, the cultural factors, the personal factors.

And you can hear when we talk about personal inclination - just how much care with regard to honesty and awareness is asked for. To be aware, to be conscious and honest about our wishes, our desires, our motivations for this or that version of this portion of the Dharma or the whole Dharma or the trajectory or the tradition. This is asking us to admit this, to be honest, to be careful, to open things up and to really be aware.

What can happen - and I realize I may be repeating something from earlier, but this feels so important - is that when we look at Dharma culture, sometimes it's hard to step out of it and actually see what's going on when you're immersed in something, when you're inside it.

Certain words and ideas - liberation, awakening, freedom, depth - are actually quite vague in their meaning to a practitioner who might be hearing them frequently and using them extensively as orientation points. They get spoken by authorities in Dharma talks and writings, repeated by teachers, repeated by practitioners themselves. And actually, aided by their vagueness, supported by their vagueness, they become charged for the practitioner in the context of Dharma practice - doing retreats, hearing this language, repeating it for oneself. They become charged, they become orientation points and goals.

But if you actually ask two questions: First, what exactly do you mean by liberation, awakening, depth, freedom? And second, is that what you really want the most? Freedom from suffering gets repeated so much, we hear it constantly, we repeat it ourselves constantly. The very vagueness of the idea almost contributes to a lack of clarity, a lack of full honesty about whether this is actually what we want and what we even mean by it.

For some people, as I've pointed out before, it may actually be beauty that they have longed for in their practice, that has kept them on the path all these years - a love of beauty, an eros for beauty. It may be the beauty of goodness, of the profoundly good heart. It may be the beauty of truth, certainly. But it's never only freedom from suffering. Not for someone who really loves the path. Can I see this? Can I admit it? Can I see that there's not a problem with it? Can I see that it's right?

The person may find - and this is probably quite common - that if they're really able to pull aside the veils and scrutinize what's going on with all these words buzzing around, all this charge, all this repetition, they may feel that what they want is beauty. They long for beauty, they're devoted to beauty more than they're devoted to freedom from suffering or reducing their suffering much further. Sure, at times they want less suffering when suffering coalesces in certain ways. But actually it's something else.

What if there's the possibility of seeing oneself as a disciple of beauty? Not primarily as a seeker of liberation or any reduction in suffering. But because that's the paradigm, and that's what gets repeated - liberation from suffering, which can sometimes just mean reduced suffering - that's how one tends to think of what one's doing, what one repeats to oneself and to others.

What if you actually broke out of that? Or just experimented: Why don't I relabel myself, reconceive myself as a practitioner on the path? I'm a disciple of beauty. I'm devoted to beauty. My eros, my longing is for beauty. What would that do?

Honesty and consciousness is asked for here. And in acknowledging this need for honesty and self-awareness, in acknowledging the inevitability of how different soul styles or different soul desires and inclinations come into a person's perception of the Dharma, their choice of a Dharma tradition, their contribution to it - in acknowledging all that, it also brings up the whole question of autonomy and authority.

If we admit and are honest that we actually desire this - that what we really long for is beauty, and sometimes when push comes to shove, we'll choose beauty over a reduction in suffering - then that invites the question about autonomy and authority. Am I going to trust that desire over and above the language that is promulgated, the common language, what the teacher is saying, what I read? That's part of the question of autonomy and authority.

But there are other aspects. Within a tradition, what is my relationship with authorities in terms of how much can I have my own investigations, my own lines of investigation, my own criteria for what satisfies me in my investigations?

Sometimes a person ends up asking a certain question of either a teacher or a number of different teachers over and over, sometimes for years, but there's not much movement there. What's happening? Sometimes what happens is they have several authorities. They're giving all the authority to those authorities, those teachers, and then they can't decide between them. Because this person says this, but that person says that. Or I read here, but I read over there.

How will you resolve that question, whatever it is? It could be a question about any aspect of Dharma. How will you know? When will you be satisfied in that question? How much are you actually living that question in terms of tailoring and shaping and directing your practice to go into the depths of that question so that that question can be opened up and answered? Or is it just, "I'm practicing how I usually practice, but I'm asking these questions to different authorities and getting contradictory answers"?

So this whole autonomy of investigation—in practice, in experience, in meditative experience, in thinking, in reading and listening—becomes crucial.

Again, there's a tension here because sometimes what happens is a person has given all the authority to other people and they're not, if you like, living their own questions and self-determining. There's not enough autonomy in their own investigations, their own inquiries.

So I ask: What is involved in a really powerful investigation for a human being? What's involved in the art of inquiry for oneself, so that one knows, so that one arrives at a place where it doesn't matter what this person says, because I have satisfied myself. I've seen for myself. I've understood for myself. I've made sense of it myself, questioned for myself in a real, alive way.

Sometimes what happens is the other side of the spectrum. A person has a certain experience and decides that, "Oh well, I've reached the end." So whatever you're saying, Rob, or whatever this other teacher is saying, "I don't think that's true because I've seen this"—a certain experience.

So, for example, a certain level of unfabricating where the personality goes very quiet, but the world just feels very vivid and bright. And it seems like—the sense of the understanding, the sense of that experience is "I'm just experiencing things as they are without the self." And one stops there. And one has decided, based on that experience, that that's the end of it. That's the understanding of emptiness. Anyone who says other stuff just can't be right. All this business about complete unfabrication or cessation or whatever.

To me, that would be a bit like journeying, taking a car to the south of England and going to somewhere like Dover, the Cliffs of Dover, where there's the sea, and just deciding, "Right, that's it, that's the end of the land, that's the end of terrestrial Earth. There is no more land after here." Versus getting in a boat, going across and seeing—after a little paddling, you'll get to France. And sometimes you point in the right direction. And so, there is more land. There is a deeper unfabricating than what I've experienced.

So the question becomes: How much am I over-concluding? Am I concluding my investigation too early? Am I over-trusting my experience, even though that experience might be limited, and I'm deciding it's ultimate?

There's that phrase from the Dzogchen tradition: "Trust your experience but keep refining your view." So yes, if that kind of relative unfabricating where the personality goes very quiet and the world just opens up very vividly—not much thought, etc.—it's great. Trust that experience. In my map, it's a relative unfabricating. But keep refining the view. Keep refining the practice. Keep refining your understanding of what's happening there. How do I frame that experience? Is there more that can be unfabricated? What would that be? How would I get there?

And also, part of the art of inquiry is a kind of structural awareness of the levels of ideas.

So how things kind of fit together - how conceptual frameworks fit together. What's a relatively small fry contention or quibbling? I think I mentioned this before, so forgive me if there's repetition: people arguing whether there were two or three types of vedanā. You can see it both ways - does it really matter?

Sometimes we don't recognize what are the more significant levels of ideas. Sometimes people hear about the ways of looking paradigm, for example - that whole conceptual framework - and it just doesn't register how radical and important in its implications such an idea is. It's a kind of meta-level idea that just doesn't register: you can look at things in different ways. One hasn't grasped its structural place, hasn't grasped the edifice of ideas, how ideas are actually... one can create a hierarchy of ideas. What's more or less significant? What's a real basis, a real meta-ideal, a pan-ideal, and what's just a relatively insignificant piece in the structure and conceptual framework of a particular dharma?

This relates to what I mentioned - I can't remember in which talk - developing a nose for what's significant and what's not. This strand of investigation, this piece, this understanding, this discernment - that's actually significant. This one is not so important. There's a lot involved in what I would call artful inquiry, or the art of inquiry.

All this is necessary if I'm going to have a degree of autonomy in relationship to whatever authorities exist in a tradition. So important. And again, this question of the tension between autonomy - do we need a necessary or healthy... or I'll put it as a question: does a tradition need a degree of healthy autonomy for its members, for its sangha, the individuals? And does it need authority? What's the balance of those? What's the tension? That's the range of tension there that's necessary to a healthy, alive tradition.

We see in all this - I've touched on this, but I want to draw this point out - there are many things being said. Just how... views about the world and views about the human being, what we might call cosmologies and anthropologies, views about the cosmos and beliefs about the cosmos, pictures of the cosmos, pictures, models, beliefs, views about what a human being is and what constitutes a human being - they are not irrelevant.

It can be fairly popular to say, "Ah, the Buddha was a genius because he just sidelined the whole cosmology that was around at the time. He took the teaching and made it purely psychological and therefore universal and not dependent on some kind of cultural accretion or cultural fashion of a view of cosmology and anthropology."

But you start to see when you consider all these things I've said that actually, that's not irrelevant at all. Those views of cosmology and anthropology may be much more primary, and may be much more primary in their significance and their determination of what the Dharma is - what we believe is the real Buddha-Dharma, or that we choose. And as I said, as part of what is the Dharma, what is our notion, what is our sense, what is our image of awakening - views of cosmology and anthropology are not at all irrelevant. They are extremely significant.

CHAPTER 187

Dharma(s) Discovered and Created (Part 3)

Rob Burbea · 1h34

> In this third part of his exploration, Rob Burbea examines how our contemporary cultural context—a hybrid of modernism's belief in universal truth and postmodernism's challenge to privileged perspectives—influences dharma evolution and understanding. He considers postcolonial critiques of Buddhism's potentially "male" archetypal emphasis on transcendence and renunciation, questioning whether teachings like the Four Noble Truths represent universal truths or cultural products.
>
> Burbea reflects on the dead-end reached by postmodern philosophy and proposes viewing dharma as art rather than truth-pursuit, allowing for endless creative possibilities within constraining structures. He presents three ways of understanding soul-making dharma's relationship to Buddha-dharma: as contained within traditional Buddhism, as containing Buddha-dharma within soul-making, or as part of dharma's current birth in Western culture.
> The talk addresses the complexity of soul-making teachings, explaining how sophisticated philosophical frameworks support practices that may seem alien to mainstream dharma. Burbea emphasizes that recognizing these cultural and philosophical influences represents psychological and spiritual maturity, opening possibilities for more nuanced engagement with tradition, innovation, and the ongoing evolution of contemplative understanding.

If we return to consider a little bit more the influence of contemporary cultural context on the tradition—on the evolution of the tradition, on the Dharma, the shaping of the tradition—and we look at the current cultural context, one reading of our current cultural context, the larger cultural context, is that we're in a strange sort of hybrid time in a way.

We had the rise of modernism or modernity, if you prefer, with the Western Enlightenment, the scientific revolution, and one characteristic of modernism philosophically is the belief, the view, the hope that humanity can lay hold of the truth—the truth—capture it in a clear, unmediated way. A single truth that can be known. And so, of course, the science and the scientific revolution encapsulated, embodied really the central thrust of that belief and idea and hope. And, of course, there were other movements in philosophy that captured that as well.

So the legacy of modernism is still very much with us, it's still very much alive. At a certain point, as I chronicled, through reflections on science and the history of science, through philosophical considerations, other factors, political and anthropological considerations, looking at studies about cultures, there was a kind of rise of a collection of related movements that we can loosely bundle together under the term "postmodernism," loosely.

And postmodernism very much aggressively challenged the belief and the idea that there could be a direct perception of truth, that there is one privileged perspective which reveals the truth or reality—whether it's scientific or philosophical or social or ethical or whatever. And so there was a rise of postmodernism, particularly in intellectual circles, but some of that spilt into non-intellectual circles, the person on the street, the everyday person who's not in academia.

So one reading of our contemporary larger cultural context is that we're living in a sort of mixed time, where to a certain extent what is still very much dominant as the mainstream cultural paradigm is essentially modernity: that there is one truth, that science can lay hold of it. Mixed with that is a kind of filtering into the common consciousness, if you like, of a kind of postmodern reservation, objection, hesitation to that proclamation or that idea of there being one truth, one reality, one privileged perspective which we can come to or which this person or that person or this culture or that culture has over and above another culture.

So these two kind of opposed ideas or opposed views about reality and truth and epistemology—and as I said, it covers all kinds of areas of human existence, not just science—they coexist in the common consciousness in a strange way, so that there is a reluctance to close down the possibility of people just having different opinions and different views and takes on reality or perspectives, at the same time as there is a kind of dominant view of this is how reality is, and it tends to adhere to the classical scientific materialist and secular view. So that in itself is a strange mix of postmodern philosophy with the dominance of more modernist views. They mix together. It's a strange combination.

And what does that imply? How does that play out in how we view the Dharma, sense the Dharma? What influences will that have on the Dharma, but also on how we view dharma?

So one of the traits or thrusts of postmodern thought and philosophy is this objection to any claim of reaching or knowing a universal truth, and any claim that there is such a universal truth, or that one can hope to arrive at a perspective which will reveal that universal truth. And rather, truths or reality perspectives or worldviews or even morality views—under the rubric of the postmodern gaze, the gaze of postmodernism—are viewed as just so-called truths. They are viewed more as just cultural products.

And so one of the constituent or related movements of postmodernism is a kind of postcolonialism. So academics and others looking at the influence of the aggressive colonialism of Western European countries, but you might also say the US, on indigenous cultures and other cultures around the world, imposing their views of reality. It's happened in all kinds of ways: imposing aesthetic, imposing reality views, imposing legal views, imposing sociological, economic modes of thinking and action. And wishing to recognize that and reclaim some of the indigenous power from those oppressive impositions spread through colonialism.

Part of all that study brought the view that there are no universal truths, there's just different cultural views. Now, of course, even among modern philosophers, this is not a simple fait accompli as an argument. There's nuances to this. It's much more sophisticated than I'm presenting here. However, that objection or nervousness when anyone claims a universal truth, any person or any culture or any religion, is part of the thrust of postmodern philosophy that has, to some extent, filtered down into our ordinary culture.

So I heard from a colleague who was teaching with another teacher, and the colleague of mine played two pieces of music in the meditation hall one evening. And her co-teacher afterwards said, well, she should be careful, she shouldn't assume that those pieces of music will be universally felt the same way by everyone in the hall. So I think they were two pieces of music by basically two white men—I think it was George Harrison and Leonard Cohen. And this co-teacher was saying, well, careful of the colonialism there, supposing that music by two white men will be heard by everyone the same way, will land in the same place as my colleague was hoping it would to communicate a certain point or create a certain atmosphere.

So, fair enough. Good point, perhaps. But at the same time, this co-teacher was probably, I would guess, overlooking the presumption of universality in the Dharma itself. In other words, the Dharma tends to proclaim, and most dharma practitioners presume, a universal truth—that the Four Noble Truths are universal truths, or certainly universal. That the pith of the Four Noble Truths, that craving brings suffering and releasing craving brings a reduction in suffering, just that much—this is assumed to be a universal truth.

This may or may not be explicitly trumpeted as such, but I wonder whether most dharma practitioners, people who are steeped in the Dharma, actually just assume that universality. Now, most Buddhists don't try to enforce their view or their way on others. They would acknowledge and allow any person's freedom and autonomy to choose their path, their religion, their conceptual framework. But perhaps, just like a fundamentalist Christian who is not evangelical might believe that those who don't choose Jesus Christ as their personal Lord and Saviour will not go to heaven—they might believe that, or even believe such a person will suffer in hell for eternity—without being aggressively evangelistic about it, they won't foist that on others so aggressively, but they're still harboring a certain view.

Is it the case that people who are steeped in Buddhism or consider themselves Buddhist assume, without aggressively foisting it on anyone else, that those people who choose differently—who don't practice a relinquishment of craving and other aspects of the Buddhist path—will suffer, and do suffer, because of their kilesas, because of craving? This is an interesting question to me. Do we assume that Dharma is universal and proclaiming, and the holder of the repository of universal truths, at least some of them?

Culturally speaking, there's a good case to look at Pali Canon Dharma teachings and that whole thrust towards transcendence and solitude and renunciation with regard to relationship with senses and sense pleasure, and regard that as, in quotation marks, "male"—as a kind of style where the thrust of Pali Canon Dharma is quite male. I think that case could be very validly made to a certain extent. It's certainly been a very patriarchal structure.

One of the related movements within postmodernism is feminist studies and gender studies. One can very easily imagine that kind of critique from the perspective of a feminist thinker, looking not just at the patriarchy through a couple of thousand years of Buddhist history in its power structures, but also at what could be seen as a typically male flavor and range and leaning in the archetypal style of its aims and its methods. To remove oneself from the world, to not be reborn, to transcend the world, to regard sense pleasures as something to be renounced, the emphasis on solitude—all these things.

How much is universal truth in there? When we talk about different worldviews spawning or setting up different dharmas, the view of the round of rebirth being equated with suffering, and then the release from suffering—liberation, nibbāna—coming from not being reborn again into the world, into any world, if that is central, then we're not just talking about cosmetic differences here. We're talking about something really fundamental.

Is that very transcendent movement away from the world, away from sense experience, something that is created by males, colored by males, reinforced by males, and reflecting a male archetypal style? The language is fraught here, so I'm certain to tread on some toes. I apologize, but I hope you get the basic point I'm trying to make.

Several practitioners have told me, "I'm actually not interested in the unfabricated. I care more about relationships and the beauty in relationships." A woman practitioner told me that. Is that just because she's deluded, or is she actually holding on to and trying to preserve and create space for something that's been sidelined and denigrated by a male-oriented and male-shaped teaching and thrust?

Do we assume the Dharma is universal and the repository of universal truths? And if we don't, then what? The same question applies to soul-making Dharma. Do we assume the soul-making conceptual framework is universal, reflects some universal truth, with all these ideas we're putting out?

One of the, hopefully, strengths and sophistications of soul-making Dharma is that, as I've mentioned a couple of times, the whole idea of breaking of the vessel—shevirat hakelim—is integral to the whole conceptual framework, including with reference to conceptual frameworks themselves. Part of the whole conceptual framework of soul-making dharma is the fact that conceptual frameworks need to be stretched, need to be soft and elastic, will shatter at certain points, will have holes in them, will have certain inevitable incoherences that may fracture and may break and may need to be expanded, rebuilt.

Sometimes I wonder, and Catherine and I have touched on this several times—how much of soul-making Dharma is a reflection of my personal dispositions, my history, my preferences, my blind spots, my views, my style of consciousness, my soul style? Even things like the emphasis on fine discernment, subtlety of awareness with regard to emotions and energy body—this is just part of how my soul and my consciousness tends to work, or how I've developed it, how it has been developed over practice. It's something that Catherine shares to a huge extent and has similar tendencies of subtle discernment. How much of that is necessary and how much is, as I say, the teachings themselves actually just a reflection of my style and not necessarily necessary?

These are questions. What do we do with all this? If we stay with this strange amalgam, this uneasy, relatively incongruent amalgam of modernism and postmodernism, modernity and post-modernity in our contemporary wider culture?

One of the other aspects or faces of postmodernism, in terms of the arts—someone told me that the whole postmodern movement actually started in architecture and some of the other arts—is the introduction of pastiche elements. Elements that belong to different artistic styles were placed and juxtaposed in the same building or piece of artwork, so that pastiche, that kind of, from a certain perspective, incongruous juxtaposition of different elements and styles and traditions within one piece, is also characteristic of postmodern art to a certain extent. This is all grossly simplified, but it doesn't matter for the points I'm making for now.

And over the years when I would see her, she would make statements that seemed to me to be taking concepts and insights from her years of insight practice and then sort of grafting them onto or projecting them into the images and the cosmology and the theology of this other tradition she was now practicing in.

So the concepts seemed to carry more weight for her than the images. The insights she had developed through insight practice were being mapped onto very different religious imagery and framework. Which is interesting—what happens when we take the conceptual understanding we've developed through one tradition and apply it to the images and stories of another?

This raises fascinating questions about what we're actually relating to in spiritual practice. Are we relating primarily to concepts, to insights, to ways of understanding? Or are we relating to particular images, particular stories, particular cultural frameworks? And how much do those images and frameworks actually matter versus the underlying conceptual understanding?

I think this connects to something really fundamental about how we approach dharma practice. If I'm identifying strongly as a Buddhist, what exactly am I identifying with? Is it the particular cultural forms—the statues, the chanting, the robes, the Pali terminology? Is it the philosophical framework? Is it the community? Is it some combination?

And this matters because it affects how we relate to teachings that draw from multiple traditions or that use unexpected images and examples. If my identity as a Buddhist is primarily about loyalty to Buddhist cultural forms, then I might feel uncomfortable when a teacher uses Hebrew mystical concepts or Christian imagery to illuminate dharma points. But if my identification is more with the underlying commitment to freedom from suffering and the cultivation of wisdom, then perhaps I can be more open to teachings that draw skillfully from various sources.

This question of identity and allegiance in spiritual practice is not trivial. It shapes how we receive teachings, how we practice, how we relate to other traditions and practitioners. And it's worth examining honestly what's actually motivating our preferences and reactions when we encounter teachings that don't fit neatly into the boxes we've constructed.

And then she was telling me that she felt drawn to Buddha Dharma again and was explaining that this draw was because she had felt Kuan Yin calling her home to explore some of her presence as a figure in her own right, as a presence within herself.

So this reconnection with Buddhism came through the sense of Kuan Yin. My question is—and I don't know what was the case with this person—but my question is really: is it just an icon, in this case Kuan Yin, typically conceived and labeled as Buddhist, or is it something more? Because if it's just the icon, where is the Buddha Dharma in that?

Actually, representations of divinities throughout history have passed, they've moved, they've been traded, they slip and are shared between one culture and religious tradition and another—countless, countless times. Academics have traced that in all kinds of ways. So just because it's Kuan Yin, and Kuan Yin is regarded as a Buddhist deity, Bodhisattva, etc., does that make it a return to Buddhadharma? If it's only that it's a typically Buddhist deity, if there's nothing more than that, just the borrowing of a deity and a relationship with that deity—perhaps through visualization, perhaps through image, etc.—where's the Buddha Dharma there?

Similarly, I heard that when Christian missionaries went to Tibet, they started trying to teach the Gospels and teach about Jesus and teach the theology of Christianity, they actually had very little impact and very little influence because the Tibetans heard the stories about Jesus—the beautiful healing stories and his sacrifice and all of that—and just heard it and said, "Oh, he's just a Bodhisattva that we'd never heard of before." And so he was just easily, without any friction at all, accommodated into their already large pantheon of deities and Bodhisattvas. And they completely missed the essence of Christianity. And certainly missed any differentiation between what they were believing and thinking in their conceptual frameworks, explicit and implicit, and the Christian ones.

So again, when we talk about traditions and eclecticism and borrowing and referring to all that, what are we actually talking about? What actually has the clout? Is it just a kind of representation, or is it more the deeper, essential conceptual framework with the delineations and things? So there's a lot of considerations in here, I think, to reflect on.

I've made the case before, and I get the impression I'm not the only one who feels this way, but in many regards, the postmodern movement, philosophically at least, kind of reached a dead end, or has come to a dead end in a certain way. Partly it was supposed that in the attack on any proclamation or hope or idea of a universal truth that could be arrived at by adopting the perspective that reveals that truth would open up the ground for more fertile cross-pollination and conversation.

I don't think that has happened, or it doesn't seem to have happened very much. It certainly hasn't happened much in philosophical circles, as far as I can tell. And the whole thing kind of got, well, died, to some extent. And I mentioned someone, for instance, like Richard Rorty, who made such an insistence in his very smart critique of truth claims and privileged perspectives on reality, and deconstructions of even the attempt at ontology and epistemology. And then was hoping that this would, in his words, open up the conversation. That was the most important thing, to open up the conversation, keep the conversation going. But very little came. Certainly in his writings, there's very little conversation happening. And it didn't seem to spawn much or open up much of a conversation or much fertile creation and discovery, either in terms of ideas or anything else.

And I made this point before, but partly the problem is that a lot of the academic philosophers lack any technology in the sense of any meditative technique and capacity and developed practice to actually shift ways of looking, to move in and out of different ways of looking, so that their very sense of reality, their very sense of cosmos, their sense of human being, their perception of things, actually changes. Of course, that's the central thing, as I would say, we practice in Buddha Dharma, at least as I tend to most commonly present it. And that takes practice.

So I can have the idea that there are the possibility of different perspectives. But if I can't actually engage different perspectives, it just stays completely at the level of the written academic word or debate. Nothing is really affected in the being and there's no real exploration of new ground, of different perspectives, no real creation and discovery happening. So that's maybe one reason why the whole postmodern philosophical movement kind of just sort of died or petered out, lost its life.

A second is, and again I've pointed this out before, that often many of those philosophers espousing the impossibility of seeing truth or arriving at the existence of one truth or arriving at one preferred perspective on reality, most of those philosophers espousing that actually had a hidden agenda. Sometimes it might have been hidden to themselves, I don't know. And that hidden agenda involved a kind of strongly secularist, almost nihilistic, materialist stance. That was their basic ontological commitment. And on top of that, they might have even had an agenda to cut down, to denigrate, to make impossible, to bar from the conversation anything that reaped to them of more spiritual views, more ennobling views, other dimensions, divinity, etc.

So, saying one thing, but actually blocking the discourse from opening up in certain areas. This also just closed the discourse so it ended up atrophying and nothing really new came into that plot other than people repeating over and over, "There's the absence of truth," and bashing each other, slapping each other's wrists when it seemed like this person or that person was claiming some kind of privileged perspective, usually without realizing it.

Now, I'm sure that in recent years and even the last couple of decades, I'm sure there must be thinkers and burgeoning movements that I'm just unaware of. Someone was talking to me even just the other day about metamodernism and saying that this was the beginnings of a philosophical movement that had something in common with what we were teaching and may provide part of a way forward out of this sort of dead end or lifeless pool left over from postmodernism and this strange mishmash of the dominant modernism with sort of filtered down postmodernism.

But at the same time, soul-making as an art preserves its own irreducible mystery and unfathomability that cannot be fully captured or explained by these other purposes, no matter how noble they might be.

This understanding of dharma as art opens up tremendous possibilities while simultaneously providing the necessary constraints that make meaningful exploration possible. When we conceive of our practice this way, we're no longer bound by the rigid truth claims that can become so problematic in both religious and scientific frameworks. We're not required to defend absolute positions or universal truths in the same way. Instead, we're engaging with something that has the fluidity and creative potential of artistic expression, while still maintaining depth, rigor, and transformative power.

This artistic approach also allows us to embrace what we might call "multiple truths" without falling into the relativistic trap that postmodernism sometimes creates. In art, we don't say that all artistic expressions are equally valuable or meaningful, but we also don't reduce them to a single measure of truth or beauty. There are qualities, there are depths, there are resonances that some works have and others don't. There's discernment involved, but it's a different kind of discernment than purely rational or empirical judgment.

The same applies to soul-making dharma as art. We can discern between practices and approaches that seem to generate more soul, more depth, more beauty, more meaningfulness, and those that don't, without having to resort to absolute truth claims. This discernment itself becomes part of the artistic sensibility we're cultivating.

When we view our spiritual practice through this lens, we're also freed from some of the cultural constraints that might otherwise limit our exploration. We're not bound by what's considered culturally acceptable or intellectually fashionable in quite the same way that we might be if we were making scientific or religious truth claims. Art has always had a certain license to explore territories that other domains might find too controversial or uncertain.

This doesn't mean anything goes, of course. As I mentioned, the constraints and resistances are crucial. They're what give the artistic exploration its power and depth. But these constraints come from the internal logic of the practice itself, from what actually works to generate soul and meaning and transformation, rather than from external cultural pressures or intellectual fashions.

The intellectual component is certainly present, but in a way, soul-making will always have these beyonds that deliver and open up—domains whose purpose transcends the merely moral, cognitive, or utilitarian. These elements are there, but soul-making will always be more. And as such, one might ask, "Well, what's the point? What's the use of it?" The answer is simply this: soul-making is the use of it. It stops there in that kind of circular, self-proclaiming declaration.

If we linger a little longer with this whole idea of postmodernism—and I'm sure I'm not the first person to point this out—when you ponder it deeply, you can realize something quite striking about one of its central tenets. Characteristic of postmodernism is this idea that beliefs and worldviews emerge from or are constituted by historical and cultural context. They're not universal truths, the argument goes, but are simply conditioned by particular historical and cultural circumstances.

This is the typical postmodern critique or analysis—really, an explanation of ideas, views, worldviews, and beliefs. But one could point out that the very idea or belief that views emerge from historical and cultural context is itself a view emerging from a certain historical and cultural context. What does that do to our understanding? The idea that ideas are culturally emergent is itself a culturally emergent idea. Again, we can point back to Heidegger and others who explored this recursive dilemma.

Does this relativize the postmodern claim as truth? Does it mean that this very idea about cultural conditioning and contingency may not be ultimately true? And what does that do to our sense of possibilities?

There's often an agenda in this typically postmodern assertion—sometimes hidden, sometimes explicit. When postmodern thinkers insist that ideas and views come from culture and don't reflect any universal truth or movement toward such truth, there's usually an implicit prohibition. What's being forbidden is the notion that cultural conditioning itself might represent something like divine movement—the life of world soul intelligence, or something of that nature.

This would be a definite taboo for most postmodern philosophers. Yet one could retain the insight about cultural conditioning while suggesting that the conditioning itself reflects something larger being worked out through humanity, through world soul—a movement of the divine, of Buddha nature. This idea, which in a way sanctifies cultural contexts and movements, is too reminiscent of Hegel for most contemporary philosophers.

Hegel, who was enormously influential before becoming almost the focal point of vehement philosophical attack, had this notion of absolute spirit—that culture, society, religions, philosophies, and art are all part of a wider movement and evolution of spirit. One of the problems with Hegel was his proclamation that this process of spiritual growth through cultural evolution had reached its zenith in his own philosophy—which is, of course, problematic for obvious reasons.

But we could entertain—neither as truth nor untruth, but as a perspective, a conceptual framework we're free to move in and out of—a very similar idea. We could see cultural conditioning and context as part of a divine movement of world soul intelligence, using whatever words feel appropriate. The key difference would be regarding this movement as open-ended, rather than having already arrived at its summit or moving toward some future peak where we'll all recognize perfection.

We could regard this divine movement as open-ended, just as we regard soul-making as open-ended. The awakening that soul-making opens and delivers would be endless in its possibilities, endlessly fertile, and still—still a divine movement.

As I said at the beginning, there's a great deal here to unearth and illuminate. I want to hold back as much as possible from imposing any conclusions I might be inclined to draw from all this, and simply expose these considerations for our collective contemplation.

When we put all these pieces together—the considerations about history, cultural context and conditioning (past, present, and future), and the place of our personal inclinations, desires, and soul styles—it becomes possible, given everything we've explored, to conceive or situate soul-making dharma in at least two ways regarding its place vis-à-vis mainstream Buddha dharma.

Given all we've discussed, it's possible to write this history—remembering that history is fiction—in at least two ways. One possibility is that soul-making is part of Buddhadharma. As such, it exists within the perimeters, boundaries, and scope of what we understand as Buddha Dharma. It certainly evolved from Buddha Dharma insight meditation as its foundation, utilizing many of the tools, concepts, and meditative techniques that are part of Buddha Dharma practice and teaching.

Soul-making emerged very much from deep exploration of emptiness, as I've explained. We can—as I have done in certain talks, perhaps including "What Is Awakening?" and others—trace these connections and demonstrate this continuity.

rethink or better expand our sense of the four noble truths, expand our sense of what do we mean by suffering and what do we mean by awakening, especially now if we cannot assume that everyone believes suffering is just being in the realm of rebirth from life to life and liberation is getting off that wheel of rebirth and not being reborn again. Then the whole notions of suffering and awakening become more open to different interpretations.

And it's possible to expand what we mean by suffering. We talked about including the suffering of soullessness and the awakening of soul. So I've explained all this at much greater length. But then we're really using the framework of the Four Noble Truths and expanding its range. And certainly there are other elements of Buddha Dharma that we could say in soul-making Dharma are the same concepts—they're just expanded beyond maybe what many proponents of mainstream Buddha Dharma would put out there.

So, for example, we talk about in the Dharma: Sila, Samadhi, Paññña—ethics, samadhi or meditative absorption and well-being and concentration, and paññña, wisdom. So you can see that when I touched on yesterday the relationship between emptiness and image, we're really opening up the range of insight regarding emptiness and its implications.

Or, for instance, when I mentioned that the truth of anicca—perhaps not an ultimate truth, as many Buddhists would consider it, the ultimate truth of impermanence—we're actually expanding the insight and saying, well, actually time is empty too, and all things that exist in time are empty. And so with the emptiness of time, the door is opened to a perspective of timelessness, eternality. So it's almost like more insight, deeper insight, widens the range and the scope of what's actually possible. So there's paññā there.

If we talk about samadhi, I've talked a lot about, for instance, the fluid back and forth between samadhi states and working with an image. The reality or the experience of wherever you are working in meditation with an image—there's a fork. You can go into the samadhi more, you can go into the image more. I've delineated four or five kinds of realms or experiences that one can be in with an image or with the essence of an image. And so this is also extending—alongside the eight classical jhanas, we can extend the range of what kind of states it's possible to settle into and regard as realms, meditative realms, states of relative meditative stability. So again, all the samadhi is there, all the paññā is there—it's just stretched a little bit.

If we talk about sila, about ethics—actually I hope that I will be able to talk about that after this talk. So again, I would urge the view that what's happening in soul-making dharma is actually we're expanding the ethics. We're certainly not getting rid of the ethics. So again, our practice is based on ethical care and ethical attention. But it perhaps widens it.

I've talked about sometimes, in talks like "Meditator's Revolutionary" and "Necessity of Fantasy," the almost unconscious limitation on our ethical sensibilities and our ethical stands and actions—the limitations imposed by a limited range of archetypes that we inherit or that are the legacy of mainstream Buddha Dharma. And so soul-making dharma might open up the ethical range more because it opens up the range of archetypes through which one can sense and tune to the ethics of the situation and then respond as well. So I'm going to elaborate on that in the talks to come.

Or even dana—we're very much rooted in the practice of generosity in all kinds of ways, and I've talked about that when we talked about opening the energy body, the importance of that, and radical generosity. But it's also possible to say that in soul-making, in some of the particular elements of soul-making, dana is implicit. In duty, for example—duty that, in relation to an image, has to spill out somehow into the world. Somehow, even if it's actually purely intrapsychic, duty in relation to an image, there's some kind of dana, there's some kind of giving of the being that is expressed through that duty.

One might also say, regarding dharma, that the soul is intrinsically and naturally generous, that it wants to share itself, to display itself, to show and manifest its gods, its daemons, to mirror and echo infinitely in life, in body, in speech, in perception, in mind, in art, in work, in so much. It pours itself out endlessly. It wants to impress in that good sense that I was talking about. It wants to connect. It wants to share. Soul wants to reach out to soul and impress and be impressed upon. There's a generosity in that.

You could say soul serves itself, but from another perspective, soul is more than me, or certainly more than ego. It's always at least tied to or tending toward the social and the community, the earthy and the cosmic, the hidden worlds as well. It serves all of that. In its service and devotion to soul-making, it serves all of that. It doesn't—again, because of the intrinsic tendency to expand, it expands into all these domains as well. So there are all kinds of directions, aspects, levels, dimensions of generosity wrapped up in soul-making Dharma.

The one view is that soul-making Dharma is just within the scope of Buddha Dharma. It's just one sub-tradition, much as Vajrayana is, or Insight Meditation is, or whatever, within Buddha Dharma. And really what's happening is we're just expanding the range of what we mean by Dharma, Sila, Samadhi, Pañña, without without letting go of any of what we already meant by dhana sila samadhi pañña. We're just expanding it.

But a second way of writing a story, or seeing it, situating it, conceiving of it, is that actually, Buddha Dharma is in soul-making. It's a part of soul-making. So why? How could we say that? Because soul styles and soul desires, as we said and emphasized, they direct and determine what kind of Dharma I want, because what kind of world I want to sense myself in, what kind of vision and sense of humanity, what kind of liberation, what kind of flavor of being.

And so the soul style, whether it's conscious or not, the soul wishes to feed into determining the Dharma. And again, we could regard that as a movement of the world soul, in a more global sense, if you like. So that Dharma itself is an expression of soul, of soul-making. And as such, it's a dynamic, evolving, moving, volatile, and multi-faced, multi-aspected, multi-directional movement of soul-making.

So one view is soul-making Dharma is within the Buddha Dharma, and another view is the Dharma is in soul-making. Buddha Dharma is a movement of soul. Was, is, will be a movement of soul. It's conjured forth from soul. It's built by soul. It's shaped and determined by the desires and the movements and the inclinations and the processes of soul-making. So we could look at it two ways.

Somewhere before, I can't remember, and it was probably in the context of saying something else, but I think I said actually you could see it three ways. You could make a claim that soul-making Dharma is well within the scope of traditional Buddha Dharma, and maybe even stretch it and claim that the Buddha did teach soul-making Dharma, etc. So that's very typical in religious innovation, is to claim the innovation, paint it as an original teaching.

So then you get the stories of the Vajrayana was proclaimed by the Buddha, by Siddhartha Gautama in his lifetime but just to a secret set of disciples or just in secret to a select set of disciples, for example. It's always been there and then it was only revealed gradually over time. Similar with Mahayana, etc. So there's a painting of something—again to do with fantasy of origins, it's to do with the way religions think backwards to the founder and the truth being behind me, truth that I'm trying to replicate. But one could paint it that way.

As a first option, one could perceive soul-making Dharma that way. One could perceive it as completely having broken out of the bounds of Buddha Dharma and being something else. A vessel has shattered, it's open, and now it's outside of the perimeter.

Or, a third way, one could regard soul-making Dharma as part of the expansion of Buddha Dharma in the West. The current birth, actually, of Buddha Dharma in the West. Buddha Dharma very young in the West. And that we are involved, and not just people involved with soul-making Dharma, all of us, anyone, are involved in that kind of meeting of cultures. Just as when the Buddha Dharma went to Japan or China or Tibet, and it met with indigenous cultures, the cultures and religious thought and conceptions that had been there for a long time, and sensibilities and styles of being and soul styles, and it had to kind of marry the two, and it did, so that Japanese Zen is much of it grossly different than, say, Tibetan Buddhism or Theravadan Buddhism, etc. It's taken on, it had to be expanded and shaped in the context of that meeting of cultures.

So that would be a third way of regarding, a third story about soul-making Dharma in its relationship to traditional Dharma. Actually, part of that expansion is happening right now. So that movement of the Buddha Dharma meeting Western culture at this time, and we're in that process. And that's where soul-making Dharma sits, as one of the discoveries, creations, fermentations, explorations of that meeting.

So there's three options there. And I think I pointed out whenever I mentioned this before that, and then of those three options, which do you prefer? How would you like to see this? And how much, again, is it just a kind of archetypal or soul style that determines the story that we, or you, tell yourself? In other words, do you want to see yourself as a renegade revolutionary, breaking out, starting something new? Do you want to see yourself as a midwife, a part of the gentle care of birthing new life and new growth? Or do you want to see yourself as loyal and traditional within an already established range of what's already agreed upon as this is Buddha Dharma? And maybe which story I choose depends on soul style.

So, I don't know how you feel now. Maybe that's just a few too many groundlessnesses in there for you. I don't know. With all this reflection and all this, what we've sort of exposed in the pot, how does this land with you?

And if there's two ways of spinning a story, soul-making Dharma is in Buddha Dharma, or the Dharma is in soul-making, Buddha Dharma is in the soul and is part of soul-making—might that also be a version or an instance of what Lee Smolin quoted about the hypothesis of duality? Two very different ways of looking at the same thing. They seem completely incongruent, but they are merely two ways of looking at the same thing.

The Buddha Dharma is a part of soul-making. So I don't know how this lands with you—whether it agitates you, makes you nervous, makes you angry, or if it excites you, baffles you, perplexes you, or even depresses you.

I wonder whether part of opening to all this and reckoning with it—acknowledging it, pondering it—is actually part of a kind of psychological and spiritual maturity of soul. To ignore all these considerations would be somewhat immature, like saying, "I don't want to acknowledge that, I don't want to think about it—it's a bit too much."

Perhaps looking at what we've got here, admitting this mix and the nebulousness and groundlessness of it, is asking something significant of us psychologically and spiritually. To be able to do this, to be willing to engage with this, requires a kind of maturity of soul. And is it possible to open to all this and assimilate it, digest it, relate to it in a way that's actually fertile for soul-making—helpful, beautiful, expansive?

Someone once asked me, probably more than once: "Why is soul-making dharma so complicated? You've got all this stuff going on, all these words." It's a good question, and I'll offer a few reflections in response.

Partly, it's because supporting and justifying what stands other than our culture's dominant, taken-for-granted, habitual default views requires a complex movement. It's difficult to do that kind of work. Owen Barfield offers a helpful metaphor: the movements a hand makes when you untie a shoelace are actually very complicated movements, but the resulting state is relatively simple when the two sides are untied. That state is simpler than the knot itself.

It may be that untying—if you like, recognizing, exposing, untying—a lot of the deeply ingrained assumptions, perspectives, conclusions, and views we typically hold because we live in this culture at this time and have been saturated in Buddha Dharma, may actually require quite complicated movements, like untying a shoelace. But then things become more open.

A second reason for the apparent complexity is simply that logos and intellect are part of the soul-making dynamic. They're part of the eros-psyche-logos dynamic. The soul wants and needs complexity, not only simplicity. Yes, the soul wants simplicity at times—it wants a kind of spiritual simplicity, and it also wants simplicity when overwhelmed with dukkha. But it doesn't only and always want simplicity. It also wants complexity, interesting and fecund terrain, materials and challenges.

As we've pointed out in the soul-making dynamics, the soul itself will complicate and complexify, as well as simplify at times. In the movement toward the unfabricated, there's a progressive simplifying—simpler than anything we usually consider simple, simpler even than oneness. But the soul also wants complexity. Working with images and sensing the soul tends to complexify, tends to add more and more faces, aspects, dimensions.

Both movements are part of soul-making—the imaginal complexification and imaginal practice in general are only part of the larger potential range of soul-making, which can involve both movement toward simplification and movement toward complexity. The soul wants both. The soul is hungry—infinitely hungry, infinitely thirsty.

The third possible reason for complexity is that we need a sophisticated and robust philosophical framework—conceptual framework, ontology, epistemology, psychology—because much of what we're discussing will be quite alien and perhaps even shocking to many people who hear it, many dharma practitioners who hear it. This work has received and will receive criticism, ridicule, dismissal from some people who are very influenced by or attached to mainstream views and beliefs.

Therefore, it needs the surety, stability, and robustness of a more sophisticated philosophical, conceptual framework and psychology. And that means more complexity, more detail, more going into things at a deeper level, more drawing on a wider range than usual in our considerations.

We could say more as well. If we're going to acknowledge that stretching of conceptual frameworks—or breaking not just conceptual frameworks but perceptions, heart ranges, and all kinds of experiential ranges—if that kind of breaking of vessels is an inevitable part of either gentle stretching or the shattering and rebuilding of vessels in an expanded way, then shattered again...

If this whole movement or cyclical, spiraling growth of breaking vessels, stretching and breaking vessels, is an inevitable part of soul life and soul growth and soul movement, then we actually need a conceptual framework and a logos that includes and accommodates the possibility of breaking vessels in its very conception, and that is wide in its possibilities.

So if you just make a dharma that fits, that becomes a vessel, and then something in the soul pushes out and expands through that, the vessel was too small. The vessel has to be wide, and so there's more in it. That more can also be a little overwhelming or complex sounding to some people.

Sometimes people say to me, "Soul-making dharma is what the world needs now. It's exactly what we need in this time of crisis, and it's almost as if it's the one thing that's going to save humanity." I would be much more humble, I think, in an assessment and say it's one possibility. Soul-making dharma is one possible dharma for our times.

It does seem to me to have certain strengths, certain assets. It includes the personal, the particular. It does not just dismiss the self or reify the self, but offers an infinitely expanded range of possible self-expressions, self-theaters, self-explorations. It has, I think, the advantage of not being a realist framework or realist philosophy, which is problematic for all the reasons I've mentioned over recent years and even in this set of talks. It's more congruent with developments in thinking about science and philosophy from recent years.

It allows and promotes, as an integral and inevitable part of its movement, the ability to sense the world with soul, to sense the earth with soul, to sense each other with soul. The reverence and the sense of divinity, dimensionality, beauty, humility, care, eros come with that. So we sense the earth that way. We sense each other that way. We sense ourselves that way. There's a framework, both of ideas and meditative art, that supports that.

Again, you could say that's a really helpful possibility at this time. It allows a potentially much deeper care. It gives ground and ongoing support and range to the kinds of care we have for the earth, for each other, for ourselves, including ways we can think about activism and engagement as part of that. Of course there are other ways, but within the soul-making dharma it seems to offer all that.

It also recognizes the importance of choices about anthropology and cosmology, and recognizes how much those visions or views of what is a human being, what is the cosmos, how is the cosmos, what kind of cosmos do we live in—how that will affect what kind of dharma we have, what kind of sense of tradition, path, and goal. Recognizing the central, basic influence and import of anthropology and cosmology on the vision of the dharma, the sense, the scope, the version of dharma and awakening. Recognizing that and actually accommodating all that.

We don't have to insist on this kind of anthropology or that kind of cosmology. Actually, we can accommodate more coherently, more integrally, all these different views. We understand where they come from. There's a soul need for this or that view, and it will spawn this or that direction, this or that sense of the path, this or that sense of the goal. Rather than assuming that we're all talking about the same thing just because we're using vocabulary in unclear and not very well-defined ways, we recognize, acknowledge, accommodate and explore the diversity in a larger range of whole conceptions of the dharma. So all that can fit in too.

But in response to those people—actually they're not that many—who are attracted to soul-making dharma teachings but struggle a little because it's too much, too complex, there are too many possibilities for practice, too many new words and ideas: I have to say that some of it, I don't know if I would have put it out there at such a rate over the last four years were it not for my health situation and having obviously a very difficult prognosis and the possibility of dying at any time. It felt important to me to get the material out. I didn't want to feel like I died without trying to put that out there.

There's no need to digest it all at once. Hopefully these teachings are there for a while and you can return to them and pace yourself.

One extreme reaction would be, "I need to eat all this now, I need to digest it and understand it right now," and kind of over-consume or consume at a pace that not just your mind, but also your heart and your soul and your life and your relationships cannot accommodate.

Another extreme would be just to throw it all out because one is maybe attached to simplicity, for example.

But a middle way would be to take your time. Again, it's so much a matter of responsiveness, attunement, care, listening, attentive calibration of your soul and your soul's needs—how's it landing, how's it going, how is the assimilation going.

Culturally, I would say we need at this point other options rather than just the dichotomy, the split between rampant consumerism and greed and craving on the one hand, and an over-simplistic view of desire on the other—that desire, unless it's desire for compassion and liberation from suffering, is basically bad and not trustworthy. That whole third possibility or middle ground, a more complex, more nuanced exploration of eros, of desire and psychology and the soul aspects and dimensions and considerations of that—that's also necessary. So that's in the mix for some of you who are wondering.

Okay, let's stop there.

CHAPTER 188

Sīla and Soul (Part 1)

Rob Burbea · 1h46

> In this introductory talk on ethics and soul-making, Rob Burbea maps the intricate terrain of our contemporary moral landscape. He traces how Western practitioners inherit a complex mixture of ethical frameworks: the Judeo-Christian heritage of good and evil with its accompanying guilt and fear of punishment, the Buddha's reframing of ethics as kusala (skillful) and akusala (unskillful) in service of alleviating suffering, the modern emphasis on releasing self-judgment, and the postmodern suspicion of universal moral claims.
>
> Burbea draws on philosopher Alasdair MacIntyre's work to show how the meaning of 'moral' has narrowed over centuries, and how modernity's project to rationally justify ethics apart from theology ultimately failed, leaving us in a confused state where law has partially divorced from its ethical foundations. He examines Richard Rorty's pragmatism and finds it lacking—without some sense of deeper dimensionality or 'higher' orientation, ethics loses its grounding and passion.
>
> The talk addresses concerns about whether imaginal practice might be amoral or dangerous, clarifying how the elements of the imaginal lattice—including the imaginal middle way, fullness of intention, energy body sensitivity, and values as inherent elements—actually safeguard and enrich ethical sensitivity. Burbea suggests that soul-making itself may constitute a moral value, and that the cosmopoiesis arising from practice naturally cultivates reverence for self, other, and world. This serves as groundwork for deeper exploration of how soul-making Dharma might address the gaps in our collective ethical framework.

Alright, so I would like to speak about ethics—the loose translation of the Pali sīla. Ethics and morality.

Perhaps the first thing to say is that I think it's an endless subject. So this talk certainly will end, I hope, and I'm sure you hope. But in itself, I don't think humanity will ever get to the end of its exploration, consideration, and inquiry into ethics and that whole subject. It will never be finished for us, complete, all figured out. In that way, it's a subject like, for example, emotions—human emotion—which I've said before I also don't think humanity will ever reach a complete, final understanding of. Or a subject like healing, or psychology in general, or certain philosophical subjects like ontology.

These unfathomably deep and rich domains of our concern open themselves up endlessly. They're endlessly fecund for exploration, endlessly complex, endlessly open to different and competing perspectives and interpretations, views and opinions, theories, frameworks. There are all kinds of problems involved, all kinds of difficulties and challenges. But at least the way I relate to those kinds of subjects and that endlessness which they seem to open out to or contain within themselves is that rather than walking away from the complexity, the problematic, the endlessness of it, it actually invites us onward. We have a certain calling or duty or destiny to take those explorations further, as much as we can, in our generation.

So it's important to talk about these subjects because they need us, in a way, to keep progressing the discourse, the consideration, the problematic inquiry—to keep wrestling, to keep experimenting. It's not easy, but it's endlessly fertile.

One implication of this is that whatever I offer here in this talk is going to be incomplete. It's incomplete because of what I've just said about the nature of the subject. So it's appropriate that it's incomplete. I mean, it's also incomplete because of lots of other reasons, but there's a fundamental reason why it's incomplete, and it's completely appropriate that it's incomplete, because that's, I think, the nature of this subject, of this realm of inquiry, this realm of concern.

Okay, so ethics. I should say right at the beginning that I'm going to use the words ethical and moral interchangeably. I know some people make distinctions in how they use those words, but for the purposes of this talk, I'm going to use them interchangeably, at random. They mean the same thing, as far as I'm concerned, for now.

What I want to go into is, a little bit at least, and open out for reflection, for consideration, for possible avenues of practice and conceiving: the relationship of soul and ethics, soul and sīla, soul-making dharma and imaginal practice and ethics, and Buddha Dharma and the wider range of Buddha Dharma in its relationship with ethics. And then even wider—the wider culture, our contemporary, practically global culture now and ethics. I want to include particularly the need, I think, for a sort of expansion of our ethical thinking to consider our ethical relationship with the Earth, with the planet that we come from and that we live on, that is our home, and with regard to such pressing issues as climate change and species extinction.

A big subject, and way too big really, but let's see what we can do.

I should point out that tonight is really just an introduction to this larger talk on ethics—just the introductory part. So many of the pieces I touch on tonight I will hopefully pick up later as we go through on future evenings.

To begin, let me repeat a few things I've said before regarding the wider culture, our wider cultural inheritance around morality, and Buddha Dharma. Just a few brief things. Generally I don't like repeating, otherwise the talks would really go on forever. But I've said this before—I can't remember where, perhaps in Necessity of Fancy, perhaps a few other places.

In the West, in the modern West, we have a complex inheritance, a complex heritage flowing down to us from the Judeo-Christian outlook on morality, on ethics, and even more the Islamic outlook—the Abrahamic religions. Their view with regard to morality seems to most people to have the flavor of good and evil, right and wrong. There is in all that a fear of punishment, a fear of everlasting punishment from God, and a kind of guilt that accrues with that.

Actually, I think there's a lot that's extremely beautiful in those traditions. I'm just pulling out some salient features for our purposes right now, in a grossly oversimplified way—apologies for that. But a kind of dualism between good and evil, right and wrong: it's framed that way. And with that can go this fear of punishment, which in many cases can be really quite severe, and guilt that can also be really painful.

Of course, as individuals, how this complex heritage from the Abrahamic religions filters down into each individual life or the context of each individual life varies widely, depending on all kinds of conditions and factors in upbringing and personality and situation and education. But as a society, that's there in the soup, in the mix.

By contrast, to a certain extent, Buddha Dharma—and if you know Buddha Dharma, especially from the insight meditation tradition, but really right from the start—the Buddha framed his ethical teachings more in terms of what's kusala and akusala: either skillful or unskillful. Sometimes it can be translated as wholesome or unwholesome. But basically what that means is what leads to suffering, what perpetuates suffering, and what alleviates suffering.

So the whole thrust of the ethics and the ethical training in the sila is in the service of alleviating suffering, and is less cast in terms of good, evil, right and wrong.

Even that statement, even that contrast, is actually not so black-and-white true. But generally speaking, most people who come to Buddha Dharma—if they've had a painful history with notions of good and evil, right and wrong from the Abrahamic religious heritage, and the fear of punishment and guilt—find some more spaciousness and softness, some comfort and relief, in the Buddha Dharma's presentation of it as we inherit it in the West, but certainly also from the beginning with the Buddha.

Coupled with this is the fact that Western Buddha Dharma, a lot of Western Buddha Dharma—certainly the Insight Meditation tradition—has a large component of its offering that tries to address and alleviate self-judgment, the pandemic of self-judgment in our Western culture. So both the emphasis away from good and evil, right and wrong, onto the relief of suffering or the complication of suffering, and the softening of self-judgment, means that for many people the approach to ethics, the way it's presented and laid out in the Buddha Dharma as they come to it, is more spacious and palatable.

Not for everyone. In fact, as I said, it's not that simple, because if you take on board the Buddha's teachings of rebirth and karma, then if you do something in this life, you can pay karmically. I wouldn't call it a punishment—that's not the way karma is thought of—but it has karmic effects that are effectively similar to a kind of punishment, except they may not be eternal. They may still last a long time. But since a lot of modern Western Buddhism doesn't really buy into that whole paradigm of rebirth and the karmic consequences there, most modern Western Buddhism just focuses on attention to and interest in how we compound suffering in the moment, in our lives, as patterns of psychology and behavior—action, speech, and thought—and how we can alleviate that. And the ethics is generally set within that framework.

But right from the beginning, the intention of the sila, of ethical training, was really in the service of simplifying, calming and simplifying the mind. Even the third hindrance, restlessness and worry—one of the meanings implicit in that is the putting down, the release, of the kind of worry and restlessness that arises in the mind, in a being, when they're worrying about what they've done wrong, about who will find out what they've done wrong, or regret, or remorse, or guilt.

So even that, in the context of the Buddha's threefold training, the sila has this thrust toward enabling a simplifying of the mind, enabling a relative amount of peace, which then opens the doorway for deeper samadhi, for jhana, which serves insight, which delivers liberation and the end of rebirth.

The five precepts, as they've come to us over history—five precepts for lay practitioners—are in a way in the service of simplifying. They're a minimum. And one way of approaching them is not to think about it much. Just keep the precepts and then don't worry about it. The whole purpose is not to worry. So if you keep within the parameters of those five precepts, then just forget about it. Don't really trouble the mind and trouble the being wrestling with complex ethical issues, because the function of the ethics is to simplify and to calm. They serve as a kind of minimum. Certainly in the presentations of Theravada, one isn't really invited into a kind of deep pondering and grappling with ethical issues in one's life.

In some modern presentations—I'm thinking now of Thich Nhat Hanh—the Buddhist ethical precepts, the five precepts, are expanded to include their positive manifestations. So not taking what is not given extends to include practicing generosity. Again, that's something I'll come back to—the practice of virtues. Some people within the Buddha Dharma still are drawn to or feel compelled to grapple with complex ethical issues. So there's a sort of minimum given the five precepts, there's a sort of extra when we add the positive manifestations and the positive directions that Thich Nhat Hanh points to, and then some percentage of people is drawn to really ponder and grapple with these issues.

As Western Buddhists, if you like, we receive a very complex inheritance around ethics. Because even if we may have never been subject to heavy-duty presentations of Abrahamic religion in our personal lives, in our family, in our upbringing and education, it still, as I said, filters into the culture and forms part of the fabric—the sort of, I think, almost fraying fabric—of Western cultural thinking and feeling around ethics. We carry that inheritance with us to some degree or other. And then we also have this inheritance from the Buddha Dharma and this other way of thinking. They're mixed. These two are mixed together. I think it's hard for anyone in the West to completely remove themselves from that Abrahamic inheritance. So we get this mixture somewhere in our psyche, in our minds—the mixture of what we've received from Buddha Dharma and the Abrahamic religions.

Throw into that mix the rising modernist inclination, the tendency of individualism—that I can think what I want, I can do what I want, I can choose what I want—which also extends to some extent into the choices and opinions about right and wrong. But this culture of individualism, for the most part in our culture, and maybe it's a necessary evolutionary step—I think it is—but in its more immature aspects, which to some extent one has to decide how widespread you think that is, in some of its immature aspects, one can wonder how deep and authentic is a person's autonomy here. How widespread is it? Are we talking about most people? I don't know.

Is it just my right to pursue pleasure? And that's my individualism and my autonomy? Actually, it's not really autonomous at all. I'm just pulled like a puppet on a string toward pleasure. And I now have enough elbow room in society's thinking to insist on my right to pursue that pleasure, no matter what—or as far as I can until the law stops me, or it just seems outrageous in terms of its effects on other people.

So we've got this double inheritance from the Abrahamic religions and Buddha Dharma, and then the emphasis also in modern Western Buddha Dharma on letting go of self-judgment.

They're mixed. Throw into that mix a kind of individualism and a sort of invitation to think for oneself. One questions how deep and autonomous that thinking actually is. One also has to throw into the mix the flip side—the shadow side, if you like, maybe that's not the best word—the flip side of the kind of individualism that is for the most part prevalent in the wider society.

And that flip side is the inner critic. Living in a world where we conceive ourselves individually and less communally, despite some of the rhetoric that goes in newspapers, where there is this emphasis on "you can choose, you can have what you want," and all this array of choice in so many areas, with a degree of alienation from community, from earth—the flip side of this individualism is the inner critic, and the pain that it can bring. Some of that can attach to anything in one's being, but some of it can attach regarding ethics, and of course that can hook up with the heritage of the tendency to a kind of narrow and unhelpful guilt that we get from the Abrahamic religions. Actually, I'll come back to guilt in later talks, because I think guilt is interesting and not so simple.

But the inner critic can often be, is often, the flip side of a kind of individualism. And at its worst, it can actually be quite incapacitating, quite debilitating and limiting in what it does to our ethical capacity, our ethical sensitivity, our ethical range and courage. We can become too self-preoccupied, and the inner critic is a state of self-preoccupation, self-anxiety. That can block our ethical sensitivity, which becomes too concerned with our self and our own pain, too contracted that way.

So you've got all these factors in the mix. I can throw in a couple more. On the one hand, you've got a wider culture that celebrates a certain level of individualism, which we might say, certainly from the perspective of Soulmaking Dharma, is still a kind of immature individualism, an immaturely enchanted individualism. And at the same time, what you've got in some, maybe most Dharma circles, Buddha Dharma circles, is a kind of anti-individualism, because there's all this talk about the emptiness of the self. Again, we get a little confused about what that means. Am I trying to tone down my personality, or erode it, or hide, or not stick out like a sore thumb, or not be too colourful?

So you get these conflicting heritages all mixed together as part of our collective inheritance, impacting each of us very uniquely and differently. But this is all in the mix, and to some extent, all of it will impact all of us.

And then lastly—and again, I've pointed all this out before—what you have is an inheritance in the Buddha Dharma, certainly in Theravādan Buddha Dharma and the Insight Meditation tradition: certain images, stories of a certain archetype of what awakening looks like, that tends to be quite limited in its range, and is not recognized as an archetype, as a fantasy, as an image, and therefore has a kind of insidious power over us. Because the Buddha statues are there, the stories are there, the tone is there, the presentation styles are there. Something is communicated: this is what awakening looks like, feels like, how it expresses itself. And the archetype of that is quite limited. It looks peaceful, equanimous, unemotional, except for perhaps some measure of compassion. It doesn't have a lot of wrestling with complex issues or difficult moral problems and situations. There is this simplicity of being that's part of the archetype. And there isn't, for instance, the ferocious warrior, certainly not in the Theravāda and Insight Meditation traditions.

So all that is part of the heritage we receive, in that case less verbally—or as much non-verbally as verbally. I do think, even in recent months, certainly in England, that this is beginning to change. There's a wider exploration of archetypal expressions, which I think is wonderful.

So, as I said, I may come back to all of this, but the point now is just how complex this inheritance is, how multi-directional, how self-contradictory it is. And there are other issues that I haven't perhaps touched on as much that I want to begin to open up.

In regard to our contemporary culture, it's worth pointing out something about the trajectory of our relationship—if you like, our collective relationship, because there's always going to be individual variations—our collective relationship with morality, with ethics. Borrowing again from Alasdair MacIntyre and his book After Virtue, which I mentioned in one of the recent talks, he looks at the history of the word moral. Interestingly, he says moral is the etymological descendant of moralis from the Latin, but moralis, like its Greek predecessor ethikos—from which we get the word ethical—means "pertaining to character." It came into the Latin from the Greek. So ethos is the character, the flavour of either a person's character, or the character of an institution, or the character of a society. We talk about the ethos, and that's where we get the word ethical. And the word moralis from Latin, from which we get the word moral, also means "pertaining to character."

MacIntyre writes that a person's character is nothing other than their set of dispositions to behave systematically in one way rather than another, to lead one particular kind of life. So it's really the quality, flavour, tenor, character of the whole set of dispositions that pertain to a person or an institution or a society.

But he goes on, and this I think is interesting, to trace a kind of narrowing of the meaning of the word moral. It is in the late seventeenth century, he writes, that it is used for the first time in its most restricted sense of all—that in which it has to do primarily with sexual behaviour. So there's a word that was quite wide and then somehow got squeezed tighter and tighter and ended up having to do mostly with sexual behaviour. He asks: how could it come about that being "immoral" could be equated, even as a special idiom, with being sexually lax?

One of the important points is that with the Western Enlightenment, there was a divorce of morality from theology, aesthetics, and law. This was part of the separation of religious concerns and issues and concepts and assumptions from other concerns that were more based on the Western Enlightenment, the Scientific Revolution, and so forth. And because morality as a sphere of concern got separated out from religion and theological concerns, it needed its own justification. It was no longer justified with regard to divine law or religious proposition. So the attempts to provide a rational justification for morality in that historical period—and he traces it from around 1630 to 1850, that period of the Western Enlightenment and the beginnings of modernity—

That's when it acquired a sense at once general and specific, he said. In that period, morality became the name for that particular sphere in which rules of conduct—which are neither theological nor legal nor aesthetic—are allowed a cultural space of their own. It is only in the later seventeenth century and the eighteenth century, when this distinguishing of the moral from the theological, the legal, and the aesthetic has become a received doctrine, that the project of an independent rational justification of morality becomes not merely the concern of individual thinkers but central to Northern European culture.

In other words, with the Western Enlightenment and the Scientific Revolution, and to some extent the Renaissance, there arose this endeavour to remove the dominance and infiltration of religious dogma, assertions, and assumptions—to separate that out from the rest of human life and inquiry, from society, science, law, and morality. Religion was separated out from morality, and morality was separated out from religion. And because it was now separated out, it needed its own rational justification. Rational justification was exactly what the Western Enlightenment and the Scientific Revolution were about. So this sphere, now distinct, required its own rational foundation.

And so enter the different philosophers: Hume and Locke, Hobbes and J.S. Mill and Jeremy Bentham, Immanuel Kant and later G.E. Moore. What is interesting is that this project—to deduce or derive or elucidate a rational justification for morality—was attempted by all this series of great Western minds, and they failed. There was no answer that was completely satisfying to everyone in terms of rationally justifying morality. So the project of modernity with regard to ethics had, in a way, a very shaky foundation. Foundations were attempted, were built, but they never really got built very well.

And as time went on and modernity segued, or disintegrated, into postmodernity—if we can even use those terms—it became more explicitly voiced by some thinkers that actually any insistence on a unifying morality, on a universal morality, was inappropriate, impossible, for the same reasons we talked about when we discussed postmodernism the other day.

Now, of course, this is only one sector of thinkers, and of course, in many respects, despite all this, you could say that in some respects there has been—if we can even say it—great progress morally over the last few hundred years. There has also been completely not. One only has to look at the twentieth century, or look around us these days, to see the gaps, the problems, the shakiness, the uncertainties, the confusion and contradictions. But some postmodern thinkers at least ruled out the possibility of any kind of universal ethics. And so what entered the field was a sort of relativism with regard to ethics and morality.

Now, that wasn't received without a sense of problem. People said, this is a problem, somehow we need to fix this. But it seems very unclear how to actually move out of that kind of confusion and quagmire—where it's kind of taboo to insist on a universal morality, and yet complete moral relativism is also felt by many people to be problematic. So again, we're in a kind of conundrum at the present, in a cauldron of mixed pulls in different directions, of confusions, of gaps and contradictions.

And it may be that we can look around us and say what we have now—and I'm thinking of UK society and the US—is, to a certain extent, a very confused state of affairs with regard to ethics. In some respects we have law, a system of law that is in many ways supposed to be based on ethics, but has actually been divorced from ethics. Or another way of stating the problem: the law is supposed to apply to everyone, supposed to be universal. Everyone is subject to the same law, allegedly. But underpinning that, or supposedly underpinning that, is ethics—and there is not a universal agreement on a universal ethics. So there is a mismatch.

And to some extent from that mismatch, the law unmoors itself from an underpinning in ethics. It exists as something to respect, to preserve supposedly the stability and integrity of society. But in many ways it's not always rooted in concern for ethics or in something deeper. Obviously it's not a complete divorce between law and ethics; much, I'm sure, of the original intention behind laws, and how they get updated in legislation, is related to ethics. But there is a partial divorce, a partial disconnection, because there isn't the universal agreement on the ethical foundation of law. There's supposed to be, and sometimes it's assumed that there is, but actually it's not completely congruent.

Two things about that. One: I'm thinking now of the Extinction Rebellion protests and the clamour of objection and opposition to protesters. Some voices would say, "Don't you care about law and order? You're throwing that out the window by disrupting with your protests." But that kind of statement presupposes, implicit in it, that law and order in themselves are ultimately valuable, or more valuable than some ethical consideration—which to me is ridiculous. One only need go back to certain societies: South Africa, Nazi Germany, and you could mention many others, where law and order might have held sway, been kept in place very well by the government and most members of society, either directly or indirectly complicit. And yet it was holding up, was part of the fabric and structure of a fundamentally unethical system—apartheid, Nazism.

And the second thing in this confusion is that, in a way, what we have as part of the situation now is strident ethical cries from different perspectives that often conflict with each other, but carry this very strident tone.

So you often only need to read headlines in some newspapers, whatever, and in some areas or from some perspectives shouting very loud with a sort of presumption of moral righteousness, and at the very same time, huge areas of complete lack of concern or sympathy around other moral issues. All this is part of the mix of confusion, the confusing mix in our contemporary cauldron.

I mentioned Richard Rorty the other day and sort of used his thinking as an example of some of the lacunae, some of what's missing in our contemporary thinking about all this coming out of postmodernism. He used to often repeat that the most important thing is to keep the conversation going—that we should prioritize, over epistemological and ontological inquiries and approaches, continuing "the conversation of the West," as he phrased it. This was part of his concern with what he called solidarity and morality.

Now, as far as I know, he didn't actually write much about morality, and part of the reason, I think, is because his approach left him with very little to say about it. We could ask: why is it good or important to keep the conversation—whatever that means, "the conversation of the West"—going? Why is it good or important? Surely such a question leads, perhaps via more questions, to some assertion, some belief in some fundamental principle or principles which need dogmatic allegiance or some epistemological or ontological support. In a way, his philosophy was a refusal of any inquiry into ontology and epistemology apart from deconstructing it, and yet there was this insistence on keeping the conversation going. But when you start to ask why, there's nothing underneath.

As I said, I don't know his writings encyclopedically at all, but from what I've delved into a little bit, he does seem to have very little to say regarding ethics and values. The question I have is: do those areas regarding ethics and morality need some kind of underpinning and orientation? An underpinning at another level to explain, to give us a sense of their import? An orientation to what we call higher or more fundamental ideas, principles, values, psychologies? Could it be that the reason someone like Richard Rorty seems to have so little to say about ethics is because he absolutely refuses any kind of underpinning at a deeper level, any dimensionality, any orientation to a sense of what is higher?

I'll come back to that in a moment, but we might also ask again: what if this conversation that he's referring to gets really silly, or becomes a waste of time, or is itself a distraction from other issues and demands? And when does, for example, hate speech and stupid conversation—what do we do with that? There's this problem of the question of free speech, and so forth.

But principally, as I said, his insistence, his project and his insistence within his project on what he calls—he wants to get rid of what he calls "numinous notions." Numinous is another word for divine notions. Any notions of some other deeper dimensions, some higher sense of things—he wants to get rid of that. So he just wants to say morality simply is. "We need to think of our distinctive moral status as just that, rather than as grounded on our possession of"—and then he gives a whole list of other things. "All these numinous notions are just expressions of our awareness that we are members of a moral community, phrased in one or another pseudo-explanatory jargon. This awareness is something which cannot be further grounded. It is simply taking a certain point of view on our fellow humans. The question of whether it is an objective point of view is not to any point."

So he really has this insistence on removing any kind of deeper level of grounding or anchoring or dimensionality. We might say he absolutely refuses it. I guess part of what I want to say through these talks on ethics is: is that not exactly what we need? Without a sense of dimensionality and reference to something higher, a sense of something higher in which to ground our ethics, we're just at sea in this quagmire of potential relativism.

Again, what you sometimes find in Richard Rorty's writings are these slips where his language kind of betrays him. He talks, for instance, about how "we hope by acting this way in a certain situation to decrease our chances of acting badly." But the question is unexplained: what does "badly" mean, and why is such an act a bad act? Where does he get the moral rules from? On what are they grounded? He's insisting on not grounding morality on anything, and yet he's insisting on morality—but what morality? Where does it get its sense of import? Where can we even find a passion in relation to morality?

Similarly, when he talks more generally in epistemological terms, he says someone might have "a good account" of why they think this or believe that, why they explain their own ethical behavior this way or that way. They might have a good account, or they might not. But again, what does he mean by "a good account"? If he's refusing any inquiry into epistemology apart from a deconstruction of it, any inquiry into ontology, what do these words "good" and "bad" mean? How do we decide what's good and bad? They slip into the writing, and again, to me this indicates, it betrays gaps, lacunae, a lack of consideration, a lack of adequate explanation and adequate grounding.

Just one more quote from him: "There is no inferential connection between the disappearance of the transcendental subject—of the human being as something having a nature which society can repress or understand—and the disappearance of human solidarity." In other words, his idea is that any kind of depth to a human being in the sense of dimensionality, which could be understood or which could be blocked or repressed by society—any notion of that, the disappearance of this notion of a human being having those transcendental dimensions—there's no inferential connection, he says, between that disappearance in our time and the disappearance of human solidarity.

So solidarity is the word he uses a lot, overlapping with morality. And then he writes, "Bourgeois liberalism seems to me the best example of the solidarity we have yet achieved." I'm not sure about his phrase "bourgeois liberalism" — he uses it quite a lot, and my suspicion is that he uses it slightly provocatively. But I don't know. Can bourgeois liberalism, whatever exactly he means by that, be separated from capitalism and democracy?

One of the things I think is problematic right now is capitalism. I'll return to that in a moment. But the other thing that's happened with postmodernity is this separating out of ethics from law and theology — the sort of atrophying of theology — and from aesthetics and from other concerns. With the postmodern objection to, and hesitancy about, coming up with a universal moral code or understanding of morality, what also goes with that is a kind of suspicion of power structures, a suspicion of hegemony in terms of who's deciding what is moral and what isn't. This suspicion is, to some extent, well grounded in the history of abuse from religious institutions over the years.

With that goes then the promise of democracy as a sort of equalizing force, where everyone with their different opinions can have their say. And of course, that's a very wonderful thing in democratic countries — a real evolution in humanity. But recently, in the last few years, much as I'm a believer in and lover of democracy, I sometimes wonder whether I still believe in it any longer. I mean, I do really, but I have some questions. I doubt I'm the only one.

I'm not sure that I believe in the immunity of the people to various forms of manipulation, whether gross or subtle — manipulation by those in power, manipulation by those with wealth and certainly excessive wealth, by the interests of corporations, by the runaway juggernaut of corporate interest. Or simply whether the people are immune to manipulation by the popular dominant view of things, of values and ethics. Let alone manipulation by Russian cyber hackers and so on.

And also what we've been reading in the news in the last few years about social media — the fact of infiltration in social media, but also the kind of closed social media circle. You tend to get feeds into your Facebook or whatever it is that are selected based on what you like to look at. And someone with very different politics, very different views, will get a similarly closed feed and be involved in a similarly closed social media circle — but espousing very different views, very divergent versions of the news. So people are seeing and receiving and sharing quite different versions of reality.

Democracy is then trying to function in a world where all these problematic issues of manipulation and distortion and alienation are coming in — through power, through wealth, through corporate interest, through just the dominant view that has its entrenched sort of power and influence. Heaven knows what's happening with Russia and all that. And then this strange phenomenon of divergent closed social media circles, where we receive and share pictures of the world, implicit in which are values and ethical systems that are really quite divergent, without much actual dialogue or meeting or opening out of views there.

In that whole quagmire, that confusion, that whole mess, democracy is trying to function, and it's pulled a couple of pegs down from the ideal of what democracy can be. So when Rorty talks about bourgeois liberalism, can that be separated from capitalism and democracy — and democracy now with fake news and all the rest, as I've just been discussing?

If we linger on the situation in our contemporary civilization, our contemporary societies, there is this issue from the beginnings of modernity — stretching through quite a while — tracing the history of the attempt to ground and make sense of and make rational justifications of morality in different ways, and how those attempts have failed.

There's the opening up of the postmodern sort of anti-universalism and anti-truth, if you like, and the danger of the quicksand of total relativism there. And this appeal to democracy, wonderful and yet increasingly evident that it's also problematic these days.

In all of that, we live as well — we're considering our contemporary situation — we live in an increasingly globalized world, a globalized society. So when we consider ethics, the immediate thing that should hopefully be obvious is simply that our actions have consequences today; our actions locally have consequences globally. What we buy on the high street — certainly, you know — or what we buy from the internet, how we get our energy and heat our houses, all this has consequences across the globe.

We can no longer, as did the Buddha in his time, think of ethics as just pertaining to me and whoever it obviously involves — these two parties. If I lie to this person, if I cheat this person of something, if I harm them in some way, it affects me and it affects them. But we are living in a globalized society, and that makes the whole ethical consideration almost infinitely more sensitive a system. What we do here has repercussions that we're beginning to learn more and more about, but even that understanding is only a drop in the ocean of the actual repercussions. There's an immense complexity in that. It's very challenging.

Part of globalization is also globalized capitalist thinking, a globalized economy based on a capitalist economy, with all the problems of the idea of infinite economic growth on a finite planet with finite resources. There's also the problem with globalization of a decrease in diversity — diversities of all kinds, in fact. The ethos of Western free market capitalism, and all the fashions and aspirations that pertain to that culture, that way of life — increasingly this has been globalized as well. So there's a displacement, a disappearance of more traditional cultures, traditional values, traditional ways of life, traditional outlooks and aspirations. All kinds of decreases in diversity go with that globalization, because what gets globalized is a certain outlook on life, a certain way of going about life, a certain ethos. And with that, a certain ethics.

All this implies that humanity needs to rethink and perhaps expand and deepen our moral considerations. Or try to. I don't think that's easy at all. And some of that might involve looking at ontological considerations, because I don't feel, for example, that what Richard Rorty has written or said on the subject has done much at all, really, to help things. So it might involve further considerations of ontology.

If we linger just a little bit longer on our contemporary predicament in the wider culture, one of the things that's interesting to me is that at some point along the way, we seem to have lost the ideal of moral education. The development of character, especially in relation to moral values and aspirations, has disappeared, it seems, mostly from Western society. You see it in religions and spiritual institutions and schools, and only there is it deemed okay to instruct or direct or reprimand or encourage a person above, say, eighteen years old. There seems to be this cutoff point around eighteen years where you can subject someone to the order of the law, you can put them in prison or whatever, but there's not really this idea of moral education.

As I said, law has, in some respects, trumped or replaced ethics as a foundation. But what is the law founded on? Partly it's founded on ethics, but partly it becomes this free-floating thing that is its own raison d'être. And something happens around eighteen years where it's considered a bit taboo to educate someone outside a very specific context. To direct or reprimand, instruct, or encourage a person above about eighteen years on the path towards what we might call higher and nobler and fuller and more sensitive and wise values and aspirations—somehow it's not okay.
